to try out the brat’s suggestion. He had asked for one, so following her weird Storm-Cloud logic he was ‘acceptable’ to test variations of ‘hugs’ on.

"Huh… this is better."

He couldn't even get annoyed she was likely creasing his suit jacket, while she figured out what to do with her hands and elected to finally cross them behind his back. The hitman patted the woman on the back absently, keeping his own arms around shoulder level since it seemed she disliked having her arms constrained, and let go quickly when she stepped back.

"Thanks, Shamal."

Brat of a Mist looked delighted he helped in some way. Then he really thought through the logistics of his suggestion/demand and put the older Italian together with that and flicked a slightly wary glance up at him.

As the feel of Sonya pressed up against his chest would take a whole lot of time to fade, Renato wasn’t particularly upset with the brat.

He rolled his eyes again and dropped a hand so the kid could get his not-really-hidden desire for a full family unit thing out of his system. "Come on, we're going to be late."

"Ooh shit. Erm... I mean. Uh... damn?" Looking around at the rapidly emptying courtyard, and only absently giving the Mist her hand as well when he tugged her skirt for it, the thief tried to think of a way to swear without offending the priests inside. "Well... ah fuck. Whatever."

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 29th of June, 1969 continued. Moscow School # 3054, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Chikatilo Andrei Romanovich?" Called the pretty brunette woman, checking off the list of teacher candidates she had yet to get through.

When the man across from Artemiy got up, she beckoned him down the hallway to the classroom she had appropriated for this round of screening.

"Down here."

The hopeful literature teacher fussed with his hat, thinking through what he would have to do if this didn't pan out. He had a factory job already... but frankly he would much rather teach.

"Dyrbov Artemiy Nikolayevich!" Startling to his feet, the unhealthily thin looking man with short greying blond curls betokened him down the hall to his own repurposed classroom to hold interviews in. "Come with me, please."

That was... a strange accent. Maybe a language teacher?

This was not particularly a school he had any experience with, private schools were thin on the ground in the city, but it was also possibly part of the reason they had to take out advertisement in a local paper in order to gather up more teachers. It was entirely possible they were going to teach more than just Chinese or another of the Slavic languages to their students.

Realizing he had maybe hesitated too long, his mother always did complain he had his head in the clouds a bit too often, Artemiy hastened to the thin man's side. "Ah... Dybov is me. I, I mean."

He shut his mouth before it could run away with him, but his possible future co-worker merely looked tiredly amused. "I'm sure. I am Bordrov Jaroslav, but call me Scruffy."

"...uh... Scruffy?"

"Long story. And if Bazanova tells you it has anything to do about jail cells or firing lines in Africa, she's kidding. Hard to tell with her, but..." The man shrugged casually as he entered the room first, as if that wasn't nearly incomprehensible despite his careful pronunciation of his words. "I'm the science teacher, emphasis on engineering and earth sciences. Possibly the English teacher if we're allowed. Bazanova's our librarian, one of the substitutes for literature and an elective in non-typical sciences... and currently filling in as our principal."

Were they that pressed for personnel some of the teachers had doubled down on the classes they were willing to teach?

"I can teach music."

It earned him a curious look, as the thin man folded himself into the chair behind the lone full-sized desk at the front of the classroom and gestured to a more comfortable seat than the student desks and chairs laid out in rows before him. "Oh? Interesting. Beginner, intermediate, or advanced?"

"Beginner." Artemiy hadn't picked up an instrument in a couple years, but he could read and teach students to read music sheets and how to tune various wood and string instruments.

He was not qualified to teach a chorus, but he could learn in a fast hurry if need be. Which would be more than enough time to re-discover if his skills in the violin had lasted through his stint as a factory worker.

"Violin and piano, but I'll branch out to other string instruments if you'd like."

He'd do probably a lot of things to land this job, picking up an old interest and passion of his would be no great hardship.

"I don't make the final calls, unfortunately. Otherwise I would say yes, we don't currently have a music teacher." Bordrov, Scruffy, raked a hand through his close shorn silvering curls, which seemed to be early and stress induced, not because the man was really that old. "But I'll note it down, and it'll probably earn you a harder look in the end."

"Quick question?" Artemiy waited for a nod before asking, because this was a bit off and while he normally wouldn't approach anything this shady he was pretty desperate for something that wasn't grinding out parts to automobiles in shifts. "Isn't this a school for the advancement of science?"

"Well of course, but not everything we do has to be rooted in logic and reason. That's why we're also teaching art, music, and languages." It sounded rehearsed, so apparently he hadn't been the only one to wonder. However, the other man had a point. "It'll be an elective, just to warn you, if it does go through."

"I am fine with that."

"Perfect." Scruffy claimed, noting it down on the page of references and prior teaching experience they had asked him to supply when he applied in their advert. "Now then. To the more boring parts of this..."
"Alright then, who all do we have?"

"Four possible Literature and Grammar teachers, a promising basic Arithmetic instructor and possible Geometry, Trigonometry, and a Calculus coaches. Two history teachers you might want to look at, a chemist interested in teaching if we would like to arrange his instructor's license, and a biology major from a local Professional Technical School who's interested in the same." Galina ticked off, then lifted her eyes from the file in her hands to look up at the Storm-Cloud that had asked. "Beyond the possible outside hires; Lisa, Scruffy, you, I, and the Triad member Yanlin have all completed our teaching certificates. Irinei is testing for his this week, Tatiana and Avdotya have arranged a schedule to trade off time as a Mafia Land nurse and the nurse in residence at the school."

The Lightning took a deep breath, then continued.

"The school is entirely outfitted with everything we need, the library is stocked, there's half of the textbooks we might need and we can't order the rest until you confirm the new hires, we did forget to hire janitors or cooks for the cafeteria, but the basement and the 'elective' classes are also about half-stocked with the supplies they're going to need."

Sonya rubbed her temple tiredly. "I thought the clan would be supplying the other personnel? The staff needed to keep the place running?"

"...might be best to seek our own people for that." Suggested the brunette after a long moment of contemplation. "While I'm sure old man Zolotov wouldn't mind given what we've supplied for the clan, you know Gedeon would cut us off the very moment he's in complete control. Even if it would be cutting off his nose to spite his face. Or he might actually have a decent sense of business acumen and will hold it over the school somehow just for leverage."

"And how much more is that going to cost us? I take it this is part of the 'supplies' we still need?"

Her assistant gave her an entirely plastic-looking bright grin. "It would help... if you went on another spree. Another big one. Frankly, we sold too many of the stones if we're opening up the Flame focus matching as an actual service as well as for our projected first year of students."

"...son of a bit-

"Also!" Ruthlessly continued the Lightning over her underboss, ignoring any dirty looks shot her way with admirable aplomb. "I can at least supply a shopping list this time. Spinal is pretty much what we need in the greatest quantities, but the pricier stuff to hawk for the cold cash to pay the first round of paychecks and the school's fees, utilities, and taxes is also very useful at this point."

The thief that would be stealing all this shit flatly glared at the slightly older woman, until a prepared 'shopping list' was handed over with a bit more awkward-looking plastic smile.

"Really Sonya, I'm sorry I have to ask again. But... we're running through the supplies faster than I had thought."
"...erm... can I...?"

"Ask, Scruffy." Sonya prompted the man, not really patient enough in the face of this news to wait for him to figure out how to 'delicately' phrase what he wanted.

"Aren't... most of the 'pricier stuff' basically... useless? There's also the metal and finished pieces, right?" Fidgeting, the Sun gestured to the information spread out all over his thighs to either make a point or draw attention to it. "I mean... aside the sapphires. Sometimes."

"I sell all of that off to buy the semi-precious stones in bulk." Answered the Lightning promptly, tossing her head in a non-shoulder involved shrug since her arms were full of things she was trying to look through. "The extra money is also how we afforded the school's property in the first place, and how we got it furnished legally for visibility and transparency reasons."

"Is there anything you want in particular?" Tacked on the Storm-Cloud curiously, as he had put in an order for gem cutting tools.

Those were a bit more specialized and high profile than most other tools the clan had ever needed to get, so their acquisition was being handled through Mafia Land and Björn.

Her poor Lackey, while he had been perfectly aware and comfortable with how to accept a contract for a heist... placing a contract for an 'acquisition' on her behalf had flustered him something fierce.

The expression that crossed Scruffy's face was an interesting study into what happened when a semi-forthright person's practicality warred with his morals.

"If you want the raw gems to practice on without worrying about how much they're going to cost you, speak now."

Apparently, her words hadn't helped much.

Peter glanced to his work, to her, then to the cuffs of a rather newer looking coat he was wearing. Then he planted his face into his hands for a long moment. "I suppose it would be highly hypocritical of me to ask it be purchased legally if possible?"

"The money will be obtained illegally." Sonya answered slowly, because this seemed to be a fairly serious issue that she recalled her brother having fits with before, curiously looking over at her Sun foundling. "I do have a legal source of income, actually. So, while I could arrange that... it's more trouble than it's worth at this point."

"...you do?"

"Investments. Which were bought with illegal money, again." Shrugging, the thief paired Galina's shopping list with the general paperwork she had to look over and decide on the final hires for their school effort through. "And again, I can do it. I won't appreciate that limitation, and will eventually get fed up with it, but if you need more time..."

"No." Scruffy decided firmly, dropping his hands and giving her a semi-resigned huff. "I'll live with my eroded moral code."

"Scruffy, Peter. I can't actually let you go since you made yourself useful, but if you'd like a quiet little house in the middle of nowhere..."

"Again, Sonya, I'll live with it." The Sun dismissed stoutly, returning his attention pointedly to his own work after taking in a bracing breath to prepare himself. "Hiding from myself will do no one any favors, and I'd rather be aware of what kind of risk I'm involved with than ignore it and be surprised when it blows up in my face."

A not particularly objectionable outlook, all in all.

If she didn't have Cherep, it was likely she'd be less patient with Scruffy's quibbling about moral and immoral income. Thankfully it seemed as if Peter would compromise his integrity if need be, although she wasn't sure about her own feelings on the matter.

She wasn't upset she was forcing that in him, because no matter how he wanted to handle it he was now officially part of the mafia and this life was a kind that wouldn't let go unless you went to extreme lengths to leave it behind. Sonya was still kind of sorry it was her and not just life events forcing it, but not to the degree she was sure she should be.

….or thought she should be.

Another few moments of thought, and the Storm-Cloud wrote it off as a bad job all around.

It wasn't Scruffy's fault he made himself useful using information they were restricting to the Flame user's office, nor was it his fault he survived however many years of imprisonment and likely slave labor on the virtue of his Sun Flames.

Bad timing, bad situations, and just one man trying to make the best of it with good intentions but resulting in things she couldn't justify cutting loose from her security even for his own comfort.

Now then, who would she be hiring with that yet-to-be acquired illegal money?

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 30th of June, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya puzzled over the contents of her fridge but shut it instead of pull something out of it.

The stock of food she had bought with Renato had been decimated over the last two weeks to the point she had just odds and ends left. Which wasn't necessarily a bad thing, most of what was left had longer shelf lives than the milk and produce, but it didn't really suggest anything for dinner to her.

Additionally, she might need to go grocery shopping.

Possibly.

If she could think of nothing that would use a container of yogurt, a block of hard cheese, the three lone carrots, and the half-full jug of juice she still had.

…but she was frankly tired of, and sometimes failing at, cooking.

She turned to address the only other adult in the suite now, running the list of restaurants in the area that did take-away through her mind to figure out what she wanted to eat. "Hey, Cherep? Do you-"

Cutting herself off, the Storm-Cloud stared blankly at what had resulted the last hour when she had been occupied reading resumes and the annotations Galina and Scruffy had added over the course of the interviews they'd done for her.
Her brother was sprawled out on her couch, a leg thrown over the back of the couch while the other was set on the arm rest. His head was hanging fully off the cushions, his purple hair brushing the floorboards, and one arm was propped up on the books laid out on her coffee table.

Not entirely new for him, as she recalled him doing it in both Germany and when she caught him napping in the circus.

The new bit was that Shamal had ended up face-down and dead asleep on his chest.

He had a session with the Mists earlier today, broadening his grasp on teleporting with Mist Flames to the point he could support going from one side of the room to another without ending up in weird or odd positions instead of where he picked.

Apparently just to get comfortable with the idea of it, and with the mechanics of how it would work out for him. Repeated teleports, or far ones, were generally known to be draining according to Anna.

It wasn't unusual that her brat had tired himself under Usov's eye, but it was unusual he'd curl up with anyone but her or Renato if he was tired.

When it was the hitman, it was more usual for him to curl up nearby instead of actually on the man. This was… actually a new sight for her.

Kind of adorable actually, for her prickly little brat who was not only good at hiding his wariness but also who generally kept new people at arm's length for a long time before trusting that they wouldn't leave him alone suddenly. Shamal didn't really like a lot of new people, he wasn't evenly cautiously hopeful Galina and Scruffy would be lingering around him for long.

Which… they wouldn't.

They'd only move to Italy when she did, but she did catch that he was being very chary about agreeing to have more games with her foundling Sun user when they met up again in a year or so. Which was a year or so away, practically forever for the poor kid.

Even Galina only got respect and his attention rather than affection, even if the Lightning had gone out of her way to be just as useful to her brat as she was to Sonya herself by suggesting fixes to the few problems he wondered about.

Pessimistic of him, but his father had died on him in a likely messy or scarring manner and neither she nor Renato could spare a lot of free time for him right now.

Rather, they couldn't spare more than they could manage in week or two stretches here or there… and often it was them putting aside the work they did for a living in his favor when they could afford it. They were still in the middle of putting more things in place, so he wasn't always living with strangers in their homes two and a half years after he ended up with the hitman instead of somewhere stable and permanent with either of them.

Her family seemed to earn themselves a pass if only because they came attached to her, she didn't miss that Shamal wouldn't interact with her family unless someone else started it. Usually Valera starting a little tiff or Lisa asked what he'd like to eat would get him involved, but he even waited for Tatiana to ruffle his hair first or for Cherep to bend down to his level before really talking to them.

It'd be better in as little as a year and maybe at most two, which might make the Mist brat relax that edge of wariness to him when it came to new people and stop holding so hard to the few he already had, but for now…
fuck, Sonya didn't have a camera. "...Anna? Or is Usov the one here now?"

"No, Miss Bazanova. Usov has occupied himself with visiting his parents this night." Announced the Mirror Lady from the tiny window that let in either sunlight or the ambient street lighting from outside. "I take it you wanted something?"

"...go ask Lisa for her camera. Please." She'd invest in her own tomorrow or send Galina out to purchase one.

The young woman in the reflection scanned the room to see why, spotted her menfolk in their puppy pile, then winked out of view but the window giggled for a few moments afterwards even if the Mist was out of sight.

Trippy.

"...I heard that."

"Don't move." Sonya demanded, approaching the twosome to ensure Shamal wasn't going to wake up with a crick in his neck. "I want a picture, and I'm badly underprepared for things like this."

Cherep cracked open an eye, peering up at her in amusement. "Tsk tsk, sis. Behind in your mom-duties?"

"...are there regulations for this?"

Snorting, her brother readjusted his head so it was no longer hanging down. He also shifted himself more on the couch, but at least that didn't wake Shamal so she didn't kick him for it.

"There's a couple modes you can go with. You could be that mom that obsesses over everything your brat does, and has to shove it into other people's faces. Or the mom that's embarrassingly overly affectionate in public."

"...yeah, no."

"I think, personally, you're an awesomely groovy mom." He continued cheerfully, even as Anna rose out of the kitchen tiles holding their foster mother's camera. "You know, the type that lets her kids fuck up but will bail them out in the end?"

"...so, like Lisa? Well..." It was who she was taking cues from in how to raise the brat. Sonya couldn't really recall much of Rachel's early years much anymore, so Lisa was the mom she knew best right now. "...thanks? I'm still taking a picture and giving her one to torture you with."

"That would only be possible if I was embarrassed about this at all." Cherep corrected snootily, then rubbed the Mist brat's back to wake him up a little before she could capture them both when one was still asleep. "Hey... Shamal? Say cheese."

"...what?" The kid pulled his head up just in time to get flash-blinded.

"Continuing," Sonya returned the camera to the Mist that brought it, so Anna could take it back to their foster mother, which she did with another bell-like giggle that echoed back from her kitchenette's floor, "what do you two want for dinner?"

Shamal pulled a disgruntled little pout, rubbing his eyes irritably. "Mamma... what was that for?"

"...to torture you with when you grow up."
Cherep snickered, grunting when the grumpy Mist thumped him on the chest in revenge. "I've got no real opinion."

"Lasagna?"

Sighing, the thief wondered how late the black-market spice trade was open. "I can do that, if your zio agrees to watch you for an hour or so."

"...wait, can we really make that here?"

Sonya eyed her brother warily for a moment. "There is a thing called the underground spice trade. I need more olive oil, and probably some tomatoes, ground beef, and garlic cloves I don't have to buy illegally, but the sheet pasta and the right kind of cheese... I'll only be able to find that there and I'm fresh out."

"The... what?" Huffing when a Mist knee dug into his stomach when Shamal climbed off him groggily, the stuntman pushed himself up into a half-reclined position just to give her a dubious look. "People steal spices?"

"Of course we do. Do you know how much cardamom and saffron sells for? By the fraction of an ounce?"

Cherep pulled a face at her, swinging his legs off the couch and employing a bit of muscle control to not knock her brat in the head with his motorcycle boots. "That's freaking weird."

"Also... cheese wheels, liquor, and caviar are also frequently targeted from what I've seen of Mafia Land contracts."

Her fellow Cloud blurted out a laugh. "Really?"

"I've seen them, never took one. Well... there was a recipe for an alcoholic drink, but it's as close as I've ever gotten to enabling the illegal spice trade."

"...no, I've got to see this." Cherep decided, slouching against her couch now. "That sounds hilarious."

"I swear to whatever god you hold dear, if you just want to come along to eat something questionable in front of me..." Sonya kind of wondered if she kept talking, would her brother end up upside down again? "But it's still a black market, Cherep."

"Mmm... I think you're scary enough I'll bet on you instead of anyone interested in picking a fight with you."

"Are we going for a walk then?" Shamal perked up, stumbling to his feet instead of remained sprawled out leaning up against the couch next to her brother's legs. "Please?"

She sighed heavily. "I can get Anna to watch you-

"Please?" Her brat interrupted her, peering up hopefully.

Sonya flatly stared back, until he got the message she didn't appreciate his rudeness in cutting her off.

"...sorry. But... please?"

"You're going to crash early if you come with, Shamal. We won't get to reading tonight if you really want to come along," Between Mist teleporting instruction and an hour or so of walking tonight, even if he asked Cherep for a lift for some of it, she didn't expect him to last much beyond dinner. "Tats might be free for a night, if I call."

Even the temptation of hanging out with the nurse for an hour or so it would take them to find the ingredients for dinner didn't dent the hopeful look he had aimed up at her.

"Fuck, fine. Find your jacket and put your shoes on."

Brat was going to be grumpy and tired for the rest of the night, and likely stubborn to stay awake as long as he could possibly stand it even if he was miserable to prove he could do as he claimed.

Sonya wondered if she was a soft touch for allowing it even if she knew it wouldn't be good for him, and for letting it happen even knowing he'd be unhappy and grumpy for the rest of the night afterwards. Shamal should learn his physical limits, so while she was well aware he'd be miserable it was his mistake to make.

She'd just… ensure he didn't end up passed out on a park bench somewhere instead of tucked in bed. Or with blood blisters on his feet.

…was there any iodine in her first-aid kit under the bathroom sink?

She was… pretty certain there was a bottle of the stuff in there. If not, Tatiana would likely have some stashed away if she asked.

"…three to one odds, one of us will be carrying him more than half the time."

"No bet." She dismissed flatly, heading to pick up her own jacket and purse.

After a nap Shamal probably really did think he was good for an easy hour of walking around, but he wasn't quite to the age where he had the physical reserves where that was actually true.

Cherep, since he was a weirdo and was perfectly comfortable sleeping with his boots on and in an inflexible, non-breathing leather jacket, merely pushed up off the couch and was ready to go.

Sonya had to stamp her boots back on, lace them up, and fetch her purse then check she had everything, and pick out the thicker of her two light jackets in case the temperature fell lower than usual around sunset. It took her a tiny bit longer, if only because she only put her purse and her jackets in the same spot when she lived here.

Even still, Shamal spilled out of the bedroom he was sharing with her with his blue sweater and shoes in hand the moment after she had pulled herself together. The brat plopped down next to her legs to pull his shoes on, and the Cloud siblings exchanged a look over his head while he struggled to tug the thick garment down over his head at the same time as he had to tie his laces.

"Do you need to buy a fixer-up motorcycle while you're up here, Cherep?" Asked the thief, just to buy up some of the time they were waiting for the kid to finish getting ready.

"It's an idea. Something suitably clunky wouldn't set me back much and will give me something to do if I can't think of anything else." Admitted the stuntman thoughtfully, scratching at his jawline and the shadow of purple stubble that said he hadn't shaved today. "But I guess that's also your way of asking if I will actually get my own transportation rather than hitchhike back to the circus?"

"I have no idea what you're talking about."

"Mmmhmm."
"Ready!" Shamal announced cheerfully, bouncing next to the door leading to the greater hotel area for them to get with the program.

His sweater was on backwards, and she was fairly sure the knot he used on his shoes was the 'difficult to untie' type Renato had drilled into his head if he ever had to escape through a window using blankets or sheets in lieu of rope or suitable string-like substances.

…were his shoes on the wrong feet too?

"Right…"

Her entirely unhelpful brother snickered as he led the way out.

---

(Tuesday the 1st of July, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Ow… ow, ow. Ow."

"Something wrong, Shamal?" The child was walking a little funny, so Scruffy reached out and hauled the kid to the couch instead of letting him do it on his own.

It earned him an entirely ugly glare, but noticeably the Mist didn't fuss or protest the manhandling when he didn't tend to appreciate it if it didn't come from his godparents or Sonya's siblings.

"Shamal just had a very important lesson in being prepared and his own limitations." Said Storm-Cloud answered for him, tossing heavily annotated files to her desk and pulling the phone closer as she sat down in the chair behind the desk. Likely to start calling their teacher-candidates to inform them they were hired. "As well as why it's generally a good idea to put the correct shoe on the right foot, and why we use easily pulled apart knots for shoelaces."

Shamal hunched his shoulders, looking rather irritated and annoyed with the world in general.

His clothing this day was very correct in that respect, but the Sun couldn't figure out if that was intentional or just usual. He hadn't paid that much attention to how the kid was dressed, not figuring it to be important or something to watch.

"...why didn't you stop him?" A second after he spoke, it occurred to Peter that his boss might not appreciate his questioning of her parenting skills.

"The brat was convinced he could do it." It was spoken absently as she pulled the rotating dial in the order on the papers in front of her, so apparently she didn't mind or care if he thought her an unfit mother. "I suggested a babysitter, but…"

Oh. So, this was a 'child was stubborn' situation and not an 'absently-minded caretaker' one.

Scruffy had to mind his mouth better. Eventually, he might hit on something she didn't appreciate being questioned on. The fact he hadn't yet… was… actually slightly out-of-character for her… right?

Why did she let him question her?

Or pick his way around her morals in his 'near-civilian' way even if he wasn't really one anymore via dubious criminal reasoning based on flashy fire skills?

Was Galina allowed to do so about personal and not professional issues?

"Good morning. Is this the Dyrbov household?" Sonya suddenly asked of the receiver placed between a shoulder and her ear, listening for a moment to whoever it was on the other end. "Ah, can you take a message to one Artemiy Nikolayevich then?"

The…?

Scruffy had done that interview. The literature teacher with a side interest in music.

Her Lightning assistant had liked the man she had interviewed at the same time, so why was she going with his preference?

"Yes. If he's still interested in a teaching position, we would like him to visit the Moscow School number three-zero-five-four's main office anytime between the hours of five and nine in the evening to finish the paperwork required and his proposed duties." A pause while the thief listened to whatever was said, the woman digging through her purse for her cigarettes and return the rather large bag to the floor next to her. "No, this scholastic year. As several of the teachers require to update or obtain teaching permits, sometimes in more subject than one, we need to know ahead of time if he would like assistance in obtaining his up-to-date permit in teaching literature for secondary school students or a few classes for teaching basic music lessons for this or the next school year."

Shamal irritably poked him in the thigh, for eavesdropping on his mother's conversation over the phone instead of paying attention to their now customary Mist-Constructed game.

"...yes, I can hold."

Peter turned back to him, still wondering what several things meant for him and if it was even worth it to ponder about it.

"Don't smirk, Scruffy. You're taking first shift in dealing with the school's office paperwork. I have enough as it is, and Galina does most of it." Sonya informed him blandly, still listening even as she lit her cigarette with a flick of red Flames. "Five to nine, you have to be there the full four hours tonight."

"Ah… any reason it's him in particular?"

And not, say… Galina's pick?

"He's actually got prior experience and up-to-date permits." She deadpanned dryly, blowing out a lungful of smoke in a sigh as she tapped her shouldering cylinder of paper and tobacco on an ashtray to knock off the loose ash. "Yes, hello Artemiy Nikolayevich? Yes, no… yes. My name is Bazanova Sonya Arsenevna. The… yes, the acting principal… yes, you do have the job if you are still interested."

"Let me see your feet first, kid. Maybe I can lessen the soreness enough you can walk in a straight line."

The thief pressed a hand over the mouth of the receiver to keep her next words confined to the office itself rather than let the man she was talking to overhear. "Tatiana healed up the worst of them this morning, it's more feeling off than feeling painful right now. I put iodine on the blisters last night to toughen them up into calluses faster as well."
"I'm fine." Shamal insisted mulishly, keeping his feet well away from the other Sun user he tended to hang around with if not with his godfather or the nurse. "Can we play already?"

A stubborn, smart-assed kid. Even if he could probably hasten the callus forming for him decently well.

Alright then.

"Cats, hunters and archers." Peter then suggested blandly, fighting a genuinely fond smirk for the little brat.

He'd almost claim the stubborn ones were the cutest… but that then suggested his icy and intimidating boss was something he wasn't touching with a ten-foot-pole.

So, the really young and stubborn were pretty damn adorable.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 1st of July, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

The second round of teachers, the temporary part-timers they might have to hire for various criminal-flavored or not reasons, were giving Sonya more trouble than filling in the permanent ones they needed to qualify for a 'school' label from the government.

She didn't want to overcommit the school's funds, half of which she already had to resupply along with the jewels for matching the 'graduates' of the Flame courses. Until the place ran for a few years consecutively, they wouldn't know how much it needed per year and the buffer it might flex from one scholastic term to another.

However, hiring too few teachers for at least the core classes and the 'cover' for the Flame ones would just be as bad as hiring too many and having one of the civilian teachers stumble on something they shouldn't in their free time.

The problem would even out the moment they got more criminal teachers like Lisa in or the other syndicates hopped on the bandwagon to have a less obviously Zolotov controlled way to train up their handful of Dying Will users… but that didn't exactly help them in the here and now.

They… probably should do another full-time literature teacher. Sonya was going to be often absent, and more focused with the library or principal duties herself when she had the time.

Randomly helpful was going to be her substitute teaching life in a nutshell.

There was Galina's pick, the guy that suggested he could help coach sports that they really didn't require more of… or she could dig through it again in hopes there was someone else with actual prior experience.

…starting off, their class sizes would be on the smaller side of average. All the Zolotov trainees, Dying Will enabled or not, and a few handfuls of Triad children would join a couple more handful of actual civilian students for the cover and another two or three from surrounding syndicates to 'test the waters'.

Meaning a range of ages, a range of education levels, and an entirely eclectic student body as a whole. Next year she might have to hire more hands, but as of right now they could probably get away with the bare minimum if she wanted to invest in a few select cases to pay off later.
Rearranging her files to put Chikatilo's on top for her next round of calls, the thief paused and cocked her head as voices started carrying down the hallway outside the office.

Scruffy and Shamal were a bit absorbed in their latest round, which had a distinctively steampunk flair to the 'game board' this time around, so it wasn't them. Her Mists were more apt to just phase into the office or the window behind her if they wanted something, so it wasn't Usov or Anna. Galina was off instructing her Lightnings at this hour and wasn't expected back for another two.

Tatiana?

But… she was back to being elbow deep in bullshitted medical files and collecting the information to know how many of what immunizations to ship to the clan when she returned to Mafia Land. A visit wasn't out of the question, especially not if she had paperwork to do as well, but unlikely until she got on top of that again.

Cherep might be visiting, but she only really expected him after he had stopped junkyard diving in hopes of finding a beat-up but still serviceable motorcycle. Barring that, the parts to make a serviceable motorcycle.

…depressingly, Sonya didn't tend to get much traffic that wasn't personal in nature. Her minions were all very circumspect about tending to their own flocks so they wouldn't annoy her, but that did mean she couldn't break up the tedious or dry parts of her own work with something new to nibble on.

"…no, mom! I swear, it's all 'eventually'! We don't have to bother miss Bazanova, I swear I'm fine!"

A baby Flame user and a worried/concerned parent?

New.

She also recognized that voice, for all she had only started hearing it recently.

The Storm-Cloud might have expected it, but Scruffy and Shamal were startled when Larion's mother and the Rain kid himself all but barged into the office.

Slightly taller than the thief, the green-haired woman she rescued from a handful of asshole vory that kidnapped her last week swept into the Zolotov Flame user's office with a highly upset expression.

…fuck, Galina wasn't here to handle this. Sonya would have to try her hand at being 'reassuring', which… she was fairly positive she was going to fuck up somehow.

Maybe if she thought of her as… kind of like Lisa?

Just… less understanding and centered?

Sonya's brain promptly broke trying to imagine that, so instead she rather woodenly turned to the other occupants of the office. "Brat, go teach Usov your game. Make it an involved lesson, please. Cheat all you want, he should be able to counter it. Scruffy, firstly call the man on top of this stack to offer a job too and then look through the rest for not-quite qualified but possible part-time teachers until we have the students that will need them to be full time."

Shamal, after a start of surprised hesitation, scrambled off the couch a bit awkwardly and jumped through a Mist Flame imbued spot on the floor to get to wherever the Mists had set up to handle their business. Hopefully he'd get there alright, or if not Anna would ensure he did reach where he was trying to get to.
Peter plucked the files she had been fussing with off her desk, giving Larion and his mother a brisk nod of either greeting or farewell before ducking out to make use of the phone in the office next to them.

The game board they had been playing on went up in so much indigo Flames a beat after the two of them had cleared out.

Lacing her fingers together and setting them on the desk, the Storm-Cloud tried for a polite smile. She had no idea how well she managed it, still distracted by wondering about Lisa's self-possessed confidence and what it would've been like growing up under her if she didn't have that. "Mrs… Tolmachyova? Larion. Good evening?"

The Rain's mother managed a nod back, still looking both upset and worried but now with an added edge of awkwardness. "I… um… perhaps should've called and made an appointment…"

"If it's that serious, I can always make the time." Promised the thief, with an honest edge that kind of both surprised her and didn't. For if it was her and Shamal in the worried mother's shoes, then she'd really want whoever it was that had the answers for her to make the time for whatever questions. "It's why I'm sitting in an office and not doing my work in my own place, even if I really could. To be accessible for questions or concerns that arise."

With a more settled nod, the green haired woman made a slightly self-conscious show of selecting the blue armchair set before the desk to utilize, her Rain son looking much more settled now that Sonya hadn't taken offense at the sudden interruption and gingerly perching on the green one.

…why didn't mother and son share a hair-color?

Admittedly, until Cherep popped up in urban Moscow with bright-ass purple hair she hadn't seen a whole lot of 'weird' hair or eye colorings… but she might not have been paying much attention to her fellow pedestrians that far back. However, she was pretty sure the colors she was positive hadn't been natural in Rachel's lifetime were dominant in terms of genetics.

As in, if her brother ever had a kid they'd likely inherit his natural 'Cloud' coloring despite what the other genetic contributor had unless it was an equally 'wildly' colored individual.

Larion had normal, common, brown hair. Not his mother's vibrant, dark green.

Interestingly, Verde's green was more 'acidic' than this woman's 'earthly'. This lady had Larion's blue eyes, but her hair was still rather a uniquely dark green you'd find more in healthy plant leaves than in human hair coloring.

Why was Sonya puzzling over hair color and genetics rather than listening to the worried mom?

Said worried mom had yet to say anything else but try to mentally pull herself together, so while she gathered herself mentally the thief would continue to muse on her hair's appearance instead of wonder why she was here.

"…Larya has informed me of something called 'Flame maturity'. That might significantly alter his personality." The woman finally settled on announcing aloud firmly, attracting the absent-minded thief's attention sharply in response. "I… would like to know what to expect."

"Honestly speaking, we don't know yet." Sonya answered bluntly, mostly to rip off the bandage on the painful topic of their ignorance instead of try picking around the topic gently. "Larion's not the eldest of the Rains we know of, though. There's an Inverted Rain by the name of Dmitriy, and three Classical Rains around the same age range, that will hit that before him. So while I cannot answer that now, it will likely be more known in a Rain's scope before he hits the same period in his life."

She was probably trying to very carefully not pull a face for that admittance of ignorance, but she was civilian and Sonya had been taught by Lisa to pick that kind of thing up. Thankfully, the emotion behind it seemed more 'depressive' and 'scared' than 'scornful'.

The very limit of what the Storm-Cloud could figure out for herself, but generally good enough to prevent her from trying to reassure those that didn't need it.

"As a whole, though... Flame maturity isn't the problem. It's a symptom." Continued the thief patiently, tightening her grip on her own fingers to prevent fidgeting or smoking. It wasn't professional nor confidence-inspiring, both being faux pas when it came to serious conversations. At least according to her mother, anyways. "The real problem is that Flame user are all just parts to the same whole... and without the keystone center to 'stabilize' a user as is, we start acting more in line to certain 'archetypes' to attract said keystone Flame type."

"What do you mean 'symptom'? What's the problem? How do we fix that?"

"There's nothing to fix, it's just how things are. Out of the seven types of Dying Will Flames... Sky Flame users are the rarest. Since a Sky has an ability of 'Harmony', they stabilize their picked 'Guardians' of the other types. Without a Sky, Flame users are... for the lack of a better term, instinctively acting out in hopes of attracting one. The longer a lack of Harmony goes on, the more we act out."

Larion's mother looked utterly frustrated to hear that, and the Rain kid himself kept giving her sideways and concern-laced glances.

Not surprised, worried, nor concerned to hear that. He was informed of basic information at least, there was a plus side to this. The Rains weren't that far behind everyone else even if they had a less than competent lead for a few months to a year or so.

"...however." Sonya was forced to admit, thinking back along her behavior and the drive to be 'not-labeled-a-psychopath' tick of hers. "We're still all human, and children naturally tend to change slightly in personality as they grow older. Parts that Larion grows out of and into in the coming years might not all be Flame-centric. We also still don't know if our original personalities are what dictate what Flame we have, if it's something simply genetically influenced, or if it's a product of circumstance or expectations. We do know an aspect of our Flames generally can dictate some of what we are, but not to what degree that's true and what is natural just because we are... ourselves.
As much as it seems unnerving to you, it's equally so for us when we run headlong into a new facet."

She might be lying through her teeth a little, but as there was no hard data on 'why' they ended up with which Flames was published or documented... she could claim such.

Genetics did have some weight into what Flame type one had, one only had to look at the Sky lineage families to see that much. Arseniy and Valera were another example.

To what degree was iffier, and the situation-by-situation example where one might've reach for a slightly different Flame than what was more 'obviously' their main type if just a few things had been different from their initial incidents.

She'd thought Bjørn would be a Rain, after all. He still had a slightly Rainy tendency to be unflappable from time to time, generally when he felt secured enough to be so, but if that was because he only defied death twice before she encouraged his Flames to the fore or if that was because a Lightning-Storm just was that way naturally was debatable.
Admittedly, the thief might be a more 'social' Cloud because of her slight Sun potential was influencing her to be so. Just hampered in by her more 'main' types of Cloud and Storm, so it wasn't recognizably a 'Sunny' trait.

It was all uncertain, and not entirely understandable. Thus, Sonya wasn't going to worry about it.

She was what she was, Larion would become who he was, and while she'll make an effort to explain it to a worried mother she wouldn't be obsessing over trying.

"...can you turn it off? This Flame thing? "

"Mom!"

"Larion... it's a legitimate question." A glance had the kid subsiding, and the Storm-Cloud seriously thought about it. "...as far as we're capable of here and now, no. There's no way we can do that. There is rumor of a possible way... but it's... I think... a punishment. Basically, via one of those incredibly rare Skies, a Dying Will user's Flames can be 'Sealed'. Which... also... pretty much lobotomizes said Flame user. Parts of said Flames is tied into our behavior and personalities, removing or suppressing that..."

Out of everything she did or didn't recall about a particular magna comic of Rachel's timeline, that bit stuck hard.

The Tenth Generations Sky's general overall issues before Reborn got there, and her suspicion it resulting from his Sky nature being Sealed by the Ninth. There was precious little mentioned about it anywhere in this life, or written down, but that one journal Lisa had just handed her made a mention of someone the Storm Arcobaleno had said was 'Sealed'.

In mostly pitying and derisive tones, to the feel of 'idiot deserved it but ouch that has to hurt' in the second-hand account.

Pulling together her suspicions on the act wasn't hard, but it was still mainly speculation on her end. Hard proof would be something to find, hopefully. Additionally, how someone would go about fixing the problems being Sealed and then having that Sky Flame seal broken would cause.

Sawada Tsunayoshi would be the one to break the Arcobaleno Curse, and for Renato and Cherep alone she owed the yet-to-be-born little snot a massive favor for that.

One she didn't mind owing, despite her dislike of actually using favors to bargain with outside her or her brother's social circle. Strange, but she could and would live with it comfortably.

The woman that had barged into the office blanched and shook her head rapidly with a splay of green strands of loose hair to show she didn't like that idea. "No, I'm.... I didn't mean it like that. Is there... any way outside of these 'Skies' to temper or minimize the risks Larya will end up... different?"

Sonya puzzled over that question. "Personally speaking, I'm the latest to hit 'Flame maturity', and from what I know... it wasn't a sudden or unforeseen thing, Mrs. Tolmachyova. We knew it was coming, had the warnings in nearly all sources we could get our hands on, but ignored the bulk of it anyways out of sheer incomprehension of the scope. I tried to deny it and remain in a less 'mature Cloud' mindset, which is why I was so very... explosive earlier last week. We can affect it to a degree... but it seems to be an unhealthy option we were just lucky worked out alright in the end."

She scribbled down an address for her instead and handed it to the distraught mother.
"This is my mother's home address. She's raised three of us so far and is currently raising a fourth. Lisa might be able to give you a better perspective than I can about the process from the outside that you seem to require."

Given the woman then clutched the scrap of paper like a lifeline, Sonya figured she had done badly at this 'reassuring' thing.

"Lastly, if I may… as an admittedly adoptive mother of another Dying Will Flame user myself, it's really all an 'additive' to the usual process of growing up. We're just known to take more of the traits our Flames lean to on than anything else." She tried cautiously, as a last ditch-effort not to suck badly at this as it seems she had. "My brat, a Mist which tend to be the more 'insane' and hard to pin down of the types, is still my brat even after three years of Flame use. He's just more mischievous, and conniving, than he was three years ago. Which also could just as much be from the difference between age three… and a half, to the age of six as being a Mist Flame user. He's smarter, he's craftier, has a very inventive sense of humor now, but he's still a brat and entirely mine."

Her visitor managed a weak, barely-there smile. "Thank you, then… I'm so rude. My name is Ruslana Leontevna."

"Bazanova Sonya Arsenevna, Mrs. Tolmachyova, but you can just call me Sonya." Responded the Storm-Cloud politely, rising from her chair to shake the woman's offered hand. "Storm-Cloud Flame user, the current so-called 'Expert' on Dying Will Flames, and temporary head of this office. While I will be returning to other things in a year's time when the actual head of this office is released from jail, my mother will know how to get into contact with me if you have any additional questions you'd like to ask. Hopefully ones I can answer positively for you."

"Given what you said would be the results of being 'Sealed', that's probably not a bad thing."

Ruslana returned in a markedly more even tone, seemingly now somehow more reassured than everything Sonya had informed her of up until the farewells. "Thank you, for this… and for my rescue, since I failed to actually thank you for that before."

A Rain tendency through the mother's line?

Or was the Rain's mother just good at pulling herself together after being allowed to panic for a time?

Was she reassured now or not?

"...you're welcome."

...and more importantly, did Sonya actually succeed or not in being 'reassuring'?

The so-far silent Larion looked hesitant as he also got to his feet, worriedly fidgeting in place at his mother's elbow while she collected her purse. "Mom?"

Sighing, the green haired woman checked to ensure she still had Lisa's home address in hand then looked squarely at her son. "I am… less nervous. You don't have to hover anymore. I don't know why you didn't want to bother Sonya so, Larya. She's very nice."

"She saved your life, of course she's nice." The Rain pointed out in return, as if that should be obvious and not… entirely untrue of the Storm-Cloud's general personality in question. "We had a reason, most of which I told you and dad but… like I said, I'm fine."

Sonya snorted, then coughed unconvincingly in a badly mistimed attempt to cover it up when mother and son looked at her in question. "...I heard the same damn line from my brat all morning about the blisters on his feet. Even when I could hear him say 'ow' under his breath with every step."
The older woman straight out laughed at that, ignoring the disgruntled expression that crossed Larion's face.

Sheepishly, the thief rubbed awkwardly at her left elbow and plastered an innocent expression across her own face. "He did."

Boldly rolling his eyes at her, the Classical Rain very firmly took his mother's elbow that he had been hovering at to lead her out of the office. "...and this was why I didn't want this meeting to happen, mom. I work for her right now."

Ruslana sniffed in mock-offense as they cleared the office door. "You are never too old for me to embarrass, Larya. It's my right as your mother."

His shoulders hunched in an expression of something that Sonya didn't get to see as they left her sight right afterwards. "...I'm fully aware of that, mom."

Dropping back to her seat in slightly amused confusion, she wondered if she had managed to fulfill what the office had been put into place or not on her own.

If so… hooray. If not… Lisa could probably catch what she missed and give her tips for what to do or not do the next time around.

Sonya glanced down at her borrowed office desk, then glanced around the empty and silent office, and then directed her gaze to the open and empty office doorway.

Great, she sent Scruffy off with her busywork. A couple of hours of free time now loomed, given the other Flame users that were regularly occupying the office had either been or had gone off to do other things.

...now what should she work on?

In the desk drawers, which she started pawing through out of bored curiosity five minutes into having little to do in front of her, and the thief pulled out a slightly mold-tainted carved naked lady from the bottom one that still had random packets of gemstones hidden within.

Maybe she should finally figure out what the hell this thing was supposed to be?

Pierre-Antoine Carpentier had to have kept it for a reason, and there was the German section of his letter/memoir to work through.

...if the naked lady turned out to be pornographic in use, she was going to give it to Renato.

He'd probably find something to do with it.

Now that she thought about it with something to do before her, there was the file updating Galina normally handled to do also. However, she was much more interested in the things of a long-dead Arcobaleno of the Storm than she was in mindless busywork.

"...Nya, why are you holding a statuette of a naked lady?"

"I'm going to figure out what it is. Somehow."

Tatiana dropped a large stack of files she had brought with her onto the couch lacking the usual Sun and Mist occupants, padding over to the desk to take a look of her own. "Oh... I know what that is."

"...you do?"
"Yeah, one of the docs in Mafia Land has one." The nurse reached out for it and accepted the slightly cool soapstone carving to examine it more closely. "They are mostly used by male physicians that visit or deal with underdeveloped countries and have female patients, especially way back in the day. Usually, culturally, the girls can't gesture or point out what hurts or is wrong on their own bodies because it was considered 'vulgar' or 'rude' to draw attention of a man not their husbands to those parts or to their body in general. So... a statue of a naked woman is used instead. This lady here, for example."

She wiggled said lady, before giving it another look over and putting it down to go start in on her own stack of work in the general quiet of the Flame user's office.

…why did a Storm mason have a bit of medical equipment?

Had Yang XiaoJing been a physician, or sick a lot?

Or one of his fellow Arcobaleno if not the Rain Arcobaleno of his time?

More questions for only one answered.

Sonya dropped the statuette back into the drawer it had come out of, now searching for the half-completed Arcobaleno letter/memoir to finish off and see if she could find another name hopefully in a less 'hot' country.

Also, she needed to note down a reminder to ask Fong if it would be possible to search out who Yang the Rain had been in his home country.

At this rate, Cherep would be Cursed before she found anything concrete to use to help him.

---

(Wednesday the 2nd of July, 1969. Shkodër, Kingdom of Albania.)

A hard knock to Liam's tent was both expected and dreaded.

The master of the Russian Traveling Circus called the Großes Volksfest smoothed a hand down his mustache thoughtfully, thinking of everything that might go wrong and the things that had yet to even as he set his accounting books to the side. "Enter! Don't be shy~"

As it could be anything from one of the carnival rides exploding under stress, a rash of food poisoning from something off with the concession fair, or even another performance gone wrong, he thought he was well prepared for whatever news would come through his door.

Such as it was.

Peizhi ducked under the flap of the heavy canvas, an entirely flat expression on his already normally severe face. "Master Liam... Mistress Crina will not wake."

…instead it was the long-dreaded disaster looming this time, and not one of the mostly fleeting but costly upsets. The end of a dear friend and a much needed dry wit that had been a part of his troupe for years.

"...did she at least go in her sleep? No," he held up a hand before what was expressed with tiny tight movements in the other man's expression actually resolved into an explanation for how the Romanian native actually expired, "don't tell me. Allow me the falsehood of pretending it happened as she wished."

The Chinese man hesitated. "...I'll remove the bottles before a coroner can arrive."

An entirely out of place smile threatened to twitch Liam's mouth up at the corners.

That... was actually a better end, if he was pressed to be honest. Done in by the very vice that had threatened to kill her. Crina might have actually liked that irony, and now she was out of the crippling pain that had plagued her so for the last year and a half she might've been able to spare the attention to be amused.

Ah... there was the grief he had been steeling himself against for months now. "I, and several others, will thank you for actions that have yet or not be done then."

Little Sister Sonya and Jaq the Strongman had kept supplying their fortuneteller with liquor, one by mail and the other by spending his own allowances on it, even as Crina's body rapidly broke down under the continued life-long poisoning of her liver. Which was responsible for the elderly lady's final end could remain unknown, and frankly even if he found out which he'd probably thank them instead of chastising.

"...thank you, Peizhi. I am," he continued pointedly when the other tried to say something, "completely aware this isn't entirely altruistic of you. No matter what Little Sister Sonya promised in return, you personally did not have to remain with us until Crina's death but could have appointed another. She wouldn't have found out until too late to take it back. I know that much of your world. The fact you did anyways, regardless of what was promised you... I tip my cap to you, young man. If I was wearing one, anyways."

Confused, slightly suspicious, and not entirely prepared to discuss what the native-born German meant by his words, the Chinese native gave an abrupt bow of acknowledgement before sweeping out of the tent.

With a smile, for that was not the first nor the last time he would use that tactic against the highly suspicious and caustic criminal flavors that tended to pass through, he turned to his makeshift writing desk.

The circus master carefully transferred the account books and his carefully amassed notations on costs and earnings for this stop to one side, uncovering the large and completely iron strong box he held the important bits his troupe asked to be kept safe for them.

Mainly deeds to various machinery or vehicles, important paperwork like birth certificates or documentation to prove they were a traveling performance actor, sometimes the odd trinket, and most importantly... wills.

For an operation that spanned multiple countries over the course of a year, they had dealt with any number of deaths both within and without the troupe while on the road. Liam personally preferred the pregnancies, births, and marriages that happened almost as often, even if they normally meant he lost another of his friends and family to a more sedentary lifestyle.

He held about half of his troupe's wills in his strong-box. There were a number of elderly performers just being prepared in case of the worst happening, and a few from the equally so among the younger members that risked death-defying on nearly a weekly basis no matter how he tried to stretch such things out.

Meaning, he dipped into this box a terrible amount before and probably too often afterwards as well.
Crina's last will and testament, updated every year on the dot until the will and patience to do so had been sapped from her, was a simple one.

A request for what would happen with her body that he could honor as he did have the extra funds, a few letters to be posted to her friends and old contacts to inform them of her passing, and a few items that she would like passed on to others instead of liquidated or kept in a dreary and rarely used surplus cache.

The Romanian gypsy woman had been a simple creature in life, and the representation of her desires for what had been left behind being just as much as the woman that wrote it fit in a wretched way.

Liam broke the waxed seal on the plain paper package, catching several prepared letters to equally elderly colleges across the globe that were to be mailed before they scattered about his dirt floor. A handful of names stood out to him in his check of availability of the addressees, as both Jiayi and their previous circus master the two women had traveled with before him were well known but not with any circus right now. These would be held onto until he was in range to deliver them personally.

Horatiu, her cordwainer. He could actually shift things to be in range to deliver this one personally as well and would do so. Maybe now the equally as cryptic Romanian would actually speak of what the two of them survived together, and he could finally lay his curiosity to rest with his old friend.

Viper?

Odd. The… man or woman that had been her apprentice for a few short weeks had not lingered around the circus as much as… they had for Crina's sake. Likely it was something to do with her effects, as removed as Liam had been from the situation he was one of those that had a chuckle over how bossy the then woman had been as her apprentice.

He wasn't too sure where to post it too, however. Likely the 'Immortal Stuntman' would know or would agree to hold onto it until Viper made their customary visit to bother the man more.

A letter for Sonya was merely expected, really. Thick as well, which was unusually loquacious for the now deceased Romanian.

One for himself?

Liam opened this one, setting aside the others that still needed to be sorted through. Reading the few short lines left for him quickly, the circus master stroked a hand down his mustache thoughtfully.

Crina would greatly appreciate it if he burned the rest of her things which were not specifically mentioned to be handed down to others, hm?

He had been well aware his old friend had not liked the perversion of her native people into soothsayers or mystic hacks for the amusement of others, but… ah.

Likely that was what the message to Viper was all about. A last jab, so to say.

Revenge or just a poke in the other's sensibilities?

From safely beyond the grave, and forever more the one to get the last word in.

Typical of Crina.

"...you will be dearly missed, my valiant friend. Fare thee well, until we meet again in the hereafter."
Chapter 67

(Wednesday the 2nd of July, 1969. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"So-"

"No." Sonya cut Cherep off without looking or even glancing over from what she was doing at the sink to see his 'hopeful' face, which was really rather rude of his little sister.

"…you didn't even-"

"You want to borrow my living room to assemble parts for another motorcycle." Postulated the thief, rather accurately, in complete deadpan. "Based on the fact you're already using it to store a few of the 'really awesome finds' you picked up in a couple of junkyards, you also want to work on it here. Hell no."

He glanced to the few boxes already stuck near her front door, which… well, yeah. Probably was a bit obvious.

"But-!"

"Cherep. There is a six-year-old living here. While normally I wouldn't care much... where Shamal can get into it?"

"I'll teach him a bit about mechanics and how an internal combustion engine works." Promised the stuntman, waving a hand at the kid in question who was only blearily watching the argument from his seat at the kitchen table. Since she still wasn't looking at him, it was a rather useless gesture. "Skills he might need for later on when he gets his own... or you know, breaks down when... um... borrowing one."

Poor brat in question was almost drowning in his porridge but really, they hadn't stayed up too late last night... much.

Well, Cherep had been really interested in Shamal's little Mist game. Learning the ropes to play, as well as a few rounds to get used to it and then a few more to adjust to a little cheat of a 'dungeon master' had taken a few hours. Then... they might've gotten a bit caught up until Sonya came back out to the 'main room' in order to kick them both to bed.

"...Shamal? Would you like to learn a little about cars and such at your zio's behalf?"

Said brat blinked a couple times rapidly, then scrutinized the older man warily. He stuck a spoonful of milky oats into his mouth instead of actually answer right away, letting him know nonverbally that he was not a fan of the idea.

"It'll be fun?"

Shamal's expression of extreme dubiousness didn't change a whit.

The older Cloud in the room scratched the back of his head sheepishly, wracking his mind for a reason a kid who was probably already a bit swamped in keeping up with his mother's expectations for his visit. There were the Mist Flame lessons, the... thing he was doing with the books every night, and the man named Scruffy's critiques of his games.
Not to mention the lock picking, learning to read Cyrillic words, and the pending turn from lock picking lessons to pick pocketing ones Sonya promised in another week of work on it.

"I'll..." Thinking about it for another few seconds, the apparently only civilian Flame user in the room heaved a slightly wry sigh. "Oh fine, I'll teach you to hotwire a car."

" Sold. Alright, please mamma?"

From the expression on 'mamma's' face as she finally turned to see the two of them, she didn't really appreciate that idea. "If you're doing that, also teach him the basics of how to drive. Shamal, you had better not try driving without either Cherep or Renato both aware of it and at hand until you're fourteen at the least. I don't care what any other Italian kids are allowed to do."

"Sure!" He agreed hastily, before his now very disgruntled nephew could retract his own agreement.

Cherep would make it up to the kid later.

Sonya eyed her brat's expression warily a few moments longer, much like her brother had when Shamal was the lynchpin to get a decently comfortable place to work on his to-be-assembled junkyard bike. "Do you want to kick around with him today? I think he said he was going to go junkyard diving, and I'll give you a bit of money if you find anything you like. I've got... a... thought to investigate, as well as a bit of legwork of my own."

"That'll be fun. Half the point of visiting junkyards is to find things, and I can pretty much fix up anything you'd be able to unearth."

With a heavy sigh from such a small child, the Mist shrugged as he toyed with the minute amount of food left in his bowl. "Sure, mamma. If that'll help you, I don't mind."

She winced herself, turning back to scowl at her dishwater. "We'll blow off tomorrow to do our own thing, I just need to get this one bit started and maybe do a bit of poking around. I'll show you a few of the places I've broken into, or we could just be lazy for a day."

A promise of a whole day of 'mom-time' had the kid perking up a bit, at least. Shamal bolted a few last bites and abandoned the table, darting off to get himself dressed and ready for the morning practice in Lisa's basement.

Running a hand through his short hair, Cherep glanced from where the kid had run off to his little sister's back as she finished scrubbing the pots used to make breakfast. "Any limitations you want me to enforce? You can find a lot of weird things in junkyards."

"If he finds it, he can have it. Just use your judgement if you're going to fix it or not."

Leaving the porridge pot to soak, she had burned the bottom of it when distracted making omelets but at least the top layer had been palatable enough, Sonya turned to pick up her brat's abandoned dishes. "...if he does find something, and you two overspend to both get it and fix it up... I'll front the money you'll need for second-hand parts."

Pausing to recall how much he had on him, and how much it would be if he got most or all of it changed over to Soviet Russian rubles, the stuntman shrugged. "I should have just enough for that all on my own, but the offer's still appreciated sis."

"How much are you carrying around?" Demanded the thief suspiciously, one wet hand on a hip and her other balancing the last of the breakfast dishes. "Seriously, Cherep?"

"I've not only successfully hid it all from a miser of a Mist, but also it's not all in the same domination..."
nor in the same hiding spots." He informed her with a faked-superior lecturing tone, wagging a finger in her face. "While someone professional might be able to find it… just any one person wouldn't be able to find more than maybe one or two. You also didn't notice before I told you."

"I don't case my own siblings to see how easily it would be to steal something from you." Sonya deadpanned flatly, rolling her eyes as she turned to finish off the breakfast cleanup. "Although… if you're going to do shit like this, I will certainly start doing so."

"…no thanks. Getting things pass Vipes is hard enough."

"Speaking of," the Storm-Cloud spoke absently, quickly getting through Shamal's dishes in order to apply more elbow grease to the slightly glue-like mass left in the bottom of her new medium-sized copper pot, "have you explained Viper to Lisa yet? I want to be there when you do."

"Oh ha, ha." Cherep spoke flatly, kicking out an ankle to pull out a kitchen chair to wait for the other two to finish getting ready for their trip to their foster mother's. "I'm not going to. Leave it up to Vipes if they're going to stick with a single gender or switch it up. I don't really care either way, but they might."

Sonya pulled the plug in the bottom of her sink, flicking off the last of the suds and turning around once again to lean up against the counter in order to look at him thoughtfully. "Is there… any specific reason why you like Viper?"

Blinking at the slightly odd question, her fellow Cloud seriously gave her question some thought.

Who knew why she was asking, but this seemed serious enough he highly doubted it was her 'joking' around. "…I don't know? Never really thought about why, to be honest. I just do. Why do you ask?"

"…there's a lot of clamor about Flame users finding and Harmonizing to a Sky, but frankly… with the disparity of numbers between Skies and the other Flame types… it's not really likely for most of us. So… are Skies the only ones we can 'bond' to, or can we sort of 'make due' with other Flame users? There's us, after all."

Cherep huffed softly, now following her wonder. "Is this part of what you wanted to 'investigate'?"

"More or less. There were the Four Rains, three now but supposedly before Fadei went 'Sky-crazed' they were pretty damn good together. You and I, where I'm absolutely baffling in Cloud-terms probably because we're 'Dual Guardian Prospects'." She waved a hand absently as she expounded on what had started this wonder for her, reaching behind her to turn on the cold water tap when her drain was done emptying the soapy dishwater in the sink. "Then there's the 'such-and-such tend to like so-and-so', is that actually lesser bonds and not just 'two unattached Flame users'? I have a Lightning-Storm, a Lightning, three Suns, three Mists, and two Clouds I can deal with. Might add another Storm in a few months. Do we really need a Sky, or is it just hype?"

"Have you met any? Skies, I mean."

"We have, yes. Timoteo of Vongola, his mother Daniella, and then Tyr the Sword Emperor."

He sighed heavily, rubbing a hand across his eyes. "I meant other than the Italian fair, who we both probably won't agree on or like much."

"…I don't like Nono Vongola or Ottavia, really. I might like Tyr, but… I'm aware you won't so…" She replaced her plug for rinsing the dishes one last time, turning around to finish them and her chores for the morning. "So… there's supposedly two in Moscow. One Dmitry found, who's got a few brats that may or may not share that, and there's one more I think is present. The numbers of us spiked, after all."

Cherep thought about that for a few seconds, glancing down the hallway when there was a soft 'thump' likely caused by Shamal doing something. "If we didn't require a Sky, why would our numbers spike if one was present?"

"Outside of the pattern already established for Flame users popping up. It was an aggressive spike. So not usual, meaning Skies are more a catalyst than a cause." Sonya started racking up the few dishes they had generated pretty quick, examining a spot here or there to ensure she hadn't missed anything in the scrub-down. "So, based on that... without a Sky, we should be more or less 'stable'. Right?"

"...if never exposed to any, I suppose." Allowed the stuntman thoughtfully. "Which... rules the both of us out."

"There's no established Soviet Sky, yet. That leaves most if not all of the trainees or other Russian Flame users."

"...unless your 'theoretical' Sky is among them. You don't know where this 'possible' one is yet, do you?"

He ducked a dishtowel that was tossed at his head. "Stop poking holes in my theories."

Shamal, coming down the hallway a bit hasty than probably safe, tripped and rolled his way into the kitchenette corner of the hotel suite. Coming to a staggered halt, shoes in hand, the Mist kid climbed back up to his chair he had eaten breakfast at. "Are you ready, mamma?"

Sonya glanced over her shoulder, slotting the utensils into the drying rack cubby for them before pulling the plug in her sink for the last time. "Yes, just let me grab my jacket and purse. Cherep?"

Pulling the cloth off his shoulder, he handed the rag back to her. "Now you know how I feel when you poke holes in my arguments, but yes. I'm ready to go."

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 2nd of July, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

A quick glance-through of the translated parts, and Sonya had to admit Galina's first estimation of Pierre-Antoine Carpentier's last letter being either a rambling discourse on the women in the ancient Storm Arcobaleno's life or about one in particular.

At least the French section, anyways.

Parts of the account were too damaged, even with Usov's Flames helping with picking up faint or nearly destroyed ink traces great sections had either crumbled with age or had moldered away long ago. Some of it they would never figure out what it said about a more interesting passage before it, and those gaps made for some frustrating reading.

There were a couple mentions of happenings throughout the French mason's lifetime that were suggestive, but... the man had been sound of mind enough to obey Omertà whenever it was written. Nothing concrete, even if there was a passage alluding to 'the physical toll being not what we expected...'

If the middle German parts didn't render anything interesting, then this was a dead end. Interesting, but not really all that important.

"...Sonya?"

"Mhmm?"

There were a few... odd markings. Either the ink had slid around and made blotches where Usov's Mist Flames picked them up a few centuries later, or those were deliberate. Sonya would be the first to admit she couldn't make much sense of middle French in the original contexts it was written in, but surely one didn't need that many accents.

Translate the German as best she could, or try and see if the weird markings held any importance?

There wasn't any way to be sure if one way or the other will pay off, frankly both might just be equally as useless when it came to her search for concrete facts to use to support whatever arguments about becoming a part of the Arcobaleno.

"Boss lady." Galina called again, this time with a slightly exasperated edge to her tone.

Sonya glanced up to her, then over to their guest. After another moment, she returned to the patchy translation she was trying to make sense of. "...I see him. I don't particularly care much, though."

"...I'd say I'm sorry about this, but she's normally like that when it comes to new people." The Lightning informed the office's guest dryly, if she was making any gestures with that the Storm-Cloud wouldn't know.

Frankly, the newcomer was neither Chinese nor one of her trainees. Therefore, she gave no fucks.

"...is that typical of her... 'type'?"

"Very much so." Agreed the thief's secretary.

Sonya glanced back up at that, eyeing the man suspiciously. "If you're here about a baby-Cloud sighting... leave a message to where I can find them and leave whoever the fuck it is alone. They'll likely join up with the local syndicate for their own reasons, hunting after us is doing no one any favors."

...then probably do a forceful takeover, but if a syndicate wanted a Cloud that desperately... sucked to be them.

"I am not here for that, either. But I'll pass that on."

Glancing down to her work, then back at him, and finally at Galina's expression, the thief sighed heavily and put the translation down on the desk. "...what do you want?"

"I am only here to extend an invitation." The vor in a slightly ill-fitting suit informed her pleasantly, taking a glance of his own to a wristwatch then back to her squarely. "A... it was supposed to be for lunch, but-"

"I am busy. Also, inexcusably busy tomorrow." The thief informed him flatly, twitching a few of the pages Galina had already finished to the side to leave the German section for her to work on as soon as this man stopped talking. "Very sorry."

Given the fact she was both slightly annoyed at this interruption and impatient to get back to work, it sounded painfully insincere.
"Before you can ask, also for most of the rest of the damn month. Next one after I have a slight trip, business and personal, the month after that I might be required for a Mafia Land contract an associate has asked me to do." Continued the Storm-Cloud strongly when that didn't seem to deter this man. "Sometime within there, I also have a few more jewelry stores to rob… and maybe a bank or two. I am busy, what the fuck do you want?"

Apparently he was rarely ever refused, which finally did make her wonder exactly who he reported to and why it was that was so. It finally occurred to her that it might be one of the non-Zolotov trainee's syndicates asking for her time, which had her sighing heavily again before he could speak the argument almost plastered across his face.

"Galina, would you mind…?"

"I'll see what they want, sure." Her Lightning was only too happy to agree.

…probably one of those 'wine and dine' things she likely had no patience for anyways.

Sonya eyed the man again, late-thirties and impeccably put together if you ignored the fact he really should go visit a tailor to get his seams taken in… but no syndicate immediately jumped out at her to say which he belonged to.

The best she could do was say he was a vor, and that was more to do with the amateur-done tattoos she could see curling around his wrists and creeping up his neck under his starched white shirt. Not professional, so likely prison tats. Likely he had either just or not too long ago finished some jail time…

…which meant his care in not pissing her off was interesting.

Most vor, confronted by a female that wasn't particularly careful in dismissing him, wouldn't care for it much and have little reason not to show that. He was… still, polite if insistent after getting blown off entirely as well as preempted in conversation.

"Name and syndicate." Sonya demanded, raising one hand to prevent her secretary from heading out with him. "She doesn't come back within a few hours, and even if you don't answer I'll still rip your head off and pike it on your boss' desk."

She was perfectly aware her eyes had gone from grey to purple, Scruffy's shuffling papers defensively from his corner was entirely unneeded.

"Kurdin Isak Grigorievich, Kostikova Brotherhood."

Blinking, the Storm-Cloud tried to place that syndicate in her very patchy mental map of which group were in power where. Since she had actually heard that one before, it wasn't one of the farther-flung gangs also edging around Moscow's urban reaches.

More central, probably within the second ring-road of the city or closer to dead middle. She did at least know he and his weren't local to the Zolotov.

Fuck, now what?

"…no one's going to die if I send her instead, right?" Depressingly she didn't rightly care if that was so, but since that was part of why she was stuck in an office right now she should at least ask.

"Not as far as I am aware."
"Fine, Galina go." Sonya put the not-quite-as-interesting translation of a dead Storm's last letter into a desk drawer, snatching up her own things to also leave the office. "You do have watch-duties this evening, so try not to stay out too late."

Her Lightning gave an utterly pleasant little smirk to the vor who wasn't quite getting what he wanted. Interestingly, he was entirely willing to be foisted off on her aide instead of getting her personally.

She caught sight of Scruffy shooting a highly distrustful glare at the man's back. "...Peter, do you realize she can and has electrocuted people to death with her Flames for unduly bothering her, right?"

The Sun startled, glancing out of the corner of his eyes at her then fidgeting more with his papers. "...oh."

As the woman being spoken of and her possible-but-not-likely next victim had yet to clear the office's doorway, they both caught her comment.

Galina preened, throwing a smirk back to her co-workers. "I didn't know Tatiana told you that story, Sonya."

"I was compiling a comparison of what made us all pop, right on up until we got too many numbers to keep up with it." That half-finished study was also probably regulated to a desk drawer, she had to clear it all out before Dmitriy got back or he'd find a lot of random ass shit in when looking either for the extra gems or to put his own work aside temporarily. "There's an idea, Scruffy? Want to finish it for me? You can work on that without us in here for the security aspect."

"Ah..." Peter dropped a look to his work already in his hands, which since the women were leaving early for the day meant he wasn't getting much more work done on it. "Sure. Where is it?"

"Fuck if I know." Tossing her purse on the desk, the Storm-Cloud began to rummage around in the odd bits of paperwork she found interesting in some way or random items that ended up stuck in with them.

Like the naked lady statue that Tatiana claimed was medical in nature. That would be somewhat surprising for a Rain to come across out of the blue a few more months down the line.

"...I'll see you later, Sonya."

"Have fun, Galina." The thief answered absently, only peripherally aware that the Lightning finally managed to shoo the hesitating vor out of the door.

She unearthed the absent collection of initial Dying Will Flame usage stories from under the ideas she had for her 'second hippy-ish' book, one detailing the actual bonds a Flame user might form without a Sky fit for civilian eyes.

Which would also include the inevitable corrections to some of the details Galina had to put in the first one.

"Lock up when you leave."

"...err... sorry? Come again?"

Wildly taking in the empty office first, Scruffy turned wide eyes on her as he clutched several sheets of paper to his thin chest. "You're leaving me in here alone?"

"You have a Mist tail, and frankly in a building full to the brim with thieves a lock isn't really much of an obstacle. We don't keep out any important information, most of it is encoded by Galina, and frankly even if you took a crowbar to the desk I highly doubt you'd find anything too shocking to make away with." With such reasoning given, she finally reached the doorway herself. "Make a judgement call if anyone requires more aid than you're comfortable giving, otherwise tell anyone that asks Galina is off on business and I am off on a Flame-related query."

Another glance around the office that she only caught because she had turned to head down the hallway outside of it, and Scruffy absently gave a hesitant wave. "...have a good afternoon, then?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 2nd of July, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Poor Scruffy."

As that was not a greeting Sonya had expected the moment she got through her front door, she glanced up from her boots skeptically at her brother. "Why is Scruffy 'poor'? Other than the fact I'm his only income, and I just paid the damn man so he shouldn't be just yet."

Taking off the first of the 'dressy' black boots she still had from Crina's cordwainer was a bit of a chore. Since she had ruined the 'functional' calf-length ones that she had spent a few years in, the thigh-high black boots with the slight heels were the last of her shoes that she was fully willing to wear for hours at a time.

Either she was stuck in them all day, as was the case when she wore pants over them, or it required hiking a skirt's hem up far enough to reach the top of her thighs to unlace them.

Sonya would go very fucking far for her personal comfort. Even if it was slightly ridiculous how far that was.

"Because we ducked into your office," her fellow Cloud patiently explained airily, "Shamal wanted to show you what he found. Except... we found him instead. Highly nervous, and a bit jumpy, to be the only one in there alone."

Finally getting one of her overly-long boots off, the thief planted her just freed foot on the floor to balance on while she got the other one off. "Poor my ass. He's been here for a few months now, he needs to break out of his little 'safety zone' otherwise he'll molder in that office and the few other places I've put him."

"He can't be comfortable here." Cherep pointed out, tossing a wrench he had been absently toying with into a box of other second-hand and slightly battered tools he probably picked up locally. "Aside that African accent, which I highly doubt is his natural one, I'd almost say he's English. Or something."

Sonya paused, half the laces of her left foot in one hand. "He's not English. I've heard him speak English, and aside that African slur to his tone he doesn't have the slang or accents an Englishman, or Londoner, would have."

"Voice coaches. We, especially, learned to talk differently in our own childhoods." He countered on the heels of her argument. "Besides, any English-speaking country would likely be capitalist. He's a capitalist boy in firmly communist country. You of all people should be fully aware how Russians are viewed outside the Iron Curtain, sis. He's got to be slightly terrified, especially since I don't think you bothered to get him a visa or any legal papers to have if ever investigated."

She scowled at him. "Usov, are we clear of listening bugs?"

"Yes, ma'am. Cleared them when he started talking about the office."

Hesitating, and looking over his shoulder to where the voice of her Mist lead had echoed out from, the stuntman sighed and scratched the back of his head sheepishly. "...I'll never get used to that. Sorry, Nya. Didn't think of it when we came back."

"I'm not exactly 'legal' myself, Cherep. Not everywhere I am is 'secure' enough to speak of such things."

Frankly, while it would've been annoying to defy the KGB about Scruffy's presence in the city illegally, she wasn't all that upset her brother almost spilled those beans. It was a lot better than speaking about Dying Will Flames thoughtlessly, so on the whole... she preferred risking that instead.

"And I did ask him, Peter I mean, if he'd like a little house in the middle of nowhere instead of hanging about. He declined."

Technically, Scruffy the Sun did have legal paperwork. They were filed under 'Bordrov Jaroslav' and held both a birth certificate supposedly within the Byelorussian SSR and a few other licenses for teaching the basics of several branches of science to middle school students.

Admittedly his paper-trail was laughably flimsy, she had yet to go insert the 'hospital copy' into the city picked as his 'birthplace'.

She'd only get the time to do so after Shamal's visit was over. Which... was in another month.

Sonya probably should get him copies to stave off general surface checks.

Maybe the fact he was so hesitant to impose was because he didn't feel secure enough yet?

Scruffy dithered a lot over what he should or should not be doing and what he could or not ask.

She'd fix that... not tomorrow, but Friday.

Speaking of...?

"Where's Shamal?"

"In with his lizard." Jerking a thumb down the hallway, which was both an indication of where the named and not Mists had been lingering the last few minutes and where Luigi's cage was, Cherep incorporated the motion into a stretch to straighten out his back. "He found a few interesting things, and I cleaned them up for him before he went to play with them in your room."

...huh. She had wondered how much amusement her brat could have with a pet lizard, as it wasn't exactly what one thought of hearing the word 'pet'. "What did he get?"

"A... weird-ass doorknob, a few glass bottles, an ornate mirror in a stand, and a pot-thing I think he intends to give you." Her fellow Cloud raked a hand through his hair while listing things, giving her an amused smirk after a moment. "Seriously, weird doorknob probably takes the cake. It's shaped like an extended bird's claw, so you have to shake it in order to turn it. I scrubbed it all with a mix of bleach and soap, but it should all be more or less clean."

What, did the kid make an obstacle course for his lizard?

"...thank you, Cherep." She hadn't asked for him to ensure it was all safe to play with, in hindsight.

The fact he did anyways was very thoughtful of her brother. Who knew how long those things had been rotting in open air, or what had crawled into them for the dubious shelter from the elements.

"Sure."

Finally prying her left boot off, Sonya sighed heavily as the slightly 'off' vertigo feeling from wearing heels too long got worse now that she was equally an inch shorter on both feet. It felt like she was falling backwards a little, but also that there was a dip behind her heels even if she could tell she was on a flat surface.

"Can you run out and get us something for dinner? Or you could take a crack at cooking."

"Foisting off your mom-duties already?" Cherep still rose from his spot on her couch, snatching up the leather motorcycle jacket from where it had been tossed over the armrest. "So long as you're paying. Any particular requests?"

"Not really, just no mushrooms." For that matter, she didn't know if there were things Shamal didn't like to eat. The brat ate practically anything put in front of him, occasionally leaving little bites left when he was full. "I also don't know what Shamal's allergic to, if he is allergic to anything."

"...so... most of what you've already eaten over the last few weeks? I can do that." Shooting a look to her tiny corner of a kitchenette, he ran a few fingers through his three-days-of-no-shaving scraggly stubble in thought before shrugging and moving to pass her to leave. "I'll find us something, give me half an hour or so."

Sonya dug a few of the reddish-pink bills that represented ten rubles out of an internal pocket in her purse, handing Cherep three of them. "Can you grab milk on your way back too?"

The stuntman stopped dead to stare at her for a moment. The thief sighed, and he smirked, pulling out another few blue five-ruble bills to add to the money she was handing him.

"You know, Nya, between the two of us? We're always going to be running out of milk."

She rolled her eyes, and sharply shoved him out the door when he unwisely passed her while still annoyed with him.

Cherep laughed, even if he almost impacted the opposite door across from her own.

(Friday the 4th of July, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Galina might not murder her, but the Lightning was going to be very damn huffy in her own little way.

Frankly, after blowing off all of yesterday to merely sight-see and laze about with Shamal, Sonya had little to no patience for listening to reports or more office work.

There was literally nothing for her to do that wasn't already being handled, and if she conducted another audit of the Flame using groups again so soon after the last one someone might get bitchy about her standing at their elbows.

What little busy-work she had was either highly suspect in a future possibly-useful way or not possible in a local sense.

There were her gauntlet and greaves designs, but she needed an actual engineer to see if her sketched framework would actually move as required. Maybe Scruffy, as soon as he finished the other piece she gave him to work on. Getting her boots repaired or replaced would require leaving Moscow entirely, she did what little she could stand doing for her fellow Clouds, she couldn't go visit the Storm section because the guy in question was losing his grip on the faction to another of the little Storm trainees that wasn't as sexist to half of the group.

What little she was left with was more translating work, working on her 'next' books, or casing places to steal from.

Three guesses as to which she decided to go with.

Sonya skirted around an elderly lady also wandering down a sidewalk, just headed in the opposite direction. It was finally reasonably warm enough, for her anyways, to go around without a jacket or some other kind of light sweater.

This little 'walk' of hers also had two happy side-benefits.

For one, she might get to find an assassination attempt to try her hand at since she wasn't in Zolotov territory. The other was that she was headed in a direction she didn't have a shared border with another Cloud.

Given exactly where a few of the older Dying Will Flame trainees popped up, and where it had spread from there, she could likely not only guess who the Moscow Sky was but where he lived.

What she had was near 'thirty' years of age, had two kids one of which was old enough to pull on his Flames but not really 'teen' yet, someone public, and likely either locally or otherwise famous. Said person also had to be recently within a limited 'zone' where the bulk of Flame users were crawling out of, generally around Usov's childhood neighborhood.

She was going to do nothing about who she thought it was, though. What happened to Fadei was still a factor, as well as the fact if she did get pulled to a Sky she couldn't do anything about it without Cherep at hand.

Either way, Sonya was heading east in hopes of running into whichever Cloud it was out here.

Closer than her neighborhood to the suspected Sky's home, but also between the Khimki Cloud and the Wolfpack's greater 'suspected' territory ranges. As it was equally likely that someone tried 'recruiting' said baby Cloud and got burned for the effort via a suicide as her finding a new Cloud, her other main goal was scoping out the local banks and jewelry stores.

The Storm-Cloud herself had no issues sharing living space with Shamal and Cherep, but frankly time to just think aimlessly was damn near priceless.

Hence her ruminations on the Moscow Sky, random aims, and what her assistant was likely to do to her in revenge of ducking out of the office the second day in a row.
She had to find something that would block Renato's little mind-reading trick, she was getting pretty tired of not thinking or just thinking specific things when around him. Sonya was insanely lucky she hadn't stuck her foot in her mouth just yet with the man, equally so that she hadn't spilled that Cherep wasn't the only one with an odd relationship with death.

Knowing her luck, she was only a step or two away from pissing him off for once.

Maybe something about whatever the fuck it was he was hinting around at, but since she refused to speculate about things in his presence she missed quite a few context clues that might've helped her understand at the time.

Yeah, she seriously needed to see if there was anything she could do for that… or have one of the Mists she was with dream up a counter. Said nosy-assed hitman might not entirely appreciate it, but the Storm-Cloud was fairly certain she was justified given she was holding her silence on his behalf.

Letting just anyone read her mind, since they knew mind-reading was a trick that was possible, was not a smart thing to do.

…could Sonya use her Storm Flames for that?

What limit did 'Disintegration' have, anyways?

Was that only physical things, or transmuting energy from one force to another for that matter, or could she affect less 'direct' things with them?

Better question, how did one go about trying to Disintegrate an 'idea'?

Sonya came to a halt in the middle of a sidewalk, aimlessly inspecting the buildings nearby as she tucked that mental wondering under the 'what happens when you try to Disintegrate water' idea she had back in the circus.

Just thinking about it made her fairly sure she'd be risking brain-damage or fairly serious memory lost if she fucked that up.

 Entirely possible water-explosive idea aside, she already knew it was likely possible to dictate to Storm Flames about burning one thing and not another. She managed that before, with the chloroform guy from her blow up.

Although the question of 'is my own spit still 'mine'' did need to be answered before she could say if she Disintegrated her saliva or the chemical residue in her airways for the 'breathing fire' thing to be repeatable. Even if she couldn't burn away her own spit, Sonya still smoked every now and again. Disintegrating her cigarette smoke was just as good as the lingering traces of chloroform if that was the case.

Unfortunately, playing with Storm Flames in the middle of the Zolotov clan's headquarters might not be the best idea. Neither was Propagating things with Cloud Flames. It might not have been before, but now that she actually was starting to get non-Zolotov traffic that was just asking to unnerve someone she really should be reassuring.

Sonya blinked, eyes catching on a uniformed man giving her a fairly serious stare down.

He wasn't even halfway down the street from her, but apparently her very presence was noteworthy.

The reasoning for that could be nearly anything. She did stop like a little idiot to stare absently at nothing, he might be one of those 'neighborhood watchers' and he marked her out as not belonging, or he wasn't 'military' as his uniform stated but 'KGB'.

She wandered up to him. "You wouldn't happen to know where the local jewelry store is, would you?"

He had narrowed his eyes as she got closer, but they widened back up enough for her to see his eye coloring clearly once she posed the question. A kind of hazel green. "Maybe."

"...can you help me find it?"

"Why?"

Either not enough of a Cloud to be aggressively against her presence but still enough to be wary of her even if she didn't look particularly threatening, or he was a bit better informed than any military boy should be.

Or partially a Mist, a Classic Lightning, or any other of those 'known' to not work with Classical Clouds or Inverted Storms well.

"Because this is far enough away from my neighborhood that my sister likely hasn't checked it out yet... but I'm lost."

An almost true reason given, because Tatiana's birthday was the next one up near the end of July, made the man unbend enough to give short but concise directions. Either in aims of getting rid of her quickly or to know exactly where she was heading.

Sonya got lost reliably enough when not following landmarks or natural features like a river that she was pretty damn certain even if she followed his directions to the letter she'd still end up not where he was expecting her to go.

That worked for her. She'd just call a taxi to get back when she was done wandering around.

With a nod of both appreciation and farewell once he was done speaking, the thief discreetly slid his wallet back into his pocket and walked off with more than half his cash to facilitate her return home after following his directions.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 4th of July, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Galina glared a hole in the back of her boss lady's brother, gritting her teeth as she waited a bit impatiently.

"...do I have to-"

"Shut up, Scruffy." She really needed to do something nice for the man, he was putting up with her dragging him about today rather nicely and all. Just... when she was less irritated.

"You know, if you do this, she's going to think it's alright to blow off here and there because you'll bring what she needs to sign off on to her when it's needed." Cherep pointed out cheerfully, finishing up with making a pitcher of lemonade and pouring a few glasses.

He stuck the pitcher into the fridge but brought another two glasses with the one he made up for himself over to the couch to hand out like some skewed version of a homemaker.

In a black leather jacket and still in motorcycle boots.

"That wouldn't be a damn problem if she hadn't also told her Mist tails to clear off for the afternoon." She snapped back at him, setting the glass handed to her a bit hard on the book-lined coffee table moved off a bit to make way for whatever it was he was working on.

That wasn't quite true, but near enough to what happened. Usov was detailing more things to Shamal about the properties and use of Mist Flames, and Anna was tailing Tatiana around headquarters and otherwise being an extra set of hands for the nurse.

It would've been so simple had the other woman not distracted her usual tails, all she would have to do was then just hand the files that needed Sonya's signature off to one of her two Misty minions and get them back nearly the same minute when the ink was still wet.

As the Storm-Cloud was now outside of Zolotov territory she was without clan tails as well, meaning no one had any idea where she was.

However, Galina needed the hiring paperwork for the civilian teachers signed now so she could go start in on getting them processed at the bank before they closed for the day. It would take an entire business day to get everything sorted out, the last business day of the week was tomorrow.

Sonya deciding to take another 'personal' day right on the heels of her last one was not appreciated. Once or twice a week, sure fine. The Lightning could hold down the fort and in fact rather liked that she was trusted and allowed to do so. In a row was not a working situation, preferably personal days should be spread out a bit more.

Galina was also a creature of schedules, timetables, and punctuality. She abhorred being late, not having the information needed, or just general disorganized messes.

The deadline for having the school staffed and equipped enough to formally open for the scholastic year was looming, the moment it hit August and they wouldn't be able to 'transfer' some of the farther flung Flame using trainees this year.

"Do you normally have green eyes?"

"Yes." The brunette snapped again, judiciously using her emerald Flames to ensure her grip wasn't creasing or otherwise marring the paperwork in her hands.

If the damn blonde didn't show up soon, she was going to bribe or threaten Usov into kidnapping her for all of five minutes. Galina wasn't entirely sure exactly how long a 'Mist Flame lesson' went on for, but she did know the kid being taught was young enough to only have so much energy to waste per day.

This was likely where Shamal would be dropped off at once done for the day, therefore the best place to wait in order to contact the Mist in charge of teaching him things to alert the kid's mother that there was something fairly urgent needed taking care of.

"...um... what's the make and model of this then?" Scruffy asked of their temporary host, who just looked amused all over for both their barging in and lack of niceties while waiting.

"The chassis is an M-seventy-two, which looks to be a decommissioned World War Two messenger's bike. There's a few rounded holes that I think are bullet holes anyways." Explained the other younger man easily enough. "I still need an engine for this, as well as shocks and maybe a newer braking system then what didn't rot away into dirt between then and now, but frankly… for a junkyard build?"

"It cleaned up well." Peter allowed, looking over the fender-less hunk of metal struts set in front of Sonya's couch.

Galina couldn't tell if it was a shake away from being so much rusted metal in a heap or if it was near-new, but as the man did identify himself as an 'engineer' he would likely know better than she did.

Cherep brightened up at the comment, starting to jabber away at a fairly rapid pace that the lone woman in the room didn't have the education to understand half of.

…the most Galina knew was 'drivetrain', 'transmission', and 'oil check'.

The lack of which in the conversation was doing her no aid. Most of which she learned from a few years of listening to Adrik blabber on about what was holding them up in stealing a getaway car in a few tense spots.

Her own eclectic education over the last few years leaned more to transistors, capacitors, and the occasional electrician's term. Cars and automobiles were still very much a mystery to her.

Scruffy could understand, however. His return jabber made a certain amount of sense, but where 'structural shear points' came into play in a discussion of rust prevention of several parts that made up an internal combustion engine confused her.

Usov saved her from being forced to admit any of that, raising a practical bonfire of Mist Flames out of the floor near Cherep's boots to dump one tired Mist brat off. Galina, as quickly as the weather phenomena her Flames were named after, snatched up his elbow before he could finish sinking back into the floor once the elder of the two Mists saw Sonya wasn't present to be fawned over.

"Usov. Fetch Sonya."

The preteen gave her a semi-serious look, only marred by the near-habitual grin he normally always had plastered across his face. "Is it really that serious? She left Anna's bracelet behind, finding her will take some time."

"It's for the school." Clarified the Lightning, in a tone she had developed to be both 'professional' and 'terrifying' under Dmitriy. At the very least, it worked half the time to get the irritating Inverted Rain to finally crack down on his own occasional paperwork. "I need this now, not next week. That might be too late."

"You dropped your papers." Cherep pointed out blandly, also physically pointing to the snow-white sheets about to leach some of the rust and dirt now coating the floor around his work area.

Galina swore and bent to snatch them up, a distraction which the preteen Mist used to vanish before she got a firm 'yes' for finding their Storm-Cloud boss.

Uttering another nasty epithet under her breath, she rounded on the only Cloud she wasn't half-terrified of pissing off.

He was utterly unmoved at her ugly look, merely hauling his delivery of exhausted Mist brat up to the couch so he could at least get comfortable. "Did you have fun today, Shamal?"

The kid groaned into his thigh, wiggling around to get comfortable for what seemed to be becoming "Well... Mists. You all get a bit funny when it comes to things like that." Cherep fished a spanner wrench out from under his nephew, earning himself a huff for either the effort or the comment. "Let me guess. You tried to let him win so he'd leave you alone about it, but he caught you out, right?"

Shamal grumbled something indistinct, picking to instead drag some lumpy blanket off the back of the couch to curl up under rather that answer distinctly.

"If you find a way to derail a highly offended Mist, share please." Continued the stuntman, reaching for his glass of lemonade for a sip. Once done, he turned purple eyes on her thoughtfully. "Hey, Galina? Why don't you wait... oh, about another minute or two?"

"Why?" Her only chance to catch a Mist to find Sonya immediately had passed, the next closest she knew of and that might listen to her was Anna. Who was following Tatiana around.

The nurse wouldn't be back to her hotel room just yet, more than likely she was still holed up in headquarters.

"Nya said she'd be back around the time Shamal's done for the day, that's why."

With a semi-violent twitch, the Lightning turned back to the man stiffly. "...why didn't you say that before?"

"Because you were all set on catching Usov, rather than listen to what I might've had to say." Cherep pointed out pleasantly. "Now that you're open to suggestions, she really shouldn't be too far away now."

"Err... should we be here?" Scruffy asked hesitantly into the slightly stiff silence, fidgeting with the rag and the lime-salt solution the other man had been using to clean various metal parts of dirt and rust. "This is Sonya's home space, right?"

With a slightly fond smirk for him, the younger man stole back his cleaning supplies to go back to what he was working on. "Well, yes... but I can safely say you two are allowed here."

"And how can you tell that?" Galina demanded a bit shortly.

"Because she's already claimed you both." Explained the stuntman airily, digging a salt-n-lime coated rag into the crevices of his mechanical part to scrub off another layer of the rust caking it. "If you ever stop to hear her talk about you all, it's always 'my Lightning', 'my Sun', or 'my Mists'. I hope you had no plans to leave, she won't take it very well if you try."

The Lightning in question blinked in surprise, the frowned at him. "She leaves us behind all the time."

"Nya's an odd Cloud. But while she doesn't have 'territory', per say, she does have 'people'. As much as a people person as you can be without actually having the skills for it." A rusty, slightly white crusted finger was waggled in her direction. "Even if she refuses to actually admit she does. You can get away with working on something well outside her view, even going a few solid months without bothering to check in. But once she gets curious over what you're up to... you'd better answer or she'll hunt you down."

Galina gave him a hard stare. "Are you sure about that?"
"You can doubt me all you want. But," Cherep dutifully cleaned his right hand off on his rag to pat his nephew's head, "the last one before you all to earn the title of 'mine' from Nya is this kid here. Guess who she's blowing a lot of Russian vory off for, as well as temporarily living in a country we don't really like the dominant criminal power of?"

Shamal hadn't entirely been asleep, and the Mist peered up at his uncle dubiously when the man removed his hand. "...really?"

"Nya checks in with Galina fairly regularly when she's off doing other things. I know this for a fact. Scruffy over there is the latest to earn himself a 'mine', once he decided to be too useful to be foisted off."

"...not entirely objectionable, I suppose." The Sun muttered mostly to himself, sheepishly giving an awkward grin when all of them looked at him for that comment. "Ah... so, Galina?"

"Right..." Drawled out the stuntman with audible amusement, raking a clean hand through short purple strands. "Galina. The only other people Nya bothers with keeping up with are the parents, myself and Tats, and little Valera. Yet she'd call the lovely lady Lightning if only to check there's nothing she needs help with, otherwise Nya leaves her to handle things for her."

Said lady Lightning gave the Inverted Cloud a quick look over, then decided to accept the flattery as just a compliment rather than a flirtation. That was not grounds she wanted to cross, even if the man was rather nicely put together and had a personality that wasn't entirely objectionable.

Quite a few years ago, she had tried to beat him up. His little sister took offense and beat her up instead. She didn't want to know if the woman recalled their first meeting or not, much less what she'd do if she tried anything she might find 'shifty' to said brother.

If Sonya wasn't going to leave the Lightning behind, then that was good. Galina would get out of the USSR as she wanted, even keep up with a seriously skilled thief and see more of the world than she had in her run with Tatiana and the rest of the gang.

However, it was kind of like climbing down a ladder but missing a rung and instead hitting the ground when you thought you were only half-way down it.

It hadn't been easy by any means, just... why did Scruffy find it so easy?

...probably because he had a more selective skill set that was proving to be interesting.

The brunette rubbed a forehead, as slightly stressed was not the perfect mindset to fully appreciate the news.

"I do not have people-territory." Sonya announced flatly from the doorway irritably, tossing her purse onto the floor next to a fairly new looking coat rack. "I do not own them."

"Of course you don't, Nya." Cherep countered cheerfully. "You just have 'people'. Of whom you'd probably brutalize anyone trying to take advantage or to poach them from you. Seriously, think about it possibly happening and what you'd feel if it did."

The thief paused, tossing her keys absently to where her purse was and getting them to fall inside of the oversized bag without even looking. Then she scowled.

Galina could tell the moment she admitted at least to herself she wouldn't like that suggested scenario happening, the Storm-Cloud's eyes bled first red and then purple.
"...oh fuck no. Not happening."

"Boss lady." The Lightning called out, a lot less hesitantly than she would've had Scruffy not pointed out they were sort of 'infringing' on Sonya's home space and then Cherep explained why that wasn't possible. "I need a few signatures, so I can run and get this processed at the bank."

"...what is 'a few signatures'?" Asked the younger woman, more or less drifting over to see both what her brother was occupied with and what her brat was doing.

"Payroll and licensing fee payouts." For their six civilian teachers and the whole slew of service personnel the school needed. They would be borrowing some cash from Pyotr until Sonya could generate the funds herself for a month or two, but after one decent jewelry store that wouldn't be much of a concern anymore. "Three of them have classes the week after next, if we want them to be accredited and perfectly legal..."

"Fine." The thief didn't really even give the paperwork a hard once-over herself, she merely pulled a pen out of a pocket to scribble her signature on the dotted lines. "There, anything else? I found a few good local spots likely to pay off well, if you or Tats, or Cherep for that matter, wouldn't mind babysitting-

"I'll do it." Said stuntman answered absently, giving her a sly sideways look. "At least this is a better cause than what Tats babysat for."

Sonya gave him a weird look, slid another one to Scruffy, then almost physically shrugged the whole conversation off. "Whatever. Brat and I are going for a nap, call in for room service around dinnertime. Peter, are you staying?"

The Sun darted a few hesitant looks about, but apparently the allure of talking shop with a like-minded individual outweighed the possibility it might irk the woman when she didn't even bat an eyelash over his being present at all. "...ah, sure?"

"Make sure to tell Cherep what you're allergic to or don't want to eat. Though, knowing him, he'd eat it anyways."

With that the Storm-Cloud basically kidnapped her Mist brat, blanket and all, and left them in the living room of her hotel suite without looking back.

Cherep held up a finger. "...case in point, may I add."

"I heard that!"

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 4th of July, 1969 continued. Cerrito Crime Family's Headquarters, San Jose, California, United States of America.)

Renato let a respectable stack of files hit the desk in front of the Don he was sort of working for. "Since you asked so nicely, this is what I'm currently trying to work through for you."

Joseph Cerrito merely flicked a glance downwards once. "That tells me nothing, Sinclair."

"Do you know how hard it is to get anything out of Soviet Russians about their fellows? I have a fairly good contact within that group, and yet I still got the run around from most if not everyone I talked to. The few exceptions were those working for my contact, and even still one needle in this haystack is proving... elusive."
Not entirely the whole situation, but enough of what was taking so long. The Soft Flame Sun irritably flicked through a few of the files, shoving the likely suspects he had tentatively decided upon across the desk for the Don's perusal.

"Even still, a fair number of these are dead. Rumored to be dead," another few files got passed along, "or just missing in action from their syndicates. These men I spent the last month acquiring information on now need to be matched with security feeds from that night around town, one face or disguising scar from a frame to one of many mugshots I managed to acquire."

"We can do that." Cerrito asserted firmly.

"I was hoping you'd say that." Renato drawled back sardonically. "That leaves me with combing the area for more clues and checking up on a comment from said contact about things. Do let me know if you find anything, so I can at least inform Don Vongola that I've finished."

The hitman would still do it himself, after the bulk of it got checked a nothing obvious stuck out to any green mook.

Gritting his teeth as some of the Fourth of July celebration echoed off the walls of this villa and made him want to twitch for his gun, Renato allowed himself the action of sweeping off his hat and raking a hand through his spiky hair. Fireworks were easily used to disguise gunshots, but the volume of them going off when it wasn't yet past noon was putting him on edge.

Also, he left Sonya and Shamal and the Storm-Cloud's cozy little nook in Russia for hit contracts. Not pandering to a syndicate boss who was so sloppy he lost his first ever Dying Will Flame user to someone that decided he was an asshole and didn't deserve to keep them.

A 'bad mood' probably didn't even touch on his current state of mind.

At the very least, since he was here, he could go see if Sonya's cards were correct. Killing via Dying Will Flame use left some distinctive marks. If he missed them the first time through, then it was either highly controlled use or not exactly in the 'area' they were overtly used.

If those cards were correct… well, it was interesting. More so if the thief could replicate this little feat, more than just with Shamal's fairly obvious motivations or plans.

Renato would still take them with a very large dose of salt until irrefutably proven otherwise.

"I will certainly inform you when I do have something to report." The Sun using hitman informed the other politely, which was the only positive thing that could be said about his tone. "Until then, hounding me or the men that facilitated my loan will do you nothing but irritate them. Now then, I do have work to be doing."

"You seem to forget where you are, boy." The Don gritted out irritably, tossing the files to his desk and ignoring the man gathering them up to be picked through by whoever would be drawing the short straw to act as a data analyst.

"You seem to forget just what I am and who I work for." Renato shot back, turning on a heel to stalk out. Glaring down the wet-behind-the-ears kid to get him to step away from the office door. "I assure you, if you tried anything… well, you wouldn't be the first syndicate I've taken apart."

Technically, they'd be his third if that happened. Once on his lonesome, twice with Sonya even if that really wasn't up to Mafia standards. Not so much a difficult thing as it was an involved one.

Frankly, the hitman didn't really want to be bothered with it.
(Saturday the 5th of July, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"-well, I didn't order it."

"If you didn't, and I didn't, and I don't think Peter knows the number to order from the cantina..."

"I ordered it." Milos interrupted the women dubiously inspecting a tray with coffee set out on the office's desk, fully entering the room and leaving his bodyguards at the doorway.

Since the woman in charge within it was part of the reason he was alive, it was highly unlikely she'd try to murder him now.

"I need a word, Bazanova. A fairly involved one, for that matter."

The young blonde woman glanced up at him but did at least greet him somewhat pleasantly. "Good afternoon, old man Zolotov. It's... surprisingly good to see you on your feet again. Since it's here... coffee?"

"Please." The old, and he was really feeling his years especially in an office staffed with those not even yet thirty, vor glanced at the ever-efficient Galina and the unhealthily thin foundling Sun as he seated himself in the chairs available for guests. "Clear off."

With a sharp nod, the brunette corralled the salt-n-pepper blond man and shoved him in the direction of the office's doorway. "Come on, Scuffy. I think I owe you a drink or something for yesterday."

The man she was manhandling had no chance to question or protest, efficiently bundled off and out the door in short order. One of the two younger vory firmly shut the door behind her.

Milos turned back to the young woman left alone with him in the office. "Your little wispy minions as well, Bazanova."

"Usov," called out the thief obediently, also pouring herself a mug of coffee before setting the pot down, "go stalk my brother."

"The Mirror Lady?"

"With my sister. She would've been tailing around Gedeon as normal... but he... doesn't seem to recall she will do so on his own. When things... happened, I reassigned her to avoid conflicts of interests from occurring."

...so, it likely wasn't Pyotr who informed them.

The Pahkan absently picked up the first mug poured while the Storm-Cloud across from him doctored her own beverage, taking a careful sip of the boiling hot black coffee while he reassessed a few things.

Thankfully it seemed as if Gedeon had expected word to get out fairly quickly, so he wasn't nearly as caustic to the Sovintnik who he believed alerted the group of his aims.

Unsurprisingly, it was a female Flame user his thickheaded son had overlooked. Milos had detected a pattern he wasn't entirely happy with in his heir's behavior.

'Sexism' the newer generation was calling it. Pure bullshit in his mind, but then again he was an old man. Women just weren't fit for some things, it wasn't so much a question of ability but practicality.

In respects to physical strength they weren't nearly as strong as another of their general size, sometimes had fainting fits, and generally didn't like the dirtier aspects of crime. It was just nature.

They were then better at more delicate things then men, in the work that required fine touches or talking their ways in or out of secured areas. Why it was that was no longer acceptable to point out was beyond him.

Then again, the exceptions to that norm he had learned over his lifetime were becoming more and more common. Case in point, the woman who was patiently waiting for him to say what he had come here to tell her.

Times were changing ever faster than it had when he was around their ages, it seemed like one of the core tenants of life mutated every damn time he turned around these days.

"So, you know what he did, but don't seem too put out by it." Milos started with the biggest issue, best to get it out of the way.

It would set the tone for the rest of this conversation, and he'd know what he could walk away with from it.

"...define 'put out'." She countered flatly in return, leveling a neutral stare at him over the rim of her mug as she leaned back in her office chair. "The changes I assume you put in made it more of an opportunity than something to quibble with, but that's always an option depending on what happens in the long run."

If she had decided to make it a sticking point and get her foster father to see it the same way as she might've, the Pahkan might have returned to a miniature civil war going on within the clan.

The limited amount he was 'allowed' to do from his 'light duty' was pitiable, he had spent the last few days just catching up with what all had gone on in his absence.

As this part hadn't immediately blown up when it happened, leaving it for later didn't seem to have damaged her tolerance of him. Small blessings.

No matter how you tried to spin or explain it away, his heir did just violate the unspoken agreement between the Zolotov clan and the vory, said vory's dependents, and other personnel that looked to them. Specifically, in the agreement to provide protection to the individuals for tithing the clan part of their proceeds from criminal activities.

She was still paying, was pre-paid actually, and yet the clan's protection had very nearly been ripped from her on a whim.

"I can't countermand his order. Not without... undesirable side effects."

"I'm not asking you to." Bazanova refuted evenly, dropping her gaze to the light brown liquid she was nursing and inspecting it thoughtfully. "I weigh little next to establishing Gedeon's control over the clan in the near future, I can take that slight whereas he might not be able to recover from it if the vory take this situation to mean he might go after their own women in a fit of temper."

…it might not have been Galina who thought up the twist the Flame users were telling whoever asked about their difficulties with his son. Milos swallowed that down with another sip of coffee, not particularly happy to hear it.

Smart as a whip, this girl. He was starting to share Pyotr's regret that she was born female, had she been male and things had worked out differently... she might've been her 'grandfather's' own heir. Could've been even if she was female, if not for his own son's mishandling of her.

The downside of being a successful thief was that you started coveting things that weren't entirely possible in traditional senses. Milos, in his heyday, could've stolen or had thing stolen that would've been called the 'heist of the century' with only an additional hand or two needed depending on what was being stolen or how steep the security. That just meant materialistic things started to mean little to him.

Stealing people had been an interesting diversion that lasted a few decades, and by the time he got that particular vice out of his system he'd already been established as a Pahkan and ruled over his own little niche of Moscow.

Milos waited a few more seconds, but she seemed to have nothing else to add. "No blackmail, or demands in return for putting up with it? I'm very aware you could end up doing a lot of damage to the clan with the things Gedeon's practically dropped into your lap."

"Personally speaking, I find nothing wrong with the Zolotov clan. I have no grudges against you or yours, nor do I wish to destroy it. I am in fact fond of the clan, for bringing my family together." His best solo-thief of her generation admitted honestly, as bluntly as he had come to expect from her. "My aims and the clan's might not match up now, but that has nothing to do with the people that make it up or the responsibilities you as a whole have. My interests have moved countries, the clan simply cannot come with me. Your son, on the other hand... I do hold a grudge with."

Bazanova would hold her silence and allow Gedeon his way in exchange for being allowed free when the time came. Mostly as expected, really. She had only been transparently angling for that for a few weeks now.

"Your siblings? Your parents?"

"Are their own people and will make their own decisions." She insisted blandly, as if by a couple words she couldn't strip away the best trained Sun Flame using nurse they had nor incite her father into something that was uncomfortably damn near close to outright rebellion. "Arseniy's not best pleased, and neither is my mother for that matter, but they have adopted a 'wait and see' approach since I've elected to not be unduly bothered."

Small wonder why vor Bazanov was 'displeased'. The man was very fond of 'his girls', even if he had been more or less indifferent to their arrivals at the time they appeared. Between one of them likely being his greatest protégé when it came to criminal arts and the other performing damn near miracles when it came to his lover's medical difficulties...

That would be a whole different kettle of fish as well as another slightly galling conversation to have, but distinctly different so long as one of said 'girls' was truly indifferent to the issue.

Thankfully, it seemed she really was that unconcerned to what amounted as an attempted murder via the next Pahkan.

Milos sometimes did not understand women, but he didn't have to in order to take advantage if he could.
"This all is not to say I do not want anything in return for 'allowing' Gedeon to drive me off." Finally getting around to her own motivation for not raising unholy hell for what had happened, the thief across from him curled her legs up with her in the office chair. She was small enough in stature to do so, and after tucking her booted feet under her left thigh she leveled a rather nasty smirk across the desk between them. "Even if that rather nicely suits my purposes, despite the risks involved."

A twisted mockery of a young girl sitting in her father's office chair was now across from him. Milos wasn't fooled by the adopted image suggesting vulnerability or foolishness, she was nowhere near as innocent or childish as the posture suggested.

"Of course not. Speak then, I'll see what I can do." The problem with running an entire enterprise comprised of thieves, they were all greedy little fucks and perfectly willing to occasionally stab each other in the back as long as it suited them.

Worse yet, she was nearly completely safe in this backstab.

She didn't start it, after all. It would all fall on Gedeon's head as he was the one who made the first move that violated clan tenets.

Sonya Bazanova smiled prettily at him, utterly fake and not the least bit ashamed of that falseness. "I'm taking Galina, as well as the Mirror Lady. I refuse to leave them here under your son. For… obvious reasons. Likewise, you probably don't want them. My Lightning can and has electrocuted people to death, and if I am forced to leave her behind for any amount of time since… well… I will leave orders for her to defend herself and Anna with all prejudice available to her."

…not entirely unexpected, if he was pressed to be honest.

The tidbit he was going to be taking away was that 'Lightning' Flame users might just make the very best untraceable assassins if he wanted was… something to think about later. Gedeon had already failed to keep the younger Mist girl in mind when making decisions, removing her from being able to spike any more of his son's future plans might be something to look into on his own if she hadn't said anything.

"Three years, after I step down, you will still pay your dues. I'll handle my son, but you can't jump ship immediately after I retire."

"One, for both me and my Lackey still in Mafia Land. And I will ensure both the Lightning and Mist have 'proper' male replacements as soon as possible."

Nothing about Anna the Mirror Lady's or Galina's dues, but her little foundling boy had bigger dues than both women from being classified as her assistant. The Mist and Lightning were paying theirs off via labor hours, not cold hard cash as she did for herself and her 'official' minion. He'd take that in trade instead easily enough.

Milos then eyed the girl strangely. "What of Usov?"

He didn't know anyone that missed how… fond, the young boy was of her.

"What of him? He's also Mist. Fanatically obsessed with me and likely has his own plans in place for whatever he wants to do." Spoke the Storm-Cloud wryly, curling up more around her mug of coffee with another nasty smirk. "I will not foil his fun by removing any motivation he has for mischief, Gedeon can deal with that himself. Although… I will ensure he 'withdraws' from the clan in an orderly manner."

The Pahkan sighed heavily into his coffee. Noticeably lacking from that comment was 'and in a composed fashion'.

Pyrotechnic illusion master deciding to finally bail might be even more eye-catching than Bazanova deciding to try her hand at inter-clan homicide.

"Two, and I'll extend the same courtesy to whoever else wants to follow you for the day before I retire."

She eyed him suspiciously instead of immediately taking the offer. "Even if that number includes my sister?"

"I'm not stupid, Bazanova. If Nurse Primokova wishes to leave, but Gedeon is in the way... there's any number of ways she could 'remove' him from being an obstacle to her. More than most medical ways we wouldn't be able to pin on her for years yet. And by that point it'd be a moot issue."

Milos was going to ensure he at least mended whatever bridge might've been charred between himself and the Sun nurse on his son's behalf, he had not invested that much money into the girl for her to just walk off with her doctor's license without so much as a backwards glance.

Gedeon on the other hand... he had to think of something before he pissed her off as well and finally lost them a sizable chunk of the clan.

To think, he had invested in the elder sister because her little sister had proven to be a damnably fine thief on her lonesome with the aid of her own Flames.

Bazanova was strong enough to do the work of two or three thieves on her own, escaping scrutiny for most were looking for physically strong groups of shifty people not a damn woman that looked like a dancing-girl, and if she was the initial example of what a 'user of Dying Will Flames of the Sky' could accomplish alone... risking a bit on the 'known' information of Suns being the best healers had been merely a calculated risk.

Now that it was about a step or three from paying off, Gedeon screwing around with the women that represented the eldest of the Flame users was not really all that appreciated. His son didn't see what he did, half-caught between the old guard's view on it as being 'parlor tricks' and the new generation's view of it being 'fucking useful'.

Slightly-built 'Clouds' that could move tons and escape scrutiny for it. Nondescript 'Rains' that were their own best friends when it came to being stealthy by putting the guards and any potential witnesses asleep. 'Mists' that could control what another saw down to the very feeling said images gave off. 'Lightnings' that could short out every security system they touched. Equipment-less 'Storms' that could break in and out of everything without it backfiring or malfunctioning on them. Topping it all off were 'Suns' that could heal major injuries without requiring to consign the injured to a hospital and risk discovery.

Milos had very much wanted such things in his clan, people that could pull off the impossible as easy as breathing. 'Skies' were unknown yet, but so rare he wasn't unduly bothered if they turned out to be less useful than the other 'Elements'.

Tasking his heir with learning a bit of the skill had done nothing, forcing him to interact with the 'first generation' had merely pissed most of the women off. A whole lot had gone wrong in a short amount of time, and his son's newly discovered 'stubborn streak' was not particularly helpful.

"I'll accept that. Two years, and whoever wishes to leave with me." Bazanova interrupted his thought process absently, seemingly having used the time he was speculating on why he allowed this 'office' to exist at all and what was happening within it to come to her own decisions. "Although... it deserves to be pointed out that even if I say nothing... others may draw their own conclusions."

"Not hardly, little bitch Milos thought a bit sourly. "This is on the condition that you and those you claim will at least pretend to be neutral about the whole issue if and when anyone asks."

"No one with sense will believe that." Bazanova refuted pleasantly, pausing to take a sip of her cooling coffee. "No, instead I'll ensure Galina spreads word about the more positive sides I can take from this if they happen. Her tone will be her own, and I will not dictate how she should feel for her.
Anna rarely interacts with others, but I will have some words with her about how far certain things should be allowed to spread."

"Usov, your sister?"

"Are not part of this deal so far, did you want them to be?"

Smart people could be very irritating just as much as they could be insanely helpful. Rubbing a coffee-hot hand across his already tired eyes, the Pahkan sighed and resigned himself to another round of haggling.

She already had what she wanted, was apparently unconcerned with easing the way for one of her people, so insuring she would corral his behavior and at least be a neutral influence on her sister would cost him whatever 'fringe' benefits she wanted.

Likely for visiting her family, or something on her little brother's behalf. Things he would then have to account for or try to slide by vor Bazanov when discussing things with him right after this.

Had Milos been a tiny fraction older, or not been healed by a Sun Flame user in days and not months from his narrowly defeated assassination attempt, he might have been highly tempted to just let this happen without trying to moderate the fallout.

This wouldn't be the biggest threat Gedeon would have to deal with when he became Pahkan, but he didn't want his son to have an immediate crisis concerning his leadership right off the mark.
Hopefully, so long as there was a definite 'end point', she'd be less of a pain in the ass and might be able to actually go back to holding full conversations with his successor.

Just... smooth this one over, Gedeon could deal with the fallout from pissing off another woman with influence behind her.

Preferably, he'd smooth this one over without Bazanova gutting them for anything of worth. A tie or two in order to ensure she had no reason nor desire to physically try gutting them later on was a plan.

"Replacements Gedeon won't be able to argue with." Milos demanded from her, as if that wasn't accomplished then they'd have the same damn problem all over again with only the possibly of a slightly different result next time. "I am not budging from that."

"Then you'll have to make due with whomever that may be, even if they're not the 'best' I can manage." She countered in a markedly less polite tone. "If that is so, I will not be appointing them to the school as well. Then the Flame training will split, between 'the clan's' and 'everyone else's'. I see no way to avoid or prevent it from happening."

Take a dip in quality to ensure things will continue in a positive aim, or not and hope the next round would be less smart about their 'defeat' when Gedeon was fully in charge and possibly not taking advice from his old man.
"It doesn't sound like you're doing anything to stop it." He pointed out, eyeing her expression.

Still utterly neutral, as a matter of fact there was a bitter twist to her lips now. Not a self-bitter, nor directed to him, but a disappointed bitter.

"I was never going to be able to hold onto it for the Zolotovs. There's no way to do so and keep to the letter of the law the Vindice passed down." The thief pointed out honestly enough. "All 'meetings or gatherings with the intent to trade Flame related information to non-aligned syndicates' is policed by them, the very moment we require something from the trainees or tried to demand something of them in return for their training... and someone refuses..."

...that would not end well, no.

With criminals, that was an 'eventually' and not a 'possibility' if someone wised up. Depending on the circumstances of what would tip that off, they could end up being the one 'picking a fight' with a syndicate that didn't have a ratio they were 'allowed' to deal unfavorably with.

That would be a very big, very stupid risk to leave themselves open to, moving it all off-site to a neutral location before anyone started bitching about the Zolotovs was just common sense.

Milos wasn't that stupid though, it was early yes... a bit too early to be setting it up.

Getting the land and the building was all well and fine, but staffing it and transferring all training to the location before anyone dreamt up the complaint to level at them?

Before someone tried to crack the Zolotov stranglehold on Flame users' training via an impartial force's directives for their behavior?

"...so, that was your plan."

"Yes." Admitted Bazanova easily, taking another longer draw of her coffee and setting the empty mug down on the try balanced on her desk between them. "Lisa will still become the principal in the end, and as they come available we'll replace ourselves with actually competent teachers in the various subjects as they occur... but this way it both prevents an unwise situation as well as provides a way 'out' that can't be touched."

If they didn't have a syndicate, they couldn't be viewed as 'trading information with non-aligned syndicates' when discipline or other violent incidents happened. It would be individuals versus those 'non-aligned syndicates', who would have their own alignments and preferences to be dealt with on case-by-case basis. Supposedly, if they required more than what one person could do, trading favors for other syndicates or banding together temporarily would then work for them.

Who wouldn't want the good-will of a Flame using trainer?

Who could then point them to what or who they needed for whichever reason they'd use that favor for?

With a sigh, the Pahkan saluted her before draining his mug fully.

Had he not learned of it before it could happen... he would've been pissed off, but likely would've let it happen if they kept a lid on it long enough for cutting them loose to be something direly needed for the clan's security.

Devious. A gambit worthy of Pyotr's granddaughter. Multi-faceted, too entrenched to be dealt with easily or firmly derailed, based on the blatantly obvious to ensure it was pushed through anyways.
"Another cup, Pahkan?"

"Please. I think I'm going to need it." Two down, two left. Then he had to speak with the damn girl's father to ensure nothing was smoldering on the vor's end. "Give me one of your cigarettes as well, Bazanova."

He received another of those fake, pretty smiles with the tobacco. The woman even lighting a finger with wispy purple Flames to provide fire without a lighter, allowing him to make use of her ability first politely.

Fuck, who was he forgetting?

(Sunday the 6th of July, 1969. St Louis des Francais Catholic Church, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Cherep eyed the rather pillar-festooned façade in beige over her shoulder. "...Nya, it's a church."

"Yes." Sonya neatened up Shamal's hair the best she could with merely her fingers, sighing when the disordered brunette strands remained stubbornly all over the place. "Yes, it is. Well spotted, brother."

She needed to start carrying around a comb or something, the kid had the genetics for naturally kinked hair which helped nothing in keeping him well-groomed. It seemed as if he so much as twitched his hair was all over the place.

Her brat snickered into a fist, tugging his tiny blazer jacket down again when it rose up a little. Apparently, he needed a whole new wardrobe soon... but he was a growing boy.

Peering around her and up to his uncle, the Mist gave him his best innocent grin. "It's Sunday, zio. Mister Renato and I attend Mass when we can."

That expression of innocence was not believable, especially since he gave an exact copy to Cherep last night in order to finesse a bit of cheating in his Mist game past the older man.

"It's the only Catholic church Lisa said was more or less 'stable'. Meaning it's not at risk of losing their parishioners to government pressure or general apathy." Sonya explained a bit tiredly, as she was not fond of even the idea of 'dawn Mass'.

She was more a nocturnal creature. Early mornings were evil if she wasn't adequately prepared to deal with them.

"I am delighted to hear that." A voice that wasn't either of the Cloud siblings' nor the brat's had all three of them turning around to face the new speaker.

In the lawn with the other 'early birds' mingling before the church's doors opened for them to attend their religious worship, stood a black-clad man with a pleasant smile on his face as he beamed at them. "I thought I saw you a couple times before, a new face in the flock is always a pleasant surprise. I am Father Luka."

Shamal, politely and cheerfully, greeted the priest and provided his name while the siblings exchanged a more hesitant look over his head while they decided how to deal with the interruption.

"...Sonya de Mort." The thief claimed for herself, ignoring Cherep's slightly startled little jerk. "To be perfectly clear… Father, I am only here because Shamal’s father was Catholic and I do not feel right letting him attend a religious service so far from home on his own."

The priest wasn’t put out by her admittance, still genuinely pleased to meet them in a now slightly disturbing way.

Of course, that meant her dork of a brother took the opportunity to be as equally overwhelmingly cheerful as he extended a hand to shake. "Skull de Mort. Her brother, the kid’s adoptive uncle, and just along for the ride. Sorry Father."

"I find that you are putting effort to ensure young Shamal’s religious needs are met even if you do not see it the same way inspiring nonetheless." Father Luka shrugged that off as if it really wasn’t an admittance of general disinterest in his life’s work, still clapping hands with the stuntman and beaming down at the kid that was the only reason for their presence. "So, even so, I welcome you both to St Louis des Francais Church. Is there anything I can do or explain for you two? Since you are more or less the ‘outsiders looking in’, and I do not want you both to feel that way while you tend to young Shamal’s spiritual needs."

Sonya glanced down herself at the kid standing before her, then back up at the priest. This was likely going to be embarrassing… but… "...you don’t… really advocate the cannibalism of your religious icon, right?"

The priest stared at her for a long moment, caught by surprise enough to lose his expression, before thin lips twitched in a smile. "That... is an... interesting interpretation of Communion."

"I know it’s not likely right... but..."

"The wording confuses you into thinking so?" He asked politely, an actual smile twitching his mouth up at the corners when she nodded. "I can safely assure you that no, we do not advocate the cannibalism of our Lord and Savior. Communion is an instruction Jesus Christ gave his followers to do after his death, to share wine and bread in his memory. Of the stories that were passed down and became part of the Holy Writ, two phrases are taken when performing communion is likely where you became confused Mrs. de Mort. Taken from Luke twenty-two, verses nineteen through twenty: "This is my body which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me" and "This cup which is poured out for you is the new covenant in my blood". As the Last Supper, part of which those words were taken from, was held the day before Jesus Christ was betrayed and yet he broke bread with his own betrayer..."

Well, now she felt slightly embarrassed for her initial assumption. She was dealing with an old translation effort, of course the lexicon and word usage shifted over centuries. What sounded perfectly fine then didn't always mean it made logical sense now.

Fuck Renato, he could've at least attempted to explain it instead of letting her bumble her question to the priest.

Sonya didn’t palm her face, she was wearing a slight amount of makeup since 'getting dressed up' was a thing for Catholic Mass, but did sharply bite her lower lip for a moment. "I... see."

"I'm going to remember that for a long while." Father Luka informed them all with a fond smile. "Not to be mean, but... still an interesting outside view to take into account when receiving visitors to Mass. You might be interested to know there is a Eucharistic miracle along the similar lines."

Anything to get the conversation off her little question, even if it was more… religious speak. "Ho?"
"The Miracle of Lanciano." Confirmed the priest with another full smile. "In the eighth century, a monk had doubts about the real presence of Jesus Christ in the Eucharist. However, when he said the words of consecration in Mass the host, the bread and wine for communion, changed into flesh and blood."

"That's creepy." Cherep pointed out for the both of them flatly.

"I have to assume the monk was very surprised as well at the time."

Shamal tugged on Sonya's skirts, wide eyed and entirely enthusiastic. Not surprising when one took the topic under discussion and his age in consideration.

"Can we go there, mamma? To Lanciano? Please? I want to see."

"If this took place in the eighth century, brat, it's long gone by now."

"It was preserved." Father Luka refuted her kindly, a shrug for her skeptical look shot at him in turn. "As far as I know of it, shortly after it was confirmed to be a genuine miracle it was encased in a silver Ostensorium."

A glance to her brother's face informed her he was equally as confused as to why anyone would want to preserve 'mysteriously appearing' blood and flesh. It sounded like a really nasty joke, to her.

"...I... see...?"

"I hope I haven't scared you off." The priest sheepishly rubbed a wrist with his off-hand. "But, well... it was somewhat related to what you wished to know."

As that was true enough, and Shamal looked excited to hear it anyways, the thief merely inclined her head to the man. "Fair enough."

"One last question, if I may. Are... you aware of the procedures for one's First Communion? If I'm not mistaken, your young man here is almost at that age."

Shamal beamed up at the priest while his godmother mentally floundered a moment in sheer confusion.

"...for... what? No, he's merely visiting my hometown for the summer. I assume his godfather has that arranged as they share a religious view, if that is a thing that is needed."

What the hell was one's First Communion supposed to be, anyways?

Supposedly more impressive than usual Mass, one would assume.

"Can I ask...?"

"I think I should urge you to speak with your fellow godparent first. But if you do still have questions, and he doesn't take you to his priest to have them resolved, I will always make time for concern or questions if you need."

Renato damn well had a few things to explain to her the very moment she got to grips with him.

Sonya huffed irritably, shoving her sour thoughts about the hitman's vagueness over Catholic norms to the side.

Likely, his non-comment over his and supposedly Shamal's religious views might very well be an attempt to get her to investigate his church and meet a mafia priest herself. She just really did not appreciate feeling less than prepared to deal with the brat's needs, and intended to express that in spades to the Sun.

A bell set in somewhere within the church rang out, mobilizing the milling crowd waiting for that very signal. Father Luka quirked a wry smile. "It seems we no longer have the time, anyways. Come, it is time for Mass."

Shamal pulled Sonya along by his grip on her skirts, and she snagged the stuntman's jacket in a hand to ensure she wasn't the only one suffering through a religious service she didn't believe in.

She loved her brother, sharing her misery was just her being sisterly. A sharp look backwards to ensure he didn't wiggle out of his much loved leather jacket merely earned her a fond roll of purple eyes as he took her arm in his own instead of suffer a fist in his jacket.

"You don't have to yank, sis." Cherep informed her in a low tone, following her as she guided the brat to stop near a middle-end pew in order to stay out of the way but also have a decent view of the procedures they were here for Shamal to observe. "I'm right behind you."

"Sucks to be you." Sonya informed him flatly, seating Shamal between them.

---

(Monday the 7th of July, 1969. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"I will see you this fall, right kid?" Tatiana asked of Shamal, earning herself a wide-eyed look.

"…you're leaving, zia?" Asked the kid, darting glances between herself and her siblings.

Flat out abandoning his little grudge match with Valera about the usage of his coloring books, earning himself a strange look by the kid's 'youngest' uncle that went unseen by the recipient.

Apparently, he hadn't wondered why there wasn't 'lessons' in the basement today nor why they were all present that morning for breakfast at Lisa's.

"I'm a nurse, baby. A few weeks of leave was pressing my luck even if it was 'technically' clan business I'm here on." The redhead knelt down to be on her nephew's level to give him a hug. "I'll have more control over my schedule once I'm a doctor, but I got a couple years of resident work to get through first."

Sonya sighed a bit guiltily behind her, but the nurse duties she would be sharing with Avdotya would actually count somewhat to her total of years as a nurse in residence.

Not nearly as much as full-time work at St. Julian's, or any other of the sister hospitals set up around the world for criminal use, but still not nearly as much a setback as the thief seemed to think.

Instead of explaining that, again for the third time, Tatiana merely gave Shamal another firm squeeze. "I'll see you again sooner than you think, baby. The time will pass like nothing, and I might be able to take that day off after your checkup so we can spend more time together. Mention that to tall, dark, and snarky for me so it might happen."

"…kay." Was the entirely unconvinced reply from the baby Mist, clinging a bit until the redhead regretfully pried his arms off her. "Be safe, zia."
Tatiana really did have to get the whole story of how Shamal ended up Sonya's godchild one of these days. That was very much a mafia farewell, coming from a six-year-old's mouth.

'I'll see you later' wasn't nearly used as often, for sometimes that 'later' was years or never in their lives. As a matter of fact, most mafia men and woman the Sun had seen in Mafia Land didn't tend to use farewells unless forced to by another party.

For that matter, Sonya never really liked farewells either long before she noticed that.

She gave the kid a smile, but the Mist child decided to mope now and slid off to climb up on the couch.

The nurse was distracted from the kids when Cherep practically lifted her off her feet in a bear-hug. "I'm with him, Tats. Be careful, stay safe, and all that jazz."

"I will certainly try." Tatiana promised with a laugh, clutching at the arms around her because no matter how strong her siblings were it still felt weird for them to use it on her when everything else said they shouldn't be able to pick her up so easily.

Cherep wasn't bulky. He was a wiry-thin kind of guy, it looked like he was built more for speed than strength.

The fact he could pick her up with one arm and likely bench press her to boot?

She might be the eldest, but she was only beat out for title of the heaviest due to Cherep having a few more inches of height to work with than her. Getting picked up by him was weird.

Sonya in turn eyed her elder sister warily when their brother released her, firmly keeping herself on the other side of the room instead of moving to physically embrace the older woman. "I'll see you very soon myself, Tats. We might as well go through Mafia Land to get the brat home again."

The distance didn't save the blonde, when the stuntman did a bit of shifting around as she distracted her with being an approaching threat. Cherep hemmed in Sonya's escape route and let Tatiana catch their standoffish younger sister in a hug of her own.

"You know," Lisa commented absently from behind the couch to Shamal, "they do this every damn time they leave someplace. I miss the days leave-taking was a dignified kind of thing, around the time of Valera's birth they'd always get into some kind of scuffle when it came time to split up again."

"Not always!" Protested their only brother that would willingly speak full sentences, spinning around to face their foster mother which allowed Sonya to duck around him and nearly escape until he wrapped arms around her much to the thief's disgruntlement. "Just... occasionally."

"Besides, Lisa," added the nurse, chipping in with the 'squeeze the Storm-Cloud' efforts gleefully by smashing herself into the hug so their younger sister was sandwiched between them, "Nya needs love too. Even if she is grumpy about getting it."

'Nya' put up with it for only a moment before she growled, jabbing a sharp elbow into her side and driving another likely boney appendage into their brother's to get them to let go of her. Once freed, their younger sister bolted and dove behind their foster mother.

"Enough." Lisa declared, not moving from where she was shielding the youngest woman in the room, even if the younger members of the family were grinning broadly at their antics. "I think you've exceeded what limits she has for such fooling around. Tatiana... do have fun, dear."
Shamal deflated a bit, having forgotten the nurse was leaving in watching the teasing they were doing to his godmother.

Sonya eyed her kid's back and heaved a sigh. "If you get ready really quickly, brat, we can go with her to the airport."
The Mist blinked up at her in surprise for a second, then promptly copied her in bolting off to get ready.

Bouncing on his toes lightly once, Cherep dropped heavily back down to his heels and shot a questioning look to Sonya. She sighed again, shrugging once and giving a wave with a roll of her right wrist.

"And now, for those of us who has less time to develop a nonverbal way to communicate?"
Demanded Tatiana, planting a hand on her hip as they started drifting to the front door.

"…Cherep might've gotten an extension on his mid-year vacation week… but… it wasn't extended by much. Also, nursing a sick Mist back to health took up a good half a week." Sonya confided to her as her brat scrambled back to the living room they all just left to grab his abandoned jacket. "By the end of this week, he has to return to the circus."

Ah… ouch. After her, and Cherep, left… that also meant… poor kid.

He only had about two and a half or three more weeks of summer vacation, depending if one considered the days required to get him back to his home country and ready for his next year of schooling.

If her taking her leave surprised him, suddenly being left with only Sonya at the end of the week might just be painful.

"Good luck with that." Tatiana informed her sister cheerfully.

She huffed, rolling her eyes. "You are such a doll, Tats. I have no idea what I would ever do without your sparkling wit and invaluable advice."

"I know, I marvel that you can even get along without me some days." The nurse announced, almost throwing an arm over Sonya's shoulders if she hadn't ducked at the very last second. "Stop flinching away from me."

"I'll flinch if I want to."

"Ladies. Your chariot awaits." Cherep interrupted grandly, throwing the front doors open when Shamal slid up next to his knee fully put together. "As your chauffeur, I must insist certain individuals be on their best behavior at all times or small accidents such as leaving you behind or incredibly bumpy roads might be found."

"…I would like to remind you, brother dearest, you aren't safe from attempting that 'greatest human cannonball distance without the cannon' record. I have no issues helping you." Sonya snarked at his back, shoving her hands into her jacket's pockets as they followed him to the car pulled from the clan's motor pool to take the nurse to the airport. "I am such a loving little sister, right?"
The stuntman paused mid-step, flicking purple eyes back at them over a shoulder, then snagged his nephew and bolted for it.
The thief he was stealing from huffed in outrage, hot on his heels in aims of getting her baby Mist brat back.

Tatiana laughed as her siblings ringed the car, a wide-eyed nephew torn between glee and uncertainty bouncing on Cherep's shoulders as they ran from a very vexed and showing it Sonya.

(Tuesday the 8th of July, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Shamal was a little confused when his mamma stopped walking mid-way to nonna Lisa's house, picking a bus stop bench to take a seat on and patting the spot next to her in invitation.

"Come here, brat."

"…what are we doing?" They were going to be late, and nonna didn't seem like the kind of woman that appreciated being put off.

"I said if you learned what I had to teach you quickly enough, I'd then teach you something a bit different, didn't I?" His Russian godmother clarified, helping him into the spot she wanted him to sit and lowering her voice so it would only carry so far. "Now then… pickpocketing. I'm rather good at this part, and I'll teach you my tricks."

Peering up at her suspiciously, because she hadn't exactly said anything about his being good enough Saturday when they had their last lesson, he tried to recall how well he had picked locks that morning. "…are you sure, mamma? I didn't think I was very good…"

"Lock picking is very much an art that requires constant practice. Along with safe cracking, making counterfeits, lying, acting, and basically any other skill in life." Sonya admitted frankly, flicking glances from person to person as they wandered across their field of vision. "You've got the basics down decently enough, and you'll only get better the more time you pour into it. That just needs to be done on your own time with lock mechanics I'll send you via mail, so I can start teaching you this while Lisa sources a set of picks for you to own."

He turned to look out at the pedestrians running about in the early morning hours, turning that over in his head. Did that mean she expected him to keep up with those skills on his own, or would she just leave it up to him if he was going to keep them?

"Ready, brat?"

"…ready, mamma."

"Alright… there's three main methods to picking pockets. Violence, the distraction, and the crowd. Violence is basically mugging someone, quick and dirty and something even the most inept of thieves can accomplish as long as they're careful about it. You threaten someone, they give you money for not hurting them and going away, then hopefully you both walk away alive."

"But," Shamal shot a skeptical look upwards, half to check interruptions were allowed and half to see her expression, "then they'd know your face."

"It's why I don't like that method. It's… sloppy. If you need the cash that bad to the point mugging someone is the best option… then maybe you shouldn't be a thief." Threading her fingers through his hair, she tugged a few strands until he caught sight of a lady down the street practically assaulting another guy. "Version two, the distraction. Generally working in pairs, one thief does something startling or attention grabbing while another does the lifting. While not bad in terms of procedure, and entirely possible within your and even my skill range alone, it again opens the risk for identification although the second set of hands generally helps avoid complications."

While the first lady was enthusiastically kissing the guy, another man swept by and only the position they were sitting on let them see the second man pull a slim black case from the first man's back pocket. A tap to the first thief's shoulder had the lady pulling back with a sheepish grin, informing the man of something that had his surprise fade into something pleased and flattered. Then she waltzed off, after the second thief that now had the first guy's wallet.

That was… kind of… eww.

Shamal didn't want to kiss anyone, girls had cooties. "Do you have to…?"

"Hmm? Oh, no silly. Any distraction will work, that… just so happened to be the closest example I could point out." He got a slight hug, from the arm she wrapped around him to give them even more privacy. The next words were nearly muttered into his hair, but he could still hear the smirk in her voice as she continued. "Use your rather talented imagination, Shamal. A 'distraction' just has to be eye catching, if it's something you're not comfortable with then why the hell would you try it?"

Startling or surprising people might be fun, although if he was 'picking pockets' on civilian targets than he would have to be really careful about using his Mist Flames.

Shamal looked up to her to hear the last one.

"Finally… the crowd. Taking advantage of the fact sometimes you end up very close to another when there's a lot of other people about…" She extended an arm as if stretching it out, a smooth slide up and down and she had lifted the wallet out of another lady's purse before said lady left them at the bus stop to get on the large transport that slid to a stop in front of them. "This one takes more skill, and is what I specialized in. Although… I generally return the wallet if I have no need of their ID cards."

The young woman his mamma had just stolen from pushed a token into a slot on the bus to pay her fair, sliding farther down but taking the second bench seat. She pulled her purse open, likely noticed her lacking wallet, and started to search for it through the bag.

She only looked up just before the bus pulled away from the curb, but her eyes slid right past his mamma who was inspecting her wristwatch at that same moment.

"Not exactly pretty, is it?" Asked the Storm-Cloud lightly, pulling her left hand back from behind the bus stop bench's back and flicking it open to remove all the money kept inside.

She snapped it closed again, discreetly leaving it behind on the bench as she encouraged him to get up onto another bus pulling in for new passengers.

Once they were seated within the bus, paying with the stolen money and the remainder given to him to have, Sonya wrapped her arms around him so she could continue to lecture him on stealing.

"You can make a living picking pockets, but frankly it's really just better for generating a bit of cash in a pinch or two. Too many lightened wallets in one area makes law enforcement suspicious, which cranks up the pressure the local thieves are under. We're far enough out of our neighborhood this is considered 'free' territory as long as you don't lead any chase back. Now, to start with… we're people watching. Point someone out and estimate how easy or hard it would be to take their wallets."

"Is that all we're doing?"
"For now. Actually lifting things smoothly will be practiced back in Lisa's basement, we've got things to help with that, but now every Tuesday and Wednesday we will be sharpening your ability to pick out a mark."

Shamal turned his attention to the other passengers on the bus, but he kept thinking back to the lady on the other one that had looked so dismayed to realize she was missing something. He gripped his mamma's forearms a bit tightly, wondering if he liked this art.

"Him?" Asked the Mist, pointing to a man rather involved with a newspaper instead of paying attention.

Watching the thief-lady steal from the man hadn't raised the same feeling as the second one, so maybe he'd just stick with tricking men out of their money.

Mister Renato kept telling him ladies were to be respected, and that a young gentleman didn't make young ladies uncomfortable unless they started it. Going so against his godfather's teachings seemed… unwise. Even if it was on his godmother's behalf.

"…mmm, already distracted and supposedly a nice mark… but… look a bit closer, brat."

Shamal peered around the paper, only to suddenly lock eyes with the man. He earned a slight smirk, but the man folded up his paper and moved down the bus when it came to a halt to let people off.

"We're in a heavily thief-occupied part of the city, Shamal." Mamma informed him wryly. "You do kind of have to be careful around here, otherwise you'll end up trying to pick another thief's pocket."

…yeah, he didn't want to do that. "How do we avoid that?"

"We're headed to see if one of my old haunts is more or less thief-free, then we'll… basically people watch until you find me a mark to steal from. If I get arrested, which isn't likely but still should be said, get in touch with Usov, alright?"

"…alright, mamma."

She set her chin on the crown of his head. "You can keep the cash we get today, and I'll keep what you pick out tomorrow. On Saturday, we'll pick something to do with the money. Like attend a theater production, go see a Russian Circus, or just buy you a lot of candy. Okay?"

"Okay."

(Wednesday the 9th of July, 1969. Wo Hop To Triad Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Fong politely responded to the various greetings tossed his way, making his path too deliberate to be waylaid by his fellow Triad members.

Even after nearly a year of being more or less exiled from Hong Kong, he was a known martial artist and thus drew more than his own fair share of law enforcement attention when the crackdown on 'traditional arts' started, he still knew the path to the Mountain Master's quarters almost by heart.

Normally a Triad member wouldn't, they would be more familiar with the way to a 'Straw Sandal' liaison if they required some assistance, but Fong had found several unexpected obstacles in his way that dictated his strange path.

Storm Flames were only the tip of that issue, his prowess in martial arts attracting attention when it came to gambling rings and his… family issues, also required some intervention by the head of their Triad.

Finally being recalled back to the heart of their organization, even if only temporarily, was a mixed blessing. He no longer had to sneak around his own home country to visit those he shouldn't neglect, but it bought back the scrutiny that made every step slightly perilous for him.

Fong was used to walking alone along a razor edge, being both a touch too risky to associate with him regularly as well as being impossible to be ignored due to the 36 Oaths made him an outsider even within his own Triad.

His 'best' use was in enforcement, finding himself the one everyone turned to for additional muscle when things became dicey both put him on a pedestal and isolated him from the usual groups that made up any one triad.

Rapping his knuckles on the doorway of his Mountain Master's office, Fong waited with his arms folded within his sleeves for an attendant to slide open the rice paper door. When the door was opened, and greetings passed around, the martial artist found himself eventually seated before the head of the Triad he belonged to.

"Master Zhōng Duyi." Bowing while kneeling made his braid fall forward over a shoulder, but the martial artist pushed the length of braided hair to the side.

"Sōng Fong. Welcome back." A crocodile's grin was aimed in his general direction, the Storm Flame user didn't even have to look up to know it. "It seems your hiatus in Mafia Land did you no harm."

"It could even be described as interesting." Fong agreed neutrally, sitting up when the hands still in his view gestured for him to do so impatiently.

The Mountain Master of the Wo Hop To Triad wasn't a young man by any stretch, but he was easily his elder by at least a decade or more. Still in possession of a head of dark hair without even one odd streak of grey, sharp black eyes, and a scar that cut through the lower left side of his face, Zhōng sharply inspected what was really a living weapon before giving him an equally sharp nod.

"They've put out the regulations for the tournament. I hope you are prepared for it."

"Speaking along those lines… she did agree."

"The Mafia Land Cloud agreed to return to China."

"Storm-Cloud." He corrected the statement with a small smile. "And yes. I have her word she will consent to a contract that would remand her to Hong Kong for a specific amount of time. That being so, she also agreed to be my hostage against… misbehavior, for the duration of the tournament."

"Good. Very good. Not that I mind, mind you, but… earning a more localized expert in these jewel things your Flame users seem to like would be… desirable." Threading thick fingers through the short beard, the Mountain Master directed his gaze upwards to the delicately worked dragon inlaid into the ceiling. "Even if it is a foreign thief."

Fong folded his hands into his red sleeves, touching the bit of Red Imperial Topaz he had hidden away for in-between moments of Flame control exercises, before deciding how to pick his way through that comment. "If getting her attention took me most of a year, nothing will happen quickly with her. It may take more years to see any progress in any direction."

Not that he was entirely sure he wanted to try helping his Triad hook into the Russian woman, or even if that was remotely possible. However, trying and failing would do no harm… so long as the proper precautions were taken.

"Sōng, I heard what happened between the two of you in the island's headwind forest. If she is not only alive but also willing to converse with you at length and will indeed arrange some services you request from her own syndicate, then I expect she is as battle hungry as you are." Observed the head of the Wo Hop To Triad, those sharp eyes drifting back down to him. "Time is also something you seem to have a fair amount before we can fully pull you back again."

It was something, or someone, to work on while he was at… loose ends. Fong dipped into a shallow bow, because it was true and entirely something he didn't mind doing.

Again, if it happened that was all well and good. If not, it was likely she was half-expecting more 'recruitment' offers and would at least directly refuse them instead of lead on any attempts for perks or costly bait.

He lost nothing by merely attempting, so long as he was allowed to do it in a way the surprisingly blunt woman would not take offense to.

More spars would be fun.

"I believe you have only just returned, so go and rest yourself." Zhōng commanded, even if the martial artist had ensured he did not appear travel-worn before his arrival. "The Mother is done with lessons at this hour."

Seizing control over himself in an iron grip, Fong merely bowed again before departing the Mountain Master's office in an unhurried pace.

The back of the Wo Hop To compound had buildings connected to the Spring Gardens, the red-light district of northern Hong Kong. It was also where a lot of the girls were trained to become courtesans, or companions, and the occasional concubine.

Fong's little sister generally spent her time there, as he couldn't afford to take her with him to an island as entrenched into violence as Mafia Land nor did he earn enough with this 'hiatus' to afford another living arrangement. He was… not happy this was the best he could do for her, but… she insisted she did not mind even when it was fairly obvious they both disliked it.

As all hands were kept busy, that meant his little sister was being trained in the arts of a courtesan while he couldn't provide another place to live.

He slipped through the mostly empty halls, unfortunately startling the woman on laundry duty but hopefully since he passed quickly she recovered equally so.

Third floor, eighth from the stairwell, on the left-hand side.

Rapping his knuckles against the wood of this door lighter than he had with the Mountain Master's office door, Fong managed a genuine smile for the wary wine-red eyes that peered at him from a cracked open doorway.

Sōng Mingxia opened her tiny room's door fully, giving her elder brother a sweet smile of her own. "Big brother, it is so good to see you again."
"It is only for a few short months this time, I'm afraid." Fong cautioned, merely earning himself a wry little laugh from his baby sister. "Then I will be leaving again."

"Anything is better than nothing." The little Rain insisted firmly in a fond tone, drawing him into her room with a suspicious look tossed down the hallway. "Can I know why you are back, or should I not ask?"

"It is not a secret, there is to be a martial arts tournament in October." Since Fong was the Wo Hop To Triad's best martial artist, of course he would be immediately volunteered for such a thing. The gambling money that could be made off him alone would've seen to that, if it wasn't for the draw of what reputation he would then earn if he won it. "I have… found something I think you might be interested in, though."

There was little personal in the room. A tiny dresser and clothing chest took up most of it, the folded futon serving as a seat for the low writing desk for now.

The Storm knelt down on the floor under the window and left her the bedding, settling in for what time he could spare before long-distance travel fatigue set in.

"This isn't like the Philippines lady knife-fighter that was more interested in you personally, is it?" Mingxia asked worriedly, quick little hands making short work of setting up a brazier to boil water for tea in the sand pit to contain embers set into the middle of her tiny room. "Big brother, I may not be entirely at ease here… but it's safe."

In a brothel, which Fong was not happy being the only decent housing he could provide her.

The martial artist sighed, feeling slightly embarrassed all over again for how that ended up resolving itself. "I can assure you, this one is so disinterested in me she even offered to trade me to her sister as she found me 'annoying'."

His own loving little sister brought up a sleeved hand to hide her amused smile for a moment. "That is good… I think."

"She also very nearly managed to kill me." Actually, they very nearly managed to kill each other.

Fong went too easy on her in the beginning, and she had been mindlessly enraged for too much of it, for a clear and decisive winner to be figured out. There was also that maneuver of being very, very valuable at the time he finally managed to get her to agree to a meeting… around the time the Wo Hop To would've been allowed to strike back at her for reporting them.

By design or accident, that had still been… startling. "I think, as she will be coming here so you can see for yourself, she may be what you were looking for."

"If she's not interested in you, big brother, she may not be interested in me." The eleven-year-old worried with the edges of her own sleeves for a moment, flicking out a small hand with blue Flames to smother the smoldering embers that had boiled the tea water. "Does she even want an assistant or attendant?"

"…I have no idea. She does have a Lackey, so she is not against it. It will entirely be between the two of you, though. Whatever happens."

Mingxia added tea leaves to the water in her small teapot, shutting the lid firmly to let it brew, before looking back up at him hesitantly. "Madam Huizhong offered for me. A fair amount, and for entertainment only. Or servant's work, if I must insist on staying away from that side of her… business."
Fong didn't pull a face at her, merely forcing himself to only listen as she explained the supposed duties she would then have. Even if he wanted to, or argue, or forbid it.

He wasn't here for her to rely on, if she felt the need to make additional arrangements then… he'd help. Even if he was more than sure why Huizhong had made an offer to take in the younger sister of a fairly well-known Triad member.

He did specialize in protection and enforcement, gaining him as a protector because his little sister frequented the madam's brothels for 'work'…

"I will wait and see this new lady of yours, big brother." Promised the young Rain, pouring them tea to drink in the elegant way she had been taught over the last year. "But if she is not amenable or willing to allow me my freedom, I may have to in order to avoid things I would really rather not do."

"Fair enough." The Storm collected his mug of tea, giving his little sister a salute with it. "It is still good to see you, baby sister."

"Likewise, big brother."
Chapter 69

(Thursday the 10th of July, 1969. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Shamal?" Sonya padded over to the bed they were sharing, curious over what had made the kid retreat into the bedroom with his lizard instead of sitting out with her and her brother in the main part of her hotel suite.

There wasn't really much dictated to do at this hour, most everything was already worked on or done and besides an hour of imagination practice after dinner the kid was entirely allowed to just aimlessly wander about if he wanted.

Cherep had just been a bit surprised to be completely and sort of abruptly blown off for a pre-dinner Mist game session, but he wouldn't take offense anyways and had left to fetch them food while she investigated what had the brat so moody. The fact the kid immediately put space between himself and his uncle was a bit alarming, and outside the general behavioral patterns he had been following to date.

Obviously... something was wrong.

Curling up in a little nest made out of the bedding, the Mist was absently alternating between petting Luigi and letting the lizard amble about his hands and a tiny section of the bedspread.

He rolled over on his back to smile up at her but isn't nearly as cheerful or mischievous as she had come to expect. "Hi, mamma."

Inspecting him closely, the thief eventually was forced to conclude that there was nothing physically wrong. Which was... good. Leaving an emotional reasoning for why an orphaned kid decided to get himself some alone time to think about things.

"What happened?"

"...Mister Usov and I were talking to Miss Anna about Constructing facades of other people for distractions, and about how to prepare stock images to keep in mind and how they should either be of dead people or completely fake ones unless you want to make trouble for them." Her brat started willingly enough, dropping his gaze to Luigi when the chameleon licked his finger with a sticky tongue. "I... um... tried to make a copy of my papà but couldn't."

Sonya sighed through her nose and crawled up next to him. Stretching out to lie on her own back, hands folded behind her head.

Thankfully, he was at least more composed about this incident than he had the last time around.

"You've forgotten what he looks like?"

There was no bawling, that was a plus. Unfortunately, the kid was probably old enough now to swallow that down and just make himself miserable with it.

Luigi didn't like her much more than he had the first time they met, pointedly turning away from her direction and leaving his relatively stable perch on a palm in order to investigate the Mist kid's shirt buttons instead.
Shamal, despite the fact he had howled when he realized he forgot his own last name he shared with said dead man, only frowned at the ceiling they were staring mostly at. "...and I'm not all that bothered, mamma. I loved him, he's still my papà, but... I'm not... I'm still sad, but not... sorry I'm forgetting."

"You were very young when he passed, brat. Human memory actually isn't all that accurate unless you have an eidetic one. It would stand to reason you'd forget the smaller details over time without something to reinforce your memory." Sonya actually couldn't really recall a whole lot of Rachel's parents anymore either, and while she was sorry she could no longer put a face to the sensation the word 'mom' gave her... she could with the term 'foster mother' or just 'mother' and that was Lisa.

"...but he was my papà."

"Renato probably can get you a picture if it's that much of an issue." Honestly, even knowing her biological father confused her adult face with her biological mother's... she really couldn't put an image of the woman to the name Nyura. She couldn't even recall what Rachel had once looked like either. "...I don't remember my mother anymore, and I last saw her when I was five."

Honestly, part of the problem might be the kid now had more than just a 'father'. He wasn't left alone in the world anymore, he had a pair of godparents and her siblings as an aunt and uncles that picked up the dead man's son.

Losing what was his only 'adult' support suddenly probably had reinforced how scary it was to be alone... until a certain hitman recalled he was missing and went to pick him up.

The only difference between now and when Shamal realized he forgot his surname was time. Time between losing his father and then apparently didn't compare to time and her family getting included in his makeshift family.

The brat heaved a sigh, curling up around his lizard and shoving his face into her stomach. "I don't think... even if I could make a Construction of him, that I want to use him as merely a distraction."

"So don't. Once you find it again, use your papà's image for other things. Like... if you need a parent or guardian for something. He was your father. Or if you need an adult image to be taken seriously in a few years. As far as I know it, Usov's parents are alive to give that kind of permission to be used in less 'upstanding' ways... and if I'm recalling it right... Anna's a runaway. She might have an idea for what to reserve your papà's image for if you didn't like Usov's suggestions."

"...I use you sometimes." Shamal admitted slowly, placing Luigi on her stomach next to his face.

Sonya gritted her teeth against the feeling of scaly forepaws scrabbling against her skin, a few involuntarily twitches of her belly scaring the chameleon off her skin again to scramble back into the Mist's hair for the safety. "And I don't really care much, brat. You can use my image how you want, I'll deal with anything that happens from it easily enough. The only one I ask you don't use is your zio's. I wouldn't mind seeing what your papa looked like myself, actually. Just so I know what you might grow up to look like."

Humming a little tune to himself, the kid recollected his lizard out of his hair to clutch between two hands instead. "I don't... really feel like doing anything tonight, mamma."

"We've got nothing that is important to work on, but more 'practice' things you can do at any time." She was going to have to go grab a book or something, she wasn't much for simply doing nothing.

Even in the middle of a heist, when she had nothing else to do but wait, she liked to still occupy her mind in some way. That could've been a result of damn near anything really, from straining herself to learn and document the Dying Will Flames of the Sky phenomena while she developed the skill... to trying to occupy herself with something right after ending up under Lisa and Arseniy so she wouldn't have to think of how she ended up there.

"...can we... go nap on zio?"

Even if the kid wouldn't be able to see it, the thief raised an eyebrow at the question. "Entirely possible. After dinner, I'd like you to eat something tonight first even if you might not feel like it. You're growing, Shamal. You need the energy."

That was an interesting request. A little befuddled on how the kid dreamt that one up, she pushed herself in a semi-upright position in order to see him clearly.

"...why do you want to nap on him, anyways?"

"Cloud naps." The Mist informed her faux-brightly, with an echo of something mischievous back in his tone. "When you have a problem, mamma, you nap on them."

"I do." ...yeah, yeah, she did.

She started that with him and Valera.

Sonya huffed, feeling a bit embarrassed and a little bit sheepish at more or less getting called out on it by her own brat, as she shoved a hand through her jaw-length blonde hair. "...point."

The kid had also fallen asleep on Tatiana, the night of her massacre, woke up on Cherep and both sisters the morning after she and Renato went to see an opera.

It was entirely possible he had assumed napping on issues was just something her family did... and there were three Clouds that all hailed from her family. One lonesome Sun, but... supposedly more a Cloud-trait than a Sun one since his Mister Renato didn't do it too.

...actually, the hitman napped to skip boring hours when traveling. It wasn't entirely her fault, then.

Everything did seem less devastating or nasty after a good night's sleep anyways.

"Right, your zio is off getting us food. Afterwards, he's likely to go back to working on that infernal machine of his. Climb up on him once he sits down, I'll take whichever side you don't want."

Shamal snickered, firmly holding Luigi as he rolled off the bed and carefully set ajar the lizard's cage to return him to his terrarium. "Thanks, mamma."

"He's going to bitch, you realize."

Cherep would squawk and huff and complain voraciously, but he'd also likely let them get away with pinning him in place for another entire night. As long as she took the brat back to bed once night really fell and he was solidly asleep, it was possible he'd not even do more than put forth a token protest if the brat wanted to do it again before the stuntman left.

"A lot."

"But zio's nice and will let me anyways. If you join in, he won't wiggle out." Countered the brat wickedly.

Since it was markedly better than him pouting or stewing in the issue of his long-dead father and his own forgetfulness until Renato could find him a picture, Sonya only sighed and slipped off the bed as well. "…true."

Her dork of a brother really was too nice to her sometimes, and that habit had spread to her godchild. Well… sucked to be him then.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 10th of July, 1969 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Does he know I'm leaving tomorrow?"

"It might have contributed to your brushoff earlier, but I highly doubt it." Sonya answered, shutting the bedroom door behind her and wandering over to where Cherep had his almost finished junkyard-built bike in the middle of her living room. "More likely, he's just not that used to you yet to lean on when he's upset."

Scrubbing a hand through recently trimmed purple strands, the stuntman inspected his slapdash motorcycle closely for something before glancing at her distractedly. "Yeah… have fun with that."

"Is that thing even road-safe?"

"…I'll find out tomorrow?" Her dork of a brother ducked the slap she aimed to land upside his head, grinning as he scrambled off the couch to put space between them. "I'd know for sure if certain some ones hadn't decided to take a nap on me. What the hell was that even supposed to be?"

"Cloud naps." The thief admitted wryly, sighing and pressing a hand over her eyes. "Shamal's likely got it into his head that I nap on all my problems."

Cherep blinked at her blankly for a few seconds, then blurted out a snicker. Slapping a hand over his mouth helped nothing, she could still hear it perfectly well. He tried to keep quiet about it if it was blatantly obvious she knew he was laughing at her, but eventually he ended up on the floor muffling his mirth into a forearm. "Can you-ha! Can you imagine making everyone do that? Just… hate each other? Naptime! Fighting a war? Pillow-fight!"

That was… frankly absurd. There wouldn't be a bird left with feathers if that ever happened.

Sonya smirked wryly, also in a bit of confusion to why he was so amused by it, but his hilarity was kind of infectious even if it was at her expense. "Brother, you are a dork."

"But you love me." Protested the immortal stuntman with good humor, making a kind of back-flip thing off the ground she was fairly certain started as a martial arts move but somehow eventually infected the acrobatic troupe of the Großes Volksfest. Proof that even without her he was still sort of absently going along with keeping himself flexible by sometimes practicing with the acrobats. "I'm your dork."

"Very true."

Pausing a moment in exaggeratedly obvious thought, her fellow Cloud ambled over to the kitchen table while she sorted out what she wanted as a snack to eat while reading a few more chapters of the fantasy book she was in the middle of. "I don't think you're supposed to do that. When something's yours, and you love it beyond all reason, you're supposed to defend it. Not call it, them, or said
"I," Sonya insisted as she pulled out the leftover meat pie thing that was yesterday's dinner to heat up, "call it like I see it. If you're a dork, then I'm calling you a dork even if you are mine. If anyone that isn't mine calls you a dork it's another thing entirely, but different than in this case."

"...you're one of those people, aren't you?" Cherep asked, collecting the dishes to serve the leftovers on. "Double standards, little sister. And completely shameless about it too. For shame."

"Your point? Also, if I'm shameless... does trying to shame me do anything about the topic under discussion?"

Since he gave her two plates instead of one, she was pretty sure that meant he wanted to be fed more too. More mouths to eat the leftovers she had was not particularly objectionable, so she served him up a slice too.

Unfortunately, microwave ovens were very much only an American thing so far. In order to heat up leftovers, she had to use her oven. Meaning it was at least fifteen minutes of cooking time, thirty if she was really unlucky, and it tended to dry out or slightly burn whatever it was she wanted to eat.

...so, hitman cooking hack for the win.

If you added a pan of water to keep meat from drying out while baking it, then supposedly if you added a pan of water it might keep already cooked foods you were reheating from also drying out. That was the plan, anyways.

If she fucked this up, the stuntman was never going to let her forget it.

"Probably not," allowed her brother thoughtfully, "although in a slightly related but not topic... I'm under orders from our beloved, wonderful, terrific older sister to ask about 'smothering'."

"How is that 'related but not' to our discussion?"

"Naptime with me and the brat is okay, but you can't stand getting a spontaneous hug?"

Sonya eyed him sourly as she cranked up the heat in her oven. "Being able to keep my arms free or move away when I'm uncomfortable, or getting the very air in my lungs squeezed out by one or more people? Yes, very similar."

"We wouldn't be that bad if you didn't always run whenever we tried to give you a hug." Cherep offered after another bit of thought on the subject, wagging a finger in her direction. "Although I will give you that point."

"I can do touch... mostly. I can touch others, hug a couple people, and do normal friend-things." If she repeated it enough times, maybe she'd even believe that. "But whenever you smother me, I can't tell what too much pressure is or how much is too much force. People are fragile, Cherep. Especially for me and my Cloud-strength bullshit. I'm not always consciously aware of how much force I'm Propagating at any one time."

The stuntman stared at her levelly for a long moment, then he whistled lowly and raked a hand through his hair. "You're using the strength other people exert to know what you can and can't do?"

She sighed heavily. "If I punched you casually like I did back when we were kids before I got to grips with this Cloud Flame stuff, it's likely I'd break your arm. I use a lot of force normally, as most of my interactions are not... exactly... nice ones nowadays. Mostly, it's me shoving a couple pounds of Propagated steel through stone, wood, glass, or people. I'd rather not break those I like, Cherep."

"...you've forgotten what's 'normal.'" He offered in short instead, sounding a lot more thoughtful about the subject.

"When Shamal approaches me he starts everything, so I know exactly how much force to use when hugging him. I can sort of do a 'light casual' thing from the Balls I've attended, but that's... not typical and mainly just letting whoever has hold of me do the pulling." Sonya clarified, accepting that summarization of her difficulty with a shrug. "When you or Tatiana hug me, you both usually are going overboard and trying to keep me contained in order to keep me there to hug. Which I'm not used to nor do I like very much. I can tell that's too much, but not what level of force I should use if I only want to escape and not... break both your arms and maybe a few ribs."

"You need more hugs." Cherep held up both hands before she snapped at him that she got more than she was comfortable with as it was. "I mean in a 'familiarizing yourself to what's normal' way and not 'more hugs make everything better'. Even if they do."

She eyed him severely. "I don't have very many I can stand to have that close to me, Cherep. My sample size to get used to 'normal human' levels is tiny."

"Yeah... that's depressing." He wrapped an arm over her shoulders, ignoring it when she shifted irritably under him. "I'll tell Tats, and we'll dial it down a bit. Or at least give you first a normal hug and then one as hard as we can so you know the range when we see you. We'll repeat that as many times as you need, little sister."

"...hooray..."

(Friday the 11th of July, 1969. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Cherep pulled a face, crossing his arms over his chest and sticking his nose in the air. "It worked! I'm here, all in one piece, and nothing exploded. I'm saying it's a success."

"When you started it up the blasted thing backfired so hard it had the hotel's concierge and valet diving for cover." Sonya countered in a deadpan, a hand on her hip and an utterly unimpressed look plastered across her normally neutral features. "The fact you got here on that thing is a minor miracle. Also, you don't have a helmet!"

"...so, I need better shock absorbers. And a better muffler. But most of that was just it clearing out the solvents I used to clean the engine, and it runs! And you suggested this!"

"I'm not arguing that. I'm saying it's likely going to shake apart on you in five minutes. Where will you be with a motorcycle that fell to pieces and no helmet? Not where you need to be and likely in a lot of pain. And if that happens in the middle of the fucking road, Cherep-"

Lisa shut the front door quietly, now knowing exactly why Shamal had wandered in alone and unescorted claiming that 'mamma and zio are a bit distracted, they'll be a moment'.

The child was puzzlingly alright with his mother-figure arguing with others in various tones of pissy, when as far as she knew most children saw that as an upsetting occurrence.

Well... it was Sonya. She'd argue with a rock about which was more hard-headed if she could.
Obviously Shamal was more than familiar with that little habit of her youngest foster child, even if she hadn't heard a lot of verbal arguments out of her and her young hitman friend when they visited.

Arseniy, likely alerted to their visitors by Cherep's favored but overly-loud method of transportation, blearily stumbled down the staircase to first peer in her direction then to dubiously glare in the direction of where his son and their grandchild were… 'discussing' the proper distribution of space on the couch. More effort on the young Mist's side with uncommunicative grunts on their son's.

She did wonder if Sonya's habits would rub off on her child, and it seemed so. Shamal was not really a quiet child, but he wasn't very argumentative to any but Valera so far. Her first grandchild had only had another fight she personally heard of, and that had been to his godfather about what he wanted to do one day.

Even after that argument, the child hadn't needed reassurance that he was still cared for like most others would.

Both Cherep and Tatiana had required some kind of reassurance they weren't going to be kicked out of the house just because they had a difference of opinion with her or Arseniy. The stuntman a lot due to the moral differences of this life and what he was used to before ending up with them, the nurse only when she messed up badly enough the vor had to step in so her childhood foolishness wouldn't haunt her steps as an adult.

Sonya was never one that needed it, but that might have been due to the fact she had rigidly kept herself from testing boundaries or leaving entirely until she no longer felt stifled by them.

Did the two of them already brush up and deal with that subject already, or was it still pending?

Also, did she bring it up and hope the young woman would take any advice about what to do when it occurred when she didn't experience it for herself and might not understand where that would stem from?

All Lisa really could do was ask or provide some anecdotes.

First, though, she should start up breakfast. Not only would Cherep likely appreciate something hot to eat before hitting the road, but Arseniy was awake before he was good and ready and that meant he needed coffee.

Before even that, though, one young man needed to get his own set of lock picks.

Lisa went into the living room the children had gravitated to simply due to the fact the new set of picks had been stashed there, coming to an entirely unexpected halt before crossing the threshold to take in the view.

Her lover apparently decided to go back to sleep … but he also decided to 'share the wealth', taking a leaf out of their foster daughter's book, with the children. Arseniy was flat out on his back on the so-contested couch, Valera making himself rather comfortable across the vor's chest, and Shamal was…

…spooked-looking was a good word.

The young Mist was uncomfortably wedged a bit under Valera and against the back of the couch, trying really hard not to disturb 'nonno'. Which didn't really work well when you were half-on the man in question.

Arseniy wasn't exactly a touchy-feely man… well, no. That was a bald face lie. The vor she lived and made a home with was very much not a people-person. Even if she got a hug out of the blue,
Lisa would first wonder what the ever-loving hell had gone wrong that earned her such comfort before wondering if he just wanted contact with her.

Casual contact was mostly limited to rough housing around with his equally blooded vory friends, behind closed doors with her, and rough if still affectionate ruffles of their various foster children's heads.

Sonya started getting hugs due to finding and sourcing them the Sun Flame healing that allowed Valera's conception at all, Tatiana was treated to the same due to her forging ahead with learning the same to bring back with her to the clan, as far as she knew it Cherep got semi-hard slaps to the back for picking and sticking with his morals in his life choices.

Valera got a slight bit more, but only due to the fact he was a toddler and was tired out easily at this age. Their various foster children were all too old when they got them to get affectionate pats… but apparently Shamal earned some kind of edge for how much their youngest foster child doted on him.

Well… there was that one incident that happened when a child aged Sonya got deliriously sick on them, but the young thief never mentioned it afterwards and she actually highly doubted she recalled any of it.

The slight 'click' made Lisa shut her eyes just in time to avoid the flash, turning to regard said Storm-Cloud in amusement as she accepted her camera back. "…we're keeping him, right?"

Sonya gave a little pleased smirk at her, retracing her steps out of the living room without so much as a backwards glance to her poor brat's situation despite hesitant flailing to attract attention. "Stolen fair and square, Lisa."

Cherep ambled in after her, apparently their argument was dealt with and either her younger foster child was ignoring that happened or it had been resolved to her satisfaction so nothing more needed to be said about it. "…heh. Cloud naps."

"What?"

"Shamal is of the opinion the Clouds of this family nap on their issues." He explained for her cheerfully, ducking a wispy blue something that nearly impacted his head and bounced off down the hallway.

It broke something else down near the front door, because of course it did.

Nothing glass or fragile from the solid-sounding crunch, but likely the same end-table Tatiana broke hurrying in and out of the house in her early teenage years. Nothing important was kept there, at least.

"NO CONSTRUCTIONS IN THE HOUSE, SHAMAL."

"…sorry, mamma. Sorry, nonna Lisa."

Lisa folded down the bellows of her Moskva camera in order to shut the lens away from being easily broken and smiled at the young boy. "You are forgiven, just try harder to keep it in mind."

She then silted an amused look to the middle foster child.

"Now then... Cloud naps?"

"Sonya's done it to him and Valera. He's done it to me with Tats one night and she joined in. They "did the same damn thing to me last night too." He scuffed a hand up through his hair from the back, scratching the back of his head. "That was… introducing a baby Cloud to a slightly older Mist, waiting up after some kind of twisted date-night thing, and then something he got upset about. So… Cloud naps."

Well… okay then. She was not going to pretend to know what went on in her children's heads when it came to their Flame business, but… it was very cute.

Now she also had proof. "If you insist, Cherep."

"Not my term!" The… third? Cloud in the room exclaimed cheerfully, striding over to sprawl out next to the couch on the floor. Apparently to join in on the so-called 'Cloud naps'. "Blame Nya."

Arseniy, who hadn't been entirely ignoring the conversation, cracked one eye open just to roll it.

Speaking of the last and final Cloud of the family… Lisa left the men to their little social naptime to figure out where her daughter went. It wasn't really all that hard to find her.

"Nya… what are you doing?"

The named thief stood up straight, hiding the broken leg of the end table and her other hand with the flickering lavender Flames behind her back. As if her mother couldn't clearly see the rest of the shattered wood right next to her silver-plated boots. "Nothing."

She eyed the younger woman sternly. "Do not burn the house down."

"…I didn't when I was growing up." Sonya muttered as she turned back to the furniture her godchild had broken, likely intending it to be under her breath but Lisa was an ex-thief herself and still had very good hearing… when Cherep wasn't trying to deafen the lot of them with whatever mechanical thing he had gotten his hands on or Tatiana wasn't gleeful over gaining another illegal rock'n'roll record to play.

"Try to keep it that way. I'm fond of this house." Lisa shot behind her as she entered the kitchen.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 11th of July, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"…so, zio and zia are both gone."

"What, am I not good enough anymore?"

Shamal gave his mother a severe glare, which had the icy woman rolling her eyes at him and burrowing her nose back into the reports Galina gave her to review.

Scruffy gave a slight cough to retain young Mist attention. "And what of Galina and I? Swiss cheese?"

The Lightning mentioned tossed her head in a haughty manner. "Apparently so. I feel so unloved…"

Sonya glanced back up just to gift her secretary with a strange look.

The kid being talked to heaved a melodramatic sigh, rolling not only his eyes but his entire body over to a sprawled-out kind of position on the couch. Then he moped there, on a plush leather couch in the middle of a Soviet Union country... there was something wrong with that picture...

When his mom seriously started inspecting the paperwork in her hands as if she was considering tossing it over a shoulder to ignore for yet another day, the brunette woman shot him a glare.

Exactly when did keeping their boss on track fall to him to do?

Oh... right, when he was the one entertaining the kid to keep him from pulling said boss away from her work to do it instead.

"I'm not very imposing, but if we tag one of your fellow spooky Mists we could go exploring? Within the building, I mean."

Shamal perked right up. "Mamma? Is there anything here you stole?"

From the look on Galina's face, it was going to be a resounding n-

"Yes. Second floor, the back-office meeting room affair. I stole the contents now on display in the cabinet next to the bay windows. They've yet to be moved since the syndicate that originally wanted them but backed out of the deal only just came by and got a oh-so-coincidental look at it all, you can likely go take a gander yourself before it's moved to storage to wait out the 'hot' item price dip."

...Peter was now interested to know what she had stolen that an entire clan of thieves displayed in a 'thumb their nose' gesture to another. The boy didn't even have to chivy the Sun out of his seat, he was already on his feet trying to recall his very pathetic metal map of the place.

"I wonder what else we can find?" Shamal wondered, wandering in a beeline out of the office and not catching the very deadly look his mother was aiming at his supposed 'escort'.

He was very likely taking his own life in his hands with this, but... well... he was interested too. Alone, he'd likely get an arm broken as some of the men here had indicated rather aggressively they had no issue doing if he looked at them wrong.

 Escorting the kid of a woman that was known for murdering a whole lot of people over the course of one night, currently embroiled in the middle of the mystical and highly volatile 'Flame' thing? For getting into altercations with vory-hopefuls and beating the shit out of them three at a time?

Peter would take those odds over the one on his lonesome, thank you very much.

Speaking of said kid, Shamal was rapidly leaving him behind. Hastening his steps, trying to ignore both Sonya's glare boring a hole into his back and Galina's brisk nod of thanks in various levels of success, the Sun got more than halfway down the hallway after the young Mist before his nerves racked up.

No matter how you looked at it, this building was full of criminals. Of various flavors, in Sonya's pure business type to Galina's small detailed concerns to those worse and better than them in person.

Peter hadn't really mingled around here, at all. Mostly due to the fact he was... more obviously not Russian.

Half the time he had been in the USSR, he couldn't speak the native language. Once he did, he was firmly ensconced in the Flame user's various groups. Mainly the 'Sun section', and the 'office group'.

Being automatically part of a solely inclusive subsection meant he knew nearly no one outside of them and no one outside of them had a reason to know him. What little anyone would have to discuss with him would be either things he didn't know of before, mostly the Flame user details he had been absently clarifying that earned him actual support instead of just absent one sided dependency, or criminal things he had only a few months of exposure of.

There was one path in and out Scruffy walked in this building, generally with enough haste he wouldn't get waylaid by either someone who he couldn't understand and therefore would likely piss off or someone who's issues he couldn't understand and help with.

Shamal hit the staircase a few feet ahead of him, causing the Sun to jog a bit to finally catch up with the child. "After the second-floor office, then where do you want to go?"

"Um… nonna said the cantina had some interesting things." Finally pausing a bit so he could draw up next to him instead of lingering behind, Shamal glanced up at him. "Hey, McScruffy… is there anything you like here?"

"…I haven't exactly seen a lot of it so far."

"That's stupid. You live here."

Out of the mouth of babes.

Scruffy sighed heavily, matching steps with the kid as they descended to the second floor. "Yeah…
but I couldn't speak Russian for a bit. Usov helped me learn in a short few moments with his Flames but being unable to speak the language is a bit… isolating. So, I didn't get out much."

Surprisingly, the young Mist nodded his head a few times as they reached the second-floor landing.
"Yeah, Mister Renato traded a few favors, so I wouldn't be unable to talk to anyone but mamma here."

"It's fairly multicultural in regard to speaking languages." Peter detailed in protest, of what confused him but there were a few people that had English as a language and had been willing to speak with him so he wasn't entirely the 'gibberish-speaking outcast'. Galina had a rough, barely understandable grasp on English, most of which her skill was his influence on her, which he really appreciated her obtaining. "Likely your mamma wouldn't allow you to be the only one speaking Italian if that had happened."

Sonya had spoken English for him back when Usov had yet to work out his language therapy, not often to prevent impacting his immersion in Russian but more than enough so he wasn't entirely isolated in that respect. Equally or more, she would've spoken Shamal's native language for him had he needed it.

That consideration on his behalf from criminals was a little strange, but… likely, half the reason why he was alive. Peter was not objecting, he was rather grateful for it.

A black-haired young woman was waiting politely for them both a bit farther down the hallways, which honestly the Sun only knew by name mostly.

"Anna!" Shamal delightedly exclaimed. "Do you know where mamma's stuff is?"

"I even was told the story to share with you." Confirmed the Mirror Lady, ignoring the hesitance and suspicion her very presence inflicted on the others using the hallways. The young woman laced her fingers together in front of her, flicking dark brown eyes up at him for a long moment.

Scruffy nearly stepped backwards, scared and unnerved but not knowing why. The young woman was a very intense one, when she was actually present in person.

Anna dismissed him after a moment, looking back down to the excited young child. "Likely, I will also be able to find the history behind certain other pieces you may be interested in."

The younger Mist beamed at her. "Let's find mamma's stuff first, then."

(Saturday the 12th of July, 1969. A Zolotov owned nightclub, Levoberezhny District, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Milos heaved a sigh as he sank down into a well upholstered armchair.

There was some pounding music beating at the walls, still faintly audible in the room but not headache inducing to the elderly men in here, smoke thick enough to physically cut if one was inclined wreathing the very air, but he had missed way too many of these little meet and greets as it was to let it bother him.

"Alright there, Zolotov?" Asked the Pahkan of the Kozlov Brotherhood snidely, already outright glowering at the head of a thieves’ clan when he entered the mostly hidden back room.

The Zolotov Pahkan smirked in his face, collecting a glass of vodka to nurse for the next hour or so. "Delightful, just old."

"You look rather good for a man shot through the chest." Kirillov Nahum remarked idly, toying lightly with a tumbler of whisky and staring at the play of light within it instead of actually looking at any of the other men in the private room with them. "Not to mention a man over the age of seventy."

With another sigh, the old thief pressed a hand to the bullet hole that wasn't a scarred-up mess. "These Flame things do pay off in sometimes interesting ways. Sun Flame using nurse sealed it up in hours, to the point it wasn't more than an hour later it looked weeks old instead of a bloody hole."

"Speaking of," Polyakov Ildar commented, the head of the Komarova Gang from the Marfino District which was one of the farther flung allies Milos had, "how hard will it be to get a set of Lightning twins trained up?"

"Easy, but best get them in quickly."

"Oh?"

"All the trainees we have so far will get a free pass, but..." Pausing, the Zolotov Pahkan examined the other men in the room from the corner of his eyes. "...we're not going to hold the training solely to us."

"No? Interesting." Kirillov, who headed up a loose collection of smaller street gangs in the 'no-man' zones between the more 'established' syndicates, picked up the conversation. He was only invited due to the fact that no-man's zone did allow outside recruiting within it even if he 'ran' a collection of independent groups within it. "Why ever not?"

"As more numbers pour in, we can't without hamstringing ourselves." Had the damn woman actually been upfront about the fucking problem, he might've been able to think of a way around it. He might not have as well, but the lack of preparation he had basically meant the initial assumption was going to go through in the end. "Not according to the Vindice Laws, anyways."
His clan would still have the 'best', for the short term. Milos was going to try to hold onto that, even if the biggest stick in there was abandoning ship and dragging more away with her, but... he could've not had that as well as had been completely surprised by the sudden reemergence of Dying Will Flame users like all the rest.

"So, we're shoving it off-site, and if you've got actual teachers the cadre involved will appreciate it."

"Puppeting them instead?"

Milos cut a glance to the speaker, not someone he knew on sight but his son had at least kept him up-to-date on the new local powers shifting into view. "For the short term, yes. As the more we let them go, the more they're going to start charging you."

Avdeev Yaropolk was a thug, only invited to this due to a ruthless takeover of a few smaller protection rackets on the border of Khimki and Levoberezhnny District. In fact, he was the only reason why the Zolotov Pahkan bothered to bestir himself out of his clan's territory to come here in his son's stead.

Vor Ziven had finally gotten back to his leader over why he was so far outside of their territory.

Milos had gotten suspicious over what the man was off doing on Bazanova's behalf a short few days ago, and still almost couldn't believe the woman managed to hide what she did for so long.

Admittedly she took advantage of the collective incomprehension of what Dying Will Flame users could manage, a brand new vor that only briefly checked in and so was very much 'out of sight out of mind', and the 'rumors' of a particular kid's demise. Almost the perfect storm to brew a major threat within, honestly.

Avdeev had no warning. Vor Ziven let Dorokhov Timur, the Khimki Cloud, go... or never had hold on the boy at all, and the young man viciously ripped the thug's head right off with bare hands the moment he was let into the dark room.

"Good evening, old man Zolotov." The heavily tanned blond scrapper greeted him cheerfully, blatantly ignoring the rapidly growing puddle of blood that was getting all over his charge and the wooden floorboards under their feet. "Timur was a bit over enthusiastic when you suggested he could get his revenge here, sorry about the mess."

Milos grinned at his young vor sharply. "Ah... to be young again. Certainly, no complaints on my end. Compliments to Bazanova for saving and salvaging the boy, Ziven."

"Yeah... she's going to be pissed. But she's also the one that told me we probably couldn't hide him much longer." Shrugging, the vor cast a glance over the gathered men either too distracted by the dead body suddenly in their midst or trying to keep an eye on the now calm as water young man that did the murder. "Dorokhov, I'll be outside with the rest of the bodyguards."

When the named Cloud swung around to give a sharp nod to his advisor, the Zolotov Pahkan crooked a finger. "Over here, boy. I might not have much time left, but I'll certainly keep up with the trend and tell you what you need to know to make up your own mind."

He didn't earn any of the goodwill the only other of-age Cloud in Moscow, but he could certainly build up more so maybe one damn Cloud would work with his son.

"Why you? We're closer to Khimki than you are, Zolotov." Flatly interjected one of the so-far silent men, swinging his gaze from the now dead burgeoning thug-lord to the old thief.
Ponomarev Rodion, Pahkan of the Khovrino Association, and a very big detractor in Milos’ ass for the last few decades.

An old rival, one of the rare few that he hadn't yet outlived. The man was maybe a head shorter and just as silvered and creaky as the Pahkan of the Zolotov clan, but whereas Milos still had the muscle from his long years working an honest thief’s trade Ponomarev was whipcord thin from long hours behind desks long before he lost his youthful vigor.

"_Because we actually went out there, loaned off a vor for his aid, and have been more or less keeping him covered while he regained his strength and feet under him._" Indeed, the young boy sauntered over to perch on a chair near the old thief. Milos then ignored any further huffing and puffing to look straight at the young Cloud, gesturing to the vor that had spoken. "Ponomarev Rodion, white-collar crime. About as east from you as we are south. Next to him, on the left, is-"

Reeling off the names and syndicates represented in the room, nearly on automatic since Milos had been here long before half had ever killed their first man, let him gauge the newest Cloud.

Indeed, the only one that would matter in a few short years.

Dorokhov Timur, the Khimki Cloud, wasn't much of a man just yet. Still on the young-looking side, just old enough to start shaving from the scruff poking out of his chin, sea green hair and black eyes that sharply took in the individuals he was point out.

Smart but wary, Milos was starting to see a trend in 'Clouds'.

Hard headed, independent, and likely just as hard to control as a particular Storm-Cloud which still belonged to his clan if only for mere months yet.

Hopefully, when Dmitriy got out of jail, he'd keep his own hard headed son from pissing this Cloud off as well.

Vor Ziven had done damn well, in coaching this young man. Keeping his tongue behind his teeth when in uncertain territory, listening to elders even if he might not agree, that poker face might be more Flame-centered than training but that was in his favor as well.

He wasn't coming off as a brash, irreverent upstart to the rest of the collected criminal powers in the room, but a violent-possible if more often composed and watchful young man. More likely to survive longer due to that projected image, than ignored and sidelined due to being thought of a liability.

As the Pahkan of the Zolotov clan, getting shot at all had impacted his image to the other syndicate bosses. The fact they didn't have the shooter was worse.

How quickly his Flame users got him back on his feet mitigated a lot of that, Dorokhov's unveiling was the last edge he needed to retain the respect of the others for the last few months of his time in power within the Zolotovs.

Milos would very much like to go out strongly than with a whimper.

The fact it was the Flame users he was regaining respect on was only a tiny bit galling, but mostly because he'd only be able to transfer a small part of it to his son.

Once he was finished reeling off names and specialties, the Khimki Cloud huffed but actually did glance to him for permission to speak. Once given a nod, the young man unfolded his hands to jerk a thumb at the dead body. "Got a Storm?"
"Not here." Milos answered evenly. "Did you bring one?"

Dorokhov turn his head to the door his vor aid had left through. "Ziven! Bring Vitya."

'Vitya' was an even younger young man, violently bright blond hair and equally light reddish-brown eyes. "Body disposal, Timur? It's been a long while since you needed me to do this."

"He's the one that murdered the boys of our southern reaches." The Cloud clarified dismissively, flicking dark eyes in challenge at the rest of the men in the room… more specifically the other syndicate he shared a border to.

Revenge or vengeance was always a valid tactic, and as an introduction Milos couldn't arrange a better one to this little gathering. He had suspicions he knew where the sniper had come from, as being shot just outside their territory range was a big suspicious clue, but until proven…

Milos glanced to Ziven's completely controlled and neutral face, before turning back to watch the Disintegration of Avdeer's corpse.

Now, to watch the fallout start.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 12th of July, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"…father?"

"Mmph." Shutting his eyes as he got settled in the back of the armored car, now included with a Lightning of Galina's arrange to ensure that no other sniper bullet could be aimed through the gaps of the reinforced panels or glass, the old man sighed heavily.

He was getting more than too old for this shit. Physically he was fine and fit, but… time and stress took its own toll on his body.

Primakova had ensured he was as hale and as whole in form, but it didn't dull the sharp spikes of emotion he had gone through once he realized he had been shot in front of his own son.

Spiritually, as much as he would've scoffed years ago at the very thought. He was just an old man, there was no measure of Sun Flames or mystical bullshit that could reverse that. His flesh was also starting to fail him, if he wanted to ignore how myopic he had gotten in the last decade… or the pain throbbing in his gunshot wound.

"…Bazanova saved and had the Khimki Cloud trained up on the sly." Milos opened his eyes to measure his son and heir's reaction to that news.

Gedeon was shocked, not that surprised but jarred to hear it come from him. At least he had known. "W-what? When was he here? How?"

"Vor Ziven, I don't know if you caught him coming in with a couple other young men. The blue-green haired young man? That was the Khimki Cloud."

"I knew that much. That he was alive. Galina informed me, although I couldn't identify him on sight." The Sun user remained silent for a long moment, more than long enough for one young man sitting in the front passenger's seat to lay a green sparking hand on the dash of the car and it to pull away from the nightclub. "That doesn't explain how, father. Only how you learned."
"Collective ignorance, mainly. No one thought he'd survive what happened. We assumed, and she slipped it by all of us." Milos ripped off his tie, tossing it to a corner of the car to be ignored and more importantly not around his neck. "She wasn't so sold on what 'everyone' knows, sound familiar?"

Gedeon sighed heavily, rolling his eyes at him. "As she did with the Flame thing, and with the school thing, and so on. I can understand that, old man. She's just not suitable."

"Who would be?" Shot back the Pahkan scathingly. "Name one damn person that we can shove in her position, Gedeon. Someone we have on hand, not in jail or elsewhere, that wouldn't crash and burn doing what she has done."

The silence this time was a bit more than sullen.

"Lightning, kid... what's your name?"

"Dominik, Silivanov Dominik Vasilievich Pahkan." Promptly responded the also disgustingly young man helping with his security. "Galina already informed me anything I overhear is to be forgotten unless you say otherwise, Pahkan."

"Good." At least someone else was on the ball.

Yet again another that they were losing right out, but... Milos would take his wins where he could.

"...father?"

The Pahkan of the Zolotovs grunted instead of actually respond right away.

Primakova had informed him chest pangs might be a sign of a stroke, a higher risk he was running due to possibly incompatible blood types donated for his survival and just getting injured at his age. Until the blood was naturally replaced, in three months, he ran that risk willingly.

Milos dearly hoped not, otherwise things would be getting dicey for everyone in short order.

Heart attacks were also something he was 'high risk' for, simply due to age and 'unhealthy' habits... maybe it was one of those and he could just get on with shit after it passed.

He had to at least introduce Dorokhov to his son first, hopefully without either deciding they hated each other's guts again like Gedeon and Sonya. Bother Pyotr into actually picking and sticking with a replacement of his own since his granddaughter wasn't going to remain with them. Figure out something to get Bazanov and his fucking daughter pacified with, so they wouldn't rip a god damned hole in his clan. Then-

Milos grunted, rather unwillingly, as the pain got worse. "Lightning boy. Think you can 'Harden' a heart?"

Silivanov ripped around, slamming a hand sparking with his emerald Flames right over the Pahkan's chest. Pain wracked the old man's form as he practically folded in half from the assault and ignoring both the driver's and Gedeon's shouts the kid did it again which finally got the internal chest pain to start fading as his heartbeat lurched queerly under the influence of emerald green Flames.

"What the fuck was that!" Roared his son, almost grabbing onto the Lightning if the young man hadn't pulled back sharply to avoid it.

He earned himself a flat look. "The property of Lightning Flames might be Hardening, but it's still fucking Lightning. Electrical shocks, to a stuttering heart in the right spots, acts as a defibrillator would. I stopped the heart-attack, then restarted his heart with a targeted burst of electrical signals. Why do you think I was assigned to be the Lightning on the Pahkan's security efforts? I've got both the power and the control to also be a medical aid."

"Primakova set you up to this, didn't she?" Milos gritted out, feeling his heart-rate stutter and skip a little but more or less continue as is.

He could also breathe easier, which was always nice.

"...I was going to be one of the nurse trainees, sir. She did give me a bit of one-on-one right before she left."

Milos cracked up, painfully but the likely heart attack was fading and he could finally feel his fingers again. "Why is it you all are trying so damn hard to keep me alive?"

Silivanov glanced to Gedeon, then back again to the man still boss of the syndicate he heeded to. "Reasons, Pahkan. Reasons."

Having said his piece, as well as having added himself to the number of people with Flames that had a direct influence in Milos' survival, the Lightning turned around again to get on with the 'real' reason he was even present.

"...still think she's the 'wrong person', Gedeon?" Her sister might be an interesting fit, if they could convince her. The old man rubbed his chest gingerly, breathing a bit hard but other than that… "Silivanov, you and who else is watching me for health problems?"

"...the Mirror Lady might've been, but she was recalled for other Mist things today. They're planning something... big." Admitted the Lightning boy hesitantly with a backwards glance, avoiding the suspicious glare the Pahkan's driver was shooting him. "There's a Rain girl I haven't been introduced yet on standby instead of preparing to leave for Mafia Land's Hospital like the others in case of strokes. Another Lightning, Kulibin Fyodor Zakharovich, who trades off with me in a few hours. He got the same training as I did from Primakova."

"Good. I want to meet them." If he was leaning on them to get through the next year alive, Milos wanted to be sure they knew he appreciated the effort they were going to on his behalf.

Which reminded him, he still had to give the sisters something to show his gratitude they responded as they had so promptly after the assassination attempt on his life.

Sonya didn't seem to want a whole lot, and Tatiana had what she was after. They both were women, so maybe… fuck, why couldn't this be years ago?

Then they both would just like a few shiny trinkets from the clan and maybe a bit better accommodations than what independent clan women normally received then. Lisa would earn better things for her home, as she raised the girls into the helpful women they were now, as a given.

He owed the Mirror Lady something as well, since she got them back to the Storm-Cloud and Sun so damn fast.

After this, it wasn't likely Gedeon would so much as breathe wrong on the hospital efforts. No matter how much he disliked one of the women involved with that deal, twice now they stepped in and kept him alive.

The school one was riskier in that respect, but if Milos could get a couple alliances involved with the running of it… it would not smack as much of Bazanova's efforts and more just a clan thing.
Coughing a bit, hopefully the shortness of breath would go away in a few more minutes, the Zolotov Pahkan let himself heavily lean on the back of the rear seat bench. Out of all the things he had left to do, to be punched out before he punched his ticket, the closest one to being done was…

"Change of plans. Driver, head to Khimki. The long way around." Best let Dorokhov get settled in or let Ziven settle the kid back in his territory and bring something to show goodwill on their end, before he introduced Gedeon to the Cloud-boy officially.

He'd give Bazanova… books. Lots of books, for going over her head like this.

There was also that jewel encrusted gaudy affair she stole for Pyotr. He had no fucking clue how the clan was going to off-load that ridiculous thing, she may as well have it.

As she wasn't sticking around, not pissing her off didn't really hold much weight to it in the balance of things. Equally likely, she might not mind.

Bazanova had warned Ziven they might not be able to 'hide' the kid anymore herself.

---

(Sunday the 13th of July, 1969. Hotel De Anza, San Jose, California, United States of America.)

Renato inspected every damn room, service elevator, the side water closet.

The floors, ceilings, what above those ceilings, the walls that had been patched over, and the entire fucking parking lot. Intently.

Every... damn... meter... of possible evidence bearing surface he could gain access to by polite or not means.

There was the feeling he was missing something here lurking in the back of his mind. It was driving him nuts.

The oppressive weather wasn't helping much, San Jose might be near the ocean but it was far enough inland and only next to a sheltered bay. There wasn't enough water in the air for his sensibilities, meaning it was just miserably dry and hot right now and had been for days unless the wind shifted just so and gave him some moisture to breathe in.

Sweeping off his fedora and raking a hand through sweat damp strands of hair, the hitman retraced his steps back into the hotel's service entrance and replaced the felt back on his head.

There was security footage showing one attacker going in, too fast to be picked up by the grainy and low-quality tapes that had been dismissed as a bird or something by the police. The second tape, the one the Cerrito Crime Family had at least confiscated before the local law enforcement could, showed only a green-haired man coming out of the hotel but getting shot seconds afterwards and that same damn blur flashing through the frames.

Too indistinct to be identified as anything but a wickedly fast Cloud.

…Sonya's cards were correct. If one man did manage to kill one half of whatever they were here to do, kidnap or free or what have you, then that shooter was then so much bloody paste. 'Three taken, but two are left'. Which then meant the man that only briefly was seen in the doorway and that had been shot was the Lightning, but that was now merely detail of which he could use to find him.
The hitman had to answer 'where was that dead man's remains?'

It didn't seem like an important question, obviously the man was deader than dead and as such it was a dead end, but the Italian very much liked having all his loose ends tied up neatly. It prevented 'surprises' in his line of work.

It would also inform him what method of body disposal said Cloud had used, and he knew a lot of body disposal tricks and where they originated from due to his Mafia Land work. Might narrow down the criteria he had from just 'Soviet Union Clouds' to a specific Soviet State.

Renato scuffed a shiny black shoe against the pavement underfoot, then backtracked a step.

With the heat shimmer coming off the pavement, it was hard to tell.

…but there was a shiny patch on the concrete.

If he squinted… possibly in the majority of a shape left behind by most of a decently sized man. Not entirely, which just meant this was lingering damage that was only now being revealed due to whichever factors were involved.

Folding himself down to a crouch, the hitman ran his fingers over the original patch that shined just so under the California sun.

Sandy, not glassy smooth unless rubbed in the right way.

There would be an after-image of a dead man right here as soon as enough of the partially disintegrated concrete finally broke up. That was only found when a Storm had above-average control, enough so to dictate only one thing should burn. Not enough to prevent all traces of Storm Flame use, but enough so that it wasn't immediately apparent.

A Soviet Cloud with a big talent in Storm Flames. Worse… a Soviet STORM-CLOUD.

Fuck… he had been looking for Sonya.

Renato immediately got to his feet, stalking off just as irritably and as annoyed as he'd been seeming seconds ago just in case he had watchers.

…while there was a possibility that it wasn't Sonya herself he was hunting, he really couldn't put much stock into that theory. His luck didn't run that way, of course it was the woman he was interested in. He could put off actually admitting that to anyone until he was more than positive… but really, merely a time-stalling tactic right now.

Don Cerrito wanted Sonya dead. Shamal's mamma dead.

Fuck that bullshit. The kid already lost too much as it was, and Renato wasn't adding to it for some petty American crime lord.

However, did he report to Don Vongola and Tyr the Sword Emperor that the culprit he had been sent to find was the same woman that attended the last two balls on his arm?

In hindsight, Sonya had talked to him about a Lightning she was sorting out. For 'keeping one of her sister's old gang members alive for her'. Green haired man from the security footage more likely, who had taken a shot to the chest instead of the Storm-Cloud who was likely dealing with carrying the same either critically injured or ill man.
The man saved likely more than one life after taking that bullet, he probably saved Sonya's as well. Selling him out instead as the Lightning in question was then not really palatable to the hitman, even then the thief could be tracked through her involvement with him and when she showed up with him if that was known.

…fuck again. Now what the hell was he going to do?

Glaring at the man he was more than certain was a Cerrito Family goon as he passed him in the empty hotel halls, the hitman bolted up a few flights of stairs heading to his own rented room.

Another few days, then he'd leave California. Verifying it was Sonya could be done easier from Mafia Land, and he had the opportunity to ask her what she wanted to do about it when she returned Shamal to Italia.

Renato did not have a whole lot of allied associates that operated at the same level as himself but had wildly different views on the syndicates they worked near, around, or for. The only time he even remotely broached the subject of hit contracts and the Russian in the same sentence he had gotten a 'do as you will' from the woman.

'I will not stand in your way, Renato' she had claimed to his face. 'I already avoid the Vongola Alliance members, and Italy as a whole, because you work there and have alliances I do not wish to encroach upon. If we ended up on opposite ends of a contract, then I would expect you to do what you do best. Expect that I will not die quietly, but I will also not hold it against you.'

As much as a 'live-and-let-live' policy as that was… he just really didn't want to kill her.

So, no, he was doing no shooting of his best thief friend. The decision for the next issue was… a bit dicier.

Don Vongola might rather like a lever over the Russian Flame expert. Sonya might just laugh in his face if he tried anything of the sort.

Renato… now had a headache.
(Monday the 14th of July, 1969. Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Silivanov heaved a sigh at his fellow 'medic-type' Lightning. "You realize it'll be the very moment one of us isn't at hand the old man will die. Then we might just end up blamed instead."

His fellow Lightning, Kulibin, merely gave a shrug. "Old man Zolotov is old. There's really only so much we can do until it's just not enough anymore. We are eventually going to fumble something, that's pretty much guaranteed by simply being human, but it's not necessarily when the Pahkan's under our watch. So, it might not even be a problem, see?"

Their only recently introduced Rain fellow glanced to the side to Anna the Mirror Lady, before Matveyeva Rima clasped her hands together and held them in front of her while she pointedly ignored the two boys.

The older of the two Lightnings very pointedly didn't frown at the younger girl.

Rains were very much a non-entity to the other Flame sections, the fact their newest and third lead had only recently gotten them out and about among the others aside mandatory things meant very few knew where they typically stood with Rains on general principles.

Galina had a couple pointed words about how he was to handle himself while attached as the emergency medical aids to the Pahkan slash obvious Flame-related security experts. Especially with how he treated or behaved to his fellow Flame users.

They apparently had enough of a bad reputation as it was. Conversely, although the Rains had the worst reputation between Flame users… did have the better one when it came to the rest of the clan.

Well, they did right on up until both Gedeon became the first vor 'user' and Tatiana proved how useful Suns could be in a pinch.

Since none of them were even older than fifteen, nor vory in the case of the two male Lightnings, they hadn't exactly been left unescorted this close to the Pahkan's office.

Aside the four Flame users in this room, there was two other men. Apparently, this side room worked as a sort of waiting room or lounge thing for either the clan's vory or visiting ones normally.

The same vor that had been the driver when Silivanov had stopped and restarted old man Zolotov's heartbeat with his Lightning Flames was also included in the office being utilized as a 'waiting room'. The man had not be amused that no one happened to mention the 'Flame users' were fully willing to use their Flames against their syndicate boss for any reason, and it was only the threat of Bazanova learning of any abuse directed at the younger Flame users that spared the older teenaged Lightning a broken arm or two.

So… Dominik was pretty much unwillingly entertaining the semi-hostile suspicion of one vor, the other one which might just so happen to be the next Pahkan was ignoring it happening. The guy in the corner glaring a hole in the side of his head, and Gedeon the supposed Sun reading something quietly in his seat.

No obvious help in that corner, even if it was his own father Silivanov saved, and so… he wasn't really all that sold on the character of their next boss.

Would the guy just let him get beat up for saving their Pahkan with semi-dubious Lightning skills, or would he actually bother to do something if Bazanova's reputation wasn't staving off any ill-humor?

"Hey, Silivanov? How long until you think we'll be allowed to leave for the medical training ourselves?"

The others were following Primakova's orders, as in leaving in staggered groups so processing and sorting could be done over the course of a week. The first group, containing two Suns, three Lightnings, a Mist, and two Rains, should have left a few minutes ago.

That was where the Lightning lead Galina was doing today, since Miss Bazanova flatly refused to do it again.

"As soon as one of the others learn to do what we can." Obviously Primakova would arrange it when it happened, but that was still a couple weeks or months off. "Continually asking me the same question will not actually get time to pass quicker."

Ironically, 'Lightning' was probably a great label for the green electric-seeming Flame types. The Classical and Inverted Lightnings got along about as well as crossed wires.

Dominik was Inverted, as Miss Galina was. Kulibin Fyodor was one of the Classical Lightnings, and thus just occasionally he irked Silivanov just by posing yet another obvious question or chatting on about things not entirely pertinent to the subject at hand. He was more directed, his fellow flightier.

Thankfully, they rarely talked to one another.

Rima pulled up her folded hands, raising them up in a cupping motion and lighting the depression made with her watery blue Flames. "Calmly, gentlemen. I will put you to sleep if you start bitching."

The Mirror Lady smirked wickedly, bestowing said smirk to the other young woman in the room. "I like you."

"I think you're creepy." Answered the Rain flatly, letting her Flames go, and edging away from the Mist to put the two Lightnings between them. "Stay over there."

Apparently, the other woman was taking that as a compliment.

"We have company." Anna remarked idly instead of responding to that usual insult, waving one slim had to the door of the room they had been waiting within a moment before it actually opened.

Miss Bazanova looked less than pleased when she wrenched open the slab of wood, and her expression when she caught sight of the ugly look one vor was aiming at Silivanov, much less when she glanced at Gedeon, did not inspire any warm or fuzzy thoughts in the Flame users that didn't know her well.

The Mirror Lady, with all the confidence of knowing a predator was not interested in her person but something else a bit tastier than her, sauntered over to the older woman. "Boss lady, why did you have us gather here?"

"...according to Silivanov, old man Zolotov wants to meet all of you." Merely repeating what they already knew unhelpfully, the thief kept her attention on the far and lone Sun in the room. Strangely, she gripped Anna by the arm and drew the Mist behind her then twitched her fingers to get the Rain girl moving as well before speaking more. "Let's go, you can ask him yourself if you really must" know about any other motivations."

…why was she… sort of… 'guarding' the other girls?

Dominik shared a glance with Fyodor, but he looked as puzzled as he felt.

"Move." The woman in question snapped out shortly before anyone could ask more question. "Now. Pyotr would appreciate it if we got this over with quickly."

Well… if the Sovintnik wanted things to happen quickly, things got done with all available speed.

Dominik was the last one out at her demand, he did hear Gedeon scoff in Bazanova's direction and had a decent view of her baring her teeth in return.

The Lightning kept moving. While learning the truth behind the recent rumors was interesting, and now the implication that Gedeon might've done something to a girl that Bazanova did not approve of or would not overlook… Silivanov was not a stupid Lightning.

He had no intention to get in the middle of that.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 14th of July, 1969 continued. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya now had a copy of a bible. A sixteenth century Septuagint version, which… she didn't read Greek.

Worse, it was Medieval Greek. She knew a language away, but she was also sure her Italian would never be up to translating Medieval Greek into something understandable like she sort of could with modern Italian and Spanish.

Why was there a Greek translation of the bible in Russia?

Was it once more popular than Latin versions?

Which she had expected this to be, honestly. Now she had to learn to read Greek, and learning to speak it might be something to do at the same time.

She tried once, a lifetime ago, to learn Latin. It hadn't stuck. Lack of interests, rare opportunities to utilize it, and just general inability to buckle down and focus on learning it meant Rachel hadn't managed to embed the language into her mind.

The thief paged through the fragile parchment, examining the ornate lettering and elaborate border illustrations on most of the pages. Since she couldn't read anything within those painstakingly illustrated pages, admiring the craftsmanship was all she could do.

Well… now she didn't need to source her own bible, and it wasn't the version that was 'edited' by an English King when he decided to break with the Roman Catholics over the issue of 'divorce'.

Maybe Father Luka could help her place if this bible had more or less in common with the current accepted 'canonically' taught these days in Catholic enclaves… once it was no longer recognizably stolen.

"It's very… shiny?" Shamal commented dubiously from her lap, able to see the same things she could about the bible and was about as skeptical over the so-called 'boon' as she was.

Brat had a point. A major one.

The cover was bleached leather covered wood. Mostly inlaid with emeralds, sapphires, and rubies, held in place with gilt fixtures and fittings in the style of two angelic forms holding a crossed set of swords. There was a group of thumbnail-sized teardrop cut diamonds laid out in a cross pattern on the aging leather between the figures, just over that was faded and cracked gold leaf lettering trying to spell out what the book was if you just happened to not know it was a bible due to the religious themed decorations. Within the pages held a wealth of old lettering, more than five different colored inks shading in the elaborate borders when it was likely produced by hand by some poor monk-type in the middle of a drafty monastery.

Meaning it was disgustingly pricy considering it came from the same period of time as Ivan the Terrible, but it could've been purchased or commissioned after the man died or before he became unstable.

She would be peeling the gemstones and gilt off the cover, and maybe getting it rebound in a more stable arrangement, before she seriously tried to read it through.

Sonya dropped the massively oversized and overly gaudy book to her borrowed desk, where made a rather satisfying thunk of metal striking wood. "Right... well... what do you want to do today, brat?"

Scruffy coughed hesitantly, awkwardly. She blatantly ignored him.

Galina wasn't here, she had finished off the 'have to do' shit the Lightning left for her after Mass with Shamal yesterday. Therefore, she had little herself to work on that couldn't be set aside for later.

"Can we go somewhere? Anywhere? Just... not here? Your office is kind of boring, mamma."

Seriously considering it, the thief first inspected Peter's mildly resigned expression then Shamal's slightly pleading one.

...she could be really, really evil right now. Frankly, it would be good for Shamal's grasp on less than morally upright skills to get some practice in with non-hostile opponents...

"Convince Peter of it, and we can do whatever it is you want."

Her brat gave her a totally unimpressed look, but dutifully glanced over to Scruffy to study his adversary's initial reaction and the defense he would be mustering up.

The Sun fidgeted with the paperwork in his hands, almost half-hiding behind the flimsy things until he realized what he was doing with them and pointedly put them down instead. Then the fact he had nothing to hide behind nor anything to distract with in hand permeated his brain, but after a moment he either decided he was an old man or adult and therefore should not be afraid of children or that Shamal wasn't likely to hit too far under the belt.

Either irrelevant or utter lies, but okay.

Sneaking the paper so her poor beleaguered scholar-type wouldn't be able to re-hide behind them, she allowed the kid to go badger the man in lieu of cutting the day short and earning herself some passive-aggressive huffing from her Lightning when Galina returned.

Sonya did not require babysitting herself. She didn't really appreciate anyone attempting to 'manage' her. Galina was a nitpicker, attempting to 'manage' others was as much her nature as it was her keeping the thief on-track so things were done at decent rates.

Although, telling Galina that would ruin some of her fun so she wouldn't be doing that either.

Either way it helped, so she wasn't going to spike it into a sudden halt.

---

(Tuesday the 15th of July, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Handing over a copy of the one multiple newspapers available to those that bothered to sign up for them, the elderly lady seated next to Sonya and Shamal tapped a badly manicured fingernail against one of the articles. "Rumor has it, and you didn't hear this from me, but rumors say the capitalist Americans are only days from attempting to send their astronauts to the moon."

"...that's nice." Mamma commented blandly, only disinterestedly glancing down at the papers. "But if they do reach the moon first, that still leaves establishing a space station first or maintaining a moon base next. Let's see if they can rush out something that won't explode on them while our men steadily work on the issues in the proper ways."

The other lady, a steel-haired old grandma type that smiled thinly at the younger woman's response, left them the papers and got up to walk off.

Shamal's godmother flipped open the tiny leather case she lifted off the other woman, sourly eyeing the government issued ID for KGB officers for a moment. "And this is why I rather hate talking to others."

"How did you know?"

"Her hands. A business woman, even an old spinster or someone that only recently went into the secretarial pool, would've taken better care of their hands. She got the hair-do, the make-up, and the dress right… but not the longer-term skin and nail care that requires actual upkeep." Sonya intently examined the laminated card, scrutinizing whichever details she was suspicious of. "I sometimes play secretary in my work, so I need to know those details… her being wrong in that was a red flag."

He was given the leather case to have since it was a Tuesday, but the ID was tucked away in her purse.

"We can use that, though. She's about to suddenly forget what our faces looked like."

Should Shamal do that, or was whichever of the Mists his mamma had today going to do it?

He had lost the grey-haired lady in the crowd of pedestrians they were studying before that occurred to him to wonder, so hopefully one of the others was on the ball today since he wasn't. "Can we go somewhere to talk, mamma?"

Firstly, he should ensure things were clear. Since he rather failed to do anything to the government-lady and because he kind of wanted to ask about what she was going to do with the ID. He was curious, and that was interesting.

The thief hummed a moment, picking both herself and the Mist occupying her lap up to wander off. Shamal got set on his feet in an absent movement, but she took his hand instead as she led them off in a seemingly random direction.
That could be because he still had little idea of where things were around here, a few walks with zio and a few with mamma didn't get him the familiarity someone would need to learn to orientate themselves in different cities. Shamal had no desire to wander about himself just yet, he couldn't quite read Russian yet and things looked too eerily the same for him to be confident he could navigate around alone.

He was a little surprised to be led into a tea house, as it didn't look like so from the outside.

Having expected a bookstore or something from the newsboy managing a little stand right on the sidewalk next to the door, the Mist curiously looked around the brightly lit polished wooden tables and counters that made up the little cafe.

He had never had much tea before coming to Moscow. In Italia, he only got it when he had been sick.

Russians drank it all the time, it was like their coffee. Actual coffee was reserved for when they had things to do but were a bit too tired to see it through or for the evenings.

It was sort of near lunchtime, so the place wasn't entirely packed but there were a good number of people sitting at the bare wooden chairs and tables either wolfing down some kind of breaded thing in-between sips of tea or nursing said tea and sneaking looks at whichever clock was the closest.

While his mamma got them some tea and something to snack on, the Mist tried to recall the grey-haired lady and the things she had pointed out to him that proved the other lady wasn't what she looked like.

The thief brought the tray she ordered to a small window seat that hadn't been occupied with, a small pot of the dark tea with two cups and a bowl of sugar lumps and black currant jam.

Shamal hadn't known sugar came in 'sugarloaves' until he had come to Moscow. Nonna Lisa had half of a big one in her kitchen, which she chipped into using a special pair of tongs she called 'sugar nips', instead of a small bag of granulated sugar as he was used to back home.

The best part of Russian tea, in his humble opinion, was that you were supposed to take a bite of sugar chips or jam and hold it between your teeth to strain the tea you drank through. Kind of messy until you got the hang of it, and mamma occasionally took it plain, but it was really good.

There was also a small cheap plate of some kind of biscuit, in a powdery white mess. "What's that, mamma?"

"Tea cakes." She responded absently, pouring him a cup of tea first then herself. She also nudged the little plate of the so-called 'cakes' closer to him to let him know she didn't really want any. "If you want to talk, you need to ensure we won't be overheard."

First of all, no offense… but those weren't cakes. Shamal had seen big cakes and small ones in the Iron Fort. Cakes were supposed to be bigger, and with a lot of gooey frosting, not small and hard and…

…okay, these might just be really tiny cakes. Little harder than most cakes that weren't stale, but still soft enough to count in his modest opinion. Shamal nibbled on the first one he picked up to try, amassing his Dying Will Flames as he learned back when he was really young to redirect attention.

Mister Renato had… sort of apologized for scaring him when he first started living with the man, but the hitman had also maintained that if he could do the net-trap with his Mist Flames then he could do his own security as well.
Shamal had several years of ensuring he was safe even when his godfather was sure they were under his belt, ensuring they were overlooked like his mamma wanted would be easy. "Okay, was I supposed to do anything with the grey lady?"

She swallowed her bite of jam and sip of tea before responding. "No, it's Usov's little project. He'll take care of it."

"Huh...." Less work that he had to do, so he was fine with it. "Is there more things you can spot that tells you when someone's not what they say they are?"

He was a Mist, such things would be good to know and avoid. Mamma knew already, she was a working thief, and she could teach him that too. Mister Renato never seemed to have a lot of time to detail things he should know just yet and getting a bit ahead of where the hitman would expect him to be was a good idea. His godfather was a taskmaster when he taught.

No, he didn't mind pickpocketing lessons. The morning's practice in the actual movements had been interesting and fun, and watching people walk by and trying to guess what they did and therefore if they were safe to steal from was as well, but... girls.

Mamma had little issues stealing from other women, Shamal... wasn't nearly as comfortable with that.

They always looked so sad and upset when they noticed they were missing something or had been stolen from. He didn't really like that much, so he kept trying to pick targets that were men.

They got angry and mean, which Shamal knew how to work around more than the sad ladies.

"I can, but splitting up the time we've got left of your summer vacation means you won't learn how to pickpocket well enough that I'll sign off on you practicing on even civilian targets."

"I'm a Mist, mamma." He reminded her pointedly. "While I wouldn't bet on me when it comes to Mafiosi, I can do civilians easily enough right now. I can practice on my own, mamma. I swear I will."

"We'll see about that." She decided after a moment. "You do realize you're giving up your pickpocketing days for these other lessons, right?"

A breath away from agreeing, Shamal paused and wondered how much pocket money he had.

Russians didn't use a lot of money for most things, just the extras. The ice cream mamma had bought him and Mister Renato to try, the books zio had bought him to read or the junkyard finds, the tea to have in the middle of the day not where they lived.

Nonna Lisa apparently left really early in the morning to queue up in a line to get the 'basics' they would eat over the day, the amount of which had apparently taken a bit of a hit when mamma, zio, and zia had all left home.

In Italia it was different, you needed money for everything. Shamal had saved up a bit of Russian rubles which, once he got back to the Iron Fort, he might have some of it exchanged for lira or euros to actually use... but he wanted to keep a bit of it.

"...maybe after today?" Shamal would have to avoid buying something Saturday, and he knew they were leaving Moscow the Friday after next, in order to have anything to show for his summer with mamma that wasn't thief skills or books in Cyrillic. "Why can't we do it after dinner or something?"
"I'd rather not overload you with things to do, you've already been working rather hard on the lock picking lessons and the Mist-imagination exercises." His godmother admitted slowly, tapping her nails against the cheap tin cup they had been given to serve the tea she bought. "You've gotten fairly far into them, for only having a few weeks to work up some competency in the skills."

"I can do it!"

"You threw a fit at Renato about how much you were doing when we were still getting things settled in last month." She reminded him pointedly, pouring herself more tea which reminded Shamal of the tea cake in his hand and the tea he had yet to take a sip of. "Shamal, you've done fairly well so far. Why do you want to add this on top of what you've already have left to do?"

...because they would expect him to keep up with and improve his skills given enough time.

Shamal knew perfectly well it would happen, getting on top of his responsibilities would let him have more time for other things. Like the fantasy story books he dug out of his mamma's collection like the 'Grimm Fairy Tales' she said he could only read when she or Mister Renato were nearby, or mischief.

"Please?"

The thief sighed heavily, then shrugged. "Fine then. I'll run over the more obvious bits while we're here, and the rest when we get back to the hotel after lunch. The moment you kick up a fuss, I'm taking these extra lessons right off the table."

Worked for him. Shamal turned his attention on the tea, and more importantly the chips of sugar he got to eat with the bitter black tea. Sugar made everything better.

"Now then… when taking the role of a service orientated job on, be aware of the damage or wear one's form or clothing would show. Water stains or chemical spills for janitors, grease and oil under the nails for mechanics, the scent of raw vegetables or fruits on cooks."

(Wednesday the 16th of July, 1969. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"Tatiana. Quick question."

"One second, tall, dark, and snarky." Insisted the nurse, holding up one finger blindly in his direction while looking over the schedule Galina had assembled for her.

She knew Sonya had opted out this time around just because she had her brat, and really couldn't deal well with the scrabbling the brats did in transit, but it really was good to have so much uninterrupted time with the Lightning. She had a lot of fun with her old gang members last night, Verde's inclusion had just made things only a tiny bit off but mostly because the scientist was such the odd-duck out in social situations.

He had opted to nurse a beer in a quiet corner instead of 'impose', until Adrik ignored his words and dragged the man by his ever-present lab-coat into a less isolated position in the bar and forced him to actually say hi to his fellow Lightning. He was such an awkward geek, but out of sheer inexperience and lack of care instead of obliviousness and an equal amount of irrelevance like someone else she could name.

Tatiana lifted her head, intending to ask the Lightning about the personalities of the nurse-trainees that hadn't been sent to the hospital for assigning them to a doctor or floor that might need someone with patience or stubbornness, only to get derailed by the highly suspicious look Galina was aiming at her fellow Sun. "...I take it the two of you have met?"

It wasn't entirely guaranteed, as far as she knew the Italian native hadn't spent a lot of time in the Zolotov Headquarters. They might've possibly have missed one another, although from Galina's reaction that wasn't what happened.

"Yes." Snipped the brunette Lightning shortly, pointedly snubbing the Italian stud of her little sister's for her lists. "Why is he here?"

"I believe he had a question for me." Remarked the other woman in the hallway, glancing at the man himself to see what it was.

If she didn't get rid of the hitman soon, Galina would be bitchy and snooty all afternoon and the rest of the night. They had plans to drink tonight, snippy drinking buddies might be fun but she'd done that before. Adrik didn't deserve to suffer through that, and frankly Verde was about as much of an innocent as could be found on this island of criminals.

Tall, dark, and snarky had been eyeing the brunette woman, but the moment she turned to him he snapped his attention to her. "Would you tell me if I asked about Sonya's recent movements in America?"

"Why do you want to know?" This was... new, and slightly alarming. Didn't he already stalk her little sister?

Why did he want to know more?

Renato's expression turned a touch exasperated before he responded. "I'm looking into something, and I do kind of want to be sure I'm not looking for my own best friend."

"I want an itch scratched, so... sorry tall, dark, and snarky." Tatiana shrugged in a faux casual manner. "Looks like we both aren't getting what we want."

He opened his mouth, paused for a long moment as he processed that quip and exactly whose sister she was, then shut it looking a bit annoyed. "...you are an evil young woman."

"Well... we could talk about maybe a trade... but..."

"No... no thank you. Lovely and as impressive as you are, that's not entirely in my best interests, sorry."

"Why do people actually like him?" Galina demanded shortly, sounding completely exasperated. "He's an asshole."

"Watching him belatedly process the invitation, recall he's interested in my little sister and he'd likely fuck up anything in that direction if he accepted, and then force himself to politely decline is amusing as fuck. Especially since he's a womanizing pervert of a gentleman, and his knee-jerk reaction is to flirt back and accept." Tatiana admitted wickedly, placing a hand on her hip and grinning widely. "More seriously, tall, dark, and snarky, what did you want? I'll tell you after I hear about what it's about."

Also, if he took her up on that offer then he wouldn't have the patience to wait while Sonya worked out what the ever-loving hell she wanted to do with a man. Then he'd be free territory, and certainly handsome enough she wouldn't mind fooling around with him a bit.

Tatiana hadn't known the Lightning had started learning English, though. Awesome.

"Tatiana, even more seriously." The hitman interrupted any further conversation in that aspect, rubbing a hand over his eyes. "I rather need to know if I should cover for her or not."

"The two of you never discussed what to do if you found yourselves at opposite ends?" Asked the nurse skeptically, because her very structured little sister forgetting to do something major like that was a bit… far out there. Smaller details maybe got lost in the thief's day to day grind, but not major ones like 'what to do if my hitman contact is hired to kill me'. "Nya's very much a 'do your own thing' kind of girl."

"I'd rather not sic a large syndicate on her ass if I don't have to." Renato shot back a bit sourly, shoving his hands into his slack pockets. "Especially since they're more likely to try to hold it over her head for saving your boy Adrik and that Verde character than try to kill her, and she doesn't like them very much."

Woo, okay. Picking between pissing off or getting killed the woman he was more than just a little bit interested in had to suck. "You might want to ask her."

"Obviously." Drawled out the hitman sardonically. "I am, in fact, wasting time until she's here to talk to face-to-face about what she wants to do or we meet back up in Italia. Half the orders I have say to kill her, but that asshole can just fuck right off. The other half is a bit more… problematic."

That probably would not be a very fun phone-conversation, and there was also the risk of getting the line tapped and… yeah, no wonder he wasn't just calling her office.

"I'm not exactly sure what you want me to tell you."

Because… really?

What did talking to her do for clarifying Sonya's position on whatever Renato was up to?

"Adrik, one of the two men you've got living with you, is the one Sonya claimed Verde saved the life of, right?"

"...yes?"

"So, it was syndicate-related?"

"Mmm…"

Well…?

Pretty much, yes. Not really an ordered one, but in the aims of aiding/abetting fellow clan members. "Sure."

Sonya did it for Tatiana mainly, for Galina partially, and the rest was due to the fact Adrik owed her a favor and him dying would negate that.

"Good enough." Tall, dark, and snarky decided abruptly, flicking a glance to catch the faintly guilty cast of Galina's face before she finally managed to suppress it. "...it's not really that bad, just… fairly annoying for Sonya or very bloody depending on how she wants to handle this."

There was the more gentlemanly side to the hitman, trying to reassure the girls that the request the Lightning had made of her little sister wouldn't end in her death. Bit close to home this time around, but Sonya's nearly default state was irritated anyways.

Bit of a close shave too, if the little blonde thief hadn't been friends with the man ask to investigate the situation… the murder half of his contract might've been fulfilled. If he thought he could get out of it, more power to him.

"Anything you want us to do?" Tatiana asked worriedly.

"You might want to keep that Verde character away from any American syndicate men, so rumor doesn't reach back to the Cerrito Crime Family before we figure things out." Renato quipped dryly as he turned to leave, tossing a salute their way by touching the brim of his fedora. "Keep his head down, for a week or so."

"They talked to a few French syndicates already…"

"Fuck's sake, I'll find him a syndicate if he just keeps his bloody head down." Snapped the hitman, coming to a halt and taking a deep breath before half-turning back to them. "I'll take a series of hits in France to do so, just… sit on him."

"Will do, tall, dark, and snarky." Promised the nurse brightly. "You make a habit of finding things for others?"

"…maybe. Then again, if I do things it gets done at decent rates and I can revisit it if whatever it is later on becomes interesting or important."

…would also buy him a lot of goodwill with contacts if he did things like that regularly. Tatiana was interesting in knowing exactly how large his usual contact list was, and who all he had nosed into the life of.

A rather helpful murderous man, added to the disharmony of being both a womanizer and gentleman.

"…sorry, Tats."

"Not your fault, Lina." Reassured the Sun, patting the Lightning on the shoulder. "It was really just a matter of time before she started getting into deadly things. Luckily, it's tall, dark, and snarky doing things this time around and no some other hitman."

"…yes, lucky." Galina repeated in a deadpan, apparently one of her little sister's habits she picked up recently. "I still don't like him."

"How much of that did you understand?"

"Not all of it, but more than enough to understand the favor I asked of Sonya just put her into some hot water." Admitted the brunette with a heavy sigh. "Shit."

"Sonya will wiggle out of this, she always did when there was something she'd might get in trouble with back when we were kids." Tatiana paused to think a bit more. "Besides, Adrik and Verde owe her the most. You just asked her to get involved."

The other woman snorted softly, looking down and seemingly slightly surprised that she had gripped her lists hard enough to impress waves where her fingers had been.

She straightened it out with a crackle of green Lightning Flames absently. "As if that is reassuring."
"Change of plans, boys." Tatiana announced brightly, thankfully taking in the fact the both of them had elected to stay in this morning and were still present in the condo. "Apparently the people that previously had you are not happy Nya sprung you both."

"...shit." Adrik breathed out, bolting from the couch and the previously badly neglected television set over to her. "Fuck, do we-"

"Calm down, it's a friend of Nya's who is not all that appreciative over who's doing the ordering. He's... fudging a bit until she can be informed, and they can work out something else."

"Honor among thieves?" Verde quipped dryly, poking something blackened and likely not appetizing from the kitchen corner she'd likely have to clean up later and apparently giving up on feeding himself this hour.

"Since this guy's a hitman, more like honor among friends." Clarified the nurse, slipping her shoes off because this was her lunch hour and damn it all if she wasn't going to be comfortable during it. "You're going to have to cut your syndicate hunting for now, for a week or so."

"I had held no high hopes for finding anything interesting through such aims." The scientist admitted blandly, turning his back on the burned food she thankfully couldn't smell yet. "I have little idea of what to search for and Adrik is more a fan of the idea of joining, or at least frequenting often, various establishments for the procurement of physical pleasure instead."

"Like seriously... you could've used five words to do the same damn thing. 'Okay, we didn't find much anyways.' Well, six and a half. Close enough."

"A contraction-"

"Verde!" Tatiana interrupted shortly. "Enough. Issues of very annoyed criminal types looking for you. That I'm sure you don't want to deal with. Focus."

"What can I accomplish alone?" The man demanded in return, equally as frustrated sounding as she was. "I am reliant on both your own and Sonya's grace for my very living arrangement. The only one keeping me from making some gaff or mistake I will apparently be killed for is Adrik. I am both nearly useless in this twisted representation of an amusement park merged with a tourist trap as well as a burden on you all. Worse now, that the previous situation I was entangled with has elected to not stop hunting after myself. Perhaps 'sucking up' and dealing with the issue myself is what is needed."

The nurse crossed her arms and pinned the man with a highly irritated look. "If Nya was here, she'd slap you one... or at least bitch you out. You've already arranged an alternate path with her, so you're just going to backtrack and make everything she's already done for you worthless by giving up?"

Verde paused, his big brain cranking away to the point she could almost smell the smoke...

...oh wait, no. That was the scent of whatever the hell he had been trying to make in the kitchen.

"Honestly, I just wanted to visit a few..." Adrik muttered mostly to himself in their native language, apparently uncaring if he was overheard by her since the other man still had yet to gain an appreciative grasp of Russian. "What are we supposed to do then?"
"Bunker down, well… more than you've been doing already." She admitted only a touch apologetically. "Lina went off to get you boys some lunch and things to snack on for today, but from this point on religiously avoid anyone from America as if your life depends on it. Because it sort of does."

Verde heaved a sigh through slightly thin-bladed nose, pinching the bridge of it even if that motion knocked his glasses askew and he had to spend another moment to fix it in order to see them clearly. "Very well. Is there any way I can ask for one of you two to find me something more substantially intellectual to read other than Sonya's admittedly remarkable store of fantasy adventure books?"

"Ran out of other things to do?"

"…I may have had the invitation to reproduce, from memory, the contents of what little I recalled of our homework."

"Damn it, Verde! Stop harping on about that." Adrik practically whined, cringing a little under Tatiana's stolen 'mom-look' she used on unruly patients.

"Why not try to make your own system if it's that important to you?"

Tatiana might've been talking to Adrik, but Verde honestly look more interested in the suggestion than the other man. Queerly, then the short security specialist then looked excited over the other man's preoccupation.

…she didn't get men at all. Maybe that was why Sonya thought she had a terrible taste in them.

"Will it keep you quietly occupied for a while?" Asked the nurse dryly, now rubbing at her temple in hopes of warding off a headache.

"…may I impose on you to acquire two computer monitors, two H-three-one-six Kitchen Computers, wire, wire cutters, and a decent amount of paper and pens? Using the money Sonya has paid for research efforts?"

"What in the ever-loving hell is an 'H-three-one-six Kitchen Computer'?"

"I'll get that." Adrik offered brightly, nearly bouncing on his toes before darting to the doors Tatiana had recently came through. "I've got a Programma 101 if you think that would help, Verde my man."

"Possibly, if I could cannibalize it for parts."

"Noted. The boss lady was storing it for me, I'll be right back with most of that."

Now utterly lost, the redheaded Sun looked between the now preoccupied scientist type hunting around the condo's living room presumably for writing utensils and the shut door behind her.

Tatiana gave up and went to go see what the hell the scientist had been attempting to make in the kitchen.

Maybe if she cleaned it up now, when she got off for the day the condo wouldn't smell like someone had started a fire.
Shamal threw himself over her lower body suddenly during their reading hour, so Sonya assumed he wanted something. "Yes?"

"Can I ask for some help, mamma?"

"Of course, on what?"

"I have an idea, but... I'm not sure how to go about actually doing it." The young boy admitted, setting his chin on her stomach and letting his book thunk to the floor while he got comfortable now stretched out over her lower body instead of actually sitting upright on the couch.

The thief frowned but didn't comment on his mistreatment of her books.

She had probably started the bad posture thing with stretching her legs out on the couch. So, commenting on his position wasn't something she could do either. Thankfully the kid didn't do this sort of thing in public, the really only place she would actually be bothered about the liberties he took with her.

She had done much worse when just slightly older than him, so she supposed it was allowable. "What are you aiming to do?"

"I want to do something for Mister Renato. And well, you too, but I had the idea for him first, mamma, no offense."

"None taken." Sonya replied amusedly, setting her own book aside in favor of threading her fingers through his hair. She had no idea why this was soothing, but the brat didn't seem to mind her preoccupation with his hair so... "What did you want to do for him that needs my help?"

"Mister Renato's on his own a lot. He can't take me with him, and you don't work in the same field." Shamal started to qualify for her, digging chilled fingers under her ribs and causing a few flinches from her. "I'm kind of worried he's lonely."

She had thought she had gotten used enough to the brat not to flinch anymore from his touch, but apparently cold things would still do it.

She didn't complain, if he was cold then warming him up was her responsibility. "So... you want to get him a pet?"

Renato had plenty of companionship if he wanted, mostly women but even frequenting a bar or two might net him some interesting conversation if he wanted. There was also the Vongola people, he seemed rather friendly with a few of Nono's Guardians and the Eighth and Ninth Skies.

"You said that he'd take Luigi once we move into wherever you were going to have us live, right? But Luigi will be old. So... maybe if Luigi had a baby, we can give Mister Renato that?"

She blinked down at the brown eyes peering up at her hopefully, actually put some thought into the issue... and made a link she was slightly worrisome. "You want to make Luigi... have an egg... with Mist Flames, so Renato would have a pet chameleon?"

"Yep!" He hugged her around the waist, seemingly very pleased she followed his Mist-logic without a stumble. "...wait, chameleons lay eggs?"
"Reptiles, insects, and fish do. There's exceptions, but those are the general species that do. I'll look it up for you when you're ready to try this." She was a bit concerned that she could, honestly. Since when did she start understanding the process by which a Mist dreamt up their characterizing weirdness? "But... we could find Luigi a mate instead... is Luigi a male or female chameleon?"

"...I don't know. Do we need another chameleon? I thought girls just had babies when they were ready... Mister Renato said you weren't ready, so I wouldn't be getting a baby brother just yet."

It was entirely possible he could convince himself that just acceptance of becoming pregnant was all that was needed, which held a bit of a concerning implication. Mist were practically the embodiment of mind over matter...

Okay... then... wait.

Did anything happen when animals were created via Flames?

Like say... have Flame resistant fur or wool since they had been partially made of it once?

She was... not really sure about the logistics of creating a Mist-imbued chameleon, but with some experimentation it shouldn't be that hard.

"Shamal... first of all, that is brilliant." She pressed a kiss to his forehead, doing a bit of semi-painful contortions to do so and cupping his cheeks to bring him up a bit more, before leaning back to see him clearly again.

Flame resistant clothing would be phenomenal to have.

No longer having to worry her own Storm Flames would leave her naked?

"And we can start with something smaller and less risky to Luigi's health. Secondly... that's not how-"

The thief cut herself off, as the wonder if telling him the correct way 'girls had babies' would impact his idea. She thought for another second, trying to think up an appropriate way to both correct that so she wouldn't find herself pregnant without any logical reason for why and so they could explore this wonder.

"...that's not how human women have babies. We require a male, and a certain action to have been done. Even then it doesn't always take, and there can be problems and things about being pregnant, and so human baby making should be left up to the girls until you get the whole process explained to you. If Renato doesn't tell you by the time you're twelve, I will."

Shamal looked a bit baffled at her tangent, but he did give a half-shrug of acceptance. "Okay, mamma."

"Okay then. We can start with spiders. There's one in the corner of the kitchenette, so we can start right away." The rest of it she'd pose to Verde, he might appreciate something to do. Spider silk that was Flame resistant might be interesting to play with, and she could get her Mists to try copying the experiment to give Shamal more data to work with. "I'll get Anna and Usov to help out, too. They might not hatch until after you leave, but I can always call when something happens."

"Um... I kinda wanted to do it myself, mamma." He admitted quietly, a bit subdued about the half-suggestion half-protest.

"That's fine. We can start with the spider in the kitchen, and I'll help you figure out the rest of it."
Did the fact Luigi's gender wasn't entirely certain affect Shamal's intents?

Well… the fact she was sure over the gender of the spider in the kitchen was merely luck and a childhood spent in this region.

"Okay, firstly. The difference between actual scientific investigations and just fucking around is… notes. Lots and lots of notes." Sitting up and dislodging the kid from his position from over her, she got up to wander over to her actually real end-table pushed into a corner and covered with old books. It had a drawer, which was where she kept paper and pens to write on said paper with. "I'll get you a notebook of your own to record things on, but I'll start this for you. The second thing we need, after the idea we're testing but you supplied us with that… is both the experiment deviations and a control."

"Why do we need more than just the spider?" Asked the kid as he followed along with her, trotting over to the kitchen table when she shooed him to sit at it.

"So we know what's normal. I used Lisa as my base normal human woman for when I was figuring out my Cloud and Storm Flames, not that it was needed because being able to bend metal with just my fingers and burning it to carbon at the same time was obviously not normal."

Sonya brought over a notebook to the table, setting it and a pen she dug out of a pocket in front of him. Then she noticed Shamal's less than enthused face and recalled that most people didn't share her interests.

"…I need the notes so I remember which spider is which in the experiment so you can do what you wanted with the chameleon baby idea." She tried first, but when that didn't improve the brat's reaction she sighed and sat at the table as well. "Also… I thought of a way you might make some money off the idea if it works. In order to show others, and to demonstrate that it's a workable idea and you deserve royalties for thinking it up, I need these notes."

Verde might not be happy to be forced to interpret a child's handwriting, but he would likely agree with her that the originator of the idea deserved recognition.

Of course, money was a very good motivator for most people. Even her, especially Viper, and likely any other criminally inclined person she could be bothered to mention.

The brat looked first comically surprised at the suggestion, then got up on his knees on the seat of his chair to reach the writing implements. "What do we start with first?"

"I'll write the beginning parts later, right now we need the initial description of the spider you're about to use Mist Flames to… encourage egg laying. Partially just in case something physical changes with the test subject, and partially so I can find other spiders of the same species for the control or other experimental interests you think up later to try if this doesn't work as you wanted."

Shamal craned his head around, then pointed the pen in the ceiling corner where a tiny orb weaver had set up her web. She had probably crawled in from the hallway or the vents in the ceilings, as Sonya really didn't open the windows often. …or she had visitors that decided to come in or leave by the windows.

It was possible. She hadn't chased the spider out yet due to curiosity, part of her web was attached to the window frame and if it was opened when she wasn't the one doing it or not said webbing would break. The web was the part she was interested in, the spider not so much.
"That one, mamma?"

"Yes, her. We're going to need something to keep her in, and a place for her to lay eggs without the risk of them getting crushed or eaten. Can you think of anything?"

"...a jar? Like we do with fireflies?"

"A good suggestion." She had a tiny remnants of black currant jam left over, she could use it in something and then have a sticky but empty glass jar left over. "She's also going to need something to eat, because the eggs have to be made somehow."

The Mist dropped his gaze to the paper, apparently to correct something he had already written, before looking up at her again. "Why does what she eats matter?"

"You never know. If something happens in this experiment but doesn't happen in another and if you don't know what the differences between the two are, how do you know what to correct to get a consistent result?"

Shamal blew out an aggravated sigh. "This is more complex than I had expected."

Sonya fondly ruffled his hair as he scribbled things down in her 'native' language. "Most things worth doing end up that way. But this way you can give Renato a very special, one-of-a-kind pet only you know how to make until you send someone else your notes on it."

She had to think of something to do with an entire clutch of Mist-imbued orb spiders after this, but she was also somewhat certain that Anna wouldn't mind some pets to play with herself. It wasn't all that long ago the Mirror Lady had been using nightmarish imagery to defend herself, and spiders certainly counted as nightmarish for some.

Although, maybe she should ensure the young woman Mist wasn't afraid of spiders herself first.

"...crickets? For the spider?"

"It is a bug." Allowed the Storm-Cloud, thinking about it. "I can probably keep two or three spiders fed with crickets for a while, or however long this will take."

Her young Mist brat scribbled that down, then nibbled on the end of the pen she had kept on her for a grand total of two days before handing it off. "Are we going to need things to decorate her home, mamma? Like in Luigi's cage, and the fake tree branch?"

"What do you want to decorate the jars with then?"

"Spiders build webs, so she needs something to build them on." Shamal reasoned logically, which made her smile fondly. "So... at least two sticks, and with leaves to hide under if she's scared."

That was... rather nice of him. "Alright. I'm guessing oak leaves and twigs will work."

The brat bobbed his head distractedly, scribbling that down as well.

His notes were going to be all over the place, and very hodgepodge, but there would at least be notes. Too much was better than not enough, so she would let him do his thing.

Sonya started wondering about silkworms, and how to apply an insect/reptile method of... assisted production to mammals, for possibly getting Flame resistant cloth. Obviously it wouldn't be greatly resistant, but every little bit would help and possibly when the idea was posed to another stronger...
Mist they could do more than Shamal could or would think of.

"What's next, mamma?"

"Well, we have our subject and a plan. Next, we need containment and a way to ensure she doesn't wander off on us. I need to use up a bit of jam to have a jar to spare, what would you like to eat?"

"Tea?"

"I can do that."

(Friday the 18th of July, 1969. Zolotov Headquarter, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Hey, Bazanov. Your girls have the ability, what the hell do you make of these Flame things?"

"Like extra skills." The vor answered only partially distracted from the speaker, more focused on deciding on who to tap for security with Sonya's school thing. "They're not that much different from most people, just able to rip your fucking head off or burn you alive if you're stupid."

"And that's not strange? The fuck are we letting them scurry around under us for?"

Arseniy finally looked up from his scribbled list of names, pinning the idiot to his chair with a glare. "What's the difference if I take your fucking head off or if Sonya does so? You'll still be dead, either way."

A heavy arm was laid across the speaker's shoulders, another of his so-called contemporaries leaning in to add his opinion to the conversation struck up when he hadn't been looking. "One of these... Lightnings? Electrocuted the Pahkan."

"Why?" He demanded, as that sounded suicidal and not something that had been all over the clan after it happened if he didn't know before this.

"Old man Zolotov had a heart attack." The same vor that started this admitted lowly, shrugging off the arm with a surly shrug and a sneer aimed upwards to his assaulter. "If they're willing to electrocute him, who else will they kill?"

"Sonya will, if you try anything stupid with her." Arseniy informed the both of them flatly. "Tatiana will, if you again try anything stupid with her. Fuck, I will if you bother them and they're too nice to do it. You wouldn't fuck around in the face of someone holding a fucking flamethrower, why the fuck would you do so in the face of these kids that have the biological equivalent?"

"They're not exactly normal, Bazanov. You have to admit that."

"They're more normal than communism, jackass." He snapped at Tsitnikov shortly, already fed up with the conversation not two seconds in and getting progressively worse the longer this bullshit continued. "Flames were more common a century ago, they faded from widespread use and are now coming back. Get used to it."

"Why should we get used to it?" Snarked back the vor usually in charge of clan security and managing attempts to spy on the clan's headquarters, beckoning a hand to get another bottle of vodka to go with his own work spread out on the table he was seated at. "What the hell are they going to do for us?"

"Didn't you just say they kept the Pahkan alive through a heart attack? Then there was that assassination, and oh wait... Sonya's jewel shit too." Arseniy reminded the entire room pointedly, itching to punch someone because he was not a talker and preferred beating things instead of jawing at them. "They already do, why are you all bitching about it?"

"Bazanova's already a thief." Tsitnikov clarified equally as irritably as him. "That's different. She doesn't use these Flame things doing that."

"That's where you're wrong. Sonya's a small woman, how the fuck do you think she can lift as much as she does? Fifty kilograms of jewels and metal weighs as much as fifty kilograms of any other material, and she doesn't look like she can with her Cloud Flames so she gets it all from the same shop at once. Tatiana does the same damn shit with her Sun thing when she heals your ungrateful asses of your paper cuts and bruises. What's the real fucking problem?"

"We've got an entire passel of brats we're supposed to guard and protect, and they're not pulling anything in or their weight."

Arseni tisked irritably, snorting after a moment more of thought. "So, you dislike the long-term investments? Why the fuck are you part of this damn clan, then? Most of the shit we do pay off years later, not instantly."

"When is it going to pay off, and how many more of these brats will we be getting?"

"Not much more." Although that news he and Lisa got from Pyotr about Sonya's aims with the school didn't need to be bandied about, not just yet. "And... about six more months at most, we'll get the first Flame user that becomes a vor rather than a vor who knows a bit."

The Storm-Cloud likely wouldn't have the patience to wait much longer than that, she had been a very impatient girl as a child and he didn't expect that to change magically between then and now. A bit strange when paired with her ever so careful meticulous attention paid to stealing things, but Arseniy wasn't a head shrink so as long as the girl liked her life he wouldn't worry.

"They're still fucking useless."

"Try asking them what they can do, idiot." He knew for a fact there were a few Flame users at loose ends, not sure of what they could do the Zolotov vorv would appreciate. "I know of two types you should be very damn interested in, the Mists and Lightnings. Figure it out."

Half the goddamn fucking problem the Flame users had with the rest of the clan was the lack of communications. They fucked off to their own little enclaves, smartly since most were children and they had little to do with the greater clan's business, but that didn't help them get used to or become familiar with the rest of the clan.

Arseni was very tired of that shit. He was not an expert, had little idea what to do when idiots pissed off said brats with biological flamethrowers attached somehow, and therefore would greatly appreciate it if the others would get their shit together finally.

He still had to figure out who could be tapped for security and who wouldn't inevitably commit technicolored suicide trying to mess around with the of-age Flame girls, he didn't have time for this.
Chapter 71

(Saturday the 19th of July, 1969. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Son of a bitch."

Sonya side eyed the youngest person present in her living room. "Was that really the best you can come up with from all the examples you have?"

Shamal gave an almost full-body flinch, shooting her a guilty look before hiding it from the others behind his book they had been reading before certain people barged in with rather important news. "Sorry mamma."

"For? Oh… wait, right. The no swearing until you're either a made man or a preteen." She thought for a second, letting him take possession of the bound paper instead of using a hand to help him support it steadily. "No dessert after dinner, then. Make a note of that, Peter. No sweets tonight. You can have it tomorrow instead."

"Kay."

"Sonya." Galina near-begged in what she thought was going to be something like a protesting tone but ended up more exasperated instead. Flatly ignoring that the older Sun in question that had been here before her was actually dutifully writing that order down on a pad of paper and refusing to give in by palming her face in front of the shorter woman, the Lightning tried again to get her underboss to understand how bad the situation was. "Your friend Sinclair accepted a contract to kill you."

"And he really should've." Snapped back the Storm-Cloud irritably. "What the hell is he thinking?"

"Um… isn't he your friend?" Peter tried hesitantly, lowering his pad of notes and glancing between the women. "You share a kid who already lost a parent?"

"Peter, it may surprise you to learn that most of the people that hire hitmen and other killers to knock off some asshole don't tend to appreciate them having little things like personal morals or values that might backfire on them." She informed him flatly with a heavy sigh.

Okay… the other woman might actually have a point with that.

"Besides which, you said it was a favor-based thing and not a payment one, right Galina?" Sonya huffed softly to herself, looking fairly annoyed as she set aside whatever she had been reading prior to the Lightning barging in. "Which means the people he's prone to working with. Other fellow Italians likely, given that's where he tends to network the most. If the syndicates of his native country think he's… wishy-washy on contracts involving girls from this, it will limit what else he might get in the future. He's as freelance as can be without formally declaring himself either way, refusing to kill me is actually sort of shooting himself in the foot when it comes to future business in what is literally his native lands."

Shamal, who was paying way too much attention to his godmother to sell the image of studious book reading he was trying to present, whimpered.

The thief he was sitting on sighed and threaded slim fingers through his hair. Easy enough to do given he was situated in her lap, his near-customary seat when his mamma didn't have important It'll be fine, kid. Renato and I will think of something. We're going to have to, if he's going to do something as silly as renege on an accepted contract."

"Are you sure you can?" Galina asked hesitantly.

"Again, we're going to have to." Sonya repeated shortly, getting to her feet and placing her own brat down on his feet at the same time. "Galinia, help Peter in babysitting since you're here anyways. There's an extra room across from mine you can use. Scruffy can take the couch like a gentleman."

"...what's going on?"

"Boss lady is off to steal things, in hopes of getting things here finished well before she's needed elsewhere." Scruffy answered her quietly, tucking the pad of paper he had been writing on into a jacket pocket and then generally looking uncomfortable in the middle of Sonya's living room. "I'm... the babysitter tonight."

"Not a baby." Shamal insisted flatly as he climbed up on the couch in Sonya's spot, dropping his book to his lap in favor of giving the older man a matching flat look and crossing his arms in a sulk.

"No, but babysitter sounds better than me being the au pair." Responed the Sun dryly as he gingerly picked an inoffensive way to the lone and very dusty looking armchair set against the wall. "Those tend to be females and exchanging household or childcare services for room and board. I'd like to think I'm a bit too manly to pull that off, myself."

"Aren't you doing that anyways?" Galina questioned, giving her collection of luggage set just within the hotel suite a considering look. "You do tend to amuse him when Sonya's needed on other things."

She'd take Sonya up on the invitation to recover here instead of trying to figure out how to get her things several blocks over to the Zolotov headquarters in the next hour before the sun set.

Way too much to handle on her lonesome since her vor driver had likely already taken off to do whatever for the night, and she didn't have the funds to rent a room herself. Likely if she asked, she would cover the cost for her… but that was possibly why the thief offered room with her in the first place.

Scruffy gave her a droll look while Shamal pondered that over and decided which he liked better. "I'd rather like to think I'm doing a favor for my boss as well, not getting into childcare because I'm that useless for anything else."

The Lightning studied the man thoughtfully for a moment. "You have an interesting sense of self-worth."

Why did it matter?

Work was work. There were any number of people she could think of that would've rather done childcare than the more thought and creative intensive work he was doing with the office's paperwork.

Maybe it was a capitalist thing. She'd ask later tonight if she really had to know, but right now taking a shower and not having to cross a few feet of semi-public hallway either dripping wet or half naked sounded heavenly.

…where was the child going to sleep if Galina was taking the 'extra' room?

This suite wasn't exactly a large one.
For that matter, if there were three people crammed into this space at the time … where had the hitman been sleeping while he was here?

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 19th of July, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Sonya had maybe a score of heists in Moscow or the surrounding areas for wildly different things. From jewels to antiques to glassware, jewelry store branches to museums to private residents.

She was therefore highly skeptical that most of the current advances in security were directly her fault.

Contributed was a given, yes. For the Cartier job she did with Tats' gang would prompt several jewelry stores to ramp up their security efforts in hopes of not getting robbed next.

No matter how careful the Storm-Cloud was, she wasn't the only thief in the city. Other thieves, that might not be nearly as careful as her or wildly more so than she could manage on her lonesome, would've contributed to how or why certain things developed in the general aim of foiling thieves.

Right now, the still Zolotov aligned thief would just like to hunt down whoever else was fond of ventilation shafts and beat them for encouraging security in them to be improved upon. Sonya was maybe overly fond of ceiling accesses, finding them firmly welded shut from the outside with a grate cover was irritating.

Well… if the high ground was barred from her… under it was.

She had yet to try dropping down more feet than she was comfortable with and wouldn't be even attempting such a thing while in the middle of a job, so Sonya carefully used some of the rope stashed in her work bag and possible loot container to lower herself back down to street level.

Leaving it attached to a roof-level water tank and dangling down one side of the sort of main street building she was going to rob, she'd go pull herself back up to the roofs after this heist to make her way over to her next one via it in a few more hours so taking it down wasn't entirely the best option, the thief took stock of what she had left to work with.

There were the main doors, a side one she actually didn't have on the building plans she stole in broad daylight during a couple free hours a few days ago, and the sewers left as possible entrances. A surface check didn't reveal any obviously open windows she might use instead, and just testing the doors informed her the building was very securely locked indeed.

Sonya paused for a smoke break back near the alleyway and street corner of the building she was to rob, to give some serious thought over the situation for a moment.

As she didn't intend to remain in Moscow for much longer, or the Soviet Union at all honestly, she could probably get away with doing a few very 'noticeable' things. Prying open doors or windows via inhuman brute force thing, the methods that were riskier and repeated too often could develop into recognizable patterns used to track the behavior or habits of one criminal.

A slim, overly strong individual could then be linked to her earlier museum heists. Possibly from there back to other jobs she did or didn't do, but the point remained.

The issue with that was she had already intended to never return to China either. Fong's little favor, which she half-suspected the whole 'asking a Russian syndicate about their Flame focuses' was actually a part of however lucrative or whatever it ended up being, would make her eat her previous words. Before even that, she never did intend to do more jewelry stores... right on up until they became a bit more interesting than just to gain pricy and shiny bits of earth to make herself more cash to live off of.

Sonya was realistic enough to accept that if Arseniy ever asked, she'd steal what he wanted regardless of where or how risky it was. For Lisa as well, and likely Valera. There was her own sister and then Galina to also consider, and maybe possibly the other Flame group leaders if it was that important. Her brother, but he'd never actually bring himself to ask outright... maybe Renato as well if there was a good enough reason. Unlikely, but possible.

Did she take short-cuts now, and possibly screw herself over later on, or keep playing it as safe as possible?

It really boiled down to a question of time. Short cuts and cutting corners, like instead of hot wiring the security system merely trying to outpace it and steal what she could before law enforcement showed up or repeating little tricks like wrenching things open instead of picking or cracking them as most other thieves did, would save her time now but cost her later.

Did she have the time now to be careful enough to avoid that, but quick enough so she wouldn't have to spend an entire week or so trying to collect the money the school needed to operate for a few years independently?

Also... if she really was going to be trying to earn herself the title of the 'World's Greatest Thief', would doing things that were traceable now help her get it or would being nearly indistinguishable from other criminals stealing shit be more impressive to sneak in there by surprise even if it took her longer?

If she was really going to do it, then she should ensure she did it well. It wasn't a frivolous title to earn herself and would pull its own kind of danger her way.

The easiest way to get such a thing passed on would be to murder the one that held the title before another, after all. The title was also not something that had a clear-cut end-goal to obtain, simply from the nature of her specialty.

It was also possible she'd have to do something really risky and attention grabbing to earn it... more like the Pabst Theater heist than these jewelry store robberies.

Sonya puffed hard on her cigarette to ensure it hadn't gone out while she puzzled over a few things, pulling the pack from a pocket and offering the watchman wandering by one.

"Heavy thoughts?" Asked the guard, accepting her offer and pulling a lighter out of his own pocket to light up with.

"Trying to decide between skimping on quality to meet a quota as fast as I can or take the time to do it well and maybe miss it." She admitted honestly enough, as that much was pretty innocent.

Also, she was trying to figure out if he was the building's guard, a local watchman, or actually part of the law enforcement of this section of the city. Outside opinions would be taken with a large dose of salt anyways but hearing someone else's thoughts might help her quantify her own feelings on the topic.

"Also taking slight advantage of having a babysitter for the night for the quiet thinking time."

Her wry admission of opportunistic behavior earned the thief a laugh, and a subsequent cough since trying to laugh while also taking in a lungful of smoke was rather painful.

"I'd... ha, I'd do the same. Newborn son. I love him, but... damn he's noisy." Confessed the likely-watchman she had waylaid around the filter stuck in his mouth, stuffing his hands into his pockets to ward off the nippy turn this summer night had taken. "I don't envy you the dilemma, though."

The jacket he was wearing was just heavy wool, which didn't have any insignia sewn into it. Sturdy boots, slacks, and a watch cap completed the man's outfit. Probably not law enforcement, they did tend to emblazon themselves with things to inform passersby that they could be approached for some aid, but a hired guard or a vigilant local to this part of the city were still possible.

As well as KGB agent.

Smiling politely, Sonya wasn't sure why she needed to know about a baby son to understand the man could share that sentiment but she'd make the required platitudes if she had to, she eventually just shrugged after a quiet moment. "I'd... rather do things slow and right the first time if I can. I don't want to miss my quota, and that will suck if I do, but... substandard quality isn't my thing."

"Having integrity in your work ethic isn't a bad thing." The man offered helpfully. "Rather admirable, actually."

He wouldn't think that if he knew exactly what he was talking to.

"Well then, you know what you need to do." With a shrug, and a quick glance to a wrist watch she hadn't noticed under the cuff of his jacket, the waylaid guardsman tipped his head to her before starting to walk on. "Good luck with that."

Sonya obligingly started walking away from her target herself, she had to get into the sewers and find a way in from the basement level.

An hour or two before it would be safe enough to start, so she had the time to poke around a bit to find the best route in.

(Sunday the 20th of July, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Shamal poured out one of the 'unidentified' bags on the floor, then set about prying the gems out of the settings as his mamma dictated how much was for what to Miss Galina as she helped in the efforts he was attempting.

"Save a selection of diamonds for Scruffy."

"Sonya-"

Her head snapped up and she gave the man trying to protest a sharp look while she pried the thicker metal off the bigger set pieces. "You don't have to keep them. Or even deal with them more than once. I just would like to know if you can use them or if you can't. A selection of both uncut and pre-cut stones, Galina."

"Are you going back out tonight?" Asked the Lightning, sorting aside a mess of white stones as the blonde woman asked from the 'to be sold' pile.
"I have to. Even if you manage to sell all of this in the next week or two, we're going to need more hard cash for the school's first year. More specifically, in paying back Pyotr the loan and the first few months of paychecks for the non-clansmen." Admitted the Storm-Cloud tiredly, dropping into the office chair she normally sat in a bit more heavily than normal and slapping the removed gems on the 'to sell for funds' pile.

"Mamma? Were we supposed to attend Mass today?"

"…fuck."

Shamal honestly wouldn't mind giving a miss to church today, even if that day was spent sorting out shiny rocks from equally shiny metals, but he figured that should be a fully informed thing rather than an accident.

Minster Renato was accepting of occasional misses, as he tended to miss Mass when traveling around himself, but not for things like 'forgetting'. He was pretty sure his mamma wouldn't like having another time-related thing to be teased over.

Sonya dropped the hand that had been rubbing at her eyes to give Galina a sideways look. "What time is it?"

"Just past dawn? Nearly seven." Answered the Lightning after double-checking the face of her wristwatch.

"If you were up all last night, and intend to do the same tonight, you should probably not stay up all day as well." Chipped in McScruffy cautiously, holding up his hands in response to the ugly look Shamal's godmother shot him. "You shouldn't, just saying."

"I am well aware of my limits, thank you."

"Boss lady, seriously speaking, there is a thing called 'evening Mass'. Why not take a nap first, and aim to attend that one instead of stressing yourself to get ready and you both there when it's already in progress now and you're likely to miss it anyways?"

Sonya stared at the man for a long moment, which made the older man slightly wary of the sudden shift in tone. "Are… you Christian, Scruffy? Do you need to attend church?"

Shamal's head shot up, craning his neck around to see more than just the Sun's side-profile.

That was right… McScruffy wasn't Russian. It was then possible the man shared a faith with the young Italian. Which was interesting. In a 'why didn't he attend Mass with them' kind of way.

"Technically… yes. But I haven't attended confession for nearly a decade now." Admitted the Sun a bit bitterly, looking off out the window instead of actually look at anyone else in the room. "Through no fault of my own until I got here, admittedly…"

"Peter, I have no idea about how those of your faith do their… worship, only that Catholic Christians require Mass. If you require something, which is really something only you can inform me of that you need, you need to tell me so I will ensure that basic life requirements are taken care of." Sonya drummed her fingers on her desk, narrowly glaring at the man. "You call me 'Boss Lady', that means I provide for you. If I'm missing something because you're not me and have different requirements for your standards of living, then you have to tell ME so I can fix IT."

Frowning, the Sun shifted a bit in place. First backwards, because even Shamal got wary of his mamma's temper and that was an entirely warranted action when she got irked he let that slide.
without getting mad at him, but then the man shifted his weight from foot to foot like he was indecisive.

"Do you not want to come with us?" Asked the Mist curiously.

He didn't rightly care if the man came with this time, it was the last one he was going to attend with his godmother here, so he could share.

But… why would he not want to attend church?

Everyone… well, alright. Not everyone attended church, mamma didn't before she started with him…

Shamal hadn't actually pondered that really. His godmother wasn't a church-goer.

What did she believe in if she wasn't Christian?

"I was very religious… up until the third year I was imprisoned against my will." McScruffy announced flatly, drawing his gaze from the window back to the small blonde woman that still didn't look entirely happy. "Then it got rather… hard, to keep accepting that my imprisonment and the number of others that didn't survive it were all part of God's plan. The next six years before you found me didn't help anything."

"…there are mafia priests." Sonya announced after a moment. "I know none, but I can find you one if you wish to speak to someone but not put me or any of the others at risk."

"I'll think about it." He settled on instead of giving an actual answer, a bit quickly. "I don't know if I want to return to church or not, Sonya. That's why I never said anything. I have some soul searching to do before I decide either way. You weren't neglecting me, it's just not an issue right now."

"The offer is there if you require help." Mamma informed him solidly, still a bit annoyed seeming at him. "Just mention it, and since I cannot provide it here I will take you to Italy and find you a priest you can be candid with if you'd like."

"Not Mafia Land?" The man inquired faux-lightly, but to Shamal's eye he seemed a bit surprised and wrong-footed by the entire discussion.

The thief shrugged, dropping her gaze to the piles of shiny stuff she had stolen and they had yet to sort through. "I'd rather not take you there, even if Tatiana would likely know of one you can speak to. You're still a bit… green, in mafia terms, for me to feel safe dropping you off with a hard-core killer for a private chat. Hopefully, in Italy, I could find you a priest that wouldn't also be a career killer."

McScruffy huffed a tiny laugh. "In more ways than one?"

Sonya blew out a sigh, leaning back in her office chair. Shamal immediately took advantage, jumping up using her knee to sit in her lap. She helped him straighten up again, but then also dropped a very sparkly necklace to his hands for prying out the gemstones for other use.

"That… was bad, Peter."

"…how do Christian hitmen resolve the 'murder is a sin' issue?" Asked the Sun after a quiet moment where everyone got on with sorting his godmother's haul.

"I have no fucking idea. Why ask me?"
"Do you believe in God, mamma?" Shamal asked when it seemed as if that was all they were going to say about McScruffy's religious views.

"…not really? I believe we do have a soul and that there might be something higher than us, but I highly doubt whoever or whatever it is really gives a damn about how we conduct our lives or how we treat each other. I am also skeptical that said who or whatever had a hand in creating the world or the universe down to the exact creatures that inhabit this world with us." The woman shrugged idly, prying a few stones out of ring settings. "We might be amusing or interesting to said whoever, but the… cults of worship that surround them is a bit off-putting to me too much to 'join' a religious view."

The Mist blinked a few times. "Cults?"

"What else can you call it?" Mamma defended herself a bit uncomfortably, setting down the sapphires she had freed in one pile and the scrap metal left of the rings in another to pick up a bracelet of some pearls. "I will not consider any Christian churches until someone can explain to me what the ever-loving fuck the witch hunts, the Crusades, and the Spanish Inquisition were all about in terms of their doctrine and reconciling that with 'thou shall not kill'. Christians have done a whole lot of murder over the last few centuries when it's directly against their doctrine. Judaism is something I've absently wondered about, Buddhism, and such… but I'm not that religious a person. I do not require a faith to define myself and have never been interested enough to actually investigate other faiths to see if it would be something I'd like."

Shamal stared up at her blankly, he didn't know how to address even half of that.

Sonya sighed heavily and tugged a hank of his hair absently. "That doesn't mean I think you and Renato are wrong, kid. Since nothing can be proven, I could totally be wrong in my views and the Christians could be correct… but the other way is entirely possible as well. In the end, it boils down to what you want to believe. I just… don't see a point in ascribing said 'whoever or whatever' with rules that ancient dead people ascribed them and trying to believe it. Especially when it doesn't work in my life."

"I've never thought about it." Galina offered idly, making more progress than the rest of them combined in stripping gemstones from settings while they were distracted. "I always thought at religion as something 'extra' but not really necessary. Something to do when you have the time to waste, rather than a necessity of living."

"…my old pastor would weep." McScruffy muttered mostly to himself, which earned him two eye rolls from the women and a faintly curious look from the only child present.

"Wasn't Jesus Christ actually Jewish?" Sonya asked him a bit archly, giving up on a rather heavily embedded green stone in an equally heavy setting and just ripping the ring in two in order to separate the gem out. "Since before there were 'Christians' there was mainly Egyptians, Romans, and the Jewish where he was known to live? If you believe he was a 'savior', why not join the religion that he was as well? If you have issues with your specific Church, but not with the issue of God's existence, find a new church."

"Just saying 'find a new whatever' doesn't exactly help those that doubt but were raised with the mindset of 'to miss Mass is a sin'." Peter countered a bit shortly. "I have nearly twenty years of faithful church attendance, not to mention being raised as a dutiful Catholic choir boy, that cannot be reconciled easily with nearly ten years of being imprisoned and abused by my fellow man."

"People are assholes, no matter what." Snapped back the Storm-Cloud equally as irritated as the Sun sounded. "It's real pretty to say you shouldn't do things that are 'criminal'… but I am a professional thief. I've also killed people even when I didn't want to for various reasons, to survive, to prevent a family from being murdered by simply being in the wrong place at the wrong time, a bunch of fucking sex traffickers because they tried for me. It happens, it's in my nature to not see that as wrong but only a matter of survival. Even knowing that murder is morally wrong to others… I have no issue with it. Does that make me a bad person?"

"…most priests that aren't aware of your lifestyle would probably say yes." Answered the older man after a long moment of studying the woman. "I actually can't. According to Christian beliefs, man was made in God's image and killing your fellow man is a slight against God's work. I can't honestly believe that, because I have seen the worst in my fellow man and do not understand nor want to how they could do that to me. Then you came along… and now I'm really confused. I know what my religion would say about what happened, that I was put in that position to be found by you for God's plan for you… but I honestly doubt I needed ten years of suffering just to meet you. Pretty sure I could've taken over the family jewelry store and met you that way if you had ever ended up in Canada."

Sonya gave him a weird look. "I didn't know you're from Canada. We were kind of wondering….."

The Sun gave a slightly frustrated gesture, which popped the gemstone loose from the earring he had been fiddling with ever since the 'diamond' issue came up and sent the rock clattering away from them. No one went after it. "That's what you're taking from that?"

"It's nice to know you can sing. I can't." Shamal's mamma chipped in after a pause to think about it.

McScruffy gave a kind of rusty chuckle, getting up to finally chase after the rock he had accidentally tossed to the other side of the office.

"I also don't honestly like it when people I've never met have 'plans' for me." Continued the thief absently, taking the jewels Shamal had finished prying loose to sort out and handing the child another piece. "It makes me… stubborn."

"…um?"

"I knew you before you decided to make use of me." Sonya clarified for Galina, waving a hand not occupied with a half-bent ring around Shamal's other side. "Speaking of which… you're free to go.
Or do whatever it was you wanted."

"What?"

"I bargained with the Pahkan. You and the Mirror Lady are free." Shrugging, she discarded her latest freed stone and slapped the silver in the 'melt down' pile. "I'm stuck for another year and have to pay dues for me and my Lackey for another two, but then I'm free. Usov can do whatever it is he's planning on, or just ask me himself if he'd like."

Miss Galina stared at his godmother for a long, silent moment. "…what?"

"Just saying." Sonya slapped down her final piece, and accepted Shamal's finally freed gemstone from the necklace and the chain to put down as well without putting him down too. "Come on, brat.
I need a nap… and you can either take one with me or be dropped off to visit 'nonna' until this evening Mass' thing."

"I can stay with you, mamma." It'd be a little boring… but he had things to ponder and could always steal one of her books to read.

Or play with Luigi and his Mist Flames. Shamal had plenty to do, he just really didn't want to be foisted off again.

"Are you sure? It's not going to be very interesting or fun..."

"I'll be fine, mamma."

"Should you leave a six-year-old home alone while you sleep?" Galina asked warily, lifting her head from the intricate studded charm bracelet she was de-gemming to give her a confused look.

"...technically I do every time I go to sleep, and he wakes up in the middle of the night." Admitted the thief after a moment of thought on the subject, not putting the Mist down per her usual nowadays. "What would be the difference now?"

"He might get bored and wander into something lethal or try playing with something you'd rather him not?" McScruffy volunteered idly.

Sonya pointed a finger in front of Shamal's nose. "Don't be stupid, then. Or you'll be exiled to nonna's instead of being allowed to entertain yourself from now on."

"Kay."

(Monday the 21st of July, 1969. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Since Sonya's 'day' started with making what was Shamal's dinner but her breakfast and then two or three hours of Catholic Mass, she had more than enough energy to try racking two heists in the same stretch of natural darkness.

She could quite easily be a complete night-owl, to only wake when the sun set and hit the bed around the time it rose again. Her few years in a circus performing mainly in the evening and night hours, not to mention it was indefinitely easier to steal things after venues and businesses closed for the night to get the gawkers and shoppers out of her way, would've made the shift stupidly easy had she not put actual specific effort into returning to a 'day' schedule afterwards.

That and it would be even more difficult to keep track of the date when on the job if she woke on one day and it was a different one before she went to sleep.

Since she also didn't want to sleep through the last few days she would have Shamal with her, the thief didn't intend to go to sleep today until the brat did to ensure she was back on a regular schedule. That would be painful as hell, not to mention she'd be more irritable than normal and would have to watch herself before she snapped at someone that didn't deserve it, but worth it in her opinion.

Strangely, after Peter and Galina showed up to babysit for her again and Sonya went into the Zolotov clan to find a driver and temporary partner for a long night, she got three vor that volunteered.

Having expected a not-a-vor-yet Shestyorka to agree to help rather than the usually too important fully-fledged criminals, the Storm-Cloud hadn't thought up or figured out a way to turn down the extra aid before she found herself in a pickup truck with them.

It was... different. Unlike the only other time in her life she had significant 'backup'... well, both times given that Renato had helped a bit himself when he was here to go along with the times Tatiana and her gang had her as an 'extra hand', this was very different.
She didn't really know them, and highly doubted they knew her by anything but her foster father or by rumor. It was understandable why she had vory rather than Shestyorka, they were far outside Zolotov territory and into rival thieves' home ground and she still was 'guarded' even within their home territory. Understandable, but… unusual.

Therefore the car trip was, in a word, awkward.

Sonya did not have the social skills to negate that. She'd admit it, and since she really didn't want to damage the Zolotov Flame user's that left her with little to do about it. Trying and failing would be worse than doing nothing… so that was what she was stuck with.

Riding in the backseat of a pickup truck with three burly, tattooed men, in complete silence.

There was plenty of time to think now instead of in the in-between moments of her next heist, but… the silence was starting to get to her.

Lighting up the third cigarette in the same hour, the thief strained to catch sight of the street signs to see if she could ask to be let off yet. With how dark the streets were, even with the pools of lamplight cast by the iron posts or the occasional lit window, the most she could see was her occasional reflection in the car's window or merely the glow of her cigarette's cherry.

Well… there really was nothing for it. Sonya sighed, then tapped the driver on the shoulder. "Let me out here, I'll meet up with you all a few more streets closer but I need the underground to get in this time."

She earned herself a brief glance backwards through the rearview mirror, but the man did pull over to let her out. However, before she could open the door the vor sitting in the back with her handed over the rather dirt encrusted car jack that had been stored under the driver's seat for the drive.

Apparently, they were going to pretend there was 'tire trouble' for an alibi. Sonya could then assume she would then be the one either sent or called up to bring them the jack, or at least that was how it was to appear to any good Samaritans or law enforcement that wanted to know what was going on.

"…right. I'll also try to get something to eat on my way back." It was going to be a long night for them, she could at least ensure they were somewhat comfortable while they waited for her.

"If you're taking requests, pick up some vodka."

Sonya glanced at her backseat bench mate, but he seemed entirely honestly about the request for liquor so she just nodded and opened up the door to leave them.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 21st of July, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Stripping the asphalt imbued cloth coating the wire supplying power to a security camera using the still tiny-sized gold ax she pulled off her chain of miniaturized weaponry took a bit of a delicate touch.

Cutting from top to bottom where she wanted no insulation instead of scraping it off from the side ensured the stiff cloth looked raggedly 'chewed' up, and it made it less obvious the damage was caused by human hands rather than some creature nibbling on it. Taking a bracing breath, she quickly twisted it to the still live but equally stripped lighting wire to short out both the lights and the cameras.
Hissing as electricity burned through her right hand and fingers from a loose arc of electricity, Sonya jerked away from the power box and the fuses she had just short circuited and jumped upwards to the shadowed entranceway over the basement-underground access of the building she wanted to break into.

Flexing the stiffened digits to work out the numbness out of them, she waited in the gloomy darkness until some poor idiot that drew the short straw slammed the steel door only a few increments under her ass. Taking a slight risk in that there wasn't another guard sent to back him up, the Storm-Cloud stopped bracing herself via her boots planted against one wall and her back pressed against the other and dropped to the stoop to dart into the basement of the jewelry store she wanted to rob.

A bit odd this building had underground access, but it could've been a really old repurposed building. Then the access door was less odd and more interesting.

Luck was with her, there wasn't a guard lingering for the one that was taking a look at her handiwork. Unfortunately, the guards had at least one brain cell to share between them and there was a stationary watchman aiming his torch down the stairwell to the level she was on.

Possibly scanning the shadows for movements, or just waiting for the other guy to return, but either way a respectable obstacle in her way.

Unless the guy switching fuses around was smart enough to notice the stripped wires that might or might not be still sparking, she only had a bit of time to reach a 'safe' spot for when the lights would be turned back on. The basement level of this jewelry store had been utilized as storage space, which meant she would be going through it to ensure there wasn't anything interesting to be had... but it was very tightly packed.

There wasn't a whole lot of room, and what there was looked too small for her to squeeze into.

She couldn't spot any vents from her position, there were only two ways to leave the room the door behind her and the stairwell in front, meaning she either had to hide out somehow or run the risk of being spotted by one of the guards she was sandwiched between.

Out of obvious options, Sonya turned to the crates piled up against the walls.

She had yet to find a way to open nailed shut wooden crates without leaving behind either tool marks or dents where her fingers had been, but she didn't need to avoid it this time. They were stacked against a wall, meaning she could hide any damage by merely turning things around.

However, climbing into unknown boxes to wait out any attention was... iffy in terms of maybe working as she wanted. Pulling another gold ax back out, she needed a knife or a less unwieldy blade for restricted spaces, the thief carefully pressed the blade into the crack between the lid and the container of the nearest non-stacked upon crate. Pulling up slowly, or what she figured to be slowly since force was a difficult thing for her to judge, at least got the cheap wood to pop loose without a screech of iron against wood sounding.

A split in the wooden edge from the sharper end of the ax, but no cringe-inducing noise.

It was full of papers. Confused, Sonya swiped up a sheaf of them from the top and applied her Storm Flames to the rest to eat out a cavity for herself. Flipping the lid around to hide the splintering she then dropped herself into the dusty and paper lined hiding spot.

Slightly offsetting the lid kept it looking, only at first glance admittedly, like it was still nailed shut. It also gave the thief a sliver of light to read what the hell a crate full to the brim of paper had held.
Just in time, as not a few breaths later the lights flickered overhead once before a handful of bulbs blew with a musical set of pops. There were shouts and utterly vehement swear words uttered while the guards started to respond to her sabotage.

Ignoring the half-shouted conversation going on about rat-gnawed wires and what kind of supplies were left to hopefully fix the things that had just blown up, she instead squinted at the tiny lines of typed letters.

Having expected little to nothing interesting, Sonya was not remotely disappointed to realize it was just old inventory records. Groping for another page under her, she compared the two.

Why were they keeping inventory lists for years?

One was from this very year, only a few months previous, and the one she just pulled from behind her shoulder blades was from nearly ten years ago.

Sonya was about to discard the paperwork, it wasn't really relevant and she should be keeping an ear out for who was passing by her hiding spot. A passing thought had her taking a third look, to make out the actual items listed rather than just what layout and heading they held.

One was typical for a jewelry store, stock metal ingots and stone orders. The other was not.

Copper was a jewelry metal, a cheap one but still, but lead wasn't. At least, she was pretty sure, given she had never seen it in any jewelry store before this.

Why lead?

"...hey, do you smell smoke too?"

…fuck.

"Yeah, I can smell it too." Sonya winced, and tried to subtly shift around deeper in the atomized dust that was left behind under overwhelming Storm Flames used to flash fry things out of her way. There wasn't nearly enough to cover her… and she was contained in a paper pile in a wooden box.

Well… they thought they sensed fire… she might as well give them some.

The wooden lid over her suddenly shifted as someone wedged their fingers under the thin plank. In response, the Storm-Cloud lit everything near or around her on bright red Flames.

There were shouts and another ugly swear word as the two suddenly scrambled backwards from her makeshift burning pyre. Sonya merely scowled as the guards bailed, there went her favorite set of lockpicks and the backpack she purchased in Paris.

…not to mention the very clothing she had been wearing.

Well… this was going to be a fairly uncomfortable walk back to the pickup truck they had, not to mention she had nothing to steal thing in… in both of the meanings of the term.

…and she just burned up her last pair of really fucking comfortable boots. Son of a bitch.

Now highly pissed off, the thief hoisted herself out of the burning wreckage that was this store's backlog of inventory reports. From the sounds of things, and the fucking fire alarm now wailing in her fucking ear, she was pretty sure the guardsmen had bolted for either firefighting duties or to get the hell out of the 'burning' building.
Was this a botched job, or could she press on and at least get something for having burned every stitch and piece of equipment she had on her?

Sonya threw a fistful of Storm Flames at the stairwell she had to go up before a rather chatty fellow descended the stairs to 'prove' the building wasn't on fire. After the expected 'oh shit' moment on his end, she started a slow walk to it while keeping herself on Flames for the security.

Might as well chase them out, steal what she wanted, and then fuck off herself.

Storm Flames might make a good disguise in a pinch, but it sucked to be forced into using. She lost way too much for the security for it to have been worth it. Now she was buck naked, had no cigarettes, lost some of her favorite tools.

Fuck, she was going to figure out how to steal everything here in revenge for losing her stuff. Somehow.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 21st of July, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"I take it we don't need the jack anymore?

"Hey, babe." One of the vory spoke up, rising up to his feet to take the 'heavy' car jack she had thankfully stored far away from the jewelry store she had just robbed. Therefore, she hadn't needed to break into a random car and hope they had one. "No but thank you for looking. Where did you borrow it from?

"Two streets over, the apartment complex. Didn't even had to knock, there was a rather nice man who let me borrow his as long as we return it before noon tomorrow." Actually, that was where she left the crate she had repurposed from the jewelry store to contain the things she stole from them, but this way she wouldn't have to explicitly state where she stashed stuff to meet up with them in front of a non-clan member.

Sonya put up with the Zolotov vor that spoke up bussing her cheek, as she was apparently playing a girlfriend or something. She also let him take possession of the jack, in favor of eyeing the milisiya officer that had apparently stopped to see what the group of men had been loitering around for and offered his own car jack to get them moving.

There was an actual flat tire the other two vory and the law enforcement officer were in the middle of changing, which made the thief wonder how they caused it. As far as she was aware, which was out-of-date information from absent half-listening to Cherep and Dmitriy back when they had been kids, the clan keep on-top of maintaining their vehicles to prevent exactly this scenario from occurring on the job.

Letting her supposed 'boyfriend' take possession of the grocery bag she actually stole from the same apartment she stole the clothing she was now wearing, which held the food and liquor for them that she also liberated, Sonya seriously wondered how they caused the flat.

Apparently, the officer had shown up as she found herself new clothes and the food for the others. They had only just jacked the truck up enough to wrench the flat tire off before she got here.

Shifting a bit uncomfortably in her ill-fitting and stolen shoes, the thief wrapped her arms around herself to make it less obvious that what she was wearing didn't actually fit her very well.
Thankfully she was less physically imposing than the vory were, and the officer's shifty side-glances flicked to her once but didn't linger for very long.

It didn't take much longer, shoving the spare tire onto the axel and tightening the lug nuts took only minutes if you were at least semi-competent which she was probably not, and with a suggestion to hurry up and leave the militsiya officer left them to it.

Her 'boyfriend' took the opportunity to pass out the food she brought back with her. "Why are you in that?"

"…Storm Flames come with the risk of burning off your own clothing if you're not careful." Sonya admitted lowly, and maybe a tiny bit bitterly. "I lost my gear as well, and my picks."

This summer had not been good on her footwear.

"We need to go pick up what I got, I've been wandering around with the car jack trying to find you all for at least ten minutes." She continued, actually towards one of the men with her. "What time is it?"

"A little after midnight."

"…one more then." After losing her picks and a bag that would've limited her to just the better quality or easily sold stuff, she had taken too long to loot the store branch to the bedrock.

She didn't regret it, as replacing her boots made her irritable enough to justify it to herself, but time was now the limiter she had to conform to.

"How the hell are we going to loiter around then? We don't have another spare wheel, not to mention some fire ensured our descriptions were broadcasted." Asked the driver a bit shortly between bites of the meat filled pastry she brought back with her.

"Lose a few lug nuts. Then one of us can go for a 'walk' until she gets back." Suggested the so far silent passenger, using a pant leg to scrub off the grime on his knuckles before taking his share of the food.

"…I can take one with me and hide it while I'm stealing to not risk burning it into dust." Sonya agreed with a shrug.

The only one taking nips out of the half-bottle of vodka she managed to locate while raiding an apartment for clothing and food was thankfully her supposed 'boyfriend', the driver had shook his head and the non-talkative one was probably some kind of liquor snob by the sneer. Her one lingering concern about grabbing the vodka in the first place avoided entirely, Sonya had no problem climbing back into the truck to go pick up her loot.

It was five minutes of a ride, and the thief's admonition that she'd be the only one to actually move her stolen goods was ignored so there was another five minutes of the three vory trying to figure out how to move the repurposed crate into the back of the truck.

Until the Storm-Cloud got fed up, snatched the massive wooden box herself, and huffed irritably at all three of them.

Slightly useful in the transport effort, but frankly she wasn't going to do this again.

Too many heads, and way too much testosterone, made things take way too fucking long.
Artemiy Nikolayevich managed a slightly awkward smile as Andrei Chikatilo poked around the classroom they might be sharing until the man was fully hired.

He wasn't sure what, but the man was a bit... off-putting. It might really be just the fact he had been hired full time and the other man hadn't been, because that was an entire degree of awkward in and of itself.

"How many students do you think they managed to pull?" Chikatilo asked absently, poking around the shelf of books he had brought in himself for hopefully future use in classes.

It wasn't hard to find reference books, and a few interesting popular stories published recently, to place an order through the library for filling the rest of the shelves. Losing the ones he brought in to bored students or just the books becoming lost wouldn't be too bad, merely annoying to replace.

The dictionary, on the other hand, would be irritating to lose. He had plans for that reference.

"More than enough for our first year." A very feminine voice announced from the doorway flatly before Artemiy could think of something to say.

Bordrov 'Scruffy' Jaroslav cleared his throat, running a hand through his silvered blond curls.
"Nikolayevich, meet Bazanova Sonya. Our... ah... principal."

"The librarian." Corrected the short blonde woman shortly. "We'll be getting an actual principal in a few years, it's just for now."

That still meant she was the boss, and the one dictating they had work and were paid for it.

Her literature teacher hastened over to at least shake the hand of the person that gave him something other than factory work to do. "Miss? Bazanova, thank you again."

"...I'm sure. I need your pick for a textbook for your classes, Nikolayevich. So we can order them in time." The woman seemed a bit taken aback by him, but apparently she didn't really mind. "You're the last person I need it from, so..."

Artemiy scrambled for his list of possible text books, taken from the master list the vice principal who only introduced herself as 'Galina' had sent to him through the mail. He had the book written down on his notepaper, he also had written down which books he brought in from home on it for whatever records needed to be kept on such things.

Bazanova accepted the paper a bit hesitantly, but while she got interested in reading what he wanted at best or what he could settle for Scruffy looked between him and Chikatilo.

"Getting along alright?" Asked the other man carefully.

"Yes?" He didn't notice any awkwardness other than on his own end, and Chikatilo seemed more comfortable than he was.

Artemiy looked over to the other man, and it really did seem as if the man didn't mind being the temporary teacher and not the full time one.
"Chikatilo, there must be a rifle club. Otherwise I leave what sports you would like to coach between what classes up to you. The more you do, and the more competitions you get your students into, the more funds I will set aside for you and Yanlin to make use of. I made the same announcement to him, you two will need to figure out how to split the load." She decided solidly, folding up Artemiy's list and putting it into a pocket. "The textbooks should be here a few days before the school year starts, my apologies for the last-minute supply but that was inevitable with the deadline we were racing for as well as how long it took to finish fleshing out the staff."

The young blonde woman stopped, took a deep breath and actually looked at the two men in the classroom.

"Otherwise, quickly get me a list of what you need still that isn't already supplied. If you do not this week, before Thursday, Galina will be the one you have to go to about missing supplies and it might take longer than you want."

"Yes ma'am."

"…alright." The substitute literature teacher echoed on the heels of his own answer.

Bazanova glanced upward at Scruffy before nodding to the both of them and turning on her heel to leave them.

"…she's not really a people person." Scruffy explained after a beat, a bit sheepishly sounding on her behalf. "But she's a damn good problem solver, which this school is part of. We rather needed one in this part of the city."

"Is that why she insists she's not the principal?"

The older man laughed a bit. "She likes books more than people actually. The principal is probably going to be Primakova Elisaveta, the Home Economics teacher, before long. Since she's… well, one of the elder instructors we've got. It's just… Sonya's bankrolling a lot of this to avoid a few of the restrictions and limitations doing it on a government contract would cause, so what she says goes."

"Where did you pick up Yanlin from?"

"Her contacts from China, obviously. It's also why you were hired." Admitted the older man to Chikatilo, honest but not cruelly so. "She's got business she can't get out of for the start of our first year, and since she was supposed to be the substitute literature teacher but wouldn't be here in the first few months… but we might be getting transfer students from China since he's here and she's got business there."

"So, you'll be teaching Chinese then?"

Scruffy winced. "Ah… no. Can't speak that worth a damn yet. Yanlin and Sonya will have to translate any issues. I'll be teaching English, as we were given permission since it's a widely used business language, as well as a few African dialects that I've… picked up as extra on the side if anyone's interested."

"So then… coworkers." Chikaitlo announced brightly, clapping his hands together and looking between them. "Drinks tonight? I need to know what you intend to teach so I can sub in, Nikolayevich. And I don't think I've actually formally met you… ah…?"

"Bordrov Jaroslav." The older man answered promptly. "But call me Scruffy, please. And-"

"If Bazanova says something about the nickname coming from a firing line in Africa, don't take her..."
seriously?" Artemiy interjected a bit dryly. "I don't know, Scruffy. You can apparently speak some African languages, and I highly doubt she's the jesting kind."

"You have to get to know her really well before she'll relax around you. Nearly goggled like an idiot the first time I saw her smile honestly." Looking back to the man that invited them to either a bar or to someplace that served liquor, the language teacher smiled wryly. "I'm up for it, so long as you don't mind I don't really get out a lot. I only moved to Moscow earlier this year, in fact. From Africa."

The 'firing line' was probably an in-joke between them. Prying the story out of the man would be some fun to do if they run out of topics to speak about. "I'm up for it. Start with a bar and work our way outwards?"

"Sounds good to me. Scruffy?"

"I'm up for that." With a nod, the older man waved a hand as he turned to follow their temporary principal to wherever she had gone off to do. "I only request we stick to this neighborhood for right now, I'm not too comfortable going too far out just yet. I'd get lost stupidly easily."

Chikaitlo laughed. "I know how that feels, I had to move here for this job and getting turned around is also something I hate."

Artemiy had lucked out by already living in the area with his wife. As a matter of fact, he had lived within Moscow his entire life. His parents lived just on the other side of the city and had done so since his childhood.

Unsure about how to add into this topic, he picked to instead suggest a time they could meet up. "Say around six?"

"Works for me." Scruffy tossed over a shoulder. "I'll be either in the office or the library with Bazanova filling out orders, pick me up there."

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 22nd of July, 1969 continued. Mafia Land.)

"You're Sonya's Lackey, right?"

Bjorn blinked, craning his neck around to fully see the speaker that had halted near the doorway. "Since you assaulted me the first time we met, I think you already knew that."

"I did not assault you." Drawled out the hitman, stalking into the little cubby hole of a room the Icelander had reserved for his research efforts and folding the information he had apparently required from the Mafia Land's info brokers. "If you really want a comparison, you don't have a bullet hole as a souvenir from those I assault in truth."

"Yes… thank you for that." Responded the Lightning-Storm dryly. "Do you require something?"

"Just curious." The Italian slapped a hand on the papers he had been looking through before the Lackey could remove them from view. "What are you doing? I am pretty sure she's not doing jobs until she gives the brat back."

Bjorn didn't sigh, but the impulse required acknowledgement. Instead, he gave the hitman that apparently was required to kill his patron but wasn't going to for reasons a flat look. "I am looking for someplace that Dama might like to live within, if you must know."
Yes okay. The man wasn't going to kill his patron even if that was apparently part of his orders. That didn't mean he had to like the hitman, or that he shouldn't be worried over the interest he had in his lady's business.

He also didn't have to forget how the man treated him that first meeting.

Renato Sinclair was an imposing hitman, especially with that grating sense of slick confidence that nothing he did would get him killed. Having witnessed, personally, the man almost waltzing his way through the streets through small-scale conflicts that had killed less skilled gunslingers easily Bjørn was fully aware it was honestly earned sense of confidence.

Again, he didn't have to like it.

An eyebrow rose up as the hitman scanned the list of personnel the Lackey was trying to account for.
"I promised Sonya I'd find her someplace close to where we need her to be for the brat's schooling."

…so, he actually had a reason to bother him. Frowning, the Lightning-Storm flicked a glance from his list to the Italian.

That was probably a good idea, the man would know his homeland better than he could research.
Even within Mafia Land's considerable reach.

"Are you sure about this?" Renato asked skeptically, twitching the paper that listed exactly how many people his Lady would need. "Seems a bit… excessive."

"Can you argue against any of them? Dama is gone for long stretches of time traveling for her contracts, so a staff for upkeep might be a good idea. Then there's keeping everyone fed. And then-"

"I get it." The hitman interrupted shortly. Another look, and the list was stolen brazenly by being tucked into a suit pocket nonchalantly. "I suppose I should then send you any estates I find up for sale then."

Less he had to do, but he would still be intently examining any suggestions. Bjørn wondered if he was holding a grudge, and if that was a wise idea.

…probably, but he didn't greatly care. Dama will still be the one to decide which one, but I would appreciate the opportunity to research how much they're going to cost, what the refurbishing needs would be, and such to give her."

"There's a matching service for mafia syndicates and suitably prepared service personnel."
Announced the Sun hitman nonchalantly, examining the Lackey from under the brim of his ever-present fedora. "I'll get you the number, so you can start arranging what you think she needs."

"I'm fairly aware she's not going to be happy, but I also don't expect her to object too much other than a bit of grumbling." Bjørn defended himself a bit waspishly.

Sonya hadn't even wanted him to attach himself to her. Once she had given in and dictated a position for him, she then added a number of other people in short order. Miss Galina had succeeded in her aims to become indispensable, Peter McScruffy seemed to have developed into someone she wanted to keep, and then there was the young child she was rearranging her entire life around for the long term.

"So long as I can blame you, I don't rightly care." Announced the infuriating hitman sadistically with a smirk. "So… castles, hmm?"
"...she likes history."

"I've noticed."
Chapter 72

(Wednesday the 23rd of July, 1969. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Hey mamma?" Shamal posed right before she hastened them both out of her suite to head to the office for the day, absently handing her the purse she had him hold while she fetched some of the school's paperwork she had left in here. "Ever want to be normal?"

Sonya blinked down at him blankly, caught flat-footed by that question. "...define normal, kid."

"Like not a... um... what you are." He finished lamely as she got on with locking her apartment door behind them, so they could go. "I mean in fiery terms and the... um... job you do."

The brat probably hadn't been really happy she more or less dead to the world for the last couple days. She had managed to get the materials to hawk off in order to not require another heavy loan from her 'grandfather', but that really didn't excuse three days of being less than responsive to what attention he needed.

The thief had to find something to do for both Scruffy and Galina for picking up her slack, even if the kid wasn't really all that happy at the major distraction.

'Normal' was... an interesting question.

Probably motivated from those few days of being in the middle of a string of heists and not paying him the bulk of her attention like a parent or guardian should've, but not nearly so much she had been expecting something like this. Renato wasn't remotely 'normal' either, and she wondered if he'd pose the same question to the hitman too.

"Is this an honest question or just a wonder?"

Shamal snagged her free hand in his own, obediently following her down the hallway to the elevators by quickening his shorter stride to keep up. "McScruffy took me to a park yesterday while you were sleeping. It's kind of weird when you don't know the other kids, but I kept being asked if he was my zio or something."

"You have a zio, and a zia. And me and Renato. Do you want more?"

"No! I'm happy enough you're with me, mamma." Insisted the young child forcefully, tugging her hand to convey some more of his honest earnestness. "It's just... I wonder if we will do the whole 'family day' thing like the other kids can."

"It's possible." Allowed the thief thoughtfully. "Not this year, and maybe not next, but I'll be living in Italy with you soon enough. Since that's so, it's possible nonna, nonno, and my siblings might visit at the same time Renato does and we'll do something together as a family unit."

She got a squeeze of the hand as he absorbed that.

"So how does being 'normal' come in?" Sonya asked curiously as she shook her hand free gently to press the call buttons for the elevator. "And you still need to define normal for me."

Scowling a bit cutely as he puzzled over his thoughts, the young Mist followed her absently into the elevator car.
Then he opted to just wave a dark blue wreathed hand around instead of finding a 'delicate' way to put what he wanted to say. "I mean not being a… uh, Cloud. Or a Storm. Or a thief. Just being a normal lady and doing normal lady things."

Technically, Sonya had already done that.

Then Rachel had died being 'normal'.

"No, honestly. Did you want me to try? I'll give nearly anything a shot, but I rather like the challenge of stealing things."

She never had thought about it, beyond the long-ago musing on if getting out of her dictated role as a thief was viable or not. Even if she had decided it wasn't realistic, wondering if she could go straight hadn't come up since Dmitriy asked about it.

Could she go straight with any degree of success?

Get a day job, not steal or kill anyone?

Sonya actually rather doubted it, not with a lot of effort or preparation paid beforehand. She did have the school starting up, and Björn working on investments for her, but given how quickly she ended up spending the bulk of her earned cash through various heists she'd be forced to steal something to provide some more.

She could try writing books honestly, taking advantage of the fact she was already published go give her a bit of a boost. However, she really doubted that would pull in a lot of money.

Additionally, she should probably put some effort into keeping up with her thief skills no matter what she was doing from here on out. Losing her picks and her fucking comfortable boots was depressing, and a rather large indication she had gotten a bit more than uncomfortably rusty being confined behind a desk all day.

Aside her actual profession, she wasn't aware of any way to stop being a user of Dying Will Flames. She had suspicions, and if those were true she wasn't touching that shit with a ten foot pole, but with the lack of confirmation there wasn't anything to be done about her Flames.

Even if she wanted to, to stop being a Cloud, Storm, or whatever her Sun Flames did, that was outside of her reach.

"We'll have family time in Italy, kid. Just be patient."

Shamal sort of cringed into himself, a rather twisted little grimace on his face as they descended in the little death-box of an elevator. "Sorry, mamma."

"I get where you're coming from, brat. So, I'm not annoyed or anything." She reassured him when the doors slid open again to let them out on the ground floor. "But I am what I am, and that's not going to change no matter what is said or tried. While one part of your question might be attainable, the other isn't."

"I know I shouldn't ask for more." He admitted a bit miserably. "But I keep wondering."

"It's completely human to wonder." Sonya offered to hopefully get the child to lighten up about the topic. "Just like it is completely human to dream bigger, want more, and compare what you have to what others have. I'm not even a bit surprised you're wondering if I can, but honestly speaking I'm not sure if I even could."
Her left hand was taken up again, this time with both of his as he followed her out of the hotel lobby.

"Dream as big as you want, I'll help you figure out what's obtainable and what realistically isn't."

"...is it?"

She sighed a bit, exchanging a nod with a vor she recognized from the group that escorted her around during her stealing spree that lost her the last pair of really fucking comfortable boots. "Not for years, I'm afraid. But... around the time you finish the school Renato wants you to attend, I might be able to take a year or so off again just to try."

When did Mafia School, Italy's branch, end anyways?

Were there established 'years' one had to get through, an age limit, or did a student just attend until one was recruited or said student decided they were done?

Hopefully Shamal would be occupied until the kid was around fourteen or so, because she'd need a fair bit of prep to take yet another year off.

Random periods in which she didn't steal might be a good thing, if she could find a way around the whole 'getting rusty' part. The less she was anticipated, the harder any law enforcement would have finding her. Sonya decided she didn't mind being asked to take breaks, but Cherep wasn't going to be told of that.

He'd ask her to do it more than it was comfortable.

"...if you get into a college, no matter for what, I'll spend the entire first year or two firmly home with you." Added the thief thoughtfully as they settled into the back of the car. "How about that?"

Shamal blinked up at her thoughtfully as he buckled himself in. "I'll hold you to it, mamma."

He might not really appreciate the bargain when it came due, but college was a life experience he should at least try.

"Alright then. One last thing." Lightly flicking his nose, which cutely made the kid sneeze, the thief sighed. "I need you to start packing as soon as we get back tonight. I have a pit stop to make on our way back, so we're leaving tomorrow."

He sort of deflated, lowering sad brown eyes to his lap. "...oh."

"We'll still spend every day until Saturday together at the very least, and tomorrow is still a steal-lesson day, but I need another day to make that last stop." Sonya clarified as the vor driving them pulled out of the hotel's driveway. Threading her fingers through his hair got him to be less mopey. "I'll be just you and me, until we get to where I want to go and then catch a plane to Mafia Land where you can spend what you want on whatever. We'll see Tats before we leave there to head to Italy. Okay?"

Shamal nodded slowly, but still didn't look happy.

She wasn't happy she had to give him back for his next school year, so she fully appreciated his little sulk. The thief also didn't really appreciate him unbuckling himself and scooting over to occupy her lap, but supposed it was forgivable since she was indefinitely stronger than any scrap of fabric and perfectly willing to mind his safety.

Sonya still buckled him under her own belt, just in case.
"Where should we send Luigi, then?"

"Mafia Land, in the care of Tats." Sonya absently answered her foster mother, pitching in with helping Galina de-gem a number of jewelry pieces. "We'll take one of the island's planes to Italy, so a small pet on board won't be too much of an issue."

"Alright then. Shamal?" Elisaveta turned to the godchild of her daughter and quirked a smile for the kid. "Sweetheart? Do you want to come with me to pack him up?"

"Her." Corrected the young Mist hastily, then the he bit his lower lip and hesitated.

"Okay, her then? Or do you want to keep her for the night?"

"Today or tomorrow, kid." She interjected blandly, actually lifting her head from her work to give her brat a level look. "You can keep her tonight, but then tomorrow she needs to be shipped off anyways."

Peter looked between the three of them, then shot a faintly confused look to Galina. Rolling her eyes, the Lightning snagged a mostly abandoned desk calendar and flashed him the next month.

What about August?

Err… wait. School years typically started in September and given how successful his godparents seemed to be in this lifestyle it was entirely possible he attended some kind of elitist school. A month for gathering up what he needed for the scholastic year, like supplies or uniforms and more clothing since he was a growing kid, might be entirely warranted for contractual-based income like Sonya typically had.

…he had been out of school for a damn near decade. He was pretty sure forgetting when the school year started and how much a hassle it was could be forgivable. Ignoring the younger brunette's soft huff, the Sun looked back down to his Mist game partner.

Poor kid. Summer vacation with his mother was damn near over and the shift of going back to his homeland had to be jarring, even if he should have the rest of the week left with his mamma.

Sonya sighed, turning around fully instead of remaining half-bent over her desk. "Adding Luigi into the staff we have to manage tomorrow will make things more difficult. I'm not saying you have to send the lizard off now, but this way we definitely won't lose her in the scramble to get to the train tomorrow."

Reluctantly pushing off the couch, the young Mist trudged over to his grandmother moodily. "It's okay, mamma. We can send Luigi to zia today."

Scruffy was entirely unsurprised the game board he and the kid had been playing on evaporated and took this to mean he'd be able to go back to his 'usual' work tomorrow at the earliest.

He'd miss the little smart-ass, but since Sonya didn't seem to wish to linger long with him in Moscow he was sure the moment she could they'd all abscond to wherever else she wanted them to be.

He had the age to understand it and appreciate would be temporary, for Shamal it probably seemed like another whole lifetime until he got more vacation time to spend with his 'mamma'.

What year was the kid in?

Or did Italians and Russians do the 'form' thing?

Peter mulled that over while the kid gave his godmother a hug and wandered off after his grandmother to go send his pet to… his aunt before heading back to wherever he lived in Italy.

The Sun then missed whatever the woman said next, and Sonya's slightly exasperated call for his attention only jarred him back to the matter at hand well after the older woman and the young boy had left the room.

"Scruffy." The resurrection of his once often used nickname, which had been dropped recently now that he thought about it, finally had the man looking at his boss. "Can you help Galina? I've got to run to the train station myself, and she wants help transporting some of this to the fences."

"…ah…"

"The clan's fences, we won't be leaving the building." Clarified the Lightning a bit shortly.

"Sure then." He could be a packhorse, which was fine enough. He might not be in the peak of physical health still, but some stairs with a pocketful of metal… oh, wait.

Sonya hadn't waited for him to gather his thoughts, apparently after he agreed she had left before Peter fully realized the scope of the work before him and Galina.

…additionally, just why the Lightning might be a little annoyed.

"How much did she leave us to handle?" Asked Scruffy tentatively.

Galina gave him a flat look. "Three of 'her' heists' worth. Almost three hundred kilograms of material."

It really did bite when your boss was a tiny woman that could lift more than humanly possible, and she absentmindedly forgot they weren't nearly as strong. Like ripping jewels out of their settings, only the thief could do the inset ring mounts by tearing the metal in half and they had to stick to pendants and earrings just so they could realistically bend the fittings without her strength.

Admittedly Sonya might expect Galina to strong-arm some help, but… nearly three hundred kilograms was likely around or over six hundred pounds.

"How much do we have to move then?"

"Not nearly as much, about fifty kilograms is earmarked for the school as is. But that still leaves most of the metal… unless you think you'd like some of it." Admitted the woman shortly, gesturing to the slowly building pile of scrap metal on the far side of the desk.

Gold, silver, platinum, steel, titanium, and several alloy mixes Peter couldn't identify on sight made up the heap of discarded fittings and broken chain.

A… big heap. Leaning halfway up the heavy wooden desk, having been added to over the last three days while their boss collected even more.

He ran a hand through his short hair as he warily eyed the mess left behind. "…uh. I can't do anything with that until I have the equipment to melt it down. And I didn't ask Sonya for that, just gem cutting tools."

"So, what, you need a forge?" Galina asked a bit skeptically, giving him not only a slightly admonishingly look but also a raised eyebrow.

Probably for neglecting to mention he'd need more tools eventually.

"A crucible really, but… that's only for metal and settings." Scruffy informed her patiently.

He wasn't going to take offense. Their boss could occasionally be a bit scattered and did rely on her to handle the smaller details when she had bigger distractions to deal with.

"If I wanted to make settings for the gemstones I'm going to cut for various tests, then yes. However, I'm a long way from that point. Until I know what to cut and how, giving them settings would be rather pointless aside the practice in doing so."

She turned to give the broken collection of metal thoughtfully. "Should we then set some aside for you to use later on?"

"A long time." Repeated the Sun with a measure of amusement. "And keeping that at hand would let someone stumble upon it later and connect the Boss Lady to her work, right? I think she'll end up with more eventually, she's proven that long pauses don't bother her that much, so no actually. I don't need any of this right now."

"…Scruffy, that means we have to move all of that down two floors with the rest of the loot we're to hawk off for the operating cash."

"…right. Forgot about that. Let me see."

Bending to the task of sorting out at least some silver and gold to keep, the man determinedly didn't think about who these broken and shattered pieces devoid of their crystals had been intended for.

There were the ripped in half rings, bent and shattered into shards when it didn't give as Sonya wanted them to, that might've been commissioned or created with the intent of them being gifted to a sweetheart or lover. Pendant settings and the backings of various earrings, their prongs bent at odd angles for him and Galina to slip the rocks they once contained free, probably for a mother or yet more significant others.

Pausing at an oddly intact brooch, which was just missing the gemstones as if someone had yet to set them, Scruffy snorted softly as he realized why Shamal hadn't had an issue with helping in the task.

The brat had probably just Mist Flamed his pieces apart, rather than figure out how to bend the metal with his child sized finger strength. They didn't have the delicate tools to enable this kind of deconstruction, but then again a Mist's ability was Construction.

Smartass. The kid had reassured him that he could handle it just as well as his mamma could, then cheated like hell in proving it.

Peter was going to miss the brat.

(Thursday the 24th of July, 1969. Belorussky Station, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)
Sonya now had a very good appreciation for why his teacher had defined Shamal as 'creative'.

The brat had not wanted to leave Moscow at all. He had utterly refused to go to bed on time last night, which meant he was both crabby and tired this morning. He dragged out saying goodbye to her foster parents for an entire hour, mostly with the help of Valera and their little pseudo-rivalry going on.

Then, after three mini-fights with her baby brother and giving Lisa several hugs because he couldn't decide if he should give Arseniy more than one or just give his grandmother the extras and ask they be re-gifted, the kid tried to lose his luggage.

While it was all still in the boot of the car.

She had to pitch in for the utterly confused vor that had driven them... which now that she thought about it he looked a bit familiar to her.

...at least he wasn't trying to help her steal shit. So long as he wasn't doing that, he could do whatever the hell he wanted.

"Brat. We have all day together. In a tiny-ass train compartment." Sonya informed him a bit shortly, more than exasperated with the miniature revolt the kid was trying to throw. "We'll only get to where I want to go tomorrow or late tonight. I kind of want to get there, because I really don't want to be in these shoes for a second more than I have to."

Shamal huffed grumpily, still digging his heels in to the point she didn't want to muscle him around in case she accidentally harmed him.

He was also clinging rather hard to a lamp post, so he wouldn't have to get on the train.

"Shamal, I swear to your God. Move. Your. Ass. If you don't..." She honestly didn't know what she'd do, but likely ask the vor that drove them and was amusedly watching her kid throw a fit so he wouldn't have to leave to loosen Shamal's grip enough she could pick him up.

The young Mist flinched a bit guiltily, and although achingly slowly he did finally let the painted black iron post go. Snatching him up before he recovered enough to try another method of which to waste time in hopes they missed the train, she positioned him on her hip and shot a flat look at the vor who elected to snicker instead of help.

"I can take it from here."

With another snicker, the man wordlessly turned around and wandered out of the train station.

"...look kid, I don't want to give you back either. But I've got a lot of shit I have to do that you can't come with me for." China honestly, and there were the twelve more heists she needed to get that apartment with Tatiana on Mafia Land. Which... she barely had enough work to spread to one bored Lackey much less enough to give three vory escorting her around. "And hopefully, this time next year we'll be moving into a house instead of just doing this visit for the summer thing."

Shamal merely imitated a heavy sack of potatoes in her arms.

Right... well, he'd probably feel better after a nap or something. He only did get a couple hours between fussing about last night and when she woke him to finish packing. They could do a stealing-orientated lecture when he woke up later on today.

More 'Cloud naps', but she'd take that in favor of an especially grumpy Mist brat.
Sonya grabbed her own carrying case, and the backpack her brat was using as a traveling bag, in one hand and stepped up onto the train they were taking to Ukrainian SSR.

The Conductor seemed to be an old hand at managing around grumpy or sulking children, and thankfully she had their tickets in the outside pocket of her purse. It didn't mean she liked letting the man fetch their tickets, but at least she didn't have to drop anything.

"You're being a bit of a brat." The thief informed the kid a bit irritably, contorting her hand a bit oddly to wrench open the compartment door without breaking it.

"...but this means I won't see you again for months, mamma." Muttered Shamal into her shoulder, stubbornly not facing her or the compartment or anything. "I don't want to leave."

Shoving their luggage in the rack provided, she huffed and stretched out on one of the benches provided without putting the Mist down.

Arranging him over her stomach and chest, she awkwardly propped her head on the arm rest. "If I can't get on with my work, then I won't be able to move to Italy myself brat. The longer you drag your feet now, the longer it will take later."

There were indistinct and probably not nice things said into her collarbone as the kid made himself more comfortable.

"I know it's going to suck, but this isn't the way to show it. It's more frustrating than cute."

"...I'm a boy, mamma. We're not cute."

"Well I think you're cute." Sonya insisted with a smirk, then glared at the low-heeled boots she had been forced to buy in order to have actual footwear until she bought replacements. "And I'm not only older but the godmother here, so what I say goes."

Shamal lifted his head to give her a highly unimpressed look. Then his boney forehead impacted her collarbone again as he returned to sulking. "So, you only love me when I'm cute?"

"I love you just fine when you're being a little snot." She answered amusedly. "It's just easier to show it when you're not being a brat."

Her answer was an entirely unconvincing huff as the train started chugging to pull out of the station.

"...love you too, mamma."

...utter little snot.

Why, exactly, did that seem to make the mini-fit he just threw not seem as bad anymore?

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 24th of July, 1969 continued. Kharkiv, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.)

"Where are we?"

"...a city in Ukraine."

"I got that much, mamma." Shamal informed her a bit pointedly.

His godmother stuck her nose in air with a little smirk. "Ho? You don't say."
He resigned himself to being teased for the rest of the day and maybe some of tomorrow.

His mamma had been in a weirdly chipper mood once he had woken up from her rather stifling early train-ride nap, which had taken up until around dinnertime. They were to eat apparently somewhere in the city before catching a late flight to Mafia Land.

He had slept through a lot of the trip, and only woke up again when they left the Russian SSR far behind. Now they were wandering around a city while he tried to muster his fuzzy thoughts and she looked for something specific.

She stopped suddenly, which almost caused Shamal to run into the back of her leg. "Here we are. I'm going to talk in a different language for a bit, try not to wander off."

Shamal gave her a curious look, but she didn't respond to that and instead knocked on a door.

Which… didn't look exactly the same as the rest of the buildings on the street. That was very odd after two months in a place where conformity was the rule.

As a Mist, he had a rather good idea of what was going on by just body language. It was debatable if that was what was really was going on or just his imagination, but it was something.

The guy that opened the door hadn't been what the Storm-Cloud expected, but the abrupt chatter of another, older man was. That man was old and creaky, and apparently not happy.

…or not happy about his godmother's footwear.

In response, she pulled a ruined pair of boots out of her big purse and gave them over.

The old guy exclaimed and wailed over the tattered leather, spinning on his heel and walking off with the boots.

"…drama queen." Sonya remarked softly, reaching down absently for Shamal's hand. "Come on, brat. This might take a bit."

This was where she had wanted to go?

Curious, in a highly skeptical kind of way, he followed her into the store filled with leather and furs.

Sonya went straight for a stool, slipping her low-heeled boots off and then helping him up to her lap. She then took his scuffed leather loafers off too.

"Mamma?"

"Boots."

"Italian? I can do this." The creaky older man came back from a far corner of his shop with the ruined leather and a sharp pair of tiny sheers in hand. "Good evening, little man. Your mother has been very naughty."

"It wasn't my choice. Had I known it was going to happen, I wouldn't have worn my boots."

The tattered boots were waved in the air as if to refute her words. Huffing, the thief merely extended a leg to the first younger man who had a pair of stacked bowls of some grey goop.

"Shamal here requires a pair of shoes as well, preferably along the same lines as what he's wearing but… better."
It was… for feet casts?

Shamal watched in confusion as his godmother's feet were first measured with the plate-thing that had been hidden under the flat and square-ish tubs, then set in the grey stuff until it squished up between her toes.

"Doesn't that feel weird, mamma?"

"Russian, kid. Vacation isn't over yet. But yes." Getting a finger poking his nose in admonition first, Sonya then glanced warily at the younger man before turning back to the old man economically cutting the seams of her old boots apart with very practiced movements. "Two or three child-sized shoes, one for now and one to grow into once he outpaces his current size. Dress shoes in between those sizes just in case."

Did that mean he got to put his feet in the goo too?

The old guy chittered something to his employee, who was probably counting under his breath as he held the goo-tubs. That guy then glanced distractedly at Shamal's feet, gave an exaggerated nod to show he heard, then carefully pulled the flat-ish tubs of goo away from her feet.

His mamma huffed, flexing her toes and planting them again on the bars that supported the stool they were sitting on. The tubs were taken to the old guy, and smaller ones were taken from the back for him.

He then missed whatever the old guy was doing with the tubs from his godmother, he wanted to see what the goo felt like. The measuring plate was the same as the one used in the shoe store next to the tailoring shop his godfather favored for his clothes shopping, but the goo… was cold.

…and squishy, but apparently he wasn't supposed to squish it from the aggravated sigh the younger man gave when he did so.

"Should we ship them, then? Darling with the marvelous legs?" Asked the creaky man fastidiously, taking the top part of his godmother's old boots from the tattered soles and tossing said shredded rubber to a bin set right behind his work bench. "Or will you pick these up at the same time as the rest of your order?"

Shamal pulled a face, shooting the old guy a suspicious look. Was he flirting with his mamma?

"I'll pick them up."

"Well-ah. Oh ho! My apologies, young man. She's a bit too young for me." Professed the elderly man with a fluttery hand, planting the other on his hip. "I just adore her lovely, utterly perfect legs. She could be a model easily with those. You only see a feature like that once in a lifetime, and that fact my leather gets to adorn those marvelous features…"

Sonya pulled a slight confused face as she glanced down at the same feature as if she stared hard enough she'd see the same thing eventually. Shamal was just happy his suspicions weren't right.

"…I thought he was just gayer than my brother." His godmother muttered to herself in her native language, before straightening up and switching back to Italian. "Can you fix those tonight, or should we get a hotel room and pick them up tomorrow?"

Creaky and flirty examined the halves of a pair of boots in front of him intently. "There's about an hour's worth of work here, darling. I won't have you wandering around in those shoddy knock-offs, so just sit tight for a little bit. Preferably, while displaying some lovely motivation please."
They would have to wait an entire hour?

At least his mamma was on the ball, she pulled her copy of 'The Grimms' Fairy Tales' out of her big purse. Shamal snagged it before she let the pseudo leather bag to the floor, digging through a lot of random things until he found the small canvas bag she had gotten from nonna.

Which were the sweet rye biscuits filled with fruit bits.

If he had to wait another hour for dinner, he needed something to nibble on.

His godmother snickered, taking her purse back only to drop it and cracking open the book.

(Friday the 25th of July, 1969. Mafia Land.)

Shamal didn't remotely like plane rides as he thought he might.

Sonya also wasn't remotely surprised at that, the brief moments of excessive pressure and boring lengths of any trip by air weren't exciting at all. While the roar of a plane's engine taking off, not to mention the sensation of being pressed into your seat during take-off were interesting… the rest of it wasn't until the plane touched down again and you got bounced a bit.

Poor brat had all his travel related illusions shattered this summer.

Carrying him again, the Mist had some issues with the air pressure making ears pop and was relentlessly gnawing on the strip of gum she gave him to help but wasn't all-together just yet, the thief got rather far into the island before he was ready to be put down again.

The Zolotov owned condos weren't the best on the island but weren't all that far away from the VIP condos were located. Her brat was dutifully impressed with the sights, because compared to Renato's single apartment it was really fancy for something owned by Russians.

Might actually be part of why her fellow Zolotovs weren't representative in Mafia Land in any significant force. It was overly ornate for Soviet sensibilities, worse than the magpie-like way they cluttered even their own headquarters, and that meant off-putting.

Even their headquarters, decorated with loot from past heists, was more about practicality than the wealth on display. A lot of it rotated when things were safe to hawk off and more came in. Making use of what they had rather than putting the priceless on display because it was just expensive.

Again, Sonya wasn't a good Soviet girl however she wasn't an American one anymore. She didn't particularly care much, just that there was space inside that was designated as 'hers'.

Well… hers and her sister's.

Shamal obediently followed along to the bank of elevators at the far end of the lobby, giving the concierge the stink eye instead of giving up his backpack even if she had dictated them to pick up their luggage from the airport terminal using the ticket stubs she still held.

"Why didn't Mister Renato bring me here when he asked you to help me?"

"He got you here before I could return." She answered honestly enough, examining her purse thoughtfully.
It had faithfully served her rather well for a couple years, but it was showing the wear. Finding another purse that didn't look like a tote was going to be a bit hard, especially one that could hold as much as this bag-like one could. Replacing it before it broke was… probably not likely for her.

She was rather hard on her gear, and that didn't even touch on the possible accidental Disintegration in the middle of a heist.

Getting off on her floor while still eying her purse, the Storm-Cloud let herself into the condo then came to an abrupt halt at what she found inside of it.

Verde had… appropriated the living room for some unholy twisted mass of metal and wires. It spread from the kitchen all the way to the far side of the living room, was liberally draped over Adrik's thighs and practically cocooned the scientist-type furiously working on something with wire bits and a soldering iron.

Shamal curiously poked his head around her thigh and the doorway to see what the holdup was to getting to his lizard and whistled lowly as he took in the same sights.

"Sup, Boss Lady." Her fellow Russian greeted cheerfully. "We were expecting you yesterday."

"...I had gotten slightly waylaid due to fixing some... difficulties." Plucking her godchild up, she cautiously picked her way through the electrified minefield cautiously as to not ruin her recently mended boots again. "Does he know his lab coat is charring under the voltage?"

"I don't think Verde even feels it, honestly."

"Mamma? What language is that?"

"English, kid." Switching languages to his native one, she addressed him instead. "*I'm not sure when Renato will get here, so you're bunking with me until then. We can kip with Tats, or I'll toss the boys out to a hotel room for the night, or I guess we can go break into Renato's place instead until he gets back from wherever... or maybe he's here?"

"Let's do that!"

Sonya frowned thoughtfully, wondering if surprising the hitman in a place that should be 'safe'... ish, was a good idea. She was actually kind of surprise the hitman hadn't popped up on the walk here, honestly. "...if he doesn't show up before bedtime, I guess we can."

Verde, either finished with what he was doing or alerted by the voices, raised his green head and peered at them irritably. "Smoking around children is a bad idea, Sonya."

She gave him the look that deserved. "I am not the one smoking."

While the scientist exclaimed, rather nastily, about his electrical issues as apparently it was not what he wanted Adrik carefully extracted himself from what he was doing to follow her to the bedroom he and the other man had been sharing for the last few months by appearances. "So, what's the plan, then?"

"Russian, Adrik. Shamal doesn't understand English. And... I have no idea. Renato and I will figure something out." Examining the changes that had happened to her room over the time Verde had been in residence, the thief sighed and dropped Shamal to the bedspread... then toed the little cot thing she was pretty sure was the other Russian's bed. "Did you need something?"

"Wondering when we're no longer under house arrest." Adrik admitted wryly, leaning up against the "...probably not for another week or so, when we can actually address the issue and the news can spread." Sonya's worse-case scenario was murdering off the syndicate that was demanding Renato hunt her down, but she was honest enough to admit she didn't expect that to be the end of it. "Has it been that bad?"

"Verde's nicely distracted for the time being, but I'm getting a bit restless."

"You're not that identifiable, I'm pretty sure you can go out and about as long as you keep your mouth shut."

The wiry man gave her a flat look. "Just feeling the love here, oh so much love."

Shamal shot the man an ugly, suspicious look. Slinking back up to the bed instead of hurrying off to see Luigi and ensuring his lizard was doing fine with the trip he took through the postage system. …she didn't want to know.

"I'm also rather broke, just hanging here and doing exactly nothing."

She gave a rather heavy sigh. "No, you're not. You were just as good at picking pockets as I was back when we were kids. What do you really want?"

"I can steal enough to live off of, sure. But for anything else?" With a shrug, Adrik rotated a wrist in the limpest looking wave she had ever seen. "Currently, I can't even afford a ticket off this rock."

More money troubles. The blonde woman rolled her eyes, then huffed again as Verde came into view and then hastily back peddled once he realized she was in the bedroom he was intending to exchange his charred shirt in for a non-burned on.

"Really, man? She won't bite…"

"...I was unaware Sonya was in there." The Lightning defended himself in a tone a bit touchy sounding. "Whereas you may have a positive self-image, I am fully aware I am not what most women find physically attractive."

"You look fine, Verde." Sonya called out shortly, in hopes this wouldn't be a thing. "But as you have occupied the couch rather handily, there is little else to be seated upon if one is tired of traveling."

"...ah."

The scientist still didn't come back to replace his shirt, and since Adrik re-faced her the thief assumed he wasn't reassured much.

...yeah, they were crashing the hitman's apartment until the man was back.

Way too many people in the same small space made everything significantly more awkward. First, though… they needed to wait for Shamal's luggage, so he'd have more than a change of clothes that he had already gone through.

"I'll set you up with an expense account through Björn." Sonya decided after checking on the brat, who had taken the opportunity to stretch out horizontally while she conversed with the other Russian. "You use it for ridiculous shit, I will come after you and cut you off."

"Noted, Boss Lady."
Renato, after three back-to-back hits in aims of collecting the money the brat's next school year would need before that bill came due, took a moment to tiredly appreciate some of the chaos Mafia Land was famed for.

It might be in his way, but that didn't mean he had to go spoil someone's fun.

There was some kind of near-riot going on, without the damages and bullet holes that typically resulted from an invasion event. Whatever had his neighbors riled up, it had spread pretty far down the street levels to the point the raucous atmosphere seemed almost party-like.

Certainly, there was more than enough booze being hawked on the street corner to warrant a party and some kind of betting pool was being built up.

Confused, the hitman scanned the milling loiterers to catch the eye of someone that would hopefully explain what the hell was going on. Only to be interrupted by some naked man being bodily thrown out of a window.

The Sun blinked at the sight, and the crowd's raucous cheers and catcalls as the disorientated streaker stumbled upright the best he could while also shielding his groin from view, then Renato belatedly realized that window was his living room one.

Someone was either being very neighborly indeed… or was about to get shot in the head.

It didn't take him long to force a path, he was rather well known… at least by the women. They seemed under the impression he had a lady love stashed in his apartment who was doing the entertainment, which… he didn't correct.

If it was true, well… an interesting method by which to gain his attention. If not, then a bullet to the brain was still on the table.

"Alright, brat. What's the next one?"

"…can you kick him out the window anyways?"

Pausing as he recognized those voices, and the language, Renato stopped and shamelessly eavesdropped outside his own front door.

What the hell was Sonya doing here with Shamal?

"We do it too many times and it'll get stale. I assure you, there's another defenestration card in there somewhere." Reassured the thief pleasantly, which probably meant she was the one doing the throwing.

"Aww… okay." A shuffle of some heavy paper sounded, and Shamal came back with the answer his godmother was waiting for. "…the… Queen lady, but she's upside down."

"Empress, inverted." Corrected the Russian, then there was a pause. "…wait, that's just 'rejoicing public' and 'the unraveling of involved matters'."

"…can you throw him out of the window anyways?"
"Sure, brat."

Having heard quite enough, Renato cautiously opened the heavy door to fully see what the hell was going on.

Sonya was literally kicking a buck-naked man out of his window.

The pile of clothing and various firearms next to Shamal's spot on his sofa probably meant said men had nefarious or at least objectionable aims for their presence, but that really didn't explain why they were here at all.

"...little dragon lady, what the hell are you doing?"

"One second," she responded absently, giving an exceptionally strong kick which implanted a bruised image of her boot's small heel into the man's naked butt cheek but didn't quite force his protesting form through the frame, "just let me..."

"...oops." Was Shamal's opinion, swiftly hiding his godmother's tarot cards behind his back.

As if the hitman hadn't already known what was going on, or what his role in the proceedings was.

With a rather ominous crack, she forced her latest victim out of the window finally to a loud cheer from the street-level. Two stories down.

"There. Hello, Renato. Did you know you had assassins?"

He stared at her flatly.

Sonya had the utter gall to blink back innocently. "What?"

There were two more idiots shivering in a combination of exposure and fear up against the wall furthest from her, the couch had apparently been made up for someone to crash upon, and an entire pile of the would-be assassins' things to deal with.

There was an almost overpowering urge to laugh like a lunatic or snatch up the brat and make himself home on the couch to watch the last bits play out.

There was also a small part of him that wondered what the hell the Russian was doing in his apartment, but given he knew exactly who was in her condo it wasn't a stretch to figure out why she was loitering in his place with the brat instead of risk a lot less secured hotel room.

"Don't let me stop you." Renato was not nearly tired enough to give miss to the rest of this performance for little things like 'details' and 'exhaustion'. "What's the fate of the next one?"

"...good question. Brat? What's the next card?"

"Um... some old guy." The Mist obediently responded as the hitman sprawled out on the end of the couch not occupied by him. He flipped the old card stock around, so his godmother could see. "With a stick and a lamp."

"A lantern and a walking stick. The Hermit. Treason, corruption, dissimulation, and just plain old-fashioned roggery." Sonya listed off as he made himself comfortable on the pillow he was pretty damn sure had been taken from his bed. She studied her next victim thoughtfully. "Sometimes though, prudence. Generally, it's just more prudent to kill those that try to kill you..."

Sonya frowned at the man glaring up at her and glanced at the brat.
"…Shamal, cover your ears and turn away for a bit." Renato drawled out, pulling his gun from the side holster.

He would not object to being the one to shoot the asshole, and frankly he liked her surprise visit a lot more than he would a set of possibly inept assassins lying in wait for his return. Even as tired and as travel worn as he was.

That didn't mean he wasn't annoyed at the sudden advent of Russian and child, but he still liked them better.

The best of both worlds, he could deal with.

Shamal made himself a sleeping mask and a set of bulky headphones from his Mist Flames, then wrapped his arms around them once they were on. Renato shot the second-to-last Storm-Cloud victim through the head after sternly calling the brat's name to be sure he couldn't be heard, and she dropped a palm full of Storm Flames on the body to get rid of it.

Disintegrating bodies were gruesomely fascinating to watch.

"Right." Once the body was so much greasy ash and a smear on the hardwood floors she knuckled the brat's head lightly to get the young Mist to dispel his Constructions and look up at her. "Next one?"

Shamal picked up the stack of cards from his lap and flicked through them until he found another that wasn't a numbered depiction. "Um… two naked people."

Renato blinked, then plucked the card from his hands to see for himself.

…there were two naked people painted on the card. Not in any great detail, and the images were positioned with the woman's ridiculously long hair obscuring a few important bits of each, but they were naked and it showed.

"The Lovers, attraction, beauty, love, and trials overcome." Sonya pondered the meaning for a moment, then turned back to her last victim. "I think… that means you can leave."

"…aww. Can't you throw him out a window too?"

The last naked man didn't waste any time, or breath, on asking if that was true that he could go. He bolted like the hounds of hell were after him for the front door and the freedom beyond without so much as glancing to the pile of clothing heaped next to the couch.

Huffing a laugh, the hitman turned back to his entirely unexpected roommates. "So… can I ask what this is all about? The 'you're living here' bit, I got the assassin one."

"Do you know how many people are living in a space only designed for two back at my place?" Sonya demanded a bit shortly, a hand on her hip. "It was this or a hotel, and Verde's got some snarled mess of wires occupying my living room I'm not sure can be cleared out in a reasonable amount of time. I figured it would be easier to just get a hotel room, but then again… there was your place. And you didn't exactly tell me where else aside Moscow I could take the brat."

…point to the thief. Renato handed the card back to the kid and hoisted himself up off the couch, bringing the pillow with him and handing her that in turn. "Well… fine then. I insist you take the bed, Sonya."

"I've been just fine on the-"
"Humor me. You're a lady, with a child, and therefore should have the bed. I don't mind you came here but take the damn bed. There wasn't a reason to suffer a night on my couch, and frankly you do it again and I'll replace it with just another bed so you can't."

She gave him a highly unimpressed look for the threat, but instead of argue just motioned for the brat to follow her. "Come on, kid. I should've had you tucked in at least an hour or so ago. Tats wants to hit the beach tomorrow."

Shamal scrambled off the couch, delicately put his godmother's tarot cards on the coffee table, gave a lightning-quick hug to Renato's kneecap, and bolted off in the direction of his bedroom.

He rubbed the back of his neck, the tiredly started stripping for what rest he could get on his couch. He'd risk slipping in with the thief some other time, when she wasn't also sleeping with Shamal.

He was going to invite himself to the beach, though.

Just because they did have some business to figure out, and partially because he wanted to see if she'd wear the same bikini as last time.

---

(Monday the 28th of July, 1969. South Beach, Mafia Land.)

When Renato announced his intention to crash their little 'beach party' before they split up for breakfast and contractual reasons, Sonya had expected the man to show up in full suit and tie per his usual.

The fact the hitman did own a pair of swimming trunks, even if they were a lurid yellow streaked with orange stripes, was… bemusing.

He still wore his fedora, because of course he did.

Sonya was guarding their spot for the towels while Tatiana was off playing in the surf with Shamal, so she had a moment to adjust to the older Italian's swimwear. "Renato, that is singularly blinding."

"Why thank you. I'm rather proud of them." The ridiculous man announced as bright as his attire.

He then appropriated Tatiana's towel to stretch out his lanky but still muscular frame upon, tipping his hat to shade his face and folding both hands behind his head.

Rolling her eyes at the silliness of her friend, she went back to rubbing sunscreen on her skin before she burned lobster red. "…what are you going to do about the contract?"

"The one that asked me to kill you? Little to nothing myself, honestly." Admitted the hitman without so much as a twitch.

"Renato… that is stupid."

"Did you want me to kill you?"

"Well… no, but that still means that backing out of a contract is stupid."

The man tilted his fedora just enough to peer at her from under the brim. "I've done a lot of supposedly stupid stuff, then. It's not the first time I've done so."
She glanced over at him over a shoulder she was working the lotion into. "So, you just expect it to evaporate into the ether?"

"I expect it to piss people off and earn me more assassins." Renato corrected her flatly. "Which… also, brings something else up."

Sonya examined the new amount of lotion on her hand, and then wondered how to get it on her back. "…oh?"

"…Renato Sinclair needs to die."

She froze, then turned to give him a hard look. "Explain. Better. Now."

The Sun actually propped himself up on an elbow, adjusting his hat to give her an equally hard look back. "I've made a lot of mistakes the past couple of years, Sonya. Especially when I was younger. No matter what I do now, it's always going to follow me. Or worse, the brat. Once you get a solid position to care for Shamal, I'll spend some time erasing my past. But that means I won't be visiting for a long while."

"…you are explaining that to Shamal." Sonya decided firmly after a long moment, scowling even if he had an actual reason. She still didn't like it, the idea or the motivation behind it. "And fuck's sake, Renato… why now?"

"Those assassins you dealt with last night aren't exactly unusual for me. It's getting a bit… ridiculous to keep on top of." Continued the hitman absently, not dropping down to the towel again but looking out over the ocean where her sister was entertaining their godchild. "I can either try merely surviving it or start over and eliminate them on the sly while still an unknown to make a new reputation as one not to be fucked with. Preferably, before the brat has to contend with my less than stellar reputation while trying to establish himself as a made man."

"I promised Shamal we will have family time in Italy. I do not care how you do it, you are not making a liar of me."

Renato huffed, but didn't protest.

She glared down at the white sticky mess still coating her hands, trying to think of someway she wouldn't be losing her best friend for a few years.

"Huh… didn't know I was that important to you."

"Of course you are. Outside of my family, you are my closest friend." Sonya snapped back moodily. "I honestly do not like this, Renato. At all."

"You'll be more than occupied fulfilling all of Shamal's hopes for a mother-figure that you'll barely have time to miss me." Predicted the hitman airily, dropping back down to the sandy towel and stretching out again. "It'll only be for a couple years, I'll be back in time to teach the brat how to shave."

She slapped her slimy hand on his abs irritably, out of locations of where to rub it in and lacking the contortion skills to reach the middle of her own back. "So… what? You are going to do nothing about this one contract you've been working on for months and hopes nothing blows up on you until you can make a clean break?"

"Of course not. We'll just have to think of a creative way around it all."
"You might want to give me the details then, or I will be of no help."

He sighed, then rattled off what he knew of the situation and how it tied into her and her 'guests'.

More specifically, how he figured it out from one scene of a crime half a world away because she had both used her Cloud and Storm Flames and there was one surviving security tape that showed only one attacker. What he was hired for, what Don Vongola wanted instead, and what he expected would be amended to fit her instead of some nebulous Cloud objecting to some American syndicate's treatment of another Flame user.

She didn't quite know how he twigged onto her being Russian from 'a stealthy Cloud', nor why she couldn't have had an accomplice with Storm Flames as backup or something.

That was probably why she wasn't a hitwoman, though.

Honestly speaking, she didn't know how Renato might wiggle out of what was asked of him. If she had to, she would work for Don Vongola for a short while just to solve some of this. Preferably Tyr, she liked that Sky better.

How that would interfere with her work back in Russia-

"Renato… I have a question. Several of them."

"…ho?"

She thrust her sunscreen at him first. "Do up my back and answer a few, would you?"

The hitman eyed the bottle with interest, then slanted her a smirk as he plucked it from her hand. "It would be my pleasure."

________________________________________________________________________________________

(Tuesday the 29th of July, 1969. St. Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"No, I don't know what they're planning on that front. I was playing with Shamal on the beach while they hashed out their plan." Tatiana informed the far-off Lightning in Russia. "Now Nya won't tell me more than 'we have an idea'."

"Well… I'm glad they have an idea." Snarked Galina bitchily from an office that actually sort of temporarily belonged to a certain blonde woman. "Any guess on what it might be about?"

"I think it has something to do with what Adrik is doing for her. Renato's been spending an interesting amount of time with him, coaching him on something they're playing mum about."

"Oh, for fuck's sake. Boss Lady, I've a question. Why does your sister like the asshole?"

"Long familiarity, and he can be quite charming when he puts some effort into it." She divulged easily, wrapping the cord of the phone around an index finger while she glanced over the personal intake of the new Russian Flame nurses and the ones scheduled for arrival next week. "They have known each other a damn near decade, and they've been scratching each other's back since the near beginning. Of course she's fond of him."

"…I suppose he's a bit different when you don't just meet him, and he's being an asshole to the vory that want a damn good look if he hurt the near daughter of their fellow." Mused the other woman very, very grudgingly. "Or to those just curious over a visiting hitman from another country. Are you sure he's not just faking it? He's slick enough I'd believe it."

"I highly doubt it. Renato's got a really good reputation with the women here. They adore him. It's weird, because he's slept with a lot of them and never went back for more." With a sigh, she glanced at Avdotya to see if her break was over yet or not. The younger Storm nurse grimaced slightly, which meant it was getting close. "Look, he's not nearly as bad as some of the men I've treated over the last couple of years. And he's a surprisingly loyal bastard, this situation alone is a sign of that. Give him a chance? You'll confused the shit out of Nya if you keep a grudge against him and she can't figure out why."

Galina snorted softly, which echoed a bit tinier through the phone line more than usual. "I'll reserve judgement until I know him better, but only for you."

"I'm touched, Lina. But I've gotta go, my lunch hour is almost over. Anything you want me to pass on?"

"We're good on funds now, so not really. The metals we were able hawk quickly, and the jewels will take longer but will provide an income for us while the school is on-going. Usov would like to know when she's coming back so his little 'project' thing can be started, but that's not all that important."

"Unless you know exactly what 'project' that is, it might be." Humming thoughtfully, she pondered what news she had to pass back. Björn had something… right? "Oh! Nya's Lackey put in that contract for McScruffy's tools, right? It's been picked up, maybe a week or two and we'll have it."

"I'll take some of the raw jewels out of the pile of gems to hawk, then." Mused the Lightning thoughtfully. "Thank you for the update, Boss Lady."

"You really need to stop calling me that." Tatiana half-ordered in amusement. "I won't be offended if you switch to calling Nya 'Boss Lady'."" Avdotya waved hesitantly, attracting the older nurse's attention to the fact their doctor was coming in search of them.

"…shut, Lina. I'll talk to you later. Bye." Hanging up quickly, which would annoy the other woman but couldn't be helped, the Sun nurse gathered up the files she had been absently pouring over while talking over the phone and rose from the duty station. "Sorry, Avdotya. Do you know any of these? Nya's good for the technical detail, but personality can be a hit or miss."

The Storm gave her a pointed look, but obediently turned her attention to the files brought along by the latest group of Flame trainees to learn various aspects of medical practices. "I'm not sure how much help I will be, Nurse Primakova. It's been a long while since I've been back to Moscow."

"English, ladies." Doctor Kappel ordered in exasperation as he stepped into the nurse's station. "Are you done with your phone call, Primakova?"

"Erm… heh, sorry Doctor Kappel. I've also looked over your suggestions of where to put the next group and can't see a problem myself."

The German huffed through his thin bladed nose softly, pressing his half-moon glasses farther up the bridge of his nose. "Take another look, please. When you're not distracted gossiping with old friends."

"That's not entirely correct, sir. Sometimes, Lina and I discuss the next group of nurses." Tatiana protested, then smiled sheepishly. "…sometimes."
He shot a dry look to the Storm nurse. "Really?"

Avdotya coughed once, shaking her head slightly as she buried her nose in the files. "I shouldn't comment, Doctor Kappel."

"I'm sure." Observed the physician dryly. "Nurse Primakova, please do make the rounds this time. If you seem to have the time to fit it into your busy schedule."

…shit. she hated having to listen to other doctors try to 'poach' her, and then getting out of it while also not pissing them off just in case they had something she wanted to learn was hard.

Although… better her than the newest crop of trainees. Avdotya kept pretending she didn't understand enough English when it was her turn, which was more believable than most of the excuses the redhead could come up with for each doctor.

Not quite a punishment, but annoying enough Kappel was probably just spreading the joy he was feeling around.

Today probably hadn't been the best day to test his patience with non-hospital distractions.

Whoops…
Renato waited until Sonya left his apartment to have a morning smoke, then he turned the heat under the bacon down to a low simmer and faced Shamal. "Brat, we need to have a quick man-to… brat, chat."

He blinked up at him suspiciously, then slinked over to haul himself up one of the kitchen chairs.

Even if he was told to keep his lizard off any surface they ate off of already, and Luigi was contently lounging in his hands. "About what?"

"Do you realize the full consequences of what your mamma is doing?" He asked seriously, making his tone hard enough the sometimes attention-flighty Mist actually give the question adequate thought. "I can count the number of people I've ever met that successfully told their syndicates to fuck off on one hand… and still have fingers left over."

To prove it, he raised a hand and folded down his pointer finger with his thumb to leave just three to be counted.

"Your mamma is doing that generally lethal thing just for you, and from the looks of it she's going to get away with pulling it off. Possibly putting herself in an even better position when everything's said and done. Which is so damn rare I've never heard of that happening before." Renato continued sardonically, once he was sure the brat fully appreciated the point he was trying to get across. "You had better be the best son of all time for her in return, got it?"

Had the woman not possessed Storm Flames, he'd be half-suspicious Shamal had influenced her through his own Flames to make her so obsessed over the brat's upbringing and person. As it was, he was at least sure if there was Mist Flames involved the Storm-Cloud had either ignored the influence or just allowed the child his way.

Any way it happened, she was a bit obsessed and didn't seem to mind at all.

Which worked for him, honestly.

Shamal gave some rapid nods that disordered his hair a bit wildly, showing both he knew the stakes arrayed before the thief they were fond of and that he'd obey that injunction as best he could.

The lizard flicked it's tongue out a few times but didn't seem bothered by any squeezing that might be going on.

"That being said, when she takes you in… I've got some business I need to get on top of. I might not be visiting for a long while."

"W-wait, what? But!"

"Shamal." The hitman cut him off before his jumbled little mess of a protest could become coherent. "Kid, I've been taking the best paying but shortest hits I could to keep you safe and provided for while Sonya gathered up things on her end. Those weren't good contracts, some of them were downright nasty, and I've pissed a lot of people off taking those up and surviving the mess. Once she'll be providing for you, I need to solve that little issue that caused me."
"...but why? Can't you visit like mamma did in the beginning? That-"Brat, your mamma had to deal with my assassins."

"And we did good-"

"The fact she so much as had to be on guard when trying to secure you in my space is not something I like!" He stopped himself short and took a deep breath, deliberately lowering his voice so he wasn't almost shouting at the child. "Shamal, I should've been the one dealing with your mamma's assassins since she's making herself a big target in order to take care of you for me. This shouldn't be the other way around, yet it is."

Utterly galling his baggage had put the thief at risk, doubly so when the brat had been with her and she was looking for a safe haven to shield them in for a few nights. Not to say the hitman was happy at what he was going to do, pretending to die would put his recognized best friend at risk for the bottom feeders and scum that would look to 'comfort' or maybe hone in on his spot in the lovely blonde Russian Cloud's regard.

The Sun had claimed his spot long before anyone else realized what a terror Sonya could grow up to be. His sudden disappearance would make others think that she would start looking for a new 'friend', however supposedly special that friend might be. The fact he was trying to get the dammably dense woman to think of him as a more special friend made it even worse, the delay would be grating… and he honestly couldn't start something right before he was going to 'die' only to ask her to wait for however long it would take to shake off his own assassins.

Criminal attention spans were notoriously short when it came to specific individuals, especially when they were supposedly 'dead', but even that wouldn't help him get his past contract history and his reputation buried in any reasonable amount of time. Two or three years, if he kept his nose to the grindstone and didn't majorly fuck up before it would be less risky to associate with old friends again.

Timoteo and Sonya would be the only two that would be allowed to keep the knowledge of who 'Renato Sinclair' had been or would become. Shamal was a bit risky, but he honestly couldn't bring himself to ask the kid to forget him either.

He had built up a few favors with a couple of Mists that would be lending a hand in encouraging people to forget him, but Mist Flames would only help so much when it came to decently strong Flame users. Who were, generally speaking, the greater threats he was trying to dodge.

Realistically, Renato was looking at several years on his own.

Strictly speaking he shouldn't even risk having his 'unknown' identity linked to himself again by visiting her or the brat at all, but… saying no to Sonya's only demand in exchange for guarding his godson during the interim had been a bit more than he was prepared to do.

Establishing of a reputation as a deadly but reliable hitman would help more than his current reputation as a ladies' man, more so if he could somehow avoid letting his personality seep into it again.

He was always up for a bit of female company, but… female assassins were probably likely to be what killed him. They were just a bit too tempting to avoid, really.

Several very long, lonely years associating with none and just getting shit done.

He wasn't looking forward to it.
However, to keep his fuckups from making the thief lethally stumble from a trade she wasn't familiar with he'd pay that price. She wasn't a cold-blooded killer, Sonya still suffered nightmares and guilt after she killed. Renato would happily take that on for her, from his own assassins to the men getting in her way, but first he really did need to cull the baggage that was dogging his heels.

"...no Christmas visits?" Shamal asked after a long moment of pouting hard and trying to figure out something to have his cake and eat some pie too. "Even mamma managed them..."

"I'm making no promises, and I might not be able to do something that predictable... but I'll try to at least do something." Depending on where he could find a place for them to live, if it was decently secluded enough it might be possible to do one Christmas.

To prevent being predictable he wouldn't be doing it more than once until he was nicely established with a better reputation.

Luigi squeaked in pain, making the Mist guiltily loosen his grip so the chameleon could breathe again. Even if the child had accidentally squeezed him, the lizard didn't leave the hands caging him in.

"That does mean you're going to be the man of the household, unless Sonya's brother visits." Renato commented blandly while Shamal mused on the unfairness of life, turning back to finishing the bacon for breakfast. "I'll be counting on you to ensure she's not taken advantage of. The damn thief is a bit dense, after all."

The brat had no intention of getting along with any male that might be sniffing around his mamma. In fact, he had several plans in mind to pull if anyone aside Renato himself was around his godmother.

Which was so Goddamned loud he didn't even have to be slightly close to 'hear' it all with how vicious the kid was thinking about it all.

Pausing in flipping the meat around, he wondered if he should interrupt that line of thought or not.

Sonya didn't deserve to be lonely or alone until he had the time for her, and he wasn't going to ask something like 'wait until I'm free again for an unknown number of years' of any lady much less his best friend. Shamal's plans were a bit of a loophole in that, and most wouldn't be able to read their godchild's mind to realize it.

...it was really tempting…

Renato heaved a sigh and turned back to the kid. "Brat, if she finds someone then... I'll handle it when I get back. Understand? You don't have to like them, and I don't like the idea myself, but she doesn't deserve that."

Shamal aimed a mulish glare in his direction, sliding off the chair and stomping off back to the hitman's room to sulk.

...yeah, he might be a gentleman, but he was still a heartless asshole of a criminal. If the brat wanted to, he could contend with the thief about the situation. He tried.

Sonya took a few more minutes after that little chat to come back inside, and the woman aimed a faintly confused look at him as she shut the apartment door behind her. "Renato, I have a question."

"Another one?" The bacon wasn't ruined after being simmered for a bit, Renato plated it up and dumped the still hot pan into his sink to cool off.
"Where did Shamal sleep when I was here the first time? I had your room, you were on the couch, where was the brat that night?"

"The hallway closet. He insisted." Explained the hitman flatly, well aware that was a bit strange but that had been what the three-and-a-half-year-old had wanted. "Originally, I was going to put him on the couch while I took the armchair for the night. Shamal decided that wasn't far enough out of sight for him to feel safe and had me make up the bottom of the closet for him instead."

"...huh." She looked around at the room empty but for the both of them. "I take it that the talk didn't go well."

He sighed heavily. "You might have to go collect him for breakfast. Odds are that he's not going to want to eat with me today."

"Tough." Sonya commented absently. "We're going to hit the boardwalk today, unfortunately Tats had to go back to work. Are you going to join us?"

"I have things to do, so no."

(Thursday the 31st of July, 1969. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

Not entirely happy that his patron had demanded he pack up his work by this day, Verde irritably stalked in a circle around the living room of the condo.

"Dude, calm down. We're almost done here." Adrik commented lazily from the newly neatened couch. "I think we're leaving today, actually."

"Be that as it may, I was in the middle of something."

"Welcome to the real world. It happens rather more than most people like." Was Tatiana's offer as she was supposedly 'bolting something down' for her hospital shift taking place in another hour, although she was taking her time with the act. Slowly licking off the oatmeal off the spoon she was more playing than eating with, she placed her elbow on the table and her chin on top of that before glancing to her fellow Russian and pointing her utensil in his direction. "Is he always this high-strung when interrupted?"

"Damned if I know, first time I've ever seen him actually stop something for any amount of time."

The wiry Russian was about to add something onto that comment, but the condo's door cracked open before he could and Verde lost interest in what he might say.

The first one through the door was not who the scientist expected. A young child, with brunette hair and brown eyes, bolted through the entranceway and nearly flung himself on the nurse. "Zia Tats!"

Promptly abandoning her meal, the woman gleefully glomped the child in return before pulling away a bit with a tiny frown. "Shamal! Bambino? Cosa c'è di sbagliato?"

Unable to understand the babble of words that followed from either individual, he swung back to the door and the two following the child's path.

Sonya and the same man that had monopolized Adrik's attention for the last few days were exchanging a look before the thief stepped fully into the suite. "Verde, ensure you have everything either packed for shipping or in your luggage. I highly doubt you will be returning here for a long time. Adrik, a word."

A book was then shoved into his stomach before he could express any of his current irritation, which the scientist reflexively grabbed as the woman passed him without so much as an apology for the abuse. Derailed from his intents to ask why and for what purpose whatever was going on could not be delayed another day or two, Verde investigated the handwritten volume curiously.

French, thankfully. He honestly did not mind English, but the familiarity of his native language was nice.

What he was reading then finally percolated past his appreciation over the language choice, and he only looked up after someone jostled his arm a few times.

"Verde, come on. You can read on the flight." Fanning a collection of tickets and a few sheaves of paper at him, Adrik pulled him rather insistently by the elbow. "We're getting you home, finally."

"I feel it must be said, also illegally."

"Actually, no." Releasing his elbow, one of the various faintly familiar items in the other man's hand was taken and waved under his nose. "This is your passport, from your things back in the States. Because you were technically 'extracted by independent contractors for personal safety reasons', substantiated because we were kidnapped and required medical attention afterwards, the French Embassy recollected your things once we were cleared of suspicion for the explosion in the chem lab. Getting it sent here took some doing, and I'm now formally barred a few years for illegally entering the country, but you're clear and free now."

Verde cocked an eyebrow, taking that slim booklet and checking it was the passport he had received in France before leaving his home country.

There was even his student visa paperwork stuck into the pages with a letter from the Dean of San Francisco State College. "Unexpected."

"You should think of something nice to do for Galina. She's the one that called the American French Embassy and asked if they knew what happened to you… since you were a friend of one of her own and I had been recently admitted to a hospital with a man she was certain was said Frenchman. Also, the cover story for this place is 'an ocean-going cruise ship', not 'island full of criminals in the middle of nowhere'."

…Adrik's former gang member?

The other Lightning, who had supplied the Lightning section of the information Sonya had just slapped the complete translation to his chest not a few minutes ago.

This was… rather thoughtful.

"The rest of your things are waiting in France, at the American Embassy. I think they want to apologize for the 'trouble' you went through. Especially since it could end up a political nightmare for them. If you want to do that."

"That would also bring my original name into the light, and might inform those we do not wish to find me where I am." The scientist observed dryly as he followed the other man into the elevator bank absently, thumbing through the papers curiously.

"Yep. So… you can try putting yourself in the limelight but run a big risk of retribution if it ever fades enough to allow criminal activity to seek you out. Or you can keep with us, which… in my unbiased opinion is probably the better option." Punching the buttons for the ground floor, Adrik gave him a wry smirk. "That's Galina for you, though. Nice, but with several barbed hooks just waiting for you to take the wrong piece of bait."

"Why has she done so?" It was… suspiciously helpful.

Verde might not be fully acquainted with the mindset of most criminals, nor what they deemed appropriate to do in various situations, but that didn't mean he was an unintelligent man.

"Well… you did save my life." The wiry Russian reminded him helpfully. "And now you're another of us that got 'collected' by a specific Storm-Cloud. Welcome to the group?"

He glanced at his friend, down to the legal paperwork that would allow him some leeway in his homeland regardless of what he decided to do, and tucked it into the pocket of his lab coat. "Indeed."

He liked to assume those of his 'type' were practical creatures. Björn was certainly practical, in keeping close to a more powerful individual that could provide protection in return for some logistical aid which would provide him with a better standard of living no matter what happened in the future.

Given how shortly and concise the Lightning section had been even translated by another shortworded woman, Galina seemed to be the same way from what little he knew of her.

What to do for a practical woman that was testing his loyalty and commitment to those that were doing right by him?

He returned his attention to the stripped basics that the Russians knew on the phenomena of Dying Will Flames, translated for him and likely would be one of the only concise volume on the subject in existence he could get his hands on. None of the bookstores in Mafia Land held a similar volume, and from how closely Sonya had guarded the information it was likely the knowledge wasn't written down elsewhere either.

"Also, again, the Boss Lady would prefer you burn that to ash rather than let it fall into the 'wrong' hands. She won't mind replacing it, just do not lose it."

"…noted."

(Friday the 1st of August, 1969. Fiumicino Airport, Rome, Italian Republic.)

"What else does the brat need for the school year?"

"Uniforms and clothing, mainly. He's growing again." Renato mentioned lazily, staring a hole in the side of Shamal's head as the young Mist was still pointedly ignoring him.

For the last day and a half, the brat had kept her between the two of them. No matter of what was going on, she was stuck between a Mist ignoring a Sun who was rather intent on not being ignored.

A bit squished defined her entirely at the moment.

Sonya glanced between the two of them, wondering what the hell to do about this. She wasn't entirely certain there was anything she could do, which didn't sit right with her.
The brat could not be that surprised the hitman had majorly important business to handle he was putting off, because the entire reason she couldn’t just snatch him up and suddenly start living in Italy for him was because she had majorly important business to finish off first.

Alright, so maybe it had to be disappointing for him that the elder Italian was going to be missing for a while once she could take him in… but she had been missing for a long while in his childhood already too.

The double-standard, that she was given the allowance to be delayed but Renato wasn't, made her a bit frustrated. It also made her wonder if this was part of the reason why her brother could become exasperated with her sometimes, about things she really didn't care much about.

"…I bought him shoes already, both in his size now and for when he outgrows them."

"Which just leaves the rest of it, since I can already see his ankles and the sleeves of the shirt he's wearing ends at his forearms rather than his wrists." He countered dryly, heaving an exaggerated sigh to try provoking the brat into complaining.

Shamal didn't rise to the bait. He kept hold of her hand, but also kept on mulishly marching towards the exit of the airport without so much as glancing at his godfather.

Renato glanced at her instead, and Sonya blinked back blankly. She didn't know what to do either, honestly.

Why did the brat then not want to make the best of the time he had left with them?

Honestly speaking she was a little surprised the Mist hadn't taken advantage of the disappointment, however he felt about it, to wring some kind of concession from the hitman in return.

Although… again honestly… that was more something Sonya would've done if she hadn't been scared of her foster parents and highly wary over why she had been sent to live with them.

"…I need a drink. Try talking to him, Sonya." Renato turned on his heel suddenly, leaving them both in the middle of the hallway alone.

…did he want her to mention something like that to the kid, then?

Or… was it a request to think of something else?

She sighed heavily, confused and already with a headache. "Brat, seriously. Please talk to me? I don't know what to do."

She got a mumble that was roughly understandable as 'it's not fair'.

"…I know it's not." Sonya crouched next to the kid, faintly thankful that she had picked to wear pants instead of the miniskirt Tatiana had been trying get her into earlier that morning. "But, since he's going to be leaving, does avoiding him really do anything?"

Shamal gave her a frustrated glare, but that dropped shortly afterwards so he could intently inspect his new shoes as he scuffed them against the tiled floor slowly.

"Renato's not happy about it either, Shamal. All you're doing is making you both feel bad about this." The thief reached for his hair in a now familiar habit, which she really had to break or something because this was strangely addictive for how simple it was. A few tugs had him looking back up at her with a pout. "Why not twist the time he's going to be missing out of him now? It's "really what I would've done in your place…"

He gave her a skeptical look. "…really?"

"…if I had a situation like yours, which I didn't." She allowed thoughtfully. "That being said, I also might've tried to hurry up things so I could get what I wanted even if it wouldn't last."

Shamal gave her a flat look. "You're not very good at this, mamma."

"Well… yes. And? Think of something better, then." She countered a bit irritably, nettled over that poke at her creativity. "I'm not really a social person, had others left me alone I would've been perfectly happy with that."

Her answer was an entirely disbelieving huff.

The brat crossed his arms over his chest, which gave her a good view of the same 'too short sleeves exposing his wrists' issue Renato mentioned, and screwed up his face as if he was thinking. "I should… demand he get me a baby brother."

"…are you still on about that? Even after Valera?"

"Valera is your baby brother, mamma. Which means he's my baby uncle." He pointed out needlessly. "I want a baby brother, not just a baby you're related to."

…point. "I'll mention it to him. Anything else?"

"Can we do Christmas with your family, mamma?"

"Possible, but we do Christmas after the new year up there." She pointed out absently.

The Mist raised an eyebrow. "So, we can do Christmas twice?"

"…huh, yeah. I guess."

"Mister Renato has to be there, too." Hastily tacked on the brat, almost visibly straining to think up of something else. "And we have to go visit that church Father Luka told us about. Before you leave."

"I... guess I can do that?"

He narrowed his eyes thoughtfully until he seemed satisfied with her honesty, and she belatedly realized they might've been just played for fools.

"Deal then. Bathroom break, be right back mamma."

Now completely chipper, he skipped off to where there were signs for the men's room past a blind corner.

Sonya slowly rose to her full height, furiously thinking back to what her foster mother might've taught him when they had been left alone together for an entire day with bits and pieces of others. "…fuck."

"What now?" Renato asked sardonically, sipping from a paper cup of coffee as he strolled back to her side.

"We both were just played. The brat's not really all that upset." She deadpanned irritably, glaring in the direction said Mist had bolted off in. "I had to promise a few things would be done, but now he's as happy as a clam."

He stared at her flatly for a long moment, then snorted harshly. "I knew it was a bad idea to leave him with your mother."

"Hey! I tried to tell you that." She snapped back, glaring at him.

Drawing himself up and sticking his nose in the air, the infuriating man waved the hand not occupied with his coffee to dismiss that. "I don't recall that. Lies, all of it."

She crossed her arms under her chest and stared at him flatly. "Are you seriously trying that?"

"I have no idea what you mean." Renato insisted, sipping his coffee again in order to not be able to respond for a second. "So, what did you have to promise the brat?"

"A field trip after we finish with Nono, you're attending Christmas with me and him back in Moscow, and you're now responsible for getting him a baby brother. Tag, you're it." Sharply, but still carefully, shoving at his shoulder, she turned on her heel to stalk away for once. "I'm going for a cigarette, catch up with the brat once you've got the luggage."

(ooo000ooo)

Shamal squeaked in surprise when he was bodily lifted off his feet and came face-to-face with his godfather's highly unamused expression, not two steps after he left the restroom. "Shamal, explain. Now."

"...um, which part?" He knew this would likely come back to bite him, but... it had almost been perfectly set up. He couldn't help himself. "I got mamma to agree you had to help her with the baby?"

He really wondered if the older man waxed those curls into his sideburns or if that was natural. It seemed natural, they were always there. Even in the mornings before he took a shower. But they were kind of weird, and if he thought they were-

A muscle flexed in the older man's jaw, but black eyes merely narrowed suspiciously at him. "What baby?"

"My baby brother?" Because... Valera didn't count.

"...did she really agree with that?"

"She said she'd mention it to you."

"Huh... not quite. She assumed you meant I'm responsible for finding you a baby brother rather than we both are." Renato blinked and leaned away slightly... or moved his arm which took Shamal away from his godfather's face slightly. "Nice try... but you're forgiven. Do it again and I'll tan your hide."

Being suddenly dropped to his feet made him stumble, the Mist nearly face planted if his godfather's knee wasn't just placed exactly into the spot where he almost fell into. Wildly straightening up hastily, so as not to annoy the man further than he already had, Shamal nearly overbalanced the other way before a sharp tug on his shirt got him standing upright steadily.

Immediately jogging after the man that turned to stalk away, the Mist tugged only once and carefully on his cuff. "Why? Nonna said not to do so maliciously against you two, and I didn't."

"You tweaked Sonya's purple side viciously with that little stunt." He corrected sharply. "She shouldn't be that fretful over something you're not really upset about. That was more than rude to pull on your mamma."

Shamal slowed down a bit, eying the man's back suspiciously. "Just her?"

"I'm wise to your tricks now, brat." Renato tossed over his shoulder. "Keep up."

"...you're leaving us for a bit. I'll have better tricks when you finally come back."

"I said keep up." He snapped, turning back to leading the way to wherever they were going. "Not entirely over it, I see."

Scoffing, the child skipped a few steps to return to the man's side. "Am I supposed to be? You're leaving... us... for... things."

"Not willingly. I assure you." Drawled out the hitman sourly. "Shamal, if I could put it off without risking either of you I would. But I can't. It's already started to interfere with Sonya's care of you, and it will only get worse from here on out."

"We did fine dealing with-"

"You're six." He interrupted him pointedly, over what would've not been a stupidly public admission of having interacted with killers. "You shouldn't be dealing with anything but deciding what you want to be when you grow up, growing up, and doing well in school. In that order. She shouldn't be concerned with what might be dogging my steps but raising you and focusing on her own work."

Shamal would admit he sulked a bit, because... really, he didn't want the older man to leave them. His godmother wasn't even established in Italy yet and the man was already planning on leaving them to it.

"I will be back, brat. I'll hear about it if you don't behave for her. Or pull shit like this again."

"...fine." He already got what he wanted, which was more time with his godparents. Well... mostly. "You're not mad I lied?"

"You're a... well, you'll lie as a matter of fact. I've lied to several people, and even your mamma has told a fib or two in her life." The older man sighed a bit, adjusting his hat as they came up to the rotating baggage claim thing. "As long as it's worth it, you can avoid being caught by it, and you think you can live with the consequences... lie as much as you want. Your mamma and I will probably find out the truth in short order, so it had better be worth it if you're going to lie to us."

That was... rather intimidating to think about.

"Of course, now we're going to be a bit more hesitant before actually believing that you're upset from here on out." Renato informed him pointedly, which hadn't been a consequence the Mist had thought of. "But thanks for the warning."

(Saturday the 2nd of August, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)
"Don Vongola? A Mafioso Sinclair and-ah!"

A particularly chipper looking hitman just so happened to hip-check the poor servant doing door-duty today, making the boy stumble and cutting his words short. "Timoteo! I've a little something for you..."

Timoteo of Vongola, Ninth Sky of the Vongola Famiglia, pinned the utterly unapologetic man with a look over the paperwork his last appointment left him with. "Renato, really now. They don't deserve such treatment."

A dust encrusted bottle of brandy was set on the corner of the Sky's office desk, which the older man appreciated for a moment before glancing back to the freelance Sun.

"Not that I'm objecting, but what is the occasion?"

"Consider it a consolation prize." Renato informed him flatly, then jerked a thumb over his shoulder. "May I present to you the head of the Moscow School number Three-Zero-Five-Four, otherwise known as the Mafiya Flame Academy. She has a... complaint, which has to do with that little thing you wanted me to look into for you."

"I don't think I've ever really appreciated how much of an asshole you can be before this." Sonya Nikishina, or Bazanova or whatever it was she was going by now, remarked absently from the doorway. She had paused to ensure the boy manning the Sky's office door wasn't greatly inconvenienced by her friend's actions and to help right him, mostly to get him out of her own way. "I mean the deliberately being an asshole part, not the thoughtless type you also occasionally do."

Ganauche understood first, and he gave a bit of a wheeze even if he clapped hands over his mouth to try and not make any noise. Coyote Nougat spoke up before Timoteo had the time to process exactly what that meant when taken together with the favor he had loaned the other man out for. "That is a fairly tasteless jest, Sinclair."

"I know." Spoke the Russian thief before the Italian hitman could, taking the strides to join them in the office when the servant indicated he was finally steady on his feet. "But as I can't get out of it due to... politics, I'm afraid I do have to complain about the mistreatment of one of my Mafia Home Tutors while he was in the middle of instructing some poor baby Flame user that popped with Lightning Flames right next to him."

Timoteo placed a finger on his temple to try and ward off the sudden headache that had sprung up. "Excuse me a second, do you mean to say that Miss Sonya here is the head of a school for Flame users that the Cerrito Crime Family have... inconvenienced?"

"Technically, the school's not exactly open yet. Next month." Waved away the Storm-Cloud absently, before she refocused on the Sky rather sternly. "That being said... I only have so many Home Tutors right now, Nono. I did not appreciate one of them being kidnapped right in the middle of informing my assistant of needing to instruct some French native Lightning about the parts we're required to pass on by Vindice Laws and getting some Lightning orientated tips. I realize he was a bit far afield, but... most of our other students are contained right now or under different Tutors and he was off on personal business."

"...ah." He managed after a moment.

This was... not good.

Admittedly, she could've been even more pissed off that they might've had a hand in the mistreatment of one of her own. Which would've made the entire situation worse to have the Cloud friend of an allied hitman pissed off and needing special handling.

"To make things a bit more awkward," she continued thoughtfully after a moment, "said Home Tutor almost died due to some... rough handling. Eventually popped his appendix, not maliciously intended so I'll let that part slide. Said baby Lightning nursed him the best he could, and likely saved his life, while they were otherwise detained. I owe the ass now for that, but that does mean I'm prepared to be... unpleasant, about this."

"Define 'unpleasant', Miss Nikishina. Please." Best to see what she knew she could do and what she was prepared to do, Timoteo would handle it if it was not particularly unpleasant.

Depending, anyways.

"I'm fully aware the Cerrito Crime Family has little to no Flame users themselves, I was the one that went to... retrieve my wayward Home Tutor." Sonya deadpanned, shifting her weight to one hip and placing a hand on it in order to free the other to wave. "As my clan, the Žolotovs, have a fair number and kidnapping and attempted murder is always a reason to fuck someone else's shit up... it comes down to it and they do not back off, I will press a complaint the best I can to the Vindice. Even if they do give me the creeps."

The Sky grabbed his 'consolation prize' and cracked the wax in a sharp movement to take a healthy swallow. Not entirely the best situation, and Sinclair did do him a favor in bringing it all up to his attention before she figured out the 'special' benefits being a head of a Mafia Academy allowed her to use, but not entirely a good one either.

Handing the bottle off to his Storm Guardian, who was sourly eyeing the hitman that hadn't warned the Ninth head of Vongola about this before they were ambushed with it, Timoteo leaned back in his office chair and studied the Storm-Cloud standing across from him. "...would you take a seat, Miss Sonya? I think this is going to become a long conversation."

She glanced distractedly to the match to the seat the hitman had taken after directing attention to her, then back to him. "Thank you, but I'll stand for a little while. I've been traveling a bit too long to be comfortable sitting right now."

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 2nd of August, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Timoteo of Vongola basically bought himself time to figure out how to get around Sonya's little, possibly evil, plan to derail anyone attempting to 'acquire' Verde out from under her.

As the Sky probably did have to contact the relevant parties, sound them out about how much they were willing to risk, and then figure out what the Vongola Alliance's stance on it should be, she let it happen without sticking her heel into things.

Also, fairly powerful individual with ties to her best friend. It wasn't like she was going to be able to be malicious about the situation, being gracious would also prevent the tiny little cracks in her story from being stressed too much and breaking wide open, so allowing the Sky his way was pretty much always going to happen.

Claiming Adrik as a Home Tutor was a bit out there, she only belatedly thought that Ziven might count as one on a beach and it had been an absent wonder for what qualified as such that tripped her onto this method of wiggling out of trouble.
Both men didn't have Flames, but also there weren't very many fully-grown Flame users she might actually dictate to leave Zolotov territory to teach another. Technically then, she had two 'Flame-less' Tutors and then herself.

Two and a half hours of basically being talked into circles, and she wasn't exactly feeling chipper. Sonya led the way out of the office, nursing a headache and downright itching for a smoke break.

Renato slung an arm around her hips, which was new and unusual enough she let him do it while she tried to figure out if this was a 'hug' thing or a 'guide' one. *"Thank you for being nice, Sonya. Although I am aware both Tatiana and Galina might've wanted you to be... less so."

"You realize Galina will probably make me pay for this later, yes? Especially if I can't inform her those that assaulted her ex-gang member will definitely not be doing it again." Maybe...?

No, the hitman wasn't doing much more than slowing her down. Not a guide-thing then, a hug. She could do hugs.

"But... you're welcome?"

The Italian getting up close and personal with her looked highly amused. *"I'll make it up to you."

"How? Bitchy Lightnings are a pain in my ass."

Then again, if Tatiana learned she hadn't pressed home an advantage over the people that harmed her former underling... Sonya was in for a lecture or three. Possibly even passive-aggressive bitching from her sister, who might then inform their mother.

"Fuck... Tats is going to kill me."

"Your sister isn't' going to kill you." He countered her pleasantly with mildly annoying assurance, finally tugging her to a stop in the middle of the hallway.

Okay... if blocking doors was a 'bad' thing here, exactly why was blocking hallway traffic an ignorable one?

They were both in the category of 'obstruction', right?

The hitman looked torn for a second, probably between either continuing the 'second' layer of their little story or actually addressing her thoughts, but he pressed his mouth into a thin line and glanced back the way they had just come. *"Did you need something, Ganauche?"

"A-ha... sort of?" The one-eyed Lightning Guardian skittered out from a turn in the hallway, sheepishly ruffling his hair when they both stared at him in various levels of curiosity. *"Erm... I'm to ask if you two have any plans in the next week or so."

Sonya glanced upwards, frowning slightly because all she really could see this close to her friend was his jawline. Normally being shorter than some didn't really bother her, but then shit like this happened... Cherep took some amusement from doing the same damn crap to her too.

"*Well..." Renato drawled out slowly, taking his time just to tweak the other Italian's nose a bit from what she could tell. "...tomorrow is Sunday. There's a church in-country the brat wanted to visit, we were thinking of making a day of it.*" weren't they leaving for that in... like, minutes?

Shamal should've checked his luggage, unpacked a bit to find clean clothing to make an overnight bag, ensured his lizard was situated, and then gone to a waiting room on the ground floor to wait for them. "If you're going to talk more, let me go so I can fetch Shamal."

Preferably to allow herself a quick smoke break too. Sonya hated politics, the very thing Nono had used to buy himself time with.

"However, I'll probably be leaving in a bit to go take care of that little favor I owe that baby Lightning." She belatedly tacked on as she recalled she was part of 'you two'. "Then I have various things to do I've been putting off for too long as it is. Including a Mafia Land contract and some personal business. Why?"

"Just so Timoteo knows what kind of timeline he has to work with." Ganauche reassured her hastily, holding both hands up in a gesture halfway between an 'I'm unarmed' and 'please don't hurt me' one. He even waved them a tiny bit for the added emphasis. "So, say... Monday we'll get this straightened out?"

"Sounds good to me, Sonya?"

"I don't really care." She affirmed with a shrug. "So long as I don't have to deal with the Vindice again."

"...heh, yeah. We'll, um... try to avoid that." The Lightning attempted to reassure them, badly. The grimace that painted itself across his face was not confidence inspiring. "I'll just... go then. Bye."

He ducked out of sight down the hallway he took to come up just behind them without actually following their path. The hitman and thief exchanged a look as they listened but didn't hear the footsteps generally required to move down polished marble stone floors in hard soled leather loafers.

"...I'm going to go back and have a quick word with Timoteo." He informed her needlessly, finally letting her hip go and taking a step back the way they came. "Should I find you in the foyer or...?"

"Outside." She corrected flatly. "Hurry up, the sun's nearly setting and we still have to feed the brat."

"Heh. Sure."

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 2nd of August, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"...head of a Mafia Academy?"

"In my defense, I didn't know that until I finally made it into Moscow." Renato offered pleasantly, shutting Timoteo's office door behind him firmly. "Sonya has a steel trap of a mouth when she wants to, frankly it took me about seven years to even learn she had a syndicate."

The Sky ran a hand down his face, then threaded fingers through his bristly mustache a few times thoughtfully. "Still... that was a fairly major oversight, Renato."

"I didn't make that oversight, I was just content to let her tell me on her own terms." He corrected a bit more gently than he was usually with others.

The man was a Sky, and the head of a powerful Famiglia. No real reason to piss him off, even if it was a bit annoying his best friend had been dismissed from being important a touch too soon.
"Worse yet, by our standards she's fifth in line to inherit her syndicate. Take Tyr's position, smash it together with what your mother has oversight on, and you have a Russian's 'Sovintnik'. Her clan's Sovintnik is her grandfather through her mother... and I think he was aiming to have her take over for him until certain Flame things upset that."

"Our' standards?" Repeated the Storm Guardian cautiously, who was doing a fair bit more nursing of the brandy bottle than his Sky was.

"By Russian vory ones, she's not likely to inherit unless things get bloody."

Ganauche laughed, a bit hysterically. "Our bloody, or is there a Russian version of 'bloody'?"

In response, he dug into a pocket to pull out a clipping of a Russian newspaper. "Well... see for yourself."

The tiny scrap of paper was passed first to the Storm, got a fairly incomprehensible look by the Lightning, was merely glanced over by Nono, and was finally placed in the hands of Croquant Bouche as he pulled away from the Construction that made him seem like part of the bookcase behind his Sky.

The dark-skinned Mist examined the paper intently, then passed out translated copies to his fellow Guardians and Boss.

Renato bounced a little on the balls of his feet while he waited for them to read through the little news story.

Ganauche was finished first per usual, looking up at him curiously as he waved his scrap of paper in the air. "How the hell did they keep it lit for three days?"

"Either chemicals or Storm Flames." Coyote suggested before the hitman could, giving his fellow Guardian a disgusted look. "Use your brain, it's there for a reason."

"Renato, a bit more detail please?" Timoteo interrupted before either Guardian could continue bickering, placing his Mist Flame copy flat on his desk. "Do you know who did this and why? It would help to put it into perspective."

"...well, the thing about that is..." He sheepishly scratched the back of his neck, because it could've be so much worse than it had been if the thief had been less self-controlled than she was. "...I was teaching Shamal the basics of firearms that night. I gave him an unloaded pistol to investigate, but the brat's a Mist."

"Constructed bullets?" The deep voice of the dark-skinned Mist echoed a bit in the office, with an audibly amused edge to the words.

"Freaked Sonya right out to the point she went berserk." Renato confirmed dryly. "She was very disappointed they weren't, to use her own words, 'better'."

Croquant pulled a faintly disgusted face, which was... interesting. The Lightning nicked the brandy bottle from where the Storm had placed it, and the Sky of the office looked like he'd rather much prefer something stronger right now as his Storm glared at the theft.

"Also found out and met up with her two little Mist minions that same night," he continued after a long moment to let them process that, "who basically just sat on the entire situation until she was done murdering the fuck out of anything that moved wrong. She's got this Lightning assistant who basically manages her paperwork so she doesn't have to languish behind a desk all day, some wreck..."
of a Sun processing a lot of the Flame information her clan is pulling in, and recently picked up some young Rain kid to help her out a bit more. Baby brother's a Cloud, not to mention her own… twinned Flame situation, meaning she's just missing a Storm or I'd swear to God she's got some minor Sky Flames herself."

"Clouds do have a minor pull of their own." Timoteo reminded him a bit weakly. "The more powerful, the more they can catch under their wings."

"…no, wait. Her Lackey's part Storm." Renato corrected himself absently. "And she still insists she's not a Sky."

"…is there a reason you're bringing this up, Renato?" Tried the actual Sky next, now sounding exasperated and a bit tired of the entire topic.

"She's moving here. I've promised to help her look into properties near or around Mafia School for the rest of Shamal's childhood. She's also been intending to ask you for French syndicates that might like a Lightning, but… she seems to keep on forgetting to do so."

Timoteo drummed his fingers on the top of his desk thoughtfully, ignoring it when the translated copy of a Russian news article went up in indigo Flames next to his hand. "When is she moving?"

"By next school year. She seems aware not everything will probably be done by then, but she intends to be in Italy full time at least by next summer. Even going so far as to formally divorce her syndicate… while keeping enough good-will to allow her to return to the area to visit family."

"How the hell is she managing that?"

Renato glanced at the flabbergasted Lightning with wicked amusement. "Partly the end result of a botched assassination attempt against her 'Pahkan' she stepped in to help with, being the 'adopted' daughter of a fairly high-ranking vor, being the granddaughter of another high ranking Zolotov, and general incompetence of another Flame user who apparently violently hates to the point she could probably kill him and get away with it scot free but is important to said boss… and a healthy dose of blackmail."

He waited another moment.

"Oh... and her mother. Who is... a very brilliant piece of work in and of herself and teaches thieves how to steal and get away with it for a living. She gave Shamal 'tips' that are... rather insidious, for your information." Renato made another few bounces and continued when no one spoke. "I think Sonya plans on shoving her mother into the 'head of a Mafia Academy' slot she really doesn't want."

The Sky gave him a flat look. "Advice would be appreciated, rather than a ridiculous amount of detail on your lady friend's many accomplishments."

"...I don't know, Timoteo. I'm still impressed she doesn't use her father or her grandfather to boost her reputation at all, and most of those on Mafia Land are still afraid of her." When the older man merely looked fairly annoyed, he shrugged. "I've only pissed her off once, and I bought her shiny weapons to get her to be less pissed off with me. Even still, it took me half a year to get her to stop being uncomfortable around me again. Her whole problem with you was that her brother got injured on your territory, and she wasn't even informed the problem was being taken care of until Tyr said something when she asked."

Timoteo glanced at his Lightning Guardian, who had winced and adjusted his eyepatch a bit self-consciously. "That still is not particularly helpful, Renato."
"I have no honest idea what you could to, Timoteo." The hitman informed the man bluntly. "None of Sonya's little minions have fucked up enough where they had to recover from the same indifference she has for you, to her it's mainly behaving because I like you and she doesn't want to impair my relationship with you. I'm not sure if that's an allowance you can make use of, or if she's just 'humoring' me and will react badly if she thinks you're taking advantage of it."

"...she likes Tyr, doesn't she?" Ganauche asked quietly as his Sky pondered that. "So okay... Timoteo Isn't going to be able to get more than tolerance out of her, but he's not the only way we can earn some consideration from the Russian Flame Academy's temporary head and the next one's daughter. And while the Sky might be out, we can still talk to her somewhat. Right?"

Renato gave the man a flat look. "She thinks you're defective."

Coyote laughed at the entirely wrong moment, spluttering a fair amount of brandy onto the floor. Even Croquant Bouche snickered at the expression that crossed the Lightning Guardian's face at that bit of news.

The youngest man in the room gave them all a disgusted pout and huffed.

"...I need to go catch up with her before she becomes suspicious."

"Very well. I take it that...?"

"I'm not killing my best friend, Timoteo. Not for some little backwater mob boss with illusions of grandeur who's put out over losing a fresh-faced Lightning they stole in the first place. He won't ever be able to touch on how useful Sonya is or can be to me, which really doesn't make it worth it to earn the utter hate of an entire Soviet Mafia syndicate that specializes in breaking into highly secured places and stealing shit. Some of whom probably would have no problems adding in an assassination or two to their names."

The Sky puzzled over that for a second. "No... that isn't entirely balanced, so I don't blame you. I'll see what I can do about it from my end then, thank you for your efforts Renato."

Touching the brim of his fedora in salute, the hitman strolled right back out the Don's office to find his wayward godson and fellow godparent.

Now all they could do was wait and see if Sonya's political heft and possible future usefulness would outweigh the bitching of an offshoot syndicate that was inconvenienced. He rather thought so, the whole Flame Academy thing alone made picking a fight with her a risky situation on the outset, much less what her foster parents could probably muster up if anything happened to their youngest daughter.

However, it really was up to Timoteo.

The thief's claim of Adrik as a Mafia Home Tutor was rather brilliant, really. Maybe she hadn't expressly intended to use the man as such, and it really was 'he said she said' kind of thing at this point since the groundwork for claiming that position hadn't been done yet on the Russians' side, but fucking around with Home Tutors was a great way to involve the Vindice in any scuffles.

Hopefully, the fear of the Vindice would prevent anyone from calling her bluff.

Renato cracked his neck as he wandered down the hallway leading to the main staircase, rubbing the abused joint absently as he wondered.

If this was what the woman was prepared to do just for a former associate of her sister's and a friend of one of her underlings, what kind of hell would she raise if anyone thought to upset Shamal?

(ooo0000oo)

(Saturday the 2nd of August, 1969 continued. Rain Bar, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Why should we?"

Larion, who was fast becoming known just as 'Larion the Rain' much to his irritation, paused speaking and lifted his head from the paperwork he was reading off from to give the older boy who spoke rather out of turn a mildly curious look. "I would assume because that is the reason we are assembled here. To explore the limits and capabilities of our Flames, and occasionally collaborate with other users about how our Flames interact with theirs. Correct me if I am wrong, please."

That literally was why they were all crammed into the dusty wine cellar of a bar right now, so he could inform the others what was going on in the research efforts if they'd like to contribute and trade tips or tricks. It was depressingly rare when a Rain volunteered for something, but it was a responsibility to give such announcements.

Which was also something the former Rain lead regularly failed to do more than once or twice a month.

It probably wasn't Galina's request to send a few Rains to the next Lightning section meetup, nor the request to start pondering what Tranquility would do when paired with a Storm's Disintegration or a Mist's Construction aside the inevitable corrosion, but the general assumption of where these remarks and comments came from that was the current issue.

With his fellow Rains, 'from the head office' generally translated to mean 'from that bitch Bazanova'. Which...

Larion was very much a Rain, a Classical one even. He liked getting along with his fellows, true.

He didn't like getting along with stupid people, though. That left a rather bad taste in his mouth, however smoothly said stupid group got along. Might be easy to do, but not particularly a proud thing to help along.

The kid that spoke, probably one of Yanovna's friends who was likely not happy about how she got dismissed, had stumbled over Larion's question before bullying on ahead with his little attempt at a mini-revolt. "I meant, why should we listen to a sell-out when we all know the office jockeys don't like us?"

"...because that's exactly why the office 'jockeys' don't like us." The younger Rain pointedly reminded him in a flat tone, ignoring the blatant and avid listening in of everyone else in their section. "We're the 'troublemakers' to the rest of the Zolotov clan's Flame users. So ill-behaved and stupid it isn't actually worth it to deal with. I'm not sure about you but being thought of like that is a bit galling... especially for a bunch of Rains that were not only so far into the wrong they were also dismissed, even if we really should have someone older doing this, but who left us and never looked back."

"No, we're not." Of course, then the older boy paused as he tried to fruitlessly recall anything he could use in a counter argument.

"Yes, yes we are." Larion patiently continued aggressively. "We are so badly behaved that even with one of the eldest Rains being 'technically' the best vor produced so far... that's only because he was the only male of his generation by the way, no one else wants to work with us. There's already pairs of Mists and Suns, a Lightning girl who attached herself to a pair of Storms, a Sun that collaborates with a Lightning and another Storm... but we're noticeably absent from that, aren't we?

"...that's not our fault, is it?" Asked one of the eldest Rains in the room, a teenager with blonde hair and blue eyes but with a highly unsettled expression on her face.

"That is so much our fault that we've been left behind for almost an entire year, but we never noticed because we're so 'put upon' and 'special' here in our little enclave." He corrected brightly, cheerfully paging through what Galina had asked him to do to see if there were any of the health-related bulletins to pass out or not. "There's a handful that aren't considered stupidly insular and not worth it, those are the ones that took the nurse-option out of here. I've gotten to talk to Raisa recently, you know. She and Stella are having ever so much fun under Miss Tatiana the Sun nurse's guidance, including the whole 'on a criminal island so most illegal things aren't actually illegal' bit."

Passive-aggressive behavior for the win, he had to thank the Lightning lead for giving him pointers.

"But, of course, if you'd rather only just associate with Rains that's fine. But if you'd like to be involved or even just figure out the truth for yourself... you're going to have to break out of her a little." Larion pointedly ruffled his papers, thumbing through the pages in a fan in a faux curious manner. "Which... is what this is a part of. Seeing if Rains can work with other Flame users as the other groups are already far into. In a manner that might let you skirt around the unfortunate reputation we just so happen to have with the others."

Instead of proving they would just mindlessly go along with the flock, which was an unfortunate drawback to Rains in big enough groups, they would instead have to prove they could work with non-similar mindsets. Which would also force them to lose that 'but others agree with me' assumption that Tranquility tended to impose in greater concentrations.

Tranquility didn't mean 'no-conflict', just calmness. It was entirely possible to peacefully argue with another, but that did undercut the whole 'difference of opinions' thing a bit because it wasn't obvious there was a difference that needed arguing over.

"We do not have a bad reputation." The original speaker insisted sourly.

Larion smiled as the bait was taken entirely. It wasn't a happy or particularly pleasant expression. "Prove it. Prove me wrong, I dare you."

He had to try to murder the same woman they disrespected just to save his mother, who then regarded his attempt as 'curious' then did the actual saving for him. As far as 'Larion the Rain' was concerned, until they proved to be just as helpful to the very woman they bitched about... they were a bunch of brats he was unfortunately responsible for.

One year, then hopefully he wouldn't be responsible for them anymore.

He was rather wistfully counting the days already.
(Sunday the 3rd of August, 1969. Lanciano, Province of Chieti, Italian Republic.)

"...it's very shiny." Sonya observed blandly from over Shamal's shoulder.

The silver Ostensorium the brat had wanted to see was very pretty in a way, the round divot of ancient brown flesh nearly destroyed by the passage of time held in a medallion of crystal and silver in some sunburst-like arrangement topped with another cross. The cup directly under it made of more glass with silver details held five rather big lumps of dirty yellow substance, supposedly the coagulated blood centuries old, between two silver angels on a very ornate silver stand.

Again, shiny but... really, really just ick. Why would anyone want to preserve something like that?

Alright so... it was possibly a miracle, of blood and a body part. Of some random human, most likely, and hopefully not the doubting monk of the story.

The thief supposed that while it might be one of the weirdest things she had ever seen preserved, it probably wasn't as bad as a chalice made out of a skull of one's foe or shrunken heads. Both of which she was pretty sure were for sale up to this day and age to anyone that wanted grisly souvenirs from exotic vacations.

Wasn't there somewhere an entire church made out of bones?

Human ones?

She... only really vaguely remembered hearing something about that but was at least somewhat sure the brat would probably like to go ogle that one too.

"...a church of bone, hmm?" Renato remarked softly into her ear, likely to keep his words just between the three of them even in a crowded public space like a post-Mass cathedral could be, dropping the Mist back to his feet so they could make way for the others that had come to see the 'Miracle of Lanciano' too. "Interesting."

Considering it, and the strange look Shamal was aiming up at them for the partial conversation, the Storm-Cloud tapped a finger against her lip. "...if I can find out where it is again, that's for next summer. So... when were you thinking of disappearing?"

"That's cold, little dragon lady." He informed her dryly, pressing against Shamal's back in order to ensure they didn't lose the brat in the crowd but also that he was headed in the right direction.

Shamal snickered, pausing and being an obstruction just to hug her thigh tightly. "Good one, mamma."

Renato heaved a sigh and flicked the brat upside his head in revenge. Sonya herself got a finger jab to her side, which made her flinch a bit violently as her stomach muscles contract involuntarily from the unfamiliar contact.

The hitman froze at her reaction, then arched a fairly demanding eyebrow at her. "What the hell was that?"

She rubbed her stomach defensively yet being forced to step closer to her Italians just to keep from being pushed out the cathedral's doors by the crowd. "It just happens, I also flinch from my siblings and... used to from Shamal until I made myself get over it."

To prove it, the Mist yet again stopped and this time dodged around the older man's hand to put his own on her stomach without the normally automatic flinching thing happening again.

Sonya carefully took a wrist and turned the kid around, just so they could leave the church eventually before someone asked them to move.

"Yes, like that." She observed dryly as they finally left the church's interior to the rather nicely warm late summer morning air, only minimally jostled in crossing the flow of traffic to get to the right side of the church's parking lot. "But fondling my belly in public isn't something you should do, Shamal. That's usually something you only do to pregnant women, and I'm not pregnant."

"It takes skill to do without being awkward." Renato chimed in unhelpfully, wrapping an arm around her hips as they started towards the car he had borrowed from Vongola's Iron Fort motor pool.

Then the complete ass poked her in the stomach to make her flinch again as soon as she was distracted looking for the heavily armored sedan.

"...Renato. Do that again and I'll break your fingers."

The sensation wasn't nice, and it made her slightly anxious if it happened more than once or twice. Not to mention uncomfortable.

"Fine, fine." He loosened his hold until his hand was planted on her hip instead, which seemed to be his new favorite thing to do. "Anything you two want to do before we head back?"

"Brat?" Sonya asked instead, she really had little desire to do anything else but wouldn't say no to more time with them both.

It was about to come to an end, after all.

"We missed the Saturday trip to somewhere since you were talking to Nono." Shamal reminded her, before yanking on the back passenger door to climb into their borrowed car.

She glanced up at the slightly confused hitman before following suit. "I've been teaching him the petty side of my skills, and as a reward for doing well picking targets for me I give him half the funds I get. I'll teach him the actual stealth skills that go along with it later, but he's got money so visiting places he can spend it have been a thing."

Renato still looked a bit blank, which was his 'public' version of confused, so she thought back to their various pickpocketing lessons for him to get the general idea out of her memory.

"...ah. There's... not much open on Sundays around here, Sonya. This is a bit rural for that."

"How far off are we from Rome? There were a couple of places there that might've been interesting to browse that I saw on our way out of the city."

He considered it as he finally let her go so they could join their godchild in the car. "...an hour or so. I guess we can get lunch or something on the way and we can pick up the brat's school uniform order while we're there."

"Sounds good to me."
Sonya got through getting into the car and buckling herself in before Shamal tugged again on the elbow of her sleeve to get her attention again. "Mamma? Are you going to keep going to church?"

"…erm… probably not."

"Unless the brat is with you, I hope." Interjected the Mafioso a bit pointedly as he pulled the driver door shut and started the car. "You might not be Catholic, but he is."

"Yes, well… I'm not entirely comfortable attending religious worship with the devout." She informed them both a bit sourly as the car pulled away from just one of four churches within the same city limit. "I know you both are, or at least you are Renato and would like Shamal to be, but… I'm not. At all."

"I rather liked that you were at least willing to attend with him in Russia, even if you're not." The older Italian informed her, with a pointed if glancing sideways look to help hammer home his point. "This is Italia, Sonya. Everyone is Catholic here. If you don't attend, it's different and makes you stick out like a sore thumb. I know you might not care, but malicious gossip might just affect your people and the brat later on."

There were another few tugs to the long-sleeved shirt she was using to conceal her tattoos while in public. "Please, mamma? I like having you with me in church."

Sonya heaved a sigh through her nose, disgruntled at the use of those like Galina and Shamal to manipulate her future actions. "I've already embarrassed myself asking a priest about if he was really advocating the cannibalism of your religious icon, odds are that I will do it again in short order. I don't like embarrassing myself."

"Wait… you actually asked that?"

"Father Luka was very nice about it." Shamal protested maybe a touch too loudly for being inside a car, as they weren't all that far away from him that made yelling necessary. "And he told us about this, which sort of fit your question."

"Yes, he was very nice about laughing at my question." Deadpanned the thief, waving a hand to dismiss that. "That doesn't really address the problem. I'm not familiar with the act of religious worship and getting there will mean I will probably offend or outright incur the wrath of those that were raised in this mindset as I question their traditions and beliefs."

Renato heaved a sigh… after snickering a bit himself. Which did nothing to help her on the subject at all.

"Sonya, I do greatly appreciate you trying to understand and being there for Shamal. I'm aware there's going to be awkward points and some difficulty while you explore some of it, and frankly with so much history some of it is unsavory and downright bad so there's going to be more, but… can you keep trying? For him, if not just because I ask?"

"I probably will never convert to Christianity, Renato."

"Never say never." Countered the infuriating man brightly, finally getting them out of the post-Mass traffic and onto the main thoroughfare of the township. "But still… this wasn't that bad, right? Somewhat interesting, something to do together, and actually somewhat fun to make a day of. I'd call this a success, however it started."

She flatly stared at him.
Shamal huffed from the backseat. "And you're leaving us, so we're not likely to be doing things like this again."

Tapping his fingers on the steering wheel for a moment, he glanced through the rearview mirror only once to drive home his annoyance with the whole topic being repeatedly thrown back in his face. "Shamal. You already know why and what for. I can't put it off, so if you forgive me or not is your own choice... but do please stop bringing it up. Repeated reminders will just make things all the sourer until I have to go."

...right. That was also a thing to consider.

"I'm not saying I won't take Shamal to Mass next summer or for however long he needs me to take him, Renato. But eventually he'll be old enough to go by himself, or I'll feel safe in letting him make the trip alone... or he'll decide Christianity isn't for him, and then I won't have a reason to go myself."

"...thank you. Until that time, can you try to keep an open mind? There's plenty that's family orientated to involve yourself in, and the brat does deserve at least the chance of experiencing it himself."

...Renato said he'd been on the streets by a very early age, right?

First kill was at... seven, when he also woke up his Sun Flames. Meaning if he had parental guidance, it was probably over with before he reached that age. So... this was another of those 'I wanted it, brat should at least have the opportunity' things?

"I make no promises. There are a few parts of history I don't like, and they generally are religious conflicts or genocide. I'd rather not try to understand those parts." Like the Crusades, or the Spanish Inquisition. Those were rather big tripping points for her, especially for a 'God of love and peace' to ignore or passively advocate through non-action the systematic murder of entire races or schools of thought an 'all knowing' God would've arranged to occur in the first place. "So long as this family-religious thing is reasonable, I'll at least try it."

Honestly, since she wasn't remotely 'innocent' in that way either, she couldn't really point fingers. However, there were limits to how understanding she'd try to be.

"Thank you. I really do appreciate your willingness to go along with this, Sonya."

Speaking of... "What the hell is one's 'First Communion' supposed to be, anyways?"

"We don't have to worry about that until next year... at age seven one is considered to be at the Age of Reason, when one can fully understand sin, guilt, and one's moral responsibility. Generally the age when Catholics have their first confession done and receive their first Communion, and then it'll be a thing he's allowed to take from then on." The Sun glanced backwards at the six-year-old in the back seat and then to her before returning to watching the road. "I will be here for your First Communion brat, hopefully you can be as well Sonya."

"So... around or near his birthday?"

She earned another sideways glance. "...be in Mafia Land by the end of January, I'll pick you up for it so you'll be on time this year."

"Oh, shut up." Huffed the thief, flatly ignoring the snickers from behind her.

"It's kind of a... thing, a tradition." Renato continued after a moment to let the brat get his giggles out at her expense. "We'll get dressed up all fancy-like, the brat has a little ceremony in a church done with others this age, and there is generally just a kind of party thing afterwards to celebrate one's first step into being a responsible Catholic adult. I'll introduce you to a Mafia Priest you can avoid embarrassing yourself with if you ask awkward questions of, who is currently Shamal's regular priest until you move in somewhere full time and then probably will be again when he requires a Mafioso's take on parts of Christian doctrine. Alright?"

"...fine."

Two thin arms suddenly sprouted from either side of her head rest as Shamal hugged her around the neck, even with her seat in his way. "Thank you, mamma."

"...you're welcome. Now sit your ass back in that seat and buckle up. I might trust Renato to drive us safely around, but I certainly don't trust these other assholes on the road with us to be as careful."

Renato frowned slightly, but it took him several minutes as well as two turns to get them onto the highway in order for him to bring up whatever it was he had been thinking about. "So... your brother drives a motorcycle, yet you've sent Shamal off with him too."

"Cherep is a professional stuntman. He knows exactly what he can and can't realistically do on a motorcycle, and exactly how much leeway 'riskier' tricks give him. He exceeds and redefines it nearly every damn week, when he performs a show or works out a new stunt. He's probably the best driver on the road when he doesn't have a reason to drive crazy."

"Think he'd be any good as a getaway driver?"

"...if you give him enough time to become familiar with a car instead of a motorcycle, maybe." She allowed thoughtfully. "He knows how to break into them and hotwire them if need be, and he's still a good driver when in a car instead of a motorcycle from what I know, I did a bit of traveling with him in a car and there was that class on driving those lorries we took together, but I'm not sure how much professional stunt driving will translate over."

The hitman merely hummed thoughtfully as they pulled onto the highway that would take them around the mountains that sat between Lanciano and Rome.

That had been a rather interesting question, and entirely fit into Cherep's pacifist nature while still being more or less criminal in nature. Her brother would probably just prefer to drive than be otherwise involved in anything possibly hurtful, which was interesting to think about.

(Monday the 4th of August, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Timoteo gestured from Sonya to the Rain about around Renato's age as she and hitman that was her friend entered the second-floor meeting room, directed there by a footman that greeted them at the Iron Fort's main doors. "Miss Sonya, this is Don Bergamaschi. Rain user and head of the Bergamaschi Famiglia. Sergio, this is Sonya Bazanova nee Nikishina. Russian Storm-Cloud, Flame expert, and the... head of a Soviet based sister school to our own Mafia School."

There was a moment when the two silently judged the other, the Don had a less practiced poker-face than the Russian possessed, and the Sun could almost pinpoint the moment the other Flame user decided to try to get into her good graces using this situation.

Halfway across the room or not.
Or, if not him in her good graces, then to twist her into his.

Glowing as he fit himself into a corner with Visconti, Renato wondered if Shamal could somehow pop up and start his little war against any suitors of his mamma's a touch early. This may not be a romantic suitor exactly, but he was probably going to try courting her anyways.

"...charmed." The blonde woman announced flatly, sounding anything but, shifting her weight to one leg and planting both hands on her hips. "I believe you have an issue with me?"

"Not in so many words, no." Sergio Bergamaschi insisted smoothly, reaching out a hand to shake hers along with a professionally chagrined if still ingratiating little political smirk. "But unfortunately, I am involved with an offshoot branch that might. Hopefully we can get around this little stumble quickly."

She inspected the hand held in her direction dubiously for a long moment, flicked a skeptical glance up at the Don, then gingerly accepted the gesture. Slowly and with great obvious reluctance, as if she wasn't fully aware that was rather rude to do in the face of diplomatic overtures. "...hopefully. I'd rather not start off our branch of Flame schools with an international incident."

The Ninth Sky of Vongola released a near silent, if not a completely motionless, sigh. Since it seemed they were going to at least get along professionally, or try in various meanings of the word, he then gestured to the two of them to join him and his Storm Guardian at the table set up off to one side under the bay windows. "Now then... you said you would like to avoid the Vindice, Miss Sonya?"

"They give me the creeps." Admitted the thief bluntly, after pointedly extracting her hand from the hand-holding the Rain was trying to get away with, taking the seat open on Coyote's left on one side of the table. "Even if I do know, from prior personal experience, they are diligent in their duties and quick on the mark... I don't like relying on others to do my work when I can do it perfectly well or have no problems doing so."

Which was also a reminder that since this was a meeting attended by the head of a Mafia School for Dying Will Flame users, it was likely there was a corresponding overseeing Vindice Officer lurking around somewhere.

Also, an admittance that she was high-ranking enough expert that her meetings had been observed before and she expected it to happen again.

Kind of a way to prove her credentials, if only by hearsay… so long as her word was accepted as is.

In that, her admission and prior attendance as a Cloud in Vongola's Christmas Balls would help.

Clouds were stereotyped into being less than interested in political posturing or with falsehoods entirely, only interested in their territories and securing them against threats.

Renato didn't even know if Sonya's motivations in this were territory-based or just her guarding the important people of her family. He did know she could lie just fine, convincingly enough to fool professionals in various occupations, and what her worst case scenario if nothing was agreed upon.

Instead of pay attention to the recap, where Timoteo ensured the both of them were caught up on what the issue was and her stance on the problem and how the other man was involved and his stance on what was going on, the hitman examined the backup Don Sergio Bergamaschi brought along with him.

As the head of a Vongola Alliance famiglia, not to mention the patriarch of a Rain-bearing lineage that Daniella Vongola's Guardian Beretta originally hailed from, the Don had any number of bodyguards to pick from in any given day. Generally speaking the originating families of any one Vongola Sky's Guardians got very well acquainted with each other, and there were decades' worth of those inherited alliances that could be traced all the way back up to Vongola Quarto's Guardian picks.

No one with sense would bring a Mist into a meeting containing an independent Cloud, however rumored that Cloud was about being fond of select Mists. The man was a decent Rain in his own right, meaning his pick of another with the looks to hail from a Lightning bearing line as a bodyguard today was sensible to cover defense if his diplomatic attempts failed horribly.

…as long as you didn't know Sonya was more considerate of Soft Flame Lightnings than she was Hard Flame Lightnings.

Renato was pretty certain he could take the other man out if it came down to it. Hell… the thief wouldn't have more than an issue if she applied enough force to overwhelm his Hardening and his store of Flames. With either of them doing the taking down there was still a fairly serious risk of collateral damage to both the room and the others sharing the space with them, but hopefully Coyote was a quick Storm and Visconti wasn't given orders to neutralize Sonya first if violence was offered. The Lightning bodyguard was brought along to buy maybe seconds if things went sour and at best to be an additional target to be dealt with in the end.

He was pretty sure she would be unamused to be informed of that. She did seem more practical than wasteful when it came to the lives of those around her.

"…to cut this short, I don't really care beyond the fact one of my Home Tutors was impeded. I care that the instructions we are required to pass on was interrupted." Rather rudely interrupted the thief before Timoteo could detail exactly why Don Bergamaschi was the one invited to this meeting. "Because of that interruption, I now owe that temporary student my Tutor's life. I am fairly annoyed, and it was due to something that really could've waited a few days until that Lightning wasn't our responsibility anymore."

Utterly true and not entirely at the same time, but probably not the best starting position she could've gone with.

"I understand that, Miss Bazanova. However, I am not responsible for their-"

"You are the one putting forth the pressure. I was content to leave things be after retrieving the Tutor and by chance his student, had you not allowed them to press a complaint up to Don Vongola we wouldn't be here." Sonya cut the, rather politically powerful, Don off shortly.

Sergio Bergamaschi glanced sideways at Nono, likely for the Russian's rather insolent behavior as an invited guest to this little Alliance meeting table. When the Sky didn't so much as twitch, because really… back chatting Clouds were always preferable to violently aggressive ones hands down, the Rain heaved a sigh mostly under his breath and turned back to her.

The non-comment on woman's behavior held another purpose beyond the mildly insulting obvious. Mainly to indicate that no, Don Vongola had no control over her and that no… they didn't know nor suspect she had a Sky to control her behavior through.

"Be that as it may, as you interfered when one of your people ran into trouble, I am also honor bound to interfere when my own do so." The Rain offered on his own end evenly. "They might not be explicitly mine in that way, but they do my famiglia favors from time to time and deserve the consideration."
"...well fine then. YOU can pay the hospital bills my Home Tutor racked up as a 'guest' of one of your subordinate syndicates." Insisted the thief flatly, digging out a sheaf of papers from her oversized purse and shoving them across the table at the man seated directly opposite of her. "Since you've decided to claim enough responsibility to stand in for them as well as push forward their own agendas."

Renato raised an eyebrow, hidden under the brim of his fedora.

"...I didn't say that-

"Someone is going to pay for dragging this out far enough to involve me again." She cut him off flatly for the second time, letting her grey eyes flash purple and narrowing them at the Rain even if that made the Storm to her direct left tense up. "It can either be you, as the one that allowed this little backwater syndicate to bitch so damn much, or them as the ones directly responsible. Or you all can shut up and let me murder off said backwater little group. At this point, both options are equally as troublesome as the other."

A couple of wires seemed to connect on Don Bergamaschi's end, and the man flicked a glance from the tiny blonde woman to the hitman loitering in the background.

Renato would be the first one to admit Sonya could clean up very nicely, but blonde wasn't a rare color in Italy. There was everything from her own golden to even platinum blondes in country, if not nearly as common as black or brunette hair colors. Beyond just physically speaking, she didn't stand out as overly tall or overly friendly and didn't really socialize beyond a handful of Italians when she felt like it.

He did know perfectly well that last Christmas Ball he took the pain to introduce her to him, so his delay in recalling who's Cloud he was dealing with was really rather pathetic.

Admittedly, the jump from a Soviet 'Flame expert' to a Soviet 'Mafia School Headmaster' was a non-intuitive one. The hitman would give him the benefit of a doubt… if he was feeling magnanimous.

He wasn't, so no.

"...paying this would set a rather bad precedent, Miss Bazanova."

"That you have a sense of honor about when you land in the wrong?" Rather snidely asked the Cloud, who set her spine against the back of her chair and affected a bored mien which fooled no one in that room. "Pick an option, I don't care which. Preferably sometime soon."

The Rain pursed his lips in irritation, hiding the action behind folding his hands in front of his lower face. "That is a rather bold claim to make without substance."

Sonya blinked at him slowly, glanced down at the bill lying between them on the table, then at Nono's form to their side. "You have a lot of balls to try claiming I'm blowing smoke."

"...point." Don Bergamaschi admitted genially, sweeping up the forms from the middle of the meeting table and merely glancing at it once before putting it aside. "Is that all you're demanding?"

She studied the other man for a moment longer than would be needed to read his body language. "...I fucking hate Rains."

He lightly laughed at her. "I will take a minor fee over the massacre of one of my tribute syndicates easily. They've been making a nuisance of themselves as it was, this just adds to the excuse I can use to smack them down a peg. I can be amenable in this… so long as you won't mind being so in Cocking an eyebrow, the Storm-Cloud merely waited instead of possibly take the bait to do something she wasn't ready to commit to.

"They aren't very good when it comes to Flame users, as you probably noticed." Continued the Don leadingly, moving one of his hands away from his mouth to tap a finger on the table. "You apparently have a School..."

"...I suppose I could suggest immigration to a few students." Was the utterly dismissive response, which was a tad bit too slow to be considered willingly given. "So long as they're old enough to make their own decisions as well as interested in leaving Soviet territory."

"Well then, I look forward to hearing all about it."

Sonya flatly stared at the man, which practically bounced off the Rain's now cheerful grin. "It will take years, if at all, until I am able to fulfill such a request."

"So, there will be several chats over the next few years, until such can be done." Continued the Don pleasantly, unrepentantly smug even in the face of the Russian's severe disapproval. "Or... you could go yourself and give a few lectures yourself. I'll take either option, myself."

There was a beat, then she gave a sudden reversal of her own and echoed the Rain's smug little smirk. "Oh... I can do a few guest lectures instead. As a matter of fact, I like that idea. Very much. Say... next spring? Early? It's the quickest I can fit something in."

Renato blinked at her for a long moment, even as the two Dons were caught off-guard by her sudden mood shift and had to pause to rethink what they were about to say or do.

Why the hell...?

...oh. Oh. Oh no... was there any way he could arrange to be there when she went back?

"...um." Timoteo fumbled at the sudden shift of disgruntled Storm-Cloud to an utterly agreeable one. "I take it these are the terms you both will agree on?"

Sonya lifted a shoulder in an absent shrug, Don Sergio Bergamaschi wasn't quite on the mark enough to protest.

"I do request you take someone from the Vongola Alliance with you when you leave to deal with this, Miss Sonya." The Sky turned to the other man when she nodded. "Sergio, if you could pay or repay her in the next few weeks?"

"...of course, Nono."

The Ninth Sky of Vongola glanced to his Storm Guardian, who seemed equally as baffled as he was by the thief's copying a Rain's abrupt about-face, then rose and gestured for the others to do so as well. "Well then, thank you both for taking the time with me to ensure this is smoothed over."

She did as bid willingly enough, even extending a hand only after a brief pause to shake the lower ranking Don's hand before turning to leave the room somewhat happily.

"...Renato, can you please explain what the hell that was?"

"But of course, Timoteo." Agreed the hitman cheerfully, pushing off the wall and facing his lone Sky friend. "Sonya's syndicate has a branch dedicated to the teaching and education of their younger members... and her foster parents run it. Those 'lessons', the neighborhood, and everything that goes on within there."

"We've seen her foster father, right? He came here last year." Chipped in Coyote thoughtfully, taking his sunglasses from the top of his head to fiddle with while he tried to recall the incident. "The... big tattooed guy."

"They are all tattooed. But yes, that was vor Arseniy. Coincidentally, Sonya's sister Tatiana once told me something interesting." He added casually, which fooled no one in the room but he didn't really care all that much right now. "That her younger sister acquired a habit for going for the hands from their foster father."

"That's speculation." Timoteo remarked, then he actually paused to really think about it as well.

"It is. I've only seen invasion grunts with shattered or dismembered hands in her wake, and one incident where she took her battle hammers to a few shy of a dozen gunmen's hands for pointing their weapons in her face." Renato confirmed brightly. "But... well. If you won't take my word for it..."

Don Bergamaschi swore softly.

"...just to be sure it's said again, Sonya's a Storm-Cloud. Might want to keep that in mind."

…and a bit of something she still had yet to clarify, but also something that didn't actually present ticks of to be identified.

Leaving the other men to discussing the pitfalls and issues with negotiating with Clouds, however Stormy they might be, Renato instead stalked after his favorite Russian.

He, predictably, found her shamelessly coddling Shamal in the middle of a hallway a floor down. Near the waiting room they had pointed out for the brat to meet up with them for saying goodbye to the blonde for a while.

"-behave yourself, I'll be back in a few months and will hear about it if you're not." She was dictating to the mopey Mist brat, who had his face half-buried into her stomach but his entire body was all but screaming 'depression' to anyone that cared to look. "Pay attention in school, try not to break any more teachers, and all that other shit I'm supposed to be blathering on about. More importantly, take care of yourself and try to have some fun. Time will pass quickly if you do."

An unconvinced huff from her midriff was the only answer. Shamal winded his arms around her hips the best he could instead, perfectly content to add in the obstruction of the hallway so long as it was being allowed.

Renato decided to do the Russian thing and ignore the traffic issues they were causing. It was far enough outside the higher trafficked areas of the Iron Fort, they weren't plugging an intersection of hallways, everyone else could easily go around if there was something important needed.

Sonya had a looming meeting in France, some work waiting for her in China, and then more beyond that. The brat was entirely justified in being upset his godmother was leaving him to get on with things. He did seem a bit more invested in her presence in his life than the Sun himself, if only for the emotional aspects Renato wasn't entirely comfortable dealing with.

She didn't seem to mind, so he found no reason to rock the boat.
Eventually, the Storm-Cloud got tired of standing half-bent over in order to allow Shamal to cling to her. She decided the middle of the hallway was good enough to sit down and pulled the young Mist down with her instead of let go.

Eyeing the both of them skeptically, the hitman assumed such things was why the kid preferred being smothered by the woman. He really couldn't bring himself to join in on the floor, so he picked a wall to 'ape a particularly foul-mood gargoyle' upon.

"...you're eventually going to have to let go, brat." Sonya mused aloud after a few more minutes of letting him have his way, despite the fact she liked to at least keep her mind occupied with something she seemed perfectly content to sit there. Being used like an oversized teddy bear instead of reading something as per her usual. "You'll get stiff or hungry eventually."

"Want to bet on it?" Shamal snarked irritably into her modest chest.

"You'll hurt yourself in the long run trying to do that." She informed him absently, finger his hair to tug or shift strands around while they sat there. "Please don't until you're fully grown."

Yanking a bit on her buttoned blouse, the Mist huffed again before craning his neck around to look up at her. "When are you coming back?"

She blinked down at him. "Christmas? I believe you demanded so... Renato, are we doing the Ball this year?"

"I wasn't thinking about it myself." Admitted the Sun idly, causing the kid to start a bit violently as apparently he hadn't realized the older Italian had followed his mamma. He merely stared back levelly at the brat when wide brown eyes turned on him, until Shamal decided to pay more attention to her all of a sudden. "Unless you really want to, we can skip it and spend Christmas in a hotel instead."

Surprisingly, it was the younger Italian that hijacked that plan. "Doesn't mamma need friends down here? And connections. And peoples-

"We get it." Sonya interjected dryly before he could finish. "Renato, would it be easier to do so in the Ball or can it be done some other time?"

"...probably in the Ball."

"Son of a bitch." Sighed the woman, giving what she needed for attending a high-class criminal ball some serious if sour thought from her scowl. "Fine... so I'll be here the last week of December, we'll head up to Moscow for a week after, and then come back down again."

Shamal very slowly, glacially so, finally untangled himself from her. "Fine. You better not be late, mamma."

"I'll try not to be." Sonya drawled out tartly, helping him steady himself after standing stock still then occupying her lap for a good quarter of an hour. "Get interested in school or find a hobby kid, I can't even describe how much that will help make the time fly."

The Mist sulked instead acknowledge that. "Love you, mamma."

"I love you too, don't do anything I wouldn't." While Renato was still adjusting to exactly how far their relationship had developed while he had been off doing other things, Sonya dropped a kiss on the brat's forehead and got up herself. "Renato."
He saluted her by tugging the brim of his fedora. "Have fun, little dragon lady."

She gave a backwards wave as she left them in the hallway.

The hitman glanced downward at the Mist brat. "...love, huh?"

He made a rude sound in his direction, starting the walk he had to do in order to get to his room in the child's wing of the Iron Fort. "You have to do your own work on that end, Mister Renato."

He scoffed, stalking after the Mist. "I assure you, I don't need your or anyone else's help in that aspect."

"...mamma actually does have a favorite candy." Tempted the utter brat cheerfully. "I got to try some."

Pausing momentarily mid-stride, he skeptically inspected the kid's back. "Ho?"

"...surprisingly tasty, even if it wasn't really all that sweet." Shamal continued just a touch too thoughtfully, meaning he was teasing his godfather and it was pretty chancy if the kid would be telling him anything.

...perfect. Time for plan b. "And here I was going to take you out for gelato since this is the day she had to leave. But I guess you aren't all that heartbroken after all."

The look the brat aimed over one shoulder was just perfect.

Suspicious, wary, but oh so tempted even so.

---

(Wednesday the 6th of August, 1969. Nice, Provence-Alpes-Côte d'Azur, French Republic.)

Adrik eyed the back of the disgustingly chipper scientist as they wandered rather freely down a French street.

It was very eye-catching, with the white facades and red tiled roofs paired with a tan bricked ground. Paired with a wide-open sky overhead and the nearby coastline, it made a pretty picture… but the interests he had in admiring the view faded pretty damn fast.

There was a good copy of the local architecture in the Mediterranean section of Mafia Land. He'd seen something like it before, just not on this scale.

Alright, no. Not everyone would enjoy an island far enough out in international waters to be completely lawless and therefore a haven for criminal dealings. However, that was pretty much his place and his kind of people.

Getting back to it, however temporarily, reminded the Russian security expert about what he had been missing while he was piddling around checking boxes off his list to acquire a full college degree. While civilian life had its own perks and drawbacks, a nearly completely safe lifestyle and more casual contacts… life connected to the trade of violence had its own attractions.

Mostly an unspoken companionship with equally blooded criminal types, more lucrative work, and definitely less personal curiosity aimed his way.

Sonya probably overpaid him, for what amounted as getting a guided tour of a few French cities.
while they kept on the move and waited for her to clear the tail they might've picked up. He was pretty certain she wouldn't ask for the remainder back, not if she could calculate the quirks a Mist she was associated with into the funds left behind for her minion to managed so easily, so he had half a million in francs to live off of until said thief managed a meet up with them.

"-the current mayor, one Jacques Médecin, who is the son of the former mayor Jean Médecin, has continued his father's work in developing the city. Most of the damage from the American bombings has been repaired, and--"

"Hey, Verde? Quick question." Adrik was… pretty sure the man wasn't born around here. They had, in fact, ensured they were some distance from the Lightning's birthplace while they were 'hiding out'. "Why did you go to the States if they destroyed some of this place?"

Blinking at the interruption, which really had only a slight chance of actually working without the man bulldozing over anyone else talking, the very green Frenchman glanced backwards at him through his spectacles. "…I suppose that boils down to the A-bomb."

He came to a stop to stare at the man blankly, when that didn't quite make sense to him. "…what?"

"Terrible although the final cost in lives might have been, the atomic bomb and nuclear sciences are genuinely some of the greatest scientific advancements on this age." Explained the scientist bluntly, adjusting his glasses as he came to a stop in the middle of the pedestrian walkway as well. "Which occurred in America. Whichever way you look at it, only the superpowers of this day and age have the willingness or interests in developing atomic sciences further instead of covering ground already gone over by others. The superpower of the Western world, the United States… or the Soviet leaders of the North, the Russians. Which then, do you suppose, was easiest to obtain a student visa within?"

Thinking about it, the wiry man scrubbed a hand over his jawline and his stubbly whisker shadow while said thought was taking place, he eventually had to shrug. "…that doesn't clear up your thoughts on the States."

"I hold no ill-will towards them, in honestly." Concluded the Lightning thoughtfully himself after giving the matter some additional brain power. "Admittedly, I also hold no fondness towards them. Nor to my own 'homeland'. They are places, beyond being the local for certain people, a few ancient productions of great minds, and assemblies of fellow intellectuals… I hold no interests in such things."

…and so, why had he given him an hour's worth of information in a dump the first thing in every city they had visited so far?

Not really seeing a way to ask nicely, Adrik rather bluntly just stated his query than find a way to phrase it better.

"I am your local 'guide'," Verde observed dryly, waving a hand to the rather striking surroundings and including the rather brilliant sunset just starting to paint the sky overhead. "However, as I am not nearly as confident as you yourself are in your specialized matters… giving all the details I have and allowing you to make use of such as you saw fit was what I settled upon after pondering the situation. As a native son, I suppose I do know more than a fair share of history."

"…man, you could've just said so. I thought you were just really proud of your country or something." With a despairing shake of the head, he took the man by the arm and steered him in a new direction. "You want to learn something interesting? There’re hotspots around here where you can learn the… less savory tidbits about these places and the people that run them. I'll show you a few."
Since the scientist allowed himself to be led, it was probably likely he was at least interested if not objecting to learning more 'criminally flavored' skills.

The fact it would allow Sonya a better chance of tracking them down quickly if today was the day she was meeting up with them again was just a bonus.

Nice was a port, a not an ancient one but decently old regardless. As with most ports over a certain age, it had a 'seedy' side of the docks where the sailors and those undertaking seafaring typed job descriptions could drink the local rotgut until they passed out. Next to those, or under or right next to depending on the situation, you could usually find a rather shallow mafia bar.

Not the deep mafia ones, Adrik actually didn't know how to get into those or even locate them in the first place. He knew they existed, and some of the signs of how to identify it when you waltzed into one, but they were places you had to be taken to and have the methods explained in detail before being able to find one yourself.

Tatiana hadn't taught anyone of them how she knew where they were, but it was likely her foster parents had taught her before she left home. Then that would also mean Sonya would know… maybe she wouldn't mind pointing it out to him?

He eventually got them through the rougher edges of Nice's port and into a suitably designated mafia contact bar. After the expected suspicion for new faces, the two of them had more than enough time to hear about one Mayor Jacques Médecin's links with former OAS terrorists and their lingering remains in other countries before something more interesting happened.

Sonya found them just before the slightly loud conversation in the corner got into very interesting topic about a former OAS agent turned photography studio owner and what he was being watched for by the local Mafia.

"You're clear, Verde." She announced shortly, seating herself a bit abruptly at their little table while flatly ignoring the attention taking off her jacket and showing her tattoos had drawn to them. "Adrik, I regret to say you might need to be on the lookout for assassins. At least until I can arrange a small visit to the States and… re-educate a few idiots about what is and what isn't realistic to tangle with."

The other Russian swallowed his mouthful of port before looking over to her. "So… what. You swapped the tail on him for siccing them on me?"

"Are you complaining?" Asked the Storm-Cloud shortly, taking a rather hefty draw from her own glass of whisky on the rocks before making a face at it. "Shit… I forgot I didn't really like this crap."

Her fellow Russian stole the amber liquid happily enough once she shoved it away.

"So… did you find any syndicates you wanted to check out? Or was whatever it was you had spread out over the living room too interesting?"

"How, exactly, is this to occur?" Verde inquired skeptically over the rim of the beer he had been nursing for at least an hour. "Correct me if I am wrong, but advertising what we are after will only attract further ill intents towards ourselves. Which we were in the middle of avoiding for most of the time we have been acquaintances, correct?"

Sonya held up a finger, stole Adrik's drink in revenge and draining it in a second, and then giving the empty tumbler a rather nasty look. "…right, port isn't a whole lot better. Well, to be honest here Verde, announcing it in suitably secured places and then just waiting for them to recruit you is actually my whole plan."
From the utterly flat look the scientist aimed across the table, he wasn’t a fan of that plan.

"...look, I don't have very good contacts out here." She explained bluntly, waving the tiny glass around the barroom to likely include the entirety of the country. "Those that I can ask about the syndicates around here I wouldn't trust if they told me the Sky was blue."

"Isn't it actually orange?" Questioned the other Russian curiously.

"Exactly."

"Be that as it may be, why do I require one away from the local we have just left behind? An ocean away from the same situation, and it is not nearly as likely they will continue to try to hunt me." Asked the Lightning a bit shortly, folding both hands around his beer stein and glowering over it. "Admittedly for protection and security of fellows, I believe you said. Do I not have that now?"

The younger Russian and fellow user of Dying Will Flames shook her head. "Look, Verde. I can't afford you. I am barely pulling enough in to afford my Lackey right now, and I have yet to find a way to realistically stretch that for, at the very least, three more adult dependents, and maybe two child ones, if not more in time. Once Bjørn starts regenerating the cash I'm paying for his lessons, and maybe after I have a sense of the drain this housing thing is going to cost me, I will have moved to Italy and be a tiny bit more concerned with the instruction and well-being of my godson than my research efforts."

"I can afford myself, thank you. And as for research, you have already paid that for the short term at least." Verde countered blandly, his tone doing nothing to disguise his intents on wiggling out of joining a French syndicate. "Putting myself out there and making a target of myself just to find a protector goes against the grain. I am fully aware I am painfully green in this endeavor, whatever the hardships remaining at hand to a master or expert is generally regarded as the intelligent option."

Adrik chewed on his bottom lip as Sonya argued that she had nothing for him nor the intents of extending her already stretched protection further, and Verde picked holes in her arguments and countered with the fact she had already more or less exceeded any unknown syndicate in protecting and guiding newer Flame users by just doing as she had and if not left here alone her protection would not have to stretch more.

Well… if this was what the other man did when mildly annoyed at being brushed off or interrupted, remind him not to ever try that. Draining the tumbler of whisky, he snagged the port glass and now empty stein of beer for refills.

He would, not even two hours later, admit if only to himself that volunteering himself to do so was the worst idea he ever had.

By the time he returned to their little table, Verde had successfully argued himself out of 'you have to' in regard to syndicates and sort of back into Sonya's protection. If only because she had invested in him, at least monetarily. Said thief was looking more and more fed up the longer the Lightning dodged around her words and twisted them for his own purposes.

"...fine. Fine, if you can go six months, alone, without dying or requiring my assistance… I will drop the subject and not continue to insist." Announced said pissed off Soviet Storm-Cloud flatly, but then she flicked her hand to include the neat as a pin barroom they were in. "But you realize, Verde, that just about everyone here is connected in some way shape or form to French syndicates… and they heard the same thing?"
It took him a few moments to really process the words, and also dodging around her hand in order to not get smacked or drop their liquor took a bit of attention, but when he did realize what she was saying it was far too late.

"Woah, wait a minute-"

"Very well." Verde agreed pleasantly, or at least as pleased as could be while also trying fruitlessly to remain tactful. "I do believe it would go without saying that regardless of what happened we would not continue to dwell around here."

"...Verde, man. Stop." Almost slamming the stein of beer in front of the scientist, he set the Russians' to the side instead of drain both of them like he really wanted to. "Sonya. What the hell?"

She gave him a slightly pissed off, but more alarmingly a mainly resigned, look of her own. "After my example, what the hell do you think Verde assumes? I cannot adequately explain why it will not happen for him as well, I have nearly next to nothing to do with how my own example actually succeeded beyond happenstance. And, at the very least, he should learn if he can or not himself. Think of it as an educational experience."

...'educational' Adrik's pasty white Viking ass. "You and I both know this isn't going to end well."

"And if I really said 'no, do it this way' do you think he'd not sabotage or screw with it himself if he thought he could get away with it?"

"No, because that's stupid and Verde's not stu-" He paused, looked back at the Frenchman about halfway through a swallow of beer, and amended that statement as he turned back to her. "...Verde's not usually dense."

Said scientist choked on his drink, but the thief threw her hands up in the air. "And what the hell can I do about that? I could tell him until I'm blue in the face that it's going to be damn near impossible to accomplish, that the syndicates that want a free Lightning will either outright try to murder him or hammer him into a corner in order to get him to gratefully join up with them or some ally or whoever for reasons, but until he sees it for himself I don't think he really understands how bad it can get. And while I could waste months of time trying to get him into a syndicate that won't murder him for his current outlook... I frankly don't have that much free time."

"You don't throw the poor man to the wolves just because you're on a time limit!" Adrik shot back, a breath away from hysterical and seriously wondering what the hell he had done in his life to deserve this shit. "For fuck's sake, Boss lady! If you're not near-by, no one's going to keep in mind denting the Lightning or the other Russian with him will earn them the ire of a Soviet Cloud... which we were banking on to prevent the wrong sorts of pressure while fitting Verde into a syndicate."

"I cannot put my entire fall schedule on hold for this one thing." Sonya flatly dictated, jabbing a pointer finger into the table between them a few times to make her point.

...and by 'into', he really meant into. As in at least a joint was driven into the highly lacquered wood without her so much as wincing from breaking a nail in half.

"I not only have a fucking school to open, but an island contract due shortly that will take me into China on their syndicate's businesses, at least ten or twelve other contracts this year yet, and somewhere in all that I have a home in Italy to find and purchase with two medical checks and my three years of missing immunization shots to take. All that I have to do by the end of this year. How then, do you think, I can safeguard Verde's social experiment with all that needing to be done?"
"…appoint a neutral third-party?" He tried weakly after admitting defeat.

This was… a whole lot of not good.

"Who?" Demanded the tiny blonde woman skeptically. "I have a hitman acquaintance I'd probably bet on more than any one syndicate, but he's a little busy himself from what he said. I could ask Don Vongola… but this isn't the kind of thing one takes to a head of the Italian families without a major bribe to go with it. Aside those two men, I might be able to get Tyr the Sword Emperor interested for a tiny bit… might. IF he's in a good mood this week, and frankly I'm not even sure if my marginal once-in-a-blue-moon words with him would stretch that much or not."

…when the ever-loving fuck did Sonya find time to rub elbows with Nono Vongola and the man's head assassin?

Verde rather solidly put down the heavy mug, now only half full of his drink, on the table to attract some attention his way. "Is a third party required at all?"

Sonya snatched her refill of his port away from where her fellow Russian had been holding them hostage, draining it herself in seconds before giving the scientist the answers he was seeking. "Frankly, Verde… I would not be surprised if a syndicate murdered everyone that moved on one street to freak you out enough to join them for the protection or for revenge or what have you. You are not really all that much of a threat, personally. A third party would ensure any rules you or I would like to set for the act of 'courting' you have to be obeyed. That means they think they have a wide lateral range of options to pick from, so long as they remain outside your grip and my view."

"There's safety in numbers is taken a bit extreme with us." Adrik chipped on the heels of her own words, a bit glumly. "Or in our case, so long as someone has direct control over assets like you or Sonya over there, the less large groups will bother with you. Flip side is also as bad, if you're too noticeable… again like Sonya over there, then you'll either be the reason the entire syndicate ends up wiped out or kicked out so you don't end up causing that."

"The Zolotovs have not been wiped out." His fellow Russian protested.

"No? Has it been tried?"

She looked a bit thoughtful. "To what extent is 'tried' covering in this? I've preemptive a few things, and apparently my own assassination has been preempted a few times by the clan."

"I'll give you good odds that either removing you or at least knocking us down a peg in influence was the aim of at least one or two of those attempts."

"…no bet."

Verde, thankfully, took the time to puzzle over that.

Adrik really, really hoped he decided to at least play this part safe.

(Thursday the 7th of August, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"…you did what?"
"Do you think she will be mad?"

Galina blinked blankly at the wall opposite her, marveling over how just perfect coincidence could be. "Nope. However, you might want me to break the news to her."

There was an almost puzzled seeming pause on Björn's end before he realized what she was saying, because the Lackey might be still young he wasn't really foolish.

Often, anyways.

"Although, if you're still taking requests, I'd like to at least have beach access for this 'castle' of ours."

"…Miss Galina?" He flatly called from the far end of the line. "I know it sounds ridiculous, but I did do up the numbers. Unless you are saying you'd like to be a full-time housekeeper for a small Italian boy-"

"I did not say anything like that."

Alright, on second thought there was perfectly logical reasons why Sonya's Mafia Land Lackey was sourcing Italian castles for them. They probably weren't the grand, sweeping fortresses of Russia's, built to keep out not only the deadly winters but Viking raids and serf revolts.

They'd be… what?

Built to withstand pirate attacks?

There was that whole nastiness with the Mafia Wars, maybe marauders and vagabonds as well.

She frowned delicately as she realized that they might just end up with a fortress of a castle anyways without the cold having something to do with it. "Why do you want my opinion on this anyways? Amusing though it is to hear what you've-"

"I," Björn rather strongly cut her off testily as she did to him before, only to uncomfortably clear his throat, "…did not really spend a lot of time with Dama. I do not know what aesthetics she likes."

Galina raised an eyebrow at her unseen conversation partner. "Björn, no one with sense lets a thief decorate. You did get an eyeful of the messy shit shoved in random corners here, right?"

"…then do I find a place we, or she, can fix up to her liking or find a castle already habitable and just hire an interior decorator for that!" A thump sounded on the other end of the line, likely the Lackey banging his forehead on his desk or some other flat surface over there. "Why are there so many options…?"

"Honestly? I'd suggest the interior decorator, preferably a local one. If you have to go through the headache of hiring outsiders for the upkeep of whatever, might as well ensure it's not too different from what they'd expect to keep curious noses out of Sonya's, or our own, business."

Scruffy blinked blankly at her as he pulled his head out of the work he had been embroiled with all afternoon in the far side of the office, only to obviously and painfully ineptly eavesdrop on her phone call.

She paused in thought, fitted 'we're getting a castle' into English and ran through how the lip movements were supposed to look, and then mouthed the phrase for him. "However, you could try asking her."
"...I think it might be better to ask forgiveness than permission in this case." Björn commented a bit self-deprecatingly. "I have the numbers, and the logic, and practically everything else... but it still sounds a bit farfetched to say 'we need a castle and the staff to run it, Dama.'"

"...maybe because it is a slight bit out there?"

"If you're not going to help."

"Oh, I'll help... by not mentioning this to her." Admitted the Lightning wickedly, grinning at the heavy sigh from one end of this conversation and Scruffy's entirely bewildered expression on the other. "I'll also run you some interference, just so she won't catch on until you've got things in place."

A slightly incredulous huff was her answer. "I'm not sure I'm alright with this, Miss Galina. While... no, she's probably not going to be happy about the size of what I'll be looking for... it's her money. She does deserve to know what I'm doing with it."

"Kid, she wouldn't have put you in charge of it if she had any idea how to manage it like you do." She informed him pointedly. "Has she ever asked about the money you're handling for her?"

"...well, no."

"I'm telling you, she's not going to ask. And since I do find it funny, I'm not going to tell her for you."

Because maybe this way the blonde woman would stop leaving her behind. Galina would like to see more of the world too, at least a tiny bit more than she managed with Tatiana and her crew.

Björn made a rather disgruntled sounding groan on his end. "Very well... I take it Scruffy-"

"Do not bring that poor man into this." Galina snapped with a frown.

The Sun had done nothing to deserve that, and frankly she wasn't remotely amused at the suggestion. "Fine. Did you need something, or was this just a social call?"

"...oh, right. The fences finished parsing through the Boss lady's hauls and picked what they wanted to keep. The remainder is what I wanted to bring up."

The Lightning-Storm shuffled a few pages, knocked something glassy but full of liquid into something metallic, and then thumped something solid on something else equally or more so. "Lump sum deposit or...?"

"Well, it was gathered to fund the school. Half to acquire the correct number of rocks, half to pay the teacher's wages. I have been selling the pricier shit to buy the semi-precious in bulk and putting the remains into a savings account when what I sell is a bit more than what I buy at one time."

"...okay?"

"You're the money man, aren't you?" She demanded shortly, a bit annoyed by his sudden turn to thickness. "If we don't want to annoy Sonya by requesting semi-frequently that she top the accounts off, then how the hell do I or you or we invest this damn thing so it'll pay itself later on?"

"...ah. Well... probably illegally, right now."

She took a deep breath, pinched the bridge of her nose, and heaved a heavy sigh. "Björn, I am aware of that. That is why I'm calling you. With the account number, and all that other business I had to do to open the account in the first place."

Instead of an exclamation of surprise or a sudden outpour of helpful tips and advice, there was a sigh. "Miss Galina… Russian banks are a bit… weird."

"How so?"

"…just take my word for it. They're very weird."

"That doesn't exactly help me, now does it?"

"Unless you somehow got a Vneshtorgbank of the USSR savings account, I can't actually get to the money to manage from here. And one of those would be a bit… noticeable for what we wish to do." Explained the Mafia Land Lackey patiently. "There isn't a whole lot of funds moving in or out of the Soviet Bloc at all. If I am to do anything with the funds you want to set aside, we're probably going to have to use runners and maybe a smuggling operation or two. Maybe a moneychanger or several for the added security."

Galina scowled at the news, lightly kicking Sonya's desk while she turned that over in her mind. "...I bring you precious gems and metals, you turn it into funds to invest we can get transferred over later if the account falls below a certain point?"

"That would probably be the best idea, yes."
Chapter 75

(Friday the 8th of August, 1969. Draguignan, Provence-Alpes-Côte d'Azur, French Republic.)

Verde was well aware he had greatly annoyed the Russians he had dealings with by backtracking on them about his joining of a syndicate issue.

They were supporting him while he was in-between aims, as well as ensuring he was safe enough until a decision could be reached, so they were completely entitled to being so with his person.

However, no matter what he tried to do he couldn't quite uncouple the assumption of 'syndicates' equating more or less to 'cliques'. As in high school cliques like the jocks and the math nerds, cheerleaders and the outcasts, or just the artist types and the poets.

A rather juvenile assumption admittedly, but the only one that he knew of and that put a foul taste in his mouth anyways. Especially with his previous associations with such scholastic social castes, most of which were entirely negative.

After being hurriedly relocated to a rather tiny town a bit more removed from the southern French coastline, Sonya had laid out the limitations and rules for his 'social experiment' before leaving them to it. Six months, so either the middle of or after February of next year, Verde had to remain 'freelance' and somehow find his way unaided by Adrik's influence back to Mafia Land to find her Lackey Bjørn without being killed.

If he accomplished what she asked, then she would consent to renegotiations to give him more security or at least a decently well-defended place of his own on her dime and they would drop the subject of him finding a native syndicate to join.

Maybe she had insisted.

Given how surprisingly sensible and honorable the professional thief was when it came to looking after her people, Adrik and her Lightning-Storm Lackey were both in good health or ensured to become that way and had been supplied appropriate wages for their work even if she had dictated nothing to them to do for her specifically, Verde had little worry she would shortchange him on any basics of living if he could not find a way to ensure it himself.

According to said Russians, 'freelance' was still the point of selling one's skills but with a more mercenary day-by-day bent than in exchange for continued protection and or inclusion to pre-established support system or networked supply line.

He had to agree to that much, as Sonya was the one he was trying to arrange something different with, but then on the trip out here Adrik tacked on his own additions to his fellow Russian's terms.

He'd be teaching the scientist how to be a 'made man', apparently something he'd need to know if he insisted on being solo in this lifestyle as well as a measure of what one had to be comfortable with in order to thrive when placed next to other cut-throat criminal types.

Verde honestly had no intentions on dealing with the mafia while he was hiding out for the time Sonya demanded from him, or at least while he was only aware of the 'survive' mandate he had no intents of it. The more intelligent option for him would be to clear out of where he was expected to be and work on that 'return to Mafia Land' part closer to the time he was due to return to Sonya's Lackey to prevent miscalculations from occurring.
However, it was then a bit bitterly pointed out to him by Adrik that while he might want one thing it didn't mean others would play along if it suited them.

An entire barroom full of degenerate-types in Nice knew he was a user of Dying Will's Lightning Flames. Or at least those that had paid attention to the tiny blonde woman's words to her fellow Soviet citizen could draw the correct conclusions that one of the two men was so. Those that caught the wiry male's rebuttal would know it was the Frenchman and not the Russian, and that the thief was a Cloud Flame user interested at least peripherally in their wellbeing.

Both Russians' dubiousness over his being able to remain freelance was probably not a good sign for his eventual aims. As Sonya held a reputation that had enabled his mostly safe if marginalized survival, on an island too far out in international waters to be policed by any one government or association, without her there to breath down necks and Adrik was another raised in this lifestyle they likely did know what they were trying to warn him of.

Not being particularly dimwitted or slow, the scientist could easily understand his current aim would be hard if not nearly impossible at his current level of ignorance. He had no reputation, knew of any acceptable skills beyond the combat or Flame orientated few, nor connections in the 'trade of violence' to enable his success… and it was possible he had to work up to something approaching or similar to the Soviet thief's current reputation in order to accomplish his goal.

However, Verde also wasn't particularly committed to even the idea of joining any group or collection of criminal types on a whim.

No matter how one tried to explain or reword the premise, to him 'join a syndicate for the protection' sounded a small part like 'go with the first/easiest group that shows any interests'. Given the lack of talk on any 'leave' option, it was likely the joining would be considered permanent for life.

Research could be done, and information compiled on their various aims, but they would not be his directions nor aims and that did not really greatly appeal. As there was still a chance he would not have to, that was what he wanted to explore before resigning himself to following those that would not share his interests at all.

Dissatisfaction and boredom were two states Verde was regretfully familiar with. He was equally as aware of his reactions when presented with either, which was likely things any 'boss' would take issue with. Few would appreciate a subordinate dropping whatever duty or project to get embroiled in something completely different and be highly reluctant to return to the previous work.

He could foresee several ways his new 'freelance' situation could eventually resolve. Either he used his scientific skills to engineer designer drugs or manufacture pharmaceuticals outside the purview if any medical safety board or industry oversight committees, or somehow sold himself on the still unfamiliar Dying Will Flames of Lightning in a stereotyped but still possible 'bruiser' role.

Verde was not a physical man, so relying on his Lightning skill of 'Harden' and acquiring more combat-oriented traits to become a guard or criminal enforcer was not palpable to him. Beyond what he was comfortable with or was willing to do that he had not actually defined yet, he did not have the physique to be fit for such roles.

More than likely, the Lightning attempting to be threatening would rely on whatever weaponry or others he had at hand.

While defense was more than assured with his Flames, offence would require some creative thinking or physical touch. Possible, but not attractive nor mentally stimulating enough to assure some success.
Since that was the case, then just anyone would be equally or more fit for such things and he would not stand out doing so. However, it was likely he would not gain the reputation or information required to meet that six-month deadline either.

Whereas he had the chemical knowhow, at least could afford a bit of seed money to start up a decent amount of production and didn't honestly see an issue in supplying harmful concoctions to those inane enough to abuse or risk their health's integrity by taking them… he was pretty sure doing so would be a terrible, terrible idea.

Lucrative although it might be in the short term, those that became addicted or made their livings off the supply of such would not appreciate a sudden halt on his own terms.

Likely said theoretical situation would become lethal or hazardous to both life and whatever 'reputation' he built then. Being able to 'Harden' one's skin did not evade the issue of poison nor unanticipated attacks from unobserved angles.

Beyond the short-term issues he could expect, being a drug dealer was surprisingly disquieting to him personally as he was fully aware how easily it could be done but held no malicious desires to actually harm the third or even fourth-hand victims of such ploys by proxy.

Leaving him with manufacturing medical compounds, possibly utilizing his previous college experiences in some way to diversify his illegal portfolio of crimes, and the lone medical text Tatiana Primakova had allowed him to take possession of as she had a more inclusive volume acquired shortly after purchasing the second-hand text for her own studies.

Given his prior scholastic record, the Frenchman was well aware he would eventually tire of medical sciences or whichever eventual aim he sought after to 'make' his reputation among the criminals of his home country. However, he at least intended to have more than enough information that the next time someone became physically infirm near him he could at least identify what the likely complication was and what could be done in aid.

"Figured something out yet?"

Verde winced, glancing to the door that had been silently opened while he had been otherwise occupied with pondering out his current goals.

To say Adrik had been less than thrilled with his decision was understating things greatly. The Russian's outlook had yet to improve any even a full night and a morning away from both the place and time of said incident, and the scientist was fully aware the other man didn't have to stick around to help him.

Frankly, he actually didn't understand why he was still here helping him if he was annoyed with the situation.

Yes, Sonya was paying the man a wage to provide him advice and rudimentary instruction on a few skills… but a phone number would fulfill most of that without the personal attentions being present offered. He could hope the other man was still around because of a possible bond of comradery, but it was more likely just career orientated or something along those lines instead.

"…possibly." Answered the Frenchman after a puzzled moment more vainly spent trying to clinically dissect the aims of his fellow, shifting around on the rented hotel bedspread to face the man fully.

"You continually refer to this lifestyle and work as the 'trade of violence', and since I am not a violent man… is there a way to supply the tools of such a trade instead?"
"What, weapon manufacturing?" Adrik questioned skeptically, fully pausing after a moment to give it more thought after his first and probably dismally pessimistic take of it. "...actually, I could maybe see that. Eventually. But... right now? You'd need a factory at least, and a workforce to boot, before anything like that would become profitable enough to warrant your continued independence. And then their desire to gain control of the local weapon maker would be another sort of headache for you."

"Not if they are exceptional weapons." Verde interjected, becoming more interested in the proposed course the more he processed it. "Not if they are Flame weapons."

The wiry, but still more physically fit than the Lightning, Russian shut one eye and peered at him through the other warily for an achingly long moment. "Verde, that's a tall order. As far as anyone knows, the only things a Flame user can use with their Flames are those rings they sell only on Mafia Land and high melting point metals like tungsten. Everything else tends to go... poof, in various levels of violence. With all the money the Zolotov girls poured into maybe finding cheaper alternatives, and I'm talking easily a billion if not more in euros, Sonya still has yet to find something that will reliably work for more than one or two types at a time."

"Admittedly a bit ambitious, but that would be a long-term goal if possible." Backtracked the scientist after adjusting to the information that his loosely termed 'patron' had more information he had not thought to ask for. That would require another round of negotiations with the Russian thief, and Verde was uncertain if he needed the added motivations to finish this 'quest' of his quickly in order to obtain it. "As for right now, commissioned pieces customized for a buyer's need. Handguns without the serial numbers, for instance. Poisons, some... certain chemical compounds for ill deeds or medications not normally widely distributed, effective industrial cleaners or acids to remove evidence from law enforcement. Manufactured weaponry to industry specifications to allow for aftermarket parts or customization, but without needing to evade the regulation of such arms nominally applied by the government and law enforcement."

Adrik pursed his lips, but the ghost of a smirk did tilt his mouth up a bit and gave the Frenchman a bit of hope. "You're going to have to be insanely careful with that. The wrong step, trusting the wrong person at just the right time, and that could backfire spectacularly."

"Indubitably."

"...who the hell even says that these days, Verde my man?"

"Obviously, I do." Countered Verde, depressingly aware of how pleased he was that things seemed now to be less tense between them.

He rolled his eyes, taking various food containers out of the bag that had been hanging off his wrist for the last few minutes of conversation to hand over. "Whatever. Here, eat up. We've got... a lot of shit to do and ground to cover, and precious little time to do it in. Boss lady's doing heists locally around here, which might muddy our trail for at least a few days, but then we're on our own."

Taking the small brown paper covered beignet, which was likely to be the main part of their breakfast for the day, he gave the other man a questioning look. "Sonya is still around?"

"Boss lady is a thief, a working one. She's got... a few days? Or so here. She originally set that time aside for setting us somewhere to test out a syndicate... then she had something to do but would've been back in a week or so to move us somewhere else if we hadn't liked that option."

Adrik shrugged, setting his own wrapped pastry to the side and digging out some fresh fruit next to dole out. "She said she'd ensure it was big, showy, and more importantly at least recognizably her doing things so if anyone tried to start after you real early they'll end up sidetracked chasing a ghost of you
Verde accepted that, and the few not-quite-ripe pears, silently without asking if another meeting could be arranged with the woman. Fully aware he could be annoying to others when he was after something specific did not make waiting any more attractive of a proposition.

Although highly tempted to ask anyways, he was still the 'green rookie'. Gallingly enough, again and without being able to utilize his prior scholastic studies as a type of credit towards being 'reliable'.

He was somewhat certain that with the stakes as high as they had been trying to impress on him the night before there would be no 'hazing' as with his freshman college experiences. However, this was a very 'sink or swim' style situation regardless.

Either he'd succeed, and therefore evade cumbersome ties with dubious individuals he shared nothing but a homeland with, or he'd fail and possibly die or be horribly maimed in the process.

At least then his jaggedly emerald, supernatural seeming ability with 'Lightning Flames' would then be of some use other than to guard him against his minor mishaps with his equipment.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 8th of August, 1969 continued. Montpellier, Hérault, French Republic.)

As good as Bjørn was as a Lackey these days, his ability to get her things to do was still limited by the actual contracts others had put in to the Thieves' Hall. Other than that, when asked if he needed anything he merely trite and minor things which really didn't impact her too much to afford him.

There were no Mafia Land contracts to steal something in Montpellier, France. No good ones she'd like, anyways. While on one hand that was good, meaning she had the ability and leeway to work at her own pace and leisure, it also meant Sonya would have to get creative in order to attract the attention off Verde and Adrik.

Montpellier was a university town, slightly more inland than most coastal cities tended to be. There wasn't any major Greek or Roman architecture that it had been built up from, although it did have a few interesting gardens and old medieval architecture along a few streets.

It also had a shit ton of churches.

Annoyed, the thief stubbornly turned away from the various cathedrals and monasteries when she came across them. If she did steal something from them, and she was highly tempted to, every damn time she attended church with Shamal she'd think or remember nothing else.

Attending Mass was already awkward enough, she'd adjust first before making it more so.

An ancient Jewish mikveh was not really that interesting, but she spent a few minutes staring at the square bath thing with steps set well below ground level and wondering what the fuck it was used for anyways.

Upon leaving that little tourist attraction, as apparently said mikveh was now not a valid one due to shifts in the water-table and therefore just a historic curiosity now… although how that was decided was entirely beyond her but something else to wonder, the blonde Russian set off down another cobblestone road to try to find something.

Anything interesting. Preferably something interesting that she could steal, and maybe eventually sell.
What was currently popular?

Aside jewelry and shiny metals, she had more than enough of that crap and didn't honestly want to steal French jewelry this week.

There were the vineyards, while liquor was always useful it wasn't really attention grabbing nor really that risky for her. She could steal several barrels at a time, which would only confuse the civilians but not really alarm or grab the attention of the local French syndicates. Equally so for any other food-items, she knew stealing cheese was still a thing that surprisingly enough paid decently in the right markets but that wasn't 'impressive' either.

Sonya sidestepped the pickpocket trying to use the semi-crowded streets to cover his snatch for her purse, flashing the young kid a warning glance to get him to back off her with a bit of Storm Flames in her eyes to hammer that home. The moment he did step backwards she made an abrupt left onto another suitably 'main' road to get away from any possible accomplices.

From the startled oath he gave at her back before he bolted off, said pickpocket hadn't been aware that was possible for a select branch of humanity.

Well, not her problem. Kid would either learn more eventually or forever wonder if she had been demonic or something.

Her semi-unexpected detour took the Russian to the Place de la Comédie, a fairly open square in southeast part of the city, ringed with various eateries and large buildings. She looked between the large fortress turned high school on one end to the railway station Gare de Montpellier Saint-Roch, and then to the Italian style Opéra Comédie on another side of said square.

She'd done an auditorium heist before, nothing that was kept in train stations stood out to her as a good target, and robbing a school was just… no.

Stumped, and irritated that she was so, Sonya blindly stalked off in another direction entirely and probably irritated others that she cut in front of to leave the square quickly.

Not being very creative had never before been an issue for her, but she supposed that was the pitfall in relying on contracts for the bulk of her work. A random heist should not be this hard, she was a thief that had lived two lives and could magically summon lilac or crimson fire to her hands. Skirting a tourist group that sounded as if they were from Britain, an unusually large one which suggested either a tour group or a school production but while one was semi-lucrative to pickpocket the other was less so, ended up forcing the Russian to stop short of the paved walkway to a rather large building.

The Storm-Cloud blinked at the tan building, and then wondered if Lisa's comments on the difficulties of robbing museums took Mafia Land's contact network into account or not.

That, she was semi-sure, was the Musée Fabre.

She'd done a museum before, and another one rather recently for those armor pieces, so… well, she did need the practice from recent events.

She was getting a house, right?

Might as well do a bit of pre-purchase scouting for decorations and things. Björn could store things for her in his apartment, as her storage unit was a bit full up of books and other papery goods.

Hopefully there wouldn't be anything too ugly or disgustingly ornate she might like. At least she'd be able to sell the worst of it to fund some better decorations if need be.

…hmm, maybe there'd be books?

(Saturday the 9th of August, 1969. Musée Fabre, Montpellier, Hérault, French Republic.)

Eyeing her sturdy brown leather boots as they helped support her high overhead a few security guards, the very same pair she had ruined and then replaced this very summer, Sonya basically loitered about the rafters of a museum's painting galley while the guards below finished their inspections and locked the building down.

As per her usual when waiting on other people to get a move on so she could start working, she occupied herself thinking about something she had started to wonder about but wanted some actual privacy in her mind first in order to do so. The fact that she had to wait for a time like this in order to be assured she had that was a thought for another time, since something else had become a bit more concerning.

Horatiu the cordwainer, Crina's fellow Romanian bootmaker in the Ukraine, apparently really liked her legs. Just to admire, not in any way that could be taken which could possibly be less flattering and all around creepier.

She wasn't sure how she felt about that. Not that she was bothered by the idea, if he did then he did and if he didn't then she could care less, but… the ideas it gave her were a bit unusual.

They were… legs. Things you stood on and helped with the locomotion most required for getting from point A to point B. The fact some people just liked legs was something she had been aware of but hadn't connected to her own possession of the same feature, meaning the idea that someone else might like her legs for more than being supposedly just aesthetically pleasing.

The thief wondered if she liked legs too or was it 'off' to her. Was she more an 'arms' person, or did she appreciate another aesthetic feature of another human?

Honestly, she had no idea.

She couldn't recall if Rachel had been a leg woman, or how she knew if she did or not like some physical feature, or anything among the previously personal details about her former lifetime.

That was… a tad bit unnerving to realize. Especially since that meant her assertion to Renato's face, that sex was not particularly exciting nor interesting, had then been based off of forgotten memories she actually couldn't recall enough to make accurate use of.

Furthermore, any other assumption she had made off her former lifetime was now suspect. If she couldn't say with certainty why she thought certain things about said subjects, then it was entirely possible she was erroneously recalling the information.

Sonya pointed her toes, curiously watching the flex of the leather contort to allow the movement as a series of security measures were set below her.

…she did like boots, at least. Or her boots, it was not certain yet if it was all boots or just the ones she acquired for herself that were comfortable and functional.

She hadn't really attempted to study the same subject on another's form to know if it spread to more than just her own boots.

Taking the fact she did like her boots, which she was certain was true since they were on her and she could appreciate them easily enough without having an issue trying to, the thief then wondered if that would apply to another wearing similar or these boots.

Which was… kind of odd for her to be thinking, but…

The lights dimmed on her before she could then decide what she wanted to do about this recent wonder of hers. Annoyed, she glanced over and down and the ground floor to check if things were finished on their ends.

In this day and age, Sonya had to worry mainly about the security on the displays rather than the floors or walls since guard patrols were still a thing. Doors leading outside and windows were also another issue, but ones she could avoid by not needing to open them in the first place.

Honestly speaking, in her last museum heist, she did the stupid thing by breaking the glass displays. Breaking the glass nominally set off vibration detectors which rung alarms in security booths and could occasionally be wired directly to police stations, if the establishment was important enough. An issue of time or not, that was not how she'd be doing this night's work.

It was similar to the same situation with the display in jewelry stores, and most other boutiques that sold pricy and small objects. Break the glass, set off alarms. That was part of why they knew how to pick locks, since going through the part of the display made to be opened often was just easier.

However, museums also had pressure switches and infrared motion detectors to also worry about. Moving the displayed items, or even putting a finger into space she shouldn't be, would also set off alarms.

Mildly annoying in and of itself, but there were also security cameras and guards to avoid.

Hence, as with her first ever museum heist, going after the displays were not really a good idea.

The backroom storage of past displays, items being refurbished or prepped to be displayed, or just the shipping and receiving part of any museum were insanely easier to steal from. Or, at least, not unless you wanted to make a statement.

Sonya needed to make a statement. She also needed to make a big enough statement that both the civilian law enforcement and the French syndicates would sit up and pay attention to her and not a random Lightning sneaking off with Adrik up north somewhere.

So… she would be doing stupid, risky things tonight and tomorrow night in hopes of making said statement.

Yay.

Even if most, or all, of the display pieces were fakes used to prevent just this situation.

Nothing was moving beneath her, so she dug out the polaroid she took of the galley from the perspective of the security camera right next to her while there was still enough daylight in the building so she could cover up the flash and still get a recognizable image. Using a spool of lightweight wire taken from her pack, she made a holder for the picture and as quickly as she could posed the picture before the lens and ensured it would stay until morning.

That done, Sonya sat back to wait five minutes before moving onto the next security camera in this gallery. Then, after she was done with this wing of the building, she'd do the same to the displays she marked out to steal from until she had a block of space secured.

Then she'd use the hardware tools she also bought in the city to break into the displays to rewire the security on select displays. The wire cutters, some more wires, a flathead screwdriver, various lengths of insulated wire, and a pair of leather gloves took up a tiny part of her available pack space next to the carefully wrapped camera she had already made use of.

Getting whatever out of here would be simple enough, waiting for dawn to arrive she'd take a crate she had watched be emptied the previous day when she was setting up for this and fill it with whatever. Once someone did arrive to the museum to start the pre-opening chores, she'd simply force her way out of the building in a way that looked as if an inattentive employee had forgotten some part of the security arrangement on the back-loading dock.

The truck she had rented and parked a street away was the riskiest part, as she'd have to carry said crate to it in the daylight.

Hopefully she could find the lid and pretend it was empty if unwieldy.

Out of everything she had to buy and would be hopefully making away with, ironically enough it was the Polaroid camera she was most fond of. She wasn't particularly artsy, so the paintings she decided were not that weird or just bemusing to be stolen tonight and the statues she would only be taking because they were old and therefore 'ancient' enough to be pricy, would mostly be sold unless Tatiana wanted one or two.

Assuming they weren't fakes, that was.

The camera she had wanted for Shamal's childhood, the art and antiques were just a means to an end to her.

Which her outlook would help a small amount, truthfully. She wouldn't be 'holding onto' incriminating evidence, at least.

She was a terrible, terrible solo thief. It was always 'need to', and never 'want'. Maybe she should just try a bank robbery on her own time next. It would certainly cover the money issues she was continually plagued by.

…or maybe a university library.

Sonya scowled into the dim light, tugging one sleeve back in order to study the wristwatch in order to see if enough time had passed yet to move onto the next security camera.

She had no place to put more books, so she couldn't do that any time soon.

Damn it.

(Tuesday the 12th of August, 1969. Grand Hôtel du Midi Châteaux's Café, Montpellier, Hérault, French Republic.)

"-no, because I will be leaving today."

"Rémy, I don't think-"
"Rémy?" The willowy blonde repeated blankly, glancing over a shoulder at the two men approaching her table. "…Rémy Sartre?"

"Miss Sonya de Mort, I thought I recognized your lovely voice."

Bjørn frowned and gave the man that interrupted his meeting with his patron a questioning look, which didn't seem to register with the interloper as he only had eyes for the Russian that rose from her chair to greet him. His fellow was at least more appreciatively responsive to the rather rude interruption, shifting a bit sheepishly in his cheap fake-leather shoes.

…when the hell did the former street-rat from Iceland become such a snob?

Viper might have a heart-attack for not getting the business part of their meeting out of the way first and foremost, but as the thief was providing the funds he was living off of what she wanted was what they were going to do.

With a wry sigh at himself, the Lackey set aside the few contracts he found for Sonya and instead gestured to the maître d to allow the interruption and to bring more seats.

"I honestly did not expect to see you this far southeast, truthfully." The Russian informed the first man in a tone that could be mistaken as bland but to her Lackey's ear sounded rather fond really. "I owe you some coffee, don't I?"

"Ah, well…" The man fumbled, seemingly only just realizing he was interrupting a meeting of the business sort.

'Remy Sartre' glanced to Bjørn back to the woman questioningly, but he was interrupted from saying anything by the two busboys the head waiter had directed to their table with the extra chairs and the additional menus to order from.

"Apparently nothing will be decided today that is time-sensitive." Offered the Icelandic teenager in some honest amusement, collecting the files to slot back into the carrying case he had invested in for just these kinds of meetings with his patron. "Don’t mind me, I'll just eat something while I can."

"Once you're done, I can use a set of plane tickets to reach Bethel, New York. Or however close you can get me to it." Sonya directed, before getting distracted by the second man's obvious peeking at her Lackey's paperwork while he took a seat between them on one side of the little café table. "Preferably today. Logistics for this last shipment delayed me too much to be comfortable as it is."

"…why is this contract for paintings by François-Xavier Fabre?"

She blinked at eldest of them seated at their tiny table intended only for two blankly. "Because that is what the client wants and therefore is what is written on those?"

"They were stolen two days ago." He informed her a bit bluntly, suspiciously. "From the Fabre Museum. Have you paid no attention to the headlines lately?"

The thief blinked a few more times as she absorbed that, and the fact it was for something she had already stolen and was likely part of what she had him ship off before sitting down to a late brunch together. "…oh."

He sighed, removing that contract from the set he was about to return to a leather folder and handing it back across the table for her to peruse. "That is actually why that contract exists, it's for a print or reproduction of one of the stolen paintings. The attention suddenly directed to those artists is likely why someone wants a copy of a specific and now missing one."
“…huh. I can do this one then.” Muttered Sonya to herself in bemusement glancing over the file only in what seemed to be pure curiosity.

As she finally stopped insisting that she was about to leave and realized she might want to look over the things he could arrange for her, before she took more personal time off, the Icelander marked the edge so he could arrange to have it fulfilled.

Obviously, as a Mafia Land thief, she could read between the lines that made it sound more for a ‘safely legal’ copy of the actually stolen paintings in question to the ‘to whomever it may concern we want this back and will pay heavily to have it’ message under it whereas the other man was only just suspicious.

News agencies in this day and age were getting pretty good of disseminating information around and, with how damn indispensable the Mafia Land networked supply lines were in smuggling efforts to the criminal underground alone, someone posting an open-ended contract to hopefully reach a thief of a specific heist wasn't actually that strange.

He knew of three still open contracts for decades old heists in the Mafia Land's Thieves' Hall, rumor was that all three had been done by the same thief.

"Fabien." Sartre nearly hissed across the table reprovingly before turning back to the Storm-Cloud and gesturing to the still unidentified man. "My apologies, Miss de Mort. This is Inspector Fabien Laflèche, with the SDLCODP. The Sub-Directorate for the struggle against organized crime and financial delinquency. That… museum break-in is what he was just assigned, and why he's being a rude fellow in such company."

"...ho?"

"Inspector, this is Sonya de Mort. A former client of mine and a historical researcher when not acquiring things for her company's clients."

Bjørn carefully ensured his surprise and chagrin wasn't painted across his face from hearing he was yet again interacting with the local police about a crime they had a hand in but were about to pretend they knew nothing about. "I would be her 'handler', or the one that arranges for said clients to hire her through while she's on the move. Mishka Aleskeevich."

Sonya twitched nearly invisibly, telling the Lackey that he might've mangled Russian naming customs or she found his assumed name a bit strange.

She forced a slightly wry little smile of her own before looking back at the man that started this little interruption. "So, as we can entirely do coffee right now since I finally have some breathing room… what brings you to Montpellier, detective?"

Oh… they both were law enforcement. Wonderful.

"Ah… I was asked-"

"For consultation an ongoing investigation we can't speak of, miss. Sorry." His slightly older and admittedly a bit better dressed fellow cop interrupted a bit hastily but he did at least muster up a slightly sheepish smile for them. "Although you could probably guess on what topic, but we’re really not to speak of it."

"But enough about work." Insisted the private investigator that Bjørn finally recalled he had the card of somewhere in his office rolodex. "Can I ask about your brother…?"
"Skull has a world-tour next year, our older sister and I are about to meet up in America to get him a new motorcycle for it." Wryly admitted the thief a bit self-deprecatingly herself, a tiny twist to her own lips masquerading as a wry little smirk of her own. "Hopefully I'll remember to ask if he can send you a French-orientated ticket to a showing if he can."

Rémy Sartre gaped for a split second before he shut his mouth a bit quickly.

"I'm pretty sure he'd love to meet you… I think. I actually don't know how he deals with any fans but given what a goofy dork he can be I can make a decent guess."

Bjørn actually didn't know her brother all that well, honestly. Certainly not nearly as well as he knew her mother, sister, and father. A few glancing meetings did not make a good estimation of any man, but the very purple man did seem pretty affable in person.

At least when around one or both of his sisters, anyways.

"…some men have all the luck." Inspector Lafleche muttered to himself, shifting a bit uncomfortably when the waiters set two additional hors d'oeuvres plates and glasses out for them around his elbows.

Snickering, even if that topic was a bit strange given that the woman was more like highly demanding and strict aunt than someone to objectify like that, he put in the order for the 'coffee' his Dama apparently owed the private investigator with one of the waiters. "Ah well, lucky him. Breakfast?"

"…if it's not too much trouble." Responded the elder man after a beat of looking taken aback then a bit sheepish yet again. "I didn't eat before leaving home this morning, it was a bit of a trip to pick Rémy up and get here in time."

"Since my business partner is a bit occupied, the company would be appreciated." Bjørn tempted smoothly, a bit despairing that he somehow picked up his patron's complete nonchalance when it came to law enforcement.

Between her example and Viper's unholy dictations and Mist Flames, he could easily fake what he didn't really feel in the face of someone that might have a few issues with how he made a living.

"You have my sympathies about odd hour work, I've seen a bit of it myself with red eye flights all over the world."

Maybe, maybe, the other will end up spilling a bit of information about his just started investigation. It wouldn't kill anything to try, since his patron seemed interested in something about her private eye and was now greatly distracted, he did have the time to spare.

(Wednesday the 13th of August, 1969. John F. Kennedy International Airport, Queens, New York, United States of America.)

"There you are." Tatiana exclaimed exasperatedly, rounding the luggage caravel and glomping her little sister hard enough to almost pull her off her feet. Hopefully that was 'hardest' and she could fend off extra hugs on the point they both were here. "Cherep and I have been up and down the same stretch of tiled room at least three times already."

Said stuntman poked the redhead in the side, to engineer her release and to give Sonya a touch gentler hug of his own. "Sup, little sis. Can I ask why you had us come here now, or what?"

"I am a little surprised you two have not heard yet, actually." Sonya offered absentely, still trying to find her pack in the little rotating machine. "But, as you have not, then I am not going to ruin the surprise."

The nurse huffed, snagging the thief's backpack before she could spot it and letting it thump to their brother's feet. "Then can I ask why you had us pack 'things you will not mind being ruined or lost'? Cause I've got to say, Nya, doing anything that would result in something like that doesn't sound like… a lot of fun."

"I will remind you that you said so in two or three days." Taunted the blonde with a smug little smirk.

Cherep laughed, sneaking in another hug even if she shot him a glare for it. "Awesome. So, since we got here early, I got a head start on finding myself a bike. Found a good one for stunts, but I wasn't sure if I should go ahead and buy it or not. Tats had me rent a car, so…"

"No, that might be more a thing to do before we leave." Finally grabbing a hold on the duffle bag she had packed with the provisions she figured they might like to have with them, she hefted that one over a shouder instead of risk bursting one of the plastic containers she intended to fill with a lot of water. "The car is a good idea, getting there before tomorrow night will either take a short trip through a shit ton of traffic or one heck of a walk."

"A… wait." Tatiana frowned at her, more thoughtful than mad. "I heard about some great traffic pile up on the radio last night."

While her fellow Cloud was giving her backpack an odd look as he picked it up, probably since she had it packed to the brim with camping equipment and dried provisions, he was at least paying attention enough to chip in himself. "Yeah, about something up in Bethel, right?"

"They're calling it Woodstock." Sonya confirmed, pleased with herself for actually getting this started and them both here to attend. "It's a music festival."

The Sun user arched a red eyebrow at her, placing a hand on her hip. "We're here for a music festival? In the middle of the United States?"

"Trust me, you will enjoy this. Or hate it completely." Really, even in the decades to come, no one would agree if it was the greatest music festival of the age or a complete disaster-fest. "We really should have been ready to go two days ago to get around the traffic, but that thing with Adrik and Verde decided to drag out on me and I needed a few days to ensure their trail was muddy."

"With said traffic," interjected their brother a bit absently, "wouldn't a motorcycle be more versatile than a car?"

"Can you fit all three of us on it?" Demanded Tatiana in return, still looking skeptical and a bit confused.

"Since Nya's like… half a person because of how short she is-" His words were cut abruptly off after getting one end of the duffle bag rammed into his stomach. "Oof. Ow. Okay, not half a person."

"You fail to take into account any luggage or personal effects in that. And I," insisted the thief flatly, "am average height for a woman. I am totally normal-sized and happy with that. You are a damn freak of nature, mister taller-than-everyone-else-but-Arseniy."
The nurse laughed, bumping hips with the stuntman who chuckled a bit sheepishly. "What does that make me then?"

"Busty."

Tatiana glanced downward and readjusted her shirt's collar down a bit to show off more cleavage cheerfully even if Cherep then whined about her doing so in public. "Damn straight."

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 13th of August, 1969 continued. Queens, New York, United States of America.)

"...seriously, though. I think the motorcycle-

"Cherep, do please stop. Not everything would fit on such thing."

Rolling his eyes for what seemed to be the fourth time in the last half hour, the stuntman went back to inching their rented car down maybe half a foot down the road.

"There are at least two days before the festival is supposed to start." Sonya informed both her siblings a bit tartly, slouching in order to stretch out her legs across the backseat's bench. "Maybe a hundred miles, a hundred and fifty kilometers, to get to the town this is being held outside of. Yes, traffic is bad. That is why I asked you both to be here well before it can get to 'gridlock'."

Tatiana gave a gusty sigh of pure boredom, then wound herself around the back of the passenger's seat to snatch at her purse. "You've got a book or something to pass the time with, right?"

"So!" Cherep interjected before his sisters could get into some kind of bitchy snip-fest that looked to be building since the nurse kept on being skeptical of what she had brought them to see. "What's the plan, anyways? Get a hotel or something in this Bethel town, or what?"

"Camp out, actually." Responded their baby sister, flicking away the grasping hands and digging through her purse herself. She came out with a heavily abused paperback and a pack of cigarettes. "If we get a good spot, losing it will be a bitch."

"Oh no. No, no, and no. Put those away, little sis."

"Cherep, do you mind if I smoke back here?" Inquired the Storm-Cloud in a sugary sweet tone.

"Heh... no, I don't really care." Ignoring the punch to his floating ribs from his right, the former Czechoslovakian run-away merely cranked down his own window. "Just please open the two windows back there, please. Before Tats breaks my ribcage."

"But it's fucking hot out there." Whined the Sun using nurse, throwing herself to the other side of her seat to not only crank down her window but also make use of the noon sunlight beating down on the highway for reading. "And that's bad for you."

She heaved a sigh of her own as she pulled a cylinder of paper filled with tobacco out of the thin cardboard pack of them. "I seriously wonder why you think I am stupid enough to not know, or be ignorant of, the consequences of smoking."

"You keep doing it."

"Which means that I am fully aware of and accept the fact it is not healthy." Stated the thief flatly, flicking a tiny lavender Flame to life in the cup of her palm to light her so contested cigarette. "Strictly speaking, even with the risk smoking imparts, the fact is these will probably not contribute much to my eventual death. Either I will end up dead from my work, some enemy of Renato's or another friend's, my own detractors, to keep Omertà intact, some fresh scut who wanted a boost to their reputation and got lucky, or just from taking stupid risks that end up backfiring on me."

"Or you'll get lung cancer." Tatiana threw back shortly, slouching in her seat. "Throat cancer, mouth cancer, a cyst somewhere along that, maybe even just a severely compromising frequent upper respiratory infections that might suffocate you to death."

"Or I might walk into traffic at exactly the wrong time and get hit by a truck." Countered the blonde in the backseat equally as tartly. "I could spend the next however many years obsessing over what may kill me, or I could live like it will not last. Which… it will not."

Cherep raised a finger, wagging it between his sisters. "I… actually kind of like her answer."

"…probably because that is why I do not harp on your case about your career."

"Point, however," another wag, "I still like the sentiment. And Tats, I know you would prefer us to keep as healthy as possible… but, is that possible? I mean, I risk broken bones and every complication that can come from blunt force trauma. And that's… a civilian's job description."

The nurse sulked in her spot, the paperback long since abandoned to her lap for the duration of this conversation. "I do not understand why people do unhealthy things. They know it hurts them, but the ignore it to continue the hazardous actions. And then when they get sick, of course they fail to realize that not just they are the only ones affected. Nya, how would your brat feel about you killing yourself inch by inch?"

Stopping cold, she processed that for a long moment as the smoldering cigarette halfway to her lips.

"Oi, Tats, that's a bit below the belt."

"No, no it's not. It's something she should take into account before continuing her nasty habits. I'm just being a bit of a bitch in pointing it out." Snapped back his older sister, poking a finger into the stuntman's bicep. "You know why I do this, and frankly her bambino does not deserve to suffer through that too."

"Not entirely similar, Tats. You were what? Five? Bambino is older than that, and Nya's still as healthy as a horse."

"Um… yeah. Speaking of that. She's got three years of immunization shots to redo."

He glanced over at her sharply, then through the rearview mirror at the thief in question. "Well. Fuck."

"What?" Sonya finally spoke up, tucking the previous query away to actually ask the Italian 'baby' in question later. Shamal might or might not care but asking should probably be something to do.

Even still, she examined the cigarette she had with a measure of concern.

Tatiana tossed her fiery red hair in an impatient gesture. "I'm calling in reinforcements."

"…this winter?"

"Sounds good to-"
"...what reinforcements?"

"If, when you're deliriously sick, you bend something a normal human can't..."

"Oh." Well, at least it wasn't the so-called 'childhood story' Cherep kept trying to pass off as true. If it was, she'd recall something along those lines. "Right, about that. It might take until next year for me to get enough time for that."

"What is more important than ensuring your vaccinations are up to date?" Demanded the professional nurse sitting in the passenger's seat suspiciously.

"The twenty, at least, contracts I need for that shared apartment for us. Whatever it was that Fong wanted me for that will be requesting me by name. Shamal weaseled two Christmas celebrations out of me and Renato, so there's also the Vongola Christmas Ball to shop around for and later attend." Expounded the thief dryly, batting the hand holding her cigarette around to emphasis her point. "I have... what? Fifteen right now? Or at least, it will be fifteen once Björn processes that contract. It might be iffy if I can get all that done this year alone, to be truthful."

Tatiana turned half-around in her seat to give her a hard look. "What about Adrik?"

"...Verde decided to take the hard way out of his troubles." Offered her little sister slowly, glancing backwards out the back windshield as if that would allow her to see what was happening in France. "Adrik was intent on helping him through it, no matter how stupid he found it, so I am paying him to do so and get the scope of French syndicates for me. Fuck knows when I will be able to use that, but..."

Blinking at her a few times, their older sister sighed heavily. "I'll pay you back for this, Nya. Or Adrik will. Or I'll make Nicholai pay you. Somehow. But thank you for letting him live on your kopeck, even if that time is starting to get a bit tight."

Sonya shrugged uncomfortably. "Well... you asked."

She pursed her lips at her, then glanced to the side to Cherep. "...can I ask you get a move on, then?"

Their brother made a frustrated gesture to the road ahead of their rented car, so his sisters could take in the bumper-to-bumper packed road ahead of them. "How? If you have a suggestion, I'm all ears."

"Go off-road?" Suggested the nurse instantly.

She flicked some ash out of the window. "Play tourist and drive on the wrong side of the road?"

"Take the back roads instead?" Continued the redhead restlessly with a cheerful smirk.

"Do either of you want to drive instead?" Asked the stuntman exasperatedly, carefully bullshitting a turn that required them to drive slightly down the median just to reach before being hit by oncoming traffic. His slamming on the gas to get them through in time nearly threw Tatiana into the passenger side door, and had Sonya nearly tumbling to the floor of the car, had the sisters not been buckled in. "You two seem to have a lot of opinions for passengers in this rental."

"We're women, we always have opinions." Tatiana threw back with a bit of a disgruntled edge to her tone, and then she searched around her legs a bit frantically to the point both her siblings got distracted by whatever had alarmed her. "Uh... oh shit."

"What?"
"NOTHING!" Slamming her ramrod stiff spine against the back of her seat, the nurse gave her siblings a slightly too-stiff seeming wide smile. Which also looked as plastic as the car's dashboard. "Absolutely nothing."

"What are you looking-" The stuntman cut himself off, looking a bit spooked himself now. "You didn't. Please tell me you didn't."

"I didn't!"

"Did not what?" Sonya questioned curiously from the backseat.

"NOTHING!"

She blinked at the back of her older sister's head, then narrowed her eyes suspiciously. "Tatiana… what happened to my book?"

"No killing each other in the car! Or ever, thank you!" Cherep hastily threw into the air between the siblings himself, putting a bit more weight on the gas pedal than strictly legal on these non-highway roads. "We'll get you a different one, okay Nya? A better one."

"…I had not finished reading that, Tatiana!"

---

(Thursday the 14th of August, 1969. An underground meeting room, Temple Street Market, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

The three men seated in the middle of the ornately detailed dining room were probably arguably the most powerful men in the Triads.

They were not quite ready to speak yet, so no one else would say a word of the subject they were gathered to discuss until they were.

Set behind them and their three couches, set in a triangle shape in the middle of the room to facilitate any discussions, were the twenty-one subordinate organizations. They shared smaller and individual tables with the one bodyguard they were allowed for this meeting. Those slightly less important but still powerful figures were arranged in a careful pattern, behind their allied organizations and branches but separated from hostile or rival ones.

Behind even them was a gallery of tables and seating, but the fringes were almost completely removed from being able to suggest anything in the meeting that had yet to take place. Their slightly higher position allowed for a good view of the depressed 'meeting room' it overlooked but was isolating by the same respect.

Fong was bored out of his mind in this pre-meeting tea and shaojiu, but as appearances had to be maintained and as everyone else had brought their picked fighters as 'bodyguards' his Triad's Mountain Master had brought him along in the stead of his nominal aide.

There were things he could learn from the power struggles on display between separate Triad branches, a fight waged with honeyed words and silken promises or cutting looks and grudging nods instead of fist and blade. It did not greatly interest him even if it was a method to fight with, but there were options to focus on.

…but nothing was really being discussed beyond the already confirmed details of the upcoming martial arts tournament, and the parts of the rules that had been decided upon so far. Most of the rest of the current dinner conversation was all about whose fighter was cutting a more impressive figure, or the speculations on what might be the prize for having the ultimate winner.

Discussing the business they were here for before the 'hosts' of this meeting were ready would be in bad taste. And probably really foolish.

Hence why Fong, and a great number of the other martial artist he knew at least by sight and reputation more than personally, were all equally either bored or puffing with false arrogance… or worse yet, swelling with uncontrolled ego.

A flash of electric green caught the Storm's eye, and he flicked a glance to the Lightning nearly a third of the room away. If he recalled right, that man used paper-thin blades hidden in his clothing to kill his targets…

Said Lightning of razor death nodded slightly further down the room, and the eventually did allow his eyes to follow the direction after ensuring it wasn't a distraction for any reason.

A fairly familiar face gave him a sharp grin from behind the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad, seated next to the Luen Group Triad Head.

…interesting. Fong nodded to the fellow former student of a former master, folding his hands into his sleeves.

Any martial arts tournament hosted by the Triads would probably not be a safe one. As the Storm using martial artist had been unaware any of his fellow former students were involved in the underworld, he now had to adjust to the idea he might end up killing or bearing witness to a death of someone he knew rather more than most.

Well… it wasn't the first time such a situation had happened. Still, not incidents Fong appreciated in any respect.

The clink of delicate china echoed through the respectfully silent room, as one of the three towering figures in the Triads finally opened up the meeting by setting aside his empty teacup and greeting the others formally.

He blew out a silent sigh as the opening feints went along predictable lines in the center of the room. Of the three Triads that had control of the center of the room one was hosting the tournament, one would hold the hostages before and during it, and the last was judging.

As the organization that suggested the idea, the 14K Triad had control over how the tournament was conducted and finding the appropriately vetted and trained referees. Their main rival, the Sun Yee On Triad which Fong's had a firm alliance with, had control over the location, both the main and backup location to use in case the first was compromised in any way. The Tai Huen Chai Triad would then be taking the hostages in trust, and arguably had the more difficult job in diplomatic terms. Ensuring each other knew how much more important their jobs were was… well, expected really.

Posturing. Attempting to make themselves more threatening or impressive to discourage the backstabbing and political maneuverings that was likely to occur anyways. Not really wasted time, per say, as they were being observed by lesser Triad branches.

"…you seem very calm, Sōng." Zhōng observed lowly, copying his bodyguard for the meeting in how he arranged his arms as they waited for the bulk of the remaining logistics to be worked out. "At "This will not be my first tournament." Fong respectfully reminded his Mountain Master, possibly a touch wistfully but he had enjoyed most of the competitions he ended up attending as a representative of the Wo Hop To Triad. "Likely, this will not be my last. I will leave the posturing and worry to those greener than I."

"The Lightning?"

Nodding slightly, he disguised the motion to the rest of the room by switching which shoulder his long braid rested upon. "He will be an issue, I believe. Disarming someone like that, if this does become a 'no-weapon' tournament which is not guaranteed, will be near impossible."

The Mountain Master of the Wo Hop To Triad turned his head to give him a steady look. "Should we be concerned with the one that made it obvious, or ones that are merely pulling the strings to observe your reactions?"

"As I cannot find them yet, I cannot be assured they do exist." Fong countered calmly but accepted the non-direct rebuke simply enough. "Ah... but keeping an eye open will never be a bad idea."

"No... it never is." Agreed Zhōng wryly, turning back to watching the debate on what the penalties for losing should be.

The obvious buy in to participate, which would contribute to the 'pot' the Triad of whichever fighter won would receive, almost went through without ever being suggested as should be.

After a bit more suggestions of less obvious ties or forfeits were dealt with, the Tai Huen Chai Triad's Head then suggested that any loser would have to indenture their 'hostage' for a time to the winner's specifications.

Fong and Zhōng exchanged a look when the Sun Yee On Triad Head casually mentioned there would be at least one user of Dying Will Flames of Cloud lingering around as a hostage. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.

His Mountain Master took a deep breath, tightening his folded arms. "Remind me to send Huiging a gift basket."

From what the martial artist posing as his bodyguard could see, the Head of the Sun Yee On Triad had looked perfectly happy to use what they had gained from close association with them to tip things being discussed in his favor. Before he could ask how one would enforce that, the suggestion was immediately removed from the table and all agreed it was a bad idea and a jest in poor taste.

As the Storm's last-ditch resort for a hostage had been his little sister, he wondered if he was thankful Sonya finally agreed to his rather impertinent request or merely irritated his suspicions on what might've happened to his sister was likely true.

They now wouldn't know for sure, but the possibility still rankled.
Chapter 76

(Friday the 15th of August, 1969. A pasture outside of Bethel, New York, United States of America.)

Rudely chased from her dreams and back into reality by old gory memories given new and disquieting twists, because her mind was that fucked up sometimes, Sonya waited a few moments to be sure she hadn't woken anyone then sighed heavily into the dark and extracted herself from her warm spot.

From between her siblings.

Which was easier said than done, given one was a former thief herself and the other was a stupidly overly concerned sort who was always up for midnight chats if needed. Worse, they were all sharing the same bed-nest-thing rather than wrapped up in their separate sleeping bags... and it was cold in what was likely the predawn hour.

It had been a good idea last night, even if they had been tired after hiking the last few miles with all the things she'd insisted they bring with. As in the very tent and sleeping bags they had the use of to sleep with and some dried foods and water jugs, which would probably fully prove their efforts in bringing them in only a few more hours.

Getting free and upright without disturbing the both of them took some doing, and achingly slow movements, but the thief managed it with enough time. Then there was getting around Tatiana's loose and long hair splayed out everywhere and trying not to step on Cherep's wide cast limbs. In the dark, already half-bent over in respects to the tent's limited standing space. A bit tricky in any estimation.

She managed to get past her elder sister's contributions to the obstacles before her, but her brother woke up slightly from her leaving a spot near his chest empty and cold. At least she assumed so from the disgruntled shift and frown while she was stepping over him.

A hand gripped her ankle before she reached the tent flap proved he had woke up from something at least. "...Nya? You okay?"

"English, brother dear." She drawled out wryly, shaking her leg in hopes of loosening his grip. "And no, not really. Nightmare, excuse me."

Instead of the expected release, there was a strong tug on her ankle. "Does sitting alone for a while really help all that much? Come back here."

Sonya glanced to the exit, then back to him. From how chilled she was from just standing up, it was probably really cold outside and would remain so until the sun fully rose.

Another sigh, and she crept back to her spot. "I am not going back to sleep. My reactions get worse the more I try."

"Noted." Managed her fellow Cloud around a jaw-cracking yawn. "We can chat instead. Hello, Nya. How are you?"

"You do not have to stay up with me, there is hours before this festival is supposed to kick off."
"I'm not doing anything I don't want to do." Cherep informed her pleasantly, shifting a slight bit so she could face him this time instead of just be curled up on his chest. "Which, however much you don't say anything about it, I am fully aware is partially thanks to you. And in the future, when things finally catch up to me, you'll probably continue to help me remain free to do what I want. So, I guess I can spare you a few minutes."

"...you probably would have been fine on your own." Sonya corrected after a long moment of just lying there listening to his heart beat. "You did manage to make your way out of the parent's home completely on your own terms after winning that motorcycle, all I did was slowed you down a year or so. I think you could have made it without me butting in."

"But, because you did, I have two sisters and a baby brother. A pretty awesome little nephew. Parents, a place to go in-between aims to recover a bit, and more than enough information not to stumble into things I don't want to do." With their positions a hug was a bit awkward, but he managed it anyways. "You might not have had to, and I might've done it alone true... but you did, and I appreciate it anyways."

She huffed into his chest, squirming out of the hold but returning to her previous position instead of drawing away. "Does that make the rest of it worth it?"

He hummed instead of responding right away, tugging a few strands of her own hair absently. "You're the only one that can decide that, little sis. But if it isn't, then maybe whatever it was you're having nightmares over isn't worth it."

"I actually do not think it is worth it, but it happens anyways." Then abstaining from the violence wasn't the appetizing option. "And then I cannot get out of it without harming those that do not deserve it."

That French family, those girls back in Moscow.

Had she not interfered, intentionally or otherwise, they would've been the ones hurt. However, again, it was hard to keep them in mind when they had little impact on her and their antagonists held more influence on her subconscious.

Cherep clicked his tongue, frowning mostly at the canvas overhead before glancing back down to her. "Is there any way to get out of the parts you don't like so much?"

"Part of what makes me terrifying is that issue, and the more I do not do what is expected then the more others will attempt to do worse to me or others I care for in attempts to verify what I am or not." That asshole clerk back in Mafia Land, a bit of the undercurrent of her issues with Gedeon, the staff of the Iron Fort. "I did not earn the reputation, but it seems as if I must continue it even if I do not wish to. Otherwise... you or Tats, or Shamal and Valera, might pay the price for that avoidance."

"...well, that's depressing." He offered after some more thought. "All I can think of to help you is that I won't hate you whatever it is and am always up to distract you if you need it."

"Want to bet on that?"

With a sigh, the stuntman poked her in the forehead a few times. "While I might be the pacifist in the family... I'm also perfectly aware what kind of lives you all opted to have. I did tour a bit of it under Arseniy's eye, remember. I might equally hate war and the thought of hurting someone, but I also know that some people in your lifestyle are utterly ugly people both inside and out. I won't immediately dismiss the issue or turn you away if you really need some help or just someone to talk to."
"I do not really want to talk to you about the issue, because I am perfectly aware you probably will not like the subject matter." Sonya informed him a bit tartly, poking him back in the space between ribs and his arm that her position allowed her to reach. "I have talked to Tats, and there's something that might come up to help later on a bit, but really… right now I just have some nightmares. It's not that bad."

"Bad enough you know what you can and can't do once you wake up, and often enough you're as calm as a clam not five minutes afterwards?" Her fellow Cloud questioned a bit skeptically, trying to shift a leg out a bit more but being foiled by the fact their sister's long hair was wrapped around his calf. "Forgive me for calling bull, little sis."

"I am leery over how much dragging the issue out again and again will help. Perhaps just getting used to it is what I need to do."

He hummed a bit, looking a small amount of conflicted himself.

"How about changing the subject?" Tatiana offered sleepily from behind her, suddenly rolling over to snuggle up to the Storm-Cloud's back. "Like… why are you two awake?"

The younger sister frowned, trying to get out of her elder sister's grasp only to run out of room because their brother wasn't budging. "Because you're hot, Tats."

"Of course I'm hot. Look at me." Blindly gesturing to her body at least let the blonde Russian sit upright instead of remaining prone.

Then Tatiana realized how far her long hair had spread out while they had been asleep and got distracted pulling it free again, which required her to actually open her eyes.

"I think she meant you're a bit warm to snuggle with under thick blankets." Cherep chipped in dryly, still being an obstruction to all efforts and doing it cheerfully. "But yes, the both of you are beautiful. Happy now?"

Blinking at him, then glancing to her sister when she chirped a bright 'aww, thanks', she glanced down at herself to see if she could find the attractive part of her. "What dictates what is thought as 'beautiful' and what is merely 'pretty'? Or 'attractive'?"

Both her siblings stopped dead and looked at her blankly, then the two of them shared a glance of their own even in the gloom of their sleeping space.

"You want to take this one?" Tatiana asked wryly, pushing herself upright now that her hair wasn't wrapped around various limbs or objects. "I already got in trouble with Lisa about possibly 'pushing her into things she wasn't ready for'."

"Erm… fuck, yeah." Her fellow Cloud agreed slowly, running a hand through his own short hair bewilderment. "I can take this. You owe me."

"Excuse you both." Sonya flatly interjected. "I merely asked a question."

"It's not just a question, little sis." The nurse drawled out dryly, flicking a wrist to dismiss that objection. "It's something that will shape how you view others, how you interact with them, and possibly who you allow closer than most. It should be handled by someone whose advice you trust, and who can take a step backwards to help you understand in your own unique ways. I've failed at that once before, may I add. I'm too impatient to help you as you need."

"What, don't you trust me?" Asked their brother as he too finally got sort of upright. "I'll try not to steer you wrong, Nya."

"…okay?"

"If he confuses you to hell and back, I'll take a crack." Promised the Sun glibly, crawling to the tent flap to start their exodus from the confined quarters. "But let's start you off easy like, alright?"

She stared at her back blankly, then glanced to her brother.

Cherep just shrugged, gesturing her to follow their elder sister. "First and foremost, beauty is in the eye of the beholder. But there's a few generally accepted 'guidelines' to separating the pretty from the plain."

Sonya followed as bid, resigning herself to being patronized with good intentions by her siblings.

She had intended to get their views on what was attractive to them, and maybe how she was classified as 'pretty' or 'beautiful', not get a lesson on how to differentiate what was and what wasn't pretty. She already knew she was horrible at figuring that out, since she couldn't tell 'classy' from 'trashy' even to this day.

Hopefully, if she gave it long enough, she'd manage to at least get that much out of her brother.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 15th of August, 1969 continued. Woodstock Music Festival, Bethel, New York, United States of America.)

"…oh, my… god. I hate you."

"I get that was factious." Sonya cut in before Cherep could offer to explain that it wasn't uttered with ill-intent, rubbing her chest where some of the overly-loud notes had thrummed. "I will not take it personally."

Her brother snickered, stretching out his legs as they watched the third act of Woodstock take the stage as the sun started to sink behind the horizon. "Seriously, though. This… is pretty awesome."

There wasn't really a whole lot to see, as the stage was rather bare-bone and obviously a slapped-together kind of affair that still made it clear it was made of particleboard. There were the musicians, the crowd, and the sky to look at. After the third glance around, the pasture was just a plain of grass and the pond a muddy divot next to the amp towers.

The fashions were interesting… but not her expertise.

What was important was the music, and the atmosphere.

She hadn't seen too much of the 'free-love and drugs' this gathering would be known for, but it was early yet. Woodstock had only just started, she'd give it a day before declaring she was bored of the spectacle.

"I will remind you that you said so." The thief merely offered again dryly, glancing upwards to the looming storm clouds overhead.

They looked pretty ugly backlit from the setting sun, and she'd guess rain in a few more hours.

"Meh." Was his belated reply after glancing up to the same visage. "If it rains… well, then we won't have to figure out how to take a shower out here."

"That is disgusting." She informed him flatly, looking back down only to give him an equally disgusted look as her tone had been.

"...well, there's that pond near the stage. Pretty sure we could take a bath down there." Thoughtfully mused her fellow Cloud after a beat. "Besides which, we've done equally weird things while with the circus, little sis."

"I meant relying on rain to wash with is disgusting. You do wash yourself more frequently than that, right?"

"The peanut gallery needs to be silent now." Interrupted the nurse, flinging herself backwards so she was splayed out on top of her younger siblings and taking up the greatest portion of the blanket they were sitting upon. "I like this next band."

"You are going to like most of the bands playing the next few days, Tats." Sonya informed her exasperatedly, extracting her knee from under her sister's back before either started to hurt. "I fail to see why this matters at all."

Tatiana twisted around, shaking a finger under the Storm-Cloud's nose. "I will beat this. Somehow. Some way. I will top this. I am the groovy sister, you're supposed to be the sweet if grumpy one."

"Mmmhm." Cherep snickered a bit, holding up his hands in an 'I'm innocent' gesture. "Hey, I know when to toss in the towel. I'll judge instead, how about that?"

"You're on." Snapped the nurse with a smirk. "I will find something to top this."

Sonya blinked at her. As far as she was aware from what remained of Rachel's memories, nothing had topped this as a concert slash gathering of those that loved peace and weed.

...a lot of weed. She had thankfully forgotten what burning marijuana smelled like, and this just reminded her how cloyingly nasty she found it. Thick enough to sneeze at, acrid enough to sting the eyes, and sticky enough to linger long after when even her cigarette smoke evaporated.

"Okay." She wouldn't put it past the nurse to find something, as it was entirely possible she was recalling incorrectly. "What are we betting?"

She blinked at her blankly, then pouted hard. "I don't know. We'll think of something later."

"Well... whatever you find, will probably be better organized than this." Observed their brother idly, waving a hand at the utter mass of humanity around them here to witness and enjoy the same thing they were here for and the nearly complete lack of... well, anything else around.

Sitting space was starting to become pretty rare, making her glad they had gotten a middle-far spot and not tried to cram into the front of the crowd near the stage.

"So... how are we judging this bet? Because there might be a way to win on a technicality rather than by content."

"The shitty organization is not my fault. I intended to scope this out... time just got away from me." Sonya protested in exasperation, poking the nurse from looming over her and back on her heels. "At least there are bathrooms. Some of them. And I brought food, so there."

Snickering, the Sun did finally back off a little bit. "If that was the case, I could arrange a cruise for us and still win. Alas…"

"Okay, no. So…” Cherep puffed up his chest, giving his sisters a snooty look, which merely amused them both. "By content. You have to find some way to top a marathon few days of musical acts."

"By surprise." Chipped in the youngest Russian wickedly. "Since I did manage to spring this on you both without you hearing a word of it beforehand. Somehow."

Tatiana flipped her off, being unable to speak because Sweetwater decided to start up their set and nothing anyone said for the next however long would be heard over the music with how close they were to the amps. Their brother gave her a thumbs up instead, which made Sonya smirk even as she winced over the overly loud strains of music.

Okay… a hippie drug-fest it might be under the surface, but at least her siblings were going to enjoy it.

Now, if only her Russian sci-fi fantasy book hadn't been ripped in half, with half tossed out a car's open window, and replaced with an American dime-store trashy romance novel. She almost couldn't read the replacement her sister thought would compensate for the damage she did, because it was just that… bad.

She had tried, since she might be able to glean something out of it about the mystery of attraction, but… the book was kind of painful to read.

(Saturday the 16th of August, 1969. Woodstock Music Festival, Bethel, New York, United States of America.)

"...and I don't see the need, man. Not for a couple of political pigs with no intentions of helping the people."

"Fair enough, I guess." Cherep responded absently, also a bit bemusedly, at their unanticipated lunchtime guest. "Although I'll admit I know nothing about the Vietnam War myself. We're from out of country. Just here for the festival."

The shaggy haired man who had asked for something to eat nodded while he chewed the slice of beef jerky he had given him. "It's cool. I certainly won't rat you cats out, you've been pretty groovy."

"...I cannot believe people really do speak like that." Tatiana whispered to Sonya behind a hand, in German.

"Ladies, be nice. A language we all speak." The stuntman waggled a finger at his sisters, with a smirk that probably told them he agreed or at least found the observation amusing. Even if it wasn't nice. "Did you have something to add?"

The look his little sister gave him spoke volumes of 'not impressed' before she switched to polite and bland for the other man. "I heard a quip once upon a time… 'war does not determine who is right, war only determines who is left.'"

"...that's deep, and I know where you got it." Their 'guest' nodded a few more times, rocking his upper body a few times to give it that extra emphasis and to clink the beads stacked around his neck. "The Montreal Star, right? I read that in Reader's Digest. Totally right, and the message is so important. Especially now, with the weapons of mass destruction all over the place."
"Right on." Cherep agreed when Sonya opted to not respond. "Hey, it's been… ah, groovy, but my sisters and I were about to go wander to see what's around before the music kicks up again."

"Thanks for letting me jaw you ear off, and for the food man." The rose-spectacled man easily got upright, which they all followed suit, and shook his hand cheerfully. "Peace."

Tatiana barely waited for him to leave, grabbing their younger sister by the arm to pull her away. "Well?"

"English, Tats." The blonde responded a bit tiredly as they picked their way around other blankets left to mark someone else's spot. "And he was… hairy?"

"So… a full faced beard and long hair probably isn't your aesthetic, but I didn't really think it was anyways." Remarked her fellow Cloud user, jogging a bit carefully to catch up and claim the youngest sibling's other side so they could sort of keep the conversation between them. "Wanna try a girl next?"

"I still do not know what we are looking for." Sonya replied shortly, almost tripping over someone's leather satchel placed at the edge of their blanketed spot trying to keep pace with their elder sister. However, the blonde was always a bit irked when she ran into things she didn't understand. Cherep shrugged that off, and while Tatiana huffed a bit he knew the nurse wasn't taking it personally either.

"We are only looking for something you'd like to look at." He informed her brightly, tugging his sisters in another direction. Away from the drug peddler's little setup on a muddy 'lane' that headed to the windbreak forest edge of the pasture, because trying acid apparently appealed to none of them. "Beyond that? Just what you like to talk about when you have the opportunity. We can find you a type from that."

"I have never noticed a preference before… other than who I speak to had best not be stupid." Was her next protest, glumly following their directions in resignation. "I do not hold out hope this will work."

"It might help to be a bit more open." Tatiana started, only to back off from an exaggerated pout Cherep aimed at her over a blonde head.

"Nya has to do nothing. If what she wants to do is follow and eyeball a few people while we talk, then that's alright. She just needs to be herself." Instructed the stuntman loftily, slinging an arm around their little sister's shoulders even if that made picking their way through the throng of people gathered for the concert a bit harder than need be. "As it is, I do have a general guess for what she likes already so…"

"Really?"

"…what?" Sonya asked curiously from under his arm, peering up doubtfully at him.

It was the eyes. His baby sister didn't really have an expressive face, but she made it up with the eyes. That he had never really worked up a resistance to, so every hopeful look from her could break his resolve pretty quickly. "You… like the classy, clean cut types. At least when it comes to men."

The nurse made a disgruntled little huff when the thief accepted that thoughtfully instead of immediately deny it or argue.

Yes… well, Cherep hadn't made a nuisance of himself to the point their foster mother had to weigh in with her own opinion on the subject.
He also wasn't 'pushing' her to do anything or consider anyone in particular, just generalizing. As a matter of fact, he'd be perfectly happy if she picked an entirely different 'clean-cut' type to experiment with than the men that he knew she associated with.

Amazing what waiting for Sonya to bring it up did when convincing her on a topic.

Then again, both their foster father and just about every other vory in Russia were clean cut as well. It wasn't just the men she found to befriend but the general aesthetic she had grown up with, therefore what she'd more likely default to if she was specifically looking for someone.

Sudden shifts, like beholding a bearded man who was perfectly fine with his face-rug, would be at least a little off-putting at first for her. Then she'd either like or dislike it, but that was later.

Now that she was paying attention, anyways.

"We might find someone like that here, and you can figure out if that's true or not. Since you are the only one that it matters to and therefore only your opinion matters to take into account." He continued after letting her have a moment to absorb that, squeezing them past a few people that had broken out a few musical instruments to experiment with in the lull of the concert. "And we can see if you like certain female types while we look around, or a few other male types too."

His utterly ridiculous little sister puzzled that over happily enough, especially since he put a stop to forcing her out of her little shell. Since one sister was so occupied, Cherep aimed an admonishing look of his own over her head at their elder sister.

With a little moue of embarrassment and a light blush, Tatiana shrugged that off and waved a hand behind them.

…right, she had opted to leave this up to him for very specific reasons yesterday.

He sighed a bit gustily himself as they picked their way further into the mass of humanity they had joined for the next few days. This wasn't exactly his idea of a good time, actually it was a bit awkward to help his little sister figure out what she was attracted to… but if he could spare her a bit of future hurt or discomfort he'd suffer happily enough.

Sonya rarely asked anything for herself that wasn't either more books or for some scholastic effort to help other Flame users. She was just happy to spend time with them when they could manage it, which made it all the more important when she finally did ask for something.

Besides which, socializing around with a bunch of American hippies wasn't that bad even with an ulterior motive. He'd probably do it anyways just simply because 'hippies' sounded like his kind of people. They were going to avoid the stoners because it seems the thief didn't like the smell of the joints and the nurse would frown disapprovingly when they passed any drug abuse, but it couldn't be that hard to find non-tripping people to talk to.

As a matter of fact, Cherep could see another knot of people that weren't passing a joint or too stoned to even sit upright… or dancing to some imaginary music just because, apparently. A strategic tug got them on a new 'path', even if that finally exceeded Sonya's tolerance for touching and she shrugged out of his hold.

"So… round two."

A few fingers tugged lightly on his jean’s pockets. "You do not have to help like this if you do not wish to, Cherep. Just a few examples would help me well enough."
"I don't mind." Her fellow Cloud responded cheerfully, hooking her arm in his instead of slinging an arm over her shoulder again and risk actual disgruntlement. "Seriously. We can even go pick up chicks after this if you'd like."

Sonya actually made a face at the offer, hilariously enough. Half taken aback and half disgusted. "I wouldn't, actually. I will excuse you to do so if you want, although… seriously, be careful with that. Sexually transmitted diseases are a thing."

"Please avoid those." Tatiana offered in deadpan on her side of their little sister. "Even with the freaky voodoo shit you've got, just ew."

"You have no room to say that."

"I've been good!" Protested the nurse, affronted as she stepped around a blanket holding a pair of sunning half-naked ladies. "I've only had two boyfriends in the last year!"

The blonde Russian huffed and rolled her eyes. "None of whom I have met, so they could not have been that important in the long run."

"This is the first I've heard of any dating from that end this year." Cherep chipped in gleefully, smirking at the redhead. "What's this about boys? …and weren't you dating Nicolai?"

"…yeah. Once upon a time. But we broke up a long while ago." With a dismissive shrug, Tatiana stuck her nose in the air and sniffed as they passed a group sprawled on raw earth while examining hands in fascination.

"Really?" That was news to him, he had thought the nurse was just waiting for her man to get out of the slammer. "Why?"

She huffed a wry sigh, giving him an unamused sideways look. "We wanted different things from that relationship, okay?"

"Like what?" Sonya demanded, confused and a bit bewildered at the sudden tone shift that wasn't completely opposite but a touch more serious than they had originally. "Tats?"

"…never mind. We're helping you right now." Dismissed their elder sister faux brightly, taking the blonde's other arm and giving her a smile. "Just be aware, sometimes even if you both work at it… some relationships don't work out the way either of you think it will."

She gave her a fairly confused stare, which eventually made the older woman roll her eyes and expound on the topic before they reached the group he had been steering them towards.

"He didn't like the idea of me leaving to learn to be a doctor at the hospital I'm at, I didn't like that he expected me to sit tight for half a decade until he had time for me again. So, yeah."

Cherep blinked, a bit surprised but not at the same time. "Ouch."

"Mmm… ever get the feeling we're between generations?" Tatiana asked factitiously, a slightly bittersweet smile on her lips. "The old one is too hide-bound, the next too reckless, but ours a bewildering mix of the two?"

"Often." Their little sister deadpanned, freeing one hand to jerk a thumb at Cherep. "See my case study."

"Hey!" He pouted, a bit outrageously, until he earned at least genuine smirks from his sisters. "I resemble that."

"…isn't it resent?" Questioned the nurse skeptically after a blink.

"I caught that pun, Tats. Wow are you behind."

She shot her a dry look. "Give it two seconds, and you'll be the one behind again."

---

(Sunday the 17th of August, 1969 continued. Woodstock Music Festival, Bethel, New York, United States of America.)

Honestly speaking, the three of them had completely diverse set of tastes when it came to music.

Tatiana's tastes had not change much as she still loved the folk pop and blues tunes more than what was labeled 'rock' these days, Sonya seemed to really like said rock and some of the faster jazz numbers, and Cherep had never really pinned down one specific genre that he liked.

Therefore their elder sister seemed to really enjoy the musical acts that had played the first night, the youngest even had a pleased little smirk all afternoon, and he was just wondering what was on the next night's schedule.

Two for three, even if he'd be keeping an ear out for Santana and Creedence Clearwater Revival just because he had liked what they showcased here.

The stuntman shifted, and rolled his eyes when Tatiana sleepily pinched his thigh for the criminal sin of doing so while she was using him as a pillow. Instead of bitch, because he was fully aware his elder sister was not going to bother to listen, he instead turned to the nice sister. "How long do you think they're going to go tonight?"

"…today?" Sonya corrected a bit absently, checking the time on her wristwatch via the glow from the stage's lights and a bit of flexibility before sticking her last cigarette's filter between her lips. "It is Sunday."

"Damn. Already?" Well, that had gone by stupidly fast.

"There will be more later today, but Sunday is the day this is billed to end." Even as she stated what she knew, the frown on her lips said she highly doubted it as she puffed on her burning tobacco. "I believe they are going to overrun, however."

"Yeah, that's probably a safe guess."

Given the amps had overloaded and forced a pause this night already while they were either fixed or a jerry-rig was figured out, and there were a couple more acts to get through to match yesterday's offer, it was likely a few musical groups would be pushed back to the next 'day's' set. An hour or so for each, and it was possible things would continue to dawn's break both now and when they started up again.

That didn't include yesterday's rainstorm nor the possibility they'd get drenched again later on, nor any other minor disaster waiting to go off that might put a wrench into things. "Should we stay for however long this is to be, or cut out early?"

"I have nothing terribly important waiting for me but more work in France."
Cherep nodded thoughtfully, looking down at their elder sister who had run out of energy after pitching in at the 'first aid' tent earlier since she was a professional nurse. "Tats? Any opinion on how long to stay?"

"...as much as I'd really, really appreciate a shower to get all this mud coating near everything off... I kind of want to see how they intend to close this thing out." Tatiana drawled out tiredly, rolling onto her back to peer up at them. "And if the two of you are right and they overrun, those that have to be back to wherever on Monday would then clear out a day early. I took the whole weekend off, so I don't have to be back until Wednesday."

Well, he had nowhere to be until next year. There was just the motorcycle to get, and he could get that any day this week than just Monday. "I think we'll stay until the end, then."

"Sounds good to me." Sonya put the stub of her cigarette out on the mud just left of her, rolling over to occupy his previously free thigh and stretch out tiredly with the apparent intent to nap.

Whelp... he was going nowhere. Again.

Sighing, Cherep tugged on short blonde and loose red hair spread out over his lap. "Why do you do this?"

"Because you'll let us." Tatiana responded sleepily, the sentiment echoed by the youngest sibling's amused huff. "And this is comfortable."

"Speak for yourself." His ass was going to go numb in just a few short hours of this.

"...plan better, then."

"Thanks, Nya." Drawled the stuntman wryly, huffing a laugh as he leaned back to get as comfortable as he could get. "I can just feel the love you hold for me."

(Sunday the 17th of August, 1969 continued. Woodstock Music Festival, Bethel, New York, United States of America.)

Being woken up by her ever-thoughtful little brother just in time to catch The Who's set, even if that one weirdo had tried to interrupt only to get promptly chased off the stage quickly enough by the guitarist, put Tatiana in a good mood.

Even the mid-afternoon thunderstorm, and all the goddamned mud that resulted, didn't put a damper on anything for her.

Well... it didn't affect her mood.

Sonya, on the other hand, got irked when it ruined the second book this same weekend and attempted to soak everything else they had brought. Apparently disgusted enough to 'dispose' of the book with utter vengeance in the privacy of their tent, and entirely out of the nasty tobacco shit, made for a slightly grumpy little thief if poked too much.

Whoops. If it was bad enough the little bibliophile would resort to burning anything papery and written...

She'd buy her little sister a much better book the moment they got to a semi-large city which might have a bookstore, both to make up for ruining the first one and the sub-par gas station peace offering.
Then again, the original book would've likely ended up destroyed anyways given how wet everything was right now.

Cherep was somehow sleeping through the rain, as apparently he got little sleep while they had napped on him. The nurse wondered if they should wake him once the concert picked up again, or just let him sleep until he woke up on his own.

Her little sister was of no help to figure that out, electing to slowly chew on a slice of jerky than respond to her question of if they should wake him immediately while they supported one of the more water-resistant sleeping bags between them so their brother's face wasn't rained on. "...I honestly do not know what kind of music Cherep likes."

"Damn."

They both glanced down to the man cheerfully sawing logs between them and studied his sleeping form for a long moment.

Tatiana glanced up first, pushing a loose length of wet cloth away from her face. "What do you think he'd like?"

"...heavy metal, maybe. Or he'll be a complete dork and like disco." Sonya offered irritably, and then cast a skeptical glance from under their makeshift rain catch at the either sleeping, quietly chatting, or dancing in the rain crowd they had joined for the last few days. "Both are entirely underground right now, and not likely to be present in the line-up."

Well, she did get out and about around the world more than the nurse did and would likely know more musical forms that weren't 'mainstream' yet. "Well shit."

"He might like Jimi Hendrix's bit. When it comes up. I think he is to close out the festival."

"What are you taking that from? Your program list-thing said The Who would close this out, and they played the second-to-last set this morning."

The thief's frown slowly switched to a confused scowl, obviously dredging her memory but not coming up with anything to share. She even dragged the much-abused paper out of their 'water-proofed' crevice between already muddy blankets and one of the empty and plastic trail mix bags. "...huh. I do not know why I think so."

Getting side-tracked from scowling herself at the ever-present mud that was slowly, insidiously creeping into everything they had brought with them, the Sun user grabbed one of the last few water jugs her little sister had thoughtfully packed for them to take a one-handed sip. "Hmm... maybe we should just wake him when the music picked back up."

"That will not be until well after the rain stops. But a couple of these have yet to take the stage, so there is a lot more music yet to be played." Sonya offered after studying the flyer a bit more, tucking it back into the contrived safe place for later perusal. "He might also like Jeff Beck, if they got him to play. I think this is actually a 'wish-list', and not the actual line-up."

"Hands back up, little sis." Instructed the nurse playfully, making a face as wet cotton started dripping down her one dry wrist and arm instead of the lower corner behind their brother's head or the arm holding the far edge up. "Please, because-"

A crack of thunder kept anything else she wanted to say from being heard, but also woke up the stuntman they were trying to help keep asleep. She couldn't decide if it was perfectly timed or badly.
"…HOLY… what?" Cherep blinked purple eyes at them rapidly, glancing between his sisters in confusion until how wet they all were permeated his brain and the echo of thunder rumbled back to them. "Oh… huh. Thanks."

"You're welcome." Tatiana chirped, then wrenched the sodden blanket away and to the ground so she could stop supporting it and letting them all be rained on. They were already either wet or going to be that way in a short few minutes, so why not. "My arms were getting tired anyways."

Sonya hadn't been expecting the sudden movement, she got almost knocked over by the wet fabric and ended up with some kind of bastardized cow-lick from the muddy corner of their picked 'rain shield' being dragged against the back of her head. "…the hell, Tats?"

"I'd say I'm sorry, but… that is funny."

The stuntman snickered too, pushing himself into an upright seated position and raking a hand through his hair before yawning.

Shooting the both of them a glare, the thief shoved herself upright and growled at them lightly before stomping off while trying to control the now dirty blonde strands.

Likely to go find herself someone to bum more tobacco from… or, more likely, to steal some tobacco from someone else.

"Our tent is leaking, by the by." Tatiana informed her brother wryly, flapping a dripping hand while they were drenched by even more rain. "And there's mud in everything now. Hope you didn't bring anything you mind that I'll be pitching once we leave."

He hummed absently, glancing around at what the sisters had managed to do while he knocked out for a few solid hours of rest. Stiffly pushing himself to his feet and squishing in his boots uncomfortably from the face he pulled, Cherep stretched out once before finally looking back at her. "Well… at least we will only smell of wet hair, mud, and maybe dirt instead of-"

"Oh, shut up." Urg, then they'd have to pack up and drag everything back to their rental. Keeping mud out of the car would be a headache, and the traffic back would be horrible, but she was sort of looking forward to whatever little room they rented for a night just for the bathroom and a damn shower. "Speaking of, thank you for not wearing leather jackets to this thing."

"Nya did warn us not to wear anything we want to keep to this." He reminded her thoughtfully, cupping his hands for some rainwater to splash his face with. "So… old boots and a jacket I picked up from a thrift store and not my motorcycle boots or my favorite jacket."

Sighing, the redhead stretched out herself now that she wasn't needed to be one half of a makeshift tent and cast a glance over their 'neighbors'. "How do you think she cottoned onto this, anyways? This… really isn't something I'd expect her to get involved with."

"Honestly? At this point, I'm not really surprised." Cherep held a hand out and helped her to her feet, sneaking in a warm hug apparently just because. "Nya's been networking all over the place, from a freelance info-broker we both know to a… big group in Italy and apparently China through that Chinese Faw-guy. She'll probably hear about a lot of things before we get word of it in other ways."

"…I bet it was Bjørn." She groaned, running her wet hands over her face to check that she hadn't gotten mud on her face then running her fingers through the muddy ends of her hair in hopes of scraping the worse off. "Surprising her with something is going to be a bitch and a half."

About to say something, the stuntman was cut off by another rumble from the rain clouds overhead.
He frowned and glanced upwards, then ruffled his hair hard enough to fling some of the water soaking it off. "Mmm… shit. If anything gets struck by lightning out here…"

"I think all the mud will ground us, hopefully."

Cherep barked a laugh, smearing some of the mud that had gotten on his legs as he accepted that little truth.

A few sucking, plunked steps alerted them to Sonya's return as she trekked through the miring mud that now surrounded every little ‘plot' between sodden blankets. She was carefully shielding yet another smoldering roll of tobacco… but she was frowning at it suspiciously instead of looking a bit more settled.

"Nya?"

"…I think there was something 'added' to this." She explained thoughtfully, glancing up at her after a beat. "I am not sure if I like it."

"I feel fuzzy." She explained slowly, her attention drifting back to the suspect cigarette in her hands. "I have not felt fuzzy since I picked up smoking, or after I stop for a while and pick it up again. Which… it has not been long enough for me to feel that again."

"…you're stoned." Cherep breathed out suddenly, grabbing the cigarette from their little sister quickly and flicking it away before grabbing her next. "Please just be weed."

Sonya blinked blankly up at him, letting herself be maneuvered back in-between her siblings without any kind of protest or her usual resigned little pout for being manhandled. "I do not think I like this…"

Poking the blonde experimentally a few times and measuring how slowly she responded compared to how she usually was when so prodded, the nurse sighed and reseated herself as their brother lowered her down to sit. "Wow, Nya. Just wow. Go you…"

"That's not nice, Tats."

She gave the stuntman a flat look, even as he knelt down to pat uselessly at Sonya's cheek.

"I'm pretty sure none of us missed how many drugs are being passed back and forth around here. She, probably, stole something instead of asking and get warned it's laced with whatever. I have to say she kind of deserves it."

Their little sister suddenly scowled flatly at the sky overhead, blinking rapidly as the rain peppered her face with water better than any pure human effort could do. "…yeah, no. I dislike this intensely."

Tatiana swore when the blonde suddenly went blisteringly hot under her fingers, jerking her hands back and wincing when even the rainwater still falling started to sizzle off her skin. She grabbed one of the sodden blankets and dumped it on top of the younger woman to hide whatever was going on. Then the thief picked herself up, so the muddy blanket fell away from her face, still looking cross and now dirt-streaked but not nearly as absent-minded or 'fuzzy' anymore. "…well, that was… something."

Their brother frowned at her sternly. "Okay, not that it's bad or anything… but how are you suddenly fine?"

Sonya cocked an eyebrow at him, peeling the muddy length of cloth off her body and tossing it back on Tatiana's lap. "Storms are good for something, even if it is the reason why I have three years of vaccinations to redo."

"Do me a favor, Nya. Stop smoking random other people's cigarettes, and just wait until you can find non-tainted sources."

Something vaguely apologetic and sheepish painted itself across her face, and the younger sister picked absently at the mud now flecked across the slightly ragged clothing she had packed for this event. "...sorry."

"Don't get me wrong, you want to experiment I'm all for that. Just... some warning before I have to nurse you through a bad, or even a good, trip." Tatiana insisted wryly, flicking her baby sister on the forehead. "Preferably when we're not in public, yeah? That was close."

She grimaced, and straight out sulked for a moment, until she visibly made herself get over the angry part of being chastised. "...okay, Tats."

"Okay, she said she was sorry." Cherep interrupted whatever was about to be snipped back sternly, giving her a look of her own before turning back to their little sister. "I need a walk, so I'll see about finding you something that's not tainted if you don't want to ask people politely."

Rubbing at her temple, the blonde sighed heavily as their brother got upright again. "Alright."

"...I'm never going to let you forget this." She informed the Storm-Cloud brightly, rolling up the dirty and sopping wet blankets to take up less space until it cleared up enough to spread out in hopes they’d dry somewhat before they left the area. "I mean... how did you miss that being possible?"

"Some people seem to be immune to their 'alterations', Tats." Sonya snarked back irritably, blowing out a sigh and slowly pitching in neatening things now that one of their number wasn't sleeping on it. "I did try to be cautious... but apparently my tolerances are not the same as a few others around here."

A miscalculation was markedly better than just being simply absent-minded or ignorant of the possibility, but the results spoke for themselves.

Tatiana glanced upwards when she realized the rain had lessened the downpour they were under, holding a hand out to feel how much water was still being dumped on them and if it was worth it to try sorting their things out. "Well... help me dry some of this stuff out, will you? I think the purple won't scorch everything, better than my yellow or your red. I'd rather not sleep on anything wet."

"...I will dry out the tent floor first." Sonya decided after a moment to ponder the issue. "Might as well start from the bottom up."

"Leave the flap open, hopefully that'll disguise what you're doing in respects to steam. I'll sit in front of it to block any lights."

"Sure."

"And try not to accidentally get stoned while you do, please."

"...oh shut up, Tats."
The muddy wool blanket thrown in her face was probably her due, but still.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 17th of August, 1969 continued. Woodstock Music Festival, Bethel, New York, United States of America.)

Cherep had greatly appreciated the work his sisters had put into getting them some dry clothing and a place to sleep, returning halfway through their work to grab nearly half the dried provisions Sonya had hauled to the site to trade for the non-tainted tobacco their younger sister appreciated a lot more than the nurse. He did managed to get some fresh fruit somehow, which after two days of beef jerky and salted nut mixes Tatiana was damn near close to declaring him her favorite sibling for.

In dry and somewhat clean clothing, and lounging on their least dirt encrusted blanket, she peeled the last orange the other two had somehow silently agreed to let her have. "Do you two think it is worth it to stay up just to see what's playing all night?"

Sonya, banished to the far edge of their 'spot' because the cigarettes the stuntman found for her were far harsher than her normal brands and smelled like it, hummed thoughtfully. "Possibly? It is slightly difficult to sleep through that level of… music."

The redhead was pretty sure her little sister was going to say 'noise' and not 'music'. Apparently the last couple sets had not been to her tastes, although she'd be keeping an eye out for a few of them because they seemed to have some promise.

"You two can stay up, I need to sleep if I'm to drive us back." Cherep managed around a yawn, wiggling his sock-clad toes uncomfortably. "Are my boots dry yet?"

"Probably not." The blonde checked anyways, reaching a hand into the right boot their brother peeled off his feet when she demanded he do so. "…nope."

"Tats, can't I just-"

"No. Trench foot is an issue with wet footwear, and I'd rather you two not get it. No boots until they're dry." Dismissed the nurse before he could get the entire question out, popping a peeled wedge of orange into her mouth to chew on before glancing to her other sibling. "Who do you think is next, Nya?"

"…hopefully someone that will not have a song entitled 'Good Morning Little Schoolgirl'."

Deadpanned the younger thief flatly. "I do not care if you can guarantee that they are not the first to cover it, nor that the original is not much different, a song with that as a title and lyrics to match just sounds disturbing."

Tatiana sighed, peeling another wedge free to eat.

"…yeah, I'm going to hit the hay for now." Cherep decided solidly after a few minutes spent watching the next set assemble themselves on the stage. "Are either of you going to stay up?"

"I will." Sonya volunteered easily enough, glancing at the surprisingly still half-full pack of cigarettes and then at her siblings. "Any requests for wake-up calls?"

"There's nothing left I really want to see." Offered the nurse after a beat, still digging the orange free of the peel. "The bands I liked already played, and what's left is just… bonus."

"Please wake us before the end, but other than that… I agree with her."
(Monday the 18th of August, 1969. Woodstock Music Festival, Bethel, New York, United States of America.)

The end was, as she had thought, Jimi Hendrix.

Who introduced himself and his group as 'Gypsy Sun & Rainbows' to a very reduced group of concert-goers left to watch him play. The exodus had started well before nightfall yesterday, and now barely half of the people that had shown up remained in the pasture.

Her siblings hadn't needed a wake-up to catch them playing, as the group didn't get on-stage until well after noon.

Cherep had loved it. He was a fan well before 'Foxy Lady' finished, got a bit confused over 'The Star-Spangled Banner' until one of their neighbors pointed out it was their national anthem with a rock-bent, and the rest of the set just cemented the stuntman's newfound love for the band.

Even the thief had to admit, having 'Hey Joe' in preformed in person was pretty damn spectacular.

Now she just had to get used to not hearing music loud enough to vibrate her lungs all day.

"Three for three, even if it was kind of close." Sonya informed her elder sister smugly, tossing tent pegs into the duffle bag as is… dirt and all. "Top that."

"Just you wait." Tatiana vowed playfully, helping their leftmost neighbor dig their car keys from the mud where their blanket had been stretched out. "I will find something."

Their brother just snickered, weirdly hyped up and overly cheerful as he rolled their various blankets up to all fit back into the rough canvas carrying bag. "I got to admit, Tats… I don't think you can find a better musical act that this."

After her fellow Cloud dumped the last load of mud and dirt encrusted blankets into the duffle, Sonya crammed the empty plastic jugs on top and finished their packing off by what little trash they had generated while out here.

"You doubt me? Such faith, I might cry." Tossed the nurse over a shoulder with a flick of her dirt streaked red braid, then she aimed a dry look back at them. "I can at least guarantee one of us won't accidentally become stoned with whatever I find."

Stopping flat, the thief sighed and bent to gather a handful of mud from the 'lane' just in front of where they had been set up the past few days.

"What are you… no. No. Nya, I said no!" Squealing rather satisfactorily, the Sun didn't dodge quickly enough to avoid the face-full of mud.

Cherep gaped for a long moment, then he started laughing hard enough to take him to his knees.

"I have no issue rubbing your face in the mud, Tats." Sonya informed her elder sister loftily, planting her muddy hand on a hip. "Nor your apparently pretty, pretty hair. Pick your battle, sister dear."

Tatiana wiped the watery earth off with a hand, then scooped up her own handful. "This means war, little sister."
Sliding back a step warily, she opted to start moving before the nurse could throw her ammunition. "Well… alright then. War it is."

"…yeah, no. Diplomacy!" A sudden tackle by stuntman had both sisters slammed into the mire they had been trying to climb out of. "Now behave, or I'll rub your faces full of mud."

Tatiana spit out an unfortunate mouthful of raw earth, slitting a look to her little sister who was equally squashed. "Truce? We'll trounce him instead."

"…wait."

"Agreed." Sonya snapped before their brother could run for it, helping the mud splattered redhead roll their stupidly strong brother over and sit on his back.

"Sibling abuse!"

"You can't claim that!" Gleefully denied the Sun using nurse in a sing-song tone of voice, sitting pretty on the spot right between shoulder blades just so she could shove the man's face into the very same mud he had slammed the both of them into. "You joined in! It's implied to be allowed since you did."

Snickering, she wickedly returned a few of the salutations and farewells their temporary neighbors gave after laughing a bit at the stuntman's predicament. While sitting on Cherep's legs so he couldn't wiggle free without compounding his 'crime' of tossing them into the mud by a repeat offence and trying to get the mud caking one side of her face off.

She didn't know when they'd be able to do something like this again, so enjoying it fully was something to do.

Besides, it was funny to hear her brother squeak and splutter in protest every time Tatiana patted his hair or face with a handful of mud.

---

(Tuesday the 19th of August, 1969. The Pahkan's Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Milos felt his heart stutter again, but thankfully it just seemed to be a stutter and not anything more serious.

Of course, the eagle-eyed young Lightning attached to his 'day' guard still caught the moment of physical pain.

Silivanov frowned at him heavily but didn't move when he waved a hand for him to stay in his position next to the windows.

The brat was starting to get really good at that. To the point he couldn't quite hide it from Pyotr anymore, who had learned to watch his 'granddaughter's' people for hints of what was happening with him.

"…Milos."

"Oh don't start. I have enough people yapping after me." Dismissed the Zolotov's Pahkan irritably, rubbing his chest because it wasn't worth it to keep up the façade now the other man was aware.
"Now isn't a good time."

"It will never be the 'right' time. Just pick one, you stubborn old fool."

Barking a laugh, the equally old man shot his contemporary an amused look. "If I'm the stubborn one, what does that make you?"

"Healthier." Deadpanned the Sovintnik in a tart tone. "I picked the less stress-inducing option, remember."

"…they can't do anything but treat the symptoms, Pyotr." He reminded the other man tiredly, pressing the heel of his hand against a bewilderingly new but old looking circular scar on his chest. "Staving things off with a barge pole, when I'm already headed to the rapids."

"Then maybe you should stop flirting with the inevitable."

With a snort, the Pahkan threw his weary form back into his seat heavily. "Which inevitability? Death or old age? As varied as these kids are, they haven't yet come up with a way to deny the progression of time itself."

"I think…" Silivanov interjected a bit hesitantly, emboldened when Milos gestured him to speak up. "…you might want to talk to the Mists about that."

"Oh?" That was… something.

"I'm pretty sure a few of them have been fucking around with their ages. If it's just how they appear or how they really are is… subjective." Continued the Lightning obediently to the prompt, giving a one-shoulder shrug after a pause where he seemed to be thinking hard. "Then again, 'Construction' is very… open to interpretation."

"Do you know how to find them?" Pyotr asked wryly, which was fair enough of a question.

The Zolotov Mists were mainly very conspicuously absent, at least up until they weren't anymore. Once they had a reason to toss reality out by the ear, everything rapidly got stranger as they bent things to their liking.

Case in point, the 'Mirror Lady'. Young Anna sliced through distance and time willy-nilly, arranging things to how young Bazanova would want without so much as a 'excuse me' uttered to those she was rearranging.

Admittedly, Milos owed his life to the young woman's ability to warp things to her liking. That didn't make the realization that the Mist could reach anywhere she wanted to be and then be gone in the next second without a trace to betray her any more pleasant.

…and the young lady was firmly not around for Gedeon to somehow make up some of the horrible reputation he had with Bazanova's people.

Rubbing a heavy hand across his face as he thought hard, because there had to be a way to hand things over to his son without it all going up in Flames behind him, the Zolotov Pahkan wondered why he didn't just visit the Flame using enclaves.

No, a fair number might not like Gedeon… but that young blonde scamp was about to make off with a lot of them. Leaving fresh faced young Flame users behind to manage things, which hopefully his sometimes-thick son wouldn't screw up networking with.
Maybe he could instill enough appreciation for him to enable a few of the older ones to ignore that they didn't really like Gedeon all that much. It stuck in his craw to think so, but... if they wouldn't follow his heir out of personal dislike or sheer unfamiliarity, maybe he could motivate them by clan loyalty.

"Which of your peppy little brats run the Mist side of things?" Milos asked after settling his idea into what was possible and what would be nice to accomplish but not needed.

"Usov." Responded the Lightning boy with some amusement. "I'm pretty sure he's about nine or ten years old, but somehow looks like a slightly older preteen right now."

"Any reason why?" Pyotr asked, which since he asked meant he was curious but it damn sure didn't sound like it.

"I couldn't say, Sovintnik." Silivanov could only shrug. "I just noticed because... I'm a Lightning. I notice things like that."

"Then speak up when you notice things like that." The only standing old man ordered wryly. "From some of the reports I've been getting, we're no longer the only syndicate around here that has Flame users."

"We have... things in place for that." Offered the young scut dryly, a smirk painting across his mouth. "Any Mists trying to encroach won't like it, I can assure you."

...right, a few of them were territorial little bastards. Milos rubbed a hand over his lower face, musing on what the 'Mists' could do to anyone they ferreted out.

He was fairly certain his imagination failed to match what could happen in a Mist's version of reality. That was almost more motivation than he needed to actually find a way to stretch things out, just so he could live and see how that would work out.
Chapter 77

(Wednesday the 20th of August, 1969. New York, New York, United States of America.)

Tatiana threw open the bathroom door dramatically, steam billowing out after her as she sauntered into the hotel room wrapped only in two towels. "I love bathrooms. Like... so much."

"You said that last night, Tats." Cherep reminded her dryly, pulling off tags of the new clothing they had bought to replace the dirt stained once they brought with them. "Which, while I agreed with you at the time, I must actually state it is now officially weird."

"Entirely." Sonya echoed absently, simply enjoying the ability to lounge on one of the two bedspreads and stretch out her limbs at the same time. "...did you need to be back on the island today?"

"Eh, by their morning. Which is in... yeah, I should probably head out and catch a plane." Sighing, the redhead pulled the towel from her head and dropping it on their brother's efforts. Selecting the slightly bigger set of women's clothing, and completely ignoring the stuntman's irritated look, she gathered up her set of clothing to get dressed. "Are you coming with us, Cherep? Or me, since I think Nya's for France."

"...I think France. I need to get whatever motorcycle I get shipped over to Europe anyways, might as well."

"I have to work, my main work-type." The thief informed him lazily. "Are you sure?"

"I can find something to amuse myself with." Responded their brother loftily, ripping off the last plastic/paper tag from the dress she'd be wearing once the nurse finally cleared out from the bathroom. "But if I don't have to go back there, then I won't."

Sonya opened her mouth to say it wasn't really that bad... but remained silent when she realized her opinion was mostly due to the fact she had stopped noticing the really bad parts he'd be disgusted by. After a while, someone getting beaten for being stupid or shot to death in the streets just sort of faded into the background there. It happened fairly often, and rarely actually interfered with her day-to-day life.

No... Cherep was a bit too good for Mafia Land.

She rolled over instead, setting her cheek on her forearm to look at the shirtless stuntman fully. "...are you sure that will not bother you?"

"It would bother me more if you were out to specifically kill someone. Stealing is... somehow, not bad." Offered her fellow Cloud in amusement, finishing with his self-imposed chore and grabbing socks sized for his feet. "Shockingly. I'll be fine, little sis. Might as well take the opportunity to splurge a bit."

"Can you afford that and a new motorcycle?"

He rubbed his nose as he dropped to the bedspread next to her stomach, looking slightly sheepish as he hauling the cloth onto his feet. "...there are these things called 'underground racing circuits'."

"Of course there is." That was probably the most whitewashed of crimes, speeding. Her brother was risking no one's neck but his own, and maybe a pedestrian on the badly managed circuits, but…
"Somehow, someway, we corrupted you. I am… in awe."

The look he gave her was entirely dry, utterly sarcastic, and entirely worth it. "Shush you. And Vipes got me into it, after Master Liam cut short my stunt work this year."

"Just so they could bet heavily on the 'newcomer' and make a killing, right? Did you at least get a cut? You must have, if you have enough to 'splurge'."

"I'm not talking to you about this subject anymore." The stuntman informed her snootily, hauling one half of a brand-new set of motorcycle boots the sisters had chipped in for to gift for a late birthday present on top of what they had already gotten him. "So… you were very, very, very bitchy about ruining your boots earlier this summer. What changed? I mean, you ground a ton of mud into them this weekend."

"Those boots are the mended, old, battered pair I got from Crina." Sonya informed him, gathering her own clothes for when their elder sister finally vacated the bathroom so she could get dressed without making her brother uncomfortable. "I only keep them for things I know will be hard on my footwear, and I finally actually managed to use them for that."

"Ah… smart."

She rolled herself upright with her dress against her chest, pinning her brother with a suspicious look. If anything, she expected him to mutter sourly over the old bat being brought up. He never had really liked the old woman.

"What the hell was that?"

Cherep raked a hand through his hair. "I don't think you want to do this now."

"Do what now?"

"I'll tell you when we reach France. I don't want to put a damper on the last few hours we've got together."

Tatiana came out of the bathroom again, finally fully dressed, dabbing the rope of damp red braid a few times before rolling the length up into a bun and sticking a few bobby pins into it to keep it up. "Right, Nya? You want to go grab something to eat with me before I leave? I owe you a book, we can find you something to make up the destroyed ones."

"…what am I supposed to be doing while you two do that?" Their brother demanded, while she grabbed the sweater-dress thing her sister insisted would look cute on her.

"Buying your noisy ass bike and getting it shipped to wherever you're picking it up?" Drawled the nurse wryly as Sonya darted past her to get dressed. "You can grab something quick and probably greasy while we have actual food and meet you at the JFK International Airport for splitting up."

Cherep huffed at her. "Right, right. Okay. Kind of need a shirt first."

"One second!" The thief called back through the bathroom door, peeling his new shirt off so she could pull on the thick knitted garment she would be wearing today.

Wriggling into the datted thing took longer than yanking out of tee shirt, which irked her slightly.

Leaving the humid and slightly steamy room with the still chilled floor tiles, she tossed the contested shirt into Cherep's face and presented herself for Tatiana's inspection.

"...I do not think I like this."

Tatiana pulled on the hem of the skirt-end first to make it lay evenly, then placed her hands on grey clad hips. Not her own hips, but her little sister's. "You look lovely. Might be a bit easier when not dressing in steamy rooms, the humidity probably didn't help."

More arms wound around the two of them, and the stuntman hauled his sisters off their feet for a very stifling hug. "You both look lovely. I'll see you two in a bit."

"Bye Cherep."

"Mmm, have fun." Echoed the Sun of the Storm-Cloud's heels.

__

(Thursday the 21th of August, 1969. A hotel, Bordeaux, Gironde, French Republic.)

Whatever Sonya had intended to do today was abruptly sidelined by the letter Cherep gave her the moment they got in, and the news that Crina had died earlier in the year.

The stuntman was shooed out of their hotel's door easily enough, while she did stumbled a bit at the realization of why she was getting a letter from her previous master of mysticism she also managed to shove it down for a few minutes and insist she'd like to read it in private.

While he was gone, a guaranteed few hours to have the Indian Motorcycle he bought delivered once it reached Bordeaux's dockside and the paperwork involved to prove it was a legal shipment, she fingered the slightly wrinkled paper.

Knowing Crina was going to die and being confronted with the realization the old bat was dead was… very different. The abrupt removal of visiting the old crone as an option she could do infuriated her, equally as much as it depressed her in equal measure.

Sonya had held absolutely no desire to go back to being the crotchety old woman's apprentice once she left, nor any desire to return to circus life even now. Why it was she suddenly bitterly wished to have had a bit more time with the old bat was… something.

She had been aware they were friends of a sort, one built on insults and digs and just generally not being the most social butterflies around but stuck together in a crowd of such. However, their relationship was mostly unstated.

The thief liked the old bat because she gave back just as much as she got and sometimes more, seeking to lessen any irritation they might've had as two people randomly crammed together by ignoring the caustic shit and supplying the ultimate social lubricator known as liquor.

She both did and didn't regret the time she had spent with her. It did hurt a little to know the old woman was gone, but she did have some fond memories that were now bitterly better.

Although there was also the aggravating reminder that the old bat died because of her own choice not to seek medical help. The recourse to both check up on her brother and poke the elderly woman a few times had been cut short because of that, making it hard to keep in mind that had been her choice not to get help. Meaning it was her choice not to allow the option to continue, or that promise of shelter given near the end of her circus years to stand.
Confused, bewildered, a bit hurt, and irrationally angry summed up her thoughts on the subject entirely.

Curling up on the supplied couch of the hotel room, she inspected the envelope her brother had handed her while wondering if she was mourning the old bat or just numb still. Finally sliding a thumb up under the flap of the letter, Sonya was rewarded by about nine pages of written words and two other letters addressed to people she didn't know.

The contents of the missive, like the old gypsy woman in life, got straight to the point.

Crina had wrote out every old legend and half-forgotten fable she knew of about those that were a bit 'fiery' she had heard in her lifetime. A few excerpts about a number of former 'apprentices' that were a hair away from being downright bizarre, in personal habits or what impossible things they seemed to be able to do on the sly, and a short summary at the end for why she was writing all this.

'...you never would ask, girl, and I know you couldn't tell us if we did. The others made that rather clear. So here's everything you couldn't question like a brat, and all that I know.'

Fuck Omertà. She pressed a hand against her face, ignoring how wet she was around the eyes, and sighed heavily.

She should've asked once it was made clear to her that the circus was well aware of those that could use Flames, even if they only have a partial understanding based on Mists. Crina hadn't been a stupid woman, she would've kept it to herself if she had made it clear that not doing so would hurt someone down the line.

She hadn't... because, well... Omertà.

If she didn't ask, then she wouldn't know if stories would spread further or require someone to stop it. Requiring someone beholden to the Vow of Silence to eliminate the storytellers as she was. As it was, she should probably have a fairly involved conversation with her old circus master to ensure there was no leak before it came back to bite her.

...of course, if she had and still didn't do anything, then the old bat would've shared what she had known with Master Liam and he was cut of the same cloth as her brother. Just... a tiny bit smarter and more willing to royally screw with heads.

If it had ever come down to it, Liam would've helped anyone in a bit of Flame trouble and possibly risk pulling the Vindice down on his head for it.

Rubbing her face more or less dry, and immediately tearing up again much to her own disgust, Sonya sniffed wetly and picked up the three extra letters.

Letters of introduction, actually. If she wanted to follow up on the fables and folk-stories, she had a written kind of 'she's okay' from Crina to her old traveling caravan and her very extended family.

The late Romanian had no close family left, but apparently she had a cousin still alive. Said cousin had kids before Crina left them to join a few traveling circuses to reduce the strain on the family group and to earn money to send back. She couldn't tell her former apprentice where what remained of her family was but knew they did pick up the money she sent to a post box in a certain town.

One letter of introduction was for said cousin, for one of said cousin's children if the young man the dead gypsy recalled had met with his death before her, or for the leader of the caravan if she couldn't find either.
Sonya slotted the extra letters between her fingers slowly. They weren't sealed, so she could see what they said without raising suspicions.

Not that it being sealed would be that much of an obstacle to her, but the thought behind the omission counted.

Instead of open them, because she was quite wet already and she wasn't morbidly curious to see what else was written by a dead woman, the thief picked up the hardcover book that was Tatiana’s make-up gift to her and slipped them inside.

The next time she called Björn she'd see if there was anything in Romania. Might as well actually earn that 'amateur historian' thing she kept claiming.

Cherep was not stealthy normally by any measure of the term, Sonya had more than enough time to ensure the fact she had been crying was covered up and think of a distraction for the day.

"I have to do something tonight, and probably the rest of the week." She informed the stuntman the moment he opened their hotel door, earning a mildly curious glance as he tossed keys and paperwork on the little end table under the window. "Um… I have to talk to Master Liam sometime soon and have a thing in Romania I should probably follow up on. But those can wait. Have you ever tried to set up your own stunt show?"

Her brother raked a hand through short purple hair as he joined her on the couch, sitting a bit heavily which bounced her a little. "Uh… actually? No, I haven't. Why ask?"

"I don't really have a whole lot to keep me here, here is just where I need to be for the moment." Expounded the thief absentely, tucking the book with the letters against her chest. "I'm likely to be moving on in as little as a week."

"I'm not particularly fussed, Nya."

"You really want to come with me while I travel the world doing contracts for the island you heartily dislike?"

Stretching out his long legs, and mostly just looking thoughtful while she studied his profile absentely, her fellow Cloud eventually shrugged. "I'm actually just kind of… drifting a bit. I've traveled a lot over the last few years, but I didn't really experience a whole lot beyond what was local with the circus needing constant attention. Right now, where you are is interesting and I might stay a bit longer after you go, or I might follow when you move on. Depends on what I feel like, really."

"…Romania in a week? Or at least an attempt to wander in that direction?"

Cherep smirked at her. "Sounds good to me."

"Well then, going back to the question if you've ever put on your own show..." Sonya set the book and its possibly interesting cargo to the side, swinging her legs off the couch to get up. "...I might, might mind you, know of a fan around these parts. A fan of yours, I mean."

"…oh. Oh." Scrubbing his right through his hair again, the stuntman gave her a silly grin. "Well... a local following, huh?"

"And now that you remind me, I was to ask if you knew of a stunt show you'd be doing locally? He did me a bit of a favor while Tats and I were on vacation here."

He held up a long finger. "Is this one of your people, or one of mine? I'm not asking because I really care all that much… just, do I have to be careful?"

"Well, I certainly can't do anything in a week's time." Sighed the stuntman after looking highly tempted for a long moment. "…but I suppose looking into the logistics of arranging it solo is probably something to poke at."

"Also, just to know how much you can pull, and what to charge. It's business, Cherep. Didn't Viper go over this kind of crap with you?"

With a snort, he kicked up his heels to occupy the space she left open and settled in for what seemed to be turning into a nap. "I haven't asked them to be my agent this first go around just yet."

"…no?"

"Err… the last time I saw Vipes, well… Crina had a letter for them too. It tweaked their nose rather sharply."

Sonya snorted a laugh, weirdly pleased to hear it. Taking a seat on her bedspread, she pulled out the phonebook supplied in the bedside table between the twin mattresses they had rented.

Hopefully, she could find a target in this without having to trek all over the city aimlessly again.

---

(Friday the 22th of August, 1969. Bordeaux, Gironde, French Republic.)

Bordeaux, France, had a lot of bridges and cathedrals.

Both of which helped Sonya with absolutely nothing. There were a fair number of museums and theaters, which went along with being a large metropolitan area, but the local companies were either government, military, or wine distributors.

Not entirely, there was a large pharmaceutical company and a paper-based packaging one within the city. Although that really didn't scream 'hard to steal' nor 'attention grabbing' to her, and Tatiana would have a little something to say about stealing from the former.

A bank robbery it was.

She had technically done one before, even if the mint and the machines to stamp gold coins in a museum display/actual minting office had been the real target. Breaking into an actual bank vault was something new at least.

As the siblings had gotten to France a bit late in the day and elected to turn in rather early, and Cherep had fairly bounced his way out of the hotel to do whatever today, she had a rather earlier start than she was used to.

To both give her a little reasonable doubt and a cover story for scoping out the bank she had picked, the she had her Lackey send her a set of traveler's cheques via courier last night before actually turning in for the day. The heavily scarred man wearing the pressed suit and tie pin of a recognizable Mafia Land agent nearly made the hotel's concierge swallow his tongue despite the classy dress, because the man looked rather beaten up by life and ugly with it.
Well, he was well past the normal age for those in their line of work too. The gnarled hands and the scars cutting into the bridge of his nose, not to mention the lazy eye with chemical burn markings around it, didn't paint a pretty picture. Sonya tipped the old vet heftily for bothering with her errands, adding an additional hundred euros when she verified the old asshole hadn't attempted to sneak a peek at nor stole a few of what he was transporting.

From the grin she got in return before he left her in the lobby of the hotel, either he had been highly amused by her or he had managed to get into the envelope without her catching on before taking his leave.

As far as she was concerned, if he managed that he earned the extra padding.

Badly hiding a yawn, because frankly she appreciated sleeping in when on the road, the thief clicked her way into a branch bank of Caisse d'épargne on a set of heels and in a skirt-suit jacket combo she had picked up after her couriered checks arrived.

Mustering a smile for the doorman that opened the glass doors of the bank for her, she calmly strode into her target.

A clerk wasted no time in assisting her, as the lobby was nearly empty this early.

"My apologies," Sonya offered the slightly older gentleman as politely as she could manage, "I actually just need to know if you cash traveler's checks. My company just put in for a fairly awkwardly timed acquisition request for French wines, and the funds by which I am to make such purchase only just came in on the heels of it."

"Ah?" He took both the stack of cheques, and her barely legal ID she had used to get from France to the States and back, to examine. After scrutinizing the signed 'Selena Bruneau' on the cheques against her signature on the passport, the man nodded in a pleased fashion and thumbed through to see exactly how many traveler's cheques she had. "These seem to be in order. We can certainly help you and your company this morning, miss."

Giving the bank clerk a small smile, the Storm-Cloud followed his gesture to what seemed to be his desk. "I am delighted to hear it. While I'm here... how much to rent a safe deposit box? Obviously, I do not wish to walk around with this much money on me unless I have to."

The smile she was given was entirely professional and understanding as the total she had was rung up on a rather meticulously maintained mechanical calculator. "Understandable, miss. Was there anything else you wanted to store, or just the bills?"

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 22th of August, 1969 continued. A hotel, Bordeaux, Gironde, French Republic.)

"Sixteen of my steps."

"Yours, huh?" Cherep eyeballed her folded legs skeptically for a moment over the newspaper detailing the American Apollo 13 astronauts and their clean bill of health after visiting the moon. "Say about... thirty-five feet."

Sonya returned her attention to her work and noted that down. "Ten more, then three to the side."

"...twenty-ish, then six."

Jotting that down, and then adding it together with the thirty-five from before, the thief compared the basic floor plan she had 'liberated' from a government building that same morning and then the service tunnels under the city. "So... any reason why you're doing it in feet and not meters?"

"Eh... Americans are weird." Noted the stuntman dryly, lazily stretching out on the couch enough to jostle the woman trying to calculate things on the floor next to him. He also flipped through a number of pages, apparently continuing a front-page article deeper in the publication. "Trying to get used to the 'standard' system they use compared to the rest of the world's metric."

"Are you planning on a road-trip there?"

"My new motorcycle uses the American standard and not the metric system."

Sonya cocked her head, still trying to make sense of the negative space not on the blueprints which likely contained the bank vault she wanted into. "...right. When is that getting here?"

"A while, actually." Cherep responded absentely from behind her. "Say... maybe... the week after next? End of next week at earliest?"

She hummed, finally getting an idea of where she needed to be for this heist. "$That's fine.

Her head popped up as the actual meaning of his words finally sank in and gifted the man a highly skeptical look over a tattooed shoulder.

He gave her a blank one in return from behind his paper. "$I didn't pay for express shipping by air, just commercial sea-routes."

"...son of a bitch, Cherep! I don't want to hang around after I steal shit."

"Then don't!" Insisted the stuntman, flapping a hand at her and discarding the newspaper on the back of the couch. "$Go city hoping and come back in a week, or I can meet you somewhere else."

She shoved a hand through her blonde strands for once, casting the paperwork to the floor and leaning back against the couch irrtably. "...I don't want to."

The couch cushions dipped behind her as her brother sat up and set his legs on either side of her. "$Aww... I missed you too, sis."

"...I know not of this 'miss' you speak of." Sonya denied immediately, shrugging but not quite dislodging her brother when he draped his arms around her shoulders for a rather odd and awkward hug. "$Get off me."

"Mmm, no." Setting a pointy chin on the crown of her head, Cherep pulled her back against him in order to push himself forward to see what she was doing. "$What are you about to steal?

"...I intend to rob a bank." Tugging her left arm, which had been pinned in an awkward half-raised position between her chest and his arms, the thief sighed and gave up. She didn't really want to escape, honestly. It was half the reason she picked the spot she had. "$Did you want anything else?"

A hum was the first answer she got. "$Can you? I thought Tats was the safecracker."

"...safes and bank vaults are a tiny bit different." She informed him wryly, using her only free hand to gather the paperwork she had acquired via dubious means. "$A safe is a box made of heavy-duty materials, not really built to be moved nor easily opened. A bank vault is an underground room built to be nearly impregnable."
"So… 'nearly'?"

Sonya shrugged a shoulder, which still didn't get him to let her go. "Nearly, because bank robbers have been breaking into and out of them for nearly half a century. Of course, every time we do so they redevelop how to build them to foil the preferred methods so new ways of doing so have to be thought up."

The one part of her work she hadn't picked up was snatched up by him and things were finally rearranged so she could lower her left arm and his pointy chin wasn't digging into her head. "What do you mean?"

"Ever see a bank vault?" Questioned the professional thief curiously, continuing when he nodded. "They're mainly built underground, right? And the vault doors are made with those steps in the edges that sit in corresponding steps in the entrance. Those both are the result of bank robbers breaking into them, one because digging under or breaking into a building then rob the cellar is difficult to do without alerting semi-regular guards or just local police... and the other to prevent gunpowder or liquid nitroglycerin being forced in-between the cracks of a safe's 'plug' and the lip of the entranceway to blow the doors open."

"...the fuck? You're pulling my leg, right? Liquid nitroglycerin?"

"I am pulling nothing. Then thieves thought to use cutting torches to drill holes into said plug-doors to force the lock through and get in that way, but a plate of copper or different alloys were added so it would diffuse the heat or possibly melt into the holes made to plug them again." Sonya drawled out wryly, picking up her calculations again to return what she had been doing before he got her off tangent. "So now... bank vaults are reinforced with concrete. Generally speaking, if they're new enough, it's more likely the 'impressive' looking plug-door is actually steel plated concrete and not solid metal."

Cherep stole her 'homework', but finally stopping the whole 'lean over her' deal in order to cast an eye over the dimensions she had to work with, so she didn't really mind. He could then double-check her numbers and correct them if they were wrong while she got up.

"Would you like some tea?"

A heavy motorcycle boot was thrown back over a couch arm with a thud before he responded rather absently, still absorbed with her notes and the negative space between the two blueprints that was her target. "Do we really have any?"

"...there's this 'complimentary' green tea shit, or coffee." This hotel had a tiny coffee maker to go with it, so there was at least adequate hot water to make it. "I might go out to pick some actual tea up with something for lunch."

"Sounds good... hey, what is your plan for this?" Cherep waved the papers she had brought in at her, as if she couldn't guess what he was asking about.

"Guess."

(ooo000oooo)

(Friday the 22th of August, 1969 continued. Bordeaux, Gironde, French Republic.)

Sewers were not the Russian's favorite method to get into anywhere.

Aside those underground tunnels being normally utterly nasty to trek through, they were cramped and dark. Getting turned around to the point she'd get lost easily was entirely possible, and someone climbing out of a manhole cover was always noticeable.

Getting the schematics for the sewer and underground utility lines was just her wanting to check how big the vault possibly was, and how much the open space she visited meant for how deep some of those safe deposit boxes had been. With a bit of abuse in respects to the stuntman's math skills, she had a pretty good idea.

She would rather take the roof-routes honestly, so even if it would've been so much easier to go in from the underside she was breaking into the bank from the top.

Roof-hopping also meant it was less likely she'd be caught on a security camera she hadn't accounted for. She might've marked out a few on the street and within the bank, but she also didn't expect to catch all of them on a quick glance-through.

She also didn't expect to do this perfectly without a bump. Banks were not her specialty, for all she'd danced around the issue once before… the fact remains there was an industry that thrived on foiling those more experienced and skilled than she was.

While telling her big brother some of it was amusing, it was also just a small sample of what had already been tried and what was developed in response to stop it. Bank robbing had in fact dropped in popularity within criminal ranks because of the difficulty in keeping up with civilian defensive practices.

Probably why Tatiana's pick to specialize in safecracking eventually meant she lost interests in favor of becoming a criminal nurse. Partially, since some of that had to be her big sister's mentality rather than available opportunities to use her specialty.

Sliding over some irritatingly tiled roofs, slick and not the grainy type which made gripping a tad bit hard, Sonya dropped down to the bank's rooftop from a neighboring one that didn't have an alleyway between the buildings. There wasn't a skylight, which made them smart bankers, but there was a fire-escape.

Which, while good in respects to fire safety… meant she could get into the building relatively easily.

As long as she dealt with the security alarms, which were not all that hard with proper support under her and time to inspect the office window. There wasn't a sign for any recognizable security provider she knew of to give her a hint or two, but after careful inspection she could tell it was a 'break the circuit' style alarm.

Which left breaking the glass.

Another minute to give her both time to ensure she knew what was needed and to see if she could spot anything else, and to pop the window screen free, then she brought out the little old-fashioned kerosene blowtorch she found in a junk shop from the duffle bag she got from a neighboring thrift shop.

She'd give the little brass gizmo to Cherep later, he might like it. For now, though, it was just here to provide the 'obvious' for her way in.

Setting the nails of her right hand on the window, the Storm-Cloud made use of her blood red Flames to dig out a handful of glass. Once she had a suitable gap, meaning most of the pane was missing, she then lit and applied the blowtorch carefully to the edges to melt them. Avoiding the wired edges only.
No matter what she did, the glow was going to be noticeable until the glass cooled. Instead of risk an ill-timed glance, she settled into position to wait for however long it would take for the gleam of molten glass to fade.

"…meow?"

With a blink of surprise, the thief looked down.

Sitting pretty on the bottom landing of the fire escape was a truly mangy mongrel of a cat, eying her suspiciously through the slats of the grating that made up the structure.

Rather spooky, given the damn thing's fur nearly perfectly blended in with the dark down there.

All she could really see were the lamp-like yellow eyes glaring up at her.

"…don't suppose you want to clear off, huh?" Sonya asked the little beast wryly, in her native language rather than French since she didn't think it cared all that much.

It just glared back at her.

"Thought not." Stupid ass thing better not get her caught.

---

(Saturday the 23th of August, 1969. Bordeaux, Gironde, French Republic.)

The dratted little beast followed her inside.

It made a spectacular leap through the hole in the window she made wide enough for her own hips, mimicking her own dive through, and landed prettily to only saunter under a desk as she stared at it.

On one hand, Sonya could understand why. It was probably motivated by seeking better shelter, and 'inside' was so much better than 'out'.

On the other, she really didn't appreciate having another complication to worry about.

Hopefully locking it in the small office she broke into, the thief ended up strolling down a hallway rather stupidly hoping this bank had a close circuit camera system rather than one that recorded and transmitted off-site.

Destroying the tapes would give her more leeway than just avoiding or disabling the security cameras and make her job easier over all. As well as remove any evidence of her visit, or that it was a slim woman that visited and not just some other dark clad thief that came knocking late at night to make a withdrawal.

It was the third door she tried that yielded something interesting, and not in the 'security room and tapes' kind of way. Well… it had the security system she had been looking for, but…

A head of a bank's office, which did not look like an office of someone that ran a bank.

Not that she had any great experience with such places, but… surely someone who ran a bank would be more interested in the rise and fall of various denominations rather than spying on their own employees.

It couldn't be a security office because the bank of monitors that took up an entire wall was set across from a cushy looking office chair and a solid walnut desk, an equally pricey and comfortable looking couch against the only wall with the windows complete with a small kitchenette corner and a coffee table stacked with several different phones and recording tapes.

What the hell had she walked into?

Suspiciously inspecting the door she just opened didn’t net her any unexpected security systems, so the thief took a few steps inside the room and dropped the still mainly empty duffel bag on the floor next to the desk. Then she set to exploring the bank of monitors for what she wanted, before poking around the rest of this to see what there was to find.

This was rather… ‘big brother’ to her.

On the plus side, after she robbed this place the police would have cause to search the rest of the building and check this weird ass shit out.

Now then, which one of these was where the security tapes being recorded too?

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 23th of August, 1969 continued. A hotel, Bordeaux, Gironde, French Republic.)

"What are you doing-" Cherep cut himself off, half-tripping over a stack of old beaten coins and scattering them across the floor because he hadn't been watching where he was going in favor for his sister's form.

"Shh…" Flapping a hand at him, Sonya cranked up the volume on the little battered TV set.

She then went back to mindlessly sorting some violently yellow and red colored franc bills into various little piles next to her.

Picking his way past the various multi-colored bills and the small pile of coins now scattered across the carpet, the stuntman gathered up several handfuls of golden yellow colored bills in order to sit down on the couch next to her.

Not entirely what he expected after getting back from eating breakfast in a little café a few streets down. Admittedly, he had been a bit worried when his little sister hadn’t been back early enough to be included in breakfast findings.

He certainly wasn't expecting to come back to find the vault contents of a moderately successful bank spread out over their little hotel room, though. What made the hopefully temporary decorations all the more bemusing was the little pile of knick-knacks near his sister's feet.

People put those kinds of things in banks?

Cherep glanced up at the tiny television screen provided, which had a breaking news coverage of a just robbed bank, and poked her with the money until she took it irritably. "Are you really watching this?"

"Why not?" She answered a bit sarcastically, thumbing through her stolen bills absently. "It's a valid way to ensure I didn't do anything too stupid they can catch me for."

He gave his sister a sideways look. "You sure there's not a bit of hubris involved?"
"In what? Double checking to be sure I'm not currently a wanted fugitive?"

"…point."

Had he stolen anything, he'd be way too embarrassed to see anything connected to his 'work'. Any mention of the theft would've had him either stuttering or cringing.

Well, that was partially why he wasn't a thief. Give him a bit of honest work any day.

"If I wanted to be smug about it all, I'd get a newspaper to share with Tats."

Blinking a few times at his sister's admission, the stuntman gave her another sideways look.

"Really?"

Sonya finally gave him a little more attention. "She reacts, it's funny. Do you want any of this? You probably can't use it in-country for a while, but-

"I'm good, thanks." Cherep was fully aware she had given him the fruits from her thefts for years, going all the way back to when they had just met and she kept supplying him with the rubles to help afford something hot to eat every night to go with a roof over his head he had managed.

He didn't have a problem with accepting stolen things, although he was aware she put in some effort to ensure she legally bought a lot of the birthday gifts he got now.

This was her work, and her money. Same as with the proceeds of a stunt show, that would be his work and money. As he wasn't tight for cash, he didn't particularly want anything from what she had.

He glanced back at the news coverage just in time to catch something… interesting.

Especially interesting since said subject was apparently how the alarms were tripped to interrupt the bank robbery that had almost gone off without a hitch. "Did you really go through the ground floor to reach the vault?"

"Yes."

"…then what's with the cat?"

She glared at the smug looking scraggly tomcat, lounging in the arms of a police officer doing the 'we'll tell you when we can, but right now the investigation is still ongoing' thing. "…fuck that cat."

"Ookay, little sis."

She started stacking bills into a shoe box that had been hidden between her ankles, which looked like the one his new motorcycle boots had come in when his sisters had gifted it and their separate birthday presents. "I've got to follow up on my 'robbery' of myself and get this shipped off so it's not going to get me caught. Then do a bit of wine trading. Do you want anything?"

"I already ate."

"Mmm… alright." Getting up and sweeping the small pile of pricey looking jewelry and figurines into the same box she had full of francs, the thief started to reassemble her load of stolen money into something to transport it all. "By the way… the owner of that bank was a Soviet spy."

Cherep's head jerked around to give her back a surprised look. "Really?"
"Yeah. I don't really expect a whole lot to be said about the robbery until that investigation is over, but when you get your bike… meet me in Geneva, Switzerland?" Sonya glanced at the television once more, then bent to gather the coins he had knocked over the floor. "And let me know what they finally say, if they get to it before you hightail it out of here yourself."

"Sure. Umm…" Scratching at the day-old stubble on his jawline, her fellow Cloud glanced from the hotel room's beds to her expectant gaze. "You don't want to crash for a few hours?"

"...I'll be fine. I occasionally do overnight things like this." Shrugging, and stretching to reach the last few coins that ended up under 'his' bed, she finally got the last of them and stood upright again to toss the full shoe box onto the beds. "I'll sleep on the bus to… Lyon, I think."

"Not quite done with France?"

"It's far enough I can get some sleep, but… once more for good measure. Not sure what to do yet, but I'll think of something."

He snorted, jerking a thumb at the television set still blaring out what little was known about the thief's work last night. "What tops a bank robbery?"

"I have no idea but finding out might be interesting." Dumping most of the stolen money that had been on her bed into a rough canvas duffle bag that he was only semi-sure she hadn't taken to Woodstock, Sonya set the shoebox within it and slung the whole affair over a shoulder. "Although, the likelihood I'll end up accidentally revealing a KGB agent again is pretty remote. Alas."

"Probably a good thing, Nya."

(Thursday the 3rd of September, 1969. Fondation Bodmer, Republic and Canton of Geneva, Swiss Confederation.)

Her brother's boots were not particularly quiet on the tiled floors. "You are very lucky I thought to ask Bjorgn where you got to."

"Shh… we're in a library." Sonya informed him tartly, examining the tome on display in the truncated 'public' display case and the incomprehensible letters printed within a red leather-bound volume. "And you're early. I thought you wouldn't be here until next week?"

"I see that, and I am." Drawled the stuntman dryly, slinging an arm over her shoulders and peering uncomprehendingly at the same volume of ancient writing. He huffed after a few seconds of study, giving her a small squeeze. "Are you going to hang around out here long?"

"Probably not. I'm for Romania, remember?"

He hummed, softly in respects to the environment they were within. "I'll probably break off after you get there. Road trip?"

Sighing, the thief poked him in the stomach. "You just want an excuse to ride your new bike all over."

"Yep." Agreed her silly brother happily. "But there's no reason why not, especially since I can spare you some traveling fees."
"I actually have a contract for around here, so as long as you don't mind a small break and a bit of a scenic trip?"

"I heard." He informed her. "And no, I don't mind at all."

Which yeah, if he called her Lackey to get her latest position then he'd know if she was busy or not. "Are you sure there's nothing you want to do with me, or want from me? I'm not sure how much time I'll have for the rest of the year until Christmas."

The first answer she got was a snort, then another hug which finally made her feel a bit squished and fed up with all the touching. "I just really wanted to wander a bit now that I have some time."

"Fair enough." She had hated how slow the circus was, and the restrictions on her time. Cherep was a whole lot nicer than her, but not that different in nature. They were both Clouds, however oppositely Polarized they were. "Any particular desire to see anything, or just the whole 'wander' thing?"

The only reply was a shrug.

"Well, don't be a stranger. Call in occasionally, okay? I'd like to hear you didn't have an accident somewhere."

"What, that's it?" He questioned curiously, following her as she peeled away from his side to walk down the hall of the library slash museum. "You don't want to come with?"

"Sort of, but I wander pretty far on my own and don't have such itches very often. Well, so long as I'm not stuck behind a desk." Sonya explained as they reached the door of the building she had been wasting some time on a guilty pleasure within. Turning on a booted heel, she started walking backwards to see him clearly as they adjusted to sunlight. "I'm kind of surprised it took you so long to get itchy with another's pace."

The stuntman rolled his eyes at her, grinning at her pointed look in return. "I'm not 'itchy' yet, just… wanting to explore a little."

"That's itchy, brother dear. Wanderlust, itchy feet, ring a bell?"

In a measure of how much they had grown over the years… he stuck his tongue out at her. "Now I'm going to have that stuck in my head. Every time I get to this point… I'll think I have to wash my feet."

Sonya snorted a laugh and was almost surprised by that. "W-what?"

"What? Every time my feet itch, I wash them." A shrug, and a sheepish looking grin, were aimed at her as she finally went back to walking normally to navigate the exit of the museum of literature. "It's ah… habit. I've had it since… well, before you."

"You are weird."

"Yeah well, I'm your weirdo."

She hummed as they joined the pedestrian traffic outside the Bibliotheca Bodmeriana, stuffing her hands into her jeans pocket as she started just wandering.

Ignoring it when he hooked her arm with his, because in a crowd it did make sense to ensure they were closer. "True enough, I suppose."
"Only suppose?" Cherep teased brightly, aimlessly ambling along with her. "I feel so loved."

"…we are about to get very, very lost."

He released her arm only to wrap an arm around her shoulders and give her another rather stronger than normal hug. "At the moment, that sounds perfect."

…eh. They could wander until she found something for them to order dinner at, then he could get them back to the main streets once they were done wandering around.

---

(Tuesday the 23rd of September, 1969. Hotel Vojvodina, Zrenjanin, Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.)

"You have got to be kidding me."

"Engin, Dama." Bjørn offered apologetically from the other end of the phone, shuffling papers on his end. "The, ah… Wo Hop To organization has requested you for the last three weeks of October."

That would be Fong’s Triad, and he had warned her they would be putting in a contract for her. However, three weeks? "What the hell is going to take that long? …no, never mind. When do I have to be there?"

A ruffle of papers as things were again reordered, and then her Lackey cleared his throat. "By the thirteenth, according to this."

Well, that gave her a little time.

Not quite enough, especially if she wanted to make a good impression on Crina’s extended family, but she could at least finish her work here. "Well… accept it on my behalf. I did say I’d take it."

"Very good. There is also… a contract for a thief in the Kingdom of Albania, or a more risky one for the Republic of Turkey."

The Lightning-Storm sounded more skeptical over the latter than the former. "Basics for each?"

"Ah… one is for a general target snatch and go, the other is a present for details one. Another in-organization, like the one that resulted in this China contract."

As highly tempted as she was to investigate Turkey a bit and see if she could poke into a few syndicates of dubious aims that might've had a hand in Cherep's early life, she likely didn't have the time to make a full inquiry. That was another thing that would have to wait for her time with the Zolotovs to end.

The Russian Storm-Cloud had a rather long list of such things by now, the Romanian thing was her latest addition to said list now that she didn't have the time. "Albania. As much as I'd like the other for personal reasons, I will need some travel time to make the first."

While she couldn't hear him write down her orders, she could hear him uncapping and then recapping his pen.

"Anything else for me?"
Now that the business portion of the call was finished, Bjorn made a significantly less professionally sounding hum of contemplation. "Not really, Dama. The… ah, French work? I have it cycling through the wash. I can start applying it here shortly, and it looks to be more than enough for… restocking what was gone through so far."

…she was only now breaking even again?

Holy fuck, people were expensive.

The Zolotovs were equally as expensive, if you looked at it sideways. The more time she spent idling about their headquarters, the less time she had to work and build up a comfortable cushion to ensure no one looking at her for their livelihoods was starving. "How much is that October contract paying?"

"Ah… about two thousand per week."

…and using the current exchange system from yuan renminbi to euros, it was about eight euros for seven days. "Bjorn, recheck that."

"Dama?"

"If that's really how much I'm getting paid, I'm socking Fong in the jaw."

"…two thousand euros a week? Actually half a million renminbi, in three installments, but I converted it. Should I not have?"

"Oh." Well, that would've been a bit embarrassing.

Actually, that was a bit pricey.

What the hell did they think she did a week to pay that much for her time? "Fine then. So long as that Kingdom of Albania thing is not too lengthy, use your judgement on that, I'll take it and that'll be three out of the last five I need."

The Triad's payments would actually just finally push her back into being 'moderately' comfortable again. After nearly two years hovering just over scraping the barrel, and that was even accounting for the three or four additional people tacked on.

Maybe she should look into ensuring she had the padding to counter any drain even more people would put on her finances. Knowing her fondness for her sister, she'd of course send Adrik more cash if he needs it. Even if the man would likely turn around and help Verde with it, which he wasn't supposed to.

…then there was that French Lightning himself. She should probably ensure she had the funds ready just in case the scientist did manage to pull off his little experiment and she had to argue over why she didn't want another little minion.

"Da, Dama." Bjorn absently responded a bit belatedly, but as he was likely jotting down her orders she found it not particularly irritating. Just a bit… noticeable. There was another shuffle of papers as the young teen probably double-checked everything they had discussed. "Can I have the shipping number for the contract you just finished? I think I smudged a number."

Sonya glanced at her inner left wrist, where the Cyrillic numerals he asked for were listed. "Read off what you have, I'll correct it if it is wrong."
As the Icelander obediently rattled off the shipping number, a fairly familiar pair of boots suddenly entered her field of view. She glanced up at her brother curiously, but he just shrugged and gave her a wary looking grin.

"Right… no, that's correct. Call me back here at least by tomorrow if that other contract is possible."

"Da, Dama."

Hanging up on the teen and pushing the telephone back across the counter so the concierge could pull it back to his little desk under it, she looked up at her fellow Cloud. "Did you find anything interesting or something?"

"Yeah… about that." Cherep gestured to the exit of their hotel's lobby, shoving his hands in his jean's pockets and following her out of the building when she obligingly started moving. "A couple backpackers invited me to wander with them back up to Switzerland and maybe down to Budapest if we've got the time."

"Sounds fun. Are you splitting then?"

"Thinking about it, yeah." A finger was waggled just under her nose, which made her give him an odd look. "That being the case, there's… one thing I kind of wanted to talk to you about. And since we're probably splitting here, in a few hours when I'm to meet up with them, there's this one thing…"

"…ho?"

"We're going to need beer. Lots, and lots, of beer for this conversation." Deadpanned the stuntman dryly, looking resigned and a bit reluctant when she glanced over at him in concern. At her second glance at him, he rolled his eyes and pulled a face at her. "I seriously don't want you to answer any of this. Okay? I can live happily without knowing a damn bit of this subject. But… since you asked last month, it might help you figure out what you want."

Sonya skeptically inspected his face for any hint of what he was on about. "You… are making little sense."

A hand applied to her right shoulder had her taking an unexpected left, which had her nearly face-to-door with a corner tavern's entranceway. "Beer first, then questions."

Bemused over what he was talking about, she went along just to see how this would end.

Eventually with beer in hand, and half hunched over a booth table, Cherep raked a hand through his hair first then took a long gulp of his drink. "Okay… remember, I don't want to know."

Blinking at him blankly over her own glass of wine, she nodded. "Okay. Can you get on with it?"

Setting his stein down firmly, her brother leaned halfway across the table instead of just be hunched over his side. "…do you masturbate?"

"…um." Ah… that's why he demanded the liquor.

"Nope. Don't answer that. Just… it might help?" Another hand ruffled his hair, and her now highly uncomfortable fellow Cloud fidgeted with his beer. "But, as you don't really seem all that interested in the physical beyond just… I mean the looks of anyone, maybe you're more abstract? You like personality traits, not long hair or muscles or, well. You do have a 'type', but it doesn't seem you like it much beyond just looks of those you talk to longer than the bare minimum… I'm going to stop talking now."
Sonya shut her mouth slowly, then took a sip from her wine from a lack of anything else to add.

"…and. I'm going to forget I ever had this conversation with you." He tacked on after draining his beer stein, glancing a bit desperately at the bar but taking a deep breath and returning his attention to her. "Again, I don't want to know."

"…thank you?" She tried slowly, actually feeling more amused than embarrassed or awkward over the topic just from watching her brother freak out slightly over the subject matter. "So… um. How about… that football stuff? Do you like football?"

Cherep snickered, thumping his forehead against their table.

"Were there any pretty ladies that invited you to go backpacking with them?"

"Yes, yes there are. Both of them." Admitted the stuntman with an actual laugh, lifting his head and giving her a squinty-look. "Let's drop that subject."

"Let's." However, now she almost couldn't stop thinking about it.

She didn't, actually. For the record… or hadn't.

Her brother did have a point, maybe she should start with herself rather than with another.

It had been a long time since she was Rachel, and while she knew she had once in another life… she already knew she was recalling some things wrong or just incorrectly. Maybe she needed a refresher.

"…I'm drawing a blank." She informed him absently.

"Yeah… me too."

The thief glanced down at her half-full glass of wine, and then at his empty stein. "More beer?"

"Please." Cherep drew out dryly, finally opening both eyes to give her an overblown beseeching look. "I love you… not in that way, but I do love you… beer me, please."

"I don't think that needed stating." She drawled back, gathering his glass up and sliding out of the booth.

________________________

(Friday the 3rd of October, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Having not expected an ambush by Mist brat the moment said brat spotted him, Renato waited until the rushed babble finished before knocking the kid's skull with his knuckles. "Calmly. Beginning, middle, end. Detail, structure. Now, what?"

Shamal pouted hard while clutching the spot he didn't hit that hard, but as he wasn't a soft-hearted little thief lady the hitman was unmoved and the kid eventually started with whatever the hell he wanted. "There's school clubs. And they do… lots of things. Can I join one?"

…yeah. If the brat was specifically asking, there was a catch.

Strolling over to the short table supplied in this 'study hall' type room the brat had to himself somehow, he kicked out one of the chairs and seated himself since getting details out of a Mist was notoriously hard or as stupidly easy as asking.
Brat had been making great strides in that respect of his Flame type, especially with the support of his equally confusing mother-figure.

Not to mention the utterly and wickedly evil grandmother.

A chair made to set someone at a short table lowered Renato about as far to the floor as he ever wanted to get. Stretching out his legs straight out then hooking one ankle over the other, and crossing his arms, he gave the kid a flat look. "Why do I care, and what do you want."

Shamal instantly scampered to pull out another chair, then seated himself neatly and looked straight back at the hitman.

Another thing he could thank Sonya's mother for, the brat had learned how to argue his point at hell of a lot better all of a sudden. It was getting pretty hard to deny the Mist without coming across as a complete asshole, and… well, given who he was sharing parenting duties with…

"School clubs. Things to do after school lets out. Mamma said to find something to get interested in, and I found it." Reaching under the table, a bit far since this wasn't exactly where the kid had been attempting to get his homework done at, and he dragged out his school bag. Out of it he dug a flyer, which was passed to the hitman. "There's a general one for primary school students, which will give a general overview of a lot of different clubs we can join once we get into secondary school."

"You're not going to be-"

"I know!" The Mist cringed, lowered his tone, and managed an apologetic shrug for the hard look he earned interrupting his godfather. "Sorry. But I do know that."

"Be that as it may," Renato drawled out sarcastically to a slight flinch, flicking his eyes back to the flyer to see what it said the Mist was probably not saying, "if you're not going to be attending public, or private for that matter, secondary school in favor of Mafia School… why bother with this?"

"Because I'll get the basics of a wide variety of subjects." Shamal informed him brightly, almost waving his hands but clenching them and forcibly dropping them back to his lap. "Like a book club, and a chess club, and a radio club. All of which I can use later on?"

That sounded a lot like the same words he gave the brat on his first day of school.

"And it gives an obvious reason why I might know a bit more than most, if I happen to use it later on in life." This part sounded rehearsed, and a lot less enthusiastic than his other argument.

However, it was still a reasonably well thought out point.

It wasn't a particularly bad idea, might help the kid figure out what he wanted to do with his life.

"So… what have you not told me yet?" As he did control his education still, it wasn't entirely out of the question Shamal was just checking that he could expand that slightly… but if it was just a question of permission then as a Mist the hitman would've expected it to be secured after the fact.

The kid fidgeted with his fingers. "There might be fees?"

Renato glanced up at him, to the flyer in his hands, and turned the damn thing around to read the list of prices he could've sworn hadn't been there when the paper was handed to him. "…yeah… no."

"But-! Mister Renato-"
"Brat, with how much I'm shelling out just for your stupid school..." He glanced at the paper again, a curious thought occurring to him before he got too far into that topic. "...try asking your mother. I can't afford this at the drop of a pin, but she might be able to."

"...oh."

"The earlier I know, the more likely I can do something." The hitman explained to him dryly, satisfied he found a way out of this without Mist dramatics or an utter snit thrown at him. "Next time, don't spring this shit on me the last week this allows you to sign up in."

Shamal blinked at him innocently. "Sorry."

Well, obviously that was bullshit. Probably done specifically, just so he could throw a childish little fit if he said no. Which then could be used as some emotional blackmail, or at least Renato could think of a few ways to trip into something like blackmail especially if he then threatened to go to Sonya with the issue.

...Lisa had made him paranoid over Shamal's possible motivations. Next summer vacation, the brat could visit with the Russian Storm-Cloud on Mafia Land rather than Moscow.

And that had no bearing on Christmas, which a week or so would be spent there anyways, or the time brat would be living with the thief in her home.

With a snort, he handed the flyer back to the kid and drew up his legs to stand up again. "I'll get you Sonya's current number before I leave, if I can. If I can't reach her kid, you're out of luck."

"Alright." The brat agreed way too easily for a kid that just got the 'ask someone else' brush-off excuse, not clamoring for the thief's number now and not later. "I did feed Luigi, she's doing good."

...terrific. When was the dratted thing supposed to croak?

There was no realistic way how he'd be able to take care of a lizard on the road if it was a tank-trained creature. "I would hope so, as you can't get a dog unless Luigi's alive at the end of next summer."

"Wanna see her?"

Renato paused, then tugged his suit down once and straightened out his cuffs. "I'll pass, thank you. Do you need anything else? I'm probably not going to be around a lot for the rest of the year, kid. So, speak now or miss out."

Shamal hopped up from his chair, shoving it under the table with a quick movement to trot after the hitman. "I don't think so. Will you at least still call in?"

"Every week, yes." He kind of wondered how the kid would deal with his upcoming 'death', but at least he'd be with his godmother for that. "I'm not sure why you expect that to change."

"...because I'm getting older?" Skidding to a halt, the Mist darted back for his book work then scurried to catch up with the older Italian again. "That's how it works, right? The older I get, the less you and mamma will keep tabs on me?"

"You're enough of a pain in my ass I'm going to be keeping tabs on you for a long while yet. Don't worry about that, brat." As he wasn't a tiny Russian Storm-Cloud, he couldn't speak for Sonya. However... "And I can almost assure you, Sonya will be always interested in what you're up to."
Chapter 78

(Monday the 6th of October, 1969. Berat, Kingdom of Albania.)

Albanian still twigged her as something 'off'.

Sonya could not figure out how, why, or for what. It wasn't quite driving her nuts, but the awareness that something was off was persistently in the back of her mind no matter what she tried to distract herself with.

It was the week leading up to the eleventh birthday of Crown Prince Leka Anwar Zog Rezza Baudouin Msiziwe, the son of King Leka I of Albania and his Consort Queen Samira Neshhipi. A lot of preparations were ongoing, a lot of visitors were passing through, and it was generally just a good time for crime.

Ignoring the 'festive' feel to the interestingly paved streets right now, the Russian thief merely picked her way through a few bookstores for history texts to waste some time before heading to where she needed to be.

Unfortunately, a lot of the textbooks she found were ‘pro-Albania’. They all had very flattering takes on the monarchy… all three generations it had so far, and the paths the royal family had taken to establish their rule.

Although it was interesting to learn that the Kingdom had once been a subordinate state to Italy when they had a complicated royal family. Reading between the lines told her that it was mainly the Mafia Wars that prevented the ex-president turned monarch of Albania from being ousted in short order when things went to hell in World War II, it didn't really help her all that much. She didn't end up buying anything in the few bookstores she poked around.

…wait.

Did the Mafia Wars happen in Rachel's lifetime?

Was that why the country pegged her as 'off'?

That was something new to ponder, and not something she'd find the answer in a book, so Sonya left the bookstore to get on with her work. After buying at least two different history texts simply to read in-between things even if she didn't know where the hell she'd put them later.

Having once done a robbery of the current military establishment, the thief had taken some precautions for just in case while walking around. As it was impossible guarantee her description hadn't been noted her first visit, either when she got into the country or when she stole shit on her way out, her bright blonde hair was dyed dark brown and she actually invested in shoes with inch-high heels and inserts that topped her height off at a half-inch more. Fake reading glasses, with merely straight glass lenses but prescription grade frames, made her rather look like a librarian.

Unsurprisingly, she rather enjoyed looking like such. The initial reaction most had upon sighting her on the street was to treat their reading material better instead of asking her strangely random questions about what she was doing later.

Yeah, flirting. However, she didn't know a lot of those people and the continued overly-familiar questions irked her. Especially when it persisted after she indicated she wasn't interested, and she was accused of being a tease or lying slut for denying whoever some 'fun' with her.
Mostly from civilians… which, murdering them was not something she wanted to start doing.

Maybe she should keep the glasses?

No, she didn't need it but… anything that staved off the bullshit that she hated dealing with was then worth the hassle. Unless she wore the glasses with her natural hair color and the results were replicated, it wasn't really something to incorporate into her daily appearance.

Sliding the fake accessory back up the bridge of her nose again, the Russian entered a rather old auction house to inquire about the lots showing later that night.

Much to her chagrined pleasure, she was first handed a list of ancient books up for auction first.

There was a first edition copy of Le Avventure di Pinocchio: Storia di un Burattino by Carlo Collodi up for sale, as well as a slightly damaged copy of Fables of Aesop and Other Eminent Mythologists with Morals and Reflections by Sir Roger L'estrange.

There were pictures of the title pages which looked lovely, and she could almost make out the first sentences of the intricately detailed first page of the stories in the pictures provided on the list.

A throat cleared, yanking Sonya's attention from the lot list in her hands to the clerk who had been helping her. The highly amused youth handed her the actual list that had the lot she had been hired to steal over the counter she had been lingering at while he went off. "I believe this is what you asked for?"

With a probably slightly awkward smile, she straightened up and accepted that list before asking something in the French they thankfully had in common about the first paper she had been handed. "…sorry, but when are these two being put up for auction?"

"The ninth, miss."

…shit. Fuck, if she stayed to buy them she'd probably run late for Fong's whatever.

She couldn't steal it now that someone knew she wanted it, she had just went and made herself memorable with this.

…she wanted, even had the money for splurging a tiny bit, but… work.

"…that is mean." Like, really mean.

They were beautiful, and she could totally read them to Shamal! The brat had her copy of the Grimm Fairy Tales and seemed to enjoy it… Aesop and Pinocchio wouldn't be nearly as graphic as a witch being forced to wear red-hot iron shoes and dance until she died.

"I can't stay that long…"

"I could inquire if it is possible to have the lots changed to tonight, miss."

The thief blinked at him blankly, then after tucking the papers into her purse she pressed her hands together in a prayer position just under her chin. "Please?"

Her target was tomorrow night, but she was pretty sure that wouldn't be recalled. Just that some librarian-type had gotten highly distracted by two books of children's fables and got her business cleared out a bit early. Frankly, with how much these two might run up in a bidding war… it probably wouldn't be expected for her to remain for a second night to lose even more money.
That was assuming the switch would be allowed for a prospective buyer. Which wasn't guaranteed to happen, if they had another buyer in mind and that was why the date they were to be auctioned had been picked. Also, the possibility that they would change the lineup for one prospective buyer when they expected a particular lot to sell high was pretty minor.

Nothing would be lost by attempting to see if they would… except her own money. She could risk stealing them anyways, or not safely right now, but as this was the second contract she had accepted in this country that would mean even more convoluted methods to disguise herself on her next visit.

Sonya was not a stupid thief. She might want, but if she couldn't get it legally then she would miss out.

However much she'd regret it.

---

(Thursday the 9th of October, 1969. Arrival and Departure Hall, Mafia Land.)

Björn absently waved a hand in response to a question someone he passed way too quickly to note who called out to him.

Slipping a bit on a tight corner in his dress shoes, which were not made to be worn when running and he regretted not splurging for the refitted type with actual rubber treads that allowed a limited amount of traction, the Icelander opened a door to bolt down another 'employee only' hallway Lackeys were allowed to make use of.

This hallway only ran from a disguised closet door to the tarmac, enabling a two-minute shortcut. Of course, with the number of criminal types that made the man-made island home, getting into the shortcut was rather easy but getting out was hard.

He cheated by being the recognizable Lackey of the only Mafia Land associated Cloud Flame user. Most others that worked on the island that had no interactions with his patron made a point of getting to know him or what he looked like.

The Lightning-Storm had never actually outright ran with any urgency while on the island before. Aside the one bitter regret over his choice in footwear, he also intended to never do this again.

He kept getting resigned looks, and a few nervous gulps. The slightly hysterical questions weren't very fun either.

It wasn't that majorly bad, Sonya had just asked that if Renato Sinclair ever contacted him about young Shamal she wanted to know immediately. She had been in the air when the call came in, immediately then meant she wanted to know the moment she got off the plane.

Why did everyone think Sonya was a mass-murderer?

She was nice, or at least nicer than your average criminal tended to be.

Slapping his ID card against a door's tiny window had it yanked open, and the Lackey immediately bolted past the guardsman armed with a shotgun to the plane which was only now taxiing down the runway.

Thankfully at least the plane didn't stop halfway down the tarmac or anything else equally as facepalm inducing.
Absently straightening his tie as he recovered his breath, the Lackey eventually forced his hands behind his back to prevent more fidgeting as a moveable staircase was maneuvered into position to allow the passengers to disembark.

His patron was the third one off, and she glanced at him questioningly as her boots hit the blacktop. "Bjørn?"

"Dama, you have a call to return. The one you insisted that if your Italian hitman ever called about I was to immediately inform you of."

The thief paused between steps, then gripped the material over his bicep carefully and pulled him aside enough they would be able to notice anyone attempting to eavesdrop. "Talk."

"Mafioso Sinclair asks if you are willing to cover extracurricular activities." Responded the Lightning-Storm obediently. "Deadline for acceptance is tomorrow."

"...shit. Yeah, how am I to help?"

"I have the details written down on a notepad in my apartment. Although, merely calling the Iron Fort will work from what your hitman has claimed." Gesturing to the processing building, thankfully she was in enough of a good mood to be nudged a bit, had her slowly starting for the closest building with a phone. "To get things there in time, a courier will be needed."

Sonya nodded absently, digging through her purse for her wallet and the passport she had made use of while she had been on both personal and business reasons. "Did he at least give you the details I am to cover?"

"...again, with my notes back at my apartment."

"Then start gathering together what you need to make a trip to Italy. Unless you can get the same courier you sent my traveler's cheques with, I would rather you handle it personally."

...apparently, she had liked the man he sent after her. Bjørn pulled a small notebook out of his inner jacket pocket and a pen out of his slack's, jolting down the name of the man. He was pretty sure it was something like Garrett McCarthy. "Da, Dama."

"Next time, just handle it. As long as it is reasonable and not... like, a few thousand euros."

"...erm."

"What the hell would cost that much?"

"It is apparently a private school's extracurricular sampling of multiple possible clubs one could join in later scholastic years." Her Lackey explained quickly, tucking the writing implements away again. "Hence why your associate apparently can or will not cover it himself, as he does the main costs as it is."

"I... no, I will hear about this from the brat." She decided, getting preempted in opening a door by a scrambling service personnel and not appreciating it from the scowl she gave the girl. "Get on it."

"Da, Dama. Ah... will someone be picking me up or do I need directions?"

Another few skeptical glances around at the processing room which was suspiciously devoid of other people, and the blonde woman glanced back at him. "I will try to arrange a pickup, check in with me before you leave so I can give directions if I cannot. Excuse me miss, do you have a phone?"
With her distracted by dealing with the processing people, Bjørn split off to do as she asked.

Giving a slightly exasperated look of his own at the now highly confused security guard a bit desperately gripping a pair of brass knuckles. "That was why I ran. So she wouldn't be irritated."

"So long as you're on top of it."

Rolling his eyes at the man, the Lightning-Storm straightened his tie again and reused the so-called 'shortcut' to get on his patron's orders.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 9th of October, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Brat, explain. Now."

Shamal stiffened his spine at the unamused tone to his mamma's voice through the tinny reception. "You said to find something interesting, and I did!"

"A something that costs a thousand and three hundred euros?"

"For the entire year," He hastened to explain, clutching at the phone receiver the maid had handed to him. "Or eight installments of two hundred. But it's the contents, mamma. Which is a... lot of subjects. Book clubs, sport clubs, introductory lessons for electronic radios, a horseback riding club."

"Brat." Shutting his mouth a bit quickly, the Mist bit his lower lip when the silence stretched a bit. "If I pay for this... Renato can pull you out if your grades suffer. You hear me? This is extra, you let your schoolwork suffer and it will stop."

"Okay!" Shamal would promise anything to get to try this out.

No, it might not be as interesting as he thought it would be, as a matter of fact it was nearly guaranteed not to be with how much it was talked up, but nearly half his class was going along with it.

He just didn't want to be left behind with the few that wouldn't be going.

A gusty sigh echoed down the line from wherever his mamma was. "My Lackey is on the way with the money. I'm calling this your Christmas present."

Ouch... he'd still take it.

It hurt a bit, but if that was what he had to do... "...okay."

"Alright then. I'm glad you found something, brat. Next time, a bit more warning."

"I'll try, mamma."

Sonya gave a tinny huff in his ear. "I'm sure. Love you brat, behave."

"Love you too. Is that a 'behave' like you do, or a 'behave' like what most people tell their kids?"

"What the hell do I care for what other people tell their damn kids?"

Snickering, he handed the phone receiver up to the maid that had summoned him to the second-floor meeting room to take the phone call. "Good news, young master?"

"Yes, thank you." One was not rude to the help, even if they were not your help, because that was not what gentlemen did. At least according to his godfather. "Excuse me."

Although the whole giving up his godmother's Christmas present kind of… sucked, he did just get introduced to the rest of her family. Maybe zio or zia would get him a present and that would make up for it.

…there was a lot of time to get through first, and if his godfather was being given the reigns of his club activities then he should get on top of his homework so it wouldn't be taken away. The hitman probably would yank him out if he let too much slide, and say it was his own fault if he complained there was a bit much to do in the time given and keep up with learning to pick the locks he had been sent already.

But it was really neat of his mamma to let him have this, even if it was a bit expensive.

---

(Sunday the 12th of October, 1969. Hong Kong international Airport, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Liqin gave her a sheepish smile, lowering the sign scrawled with her name on it he had been holding to attract her attention. "…miss Yu."

Sonya eyed the man irritably. "Obviously, you do not have to use that name. The other one is on that paper."

"Yes, well…" Shrugging a bit awkwardly, the Triad member folded the sheet up and tucked it away somewhere.

He didn't have a purse, where did he put it?

"I merely needed a way to ensure you would know where to go. You have not given me permission to use it."

Rolling her eyes, she gestured for him to get on with it. "I need to update my wardrobe, what Chinese garments I have are ill fitting. So, whatever it is you want, it can wait."

"…aa." Almost visibly cottoning on to why she was a day early, he hastened quickly to match steps with her on her way out. "Fong was not expecting you for another day."

"I wasn't expecting him to meet me." She informed him shortly. "In fact, I wasn't expecting you either."

She had wanted to do a bit of arranging herself, as in getting a suitably secure 'drop' bag set up on the mainland part of Hong Kong for just in case she had to hastily bail out again. She did have to rather unexpectedly extract herself from the country once before and preparing for any further complications was just smart.

Having a tagalong would make that harder, and therefore she wasn't amused at this.

Liqin merely kept pace with her, grabbing the doors exiting the terminal before she could and gesturing to a waiting taxi.
...so, no. She wasn't going to be able to do what she wanted to before getting into it.

Well... not without some creativity. "I merely wanted a cigarette."

The man paused, confused.

Sonya set her backpack against her left leg and dug her cigarettes out of her purse. "I also have to go fetch my luggage, as well."

Liqin gave her a slightly suspicious look.

"And... lunch kind of sounds nice about now."

Folding his hands into his sleeves, the taller Chinese man gave her a wry little smile. "So it is going to be like that, is it?"

"I have no idea what you are talking about." She observed slowly, hiding the act of lighting her cigarette with both hands and what little concealment her short blonde hair allowed. Lifting her head again, she took a long drag from her smoke before continuing. "Are you accusing me of something?"

"There is nothing to accuse." He informed her pleasantly, still wearing that tiny little smirk. "I can wait."

For the record, she didn't appreciate his sense of humor either. It was going to make things a bit harder.

Tapping the filter of her smoke against her lips thoughtfully, Sonya turned her attention to figuring out a way to give him the slip to do what she wanted to accomplish before she had to be anywhere. Liqin still had that stupid little smirk on his face.

A taunt, which she really wanted to wipe off.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 12th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"Your grudge with Liqin is still unfortunate."

"I," the young woman insisted without looking up from the old-looking tome she was reading from, "had things to do. I did them. If Liqin had issues keeping up, well then... that is not my fault."

Fong shook his head, smoothing a hand over his mouth to hide the smirk and gesturing for the hovering tea-carrying girl trying to be a good hostess to an indifferent Cloud user to take her leave.

Not that there was any real reason to, Sonya wasn't watching him at all and seemed to not care what the young woman attending to her still full teacup did. "I believe you just ensured his respect, since this is the second time you've evaded him when he intended to follow you."

"Is his job keeping up with people? More specifically, people that do not want him to follow?" Questioned the thief sarcastically, finally lowering the collection of papers and leather in her hands to give him a suspicious look over the top of it. "I could blame someone else, if you rather."

"Ah... no, thank you." He refuted after a moment of consideration.
Liqin knew why she was so agonistic to him and had yet to actually take issue with her obvious dislike of his person. It hadn't actually affected anything too important, merely inconvenienced one man a slight bit.

He had no real opinion on the subject himself. Merely that it was slightly amusing and rather petty for a Cloud to do towards someone she decided to snub, and it was rather interesting to see her think up more ways to show her opinions on the subject.

Joining the Russian in the little nook she found to quietly read things until he was free, Fong seated himself on the other low bench supplied for this tea table and investigated the abandoned teapot steaming away on the table. "May I ask what you are reading?"

"…a collection of children's stories in Italian." Slipping a scrap of paper in-between pages to mark her spot, Sonya set her book aside on her purse and looked straight at him. "So... I'm here. Now what?" "Now... well... there's a complication."

"Of course there is..."

"We are not the ones arranging the tournament." He explained a bit apologetically, unable to do more in the face of the facts. "For about a week, you will be held with a number of other hostages. There have been a few attempts to take advantage of that, so there is a question if you would mind extending some protection to a few select others."

From the utterly flat expression she had, it wasn't likely.

"A few will be children?"

"I'm not a monster, Fong. If they are young, if they can't do it themselves, I might step in if it's that urgent or obviously not something they're comfortable with." She shrugged, seemingly only now recalling she did have a cup of tea that was cooled on her side of the table. Investigating it with a fingertip, she apparently found it too cool and lit a finger with purple Flames to reheat it as she held it a touch over the surface of her tea. "Aside that, I reserve judgement if I should step in or not. But that doesn't tell me anything good about this little favor I'm doing for you."

"We had not expected anything too alarming, until a bid in one of the meetings that made it clear one of the branches arranging things have an ulterior motive aside the gambling that can be won off the fights."

Taking a sip of her reheated tea, she aimed another impressively flat expression at him over the rim of her cup. "Are you really that surprised?"

"No, it is why I asked you instead of risk my other option."

The woman shrugged, digging one handed through her purse for a small pack of cigarettes.

"I thought you quit?"

"My sister had insisted. But then it turns out Storms can get to the point of only being affected by what they want to be or, if they get too low on Flames, sometimes unintentionally." A flick of red Flames this time lit it, and the thief huffed a smoky sigh as she inspected the fragile cylinder of paper. "So... I will be held captive, supposedly with other women or dependents, at the hands of dubious intent holding others. Did I miss anything?"
“…there is a few days of meetings and discussions before that.” Fong corrected after a moment accepting how strange that did sound. "And a martial arts master you asked me to find for you."

Sonya sighed again. "Do I need to know anything about this master of yours?"

"…he probably will not appreciate your gender." Admitted the martial artist slowly. "But there is some time until then… would you like to spar?"

She blinked at him slowly, then a small frown settled on her lips. "Oh… that reminds me."

He ducked the hammer that almost took his head off.

"I do not appreciate your last 'gift'." She informed him pointedly, jabbing a finger a hairsbreadth from his chest. "As soon as I figure out how to use them, I will be using them to whack you around a few rooms."

"I hold no objections to that." He informed her brightly.

The Russian paused, rethought her statement, and then retreated back across the tea table into her seat. "Allow me to correct myself, I will use those weapons to kick the ass of everyone but you."

He narrowed his eyes at her.

Sonya pretended to ignore his reaction, puffing on her cigarette and inspecting the surface of her black tea instead. If the reflection gave her a satisfying image of his frown, well… luck.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 12th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"She's tiny."

"Not everything powerful or intimidating has to be large."

Sōng Mingxia squished herself to avoid the two gossiping wives and still get through the doorway they were nearly blocking, entering the courtyard of the Wo Hop To Triad's headquarters at an angle that wasn't quite comfortable.

Her brother was in front of her for all of a second, then he was a red blur dodging out of the way of a massive gold battle ax that would've split him in half had he been a moment slower. As it was, the ax made a deep gouge in the earth before skipping up and shattering into Cloud Flames before it could hurt a bystander that also came out to watch. Flicking his braid out of his field of view, the elder Sōng sibling feinted left then ducked right to weave around the business end of a long-handled slim ax and close in on his opponent.

A willowy blonde woman wielding the halberd redirected the retaliation punch over a shoulder with an upraised arm holding her weapon and stomped her booted left foot… causing a localized small-scale earthquake that threw off the footing of everyone in the courtyard.

Taking advantage of the opportunity she caused, she released her pointy weapons in flairs of lilac Cloud Flames only to summon a massive maul from the energy to swing double-handed at the martial artist's guts.

Fong had to take the hit as he was wrong-footed to dodge quickly enough, and even with catching the handle behind the head of the hammer and rolling with the strike he ended up knocked clear to the other side of the enclosed yard. He did manage to take the maul away from the woman, and discarded it himself, but the Cloud-woman merely flexed her hands lit with her Flames to summon two more gold axes to them.

Her brother considered his opponent for a moment, then kicked back up the maul he had discarded.

"That is cheating." She observed dryly, dropping an ax to snap her left fingers and imploding the weapon in his hands in another bursting puff of her wispy lavender Flames. "Why in the world would you pick up my weapons?"

"...I'm curious about what they can do." He admitted easily, a shrug as he sidestepped far enough to slightly circle the woman to the left in order to keep him directly in front of her... which then put a rather shallow crater at her heels.

A slide of a foot, and Fong suddenly kicked up a plume of dirt and soil from the disturbed ground instead of dart forward.

Flinching away from the grit thrown in her face, his opponent only just managed to bend backwards in time to avoid another kick to her head. Instead of righting up once the shin passed over her, or overbalancing into the shallow crater behind her, the blonde continued to go backwards into a one-handed handstand until Fong had to withdraw from his position to avoid a leg of her own kicking up between his.

Completing the backflip with an attempt at her brother's jaw with her other heel when he didn't back up as much as she apparently wanted, the woman growled slightly when her opponent took advantage of her odd position to grab a blue-clad leg and try to toss her away.

The axe she still held instead bit into ground as she gripped it in both hands, tearing up even more of the courtyard but preventing the owner from being tossed around like a ragdoll.

Mingxia sighed, rubbing a hand over her face before looking back up again in hopes of finding a good spot to interject.

Fong did not give up his advantage easily, dropping a bit to a crouch to apply some leg strength to hauling on the limb he had.

The woman tried to tug back, but her axes didn't equal out her brother's more solid grip and his leverage on her. A moment spent in the tug-of-war where nothing moved, then the gold blade embedded in the ground started to slide toward her opponent in spite of the grassroots they were digging into.

Her free leg kicked out, not really doing more than making the martial artist wince when it impacted his right shoulder, then it kicked out again with a flash of lavender fire and the sound of heavy fabric ripping.

He released a second too late to avoid the sharp pick end of a delicately slim warhammer summoned from the side of her calf, it sunk a good two inches of metal through Fong's bicep.

Not quite straight through the arm, but enough so that it was likely skin and a bit of muscle was now punctured.

"I win." Observed the woman slowly, righting herself slowly now that she was released and ignoring the damage to her clothing. Leaving her axe in the ground in favor of helping her brother extract the strange war hammer from his arm. "...to be honest, I didn't even know I could do that."
The elder Sōng sibling flexed his bicep once the weapon was carefully pulled out, clamping a hand over the coin sized punctured marks in his clothing to prevent too much blood loss. "I was unaware we were actually doing more than testing each other, so I object to that 'win'."

"Big brother," Mingxia spoke up, then when he glanced to her she pointedly looked at the damage the two had wrought on the courtyard, "I believe you were told not to do this anymore."

Fong blinked at her innocently, smiling serenely as he turned to face her. "I have no idea what you are speaking of, little sister. There were no fights with invading and hostile Triad members."

Clapping a hand over her face, the Rain silently despaired over her brother's sense of humor. "The two of you put three holes in the yard, brother."

Both combatants obediently looked around at the damage they caused since she mentioned it.

Mingxia watched between her fingers as the blonde woman was entirely uncaring of the mounds of dirt thrown up, which was likely also her fault, and the martial artist absently stamped out a small fire near the veranda she was standing on that had started well before she got there.

"…whoops?" Offered the Cloud blandly, sounding utterly unapologetic and more confused if there was a tiny slant to her tone. "There wouldn't happen to be a Sun around, would there?"

The bloody end of her weapon swung to the ground, and she used it as an awkward and ill-effective shovel to push the bigger mounds of loose dirt back into the holes they probably came from. Before she could ask what use that would be, the older woman then also stamped the small heap back down to level ground.

Leaving an utterly obvious bald patch in the grass, which she supposed was a tiny bit better than the still smoldering charred ones.

"I will fetch one." Mingxia offered to her, glancing expectantly to her brother.

"Ah. Sonya, this is my little sister. Mingxia, this is Sonya Bazanova. A Russian Flame expert, and thief."

"I caught that she was your sister." Sonya responded absently, finishing up her rather blatantly obvious patch-job on the small strip of grass by leaving the bald spot stamped with the indentation of her heel in order to 'fix' another. "She is your 'other option'?

"Yes." Fong informed her back solemnly.

She glanced backwards at him first, then slid those grey eyes over to the younger girl. The Rain held her breath to prevent any hitches that might translate to a flinch and returned the look the best she could.

It felt like a minute, but probably was merely a second.

With a shrug, the Cloud-woman went back to what she was doing.

That… wasn't bad, right?

Mingxia looked to her brother, who merely shrugged himself.

"Huang is in, little sister." He informed her instead of be reassuring, taking a hand away from his bicep and eying the spreading bloodstain. "I think he will not mind healing this."
Alright… good luck explaining this to the Mountain Master.

(Monday the 13th of October, 1969. Wo Hop To Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"Did you get in trouble for yesterday?"

Fong rubbed the side of his nose, then dropped the hand back to his lap. "I have no idea what you are talking about."

The martial artist's little sister sighed heavily on the man's other side, so Sonya assumed he might've. Which… yeah. They didn't have a very large enclosed yard here and from the shape of the building and the look of the layout it was their only one, so maybe hammering a few holes in it was probably not a great idea.

She wasn't going to apologize, she didn't start the little tussle that was entirely his fault for insisting that he should be the one she tested any new styles out on since he gave her the weapons.

Although… finding out she could summon her weapons to any part of her body was interesting, and probably worth the hassle being involved might cost her. Possibly worth tearing through her jeans.

"I heard about that." Xiasheng observed from her other side thoughtfully. "I take it you were the one to leave the holes in the grass?"

"Unless they were charred, then it wasn't my fault."

Her once-sparring partner smirked, glancing over her head to the man that once set him up to spar with her with his rather unique yellow eyes. "Really, Fong? You couldn't even wait for a suitable place to be prepared?"

Fong opted to ignore him in favor of taking a bite of his food.

Was there such thing as 'Cloud-proofing'?

The only Triad member she actually had a decent opinion of merely lifted a shoulder in response to the question being posed aloud, swallowing his bite of breakfast to answer her. "I believe we will shortly find out. Not many like facing Fong, he's a bit of a perfectionist and a little over-competitive."

She could easily believe that, given the little tiff the man picked with her yesterday. Sonya poked her bāozi to see if it was cool enough for her, then glanced at Fong's half eaten tāngbāo he was chewing while they discussed him.

More steamed buns, she was starting to see a pattern here.

The man's little sister was like her, waiting for her street-vendor procured food to cool first before eating it. They were sharing a pot of green tea, while the men actually ate it in spite of the heat of freshly steamed food.

"So… this was the day I was to show up. What's happening today?"

"There will be a meeting later tonight." Xiasheng informed her, a bit muffled by a sleeve as he swallowed a bit hard. "Wherein you will be introduced to a few allied branches, and the others that will be hostages."

Sonya blinked up at him in confusion. "...why?"

"Mostly an overview of what to expect, now that the details of where you will be held is known." Fong offered, apparently finally deciding to be helpful in some way. "There is also the thought you might be able to rely on each other's abilities or protect each other once you are... elsewhere."

Right... and they weren't expecting this to go smoothly.

Picking up her breakfast, the thief nibbled open her pastry for the interesting and savory vegetable mix within instead of further question either Triad member or the little sister that had decided to eat with her.

She rather appreciated it, she had found herself left alone at a table in a full hall when she first sat down to eat. Which while sort of understandable, was also irritating and a little lonely.

The Chinese Storm who was responsible for her even returning to China at all was obviously invested in ensuring she didn't find her trip all that objectionable, but the man's little sister and Xiasheng were surprises she hadn't expected.

"I'm sorry." Mingxia offered to her from across the table, refreshing the entire tables' teacups regardless of the level they had. Setting the pot down delicately, the young girl flicked an interesting clear wine-red colored glance she shared with her brother up at her and bowed her head slightly. "It's... I'm not a very good fighter."

"...some people just aren't." Observed the Storm-Cloud neutrally. "That is not something to apologize for. Since you are not an alternative was needed, I really don't mind all that much and I am being paid. That is generally the basis for most services sold from one person to another."

The girl frowned slightly. "You aren't one of the Cloud-types that only respect power?"

"I'm a professional thief, girl." Sonya reminded her wryly, wagging a finger at her. "I can do power, and it is something to appreciate in action sometimes... but I can look past that if need be."

"What do you like, then?" Asked the younger female right before she took another bite of her breakfast steam bun. "What do you look for in others?"

Lowering her food again, she cocked her head to the side. "A bit broad of a question... what do you mean?"

"If power isn't what you go after, what do you like to see in other people you deal with?"

"Frankly, nothing. I don't tend to have good interactions with more than a bare handful of individuals." All her dependents had found, and then attached themselves to, her on their own.

Her opinion had not been particularly cared for nor sought after, unless they were counting Shamal. Which she didn't, brat was her godchild and more than deserving of demanding her attentions if he wanted it.

"Why?"

"Not anything?" Questioned Mingxia, looking slightly anxious and a bit depressed.
Well… fuck. Sonya hadn't intended to upset the girl. Why was she asking, and why did her opinion on the subject matter at all?

"…my views on the topic was never sought after before. My Lackey decided I was fit to follow on his own, then decided following me from Finland into the Iron Curtain was what he wanted to do. He… kind of… started it. I now have a Sun, two Mists, a lady Lightning and a male one attempting to arrange his own inclusion."

"Oh."

"…I like people that aren't useless?" She tried again, as the young girl's expression hadn't really changed all that much. Surprised didn't give her a lot of range to pick from for what she might be thinking.

To be honest, she really didn't want to make Fong's little sister cry. She didn't appreciate feeling like that kind of bitch.

Especially if the man would go to a semi-unknown woman in hopes of protecting his little sister, as that meant he probably would likely become even more annoying if she made her cry.

Speaking of, the man was particularly unconcerned by the topic of conversation. Of the possibility she might've upset the girl. Fong's non-reaction to this was rather… confusing.

She would be rather pissed off if anyone tried or almost made her brother cry, but then again Cherep was her dork and she could probably be over-protective of the stuntman due to his pacifistic nature.

Not that she thought her brother was a wuss or anything, she was fully aware he probably could make someone else cry by being Skull-level irritating or asshole-ish, it was… just… he was family.

"Why do you ask?" Figuring out what she was supposed to be advising about might help a little bit in her aims of not making the girl cry.

Mingxia pushed her small plate to the side, only one half of her two steam buns eaten, the young girl then leaned forward to directly address the Soviet Storm-Cloud. "I would like to become a lawyer. While most Triad branches have someone on the payrolls that can do that already, and… female lawyers are few, if I do not specifically secure some way to study law it is likely not to happen."

Sonya could then assume the girl was questioning her because she knew of a Cloud that might need a lawyer.

Which made a lot more sense and made her rather sorry she started off the way she had. "You do not have to wait for someone else to start your education, sourcing a few law books should not be that hard. Besides which, although I am aware this is grossly oversimplifying the effort needed, studying law should include studying the law of the land within which you intend to practice."

"I have… some books. And I do study law, just not in any established schools for it." She informed the older woman earnestly.

"That's good." She offered in return a bit awkwardly. "That being the case, most Clouds are susceptible to logic even if they don't like the parts or the result of the argument. I believe the equivalent in lawyer speak is 'bury them in evidence'. And you can rely on the fact most Clouds are rather ornery, so being told they shouldn't or being challenged to do something is a good way to catch their attentions."

As far as she was aware, and she was slightly more aware that she wanted to be, with the current unrest actually decent lawyers for the next generation should be encouraged. It wasn't her country, nor her society, but she had gotten one Chief of Police executed and helped the Triads with removing evidence the police had gathered on them only to learn they hadn't actually been using it as evidence of crime should be.

What she could advise in respects to Clouds was taken from her own nature and various other baby Cloud brats, but it should be somewhat similar since they share natures and other types tended to share traits across national lines.

"I will show you what I have after the tournament." Mingxia offered excitedly, nearly bouncing on her heels and almost tipping over the small table they were seated around in her enthusiasm if Xiasheng hadn't pressed down on his side to keep things level so only the teacups rattled. "I have several law books, and a few flyers for local schools. Although really, I would like to go to another country to study health and environmental laws and why they're implicated there. With, obviously, a side of criminal law."

"Ah... I'd advise you to look into studying in Russia, the United States, or the United Kingdom. The States are probably your best bet even with the student protests going on right now... and even if London has some of the better foreign student programs, but Russia would not be too far behind as long as you come from a fellow Communist state. If you go further west, you'll also be able to study how and for what reason they were implemented easier without running into censorship. Which also means catching the less 'environmental' parts and the company backroom trading that enables a few of them to even exist in spite of contradictory scientific studies." Sonya got three more bites into her food before the stares from the men on either side of her made her realize she might've said a bit too much. "...what?"

"How do you know all that?" Fong asked curiously, plucking his teacup up as he had polished off his portion of the food.

"I have everything except the paper for a master's degree in Foreign Affairs." And there was also the school thing, ensuring the non-criminal students could then go on to study more told her the rest of it.

Clapping her hands together, the man's little sister beamed at her. "You're a diplomat?"

"...I studied some of it?" Tried the thief hesitantly. Rachel hadn't exactly had a plan of what to do with her degree, and never did get around to putting it to use. "Being a diplomat would require others to actually debate or seek accords with me, rather than flat out avoid. And precious few bother enough for me to actually make use of the information rather than just know it."

Xiasheng hummed thoughtfully on her other side. "Interesting. I can easily understand why you might find that avoidance of your person irritating, but... why did you pick to study diplomacy?"

That was... why had she studied Foreign Affairs?

"...I wanted to travel, which I do, but I also intended to not offend when I did so. Until... well, I got... Cloudy. And stopped caring."

"Oh, this is perfect." Mingxia enthused brightly, settling back on her heels finally and staring up at her with those slightly disturbingly bright red eyes that made her paranoid that she had Storm Flames as well as her brother. "After everything is over, can I have a moment of your time?"

...a dry run?
Or did she just want another second opinion on what she already had as well as some help with her sales pitch?

"…sure." Sonya wasn't entirely sure what would happen after this tournament but leaving should be entirely up to her for what day it happened. As long as everything was over.

This way, Fong might be interested in ensuring she had a relatively peaceful recovery from 'captivity'… if only to keep her word to his little sister. How much could his little sister have? She looked… maybe, a bit older than Usov but certainly younger than the Mirror Lady.

…did the little sister have a Flame type?

Then again, it wasn't just Flame users that could be resourceful. Probably best not to underestimate the sister of a man that would gift a small fortune in weapons in hope of her fighting him with them and then picking a fight when she opted to try not to give in to expectations.

Fong blinked back in confusion in return for the semi-suspicious glare she shot up at him.

(Monday the 13th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed meeting room, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Sonya was not providing the most 'inspiring' of images for those that had any expectations of what a Cloud Flame user was.

Instead, she was fiddling with the jade and brass tobacco pipe she had been given by one of the other ladies when she asked about replacing her nearly empty pack of cigarettes.

Fong really couldn't blame her, nor bring himself to request she provide a more awe-inspiring face to the meeting as it wasn't yet starting nor would be all that interesting. All he asked for, and indeed gotten, was a 'deadlier' option than his little sister to provide as a hostage for the Wo Hop To Triad's inclusion in the martial arts tournament. Anything further was beyond the exchange he had requested.

The already implied allowance for those uncomfortable or unwilling and unable to refute any impositions was almost more than he could ask for.

Clad in a skirt and a long-sleeved fitted blouse supposedly bought when she gave Liqin the slip the day before, the woman could almost walk around the streets of Hong Kong and receive no undue attention for her attire. Except… for the obviously western style boots.

The same boots she wore into the country and had been highly reluctant to give up even if she did not mind removing them. She would carry them with her, or place them in a purse, instead of leaving them by a door. They were in fact in said purse at the moment, as they were not in the Wo Top To Triad's headquarters.

Fong was highly curious over why she did that, but now was not the time.

The heads of the Wo Shing Yee and Wo On Lok were discussing exactly how to handle any unexpected split-ups of their respective hostages with Wo Hop To's Zhōng. Said respective hostages was an elderly lady who was the mother of the Wo Shing Yee's combatant and what seemed to be the other's girlfriend.

As equally bored of the proceedings as the Storm-Cloud, the eldest woman was knitting a scarf as the conversation went on and her son held her yarn. The only young Chinese native woman in the room was not nearly as calm as the other two but striving to at least keep up somewhat even if this was probably her first close encounter with the life her man had.

As the meeting would only start once the rest of the Wo clans arrived with their own to-be hostages to introduce to each other's, the distractions various attendances had were not impolite yet.

Sonya eventually got distracted herself by the clicking needles, thankfully either missing or ignoring the comment that drew Fong's attention.

"-and this is the rumored 'Cloud user'?

"I have three holes in my front yard that say so." The Mountain Master of the Wo Hop To Triad confirmed dryly.

"I heard of that." Admitted the Wo On Lok's Mountain Master slowly, glancing to the distracted Storm-Cloud. "A pity, you had a very beautiful courtyard."

"The hazards of gathering the enforcer types to me." Zhōng dismissed calmly to the man, as he merely borrowed enforcers when his loan-sharks needed the muscle. "I have a fair amount of repair bills to pay when they become distracted."

The far sliding door slid open to allow the Wo Shing Wo head and his people, adding another young woman into the room. Still, Sonya was the only blonde and overly recognizable as a non-native for it when paired with her exceptionally pale skin tone.

Meng ZhenKang, the Mountain Master of the Wo Shing Wo Group, eyed the Russian skeptically as his people arranged themselves in one of the empty sides of the room behind him as he joined the others of his rank. "That is your Cloud?"

Sonya took a strong draw from her pipe, then proved she was indeed listening to the pre-meeting chatter by lighting the smoke she blew out with her Storm Flames. Her Flames licked the hazy cloud of grey in a wash of deadly ember-red threads and they traveled alarmingly far by only slightly burning the smoke until it very nearly just missed the speaker's face.

Getting up from Fong's side, she ignored the silence she caused and reseated herself in front of the knitting old woman.

The needles had paused as the owner watched the fiery smoke in fascination, and the Storm-Cloud's rearrangement of seating only drew attention when she leaned forward to take the yarn from her son. "Can you teach me, åyí?"

The steel-haired old woman studied the younger thoughtfully. "I would need more yarn, young miss. And another pair of needles."

Sonya reached into her hair with the hand not holding her pipe, pulling two red tipped needles from them. The hairpins were almost needle thin… until she applied her Cloud Flames to it and they grew. Searching for the end of the elder's yarn, she somehow sliced a section off no longer than one of her finger joints by drawing her nail along it. Another application of her lavender inner fire, and she had a heap of loose string almost matching the size her elder had remaining.

Taking the Cloud Flame based craft items from the younger woman, the old woman put her original supplies down in her lap and ran her fingers over the lengths of steel then tested the strength of the yarn. "…interesting."
"They will not last, I merely wish to learn the basics from you. I will bring more suitable tools when we meet up again."

"Oh no, I could not ask that. I will bring the supplies."

"I insist." Sonya refuted politely, absently rolling the loose yarn she had made into an easily handled ball. "You have the expertise I would like to learn already. The items to learn on is the least I can do for humoring me, as well as more yarn to express my appreciation."

"Any teacher is happy to pass on their skills to the next generation."

"I might end up repurposing the needles or yarn for non-polite reasons." Countered the thief next, sounding more amused as they continued the niceties. "As that is so, ensuring the quality to stand up to that abuse is something I must insist doing myself."

"I may not be young, miss, but I know how to do that. I've done a lot over my life." Insisted the elder woman serenely. "You are a guest, a very polite one. It would be my pleasure to encourage your interests."

Pausing to pull on the pipe again and looking pleased when the old lady didn't flinch back from the smoke, the Russian set the pipe aside. "If you are sure…? I suppose you would know best what to learn on."

"I only know enough to start you on your way, really. Now, watch."

As Sonya was happily enough distracted with the impromptu lesson, Fong glanced back to the four Mountain Masters of the Wo Triads already present. The Wo Shing Wo head was giving the head of his Triad branch an impressively blank look, to which Zhōng did not respond to.

Wo On Lok's Mountain Master smoothed fingers down his neatly clipped goatee. "…Zhōng, you seemed to have acquired a little dragoness."

"Hired." Corrected the Wo Hop To's head dryly. "She does not come cheaply."

The thief in question glanced up at the men skeptically but didn't actually say anything about what had caught her attention.

"Two for one, and most will only focus on the one." Wo Shing Yee's head observed idly, glancing at the two young Chinese women that had apparently not had front-row seats to a semi-belligerent Dying Will Flame user before. "You may have paid, but it seems worth it."

Having his duties usurped by the blonde, the elderly woman's son left the two females to their crafting and reseated himself next to Fong. "That was… unexpected."

He slanted an amused look to his possible future opponent. "Are you complaining?"

"No. Far from that." Countered the younger man wryly, massaging his forearms. "Holding up even something as light as a few hundred meters of yarn can be straining after enough time has passed. Aside that, my mother seems to enjoy teaching your little dragon."

"She has stated those that can't or won't fight can look to her for some help." The Storm offered the man, as that was his mother.

Pausing in his ministrations, he glanced to the blonde and back to him with dark brown eyes. "I am relieved to hear that."
According to the restrictions on 'hostages', to ensure they were valuable enough to ensure compliance with the tournament's few rules, there were few that could qualify for the position.

Generally, family would be the first thought when 'dependents' was used but in recognition to those that had no suitable family that could be held in bond for their word 'partners' and 'associates' were allowed.

The only qualifier that prevented Fong or any other entrant in the tournament from putting up their fellows as hostages was the 'no Triad members' restriction. Supposedly to 'prevent any backstabbing or pre-arranged sabotage by taking a fall in a bout'. Furthermore, if using the associate clause, one had to prove they actually were known to each other well before the tournament was announced.

He lucked out in his selection of hostage by the incident where Sonya lost her temper and he ended up helping her through her rage. As that paired with the school effort his Triad was helping her syndicate with probably would stand in the face of a Cloud's peculiarities even with the infrequent meetings, hence why he didn't have to risk Mingxia.

The Storm was fairly sure no one believed the previously stated reasoning for the restrictions any more, but they had been put in place for a few months now and altering them would be an uphill battle that might not be worth it.

The sound of lacquered wood being drawn against metal signified another group's arrival, actually three from the looks of it. They might've gotten distracted on the tea room floor overhead, or merely arrived together for their own reasons.

Regardless, it meant they had the bulk of the Triads invited tonight and the meeting could be anywhere from five to ten minutes away. "Sonya."

A twitch signified she heard him, and the thief looked back at him only when she reached the end of the looped yarn around her finger. Her final response was merely a cocked eyebrow.

Fong sighed slightly. "Please."

She glared first, then thought about it, and finally turned back to her instructor in the art of knitting. "Excuse me. We will have to continue this later."

The old mother nodded in acceptance, watching in fascination as the Storm-Cloud's utensils went up in her purple Flames leaving behind two tiny hair pins and a small length of the original yarn. Pausing only to pick up the tobacco pipe again, she retreated back to Fong's side.

Grudgingly. Obviously unhappy at the interruption, even if she was polite enough waiting for her temporary instructor's son to vacate her former spot so she could reseat herself again.

Her use of Cloud Flames had suddenly made her the most interesting thing in the room, and she refused to acknowledge that. Instead, the thief only pouted in a not quite insolent but also not entirely rude or arrogant manner.

"I am beginning to see a pattern here." Meng ZhenKang informed his fellows, which mostly confused the newer arrivals but earned him a few amused looks from those that had been early.

Fong wondered if Sonya restricted her Cloud Flame use to only creative applications when not in a fight. She lit things on fire with her Storm and seemed to have more day-to-day use of her red Flames than for her lavender one.

"Shall we jump straight to dinner, or start with tea?" Wo On Lok's Mountain Master asked of the five other Wo Triad group heads present so far.

"Tea." Decided Zhōng after a moment of thought. "Let us allow our fellows the time to catch up. It is not yet seven."

Being underground, the Chinese Storm of the Wo Hop To Triad's couldn't judge what time it was by using the sky. They hadn't been waiting long, however easily his to-be hostage had become distracted.

…speaking of dinner, Fong turned to Sonya curiously. "Can you use chopsticks?"

"...I've never tried." Responded the thief after a moment. "Will there be a fork if I ask?"

"You have been through China twice before. That I know of."

"Once with a traveling circus, who had their own ideas for dinner, and once more on top of that. Yes, twice. But... I generally stuck to finger foods or soups." She admitted idly. "...that will not help me now, will it?"

"I can teach you." He offered, since it seemed she was in the mood to be taught.

Sonya slotted her hair pins back in place, having used the time since she stopped using them as knitting needles to inspect the red paint on the sharp ends for chips or cracks, and nodded once she no longer had sharp things in hand near her scalp. "...I would appreciate that."

(Friday the 17th of October, 1969. Flame Office, Zolotov Headquarters, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"I don't see the-"

"No, no, no. Look," Peter 'Scruffy' McScruffy flattened the old study he pulled from a nearby library he found and basically used as a second home-away-from-home after being kicked from the Flame user's office for the day when he wasn't tired enough to sleep. "This is a report of a set of experiments back at the turn of the century. They made rubies."

"We can't use rubies." Galina reiterated flatly.

"Well, no. But then they did sapphires after some trial and error. And before you say so," continued the Sun hastily before the Lightning interrupted him again, "I am aware we can't use sapphires either. But... the point is that it is possible to manufacture gemstones."

From the mostly confused look on the brunette's fairly pretty face, she still wasn't following his line of thought. "And while that is all well and good, is it worth it to make our own? Reselling gemstones means we take a hit on their value, especially in bulk as Sonya sends them. Exactly how many rubies and sapphires would you have to make to equate out the price of making them?"

Scruffy let his forehead impact the desk. "No, Galina. Ignore the rubies and sapphires for now. It's not the type that's important, it's that it was done. Possibly then, other types can be manufactured. Possibly I can manufacture certain stones of specific elements to systematically find out what is reacting to our Flames. And then-"

"Scruffy." She interrupted strongly, nearly making him bite his tongue in surprise. "Anna?"
A ripple of Mist Flames ebbed in the window pane right behind the woman that called for her, before the Mirror Lady stuck her upper body through it to address them. "I took care of it, they forgot there was anything else Peter wished to say about the subject after your price comment."

"Peter, Sonya does not wish to give the Zolotov clan any more than she has to." Galina explained to him calmly, gesturing him to sit down instead of loom over her with his extracurricular research. "That includes you, for your information. Next time you find something like this, just ask me for a moment outside the office."

"…ah. Right. Sorry." With a sheepish cough, he absently smoothed down the papers he laboriously copied out last night to bring in today. "Well… ah…"

"Your idea. I like it. Sonya will appreciate the help… probably." Clearing her own throat after the slightly tacked on admission, she tugged the papers out of his hands to read herself. "However, we have less than a year here. Before you put in a request for the equipment, calculate how much it will take to transport it elsewhere and what an interruption would mean for the… um, manufacture of whatever."

"Oh, no. I'm actually going to have to do some study before I can ask for anything. As I have no idea how, aside a crucible and a glass blower's pipe with a lot of glassblowing elements." He had just gotten excited at the realization it was possible to control the variables for what jewels reacted to what Flame type. Then he wanted to share his excitement, and really his closest friend right now was Galina. "I um… yeah. Hello Galina, how are you today?"

Anna giggled at him, falling backwards back into her weird mirror-verse existence she seemed to greatly prefer to real life.

The Lightning herself pursed her lips to hide the small smile of her own that was obvious only for a split second. "Scruffy."

"I… should get out more."

"You can speak and understand Russian now. There is nothing keeping you from going back to the rest of the Suns and actually talking to them." She reminded him dryly, starting to sort her things into various drawers in the desk she was seated behind. "Or just striking up a conversation with others you may pass on the street. Or finding another Flame group and asking them questions until you find someone else to talk to. There are a lot of options now, Peter."

Peter shuffled in place a bit, hands empty and not entirely sure what to do with them now. "That's easy to say, but hard to do. I'm just not… comfortable with imposing on strangers right now. I mean I did once and that worked out, but first someone else did to me and that didn't work nearly as well. And… the other Suns are rather… young. And hyper. I feel old just watching them."

"I regret to inform you… that you are old." Galina announced, almost sounding genuinely sorry about it. "You are the second oldest Flame user we have right now… discounting Gedeon, but we don't count him for anything."

"Thank you, Galina. I really appreciate that."

His deadpan acceptance of her words earned him a smirk from her as she took his arm. "I am entirely willing to repeat it however many times you need."

"…where are we going?"

"Bit of an early lunch. I'm hungry, and I'll bet some good money you didn't get breakfast this morning."

Well… no, but… "Galina…"

"It's not entirely healthy to only speak to me, Sonya, or Shamal." She interrupted before he could think up of an argument. "I won't ask you to talk to anyone, just to join me for lunch in public every now and again."

…and that was probably for the best, yes. "I got to the library on my own."

"And I'm very proud of you, Scruffy. But that is the weakest public place you could've gone to. Talking isn't exactly encouraged in such places."

Scruffy laughed, finally giving in to the insistent but light tugs on his arm to start walking.
Mingxia bit her lower lip. "I don't think that's a good idea, Madame Bao."

Lian Bao frowned at her sternly, still looking prettier than her even with the not really pleasant expression on her face. "What do you draw that opinion from, girl?"

"Our guest is already in an ill-humor, surprising her with something so… social will not likely end well."

No one in their right mind tried to force a Cloud Flame user to socialize, that was just not done without property damage or murder. They were very much like cats, only came around when they wanted to and could just as quickly turn from pleased to violent in a blink of an eye.

Aside that their guest was only slowly picking up more phrases in Cantonese, her main common language was Mandarin which only those that actually left Hong Kong or came from outside it also shared and could converse with her.

Sonya Bazanova was not that different from what was known of 'Clouds', however more she was with the added Storm Flames.

The same woman that had supplied a lot of helpful advice one morning over breakfast had quickly turned moody after the meeting she had been required to attend her second day with them. That moodiness had turned to outright snappish yesterday morning to Xiasheng, who she seemed to generally like well enough before that, until Fong suggested some sparring to work it out.

The Cloud user had taken the invitation with a vengeance, giving the Storm user two broken bones in return for a broken nose and three fractured ribs. Then, after a Sun was sourced to heal them both, insisted on another as she didn't feel quite 'settled' yet.

A broken jaw for her and a cracked collarbone for him, a near amputation of his arm in return for the Russian's broken leg, four smashed bones in her foot and a slipped spinal disk from a nasty kick for the Storm, the two of them were getting steadily more violent in each bout until one or the other had to stop to attend to their injuries.

Of course, Mingxia's battle-crazy brother was loving the opportunity to work out the kinks in a few of the more brutal moves in an actual fight. Sonya seemed equally pleased just to have someone to fight, and they were providing a rather bewildering moral boost to the entire household with how skillful they were in dodging the lethal blows.

Just… no one wanted to watch them actually try to murder each other. Not even her, as much as she wanted to support her brother that was a bit… more than she could stomach.

It wasn't so much that everyone else was equally as squeamish as she was, it was the two of them were destroying a lot of things a bit mindlessly while they fought.

Zhōng seemed rather resigned to losing most if not all the rooms for practicing the forbidden martial arts the building had, as the two fighters had gone through two training halls and a smaller outdoor shed so far. One had only just been rebuilt, and the two were currently in there trying to gut one another with the Cloud's mysteriously appearing weaponry.

The courtyard held a new furrow when one of their spars wasn't quite contained by four walls of a partially sunken basement dojo, which was how that one small gardening shed got a bit... smashed. That was why everyone else found other things to do, no one wanted to know if they were accounting for watchers or if they weren't.

Mingxia wasn't even sure if the two would stop for the midday meal or not today, even if the Russian was supposed to be fitted for a wardrobe she would be wearing while she was the Wo Hop To Triad's hostage for the tournament.

Surprising the woman with a 'dressing/makeover' party would probably send her right back out to attempt brutalizing the Rain's brother again.

"I will see if I can ask... but it is not likely to occur. If not, I will acquire the measurements you will need."

She had to go back and try interrupting the current spar almost giving the entire building fine tremors. That might be... slightly hazardous to her health.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 18th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"I'm fairly certain," Fong started slowly, not from confusion or hesitance but due to the shortness of breath he was currently laboring under, "I broke your leg."

"I worked something out." His guest replied through gritted teeth, slowly spinning her seemingly more favored long-handled if strangely small-headed battle hammer as she eyed his form for an opening. "Worry about yourself."

Spinning it so the thin beak of the hammer was the side she was bearing down on, she brought the weapon in an arc at his side from the left. Dodging to the right to give him more room then rolling under the strike, he then had to impose his only non-broken forearm before his face to redirect the backwards mule kick she turned her movement into.

Striking at the back of her knee didn't work as it had earlier, she had learned and turned her missed kick into the start of a no-handed cartwheel. Fong had to dive out of the way as he couldn't immediately tell where the kick from overhead would come from or if she was bringing that weapon down again so redirecting that would only be a matter of luck and chance.

He did catch her ankle with his own, tugging it from under her and forcing her to go to a knee still.

The broken leg knee, which didn't seem unstable or being favored.

Did she have Sun Flames as well, or was this something else?

Whatever it was, it obviously didn't keep the pain from registering from her tight features. "Sonya, I think we... should maybe take a moment."

She flicked her thankfully now grey eyes from his left arm, which felt as if it had been snapped at least in two places by an errant hammer strike earlier, to her really broken but apparently not entirely leg, and then she sighed heavily. "Probably. Damn... I nearly had you."
He huffed softly, since she was the one kneeling when he had gotten back to his feet. "Huang? Anyone?"

"...are they still out there?" Sonya wondered as she used her long-handled hammer to get upright, gesturing to the rather hastily done patchwork on the east most wall once she was on both feet again. "I wouldn't have, had that been something to risk."

Fong blinked at her, then actually took a second to actually take stock of the room.

The mats underfoot were either ripped or torn, some outright still smoldering, showing the now heavily scarred pinewood floors underneath. Two of the walls, aside the one with the ill-patched hole through it she had made with his body and helped along with his Flames to prevent any spinal injuries, had massive cracks. Both of them were caused by him dodging repeated attempts to use him like a shovel.

One of the lanterns had shattered from something, spilling some oil and a fair amount of glass in that corner of the room.

Aside a few more gouges here and there, and a hole in the ceiling he actually wasn't sure from what, and... well...

Hopefully the prize purse from this upcoming tournament would be fairly substantial, otherwise he'd be paying for the last day and a half for a few years yet.

"...Fong? ...Fong!" Snapping her fingers under his nose, the thief looked fairly worried for a moment. "Did I hit your head?"

"You tried but missed." He reassured her quickly, gesturing so she'd lead the way out of the half-underground room so they could find one of the Sun users. "I am fine, merely thinking. You have gotten better at not allowing strikes to your own to connect."

"Yeah... well, I think you still broke a cheekbone." She informed him blandly, running a thumb carefully over her left cheek and wincing away from it before she got anywhere close to her own nose. Severely eyeing him a moment more, probably to be sure she hadn't addled his wits with a misjudged hit, the Cloud user let her hammer go with a puff of her Flames and did finally start making her way out. "But seriously... thank you. I feel a lot better now."

"I am glad to hear it... but we should probably wait for the rooms to be doused and somewhat fixed before doing this again."

Actually, pausing to think about it... he was fairly sure that not just his right arm was broken now. Something rather painful was twinging in his hip, and his breathing had yet to recover even in the short while they had to catch it. Probably another broken or possibly bruised rib.

"May I ask what it was that made you...?"

"More Cloudy than normal?" Sonya finished dryly, heaving another sigh at the staircase they had to traverse to get out of the underground rooms. "...I do not do well cooped up with people gossiping about me. The last time this happened... I could range as far as I needed to in order to be less... violent. I also had more things to distract myself with."

Fong had the pain to prevent anything from crossing his face, not that she would see anything as she was ahead of him. However, he hadn't thought of that.

From the few Clouds he had interacted with, 'stationary' was not often applied to them.
'Patrolling' he was fairly sure the Chinese Cloud Tian of the former Green Gang had claimed about his own wandering habits, just generally getting out and about and not occupying less than a thousand square meters every day.

She was doing that, and would be doing more of it, and it wasn't sitting right with her. Her dislike of gossip was something he could understand more easily than just be aware she had issues with, but even still...

"I am... unsure how to help."

"There's really nothing for it. I can deal, so long as you don't mind my attempts to shatter your bones."

"While I will never mind a spar or two," and that really couldn't be stated enough, she was interesting to fight against with the not-trained but still fluid movements, "is there anything else you can think of? I don't mean to say we should not do this more, but I am fighting in a tournament in a few days and you will be held hostage for at least a week if not longer while I am otherwise occupied."

The broken arm was actually kind of concerning, it had broken it twice today alone. Five times if one counted yesterday's bouts as well.

Fong wasn't sure how she kept breaking it, but it did tell him that he had some flaws in his own mixed fighting style to ponder and try mending. Doing so before a major fight like the tournament promised to be wasn't always a good thing, but at least he was aware something about his left side was vulnerable.

Perhaps he should go back to trying to learn to be ambidextrous. While there were Sun users in the Wo Hop To Triad, that didn't mean there always would be one nearby when he broke something important. If she could manage that with his right...

Sonya glanced backwards at him, about to say something that was cut off by a soft 'oomph' and she flinched backwards from whatever had impacted her into his chest. Not having expected that from the usually sure-footed thief, Fong barely managed to wrap an arm around her and grab the railing to prevent them both from tumbling back down the stairs they had just laboriously climbed up.

His broken arm twanged painfully, but not nearly as badly as when the Russian flinched again from it being wrapped around her stomach. That movement also highlighted there was something wrong with the martial artist's right hip.

Breathing deeply through the pain, or as deeply as he could go having been recently winded from the woman's mule kicks that were significantly more painful than most thrice her size could deliver, Fong flicked his eyes over to his slightly panicked looking little sister. "...Mingxia? Did you need something?"

"I'm sorry. Did I hurt you?" Asked the Rain of the woman in his arms instead of actually answer her own brother, hovering nervously over them as she was standing on the landing instead of the stairs. "I'm sorry."

"Shush. I just... really don't like it when anyone touches my stomach. I'm not injured there." The Storm-Cloud replied a bit shakily. "Fong, release me."

Fong did so quickly. She knew his arm was broken, that was probably the only reason she hadn't broken it again if she really hated being touched there.
His little sister backed up suddenly, almost flattening her back against the far wall opposite the staircase they were traveling up. "I am really very sorry."

"It's fine, girl." Replied the older woman a bit testily, then she reached the landing and took her own deep breath. "I also don't like it when people shrink away from me, by the way."

"This is a very narrow hallway." Mingxia pointed out a bit timidly, not quite leaving the wall but at least now not pressed against it.

"Neither of us are big women." Sonya countered a bit sarcastically, as they weren't.

His little sister seemed to have inherited their mother's frame, which meant she would only grow tall enough to tickle his nose with her hair. Fong wasn't exactly sure where his height came from, but their father had been a rather stocky man when he was alive so he knew from whom he inherited that much from.

The Russian herself wasn't exactly short, but she wasn't tall either. She only came up to Fong's collarbone, but she had more muscle weight than his little sister could manage at the tender age of thirteen with a past history of not having nearly enough to eat every night.

"May we continue?" He interrupted as it seemed his little sister couldn't find anything to say to that, not entirely without his own motives. For one, the younger Sōng sibling probably needed a very good impression on the Storm-Cloud in order to gain what she had been looking for over the last few years and for the other… well, his hip really did hurt a fair bit. "Sonya, are you sure that leg is fine to walk on?"

Not entirely neatly distracted, the blonde did at least glance down to her left leg as she took an experimental step down one side of the hallway. "Probably. It doesn't feel alright, but that's part of the trick. Where are we going?"

...she was a guest and probably didn't know where any of the Wo Hop To Triad's Suns generally spent their time. "Well, yes. But as the two of you may not be particularly robust, I am. To the kitchens, please. I believe you know where those are located."

Sonya glanced at his significantly bigger form thoughtfully, to Mingxia's sheepish half-smile, and rolled her eyes before she started walking again.

His little sister gave him a strong hug for the aid before he passed her. "...I regret needing to ask, but Miss Sonya?"

A disinterested hum from ahead of Fong signified she was at least listening.

"Did you bring anything to wear during the tournament?"

Another pause caused him to stop short again, and Sonya turned around to lean against one wall to see past the Storm to the little Rain behind him. "What I'm wearing isn't good enough?"

Blinking himself at the question he hadn't thought of, Fong took in what she was wearing thoughtfully. The thief favored things she could move in more than form-fitting clothing, which did match the current 'fashions' popular in the city. Long sleeves, slacks, and generally only tighter across the abdomen than strictly allowed by the Red Guard. She had been dressed similar yesterday, only the skirt from the first day she had arrived stood out as particularly feminine.

Mingxia leaned a little past Fong's side herself to see the older woman clearly. "Erm… it will be a big production, Miss Sonya. Most will likely be dressed up for it."
"…son of a bitch."

"Can we dress you up a little?"

Considering the question, she glanced first at the charcoal grey and black outfit she had on before taking in Fong's red long-sleeved tunic and pointed at that instead. "Can't I just wear something similar, but in purple?"

"Well… yes? But that would be advertising you are a Cloud to everyone."

"And why… no, I get what that might not be the best idea." Finally continuing on her way, it wasn't until they were halfway to the kitchens that the Russian glanced over at the smaller Rain. "…I get to refuse anything too restrictive."

"Of course!"

"And anything too tight." She continued flatly. "If I can't do a cartwheel in whatever it is, I will actually wear this instead."

The younger girl nodded quickly. "Understandable, yes. Anything else?"

"…I don't do green colors well."

"So, we can?"

"Who's 'we'?" Asked the Russian skeptically, not budging even if neither of them were in the best condition.

"Some of the other girls." Reassured, or at least tried, Fong's little sister as he reached around the thief to open the so far forlorn kitchen doors while they discussed things. "They've gotten really good at hiding something fashionable under their Mao jackets."

"…the same girls that keep gossiping about me to the point I had to try to break your brother's face for the stress relief?"

"Um… yes?" Having only gotten a step into the kitchen, which was long enough for Huang to notice him, the martial artist turned back to the women just in time to catch the highly suspicious look and hopefully bright smile being traded. "They might not gossip if you provide them some time to get to know you?"

Sonya considered it, and the other girl, for a long moment. "Well… I haven't tried that one yet."

Fong suppressed a wry smile. "I will be sure to leave the evening free."

Huang sighed heavily, setting his wok down for another of the kitchen workers to handle so he could heal them of their latest injuries. "I take it I'm not getting out tonight either?"

"I could go for a walk instead." The Storm-Cloud observed dryly as she turned to face them through the doorway. "Ranging a bit far generally helps with minor irritability or just restlessness."

…she would probably be stopped by the Red Guard in short order, wanting to see both her paperwork and to ensure she was conforming to the general guidelines of the so-called 'Cultural Revolution' while the obviously non-native was being a tourist. As she had a less than legal paperwork trail, she'd probably have to murder them in order to remain available to attend the tournament as a hostage. Even with the unrest the Triads could cause, the disappearance or brutal murder of a Red Guard patrol would be fairly noticeable.

It was probably for the best she didn't go out.

The Sun user they had sought out huffed as he took Fong's left arm to piece back together. "I had a few new recipes to try out anyways."

"We appreciate it, Huang."

"…what he said."

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 18th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

The courtyard building thing the Wo Hop To Triad operated out of was an older building with an actual stretch of slightly damaged greenery meant to be a courtyard, meaning it didn't have modern plumbing.

There was a well instead a bit further down the street, where water was drawn and brought back in buckets fairly regularly.

Sonya didn't really make much of an issue of that, because it was a different part of the world and she probably had done worse things to keep clean enough than outhouses and a washtub.

She traveled with a circus cross-country through the Arabian Desert, enough said on the subject.

She could deal with a washtub of water in a sink happily enough to bathe with, if need be.

A washtub barely big enough for the younger sibling of the martial artist that brought her back to China was another thing.

Studying the wooden construct bound in rope skeptically and ignoring the gossip going on behind her, which thankfully was at least in another language therefore she could pretend it wasn't gossip no matter how many supposedly covert looks were shot at her, she wondered how the hell she was supposed to take a bath in that.

"Miss Sonya?"

"…my legs will not fit in this thing."

"Oh, you just need to sit in it. We'll wash you."

Sonya gave the girl a flat look.

Mingxia blinked her rather striking red eyes up at her, spoke something in the Cantonese she didn't really understand even if it did share some similar sounds with Mandarin to the other women in the room, and then merely gestured to the wooden tank unhelpfully. "Please?"

"I don't like people touching me."

"I promise, we will somehow get you to an actual bathhouse before you have to be taken hostage. But for right now… I'm really sorry, but we need to scrub you down before Madame Bao will let you try on the pieces the other girls think will fit you."
Instead of asking why she cared about 'Madame Bao's' opinion on jack shit, which she didn't but…
guest, the Storm-Cloud regarded the tub in irritation before starting to strip out of the 'Mao jacket' thing that was apparently all the rage in-country.

For some reason.

The thing was uglier than sin and did nothing for a girl's figure. Which, with the 'Cultural Revolution' thing on-going, was probably the point.

Although a surprising number of girls had more fancy clothing underneath, well hidden from casual inspection and more for their own sensibilities than for looking pretty. It seemed to be the thing to do for the women also house in the building, Mao jackets were for outside or the main floor and whatever silk or cotton brightly colored thing they really wanted to wear was only for the second or higher floors.

"Oh! You have a tattoo as well?" Mingxia asked as she took the Russian woman's right bicep as she was sliding the blouse that served as an undershirt off.

"...yes." It wasn't worth it to deflect, with her pale as parchment skin the colors stood out vividly and just about everyone could see it.

Glancing over the cat tat herself, the thief made a mental note to get her cloud and paw prints touched up again the next time she could a tattooist.

Also, she really needed a tan or something. She was way too pale.

Removing the buckle of her armlet of chains and the miniaturized weapons earned her even more attention, and not just from her current 'attendant'.

Fong's very brave little sister took the chains curiously, not folding it over an arm with the rest of Sonya's things.

Plucking off one of the golden battleaxes with a tug and a clink of metal on metal, the younger girl fought had to keep a smile off her face. "Oh... oh, Fong's going to be so mad he didn't figure this out himself."

"I cannot have been the first Cloud to have thought of that."

"...there might be stories of something similar, but if there are I haven't heard any." Allowed the girl thoughtfully, examining the tiny charm intently after dumping the bulk of the cloth she had removed on a bench. Holding up the mini-ax, Mingxia tilted the scrap of gold-plated metal to the side in order to peer through the little hole drilled through the butt of the haft. "Why do these have this?"

"...they're ax charms. They can go on a bracelet if I need to be more 'dressed up' and still armed." Sonya responded absently, stepping out of her pants and underwear and picking it up to add to the rest of her pile then reaching behind herself to unclasp her bra. "Speaking of, if you can find a small enough chain and some wire I can reset them as such."

Handing the chain over to another woman, with the little ax charm, the youngest female in the room spoke to that woman quickly for a second before rounding the entire little 'bath' setup and the even shallower wash tub set ready with various soaps. "Ready now, Miss Sonya?"

Completely bare, and now out of excuses to postpone it, she gingerly placed both hands on the rims of the bigger tub and carefully lowered herself into the water. It wasn't exactly warm, not with how much time she had spent dithering over the logistics of doing this, but it was only a moment and a brief flair of Storm Flames to warm it back up to near-boiling.

Then she was practically beset by droves.

Two ladies she couldn't actually speak to decided to take each leg, she only escaped two more from taking possession of her arms by yanking them closer to her chest… which was foiled when Mingxia gingerly tipped her head backwards to wash her hair from the upside-down view she had of the girl's set up behind her and the thief grabbed for the sides of her tub reflexively.

"Mingxia. I am not comfortable with this." Hissed out the Storm-Cloud, which did at least stop the hands on her dead for a moment.

"Five minutes, Miss Sonya." The girl promised her a bit apologetically, picking up a bucket the older woman only barely shut her eyes in time to prevent the water within from splashing into. "Then it'll be over with."

Something rough and a bit abrasive was scrubbed over nearly every inch of exposed skin, from between her toes all the way up to mid-thigh where the water was and from fingertip to shoulder. No matter how much she twitched or lightly tugged away, because it was likely some of them were just purely human meaning Cloud Flame strength might harm one or two.

Squinting her eyes open to irritably glare up at the girl scrubbing something into her hair, Mingxia froze with wide-eyes and spoke something sharpish into the air over the Russian.

The touching stopped suddenly. Again.

Sonya took in a deep breath, guessing that her eye coloring probably wasn't her normal grey right now from the reaction. "Slowly, girl. I'm not used to this, and currently I'm highly uncomfortable."

She wasn't sure how much crowding she could stand but knew this wasn't helping at least.

"…right, sorry." Likely repeating her command in another dialect the others could understand more, the rather brave little girl went back to scrubbing her blond hair.

Slowly as she had asked.

She couldn't help the rather violent twitch when one of the other women took up her left leg again, but that was more pain than just being touched in general. Things went a lot more slowly from that point on, at least.

In a desperate attempt to distract herself, the Russian took mental stock of the rest of her body instead of just feel others touching her.

The 'spars' she had with Fong weren't exactly what most would think of as spars, a civilized testing of similar martial art styles shown to take forever in those kung-fu movies yet to be popularized in the West. It was a lot quicker and dirtier than that, and she still ached in places even after being given a once-over and healed by a decently practiced Sun using healer.

The Chinese Storm's fighting style was built around brutal takedowns and debilitating strikes, aiming to disable or cripple an opponent well before a retaliation was mounted. Past that first polished exchange, he was a lot more reactionary than the aggressor as he meshed multiple martial arts styles into a slightly disjointed but still fluid whole on the fly.

Sonya's was merely brute strength and inhuman speed with little skill, less precise but then again she didn't need to be in order to cripple her opponents. She wasn't really all that wedded to the idea of murdering the man, which limited her responses to a more 'human' realistic levels even if it handicapped her in the bouts. Or at least she tried, but he didn't hold the times she hit too hard or moved too fast against her.

They weren't exactly well matched, Fong's overwhelming skill meant he dealt out more damage even if the Russian seemed more flexible than he was and able to alter the surroundings to suit her own purposes to take him by surprise.

What it was in summary was a violently moving seesaw of experience and ideas given form.

Neither of them could 'win' at the spars really, as whoever was not as badly injured didn't consider her holding back in order to not instantly squish the entire building nor would the last one standing be fair to the only one of them that relied on pure human-limits of stamina.

The Storm learned quickly, never falling for the same exact trick twice… or it would seem so if it wasn't for that one thing it seemed he couldn't help but doing every damn time he was blindsided. In every fight Sonya got better at trying to hit him by surprise, gaining the lacking experience she had been missing up to this point in leaps and bounds with someone to play target for her. Again, expect for that one tell he had she took advantage of when she was lagging too far in the bout.

Experience vs creativity, inhuman force against human limits, the environment vs the martial artist. What kind of spar they had relied on what they were personally aiming to do or experiment in.

As it was, with a dedicated and prepared Sun standing by, she was pretty sure the two of them could happily go an entire week just trying to murder each other and fail to do more than disable a limb or two per bout. More for her than him, but then again… she had a 'cheat' of her brother's she was trying to work out.

Hence why her left leg hurt, especially as it was hanging over the lip of a wooden washtub and had the rest of her leg's weight pulling on it. She wasn't sure if it was the tibia or the fibula, but it hurt when so much as jarred wrong above even the low-level throb it had died down too after a few hours.

It was probably a good thing Fong called a halt when he did, she really had only half an idea of what she was doing with it. Maybe taking things slowly, and not stressing it out if she didn't have to, would be the smart thing to do.

Huang the Sun had dutifully examined it when Fong insisted, but informed them he found nothing wrong aside what felt like an 'old break'. Now the Storm was all sorts of suspicious and had waved off any further fighting right after lunch to arrange things, so she could meet the martial arts master he had in mind for her other favor.

Cherep had said the pain was a sign of his ability working, but Sonya wasn't actually sure how long she could go with a nearly blindingly painful throb in every other step. It was helping her keep her temper, oddly. Pain was very attention grabbing.

She had a few days before the start of the tournament thing where she had to be fit enough to defend herself just in case. She'd decide closer to that time if she could keep it up or not.

A few more aches were being none-too-gently prodded, bruises she had ignored and didn't ask to be healed from or scraps she hadn't realized she had at the time. A few of her old childhood scars were being stroked with soapy hot washcloths in hopes of scrubbing them away, which elected a very odd sensation and she focused on numbering them instead of giving into the anxiety laced panic attack trying to build.
One did not escape working with sometimes exploding weaponry without the marks to show for it, a lot of the few scars she had happened from working in Aleksandr's basement trying to replicate her initial Cloud Flame trick without knowing what she was doing.

It wasn't just her arms peppered with tiny white lines, there were scars from shrapnel of badly abused concrete floors imploding from the force applied to them on both legs.

Aside her childhood scars, there was one just over her tattooed shoulder from a near-missed gunshot during one of the rare times she was present on Mafia Land for the invasion events. A raised bumpy scar over her right hip, which was caused taking a tumble learning to walk a high-wire for her brother and grinding a braided wire rope into her hip hard enough to remove a strip of flesh before falling to the safety net that had been set up beneath it.

Her right hand held a few oddly shaped scars from when she shattered it by destroying a floor for Tatiana's gang, which ached when it rained every now and again and tended to stiffen a little after some plane rides. A number of tiny old nicks from learning to juggle weaponry under Faris littered both palms and randomly cut across some of those older scars on her arms, not to mention the oddly distorted divot of flesh in her palm that resulted from testing sapphires with Galina and Dmitriy.

"…Miss Sonya?"

"Are you done yet?" Asked the thief a bit desperately, pretty sure the answer would be negative from the feeling of something grinding lightly against her nails.

Both toe and fingernails. Probably nail files, meaning she was getting a mani- and pedicure.

"Another minute. Will you need a moment for yourself before the fittings?"

"That is likely."

Never, never the fuck again. Sonya didn't care if someone was supposed to be the world's greatest masseuse or whatever, she was never letting anyone else 'bathe' her or touch her unless she knew them better than she did her own damn siblings.

Fuck this bullshit.

Nails scraped against her scalp, causing a near full-body shudder of unease. The fingers retreated quickly, then lukewarm water was poured over the soapy strands slowly.

The moment her right hand was released she yanked it back and glared at the manicure she now had. Her left side limbs were released nearly at the same time, her right foot took another few moments.

Mingxia finished with her hair a bit later than even that and spoke some words to the other women while the thief tried to re-center herself without slamming a fist down on her technically broken but not leg to help that along.

By the time the Storm-Cloud could risk cracking her eyes open without the desire to throw something hard at whoever she spotted first, only the younger girl was left in the room with her.

"Umm... are you alright?"

"…no." Cupping her hands in front of her face, Sonya inspected the slightly lavender tint cast on her skin even in a more or less brightly lit room. With a sigh, Sonya dropped her hands back into the water and slouched in hopes of taking the pressure off her left leg enough to stop the throb in it. "It will be a while until I am."
"Do you need help?" A tiny tanned hand was lit with wavering blue Flames, a Rain's Tranquility flooding the room.

First, she merely narrowed her eyes and resisted the tug on her rolling emotions.

As much as she had been looking for a Rain, giving Fong's little sister some hold on her mentality wasn't something she was prepared to do. A few days did not give her a full understanding of everything that made up Mingxia's personality, nor if she really wanted to take risks with her.

She was a little surprised the girl hadn't picked a fight with her upon meeting. Which probably meant that thing with the Four Rains had been entirely on their own terms and not due to a 'predisposition'.

While interesting… it didn't really help her much.

Causing herself pain, leaving to pick a fight with Fong again, or giving in and letting the little Rain-girl manage her were her options.

Sonya was not doing this again, so leaving to pick a fight with the girl's brother would mean she'd have to redo the bath thing again and that was out. More pain was just masochistic and not really a habit she wanted to cultivate.

Either try to wait it out, or Tranquility.

"…Mingxia, I don't wish to slight your rather useful skills or anything… but… I think I just need a moment alone." Suggested the thief after a moment of struggle with her absent long-term aims and current sensibilities. "Maybe some tea instead?"

Thankfully not taking it badly, or at least doing it with a smile which meant she had a fantastic poker face, the younger girl nodded. "Anything to eat to go with that?"

"…I don't know. Use your judgement. But," gesturing to the pile of her things when the Rain looked expectant, "can you hand me my pipe before you go?"

Taking the surprisingly solid thing after Mingxia pulled it out of a pocket, Sonya tamped down the tobacco she had loaded the bowl with in perpetration of this fiasco and lit it with a press of a thumb now with the nail painted bright red.

Puffing on it quickly and frequently first to ensure the ember caught, she took a longer draw once the brass bowl became uncomfortably hot under her fingers.

Blowing out the smoke from her lungs in a hazy cloud, the Russian hunched into the warm water and felt just miserable and strangely a bit violated.

If she couldn't stand to let some strange women touch her, nor found other women particularly attractive if she bothered looking at them, then it wasn't looking good for the possibly lesbian wonder she held. As she didn't look at men and bother with how 'hot' they were, and rarely felt comfortable with them from the short periods she had partnering a few in a bare handful of Balls or just on the street being cat-called.

Where did that leave her?

…well, no. Wait.

She didn't mind Cherep or Tatiana, nor Valera, putting their hands on her. Just if they were squishing her or pinning her in place. She didn't mind Renato touching her or the whole 'holding a hip' thing he had started up. Dancing with Tyr wasn't bad, and that was even more 'rare'. Shamal had stopped triggering that weird-ass flinch thing that happened when someone touched her stomach.

Maybe she should try a friend first and see if that countered the violent dislike of touch thing she had.

Not Renato, for as much as she was pretty sure he knew the whole routine very well and could guide her through it damn well… he didn't exactly 'do' exes.

Not even on Mafia Land, where she would put good money on the possibility he had slept with at least a good third of the single women on the island, did he really bother keeping up with them aside names and appearances. Occasionally maybe another one-night stand here or there, but in general his relationships were really shallow and temporary.

The Sun was really nice about it, not a braggart or anything that would make the entire thing off-putting according to Tatiana, but… didn't do anything longer than maybe a weekend long 'tryst'.

If Sonya could figure out what the hell was up with her sexuality, then she'd likely want more than just a night or something just for the reassurance that she really wasn't somehow broken inside. Besides which, she didn't feel like making that relationship awkward with her possibly fumbling around a relationship, especially since there was both Shamal and the future Arcobaleno thing to account for.

Fong was probably the closest 'friend' right now… but she didn't really trust him all that much just yet. The thief would trust him in a fight for damn sure, but outside it she didn't have a good grasp on his personal motivations or aims. She knew he was surprisingly attentive big brother, was a bit more stubborn than even her when he felt like it and viewed her Cloud Flame strength and speed as a challenge rather than something unfair.

…so, no. Not right now. Maybe sometime in the future, when she knew him better, maybe.

Well… what other people did she know?

Galina… was… hmm… she didn't know if the Lightning liked women or men, but that was something to investigate. Scruffy was… no, the man didn't need her own issues heaped on top of his own.

Dmitriy?

Well… she'd see when he got out of prison. His time away might've changed her old childhood friend, aside which the Rain might not be looking for a girlfriend the moment he got out of jail.

Sonya ignored the click of the window in favor of pondering if Tyr did relationships or not.

She might not like Nono Vongola, nor Ottavia, but the Sword Emperor was surprisingly inoffensive to her still. Probably her understanding of 'Varia' and what it would come to be, a bit like the CEDEF branch but focused more on assassinations of threats to the Family than policing the various branches.

Glancing over at her visitor, the Storm-Cloud studied the man awkwardly hesitating in the now open windowsill.

"Do you speak Mandarin?"

"…um, yes?" After another belated moment of flabbergasted staring, the man shuffled around so he was facing the wall and not her. "My apologies."
"What do you look for in a partner?" Sonya questioned his back, putting the pipe stem back between her teeth to worry absently. "Like a girlfriend?"

A glance backwards, which was aborted halfway through the motion and the man rigidly inspected the wooden walls instead, and another shuffle before her answer was given. "Err... I have a wife, miss. It was arranged."

"...ah." Well, that was of no help. "...who are you, anyways?"

"No one important." Was tossed over a shoulder as the man slid over to the closed door jerkily.

"So... you don't belong to the Wo Hop To Triad?"

Freezing in place, her rather rude visitor yanked a knife from somewhere on his front she hadn't caught sight of when he was coming through the window and spun on a heel. Sonya threw her tobacco pipe like a dagger through his chest hard enough to get the man to also fall back through the now shattered door and pin him slightly off the floor against the far wall of the hallway.

Mingxia awkwardly juggled the tea tray over the gasping man and into the room a few moments later, delicately stepping around the legs in her way and eyeing the damage to the doorway before giving the thief a questioning look. "Miss Sonya?"

"...he came through the window and proved unhelpful." Gesturing to the now open window, Sonya eagerly sat up to take the tea tray and serve herself when the Rain got highly distracted by the changes to the room. "I need a new pipe, I think I broke the other one... or will when I try to unpin the asshole from the wall. Either way, I don't think anyone will want to use it now."

She turned around with some wide eyes to give her a look she didn't really understand. "...would you like a towel?"

"...why?" Balancing the wooden tea tray on her knees, Sonya sat back with the freshly poured cup and sipped carefully. "I don't feel like getting up just yet."

Crammed as it was, it was still a hot bath. Her arms and legs might be getting a bit chilled, but the heat for the rest of her slightly abused body was wonderful. She just didn't like the scrubbing thing that she had to suffer through before she got the time to actually relax a bit.

"Ah... I think someone will want to figure out why he's here?" Mingxia tried a tiny bit hysterically, which did finally earn some concern from the Storm-Cloud.

"...well, he's not going anywhere until someone can pull the pipe out of his chest and or the wall. And I don't feel like it." She lived with Triad members... it couldn't be that exciting there was a break-in.

Maybe it was the growing puddle of blood?

The girl had chastised her brother for that fight her first day, and he had responded something about 'hostile invading Triad members' to excuse his actions.

"Does it bother you?"

"Miss Sonya... you're undressed."

"I am in a bath right now."
The Rain opened her mouth, shut it as she slowly turned first to the window then to her entirely unexpected and unhelpful visitor supported slightly off the floor by the broken ruins of the door, then spinning back to the Russian and yanking a towel from the pile of them set on a stool. "Miss Sonya, I must insist. One of the men will likely be here shortly to figure out what the shattering wood was all about, and you shouldn't be undressed in front of some male not your husband."

"...I don't have a husband." Observed the Russian slowly, again.

Not entirely sure what urgency the other girl had motivating her… but she wasn't doing the 'scrub' thing again. Not for anything.

Taking a sip of her tea and sinking down further into the water, she eyed the little girl suspiciously. "Why are you so insistent about the towel?"

"Does your father know you're here?" Mingxia demanded in a scandalized tone, lowering the fabric as her attention was derailed into a bewildering twist.

"...probably? He knows I do work for Mafia Land that takes me all over, and I wouldn't put it past my elder sister to be informing our mother of my movements." Then again, she also wouldn't put it past Lisa to still have connections in Mafia Land that could inform her of anything that went wrong with either Tatiana's or the thief's life.

Her foster mother had let Sonya go off and work for the island at eleven, after all. Lisa was not a stupid nor unprepared woman.

"Why are we discussing this?"

Arseniy wasn't someone she thought of when she traveled here or there, nor did she often think of what he'd approve of.

Did that make her a bad daughter?

Should she think of her foster father's opinion more?

The Rain started at her with wide, red eyes for a long moment. A huff, the towel draped over the widest part of the tub and the Russian contained within, and she left the older woman to it.

…well, that had been weird.

Transferring the tea tray to the nearby floor in order to attempt readjusting her really broken but not quite leg again, and Sonya sipped her tea again wondering if Mingxia would bring her another tobacco pipe when she came back.

A wheezing, hacking cough signified her unanticipated guest was somewhat recovering from the shock and possible concussion of her throw. The man scrabbled a hand around rather uselessly while he gasped under the likely constricted breathing space he was allowed by the admittedly long but not that long pipe stem, or so she thought since his other was clutching spastically over the pipe bowl protruding from his chest… until he pulled out yet another knife from his waistband.

He attempted a sloppy throw at her head, which was easily caught by the former knife-juggler.

Flipping it one-handed to grip the blade, she threw it back hard enough to embed it hilt-deep into the wood next to his head. Panic wide-eyes flicked from the humming hilt, to her, the ruins of the doorway he had been forced to, then the bloody splotch on his chest bubbling around the still smoldering bowl of tobacco protruding from it.
Taking a sip of her tea and frowning when she was left with barely half the cup left, Sonya caught sight of Xiasheng stomping a heel down on a wrist before the intruder could find his other knife out of the corner of her eye.

She looked up and watched with some amusement as the Storm bent to eye the bloody chest pinned against the wall.

"I feel better, by the way."

"...that is good to hear, Miss Sonya." Xiasheng responded slowly, still studying the man almost on the floor and not looking back at her. "When will you 'feel' like unpinning him?"

"Well... give it at least fifteen more minutes. The tea is rather nice."

The actual member of the Wo Hop To Triad sighed a slightly huffy sounding laugh, standing upright only to put his back into the broken doorway. "May I ask you to make it a quick fifteen minutes? I apologize for the imposition, but... we do need to fix the doorway now."

As he was tending to the knife wielder, she leaned over to refill her cup now that she didn't need a hand to defend herself. "Mmm... we'll see."

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 18th of October, 1969 continued. Gang Jiao, Longgang District, Kwangtung, People's Republic of China.)

There was something very, very wrong with what he found when he reached his former martial arts master's former school.

Admittedly it was not the usual time one visited the home of another... but that wasn't the only issue.

Stepping delicately over the scattered ruins of a vegetable patch, Fong flicked a few suspicious glances around the dimly lit small and normally neat yard. Shattered pottery littered the veranda of the dojo, two of the sliding wooden doors that had once opened the building to cooling breezes in the midst of sweltering hot summer nights were broken and left where they fell.

Dusty footprints and muddy smears were ground into the floorboards of the dojo itself and stood out starkly in the moonlight, and there was definitely something left to rot just inside the building.

Settling his hands more firmly into the sleeves of the nondescript charcoal jacket he was wearing to avoid attention, the martial artist waited.

For his old martial arts master, one of his other former students, or for one of the locals to pass by.
Any would give him more information, even if a few might just end up a bit bloody if what he suspected happened had.

"Still a hot-headed and reckless fool, I see."

"Master Yaozu." Fong greeted with no small amount of relief, not turning but glancing at the elderly man that stepped up to his side to also regard the damage to his former residence. "I am very pleased to see you are fine."

"I am not fine." Countered the martial arts master shortly, pulling the cap he wore over his steel grey hair low so he wouldn't have to behold what had been done to his home. "I now live like a fugitive in my own village, 'shamed' for being a teacher on the streets and by word of mouth spread farther than I can travel alone. I had not thought my own students would fall to this madness that has spread over our country like a virus."

"…obviously not all of us, or I suspect you would be a bit less healthy as you are."

Yaozu gave him a sharp look from under the bill of his cap, tugging the Mao jacket he was wearing to more conform to regulation about cuff length even if it was a bit short on him. "And now I have to pin my hopes whatever you have not said about this offer of your 'contact' will not be too objectionable or return here and hope I can outlive this 'Revolution' and not the goodwill of my apparently more morally resilient students."

"From what I know, and I have looked into it as far as I can sifu with my own connections, this contact is well accommodating to their people. You will not need to live in fear with them."

"That does not answer the question, Fêng."

"Fong. I do not wish to forget, but I do not want my past to chase my sister's heels sifu." Asked the student instead of immediately offering the information the older man was digging for. "The contact is in Hong Kong for the moment, I ask you meet them first before making a judgement."

Glancing at, then wincing away from, the state of his dojo… the elderly man finally nodded. "It seems as if I am out of options. Very well, Fong. Let us see this contact of yours."

Inclining his head, Fong turned to lead the way out of the ruined yard but came up short as he spotted movements in the shadows down the main street. "…I believe your reemergence was noted."

A tired sigh from behind him, and the elderly man stepped in the opposite direction to a more roundabout way out of the village. "I do not want my leaving to be marked with destruction or pain.
However, it has turned against me this is still my home."

…he wasn't nearly so nice, but then again he also had less attachment to this village than his elder.

Fong merely glared down the street but followed him after a moment of indecisiveness.

If Sonya did somehow get Master Yaozu to move to Russia with her, then there would be nothing preventing the Storm from returning and dealing out a few reminders of how one should treat their elders as well as how to respect another's home.

He just had to wait until after the martial arts tournament to finish first. If he survived it.

Maybe his old master wouldn't mind helping him figure out why Sonya kept breaking his left arm with concerning regularity. Once he was… eased past the revelation of Dying Will Flame user and the fact said contact was a tiny Russian lady.

(Sunday the 19th of October, 1969. A warehouse, Saint-Nazaire, Loire-Atlantique, French Republic.)

Adrik handed his friend an unloaded pistol of a make they didn't have 'in-stock' just yet. "Are you really sure you're okay with this?"

"No." Verde informed him dryly as he stripped it down to the components in a surprisingly efficient set of movements. "I do not feel particularly inspired nor satisfied with my work. As of right now, this is a means to an end which isn't mentally stimulating enough for a goldfish much less someone like I."

"Okay, point... but honestly speaking here." The Russian interjected before he was snapped at yet again, spreading his hands in the scientist's view so he'd at least recall his wit was a weapon of its own that could be quite cutting every now and again. "These things move at their own pace. There's what? A week less than half a year left? Verde my man, exploring some of your other options might stave off a burn-out."

…and would actually give him more time to scope out their current 'clients' than merely being forced to rely on word of mouth for most of his understanding of who they were supplying weapons to.

Pausing in his mechanical actions, the Lightning examined the smear of burned gunpowder on his fingertips from the trigger parts. "Am I getting in over my head here, Adrik?"

"You were in over your head the moment the chem lab blew." Admitted the other man wryly, because although the other was highly intelligent that didn't mean he was entirely adaptable the way mafia members kind of had to be. "How far you go into this life is entirely up to you, so if you're not sure about something you really do need to speak up so I know."

Selecting a solvent from the rack of them slightly sloppily built over the scientist's work table, Verde squirted the liquid on his fingers and used a terribly stained rag to wipe off the carbon absently. "I mean, am I proceeding too quickly for you to keep up? I am aware you are attempting to ensure we are not ambushed with those that may have ill intentions."

"Ah... well... that too."

Instead of then applying his solvents to the guts of the gun he had been given, the Lightning turned to him and inspected him from behind those coke-bottle glasses that doubled as magnifying glasses when he was working on removing identifying manufacturer stamps on their pieces. "Do we now move again?"

"As far as I know, it's not that bad. It's known you're somewhere around here, and that I come to town in order to hand off packages. We do a few additional things, and you won't have to give up this place." Adrik informed the other, waving a hand at the tiny corner of an ill-inspected warehouse he had re-appropriated for their own use.

The equipment and chemicals that reeked to high heaven were left here overnight, they retreated to a surprisingly modern little apartment on the edges of town for actual living in-between orders. Of course, that didn't mean a highly bitter and sometimes tangy reek didn't come from Verde now and again when he got into the more powerful acids... but then Adrik could tell the other man to take a damn shower.

No matter how hard the scientist worked at it, there was no way to hurry a reputation. Well... no way to earn a good one quickly. You could easily gain a bad one, but then no one would...

"I have an idea."

Verde grunted absently, having turned back to his work in a moment when the other was distracted by his own thoughts.

"We could make you undesirable to the local syndicates."

Blinking green bug-eyes at him through those entirely stupid looking glasses, the scientist frowned at him suspiciously over a shoulder. "How?"
"Being reckless." Adrik explained slowly, trying to run the entire suggestion through his head a few times trying to figure out the part that made it too good to be true. "If we take a few of the lesser hits and only just skate by the skin of our teeth, no one will want you for any other reason than your manufacturing skills."

"...would that then make it a 'good idea' for someone to risk Sonya's eventual retaliation for your murder to get me off the streets and safely barred in some underground workshop? Furthermore, can 'skate by the skin of our teeth' be done without really being skilled enough to judge what will or will not work?"

"...oh yeah." There it was. "Damn. Well, there goes that idea."

The Frenchman sighed again, returning his attention to the gun parts spread out before him. "Adrik, I appreciate your aid. Greatly, more than I can adequately express. However, my haste is... part of something else. If it has become an issue, I will merely start replication instead of alterations to give you more leeway in your aims."

Taking a seat on a slightly miss-stacked crate which made a little bench for him when he visited, the Russian cocked his head at the other man's back even if it wouldn't be seen. "Alright... so can I know what this is all about?"

"...I have been allowed to vacillate between subjects my entire life, Adrik." Verde began absently, his tone falling into a kind of drone instead of his rather bland but still lively usual tone used when his attention wasn't split. "From an early age, when it became apparent I was smarter than the average child, I was allowed to study ahead in classrooms. I was taken out of public schooling in favor of tutors once I outstripped the teaching experiences provided by such establishments, and said tutors saw no reason not to allow my wandering attention to dictate what was instructed for the amount they were paid."

The story was not a short one, and the security specialist was somewhat sure the other was just rambling on without much attention paid to what he was saying for about half of it. In the spill of miscellaneous information contained the few facts relevant that actually required one to not nod off mid-way through.

Verde was rewarded for switching subjects of study by his tutors, as they were paid depending on how much time was spent teaching him. That continued up through the accidental death of his parents and his emancipation as a fresh-faced but fully educated fifteen-year-old that argued his way through a court case and out of foster care or requiring to be adopted by those that might want his inheritance and not his well-being.

That habit had spread to even his college education, where switching fields of study meant the scientist was allowed the information and equipment that went along with it with almost an overabundance of new things to investigate or explore.

The near-decade worth of college education had been spent at the whims of the Lightning's brilliant mind and wandering attention span.

"So... you're doing this speed thing because you want to..."

Verde sighed heavily, blindly groping for a water bottle left somewhere near his chair as acid bubbled away on the serial number of the gun's butt. "I wish to establish some sense of dedication in myself and my work. Frequent changes will give me a broad experience base to draw from... but little beyond that mere awareness. Whereas continuing with this for at least two months will..."
Frowning, the scientist fell silent and visibly pondered the possibilities.

"Will reassure yourself that you're not entirely a spoiled rich boy out of your depths?" Adrik finished for him with a laugh. "Okay, whatever you want."

Another bug-eyed glare was tossed over a shoulder as the man took a gulp of his water. "That is what you decide to take away from that?"

"Well… I could also-

"On second thought, I do not think I would like to know what else you could take out of that." Verde interrupted flatly before anything could be stated.

"I won't tease you too much." Adrik reassured him, grinning broadly. "Just… man, should've guessed. What else could let you switch majors as frequently as you did?"

"I informed you I had an inheritance."

"Well… yeah. But that doesn't include 'tutors'. I bet there was also a big manor house and maids involved with that. Did you have a butler too?"

Carefully tapping a small amount of the neutralizer, which the Russian swore smelled worse than the acid itself, onto the bubbling liquid already at work on the butt of the gun, the scientist quickly lowered a kind of hood-thing over the entire table and flipped on a jury-rigged fan hood to suck the previously described 'hazardous gases' out away from them.

Even still, the Frenchman retreated to the crates blocking the view of their setup from the front of the building. "Exactly how long will I continually be hearing about this?"

"A long while, Verde my man."

Taking the thick-lenses from his face and slipping back on his normal pair, the Lightning gave him a measured look. "…I suppose that means you do intend to remain in contact at least."

"Was that in question?" Adrik questioned in confusion, giving the other man a strange look. "You think I'd go through this much effort for just anyone?"

"As far as I would be aware, yes. It has already become apparent Dying Will Flame users are afforded more leeway and benefits than the regular criminal ranks."

Putting his hands on both of the other man's shoulder, the Russian ensured he caught his eyes. "Verde. My man. Suffer. You're stuck with me."

There was a suspicious searching look first, then a soft hum, and finally a nod. "I see. I chose to suffer gladly. Even if you will call me a 'spoiled rich boy' again."

"Well… you are." With a shrug, Adrik glanced at the humming machinery then jerked a thumb the way he had come in. "Come on, let's let your voodoo work."

"It's not voodoo, it's chemistry."

"Whatever. Food. Breakfast. Things to eat. I noticed you didn't eat anything last night when you came out here. So that also means a shower and sleep, man. Before you keel over."

Verde rolled his eyes at him but was at least smirking with good humor as they left the large and mostly empty building.
(Monday the 20th of October, 1969. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Sonya smoothed a hand down the rather simple if still overly colorful silk dress, which was an interesting long tunic-thing she was wearing over a pair of silk pants as she got herself some space.

In the additional 'thumb their nose' at the government this tournament thing didn't quite cover for the participants' desire for rebellion, and in respects to the fact fashions haven't really advanced all that much with the unrest the civilian and government ranks were in, everyone attending the Triads' little arrangements were reaching far back into history for what to wear to the first night's affair.

Meaning they had to dress up in ancient Chinese court fashions. At least she wouldn't be the only one suffering old stuffy outfits. Theoretically speaking, anyways.

This was surprisingly not too bad, compared to the other things she could've worn. She and Mingxia had been able to paw through the entirely of what was available, and even set things aside for a few others.

Fong's usual bright red changshan and pants set would be replaced with an equally red but also black hanfu. Sort of a wraparound long-sleeved jacket thing paired with, funnily enough, a skirt or a set of pants. She wasn't sure if he'd be fighting in that or if it was just for whatever passed as the opening ceremonies, but it would be something to see.

The thief was getting stuck with an áo dài. Technically Vietnamese, partially picked in respects to the fact she wasn't Chinese but mainly due to the fact she was a fair bit bulkier than most of the clothing in storage within the Wo Hop To Triad headquarters’ attic was comfortably made for. It was the only thing that almost fit and, with Mingxia's help, the first one was altered to not constrict the Storm-Cloud around the shoulders too badly to see if altering the rest was worth it.

Hilariously enough, the first one she was trying out to ensure she could move in it as she wanted was a bright, lilac purple worn over a pair of seafoam green pants.

The little Rain girl was pretending to ignore her amused smirk as she settled on the veranda with what would probably be their breakfast. A tray holding both a pot of likely green tea and another basket of those steam buns the Chinese girl's brother seemed to prefer.

Summoning three of her Bec de Corbins to hand from the single miniature taken from the hidden inner pocket of her purse, the Russian planted two of them into the rather battered turf facing the same direction. Placing the third lengthwise across the small catch between the haft and the hammer face gave her a rather interesting looking pull-up bar affair.

Then she considered the colorful panels of the dress that hung past her knees.

The 'upper' half of the outfit was kind of jacket-like and all in one solid light color, tight long sleeves and a rounded high color she really didn't mind all that much. It sort of 'ended' being a jacket around her waist, as that was where the front and back panels separated to allow for full movement of the legs.

The 'skirt', or really two flaps of fabric masquerading as such, were an embroidered flowery riot of colors that occasionally moved to the side in order to expose the light green pants that probably went with this jacket-thing. There were no other green-shaded tunic tops or even more with a full garden embroidered into it, so that was what they were guessing.

A pair of soft-soled cloth shoes, which she was nixing to hell and back again the moment this 'tryout' was done, and socks completed the whole affair. Being able to feel the odd stone underfoot was just strange after years of having at least an inch of rubber between her and the ground.

Sonya hopped the distance needed to grip the handle of the sideways Bec de Corbin, swinging a few times experimentally to be sure the mocked-up set up of a horizontal bar wouldn't fall over. Folding herself in half on a backswing, the thief balanced her silk-clad thighs on top of the tungsten bar and pulled herself upright on top of the whole assembly.

Pausing, she eyed the courtyard fencing to ensure her assembly of weapons wasn't tall enough to allow someone on the streets to spot her form. Assured she wasn't risking anything, she tipped forward while hooking both ankles around their respective posts.

Now upside-down, the Russian inspected the split in the outfit over her hips. Or under, with her current perspective. No splitting seams even with the tugging the exercises she was doing, so she supposed it would do as something to wear.

Her sleeves, on the other hand, were too short. They were pulling at her forearm rather than her wrists now.

That wasn't alterable with a few lengths of silk string and an hour's worth of stitching.

In order to 'fix' the cuff issue, they would have to rip the seams. Either just the cuffs, to add a strip of 'bordering' to artificially extend the length, or all the way to the shoulders to remove the sleeves entirely.

Sonya had only a minor amount of skill in sewing, she could do seams and making some roughly right-shaped clothing on her own as long as there were templates. Taking in a seam to tighten something or picking apart a previously altered one to loosen it was simple enough.

If there would be any major alterations done, it wouldn't be by her.

…that might mean she would be forced to suffer through 'fittings' to change the fit.

Sliding her legs off the mocked-up horizontal bar, the thief allowed herself to lightly fall back onto her feet and let go of her Cloud Flame copies. Ignoring the throb in her left leg she carefully measured her steps backwards, so the limp wouldn't be obvious.

"Are you happy with the fit, Miss Sonya?"

Eying the inch of naked wrist as she tugged the smooth cloth to cover as much as it would, she shrugged as she lightly stepped over to the girl. "Sure. Something like that."

Mingxia poured her a cup of green tea, which she was starting to get a little sick of but didn't say so as she took it. "Is there a problem?"

About half an inch of her wrist were exposed and pulled the skin a bit awkwardly for a woman used to longer sleeves. "…not really."

She'd just keep her hands down, unless it was needed. Problem solved.

Sonya gingerly settled herself on the other side of the girl and next to one of the posts holding a slight sloping roof over the wooden planking that bordered the main building.

Jeans and woolen slacks weren't things she got nervous over dirtying, but silk and avoiding that scrub-thing again made keeping the green and purple embroidered cloth out of the dirt something she was keen on.

If she wasn't so obsessive over keeping this costume clean the silk outfit would be really comfortable in the already warm morning. Long sleeved it might be, but it breathed a lot more than the wool and heavier cotton she normally dressed in to ward off the cold.

The only other quibble she had was how tight the sleeves were. She couldn't wear her bracer of chains with her weapons on it with this on, it wasn't snug enough to show muscle definition but it would make anything underneath a bit obvious.

Mingxia left her spot in a blur of black cloth, darting over the admittedly ragged grass of the courtyard to greet her newly returned brother. Sonya inspected the martial artist's oddly subdued attire compared to his normal bright red as he pulled the cap hiding his coiled braid off, then slid her eyes over to the older man equally as mutely dressed that joined the Storm in the courtyard curiously.

The Rain had brought out more teacups than what the two of them would need, so instead of get up and risk dirt in the silk the Storm-Cloud poured more tea.

Eventually, she would steal out of here one night and find some black tea. Somewhere.

…and she'd put a call to Björn to bring her some. Actually, she was pretty sure she forgot to bring a gift for the man hosting her.

Fong's poor Triad head had put up with her destroying a fair amount of property so far, she should probably ask her Lackey to bring something to make up for a bit of the imposition. If she was going to the effort to be non-descript while she visited, at least in the civilian sense, then maybe she should also get the Icelander to bring something for that old knitting lady that agreed to teach her instead of asking to go shopping in Hong Kong.

She'd done so her first day, dodging around Liqin. It wasn't all that interesting, a lot of what was available to buy wasn't beyond the basics of life and maybe a handful of odds and ends wares only notable because it was made in China. There was probably more, but she would need more than a few hours to find it.

Fong settled the elderly man he brought back in his little sister's former spot while he listened to her rapid chatter, and the thief offered a full cup to the elderly gentleman. As it was in Cantonese Sonya didn't know exactly what was being said, but by the gestures and the raised eyebrows in her direction she could guess.

The silver-haired old man, with rather exhausted looking features and a bit dusty from travel, snapped something sharp at the girl. The Storm replied calmly, earning himself a sharp look of his own, seating himself on the ground off the lip of the veranda. Mingxia rounded everyone to take the spot that left her back against a wooden wall and facing her brother across the tea tray.

Sonya was suddenly the center of attention without quite knowing why. "…what?"

"May I be allowed to impose on your teaching abilities?" Inquired Fong evenly in a language she did understand, picking up the cup of tea his little sister poured for him with a thankful and slightly tired smile. "Sifu Yaozu isn't in the know."

Sipping her own tea, she flicked her eyes from the old man to the not-so-ancient one. "Does he even Flicking red eyes to his latest guest and then back to her, the martial artist quirked a wry smile for her. "He was the one to teach Mingxia and I to speak it, so I would assume so."

"Okay... then why?" If the old man was a Flame user, and yet didn't know about the phenomena, she'd eat her boots.

The old man narrowed his eyes on her.

Feisty, thought Sonya in amusement.

If Fong was asking her to teach the elder about Flames, then he didn't know what a 'Cloud' was nor did he hold the automatic flinch from them a lot of other users tended to have. Depressingly, that would likely change quickly if the Storm had a good enough reason.

"...sifu may not have the option to return to his village for a long while." Explained the Storm slowly, turning his teacup around idly. "As I cannot see him back, I believe he might be interested in attending the tournament as a spectator while things are... arranged. Either with you or something around here."

"Are you asking me to inform him on a whim?" Questioned the Russian skeptically, pretty sure she was missing something because that sounded just stupid.

One did not risk Omertà as lightly as this, and Fong wasn't a stupid or reckless man. Or at least she thought he hadn't been.

If the old man didn't take it well, they'd have to kill him. She'd have to kill him, by Vindice laws. While dodging the requirement of murdering someone he knew through a technicality was a possible motive, not one she would've expected from him.

Of course, old and feisty wasn't a stupid man himself. Obviously long since cottoned on to the fact whatever they weren't talking about would be interesting or risky, he cradled his tea in both hands and narrowly inspected both speakers instead of speaking up himself.

"Not a whim, no. Sifu was the teacher I was under just before I... ah... figured out what I can do." Fong temporized easily enough, either not taking offense to the questioning or hiding it pretty damn well. "There were things I could not tell him, and a few incidents I could not explain. Now that he is as much a fugitive as we are ourselves..."

"The difference is he might be able to return to that life. We can't, or at least not without complications." Sonya countered a bit flatly, flicking her own gaze to the subject in question waiting out their conversation of him rather patiently. "Old as he may be, do you really want to gamble on him taking it well and upholding our laws no matter what happens in the short or far future?"

'Sifu' Yaozu cocked an eyebrow at her in return for her look. "You have laws? I had believed criminal types like you all flouted them, not upheld them."

...feisty wasn't entirely covering it, then.

The Triad Storm gave her a slightly wan smile over the rim of his teacup. "Do you believe we can keep it from him? While that may be possible here normally, between you and I?"

"There's only... what? Two days until I go in as your token hostage? I can behave myself that long." Between her not really but kind of broken leg, and maybe some really antisocial behavior, she could maybe managed another twenty-four hours of doing near nothing. "It isn't required, Fong."

"Miss Sonya… there is what happened yesterday." Mingxia piped up hesitantly, taking a quick sip of her tea when attention was aimed at her. "That may repeat, so ensuring there won't be a bad reaction when and if it happens later is… just wise."

"What happened yesterday?"

"…a break-in." Explained the Storm-Cloud concisely with a one-shoulder shrug.

"You might want to talk to Xiasheng about that, big brother."

"…was he there for a reason or something?" She inquired a bit curiously. "He didn't say anything too interesting to me."

The younger Sōng sibling blinked up at her innocently. "I wouldn't know, Miss Sonya. My brother is the only one who would be able to find out if no one has said something to you yet."

"…I will see about it shortly. Returning to the subject," Fong allowed his little sister to top off his teacup before glancing at the Russian expectantly, "aside my own wishes there is the consideration of your own setup in Moscow. Can you keep it from him there?"

"I had intended to as you said he wasn't in the know."

"Are you done discussing me?"

Sonya eyed the old man, taking a long draw from her lukewarm tea first. "…sleep on it. Take the day, recover from your trip and settle somewhat from whatever will prevent you from returning. If I tell you, you will not be able to escape us even if the three of us let you. There are things that frighten and intimidate us, that enforce the laws I previously mentioned. If, when you wake tomorrow or sometime in the coming day, you decide you want to know without being egged on by this or whatever else Fong might say… I will inform you."

To his credit, he visibly pondered her words and didn't insist to know what they were hinting around. "The girl is involved."

"We don't have a choice in that, like Fong and I she is included as a matter of fact by circumstances. It was our choice to be… more involved than she is." Mingxia was a Rain, she was probably automatically on the same level as Cherep was. A user who knew enough to keep her use to herself, and therefore likely away from unwanted attentions. Not beholden to Omertà, but still subject to Vindice Laws. "But your situation and hers differs due to ability. She has it, you don't. It's likely that will never be an issue for you."

"Explain."

Snorting softly and wondering if he'd continue demanding things from her when he knew, she lifted a shoulder in an absent shrug. "The eldest I know of that has achieved it, either through accident or intent, are all in their late to early thirties. While the possibility that you might learn to use it is unknown enough I will attempt to help you if you want, the likelihood is remote as far as I know. Part of the issue might be the fact the older one is the more set in their beliefs they are, or the components of the ability are too rigid later in life to be adapted as needed."

Thick, oddly flattened fingers smoothed over a rough amount of stubble as the older man puzzled over her words.
Fong set down his teacup, giving his little sister a smile of thanks but a shake of the head when she lifted the still half-full pot to inquire if he needed a refill. "I will show you to a room, sifu. I don't believe either of them have anything too pressing to do today."

"Sewing." Sonya deadpanned flatly, again giving the exposed wrists she was suffering an ugly look. "We have your outfit picked out, you'll need to try it on and tell us if it needs tailoring as well."

"Oh! I didn't notice... we can fix that, Miss Sonya." Setting the cast-iron pot down, the Rain almost took her wrist but pulled short at the last moment. She then tilted her head to the side, taking in the actual silk clad limbs and pulling a slight face. "...or really, we can shorten it, so it is less obvious."

"If we can't figure something out, I can just keep my arms down instead." The Storm-Cloud was actually rather on the tall side for a woman in these parts, likely stemming from a recent past-history of famine and internal strife.

Equally so, she was also a bit bulkier with muscle than it was possible to sustain with the food available in this corner of the world without criminal help.

At least, by with what was available to the civilians. Which, of course, didn't entirely mean their criminal ranks were subjected to the same.

A clink sounded as their elderly guest set down his own cup and accepted the Chinese Storm's arm to help him to his feet. The steel-haired old man gave the females a sharp nod in farewell, then followed the long-haired martial artist into the building.

Sonya was distracted by a tiny tug on her sleeve, as the Rain examined the seams of the cloth covering her arms. "We could shorten it to about mid-way up your forearm... or remove the sleeves entirely."

"Think we can find a similarly colored bolt of silk as the pants? I would prefer longer sleeves, myself. So, an undershirt maybe?"

"That would be a little hard, but I can try." Mingxia offered slowly, inspecting the shoulder seams they had let out in order to make it fit her and not some likely deceased former owner. "...maybe there is something else in the attic we can adapt."

"I can go sleeveless instead if need be." She countered reasonably after a pause. Because rethinking it, removing the sleeves and instead having pale green sleeves might give that ill-cast to her skin she wanted to avoid.

The Rain was young yet, she could panic and get flustered when incidents overwhelmed her limited pool of internal Tranquility. She didn't want the girl to stress herself out trying to find something she'd be more comfortable with if something else would work just as easily, especially if her suggestion might not work well.

Her reward was a sweet smile from the younger girl. "I will keep that in mind. But... either way, we need to remove the stitches in this."

Therefore, she had to get out of it, right. "Go ask your brother if he wants to take breakfast with us before we get to work or what. I'll handle the tea tray before I change."

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 20th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)
"Why don't you explain this 'unsaid' thing to me?"

"...I am unsuited to teaching. The possibility I will handle it wrongly is high." Fong admitted wryly, wrapping the over robe around himself and belting it close with another length of black silk. "I may still be a bit 'hothead', as you called me."

He could easily see why his sister and Sonya were currently trying out the outfit they had picked for the Russian, his own borrowed formalwear was a touch tight around the upper chest. Not badly, it wouldn't affect anything but his comfort, but each breath would probably pull at the seams.

His sleeves were rather voluminous, probably picked by Mingxia since she knew he rather liked to store small things or fold his arms into them.

Yaozu snorted at him when he presented himself to his elder. "You have the collar too tight. It should be lower. The end of the wider collar strip should be mid-chest."

…well, that would explain why he thought the garment was too tight. Undoing the belt and loosening the cloth reduced the pull… but maybe a bit too much.

"The waist needs to be taken in." Observed the martial arts master dryly, the only one in the building that knew how the outfit picked for him should look when worn correctly. "You are more fit than whoever wore it last."

"Then I should find Mingxia. Will you join me?"

The elderly man didn't budge from the chair he had claimed once they had woken properly.

Having traveled overnight meant they were far outside the village Fong had retrieved him from in a short amount of time, but that they both got little sleep on the various train lines taken to get back to Hong Kong without leaving an obvious trail for the Red Guard to follow. A few intermittent spots of cart smuggling, that he was glad he had pre-arranged on the possibility Master Yaozu would attend a meeting with a possible patron with him, ensured they did at least have a few solid days if not a week or so of time before it would be possible anyone would be able to track the elder man.

Any more would be risky, so Fong had a week of time to find his former teacher either a hiding spot or to get him out of China.

While not infringing on the elder's utter dislike of criminal elements.

Withholding the sigh, he regarded the martial arts master evenly. "You should at least meet more with Sonya, as she was the one to offer to move you and supply non-criminal students to teach."

"A woman." Master Yaozu remarked evenly, not showing what he really thought about it but more just stating the Russian's gender rather strongly. "A surprisingly patient woman, with a level head."

"If you can convince her that you are settle enough to take it well and not risk us, I could show you why she commands respect." Fong offered temptingly.

Sonya didn't seem to have a 'careful' fighting style, there was a 'gentle' style that took her a touch too long to respond to a strike but would reduce the amount of damage she dealt out. Xiasheng had described the differences between his spar with the Storm-Cloud and what Fong received, and the only reason why he didn't get entirely flattened in his own bout was she allowed him to start and merely responded instead of being the aggressor.

He preferred the more active bouts with the woman, himself. They were more interesting to try fighting against.

However, he couldn't show his former teacher any of that without inducting him into the umbrella of the Vindice Laws at the least. Without a more restrained fighting style of the Cloud's side, they couldn't hide the Flame use and just impress a more than average fighter on the thief's end.

Leaving either relying on Sonya's diplomatic efforts, which in light of her scholarly pursuits probably was better than anyone just off the street, or the old man's own sense of self-preservation.

The same man who remained in his school for martial arts well after the subject was outlawed and his picked role in life discriminated against in broad daylight.

"I will make the decision tomorrow." Master Yazou responded repressively. "As asked. I will meditate instead of socialize and seek to understand my own feelings on what has happened the last few years."

That would also allow him to refrain from rubbing elbows with less than legally obedient residents went unstated but still understood. "I will bring you a tray for dinner, then."

Fong did seriously wonder if the martial arts master really didn't know what he felt about his village turning against him, or that a few of his students had joined his detractors. As both were probably things the elderly man had precious little time or the luxury to honestly ponder without the worry of being caught or risking whoever it was that gave him sanctuary, he wouldn't try to insist the elder not spend an entire day within the same four walls.

Taking his leave instead of trying more dialogue with the elderly man, the Storm started his search for both his first guest and his little sister.

Which… Mingxia was capitalizing a little on the fact she was a Rain and the Russian a Storm-Cloud. Taking leave from the 'lessons' she attended in more usual days, she instead had been granted leave to tail around the thief in aims of preventing another small-scale meltdown of the Cloud sort.

Instead of finding her in a predictable set of rooms or on a specific schedule, he actually had to hunt through the rest of the building for where she was 'entertaining' Sonya. Not the courtyard, kitchens, nor the previous nook near the kitchens he found the thief that first day, but a third-floor room that had two walls worth of windows.

Fong had intended to say something to attract attention, but… Sonya was snipping stitches with a tiny gold ax head. Set up underneath a window in a semi-full room of other women doing various fabric related tasks, carefully and methodically slicing delicate threads with a miniaturized weapon to remove a panel of the purple silk dress she had been wearing earlier.

He knew that ax. He had seen a larger version tossed at his head fairly often the last few days.

Eventually Mingxia noticed him standing in the doorway, staring at the thief's efforts in dismay.

With a giggle, his little sister set aside her work. "Did you need something, big brother?"

"A bit of tailoring." Admitted the Storm wryly, still not looking away from the tiny weapon in the Storm-Cloud's hands. "This hangs a bit oddly from the shoulders, it was recommended to have the waist taken in."

"...it wraps around you." Sonya interjected skeptically, glancing up momentarily from her own work to study his form narrowly. "How would taking in the waist help anything?"
"Oh. Wait." The little Rain stepped around the Storm and tugged slightly around his back, smoothing down a few wrinkles he hadn't noticed. "...Miss Sonya? Can you come here?"

She glanced down at her own work before setting it aside, not getting directly upright but sliding to the side to avoid being spotted by anyone looking up at the windows from street-level.

Padding over in bare feet, the older woman rounded Fong and then hummed. "Ah. That is what 'take in the waist' meant."

Fong's long braid was tossed over his shoulder and it nearly smacked him in the face, and a few more tiny tugs pulled the fabric that lay across his back.

"...more 'take in the shoulder panel seams', really."

"That is the waist. I think we only need to adjust the bottom sleeve seams? If we take it in there..."

"We'd have to adjust the rest of it as well, otherwise the silk will look obviously pinched where we stop. That, and that only pulls this... we need to take this part in more." A significantly lighter touch pulled the back of the material under his left shoulder and some of the looser fabric across his back, pulling the lay of the fabric tighter to his form. "So... pins?"

Mingxia darted off to one of the others stitching together various pieces of both colorful and drab cloth, acquiring a number of tiny metal needles after a quiet word. Sonya poked his left arm up with a finger, lightly at first then more insistently when he didn't move as much as she wanted.

Fong hoped she knew what she was doing, otherwise there was a risk of getting stabbed deeply with a needle by a Cloud in his immediate future.

"Both arms up, brother." Asked his little sister as she circled him again, only for the thief to poke him around so his back was to the natural light coming in from the window.

Once everyone was shuffled around to the older woman's satisfaction, the fit of the wrapped jacket right under his shoulder blades was tugged and slid around until it lay better and pins were inserted in both sides so the girls would know how much to take them both in.

"There. Was there anything else?" Sonya's slightly muffled voice came from behind him, a soft ting of thin metal dropping to the floor and a Russian curse elected a small snicker from the Rain.

"Nothing I noticed, no."

A light tug to his left cuff, another to his right, and the blonde woman stepped out from behind him to return to her own work. "Then leave that here. Shoo. We're working."

Someone translated that order into Cantonese, and every other woman in the room suddenly looked up from their work with interest.

Fong smiled wryly, mostly at himself but a slight bit for the sudden feminine attention. "I think I will go change and then bring this to you."

The thief shot him a strange look as she settled herself in her previous position. "Why? You, and it, are here now. Admittedly we probably won't get to it right away... but why leave?"

"You really need to talk to Xiasheng, brother." Mingxia reminded him a bit pointedly, ignoring the giggles as their words were translated to Cantonese and repeated around.
He didn't understand what that had to do with getting an over robe fitted and the logistics of undressing in a room full of women, until one of them asked her neighbor if 'the Cloud-woman really didn't move from her bath when the assassin tried to murder her?'

…ah, not just a break-in happened while he was gone then. "If you do not need it right now, Sonya, I can investigate the fit a bit more to catch any problems."

"…be careful of the pins, then." She reminded him pointedly, putting her share of the pins the Rain had gotten her on one knee in favor of her tiny gold ax and the purple silk she had been wearing earlier that day.

Fong turned back to his little sister. "That ax…?"

Mingxia's smile turned a touch mischievous. "She has an entire collection of them, worn on the magnetic chain wrapped around her left bicep. They're very cute."

"That is a real one, then?"

"They are mostly the similar size as it."

"Not entirely," interrupted Sonya a bit tartly, slicing a few more threads and pulling the silk threads out of the seams she was pulling apart, "there are a few older ones about twice the size I sometimes use as hair sticks."

"Can you find some gold or gold plated chain, big brother? Apparently the axes can be worn as a charm bracelet, and since it looks like we have to remove the sleeves of her outfit she might need a different way to bring her weapons with her."

"I'll see what I can dig up." If he was being asked, then they had already been through what stored clothing the Wo Hop To Triad had hoarded when everyone else abandoned their finer things in favor of Mao jackets and plain coarse clothing and didn't find something that would suit.

"And thin wire I can use to attach them, if you do." Tacked on the thief absently, finishing with pulling the last few stitches from the one remaining sleeve and putting the extra pins to use folding the seam material over into cuffs to make the pale purple dress into a sleeveless one.

"Alright." Fong carefully gave his little sister a hug, without stabbing either of them with the pins now lining his sides and possibly some of his back.

Mingxia waved him off with a smile, taking her pins back to the woman she borrowed them from.

He wasn't sure what the girl would do once Sonya was occupied with being their hostage, she would likely have to go back to taking lessons from the Madame and the rest of the 'loose' women again.

It wasn't all the lessons the occasional streetwalker or courtesans had to teach were bad, sometimes they were from the wives and mothers of various other Triad members for just general education and Mingxia adored those lessons. Fong… just didn't want his little sister to consider maybe picking the streetwalker's profession up to help pay her way. Not before the 'Cultural Revolution' started, nor now when it was even more hazardous for a prostitute to safely work their trades in the streets.

If Sonya wouldn't take the young Rain on as a possible future lawyer type in a different country, he wasn't sure what else he could do for her.

Zhōng didn't need nor desire another lawyer-type, nor the risk of being the patron of one in the current political minefield in the country right now. It was more than risky to try studying something or just even being a teacher. Sending a possible lawyer outside of the country risk losing them to whatever cultural mess was going on there, and the real possibility they didn't have the assets to support anyone or any establishing groups sent along to protect an investment.

Finding another Triad branch that could use an assistant to one of their few lawyers in hiding would be even more risky, and just be a repeat of the situation with the Wo Hop To's Triad's Mountain Master's own stance on the issue.

Although… it seemed like the Russian thief wasn't against at least hearing out his little sister's sale pitch. Fong would merely hope Mingxia earned the Russian's regard and assistance, somehow.

They seemed friendly enough, or as much as Sonya ever seemed friendly. It did seem to be the best option available to the little Rain right now.

…and didn't that make him feel more like he had failed her and their late parents?

He fought with his fists, his sister with her words. Just because he was uninterested in learning her favored form of battle didn't mean he was alright with being unable to help her study it.

What little Fong could save up from fights and jobs normally went to ensuring this place remained safe, through bribery of the local police and Red Guard officers or merely buying provisions needed to keep Mingxia fed and warm outside the basics provided to all residing here.

Sonya had people already, didn't seem to need to work end-to-end jobs to afford them, and her Lackey was both busy and healthy not to mention her own sister was studying to become a doctor on her own terms. If Mingxia earned the Storm-Cloud's patronage, he wouldn't have to worry nearly as much a misstep of his might harm her and work on building up a better reputation of his own so when she came back she would have someplace secure to practice her art.

As awkward as talking to Tatiana could be, he would much rather the Russian sisters provide role models for his little sister. They were both formidable in their own ways, and properly honorable ladies… mainly.

They did tend to have mildly embarrassing conversations occasionally… but again, better than what courtesans and prostitutes would probably talk of in front of his younger sister.

"Xiasheng. Mingxia advised I speak with you about what happened with a break-in?"

His fellow Storm smirked wryly, turning to face him with a grin as the martial artist entered the men's dorms. "Miss Sonya really does have either pure steel nerves… or she didn't care an assassin looking for her broke through a window while she was in the… ah, middle of something. She wanted to finish her tea before getting around to helping me unpin her assassin from a wall."

"Is she really pale all over?"

Liqin sighed heavily, scooping up the pair of dice from the floor and nailing the speaking in the head with both of them. "Do stop being disgusting, please. I would be more interested in knowing who was supposed to be on guard when the incident happened."

"I wouldn't know what she looks like undressed." Xiasheng informed the entire dorm flatly, returning his attention pointedly to the newspaper he had been reading. "I didn't impose on her privacy by trying to sneak glances like some undisciplined green youth."

"What was he seeking?" Fong questioned curiously, carefully peeling the wrapped garment off his form in hopes none of the pins the women put into the seams pulled out.

"That much he was at least willing to divulge." The assassin who recently changed his name to 'Liqin' permanently answered him, taking back possession of the dice as they were returned from where they had scattered to continue the game on-going. "He was sent to kill the Cloud you brought in, preferably at night when no one would notice until far too late. Someone apparently didn't like that you found one."

"But not where he hails from?"

With a shrug, the man actually cast the dice for his roll. "That he stubbornly remained silent upon until Zhōng decided not to bother with keeping him alive any longer. You'll apparently have a better change figuring it out during the tournament."

Xiasheng glanced at his fellow Storm over the newspaper with amusement. "I would actually place money that they were jealous you brought one in yourself."

"That's not a bad assumption." Liqin interjected before anyone else could, giving a toothy smile at the real winner of their little game to have half of his coins returned to him and the other man heckled a bit for giving in to the assassin so easily. Pocketing the coins and rising to his feet in a smooth motion, he faced the pair of Storms. "As if we claimed we were bringing a Cloud, but didn't..."

"Instead he walked right into her taking a bath and ended up on the wrong end of her pipe."

Fong blinked in surprise, recalling he hadn't actually seen the Storm-Cloud with the tobacco pipe at all this day. "What?"

"Apparently her time at the circus was spent learning some... interesting skills." Xiasheng answered for the non-Flame using assassin, discarding the paper and rising from his bunk to take the pinned garment from him when he beckoned for someone to take it. "Knife-throwing for one, and with a bit of her Cloud Flame strength... she threw her lit pipe right through her assassin's chest. It was still burning when I got there."

"Ouch." The man Liqin abused with the dice spoke before Fong could, rising to join them instead of getting involved in the next round of dice. "Wouldn't the blood put the ember out?"

"Not if it's lit with Storm Flames, apparently." Liqin informed the boy, grinning. "It's still burning. We just buried it in the courtyard, and it ate away at the dirt that fell into the bowl before someone poured concrete over a scrap of wood set over it and that finally let us pack dirt on top. If you go out there, there's a spot near the corner that is still oddly warm."

Fong tried to recall exactly how long that pipe had been. "Where did we get that from?"

"One of the Mountain Master's deceased relatives. He wasn't remotely upset at what final use it was put to. Finding a replacement will be a bit harder."

"I might know where to get one." Offered the boy a bit hesitantly, sliding a bit closer to the three of them. "My father smokes."

"I do hope you're not suggesting we take your father's pipe, boy."

"No! No, but he knows where to purchase them..."

Fong spread his hands between Xiasheng and the younger man. "Peace. If you could... ah, could you introduce yourself?"
"Shao Xieren."

"Xieren, if you would ask your father to find a decently sturdy one, I will reimburse him." Offered the Storm. "Even if he refuses, ensure you convey our respects for listening."

Liqin waited for the boy to agree and dart out, slanting an amused look to the pair of Storms. "A newfound Lightning. A bit peppy, isn't he?"

"They have to start somewhere." The martial artist merely observed evenly, pulling his normal clothing on finally now that the discussion was mostly over.

Xiasheng handed back the finery that needed some tailoring with a slightly forced neutral smile. "He makes me suspicious as a matter of fact. I don't think any of us were that eager in the beginning."

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 20th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"Good evening, sifu." Mingxia greeted the elderly Yaozu softly, which was more than enough to rouse the man from his meditations next to a window.

"I thought Fēng was supposed to bring a tray."

"He was, but he got unavoidably distracted with his duties. Miss Sonya also reminded him that baiting you about what was not said is most rude over the dinner we took in the common room." Admitted the Rain pleasantly, bringing in the wooden tray with the several dishes filled with simple but at least filling food and the smaller teapot he could nurse as long as he liked. "And I wanted to see you again, sir. It's nice to see someone from... before."

The same martial arts master that had instructed her in Mandarin Chinese and a few other skills she had wanted to learn to safely travel even in a slightly backwater town she had been born into sat before her again. While her brother had spent his nights honing his martial skills in the elder's dojo, she had bothered him for all that he would teach her after her chores were done.

After their parents died, landowners were not nicely treated in the start of Mao Zedong's rule, the old man had taken them in for a while until her brother found a way to support them both... even if his then former master hadn't liked the methods.

Master Yaozu painfully raised himself from the chair he had probably been sitting in for hours, a bit creakier than she recalled but still the same old strict teacher she had cried on after her parents were... no longer around. "Pour the tea then, Mingxia. I would like to know you are fine, in spite of my worries."

"We both are, sifu." Insisted the Rain happily, settling the tray on one of the guest beds in this room and sorting out the tea for them. "Although, I know Fong isn't happy about needing to keep me here. But he was... is very nervous over something he does coming back to bother me even now."

A stubbornly neutral look was plastered over the elder's face as he took the full teacup from her and seated himself on the bed instead. "...I see."

"I've decided to become a lawyer."

A steel-grey eyebrow rose. "...how do you see that working out?"
"Everyone needs lawyers. Even criminals." Mingxia informed him, with a wry smile of her own as she seated herself on the floor next to the bed. "It will be a long while until I can call myself one, but..."

"Hmph. Better than your brother's path, I suppose."

She sighed softly. "Fong tried dock work first. He was fired in short order, apparently it wasn't appreciated when he would defend himself from the older hands trying to haze him for a 'country boy' doing better than them."

Yaozu merely snorted, taking a sip of his tea before setting down the cup and picking up the first tray of a medium sized cooked fish and the chopsticks provided.

"In-between mostly labor work, he then found a few tournaments to fight in. But then the Cultural Revolution happened, and he couldn't fight in any official tournaments that was really paying for my stay with you." Mingxia continued after a few moments of stubborn silence. "He tried an unofficial one, right after the ban went into effect. It didn't end well."

"Obviously he survived whatever it was, since he's here."

She merely spread her hands and shrugged. "If you want to take it that way, it is up to you. But he did end up here after that fiasco, where he was offered the opportunity to learn more about things not taught most places."

She got a mildly curious look. "What are you doing, little Ming?"

"Giving you the parts of the story you probably wouldn't get out of my stubborn brother."

"You think that will change my mind?"

"No. That's not my aim here." Admitted the Rain simply enough. "I only want to inform the one that took care of me for him why things happened the way they did."

"You just admitted to wanting to be a lawyer, Ming." Yaozu pointed out after swallowing his next bite.

"There are laws, for a select section of the world. The bare basics that are required to be passed on are... inadequate to say the least. We both have the trait, and he knew if he went into the Triads he'd get the information and could help me with it."

She only earned another stubbornly blank look.

Well, no. Baiting the old man wasn’t polite. Sonya had informed both siblings of that over dinner, aimed more to the Storm than the Rain.

Mingxia was fully aware of that, she just chose not to listen for right now. "Even if it earned him your animosity, Fong needed the help and wanted to give me it without allowing the Triads to hold me on that. The fact he was a good martial artist allowed him to find a place here, one that might even give him more legal work once the unrest is over."

"That doesn't excuse the fact he is using what I taught him for petty criminal acts and likely a few more serious ones. Against the tenets I tried to instill in him."

"That is your prerogative, and it is understandable."
The elderly man put down his half-eaten fish and pinned her with a no-nonsense look. "Will this thing you all are dancing around not saying anything about make this all 'magically' better?"

"No... it will make it worse." Mingxia didn't actually know why it was only the criminal ranks Dying Will Flame use was restricted to, or why everyone went along with it. The only ones that could answer that question were the Vindice, and she was not that brave.

"I believe I said not to tempt the old man." Sonya Bazanova observed a bit pointedly in Mandarin from the doorway.

Since even Master Yaozu was surprised by her sudden arrival, she didn't feel embarrassed over her jump that spilled lukewarm tea over her fingers.

The thief inspected the both of them, and then pinned her with a stern look over her newly replaced tobacco pipe. "Also, I'm fairly sure telling another how to feel about something unknown is rather impertinent."

"I have no idea what you might be insisting, Miss Sonya."

"I'm sure. I was wondering if you were a bit too nice to be real. Nice to see you do have some vices." Observed the older woman dryly, leaning up against the doorway. "Although, I will admit, hearing about Fong's early years was interesting."

"What about yours?" Asked the martial arts master a bit defensively, which both Flame users caught easily enough from the look the Storm-Cloud pinned him with.

"I started out a thief. At nine." She informed him blandly, pausing to draw on her new completely brass pipe again. "Then I kept on being a thief. I steal things, it's what I do."

"What are you here to steal, then?"

"...Mingxia's spot as a hostage for good behavior in a Triad hosted martial arts tournament."

Yaozu glanced at the Rain, who merely nodded to indicate the woman was telling the truth. "Big brother did not want to risk me like that, but with the limitations on what would be accepted as a hostage... he reached out to a foreign associate to participate in my stead."

"Were you looking for Mingxia for a reason then?" Inquired the elder man a tiny touch more respectfully, not a whole lot but nearly as much as she once recalled him addressing her mother.

"No, actually. I was looking for you." Announced the Russian, padding her way into the guest room and taking the other bed to perch upon. "Did Fong explain anything about my job offer?"

"...only that it existed. The contents of your letter...?" He paused until she inclined her head to accept the connection to it. "Is all I know."

Sonya mused on that for a moment. "Mingxia, shut the door if you would. I won't ask you to leave but do keep what you hear confidential."

The thief only continued when she hopped to do as ask, starting with the explanation well before she returned to her seat.

"I asked Fong for a martial arts master who might be able to teach my brother aikido. He is very much like Mingxia, involved due to something beyond his ability to control but choosing a more civilian lifestyle for himself irrespective of the knowledge of what our lifestyles are like."
"…your brother, not yourself?"

Sonya pulled on her pipe instead of answer right away, obviously thinking through her words with deliberation. "You would need a lot more information before you could instruct me of anything that might be useful. Aside all that, my brother is a complete pacifist. He refuses to entertain the possibility of harming another, even if that would save himself. Even if we both know full well most humans aren't actually all that nice."

Master Yaozu set down the shallow dish now only filled with fish bones on the dinner tray she had brought in and picked up the dish of Ma Po Tofu. "Interesting, but only one possible student. It is unknown if we would even suit, or if a pacifist would want to learn any martial style."

"I recently rescued a man from Sierra Leone, Africa. The man was skeletal thin, utterly overly concerned with his fellow man even half a breath away from starving to death, and also peripherally involved in our lifestyle without choice. A nurse that checked him over for me recommended moderate physical activity, which I am sure he's not getting."

"You cannot teach the unwilling."

"I can only set it up and lead a horse to water." The older woman shrugged that off. "Aside those two, who are the only ones I can almost guarantee will not abuse what you might teach them, there are either younger students who might be interested in learning but are criminals in training and the civilian residents of Moscow itself. What you teach, to whom, or how much, is up to you."

The elderly man chewed on his tofu, Sonya smoked more, and Mingxia fidgeted with the tea out of nerves.

"You will forgive me if I require some time to consider the offer."

"It would mean moving countries and exiling yourself for at least a short few years or longer. I will not hold it against you for taking your time, in fact I expected you to need some." Spoke the thief around the stem of her pipe blandly. "Hence why I sought you out now and not tomorrow."

The martial arts master went back to chewing on his food, giving a nod of thanks when the Rain refreshed his tea before pouring a cup for the Russian that seemed to be less than enthused by the offer but still took it politely.

Then Fong lightly knocked on the doorway before sliding it open, looking a bit surprised at who was all within the room.

"What part," Sonya asked in exasperation, wagging the stem of her pipe at the Sōng siblings, "of 'do not bait the old man' did the two of you not understand? I thought I was rather clear."

Mingxia giggled into her hands even as her brother gave the Russian a politely bemused look. "I have no idea what you might mean, Sonya. I merely wished to see if sifu wanted someone to talk to yet."

Not remotely sold on the Storm's stated reasons, the older woman looked at the elderly man. "Were they always this stubbornly insistent?"

"Yes." Yaozu confirmed flatly, returning his attention more to his food than his various visitors. "Their father was much the same way, if I recall correctly. And I'm fairly certain I do. I didn't expect it from Ming, but I should have."
Alright, complaints?" Galina asked of the assembled teacher-types she was hosting.

Sonya might be a bit annoyed they did this in her apartment, but the Lightning couldn't invite the few civilian teachers into the Zolotov Headquarters without a few awkward questions to answer. Masquerading as if this was her home was just as awkward, but the Lightning was sure after the rough opening month few of the teachers would want to do this in the school.

"Miss Galina, I know the… Chinese students are part of… something." Artemiy Dyrbov started slowly, glancing at the only Chinese native in the living room before snapping his gaze to her. "But… they are not the… best behaved?"

"That is why they were sent outside of the People's Republic of China." Yanlin explained a bit apologetically, which still earned him a few strange looks. "The… current views of my country are not flattering of teachers or those that think for their life's work."

"Part of the reason Bazanova isn't present is that she is in China at the moment." Explained the brunette as calmly as she could, giving the poor beleaguered Literature teacher. "Most of the reason we have Chinese exchange students is political. We are aware they are little hellions, but we are also trying to educate them not to follow the small-minded take of intellectuals being less than respectable."

Scruffy cleared his throat a bit nervously, still not entirely comfortable putting himself out there on a wider scope than just one-on-one. They really should've made him a counselor or something, honestly. However good he was at drilling why science might be something to know into his classes.

"If it is that bad, refer them to Yanlin for behavioral corrections. While overwhelming the man with too many 'problem' students would be rather inefficient, he might be able to reach them if you are getting stumped."

The lone Triad member and Rain Flame instructor inclined his head to accept the referral, which did finally relax some of the tension that had been in the room when the various teacher-types assembled.

Lisa, which Galina still almost couldn't believe she was the one directing and not the other way around, gave the entire room a tight little grin. "I like stumping the little snots on what they would do otherwise if they refuse to think or listen to me."

Peter coughed a startled laugh, echoed a moment later by Andrei Chikatilo's more robust chuckle at the quip. The Lightning shot the older woman a small, thankful smile as a few smaller discussions started up on the various ways some of the teachers had found to circumvent the more rebellious students' antics with those that hadn't found a way around it.

Allowing it to continue, the brunette reflected on how the first two months of her teaching career had gone.

To say their exchange students were a bit problematic was understating the issue, severely.

Yanlin had tried to prepare them, but who in hell thought that anyone sent to a foreign land would try to disrespect their instructors because they merely taught?

It was probably the more enduring issue, as the slight fiasco of ordering too little food to feed the students the first week had been solved by Lisa in short order and the hiccup in the Flame instruction lessons being almost walked in on by a civilian after hours had been ironed out by Usov with appreciable haste. Andrei the Sun being the one in charge of the dorms after hours helped reduce the number of incidents between the Russian students and the Chinese ones. Installing Anna as the head of the girl's dorms was a bit more problematic as she wasn't a student nor a teacher's aide, but not nearly so much as they didn't have female Chinese exchange students.

The actual lessons were disturbingly easy in comparison. Teaching a bunch of snot-nosed brats how to setup and manage a budget, track and file invoices in various filing arrangements, managing the building of what limited savings they could probably manage to scrape together, or just simple addition and subtraction wasn't all that hard when the brats paid attention.

"Okay, quite down." Galina spoke up after allowing the chatter to continue long enough for most of the better ideas to be banded around. "Anything problematic you noticed? I cannot fix it if you do not speak up."

"That's a double negative." Dyrbov pointed out a bit needlessly.

She pinned him with a flat look. "Noted. And...?"

Most of what she got in response were minor nitpicks, general supply issues they had no idea they needed more than just some arbitrary limits or quibbles about the texts selected for some subjects that would devolve into a round-robin debate if she let it go on. Noting the more easily fixed in one notepad, and the ones that would either need involved discussions to air out or more than a bit of creativity in another, Galina let Lisa take over the discussion and manage it so someone else suggested maybe getting out of the Lightning's hair before dinnertime came around.

Hey, there was a bar just down a few floors. Maybe they could move things there?

Yeah... Galina was still slightly scared of Sonya's mother.

Scruffy engaged her in a discussion over book recommendations, which he carried most of until the last few civilians trickled out with Irinei following the Chinese Triad member and the eldest woman in the room to provide the two of them a bit of cover.

The moment the door shut, leaving her and Andrei the Sun behind with McScruffy, Galina turned to the man absently chatting her ear off expectantly.

"I think Chikatilo is still suspicious of us. I'm not sure what Usov did, but apparently it didn't stick."

Sighing heavily, the Lightning slumped into the couch. "It's only been two months. Not even a quarter of the way through the very first year. And we can't even keep the civilians out of the sensitive stuff?"

Anna let herself in via a window's reflection, the same way how they opened up the thief's apartment to host this meeting in the first place.

Dusting her hands off absently, the teenaged girl gave her a bland smile. "It wasn't our fault, Usov did catch him before he ran off."

"I'm not blaming anyone, Mirror Lady. Merely observing how badly we handled the first month."

"He didn't escape, and it is entirely due to you and Usov. I'm just reporting what little I could get out of him about it, especially since it seems as if I'm not 'in' on the secret." Scruffy defended himself a touch too quickly to be entirely described as 'non-panicked'.
"Anna, if we select certain days to do more 'normal' things for the so-called after school activities... can you arrange Chikatilo to 'spy' on it?" Ballet practice and firearms practice wouldn't be something any school faculty would hide, so not that. Those were morning activities anyways.

There was the possibility of using Yanlin's nationality and the Chinese exchange students, suggesting they were having their own meetings after-hours that might be believable enough.

What else would be something one would want more privacy than normal to use the basement for?

Galina glanced up to Scruffy's features skeptically.

The man blinked back in confusion. "What?"

"...how do you feel about starting a poetry club? Or a... capitalist-writing reading club?"

Scruffy blankly stared at her for a long moment. "Is that safe?"

"No, but then again that's the point. Chikatilo thinks there's something going on, so let's give him something that won't have us visited by the Vindice." She explained with a wave of the hand. "Even if he tries to blackmail us about it, we can either stave him off until Sonya returns or handle the problem if he tries to overreach himself about it."

"What if he does nothing about it?" Andrei the teacher's aide asked when his fellow Sun pondered that. "Are we just going to let him linger on our flanks with something illegal to hold over us?"

"That is a scenario that will take longer to set up and pull off believably. Let's try the less risky options first, like maybe a Chinese only meeting Yanlin's trying to moderate their students' behavior. If that bait isn't taken, then to keep a lid on things until Sonya can decide what to risk or do with the man might be necessary."

Scruffy shuffled a bit in place, looking a bit conflicted. "...can I do it anyways? I mean, I'm not going to try... ah, insulting? Your communist ways. But... as an implicit lesson on how others in the West see the mindset might be... interesting?"

"Peter, we're criminals." Galina reminded him pointedly. "If you can find the students interested and believe you can keep a lid on it when we're inspected or even from the children's parents, then feel free."

"Just... you might want to recruit Usov's help in keeping things quiet, yeah?" Clapping his fellow Sun on the shoulder, Andrei turned to leave them. "Let's try to only have one crisis at a time."

"Seconded." Anna interjected before turning to fold herself back into the window's reflection.

The Lightning inspected the slightly conflicted expression on the older man's face when they were left alone. "Peter? Was there something else?"

"Ah... coffee? I mean, would you like to go get some coffee so I can pass my ideas through an actual communist?" Peter kind of hunched in on himself a bit as he started rambling quickly. "I don't want to offend, and a lot of the takes the western world has on communist life is not... good. I don't... I only have a vague idea how to address that?"

"Probably not something to do in public, Peter. So, coffee probably isn't the best idea." Galina gently refuted after pondering the request. "However, there's nothing stopping us from finding where Sonya stashed her tea and having some here."
"...oh, right."

The Lightning took him by the elbow and shoved him around a bit, so he would start moving to the table set within the kitchen corner of this apartment. "Or you could just say 'I would like some company, Galina'."

The man sheepishly laughed a bit nervously. "If you are busy then I don't want to impose..."

"Impose, please. The breaks from my current headaches are rather nice." She sighed lightly once he took a seat, putting her notepads on the table to search the cabinets for the tea kettle and tea leaves she was sure was somewhere on the right over the sink.

Keeping in mind Scruffy's recent past as a prisoner against his will to a diamond cartel was slightly hard.

Like most Suns, he had bounced back from the trauma inflicted on him rather quickly once given something else to do. That didn't mean he had dealt with it, nor that he had put any of the issues it might've given him behind. Merely that he could continue his life, such as it was half-hidden by the Mafiya due to his Flames and half-drafted into Sonya's staff through mere circumstances of his Flame use.

Galina had only belatedly noticed the man wasn't actually dealing with any of the issues he had or expanding any distance beyond what he had been limited to as an unwilling dependent. Even now that he had the funds and leeway to live more than merely exist, he remained in the same cramped accommodations and bare-bone routine.

She was pretty sure Sonya didn't even know there might be more lingering issues to deal with, and to keep the Sun from collapsing in on himself she'd ensure he recovered as best she could.

Tatiana had a few suggestions and was the one to clue her in that something might be still affecting the slightly greying blond man. Peter didn't seem to mind her occasionally nudging him, but then again it had only been a few days.

Thankfully she was an Inverted Lightning, slow and steady work at it was completely within her abilities.
Chapter 81

(Wednesday the 22th of October, 1969. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Master Yaozu took an extra day, for what reason she could only guess at but it likely involved yanking Fong's braid, then he confronted the thief her last 'free' morning before being taken hostage. "I would like to know what it is that is unsaid so far."

Sonya, who had sought out the early morning sunlight since she wasn't sure when she'd get more in the next week or so, cracked an eye open to see the old man. "...mmm, alright."

"May I sit in?" Xiasheng inquired politely from across from her, finally looking up from the cup of tea he had brought out as part of a tea tray but she snubbed taking a portion of. "Actually, a few of the others might be interesting to hear how you Russians induct others."

Heaving a sigh, she replaced her pipe stem between her teeth. "You may sit in if you'd like, but we are not doing a mass lesson right now. I think we should keep this small, it is rather surprising in content. Aside which, I don't like crowds."

The Storm accepted that easily, silently asking the elder if he would like the so far forlorn empty cup and a measure of tea by lifting the pot questioningly.

"First and foremost, the ability I will talk about is called Dying Will Flames of the Sky." At the skeptical look she earned, she lifted one hand and lit the tip of her index finger with her lavender inner Flames she identified with and by the most. "I am a Dying Will Flame Cloud user. My ability is Propagation, or to make more of something. I can make more blood to bleed... and... make more steel to wield."

Dumping a full-sized Bec de Corbin into his lap, summoned from the wisp of a Flame she had lit on a fingertip, she went back to smoking for a moment to let him absorb that.

"...of the 'Sky'." Yaozu remarked after a long silent moment in an utterly even tone of voice, setting the butt of her favored weapon on the ground and leaning the shaft against one shoulder. "Why 'Sky'? Is there an 'Earth' to go along with it?"

"Yes, but I've never met an Earth Flame user. I've only read about them." Picking the second question before the listening younger man could offer the negative most would probably give, which wasn't correct and damn it all she was doing this brief, Sonya shifted around and backwards slightly to directly look at her audience. "As to why we are Elements of Sky Flames? Because our Flames are compatible to a Sky Flame user. What happens if we find and bond to an Earth Flame user isn't known, or if Earth Flames have their own spectrum of types like how Earth and Sky are supposedly different. I believe it was... gravity vs Harmony."

The martial arts master ran his fingers down warm and smooth metal, which never did grow cool no matter how low the temperature was outside. He didn't glance at either Flame user bracketing him but instead studied the far courtyard wall in an absent way.

Before she could decide if she should continue or let him have more time to absorb the information, the old man set her weapon aside and picked up his spilled teacup. Xiasheng poured him more obediently when he belatedly noticed there was no liquid inside.
When that was all the old man did, Sonya continued.

"There are seven Elements of Sky. There's Sky, Cloud, Storm, Rain, Sun, Lightning, and Mist. Harmony, Propagation, Disintegration, Tranquility, Activation, Hardening, and Construction respectively." Pausing to pull on her pipe again, she blew out the smoke well over their heads in order to not bother either man with it. "Any sane person's first question is why we keep it hidden... and the answer is the Vindice Laws."

That earned her some attention, and she picked back up her weapon to immolate it into nothingness again without setting anything a-Flame.

"What are the Vindice Laws?" Master Yaozu asked tiredly when she didn’t directly continue, now staring up at the sky instead of the wall.

"...the Vindice are individuals that dress in nearly all black, their face and hands either masked with gloves or wrapped with white bandages. I've seen them once... and once was more than enough. They move via portals ripped into surfaces, or possibly into nothing, and arrest those that violate their laws in black chains that I think cannot be broken. No one knows what or who they are, nor what happens to those they take. All we know is that they've existed for a long time, and they relentlessly hunt their law breakers."

A sharp glance was thrown at her, a more wondering one from the Storm on the elderly man's other side.

"If Mingxia, or Fong for that matter, draw attention to their Flame use... they'd be arrested, and you'd never hear from them again. If I walked into the streets and massacred the Red Guard in droves... I'd be arrested, and you'd never see me again. Anyone that has Flames and actively uses it tries to hold government office or join the military even knowing it's forbidden... they would disappear without so much as a word. If we draw any unwarranted attention to ourselves through Flame use, well... see previous examples."

Nearly giving himself a crick in the neck, the martial arts master shot a questioning look to Xiasheng to collaborate her words.

He only lifted one shoulder in a shrug. "I've never seen them. I would never want to, either. As far as I know, what she says is true. Sightings of the Vindice do sometimes arise in gossip, and occasionally a few on our ends just go missing... with a proclamation declaring their lawbreaking given to their leader so we know who took them."

Yaozu stared at the other man for a long moment, glancing back to the thief once, then examined the tea in his hands with a furrowed brow.

"How the Vindice Laws got wrapped up in organized crime I can easily guess. Flame users are allowed to freely use their abilities as long as it's not 'public' or would cause panic, and the mafia and or Triads are not public. The only thing we are required to pass on are the basic rules, not how to control one's pyrotechnic self-immolation habits. In order to get that, one would have to swear to their specific group in order to have the tricks another learned taught to them. And on and on... until, well... the only ones that know are all criminal types."

"It is nice to gather with others that understand how difficult it is to manage our abilities." Using his Storm Flames in a probably copied from her maneuver, Xiasheng re-heated the elder's now likely cooled tea with a flash of his ruby red Flames.

"I had to help Fong with learning more control myself." Sonya tacked on after a silent moment, examining the remains of the tobacco she had packed into the pipe's bowl last night and wondering how many puffs were left. "And that wasn't all that long ago."

Yaozu shot her a look, a suspicious one she didn't understand. Suddenly surging to his feet rather fast for an old man, he turned and damn near stormed into the building while his abandoned teacup rolled in the now muddy ground under the veranda.

Sonya and Xiasheng exchanged a set of blank looks, then they both got up to follow in curiosity.

Or at least she was curious as hell and could guess the Storm was as well since he kept up with her and the older man.

The steel-haired old man made a turn for a hallway she hadn't been down yet, and when the martial arts master threw open a sliding door with a slam it drew a lot of male voices exclaiming in surprise.

"Fēng! Did this… FLAME thing! Was that the reason you burned a hole in my dojo's wall?"

Sonya snorted, clapping a hand over her mouth as she snickered. Xiasheng slowly shut his own mouth slowly, looking slightly bewildered.

"...sifu, I would not mind discussing what really happened when I left. However… this is the men's dorms. And I do hear Sonya past you. Perhaps somewhere more private?"

"Oh no. No. I want to know now, Fēng. Did you LIE to me? To my face?"

Coughing in hopes of stopping her little giggle fit, the Storm-Cloud looked over to the other pure Storm. "Breakfast, Xiasheng? I think they… heh, might need a moment."

Hawkish yellow eyes flicked to her, to the back of the elderly man reading his former apprentice the riot act for hiding his issues in the first place and then covering up his difficulties with more lies, and he nodded slowly. "...that might be something to do, Miss Sonya."

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 22th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"I only have your word these 'Vindice' things exist."

"Probably something I can do about that, but they freak me out." Sonya Bazanova responded lazily, stubbornly sitting in the late morning sun even if a rather severe looking woman was arguing with Mingxia about when the thief had to get ready for being taken hostage later today. "I think they make everyone that are near them irrationally panicky, so that might be something to see about much later on."

Yaozu cradled his freshly poured tea in both hands, to allow the heat from the beverage to sink into his joints abused by a lifetime of perfecting his chosen lifestyle.

He had not really appreciated having a fundamental part of the world irreconcilably altered out from under him. Fēng's, or Fong's, difficulties in his 'Storm Flames' should not have been hidden from him, as he had been the young man's instructor… but he was also fully aware of what would have happened then.

Had his student confided in him about the strange fire ability he suddenly suffered from… he would either have done much the same as the young man had eventually or done the supposedly law-breaking alternative of asking others if they knew of the phenomena. If the criminal ranks were the only place to find instruction for these Dying Will Flame user, they then could demand whatever in return and get it even if he had his own opinions when reaching that conclusion.

Fong had cut short the entire issue, circumventing Yaozu and still providing his little sister some safety from the same fate.

He did not appreciate the ability to make the decision being taken from him but was also irritatingly glad he had not needed to compromise his own honor at another's whim. There was also the fact his student apparently hadn't trusted him with the problem, instead seeking his own answers. However much he had not shown comprehension of the problem when viewing the accidental result, Fēnɡ-Fong had no way to truly know that without asking in the first place.

He wasn't sure if it was the start of the so-called Cultural Revolution that had caused the 'Storm' to seek an alternate instructor for something the 'civilians' seemingly had no knowledge of, or if it was something he might have said over the years that made him doubt Yaozu would take him seriously. However it happened, whatever it was that influence Fēnɡ to keep his fire-related problem to himself, it had and he now had to decide his stance on the subject.

Mingxia hadn't been… what had the woman claimed?

'Impertinent', in claiming the underpinning reasons things had happened the way they had was not good.

"...why does Fong think you command respect?"

The thief he was trying not to interrogate sighed heavily, recollecting her half-sprawled position into a neater posture as he insisted on speaking more with her than she seemed to wish. "Ask him. I could answer in various ways, but he would know why he said something better than I."

He gave her a sharp look. "Try."

She glanced over at him, those normally grey eyes flashing a bright purple for a moment before it faded back to her original eye color. "…Cloud Flame users are notoriously ill-tempered creatures, with the reputation of massacring their detractors to back it up. I naturally figured out how to Propagate force, I can and have destroyed entire buildings on my own over the course of a night. Turn a fully-grown man into a bloody smear with a flick of a wrist, bend cold metal with a hand, and smashed craters into the ground effortlessly."

Yaozu stared at her hard, trying to figure out if she was lying or telling the truth.

"Don't get me wrong, I'm not proud of a lot of the more lethal things I've done. I still occasionally have nightmares, but I honestly don't regret it either." Sonya cast a glance over the courtyard, which had what seemed to be formerly neat greenery recently ravaged by a bull gone mad… if it had various lanterns tied to its horns. "Between my own safety and seventeen other girls'… or the near hundred men trying to profit by selling said girls and me into sexual slavery…"

His eyes went, slightly unwillingly, to the exasperatedly arguing Mingxia standing in the doorway blocking a much older woman's path to the Russian woman. Said woman being discussed suddenly surged up to her full height, stretching in a way that could only be described as sinuously, which cut short the ongoing argument in a highly suspicious way.

There was some fear in that reaction, on behalf of the older native woman. Mingxia was still merely exasperated, but of her elder. She held no fear of the blonde woman's motions.
A glaring flash of fiery purple, and a solidly massive double-headed ax that would be taller than the woman that summoned it to hand embedded itself right in front of Yaozu with an audible but still muffled thunk next to a sharper crack.

"I don't know what it is between you, Mingxia, and Fong. Frankly, I don't care either. It's your business, and I don't feel like digging into it. However... this does need to be pointed out." Ignoring the weapon she had thrown at his feet, Sonya planted her right hand on a hip and stared flatly down at him. "If you, now or later on, try to say something in public about this Flame stuff… either the Vindice or this Triad will come after you. Worst case, Fong will be tasked with killing you before you trigger the Vindice to make a house-call. If you feel you can't stand saying nothing, of letting this monopoly continue… which I am fully aware is unfair in the extreme but it is what it is... tell me soon so I can spare Fong the guilt of your death. I don't like killing people, but it would probably be even more distasteful if you know the victim."

She turned on a heel before he could think up an answer, going over to investigate the young woman's visible irritation and why it was going on.

Turning back to the almost bewildering oversized ax seated in the earth before him, the martial arts master took as sip of his unfortunately rapidly cooling tea.

A few sharp words denying any assistance needed for a run to a bathhouse from the thief's end, a quieter word to the younger woman, and the female he wasn't sure was arrogant or just supremely self-assured left the courtyard for somewhere deeper into the building.

He wasn't surprised when Mingxia seated herself next to him when the older two left her behind.

"I've seen magically appearing weaponry, your brother burring holes through things that shouldn't burn... what can you do, little Ming?"

Two tiny hands cupped nothing, until they were filled with wavering blue Flames of her own. "I'm a Rain Flame user, sifu. I have the ability of Tranquility."

Yaozu paused as a feeling that could be described as 'Tranquility' spread through him, blunting the edges of his emotions without the need of meditation to investigate the source of them. "That is..."

He could now think of six different ways to use that for less morally upright purposes than just calming someone or a room of agitated individuals down so peaceful talks could occur.

Carefully keeping the wry bitterness from his face to prevent upsetting the girl, he instead inclined his head to show he appreciated the illumination over her own involvement.

Fē-Fong, had provided her a way not to abuse her special gift that she seems to have taken. His equally disappointed and proud feelings on his former student aside, he could still appreciate that much without conflicted emotions interfering on his own.

"That is very impressive, Ming." He informed her honestly as he could, give his limited exposure to the phenomena aside it was different enough to be noted either way.

"Rains are rather common, so not really sifu. Next to them, some of whom live here too, I am terribly unpracticed." Mingxia explained a bit apologetically. "And I don't have any major combat applications for it yet, all I can do is calm a room with a limited amount of people. Big brother, Miss Sonya, and most others can shrug off my Tranquility easily."

So, there was a way to resist these magical 'Flames'?
Did he need to have them, or could it be trained in anyone with enough determination?

Yaozu tugged on the beginnings of a beard growing on his chin thoughtfully. "...I find it impressive."

"There will likely be a lot of Flame users at the tournament, sifu. If you go, you will probably find those better trained than me."

"I am not sure if I would want to, but if it is just a matter of practice... there is nothing stopping you from working on it alone."

"I would need a target, and not many want to risk overdosing on Tranquility for some young girl when better trained Rains are around."

He tugged on the short whiskers again, planning to bother one of Fong's roommates for his shaving kit to deal with it soon, and shot the girl staring at her hands clasped in her lap a stern look. "I am led to believe that woman is some sort of Soviet expert or instructor of these 'Flame' things. Did you think to inquire with her if there is anything you can do without a partner? There is always a way, Ming. Find it. Neglecting your education because of another's dim views on who you are will do you no service later. If no one else will help you, I will."

…and that decided him, didn't it?

If he was already planning on keeping his eyes open in this so-called tournament for any 'Rain' tricks to help the younger Sōng sibling, he wouldn't be trying to rock the fishing boat for at least a few years yet.

Yaozu heaved a tired sigh, wondering how in the world one acquired a traveler's visa or passport in the mess the government was in now.

"...I'll be right back, sifu. Excuse me!" Rapid footfalls faded in quick order echoed back after the young girl's words, leaving him with half a cup of tea and a massively oversized gold-plated battle ax embedded in the courtyard.

A moment of considering it, the martial arts master set aside his beverage to test the give the weapon had... and belatedly noticed the bladed end had bisected one of the flat stones that made up the flagstone path.

Not cracked it in half, which would be confusing enough, but the metal had cleaved right through the flat grey stone with just the force the woman had tossed it with.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 22th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"...I only know of one way, really. I didn't pay a whole lot of attention where the Soviet Rains are right now, nor the precise methodology they developed the basic exercise into." Sonya admitted after a moment of consideration.

Mingxia bit her lower lip. "Can I ask then...?"

"I believe you already did. Give me a second, I think I have the components with me." Having stated that, she turned to scale back up the staircase she had only just came down.
“...I offered—”

"I know, big brother." His little sister interrupted a bit abashedly, wringing her hands together. "And I could probably practice with you now that you have less issues not burning through the Flames of anyone attempting to Tranquilize you, but... you’re busy a lot of the time."

Fong grimaced slightly as he accepted that. It would be different if he was just waiting out the ban on martial arts but getting sent to Mafia Land to help with security there as well as pick up more martial art styles to preserve them and hopefully teach later on meant he wasn't here for her a lot.

The fact Mingxia hadn't been able to convince one of the other women in residence here to be her subject was... not particularly surprising.

Tranquilizing someone to death was the current favorite use of Rain Flames in the country. Especially as the normal side effects of such a thing was similar to dying from pure stress or, with enough preparation to fake it, drug use.

Digging into a pocket reminded the Storm he did have a bit of topaz on him, and he wondered if 'component' referred to another gemstone.

The he wondered if Sonya carried around a selection of jewels with her everywhere.

Vaulting the staircase, the Storm-Cloud in question lightly landed halfway down the stairs and skipped down a few more steps to bleed off her momentum. Coming to a stop right in front of the barely teenaged Rain girl, the thief held up a nearly colorless little gem so they could all see it clearly. "This, you will be careful of. Mingxia, this will shatter on you... and you press too hard with it, it can explode. I had one of these eat a divot out of my palm because I wasn't being careful. girl."

His little sister gingerly took the tiny pear-cut stone from her warily. "What do I do?"

"Light it, slowly, with Rain Flames until it splinters into shards. It both a control and a sustainment exercise. If not build, because I don’t think we build up more Flames than what we have naturally, it will allow you a tighter control over what you do have." Sonya shoved her free hand through her blonde hair, eyeing the little stone she had given over warily herself. "That is a bit of white sapphire, and to whoever is eavesdropping... do not use sapphires. Again, they have a nasty tendency to explode."

"Why give one to Mingxia, then?"

"Rains are pretty much the only ones I know of that can make limited use of sapphires. And some rubies. Go slowly enough flooding it with Tranquility, and they'll just splinter apart instead of shatter violently." The woman shrugged that off easily, turning to snatch her bathing things from the amused Liqin tasked with holding onto it while she sorted out the request. "The shards then can be used to slowly Tranquilize another person, just slip one on whoever and let them walk away. Leave it on long enough and they'll die, but..."

The assassin waited until the woman wandered off to take advantage of a bribe they paid out to reserve an entire bath house so she could clean up for later tonight, then turned to the young Rain. "I'd be interested in those shards once you're done with them."

"Liqin."

"If it would bother you, not to kill with. Just... reliably taking out guards without needing to fight those that walk in on possibly awkward situations would be helpful." The man explained smoothly, rolling a shoulder in an absent but still easy-going shrug. "I'll spread the news to a few other Rains, see if they want to try this as well... because interesting isn't quite the word to use about this tidbit of advice you got out of her.

Mingxia stared at the gemstone in her palms while the other man was talking, then up at him questioningly.

Fong kept his features blank. While yes, he could understand that... if she wasn't comfortable with that then he would prevent any pressure.

"I don't know how long this will take me, and we don't know how fast or slowly they'll work once I do have shards." Offered the little Rain after thinking hard. "How about... you can have the shards from this one, which will likely be shattered before anyone else's, as long as you find me a replacement once I break it?"

"I would not mind at all." Giving her a brisk business-like nod, Liqin shot the Storm an amused glance as he walked on to wherever he had been headed before Mingxia waylaid their Russian guest with her question.

"Are you sure you are alright with that?" Fong asked his little sister once they were left alone in the middle of the hallway, concerned at this sudden switch in aims.

"...it's not guaranteed Miss Sonya will take me on, big brother." She reminded him slowly, folding the little gemstone into her palm and looking up at him worriedly. "Either way, if it happens or not, this is another way. Not a very appetizing one, but... something I can do. Hopefully it'll only just be the one."

"I could try asking her for you." He offered instead of the automatic 'don't' that tried to escape him. "Sonya might be very annoyed at the imposition, but-"

"I think she has an easier time saying no to you than she does to me." Mingxia informed him with a small smile. "It took you... how long to get her to talk to you, again?"

Fighting down the wry smile, because that was very true as it had taken him months to get the woman to offer something on the subject of her gemstones and his little sister had taken all of five minutes, he turned to follow Liqin's path. "I see you have no respect for your long-suffering brother forging the way for you..."

"Is that what it's called these days?" She asked, almost genuinely sounding surprised and a touch wondering... if it hadn't been for the mischievous little smile betraying her real feelings. "Doesn't she still call you annoying?"

"I don't believe I will be able to get rid of that descriptor for a long while." Fong admitted dryly to her with a shrug. "But... getting her to pay anyone attention beyond just acknowledging they exist was... well, no one else managed it by the time I met her. And she did eventually hear me out, even if she does think I am so."

"It's a good thing, big brother. It will keep you humble."

The Storm shook his head at her. "I believe the fact she very nearly ran me into the ground sparring with me over the course of a day and a half, not to mention the fact she refused to go all out and still broke a lot of things including me, will keep me humble enough little sister."

Mingxia snagged his braid to tug on lightly, darting off back to the courtyard with a giggle.

Fong watched her go in amusement, glad she was acting more her age again. She tried so hard to be mature and self-contained so he wouldn't worry about her, not realizing the more stiffly she behaved herself the more he worried.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 22th of October, 1969 continued. A bathhouse, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Sonya knew how bathhouses worked just fine, she didn't need an attendant. This was her third visit to the People's Republic of China, she got the gist already.

In hindsight, she probably should've asked Mingxia to handle whatever that was supposed to be even if she had an old man she apparently knew for years to catch up with. Keeping that older bitch from trying to wash her like she had no idea how Chinese water-culture was done had long since passed annoying and gone straight into aggravating.

No, actually. No matter how damn painful the broken leg was… she had to keep it, or she'd start bashing in heads just to get some peace and quiet. Which would probably not help, as that would then trigger that 'be afraid of me' reputation she didn't really like all that much still.

It'd be earned, but… as she couldn't speak to about half the women that were also taking advantage of the Storm-Cloud's inability of dealing with another touching her, the act of aggression would probably be misinterpreted into who knew what.

Abandoning the fussy older bitch when she turned for whatever she was going to try insisting on next, the thief darted around her and slid into then under the water of the pool-like heated bath.

She had done as much scrubbing as she was going to do under the showerheads already, she didn't want a scrub with something that has the texture very much like sandpaper. Her tattoos would not scrub off, no matter how much the biddy wanted her to try.

Coming back up near someone else's legs meant she startled two girls around her age. Not badly, thankfully, but they did stare until she gained some space from them.

Interestingly, Sonya could almost use the heated bath as a swimming pool. Standing in the middle had the water come up to her collarbone, but her pale skin was drawing more than enough attention to her person than she really liked on average so she merely found herself a submerged step near the far wall to sit on.

Besides which, the heat was settling into her broken leg a bit painfully, so maybe she should abstain from anything too involved right now.

Her pick of seating gave her a decent view of the entire hall-like room, from the bank of showering stalls separating the bath from the locker-type entranceway. There was a pathway that wrapping around three sides of the heated pool, paved with smooth cool tiles in light green edged with concrete painted a faded grey-blue. What windows this room had were high and small, and the steam rising off the water curled lazily through the intermittent sunbeams.

…the only thing she was missing was her tobacco pipe… but she had been playing with that thing way too much lately.

In the face of her attempt to abstain from nicotine, she wondered if there was any liquor in the building.

"Is there a reason why you are being so… willful?"
As she had a very good view over the room, Sonya wasn't surprised at the bitch-lady coming back to bother her more. "Is there a reason why you're trying to commit suicide via Cloud Flame user?"

"I thought you were 'settled' after destroying so much of our building."

"Is it leveled yet?" Sonya questioned scathingly, slitting the woman a glare that made her back up several steps. "The last time I had such a rapid mood swing, I put a burning hole into my city… that kept smoldering for three days. Leave me to manage myself, thank you."

Finally earning herself some space from the older woman, she'd probably regret it later but that wasn't now, the thief settled herself more firmly in her far spot and tried to find something else aside the pain of a broken leg to ponder.

She couldn't recall if there was something she wanted the space to ponder or not, unfortunately.

Maybe she should try not-thinking?

She hadn't tried meditation in a long while, not since her childhood.

Maybe it would help.

"…um, excuse me? Miss?"

Cracking open an eye again, the Russian studied the white-haired woman that had spoken.

Not Miss Silvery-White's hair color, white without the metallic silver edge to it.

The other woman settled herself respectfully far enough from the Storm-Cloud, blinking flat black eyes at her in a mostly faked politely curious expression.

…Sonya didn't really care if it was faked. It was, and right now it wasn't irritating her. "What?"

"Just before we left, rumor had it you gave Mingxia something to do with her Rain Flames."

Ensuring her hand was free from the water, she let Lightning Flames spark between her fingers. "Do you know anything for Lightnings?"

"…why is it Mingxia had to ask me for help?" Questioned the thief skeptically first, wondering if Galina would be annoyed if she shared the brunette's nail polish trick with anyone. "Shouldn't you be helping each other? Isn't that the point of why you all gathered under the Triads protection?"

The white-blonde Lightning blinked, taken off-guard enough the skepticism she really felt shown through for a split second.

"Look, the stones I have are crutches. They do things, either pop when you push too much Flame through them or provide a slight edge to control, and that you can earn honestly through enough hard work." She lectured flatly, tipping a head back to take some of the stress off her neck and so she could safely ignore her current irritant while not entirely looking away from her. "Fong's kind of an odd case, he's a pretty powerful Storm…"

…wait.

"So… you've nothing to offer?"

"Did I say that?" She shot back more absently than with any real heat, still caught on her belated wonder. "I don't see a reason to. You're more than old enough to have had some time with your Flames, by now I'd hope you know what you're capable of."
Surely one of the Soviet Storms had containment issues. Right?

Just saying Fong was definitely more powerful than her in Storm Flames was easy, she had only minor things to do with her blood red inner fire so she was just a finer touch. Besides which, she was both a Storm and a Cloud. They both pulled from the same pool of willpower, but she could do more with less that Fong merely used brute strength to force his own way through.

A portion of her Cloud Flames was always being used, with her stupidly tricky strength-bullshit she could never really seem to scale to any one general mode. Either too hard, not nearly enough, slightly more than she should have, or just a touch too light to actually hold something.

She'd get it eventually, it just took an insane amount of practice she had formerly abstained from with other fragile human beings.

More so than she was getting right now.

Shamal had never complained when she squished him a little, merely wiggled so she'd know. Thankfully the brat was a smart one, making himself comfortable with her when she epically failed in human contact.

Well… that lead back to maybe getting a lover, didn't it?

Shoving that mental train aside for later, she went back to trying to recall what had been tracked on all that paperwork Galina had placed under her nose over the last year and some.

Had any other Storms she was currently kind of responsible for suffered any self-control issues?

Without going like those twin Storms back in Russia that burned themselves alive?

…was the fact Mingxia popped with Rain Flames have any bearing on that?

Sonya sighed, slinking down farther in the hot water as she pondered that new wonder.

Were the deaths of all those kids because they couldn't spread the information of Flame use far enough to prevent them?

Were they preventable, or just gut-reactions to being on-Flame that got out of hand and would've happened no matter what prior knowledge was had?

Was spreading the Flame use information far enough to avoid those possible?

She was taking it on faith the Vindice had a reason why they dictated the limitations they had, but... there were those like Cherep and Mingxia allowed to exist.

…but mafia cultures and Omertà.

Was it just because Flame users established parts of the widely known syndicates that Dying Will Flame users were thought to all be criminals themselves?

Were there non-mafia Flame using circles?

If there was one, there probably was more. The mafia didn't reach everywhere at the same level, one only had to look at her former life's homeland to understand that. Maybe something like Viper's Espers, or... had Crina had more than a fable-related reason to giving her letters of introduction to what remained of her family?
Her fingers twitched for her pipe, which was entirely bewildering. She only had it for a couple days, how the hell had it turned into a habit already?

"…what do you have to offer, then?"

"What do you have?" Countered the thief distractedly.

She tugged her wet white hair firmly behind an ear, slicking back the rest of it with a wet hand when it flopped into her eyes. "I have a gold chain bracelet. I know you didn't manage to find one in storage."

She shot the other woman a skeptical look. "…you're Inverted. A decently strong Inverted Lightning I know of put ground malachite into her clear nail polish, which helps her conduct Lightning Flames from her fingertips. She uses it for both breaking listening devices and electrocuting those that get too close to her. If that'll work for you or not…"

The Lightning hummed thoughtfully, eyeing her strangely. "Interesting. I'll get you the bracelet when we return."

"Pleasure doing business with you." Drawled the thief blandly.

"Will you speak to the others, or will you be more 'figure it out yourself'?"

Sonya sighed, drawing herself upright and sitting back properly on the sunken shelf. "Look, there's two basic facts we can't change. There is only so much Flame to any one person, you can only get better at drawing it out or get more finesse in how you apply it outside of yourself. Second is that copying another's methods will never work nearly as well as what you find out and develop for yourself. The extent of my advice? Experiment."

Blinking at her blankly, the white-haired Chinese woman cocked her head to the side. "…how does that explain Fong? He's… powerful. Was he always so?"

"…Fong's a freak of nature." She decided stubbornly with a grimace.

The Strongest Storm Flame user, who wore red. Martial artist type. The next Storm Arcobaleno. She'd get proof enough in the coming days if he really was the strongest Storm in the Far East.

Sonya either had really good luck, or really shitty luck.

She couldn't decide. The man was really fucking annoying sometimes.

Like right now, and he wasn't even here.

"Are any of you Flame using women up for a job?"

Her entirely unwanted but not really minded all that much visitor paused and sank back into the spot she had been halfway abandoning for probably someone more socially inclined than her. "What do you mean?"

"There's… an old, dead Rain woman I'm looking for any mention of. Yang XiaoJing, the former Arcobaleno of Rain about three hundred years ago. By description, and other things, I'm pretty sure she originated around here. If it's China, Japan, or even Singapore… I don't know."

"…what in the world is an Arcobaleno?"

"That is the question, isn't it? I'm not sure, all I know is that they existed."
The Lightning flattened her lips together but appeared more thoughtful than skeptical. "What do we get if we find this for you?"

She leveled an incredulous look on the other woman. "I am a thief. Nearly anything you could name."

"Nearly?" She echoed doubtfully.

"I'm not stupid. At most, half a million in euros or something you want but isn't for sale."

A mainly polite, but a touch too sharp, smile was her answer as the other slid off her perch to wade off to another grouping of women.

It wouldn't be until after the Cultural Revolution, and maybe a year or so after even that, that Sonya would have the leeway to search out the answer for herself if the late Rain was Chinese. She wasn't a native nor knew how the government had, if they survived the current regime, recorded past generations and how to see a copy.

Passing on the foot-work again wasn't a good habit to get into, but frankly she had little expectations that anything she did in this country would speed up the search.

She'd do Crina's hint herself, at least. Maybe before she had to go to Italy for the Vongola Ball again… hopefully for the last damn time.

…ah. Between the pain in her leg and the bitterly understanding take she had on her old master of mysticisms' death, she had a way to manage her own emotions without destroying something for the catharsis. Finally.

The next week and however long would suck.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 22th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Carefully threading the wire through the tiny hole in the ax charm, Mingxia used a pair of pliers to complete the link and attach it to the delicate golden chain Sonya pressed on her once she had some time to recover from her trip to the bathhouse.

It looked a bit strange, tiny golden chain and slightly too large charms linked with cheap tin.

She glanced at the small heap of metal and chain piled in her lap, to the smaller brace of them she was working on, and to the screen that hid the Cloud woman's form as she changed into her borrowed finery for the opening banquet for the tournament. Unsure of what else could be done, she snipped another length of wire using the cutters and bent it to shape for the next charm.

"…I'm not sure how much I like this lace-thing."

"Is it bothering you?"

"No… I'm fairly sure in that respect it's better than I expected. The sleeves are long enough now, too… but… I'm going to get cold easily." The silk stockings, apparently being refused out-right but then again the older woman had warned them she was wearing her own damn boots, were left on the paper and wooden privacy screen as it was shoved aside none too gently.
Mingxia had to admit, that did look a bit breezy.

Once she had removed the sleeve panels, it had a gap in the bodice from the armpit all the way up to the collar. They had to replace that with something, and someone had dug out a length of silk lace from somewhere. It wasn’t quite the same shade of purple as the main body of the dress, it was darker actually, but it didn't look too mismatched.

It continued the flower motif from the skirt, small silk flower patterns were knotted into the sheer fabric. Paced out sparsely at the top and becoming denser near the cuff of the sleeves.

It hung past the thief’s fingertips from where it hung from her shoulder, so they hadn’t gotten the measurements quite right. Aside that minor nitpick…

…her tattoos were mutedly showing through the sheer cloth. She knew what image it depicted, so she could make out the form of the cat and the storm-clouds next to the moon, but anyone else would just see a smear of color.

"I don't think you're going to be able to wear your chain, Miss Sonya."

The Cloud woman inspected her left arm, lifting it so they could see what was visible just by that slight motion. "Probably not. Do me a favor, Mingxia? Look after them until I get back."

Sliding the sleeve back, she ran a few fingers through her shiny blonde hair experimentally. Pulling a lock as far as it would go and skeptically inspecting the tips for a moment.

"Do you want to put your hair up?"

"…it's too short. I need to grow it out longer. Might as well just grow it out from now on, I keep having to put it up." Not looking happy over that observation, she ignored her disordered hair to seat herself on the bench next to the younger Rain, hiking up her pale green silk pants until the very tops of something…

She was wearing an assembly of small belts around the top of both thighs, which held up her own sheer stockings that turned her skin a few darker shades. Plucking one of the tiny charm weapons, one of the short-handled hammers from the rank of them, she threaded it through the loops of her delicate belts next to the skin of her inner thigh.

"…what are those?"

"Garter belts. Keeps your stockings up even if you're doing less than ladylike things."

Mingxia glanced up at the white silk stockings, then back to what Sonya was wearing. "…it's possible they will take your shoes while you're being held hostage, Miss Sonya."

She glanced up sharply, shoving aside the loose gold strands that freely swung into her face with the motion. "What."

"Well… it's possible?"

The Cloud woman blinked at her blankly, then sighed and unhooked her darker stockings to roll off her legs. "Fuck."

"Sorry."

"It's a good catch, girl. I'd be rather vexed if someone tried to take my boots." Half-rising from her seat, she reached out an arm to snatch the white silk to put on. "Anything else?"

In response the Rain lifted the delicate chain of gold, so she could see it and how odd it looked next to the oversized charms. "This… isn't… it doesn't look right, Miss Sonya."

"Well, that I can fix." A lick of Cloud Flames sunk into the metal links, which extended it and enlarged the chain so the differences in size wasn't noticeable anymore.

…but, maybe the chain was now too long?

The younger girl went back to linking the tiny gold axes to the now less delicate chain, wondering how the Cloud would solve that issue.

They worked silently for a bit of time, the thief finishing with her stocking in short order and going back to threading a selection of her weapon charms into her garter belt while Mingxia finished off the ax charm bracelet. Once she had all the weapons she wanted on her, the older woman reached into the smaller pile of metal in the Rain's lap and pulled out her two necklaces.

One was a jeweled key in red, the other a small stylized hammer. Not normally seen on her, they mainly resided under her clothing.

Awkwardly untangling the silver chains, with more gravity than tugs, the Russian looped the key around the Rain's neck and the hammer around her own.

"It's a Storm-key. They can melt through locks with a dab of red Flames." Sonya informed her before she could ask. "I'm not wearing enough red to excuse it. And since I think the stones are common knowledge now, best not to tempt fate. Don't break it."

Mingxia inspected the panels of her skirt, which actually didn't have bold colors. It was all softer shades, mainly greens with some blue and yellow and the rarer darker purple. The closest to red was the pale pink rose that sat off-set from the middle slightly near the bottom.

Confusingly the Russian then took her longer hammer weapons, the ones that didn't look charming and tiny, and threaded them through tiny loops that had been added to the bottom of the skirt. Four, two on the front at opposite edge and repeated with the back panel.

They weren't hidden, and the silver made it noticeable, but they really did only look like slightly out of place accents to her dress than her hiding weaponry.

Sonya's last step was her hair, blindly parting it to the side and twisting the short-side hair around a finger to slide her bobby pins into and keep swept back from her face. She treated the other side similarly, then slid in the two straight pins with the red painted tips into the result.

"Right. I'm ready. Hopefully Bjørn will get here soon."

Mingxia blinked at her blankly, which wasn't noticed as the woman took her recent work and twisted it twice around her left wrist. "...who?"

"My Lackey. I'm aware I haven't been the best guest, and the lot of you put up with me being so, rather fantastically. Relatively speaking."

"Is there a way we could do better?" Asked the Rain rather bemusedly, not sure if she was bemused or slightly offended.

"...the main issues most Clouds have with other people is that we're feared. Why the hell would we "respect someone that cringes away from our very presence?" Sonya informed her in her characteristic bluntness. "Which, surprisingly, wasn't an issue I had in any appreciable amounts. Or at least I didn't understand it if it was said. Aside that, just being included is nice even if we don't take the option. Sometimes I'm just not up for socializing or it's safer for all if I don't."

"Being a Cloud sounds lonely." Mingxia offered after a moment of absorbing that, settling on bemused.

"It can be, but we never really notice until we're suddenly that outcast on the edges of a new group… excluded by circumstance and hearsay." With a sigh, the thief turned to look her straight in the eyes. "I appreciate that you bothered following me around. Even when I got snappish. I'm not used to large groups or communal living."

"You were very agreeable to amuse yourself rather often." Refuted the Rain easily.

"...are you calling me easily entertained?"

"Possibly." She giggled, gathering the metal she had been asked to care for up in her arms so they could leave the dressing room.

An amused snort followed her out of the door, the whisper slide of silk finally betraying the woman's movements.

It only lasted a moment as the thief noticed the same, and her steps started to become more silent as she moved to follow.

(ooo000000)

(Wednesday the 22th of October, 1969 continued. Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Bjørn had to help his escorts with the crate, shifting a bit uncomfortably in the plain jacket and pants set he had been recommended to purchase for this trip once they had it off-loaded from the rickety vehicle.

He didn't normally mind visiting his patron in the countries she worked in, it could be very interesting often, but China was… weird.

The Lightning-Storm had taken the opportunity to read up on the local newspapers while he was assembling what Sonya had requested from him over a phone, and it was… not entirely correlating to what he saw on the short drive from the Mafia Land servicing airport to where his Lady was staying here.

The papers were reporting on 'select cases of Red Guard brutality that were unwarranted', but it seems as if the individuals on the streets held no hesitance to beating some old man who apparently didn't meet their standards. In broad daylight, so he was somewhat certain they were part of the 'Red Guard' and not a criminal syndicate.

That was just… backwards.

Seeing the group of olive-green youths with the red stars and armbands get arrested for the assault had been equally as confusing. The scuffle had been rather drawn out, eventually the youths were arrested for their assault but the older man was left in the dirt instead of helped.

In short, the Icelander didn't understand what was going on and hoped his patron at least had half an idea. A short visit and some newspapers didn't mean he had any kind of grasp of what made up any country's governmental policies.

Thankfully, he did speak Mandarin Chinese. It was one of the 'business languages' as Viper had termed it, before drilling the information and language skill into his skull using Mist Flames even if it rendered him unable to speak his native one for the rest of the day. His familiarity with the language was a bit lacking, which nothing but practice would help.

Getting hustled into a gated open-air affair in short order meant another had to be tasked with muscling around his Lady's requested shipment, which he oddly didn't quite appreciate.

Sometimes a bit of physical work was de-stressing when he had multiple things going on.

"You took your sweet time." His Lady observed from behind him in her native Russian.

Bjørn sighed and turned to his patron tiredly. "I have everything you asked for... but I really must ask, why couldn't I have done it groups of four?"

"Traditionally bad luck. 'Four' in Cantonese sounds like their word for 'death'." Placing a brass tobacco pipe between her lips, which was interesting and not something he had seen her with before, she idly watched the men wrestling the literal crate into the courtyard with them. "...was the really big box necessary?"

"Dama, you demanded twelve pounds of black tea."

She gave him an odd look. "Twelve cans of black tea."

Well... that made more sense on second thought.

"For fuck's sake, Bjørn."

"Forgive me, Dama."

"Is there a problem?" Asked a red-eyed gentleman he was certain he had seen before occasionally on Mafia Land... just not dressed that way.

As a matter of fact, his Lady was rather neatly attired herself.

They both made him feel shabbily dressed, which made little sense as he was dressed for the streets and not for whatever it was they were about to do. Of course they were not similarly attired.

"...I'm blaming the connection issues. Get a better phone line. In other news, I apparently ordered twelve pounds of black tea for your kitchens." Sonya announced a bit exasperatedly, shaking a measure of lace off one hand in order to pinch the bridge of her nose.

"Oh?"

"My apology for being so ill-tempered for Huang and taking so much of his time. Black tea, hopefully a lesser amount of jasmine tea, and various others left up to my Lackey's digression."
Responded the thief blandly enough, so he could take it that she wasn't greatly annoyed by the mix up. "There's also some seeds, because I did destroy the garden a bit."

Both men standing with her looked to the courtyard which, after a moment to adjust to a bit of greenery in a large port city like this, did look a bit more than just ragged. It was nicely leveled, but... that didn't mask the large tracts where the grass was removed entirely.
"...Dama."

"There isn't a burning hole in the city, I see it as a success." Sonya insisted defensively, dropping her hand to cross her arms over her purple silk clad chest which waved around that tobacco pipe and the aromatic burning scent of smoke all around as well.

Which, fair enough.

"There's also eight... Bjørn?"

"Da, Dama. Only eight."

"Eight bottles of liquor for your Triad's head. Forgive the delay." Holding up a finger before anyone could break into the crate, she waggled it. "Also, something for sifu Yaozu for meeting with me. No touching."

Summoning one of her favored weapons to hand, she planted the pick end into the lid and pried it up without so much as a hesitation to account for the nails hammered into the wood. Bending over the lip of the container, she fished out a red wrapped present and left the rest.

"Now you can have it." Sonya tossed over her shoulder as she left them.

"I apologize for the twelve pounds of black tea." Bjørn informed the men in clumsy Mandarin Chinese when they all glanced at him. "I did think she ordered that."

"Why would anyone want twelve pounds of black tea?"

"She has been known to try drowning out her irritation in tea. Or, more to the point, of letting us try." Explained the Lackey a bit defensively himself. "And, taking into account that hole in Moscow that burned for three straight days, with what she was asked to do here I thought it wasn't that odd."

The man with the braid he was speaking to inclined his head in acceptance of the point, a little bemused smile on his face. "I see. I don't believe we've been properly introduced. Sông Fong."

"...Bjørn, just Bjørn. Dama's Lackey. I remember you, actually."

"Yes, the incident with that Italian fellow Sinclair." Confirmed Sông evenly. "I recall. Excuse me for asking, but what does 'Dama' mean?"

"Lady. It's... Icelandic." Was it also Finnish?

Mmm... he didn't quite know.

"Or Scandinavian, either or."

"You're a Viking?

"Don't worry, they settled down to become a lot of cut-throat merchants." Sonya observed dryly as she followed another well-dressed Chinese man who regarded the shipment he had brought with him somewhat blankly. "He's not about to go a-Viking."

Flushing slightly at the sort of backhanded brag he wasn't sure he earned, he awkwardly scratched the back of his neck in response to the amused looks.

"*Bjørn, catch up with Renato if you could about the issue he contacted you about for me. In a... week? Around there, when this thing is supposed to be done, I want to see Galina. If she can't make "It, I want a full report on the school to pass on to whomever it is back here who sent us students."

Probably several copies of that report if paper was going to be the medium, from what the Lightning had said some of those exchange students has issues with each other that could occasionally be district-based. Pulling out a notebook, he made a quick note of that order and a reminder to double-check her godchild had the school function thing he had wanted.

"Anything else, Dama?"

She considered it, then shot a look at the equally as finely dressed individuals in the courtyard with her, and back to him. "Send books. Lots of books. At least one per day."

"From your collection, or...?"

That caught the thief up, probably wondering if she had the space to store more.

She didn't, and he only knew because he had a shiny new bookcase in his living room starting to fill up with volumes he hadn't purchased himself.

"Actually, yes. It's been a while, re-reading a few might be interesting. Dig out whatever is on the bottom to send." In contrast to her words, her expression wasn't what one would call 'accepting'. Sourly accepting maybe.

"Very well. I'll."

"Um." An equally red-eyed younger girl to the braid-man peeked curiously around Sonya's greensilk clad hip, biting her lip but speaking up when most of the attention in the courtyard turned to her. "Can I have a word?"

The Russian studied her thoughtfully, then shrugged at the Icelander. "You're choice, Bjorn."

He had two hours before his flight out, it wouldn't hurt to try assisting his patron with building connections."...alright?"

"Her name is Mingxia, Rain user. I think she need some more non-boss advice." His Lady informed him more quietly on her way past him, staring hard at Fong Sōng when he held out an arm for her to take before gingerly accepting it.

Bjorn blinked at her back as the three rather nicely dressed individuals left in short order, then turned to the young Chinese girl that batted her eyes up at him hopefully.

Oh no, he recognized that look from Galina's little 'chat' with him. "...you wish to attach yourself to Dama's staff, don't you?"

"Does she have a lawyer?" Mingxia asked curiously.

The Lightning-Storm paused, thought about it and where everyone was and what individual aims they all had, and heaved a forlorn sigh. "Right. You might want to go over your argument with me, I know how she thinks."

"I'll get my books."

Pursing his lips, the criminally trained investor and professional Lackey wondered if the Soviet Storm-Cloud realized what the girl wanted.
Honestly?

He actually rather doubted it. It seemed he was the only one to ensure she knew what he wanted from her first.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 22th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Zhōng didn’t notice anything strange until his prized martial artist's elegantly attired guest leaned over to address the red-clad Storm Flame user in an attempt to be covert. "I... this is a bit off from what you said. This is rather bitter. Is it supposed to be?"

Fong snapped his head around and snatched the plate from her spot at the banquet table, ignoring that his ridiculously long braid nearly smacked the Wo Hop To Triad's Mountain Master in the face when it was flung off his shoulder in response for the violent movement. Forgiving the man silently because what she had claimed was alarming, he watched the other man inspect her plate in concern. The martial artist eventually isolated some kind of spice in her food that wasn't in theirs with the back end of his chopsticks, looking rather irritated as he plucked out the tiny tan fragment with some kind of brown fiber coating one side. "I am not sure what this is, but it is not in my plate."

"Well... it wasn't bad, I was just asking." Sonya took back her plate with a stern look to the Storm that had taken it from her, picking up another length of marinated jellyfish to try before returning it to the table. "You could've just said yes or no."

"Sonya, that might be poisoned."

"You cannot poison an aware Storm Flame user." She countered, looking irritated when the strip of flesh slid off her chopsticks. "Supposedly."

"It's not supposed to be bitter."

"If it is poison, they'll be really fucking surprised when I'm still here in a few hours. Or however long it was supposed to take to kill me." She refuted blandly next, finally getting a bite of her dinner with a bit of slurping. "...still odd, though."

Their fellow diners, who had all stopped eating when the Storm made his observation without bothering to keep it to the two of them or even to a limited portion of their table, either attempted to be as brave as she was about eating possibly poisoned foods or started inspecting their own plates with suspicion.

Pressing two fingers to his temple, Zhōng abandoned his first plate of the banquet and tried not to listen to his prized fighter and his guest/hostage bicker like children over whether or not eating something you thought was poisoned but were immune to was a smart move. The Cloud woman was still eating the food even so, discussing it openly as if it was a normal occurrence was not… normally done.

Normally there was panic, and disorder. Maybe a dramatic accusation. A graceful, or disgraceful, death or two to follow once someone made the mistake of being happy over the first death.

Where all Russians like her?

"Sonya, I must insist you stop eating that. Your father will have our heads for allowing."
“ALLOWING? Fong, step lightly there.” Aborting what would've been her pointing her chopsticks at his chest, the thief curled them into a palm to do the pointing with her index finger at the last second. "Arseniy isn’t the most understanding vor, but I am myself and also he does not interfere with my choices. He’d be more upset with you trying to refuse something I want. I want to try more of this, I’ve never had it."

With an utterly pleasant expression, the martial artist swapped out her plate for his own in a quick movement she couldn’t prevent with one of her battle axes fast enough.

"...fine. Whatever. Mine now." Digging her chopstick into the mound of marinated jellyfish strips and ignoring the weapon she had embedded into the wood of their table, she tried one of what was served to the Storm. "...oh, this is very different."

Fong poked the now his, probably, poisoned plate of food suspiciously with the contaminated chopsticks a few times before setting the whole plate and the sticks aside.

Zhōng tiredly sighed. "Would you like to guess how much of what else she is served is poisoned in hopes to insure she expires before she could interrupt any mischief planned for the hostages?"

"Not particularly." Replied the man next to him absently. "She’ll still probably eat it."

"I can hear you two."

"Yes, and?" Fong teased the woman cheerfully, seemingly pulling on some past interaction no one else at their table was privy to.

"Mmm... I probably will still eat it." Admitted the Cloud thoughtfully around her chopsticks, snapping her left-hand fingers to get the ax to evaporate into her pale lavender Flames that nearly perfectly matched her dress.

"I see no reason for you to object to that observation, then."

"I’ll object to whatever I want. Your tone, for instance."

"Must you always be so argumentative?"

"Yes. It's still a way to fight, just without the casualties." Flicking her off-hand at the ax-scar in the table in example, she experimented with picking up some of the cold suckling pig served with the jellyfish to try next. "It doesn’t work nearly as well as an actual fight but helps in taking off the edge of whatever is irritating me."

Fong blinked at her blankly, along with more than half their table shamelessly eavesdropping. "...ah."

"But I can count on one hand how many are brave enough to actually argue back. My family," her pinky finger was flicked up, then her ring finger, "my best friend."

"No one else?"

"Limitedly. Case by case." She eyed him suspiciously. "Usually dependent on the situation."

Sighing again, he shot the slightly aggravating woman a stern look.

She pursed her lips but did pull back slightly and go back to eating silently.

Well... he actually hadn’t expected that to work. Apparently what guilt she felt for being a 'poor' guest was more than enough for her to at least take the suggestion to stop talking. Not that it was bad to know how to better manage her temper her next visit, but this wasn't the place for such a discussion.

From all he had heard about her type, he had likely gotten off lightly for hosting her in a sort of semi-imprisoned kind of way in his headquarters. She had stayed under any government notice and within the bounds set out for her until invited past them.

The 'gift' he had only a moment to investigate before leaving for this banquet was unexpected enough.

When it was time for the second course, the servers were at first taken aback by the suspicious looks they gained from their table. Either they didn't know about the assassination attempt, or they were surprised the woman was still alive. Either way, it wasn't just the foreign-born Russian that gave them more attention than normal.

The braised scallops and dried oyster that replaced the roast pork and marinated jellyfish was collectively regarded questionably… except by the one person who had genuine cause to abstain from eating it.

Nearly stabbing the Storm's hand before he could take possession of her new plate with the chopsticks she had from the first round, the Russian elected to stab one of the scallops with a single stick and used that to transfer it to her mouth.

"…well?" Asked the older woman that had promised to teach her to knit from across the table.

"…how the fuck would I know if it a bit off?" Responded the woman a bit thickly, using the pad of a thumb to smooth away a bit of sauce. "It doesn't taste bitter… I think."

"Better you than us, Zhōng." The Wo On Lok's Mountain Master informed him cheerfully, endlessly amused by the drama as he always was. "We greatly appreciate your sacrifice."

Considering they would have the Cloud's implied protection for their knitting old granny, without the headache of dealing with her, he could see the point. Not appreciate it, but see it.

The Mountain Master of the Wo Shing Wo Group barely managed to conceal his snort further down the table, earning a wide-eyed look of incredulousness from his picked fighter.

"Likely, it will be worth it."

Fong gave him a side look of his own. "This is the second assassination attempt on her life so far."

"...shitty assed attempts." Sonya offered on her own end thoughtfully, trying the oysters next curiously but returned to the scallops in short order. "How much longer will this thing go on, anyways?"

"Well… with banquets? Usually ten or twelve courses, and nothing important will be discussed until the end." Responded the Storm thoughtfully.

"I utterly regret not bringing a book." Nibbling a bit on another scallop that was a bit larger than one could comfortably eat in one bite, she scraped her bottom lip with her teeth and gave the Storm seated next to her a slightly more serious look. "I think I'm going to have to request you bring me something to actually eat each day."

"Along with the requested books you asked of your Lackey?"
Eying her plate suspiciously for a moment, the martial artist offered her his nearly untouched one.

After a second of visibly thinking about it, she took it and started in on his oysters. The thief made a sound of discontent after a second of chewing. "...yeah, no. It was the oysters this round."

Wo On Lok's Mountain Master smoothed fingers down his neatly clipped goatee, considering the Russian thoughtfully even as he tipped his dried oysters to one side of his plate like the rest of their table. "Bets on the next course, anyone?"

Zhōng utterly regretted the necessity of bringing her here. It was amusing, in hindsight likely moreso and would probably do wonders for their reputation among the other Triad branches, but he wasn't sure if the property damage costs were worth it.

If there was so much issue ensuring she was calm while under a limited type of house arrest for half a week, a probable week and a half of being held hostage might see this entire place go up in so much purple Flames.

---

(Thursday the 23th of October, 1969. Budapest, Hungarian People's Republic.)

Having split from his very lovely traveling companions yesterday, Cherep ended up just wandering the cobblestone streets of Budapest a bit aimlessly.

Not to say he wasn't entirely enjoying his time without deadlines or traveling plans to conform to, but he was just ambling along at his own pace for once and enjoying the novelty of the act. This city was huge, very easy to just get lost in, and there was always something interesting to see every turn he took.

He had dipped into a few pubs just to see what was on tap and maybe taste a few, kind of skipped the museums and libraries because they reminded him of his little sister and he couldn't share that with her, wandered down a large section of Andrásy út to take in the sights and what was for sale, and skipped the baths because that reminded him of Tatiana.

Actually, maybe he could explore them and write them letters about it?

They had kind of drifted apart a little, which was understandable now that they weren't half living out of each other's pockets under Lisa and Arseniy. Working on their own separate paths had left little time to ensure they caught up with one another, last couple of years it was either Lisa's pregnancy or only Christmas he saw their elder Sun using sister. Maybe a phone call here or there for his elder sister, a few postcards exchanged with his little sister and random glancing meet-ups, and that was it.

It wasn't until Sonya got them all together so much this year, a brief visit that overlapped to welcome her brat into the family and the concert she somehow found out before either of her older siblings, that he realized he had spent maybe less than a month with Tatiana in the last couple years.

If it was his little sister demanding sibling time from them, then there was something seriously wrong. …ooh, a theme park!

Making a beeline for it, even if he cut across a park's green and got dirty looks for that, the stuntman jogged down the streets until he came up on a seasonal fairground type affair.

A bit different than a wandering circus, this was made to be stationary and never move. That meant it likely had a fun-house full of a mirror-maze. Those were awesome to think in.

Shelling out a bit of money and ignoring the strange looks he got for being excited to solo a 'kiddy' attraction, the Cloud Flame user happily got himself turned around all over the place.

About the third time he banged his nose off a pane of plate glass, it occurred to him that writing a traveling journal might appeal to Sonya more than just letters. Would be easier on him too, then he could write however long letters to Tatiana and not worry he wasn't giving both of them enough attention.

…the nurse might like pictures more, actually. Of the local sights, fashions, and maybe just cool-looking things. She spent most if not all her time on a tropical island, which had to get same-y after long enough.

Sure, in Mafia Land you could get just about anything from anywhere in the world as long as you didn't mind a trip… but as a nurse she probably didn't like being very far from the hospital she worked at in case of emergency.

He had also seen her utterly insane and thick medical textbooks. He'd get the pictures he took developed in each city, and write a short blurb on the back, before sending them to her. She wasn't quite as much a fan of written word as their younger sister, short and sweet might be the way with her.

What to do for Valera?

Baby brother was… a brat, really. He didn't have much of a personality beyond that, if you discounted being really viciously protective of what he saw as 'his'.

Cherep could be really evil and send the brat stuffed animals from a city in every country in the world. With a Cloud's irrelevance to another's opinion, the kid would likely hoard them even well after he became a vor or picked a different path.

Pausing to sneeze, and rubbing his much-abused nose, he took a random turn and unfortunately found himself at the end of the maze.

…aww. He'd been through this configuration before then.

"Now, now, gentlemen!" …the hell? "Let us not behave hastily. That is the way people come to harm… mainly me, right now."

There was… a very terrible Master Liam impersonator with a less than practiced dictation and with an accent. Still rolled the 'r's rather nicely, honestly. Curious now, the stuntman backed up to the corner of the fun-house to see if he could hear what was going on clearly.

"There hasn't be enough time! Ah… ahem. I mean, dear… investors, let us not be too eager to judge things over and done with. My contracted agreement was to the end of the week, yes? You are ahead of yourselves and will feel quite foolish when I deliver my end of the bargain."

Okay… this sounded as shady as fuck. Cherep wondered if he was interested enough to figure out what was actually going on or not.

One hand, it was a carnival. He liked them. They had enough of a bad reputation about kidnappings and shady business practices, if this would add to that then as a carnie himself he should probably alert someone.

On the other, he wasn't what one could call intimidating or scary. Likely, if he got involved, he'd get beaten up or shanked in the gut for a few painful days.

This was a job for… Viper.

The stuntman wondered when his Misty friend would swing around, and exactly how much he should gather up to shell out for the miser doing him the favor.

Mmm, he had a camera and a journal to source for his sisters. He wouldn't be leaving the city for a bit anyways.

Maybe he could also get started on that stuffed animal collection for Valera somewhere around here too.
(Thursday the 23th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"Lady Cloud?"

With a tired sigh, that stupid banquet thing ended really late and frankly the thief had little to no patience for the hour-long talks and speeches that followed afterwards but sat through anyways, Sonya slit open an eye and glared at the speaker.

The young boy flinched back a full foot of space, dithered with the formerly neatly pressed little robe he was dressed in by trying to tug it neat again, and tried to not spastically gesture to a low table being filled with food trays by subdued dressed servants.

He failed.

"Erm… Lady Cloud, they're serving breakfast."

"They tried to poison me. I'm not eating anything in hopes that will spare the rest of you."

She informed him softly, trying not to scare the ever-living shit out of the poor boy.

Given by how much he paled, and the scandalized gasps all around from those awake enough to comprehend the statement when her words were repeated in different dialects to allow the rest of the room in on the issue, she probably failed horribly too.

The other hostages that had been near her when that had come to light last night weren't so fluttery, the steel haired old knitting granny nonchalantly picking up her own chopstick to make a plate of food even as the servants hesitated at the sudden attention aimed their way. The two twittering bitches who regarded her as some kind of oddity one moment and some kind of monster the next, especially after last night, were all but plastered to the far wall away from her already but gallantly trying to put forth a good face in not fainting outright.

The remaining Wo hostages, of which the boy was one and her 'assigned' translator, didn't really seem to know what to make of her. One was an elderly gentleman who seemed bemused at the Flame thing but nonetheless proud of his young fighting possible son/student the last few times she'd seen him, now sitting in a corner meditating.

Of the two remaining, one was a three-year-old girl and the other a slightly older boy.

Old knitting granny had them, and she was in the middle of taste-testing the food while cutting it up into smaller bites to ensure it wouldn't kill the kids before transferring the food off her plate to theirs.

Aside the Wo Triad Groups' nine hostages, there were about forty other people all crammed into the same three open rooms. Of that forty, only about six other unknowns were in the same open-space room with them. The rest were further inside, but she didn't rightly care at all.

She'd done an inspection of the whole interconnected set of rooms before settling down, knew four ways to exit them without her Flames and five more with. Two bathrooms on both ends, one side for women and one for men from the looks of things. This one was the middle, the very room they all had to enter by.

There was only one door in and out, a heavy affair that had ridiculously easy to pick locks on the outside of it, and Sonya had kicked a few cushions to lean against it for her bed once she was satisfied with the layout. She was in fact still lying on them, not particularly bothered to move even when the 'head' servant guy had damn near gone as pasty white as her skin when he spotted her watching him in the dim morning light when he came in to start the delivery of the food.

So… actually, she knew there was food. She was pretty sure the people involved in her possible attempted poisoning hadn't expected her to survive to morning, so breakfast was probably safe enough. Even so, old knitting granny's caution was very smart of her.

Stretching a bit lazily, the Soviet Storm-Cloud flicked her eyes back to said 'head' servant guy standing rigidly at his post right next to the doorway. Who was still pasty grey under his naturally olive skin tone, striving to ignore her very presence and the suspicion aimed at him.

With a wicked smirk, she turned back to the young preteen trying really hard not to let his nerves get in the way of his assigned task. "Go eat, little man. It should be safe enough for now."

"…not even some rice? Please, Lady Cloud? You should eat something."

"I will eat later." Refuted Sonya, still a bit more gently than she was wont to but the kid looked spooked enough as it was. "Just... not what they bring."

"Is it wise to bait them?" Wondered old and creaky who had been meditating in a sunny corner of their very nice prison, taking advantage of the high but tiny windows letting in small slats of sunlight into the room.

As he was nearly half a room away from her, and there was some noise-level since the others were waking to the scent of breakfast, he was a bit too loud to be ignored.

"I bait them by surviving." Observed the thief equally as tonelessly, merely allowing some bored threads into her voice. "Would more or less intentional baiting affect that?"

They each were given a small, flat chest to hold things within. Like clothing, various vanity items, or amusements. Sonya had, very politely and she didn't know why one paled so much and fainted straight away, glared off the middle-aged old bitch a room away from taking possession of all the younger children's chests.

Her own contained her tobacco pipe and a leather pouch full of shredded tobacco, as well as a change of clothing she wouldn't mind spending time in and the books she had already read through. Since she wasn't going to obey the slight gnawing in her stomach she pulled that out of the cedar wood box.

Knitting old granny had collected their group's children chests, filling it with their things under their dictations. The wonder over why the girl brought an entire collection of dolls aside, the boy wasn't much better but he only had two wooden samurai figures, the only others that brought smoking supplies were mostly the older men.

Point in fact, she was mostly sure the meditating old man was another smoker.

However, second hand smoke around kids was still… eh.

Rising from her spot of very comfortable indeed cushions and flashing the sickly-looking servant man a few teeth too many with a bit of Cloud Flames in her eyes, she wandered over to him and took a seat in the next strip of sunlight. A touch of Storm- Flames, both to the pipe's bowl and to the exhale of smoke, solved that issue for her.
"The point remains that," offering her pipe earned her an actual look from her new seat-mate as he gingerly took it, "I am here more for your protection than anything. Reminding them that trying to kill me has failed already, twice actually, may prevent another attempt spilling over to you and the others. I would be then somewhat obligated to murder my way out of here in attempts to find that 'them' I speak vaguely about."

After staring at the burning pipe's bowl for a moment, he pulled experimentally on it. He looked pretty damn surprised when she lit his exhale on Flames as well. After a moment of blinking stupidly, he handed the pipe back. "...I see. Why... do you refer to whoever is trying to assassinate you as 'them'?"

"It may not be the syndicate that is holding us. Excuse me, Triad. It could be the ones hosting, or someone else that have designs on the tournament of their own." Stretching out her really-broken-but-not leg again, and fuck did it just occasionally twinge painfully sometimes, the Russian examined the room again thoughtfully in the light of day. "As I don't know for sure, I cannot justify outright massacre right now. Further attempts would likely shine more light on the culprits. They can't have that many assassins that can keep their traps shut about them."

Well... she could actually justify it. As a matter of fact, if Fong went ahead and did something exceedingly foolish like tell Arseniy about the assassination attempts, her foster father might have a few things to weigh in on himself.

Would probably be on his way to have his say, and the vor wasn't really a greatly talkative man.

Given the shit he dug into to save Tatiana from some teenaged stupidity from haunting her steps, which he really didn't have to actually do as everyone in Russia had criminal records of various degrees, Sonya felt safe in assuming he would be equally displeased at this current trouble of hers.

He had hunted down her biological parents without being asked, stood up for Cherep's sake against a criminal doctor that hadn't known why the Cloud had the injuries he had but was about ready to murder them all for it...

Actually, her foster father might've seemed like he did little for them but be there during their years under his roof... but he had done a lot.

...what was the Sŏng sibling's fascination with her father?

First Mingxia asked if he knew where she was, then Fong basically had a very restrained stroke over 'allowing' her to eat something they were sort of sure was poisoned he thought Arseniy wouldn't like her eating.

Now Sonya couldn't stop thinking about the vor. She kind of missed the grumpy, gruff man that raised her to be the thief she was. Rather badly right now.

Fuck, she hoped the man was on his way. Even if that would probably include a fair bit of risky political murder or several hundred.

Arseniy was still a Cloud, he just never needed the Flames that went with the mentality.

"Is there a problem, young lady?"

Reminded she had a smoking partner and she had been holding onto the pipe for a while now, the Russian took her draw and handed it off. "...homesickness. I, and most Clouds, abhor being away from their territories for any length of time. It's already been most of a week."
She still didn't believe, or didn't want to believe, her 'territory' was people. Just having 'pack' as part of being a Cloud was somehow less personally abhorrent, so Sonya bitterly missed her pack mates.

Even if that sounded utterly stupid and was never going to be said aloud ever.

Mostly because she was, yet again, shut in and barred from seeing them if she wished.

It probably wouldn't be nearly so acute if she had the option to go visit them, which in hindsight she did a lot when she was at loose ends. Arseniy, Lisa, and Valera when she was in Moscow and Tats when she was in Mafia Land… with occasional asides with Cherep here or there.

Frankly, the Russian was just sick and tired of not having regular contact with her siblings and Shamal. Yes, she and her older brother bounced around the world a bit too often to have reliable ways of communication at hand. Frankly, a week to months of no contact would probably never bother them. Had never bothered them yet.

Just as long as it was ended on their own terms when they wanted it to, they probably would never really bother to stop wandering off and wandering back every now and again.

Kind of an odd realization to come to light while playing slightly lethal damsel in distress for a Triad branch, but… well… whatever.

The minute she got out of here, Björn would be pulled from whatever he was on under Viper to find her a damn home already. Renato too, the asshole had promised to help.

Fuck Moscow up the ass and sideways for good measure. Fuck the Zolotovs too, frankly she utterly dreaded going back and didn't really intend to remain either. She… just… no longer cared.

Something non-physical snapped sort of behind her eyes, which was weird enough to feel and not entirely know the origin of, and…

Huh. Sonya didn't care anymore.

That was… oddly relieving.

Galina was more than good enough as a steward for the Flame groups for the short term, depending on what she wanted to do either the thief would pay her to remain a teacher or abandon ship entirely with her once Dmitriy was sprung from prison. Scruffy was already hers, the Mirror Lady was free to do what she wished, Usov would likely be along shortly.

Was she missing anything?

The Cloud brats should be warned she would be M.I.A. from then on, but she'd do that around Christmas time. Then…

Hmm…

Old man Zolotov and his fuck-wit son?

If she told Lisa her patience was gone, and it truly was from the dead non-reaction she got contemplating her former role in the clan, her foster mother would probably manage things. The older woman had been digging here and there for the breaking point and if she had passed it, and she was pretty sure the whole 'no reaction' thing would be scores better than attempted homicide-suicide by Cloud Flame user.
It wouldn’t be 'official' until she and Tats got that shared apartment thing, because why give up the condo before they had to?

A nudge against a lace-clad arm, and Sonya winced as she realized she forgot the old man again. Taking back the pipe which the poking was done by, she sighed a bit heavily before puffing on it to ensure it was still lit.

"We should probably arrange for some kind of entertainment." Knitting old granny announced out of the blue, settling the children she had taken under her wings behind the Soviet Storm-Cloud prudently and handing each one of their dolls. She made her creaky way over to the two of them, using the thief’s politely if stiffly upraised hand to help lower herself to the floor with them. "Idle minds left to wander will get to us before long, and they were not all that forthcoming about if we are allowed to watch the tournament."

"Oh… I can assure you, they will not stop those of us that want to." She promised her a bit darkly, taking her draw off the pipe and first offering it to her and getting a negative shake of the head before passing to her other side. "But that said, we should also sort of organize this group a bit. I am only one person, I cannot be everywhere. And anything too dangerous goes down, they will likely come after me first."

They had taken her ax charm bracelet, probably because she had used it at the banquet last night. Unfortunately for them, their screening for other weapons passed over her other charm weapons because of their unusual locations. She still had two garter belts full of miniatures, some of which were digging to her skin a bit uncomfortably but that she would bear, her Bec de Corbins and the Thor's hammer pendant.

"Physical exercise as well. Some of the younger ones will need to do something or they will never calm down for the night." Observed the old man on her other side idly, now not jumping when she applied her Storm Flames to the smoke he exhaled. He in fact looked rather thoughtful. "I will admit, I do not know much about you Flame users."

"That may not be wise to do myself, your syndicates should have say over what they wanted to risk with you all." Shrugging a shoulder, the thief accepted the pipe back. "Although, I will admit maybe a general overview would be needed for those that are only now aware Dying Will Flames exist."

…that reminded her. Looking over a shoulder, Sonya eyed the two Wo Triad Group women crammed into a corner practically all over each other.

Odd, but okay. She had thought they were girlfriends of certain fighters, but it could totally be they were lesbian sisters of those young men. Or something.

How many other 'adults' were in here?

There were a handful of old people, a shit-ton of kids, and a sprinkle of fully-grown hostages.

"I refuse to be in charge of anything but security and Flame-related lessons." She announced to her two fellows flatly, pausing to draw on the pipe before handing it back. "I know ballet and some tumbling routines from traveling with a wandering circus, and will not mind teaching… I think. But I don’t do well with large groups. Kids in the morning and right before bed, whoever wants to learn near or around lunch, and Flame lessons occasionally in-between."

Knitting old granny hummed softly, reaching to massage her left shoulder joint with a brief grimace of pain. "My son told me some of what you can do… if you can 'Propagate' the knitting supplies, I can teach more than just you."
"History lessons. One should know where they come from to understand where they are going."
Decided the old man firmly, passing back the pipe. "If we had writing materials, I would also say reading and writing… but I did not bring such things."

Sonya blinked at him, dropping her eyes to examine the burning tobacco pipe in her hands, then eyed the bare pinewood walls with interest. More specifically, the moving panels that opened up one room into another.

"Actually… if you have a book of matches, I believe getting that might be easier than you think."

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 23th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Fong was not… worried, per say.

Concerned was a good word.

One really only had to take one glance at the scars the courtyard of the Wo Hop To Triad's Headquarters to see the imprint of Sonya's brief stay with them. Added to that two assassination attempts they knew of on Chinese soil…

Well. Nervous might actually cover it.

He was in Mafia Land enough to see international news, from all corners of the world. There were in fact two very visible signs that however reasonably well-mannered the Russian thief tried to be, sometimes her temper escaped her grasp. Once in Mafia Land, one in her native city.

Marvelous self-control for her type, really. He wasn't doubting her, or her ability to manage herself, but… well-

Something hard and knobby, Master Yaozu's newly acquired walking stick in fact, whacked him upside the head in an admonishing manner he had not missed. Hard enough to sting, but not hard enough to do more than merely force the head of someone unprepared for it forward a bit.

"Stop daydreaming, Fong!"

"…yes, sifu."

Mingxia giggled next to him, clearing her throat and dropping her ruby gaze on the gemstone the Soviet Storm-Cloud had pressed on her to help develop her Flames when the both of them glanced at her.

Fong was pretty sure his old martial arts master was getting his revenge right now. For… yes, lying to him.

They had a very good reason, and the old man had accepted that they didn't have another choice, but that didn't eliminate a lot of the more troubled history between them.

He hadn't quite expected things to work out this way.

At most, he had expected Yaozu to disappear into the thief's motherland without so much as a word or simply refuse to hear him out. He had been rather strict on the point that as long as Fong was working for the Triads he would have nothing more to do with him. Even getting Sonya's proposal heard had been a gamble, which probably only succeeded because of the Cultural Revolution's toll on him.

The revelation of Dying Will Flames, although that did throw the old man a bit, put a bit more weariness in his eyes but gave him more understanding of why. Why they didn't have another choice, not if the Flame problem they shared was to be solved.

Not expecting and not appreciative were two very different things… just… who gave Yaozu the damn stick?

Fong caught the next strike before it could connect even with his wandering thoughts, triggered as it was by his little sister succeeding in finally putting a crack into the tiny jewel.

Snorting, with satisfaction and a bit of tiredness, the old man folded himself down to sit on the Rain's other side as she gleefully took in the tiny hairline fracture. "Nerves, boy? Rather odd… for you."

"I am not nervous over the tournament, sifu." Refuted the Storm easily, unable to prevent himself from taking in the damage to the yard yet again. "…if the arena survives Sonya's temper about being shut in, on the other hand…"

As dismissive as the thief was over the attempts on her life, she also was willing to risk more than anyone that knew someone wanted them dead and was within striking distance should be. He wasn't sure if that was from experience with those after her, or if it was just sheer acceptance of the fact people wanted her dead.

The fact he didn't know sat ill with him. Fong had set out to befriend the woman, and yet faced with the opportunity to actually talk to her more he had instead spent most of it trying to break her in half. His little sister had more dialogue with her than he did now.

He did not like to fail, especially in goals he set for himself. While fighting a Cloud was a genuine method by which to earn their acceptance, it was also probably the easier one. One didn't have to appeal to the Cloud's rational mindset and ensure their presence outweighed the possible annoyance it caused that way.

Additionally, Fong was not a fan of taking the easy ways out of a problem. The results were usually rather fragile in endurance and did not help build strong relationships.

"She seemed very even tempered these last few days, big brother." Offered his little sister, losing some of her smile in respects to the subject matter. "Maybe watching the tournament will put her in a good mood?"

"...I broke her leg, her left one. I am sure Huong didn't heal it, and she shifted her weight onto it when she got bored enough to fidget last night."

"I believe she's been using it to... temper herself."

"If it is broken, then how can she stand on it at all?" Yazou demanded skeptically.

Fong could only spread his hands and shrug. "I do not know, sifu. All I do know is that right after I did break it... she flexed it twice, only the first time gingerly, before just standing up again and proceeding as if nothing was wrong."

The older man stared hard at him for a long moment. "That is a mildly terrifying ability. If it took her to the ground at first, then it cannot be just sheer endurance."

"Isn't that a good thing?" The Rain asked of them curiously, pulling a slight face as she thought over her words again and found something wrong with it. "I mean, not that she has a broken leg, but that she isn't hampered by it?"

"Something that isn't stopped by pain or physical inability..."

"There is always a limit to one's Flames, sifu. Eventually, in any fight that takes long enough, even Sonya's would run out." The Storm scowled at this turn of the conversation. "Not that I am ill-wishing, but it should be said."

Yaozu glanced down at the paving stones making up the walk from the courtyard gates to the veranda they were seated upon, and the one stone split in half that had yet to be replaced.

"And that is why no one wishes to upset a Cloud Flame user, sifu." Mingxia informed him, and Fong belatedly realized Sonya might've been the cause of that specifically and not just it being damage from their spars. "Delicate as she appears, she could likely flatten a mountain before someone can take her out."

...now they were back to the topic of Sonya possibly destroying the tournament area before he could fight in it.

No, Fong would like to speak to her before she possibly got infuriated with being held prisoner on an island south of Hong Kong proper and did a large amount of unanticipated remodeling. The arena would be a loss, but one they could solve in short order as long as there was a decent Mist user or seven about.

"Fong." Huang the Sun shuffled out of his kitchen, holding a small lacquered box in one hand. "I have the meal you requested, and no. You may not eat it."

Well... that was an odd qualifier-

Wait.

"Oh no." Mingxia sighed softly. "Master Huang, you didn't."

"I included a list of all the dishes for the lady Cloud who got me tea." The Sun lectured sternly, waving around a ladle with suspicious red stains on it. "If the Mapo Tofu does not get to her, she will know."

Yaozu ran fingers down his neatly shaven jawline suspiciously. "What's this now?"

Turning to him with a sly little smile, his little sister could occasionally be quite mean, the Rain lifted a shoulder in a shrug very reminiscent of the Storm-Cloud the boxed food was intended for. "While my big brother still likes dumplings... while here he came to love a spicy kind of tofu dish. Mapo Tofu in fact, he has an unhealthy addiction to it."

"I do not." To prove it, the Storm sat the box down and didn't respond to Huang's dramatic eye roll.
"Mingxia, can you watch it while I change? It is nearly time for the Mountain Master and I to leave, especially as there are only limited times to see the hostages."

"Of course, big brother. I will watch the box containing the evil tempting dish as you heroically put space between you and it."

...why did he miss her being mischievous, again?

Heaving a sigh, and ignoring the Sun's rather loud guffaw at the teasing, he rose from his spot to dress in something easier to fight in.

No, it wasn't quite the same as it was. Might not ever get that way again.

Fong did not mind, they had all grown in some way and that would always show. Yaozu would look at him again without glancing away in stern disapproval, Mingxia would tease him in the open instead of saving it for the rare times they had alone.

It was fine as it was.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 23th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

…holy fuck was that spicy.

Sonya blinked a few times rapidly, eyeing the dish she had taken a bite out of warily. It had been specifically packed so it would be still warm when it reached her, so she had curiously started with it just to see what the hell it was.

"Is there anything you can observe from your… situation?"

"I think the head waiter guy knew or at least is involved in trying to poison me, either that or he's terrified of my very existence for some reason." Which… really, all options were equally as likely as the others.

Turning around to suddenly see a person in a full room of sleeping people was watching you intently had to scare the shit out of a lot of people. Maybe.

Her mouth was also burning, ow.

The thief scrubbed the roof of her mouth with her tongue, waiting out the sensation of taking a bite of something a bit spicier than she normally liked. Attempting to get more of the diced tofu than red sauce onto the spoon this time, she tried another bite even if Fong looked a bit grumpy.

Zhōng sighed yet again, probably over the fact the martial artist had been not so subtly trying to indicate he wouldn't mind taking the really spicy dish off her hands and she was ignoring him.

Sonya waved the spoon in his direction as she got over the harsh bite of her latest mouthful. "That sigh? The sensation of things getting a bit weirder than you can stand? Is how you know there's Mists about. The stronger they are or the more there are, the stronger that feeling. Last night there were about twelve to fifteen all in the same room, for reference. Do you normally sigh so much? You sound like a half-assed boiled teapot."

The Mountain Master of the Wo Hop To Triad stared at her blankly for a long moment, then with an annoyed air and a rather ferocious scowl he got up from the table they were seated around to address the ceiling. "We were assured all hostage meetings would be private."

"They're not going to admit they heard you or did so in the first place." She informed his back blandly, moving the shallow bowl of whatever it was away from the Storm's fingers and taking a maybe too big bite of the food she instantly regretted.

The hell was up with Fong, seriously?
"They… wow hot, they're also not going to leave in hopes of proving me wrong for just long enough. While you can confirm with your own Mists back at your place what I say is true… but by then it would be too late for you to press the complaint home. You would 'technically' accept the imposition as a necessity security option if you don't object now, if I recall the arrangements gone over last night right. Besides which, Mists have odd ideas about what 'private' means."

"Do you deal with them that often?" Inquired the martial artist curiously, all but lighting up in happiness when she shoved the almost lukewarm dish finally deemed a bit too spicy for her across the table at him.

He caught the spoon she chucked at his head like a complete asshole, leaving her hands free to dig into the blue lacquered box for something else.

"There's a pair of Mists back home I interact with pretty often. While the old wives' tale about how Clouds and Mists interact have some basis in fact, I can actually deal with the Flame type decently enough if enough precautions are taken."

What else was in Huang's care package?

…grated lotus root and carrots in something oily was in the next container she opened. She was going to send the Sun user several hundred pounds of tea at this rate.

The minor headache she had from not eating all day had long since faded, but the… hmm, vinegar and root dish was doing wonders for her scorched taste buds.

"How are we to be sure you are in fact in no distress from the accommodations?" Demanded Zhōng shortly of them both, looking highly vexed in her presence for once. "Or if any of the other hostages are even alive?"

Sonya and Fong exchanged a look over the table and the food. She twisted her chopsticks, the ones with the core of steel purchased for her in hopes she wouldn't shatter all the eating utensils with stupid-insane finger strength, in the air a few times while they both swallowed to buy time.

"A, there's two Storm Flame users in the room."

"We are both on guard, Mountain Master. It would take a considerable amount of Mist Flames to change our minds on that alone before a suggestion can be implanted."

"B, I'm fairly sure the level of Mist Flame needed to fool Fong's understanding of what is going on… only exists in one person I know of or at least ten or so other Mists pooling resources. And that one person is a friend of a family member. Whereas with my own defenses might be less robust to a pooled attempt… there is also that folktale about what happens when a Mist runs afoul of any Cloud that likely stayed the hand of whomever might've tried. So, they're not likely to try at all because that's stupidly suicidal and likely to not work. Weird and rather insane Mists might be, but they do have a great understanding of self-preservation and what they can realistically do."

The older man did not look entirely convinced, but he did return to the seat he abandoned once learning they were being observed.

"…you believe there is a Mist stronger than me?" Fong asked after a moment of chewing, before his next heaping spoonful of the really spicy stuff.

Sonya frowned as she munched on a piece of lotus root, seriously wondering. "Honestly? I… have no idea. The two of you might be the strongest in your respective Flame types for all I know. Whereas sometimes power is just not easily overcome, the other is a Mist."
Rubbing the old knife-wound that cut into his left cheek in a manner that suggested nothing good for whatever her was thinking of, the oldest individual in the room leaned forward to gain her attention. "What is a 'pooled' attempt? I have never heard of such a thing."

"Kind of a Mist-only technique. They can Construct something with the understanding of another's Flame work, which is insanely hard to try replicating without their ability to change the 'intent' behind their Flames." Nibbling a carrot slice shaped as a flower, she ran her mind back over all the attempts she had probably annoyed her brother about how they might share Cloud Flames because him running out was one of her worst nightmares. "It's... also insanely hard to try replicating in other Flame types. Not even in Rains, and you'd think with their Tranquility it would... erm... 'stack', better than any other type's."

Giving her a strange look, Zhōng took a deep breath instead of sigh.

Blowing it out again as he attempted to corral his probably wonky thoughts into a less Mist-impacted way. "You are unusually chatty today."

Sonya bit through the chopsticks, actually how she kept losing the damn things now, and irritably fished out the shattered wood splinters and the steel out of her mouth.

Clearing her own throat after swallowing her bite, she turned slightly to face him directly. "There. Are. Twenty. Kids. Being held hostage here. I'm fine with kids I'm not related to... so long as I don't have to interact with them."

Fong glanced up with a measure of concern from scraping up the last of that really fucking spicy red stuff.

She shrugged, peeling the paper off the thankfully full steel chopsticks that had been tucked in the very bottom of the Sun-made care package for her. "I'll deal. They're kids. They deserve to be protected. Aside twenty fucking children of varying ages, there's about six more near my age and ten adults a bit older than us. The rest are old people. I rather loathe one of the middle-aged women, can't deal with the other six near my age, and have about two old people I can more or less deal with easily enough. However, twenty kids takes a lot of work, especially as several are already missing their parents or want to go home but don't understand why they can't."

Those few who weren't alright with not seeing their guardians or caretakers kept triggering those that were a bit more adventurous, meaning crying jags could spread from one side of their prison to the other no matter how careful they were.

She could understand that old biddy, the bitch trying to set herself as the ultimate child-authority, was actually a professional caretaker someone managed to send in as a hostage. Sonya didn't mind if she wanted to structure kiddy-activities or whatever. More power to her.

She had a very big problem letting her hit the kids when they didn't obey her right away. Some of those kids maybe, the older ones being rebellious just because they were unhappy or specifically being dicks to the old people. The Russian was not so self-righteous as to assume violence was never an answer, the various parents of the kids might actually see that as a valid tactic and they weren't her kids.

…slapping a three-year-old because the boy was just miserably missing his mom and you didn't want to hear it, or wouldn't shut up when told to, was another thing entirely.

It put her in the awkward position of not allowing someone to do their job because she had actual honest problems with parts of that job, but not the rest of it. The bitch was decently alright when there wasn't a problem, keeping childish attention spans on story-time or whatever for solid blocks of time, but the option of behavioral correction she defaulted too…

Culturally speaking, she probably shouldn't have gotten involved no matter how much that put her on edge. She honestly did not know what was allowed or what was viewed as child abuse around here, and insisting her sensibilities were the right ones was a moral grey area she didn't want to assume.

Corralling those kids for naptime with her instead of allowing them to be hit and continuing with whatever the distraction was at the moment had been her recourse. They got to either be miserable then recover, fall asleep, or got to commiserate with each other over being miserable at lower volumes.

Probably in the wrong here or not, there was also the problem of however longer this was to go on and not murdering her fellow hostages.

Sonya was realistic enough to understand if that bitch did more than just slap a kid she'd probably hurl twenty pounds of steel through her corpse without so much as a rational thought about the consequences. Which would be a hell of a lot more scarring to the kids than just getting hit once or twice.

She had avoided no-win situations like the plague before this. They were not fun, nor could they be easily solved. It came down to a compromise no one liked very much but would hopefully do the least amount of damage.

…wait. "Quick question."

As what they were really doing was wasting time while she ate food they all knew wasn't poisoned, both Chinese men politely gave her their attention.

"...are we supposed to have the kids with us for this tournament thing? No one has said if we can watch or not, or if we're supposed to ensure they either sleep through it or watch. Or if we split up for that who's taking care of the kids then."

"Fong, go inquire for her."

…oh, awkward. The Storm did as asked without question, leaving her as… was she the Triad head's bodyguard right now or what?

Folding over one of the white lattice looking lotus root slices to manage easier, the thief sighed when it sprang flat again and entangled itself on her chopsticks.

"Is there anything else wrong?"

"Mostly just cultural things I'm not sure of, and a whole lot of very opinionated people in one room makes for several arguments I was subjected to." Aside that, it wasn't annoying per say.

Labor intensive and a hard draw on her patience, and only sometimes annoying.

"Why not ask?"

Biting another lotus root slice in half, Sonya eyed the man thoughtfully. "Is it okay to hit children here?"

Zhōng stared at her flatly for a long moment in return.
Seriously, was she ever told his last name or had she completely forgot it?

She could not remember. He stared a lot, at her and into space and sometimes just at Fong too, though.

"Because I have issues with that. It wasn't the way my siblings and I were raised, and mostly Russian vory don't harm kids too young to really understand what's going on. At most, I got slapped upside the head for being a smart-ass."

"A bit more clarification. Now."

Sonya sighed, finished off the last of that plate and exchanged it for something less crisp and rather rice-filled as she detailed her current main issue being held hostage. Fong returned about halfway through, electing to remain next to the door while she talked.

Well… more rambled. She couldn't recall the last time she had talked this much.

"Enough." At her raised eyebrow, the older man inclined his head to acknowledge her point she wasn't one of his people. "Thank you. I will speak to some of the others, and Fong will speak with some of the other fighters, tonight. We will return with your answer tomorrow."

"To your other question," interjected the Storm, who looked very much less amused since the topic had been what was or what wasn't child abuse in this country, "apparently you will be witnessing the tournament's bouts. All of you."

"…they fucking need to tell us something, otherwise we would've had all the kids asleep around nightfall." Finishing off the rice dish, she glanced through what was left. "I'll inform the others went I go back."

Huang the Sun had packed a lot of food for her, but she wasn't sure about taking it back to the 'prison'. She'd leave it unattended for the tournament at the very least, and even she had to sleep sometime.

…were those chicken feet?

Opting to instead pick up the, yet again, vegetable dish right next to it instead, she gingerly tried whatever it was hoping it wasn't sliced green bell peppers. It wasn't, but she also had no idea what the green shreds were. "Fong, can you do me a minor favor?"

"…oh?"

"Call my father, would you?" Having other things to focus on didn't really negate the other things she had to deal with, and one of which was a rather acute sense of homesickness. "Don't tell him about the assassination attempts, I'll do that, so he won't kill you. But it's either you all visit me every day, or he comes here and does it... and he can do his thing for whoever's trying to kill me."

Sonya kind of wanted that over with before the twenty kids she was being kept with got caught in the crossfire.

She kind of couldn't get over that, twenty to forty parents thought sending in their children for a criminal hostage was a good idea. While yes, a bunch of kids could be sent off and their parents claiming they went to visit relatives was a lot easier than someone with an actual job dropping everything for a week or so without earning suspicion… just… kids.

"Do you not hold faith that we can find whomever it is ourselves?" Zhōng questioned a bit sharply.
"I believe you have a minefield to navigate even accusing someone of the act." Corrected the thief blandly, finally feeling full and slowing down the rather mechanical eating motions. "I think I am too hampered, your people probably known. And frankly, it's really an excuse because I want to see him again and he might find it fun."

The Wo Hop To Triad's Mountain Master skeptically took in her slight physical form, then shot Fong a questioning look. The only other one in the room that had met her father shook his head, holding a hand up about two inches over even his own rather tall form.

"Arseniy's also built like a brick shit house." Sonya added in helpfully, packing up the leftovers back into the little box they had come in but keeping the steel chopsticks with the book her Lackey had sent to her. "Cloud mentality, but never needed the Flames."

Odds were, she'd bite through them again tomorrow or something. Better than having purely wooden ones shatter between her fingers and thumb again, the splinters had been annoying.

"…that might be… interesting to see." Decided the older man after a silent moment contemplating that.

Poor, poor sucker. She was almost sorry she wouldn't be able to see that meeting.

(ooo000oooo)

(Thursday the 23th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

As a hostage, she and the others the thief had been imprisoned with had their own little boxed in room directly under the balcony the various Triad Heads were located upon. They would have a very nice view… when the bouts actually started up.

There were a lot of cushions, and really at this rate she'd start stealing them they were that comfortable, they had bedded the kids down upon. Another large open-area type affair with wooden railings separating them from the arena. Two doors, the one they were escorted through and likely another for whoever would be delivering dinner.

As this was the actual opening night of their rigmarole, yesterday had been a sort of a thing for the behind the scenes people, there were a large number of criminals and rowdy types filling the area's higher tiered seating. Noisily, and with a couple fist-fights here or there.

Again seated with her back to the wall containing the only door into their little prison, Sonya was more interested in her book than she was the spectacle of the tournament getting sorted out to start.

As she read it once before, it wasn't really all that easy to get absorbed again. A rather absurd take on the Russian Revolution featuring a dog turning into a parody of a man, she wasn't actually sure where she picked it up from or if it had originally been one of her foster mother's books before she got into them.

Some rather nasty feedback made practically everyone wince, but also cut out a lot of the noise in the high-vaulted several story large room. Sonya attempted to bury her nose into the book again, while three different announcers took turns announcing a lot of the same shit that was told to the participants last night.

It didn't mesh very well with the upset and rather sleepy children she was contained with. She wondered if the Triad Heads over them appreciated the noise as well.
One of the bolder kids, that three-year-old she rather strongly objected to getting slapped for crying for his mom, abandoned the piled cushions the other children were gathered upon to climb into her lap.

Sonya lifted the book to stare at the toddler, who ignored her in favor of making himself comfortable. …well, alright then.

Ignoring the pain throbbing in her broken leg as the kid curled up for his interrupted nap, the Storm-Cloud went back to trying to read.

Then the lights dimmed when the announcements were over, which she did not appreciate. The first fighters she didn't know, nor did she care about.

It did make her wonder if, when the Flame-eye lights were 'on', could she read with them?

As it turned out, yes. Yes, she could. Storm Flames didn't really work, the red didn't light up nearly as much as her Cloud Flame's light purple, but she had to hold the book pretty damn close to her face in order to make out the letters.

Once she figured that out, and a check to be sure she wasn't missing the fights yet, the Russian settled back a bit to try getting absorbed in her book.

A thump behind her made the Storm-Cloud look up from her book eventually, disturbing the toddler napping on her enough to get the kid to roll over on her lap painfully. While setting her teeth against the pain, another two half-assed muffled thumps from the hallway drew more of her attention.

Another glance to the arena, Fong wasn't in the ring so she really didn't greatly care, the thief carefully pulled the toddler off her lap and let him have her cushion to sleep on. Awkwardly getting upright, with the broken leg and the kid she had to make a few strange contortions to get the leverage she needed, Sonya paced around the little niche she had made for herself to face the door.

It bulged against force applied to the other side, it sounded like someone was smacked bodily into it, but didn't break open right away. It took three more hits for someone to spill into the hostage room… and he fell right at Sonya's bare feet.

A glance up through the broken door, the green dressed 'guards' they had been in the care of while transferring from their dorm to this room were struggling with several black-dressed individuals of which the guy at her feet scrambling to get up was with from the uniform, and the thief punted him back out of the room.

…she probably broke his neck kicking him in the face. Fuck.

Good news, her action attracted a whole lot attention which let the Lightning guards finally gain the upper hand. Bad, two more tried to rush her.

She punched them out in short order, drawing back a touch too much on the first guy so he got kicked in the gut too but actually managing to just ring the clock of the second one. Amusedly, the second guy was bodily tackled right after she punched him in the face.

With that over and done with, she helped the guards by picking up the now broken door and setting it to the side while they handled the bodies. Then returned to her seat, unfortunately waking the toddler but he was happy enough to go back to sleep on her.

Between the book, the kid, the clean-up just outside the room, and trying to keep an ear out for Fong's name or just the Wo Hop To Triad's as one bout ended and another started, she didn't get very far doing anything. Bored, restless but pinned in place, and not particularly feeling like being difficult right now made for a frustrating mix.

Elderly knitting granny knelt down next to her, divesting herself of a skein of grey yarn and two sets of needles. "Would you like a distraction, Lady Cloud?"

"Not you too. I get the kid stuck to me as a translator was told to call me that, but it's not entirely what I am." A check of who was in the ring right now, no one she knew but one was using Rain Flames and that still wasn't interesting to her because he had obvious uses for his Flames, and she gingerly accepted the needles passed to her.

She started something, showing her how to start looping the yarn slowly so the thief could copy it. Then making an insane number of the little slip knots-type things on her shiny needle. "You may not be able to evade the title, young miss."

"I can damn well try." Sonya informed her blandly, holding up her own mess of loops and comparing it to what her elder had in her hands. She'd need about… a hundred of them? "'Cloud' is only a part of what I am, even if it is a large part."

Satisfied with her start, knitting old granny started doing something a lot more complicated. "While that might be, because it is part of you and easy for others to understand in the shortest amount of time."

Stereotyping at its best. In a more limited way than just 'Russian', or 'woman'. The thief might know of it, and understand of why it was used, but that didn't mean she had to like it.

…she had what, ten? Knots.

Granny wasn't even finished with knotting her more complicated stuff, so she continued in a more methodical way.

Knotting string was weirdly engaging, and she wasn't even knitting yet. Only glancing up once when apparently there was the first major injury, even with how expansive the room was even her and the rest of the hostages could audibly hear the snap.

Of course, not even a broken arm stopped the fight. Getting a bit overconfident because he had managed to break a limb, he was taken off-guard by a rather nasty spin kick to the jaw.

How many entrants were there?

There were a couple hundred people there last night, assuming that each group was three or so large, there would be… anywhere from forty to sixty Triads that had an individual fighting.

Which wasn't exactly true, because one of the Wo Group Triads had two fighters. Two fighters for a hostage, and how they got that arranged she wasn't sure.

That being the case, it wasn't too far to assume there were just under a hundred fighters. Given there seem to be ten-twenty minutes per fight, at least a five-minute intermission to put the arena to rights and allow betting to occur but more like fifteen minutes for once the preliminary rounds were over…

Three rounds… six fighters?

At best, per hour.
They had started near nightfall, somewhere between six or seven at night, and there had been two bouts and long enough she'd call it an hour. Was this to be showy, showcasing everything they had for the entire tournament, or was it to get the more amateur fighters out of the rings early?

Well... it was entirely possible Fong wouldn't be fighting tonight. Or if he would be, it wouldn't be until nearly the end as he was probably on the 'professional' end of fighters. No one in the ring yet were all that skilled, they were merely duking it out with a polished move here or there to either take advantage or create one.

Sonya returned her attention to the needles and her mess of knots when her theory was born out by not recognizing the names of the next fighters called. Things continued in that manner until the first... round was called to a close.

Apparently, this would be done in sets. Which did give the theory that it was arranged in some manner, rather than randomly set up fights. She amused herself wondering if they had to draw lots or if there was a very fierce round of rock-paper-scissors going on, even if more likely there was some kind of bookie doing the match-making.

Not bothering to put down her knitting needles when the far end doors were open, merely glancing up to ensure it wasn't another unscheduled interruption, the thief gently poked the toddler in her lap awake when she noticed it was just time to be fed.

The little brat planted both hands on her broken leg climbing out of her lap, which aside a twitch of pure pain she was merely happy to have her legs back. Sonya glanced out at the arena, where a few people were righting the few broken floor boards and mopping up the blood and few broken teeth.

Ignoring the food, merely nodding in thanks when knitting old granny left her needles and yarn so she could see how to do the next rank when she got to about a hundred knots, Sonya settled back to knit... whatever the hell they were making.

"A refusal to eat will not be accepted."

"I'm not refusing to eat." Responded the Russian absently, counting sixty knots and wondering if it was more than a hundred she needed or exactly so. Glancing up at the probable Mist user, then to the table everyone else was eating at, she returned her attention to the yarn. "The first banquet I attended last night I was served poisoned food. About eight of the plates. In hopes of not aggravating another attempt that might catch the other hostages, I am not eating what's provided. The Triad I'm with has it handled."

"This is the first I've heard of such a thing." The man who was and wasn't standing over her observed darkly.

"Well... that's not my issue, is it?"

"I only have your word this happened, and you are not refusing to eat."

"Ask whoever it was eavesdropping on hostage visitations for collaboration." Sonya countered blandly.

A five-minute warning was called for the next round, which was going to be Fong and someone she didn't know anything about according to the announcement.

Really?

A second-tier fight?
Worse yet, starting off the second set?

Well… the man had been in Mafia Land a lot recently, might be the problem. Semi-unknown locally then, depending on what kind of work the Storm really did for his Triad. They were in for a shocking upset.

The Russian was almost sorry she couldn't lay down bets herself.

As the Mist went off to whatever it was he was up to without so much as a word, Sonya put her work down and got up to get a much better view of the next fight.

The crowd calmed down a bit, but the noise level didn't go down until the announcers repeated the names of the Wo Hop To Triad's entrant and whoever the fuck was opposing him. Leaning up against one of the posts that helped support the balcony over the hostages' heads, she actually paid attention to how this was being conducted.

Fong entered from one end, his opponent from another, and there wasn't a ref in the ring with them. They got to pick if they were going to start from far or near, which the Storm seemed a fan of closing in early but his poor target didn't.

No one started until the announcers counted down, in three different dialects, from ten to one.

The kid, and she really couldn't even look at him and say he was fully grown without wincing internally, immediately backed the hell up. It didn't really help him, Fong darted in from the right way too fast for him to completely dodge.

Said kid instead dropped before the Storm could hit him. Striking out at a leg with his own, he attempted to catch his opponent's knee.

Smoothly transitioning into a one-handed cartwheel over the strike, which she easily recognized might not have been stolen from her but it was one of her favored tactics, Fong landed lightly near the kid's upper left but not quite positioned to immediately strike with his hands. Even scrambling upright a bit ungainly, the Storm's opponent couldn't quite duck the mule kick that caught his left shoulder.

…and if the ass put bets on himself, she was demanding a cut.

Poor kid was decent, really. Not a professional fighter, but scrappy enough to have a bit more luck in the ring than the last set of fights. It wasn't showing very well next to the better trained Storm user kicking him around the arena.

He did manage to dodge and twist himself so none of the hits were nearly as bad as the first kick, but he was obviously favoring that side for the entire scuffle.

Once Fong did finally manage to close with the scrappy bit of an opponent, with a roundhouse kick to the temple, there were a whole lot of groans but a few cheers as those that lost or won their bets celebrated. A very loud shout from over her head was a first, but she was a bit more interested in the winner who glanced up at her.

Sonya flipped him off.

Grinning, the Storm helped his very groggy opponent up off the floor before leaving the ring.
Cherep scratched his hair absently, examining the book he bought for an idea for how to start the traveling journal.

Should he write a sort of mini-letter?

This book was started with a 'preface'. Which… seemed to be a mission statement. He really didn't have a mission, but an intent.

Did that work?

…would Sonya share it with anyone when he was done writing it?

Fuck, he hoped not. That'd be kind of embarrassing.

"Well… I suppose this is a tiny bit better than the slum holes you normally lurk in."

"Sup, Vipes." The stuntman responded absently. Snapping his head up, he glanced over at the Mist poking around his hotel room and set the books aside. "You've been gone a while."

"Your sister and I do better when there's business to be had." Observed the miser dryly, turning to him and planting a hand on a hip. "And you were… occupied, recently."

Cherep scratched a cheek sheepishly, making note that his friend would give him privacy if he was… occupied. It was a good word. "I won't mind if you want some attention too, Viper."

The hooded visage of his friend stared at him, and he really did wonder if the Mist pulled faces at him under that thing. Or at least made weird eyes, as he could see the mouth and lower jaw.

Slapping himself for his weird ass thoughts and electing a snort of a laugh from his visitor, Cherep pushed himself up off the bedspread. "So, actually, I'm rather happy you popped in."

"Oh?" The Mist picked up the camera he had a hell of a lot less issues figuring out how to start in with, absently spinning the wheel that panned the film inside for subsequent pictures.

"How much to hire you?"

"...you're not going to ask for a 'friend' discount, are you?"

"Have I ever?"

Viper made it obvious they were thinking hard on it, even with half their face disguised.

Cherep snorted. "I've got six thousand euros, and I am also assuming dinner and dessert is included in the cost."

"Deal. What do you want to know?" A small hand was held out demandingly, so the Cloud dug through his duffel bag for the cash earmarked for the Mist and handed it over.

"There was this weird ass conversation I overheard yesterday… I want to be sure the local carnival, one of those seasonal ones? I kind of feel a bit responsible for ensuring the carnies aren't getting into shit they can't get out of."

Yanking their hood off and licking a thumb first to start counting the money they were handed, Viper shot him a strange look as they sorted bills. "Far be it for me to prevent a fool parting from their money… but it's not your business, Cherep. I'm still taking the money."

"You can have the money, Vipes." He dismissed easily, shoving his hands in his pockets. "I don't care about it. And no, I'm not really involved. But… I can't just ignore it. Call me a fool if you want, but as far as I know it I'm part of that 'masking' level of the mafia. We're supposed to screen for good or bad secret keepers, right? This guy is so horrible at lying I'm embarrassed for him."

"An Omertà issue, then?" The Mist didn't look remotely sold on his reasoning, but perfectly happy with their six stacks of bills floating in the air. "Fine. You've paid, and it doesn't sound that tricky. Expect the information tomorrow."

"...don't you need me to describe-

"We have dinner to discuss details. I want something authentically Russian." Tucking their money away somewhere he could not actually comprehend for the life of him, Viper made to walk to the door.

"Erm. Wait." Cherep ran his mind back over the last few minutes but still… "Where'd the camera go?"

A pointed hand gestured to the same place he had put it after experimenting with his new toy.

How it got there when point A and point V had absolutely no correlation was… right, Mist.

"...right. Authentic Russian in Budapest? Well… worst comes to worse, I can make something if we can borrow a kitchen somewhere."

Viper paused for a second, both hands gripping the hood. "...really."

"...Vipes?"

"Nothing." Claimed the miser flatly. "Remember, authentic. I don't care where you find it, how you find it, or how you get it. If your mother wouldn't serve it, I don't want to eat it."

Cherep blinked at them as they used the door for once, wondering where would be a 'Lisa approved' restaurant around these parts.

Frankly… it might just be cheaper in a time-sense to make it himself.
(Friday the 24th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Teaching a bunch of brats how to fall, generally the first thing any acrobat or martial artist were taught so Sonya deemed it safe enough to start them with, should not be this… unruly.

The floor was made of waxed hardwood planks, why did the brats get so much enjoyment flailing around it?

Ballsy toddler boy was just flopping on the pillows and giggling his little head off, his fellow younger children copying him instead of the actual movement she was trying to teach. A few teenagers too 'cool' to do more than the bare minimum, but as they were not doing anything else but standing there all snooty-like she ignored them. Between those two groups, there was just… a lot of flailing around.

The Soviet Storm-Cloud scratched the back of her head in bemusement, running her fingers through the blonde strands to neaten it afterward. Her 'class' was perfectly happy amusing themselves in various ways, she wasn't sure if she should try getting kiddy attention again or just let them get the experience of how they tumbled around.

Doing the first would do nothing but result in the second. Just… slightly less efficiently than letting them gain the experience under the power of their own curiosity. More orderly, less efficiently.

One kid slipped and tumbled backwards into another who was doing the belly flop, which was not appreciated at all from the little fistfight the two got into. Before it could spread, the thief picked her way through the tiny bodies and fabric bags filled with feathers to separate the two by grabbing the back of their outfits and lifting them off the floor.

The little girl kept swinging for a moment, fruitlessly kicking her sock clad feet in mid-air before realizing something was wrong. The slightly younger boy stuffed his fingers in his mouth, pouting a bit more and just limply hanging from her hand and masticating his digits.

Depositing them on separate ends of the room, which had turned into a sort of 'dorm' slash 'classroom' type thing just because without discussion about it, Sonya picked through more wildly flailing children to sort out any more issues. There were two teenagers attempting to be helpful, somewhat succeeding but also causing their own issues she merely helped when it seemed to overwhelm them.

The weird cushions they got for comfort, which the kids were supposed to be tumbling on, were kicked around all over the room. Inevitably, it resulted in her only briefly organized class resulting in a large pillow fight in short order.

Faster than she could respond alone to the melee.

Blinking as a pillow bounced off her face, Sonya ducked the next one on instinct.

As it turned out, that was a bad plan.

The Russian couldn't dodge them all, her opponents were tiny but many and she was trying not to do things at inhuman levels right now. A split got her out of the first round, and she had to roll to the side in a split second to avoid a few ill-tossed missiles, then she had to scramble to get out of the way of the next volley.

Oddly, her light sweater and slacks weren't nearly as easy to move in as that outfit she was wearing for the tournament. She found that unfair.

It ended when a few older ones that could plan and use some tactics amassed an entire wall of pillows she couldn't to more than merely brace for. Peeking around the upraised arm, the Storm-Cloud gave her class a highly unimpressed look.

The pillows were now stacked against the wall behind or around her.

Shrieking gleefully, the kids bailed on her. Spilling out of the half-closed off section of their dorm and into the other two which were occupied with the rest of their fellow hostages.

Shaking out the irritable throb in her broken leg, which was pretty minor given she decided her attempted class was probably a success in the aims of distractions if not for learning, the thief kicked things to a more orderly pile and followed them out.

A whole lot of exercise, an opportunity to be 'naughty' and getting 'away' with it, and the kids were easily corralled for breakfast and more importantly something to drink. The older teens who had more stamina than their younger fellows were at least under the thumbs of that nanny bitch, so Sonya joined the smoking circle instead of following up on her class.

The only old man that seemed to like her at all, which wasn't saying much because he had this 'oh… you're a girl' sense to him every damn time he talked to her, handed over her tobacco pouch she had donated to the making charcoal cause.

As a bit of a bibliophile, Sonya didn't understand exactly how many of the kids couldn't read their own written native language. Not just the younger ones who might not have been taught yet, of the seven teenagers four of them couldn't read or write.

Finger-painting a few Chinese characters on the walls with wet tobacco ash and having the kids 'read' them repeatedly, mostly names but occasionally a few apparently common sign posts around Hong Kong, might not do a lot to address that. However, it was something.

If it stained the plain wooden walls, she didn't greatly care all that much.

Pulling her pipe out of the little chest she had utilized for her stuff, Sonya packed the shredded tan leaves into the brass bowl and accepted an actual match passed to her in order to light it.

To be perfectly honest, this was really boring.

She had heard 'hostage' and assumed it would be a semi-tense, maybe not entirely calm affair.

Maybe with a bit of intrigue and a fair dash of interesting political fights she could observe and not participate in for once.

Her fellow hostages were more treating it like a vacation, and it was just really a whole lot of waiting around with rare punctuations of short violence.

Which… okay. She wasn't complaining, as her first experience as a hostage this was pretty tame. That wasn't bad. Just… it was not very easy to past time in here.

There was nothing interesting to do.
She could read, but she read the books she had already. There was knitting, but she wanted to keep that for later when they were attending the tournament's bouts. She wasn't all that social, so talking or just questioning her fellow hostages would be fairly awkward for her and not something she wanted to do although she probably should ask for names or something. Even the minor Flame use, using her Storm Flames to remove second-hand smoke from the room where kids passed through, earned her wary looks she didn't like receiving.

Puffing a few times on the pipe, the thief wondered what to do until Fong and his Triad's Mountain Master visited with something to eat. Also, if the martial artist called her father yet.

How intimidating could Arseniy be over a phone line?

The man didn't really like to talk all that much, and when forced to as in her childhood thievery classes he got surly and grumpy. Phones were probably not his favorite pieces of technology.

Sonya was one of the few that didn't twitch or recoil when the same Mist man from last night, or at least she thought he was the same one as it was hard to tell with them, suddenly joined the tiny 'smoking' circle by blinking into existence. She'd dealt with an obsessive Mist boy and a mirror-dwelling Mist girl, surprise visits by their types she had gotten over a long time ago.

"We are taking your complaint under advisement." Started the Mist blandly, ignoring the skeptical attention aimed his way from the rest of the hostages either old enough to understand or surprised by his arrival.

Snorting at the completely useless comment, she pulled on her pipe again. She really did wonder if it was her actions last night or just because she was supposedly 'intimidating'.

"We request you do not seek out the cause while we investigate."

"Way too late for that. Sorry." She informed him completely unapologetically, touching the smoke in the air with her Storm Flames to rid the room of second-hand smoke. "One incident is one too many… but there were eight separate incidents that I had to deal with before I was even taken hostage. All in short order, which inspires no confidence in your security measures."

"We were not the ones hosting."

"Should that matter?" Interrupted the thief questioningly, not arguing but honestly curious. "It happened, you did not know. By that alone, I do not feel entirely safe under your 'protection'. Therefore, I will take the precautions that is both non-disruptive and limits the risks I and others are exposed to."

The Mist pursed his lips at her disapprovingly for a long moment. She blew smoke in his face in revenge for the light manipulation attempt.

Coughing, he waved the smoke away with a few irritable bats of a hand. "You failed to say anything."

"Now that's entirely bullshit. Everyone at my table knew, as a matter of fact bets started up after the second round of plates." She made a tidy sum herself, although she had to bet on how many plates would be poisoned.

Guessing eight was just because she had no idea how intent the people trying to kill her would be but weighting on the stupid side because of Mist Flame effects.

One dish had been a soup, shark fin or turtle soup maybe?
She couldn't tell and was a bit worried about asking.

The other had been the dessert dish. The only two not poisoned out of ten, the third dish and the last.

"If you didn't know, honestly speaking, then you have horrible communications with others providing security. If they did and just you didn't know, I think your information networking skills are horrible." Sonya held up a finger and waggled it before the man. "Either way, not my problem. The assassination attempts are, and you have yet to say anything for why I should not defend myself... so I will continue."

"Would anything I say change that?"

Sonya pulled on her pipe for a moment considering the question. "Hmm... not likely."

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 24th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Zhōng Duyi winced slightly as their visitor heavily slammed into the ridiculously fragile looking chair across the table from him that had apparently been a bit lower than expected.

Shifting to a more centered position and straining the usually sturdy wood slightly, then giving a look to the chopsticks provided for his use in something eerily reminiscent of the man's daughter, his guest returned his stare flatly.

Vor Arseniy Bazanov was... significantly larger in person than he had assumed based off his daughter's... physical form.

Fong and a few of his fellows being taller than a large number of other native Chinese men was sort of a point of pride but meeting a man who was about twice of the Chinese Storm yet only a few inches taller was... bewildering.

...how did a man like that result in a daughter as willowy as the thief?

Zhōng was somewhat sure his thigh wasn't nearly as thick as the other man's heavily tattooed bicep. He was pretty certain Sonya Bazanova was an entire foot and several inches shorter than the man, as well as maybe between half or a third of his weight.

He wasn't sure which one was more intimidating, one physically the other by reputation. It was fascinating to ponder.

His own interest with their latest Russian guest was echoed by a fair number of others in his Triad, which at least was somewhat reassuring. Those that had met the man before, mainly the Flame users that took advantage of the slight discount Fong acquired for them in jewel matches for their types, stared less but seemed no less bemused by the walking mass of muscles.

They also greeted him rather politely, which he could entirely appreciate just on the physical side.

Arseniy fumbled his chopstick a bit, adjusting his grip over and over again before he was satisfied with how well he handled them.

Most belonging to the Wo Hop To Triad were still collectively staring at him when he passed them in the hallways and even in the Mountain Master's office, and the vor was doing phenomenal in ignoring it. His daughter didn't take it nearly as well, but she also stuck out a bit more as she didn't have his tan or darker hair and mainly avoided being in the public spaces or around others at all.

"We can give you a room if you would like to get some sleep."

"I slept on the plane."

Fong visibly hesitated, apparently not sure how to continue the conversation after that point.

As a matter of fact, no one seemed to know how to talk to the very brusque man. There had been six words spoken in the last hour since the vor showed up glowering on their doorstep, and five had just been uttered.

Rumor had it Sōng Mingxia chattering at him about his daughter's stay with them only earned her an approving pat on the head while Zhōng cleared his schedule. The Russian had announced himself with a short 'Bazanov' at the gate, but the only one that got a verbal acknowledgement was the Storm who earned a grunt of recognition instead of words.

Anyone asking if he needed anything earned a shrug and questions about what he was seeking were treated with a flat stare.

…he kind of wanted to visit Russia now.

Zhōng had never had much a desire to leave his homeland, not for any reason before this day. However, he was now insanely curious if all Russians were similar or if father and daughter were just atypical examples. Even if not, it would still be fascinating to see them in their native homeland and how they conducted themselves there.

Huang, yet again proving the price of saving the Sun using chef from government oppression for probably foolishly refusing to cook for certain people back when the Cultural Revolution started was maybe too paltry, brought in what he had decided to serve for lunch today. Saving the few in the Mountain Master's office from trying to figure out how to politely talk to the mainly silent Russian without tripping over something sensitive.

"…we will be visiting your daughter in about an hour." Fong gamely tried again as Huang's helpers transferred plates and dishes from his cart to the table.

Arseniy hummed approvingly, awkwardly utilizing the chopstick to start transferring some of the sweet and sour pork on a bed of fried rice placed on the table to his plate.

If it was over the food or the martial artist's words was entirely debatable. Huang took it as an approval over his food and almost preened, caught himself doing it, then shooed his kitchen helpers out of the room and following in short order.

Zhōng was now highly interested how his daughter would interact with the man.

Would it be mostly chattering from the woman and grunts from her father?

He honestly couldn't see another way it would go.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 24th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"Arseniy!"
The burly Russian swept his foster daughter off her feet to return the hug she jumped to give him without so much as waiting for the door to be closed behind her. Not entirely surprised at the greeting, she did something similar in Italy after all, Arseniy ignored the two Chinese men and the hesitating 'guard' type that seemed to have escorted her to him.

"Why did you have me called?"

It wasn't exactly an imposition, with the shift of training to that school house she set up he had a fair bit more free time on hands than he was accustomed to. Lisa could handle most of the criminal-orientated lessons on her own after years of sharing the job with him, and with Sonya's Flame users at hand to ensure her mother was respected he didn't have to involve himself nearly as much.

Following up on security issues, which really was a lot of visiting other syndicates and informing them their watchers were noted and not particularly needed but if they'd like to add some to the security on the school building it was fine. Really not needed, but inevitable so they'd work with it.

Mostly intimidation tactics and the sort, but he wasn't the only physically imposing vor that could do it.

His lover didn't mind taking their son in with her for classes, leaving Valera under the eyes of the Mist pair pitching in there. The only part of their new criminal school she wasn't particularly a fan of was the homework, since she had to grade it.

He had some time, not a whole lot but more than enough to spare his younger foster daughter a few days.

What was more concerning is that she asked for him to come here at all. The blonde had never asked for help, at least not for herself, before.

"I'm homesick, which is odd. Not for Russia, or anything in Moscow." The thief he had trained dutifully informed him without needing more prompting, touching back to the ground gingerly when he set her down but not looking away from him. "Partially I really just wanted to see you again. But I gave my word I would be their hostage for this thing meaning I can't leave, there's this assassination thing happening, and well... yeah."

The vor blinked at her blankly. That homesick part would be reported to Lisa, because he didn't know how to help her with it. If visiting would help, then he would... but the issue was a little out of nowhere for him.

"Eight poisoning attempts, an attack on the room the hostages and I were held in last night, and just general incompetence on behalf of those holding me. I'd rather you hunt that down, if I can't."

"Why?" He demanded shortly, which might've earned him confused looks from the natives but only a kind of half-shrug from her.

"I can't leave without, and I quote, 'without being released by the Triad taking hostages' or I'll forfeit Fong's spot in this thing." Sonya answered slowly, biting her lower lip for a moment as she ordered her thoughts so he could make informed decisions with the best information they had between them. "Which would invalidate the time I've already spent in-country and forfeit my contract, but... also there's a shit-ton of kids involved in this."

Arseniy accepted that grudgingly. Fair point, a few of them, but it didn't mean he had to like that she was risking so much for others. For her career was one thing, but this wasn't a heist.

The younger woman ducked around him to formally exchange a nod with the older Chinese man and take the box the younger one he did remember visiting her in Moscow handed over.

If she was getting poisoned, and he really was very interested in how that came about, then getting food outside the arrangements was just smart.

He eyed the scarred man, who seemed to be running things at least on the side of the Triad Sonya was currently working for.

"I kind of think they snuck that in because I was attending." Continued the thief only well after she finished one dish of something made of pork, waving the chopsticks made of steel she pulled from a pocket to eat with. "The 'no one' can leave thing. So... damned if I do, but not doing anything is stupid."

The vor didn't raise stupid kids. Considering it while the young woman bolted noodles quickly in the chair next to him, Arseniy wondered what she expected that he could do.

Sonya couldn't bail on the Triad's contract with her, not without damaging her reputation both here and in Mafia Land if she survived that at all. Which also tied her up from actually actively seeking out and dealing with whomever was trying to kill her. Therefore, calling in some backup was understandable and from what he knew of her personal life outside her work that left that Italian hitman or her siblings. Or her foster parents.

That didn't mean Arseniy had more leeway than she did in this. This wasn't Russia nor Zolotov territory, what reach he did have was mostly due to their connections with the Wo Hop To Triad.

...he still found the name stupid. 'Harmoniously United Association', or 'Harmonious Union Plan' however you wanted to read that, sounded more like some civilian worker's political party than a criminal syndicate. Maybe that was the point...

"I didn't hear about any attack." Duyi observed neutrally into the silence.

Sonya paused, swallowed her mouthful, and cocked her head at the man. "Did you hear the brats last night? They wailed a bit when the announcers startled them."

The older Chinese man thoughtfully smoothed the pad of a thumb down a seamed scar on his cheek. "I did not."

"Mmm... Mists. It wasn't silent, especially after they broke the door. I wondered why no one said anything about the kids crying." The thief dug back into her meal, apparently finding that more than enough for her end of things.

"What really happened last night? So we know what they're trying to claim." Asked Fong curiously.

His daughter clicked her chopsticks together to buy a moment, slurping up the noodles she was caught halfway through eating. "Um... the guards we had mostly had it handled, until they broke the door between us and them using someone or said someone broke the door with himself. I kicked him out in short order, got rushed by two more I punched, then that was it. The guards puttered about the broken door for most of the night, I kept half an eye on it while learning to knit."

Her Chinese contact exchanged a slightly confused look with the head of his Triad.

"Can you raise the issue with whoever the fuck this is?" Arseniy demanded, because that was the obvious resolution and while not likely to work should at least be attempted to cover all the bases.

"I am not sure how your own fraction of the underworld operates, but here it is possible a branch of "one Triad might be working at odds with the rest of it." His foster daughter's fellow Flame user explained, spreading his hands with a shrug to cap it off. "Accusing a specific gang of working at odds to their parent branch is dicey enough, and if handled wrongly or if things go far enough then it is possible one of them will falsely take the blame and not solve the larger issue."

Sonya nearly snorted her mouthful of lo mein in surprise, drawing a sigh from Arseniy as she started coughing.

That really could describe her little group of Flame using miscreants. Trying to keep an eye on how they were starting to feel their way out of their little established niches was hard enough since they didn't seem to care with who they started, and they weren't really all that accepting of the normal dredge work most newbies were tasked with.

Which he could see that being slid to the side case by case, if the brats were anywhere near as useful as her Mist duo could be. Just being favored because they had multi-colored fire they could use wasn't something he was a fan of. Especially not when their skills didn't lend to critical help in any job in any way. In his personal opinion, they had to do twice the work to be nearly as useful as a purely thief-trained newbie.

His various brats were too level-headed or grounded to have expected special treatment for their various fire-related skills, and hopefully he and Lisa could continue that trend in Valera.

Tatiana was dealing the best with getting deferential treatment, but as being a nurse already had established guidelines for how to behave she could draw from others her grace wasn't surprising. Cherep might be seeking out his own influences, but through the hard way of earning it so hopefully he'd keep a level head once he got it. Sonya was… struggling the most, mostly because it was at first unearned but well deserved even so.

Fong dug out a container, a tin thermos, from the food provided to help the still spluttering thief with whatever liquid it had within it.

Zhōng Duyi elected to regard the elder Russian while she was a bit occupied with regaining her breath.

Then once she could breathe he returned his attention to her. "As to your question of yesterday, I have spoken to the others and they will speak to their own people for your answer."

Sonya cleared her throat awkwardly, blinking rapidly and settling back with the thermos that seemed to be filled with lukewarm tea. "Ah… alright. I was kind of hoping that would be resolved quickly… but I can wait."

"I could not reach all of the others, we are somewhat segregated depending on who our opponents and who our related Triads are." Fong informed her apologetically, earning himself just a hum of contemplation from his daughter. "From what I did get, and apparently not the parents of the younger children you are being held with, they do not mind the caretaker's brand of correction."

"The teenagers? I don't really care all that much for them, they're some rude little snots." Agreed the thief idly after a hefty swallow of her tea. "They're more than old enough to have known they're being unreasonably idiotic but picked to do shit anyways."

A gesture inquiring if she wanted more time was answered with a negative shake of the head, and while the younger man gathered up the leftover food the older Chinese man probably around Arseniy's age leaned forward in a probably pointless attempt to be covert. "Miss Sonya, I feel I must request you be less… agreeable. If another 'incident' happens. I find I am most irked that little seems to be done in response, but I do require some leverage to hammer it home if you'd like."

"I have no idea what you're talking about." Sonya observed calmly, obviously lying through her teeth to anyone that knew her even a little by the wicked little smirk. "But I'll be sure to keep that in mind."

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 24th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

With Sonya's foster father introduced to Liqin, and the Russian vor and the Triad assassin deciding they would not mind working with each other, Arseniy immediately left the Wo Hop To Triad's Hong Kong compound.

Actually… with how things worked out when the larger Russian left suddenly and without a word spoken of his intent, it was more the Zolotov vor leaving the Chinese man behind and forcing the long-suffering assassin to hastily drop his preparations and run after him in order not to be left too badly behind.

Fong found it amusing that father and daughter both ducked Liqin in what seemed to be either pure habit or just because, and it seemed to now be a thing without either knowing of the other's actions. As well as slightly impressive, for Arseniy was not a slight or easily overlooked man and yet that hadn't impacted his ability to be stealthy at all.

He was there and present in one moment, then suddenly no one knew where he had got to.

Showcasing for any that doubted that father and daughter both did hail from a clan of thieves and deserved the titles.

Master Yaozu scowled heavily when it became apparent the significantly larger Russian was not returning, irked he had lost the staring contest with the foreign criminal and that he was likely not returning for a while.

"I've found Russians do not say goodbye very often… or at least those Russians do not." The Storm informed his former teacher idly, for really there was nothing he could say about their behavior other than what he had observed. "They also rarely apologize, for anything."

The old man grumbled to himself instead of responding, sipping the jasmine tea that was part of the gift that made Huang the Sun decide to all but adopt the blonde Russian if the quality of her care packages were anything to judge by. Mingxia, who was sharing the tea with them, finally dissolved into the giggles that had been threatening ever since the staring contest started.

Smiling wryly himself, Fong turned his attention from their various absent Russian guests to his former teacher. "Will you attend the tournament tonight?"

"I see no reason to." Yaozu informed him testily, settling back on his temporary bed firmly to imply he was not moving.

A pity they couldn't do this in the courtyard, but the few gardeners they possessed had chosen to start trying to coax the formerly well-maintained garden strip back into some semblance of its former glory. It wasn't that anyone was barred from sitting out in the sun on the veranda, but that unexpected mouthfuls of soil were being tossed about as they tried to set things right.

Fong was not sorry, Sonya kicked him through a wall and several feet of solid dirt. Yes there might be an interesting little divot near the basement dojo where she had done so and he burned away what he impacted in hopes of not having more broken ribs, but he thought the both of them should at least share the blame instead of just him.

"Although I will admit a lot of the audience seem to be criminals, some are merely criminally connected sifu." He tried again, because he was rather keen on at least getting the elder man to attend one of the nights. "That should not detract from what it is being held for."

Part of the reason they were holding the tournament even in the current political climate was to keep the tradition and honor of their native styles of martial arts alive. It might be illegal, but governments and policies could change in the coming years. As a martial artist, the Storm was rather glad something was being done to preserve it and share with others who might like to learn themselves no matter what connotations it now held.

He wasn't sure if he should press his luck, or merely accept the martial arts master was going to refuse anything more than the bare basics of living for the short term. Yaozu might not approve of their lifestyles, but he was also making a concentrated effort not to offend anyone in it while he relied on them for security and safety.

"Can I go?" Asked the little Rain curiously into the more or less comfortable silence, peering up at her brother hopefully.

"...I believe Xiasheng and a few others have secured tickets for the next night's bouts, I would rather you go with them than alone." Fong informed his little sister honestly, wondering what his fellow Storm would ask in return for watching her for him. "I can get you in if you will wait a day."

He would just much rather her go with others that would look after her, rather than have her go alone into a den of admitted and not particularly nice criminal types he didn't know the quality of.

Master Yaozu harrumphed, examining his empty teacup before firmly setting it aside. "Tickets?"

"Yes, more or less a way to keep the spectator numbers manageable and implicate the viewers if they try to report anything." Depressing that it was required, but this wasn't the first illegal tournament arranged over the last half a decade that Fong knew of.

It was merely the first one that managed to get all the way to the opening night and through the first round without things becoming dicier than realistically possible.

A lot more secure and safe than the illegal fistfights he had started out with in Hong Kong's docks, not that the specific part of his early years here were things he liked to reflect upon often.

The Storm wondered if he should reexamine those two years he spent outside the Wo Hop To Triad before Xiasheng contacted him about their shared Flames, or if the possible motives and undercurrents didn't really matter all that much in the long term. The slightly older man had been completely straightforward about why and what he wanted while helping him keep low and out of the Red Guard's search for him, but that didn't mean there had been no other influences that might've helped along his conclusions to join up with a Triad himself.

"How many of those tickets do you have?" Demanded the elderly martial arts master shortly, flatly ignoring the hopeful look Mingxia was pinning him with.

Fong carefully erased any amusement from his features. "The Incense Master is controlling our group's admissions, I can easily arrange for one or two myself if need be."

Yaozu thought about it, ignoring the younger Sông sibling's stare while he pondered things over.
The elder Sōng sibling wondered if his little sister did that light manipulation against him. Then again, Rain Flames were all about manipulating things to be less implosive or active in nature.

Could or would someone hold his Storm Flames or elements of his own nature attributed to possessing them against him?

Was that right...?

He didn't think so, so no. Even if Mingxia was using such things against him, Fong would not hold it against her as long as it wasn't done to convince him to do things against his morals or for anything greatly against his will. Which he didn't believe she would do in the first place and so made the wonder moot.

The question turned then was there a right or wrong for her doing the same against others... which he wasn't sure if he could judge. Brother or not, it greatly depended on the situation and who it was not to mention for why.

Then again, that seemed to be Sonya's whole issue with most other people. Her Cloud nature was held against her before anyone actually took the time to get to know her or her social limits.

Out of fear of her lashing out, rather than prejudice or elitism.

He wasn't sure what this wonder was in aims of, but it was something interesting to ponder in moments between things.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 24th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

As Sonya distracted the kids with exercise in the morning hours, apparently the afternoon would be school lessons and maybe naptime depending on age range.

Which... the thief was of two minds about. Not the writing and reading bit which she was contributing to even if one system she couldn't exactly navigate with any amount of skill, nor the arithmetic. Naptime was fine, she could wish it wasn't entirely under her watch but that she could deal with.

Free history lessons from an actual person, perfectly fine in her opinion. Possible propaganda she couldn't have a physical copy of for later research and or compare to other accounts, not so much.

Reseated in a corner of the 'smoking wall' at least somewhat removed from the toddlers and crankier young children due to smoking but not that far away, the Soviet Storm-Cloud second-hand eavesdropped on the current lesson on the last dynasty of China and how it was viewed these days.

Obviously, as under the Ch'ing Dynasty one of the Opium Wars happened due to their repeated civil unrest rather harshly put down and rampant corruption of government officials, the last dynasty was not looked upon with favor or fondness. Between the First Opium War, the Anglo-French War, the Sino-Japanese War, the Boxer Rebellion, bureaucratic inefficiency, said corruption, severe floods, a long stretch of famine, and massive overpopulation the last Chinese dynasty was used as a fixture of what the Chinese people had thrown off in favor of the People's Republic.

Nothing good was spoken of nearly two hundred or so years the Ch'ing... Qing? Dynasty were in charge.
Which, if it was entirely so objectionable, the thief would've thought someone else or some other regime would overthrow them long ago. Did nothing good happen, or was it more a position that could be taught to kids without earning them the ire of the current government, did the man actually believe it, and or was it all true?

…was Fidel Castro still a thing?

She couldn't remember, nor recall.

Maybe she should see about it sometime soon?

She didn't recall enough about it, other than a 'Cuban Missile Crisis' which might be wrong given how long it had been since she last thought of the situation, to do anything but wonder.

Back to the ongoing lesson, if in two centuries and several rebellions had not unseated them then it couldn't have been entirely objectionable. Beyond which there was the industrialization of China to consider, which could have gone either way depending on how it was implemented.

Sonya didn't know enough to ask about it, and she didn't feel like talking to the old man giving the lesson.

More irritatively, she had to actually listen to the teenaged boy assigned as her 'translator' in order to understand the lesson going on. That raised Cantonese just higher than Japanese in the languages she wanted to learn but had yet to set aside the time to do it.

Waving the teenager quiet, the thief readjusted herself and narrowly inspected her fellow hostages.

There was the kid that was tasked with talking for her when it came to purely Cantonese speakers, but with the quality of education the kids seemed to have had before this that was probably a dismal prospect. No fault of his own, more so the people tasked with his upbringing or the current government if this was really a thing and not a completely unbelievable coincidence, but not ideal.

The elderly man currently giving lessons, who probably was the best informed as he took the task upon himself, didn't speak a dialect she could understand. Translation errors and possible misunderstandings were high if she tried to ask him even through an intermediary, added to the awkwardness of her questioning his understanding of his own history.

Out of the rest of the adult hostages, she had only two others she even wanted to speak to.

Knitting old granny was taking advantage of the ongoing naptime for the younger children to take a nap herself, and the equally elderly old man she split some tobacco with that first day was involved in some kind of game involving random tokens appropriated for reasons.

Sonya could branch out and try talking to someone else, not bitch-lady who was 'caretaking' because fuck her royally. There were the few others near her age, but… that possible lesbian couple were apparently not fans of something about her and tended to avoid her religiously. The other four weren't much better, seemingly following the norm of avoiding her put forth by the others without really knowing why.

Aside them and the sheep, there was a lot of kids again and a handful of elders.

Again, excluding the children who seemed to have been let down in terms of their education that left someone who was old.

Of the twelve of so people left, three were asleep, another was currently teaching in a dialect of the native language she didn't understand, several were occupied playing a strategy game using wooden dolls and various other items they had to spare, a few were holding their own conversation on the opposite side of the-

Sonya snapped her head down, examining the toddler that just spilled himself into her lap.

…what the actual fuck?

The kid ignored her yet again, or perhaps didn't care for what face she was pulling at him, curling up and stuffing a good handful of the material her sweater was made out of into his mouth to chew.
Balssy toddler boy merely snuggled into her thigh even if there was no reason she could see for him to do so.

That bitch-lady was a room away, or at least more to the point a sliding wooden panel wall was between them. This room wasn't foreign anymore, or at least it was understandable that nothing bad had happened here yet. The kids had seemed rather glad to return here after the last fight of last night, or at least to return to the more comfortable cushions than their 'cage' had.

From what the Russian had seen… no one really liked her in the beginning. She wasn't sure if it was her or just her being a Cloud and affecting others instinctively like how concentrated Mist Flames did, but most were highly wary of her in the first few meetings.

Instinctual or unintentional coincidence, she wasn't used to being sought out by anyone but those she already knew decently well.

…Fong was still a freak of nature, and possibly not right in the head. Additionally, so was Liqin. She still blamed him for stupid shit. She wasn't sure what the kid was yet.

She was getting off-topic again.

How often did she fail to finish a thought because of other tangents that occurred to her when trying to think?

Drool leaked onto her thigh, causing the thief to sigh and resign herself to being another's bed again.

She wouldn't be asking anyone about Chinese history today then.

If she had to wait, she might as well as Fong tomorrow and avoid possibly learning she hated another of her fellow hostages or risk pissing them off herself.

The waiting to do anything was starting to get to her, and it had only been two days so far.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 24th of October, 1969 continued. Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Mingxia tried not to wander too far from Master Yaozu, but she was really excited to see what this was all about.

Her brother had been a strong supporter of the 'Underworld Tournament' while it was in the planning stage, and now that it had become reality she wanted to see it before it ended.

The young Rain girl was actually slightly surprised her older brother hadn't protested her attendance.
Perhaps it would have been different the opening night to what he had expected, or the fact he knew a few of the others in the Triad would be attending so he could rely on them to ensure she wasn't bothered, but she was very pleased to be allowed with only the elderly martial arts master as a protector.

"Ming." Yaozu called with a slightly exasperated edge to his voice, too disciplined to show if he was uncomfortable or wary of their surroundings by tone or posture. "Patience."

Retracing her steps, she gifted the elderly man with a small smile. "Sorry, sifu."

He sternly eyed her for a long moment, then turned his attention to the admittance to their highly illegal spectator's seats.

Their entranceway to wherever the Triads were holding the tournament was on the outskirts of Yung Shue Ha, a tiny and mostly fishing related collection of houses on the Tung O Wan Bay. After taking the ferry to Pok Liu Chau Island, they had a long walk with a few others on a hiking trail halfway into the forest until reaching a slightly disguised fork in the path.

That path led straight to the southern side of the mountain that speared out of the lower half of the island, and a man taking tickets to allow others into a cavern he and a few others were guarding.

No, there was nothing to see yet. Mingxia didn't greatly care, she wanted to just see.

It had been a long time since Fong moved her into the Hong Kong headquarters of the Wo Hop To Triad, and even longer since she had the relative freedom to explore anything. She was aware it wasn't safe on the streets these days and did not begrudge her brother his worries over her.

It just meant she wanted to get the most out of this opportunity. Especially before they had to enter a tunnel.

Even just walking through a forest was a breath of fresh air for her.

"Come along, girl." Master Yaozu nudged her after handing over their tickets to be verified and returning the speculating glance with a hard one of his own when taking them back. "One last look before we head in."

Mingxia flashed him another smile, spinning to take in the wooded clearing one last time before she followed him into the tunnel. As the elderly martial arts master had done his own hiding as an almost or actual fugitive, he also probably appreciated the opportunity to get out and about as much as she did.

In sharp contrast of the wide-open air walk there, the cramped and hemmed in earthen walls that twisted and turned to utterly baffle the Rain Flame user's sense of direction were nearly claustrophobic. What was interesting was how sharply cool it had been at first, yet the farther they walked the more it heated up.

Yaozu eventually led her into a cavernous arena, a rapidly darkening skylight and probable vent on one side of the vaulted ceiling letting in the last dying lights of the day. Mingxia adjusted to the thought it was later than she had thought for the supposedly short trip, not terribly surprised to see that she had lost track of time.

Aside the fading sunlight still being the strongest illumination in the large room, there was the ranks of benches bolted to the rough concrete floors. Part of the spectator's benches were cramped and nearly stacked on top of each other, the higher ranks, or short and adequately separated, which seemed to be the part they were headed for.
The walls were either rough rock or poured concrete, dressed up near the ornate balconies on opposite sides of the arena and left bare on the spectators' sides. Mingxia vaguely recognized Master Yaozu got tired of her wandering attention and took possession of her elbow to guide her down the gradual steps to their seats.

There were a lot of people within the room, braziers lit in four cardinal directions given the carvings on the bowls showed the Four Symbols flickering brightly giving the room more illumination. Various banners depicted with characters or images associated with certain Triads draped over the railings separating the spectators' seats from the arena. It was unsurprisingly loud with idle or not so idle chatter and bookies trying to get bets set down for the bouts to be started.

She wondered where Miss Sonya was. There was no obvious place to hold hostages and yet allow them to witness the fights, from what her brother had said of yesterday's events the thief had watched his so they had to be somewhere in here.

"Ming… will you please pay attention? At least until we can sit down?"

"…sorry, sifu." She should probably reach her seat before gawking around like a country girl, so she refocused on where he was leading her.

As Fong was a fighter in the tournament and the Wo Hop To a participating Triad, they had tickets for one of the semi-private spectator's benches. As front-row as possible if they weren't a Triad Head, but not far away enough to be in the purely spectators' ranks.

There was just too much to look at and Mingxia was probably jumping all over the place, which did blind her to the others held within the same space. Refocusing on their path, she was actually slightly surprised they past three fist-fights and at least several arguments over various topics they had to pass for the seats Yaozu was leading them to.

Against the impulse to soothe the fractious air with her Flames, the Rain clasped her hands together before her and refocused on the bench the elderly man checked against their tickets before gesturing her to seat herself first on the far end away from the designated pathway others were moving through.

Exciting it all might be, but this was almost overwhelming for her.

So many people she didn't know, so many conversations to hear, nearly too much to pay attention to only one thing.

"Fong will not be fighting for a while yet." Observed her elder grumpily, folding the flyer he had been handed sometime between entering this room and the Rain finally noticing he had it.

Tucking it into the breast pocket of his Mao jacket, the martial arts master shot suspicious looks to the people they were nearest to.

"I am not surprised, sifu. Big brother is a very good fighter." Mingxia responded calmly, sliding to the edge of the bench just to see if she couldn't spot where the fighters or the hostages were being held deeper into the arena.

They had not been early to this, but she also hadn't thought they left it for that late. She hoped she remembered to inform Fong's friend Xiasheng that he and the others should probably leave fifteen minutes earlier than he recommended for them.

The few lights started dimming not too long after they found their seat, leaving just the overhead lights focused on the arena and the four braziers to give illumination. Tiny tea lights bobbing around the balconies signified it was probable that the various Triad heads attending were finding their seats with the help of some attendants.

Mingxia examined what little else she could see aside the far tiny flames and the great open floor space held in reserve in the arena.

…she still couldn't figure out where Miss Sonya and her fellow hostages were being held.

A sudden crackle of feedback nearly made her jump, and the Rain huffed silently to herself as she got over the scare. Three different voices quickly ran over what would be on display, how long between bouts in case more bets or collecting on one was done in between fights, and that joining the fighters in the ring would be treated as sabotage.

Even if Yaozu had stated Fong would not be fighting anytime soon, and she wasn't really a fan of watching two people try to hurt one another for someone else's amusement, she paid attention because her brother would ask about those that fought before him. Even if that would be more something he'd ask the martial arts master than her, she would like to still participate a little in what wasn't the same old thing that happened every day.

It took three fights of the first 'set', when Master Yaozu was rather absorbed in how the fighters conducted themselves and how the rare spark of Dying Will Flames were utilized, for something odd to happen.

At least, odd if you had not made the acquaintance of a very independent woman from Russia and her more violent habits.

Mingxia found it safe to say someone being forcibly thrown through what seemed to have been a gap under the balconies the Triad heads were positioned upon and straight into the fighters was not supposed to happen. Also, that even with having an elder brother who practiced martial arts for a living, she had never seen any merely human person kick or throw another horizontally farther than a few feet.

Well… not until recently anyways.

"I found where Miss Sonya is being held." She informed the highly perplexed elderly man attending with her, who seemed more confused where the additional man had come in from than who had propelled him that far.

(Saturday the 25th of October, 1969. Budapest Zoo and Botanical Garden, Budapest, Hungarian People's Republic.)

Cherep had been investigating various ways to take pictures with his brand-new camera, intending to go through at least three rolls of film at least before picking one to stick with for what he sent to his eldest sister.

He wasn't sure how long he'd be sticking around for. At least long enough to figure out how to start a traveling log for his younger sister… but he wasn't sure about past that. He wasn't tired of this city yet, but he had less enjoyment just wandering here or there than he had at the start of his stay.

Not done yet, but probably soon.

Forest-type pictures and quaint café arrangements were easy in his probably not-so humble opinion, but animals were a bit harder. They were really just too cute, or in some cases just really gross, to stop taking pictures of. That, and he’d only know how the pictures would come out after he had everything developed.

The aquariums were pretty damn awesome in his opinion. Especially that rather playful little octopus he luckily got a picture of before it absconded with a seashell and hid itself in a reef.

Hopefully that would develop well, or he might just pout because it had been so tiny and adorable.

Wandering out of the display house filled with small and large freshwater or salt tanks, the stuntman absently wound the film in his camera as he people watched a bit and wondered which way to go next.

"Mauricio Sebastian Ciceron," Viper suddenly droned from his elbow, their sudden appearance not surprising anyone as no one even gave them a second glance, "a small-time illusionist and stage magician with horrible business sense. Mou… that's who you overheard a few days ago, he recently got in debt to a local loan-shark racket for the lovely tune of one hundred and fifty thousand forint."

Cherep did a bit of calculation in his head to change that to a denomination he knew better as he wandered to go see a few of the big cat enclosures. "Seriously, Vipes. I'm going to start questioning your adoration of money in all its forms here soon. So, what… about… two thousand five hundred euros?"

"Around there…" Agreed the Mist user tartly, ignoring his comment on their miser-ness. "A stupid-assed get-rich quick scheme he probably heard Americans did from rumors and second-hand stories, actually trying to peddle snake-oil."

The Cloud user paused mid-step, side-eyeing his companion. "…I thought 'snake-oil' was a saying. For that 'cure-all' medicine that never really worked way back in the 'ye olden days'. Was he really trying to sell actual snake-oil? As in trying to sell it as something beneficial or just because?"

Viper only shrugged, apparently not particularly interested anymore or they hadn't got that kind of information.

"Where the hell did he even get that?" Cherep wondered in exasperation.

The Mist came to a halt in the middle of the path, giving him a longer look than normal.

He blinked back at them in confusion, eventually turning around to face Viper himself. "What?"

The heavy cloak the other was wearing, not entirely against reason like it would’ve been in the middle of summer but in a rather brisk fall afternoon that much wool cloth was probably nice and warm, made it really hard to tell what Viper was thinking at any given moment. They weren’t very expressive with the only visible part of their face, aside the nearly always present frown.

Sometimes the tattoos flexed a bit, which was a sign that some squinty-eyed action was being had, but that was pretty rare when he could make the other think of absurd things.

"I want you to repeat after me, Cherep."

"Why…?"

"Just do it." Snapped the Mist irritably. "'The actions of idiots does not concern me'. Repeat it."

Instead, the stuntman merely gave his friend a skeptical look. "Seriously? You call me an idiot some "...Ciceron's a Rain. A minor petty talent, at best." Admitted the other only after a whole minute of Cherep's best puppy-eyes... and fifty euros they immediately pocketed. "Not enough to bother with."

"Wait... really?" Actually, putting that into the equation gave the former Czechoslovakian runaway a bad feeling about why that loan-shark ring let a circus type take out a loan in the first place.

"...mou, Cherep-"

"We're required to help him, right? Sonya said there were rules we had to pass on." He cut himself off, looking at askance down at his wrist which didn't support the hand his camera was clutched in.

The one with a twisted Mist-rope of Viper's cloak wrapped around.

"It is not worth your time, Cherep. Yes, as I noticed I am required to pass on the laws if he does not know. Two seconds with a piece of Mist Flame paper, five if you insist, and that's it." Lectured the miser sternly, tugging the stuntman back in the direction of cuddly cat creatures instead of the nearest zoo exit. "He's not a particularly talented individual, in anything, and he's more a risk than an asset. Forget it."

"He is a fellow carnie." Cherep refuted, gently because he did get where Viper was coming from but that wasn't him. "Besides, you wouldn't like me so much if I was an asshole to everyone."

"...I wouldn't mind you being more of an asshole to others occasionally." Countered the Mist user irritably. "I still highly advise you to forget about Ciceron. He'll be snapped up by a local syndicate, drown or learn to swim with the sharks, and that'll be it. 'Mertà will be held up, no one inconvenienced, life will go on."

"I really actually don't care about propping up Omertà, the only one you're concerned about being inconvenienced is yourself, and life always goes on no matter what." With a roll of his eyes, he started trying to peel off the Constructed end of Viper's cloak.

Easier said than done, apparently said Mist wasn't yet done trying to prove their point.

"He's not just indebted to one syndicate, Cherep. Mou... the moron is playing four against each other." Viper informed him in their usual monotone, which the stuntman actually didn't hear all that often so he was aware his friend was starting to become truly annoyed with him. "He borrowed from one for some stupid 'double your money' trick which unsurprisingly failed, then borrowed from another to pay that first one off... then again to pay them off plus a little extra to try another little get rich quick scheme. Failed again, borrowed again to pay off his debts. Do you see a pattern here?"

Cherep thought about it. "So... did those others catch onto his Flames...?"

"The idiot uses his Rain Flames in his magic shows. He makes a thin sheet of Tranquility ice for mirrors and frosted glass, melting it when he needs to 'disappear' or to change the reflection to make things vanish." Drawled the Mist flatly. "What do you think? He needs to be taken in soon, for his own safety if not for the rest of ours."

"I think... that is an interesting application my sister might be interested in poking once or twice?" At the utterly unamused look Viper actually removed their hood just to pin him with, the Cloud user darted in to give the prickly Mist a big hug. "Besides, you can get a whole lot of enjoyment pointing out how stupid he was with money. You do it to me all the time."

"Mou... the difference is you can be taught."
Melting into pure smoke instead of 'suffer' a hug when there was no reason to get one also released the stuntman from their grip on his wrist.

Cherep bolted… and got no more than five meters to the exit before Mist Flames made some kind of creeping ivy twine around his legs like some kind of weird cat-plant. Right in the middle of a path where no one noticed he was acting a bit oddly nor realized a Mist was bending reality in knots.

In short, he got stepped on a few times to add insult to injury.

Viper's right boot toe reformed with the rest of them right in front of the stuntman's nose. "...are you going to insist on this?"

"If you broke my camera, I'm going to pout."

Something hard bounced off his head, and he scrambled to slam close the panel that normally hid the exposed camera film when it popped open due to the abuse. "Noo... Vipes, you're so mean... that picture of the little cute octopus... if you ruined it I'm going to really cry. It was adorable."

The Mist palmed their face with both hands in pure exasperation. "...why am I friends with you again?"

"I think you said because I can make you laugh." Which, depressingly enough, wasn't the weirdest way someone indicated they wanted to be friends with him. There was those several months of being stalked to contend with... "So, are you going to help me or what? I mean, I could probably just pay things off for him and have the guy work for me for... erm, something. That... on a second thought, is a horrible idea. I'll send him to Sonya instead."

Viper gave him a flat stare, fully visible instead of requiring one to guess what expression was on their face due to the hood they had yet to replace.

"...what?"

A hand was held out demandingly.

"Didn't I already pay you?"

"For information. Operational backup is three times more. And if you can't pay now, five times."

Cherep pulled himself up off the ground, smoothing a thumb over the closed lid of his camera as he eyed the hand warily. "That's going to take me a little while to gather up, Vipes."

"Five times my usual rate for just information then. You also better hurry... Ciceron's about to piss off the last syndicate that'll give him the time of day."

Yeah... there was no way he could scramble fast enough to get everything done and Viper paid off today. "Will leaving him for a day hurt anything?"

"...depends on what you mean by 'hurt'... or 'anything' for that matter, mou."

"Confidence inspiring, that." If the guy wasn't going to die or anything else nearly permanent, then Cherep could use a bit of time ensuring he wasn't running into something way over his head. Also, he could use some time to contemplate how he wanted to approach this. "Well... if nothing painful is going down now... are you mooching off me for lunch?"

Rushing to the guy's rescue only to endanger himself would amuse no one, especially not anyone in his family. Besides which pain was painful, and he did try to avoid it.

Normally... sometimes.

"Just for that... yes, yes I am. And I demand something hellishly expensive and fancy. I hope you have a suit jacket handy, or you'll just be paying."

"I've got something... but... do you really only give those poor suckers you come across two seconds with a copy of the laws? That's cold, Vipes." Cherep got three more steps before something else occurred to him when the Mist user elected not to respond. "And wait, you've got Mist Flames. Why the hell can't you just... magic a suit jacket or something?"

Something hard yet bendy whacked him upside the head without Viper so much as twitching. "...a hundred euros for me to Construct you something appropriate. Mou, two hundred if you so much as whine for the next hour."
Chapter 84

(Saturday the 25th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Sonya blinked sleepily at Fong when he poked her in the arm with his elbow. "What?"

"Ah... you seem to have a slight... um... guest?"

"Yeah. I have no real idea why he keeps doing this." She informed him blandly, setting her head back against the wall they were leaning up against. Ballsy toddler boy ignored everything going on, including his father's highly agitated behavior for his actions, and groggily curled up to pillow his head on her left thigh. "A couple guesses, but those could be wrong."

Good news, the child-care thing was now solved.

Bad?

She was right that she was in the wrong in that.

The only good side of that for her was that the fact it was cultural for her made her interference somehow alright that she objected to the various parents and guardians. Not entirely appreciable in a few cases, but excusable since she had been asked to protect her fellow hostages and that mix-up was made clear to all parties.

Miss bitch-lady wasn't so snotty anymore, since she had been taken to task for how she started some kind of slander campaign the Russian honestly hadn't noticed all that much. Made a few things belatedly understandable in respects to her limited conversation partners, but really not all that appreciated by her anyways.

Just... no. Not even for the few that tried to apologize.

Sheep-people were sheep, allowing for the possibility but getting the truth for themselves was entirely possible and reasonable. The fact they hadn't done that made her less than interested in them even more than she had already been.

If Sonya had been aware her option for alternate body disposal in the second hostage re-taking event would result in this, she would've taken a nap herself yesterday.

The tournament was well and truly over with for the night, and yet they were still held in a general waiting room for the various Triad heads to re-hash out the security arrangements. 'They' being the hostages and their various reasons for being such, meaning twice the volume of people than she had been accustomed to over the last few days. Since apparently while it had been expected for certain factions to try to derail the tournament, but no one appreciated not being told of the attempts on their people, the obvious solution was to stick the hostages with their fighters to prevent anything while holding discussions.

At least they did have the various entrants even for an insanely late night for most the children, which meant a lot of the kids were both really grumpy and really clingy but at least they were being so to people that actually responded to that how they wanted them to.

Aside ballsy toddler boy. Who had insisted his very bewildered father sit near the Wo Triad Groups' hostages, just so he could childishly introduce the two of them in nearly incomprehensible baby babble and apparently continue napping on her once the excitement of seeing his father faded.

To be honest, the Russian was starting to think he was either a baby Mist or a baby Cloud. She had given her one piece of white sapphire to Mingxia, meaning that unless she asked someone to source a piece for her she wouldn't know for sure right now.

That was, if he was anywhere on the level as Valera was a year older.

This was very much similar behavior to her little brother once he got the message she was part of the family. Proprietary behavior in respects to her person, an assumption he had a right to her lap, and just general comfort seeking once he knew she'd allow it.

However, Mists could be equally obsessed with certain things or individuals.

One really only needed to look at Usov to understand that much. If the Mist had thought he'd get away with it, she wouldn't have put it past him to try sleeping on her too way back in the day.

"He is very bold." Fong eventually commented to the other man pleasantly, only to earn an embarrassed kind of shrug.

"Possibly a bit too much."

"He's fine." Sonya interjected blandly, shifting slightly to get toddler weight off her broken leg she was semi-sure she managed to hide from her foster father. She'd probably hear about it later if he had caught it, but hopefully only well after she had a better handle on her temper. "The kid was probably really confused over what was happening the last couple days, and probably still is. He's not hurting anything, so I don't really care all that much. Besides, I'm probably a lot more comfortable than the floor."

The man she was speaking to, whom she knew hadn't yet been one of Fong's opponents but damned if she could recall how he had handled himself in the tournament so far, cast a general glance over the room they were being held within while alternate arrangements were made for the hostages. Which didn’t include those stupidly comfortable feather pillows, merely a lot of mats and chairs the elderly had the most of.

Nudging her again, the Storm sitting next to her quirked a small smile but nodded to the kid in her lap. "Is that indicative of anything? I honestly wouldn't have expected you to put up with the imposition."

"It's really only for naps." Had he tried to do anything else, like demand her sole attention when she was busy with other things or earlier yesterday morning when she was teaching, it was likely she'd have an entirely different opinion. "But… possibly indicative of Mist or Cloud Flames, the possibilities are about equal from what little I know of baby Flame users. And I have a really limited experience with those."

If you stretched it, the kid's comfortable behavior with her could also be a Storm's obsessiveness or a Lightning's hyper focused and fixed attention span showing. Maybe even a Sun's cheery social-ness expressed to the strongest Flame user in the room who was protecting him. She could even make a case for a Rain's desire for neutrality or safety causing him to seek her out…

…only if the other kids weren't wary of her moving suddenly even after their morning tumbling lesson turned brief pillow fight.

Sonya had thought that was just kids in general responding to her normal distaste for childishness before this, which she had to admit Shamal had tempered a lot but not nearly enough for her to actually seek out children for adorable or 'cute' behavior to twitter over. It could be more her Cloud nature and not her personally, which made for an interesting problem to turn over in her mind.

Ballsy toddler boy had an immunity to that natural wariness she was semi-sure was just part and parcel of someone being around a Cloud Flame user. Either his own yet-to-be-expressed Flame nature countered or made him immune to it, or he was so self-confident he ignored it by sheer and pure willpower alone.

Either way, he'd be one to keep an eye on in the near and far future.

It might feed into that 'only one alpha-Cloud per territory' theory, or just be something generally about them that let baby Clouds feel safe around even grudgingly protecting Clouds. Which might or might not be the issue right here.

Aside ballsy toddler boy, there was the Wolfpack Gang Cloud's behavior when she confronted him in his territory to account for.

Did his younger age make it easier for him to accept her advice, more so than the Khimki Cloud?

She really needed to follow up on the both of them, but it was really a distant secondary concern. They'd either survive or not, and it was depressingly doubtful anything she did would help either other than to draw more attention to them.

"Sonya?"

"Mmm?" Fong really needed another way to get her attention before she broke his pointy elbow.

"Is there any way to tell? For sure?"

"Right now? Not really."

Valera had three active Flame users around him every now and again, he knew Dying Will Flames were possible and his siblings could use it. The fact he might not have it likely had never occurred to her little brother at all even with Arseniy and Lisa not using the colored Flames around him.

If he got a cut when Tatiana was around it was healed with bright sparky yellow Sun Flames, if Cherep was visiting they could have unlimited toys to play with from applications of soft pale purple Flames. If he bugged her enough, she'd enlarge his fluffy toys to climb on using the same purple Flames. That made her giving her baby brother the piece of white sapphire only a calculated risk, as he had the prior knowledge but not the practical application experience to really pull anything up yet without the help.

This kid?

She had no idea if he had Flame using family to know it was possible and if he had ever seen them screw over the rules of reality on their own whims. Giving this toddler a similar bit of off-white sapphire when she wasn't sure of his background history made it more questionable if it would do anything.

Aside which the brat was happily snoozing away, so the question was rather moot right now.

Sonya sighed, feeling a strain on her knee and a responding throb in her broken leg but unable to adjust things so she would be more comfortable. "How much longer? This is getting a bit… stupid."

"Well..." The Storm on her right side hummed thoughtfully, cradling his chin with a hand as he eyed their hopefully temporary holding cell. "It is entirely possible they will decide to move you all to another place instead of return you to where you were. You might have different guards in hopes of derailing the next attempt without your interference. Any way they try to solve this, it will require renegotiation about who and where."

She flatly stared at him, earning a slow blink in return.

"What?"

"...that's it, I'm going to sleep."

Ballsy toddler boy was unhappy to be hauled up out of her lap, but the relief of the stress in her leg was more than worth that baby upset. Picking to just slide down and lay on the floor, and to prop her head up on Fong's thigh, the thief heaved a sigh as the toddler squirmed irritably until she placed him down on her thighs.

"...ah?"

"Put up with it." There was nothing she could use and still support the brat in her hands as he seemed to want, why it had to be on her was a question, so the martial artist would just have to deal.

There wasn't a whole lot of space in here, she even had to fold up her legs in an awkward way just to get down herself and not kick the toddler's father on the other side of her.

Good thing she was wearing pants under this lacy silk tunic thing.

She just had her eyes shut, she wasn't ignoring the rest of the room. When a few other children decided to wander over for nap time too she said a few very nasty things in her native language that startled a laugh out of the man she was sort of taking advantage of.

"Does this happen that often?" Fong inquired in which she was going to consider a criminal level of chipper-ness, with a lot more amusement in his tone than she found polite as a lot of children got sorted out by equally tired parents that decided not to question the mass child response to her lying down.

"...shut up."

The asshole hummed instead of actually articulate a response, from the feel of tiny fingers curling into her hair meant he probably let one of the kids climb into his lap as well.

Why her?

Sonya didn't even like kids.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 25th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"-required to merely report any incidents and not involve yourself."

Sonya yawned broadly, blearily inspecting the chips in her nail polish instead of paying a whit of attention to the man trying to speak to her.

Said man, who was one of the announcers given they both seemed to recognize only his voice, was not expecting that reaction to the demands someone thought was a good idea to place on an already insolently behaving Cloud Flame user and glanced at Fong for some reason.

Probably to elicit some aid.

To be honest, he had only pretended to pay attention himself while somewhat dozing through the conversation. It was probably near dawn's break, and he was slightly regretful he hadn't followed the thief's example and slipped into sleep himself soon after she finally made herself comfortable. The only problem he had with trying to sleep in a room full of unknowns was the fact it was entirely possible someone was waiting for him to try in order to harm him or his 'hostage'.

Given how things had turned out, with almost everyone trying to cheat in some way or form already or the previous attempts on the hostages, he'd rather be cautious for now.

Fong knew, for a fact, at least two of his to-be opponents were using outside Mist Flame users for 'assistance' in their bouts. There was the Lightning that had been paralyzing his opponents before they even entered the ring, someone poisoning their opponents instead, two that were using drugs to deaden themselves to pain, and at least three more he found shifty but unable to decide why.

That didn't include the Rains slowing their opponents in the ring, the Sun he was sure was healing in the bout instead of risk healing outside of it, that Lightning assassin staring at him still flicking blades around the arena before the fights formally started, or any of the other Flame users finding their own ways around the rules.

Sonya's report that someone or some organization had tried for the hostages had not been all that surprising.

They were criminals, they weren't the most trustworthy around. Trying for the reason everyone had to at least appear to conform to regulations was the obvious tactic if someone didn't like the constraints.

Additionally, it was entirely possible this demand was a throw-away one. The one they expected the Cloud to stridently object to and therefore trap herself into something even worse but more politely worded. Fong was not skilled in reading between the lines of spoken word to tell for sure, a deficiency he should probably work on.

He blinked innocently when given an entirely exasperated look, probably for being unhelpfully silent instead of trying his own hand at irritating the Cloud user.

Likely, that man had no idea how lucky it was the thief was paying him and his demands no mind at all.

"If you remain silent, I will take that as acceptance."

"You can do that." Dismissed the blonde woman propped half on his thigh tiredly, apparently way too weary to really be bothered at all. "So long as you know I'm more likely to laugh hysterically than actually conform to anything you try to use that for."

Surprisingly diplomatic if it wasn't for the mocking end. Fong actually expected her to treat that as more of a threat had she been paying attention as it seemed she had.

Well… she had more forbearance than he did in that. Something else to work on, then.

He rather hoped this tournament became a once a year thing, given how much he could take from the whole affair in hopes of improving himself. He had been running out of things he could improve on by himself, frequent testing against others ensured he knew where next to focus his training. Whereas forbearance and patience hadn't been things he expected to learn he needed to develop more, not after the struggle to contain his Storm-ness in his teenage years, he could probably pour more effort into it so he didn't lose his edge.

…but it was slightly galling on a personal level that a Cloud was more patient than he was.

Their… visitor, eventually deciding things had not gone to plan and realizing he had no backup idea to try a different way, huffed disgustedly and rather minced off.

With appreciable relief in his form.

Fong huffed irritably himself, thinking not to polite thoughts about whoever sent him with the demand. Obviously, the man had been aware he was being given a nearly suicidal task. It was just the Russian's entire disregard for the insult that spared him.

"Odds are… half an hour or so." Sonya informed him blandly around another yawn, idly patting the groggy toddler shifting around her ribcage for a more comfortable position to sleep in. "Then they'll come back and actually tell us what the fuck is going on. Or try something else, depending on how stubborn they are."

Humming to show he heard her but had nothing to add, he ensured the two children that opted to clamber into his lap were still asleep. One had knotted her hand into the Soviet Storm-Cloud's hair, but the other had grabbed his braid and was masticating the end.

He wasn't sure how he had become 'safe' to these children so quickly, especially as it seemed the woman hadn't been appreciative of being crowded by them. From Sonya's previous behavior and comments, he had thought she was not a fan of younger children at all.

If it was just purely her influence, that was very… interesting.

Settling back to wait out and see which of her observations would be borne out, Fong examined his various to-be opponents to see if he could get a bit of sleep himself safely enough.

He wasn't the last one awake, although he suspected the thief did nothing more than lightly doze for the last few hours herself rather than actually sleep. From what Fong could see there were about fifteen other fighters and maybe three of the Russian's fellow hostages still somewhat responsive in various levels.

It was interesting to see who left considered who as their greater opponents in this room. He might be making a point of ignoring a Lightning using assassin's attempts to unnerve him, but that was no reason to behave recklessly and fail to take measure of the other entrants he might be fighting later today or sometime in the coming week.

"You know…" Sonya informed him lowly, idly staring up at the ceiling with red rimmed grey eyes as she adjusted her legs, "the more you ignore him the greater the obsession he's going to have."

"I have no idea-"

"Fong, Lightnings are fucking scary." She interrupted bluntly, giving him an upside-down stern look. "I've only dealt with them in glancing ways so far, will likely have more in the near future, but if any of them had the same disturbing intent on me as they had on their various aims I was remotely involved in… I'd at least be concerned of that if not disturbed."

Considering it while he untangled his braid from tiny sleepy fingers, the martial artist shrugged absently for her. "I do not see what giving him attention will do. How did you notice?"

"Lightnings are not subtle." Sonya drawled out sarcastically. "He's been staring at you for several hours now."

"Perhaps he just wants attention."

From the utterly unimpressed look he received from her, she didn't believe that.

Admittedly, he didn't either.

The newest Lightning in the Wo Hop To Triad, Xieren, was a rather intense young man. Very helpful, but almost conspicuously so in aims of integrating himself with the other Flame users to get tips that might help him. If he was an example of the range of personality most Lightnings had, then there might be a highly uncomfortable incident or several in his near future.

Hopefully Xieren would settle down sometime soon, otherwise Xiasheng would take offence with the young man.

"Not to be a hypocrite… but ignoring him won't work."

"You do tend to ignore some things that most wouldn't." Fong agreed neutrally. "Or shouldn't, for that matter."

"So, I would know where and when it wouldn't work, right?" A sigh, and the thief shut her eyes again. "It's your life but Lightnings can be nearly or almost as stubborn as Storms like you and I can be. If you fail to give him what he's looking for in this situation, he might go outside it for whatever he's seeking."

The Storm Flame user in question paused at that, wondering if the whole situation was Flame based and not situational or personal. He was… mostly certain he had done nothing to deserve the attention, but that might not be the situation on the other end.

Even if it was purely Lightning and Storm issue that has become personal, something situational that got tangled into Flame nature, or something personal he was unaware of that was situational in how it was expressed… all of it still meant there was a Lightning that seemed to believe he had an issue with him.

Fong pondered the question for a few silent minutes but was unable to decide it in any satisfying way.

He then wondered if he was alright with being defined by his Flames first and then being Fong second. It seemed to be an actual problem, various Flame users buying into or conforming to the general 'understanding' of what and who they are to the eventual end of defining themselves only as such.

Was he being too stubborn in situations because he was given the leeway to do so as a 'Storm'?

Or because Fong as just himself was merely known to be stubborn?

"Do you think a Storm can be patient?" She was partially something else, as well as diplomatically trained apparently. Sonya might have an interesting opinion on the issue.

"…I don't think we're predisposed to be so, but that doesn't really mean anything." Answered the woman eventually without opening her eyes. "I am apparently obsessive over my self-control that makes me an entirely baffling Cloud Flame user. You might be able to become obsessive over your patience."

Meaning it would be a matter of self-control?

Or simply dedication… "Is that you're advice then?"

"Do you know how ridiculous it is for anyone asking me for Flame related advice?" Sonya informed him bitterly, actually opening her eyes again just to gift him with a glare. "I make up half the shit I do, and basically guess for the rest of it."

Fong blinked down at her blankly. "...truly?"

"What do you think 'expert' means?"

"...someone that can provide advice?"

"Supposedly." She agreed tartly. "An 'expert' is a person that can provide experienced advice for problems of a certain type, yes… but anyone thinking I'm experienced is fooling themselves. I'm not even twenty yet, and while I might have a decade of Flame experience… it's mainly for Clouds, Storms, Mists, and Suns."

"Maybe they just want to hear what they already know." Offered the martial artist thoughtfully.

Sonya arched an eyebrow up at him, huffed, and decided to go back to napping instead of answer with the obvious.

That would include him, yes.

Fong settled back against the wall with a huff of amusement she snorted at, taking another glance around to see who else would refuse to sleep in such an open area with their dependents.

Not many were still awake now, mostly those that took a nap earlier and had been wakened by their friends so they could get some kind of rest and those like him too stubborn to drop off.

Him, and the Lightning, and maybe a handful more.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 25th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"...where is Fong?"

Mingxia bit her lower lip, looking up at Master Yaozu apologetically. "I wouldn't know, sifu. If Fong doesn't tell me, I don't tend to know what's going on. I only know the Mountain Master came back without him this morning. Xiasheng offered to tell me anything involving big brother when he hears when I came here, but he hasn't been by recently."

The elderly martial arts master scowled slightly, taking the seat across from her and examining what was in her hands. "What are you doing?"

"We used the lace from this in Miss Sonya's outfit, I'm replacing it with spare cloth to preserve the seams." Explained the Rain simply enough, shifting the expanse of dark blue silk and the plain white she was using to hold the garment together to help her sew straight.
"Why you?"

"Everyone works here, sifu. Especially big brother and I." Without a particularly prickly Soviet Storm-Cloud in residence, she couldn't claim to be pacifying Sonya's general irritably anymore.

Thankfully, there was helping with the cleanup after the brief visit she could pitch in with instead of going back to the daily lessons on being a good housewife or lover.

…or how to be a good consort.

Mingxia winced when the needle she was wielding punctured through skin, extracting her left hand before her stabbed thumb bled onto the white silk and stained it. Placing the abused digit in her mouth, she rather failed in one-handedly manipulating the silk to see if it needed to be cleaned in a fast hurry.

Master Yaozu had to help in checking over the half-mended garment, although she had never seen the old man ever sew anything he did at least embed the silver needle into the seam for her to pick up later. "How do we get tickets to tonight's bouts, little Ming?"

She blinked at him curiously, but the elderly man didn't explain why he wanted to go back. Extracting her hopefully non-bleeding thumb, the young Rain lifted a shoulder in a shrug. "We would have to ask one of the other men, sifu. Without my brother to arrange it…"

"Actually, Fong himself received a ticket for a guest for entering… as well as Miss Sonya." Xiasheng offered from over their seated elder, stepping through the doorway Yaozu had left open when he entered. "I am somewhat sure, unless Miss Sonya's father reappears in a few hours, that you both may use their tickets without issue."

Giving the hawk-eyed Storm a grateful smile, Mingxia pulled the silk back to where she could work on it more. "Xiasheng, where is my brother?"

"Ah… the final decision was to hold the hostages where the entrants could keep an eye on them… since it seemed the original security arrangement was so 'dubious'. Likely," concluded the man teasingly with a dry smile, "Fong is with Miss Sonya at this present moment."

"Why wasn't that done from the beginning?" Yaozu demanded shortly, not particularly happy for some reason.

Probably because the Storm was a completely shameless type, who didn't care if one of his fellow's old teachers held an issue with his career choice and refused to be sorry about it.

"That part of the facility had been unfurnished upon the start of the tournament. Apparently, it had been finished in the last two days." Explained the man simply enough, glancing over his head to the young Rain. "Fong will not be returning here after his fights, Mingxia."

"I understand, thank you Xiasheng."

Inclining his head, the Storm moved off to continue whatever else he had to do today.

Yaozu gave her a mildly confused but more demanding look.

"…Xiasheng had to promise Fong he'd look after me if big brother joined the Wo Hop To Triad." Explained the Rain obediently to his expectations. "While the other men here would help me if I need it, Fong asked before he knew that."
"Why that man?"

"Xiasheng recruited Fong." For a meaning of the term.

From what her brother had to say about it, it was more an invitation of a new and less risky place to hide out a probably death-sentence warrant for his arrest for participating in an illegal public brawl. Not that the invitation was at all objectionable, her brother was alive and not in some government run work camp after all. But... it was entirely possible the other Storm used the younger one's less than desirable situation to his own benefit.

Again, neither Mingxia nor Fong particularly cared all that much given what the alternative might've been.

"...would you be willing to leave this place?" Yaozu asked after a long moment mulling that over to himself grumpily.

Mingxia paused in her rather mechanical sewing motions, blinking at the elderly man. "To be honest here, sifu? I have... a few options."

"Oh?"

"I'm going to try to get Miss Sonya to take me on after the tournament." Which wasn't entirely guaranteed, even if she had the Soviet woman's help and some advice from her own Mafia Land Lackey. All she could do was ask, the worst that could be said was 'no'. "If I can't get that... one of the local women were looking for a servant. Cleaning, mainly. But it would be legal work... so there is that."

"So, a thief or a...?"

"She runs a... erm. Escort service?" The sheepish smile she mustered for him did not derail the man's suspicion.

"...a thief or a... whore." Yaozu concluded with distaste. "Are those your only options, Ming?"

"Not very many would have any use for a girl, sifu. Busywork, or taking a risk with Miss Sonya's allowances." With a shrug, the young Rain shook her head and returned the bulk of her attention back to the work in her hands. "Otherwise I am too young, or too green, to be of any asset to anyone right now."

The elderly man stared at her flatly for a long moment until she blinked back in confusion.

"If Miss Bazanova won't take you in, you can come with me." Yaozu decided solidly after nearly a full minute of a bewildering staring contest she wasn't sure what the reasoning for was.

"Are you taking her up on the offer she gave?" Mingxia asked, a bit startled and in hindsight that was a rather inane question.

Of course he would if he was inviting her to go with him. As it wasn't likely the elderly man would survive returning to their hometown alone, and she wouldn't assume he'd risk her there, the only other scenario that would make sense was either taking the thief up on her job offer... or striking out in another direction entirely.

...wait, that would make her question not inane.

"I am." Confirmed the elderly martial arts master shortly, cutting out the confusion Mingxia had mired herself in with his words. "It remains to be seen if I will be doing any teaching of the dividuals she mentioned, but the temptation to return to my life’s work is more than enough for me.
Either way, hopefully you might be able to find something less… disreputable, to support yourself to become a lawyer."

Oh dear.

Getting the Soviet Storm-Cloud interested in her hopefully legal-embroiled hope for a career was actually the best option she had, but she was semi-sure Yaozu thought his suggestion was better.
Hopefully, if nothing went terribly wrong, he wouldn't take offense if she opted to barter her eventual future work against the Soviet woman paying for the school hours she would need soon.

At the very least, she wouldn't have to indenture herself to Madam Huizhong and partially pull her brother into the situation just to enable her wish to be a lawyer. Regardless of how it resolved itself, she would be heading to Russia.

Hopefully this wasn't what Bjørn had meant when he claimed everyone else had just sort of simply followed her without asking.

Mingxia would rather have permission than impose herself unwantedly.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 25th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People’s Republic of China.)

"…Fong?"

From the slight snore she was answered with, Sonya assumed the man was still asleep.

Which… really didn't help her right now. Unhelpful lout.

The dormitory they had eventually been moved to was rather nice. A lot nicer than the empty partitioned rooms the hostages, which might've been an unfurnished VIP room for a high-ranking Triad official and his staff. There were actual rooms in this one, with beds and actual seating in a common room where the hallways leading from the bedrooms opened up to.

She'd miss those stupidly, insanely comfortable cushions. Weirdly.

Half of the closet-sized bedrooms held twin single-sized beds installed in them, but most of those had been taken by elderly hostages and those with their kids by the time she got the entirely too tired and zombie-like martial artist shepherd down one of the hallways. Instead, they had a tiny cupboard with most of the space take up by what probably was fondly thought as a double-sized bed.

With a taller than normal Chinese man and herself, and she wasn't exactly small for a woman in these parts, it wasn't a double-sized bed. Just so that complaint was out there.

The Russian hadn't been in the mood to check this place over for escape routes or listening devices when they were finally escorted into here, which Arseniy would not be impressed with but it was highly unlikely anyone else was in the mood for more than just simply knocking out for a few solid hours so there was that.

She'd do it now that she was less exhausted… if only the martial artist she had shared a bed with would let her up.
Sonya blinked up at the ceiling a few times, wondering if she could somehow slide out of Fong's grip without him gripping harder on her ass or left shoulder. It wasn't as if he'd bruise her, she was weirdly resistant to bruises even when she banged a shin on someone's low coffee table… Renato.

Asshole probably had his furniture slanted just so in order to ensure any erstwhile assassin banged around noisily in the dark, so she hadn't fucked with how he had his living room arranged… but damn was that annoying when she nearly kicked the flimsy wood halfway across the apartment because it hadn't been where she thought it was.

Out of all the people she had shared a bed with, from her siblings to her godchild to her best friend, her current bedmate definitely tied for the clingiest if not exceeded what was required for first place. Her sister could occasionally be equally so when they ended up in the same bed, but at least the nurse minded her hands better.

Yeah, okay. She slept on the Storm first. Napped, really. Not the same thing happening here.

She wasn't exactly sure how she slept through the martial artist half rolling over her, much less the man working a hand and arm behind her ass and back. However it happened, the thief was pinned in place because he had his nose buried into the crook of her neck and his arms barring her only obvious escape route.

…maybe she could slide down?

Digging her heels in for the added help, Sonya attempted to wiggle her way out from under the still insensible Storm. The utterly irritating ass snuffled when she got an inch, and then hauled her back up again with his grip on her rear when she attempted to duck under his shoulder.

Then a thigh was shoved in between hers, removing that option from what she could do.

Well… shit.

If the asshole didn't wake up shortly, she was going to refuse to sleep with him again.

She was bored and, now that he was entirely laying on top of her, a bit squished. Sonya didn't have a whole lot in terms of chest, but what she did have was a bit sensitive to being flattened into her ribcage.

Not to mention her stomach. If he touched it, with something other than apparently flat abs she was weirdly immune to, she would be shoving him off even if she'd likely break his arms doing so.

From what little she did glean from the long wait last night, if you broke something you had to keep on fighting with it for however long it would take to figure out a 'best fighter'. The guy from the first night, as well as three others from last night, still had broken limbs rather nicely bandaged now but obviously still hampering them.

She did wonder if she broke it would it then be healed, but she was kind of doubtful.

Eventually, the moment Sonya ran out of things to ponder or got too uncomfortable due to the pressure, she'd try poking Fong awake. Even if she could likely stab a finger through steel or concrete, meaning flesh and bone probably would be less than resistant to her.

Was she like the cool side of the pillow to him?

She wasn't a full Storm, and between Fong and Renato sharing her bed she was fully aware she didn't have the same kind of high body temperature as them. The hitman was very nice hot water bottle to have in a drafty attic inn room and, even if they only had sheets at the moment, the martial artist's body heat was rather nice right now. If a bit… overwhelming with the latest readjustment.

Well, Mingxia would be on the even cooler side of the spectrum then… right?

Rains and Mists were the lowest, in fact they were almost hypothermic compared to any normal human's internal temp.

…did Cherep ever end up in bed with Viper?

Could he confirm that?

She knew Usov was a bit chilly to her the rare few times she had personal contact with the preteen after he got a measure of control over his Flames, but that might've just been Russia's usual climate.

Then again, Shamal wasn't really all that cool to the touch yet. However he was still growing, which might throw off any assumption she could make. Depending.

"I wonder… Fong?"

Sonya wasn't sure if the snort was the martial artist responding or just impeccably timed happenstance.

"…this tournament and the fights have been stupid."

After a minute, she concluded that it didn't work when the man slept on completely unbothered by her comment.

With a sigh, the thief wiggled slightly as much as she was allowed by the Storm's grip on her to test how easily she could move. While the weight of a fully-grown man on her ribcage didn't really impact her breathing all that much, the only thing she could move without getting an unhappy grunt from her bedmate were her hands.

When she moved the thigh trapped by his, Fong suddenly yanked himself into a more or less kneeling position over her and blearily inspected her neck with visible puzzlement.

"That's what wakes you up?" Sonya asked archly, shifting again to draw upright when the Storm absently followed along to finally allow her to move.

"…erm." Fong offered roughly, still looking a bit more than addled and now entirely confused instead of just puzzled.

He absently tugged his braid out from behind Sonya's right shoulder, and definitely didn't seem to have all his wits about him just yet.

"Move your legs, then you can go back to sleep." She couldn't move her left leg without kneeing him somewhere she was pretty certain he wouldn't appreciate being hit, and she couldn't pull herself any farther up the bed because her back was already against the wall. "I just need to get up."

He blankly peered down at her for a long moment, then obligingly did as she asked with a semi-controlled fall onto his left side. More or less face-planting back into the dense and flat pillows provided for them without so much as a word, which she was slightly sure hadn't been his intent but a result he wouldn't mind at all.

Rolling her eyes, because that was pretty much as helpful as Fong ever was so she wasn't sure why she expected anything different, the Soviet Storm-Cloud slid off the bed to first figure out where the bathroom was and then where her chest got to. Then… well, she might as well go back to sleep herself.

Hopefully the Storm would be less grabby when she got back.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 25th of October, 1969 continued. Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Arseniy slugged his assaulter in the jaw, knocking the gangly youth out cold while his whipcord 'guide' knifed both of the other 'muscle' sent to discourage the Russian's poking about.

Faster than the last man could cut and run, he slammed his left hand directly on the man's throat and hefted him up a good foot off the ground.

Liqin cleaned his knives off on the jacket of one of his two victims and kicked them into a more sheltered part of the alleyway, sheathing the blades back into his sleeves and calmly strolling over to the kid the vor had knocked out. "Honestly speaking, I had expected it to take longer for anyone to go after you."

With a snort, the older man sourly eyed the chatty idiot that made it semi-obvious he was the one calling the shots before he admittedly hit first.

Obviously, the mere act of visiting his foster daughter in her captivity had advertised Arseniy's presence perfectly well. While Sonya might be constrained due to the contract she agreed to fulfill, he was now the more concerning Russian in the People's Republic of China just simply because he could ask awkward questions or dig into suspicious behavior.

There was a lot of it on the streets, and not all of it was Triad-related. Some kind of regime shift was making all sorts of things unstable and confused, which just helped him rather than provide an obstacle.

Arseniy slammed his victim against the brick wall a few times to knock him out for easy transportation, letting the insensible man slid to the ground where the Chinese assassin was pouring a small amount of some liquid in a hip flask out on his gangly target. With a curious sniff, the Russian narrowed his eyes and wondered what was in that.

It wasn't wine… hopefully it was some kind of whisky.

Liqin picked up the teenager, handing the flask over so he could 'doctor' his own explanation for why they'd be carting around two individuals against their will in broad daylight. Arseniy took a nip for himself before wasting a bit on his victim.

Hmm… rum. Not what he was used to, but decent enough in a pinch.

"Is this all you're going to do? We're going to have a few rather disgruntled prisoners in short order..."

"Why bother hunting? They'll come to me." Especially as the thief was 'contained'.

Sonya was in a predictable location, with an easily found schedule and surrounded by softer targets that might suffer if it came down to an actual fight.

Arseniy… wasn't.
He was free to be a very big, ugly ass thorn in someone's side if they were specifically targeting Russians. Eventually, someone he ran into will be connected to whoever was going after his daughter and he could tailor his movements appropriately.

It didn't mean he was going to ignore the patently obvious until he got there, but until he got an actual bite on his 'baiting' just clocking a few upstarts a new punch card was entertaining enough and hopefully distracting.

He really only had to give his foster daughter enough time to wait out her constraints. If things were that annoying, she could take care of it herself once she could move freely. Making himself a general pain in the ass could backfire eventually but keeping to the 'Wo' Triad Groups' territory made thing harder to accuse him of anything.

The brief excursions outside it was just him ensuring he had the widest range of exposure to keep stress of his daughter.

Between their two victims this afternoon, or the four including the two enforcer types, he didn't really expect a whole lot. Maybe something the Wo Hop To Triad could use in exchange for taking the bodies, but probably not anything he was interested in yet.

So long as he wasn't the one picking fights, no one had the grounds to bitch to the Triad 'hosting' him.

Which was incredibly flimsy in all respects, but anyone complaining would then have to explain why their people assaulted a guest of another Triad in their own territory to be taken prisoner in the first place. Mustering any kind of attack would be inviting a full-scale war between Triads, which made it highly unlikely if the attempts started off with something as anonymous as poison attempts.

He'd rethink his approach the moment things escalated.

Eventually, things might get rougher than he could handle alone or with a single man to back him up. Hopefully before it got to that he would find who it was trying to assassinate his foster daughter.

Arseniy paused, half to let Liqin catch up after putting away his flask of rum and half to wonder what the hell he would do if nothing showed up in a reasonable amount of time.

He didn't really want to get too embroiled in these parts. Sonya might be interested in China, but he wasn't.

As amusing as it could be to scrap with a few idiots around here and duck the Hong Kong Police, he had Lisa and Valera waiting for him back home.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 25th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"-have no idea why you keep apologizing."

"It's… just accept it." Fong asked with appreciable exasperation as he came into the holding room. "I didn't mean to… ah…"

"…do I want to know?" Zhōng inquired before the young Russian woman could respond, placing a box he was unsure the thief still needed on the table between them.
Oddly, the usually self-possessed Storm flushed slightly before settling back into the seat stiffly and not looking at him.

Sonya looked equally as confused as he did at first, turning to him with an utterly flat look after a moment of staring. "Fong is apparently embarrassed that he-"

Fong slapped a hand over her mouth before she could fully explain the situation. "Sonya. Please. Good evening, Master Zhōng. Was there anything else we needed to know?"

"Nothing of consequence you could not guess for yourself." He informed his fighter blandly, settling into his seat while the Russian pulled away from the martial artist with a strange look for him and dug into Huang's care package. "Most the conversation I was involved in that didn't concern where you are being held was more of how the revenue of the betting would be distributed once the fights are finished."

She clicked her chopsticks together, swallowing what was probably the only thing she had eaten for an entire day. "...where we're being held? Is tiny. They don't have big enough-"

Again, the Storm moved to physically silence his fellow Flame user. Who looked highly unamused at the obstruction to her meal, and instead of allowing the imposition again she bit his hand.

Well… more closed her teeth down on the webbing of the hand between the thumb and index finger but not hard enough to actually catch any flesh hard enough to rip into it.

Sonya pointed her steel chopsticks in the martial artist's face with a scowl painted across her lips. "Do not do that. Once, sure. Whatever. Twice? I will bite a finger off if you do that again."

The Mountain Master of the Wo Hop To Triad wondered if there were more Mists about, or if the two of them just happened to be ridiculously behaving on average. It wasn't something he would've thought of Fong, but from her brief stay within his headquarters he did expect if from her.

"Miss Sonya. Your father visited us briefly." When all the thief did was raise an eyebrow as she took another bite of the dim sum packed into a plastic container, he continued. "He left us two prisoners and wandered off again."

"...yeah. Sounds like Arseniy." Confirmed the woman needlessly before going back to her boxed meal, as if that needed to be verified.

Zhōng pressed his mouth in a thin line, wondering if she was being obtuse for any reason or if she genuinely didn't see an issue with her father's behavior.

Admittedly, he didn't greatly mind the Russian attracting attention to himself off his daughter's issues here if it did stop some of the incidents. It had yet to be proven, but he could take advantage of the incident regardless.

However, the numbers brought in might become a bit difficult to handle in short order.

He wasn't in the business of kidnapping, what secure rooms he had were few and mainly smashed due to the thief's irritability. Maybe he should look into remodeling the compound a bit… and include some of the more modern plumbing…

…and an off-site facility to enable the two of them to destroy to their heart's content.

Hopefully that way he wouldn't lose the garden again if they held this tournament again. Outside a yearly demolition, he could task it to be storage and have it cleared out without needing to task someone to it.

Her succinct response left them with little to talk about now.

He pinned his prized martial artist with an expectant look instead of attempt conversation with another brusque Russian. "Care to fill me in on what the issue might've been before my arrival?"

"…not particularly-"

"he cuddles in his sleep." Sonya informed him bluntly between bites.

Said Storm pinched the bridge of his nose and sighed heavily. "Yes. Thank you, Sonya. I am fairly sure he didn't need to know that."

…he regretted asking.

"Also," continued the thief blandly, "actual blankets might be nice."

"I will convey your request." Vowed the Wo Hop To Triad's Mountain Master. Anything to get away from that particular topic.

Fong frowned pensively, glancing sideways at the woman. "…is that your only complaint?"

"Honestly? Yeah." She considered him in turn. "Well… that and you have a weird obsession with my ass."

Zhōng now wondered if Sonya held some Mist Flames, or if just a few Flame users in the same room complicated the 'weird' factor anyone Mist puts out. While he had learned more than he had about his arguably best Storm user in the last few minutes than he had the last few years… but they were really things he could've happily gone his entire life without learning.

The man being discussed in question opted to pretend as if nothing too embarrassing was being said about him. Giving the Mountain Master an impressively straight-faced look of polite attention, Fong smiled tightly. "Master Zhōng, did anything else interesting happen recently?"

"The Red Guard was finally formally disbanded instead of merely backhandedly slandered in the news. Chairman Mao advised to have the youths sent to the countryside and it looks as if it really is happening." He offered, certain that it was news to one of them if merely an update for what the other already knew. "A fair amount of reorganizing is going on to account for the unhampered police force."

Appreciatively Fong's eyebrows rose up and even the Russian paused in eating.

Sonya cocked her head to the side after a while to mull the information over, pulling the chopsticks out of her mouth to pose a question. "Does that mean your Cultural Revolution is over?"

"I highly doubt it. Merely that the main arm of the unruly interruptions and disorganized chaos coming from them will decrease." Explained Zhōng tiredly, rubbing the bridge of his nose. "Hopefully it will mean the mess will get organized, but that might be too much to hope for in just one policy change."

Simply inclining her head to accept the information, the Soviet woman went back to her meal.

"Has it impacted anything important?" Inquired the Storm next, idly so if the older man deemed anything too important to speak of in a likely observed meeting he would not object to a subject
"Not as of yet, Vor Bazanov seemingly is perfectly happy to wait at the edges of our territory and confuse the hell out of everyone attempting to cut corners into it... as well as drawing a lot of attention to himself."

Sonya hummed appreciatively for the update, polishing off the dim sum in a few more quick bites. Setting that empty container aside, she pulled a shallow dish with likely lukewarm dumplings to eat next. "Question. Do you end up supporting a fair amount of civilian infrastructure as well?"

"As well?" Zhōng echoed, considering the question coming from the woman.

She shrugged, attempted to stab Fong's hand for stealing one of her steam buns, then glanced back at him. "We do it a lot. Arseniy's usual duties involve keeping up my childhood neighborhood, like fixing up utilities or leaking roofs and the like. In exchange for the clan shoring up the local infrastructure, the area generally ignores anything too strange going on and won't report us for stupid shit young thieves might get into."

"...interesting." No, he wasn't talking about how childish the two could be in the same room. He was getting slightly used to it now.

The head of the Wo Hop To Triad wondered if that suggestion would work here. Obviously, that was a long-term investment... but an interesting one.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 25th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

It took until Fong's fight in the tournament for Sonya to realize what was bugging her.

There hadn't been anything resembling an attempt on her or her fellow hostages this night.

...she was actually surprised to be slightly irritated by that.

Shit. Had the attempts been helping her subside peacefully in a very nice and gilded cage?

...whoops.

The Soviet Storm-Cloud, too antsy to have settled down with her knitting project and without her book or pipe, paced instead to work off some of the energy she had. She earned herself a betrayed little pout from Ballsy Toddler Boy, but the kid eventually bedded down with his fellow brats when it became apparent something was off with her and the thief wasn't settling down anytime soon.

Hopefully the lack of anything happening wouldn't key her up too much, because in captivity she had no idea how to bleed it off without ripping their much nicer prison apart.

With the addition of the tournament entrants, she wouldn't appreciate having to go back to that empty set of rooms again. Even if she was still tempted to break out and steal those stupidly comfortable pillows.

Turning back to the ongoing tournament, which really wasn't all that fun to watch for her as she wasn't participating but she hadn't realized she might be tempted into such things before being taken hostage, the thief attempted to focused on the fights instead of pace.
She set her teeth when she realized Fong still had the very nasty bad habit of always dodging left first when surprised. Now that whoever was organizing the tournament's bouts realized the Storm wasn't any kind of green horn in a ring, he was getting more interesting fights that lasted more than fifteen minutes if he was being nice.

If he did it again, she'd say something. While yeah she took advantage of that little habit of his in their tussles, the thief was interestingly not alright with anyone else using that tell against him.

Stopping her fidgeting, Sonya ran her mind back over that thought suspiciously and tried to make sense of the tangled feelings under it. It took barely five minutes, in which Fong utterly failed to actually land a hit on his opponent of the night, for her to start pacing again.

…really not good. This non-incident thing was really throwing her off.

She had not actually experienced a whole lot of jealousy in her life, there was that Cherep and Dmitriy thing and that had been about it for her. Queerly, she was really jealous of the Storm that asked her to be his hostage right now.

He got fights, she had to just watch.

Chewing on her lower lip irritably, Sonya scowled at the floorboards under her bare feet as she tried to figure out something to drain off her irritation and general ill-feelings without trying to murder someone.

There was a dull roar from the spectators somewhere above the Soviet Storm-Cloud, signifying first blood in the bout went to Fong's opponent against some expectations.

She paused, wondered if the martial artist had gotten a bit over confident from the last few 'easy' nights, and shoved that thought to the back of her mind as likely jealousy induced and not fit to be spoken as she continued moving.

Besides, the Storm gave back as good as he got with a probably rib-cracking palm-thrust to his opponent's upper left chest just under the man's arm.

He had to duck under a knee aimed at his head in revenge, but the martial artist managed it at the very last second to the point his braid wrapped around the other man's foot.

Interestingly, Fong then grabbed his braid and lit it with Storm Flames. Startled, his opponent back peddled awkwardly on one foot trying to disentangle himself. Blinding himself to the leg sweep and the subsequent knee drop to the man's sternum.

Sonya blinked when a very different roar, this one of approval, clued her into the fact she had stopped for at least a full minute watching the scuffle end.

…maybe she should watch more than just Fong's bouts. It really couldn't hurt, and maybe she could find something else to temper her antsy behavior.

Cocking her head curiously, the thief took a full three steps to the left. It put her in reach to the pillar that held up the left side of the balcony over their heads, and just in range to grab the man attempting to scale the side of the arena's walls while most were more distracted by the last few exchanges of Fong's bout.

"Um..." Coughed out the new man uncomfortably, gripping her wrist in exchange for her nearly crushing his windpipe out of suspicion. "...I was... just... curious?"
Sonya blinked at him blankly as he shakily fought to keep his footing on the railing likely intended to keep the kiddies from falling out.

…not a 'retaking' of the hostages?

Well… free target anyways.

Drawing him further into their little alcove, she positioned him just so that when she punched him he'd at least break through the door they had been led into. The man realized at probably the last second what she was doing, but even if he dug dirty fingernails into her wrist it didn't save him from getting slugged in the cheekbone.

Irritatingly, as he wasn't trying to kidnap them she was trying to avoid killing him, she didn't hit him with enough force to break the door. And the Lightning guards outside it were prompt in yanking it open to take possession of the moron.

A tug was applied to the hem of her skirt, and the knitting old granny offered her abandoned knitting supplies. "Feel better?"

"Much." Even if the man was rude as hell for not breaking the door. Sonya took the offering and sat next to her. "I missed your son's fight. How did he do?"

"He lost, unfortunately. I think he broke his nose tonight..." The elderly woman sighed, absently straightening out her yarn.

"…ah. I am… sorry to hear that." Responded the thief probably too slowly and a bit woodenly to be fully believable. "You can at least see him shortly? That might help."

She earned a mildly amused but still a bit worried looking smile in return.

(Sunday the 26th of October, 1969. Björn's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

With a wince-inducing thud, a sizable stack of paperwork was added to the Icelander's battered coffee table.

Which, if he was pressed to be honest, hadn't exactly been cleared of other bits of paperwork he had yet to sort through.

Björn looked up at the hitman who had done the dumping of paper on him suspiciously. "What is this?"

"More than half of that is estate properties for sale in the area Sonya needs to be in for Shamal's eventual education in Italian Mafia things," Renato Sinclair, the Italian Mafioso and fellow godparent of his Lady's godchild, explained simply with a wave and a sharp turn to make his way out again as abruptly as he let himself in, "the other half is the shit I promised Verde for the whole keeping his head down."

"…you could have knocked." Critiqued the Lightning-Storm irritably, reaching for the top file to start sorting through this instead of contracts his patron wasn't available to run for at least another week and a half if not more.

The hitman paused, giving him a sardonic look over a shoulder. "I could have. Slightly less efficient,
"It's generally considered polite," continued Björn dryly, "especially as while my Dama might enjoy your company... I don't."

"Is there a particular reason why you're being so snippy with me, Lackey?"

"You assaulted me the first time we met."

The Sun user blinked exactly once, and then he considered the ceiling thoughtfully and made a little tisking sound as he turned back around. "...oh, right."

He gave his entirely unwanted visitor an irritated look over the first folder of a... castle that needed some serious renovation and actual rebuilding of certain parts to be habitable. "Is that it?"

"If you're expecting an apology, you're not getting it. Sonya missed Shamal's birthday, that was why I wanted to talk to your 'Dama.'" Drawled the hitman sarcastically. "Getting the brush off meant he had been very upset at the lack of Russian thief in his life. Guess who had to put up with that shit."

"Very sorry." Shot back the Lightning-Storm equally as sarcastically. "But if you picked to distrust the Lackey of the woman you wanted to reach with the situation in question... then fuck you."

The smirk that painted itself across the man's face was not heartening nor nearly as irritated as Björn might have wished. "Ho? You've got some, as the little dragon lady would say, brass ones, boy."

With a shrug, because honestly he wasn't exactly sure where the 'snappiness' was coming from, he discarded the first folder to start a 'maybe' pile and investigated the next one. "Dama will be most unamused to lose the investment she made in me."

Renato Sinclair gave him an impressively droll look. "Hiding behind Sonya's skirts?"

"Wouldn't you? It's surprisingly efficient to keep incidents low without having to barter or rely on anything more valuable."

The other man considered it, then him, and shrugged. "Fair enough. I'm doing the same thing with Shamal, so..."

The Icelander picked up the third folder, the second was too small for what they would eventually need if his Lady kept adding to her staff at any rate she had previously and so started the 'no' pile. "If you insist, sir."

"Cute." Drawled the hitman sardonically, turning on his heel to finally leave Björn's apartment. "Call me that again and I'll just have to explain a bullet hole in your leg to Sonya."

"Good luck." Called the Lightning-Storm after the man, sighing heavily when the door slammed behind the Italian and now making a new 'maybe' pile that didn't need so much renovation but had historic regulations on the property.

Maybe he should just have a 'maybe for various reasons' pile instead...
(Sunday the 26th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Being less exhausted this time around meant that he at least woke first, if in a bit of a mirror of yesterday's positions.

Meaning Fong had a Russian Storm-Cloud thief half-sprawled across him this time.

…and he had absolutely no idea how to extract himself from this without embarrassment before she woke herself. At the very least, he could release the back of her left knee and not mention it was likely he was the reason for her practically half-straddling his hip.

He didn't know which of them had moved to enable it, but at least he wasn't the only one with wandering hands. One of hers had ended up under the waist of his changshan to find the skin of his stomach, and while he couldn't tell where the other one was exactly it likely had grip on his braid from the tiny tugs on it not in time with her breathing.

Musing on the issue was the least he could do, as he wasn't sure how to move without the woman sprawled across him waking from it.

The Storm didn't know how long it was between realizing what position he was in and when someone knocked on their door, but he didn't think it had been nearly long enough.

"…lady Cloud?"

"I'm up." Sonya called mostly into his chest, stubbornly not moving even if answering had betrayed her coherent status.

Fong poked her in the arm after a moment of hesitation both on his own end and on their caller's behalf. "How long have you been awake?"

"Who knows." It didn't seem as if she was all that bothered by their position or had any intent to bestir herself anytime soon. All she did was stubbornly bury her face into his chest more before calling out so the individual behind their door could hear. "What?"

"I'm sorry for interrupting, but could you perhaps…" A blonde head popped up to give the elderly lady that slid their door open slightly a look Fong couldn't see, but he could see the surprised expression on their visitor's face. "…ah, are you…? Should I come back?"

Sonya huffed, pushing herself fully upright. "I'm awake. What is it?"

He jerked his hands away from the yawning woman that moved without shifting away and ended up straddling his stomach, but the Storm was depressingly aware that probably didn't help things.

Maybe if he closed his eyes, this wouldn't be happening?

"…um. Can you… bleed off a bit of the energy the children have again, Lady Cloud?"

"Fuck… yeah. Give me a minute to really wake up." Responded the thief thoughtfully after stretching out her back as if there was nothing about this she found strange. "Fong? Want to come with?"
"What are you doing?" If there was any justice in the world, she'd get off him before she slid back enough to notice something he'd really rather her not.

Crass, and a bit rude, but... she didn't seem to even notice her own provocative behavior might cause him some issues.

"Baby tumbling lessons." Sonya didn't entirely leave her position but leaned forward far enough to require a hand planted on the mattress in order to reach the pipe she had left on the ledge of their headboard.

Fong ended up nearly nose-to-chest with the woman for a long moment, which took a few breathing exercises to not react impulsively to... and he did not mean to take a deep breath. "...do you often sleep with other people?"

"Erm... mostly my sister. Occasionally a few others depending on the situation. Why?"

...that had been a bad question to ask.

He had seen Tatiana and Sonya merely perched on the same bench, and how that ended. Twice. Likely, their bedtime antics were not much better.

However, it did mean she likely didn't see an issue with her behavior. Siblings of the same gender would probably have less issues climbing over each other, or anything else an entirely different person would assume was less innocent in intent.

Since he had made Tatiana's acquaintance himself, and knew of her sister's mischievously conniving ways, it was entirely possible the Sun had specifically mislead the Storm-Cloud in hopes of making others who ended up in bed with her uncomfortable. Or even if not intentionally, then through understanding of how her little sister's mind worked and accounting for that without mentioning others would not think the same.

He wasn't sure how to raise the issue, especially as she sat back on his stomach to investigate the bowl of her pipe before finally getting off him.

Fong took a second for himself before following, still wondering how one held such a conversation with an at most friendly acquaintance and trying not to think of what he would've thought had a different woman done the same things.

Sonya didn't wait for him to gather his thoughts, nor for him to untangle himself from the bare sheet they had, she left their room for the common room without a look back.

A less than graceful stumble, caused by the tangle that only became apparent after she slid out of it by virtue of her slim form, the Storm followed with slightly undue haste. There was an early brunch served and apparently they were finally deserving of thin wool blankets, laid out in the decent-sized sitting room arrangement.

His erstwhile sleeping companion made a beeline for the blankets without so much as glancing at the food, either absent minded distraction or a dismissal of any concern he found slightly impressive as he knew how long it had been since she had last eaten. Passing on the food himself, anyone wishing to get rid of her would really only have to kill him to invalidate her whole reason to be included here so he would not mind following suit and only eating food he knew wasn't poisoned, Fong ended up with an armful of two blankets shoved on him.

She spread three down herself, then turned and gestured to a spot for him to presumably copy her actions before putting a few fingers in her mouth and unleashing a rather piercing whistle before starting a few stretches one could do in a stationary position.

He found the number of children that quickly obeyed that call unsurprising, even the sullener teenagers and a painfully earnest young man who looked surprised that she was waiting for them all semi-impatiently.

"Same drill as last time, they only have to do it once for me to accept them fucking off." Instructed the thief to the only helpful looking young man, before shooing the younger ones in a more or less single file line.

It devolved into three ragged ones, which she eventually deemed good enough. "We don't have the same things this time, so we're going to do this one by one. Fong can check you lot over first."

While her… aide? Was busy translating that for those that didn't speak Mandarin, she ensured that at least some attention was being paid to her before collapsing backwards only to roll with the motion and end up in a crouching position a foot from her starting point. Demonstrating it twice more from different angles, with a brief pause to tap none to gently on the head of the only young girl that wasn't paying her any attention, she then gestured for someone to come forward and try themselves.

She got instantly embroiled in the argument between three young children that had their own ideas of what to do, leaving Fong suddenly on his own with a handful of young adults.

…wait, he was teaching?

"Just watch them so they don't break something. Again, they only have to copy it decently to be excused, most of them will probably only do it once." Sonya reminded him needlessly, which probably meant he had unfortunately said that aloud.

Instead of saying that, he merely nodded hesitantly.

One of the younger men said something a bit insulting about needing to be included under his breath, not nearly low enough to get both thief and martial artist miss it. She likely didn't understand the words, but with his entire demeanor a translation was probably not needed to get the general idea.

A hand shot out and gripped the young boy's throat, lifting him off his feet by it and bringing him face-to-face with a highly annoyed Russian. She bared her teeth in a too sharp looking half-smile, half sneer.

"Ensure this one can do it perfectly." She dumped the now cowed young man in front of the Storm.

"…that much, I can at least do."

The Soviet Storm-Cloud eyed him oddly, then heaved a sigh and made a motion for him to get on with it in a lazy rotation of her wrist. "I have no idea why I thought you'd be any help here when you're not usually so…"

He blinked at her back blankly, wondering what in the world she was talking about. This was him helping her, wasn't it?

…were there times she wanted more, and he didn't realize?

(ooo000000)

(Sunday the 26th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)
Sonya eventually got all the children through the exercise, letting a few of the more excited brats loop around for another go without protest.

Fong, in his utter unhelpfulness, only worked on that one snotty brat while she handled the rest.

When the last brat, ballsy toddler boy, eventually got fed up rolling around with her help and wandered off for something to drink and probably cuddle-time with his dad the thief took an entirely ill-timed opportunity to reflect on how ridiculous it was she was doing this.

Her brother would burst a rib laughing if he could see her now. Frankly, she would assume the rest of the family would be equally as amused if less exuberant in it. Renato, as much as he'd probably loathe being lumped in together with the stuntman, would be nearly as amused.

...fuck, Crina would've-

She stopped that thought there, striving to prevent a scowl from twisting her lips and disturbing any of her fluttery-flighty fellow hostages.

"Something wrong?"

Of course Fong would notice right off the mark.

Sonya threaded a few fingers through her hair, restlessly and fruitlessly trying to ignore she didn't know what her old master of mysticism had done with her body and if there was a grave or not to visit. "...no. I'm going back to sleep. Wake me up when Zhōng gets in."

She couldn't go visit the circus and have some fun getting the old gypsy woman smashed or trading snippy little quips with her anymore. One part of that was now gone and dust forever, meaning the impulse to go check up on the old bat was invalid. Cherep wasn't even with the circus right now, there was no reason to blow off this Triad thing just to double-check what she already knew and likely make things awkward for those trying to move on.

Snatching the topmost blanket from the 'kiddy pile', she turned on a heel and stalked back down the hallway to their room. At least tried anyways, she got stumped by the fact all the doors looked alike and she didn't know if Fong had left their room's ajar or anything.

...which was not good for her steadily fraying temper.

"Two more doors." Corrected the Storm, having apparently dismissed his poor sap for wobbling on his way when she bailed in order to follow her. He did at least prevent himself from repeating his query until the point when she finally located their room and stopped dead because she had forgotten her damn pipe. "...are you sure-"

"Fong, it's nothing you can help with." Apparently today was just a day to depress herself. Curling up and pretending she was anywhere but here sounded good. "Unless you want to get in bed yourself, shoo. And grab my pipe for me."

Annoyingly enough, the man had been right in which one was theirs.

Straightening out the tangle of sheets and wondering what the hell Fong had done to get it all twisted like that... the thief paired the sheet and blanket together then tossed the whole assemble onto the bed. Before climbing in, she took a second to dig one of the books out of the chest provided for storage.

How had they gotten from their former prison to here?
Suspiciously, she inspected the bindings and the cover of the hardback tome. Seeing nothing besides the wear and tear a life of travel imparted on her things, she fanned through the pages quickly.

The needle that stabbed into her palm had been embedded into the binding itself, just waiting for her to open the book to read and deliver whatever method of death was being tried, something sticky made pulling the tiny splinter of metal easy to extract.

Now highly irked, Sonya sat on the bed and investigated the rest of her things to see what else had been tampered with.

She ended up with three more needles, one that had spilled into the bottom of her chest and the other one she extracted from her other book. Zhōng had not delivered a book yesterday, so the very battered Russian sci-fi book was likely the one that lost the needle before it could stab her.

When the door slid open again, the thief snatched her pipe and shoved the likely poisoned pins on the Storm she was sharing accommodations with. "How many times does it take before I can formally raise the issue with the head of whichever of these damn groups?"

"...technically, once was one time too many." Fong replied absently, rolling the tiny needles around his fingers thoughtfully. "What... what is on these?"

"Sap, probably. Any known poisonous plants around?" Sonya got fully under the covers, her now de-booby-trapped book set aside for pipe-inspection.

She should look over the pouch of tobacco she had been given for this shit too. Luckily, she was pretty sure one of the old men had it in his chest and so it was probably not poisoned.

...probably.

Looking up before she started inspecting the other frequently used item with her, half curious over what had distracted her bed-mate and half to either order him out to find her tobacco or into bed with her, she got distracted by his obvious unhappiness. "...Fong?"

"...this is probably not safe to handle with bare skin." The martial artist informed her a bit pointedly, a grimace on his face as he eyed the latest attempt on her life.

"Pull up your Storm Flames, not enough to fill a palm but just enough so your skin warms." Sonya cut herself off when the man's entire forearm burst into angry ruby Flames. "...or you could do that. Storm Flames burn everything but us including things in us that isn't, so if you use that be careful. I burnt off three years of immunization shots doing it."

He shook off the ash that now was the only remains of the pins and his right sleeve, then turned to her and cocked an eyebrow. "Is that how you ate all those poisoned dishes the first night?"

"I couldn't get anything from eating them, but I could still taste. Even if they were all likely a bit off from what they should taste like."

"Interesting... I'll work on that little trick." Barreling on before she could ask if that meant he panicked and used too much Storm Flames, Fong nearly folded his arms into his sleeves before he recalled he only had one now and ended up just gripping his right wrist instead. "Will you now tell me what's wrong?"

Son of a bitch. She had only just managed to focus on something else…

"Sonya?" The irritating asshole perched hesitantly on the edge of the bed, making things dip... shift in his direction and earning him a look from her. Fong regarded her levelly… if it wasn't for the faintly worried crease to his brow. "The week is nearly up, two or three more days of this then we're free. You've done wonderfully so far, if it's getting to you-

"No. Well… yes, but no." Frustrated, a bit moody, and now a bit more depressed, the thief raked the fingers of her left through her hair again. "It's not the tournament… although I don't think I can do something like this again without more help… it's just-

Being unwilling to talk about Crina was stupid, the woman was dead. Outside of anyone's reach, even if she pissed off every last criminal element in the world the old gypsy woman would never be used against her or harmed by the association.

Knowing all that didn't mean Sonya was alright with the idea.

However, Fong still deserved something. He was sharing space with her and she knew some thought she was terrifying when she was calm. Sharing space with her when she was antsy or highly irritated at the drop of a pin had to be unnerving even for him.

"An… old, friend of mine died." Was safe enough, but she struggled with how to phrase the rest of it rather innocently. "…they refused medical help. Which was their choice, but I still disagree. But it's useless now, because they're gone, and I can't go argue or see them and-

She twitched when she got a sudden hug that pulled her forward a bit awkwardly.

Confused, she absently patted Fong's shoulder and tilted her head back so her voice wouldn't be muffled by his shoulder. "…what's this for?

"I'm sorry about your friend." Fong informed her honestly enough, giving her an extra squeeze which she would forever deny made her eyes itch with even stupider tears. "Was it recent?"

"…earlier this year. I only learned about it recently." Sonya corrected absently, setting her chin on his shoulder. "I haven't… adjusted to the idea yet. The reminders still hurt."

Fong hugged kind of like Cherep did when he was more concerned and less playful. It was nice. Probably went hand in hand with being a big brother.

Did all big brothers give good hugs, or had she and Mingxia just lucked out?

"…thanks."

"You're welcome."

Sonya grimaced as she realized her cheek had ended up smeared with what was likely ash from his Flame-fit in the course of this hug. "…can you let me go now?"

He jerked back, thankfully releasing her beforehand. "Sorry."

She plucked the pipe up from her lap to absently toy with and shrugged. "One of the others has my tobacco pouch, I don't know if it's been tampered with… I kind of didn't check everything over when were moved in here."

Then didn't pick up a book or her knitting needles for an entire day. No telling what her yarn was laced with now.

"I'll go ask for it." Fong's wine-red eyes fell to the slender brass she was sliding between her fingers.
"What about that?"

"…well, if it was it's not now. I generally use Storm Flames to light it."

"How does that work?"

"Badly, which is the point. I was supposed to stop smoking, according to my sister. If I light my pipe with Storm Flames, it eats the tobacco before I inhale the smoke. I only occasionally use matches." Then she was just left with inhaling smoke and ash, which didn't really burn again even with her Storm Flames very well… "But the act of smoking is habit forming when you did once smoke… and I find it relaxing even if I don't actually smoke anything."

"Ah. I see."

Sonya arched an eyebrow at him, which the man eventually realized after a few more moments of contemplative thought.

"What?"

"Shoo. Find my tobacco." She glanced over to the empty side of the bed. "Or get in, one of the two. I don't care which."

Fong's mouth opened, shut, opened again.

Then he blinked rapidly as he got upright. "I will… find your tobacco."

Probably something to do before someone smoked tainted and dead plant life.

She slouched down in their bed, lifting the now bobby-trap free book and opening it to a random page. "Have fun."

(o00000000)

(Sunday the 26th of October, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

This time, instead of immediately heading off again once he dumped his 'cargo' off, Arseniy lingered a bit in the Wo Hop To Triad's headquarters.

His 'guide' took the few moments free to fuck off somewhere, so the vor lingered in the nicely sunny courtyard. It didn't take very long for someone to join him temporarily, but the cook merely dropped off a tray of tea for him before leaving him too it.

Not objecting in the least, even if he'd prefer coffee right now, he took a fortifying swig of the hot liquid.

Black, not green tea. Hmmm… more than likely imported, from what he'd seen on Hong Kong's streets so far.

It was all green, or some white, tea available from the street vendors that had it. That, or this Triad had a lot more pull in the local infrastructure than he had thought.

Eventually, the pad of small feet heralded his next visitor before she slid open the doorway behind his left shoulder to join him. "Vor Bazanov! Good afternoon?"

He supposed that was why he was given a few extra cups on the wooden tray.
The young girl, which he recognized as the younger sibling of that Storm-man his youngest daughter was involved with just from the blood red eye color they shared, sat herself down neatly on the other side of the tray set on the veranda.

"Did you come to see your daughter with the Mountain Master?"

Obviously, or he would've been gone by now. He glanced skeptically at the elderly man shadowing the young one's path, just settling back with the admittedly decent tea when the girl didn't so much as flinch from the extra addition's imposition.

"...Miss Sonya talks more than you." Mingxia sighed out, pouring herself and the old man cups of the steaming liquid before continuing. "I don't think I've heard a word from you yet."

"Sonya's her own person." Arseniy offered slowly, a bit nonplussed by the observation and how that facet of his foster daughter pertained to anything about his admittedly minimal conversational skills. Grinning brightly up at him, she shifted to face him more instead of looking out over the courtyard. "So, you do speak! Hello."

He took a sip of the tea.

The girl deflated, glancing first to the old man before looking back at him a bit more hesitantly. "Would you answer any questions I ask?"

…maybe.Depended on the question.

"You know, barking at a mountain will not make it move."

"I am a Rain, Master Yaozu." Insisted the girl, elevating her nose slightly. "Enough rainfall can wear down even the biggest rock."

The elderly old Chinese man glanced across to him. "Do they all do that? 'Storms' are stubborn and lingering, 'Rains' are persistent to a fault?"

"Pretty much." Fuck knew he heard enough from the Clouds teasing the Sun over her overbearing nature while his eldest brats were growing up.

There were also all the other ways their 'natures' could be used to describe or explain what they were doing... or at least they had thought it would.

"It sounds like an excuse for stupid behavior." 'Master' Yaozu observed a bit pointedly, which had the girl blinking at the very idea.

"Trick is not to fall for it or let them excuse it all the time." Dismissed Arseniy with an absent shrug.

"You raised Flame users." The sudden interjection earned her a lot more attention than she probably counted on, Mingxia looked a bit surprised. "Erm... she said to keep it to myself but did not ask the same of Master Yaozu. I... thought you knew what she was seeking here."

"What?" His brats weren't something he liked being questioned, especially not by unknowns.

"I am to teach the one that's apparently a pacifist." Offered the elderly man bluntly, which the vor appreciated. He settled his tea firmly into the bowl created by his hands, probably to leach the heat into his battered hands. "Your daughter specifically went after my service as I know the way of aikido, which might appeal."
That meant absolutely nothing to him. Cherep's complete unwillingness to defend himself worried more than just his sisters, but if Sonya thought this would work…

He glanced back at the girl after a moment contemplating the issue. "What about it?"

Arseniy might be a bit defensive about the kids, but they had enough troubles with just the shit Sonya had dug into for the clan. More trouble would be… exasperating.

"...do you have any other advice for young Flame users? I can see the trap you just spoke of, of excusing not particularly good behavior merely because of what I am..."

He tisked at her. "Not the one to ask."

His youngest daughter might be blind to a few of her own faults, but she would at least pin them down and dissect them once she knew of one. The fact she had to go the long way about finding them was probably half her nature and more the unwanted reinforcement that she should already know being an 'expert' and from getting looked at as an advisor when someone wanted help.

That did weird things to a kid's head, when they weren't quite old enough to have assurance that they had seen it all before yet kept being asked about things as if she should have. Her momentary spots of ignorance and arrogance weren't excusable but understandable in that light, especially as she tried rather hard to keep herself level-headed and learn what was required of her even so.

He had faith she'd pull through it.

"Well... the one I would've asked, had I thought of it, isn't here right now." Confessed the young girl sheepishly. "But she turned out... well? Very... non-hostile for a Cloud woman."

He gave her a suspicious look.

"So... is it a self-fulfilling prophecy? What certain Flame users are 'supposed' to be like?" The Sōng girl set aside her tea to cup her own hands, revealing a welling of her blue and very... liquid-like Flames. "Your daughter is and isn't bound to her type. But how?"

That was actually a decent question. He didn't know.

Tatiana was very much what 'Suns' were 'supposed' to be like, Cherep very much wasn't how 'Clouds' should be in every respect aside the willful part. Sonya was both between and a slight bit more like her older brother, and Valera was just a stubborn little brat right now.

If his eldest, who grew up without knowing what her type was supposed to be like, and his two middle children, who knew what they should be like but went differently in their own ways, were so different in that aspect... then depending on how Valera turned out he'd know if knowing the 'usual' influence those growing up with Flames any.

...he didn't like that thought.

Sonya was one thing, she had specifically dug into the unholy mess to figure out her abilities and what she could do with it. Valera wasn't yet to the point he could make an informed decision about what to do regarding his Flames, and it was part of his responsibilities as a father to ensure his son was without confining influences like that.

"Sonya had her own scars before we got her." If that had anything to do with how she evaded the 'known' behavior of Clouds was debatable, but it was something to give the girl for making him consider the issue fully. "Might want to think on who you want to be first, then fit your Flames into Sonya and Cherep had their own sense of selves well before most would due to their situations, Tatiana had been a little later getting there and she mostly found herself only after leaving home that last time. Valera would get there whenever he would get there, but until then he should probably keep an eye on things.

"...'got' her?" Mingxia repeated in confusion.

"She's adopted." Arseniy ensured he gave the girl a look to convey that part didn't really matter all that much to him.

"Oh." The little Rain girl gave him a searching look, then settled back with a slightly bewildered look. "That... actually makes more sense."

He rolled his eyes, examining his delicate looking teacup and the level of lukewarm liquid inside and wondering how much longer he had to wait for someone to take him to see Sonya.

No, he didn't look anything like his foster children. That was kind of the biggest example for the fact he wasn't their biological father. Frankly, at least the younger two, he didn't think they would mind claiming him as such even if they had different men that were their actual fathers.

"Well, you're big. She's not." Defended the young girl, a bit sheepishly. "It's a bit... strange when you see the two of you together the first few times. Or even just one first and then the other."

With a snort, he drained off his tea and set the cup down on the tray as he caught sight of the 'Mountain Master' leaving his headquarters to join them.

"Vor Bazanov, good. I have something taken from one of your... gifts, you might be interested in."

Zhōng Duyi glanced at the two keeping their visitor company while he waited, nodding shortly to the elderly man nursing his own drink then gave the girl a mildly inquiring look.

Mingxia gave him a bright, slightly mischievous smile in return.

The Chinese man more near Arseniy's age turned back to him after a moment. "Are you ready?"

With a huff, he pushed himself upright.

He'd been waiting on the other man, asking if he was ready was a bit superfluous.

(Sunday the 26th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"I'm fine." Sonya insisted in Fong's face irritably, glaring at the man as Zhōng entered the now familiar holding cell where hostage meetings took place. "Will you stop asking? It's more annoying than helpful at this point."

"It is a valid question, you've invalidated your only other method of taking the edge off in helping us with the less than stellar security." Responded the Storm Flame user calmly, spreading his hands in a gesture of peace. "I am willing to help you figure out ways to counter the irritation, if you want."

"And how the hell do you expect to do that?" Arseniy demanded shortly as he came through the doorway himself, a bite to his tone that suggested whatever the younger man was thinking it had better not be what he was thinking.

"…clearing a section of the space we have been allotted to spar in?"

The father snorted, glancing first to his daughter then suspiciously at the martial artist, before slowly continuing with closing the door behind him and taking a seat. "...I see what you mean now."

"You're participating in a martial arts tournament Fong, picking a fight with me is not in your best interests." Shot back the thief exasperatedly without acknowledging that comment, accepting the boxed food from Zhōng with an appreciative nod. "Thank you... Mountain Master. Hello Arseniy."

"I do have to agree with her, Fong. Maybe promise her a fight after the tournament instead?" He offered as they seated themselves around the table.

It wouldn't be too much of a hardship to find a decently abandoned rural arena, so long as spectators could bear witness it might help some of the disgruntlement in his Triad over the limited tickets for the official underworld tournament.

Sonya unwrapped the box and selected something for herself before shoving the care package from his Sun cook over to the Storm using enforcer. The head of the Wo Hop To Triad raised an eyebrow at his fellow Chinese man.

"They only have to kill me to send Sonya away." Fong explained simply enough, plucking something for himself and the extra set of steel chopstick packed in if the Storm-Cloud woman bit through her own pair yet again. "I figured discretion would be prudent."

The Soviets both looked at him strangely, or rather Arseniy hadn't stopped glaring since he arrived and his daughter only just glanced at him sideways.

"...how long has it been since you last ate?"

"I only thought about it this morning, actually." Admitted the Storm a bit sheepishly as he dug into the food. "But I did eat what was provided yesterday..."

"...probably safe enough. Things did shift rather abruptly which might've removed access to any would-be killer." Mused the thief thoughtfully around a piece of shrimp. "How much longer is this shit supposed to go on?"

"It is scheduled to end Tuesday." Zhōng informed her thoughtfully. It wasn't the first time she swore in front of him, but she did seem to have an even shorter temper right now. "The last day will be a full-day affair..."

She raised an eyebrow at him. "What aren't you saying?"

"What isn't done by then will be finished the last day, in case of unexpected losses or if anything... interesting comes to light. By whatever means necessary."

"There were forty fights that first night..."

"Six fights had to be finished the next day." Fong interjected helpfully.

"...so, there's about ninety competitors?" Finished Sonya thoughtfully, frowning suspiciously. "...wait. Are there always six more fights that have to be done the next day? I wasn't keeping count after I realized the losers had to fight other losers."
"No, they solved the scheduling issues by starting an hour earlier."

Grey eyes flicked to him, and it took a few more moments for her to swallow before she continued. "How many are in contention for the winner?"

"Eleven, I believe."

"Twelve." Zhōng corrected Fong, as he had a better view of things when not trying to psych out his probable opponents or getting ready for his next bout. "One didn't fight yesterday."

"So six tonight, one tomorrow, and one more the night after? How is the by figured out?"

"A bidding war."

Arseniy snorted, which nearly surprised the older Chinese man as he had almost forgotten the burly Russian's silent presence.

"Typical." Agreed his daughter equally as sardonically.

"A bidding war done by the spectators. We're not allowed to bid ourselves." Clarified Zhōng in amusement. "Although I will admit we initially had the same reaction, so I believe what we ended up with was a hasty correction."

"…actually, that's sort of creative. Even if it was a split-second change." Allowed Sonya thoughtfully around her chopsticks. "What's happening Tuesday, then?"

"I am… unsure."

The bouts should be finished Monday night where both a winner and an ultimate loser would be found out, unless there would be another event like the banquet that kicked it off. The Mountain Master of the Wo Hop To Triad had no information on what was to happen, and after her actions the last few nights he doubted he'd get any insights if he merely asked.

The Russian vor grunted, centering attention on him almost effortlessly in a way Zhōng was envious of. "When you're done here, I've got a bit of information for you."

"Found out who was being naughty?" The smirk that crept over her lips was a semi-frightening mirror of her old man's, and a few of the stress lines pulled taught he hadn't noticed suddenly relaxed at the news. "…fantastic."

"I'll remain just long enough for you to get free again." Offered the oldest man in the room calmly, unbothered by the sudden rather blood-thirsty edge to his daughter. "Then you can do what you want."

"Um… Sonya, is that wise?" Fong inquired, actually putting his boxed dish down. "I don't mean… erm, just…"

"…I know my warning signs." Dismissed the Cloud woman neutrally before taking a bite of her shrimp lo mein in the pause. "If I do nothing, my anxiousness will continue to build up until something else kicks things off and I put another burning hole in some street corner in a mindless fit of rage. So, either an uninvolved party or those responsible… I don't have many other options right now."

Zhōng and his Storm exchanged a look. Slowly, the martial artist went back to eating when he didn't indicate anything he had to do.
Knowing the man's methods as he did, he'd likely exhaust trying to talk the woman out of her immediate plans with the time they had left here first.

As the Mountain Master of the Wo Hop To Triad, he had no agreements nor arrangements with the ones trying to murder his Triad's hostage. A bit of ill-will, as the woman had freely dispensed advice and tips to his Flame users as long as the questioner matched her standards not to mention gave them a miscellaneous question to nibble at. Her connections had proven interesting already, which likely resulted in her being the most highly valuable hostage currently being held who wasn't as safe as her fellows.

Dropping a word or two in the ear of the responsible party might be interesting… but too likely to be traced back to him. He had no reason to do anything but wait and watch.

In other words, it wasn't worth it to bar her way. From what little he had seen of her work, and the destruction she could do even unintentionally, he was interested to see how she'd deal with the situation.

The Soviet Storm-Cloud looked to her father instead of acknowledging the exchange between the Chinese men, although Zhōng was aware both Russians had made note of it and just didn't comment.

"You don't have to stay longer if you want."

"I'm a bit concerned over that 'homesick' thing."

Sonya hummed to buy herself a moment. "I believe it's the constraints. I keep circling back to things I should check up on, but I can't leave the area I'm restricted to. Hopefully I'll settle once I'm released but if not, I'll follow you back shortly after. Some violence might just help… but I'll need some support…"

"Want me to send your Mist pair down?" Asked the vor curiously.

"Umm…" Considering the question, the thief nibbled one of her last few shrimps in half while inspecting Zhōng's features. "…how many Flame users do they have?"

"More than enough for you to operate freely instead of tasking one to sit on hostages if you ask for more help." Arseniy answered before the Mountain Master could assemble his thoughts.

"…do you mind a minor Soviet invasion, Zhōng? The Mist duo are fairly inoffensive to host, but if I call any of the older students down to give them some operational experience…"

Her father leaned forward, highly interested. "Who were you thinking?"

"Andrei for one, he's likely to just remain where he is instead of spread out." Sonya mused aloud slowly, naming someone neither Chinese man knew given the blank look on Fong's face. "Then any of the other section's older students that don't mind a field trip…"

"I will not mind providing a location to meet up within, as long as you practice some discretion." He'd greatly rather not have to embroil himself in a turf war with the remaining branches of the offending Triad, merely bolster a faction in becoming the 'main' branch once the dust settled. "You do realize you will not likely take all of them out in short order? There will be… groups that will not be local and will hold a grudge against you if you should meet up with them in the future."

"I'm aware, and don't care." Announced the woman shortly, her eye coloring bleeding the purple that signified a Cloud Flame user. "If they're going to be upset their 'leader' poked me enough to earn some personal attention, they're too suicidal and stupid to be bothered with."
Zhōng stroked the seamed scar on the side of his face thoughtfully. "...interesting."

In the interests of diplomatic truce keeping, he should spread the word over how annoying the multiple assassination attempts had been and the reason why she would be going after them once things had been finished.

"I have a fairly green Lightning, pun not intended, I would appreciate being seasoned a small bit."

"Sure... I suppose I should pull Galina, if she thinks she can be spared. She's our main Lightning instructor." Continued the woman, discarding her empty box for a new one and instantly sliding herself to the far end of the table away from Fong once she saw what was inside it. "Hopefully it'll give the greener younger students some time to figure out what to do when given some leeway."

"Of course, you do realize that we are being eavesdropped upon."

"Of course." Grunted the older Russian sarcastically, echoed by the brusque nod from his daughter.

"Obviously." She agreed once she finished her bite of dumpling.

The martial artist blinked, only just realizing what she had taken from Huang's care package. The thief slid even further over, until she was nearly hip-to-hip with her father and practically dumped the box of soup dumplings into the older man's lap.

Fong pouted at her as he drew out something else to eat, merely earning himself two dubious Russian looks in return.

…well, at least the important parts had been discussed before things devolved into less dignified antics. Perhaps he should drop a word to the Sun he had two people to provide for, it might prevent another of these incidents...

No, he had done enough.

The free show, unwanted thought it might be, was somewhat amusing...

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 26th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Apparently, the losers fought first.

Understandable, really. Get the green and the inexperienced out of the way quickly, because it wasn't likely their bouts would continue for long. It would also help for the draw, getting the higher volume of fights that could be resolved quickly for the spectator's enjoyment and give them more for even a partial stay if they had other things to do later on or could only catch part of the tournament.

Sonya actually brought her knitting needles, freshly cleaned of their own sappy coating of dubiousness, and her yarn... but they found less use than she liked. She at least wasn't antsy enough to pace this night, but she also wasn't settled enough to sit in a corner again. Instead, she took up position at the pillars to watch the goings on.

Even if they weren't very much more than fifteen-minute scuffles, they were something to mindlessly watch and pick up some tips from.

Mostly, at the moment, of what not to do.
Either way, it was slightly instructive.

So far, she witnessed three foolish moves that broke the performer's own limbs instead of gaining them some advantage and seven stupid tactical decisions that lost six separate matches with one lucky s.o.b. who managed to do so twice before his luck ran out. A few interesting tricks, one who seemed to have actual combat experience but was playing lame for some reason, a Mist masquerading as a fighter, one fighter that seemed to have done something preemptive to his opponent, and a few other interesting characters to keep an eye on.

If tomorrow was the semi-finals… or was tonight supposed to figure that out?

Someone would get the pass, she had no doubt Fong would probably get one of the remaining two slots… who would be his second-to-last opponent?

Ballsy toddler boy, apparently unwilling to miss another night's sleep in her lap, had hold of her pants leg and was half hiding himself behind her skirt panel. He refused to go off with the other kids, and she was kind of tempted to see how long he'd stubbornly linger at her side before being forced to go and join the puppy pile of kid-sleepiness with the others.

He was nodding a bit, and was more leaning on her leg than standing upright, but so far he seemed perfectly content to somewhat stand with her.

With the kid so passive, she was almost taken by surprise by his sudden lunge to the railing. It took a bit of fancy footwork to hook her heel around his slightly pudgy belly before he took a header off their perch.

"Bàba." Ballsy toddler boy pointed out to her, as if she couldn't see that was his father in the ring. Pointed child-sized finger and all.

"Noted." Sonya drawled wryly, still pulling him back with one leg as she nodded in a method of communication he could understand before standing upright again. "But that's one hell of a drop, kid."

Unconcerned over her observation, the now wide-awake kid at least kept one fist twinned into her skirt but leaned out as far as the fabric would allow to watch his dad taking the measure of his opponent before the bout was started.

She had wondered how the kid's father was handling himself, she'd already seen the knitting old granny's son scrape out a win against that kid with the insane luck simply by being cautious. Likely the broken nose had made the lady's son be more cautious…or the two loses that netted him a mid-tier slot instead of the one-lost and the no-lost fighters did it.

Brat's dad was another of those cautious ones, letting his opponent pick the moment the engagement began. It didn't help him nearly as much as the less skilled or unlucky fighters, it put him on the back foot and the defensive against an aggressive rush from a man who had a broken arm and a couple of semi-familiar burns.

…Sonya was pretty sure that was one of Fong's former opponents.

A broken arm didn't hamper the guy too badly, his style seemed to rely more on kicks than punches. It did limit him to right-handed maneuvers only, which gave brat's dad momentary advantages when he could predict another more complicated maneuver.

That stalemate continued, a rather brutal and random scuffle until the guy with the broken arm over-extended a touch too far and ballsy toddler boy's dad managed a knee-strike to the jaw which took his opponent down.

A bit… rag-doll like.

Sonya cocked an eyebrow, hoping the guy was just unconscious and not dead. To be fair insensible people acted just like dead ones, and frankly she had expected more death in this thing than had happened in this so far, but killing in front of your own kid was probably a bad thing.

While he was waiting the count, the only conscious man happened to glance up to the audience and thankfully caught sight of her and his son. The toddler waved frantically, as if being missed would be a terrible blow to him. He earned a slightly sheepish wave back, a quick one that hopefully wouldn't advertise their location to anyone that shouldn't know.

Deeming their location compromised, the thief snatched the kid up and turned away from the arena. The kid kept waving over her shoulder even as they left the limited pool of light that let those in the arena spot the hostages under the balcony the Triad heads were position upon.

She'd be on guard for visitors the rest of the night as well as tomorrow, but if anyone caught ballsy toddler boy's father's covert wave it'd be tomorrow they'd try something with that information. Hopefully most would think he was just behaving slightly foolishly to his Triad head instead of his hostage.

Hopefully the kid would fall asleep quickly as it was rather late, but the fights were getting into the less damaged and more skilled rounds that she really had wanted to see.

Knitting old granny held her knitting supplied safe with her, and she was polite enough not to laugh outright at Sonya's current burden while she was situating the toddler and her sort of but not really broken leg out so she could sit comfortably.

If she missed Fong's fight…

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 26th of October, 1969 continued. Budapest, Hungarian People's Republic.)

Cherep teetered on the edge of the rooftop Viper had picked out for them ever so grudgingly, curiously peering down at the highly nervous Spaniard Rain man waiting on his contact.

After the last couple days, in which his Misty friend demanded for 'covert observation' before actually approaching their target, the immortal stuntman was feeling rather impatient to get things over with so he could leave the city already.

"You could have left by now, mou… had you not insisted on this." Viper observed tartly from further back on the roof.

Pointedly counting out the money he'd handed over through the last few days to placate his very touchy friend to help him out with this.

"Yeah well… I'm not that mean." He shot back cheerfully, glancing down the narrow alleyway curiously to see if he could spot the men one Mauricio Sebastián Ciceron was waiting on.

How the little wanna-be Master Liam had managed to scrape together the money he needed to pay off his debts was beyond him… but not beyond Viper's grasp of fiscal things. The explanation was a bit boring, but it boiled down to a side-business in something or another with generous amounts of scamming a few people of pocket change.

…no, he didn't pay a lick of attention. Not because he found the subject boring, he did… but because he suspected Viper had made the subject matter he was speaking of deliberately boring and used a droning tone to punish him even if he had wanted to pay attention.

To say the Mist was not a fan of this idea was putting it shortly. Cherep was interested in how Mauricio had managed to wiggle out of his situation, but as his twisty friend was unwilling to be helpful the only one he had to ask was the Rain man.

Hopefully this whole meeting thing went off without a hitch, otherwise they'd have to try 'intimidation'. He… didn't do intimidation too well, probably the lack of actual hostility he could work up.

Then again, he could be the cuddly little plush toy zebra he got for Valera and with Viper's help… anything could look suitably intimidating to anyone with enough Mist Flames behind it.

It was a very nice afternoon, he'd much rather be on the road with his lovely American built motorcycle driving to some other location than loitering on a rooftop. He did owe Viper dinner somewhere nice again, but they could probably find something just as good in Bratislava or Vienna as what Budapest had to offer that they hadn't frequented yet.

Cherep did have to hunch a little against the nip in the air, which said fall was only a month from being over. Alas… he'd have to either find a storage unit for his bike or winterize Diana, so she'd survive Russian roads…

…probably would be best to put her up with Cleo the junkyard bike.

He was going to retire somewhere tropical and non-icy. Didn't really care where, so long as there were long roads nearby and a decent garage.

"Ciceron!" The undying stuntman blinked, taking a step backwards to get out of their line of sight of the individuals that joined the Spaniard in his half-hidden little nook.

"I'm hiding us, moron. Mou… they can't see you even if you waltzed right up to them and poked a few in the face." Viper observed tartly from behind him, taking a few steps to see what was going on himself.

"Right… I knew that." Cherep stepped back up to the edge to see what was going on better.

The people they were spying upon hadn't waited for them to sort a few things out, Mauricio was presenting his payment proudly… with only a bit of nervous sweat making his forehead rather shiny.

"-humbly present the funds I have borrowed from your coffers, my good business partners. With my ample and heartfelt appreciation for the credit given in my time of need."

A thin-faced middle-aged man examined the bills neatly wrapped in sets within the canvas bag, taking the proffered tote and slinging it into the guts of one of his thugs. "I haven't the faintest idea what the fuck you just said."

"Ah… well, the pursuit of improved articulation is its own reward… erm." Mauricio trailed off when he finally took note of the highly unimpressed looks aimed at him from all four of the people cornering him. He coughed a little uncomfortably, rocking on his heels a little before trying for a non-offensive smile. "I trust this concludes our association, does it not?"
"Yeah... no. There's been a couple very interesting rumors about you, Ciceron..." The first thug-man commented almost casually if it wasn't for the nasty smirk on his face. "...rumors that you can do a few interesting little tricks."

The short Spaniard coughed again, which didn't do anything for the pallor he suddenly had. "Well... ah, gentlemen...? I ah... am a simple stage magician... I am unclear of what anecdotes you may have overheard of my humble labors... however."

"Cut the crap." Harshly interrupted the thin-faced man, shoving roughly at the self-claimed magician's chest to physically cut off his words. "We know what you are... Rain. And... as much as this is... you still owe us interest."

Mauricio spluttered. "No! I have... I mean, I've gathered more than enough to cover any reasonable fees."

"Extra charge for lying to us." Drawled the man nastily, taking a full fistful of the Spaniard's rather colorful coat to haul the poor man forward. "Flame users are a hot commodity, didn't you know?"

Cherep bent his knees, aiming to drop close enough to snag the poor Rain man away from his assaulter. He didn't have the chance to formulate anything more of a plan than that, Viper ripped him away from the edge with a tentacle formed from his cloak and then practically melted away into some kind of evil-looking fog monster to do the rescue.

The slightly portly Spaniard ended up flung to the rooftop with a really funny sounding squeal of surprise, making the Cloud Flame user scramble to catch the man before the Mist's temper snapped and the guy ended up a wet splat on the bricked alleyway below.

He didn't bother looking to see what Viper was doing to the men trying to shake the poor Rain down, merely hauling his rescued carnie farther away from the edge. "You are damn lucky I was in town."

The utterly flabbergasted man spluttered instead of answer, scrambling to get his feet under him again and a bit too wide-eyed and breathing a bit raggedly for Cherep's peace of mind.

"Hey... you okay?"

"...I need that fog-thing. If I had that..."

"Yeah, but. Out of your price range. Was nearly out of mine as well." Drawled the stuntman wryly, planting his rescued man squarely on his feet in the middle of the flat-topped roof. "Look, seriously. You need to keep your head down more. You can't rely on luck, because it was pure chance I overheard your situation and Viper decided to visit."

He got a speculative glance in return, topped by a wary look to the edge of the roof where something Viper was doing was giving at least two of the thugs panic attacks, and then the Spaniard absentely pressed down the lapels of his colorful jacket to ensure he was in one piece. "...can I assume, then, you and this 'Viper' are others?"

The Cloud user smiled wryly.

Notably, the man didn't ask if they were other Rains or a different Flame type. He might not know the full extent of the Dying Will phenomena, and he just knew Viper would give him an earful if he said anything that stupid to a relative unknown they already knew was a bit shifty.

"You've been helped by others before? Don't you think then maybe you're doing something..."
Mauricio frowned, casting another glance to the far end of the rooftop as he nervously fidgeted in place. "I will admit there might've been a slight miscalculation on my end..."

"Slight?" Viper drawled out sarcastically as he reformed at the stuntman's side, the sneer visible despite the cowl of his cloak. "Slight would be if you had a glancing scuffle with the local crime syndicate, mou. That was not. That was pure stupidity."

"Not all of us can bow reality itself to our will." Pointed out the Rain tiredly, smoothing a neat dagger beard on his chin down and practically radiated angst and doom. "In truth, it really seems to be only a matter of time before my luck runs out."

Cherep and Viper exchanged a look.

The Rain suddenly cleared his throat sheepishly, fixing a very fake smile to his face. "I mean... um, my gallant rescuers! Many thanks, indeed, for your timely intervention. Alas, I have nothing to reward your heroic actions-

"Mou... no need." Suddenly interjected the Mist flatly, pulling the tote bag out from nowhere and bending his hooded visage over it to look over his prize. "I have more than enough here for bothering with your stupidity."

Mauricio spluttered, wide eyed. He glanced to the edge of the rooftop where his assailters were and then tried to bolt. He was dragged back with a string-thin lace of his cloak without so much as looking up from their new money bundles.

Sighing heavily, the stuntman raked a hand through his hair. "Look, man. Staying put isn't actually a good idea. Especially with your act, we caught it by the way. The mirrors and glass you made from Tranquilized ice were interesting... but way too much of a calling card."

"Well... it's not as if I can remain here now." Agreed the Rain a touch bitterly, glaring up at the Mist dragging them back to the Cloud.

He grudgingly picked himself up off the roof, brushing the dust and grime off his colorful jacket. ...did he stitch that himself out of wildly colorful scarves or something?

It was awesome.

"I meant in general." Cherep corrected with a bit of amusement. He was generally Viper's favorite target, it was nice to not be the one paying through the nose for once. "Unless you've got the backing of the local syndicate, sitting tight just encourages someone to try picking you up."

"I suppose, since my hasty exit was prevented, you have an alternate arrangement in mind?"

"For the short term, at least."

How much would it take for Viper to dump the man on Sonya?

Probably more than he was comfortable paying out, so... Mafia Land, probably. Maybe Bjørn wouldn't mind sitting on the carnie for a bit. The stuntman sighed, not particularly willing to go back there but...

Actually... how did one reach the island?
He actually… didn't know. Arseniy, and Sonya, had handled the tickets the two times he went there.

…shit, Mauricio had to come with him didn't he?

"I did not think this through fully…"

"Why do you think I objected to your plan to help this idiot?" Viper asked sarcastically, evaporating the bag of cash to wherever he kept things and rounding on him. "Seriously Cherep? Mou… yes, he's saved for the short-term… but now he has to leave the city. And, given your stupidly self-sacrificing habits, you're going to help him… aren't you? Which means if this syndicate was banking on this idiot Rain… now you're at risk."

"…you're not very nice, Vipes." Yeah… his sisters were not going to be pleased. Cherep scratched at his slow growing stubble sheepishly, reconsidering his only half-assed plans for the guy. "He's safe now… that's good. We can build off that."

The Mist stared at him flatly for a long, slightly awkward moment. "…yay."

Snorting back the laugh, the stuntman held out a hand to the Rain now suspiciously eying the both of them. "So, hi. My name's Cherep Bazanov. Part time mechanic with a traveling Russian circus, otherwise known as Skull de Mort… the immortal stuntman."

Gingerly, the shorter Spaniard shook the proffered hand. "Mauricio Sebastian Ciceron, stage magician. A… pleasure?"

"You get him caught… and not even death will spare you from my ire." Viper snapped instead of introducing himself, turning sharply on a heel to stalk away. "You still owe me dinner, Cherep."

"Ignore Viper, he's been grumpy all week." Ignoring the now owlishly blinking Rain main, he guided him on their own way off the rooftop now that the Mist had decided to leave them. "Let's get your things and get out of the city, we'll have more than enough time to get to know each other once we're out of here."

Cherep would be keeping an eye on the man at least for the first week, or however long it would take for Sonya to arrange a meeting with him with a mostly unknown Flame user. Hopefully she'd take him, but maybe he should start thinking about what to do if his little sister didn't need a Rain like Mauricio.

…maybe he should plan on talking a bit with Master Liam about his little mini-me instead.

Viper didn't like the guy… would a thief see him differently?
"The fuck, Fong?" Sonya groggily peered over the bed towards the door, glaring at the martial artist meditating with his back to the sliding panel that was the only entrance to their cupboard-like bedroom.

"…what?"

She thumped her head back down, drawing the bed covers higher up the bed. "It's colder without you."

The unhelpful asshole hummed but didn't move back to the bed. The thief could tell even when not looking at him because the bed didn't dip under his weight.

She tried curling up to minimize her profile, but the lack of extra body heat she was semi-sure had woken her up kept her awake as things got cooler in bed.

Irked, she pushed herself upright and glared over at her delinquent bed-mate. "The hell are you doing?"

"Meditation." Fong answered her peacefully, not opening his eyes even as he answered her question. "I find it helpful."

Sonya had just found it incredibly boring herself. "I tried meditation once."

"Oh?"

"I failed… I think."

Fong did finally crack an eye open to peer over at her in amusement. "I wasn't aware it was possible to fail in meditation."

"I think way too much." She hadn't gotten to any peaceful state of mind, merely ended up chasing the tails of her thoughts around in circles.

It had been useful when she had been younger for that aspect alone even if 'centering oneself' was seemingly beyond her grasp, but now she had too many things to do and rather than just ponder on them she'd rather be doing something about it all.

Besides, she did most of her thinking in between heist planning and actually pulling the robberies off.

"That isn't necessarily a problem, more a minor obstacle." Observed the Storm user thoughtfully, closing his eye again to continue his meditation.

Sonya frowned at him, not really feeling up to getting vertical for the day but also not willing to go back to sleep even if she was a bit tired still. Not alone, anyways. Instead, she curled back up in the bed covers and merely mused on what the fuck she felt like doing.

…a whole lot of nothing. She didn't feel like doing anything in this place.
Not good.

She ran her fingers through the thin cotton of the sheets provided absently, restlessly.

Fuck, this had taken so much less time than her irritation with her clan…to go from fed up to marginally pissed off with the situation. It was probably the whole being shut in thing, even in Moscow she could occasionally get out of the office now and again then break off for long stretches.

Also the clan was somewhat intertwined with her family, so there was that she had to burn through first.

So, the question was… would this 'end' be an explosive give up or a sudden snap of indifference?

The thief knew perfectly well she'd be no match alone against a full Triad outfit, especially not if it was an entrenched one in their home ground. If she couldn't wait long enough for Usov and Anna to come down… trying anything violent on her lonesome would be suicidal. Mists could be relied on to contain a lot of things, and if she was pressed to be honest she was looking forward to hunting a few Flame users and seeing the difference between a borderline civilian outfit and a full criminal one.

Disturbingly, even knowing she'd likely die trying to solo a criminal syndicate… it didn't make a dent in her eagerness to get on with things. It would at least be something different, and at the moment different was very damn attractive.

Apparently, four or five days was her limit for staying put in limited spaces.

"…Fong?"

"Yes?"

"Either get in bed or start talking. I need a distraction, fast."

The man snapped his head up, giving her an odd look for a long moment before heaving a sigh and apparently giving up on his meditation since he didn't immediately close his eyes again. "What would you like to discuss?"

"Chinese history. I've been meaning to ask… but I don't speak Cantonese and the people here are a bit… annoying." It didn't take a whole lot of effort to maneuver herself in a better position to see him more easily, but it did basically turn her sideways on the bed. Which required a bit of adjustment that irked her more. "Preferably recent history, if you would."

"…that's a bit painful, for me." Admitted the Storm with a touch of bitterness, crossing his arms into the spare pair of his outfit he had gotten delivered sometime after they had been moved in here. "I take it you mean this Cultural Revolution thing…"

"If you'd rather, start from the turn of the century and go backwards instead." She really didn't have a feeling on it either way, but if he did she could ask someone else for recent happenings.

Old man Yaozu, maybe.

Fong considered it, then started off a bit slowly. "Turn of the century would likely start with the Xinchou Treaty. Otherwise known as the Yihequan Movement, or the Boxer Rebellion to the English speakers involved, it was an anti-imperialist uprising against foreign powers trying to expand into our country. Most involved were eventually executed when the Eight-Nation Alliance saved their people, a mix of businessmen and Christian missionaries, besieged in the Legation Quarter of Beijing."
…Sonya would hunt down a history book for why the hell China's turn of the century started with a rebellion later. Right now, she was going to just listen and try to remember this for later.

"The Eight Nations were the Empire of Japan, the Russian Empire, the British Empire, the French Third Republic, the United States, the German Empire, the Kingdom of Italy and the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Initially, the Empress Dowager Cixi supported the Boxer Rebellion… but once we lost the Battle of Beijing she immediately reversed that policy and turned to sponsoring the reformations that opened Imperial China up to foreign imperialists." Pausing, the martial artist glanced over at her thoughtfully. "This was long after the hidden societies that later became what is more known as the Triads of now reluctantly agreed to no longer influence any rebellions or uprisings after they grew out of what local grassroots they started in."

"Understandable…" There was also that Vindice Law about military service to account for, but the suggestion that some of China's history before this Boxer Rebellion was directly influenced by Flame users was interesting to ponder. It did raise the question if Flame users could only not be paid military personnel, and if volunteering one's service for free counted in any way. "...but why? I mean, what influenced that decision? Just ending up on opposite sides of the conflict or what?"

Fong bit his lower lip, casting a glance upwards as he dredged his memory to answer her query. "From what little I know, we... I mean the Triads, interfered successfully in the first of the Opium War conflicts. We ousted a large part of the opium trade for a short while, remaining control of a small part of it ourselves... but that was the start of the end for China's imperial dynasty. Our interference meant the inequality between the modern industrial-level invading forces and the lower quality of our manufactured military gear wasn't recognized... and in the Second Opium War..."

She remained silent, letting him gather his thoughts. She had a bad feeling about what had happened then, given she knew how indigenous and less 'modernized' people tended to see invaders from Europe.

Usually rightfully so, if she was pressed to be honest.

"...the Vindice put a stop to any efforts of ours to help in the next conflict. By then it had gone beyond just ousting an invasion and entered military territory, as by Omertà we're not allowed to interfere with that level of warfare. If it isn't local only in scope, we are barred from joining. The Arrow War, the second of the Opium Wars, was between more than just a rural Chinese rebellion against outsiders and was a war between the Qing Dynasty and both the British and French Empires." The Storm's tone picked up a large measure of bitterness, more so than when he commented on his distaste for current events. "Without the assistance of the criminal factions' Flame users in critical points of the war, we were decimated in short order. That non-involvement wasn't entirely a conclusion drawn by ourselves..."

A few questions occurred to her, but until the Chinese native gave her his attention she wouldn't pose them. He was kind of doing her a favor as it was, she could wait for him to feel ready.

If the man had such feelings now, it probably had been worse when he realized his fiery Flame skills had meant that for whatever reason his countrymen with the same skills had not helped with mitigating a national embarrassment on the world stage. Learning the reason why may or may not have helped him all that much.

The thief wondered if there was a similar incident in Soviet Russia's past… well, aside World War Two and Stalin.

"They, the Vindice I mean, disappeared an entire Triad and all the branch gangs connected to them before we listened... we still don't know what happened to them. Those missing were supposed to interfere with the Battle of Canton that same day, such as it was, to oust the invading British and French forces. Their absence meant the hostile takeover of the city was embarrassingly quick and final for us."

"...probably means there's a centralized intelligence behind the Vindice. If they're doing more tactical than just enforcement where their... wraiths, are," Sonya offered neutrally, slightly glad to have confirmation for that suspicion but a bit unhappy that this wasn't something Fong seemed to enjoy. "Therefore, you might be able to ask and get the information from a Vindice Officer that wasn't present."

He glanced at her, his expression slightly hard for her to read.

"Just saying. I've talked to them once."

"...you'll forgive us if I and other Triads don't do the same, I'd rather never see them."

"I'll ask the next time I see one, if you'd like."

Fong hummed noncommittally first, then merely shrugged with an impressively straight face.

"Alright... so if you don't want to continue to current day, what happened before the Opium Wars?"

"A few things happened between the Opium Wars and the Unequal Treaties, the Xinchou Treaty in particular." Corrected the man thoughtfully, apparently not even considering going up through the end of the Qing Dynasty to the formation of the People's Republic. "There was the Taiping Rebellion, Punti–Hakka Clan Wars, Nian Rebellion, Dungan Revolt, Panthay Rebellion, and the Self-Strengthening Movement..."

Holy fuck, no wonder Jiayi claimed her people had a lot of strife and war in their recent past.

She had kind of actually been understating the issue to her way back when. "...start from the more recent and work your way back?"

"Or I could start from the start and go to the end of the Qing Dynasty..." Fong suggested slowly. "...as long as you don't mind I only know what was taught in school and not the criminal underpinnings the farther back we go."

"It's fine. It's something else to focus on, rather than what I'd like to do if only I wasn't confined to a few square meters of space." Like bail entirely and go visit Tatiana, or Master Liam, or Lisa and Valera. Basically, to be anywhere but here. "Besides... my education was pretty lacking when it comes to contemporary history, anything you'd like to share will merely improve it."

The man quirked a wry smile for her. "The pursuit of one's education is an admirable goal... even if a lot of my countrymen will not share that exact view on it right this moment."

"I'd share some of Soviet Russia's history in exchange, but at the moment I don't actually know a lot of that either."

"It is fine..." Insisted the Storm neutrally with a one-shoulder shrug. "You can share it with me later."

With a snort, the Storm-Cloud grabbed one of their pillows to support her head and made herself more comfortable. "Fine then, keep talking."
When Sonya fell asleep again, sometime when listening to him detail the origin of the conflict between the Punti natives and the Hakka guest families in the Perl River Delta which boiled over during the period of time the sea ban had been in effect well before the Qing Dynasty's later version of the Canton System that replaced it, Fong left her to her nap and headed out of their dorm room.

She could insist she was fine all she wanted, it was pretty obvious at least to him that the longer she willingly stayed captive the more stressed she became.

Someone who only recently made her acquaintance probably wouldn't notice due to her nominal self-control rendering her mainly neutral on general principles. However, he had known her for a while and the difference between her usual reserved silence, unless being addressed, and this stressed closed-mouth behavior was vast.

Perhaps she wouldn't mind learning a new style of combat… it would hopefully stop the demands to join her in bed. Not that he would mind, if she was really offering, but he actual doubted she knew what she was asking for.

The thief would likely inform him in her usual blunt way if he was being overly exacting in any instruction, which would just help him as much as it might help her.

Before he could offer instruction, he should probably ensure it was possible in this place.

Additionally, he should look into getting his broken fingers splintered. A miss-timed block at the wrong moment likely cracked the bone of his ring and small fingers of his right, but it didn't hurt nearly enough for him to have gotten it bound before seeking some rest.

Absently running questing fingers along the sore parts of his opposite hand, Fong made for the shared common-room to see what there was to work with. He knew approximately what the dimensions were but taking another look with an eye to instruct someone might help.

Sonya had done her own instruction in the corner next to the main door, which was the easier spot to corral a numerous amount of easily distracted children within and two walls to limit the area of exposure to something controllable.

From where others had spread out into… maybe the middle of the room would be wise.

There were a few cushioned chairs, mostly taken by the elderly trading amusements between them to whittle away the time they had left here. A bare table with only the remains of the breakfast banquet was left to the other side of the only door from their prison, and the few smokers they had between them had monopolized the windows to help vent their chosen poison from the rooms.

"Looking for something, Fēng?"

"Fong." Corrected the Storm absently, glancing over at his former fellow student of Yaozu. "How's your leg?"

"Bad, but I'll live." Xinyue admitted wryly, gingerly keeping his weight off it as he limped closer. "Not sure why I expected anything different, given I've fought you before way back when. Your fingers?"

"Sore, but not significantly impairing."
"Lucky you." As the other man had been the one to attempt to break them only to break a leg in the process, Fong found the smirk hard to suppress. His former fellow student rolled his eyes, pulling up against him a bit painfully from his expression. "Do you know Lu Shui?"

"...who?"

"Another of your fellow 'Flame users'." He jerked a thumb down the other corridor, the one the Storm didn't currently reside down. "The... uh, green? One?"

"The Lightning." Well... he had a name now.

A pointed look was given instead of confirmation. "Speaking of, when the hell did you end up one of them? How?"

"It wasn't too long after you left for the city, if I must be honest." With a shrug, Fong went back to wondering where he might be able to instruct another in a style of martial arts. "I had to leave the village shortly afterwards myself. Storm Flames tend to be the more destructive of the types. I put a hole in the dojo wall..."

Xinyue winced, scratching at the back of his head with a grimace that had nothing to do with pain on his face. "I can imagine Sifu Yaozu wasn't pleased."

"Ah... he gave me an earful. And a few whacks upside the head with a walking stick for the crime of denying my involvement only to learn I lied later on."

The other man snorted sardonically, leaning against the wall with a sigh. "...that doesn't really say anything about how."

"...how do I have Storm Flames? I do not know, I merely do." He had to admit honestly with a shrug. "You could ask Sonya."

"Who?"

"My hostage. A Soviet expert in Dying Will Flames."

He earned a pointed look. "Anyone that asks her something about Flames gets brushed off."

"Were those that asked her about Flames also the ones gossiping behind her back earlier?" At the thoughtful look his question earned, Fong shrugged. "She is not here because she is an expert, but for my behalf. She has no responsibility here but that which she takes on herself... and for her type, she's done a lot."

"The kids, right?"

"And a few security issues." Confirmed the Storm absently as he watched their fellows go about their time-wasting activities. "I believe she also knows several ways to evacuate us all if it comes down to it, or all the hostages from where they are hidden depending. I haven't asked, admittedly... but she is a professional thief. I can imagine a few ways she could do so now, just through the skills I know she has."

"Hmm... is she awake?"

"Ah... no. She decided to take a nap. Give it long enough and she might be awake."

Xinyue snickered, outright laughing at his eye roll.
"It isn't like that."

"I'm sure." Nodding a few times, his fellow former student of Master Yaozu nonetheless didn't wipe the smirk off his face. "Let me know when she wakes up, okay?"

"I make no promises. It might just be easier to check in every now and again."

Eventually, only sometime after Fong concluded the middle of the sitting room would have to do, he got a gentle prod to the side from the other man's elbow. "What type does she have? I know of Storms, Lightnings now, and Rains... don't ask."

"Suns, Skies, Mists, and Clouds. There are a few others participating as well, but Sonya is the only Cloud Flame user present." A particularly stressed Cloud woman, but maybe a semi-interested person to instruct might be slightly distracting for her. "I must ask you don't irritate her more than she already is, we don't have the room to contain her if she decides to murder a large swath of people."

From the stare he got, the other man didn't understand. "...she's a woman."

"That can crush the very bones of your hand with one of her own effortlessly." Fong agreed with a wry smile. "I've seen her do it. She's also kicked me through a wall, shattered a large stretch of dock under our feet to dump me in the sea, and outran me once."

"...of course, you would pick a fight with her if she could." Xinyue shook his head, running a hand through his short dark hair. "I am unsure why I'd expected something different."

He hummed innocently, turning back to his shared dorm room to see if the thief was awake yet. "I have no idea what you may mean."

"You haven't changed a bit, Fong."

"Did you expect me to?"

"I could've held out some hope you would gain a bit more patience. Which you did. It just wasn't a... um, whole lot..." Fong endured the friendly punch to the shoulder with amusement, shrugging instead of verbally respond to a statement of what was pretty much correct as far as he could judge it. "Before you go... do you know what happened to sifu? I went to check on him just before the tournament, but his dojo is empty and a bit... broken into."

"I have him with me, for most of the last week actually. The village turned... less than ideal for him to wait out the current situation."

For the moment anyways, but the other man should expect things to change eventually.

Especially with how their elder viewed their less than upstanding lives, which he had made a point of when they were both still young and his students. In a rural township that held little to no strife before things turned sour, little to nothing would change drastically without outside interference.

"I have plans to go... visit a few of our former fellows." Commented the Storm placidly, side-eyeing his slightly hobbled man thoughtfully. "In the interest of reminding them that there is a reason to respect a man of sifu's years and experience."

Xinyue blinked a few times, likely putting the pieces together enough to guess at why Fong had gone back for the elderly man even if their former master held dim views on their way of living. "That would be interesting. If we survive, you can count on my attendance."
Humming thoughtfully, Fong inspected their accommodations one last time before giving the other man a nod farewell and pressing on to find something to bind his aching fingers with.

"Good luck, Fong. Not that you really need it."

"To you as well, Xinyue."

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 27th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"I need a new pipe."

"Did you kill someone else with the new one?"

"...did I kill that first guy? Whoops." The thief considered the situation for a moment, before shaking her head and drawing the tube of brass from her lap to show him. "No, I sort of gnawed a few holes into it and bent it in half this time. Didn't even notice until I couldn't pull on it anymore. I'd still use it even so but trying to straighten it out left it a bit... crimped, in the wrong spot."

"...I..." Zhōng trailed off as the woman set the very battered brass pipe on the table. "...see."

Teeth marks in metal. He was somehow surprised to see it.

"Um... are you okay, Miss Sonya?"

"I? Am banning that question." Sonya answered the younger of the Sōng siblings pointedly as he picked up the much-abused cylinder of metal to inspect, shooting an equally disgruntled glare at the elder. "Regardless of what I may seem or look like, being repeatedly asked that is annoying. I will live, and that's going to have to be enough."

Fong proffered a box from Huang’s care package with a serene smile instead of answering the complaint she was leveling at him in a roundabout manner.

The young Rain he had brought along per her request to see her brother, mostly to see if her presence impacted the twosome's behavior in any way once things devolved near the end, kept eyeing the woman intently even as she was solidly ignored by her target. Even the books she had been holding onto for the thief, belatedly placed on the table between them all for the other, only earned her a brief look.

"How are things, Mingxia?"

"It's going alright, big brother..."

"Madam Huizhong visited us briefly." Interjected the Mountain Master of the Wo Hop To Triad evenly as he ran curious fingers over the blunted gouges in the metal, much to the consternation on the girl's behalf. "According to the door guards, she left rather annoyed."

Confused over the weight that suddenly appeared over a few of their limited number, the Soviet woman accidentally bit through the tip of her chopsticks but didn't do more than just pull the metal out of her mouth as she waited for what was to happen.

"...ah." Fong managed after a long pause. "That is... little sister?"
The Rain nervously fidgeted with her fingers under the Storm's concerned stare. "She just wanted to confirm some things..."

"What things?" Sonya prompted when her patience ran out, in a short amount of time watching the staring contest going on between the siblings.

"If I can't, um..." Mingxia looked upwards to the unimpressed woman's features, pulled a little frown, and then focused on her brother. "...she wanted to know when I could start."

"Were you not going to ask-?"

"Yes. But..."

After flipping around her chopsticks to even out the bitten off parts, the Russian thief went back to eating.

Zhōng wondered if she actually knew what the younger of the Sōng siblings wanted from her and was ignoring it or if she was unaware of the entire undercurrent.

He supposed the answer would become apparent in a short moment.

The Cloud woman blinked back blankly when both Fong and Mingxia shifted their attentions and looked to her. "...what?"

The Storm glanced at his little sister. "Ask now."

"I don't have my things!"

"Adapt to the situation, not everything will always go to plan."

"How am I to formulate the argument for me if I cannot provide the information!"

"Generalize, prove it later."

"That's not how it works, big brother." A bit exasperated, the young Rain glanced back to the thief politely trying to give the siblings some privacy even if that wasn't possible restricted to this room as they all were. "Selling oneself generally depends greatly on what skills one can bring to the table, of which I have nearly none. What I might bring depends on my plan for the education and what I would do in return for the imposition."

"Ming... I cannot guarantee anything beyond these few days, she has her own plans for afterwards."

"She did promise to hear me out. Afterwards."

As he had been specifically watching for it, Zhōng knew the moment their Russian guest cottoned on to who, exactly, was being discussed. It wasn't very much longer before the rest of his people realized the same.

She bit through the already gnawed chopsticks with a ringing snap and set the halves that remained in her hands with enough force they embedded themselves long-ways into the table before digging out the parts she bit off.

Both of the Sōng siblings glanced at her as she drew out the much-abused metal first before speaking.

"Am I the last one to know who she intended to ask?"
"...your Lackey even gave me some tips?" Admitted the Rain after a sheepish pause. "Um... I didn't realize you didn't mean to... ah. I promised Madame Huizhong that if nothing else would come up, I would go to work for her. She wanted to move up when I started working for her, but I don't."

"Stop." Pressing a few fingers to her left temple, Sonya rubbed at the skin there. "From the beginning. Who the hell is Madame Huizhong and why does she want you?"

Mingxia glanced at her brother, which was more than enough of an answer for the older woman's second question.

"Right, so... who is she?"

"She runs, an... escort service?" Hastening beyond that point, needlessly from the non-reaction the Russian had, the younger girl shifted in her chair to face her squarely. "If... I work for her until I am sixteen, she has promised to at least consider if she would want a lawyer at that time."

"...consider." Repeated Sonya flatly, leaning back in her chair as she settled in for the conversation and even ignoring the food. "You're going to work for a pushy, conniving mistress of a whore house for the possibility she's going to just say no in order to keep you under her thumb and a lever over your brother."

"I... could save up and go my own way eventually, but... yes. I don't have many possibilities. The Mountain Master has done more than enough in providing for me on my brother's behalf, but he sees no need for more lawyers than he already has... especially not with the unrest currently going on." Nodding absently in recognition to him, Mingxia clasped her hands together. "For what I want, there will have to be risks."

"Those 'risks' seem a bit stupid. Even I can see it's a dead end, how the hell do you think that's worth it?"

"It's not ideal, I'll admit. It is the best I have at the moment."

Sonya glanced sideways at the so far silent Storm before turning back to the Rain. "Do you need an answer now?"

"...it would help declining Madame Huizhong's offer without issuing insult. I know this is awkward, and I am really sorry... I had flyers and the basics of a plan I would've-"

"I don't want more people!"

"I can cook! Some things," amended the younger girl sheepishly, "and clean, mostly I know housework. Well, Chinese housework... maybe they do things differently in Russia? But I swear I'll pay you back for this! If you-"

"Can you teach me Cantonese?" Interrupted the Cloud woman shortly.

"...if you want?"

"How about Japanese?"

"Not currently... I can learn, though."

Scowling considerably, the Cloud woman took a moment to ponder the situation.

Mingxia bit her lip, watching the woman's slightest movement worriedly. Even her brother waited for the answer, paused in the action of eating with his own chopsticks balancing some sautéed vegetable halfway to his mouth.

"…you talked to Bjørn, did he give you his office number?"

"Um… I have it written down, yes. Back at-"

"Good. Call him up and pass on that I need Galina. Even if she can only do a short visit." Leveling an entirely unimpressed look on the girl, the thief eventually dropped it with a sigh. "Teach me Cantonese while you start looking into Japanese, and I will get you into a Russian school I control with room and board included. Get the grades a lawyer student needs while you do so, and I will make arrangements for you to study law in a semi-progressive country that won't be so difficult for a girl… or anyone, to learn law. Deal?"

"Deal! Thank you, so much."

"Get your shit together quickly, you'll leave with Galina and she'll make the arrangements for your move and what you need for living in a different country. You're a bit late to be joining the classes already going on, I expect you to catch up quickly." With a heavy sigh, she snatched the box of food Fong had been eating out of from his hands and then made a copy of his chopsticks with her own lavender Flames. "Fuck's sake, Fong."

"What?"

"A word that you little sister was looking for a patron would've been appreciated." Starting in on the food she had commandeered from him irritable, the Cloud woman sat back to chew on the noodles as if it had insulted her.

"She is the one that wanted something from you, I left it up to her to handle it." Professed the martial artist simply, electing to take something else to eat instead of contest the snatching. "I got you here and in range for her to speak to, it is her quality of life that she wants to change on her own merits."

"You all are just lucky I started looking into how to support yet another dependent recently."

"We appreciate it, Sonya." Fong informed her honestly, merely earning himself an annoyed huff.

"A lot, really. Thank you, Miss Sonya." Echoed his younger sister solemnly on the heels of his comment. "Is there anything specific I should pack?"

"…warmer clothes. Russia gets cold in winter. Galina will handle it if you have nothing suitable, but pack as if you're not coming back." Pausing to chew harder on a bit of vegetable, the thief eyed what the girl was dressed in sourly. "Because I can't guarantee you will anytime soon. Your studies should take precedence over everything else, but then again moving countries even for a short while is a hassle you might not want to interrupt things with."

While she had been speaking, in rather clipped tones, the martial artist had dug through the box of food to see what else had been packed for them. Drawing out the container of the dumplings, which he had a fondness for no matter what kind they were, he hesitated before nudging the thief to see if she wanted any for herself.

Sonya eyed him sourly, stabbed two with her copied chopsticks to take for herself, and then started ignoring him

…so, there wasn’t going to be a ridiculous argument this afternoon?
Zhōng felt slightly cheated.

He had grown used to it, slightly. As one would grow use to stepping on stinging nettle every morning, or to a particularly annoying pet nipping one's ear at every opportunity.

"Do not."

"I'm not doing anything."

"Then remain not shoving your pointy elbow in my ribs. Thank you." Snapped the thief irritably, shoving her seat over a good half a meter away from the man. "I have enough issues with rude parts of yours in bed."

…he stood corrected. Well, sat corrected.

Mingxia's eyebrows flew upwards, shooting her brother a disbelieving look he immediately shook his head at.

"It's not like that." Fong hastily interjected to his little sister, before shooting the unapologetic woman at his distant side a look of her own. "There just are limited beds available, and we picked one to share."

"We?" She waggled a finger at the man. "I. I picked our room out, you were half-dead. After the kids and the elderly, there were mostly single or double occupancy rooms left open."

Squeaking in shock, the Rain clasped both hands over her mouth and examined her brother intently for any obvious injuries besides the bandaged fingers on his right.

"I am fine, Ming. Sonya, please. It's just-"

"Half-dead from exhaustion. Excuse me, half brain dead."

Casting a glance at the ceiling at the second interruption so far, he turned to regard the woman nibbling on the remains of the stir-fry she had snatched from his hands. "Anything else you would like to state right now?"

"…maybe." Allowed the Russian idly around her chopsticks. "Your hair gets everywhere, twice so far it's ended up in my mouth."

"It's braided."

"Your hair has the texture of corn silk. Trust me when I say it gets everywhere."

Sighing heavily, the man rubbed one side of his face in exasperation. "Noted."

"You give nice hugs, though."

Fong paused, mouth open, for a full second as he processed the sudden change in tone.

Mingxia nodded sagely. "He does."

"And at least there are beds now." She continued thoughtfully, slowly, heedless to the odd looks. As if she was searching for any good points to state. "At first we just had these stupidly comfortable pillows and the floor."

Zhōng raised an eyebrow at her, interested in the possibility she would start critiquing her stay as a hostage so far. Anything that could be gotten out of the woman might be interesting points to use in future arrangements of this nature.

"That sounds awkward." Observed the Rain girl slowly.

"In a large, three-sliding rooms in one kind of room. It was easier to teach the brats the starting maneuvers of tumbling on the pillows though. And they were really comfortable... but that was obviously a last-minute fix thing." Pausing to gnaw on one oddly resilient chopstick, she visibly thought about her next point before posing it. "It is also incredibly boring. There's nearly nothing to do that we had not brought in ourselves. Which wasn't really a lot given most didn't take anything they'd regret losing in with them."

"Any other points you'd like to raise?" Inquired the head of a Triad present in the room curiously.

"...they need better lines of communication. I get we're hostages, willing ones mind you, but the utter lack of any idea what is going on in respects to our involvement in the tournament was irritating." Stabbing her chopsticks into the remains of her meal, she sniffed. "Knowing a general idea of when to be ready to move or whatever would've been nice to have, aside that few hours' notice you got us."

Well... interesting. Possibly useful, depending on who tried to claim what once things were fully over with.

"Also, the beds are not nearly big enough." Fong planted his face in his hand as the woman wound her chopstick in the air a few times. "With both Fong and me in the same one? Tight quarters does not even begin to describe it."

Eventually, after the moment of shocked staring, Mingxia started giggling. Nearly surprising herself with it as well.

Zhōng sighed. Apparently, a set of younger ears about did nothing to curb the thief's blunt mouth. At this point, he half expected the woman to be doing it on purpose in order to get reactions.

Thankfully, there was only one more of these little visits to do before it would be over.

If only for the year, as long as she didn't consent to return for the inevitable next one.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 27th of October, 1969. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Sonya was not entirely settled enough to knit tonight, but she could sit still at least.

Even if the delivery of books by Mingxia included a few old favorites, it wasn't what occupied her attention this night.

Ballsy toddler boy promptly occupied her lap the moment she sat down, but the thief's attention was drawn more to what little of the audience she could see from their low spectator's box than the fights, the kid, or the book in her hands.

After several days of this, she had thought she got down the usual behavior of a spectating crowd. They were weirdly quiet this night, there were less bets being called over the general noise and a few more fist-fights.
As she had no access to local news right now, the cause for that behavior could be anything.

No matter the cause it was out of several, it resulted in the same thing. A nervous, criminally inclined crowd that would turn ugly at the slightest provocation.

She was more interested in seeing if she could spot the start of it than watching the fights she couldn't join in on or her various amusements.

…and even if she hadn't brought in her pipe for the spectating part of her hostage career the last few days, the lack of the option was irritating in that she thought about it more due to it being not available.

Instead of dwell on her issues currently, which she suspected might be half her problem at the moment, Sonya idly petted a toddler's back as she kept as good of an eye on the crowd as was possible for her spot. There was a very limited field of view, but that just meant she should keep a sharper eye out. Sight wasn't the only way to catch something shifty going on.

Blinking when something nudged her arm, she turned and reflexively accepted a… picture book?

"The little one might like it to play with."

"…I highly doubt he can read." Sonya informed the knitting old granny dubiously, cracking open the book and glancing over the content within.

"He won't need to."

No he wouldn't, as it was just a collection of slightly grimy pictures… or rather disturbing comics.

Some gangly caricature of a kid witnessing a whole lot of death and something about a horse and a few military looking men. Turning near the beginning netted her the same child with three 'hairs', probably depicting his hair, witnessing some boat-man getting shot while he was on the same boat in the middle of a river.

What the hell is this?

SanMao! according to the half-scratched off title on the cover. The imprint of where the ink had been stamped with some printing press allowed her to figure out the Chinese characters eventually, even if she had to hold the book still against grabby hands.

Ballsy toddler boy didn't care that the subject matter was rather horrific, he latched onto the book gleefully and thumped his head back against her sternum to page through it. From the rate he did so, she'd bet he had seen it before and was just turning to his favorite parts first.

The Russian turned semi-disbelieving eyes to the old lady, who apparently didn't realize there was something she found a bit off. She had returned herself to the wall without so much as a backwards look.

Apparently, this was another of those cultural differences she kept stubbing her metaphorical toes on.

If she was pressed to be honest, it probably wasn't all that different from the Grimm Fairy Tales she let Shamal borrow off her. However, reading the Brothers Grimm's legends required a certain level of education and maturity to even comprehend the contents… this was just pictures anyone could look at without even needing to read one's native language.

Sonya would admit to getting a bit engrossed in the picture book, looking over the toddler's dark head at what he paused at and getting only brief looks at other pages.

It was... educational?

A lot of things children on their own might end up involved with, if slightly taken to the extreme end of possibility once on their own, so if China had a bit of an orphan problem then she could maybe understand why this was considered appropriate reading material for an extremely young child.

It was still morbid as hell.

The main lights, normally turned off in favor of a spotlight type thing aimed over the arena the fighters were scuffling about in, suddenly flicked on.

Blinking owlishly so her eyes could adjust even as she reacted immediately to the sudden change, Sonya dumped the brat to one side with his book and pushed him further into the room to hopefully end up nearer the wall and under someone else's eye. Putting her body between him and the opened balcony area that was the supposedly only unsecured entrance to their holding cell.

Rolling up to the balls of her feet, the thief stole forward to get a better eye on what was going on.

Cautiously, because if their position wasn't compromised she saw no reason to attract attention to where they were.

...a riot, apparently.

Some kind of fighting was getting more than a bit out of hand higher in the spectator's benches, there was no organization to it she could see so probably just some argument or insult that just rubbed someone the wrong way.

But... why the lights?

It wouldn't be the underworld if they were polite and upstanding citizens of the world, this wasn't the first fist-fight that occurred outside of the scheduled bouts. A big one, maybe... but not a first.

An ear-splitting snap and pop was probably the announcing system either giving up what ghost it had or being specifically sabotaged so nothing would be broadcasted.

Sonya turned from the balcony, deeming it too risky to remain in semi-view of any casual or not so casual glance. Her fellow hostages had gathered up against the far wall, at least. Kids and the elderly in the middle, the few young adults peppered through it or at either ends if they felt brave enough.

Dismissing that from concern, she turned to inspect the only doorway in or out of this room.

It had been assaulted and broken open once before, did this incident have anything to do with the previous one and if so would it be attempted again?

Planting herself right in the path, but clear of the door even if it was knocked off its hinges again, the Russian pulled her Cloud Flames to her hands and eagerly awaited anyone stupid enough to try it.

This attempt seemed better organized and more effective than the last one, and she wanted a piece of the action. Sitting around while others had all the fun was not her preferred leisure activity.

...unfortunately, she couldn't see a reason to leave the other hostages. There was probably that Mist around, who was likely providing the 'Triad heads' sound-proofing and had visited her a few times before, and the possible Lightning guardsmen. However, as much as she highly distrusted the security they were under there was no reas-

Her thoughts were cut short at the sound of gunfire.

Not from the greater open arena to her right, but from somewhere to her left. A bit muffled as well, as it was beyond several walls from her position.

Greatly better organized and equipped than the first attempt, and probably not all that concerned with taking people gently or alive at all.

Obviously the Triads would and could use guns, but as she hadn't seen a whole lot of them here it was entirely possible this might be an actual military operation instead.

Automatic weaponry would require some different tactics than just melee attackers.

Sonya was likely to get shot if she didn't move soon. The quarters were too tight for anything else, and she had limited options for cover in here.

There wasn't much for it. She wasn't going to hide behind her fellow hostages, as for some Mist help from someone she didn't know the temperament of, and if they got to her with guns then things really were screwed up.

Bleeding her readied Flames into the full-sized variant of her Bec de Corbin, the thief hefted it so the pick end was in front and eyed the door expectantly as she strained her ears.

After that ear-splitting pop over the intercom system, her hearing was shot as it was. The brawl going on wasn't exactly silent either, and the sudden change of circumstances had startled the kids she was held with into fussing about noisily. Her summoning a weapon to hand had cut it down significantly, but not nearly enough to be described as silently.

Even expecting the noise, the sudden rattle of gunfire not more than a few meters away still made her jump.

They were coming down their corridor.

…if she died here, she'd be pissed.

Yeah, she got nearly as far as Rachel had… almost into her twenties. However the irony would be bitter, even with all she knew now and the combat she had already seen she'd die just a bit before her last life because of idiotic and armed criminals.

Already pissed off, mostly from the scare of the sudden gunfire closer than she liked, the thief flinched again when the lock on the door was crudely shot off and the door kicked open.

She buried the pick of her weapon into that moron's head the moment he barged through the door.

Wrenching the Cloud Flame metal free, she used the butt end to toss the corpse off the edge of the balcony in a sweep and actually paused to see if she should let her weapon's Construction go or summon something else.

Olive green uniforms, military?

She couldn't see a red armband, so there was that…

Shocked by her sudden violence or not, the second man who had apparently been the one to fire his rifle did haul it up to give her a few holes in her guts before she fully recovered. She abused her strength to escape the momentum of her weapon to smash his head in with the hammer end.

Then the age of her now dead opponent finally occurred to her.

He wasn't her age, from his bone structure she glimpsed a second before rendering his face into a bloody smear of paste. Not exactly much older than that kid stuck on her for translation duties, but not entirely an adult either. Somewhere between, and as far as she knew the Chinese Army wasn't taking children conscripts right now.

More than likely, Red Guard agents without the armbands.

Why?

…too little information to make any assumptions.

Glancing down the corridor as her mind raced, and dismissing the two now dead guardsmen as worse than useless for her, the Soviet Storm-Cloud took a step back and glanced at her fellow hostages. "I'm deeming this location now compromised. Get into a line and follow me if you'd like to live. Mist man? Is the beach to the south clear?"

"That is not known." Asshole didn't even have the decency to give her an indication of where or what to talk to.

"Then we're headed for the beach, if not the mountains over this compound." She decided after a moment of trying to calm her racing thoughts enough to understand what the hell was wrong. "Send someone when you clean up this mess."

The young man she basically decapitated was old enough, if not really…

She did to that kid what Rachel had done to her.

Sonya paused momentarily mid-step as she realized that. The situation wasn't entirely similar, he was somewhere he shouldn't have been, and her last life had been ended in a public alleyway. However, enough was similar that she was not happy with it.

Angry, still somewhat startled from the scare, and now a bit disgusted with herself, the thief dismissed the broken doorway and turned to the far wall on the opposite side of the room.

Needless to say, the two equally green-clad men on the other side of the wall had not been expecting her, or anyone probably, to go through the wall instead of down the corridor.

A shot whizzed past her nose before she registered the sound of a gun's report close by, and she hurled a hammer down the probable path in response. Forced to pause and remain in place, because the hostages behind her had only two ways to go and one of them meant going it alone or letting her power a path, the Storm-Cloud glared down the hallway almost willing someone to be stupid enough to shoot her.

Once the dust settled from her hammer nicking and caving in the painted concrete wall, she could make out an arm and no movement.

Well, she knew that way probably had more people and the other was unknown.

Option C then.

Sonya summoned another hammer from her garter belt full of them, a double-handed maul this time instead of a war hammer, and started in on the wall across from the hole she had already made. Hopefully that would be a room, into which she could move the people behind her while she sought a way out of here.

It'd be really obvious what way they were moving, and where they'd be once things were over with, but all she was really concerned with was getting the kids and the elderly somewhere she could defend reasonably well.

On the plus side for her 'force a way' method, startled people made a lot of noise.

If she broke through into someone else's secured position, she'd know it before stepping inside like an idiot.

---

(Tuesday the 28th of October, 1969. Budapest, Hungarian People's Republic.)

"I must refuse."

"Dude, I don't know if you've looked around lately-

The tiny, and a bit portly, lightly tanned Spaniard sighed exasperatedly at him as they sat around a tiny inn room waiting on a Mist to report back to them about his pursuers. "My good man, although you have my profuse thanks in the timely... if costly, rescue, I have a few sundry responsibilities I cannot abandon upon anyone's whims, much less my own. Vienna is too far to go just for myself."

Cherep pinned the man with a look of his own, itching to move on already and probably not as patient as he should be with the guy. "Whatever it is, is it worth your life?"

"...that would be understating things." The Rain known as Mauricio Sebastian Ciceron informed him tartly, smoothing a hand almost compulsively down his coat stitched together from multiple silk scarfs that had definitely seen better days. "Part of the reason I have been raising funds admittedly a bit desperately was just for that reason. As I might have gotten in over my head, your assistance will be forever remembered fondly... but if I leave? Then there will be no more aid for them."

"And how well did that work out for you?" Asked the stuntman a bit tiredly. "And how well do you think you'll do trying again?"

"Obviously not well." Returned the stage magician sarcastically, before clearing his throat a bit awkwardly. "I mean... I... hell's fire. Look, not many like to be seen helping out a freak show. Finding a money lender that wouldn't ask questions about our ability to pay the loan back had seemed a Godsend. If I don't return with the money, they're going to have to default to begging for the cash to get a doctor to look at the snake-man. Trying to cut my losses and attempt something else... well, you saw how that ended."

Cherep blinked at him blankly. "You got an outfit? An entire one?"

"Such as it is."

...well, fuck.

Biting down hard on his lower lip, the Cloud Flame user ran an exasperated hand through his hair in frustration. He didn't even like sideshows and how... shifty it all was, and he probably belonged in one due to the whole undying thing.
This wasn't supposed to be that involved. Save the Rain from his own stupidity, bounce out of the country in short order, then go on his own way once he gave the guy a phone number to call and get caught up under his sister's guard.

"Is it that dire?"

"We do not know, Aziz has been coughing blood for at least a week now and hasn't been able to move around much due to some kind of pain in his stomach."

Cherep wondered, a bit desperately, if Tatiana did house-calls. Maybe if he begged… "I know a nurse trying to get her doctor's license. If she visits, would you please get out of the country for a short while?"

"And why should I trust you with their safety? I barely know you."

"Do you really have a better plan?"

Mauricio paused and thought hard, nervously smoothing the side of one thumb with the fingers of his other hand.

"Once Viper gets back and gives us the all-clear, give me somewhere to send the nurse and you can meet back up with them in London, England. Next year, early." It would be a pain to have the guy with him on a world tour, but as he involved himself he was technically held accountable for his further actions in respects to Omertà.

Everyone in the family, except maybe Valera, would have something to say about it if he didn't at least ensure his involvement was covered as thoroughly as possible. Which meant giving the man the full Vindice Laws, as that was kind of what he was supposed to do with Flame users not inducted into it.

Which he didn't remember. They had mostly pertained to criminal stuff, some military, and some government things. None of which he was all that interested in, so the remainder that he did know was 'do not draw attention to yourself' and 'pass it on'.

Sonya would not be impressed at all…

For that matter, neither would Lisa. As a matter of fact, his mother would be rather exasperated with his lack of forethought before jumping in completely blind and the entire situation after the fact.

He should've listened to Viper.

No, fuck that.

He, Cherep, wasn't an asshole. Skull might be, but this guy wasn't a criminal. Mauricio didn't deserve to be impressed into a mafia syndicate just because of what he was. The Tranquility ice thing was pretty awesome as it was, just because he could do that didn't mean he had to be basically taken hostage for it.

So what if this was getting more involved than he liked?

Being a halfway decent person to another shouldn't be a great imposition, and it wouldn't be. The guy might've made some bad business decisions, but that was about it. Apparently on someone else's behalf, so he wasn't an asshole either.

"Okay, so… medical professional. Where do I call her?" Hopefully Tatiana wouldn't mind a short He'd promise her some shopping on his dime, even if that would start cutting rather hard into his finances. Two or three illegal races, especially if Viper would handle his bets for him in exchange for sixty percent, and he'd be fine until the world tour thing next year.

Unless something else happened…

"If you can get a doctor to Aziz, then yes. I can be convinced to leave the country." The words were reluctantly dragged out of the magician after maybe a touch too long to think about it. "That being said, I do not see myself performing any illegal actions even if I am grateful for your aid."

"Yeah, neither do I."

Mauricio blinked at him blankly.

"I did say I was a stuntman, didn't I?" Cherep pointed out a bit tiredly, but at least with some amusement. "Someone did this for me, I'm going to pass it on. We'll figure out payment later. Much later."

Seriously, he didn't appreciate his little sister and his foster father nearly enough. How the hell had they kept his nosy, mainly civilian, nose out of trouble way back when?

Sonya took the 'Flame expert' position she hated being shoved back into to cover his Cloud Flame use from anyone too curious, and mostly because she was a curious sort and wanted to know enough to understand, and Arseniy had practically hand-guided him through the shallowest parts of the Russian Mafiya to get him out the other side without issue.

They were practically saints. He adored the both of them.

…did he pick anything up for his foster parents?

Shit.

He didn't. Well, something to keep an eye out for.

"Did you ever get a rundown of what the Vindice Laws are?"

Frowning, the Rain regarded him suspiciously. "The what?"

"I... have to get a copy... oh wait, no. Vipes should know them." That was that problem solved, now for the next one. The actual part he had to do to keep out of freaky mafia police custody. "So, you are a user of Dying Will Flame of Rain. I'm of Cloud, Vipe's of Mist."

The look he got in return for the admittedly random topic change was at first skeptical, then when he lit up a finger with his bright purple Flames changed to stunned.

…maybe that was why Sonya picked up instructing others in their Flames here and there?

The expressions were kind of fun.

"You can do it too." Prompted the Cloud after a while, stretching out his long legs the best he could without nudging the stage magician out of his perch in a corner. "There's seven types, Rain, Clouds, Mists, Storms, Lightnings, Suns, and Skies. I'll go over them later, but Rains are generally peacekeepers. The ability you have is Tranquility."

Generally. Hopefully, very far from Moscow and far away from the little cult-thing the Zolotov Rains had started up, Mauricio would develop into a decent one. Cherep good give it as good of a crack at it as possible, maybe it would help him.

"The nurse I mentioned? She's a Sun. Activation. They make damn good healers, but they also make really good killers." They could skip Clouds for now, the stuntman was pretty sure his type-cast generalization would just confuse the guy. "Equally, Rains might make good peacekeepers but also can argue fantastically well if they want. It's all sorts of calming situations down, see?"

"You are… not very good at this."

"Yeah well… so? Vipe's going to charge you through the nose to do it instead." Oh fuck… he still had to pay the miser of a Mist for the scouting too. Cherep wondered where the nearest racing circuit was, and exactly how much Viper's surcharge for not having the cash on him now would be. "So right now, it's either me or them."

…he needed cheaper friends. Between the Mist and his elder sister, he was going to be broke in short order.
Chapter 87

(Tuesday the 28th of October, 1969 continued. Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"...I cannot find the bullets."

"That's fine." Sonya informed her temporary 'doctor' as blandly as she could, placing a hand over the two bullet holes in her lower belly.

Her Storm Flames probably took care of the physical bullets before long, but that didn't necessarily mean anything beyond the obstructions were gone and she had been bleeding freely for some time. She wasn't sure what the dust left behind by Disintegration actually was comprised of, if Storm Flames just reduced something to the atomic building blocks or to a specific set of compounds or what, which would likely be Scruffy's first academic question from her if he felt up to it.

She had a list of those, didn't she?

No, wait, some of those were for Verde.

Summoning up her Cloud Flames to her hands was an old if easy trick, then the thief placed them over her bare stomach and closed her eyes to focus on rejecting the injuries again.

…this was a hell of a lot easier when there was some reason to be uninjured. As in she had a job to do, rather than a small amount of down-time to wait out. However, blood loss was its own danger. One she had already experienced once before in a life before this one.

She still didn't want to die again. That kind of helped a little.

Gritting her teeth against the sandpaper like sensation of replicated Cloud flesh as it ate it's way from the very depth of her guts to the sensitive skin covering it, or not as the case may be, she waited for the worse of it to die down before swinging her legs off the rocky outcropping they were using as a makeshift surgery table to get up.

The highly stressed young lady, who had been the only one of the hostages to admit to some medical knowledge, gasped and scrambled backwards first. Then she paused, all but visibly straining to think about her actions and what the lone blonde might or might not appreciate.

With an irritable twitch, the Russian ignored her reaction and smoothed the fresh and some clotted blood off her stomach as she returned to the little beach-party thing they had going on. Pulling down the flimsy tank-top thing she had worn under the tunic-like dress thing, ruined now because of the holes and the blood, she debated on if getting dressed again or not would be useless.

Both articles of clothing were holey, and blood covered, but it was cold enough as it was and her skin was tacky with slowly drying blood.

…eh, it was almost morning. She could wait.

In the interest of stealth, the fire pit was nearly buried into a rocky stretch and bigger stones shifted to ensure it wasn't obvious from a mile away unless you had the elevation on them. The bonus from that was that the rocks were reflecting the heat back, so the kids and old people snuggled down for sleep around it were nice and toasty even if it was a late fall night.
Needing something to do, partially from a medical standpoint and partially because she hated leaving something as half-finished as she had the fight while getting the other hostages out of danger, she picked to 'patrol' their little encampment instead of take a seat near the fire and get some of the fish they were grilling.

The temperature difference alone made her irritable, on top of the pain in her gut and her general ill-feelings from recent realizations.

Oddly, her broken-but-not-really leg was no longer aching. She kind of wanted to get it checked out by Doctor Kappel sometime soon, which was the first thing she had to do once she left China.

The gods alone knew Tatiana would give her an earful for ignoring it, but right now was not a good time to be injured.

Instead of dwell on her already bitter-tinged thoughts or pay attention to her general aches and pains, she occupied herself with checking an ever-widening perimeter to get away from the staring.

Because she went through several walls, and killed about five handfuls of people, apparently she was now terrifying. Again.

This wasn't the rumor-shit that irritated her, but it was noticeable where those that hadn't hesitated in front of her before did so now. Even the grumpy grandpa guy and knitting old granny were both a bit more… hesitant, to her.

Depressingly, she was also now used to this reaction to her getting violent. It didn't irritate her nearly as much anymore.

She wondered if she was possibly jaded to it now, or just numb.

…and this was still thinking about her issues, wasn't it?

A misplaced rustle in the near-dead twilight, nothing non-human should be rustling for food this early, attracted her attention. Especially for what direction it came from, as that was more than a little concerning.

Having immediately extracted her fellow hostages instead of embroiling herself in the mess of a minor turf war going on, the Storm-Cloud had gotten a few glancing fights already. There were those that attempted to barge in on them, and the kid she was resolutely not thinking about, but also a few more beyond them. Two 'patrols' she startled the hell out of, and an entire section of a cordon she removed from the land of the living in order to finish her extraction.

Sonya would be a lot more hesitant over the killing if they, the Red Guard-like people, hadn't been trying to specifically target her and her fellow hostages. Every damn time she ended up running into a patrol, they radioed in her position and requested backup.

All total, the Soviet woman had netted herself three outright brawls of her own and one mini-slaughter.

Her Cloud side was utterly glutted on all the violence, the only sour pangs were the literal ones in her guts and a few other almost-near-misses that stung or still bled a bit. It made all the stress, irritation, and the weirdly dead-ish feeling she had since the start of the Underworld Martial Arts Tournament drain away. If she could stop tripping over her own thoughts, then maybe she could enjoy the little camp-out thing going on.

As her injuries were really rather minor, or she was forcing it to be for the moment, it allowed her the range to pick out and 'remove' the military-like patrols either sent after them or just posted around in different ways.

In other news, she had a set of radios that let her and the other hostages listen in on the utter unholy mess the 'invaders' were suffering through. Several uniforms that were gleefully pitched into their little bonfire by her elderly, some non-regulation apparel ripped up for various uses, a number of tools and random pocket-sized things that were appropriated to help establish and maintain the little campsite.

And the tobacco. Bless the smokers for the tobacco.

In other, other news… trees significantly off the beaten track seemed to have sprouted several naked bodies, all of them alive but unable to remove the rope tethering them to their own branches.

It was in the shadow of one of her 'corpse' trees that she found something interesting. Not one of the prisoners getting loose as she had suspected, but ballsy toddler boy's dad was eyeing her handiwork nervously. Alone.

While a full-scale invasion attempt on an underworld hotspot was going on.

He nearly jumped out of his skin when she slunk down to ground-level next to him. "Lost?"

"…in a manner of speaking." The guy admitted, sheepishly but with something under that… that pinged off her bullshit-o-meter.

…she didn't care. Someone else could figure out what he was lying about. Right now, she needed the adult hands for the kiddy corraling back at her makeshift base.

As long as he was ballsy toddler boy's dad. She should probably make sure.

No reason to be sloppy, after all.

Sonya summoned a palm-full of bloody fire to one hand, tossing it negligently at the base of her 'corpse' tree. Her Storm Flames immediately started eating up the bark, drawing several screams of terror and quite a few shouts of protest.

As they now saw her fully, not to mention the Flame use, she was unwilling to let them live.

Bonus, the light the now burning tree gave off let her inspect the man's face before she led him to where she had her fellow hostages set up.

"…what did you do?"

"I didn't do anything." Refuted the man, a bit too quickly.

It might've been the tree burning people alive, or just him naturally.

Honestly speaking, she didn't know him that well to figure it out.

She also wasn't that cruel. The tree was burning with her Storm Flames, it would kill the guys tied to it in short order once it got high enough. They might be a bit uncomfortably warm, alright near-boiled alive, until it reached their level… and be utterly terrified as they watched their fellows die…

…wow. She was kind of a bitch, wasn't she?

Snapping her fingers had the entire tree going up in an instant, even if she hadn't wanted to waste that much Flames on something that was inevitable. The blinding flare and the sudden cut-off of her ruby Flames had the man blinking wildly as he took in the now empty divot where a tree once stood.

"...what did your Triad do, then?"

That got her a much different reaction.

...or it was the sudden dark, and the fact she had found him in it when he probably hadn't expected her to had already unnerved the man.

Sonya's night vision couldn't be that much better than his, the burning tree had screwed with that even if she closed her eyes for the sudden immolation. With a slight amount of Cloud Flames behind her eyes, it was a tiny bit better than nothing.

Not nearly as good as her natural night vision, and using the trick seemed to make regaining that take longer, but good enough for sudden things or reading.

It probably contributed to his not-so-hidden terror, too. She shut it off, to be considerate, even if that did functionally blind her.

"I didn't do anything." Ballsy toddler boy's dad repeated firmly, backing up and nearly tripping over some of the roots and litter underfoot from the sound of it.

"You didn't. They did." That was... kind of actually a bit cheap.

Was he divorcing his syndicate like she had?

Would be doing, excuse her.

Sonya had paced around to be more on the man's right, just in case there was going to be another unexpected happening like... say the man would be armed with a gun and not be ballsy toddler boy's dad.

She had enough gunshot wounds, thank you.

Frankly, the Russian was really only mildly curious what was bothering the guy. This wasn't her territory, they had their own ways to deal with in-fighting, she was trying to make conversation.

Putting him at ease, hopefully. Which, it seemed she failed at. Not unusual but depressing too.

He flinched away from her new position, finally fully tripped on that root, and hit the ground rather hard for a martial artist.

Pausing, and trying to fruitlessly recall where any other hazards might be, the thief sighed and re-activated her night-vision hack. "What did they do?"

The scream in her face was entirely not appreciated.

(ooo0000oo)

(Tuesday the 28th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Fong ducked the bayonet thrust, taking possession of his opponent's arms and impaling the man on some of the broken rubble leftover from some Cloud's very pointed and contained arrow-straight rampage. Pressing down firmly had the impaled Red Guardsman screaming invectives against his lineage, but also ensured he would not be able to remove himself without aid before dying.

Kicking the jammed rifle had it bent in half without the Storm Flames needed to render it inoperable, so no one would be able to pick it up and shoot him in the back.

Taking a moment to regain his breath, he examined the on-going brawl he was still in the middle of.

There would be a large number of dead once things were over with, but that was not surprising. The Red Guard branch that somehow found them had been fully armed, most of the Triads had ensured any and all guns would be left behind in their respective territories while this was ongoing.

As they had interrupted two Flame users in the middle of a bout, there would be no survivors left alive. They couldn't afford that.

He only marginally ducked the sudden spike of Lightning Flames tossed negligently in his direction, earning Lu Shui the Lightning an irritable glare. "Will you stop?"

"Whatever seems to be the problem, Sōng?" Purred the assassin all but gleefully, flinging another of his paper-thin blades into a throat.

A very ragged group's leader suddenly pitched forward, sans his head, meaning the 'reinforcements' to their section of the arena were stymied in their forward charge into the criminal ranks not breaking as they seemed to have expected.

There were a lot of things the invaders hadn't expected, Dying Will Flames being one of the more major bits.

The Storm just had a slight issue with all the 'near' misses happening around him.

Very telling about the Lightning's control and aim or not, it still was not pleasant to be forced to watch the man supposedly covering his left for any overt sabotage.

With an irritable huff, Fong drew upon his Storm Flames and threw a double handful straight into the milling mess before their opponents could sort themselves out. Flash frying the lot of them into useless ash and taking out the weaponry that might prove inconvenient if any of their opponents came upon the site.

His future opponent took the opportunity to use his Flame's electrical nature to overload the lights down one hallway and identify another knot of opponents for them attempting a stealth flank.

Hooking a foot under a nearby section of concrete, he pressed as much Storm Flames as the fake rock could hold before kicking it down the corridor. Whoever it was that survived a glancing brush with a Disintegrating rock wouldn't last long, given the slightly echoing sobs.

A prissy little huff of his own, Shui flung a number of his little blades over the Storm's shoulder to not only nick the other Triad member's braid but also kill someone attempting to sneak up behind him.

Fong glared, the Lightning merely smirked.

Tucking the longish length now loose behind an ear, the Storm opted to try ignoring the other man.

The few fights still ongoing were dying down, the holes all the Flame users had punched through the invading Red Guard branch to reach their 'fallback' position and eliminate them before a retreat could be called had badly disorganized the 'invaders'.
A certain Storm-Cloud's brute-strength extraction had caused no few moments of terror in and of itself, meaning it was likely his hostage was at least feeling better if not entirely happy. Hopefully the fresh air would reduce some of the stress Sonya had been going through.

Now they just had to… sweep up the remains, and hopefully transfer to the secondary location without incident.

Fong was keenly looking forward to pounding Shui's face into the dirt.

It wasn't so much the opportunity to test his skills against another Flame user anymore, he was well and truly aggravated with the other man. Even if the tournament would be called short, he would be fighting the Lightning sometime soon.

"I wonder where your lovely little dragoness got to?" Queried the assassin now dogging his heels, apparently trying to incite a brawl before their bout came up in official channels.

He paused for half a second, pulling himself out of a near-haze of sheer Stormy-irritation.

…it was entirely likely the Lightning was trying to pick a fight with him. The penalties for doing so while the tournament was still 'ongoing' would ensure Zhōng would be displeased with him if he did so.

The forfeit on the other hand…

"I dare you to try." Fong dismissed with an amused smirk that was not what the Lightning assassin had expected.

There were rules against entrants fighting one another outside the ring for while the tournament was still being held, and rules against harming another fighter's hostage as long as you could prove it without a doubt, but there were none about what the hostages could do to a fighter.

If Shui tried anything and Sonya decided she disliked it, she was perfectly entitled to rip the man's arms off.

It would reduce how much fun he would have smashing the Lightning's face into the dirt later, but… it would probably be worth it.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 28th of October, 1969 continued. Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"So. They hatched?"

"They eat each other, and the mother, if not separated." Anna responded pleasantly, lifting the one in her hands so the woman that allowed her to take possession of her new pet could see it clearly. "This was the only survivor from the experimental batches. He almost got into the control batch too, the scamp."

The Mist Flame imbued orb weaver spider lifted a needle-like foreleg and placed it down delicately, inching forward in a very deliberate manner in the bright morning sunlight. The fact it was now the size of a small bird only a few days old aside, the Mirror Lady adored her new pet still exploring her hands.

The blue, green, and yellow patterns on his bulbous thorax stood out vividly against the drab stone they were seated upon, and the yellow and brown banded legs made him look downright dangerous, but it was his beady black eyes she adored.

He was still a baby, who knew how big he'd get or how long he would live.

Anna was very tempted to name him pavuchky, after the old Christmas fable of spiders in a pauper's tree decorating it for them.

Sonya eyed the spider tiredly, a hand pressed to the very obvious injuries in her belly to catch any leaking blood, and shrugged. "Did you remember to feed them right after they hatched? All newborns are hungry... I think..."

"I dropped three live crickets in each jar, boss lady. The moment there was more spider silk than the moms could account for." Admitted the Mist, bringing her fingers up and around Pavuchky. He froze, seemed to ponder the change of situation, and nibbled on her fingertips for the lack of anything to do. "I don't think young Shamal understood spiders lay clutches, actually. The moms tried, but there were only two or three eggs in each silk sac. They're just as big as an adult should be hours after hatching, and if they had required a lot more protein than I gave them? It is entirely possible I didn't feed them enough to prevent it."

She still had to train her baby, letting him roam freely would not be a good idea.

Even in an encampment her boss lady was running. They all had been most put out when she pulled her little man from his pet-box in the plane's cargo hold to her hands while standing on the beach.

Letting him wander around on the three-meter-tall rocks spiked around the little campsite in a makeshift wall were another thing, however. Both women were perched in a natural divot one had, which gave them a decent view over the hostages Sonya sourly claimed she was responsible for before suggesting their bird-high view of things.

"...I don't think it's cannibalism if he's not really the same as the others." Allowed the Storm-Cloud thoughtfully, even if she really looked tired and a bit cranky to go along with the tiny nicks in both flesh and cloth. "So aside his siblings, I guess he was just hunting for more food?"

Anna elected not to mention the cage of crickets, which Pavuchky would've gotten into so much easier than the glass jar holding the control group or the equally as secured jars holding the other experimental batches, had been left entirely alone.

"Can you do anything with him? I'm aware he's only a few days old... but..."

The Mist lit a finger with her Flames, her pet pouncing on the energy source lightning-quick and sucking it up with his cute little pedipalps. A bit over-stuffed, it was how she got him to be so passive in her hands, Pavuchky's thorax patterns started to shift and change.

Then her smart little darling wove them a spider silk square of cloth. Encouraged by the structure she gave her aimless Construction, but it really was only a slight encouragement.

The older blonde took the offered near-transparent scrap of cloth curiously, directly from her little baby's legs, with a courteous nod of appreciation for the dear.

Sonya attempted to lite it a-Flame, tear it in half with her finger strength, and just overall damage the little square of silk. Her Storm did in fact eat slowly into it, her Cloud merely replicated a corner, and while she could almost tear the delicate seeming material apart... it didn't want to go easily.

"...huh. Interesting. Can he take another dose, or should we wait?" Asked the thief as she gave back the slightly damaged square to her pet.

Pavuchky was not happy over the damages, he started to repair them without any additional Flames or encouragement from her.

Anna stoked his thorax thoughtfully as she allowed him more space to work. "I don't know? I would say not, but he uses up a lot of what Flames he's given doing even that small amount. He might actually need another bit shortly."

The Mist Flame orb weaver suddenly dropped from her fingertips, making his delicate if deliberate way over to the Storm-Cloud. He didn't go far, just far enough to reach Sonya's hand. Then he tapped on her fingers with both forelegs until she moved them.

Not even waiting for anything like permission, Pavuchky fitted his scrap of silk to the holes in her breezy looking tunic-top. Weaving the broken strands into his patch, somehow the delicate if undyed strands acquired the purple the normal silk had. Once that was finished, he started feeling out the lacey parts and how the strands wove together in order to fix them too.

"...I have a sudden impression of a very fussy tailor from him." Sonya remarked blandly to her.

Anna giggled, beaming at her ever so clever baby.

There was nothing that could be done about the rusty trails of old blood, or even the tiny dots of new blood where whatever her boss lady was doing didn't quite reach all the way. Her little man took a few rusty crusts the older woman was flecked with to experimentally nibble upon, and almost managed to wander away from her once he deemed himself done.

Scooping Pavuchky back up, even if he nibbled at her fingers again, the Mirror Lady examined her boss lady. "You seem very... tired."

"Nearly been a full twenty-four hours for me, Mirror Lady." Admitted Sonya frankly. "Did you defang him?"

"Nothing so cruel. I merely... have the suggestion that he can't bite through human skin going on." Anna sniffed in mock offense. "He can't reach his back to remove or eat the dot of Mist Flames."

"Anna, you are aware some people have phobias about spiders... right?" At her slightly insulted look, the thief gestured lazily downward. "My fellow hostages nearly had a collective panic attack when you popped in with him."

Of course, having said that, her boss lady lit a finger with her Cloud Flames and offered Pavuchky a taste.

He went still at the very different Flames, moving glacially slowly up her hands until he was about at the same level as the thief's lavender will-fire covered fingertip. A vibrantly striped leg delicately reached out and poked the mass of Cloud Flames, and then another, using his Flame-resistant chitin to gather up a few wisps he examined it intently with all forward-facing eyes first and then brought a Flame-burning leg closer to his mouth.

The spider sipped a bit, paused, sipped more. He then scraped every last bit of Flame off her fingers to stuff himself silly with.

"Well... that's their problem." Insisted the Mirror Lady as her darling gorged himself, the pattern changes along his thorax proving rather interesting with an added streak of vivid purple growing darker as he ate.
...and then the spider grew about two sizes all of a sudden, sprawled legs shifting from her palms to her fingers and wrists to support his sudden resize, but that was ignored. He had been doing a lot of growing the last few days, and with Cloud Flame's property of Propagation that really should've been expected.

At least there was no shed skin to worry about this time.

"Pavuchky is a very well-behaved spider."

"Anna, he's trying to eat your fingers."

"He's just playing."

Sonya did not look remotely sold on that. "If he startles anyone, and they smash him, it will be your fault."

She pouted, earning her not even a blink from the thief, and brought her significantly bigger pet in close to her. "Well… fine. I get to defend him then."

"Noted… are you really calling him 'little spiders'?"

"He was the smallest of the group… until he ate his sisters." Anna lifted her head, listening in a Misty way to Usov's far-away words, and sighed slightly. "Boss lady, the plane is landing. Any orders for us?"

"I'm not going to be immediately available, so if Arseniy wants you all to do something that's fine. Try not to cause an international incident until I am, please." The thief snatched a dragonfly out of the air and offered the bug to her darling. "Otherwise just bide your time. If it's not the Wo Hop To Triad, ignore anyone else."

Pavuchky all but leapt to the Storm-Clouds fingers to take possession of the dragonfly, wrapping the squirming thing in enough silk to pin his victim in place.

Sonya allowed her to take back her pet thoughtfully. "...since spiders are hunters, and we just added an unnatural part to his natural makeup, he might've needed Flame imbued bugs to eat and not just normal ones. Especially if he can survive eating wildly different Flame types."

Anna made a dismayed sound as she followed along with the older woman's line of thought.

No wonder her baby ate his siblings and the other batches, he must have been starving before she let him nibble on her Flames. It would also explain why he went after the control group, the same type as his fellow experiments but without the Flames. He might've thought they would had some more for him.

"Additionally, before the next test group, we need to ensure we're not dumping an entirely invasive experimental species into the wild." Continued her ever so thoughtful leader slowly. "If your little pet got loose to eat his fellows and tried to eat more of his non-altered species, then we need both a stable 'prey' type for them to eat and maybe even Flame-imbued plant life for the prey to consume. Somehow, without risking the wider world's ecology."

"This is getting rather involved." Anna commented neutrally, massaging Pavuchky's bulbous thorax as he masticated his dragonfly treat.

He was now almost bigger than her fist, her little man was going so fast.
"All things worth doing right are." Sonya deadpanned, giving her a pointed look.

The Mist woman smiled at the reminder that she was part of a 'do it right' thing for the older blonde.

"I have to leave you to it, our plane landed." Anna regretfully admitted to the only one that hadn't screamed, swore, or otherwise reacted negatively to her little baby. "I'll see you in a few hours or days, boss lady."

"I certainly will not object to a visit or two before that, even." Remarked the Storm-Cloud evenly. "Don't get too attached to him, Anna. If I recall correctly, common web-spinners like him don't live all that long. It's why I had this started on his type."

She pouted, cradling her massive baby to her chest. "Don't say that, boss lady."

"Just as a warning."

"I'll keep it in mind." Relented the Mist woman sadly, quirking the baby spider a wry smile for him nibbling on her fingertips again.

That was Mist, Rain, Lightning, Sun, and now Cloud. She wondered how much she had to scare those two with the rest of the group for them to release a bit of Storm Flames for her baby.

The trick would be to find a Sky for Pavuchky to nibble on.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 28th of October, 1969 continued. Undisclosed underground complex half a mile from Sham Wan Beach, Pok Liu Chau Island, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"I may or may not have been shot in the stomach. Twice."

Fong about spluttered his drink of water all over the floor. The young man who was helping various Triad fighters recover from their midnight counter-raid was unimpressed entirely, giving the Storm another ladleful of water before skirting around their little group for another.

Zhōng blinked at the Russian woman, eyeing her blood splattered outfit suspiciously. There were spots of fresh blood on the skirt and great streaks of rusty blood in others, equally fresh dots on the front panel of her borrowed áo dài to confirm her words, but not obvious holes in the garment.

"Additionally, if you have a phobia of spiders, I do apologize about what the Mirror Lady brought with her from Russia." Continued Sonya Bazanova idly, not remotely sounding sorry at all or even slightly in pain from her claimed injuries. "But frankly, it's her pet and I've had enough people screaming in my ear about it."

…one of her inbound Mist minions contacted her, meaning they likely didn't have any support from the Triad that was supposed to have protected the hostages. Not even secretly via another Mist, who could possibly have been identified by her own.

The Mountain Master of the Wo Hop To Triad nodded firmly to show he understood the less obvious message in her words, raising a hand for one of the Sun medics inspecting the rest of the curiously unmarred hostages for anything they might use against the Russian thief.

Her abrupt decision to evacuate the hostages from the Triad that had possession of them was a rather large snub, even if they had been mostly murdered off by then. Then again, given how many times she had to interfere in their security arrangements before even last night, he was sure very few would really be all that offended.

Expect the ones that should’ve been responsible, that is. Then possibly their nominal allies, as long as they had a hand in whatever was tried with the hostages. That would be interesting to feel out in however many days.

Ignoring the squabble the Storm and Cloud suddenly got into, over her injuries and 'this is why you brought me along, right? I'm fine' that he was getting curiously immune to them pulling, Zhōng wondered what to do with the information.

Obviously, he would be signing off on her contract the moment he got back to his headquarters. With her injuries and the fact she had taken on the responsibilities one of the other Triads should've been doing instead of her taken into account, she had more than fulfilled it sans the date part. He would also make an honest attempt to get the hostages disbanded, the moment the Triad Heads gathered to work out the penalties for what had gone on and the branch that aided the Red Guard in finding them.

It wasn't really required anymore, aside the illegal arena and tournament in the forbidden martial arts they were holding… they were now all complicit in the murder of an entire Red Guard branch.

Besides which, he was fairly certain that with all the effort poured into making this arena impressive the secondary location only barely had enough facilities to hold the fighters and an audience. If they could also take and support a large group of dependents in any measure of security… well, he for one would be doubtful.

Either way, there would be a few days of time before things could resume, if they would resume. That would exceed her contracted length of time either way, and hence he should do something before he was required to pay Mafia Land for overtime.

Fong may not be pleased if the tournament was disbanded, either indefinitely or until next year, so removing part of the more problematic mechanics of the event might help things continue.

"One last thing. Sonya called before he could move off and leave her at the mercy of both Fong and the Sun medics. "Ballsy toddler boy… never really got his name, but it was his dad I caught? The kid… I think he's Flame blind."

Zhōng turned back to her curiously. "I've never heard of that before."

"Neither have I. But when the Mirror Lady did her astral-projection thing and made a Construction of herself to talk to me, ballsy toddler boy couldn't see or hear her." She jerked a thumb over a shoulder to a toddler-aged young child remained in the arms of the Wo On Lok's elderly hostage, the one that promised to teach her to knit. "He did see the utter monstrosity of a spider Anna pulled from her Flames, but not her. So… a little more experimentation while you were all catching up to us, and I think he's Flame blind."

"What does that mean?" Fong asked, even as he chivvied her backwards onto a broken part of masonry so the medics could tend to her.

He earned a dirty look, mainly for the fussing if the Mountain Master observing them was pressed to guess, before the woman submitted with ill-grace. "Depends. Either a kid that is a liability when it comes to interacting with Flame users, or a kid that will grow up to be the only one you can be sure is never affected by Mist-things, Tranquility, or any other such Flame bullshit."

The Storm-Cloud glanced to the Suns fussing about her skirt, then looked back up to give Zhōng a pointed look.

"I'll be very interested in the answer, if at all possible."

"I will… see about it."

(Wednesday the 29th of October, 1969. Wo Hop To Triad Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Sonya ended up with ballsy toddler boy for the meantime, because of course.

She was injured and disinclined to go anywhere, had some kind of vested interest in the kid's wellbeing, and wasn't a traitor. Admittedly she wasn't exactly alright with what amounted to kidnapping the kid from whatever family he might still have, even if his dad and originating Triad were… in a serious amount of trouble.

A serious amount of trouble that just might become a bit more than bloody in the end.

The Tai Huen Chai, the Big Circle Boys, were… apparently former Red Guardsmen themselves. Or the same people that created and/or enabled the utterly baffling premise of students waging war on everything that had been Chinese just because, just a few decades removed. They did take in a lot of the ex-Red Guardsmen and affiliated people when they became disillusioned with their causes, so it was a more or less a paramilitary Triad with a lot of lawyers instead of a local gang that grew in influence.

As back in the nineteen-fifties, the 'ultra-left' faction of the Communist Party of China were 'purged' from the government. Not just kicked out of office or chased from their homes, a large number of them were shot in their sleep.

Sonya would very much like to know what was 'ultra-left' in a communist state like the People's Republic of China, and why the fuck it had mattered at all at the time.

Oh, wait. Fanatics, right.

Regardless, there were survivors. Of course there were, and the survivors of that atrocity were all not happy people. Who, as they were barred from legal ways of living, turned to criminal ways.

And they were very good at it.

A whole lot of scorned bureaucrats and disgraced military types?

Of course they were good at getting through the loopholes and grey areas set forth by the very people that tried to have them killed. Then managing laws and supply lines to support whatever the hell they were up to, under the noses of their once-fellows that may or may not have contributed to their disgrace.

The 'Big Circle' apparently came from part of how they survived… or something about their time in the internment camps. She couldn't quite tell, but something like 'their safe-spots/mark of their imprisonments were marked by a large red circle'.

It was really subjective and changed depending on who she asked out of boredom. Especially with the little factoid that a splinter cell of their Triad were the ones to lead the now defunct Red Guard branch to the underworld tournament in hopes of ‘proving their worth’ via a mass arrest of criminal types.

Any way it happened, it did and those survivors of the ‘ultra-left’ went underground with their aims like a ‘proper’ Triad organization. Built up a reputation, got into a whole lot of murder and social engineering projects, and the like.

Fast forward to today, where large factions of their old ‘coworkers’ were being kicked and sometimes arrested and sent back to the country because they were getting… a bit too fanatic for the people in charge.

Someone overheard someone else talking about the underworld martial arts tournament, probably thought ‘we can use that to get back into such-and-such's good graces', and shit snowballed from there.

Which left ballsy toddler boy and his dad.

Ren Guo, the dad, and Ren Cai, the kid. The Tai Huen Chai's fighter and his hostage.

Daddy dearest was in a shit-ton of trouble because he not only knew a faction of his Triad was up to no good, but he also helped them get in. Hence, how he ended up under one of her corpse trees without getting somewhat beat up while the rest of the Triads and their assorted fighters were still dealing with the invasion.

They weren't the ones that were trying to get Sonya killed, from what Arseniy had said, which for one would've been too easy and for another the repeated attempts on her life had made her suspicious of everything in general. Even to the Triad that should've been the ones to do hostage security.

The reason why she was pretty much on her lonesome for her extraction?

Most of the Big Circle Boys present that night had been dead before someone barged in on her and aerated her guts for her. Especially all the guards that were supposed to be on site.

Cai, being Flame blind and the Russian thief admitting to some curiosity verbally over how he'd grow up, got handed over to a neutral third-party while his 'originating syndicate' did some housecleaning and the other Triads decided what to do about them.

If the dad was alive now or not, she wasn't prepared to guess. Admitting in a public setting the kid might be one of the rare few that could do utterly neutral negotiations between Flame users hadn't been the best plan, but it gave the kid a unique sort of position. In being possibly an asset to hold onto even if his dad was a… dick.

She didn't like how kids were treated here, and that was with loving or at least invested parents. She didn't really want to contemplate how a kid with a disgraced dad would be treated. The 'possibly more than useful' thing was the best she could manage for the kid to hide behind.

His life was probably going to suck as it was, and unless she stole ballsy toddler boy…

…which she couldn't do.

Sonya was not equipped to handle the sudden influx of a toddler, who was not grieving now but might just be doing so in as few as a couple days when and if his dad did a no-show. Which made her rather appreciate how utterly out of the blue Renato getting Shamal dropped on him must have felt on the hitman's side of the equation.
Mingxia would be taking up the tiny surplus of cash she had right now, Galina was off getting her paperwork straightened out and her wardrobe fixed to survive a Russian winter. Beyond that, she didn't have the time for a toddler.

She could stick him under Scruffy, worse comes to worse, but from what the Lightning had informed her of last night about the Sun's mental state and his slow to heal from it issue that might not be the best idea. Alright, that wasn't his fault but she was a little sour over the belated realization she had done nothing for it either.

Scruffy needed to speak up more.

Fong was off with his Triad head doing the renegotiations either the continuations of the tournament needed or just the recent mess' cleanup. Arseniy had done her a minor favor taking old man Yaozu in for his traveling papers, he really only needed a temporary one for right now, and was sitting on the two Rains brought in from Moscow while he did so.

Mirror Lady Anna, Usov, and the Mist girl's utterly monstrous pet were off stalking for the information she needed to press home a… complaint about the number of attempts on her life.

Avdotya had given her the most unimpressed look for her gut shots, but as she wasn't a Sun she took a back step to Huang and instead did a highly painful inspection to ensure she didn't need to burn something out of her injuries for the fourth Sun that had a look at her to heal up. Like an infection or a ruptured length of intestine.

Her stomach was still twinging painfully when she shifted a touch too much.

There were three of Galina's Lightnings, basically sitting outside her 'sickroom' door and being obstructions to even Xiasheng. Andrei and one of his fellow Suns were apparently back where the Moscow contingent were being housed, basically making sure none of their shit was tampered with.

That left one loose Storm user from Moscow. Tasked to be Sonya's hands because she was 'bedridden for observation', on orders from the nurse.

Which she was only tolerating because the Sōng siblings were fussy hens. "I know you, don't I?" Because she was pretty shit at names, to be honest.

…and faces, if she really had to be truthful.

The Storm kid pressed a set of spectacles up his nose, probably for the lack of anything to do with his hands. "Well… not really, Miss Bazanova. When you visited us, I merely asked if you had two Flames didn't that mean you were weaker than Mikhail."

The thief dredged her memory. "…the kid that got punched by that girl?"

She earned a wry grin. "Zoyka does that a fair bit, yes. She did punch me when I asked you the question."

"Huh… so you are?"

"Milanko Ugljanin."

…it was a 50-50 split if she'd ever recall that.

She had been actually intending to ask him some of what had been going on in the Storm section, right up until the door opened without the three Lightnings guarding it kicking up a fuss.

Which meant Galina had returned with a surprisingly timid Mingxia.

The Storm brat in the corner perked up, the Lightning ignored him, and the little Rain slunk to the floor next to Sonya's bedside and just curled up there.

"Beat it, find something to do." Her assistant informed her 'hands' shortly, taking a moment to express a bit of dissatisfaction with the lack of seating options and electing to sit on Sonya's bed instead of the floor. "I had to borrow the Mirror Lady to get things done in a reasonable timeframe, hope you don't mind."

"Not really." Admitted the thief idly, petting downy toddler hair as the kid woke up from his nap at the sudden increase in volume. "The Storm's...?"

"...he likes praise. Got caught up trying to earn the entirety of the Storm section's approval." Admitted the brunette shortly in Russian instead of a language the teenaged Rain could understand. "I've removed him from that the best I can, but it doesn't mean he's magically fixed. If given nothing to do, like now, he's likely to return to the other Storm brat and try to gain his approval."

Mingxia eyed the admittedly forthright woman's profile a bit nervously. "That's not likely to happen?"

"They know it's what he's after and they're a bunch of perverse, contrary, stupidly stiff-necked bunch of idiots. Especially in volume." Galina offered blandly, as if that couldn't also apply to her 'boss'. "The school isn't really helping him, just broadening his social circle might make him more spastic."

Frankly, if it was positive and widespread social acceptance the kid was after, nothing would help him.

Sonya hummed to show she heard but swung her legs off the side of her bed and sat up instead of speaking right away. Much to ballsy toddler boy's irritation when he lost what he was hiding behind to avoid all the new people. "There's nothing to do but watch him, then. Rather strange of a fixation..."

"We didn't give them anything to fixate upon. They found their own methods, and a whole lot of them are goals they'll never be able to achieve." Tossing her head impatiently, the Lightning held out a hand for the Rain girl to take. "Few of them have your drive to find something, instead they get stuck with whatever their prepubescent preteen or teenaged angst gets hung up on."

Mingxia looked highly surprised to be pulled up to the bedspread instead of left on the floor. "So, boss lady." Galina switched to Mandarin Chinese, so the girl could understand them again. "What did you call us all down for?"

"A distraction, to be honest." Admitted the thief slowly, stretching out her much-abused abs carefully to be sure the sore feeling of 'scrubbed with steel wool' feeling of another Storm's disinfection methods and the sandpapery feeling of Cloud 'voodoo' had actually faded and just wasn't numb. "If nothing goes to plan, maybe a bit of combat experience for the kids. Mainly, though, I need hands."

"For what?" Asked the young Rain softly when all the Lightning did was arch an eyebrow.

"I have this... thing, about people sent to kill me." Admitted the Storm-Cloud wryly, pushing up to her full height to check her range of movement. Then picking up ballsy toddler boy since he didn't appreciate being left behind with strange women. "I rather dislike the hassle, after all."

(Friday the 31th of October, 1969. Budapest, Hungarian People's Republic.)

Tatiana gingerly prodded the stomach of the heavily tattooed guy, when that didn't earn her a discontented twitch of pain she graduated to actually pressing down with splayed fingers. He was breathing much to shallowly, but that might just be because he was trying not to cough up a lung and splatter his sheets with even more blood.

Eventually, the nurse sat back on her heels. "Well... good news is you don't have a hernia or ulcers. Those were the two rather major causes that would've required surgery. Admittedly one would've had you bleeding from the other end, but it was possible."

Aziz the 'Snake man' eyed her warily, scooting backwards away from the flame-haired nurse.

"So, what does that leave us with?" Asked the stuntman behind her, running fingers through his already rather spiky purple hair.

"Practically everything else. Hemoptysis is generally a symptom, not the problem." She wished she had access to an x-ray machine, or even a bronchoscope. "But, as it's not the major culprits... or at least I don't think so, it's either his lungs or his throat."

Which... might let them not break into a hospital around here just to be sure. Had the individuals been even remotely criminal she would've insisted, but...

...these were entirely her dork of a brother's kind of people.

There was a 'bearded lady', which she highly suspected was actually a guy even if he was prettier than her if he'd shave the beard, watching her every move suspiciously. S/he had some kind of nurse experience, but not the medical instruction the Sun user had to her, and had gotten the Snake man rather comfortable if it wasn't for the whole coughing blood issue.

Also... the corset thing was ew. Why did they do that?

Did he and/or she know what that did to her organs and rib cage?

Aziz had filed his teeth into fangs and tattooed himself all over with snake scales, and she did mean all over. His 'sick-bed' was situated near a few tanks filled with a knot of pythons and two vipers, which she was assuming were his pets/partners. The guy also hadn't said a word yet, merely kind of cringed away from her as much as he could get away with.

Tatiana was being gentle, damn it all. Yeah, she smacked her brother upside the head as a greeting but that was for not picking her up from the airport.

There was the Rain guy Cherep picked up, something-or-another Ciceron, wringing his hands in a corner. Rather portly man with swarthy skin, she was going to try to hound him into a diet or something the moment she was done with the snake man.

A couple handful more, but those were all being shy and hiding away from her.

Not that it would help them, she intended to go over all of them with a fine-tooth comb.
Her utterly too sweet of a brother would get crushed if any of them came to harm, directly or indirectly stemming from what he was trying to do with baby-Rain-face over there. He had to hide their boss man for his own protection, for whatever reason she was taking on faith since he hadn't gone over the details with her yet, and since he deemed Ciceron as a bad gatekeeper for Omertà…

Well, Mafia Land was right out. Even if they could afford it, which they couldn't on multiple levels.

Rummaging around in the first-aid kit she had at least thought to bring with her, Tatiana pulled a small flashlight out of its depth. "Okay, Aziz. I need to see your throat. If whatever's wrong isn't there, we're going to have to get… creative."

She did bring a stethoscope with her, but that wouldn't tell them anything aside if his breathing was rattling suspiciously or not. Which may or may not be the issue he was having.

Aziz glanced warily from her, the flashlight, to behind her where his boss was standing with her brother, and back again before budging from his cower against the crates that made up his comfy little spot. The Sun waited with faked patience while he maneuvered himself, categorizing the higher likelihood the guy was extremely double-jointed from how odd a few of those movements appeared.

Snapping at the guy for taking his time would do nothing but make him jumpy, the others in this little backwater slum thing hate her, and just generally impact how successful she'd be nattering them all into a checkup of their own.

Patience was its own reward, even if by nature she hated it with a passion.

Asides which, Aziz had fangs.

If he bit her with those?

Tatiana smiled encouragingly at the guy. "Smile, and open wide."

…he had no molar teeth, okay.

Hopefully he was getting some kind of dietary supplements aside what he could rip apart with those pointy pearly whites, they and his gums seemed healthy enough at first glance.

She wasn't a dentist. They were there, not swollen or irritated, good enough for her.

Clicking on the little flashlight, the nurse attempted to peer down his esophagus as far as physically possible without the actual tools for such a thing. She really should take control of the guy's lower jaw, but that might also give her more trouble than it was worth given how wary he was already.

"…do you swallow swords, Aziz?"

"Why does that matter?" Demanded the bearded man-lady before snake-guy could even hum an answer for her.

"Nojan, let us not alienate the lady of medicine." Soothed the Rainy dude a touch hastily.

"She doesn't have to do this." Cherep tacked on a bit more defensively.

…because he really was a sweet dork.

The Sun user gave a small laugh. "Because our baby sister learned the process to do it too, and had a few interesting things to say about the art that I was interested in. Like the very real possibility of 'nicking' one's cricopharyngeal sphincter if you tried to rush learning. Or tearing it or stressing it.
He's got a bruise at the back of his throat and eliminating that as the cause might help a small bit finding out what's wrong."

A bit paraphrased, Sonya didn't know the medical terminology, but true enough.

Nojan the bearded one exchanged a look with her Rainy boss. "...family of carnies?"

"You could say that. Not entirely, though. I didn't join the circus, to say the least." Tatiana dismissed with a wave. She gave the less wary and now more interested snake-man an encouraging smile. "I also got how to breathe fire out of her, if you'd like some tips."

If he was trying to learn alone, without the help of someone that knew how to do all those show tricks, she was going to punch someone.

Unless you were trying to kill, sharp implements did not belong near someone's throat.

Alas, the guy gave a shake of his head.

Not sword swallowing, although he still looked rather interested in her so that was still progress.

"So... now what?" Cherep asked of her as he helped her back to her feet.

She gave him a grin, there was no reason for him to back up like that. "Well... I need a getaway driver. We're going to have to... liberate some medical supplies from a nearby hospital. However, I'd like to make sure Aziz isn't the only one that needs a bit of help first."

Her stethoscope hadn't even made it into her kit, it was looped loosely around the handle. Plucking that up, Tatiana warmed it between her palms and a tiny bit of Sun Flames added to ensure it remained that way.

Steel, as a byproduct of iron, being a Sun Flame metal for the win.

Perching her pert ass on the snake-guy's bed, she gave him a slight smirk. "Breathe, as you would normally then deeply. As deep as you can go, even if you cough."

Tatiana listened intently, to the guy's lungs not the sudden conversation that struck up the moment she was 'otherwise occupied'. He was breathing too quickly, and his breath was rattling in his lungs, which meant mainly that they were filled with fluid that could or could not be blood.

…the guy's wariness might not be because she was a stranger. Confusion was possible, meaning it wasn't the words he was listening to but her tone. That shake from before could've been an 'I don't understand' kind of motion and not a 'no' one.

Confusion was generally a symptom of oxygen deprivation or head trauma. No contusions on his shaved head, the pretty patterns made it hard to see if there was bruising, but she was pretty sure 'he got whacked in the head' would have been told to her if that had happened.

Breathing problems then. A severe one.

Pneumonia or an upper/lower respiratory issue?

Cancer was a possibility, so were cysts.

Aziz about jumped out of his very colorful skin when she plastered a hand to his forehead, toeing her kit closer so she could grab a thermometer out of it while he adjusted. As the tattoos kind of made it hard to tell if he was turning blue or anything, she unwrapped her thermometer from the sterile plastic case and handed him it instead of jam it under his tongue as she wanted.

His nails were turning blue.

"Tats?"

"More than likely, pneumonia." Coughing blood with flu-like symptoms. Possibly, honestly, the more likely of the options.

There were what?

Three?

Four. Ish. Major causes for pneumonia, and a handful more reasons why he developed it when he was a healthy… ish, young man. Might've been anything from his snakes slithering through something not quite healthy to those tattoos he had. It could even be a side-effect of something else he had that wasn't so pesky.

She needed a lab and she needed a toxicology specialist before she could start treating him beyond just general antibiotics. That wasn't really a great idea, because if whatever caused the pneumonia wasn't susceptible to whatever he had it would just build up an immunity to the antibiotics that couldn't kill it. Which might help it kill what should be killing it when she found his treatment.

The major problem right now was that Aziz wasn't getting enough air, which made him lethargic and confused to the point of being dazed and slow to respond. Or if it wasn't an issue of enough air then he wasn't getting it past whatever was building up in his lungs. She'd put him on pure oxygen if possible, but there were no tanks of it here.

Carefully not showing the face she wanted to pull, Tatiana turned to her brother. "I need an ambulance at the least. It would have… most, of the general supplies I need right now."

Cherep pulled the face she wasn't doing. "Just an ambulance?"

"Please." Thankfully, she could get around the whole 'Aziz couldn't get enough air' issue on her lonesome right now.

Lightly pushing the snake-man back so he was laying down again, Tatiana lit her fingers with her sparky yellow Flames and Activated his oxygen absorption rate. With her other she took the thermometer from his mouth and pouted at the fever his shirtless-ness was probably concealing.

The ambulance should have the supplies to take cultures with, and she'd have to break into a clinic or lab herself to run a few tests. Maybe, if she caught him on a good hour, Doctor Kappel wouldn't mind conveying some questions to the labs in Saint Julian's for her.

Like what to treat whichever strain of pneumonia Aziz had, and if whichever virus or bacterial infection was the cause could be symptoms of a worse or direr illness.

With one hand rather firmly occupied in raising the guy's blood-oxygen saturation level back to a survivable amount, Tatiana inspected the two she had been left with. "Anything either of you can think of that needs immediate treatment while I'm here?"

The little crate-city slums they were in was not hygienic, and there was the great possibility just moving them from here would clear up a lot of the minor shit that could be bothering them. She really should cordon off Aziz's sick-room type affair, but she suspected these people had been trading off tending the guy so they were all exposed to whatever he had already.
Baby sister was sometimes a little idiot, but Tatiana had figured out how to use her 'immunity' trick even if she had no Storm Flames. As long as she wasn't infected by something, because viruses eventually became part of oneself in their drive to make someone sick.

Still, one's Flames did not harm oneself. As long as that remained true, the nurse could pull her Flames to about skin-level and remain uninfected. It was a hell of a lot easier with Storm Flames, and even just keeping it up for a full hour was draining as hell, but possible.

The trick would be to test it, and that was… iffy.

Nojan the bearded one was gawking at her Sun Flames, which Ciceron was doing on a much lesser scale but with a measure of fascination normally found in the tetchy trainee brats just realizing there was more than their version of inner Flames around. Aziz's frame relaxed a touch that she hadn't even been aware was there, his above-normal flexibility making his boneless state a lot looser than she was comfortable with.

Possibly, being able to pull in enough air and process what was going on was the cause.

"Aside a few old injuries."

"Let me cut you off there." Tatiana interrupted a tiny bit shortly, turning back to the two and pinning the chatty dude with a no-nonsense look. "The price for my help is a hug, which my brother paid. He's a big ass softy, so if any of your minions up and croak while he's off hiding you from whatever, he's going to be pouty and mopey and generally too wet all over. I, and various others in my family, are not the type of people you want to piss off. You make my brother sad, I will make your life a living hell."

"…you sure you're a nurse?" Asked the highly caustic man-she.

"Sweetie, I am a criminal nurse. I patch up killers for my day job. Now, start talking little Rain. Before I burn you."
(Saturday the 1st of November, 1969. Wo Hop To Triad Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Sonya eyed the child she had dubbed 'ballsy toddler boy' thoughtfully as he fidgeted in the mid-morning light next to her.

It was a rather silent consideration, until the girl pouring her tea finally looked up and seemingly broached the topic occupying her mind for most of the morning. "…Miss Sonya?"

The blonde Russian, and that did now need a qualifier for there were easily another dozen or so with varying features scurrying around at her bidding, tilted her head towards Mingxia but didn't look away from the child taking refuge in her lap instead of play in the open air. "Something you need?"

Fong had maybe a few more minutes to wait for the Wo Hop To's Mountain Master and had picked to spend them in the courtyard with his lingering guests. Two were due to leave shortly, one was not averse to remain due to the expressed issue now pulling at her clothing, and it was possible more of her minions might peek in for a few short moments.

Watching her deal with various other, young, Flame users was still fascinating. The Storm that had invited her here unfortunately didn't get to see a whole lot of that, due to the meetings he was a bit tied up within, he mostly heard through second-hand accounts from his fellows about how that went.

"Exactly… when are we leaving?" Mingxia inquired softly as she stuck her fidgeting hands into her wide blue sleeves, looking more than a bit conflicted. "You said I would be leaving with Miss Galina, right? Is… something wrong?"

"Aside the fact we're still waiting on traveling papers, so you can do this legally and transfer the eventual scholastic credits to another school for further education, there is the issue about those trying to kill me." Explained the thief evenly without so much as looking up from the child in her guard. "The others are also on a school trip, for real-world experience in applying their trades with a sort of safety catch. You'll leave with the other kids about when Galina decides there's nothing else for her brats to do."

"Can I inquire about what they're doing?" Fong prodded after a beat, within which it seemed the woman deemed that more than enough to answer his little sister's nervousness.

"As I have a… slight complication of the child kind, they're getting the footwork of what I want to do done with." A shoulder lifted up in an absent shrug, but that was the most he received for the question before she changed the topic. "Why, politically speaking, was I stuck with the kid? I'm foreign."

"Perhaps, but you are also a Cloud." One that had a very new, and semi-disturbing, reputation for mass property damage and understandable wide-scale manslaughter within the Triads.

"Is that a tradition here?" She questioned warily, finally looking away from the toddler stroking the tangled threads of yarn that was part of whatever the Storm-Cloud had been knitting before the child got involved with it.

"Well… no. There have never been all that many of your type to use like that. But you are a respectable deterrent to any seeking alternative rearrangements before anything is decided."
Especially considering what she had done at the tournament's hopefully temporary end.

They were still digging rubble out of there in hopes of reclaiming some of what went into building it, and her 'corpse trees' had been more than a little disturbing to deal with.

Given more than half of the arena's south façade had collapsed because a Cloud had thoughtlessly destroyed two load bearing walls on her way out… and the remains of whatever patrols that ran afoul of her were still being stumbled upon by curious civilians and Triad cleanup crews alike.

He really shouldn't complain. The hostages had been fine in the end, most that got caught up in the collapse were not his opponents, and they had to abandon the location anyways.

…but he had been right about it not surviving the woman's temper. She would've outclassed what damage the Red Guardsmen had done to the Triads involved had those trying to arrest them not been the ones to suffer most of the losses.

Master Yaozu snorted harshly, eyeing the child that didn't seem to like any but the thief he had taken refuge with. "He seems fine with you."

"We're criminals, if that was actually taken into account while the decision was being made I'd be highly surprised." Pointed out the woman pragmatically, allowing the child his way when he decided to hide under her shirt and merely pulled a face as that likely meant he was touching her sensitive stomach. "I should reiterate that I don't mind, for now, it's just… odd. New, in another way."

Fong very carefully did not grimace. Unfortunately, both his little sister and former martial arts master knew him very well, and knew he knew something from that non-reaction alone.

The Triads, or more to the point one Triad organization in particular convinced enough of the others to follow their thoughts on the matter, had placed the child she brought up as 'possibly interesting' with her in the hopes she'd become attached. Then, equally as hopefully, it would be possible to control the Cloud woman through controlling the child and tie her down somewhere locally. If nothing like that happened then nothing would happen, but the suggestion alone was enough to have most allowing it to continue.

Which… containing her had been tried once before, by the Wo Hop To Triad with a bit of aid from their allies.

On a mere fluke, they realized the same little Storm that aided the Triads with the pre-tournament preparation of wiping most if not all criminal records the police held on entrants was with a civilian traveling circus and had tried to head her off before she left China again. Before anyone else realized it and thought to poach her first. The ending to that chase had been a little more than pricy to smooth over and could've been so much worse in terms of sanctions from Mafia Land given what and how things were arranged before they caught up to her again.

He and Zhōng both tried to derail this attempt with limited success, and they were the ones in the direct line of fire if the Soviet Storm-Cloud decided she was not amused. Again.

They were rather fond of this building. It was a nice building, convenient and while not entirely in a main-street part of Hong Kong it was close enough that it was easily in range for most if not all of what their various branches and subordinate groups might want to get up to.

He intended to tell her, just… not somewhere that Duyi would be annoyed if she destroyed said somewhere.

Thankfully, if they could manage a majority in another day or so, there might be a way to evade the outright hazards of informing the woman anything about the politics behind her current 'task'.

Mingxia didn't have the self-control training the two fighters did, and vor Bazanov realized he knew more than he was saying from her glancing at him. Before he could say anything, his daughter heaved a sigh.

"Well, whatever. We're still waiting on the paperwork for the both of you, I suppose I don't really have anything better to do right now."

"You owe the Long Triad group a visit, and there is what the rest of us are on." Interrupted a new voice, her ruthlessly efficient Lightning assistant, as she entered via the compound's gates. Probably, the green-eyed brunette had arrived for any new marching orders from their 'boss lady'. "You have plenty to do."

"You all should still be doing prep, and I'll visit the Long Triad before I leave not before." Countered Sonya a touch dryly, scooping the child out of her garments and giving him an odd look for his behavior. "I tried doing a mid-visit meeting once. It didn't work out."

Fong flinched, driving a Storm-wreathed fist through one of the veranda's pillars and the violently colored spider crawling down it… which popped into wisps of Mist Flames.

Ah… he was unlucky.

"Did you just try to kill my Pavuchky?" A young woman that hadn't been there until that moment demanded shortly, two more of the bulbous monstrosities inching their way up her skirts as she placed her hands on her hips and stood as bold as brass in the middle of the courtyard. "How rude."

"Yeah, Fong. How rude." Mimicked the thief wickedly, absently keeping the child in her lap from reaching out to poke another copy of the grotesque spider.

This one had three of its' vibrantly banded legs perched on her knee like some kind of twisted parody of a dog trying to see what she was protecting.

His little sister whimpered, all but folding herself into Master Yaozu's side to get away from the Mirror Lady's nightmarish pets.

"My apologies." Offered the martial artist blandly, only really sorry he had failed to kill the thing before it could startle Mingxia, as he extracted his fist from the shattered and now smoldering wood. "I didn't see what I was hitting until too late."

Someone had put a hefty bounty on the monster's death. He would not be all that sorry to collect on that either.

Kicking the burning parts of the former wooden pillar off the wooden veranda to prevent the entire building from going up in Flames, Fong missed some of what Sonya then informed Mingxia and Yaozu.

He did hear '-but it's your reactions that encourage it.'

Probably, 'Pavuchky's' owner was a Mist.

The young woman who would also go by the name Anna flounced over to collect the violently colored spider now perched deadly still on the thief's knee, meaning that one was… well, it was a fifty percent chance it was the real one. Fong eyed it suspiciously, wondering if he could kill it before the Storm-Cloud found the protests against the thing's inclusion in whatever she was doing less than amusing.
…they all looked identical sans the patterns on the bulbous part, the possibility there was more than one 'real' one was…

Mists were a headache, decided the Storm sourly.

Positioning the third copy on the crown of her dark head, the Mirror Lady sunk into a perfectly poised kneel in front of the Storm-Cloud. "We're ready, boss lady."

"Are you. And the rest?"

"…might want to give it a day." Demurred the Mist woman pleasantly, ignoring her pet as it crawled down her face in its deliberate way.

The two copies of the massive spider that had been on her skirts skittered off in different directions, another sticking its vibrantly banded legs out from under her hair and crawling up to a shoulder, and the one that had been on her head dropped delicately into her lap without leaving a silver thread of silk behind in her dark tresses.

Eying the pack of spiders, it was really a rather demented shell-game the Mist woman was playing with them, the Storm settled himself into a stance that would let him react quickly if at all possible.

He might be holding a grudge, because his little sister was not a fan of creepy things and never failed to become upset in the face of the monster's mirrored visage.

If he got to grips with it, the real one, it was going to die.

"Anna, enough. I don't mind if you use him to terrify others, but not our own."

She blinked innocent blue eyes back at the older woman, but the spiders all disappeared with a quiet ripple.

Even the one in her lap, which Fong would've said was probably the real one.

Mingxia didn't really seem to care if they were out of sight, she remained all but welded into Master Yaozu's side. The old man huffed in response to the monstrosity disappearing, appearing slightly long-suffering rather than unnerved if it wasn't the more relaxed bent to his still disciplined form.

"In reality, about two more days." Galina corrected when no one else seemed to want to comment, waving one green-tipped hand to dismiss the Mist woman's previous comment. "Then we can see about… your little idea, Sonya. We're still on the issue of where to put it all."

"Right, well… in the meantime, this Triad has a little Lightning they want you to look at." Offered the Storm-Cloud idly, reflexively patting the toddler on the head when he decided to babble everything he thought about their Misty spider visitor to her. "Classical, kind of peppy, purveyor of pipes."

Lifting her new bamboo and brass pipe from the tea tray still holding the untouched cup of tea that Huang gave her earlier that morning, the thief lazily flicked it around her fingers not occupied reassuring a child and just watched the play of light off the polished wood and metal.

The Lightning arched a delicate eyebrow but shrugged. "Alright, I suppose the brats can have today to fuck up within. That might mean tomorrow will be a bit more involved than you'd like."
"I rarely like working with others, Galina. The last time anyone actually managed to make themselves useful on one of my jobs was your group." Professed the blonde Russian dryly, keeping her pipe away from childish fingers easily. "And you cheated by having my own sister with you."

When the toddler found that distasteful, he yanked on the front of her shirt. Earning himself a highly unimpressed look.

The woman in question getting up with him bodily tucked under an arm. "I think it's someone's naptime anyways."

"Sonya." Arseniy called, rooting attention to himself near effortlessly as he didn't really tend to interrupt or even speak much. "I'm heading back."

"Alright, thanks Arseniy." His daughter gave him a sharp smile. "I shouldn't be too far behind you."

(Saturday the 1st of November, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"No one in their right mind uses a Classical Lightning as a decoy." Galina informed Xiasheng pointedly. "Hey kid, who sent you here?"

"The Faithful Alliance Society." One Shao Xieren promptly replied, a bit confused on why she was demanding information from him but obedient to the directions previously given by a senior member of this syndicate to answer any question she posed.

Zhōngshí Liánméng Shèhuì was not a Triad she knew of. It didn't really mean much, rumors abounded that there were hundreds of Triad branches. Some more interconnected to the 'main' branches in odd ways than others, and then there were all the baby branches feeling their way to standing on their own feet.

However, if it was more of a fringe-group than a main-power one… why did they give up a Flame user?

There was safety in having a limited few, meaning you could go under the 'radar' of a larger group according to the Vindice Laws. That kind of arrangement was… dicey, even so.

With anyone semi-intelligent it would really only mean a larger group could only task so many of their own Flame users to destroy the smaller one, and there were all those non-Flame users to be put to any task that wouldn't be counted, so it was still a gamble. One that might pay dividends, but a risk even so.

"Why?" Asked the female Lightning bluntly, not because she was curious but just to see if he could articulate anything.

It earned her a shrug and the spread of his hands as he failed to come up with anything to say.

"What did they say when they told you to come here?" Asked the Russian woman next, more than sure the kid knew what it was they wanted to know but hadn't actually pondered the situation enough to realize it for himself.

All Flame users had their little ideocracies, shared across their types. While they weren't totally universal, you could generally rely on certain little things to be the same the world over. Said ideocracies were generally of the same categories, and just only differed by how one put it into practice or if it was an internal or external matter.

Lightnings, especially types like the kid in front of her, tended to only vaguely pay attention if it didn't directly have to do with him or it wasn't attention-grabbing enough. Point in fact, that was still paying attention even if they didn't greatly care about it. Depending, if he was on a slide of Classical but slightly more middle than on the extreme end of it, it was possible he remembered.

No matter how long ago it was. Lightnings tended to have very good memories.

If they put it to use or not was another question.

"That the Wo Group Triads would have the resources to handle me and what I needed." Responded the dark haired and eyed kid, earning a puzzled scowl of a type from the hawkish eyed man next to her. "...and I don't think I was supposed to hear it, but they also made mention of being 'able to use it'."

"So a distraction, with the possibility of being a decoy, but not intentionally so." Galina concluded with a nod of thanks to the kid. "Good work."

The kid, and she was aware he wasn't all that much younger than her but after dealing with the Lightning section of the Zolotov clan she tended to think of all inexperienced Lightnings no matter their age like that, blinked at her in a puzzled fashion but accepted the praise with a shrug.

Xiasheng rubbed fingers on the faint scars that cut through one side of his face, pondering the situation heavily as Xieren decided that he was finished reporting to them and wandered off as his attention span waned.

"If you're paying him the bulk of your suspicions, what haven't you been paying attention to?"

Narrowing his hawkish yellow eyes at her, the Storm folded his arms into his sleeves and just scowled for a moment before he strode off. "I have a fairly good idea of what. Please excuse me, Miss Galina."

"That's not to say they're not going to try anything with him, mind you." Flicking her fingers at the man's back in a half-assed farewell gesture, they both probably had more than enough to go on when it came to the kid as it was, she wandered off to find out where her boss lady had retreated to.

While the bulk of the Zolotov Flame users had a floor of a rather decent bunkhouse to use for their own purposes, Sonya had remained in the room the Triads had cleared for her during the tournament while the baby-thing was going on. Galina only vaguely knew where it was, and that was depending on if she had memorized the way correctly or if a Triad Mist was 'doctoring' the layout of their headquarters for visitors.

Luck seemed to be with her, Sonya was stretched out on the same bed as last night and still staring at the ceiling in a thoughtful fashion. It wasn't a particularly wealthy room, a bit bare even for Soviet sensibilities, but it had a decent window overlooking one side of the courtyard and one wouldn't be immediately apparent from street-level if you stood in front of it.

That and the bed were the really only decent selling points to it.

Equally as similarly as the last time she was here, there was a toddler using the lazing Storm-Cloud as his personal body pillow again. "...Sonya, the kid's probably Triad. Or at least, they're going to bitch if you make off with him."

"I'm aware of that." Responded the thief a touch slowly as she dredged her scattered attention from whatever she was pondering back on the here-and-now.

Galina planted a hand on her hip while standing in the doorway. "Don't you have more than enough kids?"

Grey eyes flicked over to her, long before the woman that owned them gave her an answer. "Honestly… I never thought about having kids, or a family."

"What does that make-

"Galina." Pushing herself to at least clearly see the Lightning loitering in her doorway instead of remaining flat on her back, Sonya pulled herself up enough half-recline against the wall containing the only window in her temporary room. "Aside that, which was unexpected and entirely without thought on my end but not anything I regret, I don't… know if I would ever want start one. I didn't… really like kids. Still don't, generally."

She pursed her lips, considering the blonde thoughtfully for a moment before fully entering the room and sliding the door shut behind her for the flimsy security. "For a woman that doesn't like kids, you're surprisingly adept at taking care of them."

The flat look she got made the brunette smirk.

"More seriously, if you keep picking up other people's kids you won't ever have to really miss the whole 'family' thing yourself." Glancing at the child that had a significant amount of the other woman's sweater in hand and was happily drooling away while he slept, Galina looked back at the other woman and arched an eyebrow. "What brings this up?"

"...I may or may not be seriously considering just stealing the kid." Admitted Sonya a touch wryly.

"Do we even have the funds for that? The time?"

"No and no. Which is why it's still a 'considering' and not an 'intend'."

That was a… interesting complication to their current aims. "Why?"

"I can't rationally think of a good and solid reason for why not."

"Didn't you just say we don't have the money or the time?"

Sonya sighed heavily, yet softly enough to prevent waking the toddler, and tipped her head back to stare at the ceiling more. "I don't have the time, money is transitory and easily accrued if I need more. If I want the kid, I need at least another set of hands at the very least. Everyone else is tasked with something or are needed on the school project for now."

She wished things were that easy for her. The thief might as well be a budding criminal mastermind in the making, waylaid by personal things that kept cropping up, but given she handed her funds over to another person entirely it was greatly possible the Storm-Cloud had a very skewed sense of monetary value.

Then again, they all did once you got deep enough. Inflation in the criminal world was hellish.

Although, the Lightning wasn't sure what she would want to do if she was anywhere on Sonya's level. "What happens if I find someone? Or the Mirror Lady?"

"...is there a reason why anything would change?"
"So if either I or Anna suddenly split from you, because we found someone and decided to become homemakers to pop out our own brats, you'd let us?"

Blinking at her slowly, the Storm-Cloud frowned faintly. "Well... yes. I appreciate the help, Galina, but I am fairly certain that while inconvenient and it's probably unlikely I'll find anyone as efficient as you to keep things I'm involved in on task, I could survive fairly decently on my own. I did it before you, after all."

It would be 'inconvenient' to lose her.

Galina eyed her underboss suspiciously for a long moment, decided on being appreciated as the feeling that statement gave her, and sighed as she sat down on the bed for what looked to be a fairly interesting conversation. "I would like to make it a point that you stated you'd allow us to make our own families away from you."

"I never said that." Stressed Sonya a bit pointedly, and a touch quickly. "Merely that if you wanted to leave my 'service' you could."

There was something else the blonde might've tacked onto that, had she not quickly rethought her words before uttering them to the brunette.

...but a Cloud like her wouldn't accept any distance forced on her very well, if what her brother claimed was true.

"...playing hostage is not good for me." Muttered the thief wryly to herself, then pinning the Lightning with a stern look. "I would... greatly, appreciate it... if you and Anna would remain somewhere I can easily check. If you leave."

Galina blinked twice.

"...please." Sonya tacked on, ever so grudgingly.

"Easily done." She reassured the other woman simply, because with what she had done for them that was rather paltry to agree to as a limitation. "But then, if you'd allow us this, why not allow yourself the same?"

"I have a kid." Pointed out the blonde simply with a flick of her wrist. "And if I didn't work, who'd pay you?"

"With the amount of time you had to waste sitting in an office at the beck and call of the Zolotovs, I'm pretty sure you could manage a husband and kid on the side." Countered her assistant with a flick of her own fingers. "Once you're clear of them, even better."

"While I'm not at risk for stupidity involving... certain things, now at least, that doesn't mean anyone I associate with are as safe or things will continue to be so down the line." Shifting to check on the toddler curled up around her hip pointedly, the other woman ran her fingers through disordered blonde locks distractedly. "So if I do anything like that, it's either going to have to be on the sly or with someone that can... deal with it."

Which would mean that Italian hitman or... Galina thought about the men here. More specifically, the people they were picking up here and whom they were connected to. Fong wasn't all that objectionable personality-wise, but bit of a smug asshole... and there was also Xiasheng, who it appeared as if the thief got along with decently well.

There was also the possibility there were others that could withstand the kind of attention Sonya would eventually earn herself, just through being her usual self. Not to mention all the 'extras' being a Flame user heaped on top.

It didn't really sound as if the Storm-Cloud was really considering the option for herself, just puzzling over the logistical complications aloud as she had asked her about it.

The Lightning had some options herself, admittedly. It wouldn't be hard to scrounge up a man, but that might just get in the way of her work for the time being.

Galina, queerly, thought of Scruffy's situation next. She should get him a girlfriend or something for the moral support he had been seeking from her, but that begged the question of who might be able to handle an ex-prisoner of a diamond cartel without breaking him in so many, varied, horrible ways.

"Regardless." Sonya interrupted her thoughts before she could decide why she was thinking of the foundling Sun and another woman sourly, considering the dark eyes that peered groggily up at her before the toddler rolled over to get more sleep. "I don't know the kid's history, if he's got more family alive or what. His dad's fucked, but he might have a mom."

"So. Wait and see?"

"Pretty much."

(Sunday the 2nd of November, 1969. The second level of a bunkhouse on Mok Cheong Street, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Stiffening as another odd and sharp throb of pain went through her rather badly abused guts, Sonya pursed her lips while pretending she didn't see the winces around their 'planning table' caused by her apparent 'disapproval' of what was splayed out before them.

No offense intended to Huang, or to Avdotya, but the minute she got back to Mafia Land she was going to have a long visit with Doctor Kappel. Something was obviously wrong internally, on top of the leg that was really broken but not anymore, but as nothing was bleeding or impairing her movements all that much it could wait.

It was just a tiny bit annoying, the occasional pangs of sharp pain in her belly contrasting with the lack of it in her leg. Going slow enough for a toddler to use her as a safety blanket didn't normally cause the sore ache in her guts, but from time to time there were pangs that didn't seem to have any cause.

Other than the fact she had been shot in the gut a few days ago. She wasn't sure if it was hard to recall she was actually injured or if it was a sign her control on whatever 'Cloud Voodoo' she had was slipping.

To distract herself, the Storm-Cloud took a more leisurely glance through the various bits of information scribbled down on scraps of repurposed paper tacked onto a massive map of Hong Kong via questionable looking 'pins'. Which might actually be Mist-made, actually.

What she was looking at wasn't really bad, per say. Elementary maybe, something almost straight out one of Arseniy's lectures of what to do in such-and-such situation, rather obvious methods used to distract watchers from what they were supposed to be watching. As close as it could be to textbook Soviet tactics given they didn't have books for this particular subject.
Nothing remotely like what she had done in the last... two?

Three-ish, years.

Or ever, really.

As a solo-thief, she preferred straight out stealth more than distraction tactics. She could use them, but her distractions tended to be obvious and missing the cause of.

However, it would work if those this was for were not entirely all that bright.

Galina wasn't kidding when she said 'a bit more involved' than she liked. There were a lot of untried students filed into the cramped room fidgeting with eagerness to get on with things, obviously similar to her own restless habits. Whispered conversations and restless movements abounded around the floor around them.

The Three Suns Gang was, supposedly, the ones attempting to poison a Soviet Storm-Cloud.

Arseniy had tripped over the rumors that 'someone survived ingesting Activated venom, what could do that?' and traced them back to the source. The one rumor aside, the vor had been unable to corroborate the rumors with fact or confessions until Zhōng extracted confirmation from one of the poor unfortunates that he had been masking his intelligence gathering under before whatever he did was done. Releasing the prisoners or death, she didn't greatly care enough to ask.

Under whose order was unknown still, for what purposes was another, but that was partly what they were going to find out shortly.

That Triad publicly had 'three' Flame using Suns, officially anyways. Sonya suspected each of those Suns had at least one apprentice or aid that may or may not be Flame active themselves to do their various biddings, and there was the possibility any of them might have a secondary Flame to worry about. The only other bit of information they had, courtesy of Anna's mirror walking habits, was that the Three Suns Gang had an interesting history of being in places where others tended to die horribly.

Which, given what was normally assumed Suns did, was... interesting. Renato made it work, regardless or in spite of his own Sun Flames, so it wasn't something to rule out of hand for those that knew the Italian.

Were these professional assassins, or just hired murders when opportunity knocked?

Intentional path or just fortuitous happenstance?

Depending on which, it would influence what overall tactic they would go with.

Thus, her dilemma. Send in the green Flame users first, or get the confirmation via the more experienced?

"Mix it up?" Galina suggested easily, making Sonya realize she had spoken that question aloud.

"...can we refrain from taking care of everything ourselves? I do not work well with others."

Tossing the brats out in the cold hard world without so much as backup was nigh on impossible given they had Mists, much less two competent ones like Usov and Anna. Overwhelming the Mists with too much to watch was more likely, but that also left more than enough time for retribution to be launched via suitably informed opponents if anything happened.
There were more points of interest than they had 'agents' for, especially since they really did need a kind of oversight as this shouldn't be a 'sink or swim' situation but a closely watched one by their instructors.

Sonya herself, Galina for sure, perhaps Anna since Usov would need the experience working with others more than the Mirror Lady did. If things were managed just right, they could spend most of a night observing the kids as they attempted to take care of things themselves.

It would allow them to know everything going on, while also being available to keep things from going lethally wrong.

Sonya sighed heavily, wondering where the hell she was going to stick ballsy toddler boy during that. "Tomorrow night, groups no more than four but with only one of each Flame type. You and Anna with me, we'll ensure no one gets in over their heads."

"Should I make up the teams?" Inquired the Lightning idly, ignoring the various others in the dormitory-like floor they had been given to use by the Wo Hop To Triad shifting a bit restlessly around them and the new whispered conversations starting up.

"...they can do it." Dismissed the thief shortly. "Get some rest, Galina. We're going to have a long night."

The expression that passed over the brunette's face was wry and just a shade of tartly exasperated, nothing of which Sonya knew the cause for. Dismissing it as mostly inconsequential to the point at hand, the Storm-Cloud carefully rose from her spot in the tiny cramped bunkhouse floor to leave.

Her room in the Wo Hop To Triad's headquarters might be a bit bare, but at least she had it to herself sans toddlers of questionable living situation. There were two rows of ten hammocks stacked on each side of this dorm room and, from what little she knew of Hong Kong's housing situation, this was actually rather roomy for unattached laborers or migrant workers visiting the city for whatever reason.

Incredibly depressing, too. Even in Moscow one could reasonably expect a sectioned off room with roommates or actual beds in a dorm arrangement for those that needed to rent places to sleep.

Eh, different countries meant different standards of living.

Sonya came to a slow stop at the base of the ground floor's stairwell, idly inspecting Mingxia's perfectly serene expression. "...you could've come up, you know."

"I thought this was a meeting about why they're all here?" Asked the Rain as she quickly gathered toddler things into a blanket said toddler had been rolling around on, folding the corners in some mysterious way to contain it all for transporting.

Ballsy toddler boy had been rather bored-looking sitting next to her, while yet more talking and the confiscation of his stuff was happening.

"...did you want to do something with them?"

Fong's little sister blankly stared at her as tiny fingers wound themselves into the material covering Sonya's kneecap. "Can I?"

"I could've sworn I said I'd get you into a school I control. They're here for a school trip from said school I control. Ergo, if you wanted an early start or just something to do, you could pitch in until they're ready to leave."
"Aa." Looking bewildered, Mingxia clutched her blanket package until the folded edges were pressed to her blue-clad stomach. "I… didn't think about that."

Sonya probably didn't help by not really speaking up either but then again, she had pointed Galina out as their ‘lead Lightning’. Frowning faintly, she wondered if that was a social or personal thing.

Shamal had no issues bugging others for tips and tricks, once he designed to actually talk to another person, or finding other things to do while occupied with his schooling.

Maybe it was a stability thing?

Or expectations?

The brat knew perfectly well what he had gotten into with her and Renato as godparents, or at least put forth the appearance he had it. Perhaps she should sit the bratty Mist down and go over everything with him at least once… on the other hand, the kid was a Mist and probably caught more than a little of their rather precarious situation from the hitman's elbow.

Regardless, she made a mental note the Chinese Rain required a firmer set of instructions.

…that might, in fact, be the Soviet Rains’ whole issue in a nutshell actually. They had floundered in place instead of spreading out with the lack of hard rules or expectations to guide them into being self-sufficient Flame users of use on their own.

Blowing out a sigh, she snatched the baby brat up from the floor to sit on a hip before gesturing for the girl to lead them out of the building.

She had to talk to Larion the Rain about that, the moment she got to grips with him, Why did this always happen when she

Where were all the people?

Hong Kong was not a small port city for all that it encompassed both a mid-sized island and a stretch of the mainland coast. Even still, it had a shit ton of people crammed inside the city limits where the Russian had ventured to date. Worst of all, it was evening and not the middle of the night so there should still be people either on their way to dinner or going home for the night.

Even Mingxia stalled in her first five steps outside of the bunkhouse the Zolotov trainees were housed within, looking as confused as the thief behind her at the utterly deserted street.

Sonya glanced around disinterestedly at the cobblestone lane and the darkened windows overhead. The only ones lit were the ones she just left, and maybe a scattering of handful farther and higher than two stories down the street.

Same tactic as Shanghai, then. Was it a wide-spread Triad habit, or were the civilians that conditioned?

Any Mists involved, or just learned behavior?

"Miss Sonya?"

"Get behind me."

The young girl did so, taking the toddler when the thief glanced down questionably at the kid.

Whatever street-light Hong Kong had without the addition of building lighting was miserable and dreary, paired with the one street in the whole city that was completely deserted made for a highly suspicious situation.

"...do you think you can take care of the kid for a little while?" Sonya inquired softly, tucking her hands into her charcoal colored slack's pockets for the lack of something to do with them.

"What? Why?"

Sighing, the thief glanced backwards at the both of them. "Can you?"

"Aa... sure?" Mingxia blinked wide red eyes at her suspiciously as she juggled the slightly grumpy toddler in her arms. "Now can you say why?"

"Inform Fong, when he gets back, I've gone for a... run. If he looks too confused, add on 'it's similar to the first time we met.'" Avoided the Russian simply, swinging her gaze back to the seemingly deserted side street. "Usov, do see them back safely."

"Miss Sonya-eEP!"

 Falling through the ground, in the boy-Russian's favored trick to transport himself about, got the noncombatants out of her way rather neatly. Mingxia probably would be rather sore with her for a while, but at least it wasn't Anna and her mirror-verse version. ...was it the mirrors or the spider the little Rain didn't like?

"A run?" Asked Anna from a convenient lacquered symbol painted on the grainy concreate making up the foundation of the bunkhouse that did give a slight reflection.

"Mmm... I'm not nearly as patient as my father." Nothing seemed to be moving on the street, not even stray cats or some of the rats that pestered all sorts of docksides. "There are puddles, why pick something like paint?"

"...I have standards, boss lady." Insisted the Mist shortly. "At least take a Pavuchky with you."

"Fine." Sonya didn't greatly care all that much, and she ignored the gigantic spider that slid from the reflective surface and jumped to her 'Mao Jacket' thing. "Tell Galina to get started now and contact me if there's even a momentary upset. I'm not sure if this was triggered by the students or another incident entirely, so play it safe and get them out of here as quickly as you can."

"Of course."

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 2nd of November, 1969 continued. Wo Hop To Triad Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Mingxia landed or arrived or was dumped a touch hard on her knees, getting one disorientated moment to take in the garden strip of the Wo Hop To Triad's front courtyard before her brother was practically at her side and helping her up to her feet without spilling the toddler from her arms. "Little sister?"

"I don't know what happened." The Rain confessed with a measure of confusion, clutching the child that really didn't seem to appreciate the occurrence of a Mist teleporting them elsewhere even if that meant the child-safe things clattered to the dirt. "Miss Sonya said to inform you she is taking a 'run'."
"Was that it?" Yaozu asked, apparently dismissing the rearrangement of reality for a second as not that important.

"…and 'it is similar to the first time we met' if brother is still confused."

Fong then uttered a rather nasty curse.

"Young Miss Mingxia, old man Yaozu." The faintly new voice, the Mist their 'boss' had relocate her without so much as a concern given to if the Rain or toddler would appreciate it, drew attention back to the young Russian boy that had done it. "I'd advise you both to prepare for a hasty exit. Given our boss lady's habits, the minute we're done with what she demanded we'll be leaving."

"Who tried to corner Sonya?" Demanded the Storm a touch irritably.

"I don't…" Cocking his head, the Mist frowned slightly. "…they're claiming Golden Rascal Dragons. If that's true or not is something we're not able to tell."

"Lu Shui." All but snarled the Storm, releasing his little sister to fully face the young boy. "Where is she?"

"The Mirror Lady would know better than I." Dismissed Usov airily with a bat of the hand. "I'm on logistical support right now, the boss lady's got her on tracking everyone we need accountability on. We were near the dockside… but it's likely Miss Galina has decided it's compromised and we're now moving a full day ahead of schedule. If you wish to catch up, do so quickly."

Fong glanced from the courtyard gates, to her and the child, to his old master, and then back at the building their Mountain Master was likely within for the night.

"Go. I can take a message as well as anyone else." Demanded the old man shortly. "If the young miss needs help-"

"That is not really the issue, sifu." Corrected the Storm dryly, flicking red eyes over the top of their compound's walls suspiciously. "The issue is how much property damage Sonya will end up doing before they stop trying to bother her. She destroyed a good section of dockside and a stretch of road the last time something along these lines happened to her, and we backed off after the second time."

A difference of opinion on anything between a Lightning assassin and a Storm-Cloud thief… especially if it happens to be something the Lightning was trying to use the Storm-Cloud for in order to coax something out of a Storm over.

Mingxia bit her lower lip hard.

That was not going to end well.

(Monday the 3rd of November, 1969. Budapest, Hungarian People's Republic.)

"You realize this means I'm not going to be home for Christmas, right?"

Cherep winced guilty, scraping the side of one of his heavy motorcycle boots against the ground before leaving it to haul himself up on his 'acquired' ambulance her supplies had mostly come from.

"I know. I'll make it up to you, Tats."
The nurse gave him a wry smile as she held Aziz's wrist in order to count his pulse. "It would be different if we hadn't taken so much time off already this year, but between 'syndicate' business and Nya's fall concert thing... I don't have any more vacation time left for the rest of the year and some of next."

Her brother gave her a sulky pout, looking really, really sorry indeed before he bent to get back to work.

"I might be able to fudge a bit of the 'school nurse' thing around with Avdotya, but even then that'll mean I'll be working through most of what we had normally taken off just for family things."

"...what if we hire you for it?"

Tatiana blinked up at him blankly, scowling when she realized she had forgotten a beat in her count and started over. "Like for what?"

"Just... general nurse things? We can do that, right?" Smoothing a hand over his jawline, the stuntman puzzled over his suggestion or the mess he was currently inspecting to disassemble. "Hiring a 'nurse on standby' for an event or a party or something? Surely there's something like that... from what I know, it's possible to hire Nya specifically so why can't we hire you?"

"Because our little sister and I work for entirely separate factions of that place." Countered the Sun dryly, not missing that several of her dorky brother's newfound 'underlings' were trying to painfully and ineptly eavesdrop on their slightly loud conversation. "While yeah you can hire her for certain things... it can't be done with specific nurses. Nya is expected to take care of herself, the hospital staff aren't."

"What are you two talking about?"

"Nothing you'll be getting into, No-joy."

"It's Nojan."

Tatiana glanced up at the bearded lady, smirking with amusement at the flat expression on the other's face. Cherep snickered at the pun, the purpose for mispronouncing the other's name with an English twist had succeeded. "Aside which, it's really something you'll likely never have to deal with. Pointless to try to explain as it is, and a side order of deadly if the wrong ears overhear. I'd rather leave it as 'unspoken' if you don't mind."

"Is everything you do possibly or likely deadly?" Asked the carnie of uncertain gender a bit exasperatedly as they placed a pitcher of recently boiled water down on the snake-man's 'side table' of crates, having calmed a lot of the hostility to them the more Aziz recovered under the Sun user's sparkling yellow Flames. "Because it's starting to sound like it."

"Just if you're stupid."

"Or a halfway decent person." Deadpanned the Cloud Flame user as he bent to his work. "Or even marginally considerate to your fellow humans. Or-"

"Shut up, Cherep." He really was a dork sometimes.

"Erm... lovely lady of medicine... would I...?"

"Cherep is your gatekeeper. You're not going anywhere near the level you'd need to be at in order to learn what I'm talking about, simply because he says no." Dismissed the nurse, finally letting the heavily tattooed carnie go as she was satisfied with his blood pressure with the latest round of medication. "Which, honestly now that I know you Mauricio, is a good thing. Just be really, really happy my dork of a brother picked you up first."

Ciceron fidgeted with his really eye watering coat, being interrupted in stitching a few more wildly clashing scarves to it while their 'troupe' was recovering from the desperate slog of trying to raise the funds to get their snake-man professionally looked at before he croaked. "I am unsure if I want to learn myself or not."

"Go with 'no'." Advised the stuntman as he unscrewed the emergency lights off the stolen ambulance to hand down to the Texan cowboy the group somehow picked up. "It's not really necessary and won't do much for anyone if you learn. Not even yourself."

"Right. Aziz is recovering decently well, getting you lot out of here and even back on the road will just help all over." Tatiana still didn't know how the man contracted pneumonia, but if shifting locations didn't do it then he likely had a newly developed allergy to his own snakes and that would be rather damming for the snake-man's whole 'act'. It could be anything from the damp and likely rotting surroundings, to something the snakes picked up, to even just an ill-timed cough by one of their 'customers'. "Give the cowboy a few more days of his pills, and his issues will likely clear up in a few as well. I need to send Cherep something special for Nahum, but the witchdoctor should not be surprised he picked up internal parasites drinking that sludge of his."

Said cowboy gunslinger flushed a bit sheepishly, and it really was a pity the American man contracted something that gave him a bit of an unsightly rash somewhere sensitive. It had nothing on the glower the 'witchdoctor' shot her, especially as he was the one to complain the most about seeing a medical professional about his issues.

Especially as Nahum had insisted he could take care of his own issues, and yet got all but yanked about by his dangly earlobes by the bearded one and yelled at for he had the same damn 'issue' for nearly a full year now and getting checked out by the nurse was costing them nothing.

It was either the chicken bone he thrust through the septum of his nose or that 'medicinal' sludge he kept nearly on the boil for who knew how long. Tatiana was betting on that utterly disgusting sludge, however the African shaman claimed it was 'herbal' and not a toxic slurry of pulped plants.

Aside the Spanish Rain and the bearded one that looked to be a native anywhere from the Greek islands to the Indian peninsula, there was a German 'midget' who really didn't want to rub elbows with any medical practitioner at all and so contented himself with cooking instead very far away from her. The rest that had belonged to this group had abandoned the rest when Aziz grew too sick to keep traveling.

Not really maliciously from the sounds of it, just through sheer practically. Cherep wasn't buying it, but Tatiana could see the reasoning well enough. If they let themselves get bogged down trying to help one of their number through his sickness, it made it harder to pick up and continue before winter set in and killed them all that way.

These slums were not somewhere you wanted to stay more than a day or so.

"So, you lot are finally cleared on a medical point." Finished the Sun with audible amusement she didn't do anything about, repacking her first aid kit with all the tools she had been using the last few days. "Cherep give Viper my appreciation, and the bribe I left with you for his help. Please."

"He took it already."
Of course the Mist had, it was money for him and so the nurse was utterly unsurprised it was already gone. "Then just thank him for me, brother. I'll see you... probably next year."

"Is that safe, ma'am?" Questioned the cowboy, who really couldn't pronounce a lot of the Hungarian that seemed to be the underlying 'common' language for this group so he defaulted to English which only half the troupe could pronounce or understand themselves. "I thought we were sticking close for a reason?"

"You're all sticking close to one area because it's not safe outside it, if any of you get 'kidnapped' and a ransom demanded it's not likely anyone sans our little sister would be able to 'steal' you back without losing parts. And Nya's on a job right now so we can't get her help for it either." Corrected Tatiana as she stood up with her medical supplies clutched under an arm. "I'm not nearly so nice, nor safe to 'kidnap' as the rest of you."

"Still won't mean they'll abstain from trying." Chipped in the Cloud user refitting the stolen ambulance to help with moving his new 'minions' elsewhere. Cherep peered over the roof of the hatchback station wagon with a cocked eyebrow. "Just... be careful, Tats. Please."

"You should take your own advice, Cherep." With a wave of a hand, the nurse pulled her favored pistol from the small of her back and cocked it before walking off to the 'exit' of this part of the slums. "Take care, you all! I'd greatly appreciate it if this is the last time we need to see each other!"

(Monday the 3rd of November, 1969 continued. Budapest, Hungarian People's Republic.)

"...that really should not be as hot as it is. Busty nurse with a gun..."

"That is my sister, Glen."

"You have a hot sister." Defended their gunslinger in exasperation, taking his very battered hat off to run some gloved fingers through his hair a few times. "Feisty little-"

"Shut up." Nojan bit in his face, clicking around the half-stripped ambulance in three-inch-heels to see the stuntman that interfered with the magician's 'impressment'. "Cherep? Now what? Are you... are you taking Mauricio now?"

"Now? Well... a few things." Admitted the purple haired and eyed Russian a touch uneasily, seating himself on the roof of the car he was stripping almost as a matter of fact than uncertainly as if he didn't know what he was doing. "You might want to gather up everyone, there's a couple things you guys have to hear so you can use if it you need to."

Aziz almost slunk off his 'sick bed' to do such gathering up, shrank back when their bearded one glared at him, and ended up simply twiddling his thumbs instead as the witchdoctor went off to retrieve their last member.

Mauricio tried rather hard not to sigh, because Aziz was alive and looking to make a full recovery now.

It was more than what he had hoped for when he stopped with almost more than half of his 'group'. In spite of what he was sure the stuntman had assumed the magician had been well aware stopping like this was nearly suicidal for him.

It just... without a member of the troupe able to masquerade as 'normal', raising the funds to help their snake-man was less than realistically possible.
A bearded lady, a dwarf, or a man that fit piercings with boiled and bleached chicken bones were not what most thought of as 'respectable' individuals. No respectable bank would hear them out without altering their appearances in ways that might not help them continue with their acts after this, and indeed the few bank branches around here hadn't even bothered to hear the 'Rain' out either once the situation was known. Glen their gun slinging cowboy from the States could've maybe managed to look respectable himself with a little polish they couldn't afford to give him, but without a lot more practice in Hungarian he wouldn't exactly have been understandable.

Having vowed to pay whatever it would cost to keep their snake-man alive meant Mauricio was fully accepting that this was the last time he would be able to help his friends, but it didn't make the looming split any easier.

"I have to take Mauricio with me, Nojan." Continued Cherep in their closest shared language once Nahum returned leading their cook and 'little person' Lothar in tow. "It's actually pretty impressive he knew of his ability and yet remained free and clear as long as he did without knowing how to avoid those that want him for that ability, probably helped along because those… groups don't really like sharing information. Leaving him around here to leave with you all will… just start that either intentionally or not. He might not get caught here, but almost anywhere in the coming stops he'll be cornered as rumor and hearsay outstrips what you can realistically outpace and that's it for him."

"How are you not risking what he does?" Demanded their most outspoken member shortly, hands on both hips. "From the sounds of things, you share the ability and as do your sisters. Yet while they are you're not."

"They were pretty much involved before it became known we were, and they kept me out of it." Shrugging, the stuntman pushed himself off the roof of the vehicle to land heavily on the ground next to her. "It was mainly luck, and the fact my foster family enabled it, that I'm not also trapped in something I don't want to do. I can't do for him what they did for me, I don't have the reputation or the ability to hide it behind something or someone else. I have a plan to keep me out of it, and that involves getting the reputation and spotlight being a minor or greater celebrity will give. I can hide Mauricio in that, maybe. And this is assuming everything goes perfectly."

"My… dear friend… could I just not use the ice mirrors?" Tried the Spaniard hesitantly, anticipating the negative the Cloud Flame user gave with a shake of his head.

"There are ways around admitting what one of us are, and I don't know how just that it is possible. You already used it, noticeably, and the news that one of your type have given these people the slip will spread and make you more 'noticeable'. It's more than likely someone will trace that back to your group, and then... well..." Cherep trailed off a bit uncomfortably, looking between the five that had remained to try and help Aziz. "Even if you stop, and I highly suggest you do so, it's already too late on that end. Look, it's not forever. Or rather... Mauricio needs to be seen elsewhere to keep the rest of you safe. Seen somewhere too public, and too noticeable, for him to disappear without a furor raised over it. That kind of thing is really off-putting for those we're trying to duck, eventually they'll write him off as a loss instead of try risking the attention for him."

"Where?" Asked Lothar, distracted from poking more of the bowl of soup into their snake-man's hands because the one thing he actually agreed with the nurse about was keeping the man fed with hearty soups while he was still ill. "Not many like sideshows, stuntman. Worse yet, few like actually paying attention to the workers of a freak-show."

"I've got a world tour as a stuntman next year." With a half-bow to the dwarf, the Russian cracked a slightly wry smirk. "As Skull de Mort, the Immortal Stuntman. A 'manager' or some kind of press agent isn't entirely out of the question, but I can't swing a whole group on my lonesome just yet. Give Nojan pulled on her beard for a long moment. "I would highly recommend you set him up as a press man. Mauricio is horrible with funds, but he can spin a pretty tale."

Said Rain squawked with offended dignity, which had their witchdoctor actually give a few brassy chuckles.

"You do." Aziz finally spoke up, a touch softly for even if the nurse was gone her brother was still slightly unknown for all the aide he had given them. "Better stick with what you're good at, Ciceron."

Drawing himself up in said offended dignity, the magician sniffed and gave a flourishing turn to where his things were already assembled for him to leave.

"You guys can take the car, try and catch up with your fellows if you have to or a new group to travel with if you can. I've got another way out." Cherep informed the rest of his troupe easily, patting the stripped ambulance a few times before heavy boot falls started up. "Remember, you bought it this way and if you get pulled over you don't know where it came from before that. The alterations I did should last a few years yet, until someone actually runs the plates and vin number to realize they don't match up. Don't sell it or get it fixed when it breaks down, just scrap it when you're done getting to where you're going."

"...are we ever going to see you two again? I mean in person, not on billboards or advertisements."

There was a pause before the Russian joined him near the broken opening his elder sister used to leave the section of the slums as well. "...it's possible. There isn't any kind of... sanctuary place for those like us, so it'll probably have to be glancing things in-between other events. Or at least... there isn't one yet."

Mauricio peered over a shoulder, but Cherep was already shaking his head.

"I don't mean to get your hopes up. If that ever comes to be, it'll be dangerous and deadly and all sorts of difficult to keep as a sanctuary. But... it might be possible. Until then, however..."

Nojan smiled wryly. "Take care, Mauricio."
Chapter 89

(Tuesday the 4th of November, 1969. Wo Hop To Triad Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Duyi Zhōng eyed the massive heap of household goods and random personal effects sitting in the open courtyard of his headquarters. "…Miss… Galina? Might I ask what… all this is?"

Half the improbable pile somehow transferred to his front lawn without becoming apparent to anyone before this very moment looked to be general furniture, a few light fixtures, a detached stone sink of all things, at least three Western-styled beds with the covers still attached, and… what had to be the contents of at least three if not more armoires owned by ladies of questionable virtue stacked on top of the less questionable personal clothing and trinkets of what seemed to be more than fifty other individuals.

"We kind of don't have anywhere to put it all right now." The neatly put together Soviet Lightning woman informed him pleasantly, as if it was really just a small matter of logistical issues and not the off-loading of what seemed to be several thieves' worth of work in looting their target to the bedrock for anything which could be sold off for even a pittance. "We had intended to get a shipping container or something, but given our current… difficulties, we decided to see if you would like to ransom it all back to our… ah, victims, before we sold it all off for what would likely be a fraction of whatever it's worth to intermediaries."

"…do I want to know how you managed this?"

"Oh, it was very educational." Galina insisted brightly for him, glancing backwards and dropping the smirk for a scowl. "Wasn't it, Mihajlo?"

One of the young men behind her shuffled slightly in place but didn't respond.

With a huff, the brunette turned back to him and picked up that sly smirk again. "If you rather not pick through it, we can always sell it ourselves…? If someone wouldn't mind pointing out the nearest local fence for us, that is."

"I think… I will not mind handling the ransoming part of your efforts. However much it all amounts to that you have not already made away with." Mused the Mountain Master of the Wo Hop To Triad thoughtfully as he eyed the entire eclectic collection, as this was a lot better than he had feared when their Storm-Cloud leader suddenly went missing as she had. "I wasn't impressed with the attacks against our picked hostage at all myself, however… interesting it was to watch the inevitable fallout."

"We really only started things, Sonya and her Mists took care of the rest when we inevitably got 'caught' at it." With a dismissive shrug, the instructor of the Soviet Lightnings glanced back over her line of students then past Zhōng's form to Sōng Mingxia and the old martial arts master Yazou. "We all have an afternoon flight out, so ensure you both have everything packed before noon. I'll be back to pick you two up in a few hours."

"Already?" Asked the young Rain, startled.

"No real point in lingering anymore, we've done what we were after and your paperwork can always catch up later," Galina's green eyes fell to the generally sulky child in her arms. "…I'm not sure what you should do with the kid, Sonya's half torn on just nabbing him to take along herself."
"Let us not do that." Interjected Duyi wryly, smoothing fingers up one side of his jawline. "The child has a mother seeking to reclaim her child yet."

"Hmm... you do realize, since you invited her to take care of him, she's going to repeatedly return just to ensure the kid's doing fine, right?"

...served the idiots that would not listen to him right and would keep the woman with the semi-rare Flame type interested in his homeland for at least another decade or so. "I see no reason to object to such a thing. When is Miss Bazanova returning Fong?"

"He's refusing to stop following her until he gets to grip with the 'rogue' element being a pain in the ass, what's his face... the Lightning from the tournament that's been trying to pick a fight with him?"

Not any time soon, then.

(ooo000000)

(Tuesday the 4th of November, 1969 continued. Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"It's basically the conservation of momentum and effort." Sonya pointed out to her currently slightly clingy ex-bed mate blandly, accepting her half of 'breakfast' with a bemused huff. "Since he's committed to this now and cut off from anything smacking of 'official' support with it if your 'Mountain Master' has been able to register a complaint or something, I'm actually easier to go after than your little sister with what support he has at hand or can influence."

Fong very pointedly looked down the five stories where the morning traffic clogged street-level of Hong Kong lingered below their feet, seating himself in a neat tailor fashion to eat what would be his morning meal with her. On a rooftop, because she hadn't felt like risking getting a meal interrupted by the police or the men hunting her this early in the morning or anything else along those lines.

Besides which, the Hong Kong police had more than enough work to do scraping the 'Three Suns Gang' off the various walls and floors Sonya had thrown them once they caught on to the robbery in progress last night.

Random naked men tied up or otherwise contained in various positions and/or locations unable to extract themselves without either more embarrassment or property damage made for very stressed policemen. Especially when obvious if non-related Triad members kept running into them trying to find a tiny blonde thief none of the police had noticed anywhere near their 'crime scenes'. Anna hadn't even needed to help, aside getting her in place before Galina's students got too roughed up.

It was also easier to hold a conversation at normal tones this high up without having to resort to shouting over the noise of the opening markets and pedestrian traffic.

"...just because it means I can run around as I want now actually has little to do with it."

"I implied nothing of the sort."

"You did by looking, asshole."

The Storm took the supposed 'high road', opting to just bite into his food instead of continuing the conversation.

Sonya then actually noticed he hadn't got them yet more steamed buns, rather some kind of pan-fried dumpling instead. Now even more bemused, she nibbled the half-fried pastry experimentally.
Frankly, she had way too much of China's variant of 'finger foods' to last her a while. Then again, getting a bowl of something easily spilled or a plate of something heavier than this would not really do much for their 'on the run' thing.

"The Mirror Lady will inform us when Galina's got Mingxia out of the country, which will be sign I'll be safe to leave myself. Then you can do whatever you want to your little Lightning issue."

"It's not my-"

"Fong, I told you to do something about him."

Frowning, likely at the subject matter rather than the interruption because he had gotten used to her doing so rather quickly, the martial artist huffed a sigh and turned to her instead of eating while looking out over the streets below. "Would doing anything have prevented this? We were not allowed to do any fighting outside the official bouts without severe consequences I had thought neither of us was willing to risk."

"Trying to convince a Lightning that what they want can't be obtained isn't easy but staving them off a few days is entirely possible." Pointed out the thief flatly with her nibbled upon dumpling to help with the pointing. "I've done it, with an even more powerful Lightning than your current irritant."

Fong bit her dumpling in half, going back to his Stormy sulking thing with an irritable huff.

Sonya tossed that one over her shoulder, flatly glaring at his profile. "What would you have done had he gotten his hands on Mingxia as he probably planned? You're aware he's trying to wrench your 'Storm nature' around until you behave as badly as he is or worse, right? That way he gets what he wants, and you might've ended up in as much trouble as he is now. Which, with Lightnings, would've made it worth it for him."

"I am aware, Sonya."

"It's not the first time someone else has tried to use my 'Cloud nature' against me, and if it's the first time someone's trying to use your own against you I'll stop stealing for a living."

She didn't get an answer this time.

Rolling her eyes, she actually started making progress in bolting down at least some of her 'breakfast' before they had to move yet again. She didn't get more than a third of the way through before her copy of Anna's pet spider started creeping down her back in response to someone getting closer than they should.

Immolating the rest of her snack with her own Storm Flames, the thief rocked back up to her feet and turned to eye the nearby buildings for which route to take to leave their little perch. "So, any suggestion for where to go next?"

"Are you insisting to continue your 'tourist' sightseeing instead of keep to heavily populated areas?"

"The point is to keep the Lightning on my case, not for him to eventually decide it would be easier to try to corner Mingxia before Galina can arrange for her extraction. Keeping things just on the side of 'risky' helps with that."

"…there is the Wong Tai Sin Temple? Several temples that we could visit." Offered the martial artist reluctantly, rising to his own feet and taking care of his own papery basket of leftover grease the same way she rid herself of her own 'leftovers'. "Or we could leave Hong Kong island itself and see what the other islands have to offer in order to amuse you."
Sonya rolled her eyes hard enough for it to hurt. "Are you really complaining about me refraining from sinking half the nearby islands into the sea? This is all sea level, I start knocking down buildings and parts of it might start flooding."

"Well, no... but..." He puzzled over if it would be worth it to continue that part of the conversation or not, then merely sighed heavily as he turned to her. "...there are a few markets still open to this day, however they are shallow echoes of what they once were. Right now is not the best time to gain an appreciation of Hong Kong as a city."

"Obviously not, but right now is all I have and am willing to spend for even a general idea." Pointed out the Russian a touch sarcastically, ignoring the doorway behind them that tried to bang open only to be foiled by the Mist Flame generated spider webbing holding the roof access shut. "When things get less... politically back-ass-wards I might try again, but for now this is it."

Fong damn near outright sulked for a long moment.

She palmed her face in exasperation.

Sleep deprivation and Storms didn't really mix all that well in the first place, making the already normally high-strung types become even more so and those with some kind of grip on their fanatical habits loosen them to something approaching their flightier fellows. Chipped on top of a Cloud's disinclination to follow 'expected' patterns and get manipulated into doing something quite like shooting herself in the foot, and it made Sonya into a contrary Russian with a large desire to avoid dealing with those she didn't have to right now.

He wasn't exactly someone she needed to deal with, he was just along because and keeping from taking out that irritability on him was somewhat difficult to keep in mind.

With Fong sleep deprivation just burned through his cheerful serenity bullshit to leave behind the very ornery martial artist that entirely would pick a fight with just about anyone, so he at least had something to punch repeatedly in the face for the stress relief. He was equally trying to keep it in mind and not take out his ill humors on her, but then again they were both Storms.

On the other hand with Lightnings, especially the type one 'Lu Shui' of the Golden Rascal Dragons seemed to be, sleep deprivation made them even more likely to fall into 'tunnel vision' to the point they were likely to get themselves killed by doing something stupidly reckless. Tricking one into a nearly mindless manhunt that could stretch even longer than twenty-four hours had probably reduced that usually wide if not lingering attention span their type was known for into a blinding narrow focus that did not give much room for anything beyond the short term.

It also just meant it was a waiting game now.

The Storm she was with might not really appreciate the manipulations to counter what was tried against her, as he wanted to beat the snot out of the Lightning himself. However, if Sonya was to avoid dealing out mass property damage trying to fight an assassin more than likely a touch more skilled than she could ever hope to be at the moment, it was either this keep-away game or letting herself get 'kidnapped' for whatever the fuck was supposed to be going on.

She really did not feel like being held hostage again.

The door behind them suddenly started getting rather insistent about being opened causing the thief to regard it warily for a moment, wondering how strong a Mist copy of Pavuchky's web strands could be. "...we should probably leave the city behind. While it won't be our fault if Lu does something... visible, cleaning up his mess will be."
Fong tisked, examining each of the buildings near them and the few streets he could see from here. "Then follow me, Sonya."

He dropped the story needed to get to the lower roof section of this split-level thing, or maybe the lower roof of a building built right next to this one, causing her to huff disgustedly and scramble to keep up.

At least she was getting a good idea of what was humanly realistic to survive when it came to drops from certain heights, even if the Storm had decided to take the fact she could jump up inhuman heights as some kind of personal affront to his skills.

"Is there a 'walled city' somewhere nearby?"

Pausing on the lip of the next rooftop, her guide glanced back at her in confusion. "A what?"

"No? Maybe I'm mixing that up with something else…"

Maybe it was more something in Singapore or Korea than something in China?

What was she trying to remember?

Whatever it was, she could ponder it later.

It didn’t take them more than fifteen minutes to descend from the rooftop perch she had paused at and walking through busy streets being stalked by a highly intent and really frustrated Lightning was a… experience she could probably do without. Sonya ended up squished almost into Fong's side when they caught some kind of trolley thing to leave downtown, as it was packed with probably more people than what it was rated safe to move at any one time.

It was nice to be moving and all, as far or as long as she wanted, but the press of early morning Hong Kong was a bit… annoying. Admittedly she was starting to find damn near everything annoying, but at least the Lightning asshole had to give miss to their trolley car because he got to the half-assed 'station' thing a touch too late.

Which at least meant getting off wouldn't be a matter of dodging electric green razor death.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 4th of November, 1969 continued. Hong Kong International Airport, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

"How, exactly, do you see getting us through customs without passports?" Yaozu inquired blandly of the 'Lightning' personal assistant of his new… patron.

"Are you sure Miss Sonya will not be mad we left young Cai to be returned to his mother?" Mingxia asked on the heels of his own statement, sounding rather worried indeed.

Galina rolled her green eyes at the both of them, watching the rest of her various students getting processed through security for a flight bound outside of the People's Republic. "Such faith, the both of you. No, Sonya will not be mad we left the brat for his mom. She in fact was half skeptical of taking the brat because of that very issue. She might be annoyed she'd have to come back if she wanted him for anything, but that's it. And you, old man, you have passports."

Under his utterly unconvinced eye, because it took longer than just a handful of days to apply for and receive such things no matter how much one would pay out in a bribe, the brunette woman suddenly fanned a pair of matching booklets under his nose.

Which she had not been holding prior to their sudden existence nearly in his face and seemed suspiciously shiny. The red covers had not one crease, and the gold lettering seemed freshly pressed. Flipping one of the booklets open had Yaozu confronted with young Mingxia's personal details.

Sliding that one closed and giving it to the girl at his side, the martial arts master warily inspected his and lowered his tone so only the two females near him would hear. "...it's fake."

"Of course it is. It's a professionally done such, which will be retroactively handled as we are on a bit of a time crunch." Scoffed the woman, recounting heads to ensure she hadn't lost one or two of her students while they were getting processed to leave the country. "Do you really expect the people we just left to do everything like everyone else?"

Well... he'd have a lot less issues if the criminal ranks would just behave themselves like everyone else. Then again, the subject he taught was currently outlawed and even his own profession was borderline illegal at the moment. Which was partially the reason why Fēng had returned for him, to get him something not illegal to do with the rest of his life.

Yaozu was not often forced to confront his own hypocrisy, and he was finding it to be a bit vexing.

He respected the rules, the tenets and laws of his native land and his masters before him. Of which one fundamental tenets of his lifestyle was integrity. To do what was right, even if one's actions could be judged or not. Bending even just that much, for his own life or for the life of his students, lied a slippery slope he did not really wish to contemplate.

Which he had to, now that he was very obviously taking part in something illegal and yet...

Obviously, the right thing to do according to his past masters and the rules he had lived by up to these uncertain days was to admit the entire group of Russians were not merely students on some sightseeing trip. That they were all mainly thieves and that the paperwork they were in the process of submitting was forged at best if not outright flimsy fakes.

...that would likely get the entire gaggle of children, and none of them were remotely mature enough to be considered young adults aside the Lightning woman to his immediate right, killed if not imprisoned in something quite like a torture cell or prison camp.

How to resolve one's personal integrity and taking advantage of illegal behavior?

Which... he was only illegal for reasoning he did not support. Yet that did not change the laws of his native land outlawing martial arts and the instruction of. Yaozu was illegally going to teach more of his art to students, admittedly in a different country to evade that law breaking by the technicality of not being illegal there.

He should've spoken to Fong more. His former student had obviously somehow settled the issue in a specific way if the younger man seemed so at peace with his new internal conflict.

Handing the not-so-obviously forged passport over with his paperwork detailing his legal residency of China to the white gloved customs agent, Yaozu folded his hands behind his back while they were eyed equally as hard as the rest of the group.

Only with a highly suspicious dark blue gleam to this agent's normally black eyes.

More Mist-managing, he could assume.
The young Mist boy had not entirely left even if he was not obviously present, as far as he could tell. Which was actually highly doubtful, he did not have a lot of exposure to everything a 'Mist' could do or everything they could affect.

If the child could affect another while entirely removed from a situation was something he did not entirely know of. At the moment, ruling it out would do him no favors in his goal of learning how to not be manipulated against his will by these 'Dying Will Flame users'.

Accepting his paperwork back with a straight face, Yazou tucked the documents away into a sleeve while Mingxia offered her own copies for verification. "When is Bazanova returning?"

"Whenever she can. Either she'll catch the flight with us, or she'll meet us when we land there."

...somehow evading not having her personal effects which included her own passport and identification, and some various volumes of different texts.

How?

Half the reason their 'aims' were delayed so long was to allow the time for him and the young Rain Sōng sibling time for their paperwork to be processed legally, but apparently that was not a barrier to these kinds of people. Did that mean there were other ways to evade customs of a certain country than to just forge the paperwork one required?

(Wednesday the 5th of November, 1969. Thieves' Guild Hall, Mafia Land.)

The next Storm Arcobaleno and what was possibly one half of the next Cloud Arcobalenos were bickering not entirely under their breath in the middle of a line for some sort of. Just… in the open, utterly unconcerned by anyone they might be inconveniencing, and standing in line like just about any other average criminal types would to have their work processed here.

Luce could only blink at the sudden and surprising display she had not thought would ever occur in front of her before she formally met the individuals. An utterly banal event and seemingly one that just happens occasionally, long before that very fact would become something to notice or stare at instead of being annoyed by as it seemed most of those around the two felt about the situation.

Well, one was Sonya de Mort. Which explained what they were present to do on this island and in this building, apparently she was exchanging whatever contract she had been on for either confirmation she was done or for a new one.

That didn't entirely explain Fon's presence, although she was aware the free-lance Russian thief and the Triad's assassin did know each other before they would formally meet as the next 'Strongest of the Era'.

Apparently, she had not looked hard enough to know exactly how well. Assuming the fact would not be something she would be allowed to 'foresee' or otherwise know before she learned it after meeting them herself.

Admittedly, the Sky of the Giglio Nero had little idea how the internal workings of Mafia Land's contracted thieves got around to their work. Just that submitting a request for them to steal or otherwise locate certain items was something that could be done. Depending on who or for what the contract Sonya was turning in was for, it might explain why an agent of the Chinese Triads was so obviously 'escorting' her about.

Aside foreseeing that this was the best route to have her heirloom tea set's cups replaced by within a reasonable amount of time, she hadn't been all that interested by what would happen this trip out of her famiglia's territory so long as it would not be lethal to anyone important to her. Apparently that had been a bit remiss of her, given the display going on.

Perfectly aware she was probably making the start of a scene by staring so much at the unexpected visages of her future co-workers, the Sky eventually pulled most of her attention to the greeting desk affair and the lady seated there awaiting her business. Being a Boss of a moderately sized criminal family did at least mean she didn't have to find her tongue while in the same room as some of the people she would be sacrificing in order to place her 'request', one of her bodyguards did it for her.

She kept the bulk of her attention on the process, mildly more interested now that she had the reminder shoved in her face of how the 'World's Greatest Thief' managed to get so far before others finally noticed she was such. However part of her attention, no matter how 'rude' or impolite it was from a Sky like herself to individuals she had no 'knowledge' of nor had been introduced to, was rooted on the world's most powerful Storm user speaking to the world's most powerful Cloud user's little sister and twinned Guardian Prospect.

…well, they were more arguing than speaking in anything approaching a calm manner.

Knowing how they would behave in another year and a half was one thing, to see them still smoothing out their relationship from what was gossiped to be a 'rocky' start was interesting. More than was probably safe, Sonya's shoulders suddenly snapped taught and the woman swung a wildly annoyed purple glare around the lobby. "...son of a bitch, there's a Sky."

Fon blinked down at her blankly for the abrupt subject change. "What?"

"There's a Sky in the room." Repeated the thief in her native Russian, not entirely quietly but not pitched to carry all that far, narrowing her gaze in irritation and ignoring everyone either scrambling out of her sight or torn between getting closer to hear what she was saying about a Sky. "I hate the feeling they give me, when they're being Skies and not just people."

Luce turned her gaze back to the process of her paperwork being accepted before the Russian locked eyes with her, thoughtful. Preventing any of her bodyguards from going after the thief in some suicidal attempt to 'object' to the blunt announcement of her presence, and therefore confirming that there was a Sky present to those that had never noticed the pull of one before. All of whom would probably attempt something equally suicidal if she reacted at all to the title to give away she was indeed a Sky.

As she had no intention of speaking with or interacting with the World's Greatest Martial Artist nor the World's Greatest Thief just yet, it was likely she had skipped over foreseeing this event as it was admittedly so minor it wasn't even worth it to speak of later on when they became the legends they needed to be.

Admittedly, there was a kind of 'air' a Sky could give off they all pretty much learned to do instinctively. A magnetic pull of sorts, to remind all those in the vicinity to behave or disappoint and irritate the Sky observing. With two of the World's Strongest in the room with her and a few handfuls of non-Flame using criminals with a dotting of other types about, she had been trying to nudge the two tired and stressed looking most powerful Flame users in the world to ensure things wouldn't end up in a surprise spar that could destroy half or more of the building they were in.
Luce had actually never really thought what it would be like to be a 'free' Element on the other end of such a pull… and she was the 'Strongest' Sky user alive, so it was likely even worse for someone that had no other Sky's influence to help center themselves. To the point even a half-blind Flame user such as one half of a Dual Guardian Prospect could feel it halfway across a wide lobby.

No one had ever complained in her hearing before, which… actually probably didn't mean it was a unique stance of the subject the brutally blunt thief had to herself as the issue might just be no one wanting to annoy her further by objecting to her methods.

Well… this would explain some of the sheepish feeling she would have upon 'formally' meeting the woman for the 'first' time. She had thought it was about Reborn and their shared godchild's situation after she stabbed them all in the back, not something more unrelated to their situation as this.

Likely, the inevitable conclusion she could then seek out for confirmation would support the Russian's words rather than reassurance to herself there wasn't anything too objectionable to the technique.

How would she confirm such an observation?

The only Skies she could ask and not be forced to explain every detail of why she would want to know was the Vongola Skies. However, simply dropping in on either the Eighth or Ninth Skies of Vongola was something she was not prepared to do just yet and Tyr was… not really a sociable one. She could try to attend next year's various Balls, but the amount of interest current rumors was generating in any hoping to 'snag' themselves a Sky like herself would make everything but the Christmas Ball this year a touch too risky.

She'd be somewhat busy or pregnant next year, and thus venturing out of her territory for anything but what was required to keep the future on track was distasteful. The Giglio Nero Sky would still be pregnant by the time the World's Greatest and Strongest of the Era were gathered up, but she kind of had to be otherwise she'd get Aria's birth out of the way early.

If Sonya didn't attend this year's Vongola Christmas Ball, then Luce couldn't either. Nono Vongola would also never track down the assailters for his own revenge if so distracted by a visiting allied and unattached Sky of her quality being remotely nearby and under his guard, again assuming the Soviet Storm-Cloud wasn't present to do her aspect's nominal 'guarding' for him however unwillingly.

Fixated Skies pulling hard on their Lightning and Mist aspects were a trial to deal with, and the Eighth Sky of the Giglio Nero famiglia had really more issues to bother with than just a single murder among the many that occurred around them.

If Luce did not confirm her attendance before the same month the Ball was to be held upon, it would be frightfully rude of her… or she could somehow get word to Ottavia Vongola that she would be attending just without confirming anything 'officially' for 'security reasons'. Too much bother and fuss over a social event would drive off the Storm-Cloud from attending herself, but if the Russian didn't know another Sky would be added to the various Flame users Nono generally had attending his social events…

This was assuming Sonya would be attending herself at all, and the future would not be one of the possible misses given for her own reasons.

Luce sighed, aware she had been neglecting her immediate future for the distant possibilities so beyond her. Which, after the issue she had to seek the World's Greatest Hitman and Strongest Sun user's help for solving as she would fail trying to do so herself in time… really was not something she should still be doing.

How many times did she need to be confronted by it before she learned her lesson?

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 5th of November, 1969 continued. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"You… what?"

"Got shot in the stomach. Twice." Sonya repeated in her face as if that was not shocking nor concerning, seemingly unbothered by the nurse gaping at her. "And now I have these pangs of pain when I move a touch too fast, I can't decide if they were healed wrong or if it's something else."

Tasty Muscles gave her a mildly embarrassed smile for glaring at him. "I had requested your little sister because I did not believe the situation was safe."

Tatiana jabbed a fingertip into those mouthwatering muscles. "I am not impressed. Out, Nya's got to strip for the doc."

The Chinese Triad member outright bolted the minute 'stripping' was mentioned, which did indeed get him out of the hospital examination room's doors before the thief could decide to get a head start on any stripping required. Interesting reaction she very much wanted the story behind, but right now it was related to 'eventually' than 'right now'.

"…huh. I've been trying to do that for a whole day now." Remarked her little sister idly, tugging her weird and utterly unflattering bag of a charcoal grey jacket off and just letting it drop to the floor dismissively.

"Seriously, Nya. How the hell did you get shot in the stomach?"

"By a gun." Deadpanned the thief flatly. "It, the tournament thingy I was held hostage for, was invaded in the end. They got most of the way through it, though…"

"Hooray." Bit back the Sun Flame nurse, kicking up the jacket and getting her tank top actually handed over as she progressed in the stripping. "Can I request you avoid any further 'hostage' contracts? This is…"

"It would've been a young, slightly just preteen, Rain girl if not me. His little sister, in fact."

Okay, Fong had a very good reason. That didn't quite take Tatiana's irritation down to just a mild level rather than 'I want to shoot him' levels.

"Your slacks as well, little sister. Then the papery gown. I'll get the doc."

Sonya's merely considering look probably meant the hospital gown would not in fact be worn by the time Kappel could be located to take a look at her abused guts, but Tatiana honestly didn't care. There were only so many times you could be shocked by her utter disinclination to behave 'modestly' in mixed company before you got used to it. If her baby sister wanted to be naked aside her underclothing with or without boots, she was perfectly entitled to be so.

It wasn't like there were 'decency' laws here she had to obey.

Huffing with a bit of amusement, she left her little sister to wiggling out of her equally drab slacks without removing her boots to get the emergency room's front desk to page the only doctor that had the balls to agree to be on call if the only Cloud resident of Mafia Land ever required their services.

Doctor Kappel had been utterly unimpressed that such a thing actually required paperwork absolving the hospital of liability in the eventuality the Cloud decided the pain was just too much and splattered him across the floor or something. Admittedly Tatiana hadn't been at all impressed either, but she did at least know some of why Sonya kept getting slighted like that.

They would… probably require more than just x-rays, depending on what would show up on them. Maybe a diagnostic sonogram?

Tatiana going to the obstetrician wing to borrow something like ultrasound equipment for however long would make waves of rumors… especially as Fong had been so stupid to 'escort' her baby sister in to the emergency room.

…eh. Served her baby sister right for this stupid shit.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 5th of November, 1969 continued. Saint Julian’s Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"You have a cyst."

…the fuck?

"How?" Demanded Sonya shortly, irritated by the announcement.

"Who knows. It's fully present, if on the small side, for it to have been something you gained in recent weeks. This isn't the first time we've inspected your abdominal region, so how it got there without notice is… something." Kappel deadpanned shortly back, jabbing the gel-covered ultrasound wand harder into her sensitive guts and ignoring the wince such an action elected. "As you reported various Suns checked over the bullet holes, one or two might not have been nearly as well trained as Nurse Primakova… ah, you in fact have more than one cyst. Three, in fact. Hepatic, liver if you must, cysts."

Disturbed slightly and unable to decide if it was maliciously caused or not, the thief glanced at her very utterly blanked faced sister. Then back to the doctor examining his ultrasound screen as he studied her current affliction. "So… now what?"

There had to be a fair number of Chinese Suns that had decided to dislike her very existence given what she had been up to the last two weeks, and at least three that might not have warm or fuzzy feelings about Russians had the access to her enough to allow sabotage. Assuming Huang held a very good poker face and didn't appreciate the bribe of tea she got him for bothering him so much by trying to break Fong.

Either just naturally occurring, Sun induced, or a side effect of Storm Flames melting bullets in her guts then things being healed up around them. It did not help her decide if she was pissed off or not, but probably would mean she'd start avoiding Suns to heal her if she didn't know their allegiances.

"You require surgery if these aren't benign." Advised the doctor nearly absently, shifting the utensil in his hand yet again and earning yet another wince he seemed mildly annoyed by. "You said it was painful? What activities cause pain? On a scale of one to ten, how painful?"

"…that is an utterly stupid scale, what is the range supposed to even be?" Announced the Storm-Cloud flatly, trying to think of how such a scale should be rated in order to not lie to her physician. Which, she was pretty sure, was a bad idea all around. "If breaking my foot was a ten, then these are... threes. I guess. It is not entirely just movement or the odd contortion, sometimes laying on my stomach might cause pangs which linger, which are annoying and not entirely something I can keep in mind before I cause them in my line of work."

"...what if being shot is the 'ten', Miss Bazanova?"

"Then a one."

"One should be a minor injury like a papercut."

"Thereabouts, sure. Unless you poke them, which would end up being a bit more of a two."

Kappel stared at her skeptically, then cocked a dark brow over his half-moon spectacles perched half off his hooked nose. "And then applying the same standard of 'shot' being the 'ten', what is 'breaking a bone' range as?"

Sonya thought about it. "A six?"

The dour German doctor eventually blinked at her after another long moment of staring without inflection, then glanced at the nurse standing by for anything he might need. "This was contractual injury-issue, correct?"

"Yes, doctor."

"Right," sniffing, the man started packing away his tools and handing them over for Tatiana to start cleaning them up, "then do finally finish changing into the hospital gown, Miss Bazanova. I'll have you slated for surgery as soon as I can, might as well remove them if they are causing you noticeable pain. Perhaps this afternoon even if I have to conduct it myself. This is assuming if you can keep from immolating the anesthesia from your bloodstream."

"I have been able to get myself tipsy again, I think it will not be an issue anymore as long as I concentrate." Admitted the Storm-Cloud slowly, not really at the point she was supremely confident she could do that but not really having enough of a point to object because it was entirely possible she could.

Hopefully once she was out of it she would not unconsciously try to clear her system of anything foreign.

"Well then, with your own sister's assistance as I don't think I can stop her, you'll be out of here before nightfall and free to continue your life as it is." Kappel informed her blandly, rising and kicking his rolling stool back to the far wall to be out of his way and somewhat near where he pulled it over from. "Have you found any new allergies, concerns, and other injuries to report before I go?"

"...not as far as I am aware." She offered after a beat.

Kappel took her at her word, snagging a clipboard they were keeping track of her 'hospital bill' on so the island could reimburse her once she lived through it on his way out to order her surgery to rid herself of the nagging pangs in her guts.

"And I can't even yell at you for letting unknown Suns take a look at you, because gunshot wounds. In the gut." Deadpanned Tatiana in a very offended tone, palming her face now she didn't have to be professional. "Just... why?"

"...Avdotya did not see 'cysts' when she took a look..."
"Nya, honey... the liver is literally a dark blood-red organ which may or may not have been covered in blood when Avdotya checked you over. If she had seen anything at all just peering at the hopefully closed skin and not... ya know... open gunshot wounds...?"

"It wasn't entirely healed after that first Sun checked me out." Admitted the thief a bit wryly, taking a moment to adjust to the pain instead of immediately moving around and probably making the pangs in her gut worse. "I was not the only one that needed healing, and while the deep tissue was knitted somewhat the skin was left open for a few hours."

Tatiana smoothed a palm over her mouth, giving her little sister an utterly flat look over what was likely a scowl.

Even with the 're'-emergence of Dying Will Flame users all over the world, more for certain countries than others honestly, the odds that Sonya could've found a competent and fully trained Sun for healing was still pretty remote while out and about in the world. Setting the cyst issue aside, as it was possibly not entirely a malicious bit of sabotage in nature and just an accident or unintentional, all in all it was mostly just naturally happenstance she needed a bit of help right now.

...mostly.

"...oh, and I broke my leg. But now it is not broken." Hastening beyond that point, because the redhead looked perfectly willing to start yelling as she had just told the doctor that there weren’t any injuries to report, she picked up the papery gown thing she had not entirely gotten on and yet had to remove anyways so Kappel could get at her stomach. "I also have nineteen heists done for the island, a handful more this month and then we'll be set to apply for an apartment together."

The Sun visibly thought about it, not remotely looking happy as she slowly got on the issue of cleaning up the ultrasound equipment. "Okay. I'm healing that damn leg the minute you're done in here. Aside that, if you want to experiment with the Cloud Voodoo... I'm demanding you do so in a clinical test. Not a recorded one if that's an issue, and it might be, so I'll help you avoid that because I understand why, but no broken legs."

"...it's how he figured out what he was doing?"

"And that's fucking wretched, but there's safer ways to learn the same thing." Tatiana refuted irritably, waving a gel covered wand of sound generation under her nose. "We'll have, what? A month of time before you go visit bambino? Part of that should be getting you through your three years of missing immunizations, but we can also do a bit of clinical testing of Cloud-abilities."

...did the inclusion of a nurse on stand-by make cutting herself to figure out how to mimic Cherep's undying skill more or less of a 'self-harm' issue?

Sonya wasn't entirely sure, and frankly with how many issues she might have already and was likely in the process of developing she really didn't need a new one. Her sense of how much pain was too much was already a touch wonky, she didn't need Kappel staring at her oddly to realize it.

Then again, few had the experience of being shanked in a dark alleyway then actually dying from the shock and blood loss behind them. Kind of put things into a strange perspective once you've lived, or not, through such things.

"Are you going to be assisting with my surgery?" Questioned the younger Russian, accepting some kind of alcohol-based wipe for the gel stuck to her stomach and appreciating Tatiana didn't try to do it herself after so much touching by the doctor. "Or can I ask you to pass on a message?"
"Maybe. He's been bugging me to spend some time in a surgery theater recently. It'll be a few hours, at least. Even if Kappel gets you a late afternoon surgery slot." With a shrug, the nurse hip-bumped the cart the ultrasound equipment was set in to so it would roll to the door of the exam room. "Why?"

"Can you take a message to my Lackey for me? I didn't manage to check in with him without Fong breathing down my neck."

"Hmm?"

"Tell him to get on the housing issue, now. I'm going to be living with you... mainly when the brat doesn't need me at hand, but Galina and Peter and the rest of the minions I have somehow acquired need someplace to live."

...Galina might appreciate an immediate target to fuss towards, Mingxia would need a list of law schools once a level of education was figured out for her, she should at least ask Yaozu if Russia was where he wanted to practice his martial arts or if he would be interested in moving farther to Italy with them, Scruffy might've actually gotten something else done she needed to keep hidden done, Anna should probably have a permanent 'lair' to occupy with her pet spider, and...

How the hell did she end up with so many people?

Furthermore, why the fuck was she intending to cluck after them?

Most were fully grown and did not need some kind of asshole-ish young woman poking her nose into their business. However much she could probably solve their issues or keep an eye out for their safety.

...did Galina grab Ballsy Toddler Boy or was the kid left behind for his mom or something?

Sonya blinked at the ceiling a few times, scowling as she basically ran in mental circles for a while trying to untangle her thoughts from her bewildering sudden social impulses to tend to a flock of dependents she swore she didn't have not too long ago.

If the Lightning had left the kid in China, she'd be visiting Fong's home country again a lot sooner than she had figured on. At least it wasn't a Shamal issue... yet.

The Storm-Cloud would have to watch herself around that, so it wouldn't turn into a new young son-type. Even if the kid didn't have a mother anymore, frankly she had way too much to do for the prospect of adding yet another child to her 'household' to be palpable.

...and given Shamal had been not impressed by her baby brother, a toddler aged kid would not qualify for that 'baby brother' he kept demanding.

"Nya? Everything okay?"

"...how the fuck did I end up with an entourage?"

"You're reliable. And competent. The price of being so is acquiring others that want you to be reliable and competent in looking after them. Or at least to keep an eye on them so others don't take advantage or otherwise inconvenience them." Tatiana announced cheerfully, probably sadistically taking enjoyment out of her exasperation and current irritation. The nurse opened the examination room's door to push the borrowed equipment out and return it to wherever she had gotten it from, glancing back at her before she left the room fully. "Might've been a bit too good there, little sister."

The thief snorted as she was left alone to basically wait for others to have the time to bother with her current 'injury'.

With her thoughts. That didn't exactly help her any right now.

…fuck.

(Friday the 7th of November, 1969. Ottavia Vongola's Tea Parlor, the Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"I take it this is Bazanova's young Lackey Bjørn, Nilda?"

The Icelandic teenager didn't frown, although it was a near thing to obey Viper's non-expression impulses and not his natural inclination to shift a bit warily under the eye of the elderly Sky woman, as he was led to a rather sedately appointed lounge-affair kind of room within a building he had no intents to visit yet again in a part of the country he had been avoiding.

This whole 'meeting' stank a bit of meddling, and his Lady would not be pleased if so. She had advised him to avoid entangling himself in Vongola affairs after her surgery and before he left Mafia Land, and he was pretty sure this was 'involving himself' at the least.

Not even the wide-open windows letting in both sunlight and breezes, nor the random few in the room tending to their own various amusements while keeping a discreet eye on both the elderly lady and his own movements, put Bjørn off being suspicious as a matter of fact.

No one in Mafia Land had tried to risk a Cloud's retribution in return for messing with her handpicked assistant, but apparently that wasn't a universal thing the world over. Disappointing, but best to learn quickly than be surprised by the fact later on.

Having missed the expected and likely delivered confirmation the Rain lady that sought him out nearly the same day he arrived in her native country, the Lightning-Storm Lackey of a Soviet Storm-Cloud glanced from the elderly woman gazing expectantly at him to the silver haired Rain that would not take a 'I'm busy' as an answer.

As far as he was aware, he had done nothing wrong yet by visiting the country for such a civilian reason as sourcing properties his lady might like to purchase for them all to call home. Therefore, he should not be on the 'defensive' in this… interview. Even if he had no idea why he was 'invited' so insistently and escorted to this meeting with an armored car.

He had a couple guesses, as Sinclair was pretty transparent with how he got the estate listings he had handed over for Sonya to spend the money to acquire. Given how much his patron had blown off in aims of separating herself from her native syndicate, Bjørn could guess his lady would not be in any great rush to join up with a new one.

It was his first interaction with a Sky, however. He was still… somewhat… curious. Even if he knew this was probably a bad idea.

Daniella the Eighth Sky of the Vongola Famiglia was a surprisingly spry fifty-five-year-old woman, obviously more skilled in social interactions than the Icelandic could muster himself even with a generous amount of Mist aid. With a full complement of Guardians, and a few handfuls of other obvious Flame users that looked to her if couldn't be Guardians as she had a set of Elements lingering around her anyways. Some silver touched her dark hair, the flower tattoo under her eye was a bit creased by just time and general age, and even if she was over the hill in terms of age for a criminal-type it did nothing to cut how sharp the previous war-time leader of Vongola's gaze was nor her straightly posed spine set in her red pantsuit outfit.

The elderly lady's smirk grew the longer the silence stretched on, instead of becoming annoyed the still standing Lackey was not playing her game. "You are delightfully so much like your patron, young man."

"She did save me." Björn dismissed blandly, stumbling a touch over the Italian he had to learn through Viper's ill-humored Mist Flames. A few months of time was not nearly enough to provide the linguistic mastery over the spoken word as much as he could read or understand it. "May I know why you have interfered with my Dama's orders for this... meeting? As far as I am aware, Ottavia Vongola, my duties have little to do with your syndicate as of right now."

The language was not one of the 'business languages' the Mist had deemed important for him to know, that arrangement had to come out of his own pocket and had been exorbitantly expensive. On the assumption of her godchild being Italian then knowing the native language might just help eventually, which did become truth as he thought it would be given enough time.

"Your lady Cloud moving into the region does cause a stir, no matter how discreetly you try to act." The Sky informed him pleasantly, fussing around with the tea service to fix herself something to drink. "A credit to you, I don't think anyone else has caught on whose behalf you work for just yet. I am just... a touch more interested in simple things these days. Which sometimes to turn out not so simple, sometimes."

...actually not tea, a coffee tray. He might've thought it was black tea on sight, but the scent rising off the steaming black liquid was unmistakably coffee and not something more sharply herbal.

Well... this was Italy.

"Given you are not only looking at castles but are in the middle of negotiations with a very... local service to match caretakers of a large estate home, I must express a tiny bit of interest. We do not allow just anyone to move in almost next door, mind you."

"As where I was before your... agent found me, I feel I should point out that where my Dama intends us to live for the next decade is a fair bit more north than your 'holdings'!" Countered Björn only a touch dryly, unable to stuff his hands into his pockets as he wanted because his tutor in finances was a slave driver about appearances. "Meaning you are not the neighbors we will be concerned with."

"The Cavallone Famiglia are our allies."

"Which would be a concern if I was looking to purchase an island off your west coast for my Dama only."

"As is the Cervello Organization."

"France it is, then. Not really all that disappointing, at least my Dama will like the beaches."

Throwing her head back the Sky laughed at him, ignoring how her Guardians bristled around her at his flat tone. "Oh dear, you are utterly alike to your patron in so many amusing ways. I am not objecting, young man. Indeed, if your ever so Cloudy lady intends to live and guard her minions in Italia we would be delighted to have her and you all. You just will have to put up with a bit of good-natured nosing about, especially as Dying Will Flame users relocating themselves so far away from their native lands is always an interesting happening. Especially ones that can establish their own famiglia from the looks of things."

Three Lightnings, four Rains, at least two if not more Suns. One Storm, equally so only one Cloud. He couldn't spot the Mists just yet to count them either. More might be lingering behind him, so at best that was a half-count of how many 'guards' this woman had. "I can assure you, my Dama has little to no interests with Italian affairs."

"Be that as it may, we are interested in her." Daniella countered herself a touch cheerfully and with a measure of steel to her tone that raked against the Icelander's nerves. "Really, dear boy. I am not asking you to betray your lovely lady's confidences. I merely wish to know if I could be of assistance to your relocation efforts."

The Lightning-Storm Lackey huffed near silently. "No, thank you ma'am."

"Nothing?"

"I am merely checking up on the listings I have for more inclusive details than what is supplied to possible buyers and taking estimates for how much refurbishing or other fixes they would require before the various locations are habitable. There is nothing I require help with just yet." A moment of visible consideration, which was utterly grudging on his end in more ways than one, and he sighed as softly as he could. "The expected servants such estates will require… I might need some aid in picking through possibilities."

Best to know who they would be attempting to 'insert' into his lady's household before they got somewhat useful to her, and the prickly Storm-Cloud started bothering to learn their names. Bjørn might not be a match to a Sky of massive and war-trained experience's machinations, but then again Mists could pretty much run rings around everyone and might not need to match his 'opponent's' level of cunning.

On the odds, he'd bet if Viper would not give a look over them self then he might be able to enlist the aid of one of the two other Mists that lingered near his patron enough for her to refer to them by nicknames or somewhat fondly for her.

A delicately but still dark brow arched at him, and the Eighth Sky of the Vongola Famiglia considered things and him thoughtfully for a silent moment. "…a split-Flame like your lovely lady? You seem to be a Lightning, and indeed act the part. That, however, is very much not something a Lightning would've plotted out around any malicious aims in his way."

…there was a Mist in his head.

The Lightning-Storm pulled hard on the ruby red side of his Flames, blinking twice because he felt nothing like when Viper messed with his head for various lessons or imparted bits of knowledge to have been tipped off by such meddling. "You do realize I will be reporting this meeting to my Dama, and she will not be best pleased by this."

"Of course, but that also means she must return to… complain." A few sharp teeth crept into the Sky's smile, utterly satisfied with what he had pointed out and entirely unconcerned with showing it. "Frankly, as I believe her opinion of us can't really get much lower, so long as you survive I can merely use what fallout there will be to snag your lovely lady's attention."

"She could try to murder you." Pointed out the Icelander repressively, likely unwisely to a woman this connected but it did have to be said before someone found out the hard way his patron had very little patience left for stupid shit. "She was not all that far from murdering off her originating syndicate and ruining her own work, hence why she has left them to avoid that. This stress will not help any of us at all."

Daniella blinked in surprise. "Was she that badly handled back home? Oh... my, that does change a few things..."

Glancing at the silver haired Rain lady that looked a touch apprehensive at something, the Sky set her coffee cup down firmly.

"Well then, I suppose tweaking her last nerve before she has time to settle is not in anyone's best interests. I apologize, young man. My interests in your lady is not intended to be her demise." Before he could decide if that was actually honest or just sweet words with little real feeling behind them, the elderly woman gestured to her agent. "Take Nilda with you, she will ensure there will be less stressful interactions your patron will have to deal with to finish off your house hunting efforts. As well as insure most that know of our... interests, that you are approved to be in our country for your own reasons."

That was such obviously a trap Bjørn blinked blankly at the Sky.

"Dear Nilda and your lady Cloud met last Christmas, young man." Explained the elderly woman in amusement, and something tiny that was utterly not. "As far as I am aware, she has her own motivations for seeking your lovely patron's attentions. She tried to use my meddling to insert herself, and while yes I am meddling to give Guerra a better excuse... I will eventually become insulted if you insist to regard me so suspiciously. There is only so far you can press your Cloud's utter irrelevance to social behavior in your favor, Lackey."

"You have not stated that my suspicions are ill founded, Vongola."

Daniella smiled sharply at him as she leaned back in her couch with arms folded across her chest, queerly approving of his statement even if it was more than a touch rude. "Because they are not. You are merely being smart, which is a refreshing thing to come from a Lightning of your quality. Rudeness in the face of prudence is entirely forgivable."
"Do you have anything left to do this year besides one or so more contracts?"

"I have to go talk to the Long Triad, but we arranged for it to happen here." Sonya absently replied, mostly aimed at her own knees but also pitched so the nurse guiding her through her post-surgery physical therapy could hear. "Because Fong got this Lightning assassin man on his case to the point we had to bolt from the country and I probably shouldn't go back until that is taken care of."

Tatiana paused in leafing through the sheets of recommended exercises to build up any damaged muscles after an abdominal surgery to look up and give the blonde thief a flat look. "…what."

Her little sister twisted, against recommended movement for this exercise, and gave her a faintly curious look now that she could peer up at her. "What?"

A moment to think about it, she was utterly unsurprised Sonya wasn't all that greatly concerned over an assassin that might be after her. Frankly, given the situation back home, it was entirely likely the Lightning assassin from China wasn't the only one after her pretty little head.

With a sigh, the Sun Flame user discarded the paperwork and gestured for the other woman to get up. "Never mind. Up, baby sister. Still no pain?"

"…no."

A hard look only earned her a shrug, which made Tatiana assume there really wasn't any noticeable lingering pain from being cut open to remove pockets of matter that shouldn't have been in her liver. As she had gone over the surgery wounds herself with her Sun Flames, and there were a few more tests in ultrasounds and a few x-rays just to check, the nurse couldn't decide if she was happy to hear it or not.

Either it really was just a slight complication of a Storm Flame user being shot then healed by a Sun user without the injury being adequately cleaned out, or it was intentionally caused.

Sonya had gotten her injuries healed when they were actually lethal if left alone, which was fantastic in the face of her trying out their brother's Cloud Voodoo to do it all for her with the whole broken-but-not-really leg thing. The fact her prudence when it came to normally lethal injuries was possibly used to harm her more was not.

"I have to touch your stomach, try not to jerk away from me." Announced the Sun next, giving the thief a moment to brace herself before smoothing her fingerling onto and occasionally into the taught skin of the other Russian's stomach. "…Nya."

"It is unconscious movement. I am not trying to do this." The Storm-Cloud almost snapped back at her, already discomfited by so much access being had to her abdominal region for various people to poke and prod.

Tatiana forgave her little sister for that, both the jerky movements as her muscles tried to pull the skin away from the Sun nurse's fingertips and that snippy comment defending herself. She had known it would happen, and the Storm-Cloud was really doing so well in putting up with both her and Kappel poking something she really preferred no one touch.

"Okay, all done. No more touching." Taking a step backwards from the uncomfortable Russian, the nurse wiggled her ever so scary fingers in the air instead of in her overly sensitive guts. "You're clear to abscond from the hospital if you would like."

Rubbing her oh-so-abused guts Sonya eyed her warily. "Really? I thought this would take longer."

"Sun Flames, you basically cheated out of the recovery stage because of my fabulous self." Boasted the nurse wickedly, grinning at her very pleased looking little sister. "I'm sorry I couldn't do this for you before…"

"Tats, it is fine. We knew you could do it, and you did it now." Dismissed the Storm-Cloud, tapping the toes of her left leg on the mat placed for those in recovery from various injuries or operations underfoot. "So, what if it is this injury and not another? You still did it."

With a wry grin, because of course that would be Sonya's opinion on the whole issue that had been a sticking point for her for years, the redhead shook her head and gestured to the door of this room. "Either way, you can abscond with yourself free 'n clear and go finish off what you need to do. I do ask you come back somewhere near the start of December with our dork of a brother, so we can straighten out your vaccinations."

"…joy." Deadpanned the blonde sourly, snagging her boots to put on for her walk to wherever she was heading next. "It is not that far into November, I could likely manage two or three contracts. More if Björn was still here, but as he's off finding Galina and the others a house I have to find my own contracts again. I will be rather occupied for this month, was there anything you wanted me to do?"

"If you can, go check up on Adrik? Not if it'll impact Verde's learning experience, but… that whole situation gives me a bad feeling." Tatiana lifted a shoulder in a shrug when her little sister stared back at her skeptically. "I know, green-man really needs the experience as fast as we can give him it… but that's an entire childhood's worth of lessons and experience we got that we're trying to cram into half a year, against those that earned the lessons and skills fairly through entirely crooked lives?"

"If I can." Sonya promised slowly, visibly thinking it over to the point her hands slowed in the act of loosening the laces of her boots. "I am not sure if it will be possible, if no one can track them down they are all the safer and if I do so…"

"Yeah, no news is good news for the two of them. But then again, the both of them were in here too not too long ago." Waving the whole issue off because there really was little they could do about it for the now, the Sun user snagged her little sister's physical therapy regime guidelines and handed it over to her. "Do these if you notice any odd pulling sensations or stiffness. You will need to sign out of the hospital officially, at the front desk, but other than that you can go back to globe-trotting and stealing to your heart's content."

As soon as her baby sister cleared out of the medical sector, then she and Kappel had to submit the paperwork to get the thief cleared of paying for her emergency room visit and surgery. The 'recovery' time was on her, but Sonya had more than enough from a bonus the Triads gave her for getting injured on their time doing what she had been hired for.

Tatiana wondered if being hired out on the merit of her Cloud Flames would kick-start her sister's reputation or hurt it.

Frankly, aside being a thief you could hire out of Mafia Land's various contractual groups, Sonya didn't actually have one for her thief skills in the international stage. No one quite knew of her other than as 'the Mafia Land Cloud', or perhaps as 'that hitman Sinclair's friend', both of which were not reputations based off her skills instead of just who she was. Good ones, in a way of 'scary' or 'intimidating', but not for her criminal skills. Which had seemingly suited the tiny blonde and grey-eyed thief perfectly well so far.

It would be interesting to see where things would go from here.

…right after she saw where the rumors she had somewhat co-opted with Fong's unknowing help about the Cloud's physical condition finally ran their course. Right now, the rumors were mostly contained to very gossipy nurses and a few highly unnerved doctors in the obstetrician wing of St. Julian's. It would only be a matter of time before they started leeching out into the streets, and the nurse almost couldn't wait for it to get there.

She might've sworn to no longer use her sister's obliviousness for laughs, but nothing said she couldn't use Tasty Muscle's and her baby sister's irrelevance for gossip to get a laugh or three.

"Thanks, Tats." Sonya spoke rather absently, reading the paperwork through instead of finish lacing up her boots because she really was that much of a bookworm to read everything that she touched.

"Mhmm."

(Monday the 10th of November, 1969. Thieves' Guild Hall, Mafia Land.)

Sonya spent all of five minutes Sunday wondering if she should at least be at the school for Mingxia's first official day, before dismissing it.

The girl would have that elderly guy to fuss over her, and from the sound of it he had some kind of hand in raising her so she'd probably appreciate him more than someone she only recently met. Besides which, she really didn't want to go back to see where the Zolotovs were now for anything until she couldn't avoid it anymore.

Going to the school would probably nail her down with administrative duties until sometime next year, and the moment Galina got a hold of her…

Of course that meant she had to instead first suffer through an entirely awkward 'meet and greet' with the Long Triad for whatever the fuck it was they had wanted and then do her own paperwork for picking up the last contract she needed this year, with whatever else she would be picking up to round it all off and waste time with until she had to be somewhere again.

Frankly, even after the meeting with yet another Triad group she still had no idea what the hell they had wanted to meet her for. There was a lot said, but very little which had any meaning whatsoever. At the very least they had bought her dinner and a decent amount of liquor, so while confused she at least didn't greatly mind all that much as it was something to do that wasn't 'required' of her.

As it had been longer than a year since she last had to arrange her own jobs, and Sonya had kind of forgotten how much a pain in the ass it was to hunt through the damn near reams of shitty contracts for what wouldn't be utterly mind-numbing to do, she commandeered a room to leisurely pick over things and re-learn the ropes she had half-forgotten.

The second level of the office building the Mafia Land Thieves' Hall held various rooms used for picking contracts, as well as a few personal offices of the various clerks of note in the building. It wasn't somewhere she had visited since that time Bjørn fucked up on her and nearly got them killed, when she was still mildly annoyed with her own Lackey.

In a medium-sized room that looked as if it should've been a conference room, as a matter of fact it might as well be for entire teams of thieves to discuss logistics than for one lone solo-thief, the Russian had three piles of contracts set out to pick through on the massive table taking up most of the room.

One was the 'discard' pile, those that weren't even worth the paper they were printed upon because it would amount to absolutely nothing aside a number for her end of year total. Various home invasions, specific robberies in random countries for trinkets she didn't mind taking in-between bigger jobs but were basically a waste of money to travel for specifically because it wouldn't pay out all that much, and the miscellaneous 'milk runs' against civilian run outfits. She kept them out because if she could fit a few into what she would do this month then fine, but they were secondary to what she was aiming for.

The second pile were not entirely much better. More military installation infiltrations for various top secret plans or weaponry, a few requests against government branches for more various secrets, contracts against minor mafia syndicates for their secrets or valuables, and general harder contracts to complete because massive targets or tighter controls on how or when things were stolen. Most of what she had been doing the last year, actually.

On the other hand, the last pile was the contracts she only just qualified to do after a full year of steady work at it and almost twenty contracts to her number this year. They were complicated, and she had done one before in the chandelier heist back in Wisconsin, but actually contemplating taking one specifically required a lot of prior thought.

Gently nibbling on the brass and bamboo pipe, so she wouldn't bite through it as she lost her second one, Sonya puzzled over the suggested heists and if it would be possible or not.

Just because someone ordered it, didn't mean it was realistically possible to pull off. Some of them were outright impossible.

…that was excluding Mist thieves of course, or anyone else with skills not entirely humanly possible to replicate. Actually, she could see how she might do one or two… would it be a bad idea to take one, then?

On the other hand, it might be possible those improbable contracts were bait for any Flame users starting to become reckless about their skills. Failing a contract could either be possibly lethal or expensive, depending on what kind of penalties the one that wanted the contract detailed in case someone was that stupid or overconfident. If someone succeeded with the weirder contracts, then they could be sought after in alternate ways once their contractual ID number was known.

Comparing the four she knew for a fact were not humanly possible, if only because she had a vague idea from comparing her physical condition to Lisa's and more recently Fong's unaugment abilities, the thief spent a rather boring few minutes taking note of the details provided.

There were never a lot of those supplied, it was really something you had to accept a contract for to get the actual situation as far as the one placing the contract was aware. Given the time that could pass between the offer and someone's acceptance, the nitty gritty details to even where the target was might change anywhere from minutely to majorly.

Newspapers from around the world generally tended to help a lot for this part, assuming one could read the native languages they were printed in. Half the cabinets were stuffed with current issues from around the world, some of which were just utter gossip rags to The New York Times and The Independent to even current issues of the Financial Times.

Lacking the current issue of the Bild, a German tabloid with a conservative bent which would provide more background information some aspects of celebrity German lifestyles for the more likely of the heists she was contemplating, the Russian thief reluctantly glanced between the piled of her work and the door of the room she was occupying.

Obviously, leaving the contracted heists out where just anyone could poke through them was not a particularly good idea. She really didn't feel like putting it all away only to come back in five minutes with the missing issue, nor juggling several files worth of contracts while she hunted down what she needed in order to figure out if she should take them or not.

Annoyed, Sonya opened the door to her conference room to see if she could snag one of the various associates that worked here to find what she needed instead of do it herself.

Bjørn could not get back fast enough.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 10th of November, 1969 continued. Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Cherep staggered forward a step under the weight that impacted his back, blinking back at his fellow Cloud who came out of nowhere in surprise only to 'jump' him. "What is this for?"

"Now you don't have to hug me." His brat of a little sister informed him smugly, shifting a bit higher up his back so she was riding piggyback in a more comfortable position for the both of them and wrapping her arms around his neck. "Because this counts. I'm technically hugging you."

"Does it? I suppose… maybe. This time, I guess." Looping his arms up under her thighs and hitching her as high as she seemed to want as she refused to tighten her legs around his waist, her fellow Cloud kept walking along the freezing cold and snowy street she had successfully ambushed him upon. "So, what's the occasion? I wasn't expecting to see you for another month, honestly."

"I'm playing hooky by not officially being back in Moscow, mainly." Sonya informed him blandly, curiously eyeing Mauricio's colorful coat which really wasn't made with Russian winters in mind for a moment but then dismissing the man from any importance from the feel of her arms shifting in her heavy wool coat around his neck. "But Lisa said you were home, so first I've got someone for you to meet really quick before I go back to work."

"Really?"

"Aikido is the martial art discipline of using another's force to evade violence offered in one's direction. I found a master of such, he's at least agreed to meet you to see if you'd like the art and if he'll teach you." She informed him, a bit more of that smug tone creeping into her tone. "So you can be a complete pacifist if you'd like, yet not be entirely fucked if someone won't let you avoid them in other ways. You can tire them out instead, you never had an issue tiring me out when we were kids."

"Huh..." That... was actually pretty cool of her.

He'd be reserving judgment on whoever it was she wanted him to meet, and if he'd try learning what could be something interesting yet wouldn't go against his very nature and preferred outlook. However, the fact Sonya went so far out of her way to respect his personal views and yet find him something so he wouldn't be easily taken advantage of if someone wanted to pick a fight?

He wasn't an entire slouch on the whole 'avoidance' part himself, thank you very much... but it was pretty likely he was equally as lucky as he was able to talk fast when put on the spot.

"...why are you really on my back?"

"I spent about a week being held hostage for a stupid event in China. I got horribly homesick... and then you were here. It was just a perfect opportunity."

She wanted a hug but didn't want to actually ask for it or risk her disinclination for touching not enduring what he liked to give her, so now he was giving her a surprise piggyback ride.

Mafia logic, at its finest.

At least she was keeping his neck warm, and his hands, so he really didn't mind. Plus, more of the childishness he could really only occasionally coax out of her and had been completely rare in their childhood was always something he'd encourage if he could. "Aww... missed you too, sis."

"Shut up." Giving it was rather more muttered into his shoulder than actually spoken so everyone could hear her denial, either Sonya didn't feel like arguing about that or she was letting it stand with only a token protest. "Go to Aleksandr's."

Cherep obediently crossed the street their foster parents lived on to reach the other side where the ancient vor lived, ignoring the few odd looks he got for piggybacking his little sister around. *"So, guy to my left is Mauricio Sebastian Ciceron. He's one of the... umm... drizzle types."

"Purely?" Questioned the only real Flame expert he knew of, leaning away from his back to fully see the Spaniard that hadn't quite yet stopped gaping at her in a rather decent subtle way. *"...*huh. Why'd you bring him here?"

"Kind of had to, it's... just for a bit." Verbally sidestepped the stuntman before he had to admit the slightly messed up and ill-thought out plan that left him with a 'minion' type. *"I need a press agent anyways and Mauricio's got a silver tongue as well, so it works out. Bit like Master Liam, really."

By the hum, Sonya wasn't sold on that being all that was to the story.

Yeah, he was going to be slapped upside the head once someone got that story out of him. With a huff of a laugh, her fellow Cloud came to a stop on the at least ice-free path leading to Aleksandr’s home. *"Want to knock for me?"

*"They should be home, it's late enough."

"...they?" Echoed Cherep, trying to crane his neck around to see her but she was apparently still staring down his new friend instead.

Sonya tugged her thighs from his grip, sliding down his back when he let her go and rounding him to basically barge in on the old grumpy guy that once taught him to dodge and get out of someone else's grip.

Admittedly, the Inverted Cloud might still be holding a grudge against the guy for starting the strings that were holding his fellow if more Classical Cloud down in Moscow against her will and... Aleksandr didn't live here anymore. Cocking his head to the side curiously, Cherep eyed the shoe rack his little sister was for some reason using for her own boots when before visiting for either combat lessons or for the Flame gem investigation had never earned the consideration of removing her footwear in someone else's home.

That wasn't the only new thing in the entranceway he had passed through several times even these years, the Chinese scroll with some of their spikey characters was utterly new to him yet looked pretty old if well cared for.

"Ah… Cherep?"

"You're going to need her help in this area, at least for a few weeks." Confessed the confused stuntman in German to the magician still following him even if this all really was far outside what he was used to as he warily entered the house behind his fellow Cloud, hopefully to get him inside and stop letting out the heat because Russia got freezing cold in winter. "She, and a few others I was taking you to, pretty much run things here when it comes to our abilities. But, she also kept me out of things I didn't want to do so there's that. You also seriously need some different skills, as interesting as the mirrors are…"

Trailing off, the undying stuntman peered back at the little girl with wine red eyes warily watching him around a corner as he accomplished that herding.

…the heck?

The thief spoke something utterly outside of his linguistic skills to decipher, wrenching off her slightly snowy left boot and tossing it to sit with the other one already off next to the low shelf for them. Gesturing for him to do the same, Sonya brazenly walked into the apparently repurposed house as if she wasn't a guest of some kind.

Did Aleksandr die or something?

If so, he was honestly sorry to hear it. He might not have liked the guy, but his little sister had somewhat. At least, she'd pester the old guy about various questions relating to combat or her staves easily enough.

Whatever it was she had asked of the young school girl apparently had an answer in the kitchen, so Sonya promptly wandered off on him instead of actually introduce the girl to her brother and tagalong. Huffing, mostly to hide an amused smirk at her truly awful social skills, Cherep gave up trying to understand what was going on before it was explained to him and just focused on pulling off his motorcycle boots.

He couldn't do any introductions if he didn't speak a related language, which meant that wasn't getting fixed anytime soon unless the girl tried to speak to them in everyone she knew.

"Why are you still here?" A coat-less Sonya suddenly demanded shortly, likely coming back to grab him for lingering too long when she wanted him elsewhere, glaring at his new minion hesitating in the closed doorway.

"I was taking him to Lisa, and through her the others of your Rain group." Cherep spoke up for Mauricio, the Rain was pretty taken aback at the borderline rude question in another language suddenly shot at him and it really wouldn't help if he somehow annoyed his little sister before getting a few Rain Flame tips. "He's kind of following me."

His irritable little sister huffed, then pointed at the living room where the girl had escaped to. "Then go sit over there until we're done here. Shoo."

With a roll of his eyes, the stuntman obediently repeated the order in a language Ciceron actually understood. With a prissily little sniff of her own, his little sister then promptly dragged him off with a hand fisted in his jacket.

He hoped she didn't put more permanent creases in his jacket again. It was kind of a pain when she did things like that because the leather broke along those creases, and he really rather liked this jacket.

Tiny Usov was already present, along with a really old Chinese guy with steel silvered hair and a rather ferocious scowl on his face, and the Sun guy called 'Scruffy'. They were all sitting around a kitchen table, a rather familiar one that still had the burns from Tatiana's iron-Sun Flame investigation scored into the surface.

Hmm… interesting.

"Cherep, this is sifu Yaozu. Old man, this is my brother. Peter's the other one. Usov's just here to supply translations for everyone until you all figure out a common language. Yes, everyone here is aware of Dying Will Flame use."

The 'old man' blinked dark eyes once at her, shot a skeptical look at the young Mist in the room, then swung his highly skeptical gaze back to the former Czechoslovakian runaway.

"The more you become suspicious of them, the more they'll try to fuck with your head."

Offered Cherep a touch blandly, gesturing to the kid then flicking his wrist to include the rest of his type in general. "Try ignoring it, they'll deem you boring and leave you alone or get even more insistent on somehow prompting a reaction but will be a bit more predictable then."

A silvered eyebrow arched.

"I've got a Mist for a best friend."

"I will try to keep it in mind." Yaozu spoke a touch repressively, more for the wickedly grinning Usov who would likely take that second option than the first but it was pretty much unavoidable as the old guy had already been suspicious of him from the start. "Miss Bazanova has informed me you are a pacifist."

The undying stuntman shrugged easily. "There's not really much of a point in yet more violence to answer violence. We have way too much in this world as it is. Also, hurting someone else for pretty much any reason is kind of… being an asshole for little reason. There are other ways if you really want something that bad. While I'm okay with being an asshole sometimes, not with my fists or any other weapon."

When the other eyebrow joined the other one on the guy's slightly wrinkled face, he could only shrug again.

Scruffy, or 'Peter' apparently, held up his hands well before Yaozu focused on him. "I have no idea why I'm here."

"Because the doctor I had you see recommended 'moderate physical activity' to rebuild what you lost being imprisoned against your will for damn near a decade." Sonya shot at him irritably.

"Which you haven't been getting. As I can't let you go without that imprisonment repeating or you getting yourself killed in likely horrible ways, learning some way to defend yourself in a pinch isn't a bad option to get such. Especially under the eye of someone that knows the limits of the human body and hopefully how to build it up in a safe manner."

"That much I can agree with." Yaozu mused aloud after a moment of contemplation, where the Sun stared a bit blankly at his nominal boss and Cherep just felt a tiny bit weird about being present for the guy's past history and his medical advice being referenced so bluntly when he didn't really need to know. "...however I would like to know why you seem to feel as if someone threatening you is a non-issue entirely, Bazanov. You have to be aware of the lifestyle your sister is neck deep in, yet you seem unconcerned by anyone taking you hostage to use against her."

As the older Cloud in the room had never actually talked to or knew remotely what made a 'martial artist' different from another brawler type, or if that was a question he should answer at all, he first glanced to his little sister for some help.

Who looked pretty blank and entirely unwilling to say anything for or against answering that.

"Why?" He asked instead back, not anything more than merely curious as to the reasoning that might help him any in deciding what to say.

"I may be forced to compromise some of my values for my very life and survival against a regime that outlawed my very lifestyle in my native lands, to the point I will allow criminal activity around me now I am also one... I refuse to do so when it comes to what I can teach." Announced the old Chinese martial arts master bluntly, which the stuntman rather appreciated really. "I can teach another how to break someone in the most efficient manner possible, if you have no respect for another's life or for your own you might end up doing more harm than preventing it with what I can teach you."

Cherep rocked back on his sock clad heels, then exchanged another look with his still utterly unhelpful fellow Cloud. "...are we going to trust him?"

"It's your life, Cherep." Sonya informed him instead of answering that question, digging out a new long pipe out of her purse instead to fiddle with. "That's entirely up to you."

"You know him better than I do."

"Not by much. I know a... friend... of mine respects the hell out of him even when the old man disapproved of his very existence, to the point he was rather grateful for the excuse to badger the old man into talking to him again even if he is a criminal nowadays. I know perfectly well he'll help Mingxia, the girl in the other room with your Rain, however he can without reservations because my friend is and has tried his best to keep her out of the mafia or Triads or whatever partially because of the views he installed in him. That's pretty much it."

A new friend. Probably not the Italian 'R' guy, Chinese Triads instead. She really needed more friends, and his newest one wasn't all that 'civilian' either so he couldn't really say much about that.

Fuck. It was that 'Fow'-guy, wasn't it?

Little sister that ducked around saying hi to him had his coloring, so probably.

Returning his eyes to the 'old man' rather patiently waiting out their discussion of him, he held up a finger. "Can I take a rain check on answering that right now? I don't mean to be rude or anything, but I barely know you and that's.... been taken advantage of before."

Sonya hunched her shoulders, looking a bit pissed off now as she fiddled with the brass and bamboo pipe in her hands.

"I can almost guarantee you it's worse than what you're thinking." Announced the stuntman to all the other males gathered in a kitchen with him, only a touch wryly. "Point is I'm fine now and not there anymore, Nya. I also know how to pick locks, you and Vipes will be highly unamused by it, and I can always run instead."
The thief made a dismissive huff, and Cherep could almost hear her growling or something under her breath at his future plans which she didn't really seem to hold much faith in. She didn't get any less tense but did slow her fidgeting with that pipe.

"Trust must start somewhere, so I will allow this." Yazou spoke up, once it was apparent that the younger Cloud wasn't going to do much more than fidget and the older one was unwilling to elaborate more. "It will take longer, until I can get a feel of who you are under the surface I will not be teaching you, but we have going over what you do know of martial arts to accomplish before anything can be taught as it is."

"Awesome." Rather nice of the guy, given it seemed to be a big deal for him or his lifestyle choices. "I really only have winters and maybe a bit of both early spring and late fall unspoken for already, though."

"You all will also be moving to Italy in a few months, unless Yaozu feels as if Russia is where he wishes to reside either for the rest of his life or until his country becomes less retarded." Sonya announced bluntly before anything else could be said. "Speaking of which, I might need you to go pick up the deed sometime soon. Probably sometime next spring."

"Noted." A more European home base would be nice, getting past the Iron Curtain even as an entertainer was starting to become a rather dicey proposition. "Thanks for this, Nya."

"Nothing's been agreed to yet, you're just introduced." Sonya reminded him a touch pointedly, pressing a thumb into the little brass bowl on the end of her pipe already packed with shredded tobacco.

"But you're still respecting my desire not to hurt anyone, even if you think it's stupid."

"It is stupid but part of what makes you into you, so I'll live with it."

Cherep slung an arm around her shoulders before she could dart away with or without her coat and gave her the hug she had tried to dodge. "Love you too, sis."

"Stop touching me."

(Thursday the 13th of November, 1969. Museum Island, Mitte District, East Berlin, German Democratic Republic.)

Stealing art wasn't exactly a new one for Sonya, but to actually steal it from a museum on a contract was. A 'partially open' one was actually honestly interesting to break into, in the holy fuck the Allied Powers in WWII did a shit ton of damage kind of way.

Frankly, she wasn't a fan of the art trade. While it was very much a criminal route for money laundering as well as an elitist snobbish thing rich people did, actually getting solid number values on the various pieces was a nightmare of guesswork. Mostly dependent on how 'popular' or well-known an artist was, and who might be interested in acquiring it, alone rather than the content of the art piece itself or if it was even remotely pleasant to look at.

The Russian greatly preferred dealing with antiques instead. Easier to keep track of the value, at least.

On the northern part of Museum Island situated on the Spree River was a complex of about four or five different museums. Most of which had been pretty much bombed out by the Allied air raids in World War II and were still somewhat damaged because the Soviet Block was not really all that interested in rebuilding them for the German people.

The Alte Nationalgalerie was a building that would not have looked out of place in ancient Greece, except it looked as if something had shot up the center façade of the building and some minor amounts of rubble still spilled down half of its front staircase. The almost cathedral-looking building with a bombed-out dome was likely the Bode Museum, which made a rather stark image against the wintry skies. The building that looked as if it had come from Ancient Egypt looked even worse in terms of the surroundings being bombed out, which she was taking to be the Pergamon Museum. Ironically, the sturdier built building using newer building techniques at the turn of the century she was pretty sure was called the Neues Museum looked to be a complete ruin rather than a half-opened museum building from several direct hits by bombs. The Altes Museum was the one she was actually targeting, which wasn't really all that much better than the surrounding museums pretty much left to rot around it, looked as if something not-bomb-level exploded right in front of the building.

All of them were located around a wide-open plaza of paved ground, which was utterly unhelpful for her.

While the Neues Museum's more stable wings were being used to store some of the remaining art exhibit pieces from the unstable parts of the complex, the Alte Nationalgalerie was partially open, the Bode Museum was technically being rebuilt and not, and at least half of the Pergamon Museum's exhibits were in West Germany, the Altes Museum was surprisingly structurally sound for being a recognizable place the Nazi Regime once held massive rallies in front of.

Unfortunately, the Spree River was a not particularly good smuggling route to get out of East Berlin. Even if most of Museum Island was guarded for the reduced number of artworks they stored and displayed a portion of, the river still held a number of patrol boats and barricades which were manned around the clock and even more guards patrolled the northern tip of Museum Island to spot anyone trying to go underwater.

Even in the middle of winter. When the river froze over. To the point they sunk chain-link fences to catch such things.

…and allowed little kids to drown because those from the Eastern Bloc weren't allowed to rescue them out of the water.

Okay, the Soviets could be complete and utter dicks sometimes. Sonya wouldn't be the one to try arguing otherwise, perfectly aware of what evils both her native lands were capable of. Every 'modern' government had such a side, but the kid-killing bit kind of stuck under her skin a little.

With the ice covering the Spree River kind of questionable and likely only recently frozen, meaning fragile enough to break halfway across the few parts it spanned where the swifter and deeper current was, it ruled out a water-route to the museum she was targeting. Even if she could probably get herself a thermal wetsuit and a tank of air still if she cheated via Storm/Sun Flame internal heat regulation. As Museum Island was or had been a semi popular place to visit there were several roads that spanned the water as well, all of which were patrolled for yet more people trying to cross the Berlin Wall using the river.

And there was an entire flotilla of patrol boats making some kind of barricade across the open if icy water a bit west of the northern half of the island. Which were still manned, even if ice was starting to lock them into their positions for the winter.

A lot of eyes that might spot her, professional ones for all they were mainly military and a few specifically trained guardsmen.

While using the river was out, as was just strolling down a bridge in full view, it did leave under the bridges as a possibility.

To get there. Getting out with at least five or so of the 'Old Master' Paintings while scrutiny was heightened would be a bitch.

However, while stealing shit from where they should be did normally get attention in a fast hurry nothing said it had to be removed from the island the same night. Given how slowly if at all there was any rebuilding of the destroyed parts of the museums was going, there were a lot of hiding places. With a lot of construction equipment, which would hide anything she did to conceal her work until it was safer to retrieve.

Asides which, this wasn't her only Berlin contract. Sonya could and would just pick up her first heist's work after her second, when immediate attention shifted to that one in response.

Hence why this particular contract was one of the 'stupidly suicidal' ones. The buildings weren't heavily guarded for museums, but the island was kind of a choke point for the Berlin Wall's really risky illegal water access crossing and did have the higher concentration of heavily armed guards around.

One either had to have an entire crew of people to pull off both a distraction and the heist or be a moderately reckless Flame user. Preferably more than one.

As it seemed physical thievery was something most Mists disregarded as either banal or way too easy, preferring mental twisting and fucking with people while they were present just to enjoy the reactions from the look of things, that left about five other types as she had never heard of a Sky thief ever.

The Russian probably cheated a little herself in having more than one Flame type, which was not the norm as her first ever actual book on Dying Will Flames suggested. In Moscow, there were about six with multiple Flame types to them including herself out of the now over a hundred Flame users they knew of.

A Storm thief, as well as probably a Sun user, could go under the water even if it was freezing. Being able to regulate one's internal temperature tended to be more of a Storm/Sun thing than Rains, Mists, or Lightnings were capable of by the looks of it. As that might just be an assumption of it being a 'Storm or Sun' thing instead of actuality, it was still pending confirmation.

Conversely, a Rain might just walk across the streets in broad daylight and emit their Tranquility to prevent triggering anyone's suspicions or aggression to be noted doing so. As a type they were all pretty damn slippery, except when they got in large concentrations and tended to morph into some sort of heedless current follower kind of thing.

Sonya, trying to do the job via purely human limits just to fuck with someone's shitty plans in hunting freelance Flame users by submitting semi-impossible contracts, was kind of forced to use her Cloud Flames to begin with. It really did make up the bulk of her physical strength and turning it off seemed to be utterly impossible this far into being a Cloud using such a thing.

Her left gloved hand slipped off icy steel, again. As she was keeping at least three contact points on the underside of the Mühlendamm's northern bridge to Museum Island, the wider side of the Spree River around the island and therefore the less patrolled one as the other side would be easier in so many ways, because gripping too hard would leave behind handprints such an event was not deliberating. The Russian paused a moment to heat the leather a bit more using her Flames without burning the thin garment off her hands or putting more holes into it.

Frankly, the undersides of most bridges were disgusting. In spades. She had burned off the tip of her pointer right and left pointer finger tips of the gloves already, to remove the utter nests of spider webs and insect husks in her way without just shouldering through instead.

It still left bird nests, the occasional perch for such feathery menaces practically caked with new and old droppings, and the random piece of trash that blew up into the bridge's supports or somehow worked its way down from the topside.

Blowing out a sigh, the upside-down thief started picking up her pace before the next patrol was scheduled to go beneath this bridge and someone lucked out with an awkwardly timed glance up.

Scaling back up to ground level once she was on Museum Island, and then picking out both a waiting area for the next day and someplace to hide the paintings for a few more needed to be done before the sun rose and she could mingle with the public either helping with the reconstruction efforts or just to see what was left of the displays. Then locating her targets, if they were displayed or in storage yet somewhere, could be done in the daylight if she was careful enough. Easy enough for her, and nothing really new.

After that, she had to repeat this stupid bridge crossing to get out without being noticed in the area by the patrols.

Coming back to pick up her loot after everything was said and done would maybe mark her down as suspicious if anyone was watching and noting who came or left the island, but there was the southern half of the island she could use then. If she stuck to it her second visit, hopefully any note of her presence would get lost in the press of people that worked or detoured through here for work.

The precaution of going under the bridges and notice of anyone watching or counting visitors was possibly unneeded, equally as likely as it was just prudence for a thief to do. Sonya would just like to err on the side of caution before she ended up screwed without knowing it.

Besides, she was still a tiny bit restless from China. As disgusting as it was, the bridge crossing was suitably cathartic in its own way.

(Saturday the 15th of November, 1969. German Democratic Republic.)

Ampelmännchen were the figures on the pedestrian lights, who had little hats instead of being utterly generic people-figures signifying if it was safe to cross a street or not.

…okay.

Unscrewing five of the traffic lights from various light poles to send to whoever the hell wanted them took about a few hours of a late night, and probably would really fuck with whoever would try to back tract her work in Berlin, so Sonya didn't honestly care all that much. Slightly ridiculous minor contract done with to pad out her final count for the year, Sonya lingered in flea market for a bit just to see what was for sale before moving on.

She was mildly curious what Tatiana and her group did in East Germany to get Ziven and Nicolai arrested, but she could always ask instead of trying to get arrested herself.
Then the Russian immediately left East Berlin for Wandlitz, or rather a complex just immediately outside the town. The Waldsiedlung was where the senior party of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany lived.

Noticably outside of the split capital city of Germany. In a double-fenced section of forest, with tall walls patrolled by soldiers. In a compound with about twenty other homes, a market and internal amusements, far removed and protected from the East German rioters that might inconvenience them to see objecting to a few of the recent policies they’ve put in place.

Sonya was not really all that impressed.

It was where the current Chairman of the National Defense Council of the German Democratic Republic currently lived with his wife, and she was to liberate a 'Hans Beimler Medal' from the man's effects due to someone apparently thinking he didn't deserve it.

Some Spanish war medal?

She really didn't know that much about it, just that the details included said it had to be obviously seen one night and be missing the next. Meaning the thief had to be in the house with them, ensure the guy knew his medal was where he stored it, then take it and leave without alerting any guards whatsoever.

Stalking old people. Yay.

That was literally everything she did yesterday, and it was looking as if nothing would change this night either. Old bitter guy who didn't appreciate his efforts and attempts to reengineer a new economy for East Germany wasn't really appreciated enough to eclipse the disaster that was the Berlin Wall's construction on both an economic and public relations front. Equally somewhat sour old lady who did his speech writing and listening to him bitch about their disowned foster daughter's horrible choice in men and a great liking for booze.

Sonya was helping herself to their books, because if she had to put up with listening to them they owed her something.

There were more Communist books than she had expected, and a copy of 'Who are these Friends of the People, and how they fight against the Social-Democrats'… written by Vladimir Lenin. His first 'book', actually, of which she had never seen an original copy of before. As in an unedited copy of the work.

Keeping her nose out of the book while not being spotted haunting somewhere a Russian really had no good 'legal' reason to hang about was rather hard, so she stuck it somewhere easy to grab but not entirely 'out of sight' of the real owners she would be liberating it from.

As a matter of fact, a few volumes got relocated by her for later stealing.

There wasn't really a reason not to, as long as she only occasionally stole books it would be fine. Disguising the robbery with other items would just help, probably.

It was in the middle of relocating yet another book to a high shelf for later stealing that the old man stormed back into his house, startling both the thief loitering about and his wife. Immediately scrambling out of any kind of sight, as Ulbricht started dictating something new he needed to speak of immediately, Sonya ducked out of the back-kitchen window and immediately dove for the crawlspace under the house.

Hopefully, if there was to be some kind of speech next week or preferably Monday, the medal she was to steal would be put on something he would wear for it and she could get this job over with.

Creeping slowly through the surprisingly clean and apparently well service access for the seventh time on this job, the Russian shuffled silently to where the master bedroom should be. She'd hear it when they started to head for bed, and then could check everything over before and after they would settle in bed to see if she could make off with her loot or not.

She already knew the old guy didn't always check over his various trinkets and military/political decorations every day, or at least hadn't on Friday when the work week was over with and things were normally stored or cleaned for the next.

If she could finish this job sometime soon, she might be able to pick up a new contract for France and see if she could find Adrik or Verde. There weren't any good ones while she had been in Mafia Land checking them over, it was possible a new one had been submitted during the… week she had been gone.

…she missed Björn slotting contracts for her. If he was back, she could just place a call and get a new one somewhere nearby instead of going back to Mafia Land directly and waste a few more days finding herself a new contract or two.

---

(Wednesday the 19th of November, 1969. Mafia Land.)

Renato was well aware he was neglecting a few things. Kind of an unavoidable complication when you were trying to not only set up for your own hopefully temporary death and keep anyone from remotely suspecting him of doing anything like that.

Defaulting out of Mafia Land contracts, and yes even the employee contracts counted as terminally-enforced, was more than lethal. The hitman would greatly appreciate ducking suspicion on that end, he had nothing that could counter the island's network of spies and crooks spread across the globe if even a hint of his survival leaked outside of his control.

His upcoming death was supposed to be temporary, at least for himself personally if not for the name 'Renato Sinclair' and almost everything attached to it.

Making up the guise of being stretched a touch too far to contribute to how Renato was going to die included actually being that stretched, because he knew at least three hitmen and seven assassins that might look into it and not be fooled by a faked air without a direct or indirect cause. Which was laughably easy to work up between the brat, hitman contracts, and Nono's willingly supplied 'help' in that quarter. All he really had to do was start looking at amassing enough money this year to put into an account, so Sonya would have a little help paying for their godchild's education until he could get back and he was already up over his head.

As long as he did the two 'contractually obligated' hits next year, his death wouldn't be greatly looked into. Theoretically. His 'contractual' years would be up, and he would need to renegotiate them next year if he was going to keep working here, so there was some ducking of obligations he was about to commit. Doing more than the bare minimum would only just help, and for now he was still racking up enough to not only keep his apartment but increase his 'death benefits'.

A firefight on the island in the middle of the Hudson River was not an appreciated complication right now.
Smart place to fuck off to, especially for a lone gun dealer that ran afoul of the local American Dons, but utterly annoying to have to get into just to kill the wire-thin jackass. Who had been armed with seven grenade launchers.

The Russian thief herself would take one look at him and probably deem him 'too grumpy to speak to'.

Fair enough of a snap judgement, Renato really didn't feel like talking to anyone so if the woman had been on the island in the first place he wouldn't have sought her out for a now rather rare moment of peace.

He checked already and ensured she or someone else more lethal and less pleasant to interact with weren't waiting to ambush him in his own apartment. Mostly so he could change his suit and get in a shower, because the reek of smoke from an old building going up in flames was almost nauseatingly cloying.

The hitman still had to ask the Russian sisters if they would hold onto a few things for both him and the brat, if he didn't catch Sonya before the end of the month he'd have to ask Tatiana if she'd do it instead to keep the 'last minute' changes to a minimum. Altering the details of one's accounts wasn't entirely odd to do when things had to be shifted or changed anyways when contracts were re-negotiated.

…or maybe not?

There were quite a few different 'fiscal' years, and while Mafia Land went with the majority of them that started on January a couple countries had different ideas what such a period of time should cover. Italia had only changed their fiscal year to match suit not too long ago, before that it went from the first of July to the last day of June. With how 'stressed' he had made himself the last few months, being a touch late for a half-forgotten date-limit wouldn't be too out of character for someone in his position.

Fuck, he should've thought of that sooner. Way too late to make use of that, and it would've been a good 'detail' to distract any investigators with.

Renato smoothed a hand up the side of his jaw, checking to ensure his shower had removed any of the ash or charcoal that might've stuck to his exposed skin and to at least ensure he didn't have a five 'o clock shadow to match to how haggard he felt already.

Another two months of this, and he wouldn't be too surprised if he croaked embarrassingly on a hit.

Stalking into one of the various and many little dive bars on the west side of Mafia Land that were surprisingly not complete dumps, which he couldn't visit again once he was safely dead until he had separated whoever he'll become as far as possible from who he was now, the Italian hitman didn't even have to ask before a bottle of whisky and a tumbler was handed over by the stout bartender.

Thankful, he just slapped the money on the counter and walked off to a back table so he could put something solid at his back for however long he could.

Having almost completely gone out of his way to advertise the fact he really didn't want to talk to anyone, which clearly a few smart people had caught on to, Renato also did not appreciate some suicidal wet-behind-the-ears sot immediately taking a seat across from him.

The highly unamused look he shot the interloper just bounced off the idiot's false sense of bravery, unfortunately. "…what?"
"Rumor has it your little Russian lady's pregnant. Her own sister tried to keep it quiet, but some Triad guy took her to the hospital and bolted from her before they borrowed a few things from the maternity wing."

Renato almost inhaled his first swallow of whisky.

…he thought Sonya wasn't getting herself pregnant as Shamal kept asking because she didn't want a kid just yet or for some time at least. It wasn't really all that long ago she had claimed such to his face, and there had been none of the minor hints she was hiding something from him during those weeks in Moscow.

Dubious after the shock wore off, because he knew her opinion on the subject and Storm women were not the type someone could impregnate without their complete consent, the Sun user rolled his eyes and poured himself a new shot of whisky.

"…nothing to say?"

"Why does everyone seem to think we're dating?" Shot back the hitman sourly, plucking up the refilled tumbler just to glare at the moron over it. "Furthermore, has anyone gone back to ask Nurse Primakova if it's remotely true or not?"

From the sound of it, he highly doubted it. A… few coincidental happenings did not truth make, even if he already had plans to ask the thief the next time he saw her if it was or not. Even if he couldn't think of what equipment from that section of the hospital would be useful for to diagnose.

Besides which, if she had decided to get it out of the way or something along those lines, his not telling her straight out he'd like to date her himself was just on him.

…which he couldn't fix even if it wasn't true, because he was more than committed to the whole 'kill myself off' plan already.

Given his luck, of course now would be around the time Sonya belatedly realized sex was something she could explore for some experience instead of just doubt the benefits of.

Probably a pregnancy scare, hopefully. There was a lot of stupid shit claimed about the act of procreation and the 'consequences' of than truth out there, enough so that a trained nurse sister might not catch all of it before the younger woman started wondering a bit after the fact.

Well… given her opinion on those sharing her bed and what condition she would prefer them in, perhaps someone else she nagged into getting their health checked out for STDs. Utterly galling visit to the hospital to clear his health just to get her doctor to shut up about it or not, at least knowing his hard childhood on the streets didn't impart some kind of incurable complications for the rest of his life was grudgingly appreciated.

"You're starting to annoy me." Renato informed the suicidal idiot trying to provoke him for some reason, flatly to ensure his lack of patience right now was blatantly clear. "Either get lost or risk being target practice."

The young scut wouldn't amount to more than that, Lightning of indeterminate origins or no. Hopefully he wouldn't have to prove to all and sundry that he could burn a hole through a Lightning user's personal use of Hardening, just so it would be less risky if he ever had to do so in the coming years on his own.

If the idiot pressed further for a reaction, well… at least there was a warning given.
…on second thought, occasionally it wasn’t rare for a syndicate to get one of their people hired by

Mafia Land just to pick a fight with and get killed by certain freelancers so the island would put forth the effort in removing those becoming a pain in someone's hide. The fallout of that happening ensured it was rarely tried, but it still happened because of course it was an option if you couldn't muster the men or firepower on your own.

Another person or group he had pissed off might be hunting him again.

Well, he now had a list of those to work through… didn't he?

If someone was trying this bullshit against him, he should probably take the pains to ensure they wouldn't think to go after the thief instead when he was no longer an option to express their displeasure against. Especially if she was possibly pregnant, or at least rumored to be so.

Mingxia could honestly say Moscow was a sharp contrast to Hong Kong, and even farther removed from her small home village of Gang Jiao. It wasn't just the very controlled and regimented buildings lining the wider streets that made it easy to become turned around, nor only the moderately spacious home she now lived in with Master Yaozu until such time as Miss Sonya relocated them again to where she wanted them, even how freezing cold and snowy it was outside wasn't the bewildering point.

The 'police' were the enemy here, to more than just the vory. Not just a faction that dealt with criminal behavior, or a political movement given military power, the literal police on the streets were often not there to help the people they were hired to protect from the criminals around them. More often than not, in the bare two weeks the Rain had been in Moscow, it seemed it was the local criminal presence protecting people from the police shaking them down for 'protection money' or other so-called rights to their livelihood they felt they deserved.

For a price, and occasionally the vory just turn around and do the same thing to the people they were protecting, but… it was somehow not horrifying.

Someone was protecting those that had no combat abilities to defend themselves or their homes, the fact the terms used to describe them had flipped meant very little in the end. The Russian civilians also seemed perfectly fine with going to criminals instead of those hired to protect them by the government, and there was a quality of life under either lifestyle… but the police were really little better than the networked criminal groups and everyone seemed to accept that as a fact of life and not strange.

In another part of the city it might be different… maybe, but she had little to no desire to wander that far from any implied protection from such she enjoyed right now.

Vor Bazanov rather grumpily escorted the students of their neighborhood to school in the morning, his lover and the woman that raised her new patron from a young girl to the woman she was these days walking along because she also taught at the school and generally answered various questions posed about schoolwork. More often than not a young child rode on the vor's shoulders for the walk, Primakova's second son and fourth child, turning the whole thing into a strange extended family walk kind of affair.

She could honestly say ballet was not something she ever contemplated learning before, a completely unrelated luxury in learning something that had no combat or eventual career orientated reason to seek out. Master Yaozu was actually greatly surprised and pleased to hear that was part of Mingxia's daily life now, more than he had been to see how life worked in Soviet Russia.

Classes after ballet training weren't exactly as the young Rain had imagine them to be, having never actually attended formal schooling before the social upsets in China made school environments slightly more hostile than both the martial artist who was her brother and the martial arts master who did raise her for a few years felt safe in letting her attend. Not exactly what she expected, but in ways both better and worse than she had assumed.

Mingxia had an embarrassing lack of idea what the world's geography looked like, as well as little idea of what natural or otherwise sciences could be used for. Miss Galina, who taught the geography classes and related lessons as well as accounting related mathematics for those that wanted it, and the teacher merely called 'Scruffy', who taught basic sciences and their applications, both didn't seem to mind helping her by assigning extra work so she could catch up quickly to the rest of her classmates.

They looked a bit bemused at her wiliness for extra work but did help her by pointing out what focusing upon would catch her up quickly.

As her decent mathematical skills, the fact she knew more of Chinese history than Russian was excusable due to her nationality, and she could thankfully exceed the competence Primakova would like to see in her students for home economics, those were the only two subjects she had to work at hard to catch up with. Rifle practice and gun range time were also actual classes, which were government requirements so even if Master Yaozu wasn't a fan of that part of her day he didn't do more than grumble, which she felt little to nothing about taking.

The fact she was better with a rifle than a handgun was just interesting to know, as was ballet.

After classes was Flame user practice, a benefit of criminal flavored schooling the Rain had not expected at all. While she had been tempted to give miss to it so she could work on evening out the gaps in her education with the teachers' help, the draw of actually learning more about her Flame type in a completely no-strings-attached way was a touch too much for her.

That was also the part of the day Mingxia got a front-row seat to how… strange Moscow life was.
For her anyways, and Master Yaozu who could spot a few things himself waiting on his students to finish their duties and come back for more lessons or help, but no one else seemed to think it was odd or even something to wonder over.

Until further notice all Flame user training was done off-site, for an internal issue that was pending correction by the librarian and founder of the school. Actually not having been aware Miss Sonya actually had the entire thing built and staffed instead of have an 'in' because her mother taught there, nor that she had a role in it herself, the young Chinese teenager merely looked to where the 'Rain section' trained instead of wonder why.

One of the teachers, the math instructor Irinei, came with them but wasn't in charge of training Rains and kept to the watch/guide part vor Bazanov did for them in the mornings. Structuring the Rain Flame instruction fell to a boy even younger than her, who was merely known as 'Larion the Rain'.
Who took a kind of headcount, compared it to a list he received and gave back to the teacher to ensure they all were Rains and not an unaware student queuing up for whatever reason, then they all walked back through several streets and part of the 'home territory' to the other side of the Zolotov territory where the 'Rain Bar' was.

During those walks Mingxia had personally watched six groups of police try to spread their influence into Zolotov territory, and end up in full out fights with the local thieves' clan various members toothing them out. Three residents of the area seeking a Zolotov vor for some kind of issue ranging from a leaking roof to reporting an 'unsanctioned' murder. After even the Rain Flame instruction she once had been very gruffly but firmly redirected back into the neighborhood she was living in before she wandered too far out of Zolotov territory because she got lost.

The vor that took her home that day wasn't remotely polite or kind in nature, but he did step in before she got hurt being out of their defended territory or wandered too far away and encountering someone not inclined to her protection. Master Yaozu forcing himself to thank the man was rather embarrassing, but at least Bazanov inquired if she'd like him to go pick her up until she learned the way back herself.

He took his friend Ciceron to the lessons anyways, and the Spaniard Rain had a different place to go home' to so waiting for her to leave would not be an imposition. He was demonstrating what he did know of combat to the martial arts master and they were just generally getting to know each other, and the elderly man had gratefully given leave to take a break and be late for that.

The non-criminal Bazanov. Miss Sonya's brother, who was shockingly nice for a Russian man in this part of Moscow by all appearances.

After Larion released them to do as they would, and she got a bit of personal tutoring in the varied ways other Russian Rains had figured out they could apply their Flames to for various effects and the drawbacks to several of them, Mingxia usually immediately left the group so Cherep didn't have to wait too long for her.

The stuntman didn't seem at all annoyed no matter how long she took to find him, generally waiting for her by ordering himself beer until she was ready to leave, but she could linger for more practice after she was confident on the way home and the man didn't need to guide her back.

"I've really got nothing better to do this month, little Miss Mingxia." Reassured the man when she apologized for the imposition again because she got a slight bit waylaid by the possible discovery of how to compound a Rain's Tranquility with another's and the mechanics of the apparently tricky application, and the plans to test it out to be sure. "Trust me, I once moved here from somewhere else too and know how confusing the streets can be. It's just experience you have to get by getting lost a few times, or at least wandering around with someone that knows the area."

"It's really different." The Rain confessed a bit warily while peering down one of the snowy streets in this intersection, trying to recall which the right way was so they wouldn't end up leaving Zolotov territory and possibly meet someone not inclined to their safety.

In Russian, because if she couldn't understand the lessons then attending school would be pointless so the Mist lead Usov gave her the understanding of his native language with the warning it was the only one they would be helping her obtain without orders. Meaning she should probably work on learning Italian herself, as she already knew Miss Sonya would be relocating them again there sometime around the end of the school year to prevent upsetting too much of the school's normal functions.

The very purple colored Cherep huffed a bit with amusement at her side, hands in his jean pockets and just wandering after her as she tried to guide them home herself today. "Just… a great amount, yeah. Honestly, I've been up and down the entirety of Europe and a fair bit of both Asia and Africa. The only places that are anything like Moscow or even a large part of the Soviet Union I know of are some of the African Countries right now. And they're mostly at war."

"…isn't the Soviet Union at war?"

"Sort of?" Scratching the back of his head before putting his hand back in his pocket, the stuntman shrugged when she peered over and up at him. "There's a Cold War, and the Vietnam thing. But there's no army looking to take over our government or change our way of life by force."

Mingxia blinked at him a few times, not understanding the difference between war and a 'Cold' war. Cherep merely shrugged again. "Soviet Russia's… unique. Let's leave it at that."

With a shake of her head, merely to hide the smile, she glanced down the three street options she had and pointed to their left. "This way?"

"It's not the way we usually go, but a way back yes." Holding out a hand for her he swung her over a rather large patch of ice to the more plowed street, so she wouldn't have to wobble over the slippery stuff just to cross the street. "I'll take us from here, you've not gone this route yet. Still a good idea to know, if say a fight breaks out on your usual way and you need a detour."

Mingxia wasn't entirely sure how useful knowing how to walk on ice would be for her, but it was really something she hoped she got the hang of sometime soon. Slipping on it was a horrible, and sometimes painful, event. The stuntman had no issues walking on the crackling material, but then again he grew up around here and trained professionally with acrobats.

…and wore heavy boots with deep treads. Which she intended to inquire for the moment someone asked if she had everything she needed.

She had actually slightly doubted Miss Galina when the woman specifically hunted through everything for sale in Hong Kong to find her thick woolen clothing, unprepared for and entirely unsuspecting the absolute frigid winter temperatures here. Snow stacking up to almost waist height of a full-grown adult near her brother's size and sometimes reaching Cherep's shoulder height was… about as bewildering to her as the local balances of power.

New, not entirely something she was sure she liked, but very much a Russian thing in it was pushed to the side as they basically ignored the building snow walls boxing them in.

It would melt come spring, after all.

---

(Sunday the 23rd of November, 1969. Museum Island, Mitte District, East Berlin, German Democratic Republic.)

Rather annoyed now, having to spend an extra week stalking the squeaky old German guy who was the First Secretary of the central Committee of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany and the Chairman of the State Council of the German Democratic Republic and the Chairman of the National Defense Council of the German Democratic Republic, Sonya literally robbed him of everything he was worth the very damn moment she had the leave to do so.

Walter Ulbricht and his wife Lottie were not really pleasant people to stalk.

Well not everything, she had no use for more than half of his things. Aside the Hans Beimler Medal he finally checked on, which she had to take, and a few books… the Russian robbed the house of everything remotely 'gaudy' as well as half their kitchen and their complete wine stock. The food she dropped off on random doorsteps, the wine was for her mainly, and the rest of the junk was sent on to Mafia Land to make use of.

She left them a few pieces of clothing each, a few pairs of shoes, and their heavy furniture… and a blanket.

Everything else, as long as she could pack it up somehow for transporting, was taken.

Including their damn annoying grandfather clock. Which she broke and burned to complete ash the moment she didn't need stealth anymore.

That did force Sonya to go out of her way to hire a pickup truck to help her transport things without drawing attention, but that was relatively simple enough as she found a semi-abandoned house a few kilometers away from her home burglary and left her loot there then explained it all away as a moving day with a bit of a shipping shortage.

…still worth it.

Breaking into the home of and robbing the current head of the German Democratic Republic was a hell of a lot more attention grabbing than someone stealing a few paintings no one but a few museums not even open owned, and a lot more of a fuss was kicked up that drew attention off the first 'big' robbery.

Still, Sonya went through the effort of temporarily changing her hair color and picking up her 'librarian' persona again and added in the corrections to her documentation needed to reflect that change. Even if she had a party to attend at the end of next month.

Pausing, the thief pulled a loose hank of her currently light brown hair and eyed how far it reached. She also probably needed a cut, but she'd do that before going back to Moscow for the start of next year. It was easier to put up if it was a touch longer.

Tucking the hair back behind an ear, adjusting her fake glasses as that shifted the thin planes of glass a bit awkwardly to the point light glinted off them and temporarily blinded her, the Russian kept walking to double check her hidden stolen paintings were still where she put them before ordering something to conceal what she would be getting shipped out.

Because she had to wait another full week for old and squeaky to check on his contested medal, she now couldn't pick up a new contract. There wasn't enough time, Sonya had to get her vaccinations redone and then run about getting her dress and assorted accessories for the Vongola Ball.

At least fashions had rediscovered that humans had a thing called a waist and it was occasionally something to show, even if the current popular 'look' was form fitting up top or sweater and baggy loose pants legs. The precursor to bell-bottoms, slacks that suggested one had skirts attached to their knees. At least they didn't look like a tent, and her sister was a fan of the look, so it was an improvement.

Sonya kept musing on her issues with current fashion, even while being redirected away from the northern half of the island rather firmly by the border guards conducting some kind of meter by meter search. As she had to go south anyways it wasn't a problem, but it was likely she had to move the paintings before the search was widened to include the other half of Museum Island.

Somehow. Without getting caught by the heightened patrols and the search effort with several stolen Old Master Paintings.

…not helpful.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 23rd of November, 1969 continued. Museum Island, Mitte District, East Berlin, German Democratic Republic.)

"Miss! Young miss!"

The tiny brunette woman muscling around a bewildering amount of wood paused, carefully twisting around to see if someone was calling her. "Um… hello?"

"How the in the world are you carrying that?" Kevin Hössler asked incredulously as he carefully jogged over the snow-crusted streets to her, the young woman couldn't be much older than him and yet was carrying around a massive wooden crate as if it contained nothing but air.

"It's empty." She confessed easily, proving his thoughts correct and balancing the awkward container with one hand as she bent to drop it rather absently to the ground. Just to gesture at the empty interior and the lid that sat sideways within it. "We need the wood for a temporary repair at home, and I asked if I could have a crate from the hotel. They said I may…?"

A quick glance, it really was an empty wooden box with solid sides to protect the contents it might be shipped containing, and the East German Grenzauflklärungszug gave the bespectacled woman a second longer look. "Forgive me for asking, but you don't sound like a native."

"Russian." With a shrug, she took the opportunity to blow warmer air hard over her exposed hands while he clicked a few pictures of her empty crate and one of her that made her blink owlishly back at him but otherwise suffer without question or upset. "Do you want my papers?"

"Please." A quick check, because she wasn't trying to cross the border or get in the way and had been rather accommodating to him but it always paid to double-check, he handed back her passport and work visa. "Thank you for your cooperation, Miss Bunina."

'Steshda Bunina' shrugged it off and picked up her unwieldy prize to balance on a shoulder again. "Not a problem. Figured I would have to stop a few times, this probably doesn't look good. If we didn't really need something solid but lightweight... I wouldn't be out here this late."

Probably a broken window fix, it looked about the right size to be used to block a drafty or broken windowsill. Smart of her to ask around the more profitable business if she could make off with something they would likely only see as trash to be removed, especially if wherever or whomever she lived with didn't have the money or time to fix the window even in the middle of winter. "It did look pretty interesting."

"I'm sure." Carefully balancing the wood for a moment, the pretty young brunette started walking on again once she was sure it wouldn't fall. "Have a good evening."

"Good night, miss."

Tracing her steps back, at least a little way, did reveal her footprints circled the nearby hotel on the island and not much further in from what he could see by the waning sunlight. Of course, as the sky was rapidly darkening, he could really assume she went only there but at least it seemed to be true. Some of the other buildings would've already been closed had she been asking around even an hour earlier than this.

She hadn't looked freezing, just a touch chilled, for her to have been out too long in only a heavy wool coat and no gloves or hat.

Russians. She might be pretty, if a bit airheaded to be out so lightly dressed in the middle of winter, but it was a pity her work visa was almost up and he'd probably never see her again.

As that was probably the more interesting part of his night over with, Hössler started to walk back to the rest of his patrol for expanding search for some idiot thief that had the balls to steal some of the remaining artwork in the museums from them. In broad daylight, the ass, then made a fool out of all of them by leaving little to no trace of their presence to answer how it happened or even who it was.

His superiors were less than pleased, and demanding results that would take several grueling hours in the dark to procure. If there was anything to find.

Which they were likely to stomp on first before realizing it might help a search for a slippery thief.
At least they weren't the only ones getting reamed for the oversight of not catching a thief.

---

Tuesday the 25th of November, 1969. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.

Kappel blinked slowly at his usual nurse. "...I beg your pardon?"

"Just keep it in mind, doctor." Tatiana informed him absently, as if what she had just informed him of wasn't unusual or utterly strange, sorting the three vials of vaccinations in her hands to match the order they would be giving them. "Nya-err... Miss Bazanova doesn't believe it, but we had to scramble the last time and I don't feel like doing that again."

He stared at her hard, but the nurse seemed vaguely confused than understanding of his own bemusement. "I shall take your word for it, then."

She smiled wryly, then opened the waiting room where her siblings had been set to wait for them waving the inoculations in her hand. "Nya! I got your shots!"

"Try not to take glee out of giving them for once, Tats." Deadpanned the blonde already seated on the exam table, a jacket and what appeared to be several lengths of chain folded in the violently purple man's hold, sitting with arms barred and appearing bored. "If you could."

"Where's the fun in that?" Asked the nurse brightly, slotting the little glass bottles into a specific order on the counter before pulling a drawer open to retrieve the syringes and disposable hypodermic needles they would need.

"If you have no more business with me," Kappel drawled from the doorway, "I will continue with my rounds and see you when you're done, Nurse Primakova."

"Sure you can trust her with the needles?" Bazanova inquired mildly over her sister's bowed and fire-red head.

"I believe everyone feels safer with her giving shots than with me."

The brother he had not yet met in truth rocked back on his heels, glancing from between his sisters and then to him warily. "...I'm probably going to regret this... but, why?"

"Nazi." Sonya informed him dismissively, not looking away from the needles in the nurse's hands.

"Former." Countered said redhead, sticking the first prepared syringe into one of the three bottles' wax stopper to extract the recommended dosage of the influenza vaccine. "Defected, even."

She raised one shoulder in a shrug to dismiss that, ignoring the dirty look for moving while the Sun user was trying to judge where best to stab her with the needle.

Their brother looked utterly unimpressed with any of their words. "...Nazi. And... you two are fine with that?"

The former Nazi doctor in question heaved a tired sigh through his nose. "Yes I was a member of the National Socialist German Students' League, a subdivision of the National Socialist German Worker's Party. The Nazi Party, for short. I was a medical student during the Third Reich, of the 'Greater Aryan Race' as demanded of by the Nazi regime for students of such skilled professions, with demanded mandatory service in the Sturmabteilung and a requirement to assist with the
"That makes nothing any better." Pointed out the younger man flatly, freeing a hand just to point at him. "You're a Nazi doctor, as a matter of fact it makes it worse."

"Does it?" Inquired the Storm-Cloud Dying Will Flame user curiously, glancing away from the needle perhaps a touch too soon because that was when the nurse quickly jabbed her with the vaccination and made her little sister flinch. "The SS doctors were a bunch of quacks, admittedly… but if he's here and still alive then he has to have some kind of skill."

"Kappel is a perfectly decent doctor." Tatiana insisted, discarding her used equipment for a new sterile set and picking up the next inoculation Bazanova was overdue for. "No, I wouldn't suggest you take his advice for what kind of people to associate with or ask him about the topic of race. Frankly he doesn't volunteer that kind of thing anyways, and I've never heard him so much as mention the propaganda of the Nazis before."

"Because one could go from a 'proper Aryan German' to an 'undesirable inferior influence' by asking the wrong question at the wrong second." Kappel interjected for himself, bitterly but he wasn't able to help that. "It is hard to continue believing in the same ideology when it is proven that one's 'genetic superiority' really did not save one from the same fate as those they tried labeling as 'subhuman'. Which made the difference not something genetic as they tried to claim but decided by another on whims."

Sonya glanced over, blankly but in a forced way that meant she would not ask even if it occurred to her to do so. His usual nurse hesitated, giving him a questioning look because he had never really spoken on the topic before with or around her. On the other hand, their brother rocked backwards slightly again and regarded him in a puzzled manner.

"So… okay." Bazanov offered after a long moment of wary staring. "Still don't like him."

"I do not believe you have to." His younger and blonde sister informed him simply, sighing instead of flinching when another needle was stuck in her arm again. "From the sounds of it, I do not believe he likes it."

The German doctor rolled his eyes and actually entered the examination room instead of lingering in the doorway for this discussion. "What is there to like? The mass brainwashing? Being force-fed propaganda and elitist drivel until I honestly believed the tripe, before I had the truth of it rubbed in my face? Being told we were so special and so important to the success of the Reich, then to see one of those 'so special and important' Germans as a 'political prisoner' on the wrong end of a labor camp?"

"That sounds like a story." Primakova commented a touch hopefully, giving a wry smile when he shot her a look over his glasses.

"'Kappel' was a man I shared the first year of medical studies with." The doctor that had assumed the name now eventually gave in with, dryly because while this wasn't the worst of the things he had been involved with it was a rather steep lesson he didn't particularly want her to experience for herself. "I last saw him as a fellow medical student when our class broke for SA training, then when we reconvened no one quite knew where he had gone. Eventually, in my second year as a medical student assisting with the labor camps, I saw him again. Across the prison yard, just before they shoved his broken body into the furnaces with the rest of the ill or unable to work 'undesirables'."

"Why did you take his name, then?" Asked the nurse, not bothering with the third and final shot her sister needed in favor of badgering him for ancient history.
"Because he started it." The former Nazi bit out with a sharp flick of one hand. "They never bothered to supply us with an excuse for why he was removed from class, and as I was part of the staff at that labor camp it was simple for me to acquire the lists of prisoners and why they were incarcerated. I knew the man, Kappel was no more a 'political dissident and spy' than I was. We had the same grade of 'pure genetics' they obsessed over, raised in nearly similar 'small town' environments, we differed in what we appreciated or liked to do outside our study of medicine but that was to be expected. Yet somehow, for all his 'desirable' traits, he was slaughtered with as much thought as anything was put into in those days."

He plucked his glasses off, cleaning the lenses with a square of cloth he kept in his vest pocket.

"So… I gave them what they wanted Kappel to be."

"If that was all it took, why didn't more Nazis 'defect' like you did?" Demanded the sisters' brother, bluntly but not nearly as hostile as most were when they learned of his former status.

"In the heart of the Third Reich? In a section of society they likely inspected routinely for just that kind of 'anti-patriotic' thoughts?" Sonya answered before the man using the name Kappel could, sounding highly skeptical and just a tad sardonic. "After all that bloody 'work' was already put into trying to justify themselves? Under the watch of the SS, and their very fellow citizens, who would report each other just in case? Really Cherep, any and all that knew or suspected the Nazis were blowing hot air out of their asses had little to no way to 'divorce' themselves from their very government. It was everywhere, and well entrenched in even daily life when the façade started cracking. Think of how hard it would be to announce you favor capitalist ways and all the reasons why in the middle of the Red Square, worse yet how hard it would be to survive that."

Tatiana turned back to her sister, sticking a finger up in her face just to waggle it under her nose. "We're nothing like the Nazis."

"Are we not?" Countered the younger sister dryly, batting away the offensive hand. "It started with silencing opposition because they're 'wrong' or 'not-patriotic'. Then it turned to 'we are better because of such and such reasoning', and anyone that says otherwise are disruptive and should be scorned silent. Beaten for it. Killed. Or otherwise arrested and removed from being able to influence anything with such 'non-loyalist', 'wrong', or just 'illegal' viewpoints. Sometimes in secret. Who am I describing, the Nazis or the Soviet Union's KGB?"

"Yes." Confirmed the only one who had lived through the rise and fall of his former homeland, resettling his spectacles on the bridge of his nose. "You may not be party to the attempted extermination of entire schools of thought or races… yet. But without a counterpoint to balance against, without dissent picking over everything to ensure it, you deafen yourself to anyone that might say 'is this wrong?' Then you may just end up repeating what we Nazis started. Just in a slightly different way, against a different group. These 'capitalists' you strive to be 'better than', for instance."

"That is how it always goes." Sonya continued in a bland tone, nudging her sister's stool with a boot to get the nurse back on the subject of giving her the last shot. "The argument of 'we are better than them', that 'they do not deserve such and such' item or land or what have you, or worse yet 'they are different and not the same as us' so fuck them and who cares if they die off? Or even better yet 'let's take their shit, they do not deserve it for' insert reasons here. Men against women, the Roman Empire against pretty much everyone before it's fall, the several 'Crusades' of Christians against the Muslims and Jews, the Muslims and the Israelis, this king against that king, the 'peasants' against the 'nobles', civil wars, revolutions, this religious justification against another, 'natives' taking back their countries from conquerors, witch hunts, the Spanish Inquisition, the genocide and systematic 're-education and conversion' of the Native American people into proper 'God-fearing Christians'. The Nazis were just the latest example, and one that was shockingly effective with their hate in this 'enlightened age of reason and science'."

"War is not an answer," Cherep chimed in, waving a hand to dismiss that, "which is pretty obvious given history."

"Says who? There were millions dead from such conflicts true, but calling the method worthless or useless or wrong would actually piss off those soldiers and some great measure of the victims. You are calling their hopes for freedom, from oppression, from being able to stand and say 'this is not right, we reject this from our lives' as wrong? Sometimes it is the only option they had, when that was the only tool they had because the other side had no reason nor desire to listen to why they were 'evil' or 'oppressive', and those that fought paid for such freedoms and rights for their fellow countrymen or fellow 'whatever' with their lives. By saying it was all as bad as any other you are actually hurting a lot of causes that tried to correct injustices and crimes against humanity. Slave revolts, refusals to follow mad or otherwise unfit leaders in their 'birth-or-otherwise right to rule', the denial of Empirical colonization of 'lesser' countries and the damage their 'civilization process' did to the native residents of those lands."

Her brother scowled at her. "Must you?"

"Yes. The very minute you deny or refuse the idea we might be or possibly can be just as bad or worse than the Nazi regime is the very minute you open the door to yet another equally horrifying 'ethnic' or ideological cleansing of the 'undesired'." Snapped back the thief just as irritably. "The same minute you go 'we are more enlightened and that will never happen again', you cement the possibility of a repeat in the near or far future. Obviously we are not all that enlightened just yet, you just have to actually take a look around at current history to see that. China, the African Border Wars, Vietnam, the entire Cold War. Where one side will willingly and with full awareness advocate and commit the oppression or slaughter of the 'other side'. The moment you stop listening to counter arguments, from hearing your opposition, when you surround yourself with only others that share your own views… you fail."

"There are those already decrying the Holocaust as faked." Kappel helpfully informed the younger man in a dry tone of voice, flicking his reading glasses back up his nose. "That it's some Zionist plot against the Nazi Party to discredit it and falsely persecute their so call 'oppressors', that there is no way such a high number of people could have been murdered because 'where are the bodies and records'? Ignoring the possibility and reality of the destruction of both the evidence and any records of the 'Final Solution' just for that very damn reason. History is written by the victors, but some refuse to learn it due to various reasoning both good and ill. It 'isn't possible to kill that many in a short amount of time', for 'no one is that evil for no reason', that 'it couldn't happen without everyone knowing it happened'."

"I know you do not like harming others, Cherep. Along with war and most violent conflicts. But… you are part of a tiny minority." Sonya turned to the man, a slightly regretful half-scowl on her own lips. "For most of the rest of the world, if they had both the opportunity and the 'right' justification, 'murder' and 'war' very much are the answer they would reach for first."

"This isn't supposed to be that hard." Deadpanned Cherep, loosening an arm from the bundle of cloth and steel chain just to pinch the bridge of his nose. "He's a Nazi. A Nazi doctor. They're supposed to be evil and… and not doctors just being doctors."

"You realize, for how much we 'decry' Nazis… no one caught very many of them." Admitted his youngest sister tonelessly, kicking her elder's borrowed stool a touch harder to get her back on the subject of the last inoculation she was present to receive. "The last rough estimate I saw was speculating? We 'lost' a good several thousand of them, most through South America but a good several handfuls of them in other ways could've gotten all over the world by now. Free of the 'Nazi' label, clear of any suspicion of their crimes, able to continue-"

"Thank you, yes. I get it."

Tatiana rose to her feet, stabbing the last shot for guarding against tenuous deep into her little sister's bicep to reach the muscle. "We are not the next Nazi Party."

"Probably not. The Soviet Union is already staggering, they have to rely on the bratva to keep public order or any sense of daily life going as it is. Odds are it will fall before that could happen... but may I point out the KGB and the SS have similar methods and end-goals. No one really do know how many have been arrested, or what happened to all of them. In either case."

Lifting his face from the hand he had been cradling it in, the brother eyed their little sister oddly. "Are you saying the capitalists have it right, then?"

"Hell no. It is ideology, theories. There is no 'right' answer, just what becomes history and what does not in the end." Sonya scoffed, snagging the chain first to loop around her non-inked up arm and fasten. "According to the original Marxism theories, capitalism is just a phase. Like 'serfdom' and 'the rights of nobility', a step in the evolution of society from where we started from to where we're developing to. Right now it works, because that is what society needs while industry develops to a higher level. Communism, when the proletariat overthrow the bourgeoisie and everything changes from laborers working for owners and money to no owners and personal right to a decent status of living for all just because they are alive and deserve that, actually doesn't exist as The Communist Manifesto speculates."

She held up a finger between her siblings before either could speak their thoughts.

"Allow me to repeat that, speculates. We Soviets are 'communists', but not the type that were called for nearly a century ago now. We are still a state-owned capitalist society, because no matter how you look at it there are still owners and laborers getting paid with and working for a currency. A half-step, at best. It was a guess, by some likely smart people postulating where to go next, a stab in the dark to what would come after the current way of life. Russia skipped the capitalist phase, it should not be a surprise we stumbled. Frankly there should not be a conflict between capitalists and communism at all, but a succession via a revolution once industry outstrips the ability of monetary trade to keep up with and pay for."

Cherep made a face, pointing at her with his freed arm and tucking the other away in a pocket as she took back her jacket. "Wouldn't that put you out of work?"

"Greed is an eternal human vice, along with Wrath and Lust. Someone will always want what they do not have, or just what his neighbor has, or just dead and no longer bothering them. I will admit to some curiosity to how I would be paid in that eventuality but do realize this is decades if not another century or so off." Sonya shrugged into her jacket, then leaned back against the wall instead of immediately get up to leave as it seemed she always wanted to do when she had to visit the hospital for any reason. "May we get back to the point?"

"Right, Kappel's not evil and..." Tatiana trailed off, disposing of the last hypodermic needle and used syringe in the container supplied for that exact purpose, before turning back to the doctor in question. "...sorry, but he did work with and somewhat support utterly stupid and evil shit when he was young."
"…how does that story end?" Asked the brother wearily, turning back to the man that started the entire conversation on philosophy and the pitfalls of blind faith by way of his former allegiance. "The one with… uh…"

"My former classmate."

"…right, him."

"Well… during my second round of assisting with the Reichsarbeitsdienst, the prisoners of the concentration camp I was assigned to somehow ended up with the parts for a short-wave radio and a small generator." The Kappel of now drawled out blandly, flicking his cleaned half-moon reading glasses back up the bridge of his nose again. "Heaven knows how they assembled it and actually managed to use them, when they were watched and observed around the clock by at least staff if not a number of guards. Or a Sturmabteilung trained army doctor doing 'secret' observation of the prisoners. A real mystery, in the end."

Tatiana snorted inelegantly, and a purpled eyebrow cocked up.

"I defected to the Americans when they came to liberate the concentration camp, they returned the favor in ensuring I was not… still brainwashed with Nazi idealism without the counterpoints to the arguments that made it more than disgusting to hold." Continued the former Nazi doctor, after a moment trying not to remember what else the Americans had done for a perpetrator of the crimes against the prisoners of that camp. "I assisted them for some time as both a native guide and fully trained army medic until the Nuremberg Trials started, then I was told 'you have three days, doctor, I'd suggest you run'. So, I did."

Kappel also had no issue selling out the members of Operation Werwolf he knew of, which bought him clemency from the Allied Power's higher military ranks when the bounties started piling up for any and all former Nazi officers. After it became more than apparent not all of them had either fought to their death or run for it, some were lingering to take the German people hostage even if they no longer supported the Nazi views, his knowledge of them and their recruitment measures proved more valuable than his death would have been to certain people.

It was rather impressive what some of the more fanatical would overlook, when seeking medical help from a supposedly loyal Nazi doctor while he had still been forced to help the Third Reich's various operations, even when he no longer believed in their politically whitewashed nonsense.

Pure luck alone some of the prisoners he had assisted in Buchenwald kept him in mind when they returned to their various countries, and a number of the French inmates had involved themselves with rebuilding their country to the point they rose high enough in rank to notice him when he was caught there. It was really thanks to them and the remains of the French Resistance Kappel ever reached Mafia Land, due to their return help and his unwillingness to connect them to ever helping even a defected Nazi he would never leave.

As Bazanova had obliquely referenced near the start of their distraction, he was a known Nazi in Mafia Land. However defected or former or as estranged from the ideology as he was, that did not dismiss the war crimes against humanity he was charged with committing in absentia. Any number of criminal types had already made it apparent the moment Kappel was no longer 'useful' to them, or tried to continue the work of the Third Reich, or even sneezed wrong they would likely lynch him from the street lamps. Gleefully.

He honestly couldn't say he held it against them.

"I still don't like you." Cherep informed him bluntly. "I don't like Nazis or even the idea of racist hating someone due to the color of their skin or where they were descended from."

Sonya sighed heavily as she got up to join him for the walk out of the hospital. "You realize he was brainwashed with several generations of Germans, yes? Told, taught, and had the ideology repeated to his face as facts for decades before he came to the realization his life was based on lies. It is easy, outside the situation and far from the society that such festering thoughts created, to say it is wrong and no one should have believed it. Or that he should have done something against everything he ever thought he knew, when in reality that would have just killed him as easily as most the victims he could have 'saved' would have been. I will not overlook his actions, nor forget what he was part of, but I do not hold him entirely responsible."

"Some people just get dealt really shitty hands in their lives." Tatiana chimed in a touch wryly, snagging the three slightly depleted bottles of inoculation to return to Pathology. "I'm with Nya. Don't forget, and maybe giving the benefit of doubt about ideology and race is kind of pushing it, but don't do what the Nazis started. Don't hate just because of a title or ideology."

"I don't hate him, I just don't like him." Their brother insisted.

Kappel shrugged that off. "Fair enough. Is your concern over your sisters learning from and being treated by a former Nazi at least put to rest?"

The younger man eyed him warily, then just scowled. "Barely."

(Thursday the 27th of November, 1969. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

"We always do the weirdest of shit when I visit this place." Cherep muttered, mostly to himself but just loud enough for Sonya to hear perfectly well. "It's a black market, the black market. For murderers and thieves and all sorts of things of ill-repute to sell their ill-gotten gains and services. First we came here for medical records and shots, then for Lisa's pregnancy, now for... more shots. I declare this a logical fallacy."

In English, so yes she was supposed to pick up on that.

She merely tossed the issue of Vanity Fair she had been flipping through into his face. "Is that an objection? Because if it is, we could-"

"Ha, no." He deadpanned, picking the magazine up off his lap and slouching down the other side of the couch to actually read the dratted thing.

"Ha, no."

She merely tossed the issue of Vanity Fair she had been flipping through into his face. "Is that an objection? Because if it is, we could."

"I was about to say 'go shopping', because this is an international island and it has stores that may not be 'listed' in any directory but are stocked with what is currently 'in' to own or wear or what have you." She continued in a deliberate tone of voice, picking up Tatiana's latest issue of Cosmopolitan and eyeing the yellow background behind a yellow dressed model suspiciously.

The first tag line was 'Would you rather be his wife or his mistress? Read here before deciding'.

Discarding that without even cracking open the cover, she sorted through the other 'fashion' magazines Tatiana wanted her to look through before going dress shopping with her.

Given she already felt kind of ill, and she had another four or five more shots waiting once this round was done with, Sonya was basically looking forward to a rather miserable month of December. The end, when she got to steal the bratty Mist and make off with him back up to Moscow for Christmas, would be nice but right now the blonde just really did not want to move.

She had a jersey knit blanket helping her keep warm, some half a pot of tea left, and her brother on the other side of the room. It would be rather nice... if she didn't have the sniffles.

"Eh... maybe next week."

In Cherep-speak, that was a 'I don't want to, but you might be able to drag me along because that sounds interesting'.

Sonya discarded hunting through the magazines for a tissue, hoping she didn't rip this one in half too.

Her brother blinked when her sneeze rocked the couch they were sitting on back a bit, not tipping over because he counterbalanced her occasional attempts at knocking herself over, looking up at her for a moment as she grimaced over the mess she had just made. "So... soup? Lunch? Things of that nature?"

"Urg." The best use she had for tissues was mopping up the snot off her fingers, mainly.

Involuntary didn't entirely mean unconscious reflexes, as they had learned in Kappel's first lesson of 'Cloud Flame users are really destructive so don't fuck with their reflexes without adequate room'. While the Soviet Storm-Cloud didn't break anything in her sleep, her bed or the people she slept with, if she was awake and tried half of that shit...

Sonya tried to refrain from sneezing while sitting down, or leaning against anything, for this very reason.

Stupid super-strength bullshit.

Thankfully she only had so much air to forcefully expel, and the range for a sneeze was short, otherwise she'd never be able to go outside during the spring or fall seasons. Standing upright also tended to help a lot, as apparently she somehow countered her own forces when using that ability already.

Hence how she could pick up more than humanly possible without breaking her knees or back. It was a reflex to her as much as breathing was, thankfully. That part she really didn't want to screw around with and somehow mess up, so what was just was and that was it.

"You need to eat. Doctor's, or rather nurse's in this case, order. Soups, liquids, whatever solids you feel like you can keep down."

"I am not that sick." Protested the thief irritably, snagging another two tissues in the vain hope she could clean up her hands enough to not feel gross picking anything up with her fingers. "I just do not feel like eating anything."

"Soup it is." Cherep informed her snootily, tossing the magazine back and getting up. "I'm hungry, so you should be hungry."

First he readjusted the couch's position, given it had slid back a full foot from where it had been when they took opposite ends. Then he wandered off to see what was in the fridge.

Sonya suffered through it rather gracefully in her own opinion, mainly because it put her back in range of the wastebasket moved just so she could dump used and mainly ripped up tissues into it. "There are some hopefully no longer dried beans soaking in the pot on the stove, Tats had the idea of putting on a kettle of pork and bean soup to leave warm overnight for however long it lasts. She's starting to get called in emergency cases, most of which seem to happen in the middle of the damn night."

"Sure, sounds good. What's left to do?"

"The pork stock, there's some bones thawing in the fridge's bottom drawers."

The stuntman paused while looking at the bones, scratching the back of his head. "Erm... she left it a bit late, that part."

"You can start it for her. I was going to do it... but I think I should avoid the kitchen right now."

"Sound plan. I like it." With that shot at her current condition, or more likely her cooking skills, given he bent to gather up the bones and some vegetables out of the crisper drawer. "Still need something to eat now, though."

"Order up something. Or go fetch it."

"I think not." Dismissed her brother quickly, hunting through what the nurse had stocked the fridge with curiously. Glancing through what was in the freezer, he quickly shut that and hunted through the back ranks of what was available by sticking half of himself into the fridge. "What's the half-full jar of red stuff?"

"Kvass."

"Borscht it is."

Sonya frowned at his back, because with what Tatiana had left of the stuff making enough for two would mean they had to make more fermented beet liquid soon. Then she had to sigh and stand up, staggering a little because her lower body was pretty much mummified in her blanket and she didn't want to rip up her sister's favorite covering, as she waited for the next sneeze to happen.

"You could ask me to come over there and weigh down the couch." Cherep informed her, ordering his vegetables and snagging a knife for them then hunting around the cupboards for a pan to roast the bones a bit before boiling. "Just saying."

"You will be running back and forth every five minutes."

"I, little sister, am here for you. Nursing things, again. You're my second Flame user this year. Seriously, I should start charging for this." Pausing, the stuntman eyed the hallway that lead to the two rooms this suite had and the bathroom. "Or we could borrow one of your bookcases and that could pull duty as 'counterbalance'."

"Do not."

"It was a suggestion." He teased, finally digging a pan and another pot out of the bottom cabinets for his soup making efforts. "I really don't mind being here if you need me, Nya."

"I do, you have better things to do than babysit me."

Like deal with his 'new' minion Rain guy or prepare for his world tour. Maybe line up a set of bikes, because while Master Liam would insist on him taking a break after every spill another 'ring leader' might not be that generous. Investigate safety equipment and any new breakthroughs in that area, plot out what to do and say in various stops because not all of it would be in countries where his undying abilities could be fudged with a little by rumor alone.
His first minion should've been a Mist. They were downright invaluable as an aide, and helped so much in keeping things unnoti-

Interrupted by the expected yet still surprising sneeze, Sonya basically whimpered as her abused sinuses protested the renewed strain. Eyes watering as she held a hand over her stinging nose, she sniffed weakly and glared down at the mess of magazines that were now all over the damn floor.
"...fuck."

"Why not try laying down?"

"I already sneezed my bedside lamp off my end table."

"I meant on the couch, silly." Cherep offered lightly, waving a slotted spoon over the shoulder at her as he arranged the bones to roast in the oven with his other hand and kept an eye on the base stock of the soup they would be having. "On your back, aim somewhat up or at least away from anything breakable."

"What do you think I have been doing?"

"Aiming at me."

A snort of a laugh turned into a cough, so the thief tried his suggestion. A nap sounded perfect anyways. "Wake me up when there is soup."

Oddly, he turned fully to eye her now. "We're not expecting anyone, right? No visitors, no one you've been meaning to talk too?"

"...not as far as I am aware." Sonya responded a bit slowly, confused, as she lowered herself to sit on the middle of the couch instead of lying down as she had intended. "Maybe Bjørn, but I am not expecting him any time soon."

"Good. Just asking."

"...possibly Renato? Erm… we do tend to at least coordinate what we get the brat for Christmas, but the kid gave up mine for a school club function thing and he might not know that." Continued the thief in a puzzled manner, now eyeing his slightly tense back. "Fong might actually come and ask about old man Yaozu and his little sister Mingxia, if he returns anytime soon."

A wary purple eye stared back at her for a moment. "...right. Let me go write that all down.

"For what?"

"Messages? In case you're sleepy and not up to talking?" Cherep indirectly lied to her face brightly, suddenly abandoning his soups to bounce over and raid the furniture for the pad of paper and pen she had been using to note down current fashions she wouldn't mind for Tatiana to look over when she was off shift. "You're kind of a bear when we wake you up before you feel ready to be."

Sometimes the nurse got back at weird hours, so notes were now sometimes the best way to continue a conversation with the Sun user. Sonya did help him sort of reorder the magazines back on the coffee table to help, what she could reach from the middle of the couch, as she wondered if she wanted to know what he was lying to her about.

He'd tell her if it was that important, right?

Maybe it was just the fact she did talk to other criminal types he wasn't really a fan of?
Triad assassins and Italian Mafiosi were not his ideal criminals, from the look of things. As she couldn't blame him, she really only liked two from each group right now, the thief let it go.

(Friday the 28th of November, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Shamal eyed his mamma's Lackey oddly as he slipped up the seat across from the guy to see what he needed him for. "Why?"

"Because it is for you she's moving to Italy, and that means if you do not like where you live she will not be happy with me." Björn informed him helpfully, laying out five thick folders on the low table positioned between the Italian Mist and the Icelandic Lightning-Storm. "I would rather keep my Dama happy, if at all possible. So, if you prefer one over the other I would like to know to keep her that way when using her money for something this big."

A fair enough series of assumptions to draw, so the younger boy did pick up the first file and glance at the picture clipped to the inner part. Then he slapped it closed and flicked wide brown eyes back up at the older guy. "...it's a castle."

"...yes?" Björn helpfully gestured to all the folders, including the ones the Mist had not yet picked up. "They all are, actually. There's another pile of mansions, but I am less sure one of those may suit."

He thought his mamma had meant a small house in Italy's countryside, not a castle.

Trying not to let his imagination run wild on himself, Shamal peeled the first one open and looked over the other pictures included with the thick stack of papers. There were ten polaroids included with descriptions and the date taken scribbled on the bottom border, of the rather run down but still gigantic stone building and the included courtyards. Plural.

...this one had a stable on the grounds. His godfather would not be able to say learning horseback riding with the club sampler was a waste of time if they got horses.

Far be it for a Mist to inform another that he expected something smaller and less grandiose. If there was the possibility of a stable, they were getting a stable.

With horses.

"Who all will live here?" It would be really empty and lonely if it would just be him and mamma, and castles had staff and maids and stuff. That was really way too much for just a godmother and godchild.

The Lackey sighed heavily, reaching into his suit jacket to pull a much-creased list out and open it up for him to see the list of names.

Whatever it was wasn't entirely in Italian, English, or Cyrillic. Some were complicated spiky figures, and a few others looked like stylized houses at first glance. More or less unreadable without a bit of help, but... there were nineteen names. Some with question marks added afterwards and at least one pair of names together. "...all of them?"

"This is all family and friends, who may or may not visit or otherwise require a semi-dedicated room if not a guest one." Deadpanned the blond man simply. "This does not include whomever else might attach themselves to Dama's staff, at least three have joined in the last half a year, as well as excludes the staff the upkeep of any such building able to hold them all would require. These are merely how many rooms may be required that I know of right now."

Shamal held out a hand, getting the list passed over so he could make it make sense.

His godmother, himself, her three siblings, her parents, the Lackey across from him, Miss Galina, Mister Scruffy, Usov with the possibility of his parents depending, Miss Anna, someone named 'Mingxia', a… master? Yaozu, possibly the boy called Larion and his parents if so, Mister Renato, a guy called 'Fong', someone named Green, the greatly unlikely requirement of a 'Viper', a possibility someone named 'Ren Cai' with the less likely requirement of a set of parents or just a mother, a suit of rooms to be left for a Sky and associated Guardians if one visited or it was needed, at least five to ten guest rooms. Then the staff, whatever they might require.

...twenty-five or so names, on nineteen lines. In all actuality at least thirty or so 'semi-dedicated' or outright claimed rooms to live in. Just rooms. Not a living room, or parlor, or a library, or anything else that would be needed to live comfortably.

They'd need a butler guy, like here. At least five or so footmen, to help with cleaning the heavier things or just be hands to help a whole fleet of maids keep order. A kitchen staff, a garage maybe?

So… about twice that in assorted staff-people who might live there and need their own rooms or part of the castle to live in. Twenty to forty, depending on what else a castle came with.

Like stables, with horses.

Shamal pulled the Constructed understanding of the people listed off the paper and into the air, settling in to match what they would like and what was available to the files between the two of them. "Mamma will appreciate it if it's not just me who likes it, but I don't know some of these names. Help?"

"Of course." Bjørn reached into his case of files for yet another one, this one a much amended and heavily Mist warded that made the younger Mist sit up straight.

...that was fantastic. Shamal wanted to learn to do that. He didn't know what it was, but the mere fact it made the hairs on his arms stand up on end like they did when Miss Anna took him through her mirrors made it interesting.

"I don't know more than the basics for some of them, but I do at least know where most are from and what they consider 'modest' living… Shamal? Something wrong?"

"Nope." He made a grabbing motion for the file, getting it and carefully poking the mass of hostile Mist Flames to understand what they would do.

Immediately forgetting what he was holding likely meant whoever it was would not be nice about whatever lay under that 'forgetfulness' layer. A Constructed understanding he stored in the floating list of names reminded him what he was doing and what it was for, but also made him a lot more cautious of the file.

...of course, that also meant he was a lot more curious about it.

If he did something stupid, both his godparents would not be amused. "Who made this?"

"I did?"

"I meant the Mist Flames protecting it." Shamal clarified his question a touch exasperatedly.
"Ah… Viper did."

There was a 'Viper' on the list to have a room dedicated to him or her.

Doing the 'smart' thing would be asking or pestering the originator about how and what it did, no matter how tempted he was to just poke more at the Mist Flames leaching out of the file. His godparents would be highly unamused if he risked himself without a good solid reason for it for stupidly investigating something he knew was out of his class.

Curiosity didn't seem to be one such reason to poke at it.

Reluctantly, the younger Mist set the file down and actually looked at what it contained. "Okay, well… Mister Renato would probably like a firing range."

Bjørn snorted slightly. "Dama would likely like a big library, and maybe some hidden rooms to hold stolen books."

"Think Scruffy would like a work room? He didn't really like bending over his work on a couch, he said his back hurt doing that."

The Lackey pulled a fresh sheet of paper to make notes upon and a pen from his vest pocket, even if he had a Constructed list going already. "Him and Verde both, likely. Perhaps a few extra rooms to turn into a laboratory?"

Shamal looked at the first summary of what was included in the first castle. "...could a 'remodeled' dungeon work?"

Blinking as he pulled his head up from his list, and eyeing what the Mist had on his as 'stables' were already on that one, the man then looked at him blankly. "...good question, I don't know."
"You're being called, Nurse Tats." Cherep informed Tatiana, waving the receiver of the suite's phone at the redhead when a head popped up from the nest of blankets that migrated to the floor of the living room due to the 'sneeze danger'.

The nurse in question eyed him suspiciously for a long moment, returning her gaze downward where their rather sick little sister was curled up in a ball half on her. "So rude... why is she only cuddly when she's ill or sleeping?"

"It fits her general sense of irony."

"...hey, Cherep? Want to go into work for me?"

He eyed his older sister suspiciously himself for a long moment. "No, not really."

The Sun user pouted, batting wide blue eyes up at him. "Please...?"

"No." He refused again with a huff of a laugh, crossing the room to instead give her a hand with rearranging things so the blonde woman wouldn't startle and do her whole suspiciously-half-awake thing for an hour or so. "Come on, up lazy bones. My turn to get cuddles."

Tatiana made a rude sound as he pulled her up to her feet. "I see your dastardly plan now, you're just after the warm spot I leave behind. That way Nya clings because you're warmer than she thinks she is."

Cherep snickered, because Sonya had already stolen that 'warm spot' and shifting her out of that for himself was a fight he wasn't going to win ever. "Something like that, sure. I don't think I can do your job anyways, no Sun Flames."

Stretching now that she was off the admittedly well-padded floor, the redhead sighed heavily as she dropped her arms. "Sun Flames make up like... a tenth of what I do these days. All you'd have to do is wander after Doctor Kappel for a few hours, writing down or doing what he says and general nurse things you do perfectly well from the look of things."

"Yeah... I kind of specifically learned how to fix my own 'injuries' before they could 'heal' wrong on me." Admitted the stuntman wryly, turning his attention to how he would manage at least touch if not sight on their very grumpy and sick little sister. "Also, no. I don't like your doctor."

It would really only take one person she didn't know and feel safe near to startle the thief into taking off for somewhere else. They weren't sure if she would abandon the condo for another part of the island to seek out the 'safety' of her other friends or whoever it was she looked for when it happened, as when she curled up to Arseniy that one time. Hopefully not but then again... Sonya wasn't exactly thinking straight right now.

If she could string together a coherent thought right now, much less communicate it, he'd be pleasantly surprised.

"I'm starting to hate Cloud Voodoo, even more than I used to." Tatiana groaned out, then started actually moving to reassemble herself to leave for the hospital. "Nya did her leg some time ago, and two bullet holes. Kept her walking and her blood inside of her in a pinch, but we're not sure if the cysts she ended up with were from what cause. Her using Cloud Flames to replicate her own flesh, Storm Flames eating the bullets then the remains getting healed over, a hostile Sun healing under duress or just a tired one, or what."

Blinking at that news, the stuntman turned to eye the nurse's profile. "Cysts?"

"Slightly painful ones. So, hopefully, you've not caused yourself them if it's Cloud Flames doing it. I haven't mentioned that part to her, because belief is a stupidly tricky thing to work around sometimes." She smiled a bit weakly at him, taking a seat on the abandoned and slightly lower than normal couch that had been stripped of its' cushions to pull on a pair of loafers. "Really will appreciate it if you can stand another checkup, but I won't ask you get it done here if you don't want to. Just... somewhere. Soon please."

"Sure." Cherep promised her, because what she asked was really open to where and he was slightly curious about the answer himself. "I'll do it..."

...he wasn't entirely sure where was safe enough if not here where his medical records were something he could walk out with. He had a few crashes the last couple of years, and they did know it was somewhat easy to spot the old damage from his 'Voodoo'. A full medical check was probably overdue, but if he went to a 'civilian' doctor...

Sighing heavily, he rubbed a hand over his face. "I don't want even a 'former' Nazi to look me over, Tats. That's just too far out of my comfort zone. Someone else?"

"The doctor you first saw is still here." Tatiana volunteered easily, as if he wasn't slighting the guy she apparently learned most of her stuff from.

Which made him feel kind of like a heel, an unapologetic heel because even so he wasn't going to change his view of Nazis and anything related to that no matter what point his sisters had but he was not comfortable with the idea, so he was going to avoid anything to do with his sisters' usual doctor. "Any ladies yet?"

"Erm... one I'm pretty sure is also a practicing assassin who usually works in the maternity ward in-between kills?" Cherep pulled a face at her, the redhead just shrugged. "Sorry, slim pickings here if you want a few specific traits in your doc."

"Can you do it yet?"

The nurse pursed her lips thoughtfully, sliding a finger under her heel to slot her foot into her shoe and finish getting ready to leave. "...maybe? Let me check that out, and the procedure requirements here. They're a bit of a mess of international regulations, so it might take me a few days."

He jerked a thumb at the ball of blankets and thief that was their very sick little sister. "I have the time."

"I might have to get Kappel to sign off on it." Tatiana warned him as she snagged her sweater jacket and her purse, smiling a bit wanly when he just shrugged. "Alright then, I'll set you up for next week if possible."

"Thanks." Drawled the Cloud wryly as she left him to 'keeping the thief in place' duties, returning to contemplating how to shift his little sister so she wouldn't squirm out of his hold and 'retreat' even farther into weirder places.

The floor wasn't really all that odd, with how hard Sonya could sneeze when she was awake it was probably a better idea than a piece of furniture she had already broken the legs of sometime last
During the first time, when they had an equally sick but much younger thief, the second time she got startled by the clan’s neighborhood nurse coming around for more vaccinations and updating records… Sonya somehow out-snuck Lisa and ended up sleeping in a cabinet under the kitchen sink for a few hours before they could find her again. Cherep wasn’t up for a game of hide-n-seek with everywhere the Storm-Cloud could stuff herself comfortably, so the floor it was.

His fellow Cloud coughed weakly a few times, ending with a sneeze that wasn’t nearly earth-shaking but painful enough she flinched away from that direction for a moment as if that would help. Quickly, he dropped half on Tatiana’s abandoned spot so Sonya would end up curled into his side as she sought out her warmer previous position once the pain in her sinuses died down.

A slitted purple eye cracked open to regard him suspiciously for a long moment, meaning that unfortunately the phone ringing had woken her up somewhat and the relatively calm discussion afterwards had probably not helped to put her back to sleep.

As long as no one knocked on the door, or more stupidly entered when Tatiana had informed the vory she would greatly appreciate it if they took care of any injuries themselves and keep visitors away for the next few days, hopefully the thief wouldn’t decide to relocate herself.

Cherep thumped his head on the ground with a sigh, as Sonya squirmed closer to go back to sleep as warm as she could get with a Cloud and not a Sun providing extra body heat to leech off of.

It was almost guaranteed they would startle the thief too much eventually, trying to keep the Storm-Cloud contentedly napping through her illness was practically impossible. Especially here, with a phone connection and people his little sister didn't trust down the main hall of this half of the building.

His wonderings would probably be put to better use in figuring out where she would bolt to if someone she didn't know entered the suite.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 29th of November, 1969 continued. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"You have a call, Primakova. From someone named Bazanov."

Oh shit.

The nurse palmed her face with the hand not holding the receiver of the phone built into the nurse's station she had been asked to check in with over the PA system, hoping it wasn't about a disappearing thief. "...right, patch it through. Syndicate related."

"Noted, one second."

(Sunday the 30th of November, 1969. Renato's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

As he had specifically invested in a few security measures that couldn't be seen from outside his windows or disabled without setting them off, Renato had not expected company as he took a brief break before catching the last few hits he would do this year.
Not that it was bad company, a snuggling and leggy Russian female in his bed was a pleasant surprise to wake to, but this was not the next meeting he had expected between them.

The blonde woman contentedly napping half on him, under the covers of his bed, also proved he either needed to update his security or figure out how the fuck she got in quickly. As well as a wonder to puzzle over how he hadn't woken up to her crawling in beside him and note the fact he was probably overdue for a little distraction of the female persuasion if he had unconsciously no problem with one joining him in his bed.

Running a few fingers of his free hand through his messy hair, the hitman wondered if he was annoyed or just surprised. Or annoyed he was surprised.

He had asked she leave the brat out of it if she ever crawled into his bed, and Sonya was frank enough to take that as an open invitation from the look of things. Technically she had the permission to do this, but he would really like to know why she was in his bed at all… possibly pregnant or not.

She coughed weakly into his sheets, curling up tighter against him as a shiver racked up her spine. The cough was probably explainable, she smoked rather frequently when she was bored or irritated and that lifestyle choice did hold obvious drawbacks. Shivering, on a tropical island curled up to a user of Dying Will Flames of the Sun, should be fucking impossible.

As a matter of fact, Renato was a bit overheated right now and he was practically buck naked. "Little dragon lady," a few pokes to her bare left arm, lacking even the chains she normally set her jewelry weaponry upon, earned him a cracked open violently light purple eye, "…okay then."

Apparently, he would be sleeping in today.

There was nothing coherent in the Soviet Storm-Cloud's thoughts, aside a mild annoyance and some vague recognition. An ache was starting up, likely she had a headache or something and he was now picking up on it as she recognized the feeling and sort of acknowledged it, but other than all that there was only a dragging tired feeling and a nearly sensual appreciation for heat he gave off.

Already half closed to start with, the thief merely shut her eye and shoved her face into his chest to go back to sleep without a word.

He'd seen sick Clouds before, while the general irritability and the utter reluctance to do anything but get comfortable and sleep it out was pretty much par for the course with them… being sociable while so ill wasn't in their natures. Self-indulgence was the order of the cure for them and getting them to share even a blanket from their little nests would be like pulling a dragon's tooth.

Pun fully intended.

Sonya had a Sun user to cuddle with if she wanted in her odd ways. Her sister, who may or may not be working. While missing that kind of shared body heat was understandable if the other Sun felt charitable about her ill sister's condition, it didn't explain why the younger woman walked half the island in the middle of the night to find him for more if she wanted it.

Without even a miniaturized polearm on her for the protection.

Without anything on her from the looks of it, and barefoot from what he could feel. A tank top and hopefully a pair of form-fitting shorts was not what one should wear out and about in the middle of the night around here… or the early morning hours.
Sick Storms weren't all that much better than Clouds in being grumpy and a pain in the ass, but they generally tried staying awake if miserable for the entire time they were ill and ensured everyone around them felt equally as bad as they did. If they would admit it getting into the way of their lives. Being ill usually screwed with whatever they were fanatical about and made them more and more bitchy as they oh so sourly waited out the sickness until they could get back to it.

Obviously, she was pulling hard on the more Cloud side of her Flames than her Storm right now… but there was something else going on for this sneak-cuddle session to happen.

Frankly, social cuddling when sick was more a thing he would've expected out of a decently powerful Sun user. About half of his Flame type overly Activated whatever it was making them ill as well as their own immune systems, leaving off the internal energy burning that normally kept them at higher than 'normal' base temperatures and so active. Even minor colds tended to become exaggerated for a shorter period of time most other were sick with the same, and it made them uncomfortably cold after so long being overly warm…

No wonder Sonya was all over the charts in behavior. A Hard Cloud, bit of Soft Storm, and likely with a touch of Hard or Soft Sun to top it off. A powerful loner that liked strong things and scorned the weak or useless, with obsessive traits over 'her' few things, that could be sociable more than normal.

The woman was a Flame user's mutt. Currently a sick mutt, who would be both self-indulgent and utterly unrepentant about cuddling whomever she wanted right now.

…who might or might not be pregnant and sick.

The hitman knew perfectly well she didn't use her third Flame type, ever. He'd been looking for years if she had, and she had to seek out his or her sister's help for injuries still. Wouldn't matter how apparently strong or weak those secondary types showed up as, as long as she could use one the rest were actually that strong as well.

Equally a strong Sun as she was a Cloud or Storm would explain this sneak-attack-cuddle thing. Unwilling to verbalize a weakness for another's presence but ornery enough to take it anyways, only for the people she liked and sought out for socialization when the whim hit her. Likely a Soft Sun like him then, if it wasn't a facet of her Hard Cloud Flames messing with any assumptions that could be drawn about it.

That would also explain why she kept wearing gold jewelry to the Balls. A touch of Sun Flames, a touch of gold on top of her dress color.

Renato slapped his free hand over his face, irritated she had slid that under his nose for two years now. She hadn't even been coy about it, blatantly wearing all her 'allowed' colors and letting others think what they would about how she color-coordinated herself. Gold jewelry with purple stones paired with a red dress the first time, similarly gold jewelry with red stones worn with a purple dress the next.

His front door opened not too much longer later after that exasperating realization, setting off the clatter of a bell he had nailed just over the lip of the doorway to ring if anyone opened it even an inch. Which made Sonya start, those still purple eyes opening up again to fix unerringly on the bedroom door suspiciously.

Voices speaking Russian, a male asking if it was really okay to just break into a hitman's apartment like this and a more recognizable response from the Sun using nurse who claimed the woman in his arm as a sister dismissing the issue as long as they were smart about it, at least meant he likely didn't "need the gun tucked away between the bed frame and the wall. "Tatiana, did you happen to lose someone?"

"…oh good, she's here. And we're not going to get shot."

"…yay."

"Oh shut up, Cherep. It could've been worse, she could've ended up under a bar table somewhere else on the island." Tatiana snipped back at the other voice, loudly walking through the apartment and opening the bedroom door with a flourish just to give her little sister a highly unamused look. "I'm severely tempted to let her wake up here, then maybe she'll start believing us when we say she wanders when sick and someone she doesn't know enters where she's at."

"…this is a new one to me too." Renato admitted blandly, glancing from the woman in his bed to the one framed in his doorway and regretting the situation if not the utterly lovely view. Redheaded nurse in her work uniform heading to his bed, barely dressed thief… more interested in his body heat than his body but he'll take what he could get from that corner. Unfortunately spoiled by the highly unimpressed scowl worn by the brother as he followed his older sister into the hitman's bedroom.

The Italian Mafioso was well acquainted with his luck, but sometimes it was equally as shitty as it was a blessing and that needed a moment of thought occasionally. "Does this happen often, then?"

"Not really. This is like… the third time ever she's bolted while sick." His fellow Sun informed him with a tired smile. "I didn't know you were back, tall, dark, and snarky. Otherwise I would've caught you for a word about this. Thank you for not shooting her either."

"So… not often enough to have a general idea what she's doing." Concluded the still prone man thoughtfully, ignoring the implied 'did you catch her at it' question, rubbing Sonya's back to lull her back into a nap or something with the hand attached to the arm she was laying on. "How did it happen if you, if not she, was aware it is a possibility?"

"The condo has maids, they do a twice a year deep clean of the place even if we're there or not."

"Sloppy."

"I'm aware, thank you." Tatiana sniffed, nettled at the criticism, as she sat on the edge of his bed to check over the thief still not napping anymore but getting there if a bit more time was spent with nothing happening. "Someone moved out, they were early this year and with the normal schedule they should've been another day or two before reaching our floor."

Depending on the security and how easy or hard it would be to know if anyone sold their quarter, half, or full floor of their condo building it was an easily understandable mistake. Renato hadn't been able to get Tatiana's floor or the name of her syndicate while stalking her before they had been introduced, so the hitman let that slide. "How long until she's… less sick?"

"Erm, about a day or more? She should stop being so zombie-like soon, but she'll still fall asleep if you let her for probably a day after even that." As a less powerful Sun, the nurse could and did take a general temperature by hand. She frowned prettily, looking thoughtful as she then felt up the neck right under little sister's jawline. "Her fever broke, so likely a few more hours before she starts actually recognizing people. Maybe half a day to graduate to half-assed responses to anything spoken in her direction."

The older Russian sister was wondered why her little sister did this kind of thing, in sheer exasperation.

Well, as he could relieve her mind a little, he informed her the usual responses and what her mutt of a little sister's Flame types modified the 'usual' behaviors for miserably sick Dying Will Flame users into.

"I haven't noticed that. The over Activation." Mused the busty nurse thoughtfully, petting her sister's hair once before withdrawing her hand. "I knew you were stronger than me… maybe Avdotya's run into it by now, but I didn't think she was stronger than me. She's never gotten the hang of her Sun Flames."

"That really matters little with split-Flames. It all comes from the same pool of willpower, as long as one Flame type is 'that' strong the rest are too. She's a damn good Cloud user, so while not as strong as say… me, she's really a more powerful Sun than you are."

Soviet methods for Flame development seemed more geared to getting the weaker users up to a moderately useful level across the board, rather than focusing on the standout examples and what they could develop further into. Different than the European standards, where if you weren't exceptional it was almost mundane to have Flames than anything to boast of. A different method than an encouragement for baby or weak Sun Flame users might help Sonya more than trying to repeat what works for the mass majority, and Renato fairly itched to help her develop her own Sun Flames a little.

"Well, if she could only use it maybe we wouldn't have the same issue as we did earlier this month." Not remotely insulted to hear it or even sour over being out-performed by her little sister in her own Flame type, just wryly exasperated which meant there was likely an interesting story behind that, Tatiana leaned back while still having her ass perched on his bed to give him a very promising smile. "Can you spare us a day, tall, dark, and snarky? We probably really should ensure she knows she does this kind of thing, and you're probably the best evidence we can give her."

"What happened earlier this month?" Asked the hitman instead of buy the bait in her smirk, well aware what his fellow Sun was angling for in that and not biting.

"I'm pretty sure," interrupted Cherep a bit blandly, shooting his older sister a look, "that abandoning her in a man's bed she's not expecting to wake up in is not something we should be doing. Because we specifically told her I was here to keep her from breaking or otherwise burning things while sick, while also trying to keep this kind of thing from happening."

The Italian Mafioso snorted. "Already failed a bit there, didn't you?"

A glare shot at him through naturally purple eyes was about as adorable as a fully-grown cat's reproachful look for spooking it, and not intimidating in the least. "I was trying to get her a glass of water so she's not so achy waking up after nearly twenty-four hours of straight sleep. If you don't have sight or touch on her and she decides where she is isn't as safe as she likes, she disappears in a blink. You try catching a thief of her skill level before she can bolt from you."

Ah… unlucky for him.

Rolling his eyes, because he had tried that very thing and knew how hard it was to catch her when she didn't want to be and was feeling perfectly fine, he looked back at the sister simply sitting by as that digression occurred. "I can spare a day, I have some maintenance to do anyways before I pick up a few more hits to do. I rather wanted to speak to her myself sometime soon, but that can certainly wait a few weeks if she doesn't wake up by then."
"I'll leave you Cherep to run errands." That warning given, Tatiana shot him a smirk and stood up to face her utterly unhappy brother. "Sorry, little brother. But really something she should learn before catching something out and about in the world instead of near family."

"Yeah… but does it have to be the hitman?"

"Could be an assassin instead." Pointed out the nurse pragmatically, earning an even more disgusted look for the point. "Or she could stuff herself under her favorite bar's countertop and surprise the hell out of some poor bartender."

Renato snorted with amusement. "Am I the best of bad options, then?"

"Pretty much." Tossed his fellow Sun user over a shoulder brightly, waving a hand as she left the room. "Play nice, boys. I've got to work until about seven, we'll move her back around then if she doesn't wake up even halfway."

The hitman and the stuntman eyed each other as she left the apartment, re-locking the door without the key. "Wallet's on the dresser. There's a corner convenience store about two streets south of us, I don't have anything for someone sick."

Eyeing the folded billfold of leather, he shrugged instead and turned on a heel. "I'll get it, we were running low anyways."

Eh, it got the man out of his apartment. Renato kind of needed a pair of pants before he was getting out of bed when he had company over.

…although, getting out of bed when he had a still shivering thief clutching weakly at his rib cage would be interesting. Sonya was also still half-aware, meaning he let go and it was possible she’d decide to bolt on him too.

Hmm… issues.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 30th of November, 1969 continued. Renato's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

"…there is a branch of theology actually devoted to just that. Jus ad bellum and jus in bello, the 'right to go to war' and the other 'right conduct within war' which is less important for your question." Renato's voice drawled somewhat far away but still audibly, making Sonya wonder what the hell the Mafioso was doing in a drowsy way. "With Christianity and the Mafia's 'soldier' ranks, most things were taken from that first one. It goes all the way back to ancient Rome, got clarified through at least two major Saints if not countless more minor ones, and clearly states what we Catholic Christians should keep in mind when it comes to committing violence and the conduct we take with it."

"But you're mafia. Criminals. You're not going to war, you're just killing people." Cherep pointed out, honestly confused to the point just anyone would be able to pick up on it so he was either being honestly curious and trying not to piss someone off or just being polite.

The dork.

Her sinuses were clogged, and her head felt stuffed of cotton, pressing the heel of her hand against the very top of the bridge of her nose slightly did relieve some of internal pressure.

"For the purpose of your question, the illegality of criminals overall isn't really the issue. That there is a proper authority making the calls for violence is, and that would be the Dons and the few other organizations' heads. If we were to take that criminal and unlawful behavior as the only criteria to be concerned with, we'd end up in another Mafia War before long. Which, thankfully, isn't the point of jus ad bellum."

"So, what is?"

The thief cracked an eye open, then shut it hurriedly. Too bright, and it made her headache worse.

"That violence, as long as it is directed by a recognized authority for more than just personal gains and preferably to protect the lives they are responsible for, is not against Christian doctrine. 'Thou shalt not kill' is a mistranslation of the original verses made by King James. It should really translate more to 'you shall not murder', where 'murder' means the deliberate and willful taking of innocent human life by the usage of the term that far back." Continued the hitman in an honestly not entirely prissy manner but certainly a lecturing tone of voice, the clatter of something metal on something not sounding only just loud enough to be heard through walls and whatever distance. "No one in the Mafia can be called 'innocent', so that really doesn't pertain to us. The phrase 'old Testament' is a reference for harsh things for a reason. Christianity has an entire list of violent punishments and retributions allowed by it for various crimes, not to mention how often someone's killed in the Bible for various wrong doings."

"Okay… I have another possibly insulting question."

"Oh, for fuck's sake. Now what?"

"How is a 'hit' not for personal gain?"

Blinking a few times warily, Sonya finally got the idea it was sort of late afternoon and that really was not her ceiling as she adjusted to the light streaming through the window.

Pausing, she tried to peer at the very different than expected feature through an eye that felt gritty and sore.

…why was it not her ceiling?

"…because I am not the one ordering these hits for any 'beneficial' reason, while I do get paid for it that would apply even to a 'legal' executioner. The limit of my personal responsibility is to ensure the innocent civilians are not unduly bothered by my work, and that I do not willfully engage in violence for just my own gains in territory or personal power. Beyond that, it's over my pay grade to bother about. I don't have the scope, often I don't know the situation or people involved, I have to take it on faith the ones ordering a hit on someone else have a reason beyond the obvious 'wanting someone dead' part."

"What if they're not guilty?"

"What if they really good at hiding their attraction to and abduction of young school girls?" Countered Renato in a bitingly sarcastic tone. "If I was unable to validate that on the surface, or even with a passive glance through a target's usual daily life, and let him live instead of kill him because I doubt my orders…?"

Cherep made an aggravated noise that ended in a heavy sigh. "Okay, discounting the actual crimes. Hitmen take hits on actual members of the mafia, if you were to get a hit for one person of note of another organization who is an 'upstanding' Mafioso just in someone's way, then what?"

"Hitmen are not people you hire lightly for frivolous reasons, especially not Catholic ones." Pointed out the man who was suffering through his entire job description and his religion being questioned rather patiently for his type of Flame user, causing the listening thief to also start wondering why the two of them were wasting some time talking about this. "Discounting any personal responsibility I have to ensure I am hired for an actual reason aside the money, and yes sometimes doing one's job well is just enough of a reason to have a hit placed on you, doing that would invite a hostile Don to spread the news so that first one is 'condemned' for the waste of life for selfish reasons. There's nothing deeper than criminal ranks, no way to 'get around' that kind of shunning or slight, so if you waste the lives you're responsible for or someone else is responsible for like that you won't be getting more and it's more likely you'll lose the ones you do have. Pointless territorial war for the aim of gain is against Christian doctrine when it comes to violence, and more would help that second Don and abandon the first if that happens. And I do mean when it happens, it's not entirely out of the question to be hired to help out a little in those situations. Against 'evil' is a whole different kettle of fish, but depending on the situation we are that evil."

There was a pause, longer than just for speaking naturally, which allowed the Storm-Cloud to investigate and conclude it really wasn't her ceiling because this wasn't her room. It was Renato's, which did explain what the hitman was doing talking with her brother about Christian theology and being mafia at the same time… but… why?

Why was she here, and why were they talking about it?

Well, no. There was a why they'd talk about it, but the asshole puts her off to speak with a mafia priest but will answer her brother's questions?

"...so, in terms of Shamal, murder isn't against your Bible or religion and if he follows your path to become a hitman there won't be a crisis of faith we're going to have to somehow deal with?"

Oh.

...he was still an asshole.

"There is a lot of murder in the good book, for various reasons. If we went by the Biblical laws alone blasphemy, sex out of marriage, and even picking up sticks on Sunday is something punished by the death sentence. The point of being both a Catholic Christian and a killer is not as divorced as most these days seem to think. Christianity has been around for nearly two thousand years now through a lot of war and various ages, and if Shamal decides to become a hitman as well the values of a Catholic really do not shift all that far for him. He will no longer be an 'innocent civilian' and required to be well aware of the consequences of his actions taken even on behalf of those he does not know of in positions of authority, but there are not any major issues reconciling the two states that you or your sisters need to be aware of."

A nearly silent creak, probably her brother leaning against something not entirely solid because Renato preferred walls or entirely solid things for his hanging about, and a clink of something not metal on something equally as hard. "Good to know… I guess."

"That's it? I thought you were a pacifist. Shouldn't you be yelping about how that's not 'right'?

"I am a pacifist, who has two absolutely shameless and murderous sisters and a Soviet Russian vor for a foster father. That's not touching my foster mother, the others I grew up with, or my siblings' own contacts. I also know several other criminal types not from Russia as well as had a short stint in your lifestyle myself." Cherep countered a touch tartly. "I dislike violence, I hate it in fact. You're a lot of hard headed, often times arrogant, and entirely convinced the way you work is the way you need to work kind of people. 'Mafia' diplomacy is probably the hardest subject to wrap one's head around, especially when the 'other side' refuses to listen to any points you might have without something" either sharp or just deadly aimed at their heads. I may not like it, but it is and what's around me. Ignoring that would hurt a lot of people, not just me."

…aw, he listened to her even if he didn't like what she said.

Sonya explored if she could get up without falling to the floor of the hitman's bedroom, because she felt as if she deserved a hug for that minor feat of convincing argument making. Mostly because she just felt like getting one, but a little bit for getting him to not dismiss all violence as all generally 'bad' and at least consider why people reached for it.

As it turned out, no. She wasn't up for standing just yet.

"Ho? Arrogant, am I?"

"Aren't you?"

"…point." Something heavier than whatever he was fussing with before was set down on something also hard and able to make noise, and someone started moving around more than they had before. "I believe your sister is now awake."

Cherep didn't bother with keeping his steps silent, he knew how but it wasn't something he practiced often. Heavy footfalls started growing louder, so the thief just perched on the edge of Renato's bed.

Sonya, still with one eye closed and terribly confused why they were here, gave her brother a fuzzy look as he entered the room. "…um."

The smirk that crawled across his face was both good and bad. Good in that it was fond, but bad in that it was a tiny touch wry on the wrong end to be a positive expression. "Good afternoon to you too, Nya. Not really a fan of where you picked to recover, but I guess he's not that bad."

Where she…?

"You should probably also say 'hi' to your host," continued the stuntman in an overly patient tone, "as well as apologize for crawling into his bed… while he was still in it."

The thief thought about it.

Hug, and be forced to deal with that before she could get her mind to work at least halfway, or sleep, and be able to ignore whatever he wanted her to think about for at least a couple more hours. She glanced from him to the hitman's pillow and back again, trying to judge how much she could possibly get away with before he got that prickly annoyed with her.

"Oh no you don't. You've slept through almost two days now, or really a day and a half but who's counting? You need to get up and at least eat something." Putting motion to his words, her utterly unfair brother caught her arm and shoved a hand under her still entangled knees to pull her up to his arms.

Annoyed, Sonya figured a hug and a nap on him would work perfectly well.

"That's not going to work either." He informed her brightly enough to make her cringe, tugging the sheets she was tangled up in off the bed so she had something to keep warm with then waltzing right out the bedroom he invaded so abruptly. "Look who's awake!"

Renato cocked an utterly unimpressed eyebrow at the man as he fixed himself something she still couldn't scent yet with a blocked nose. More than likely coffee, given who it was. "Oh dear, I ...could she get some of that?

Cherep rudely dropped her on the middle of the couch, sheet and all. After the first bounce she immediately fell over because she hadn't expected that, and the thief blinked blankly back up at him as soon as the world stopped spinning.

Which revealed nothing because her fellow Cloud didn't even have the decency to remain still for her to muster up the willpower to glare at.

Sonya contemplated if he would up his level of annoying-ness if she tried to curl up and nap some more.

Probably, but did she care?

"Please eat something." Tried her brother when she finally managed to pin a glare on him, holding something bowl-shaped with a colorful film wrapped around it as he stepped back into view. "Please? For me?"

"I just wanted a hug."

...holy fuck did it sound like something died in her throat.

It did make Cherep pause, looking between whatever was in his hands and back at her. "Fine. I want you to eat, you want a hug. I propose a trade... you eat, and I'll hug you while you do so."

Hmm... as long as she got something down he'd still hug her, the softy. Holding out a limp hand was all she really needed to do to signify her 'agreement', and not really having the energy to do more than that made even eating something sound strenuous.

The stuntman disappeared to handle the... whatever he was doing, and Renato peered over the back of the couch and eyed her suspiciously. "So... alive yet?"

"...ow."

"I bet." With an amused huff, the asshole she called a friend looked up and over some ways. "How long until she's coherently awake enough to hold a conversation?"

"Eh... that'll take a few more hours. We thought this part was the end, but it was really the point she decided she didn't like being checked up on by a local nurse and stuffed herself under the kitchen sink for a few more hours of uninterrupted sleep."

"...Renato? When did you get here?"

"I live here, little dragon lady." Drewled the casually dressed hitman a touch sarcastically, ignoring her real question of when he got back on the island, flicking a wrist at something she probably had to turn her head to see so that wasn't going to be done. He eyed her with more amusement, now smirking rather broadly. "Lazy little thing, aren't you?"

"...ow." Sonya repeated a touch huffily, somehow mustering a bit of elbow grease to at least pull herself up the couch and recline on a conveniently placed couch arm.

Even her lungs hurt, to go with a headache that might be caused by dehydration, and her sinuses were in the process of draining. If she sneezed his coffee into his face, served him right.
Renato sharply pulled away from her, cradling his mug suspiciously far outside of her sight.

"I stole some of your coffee." Cherep announced as if that wasn't damn near impossible to do…

...wait, there was probably a pot of it made so he wasn't talking about the mug in the other man's hand.

Said brother also fussed with the things around her, to the point she badly lost track of what was going on. Somehow that ended up with Sonya wrapped in the sheet and sitting sideways on his lap, with something hot pressed into her hands. As that hot something was coffee by the look of things, she didn't greatly care about anything else.

"Do me a favor?" When a disinterested hum sounded the man she was sitting on who had her wrapped up in a hug as promised continued. "Sit on the other end. If Nya sneezes like this, it's likely she'll break your couch."

"...please tell me you're joking."

"Nope. Think about it. As strong as she can be, a volume of air forcibly pushed out a small opening with basically a seizure of her diaphragm…? Her getting hiccups is a riot of laughs too, especially when she's the size to comfortably fit under someone's chin."

There was a beat of silence, then the Sun user being talked to rounded the couch and sat on the requested end of the furniture. With an expression that was likely translated to mean pained amusement, slouched over the other couch arm to protect his coffee mug, and warily eyeing the both of them. "If this wasn't so God-damned amusing I'd probably be horrified."

Sonya literally could not care. There was coffee, her brother, a hug, and the likelihood of a nap on him if the hitman kept distracting her seat. Everything else could go fuck off for a couple more hours.

...coffee was a stimulant. Cherep was probably counting on it to keep her awake long enough to force whatever was in that bowl down her throat.

Fuck.

"Not the sharpest tack in the morning, is she?"

"Nope."

She mulishly glared at the both of them over her cup of coffee and milk.

(Monday the 1st of December, 1969. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

"It's at least a little funny."

"Shut up, Tats."

Ignoring her grouchy little sister, because being still somewhat sick and forced to accept the admittedly slightly bewildering habit of running off while sick to cuddle really strong men it was entirely understandable why she was so, the nurse shoved a likely candidate for a dress style across the kitchen table.
Sonya glanced at it, winced, and went back to her own magazine. "That looks more like she is wearing half a hardware store, no."

Well, if it was the metal she was objecting to...

Tatiana flipped the pages back a way and showed her little sister a different dress. One that admittedly was made out of normally not worn materials and had an interesting gap in a few… broad sections. Including most of the upper body.

"While you may be able to pull that off, I do not have your chest." Pointed out the groggy and grumpy Storm-Cloud, ignoring the fact you could pretty much see the model's entire upper body sans a diamond shape keeping her 'cleft' concealed… and nothing else. "Please no."

Her only complaint about it was not having the chest to pull the dress off, not that it was about the same as going topless.

Really. Poor tall, dark, and snarky.

If that was fashionable this year, she kind of dreaded where 'shocking' fashion trends would go in the near future when and if it coincided with her little sister's idea of acceptable fashions. "Okay, but most seems to be of the order of 'shapeless bags' or 'eye gouging' colors. Or worse yet, your category of 'that material should not be composing a dress'."

The grey eyed blonde shot her a sour look, then another unhappier look at the glossy papers they were bent over. "Why, exactly, am I pandering to the ideas of what other people consider fashionable? I do not share their tastes, obviously."

"Because." Shot back the redhead. "Most of this will change in like, a season. Try something new for once."

Admittedly, not the best argument for getting a touchy and more often than not irreverent Storm-Cloud to go along with something she didn't like. It was the best Tatiana could come up with right now, because some of these were admittedly a touch strange.

"Norell put out a new dress?"

Sonya, already disgruntled, grumpy, and not happy at all, did glance over. The disgusted look was expected.

A sequined bodice and sleeves would never get even a grudging acceptance from her picky little sister. Which was kind of understandable, the thief would probably shed or rip those sequence off over the course of the night without knowing it.

"You might have to just commission a dress, at this rate." Tatiana offered idly. Flipping through the amassed fashion magazines to find something without feathers, beads, metal plates, plastic discs, large amounts of fur, or anything else her sister would veto at a glance was always hard. "How about this?"

"...that is a bathrobe." Pointed out the Storm-Cloud slowly.

"It is not..." Trailing off after a second good look at the dress, the Sun had to admit she could see why the other woman made the conclusion she had. "...it just looks like a bathrobe."

A black-and-white image of a white dress made it hard to tell.
"Okay, well. If you don't want to just buy something, then what you're left with is... pantsuits, I guess. Long sleeves, short knee-length skirt if not pants, and the more fabric the better."

Sonya eyed her, then the pile of magazines, then sighed and basically tipped over to ignore the entire mess. "No, then I have a better idea than what is currently 'fashionable.'"

"Oh really?" Challenged the older sister curiously.

"I was in China not too long ago." The younger sister informed the couch cushions in a bland tone, not bothering to right herself. "I wore a Vietnamese áo dài for that, which basically fits your criteria. A few alterations to the 'traditional' dress, and I can wear one of those instead of hunt through European fashions for something that will not irritate me."

"What's a áo dài?"

"...do you know what a qípáo is?"

"Not a clue." Tatiana admitted brightly, settling in to hear what facet of fashion she hadn't known of before.

Sonya actually moved her head to give her a look, telling her non-verbally that the Storm-Cloud suspected she was pulling her leg. "Fong wears a changshan, okay? Jacket and pants kind of thing?"

"Right."

"A female's equivalent is known as a cheongsam, or a qípáo. Think more form fitting without pants, and long enough to count as a long cocktail dress. Knee or calf length. Generally, as far as I have seen them in the styles worn lately, they do not have sleeves either. Maybe something just long enough to work as a capped sleeve, but that is it."

"Sounds cute."

"An áo dài is similar, except they have form fitting long sleeves and have a split in their floor length or likewise skirt up to the waist. Because of that, loose and baggy pants are worn underneath."

"...pretty sure I'm not doing your explanation justice." Admitted the Sun using nurse wryly, tossing her magazine to the coffee table to join the piles of 'rejected' fashions. "Can you sketch it? Actually, can you draw?"

Her little sister looked equally as confused as Tatiana was curious. "...I have no idea. I can draw lines, and copy things, but I do not think I can draw without something to copy. I almost tried with my left hand, but my right healed up before I could get to that."

"Can't hurt to try." She declared grandly, because it was something to do and if the Storm-Cloud could then they'd have a sketch to show a seamstress to make into reality tomorrow. "Stay there, I'll get some paper and pencils."

"Ha, ha." Sonya deadpanned bitchily, scowling after her as she wandered off to find them something to work with.

She'd have to run out to find some, she knew perfectly well she didn't have anything suitable anymore now her 'classes' were over and she had the international equivalent of a GED or O-Level certificate. Cherep had taken the opportunity to nap in their little sister's room, recovering from the panic the disappearing sick Storm-Cloud had caused them and the rush to figure out where she went before someone not particularly nice stumbled upon her, and while the thief was good for paper... not so much for pencils.

At least her little sister finally accepted the fact she did run off if spooked while sick, which may or may not put any kind of dent on her future wanderings.

She should write a note and stick it to Sonya's back after the next round of vaccinations.

...or get her little sister a collar and identification tags inscribed with a phone number to call if she wasn't really responsive enough to explain herself. Maybe with a bell.

---

(Wednesday the 10th of December, 1969. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Cherep smirked wryly at the deadpan look his little sister shot him. "Now, remember. No pulling your collar off."

"This is unnecessary." Sonya hissed irritably, touching the length of leather then removing her hand before their older sister could slap at it.

"You failed to come up with a better idea, sucks to be you." Tatiana announced bluntly, ordering her two bottles of liquid on a desk next to the needles she would be using.

The littlest Russian in the room outright sulked, ripping the third bell they had attached to her 'sick collar' and tossing it none too gently into the wastebasket. It lodged into the painted brick walls instead, right behind the wire frame of the basket.

"It could be worse." The stuntman pointed out wryly. "We could try chaining you to a bed."

"I could immediately head back to Moscow." Sonya tossed back huffily, shooting her elder sister a seething look for the first of two jabs she had to get to finally catch up on her vaccinations.

"Do so. Then we'll know you'll head immediately to Arseniy instead."

Cherep and Tatiana exchanged a set of amused looks as a tiny tinge of red suddenly spread across the bridge of their little sister's nose.

Sonya dropped her face into her hands. "...fuck."

"Yes, yes you really did ambush him on the couch and decide that was where you wanted to spend a few good hours napping. Practically half hugging his hip." The nurse informed her gleefully, extracting the second dose of the inoculations to give next. "Scared the hell out of Lisa when you weren't where you should be."

"Of course, the second time you decided to take a nap under the kitchen sink. We spent four hours looking for you." Tacked on the stuntman dryly, ignoring the dirty look the thief was trying to give the both of them to shut them up. "Lisa fretted about you running off into the night and everything, Arseniy even checked the attic and was in the middle of planning to get the other vory out looking for you when Tats tried to go for more dish soap... then you rolled out from the cabinet under it instead."

"You both are not helping." Announced the thief flatly.

"Hopefully," Tatiana offered in a less amused tone fiddling with the used needles to disassemble and throw away, "it's the flu shot. That's twice now it's made you… wander off. Which probably means you should always get a shot every year. If that's your reaction to a weakened form of the influenza virus, I'd hate to see what happens when you get the full-blown flu."

"So, what are these?"

"Pretty sure your Polio and pneumococcal vaccines are still good, you got a new dose of DTP and the new MMR for combination coverage of various others the last round with the flu shot. This is a new meningococcal vaccine and the inoculation against chickenpox, and now you're all caught up."

"Joy." Deadpanned the blonde flatly.

(Saturday the 13th of December, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Upon noticing that his usual ways were blocked by the mansion-wide cleaning efforts, Tyr made a detour he took less often to get to Daniella's parlor.

The Head of the Varia Independent Assassination Squad took it less often because it made him more noticeable to general traffic and made it possible to hail him by the Ninth’s Guardians.

Not that he had any issue with the Ninth Generation of Vongola, he just preferred the Eighth and the teams they had survived the Mafia Wars as well as a World War with, and a partial invasion.

Hard to create that kind of bond with another when there wasn't a war or three going on to provide the fires to be tempered within.

Contemplating how to avoid another such blockade in the future, perhaps dropping a word to housekeeping to stagger their cleaning efforts a small bit, Tyr passed three groups of maids and two footmen. Causing two pails of dirty water to be dropped and a young man to fumble his broom.

The other reason the assassin avoided the more 'accessible' parts of Vongola's Iron Fort, the unintended delays and scares his presence caused others. Having cultivated a reputation of being the very last thing quite a number of people saw ensured his time was not wasted often for petty reasons but did somewhat impact the reception he received by those less confident in themselves.

...and the Stupid.

"Tyr! Whoa, whoops. Sorry!" Jogging with a bit more haste than called for indoors, Ganauche slipped on the water spilled on hardwood floors and nearly crashed into a wall on his blind side.

Scrambling to catch up with the politely paused Sword Emperor, the Lightning huffed and puffed to show more than enough of the side effects of not doing his physical conditioning. As that might still be medically involved, due to his eye and the coordination moving with one eye being more of a cause of concern yet still, Tyr didn't point out how unfit the Lightning Guardian was becoming.

He thought it though, taking it into account for the upcoming Christmas Ball and what amendments security would need to account for a less than fit Guardian if there would be three Skies attending. Four, if rumors were true.

"So… do you know when that Lackey guy's going to clear off?" Ganauche inquired a bit breathlessly.

Well, it was security-related and certainly something to check into. The assassin nodded shortly as he continued on his way with a distraction at hand to reassure the help he was not there to kill them. "Young Lackey Björn will remain only long enough to confirm his orders with his patron before leaving us. As Sinclair will be escorting her to the Ball again, this might be the best possible place to await her arrival."

"Possible?"

Pausing, Tyr glanced to the side to see if the Lightning really was that blind. "...she might decide to scorn Vongola hospitality again for a local hotel instead."

Ganauche blinked back at him with his lone remaining eye. "Tyr, the hotels are all booked."

"That is assuming the Lackey did not reserve one for her already, under different or assumed names for privacy we do not know of."

"He's currently sleeping in a bed and breakfast, not someplace you put someone you frequently refer to as 'my lady'... who's also buying a castle for her godchild in a native land not her own."

"That," pointed out the assassin patiently, "does not give any credence to the argument if he reserved a hotel room for her or not. Just that he saw no reason to rent and live out of one himself."

The Lightning paused mid-stride to wrap his mind around that.

Tyr was forced to follow suit again and suffer yet another delay to his day.

He almost couldn't wait to see what Soviet Lightnings were like. The Icelandic Lackey a particularly interesting specimen of a Soviet Storm-Cloud caught hold of was an equally interesting mix of Storm and Lightning behaviors, without the irritating habit of baseless assumptions and targeted blindness.

Hopefully, 'shocking' examples of Flame users without a few of the bad habits of their types excused for various reasons would improve the quality of what was native to Italia.

Lightnings that got distracted and investigated whatever caught their attentions thoroughly were all fine enough, Lightnings specifically trained to annoy their targets into attacking or killing them was just Stupid. That was not a sign of ultimate guilt, but a sign of limited patience, and a waste of a… person.

"So… you have no idea when he's leaving?"

The Head of the Varia gave the man a pointed look that seemed to have no impact whatsoever. "The twenty-first. Following their usual habits, Sinclair and Nikishina will be present in Italia the weekend preceding the Ball. Which will be the twentieth this year, if not the twenty-first due to traveling delays. Young Lackey Björn only requires an hour at most of her time and plans to finish his duties in country immediately afterwards."

"Is that a guess or a fact?" Wondered Ganauche.

Tyr regarded him for a long moment, then strode on without the Lightning Guardian.

Perhaps the point was annoying details out of a target more than trying to implicate another in the murder of a Lightning belonging to someone else.

If so, the Lightnings of Europe were even worse off than he had believed.

Leaving his distraction behind did create two more hazards to be cleaned up, his unexpected arrival nearly tripping up a footman balancing on a ladder attempting to string garlands through the main reception hall's chandelier and his fellow more sensibly doing the decoration of the staircases' banisters alone. One merely accidentally kicked a box of decorations, the other nearly fell to his death.

Catching the wobbling ladder before it could tip over, Tyr waited just long enough for his supposed spotter cheating his fellow out of support in favor of haste in their duties to gather his wits and replace him.

By then, he was already more than ten minutes late for his appointment with Lady Daniella.

Glaring at the foolish footman would likely not help anyone but strand him more until the one mounted on a ladder could descend, so he merely made note to report the hasty one as such.

Not three hallways later, he ran into the Ninth Generation Rain Guardian. Schnitten Brabanters was probably trying to assist the decoration efforts yet was making more of a nuisance of himself in the end.

Glass wax window decorations were something they recently imported from the American States and seemed perfectly suitable to decorate the large ceiling to floor windows of the ground floor with. As it was a general cleaner that just appeared and remained white for days, but the Rain was having some issues getting his stenciled images to his satisfaction.

The maids he was working with had already finished most of the hallway windows and were waiting on him as he had monopolized half of their equipment.

Tyr cleared his throat loudly, catching attention of the Guardian on the lawn. "Schnitten. I believe the ladies are waiting on you."

The Rain blinked, looking through the unopened window he was decorating at him blankly then to the maids waiting for him with the rest of their supplies. "Oh, good morning Master Tyr."

"If you insist." Looking pointedly at the other completed and already dried decorations finally got Schnitten to stop holding up the maids tasked with decorating the windows.

Thankfully the Rain Guardian did take the hint, even if he didn't appear satisfied with his work.

By the time he arrived for his appointment, he was unforgivably late and annoyed he was so.

Daniella had moved rooms by then, and Tyr followed Vongola Ottavia's normal schedule to the various offices she circled through. It took him three tries to find the right one, and the young man seeking employment the Sky wanted to know if he would like first choice of.

"Tyr, finally." The retired Eighth Sky of Vongola greeted with a touch of amusement and a bit of wry censure for keeping her waiting, seated behind the desk of her blue office. "Is there really that much going on to delay you?"

"Unfortunately. I have some reports to pass on already."

"This young man is... ah, let us call him Ottavio. A young Cloud, in fact." Gesturing to the young bespectacled boy across a desk from her, the elderly lady leaned back and smirked up at him. "I have one, myself. So as you yet have an opening, I would like to know if you two would suit."

Tyr glanced at the young Cloud, then back to Daniella.
"...you're not going to catch her anytime soon, dear Tyr." She reminded him amusedly. "Not without her brother, and that young man made his opinion on the subject rather clear by being so willing to leave even when a Sky gave him personal attention."

"Perhaps not, that does not mean the chase will not be worth it." Besides which, Nikishina deciding her brother was at risk in Vongola territory was not his issue if he moved the Varia Independent Assassination Squads off-site somewhere. "Coaxing an already trained thief to kill would be easier than training a young boy to become an assassin, her brother seems permissive enough as long as it is her."

"You get the pair or neither, not one or the other."

"I am aware."

Ottavia heaved a small sigh. "I take it you're going to be stubborn about her."

Tyr merely waited out the older Sky's attempts at meddling patiently, well used to her tries to fill out his ranks of Guardians.

"Train him anyways, if you would?" Daniella asked instead of more attempts to discourage him, leaning back in her office chair to see the both of them standing before her desk fully. "If you two don't suit, then fine. Having a Cloud at hand with your role would still help you aid my son, even if it is not your preferred Cloud. At worst, he can just be one more assassin."
Chapter 93

(Sunday the 14th of December, 1969. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

The bell really didn't help much.

Cherep carefully pulled the blanket out from under his younger sister, which earned him a grumpy huff of irritableness, but covering her up with the material so she was tucked into bed with him seemed to earn him forgiveness. Of course now was when the little bell, that he had bought an entire packet of out of a bulk warehouse kind of store with Tatiana when she picked up an actual blanket for their less than miserably sick little sister, thought to ring a warning the thief had wandered again.

A pain in the ass when she left like leaving, but still adorably cuddly the rest of the time she was sick. At least he still counted somewhat for whatever she sought out like this, even if he wasn't 'dangerous' as some of the other men in her life.

Apparently they could add 'chicken pox' to the list of illnesses that didn't agree with slightly Sunny Storm-Clouds, or whatever 'meningococcal' was supposed to protect from. If it was the former and not the latter there was a bit of concern because chickenpox was harsher on those fully grown rather than the younger victims.

The itching was also a bit of a concern, because Sonya could and did easily tear through her own skin with just nails pretty quickly without noticing. Their older sister had been quick to pounce on the first few drops of blood, but there was only really so much of his own sisters he was willing to slather with lotion to help them when the nurse wasn't awake or present to do it.

At least this was the last round for the year, next year would be interesting.

Hopefully then they could do this in a different place than Mafia Land from here on out.

Yeah, it had a hospital… so did most of the developed world at this point. 'International' could describe a few of the bigger trading capitals, if his sisters wanted to shop as well then there were several cities he could name off the top of his head.

Making polite conversation with hitmen was hard. Sonya's friend had been entirely unimpressed with him trying to be polite, and frankly Cherep hadn't really had any idea how to talk to the guy. He was a lot different than Viper, and while if he said something wrong to the Mist he'd be charged some money… saying something wrong to the Italian guy got him a lecture.

Getting through that without actually admitting he still didn't know the guy's name was also tricky. Pretty sure he failed, too.

Getting lectured on the religious views of Catholic hitmen while the guy had been cleaning three guns had been an experience. A sort of useful one, sure… but weird. "…the shit I do because I love you."

"Oh, shut up." Sonya muttered into his shoulder, gripping his wrist for a moment probably because she itched and knew it was a bad idea to scratch at it. "I do crap for you because I love you too, consider it your comeuppance."

"Awake now?"

"Eh..."
Good enough given the past two weeks, really. "So… can we not come back here again?"

"…sure? Bjørn's looking for a place as we speak," admitted his fellow Cloud tiredly, not budging from where he tugged her but sounding pretty miserable anyways, "I suppose we can do family things either there or back in Moscow instead once we have that."

"I know the two of you like this place, but it's really fucking weird. I can't get over the weaponry people walk around with and frequently use." Cherep confessed, ignoring it when Sonya dug her hands behind his back so she wouldn't give in to itching whatever was bugging her right now. "I keep thinking I'm going to do something wrong and get you two into trouble or something. Or get shanked for blinking wrong one of these days."

"It's not so much like it's safer for us here. No laws to be broken, no police to duck." Corrected the thief sourly into his shoulder. "I do not mean to make light or dismiss your concerns, because they're fucking true, but this is safer than even the Soviet Union for me and Tats. We don't have to be on guard against the government and the police here, guard our words or thoughts, or just even care if we end up in a confrontation in broad daylight."

He eyed the blonde hair of his little sister, the only part of her he could see right now, warily for a moment. "Safer for whom?"

She adjusted herself finally just to look disgustedly back up at him, eyes no longer glowing purple but somewhat suspiciously shiny anyways. "For everyone. You don't fuck around with those you don't know here, and that carries less risks with it. If we go away from the civilians, there's no collateral we have to guard for if they trip into us. Without laws, we can get the bulk of our business done quickly instead risk governments demanding their taxes or cuts and getting pissy if we don't pay them legally. No police means no shifty requirements in hiring or bribing a small space for breathing room to plan your next step."

"What happens when someone does try fucking with those they don't know here? You had to meet that Italian hitman guy somehow…" "I need to borrow you right after Christmas, or before it. Depending how quick purchasing a property will take. The paperwork might be couriered instead, so… keep an eye out unless I call."

…notice how she didn't even bother to address that question. "Right, I get to hold the title of whatever property you're ending up with… even if you could give it to Bjørn now."

"I made my plans without him, adding in my Lackey afterwards does not change them." Sonya snapped irritably, squirming slightly then thumping her forehead into his shoulder as she stopped straining herself to keep eye contact. "The plan always was you'd hold the deed to my library, suffer."

Cherep snorted, a smirk pulling at his mouth. It was always about the books, apparently the fact she'd be raising her godson there had little to do with it. "What does 'Lackey' mean, anyways?"

Given the noise she made, the thief did not appreciate him making her think right now. "A footman, more of a servant, someone that runs errands or does menial tasks for someone else. Here? More the last than anything else, Bjørn's considered to be a minor extension of myself."

"So… someone calling Bjørn 'Lackey' is basically calling him an office gofer."

"I don't really like the title either, but Bjørn specifically went after it for himself." Sonya tried rubbing the side of her face against the shirt he was wearing to bed, because they had suspected she'd do some bed hopping in the end even if this round hadn't made her as ill as the first round of inoculations, and seemed entirely unsatisfied with the results of her actions. "Lackeys also have a kind of protection for themselves they share, because if you fuck with a Lackey here you can pretty much count that at least three others that have one will fuck your shit up so you can't go after their own. It's not worth it, and they are technically of Mafia Land employees with the complications messing with them that entails."

"So, for his own protection? Huh." Hopefully Björn knew what he was getting into, but as the stuntman didn't really know the guy beyond being his little sister's first assistant type he couldn't really pass judgement.

The few times Cherep and the Lackey in question met, both before and after the blond teen became such to her, he seemed rather intense and focused. The first time around he had been working on his Russian enough to sell himself to Sonya as an assistant, the next few were through phone calls that always seemed a bit brusque. Viper didn't really say much about the guy either but given his miserly best friend's habits that might be a mark of merit or something like a mark of irritation.

"...I think you might need a bath."

"I've had three today." Bit out the thief in protest, tightening her arms around him but not enough to cut off his breath. "I reek of oatmeal, I do not need another bath."

"But you're starting to itch again, and if you take a bath then you can rub oatmeal on the itchy spots and hopefully get back to sleep afterwards." Pointed out her fellow Cloud cheerfully, wheezing a little when arms tightened a touch too hard before she quickly dialed back on her strength and put less stress on his rib cage. "I will walk into the shower fully dressed with you and turn on the cold water. Try me."

"How about in an hour, if I don't fall back to sleep by then." Countered Sonya flatly, unamused by his plan.

"Okay, but if you try ignoring me to fake being asleep I reserve the right to dump you in the tub fully clothed anyways."

She made an angry growl sound, which meant she totally was going to try to do that in an hour if she didn't drift off and hated that he was calling her out on it before she could.

It was still a totally weird place, full of Mafiosi and Nazis and other criminal types he didn't look to hard at out of fear of the weaponry they walked around in broad daylight with. Also, because he didn't want to be one of those many people beaten up or dragged off to likely be shot in the gritty corners if you looked around hard enough.

Faking as if he belonged was decent practice in fooling those that read body language or intents as if their survival depended upon it, and it frequently did, but flimsy of a defense without his sisters at hand or their foster father pulling more than his fair share of attention for his foster son's comfort.

He could still be picked out as the weakest of the three of them, not easily but often enough even if Sonya's reputation as the 'Mafia Land Cloud' kept people far out of her sight. Cherep didn't like feeling as a liability to his own sisters, especially when they were asking for his help not to paint a target on their backs.

"You spent the last fifteen years passively aggressively ignoring shit you hate," Sonya interrupted his thoughts shortly, jabbing him in the ribs none too gently to make him realize he had tensed up on her, "now you decide to fret over things?"
"I'm not the only one that does that." The stuntman shot back with a huff.

"We're twinned, that means we're similar in ways."

"Does it? I feel just like myself, not different or off."

The Storm-Cloud sighed heavily, thumping her forehead on his shoulder a few times. "Cherep, it's well done with. A Sky could tell at a glance, meaning we had everything a set of twinned Flame users would exhibit. If there was anything to notice, it would've been back when we were kids. Before I got to grips with my strength, maybe even before you moved in."

Well... admittedly he was a lot different than he was as a kid. So was she, she hadn't punched him in the arm for doing something she deemed stupid since they were about ten or so. "How much is that just growing up and how much is the Flames twinning on us?"

"Who the fuck knows." She muttered sourly, freeing a hand to rub her apparently itchy face before digging it back under his back. "I can give a guess if you want, but that's based a lot on the generalized bullshit taken second-hand rather than fact we've managed to piece back together."

"No thanks." Cherep wasn't sure what he'd do with the information anyways. "I'd rather know what's on your side, actually."

"Aside the violence?"

"And the territory thing."

"...I'm not really sure." Admitted his little sister after giving it some serious thought for him. "There's a lot of questions I have about how far just pure human physiology can explain some of the 'habits' certain Flame types have. If it has any effect on what type one possesses or how they behave originally under their Flame type. Do Classical Clouds start off as psychotic, or is it a learned behavior after a certain amount of time? How about Suns, and if a naturally high metabolism to start with encourages or changes the influences one's Flames have on the body? There's... little actual data aside hearsay, and old stories that may or may not have background details we'll never know this far away from them."

"...psychotic?"

"I literally have no issue with murder, aside knowing it's not something I should do lightly and trying to keep that in mind." She admitted to blandly, which didn't exactly surprise him to hear confusingly. "I used to? I think it was knowing it was against everything society is supposed to stand for, or maybe it was the situation I was involved in by my own choice before I wanted to be. Maybe learned indifference from how we grew up? Then... I didn't, in fact I felt better afterwards then just made myself guilty for being so. So... either I had an engraved socially learned aversion to murder I got over, or I never had that, and it was just the surprise outside of my control that upset me."

"Let's go with the first one." Weighed in her fellow Cloud dryly. "Not that if that's the way you want to look at things is that bad, but the first one sounds... healthier? Less like you're writing yourself off as an aberration. Criminals do have a sense of responsibility and some kind of honor, even in this society there's no mass murdering serial killers going about without some kind of control on them."

Sonya hummed thoughtfully. "Depending anyways. Given my 'usual' reception these days, it might actually be the second for most of 'my type'. We seem to generally be a bunch of fucking assholes."

Cherep snorted, laughing a bit when she gave him a huffy glare for that bouncing of her head rest.
"And I am technically one of those mass murderers."

"I said 'mass murdering serial killers'. Which you are not."

"Depending on how you want to look at it." She dismissed without an inflection to her tone to give him a hint what she really felt about the topic.

"Well, I want to look at it as you trying to keep in mind that people are people and just because they can be annoying isn't a reason to kill them." He offered sort of brightly, a bit concerned where this was going now. "I'm annoying sometimes, you can be somewhat annoying too. I really appreciate it you try to accommodate my views into your life, but you don't have to. It's probably dangerous to try. We have different lives, have different standards for such lives, and dealing with your lifestyle with my views is… probably impossible."

His fellow Cloud dug her pointy chin into his shoulder, tilting her head back up to look at him. "...even if I'm a 'mass murdering serial killer'?"

"Your life and mine are different enough I won't pass judgement on what you do." He just hoped she had a really good reason for considering herself one, and it wasn't just her being extremely hard on herself because she feared what he'd think of her. "I'm not deaf, I've heard what everyone seems to expect from you back home. The fact it was only a bunch of assholes targeting girls like you for… bullshit, who ran afoul of your temper then specifically poked you in a few sore spots more so far, is actually entirely understandable. Like you said, I'm part of a minority."

"I didn't mean to marginalize you by saying that." Sonya protested quietly. "You have a point, oftentimes a lot of issues can be resolved perfectly fine with talking it out, it's just not many naturally see that as you did from the start of their lives and are willing to listen."

"Not many having my views and forgetting that means I can come off as a horribly elitist, holier-than-everyone, snobbish asshole sometimes. While I don't mind being an asshole, passing judgement on things wholesale without bothering to take the background details in mind that might make violence the 'distasteful but only solution' is… I'll leave that for Skull."

"Everyone can be horribly elitist, holier-than-everyone, snobbish assholes sometimes." She eyed him suspiciously for a long moment. "...but okay, I don't really like him anyways."

Cherep laughed, hugging her back hard for an equally long moment. "That's the point, little sister. He's supposed to be an unlikable asshole."

"You're going to get punched in the face playing him." She muttered grumpily into his chest.

"No, I won't. I'm too loveable."

"Bet you five ruble you will."

He had probably been hanging out with Viper too long if a bet had him hesitating and rethinking his claims seriously.

"...sure you don't want that bath?"

Sonya outright hissed at him, digging her hands out from behind his back so she could roll over and give him a cold shoulder. Stuffing her hands under her arms in a vain hope of controlling her fidgeting.

"But I love you, little sister." He got a grumpy huff instead of a response when he followed and gave her a strong hug, mostly to help pin those hands down. "Don't you love me too?"

"...for some stupid reason, apparently so."

(Monday the 15th of December, 1969. Zolotov Condo, Mafia Land.)

Cherep might allow them to pull him out of the 'safe' places to go shopping, but he would not leave designated places with them just to hit up a bar or restaurant. Sonya was mildly impressed they got him to go shopping at all with them, without resorting to tricks or bribes the stuntman would not appreciate, so she had no issues with Tatiana getting some takeaway and a whole lot of booze for their brother's last night in helping them out.

Besides which, it was rather nice to spend days catching up with each other. The whole being sick part she could have dealt without, but one couldn't have everything sometimes.

"So, for this world tour thing? Where are you going to go?" Tatiana asked, being a Sun meant she recovered from her normally draining work schedule with just a whole cup of bisque soup and three of the croque-monsieur sandwiches their order had come with.

"Starts in England. Cambridge to Bristol to Manchester." Pausing to bolt the rest of his cheesy sandwich, their brother also downed the last of his soup so he could move on to the tarte flambé too. "Then Glasgow, Dublin, and then two stops in Iceland, three in Greenland, and then the Canadian and American stops by... uh, summer? The rest of the schedule's kind of left open, depending on how long it takes to work through Canada and the States of America."

"...that's about half a world." Pointed out the nurse, taking a break from eating with the hard liquors any French chef would've been appalled they were drinking instead of wine or champagne. "That's only if we count the UK as just 'Europe'."

"We'll be moving pretty damn fast." Cherep countered a little wryly, sitting back with his third of the cheese and onion pizza thing. "Maybe less than a week in each place? The stops that we're already confirmed for and set up to perform in are all within about two months. Then... well, Canada shouldn't be too hard to work through since a lot of it is uninhabited... but the States...?"

"I suppose the plan is to hit most and not all of them."

He tossed her an amused look. "Given they've got fifty of them, Nya? Nope, we're just going to hit the highlights there. Most of the summer for sure, maybe even leave sort of near fall to do the fall and winter months somewhere more sunny than the Communist states."

"Be careful there." Sonya reminded him a touch pointedly, then nibbling cheese off her pointer finger. "They might be over their 'Red Scare', but we're still at war and we all look pretty Russian at first glance."

The nurse stopped drinking to give her an odd look. "Wasn't that over a decade ago?"

"And the resort they reached for was declared unconstitutional and therefore illegal, after another couple of years, but the real question is what did they learn from that?" Waving that off with her own bottle of vodka, the thief took a quick swallow and glanced back to their brother. "My point being, people in large groups are stupid. Even 'civilians' in large groups. Try not to give them a reason to hate you."
"Other than my nationality? I'm touring as 'Skull de Mort', not Cherep Bazanov." Wagging a finger at her while getting in a quick bite, the stuntman shrugged. "French/something-or-another loudmouth idiot and not the Czechoslovakian turned Russian boy from the scary Communist Bloc."

Sonya gave his still weird hair coloring a pointed look. "They do not have many of the reds or purples in France, brother."

"I dye my hair, obviously." He sniffed in response, flipping a hand through his short and spiky hair which might or might not be covered in cheese grease. "Which will be why there's a measure of bleach and peroxide in my traveling gear, not just for cleaning myself up after nasty spills."

Tatiana made a disgusted huff of her own, eyeing them both sourly. "...stupid Cloud Voodoo, new subject. I don't want to talk about that crap."

Both Clouds gave her a look, then shared one between them.

"There's the oil from the food in your hair." Sonya obediently pointed out, which made Cherep blink at her blankly twice before a wry kind of frown settled on his face and he glared at his offending fingertips.

Their older sister snorted, which meant it counted. "Nya, do you really think the Soviet Union's going to fall?"

"...it might? Really depends on if anyone notices or cares that the mafia's holding up their interior public works or not." With a shrug, the blonde picked her plate back up with her second serving of the oddly pork tasting pizza-thing. "If they ignore it, and the further breakdown of services, then it's a high possibility the people will grow upset enough to overthrow or defect from the Union more and more until it collapses."

"That would be... really fucking odd." Cherep offered a touch absently, trying to clean his hair with a napkin.

"It's stable right now only because several factions of the bratva are deeply involved with and heavily integrated as the civilian's support structure, but that's... not really a good thing. For us maybe, but not for the longevity of a nation." Bolting her last bite of their dinner the thief discarded her plate, so her siblings knew they could have the rest of it if they were still hungry. "It would really only take one government idiot to piss off a vor in high enough rank, then we might have a lot of internal breakdowns to deal with as a people rather than as criminal support and the involved civilians deciding they'd rather deal with us than the government."

Her brother looked over at her, a tiny bit sideways given his current preoccupation. "Then what?"

"Then what, what?"

"What happens if the Soviet Union falls?"

"Who knows, but given that we have control over public services in wide swaths?" Sonya shrugged again. "Then that point of vory not owning property might come back to bite us in the ass. Then again, Vindice Laws refuse allowing Flame users and the Mafia in 'government' positions... although there are the Mists back home..."

"...hey, Italian criminal types own property, right? Why are you giving me the deed to whatever place you get?"

"Because I'm Russian, not Italian."
"Do Russians outside of the Soviet Union follow those same rules?" Cherep wondered mostly idly, finishing up his impromptu hair care and returning to his dinner.

The Storm-Cloud merely shrugged for a third time, more interested in her bottle of vodka than answering a question she didn't know even a possible answer to.

"Maybe you'll figure that out before we do." Tatiana offered brightly much to their brother's exasperation.

(Saturday the 20th of December, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Mamma! You're on time!"

"How much did Renato pay you to say that?" Sonya inquired mildly as she joined them in a parlor room somewhat removed from the holiday foot traffic, sounding honestly curious rather than annoyed.

"A thousand lira." Tattled the young Mist shamelessly, scrounging the banknote note out of a pocket to show her.

She flicked a glance at the hitman ignoring them behind a copy of the local paper, then got distracted by one of the news articles.

Renato found himself holding air as the woman then plucked the newspaper out of his hands to read the part that caught her attention, which by the looks of things Shamal was highly amused by as his godmother took the seat next to them on the couch.

She was getting damn good about evading him picking up her thoughts or intents.

"…which moron did this?" Sonya inquired of him, shaking the part of the paper he hadn't yet gotten to in his direction.

Snatching the damn thing back, Renato glanced over the article detailing the theft of the Nativity with St Francis and St Lawrence from a church in Palermo, Sicily. "I wouldn't know, why?"

"Because they probably ruined that painting, that's why." The professional thief informed him wryly, settling back because Shamal wanted to be fussed over and obediently letting the kid hug her. "I hate dealing in art, but even I know better than that."

Giving her an odd look encouraged a bit of clarification.

"You even put a pin hole in the paints of old art, and 'collectors' will collectively shit themselves to not only tell you what a travesty it is but also knock anywhere from fifteen to about seventy-five percent of its value down." She informed him blandly, sifting her fingers through the bratty Mist's hair. "I dismantle them from the frames if I need to store them somewhere, most other art thieves do too. Cutting something out of the frame? About... no one will buy it now. The traceable damage makes it impossible to claim it's a copy too, which is the only way it could've been displayed at all after being stolen."

Right now, the Russian looked perfectly content with things even if he knew she was starting to hate Vongola and most things related to their Skies.
"What are we waiting for?"

"Your Lackey to come by." Renato informed her, taking a second look over the piece that she criticized his fellow Italian criminals over. "You asked to deal with him first, after all."

…she might have a point. Might. He never really stole anything without first killing the previous owner, so he couldn't say with any certainty how difficult or easy the job would've been while trying not to harm or alarm the priests or attendants of the Oratori di San Lorenzo. Using a knife to cut out a painting in a church did seem a touch unnecessary, and if she was right about the value now… it was a rather pointless job.

"Did you and Björn come to an agreement as to where you want to grow up?" Sonya inquired of the brat idly, still playing with the kid's hair.

"Yeah." Brat practically radiating smugness, he tipped over into the woman's lap fully even if that meant he was no longer sitting properly on the damn couch. "He's got the details in his files, and we tried to match up to what everyone wanted."

"…everyone?" Echoed the Russian after a moment.

"Like Miss Galina wanted it near the beach," Shamal informed her brightly, squinting under her hand to peer up at her face, "and the garage you asked for."

"Ah." Ruffling his hair, she then turned her attention to the Mafioso. "So, when does Björn usually show up?"

"I wouldn't know." He informed her, flicking the kid on the forehead to get him to sit up properly. Shamal scowled but did at least pull himself upright. "I just got here myself."

"I thought you were helping him with locating something nearby where the brat's going to school?"

"I did." Renato informed her blandly, folding the paper to discard. "I gave him a list of properties and a range of cities to somewhat remain within, so the brat can be home every night or weekend."

Sonya eyed him for a moment, a hand still in the brat's hair. "Really. Do I get to know where this place is?"

"Once the brat starts attending." Although… it was a good question to answer before he 'abandoned' her to raising the brat alone, he wouldn't put it past a few individuals to try and invalidate Shamal's spot in Mafia School just because the woman raising him was Russian. "…I'll ensure things are confirmed on that end before you have to head to American for Don Bergamaschi."

She tisked, stretching out her legs and pulling her purse up from the floor to rummage around. "That's going to have to wait until sometime in February, after the brat's birthday. I've got a thing with a Mist about the KGB first thing next year."

"I'll let Nono know." Renato promised her with a smirk as her Lackey was finally shown into the room they were occupying, giving the platinum blonde following the younger man a narrower one. "Well now, what's this?"

"Dama, Miss Guerra." Björn the Lightning-Storm Lackey introduced one of Daniella's hatchet women almost a touch short to really be politely. "She's been… assisting me."

"We could be neighbors." Nilda offered to excuse her involvement with a sharp smile. "There's a property right next to my famiglia's territory, that your Lackey's trying not to show me he thinks is best for you and your people."

"…ah." Sonya eventually answered, drawing a complete blank on why the Rain wanted to 'assist' her Lackey with his house shopping. She glanced down at the kid it was for, back up to the Icelander doing it on her behalf, then over to the hitman in confusion. Eventually she turned back to the two of them. "…okay?"

"It is a good property, Dama."

"Fine then." Dismissed the thief blandly, finally pulling her fingers out of Shamal's hair and but merely glancing at the file her Lackey attempted to give her. "As longs as it fits the requirements, I honestly don't care what it looks like as long as it's where we need to be. If I really dislike it, I'll have it renovated until I do."

"Neighbors then." Observed the Rain with honest delight, snatching the so far scorned file to actually look at the details it contained. "…I might just have to earn myself an open invitation to visit whenever I want."

She eyed the other woman warily, confused as to why she would want to earn herself that kind of consideration. Still not sure if she should be concerned or not as well, which made her less likely to ignore that. "…right. Go buy it, Bjørn."

The Lackey hesitated, then snatched the file from Daniella's hatchet woman. "Some renovation is required to be habitable, Dama."

"I'll go check it once we're done here." Sonya promised the young man, the bulk of her attention on the platinum blonde woman. "Do you at least have a list of contractors we can hire for that?"

"…Vongola is allowing us to make use of their construction company."

"No." Refuted the woman flatly, highly unamused by the suggestion and visibly so.

"Then I will also arrange a few estimates from more local companies." Allowed the dirtier blonde Icelander, pulling a pen out to mark down some lines of a code on the file in his hands.

"The CEDEF aren't all that bad at construction work." Guerra commented almost idly, placing a hand on her hip and eyeing the thief with interest.

"No." Repeated the Russian as her Lackey glanced between them but bowed himself out of the conversation and the room rather quickly. "I really don't care how good they are, I'd rather not invite unknown Mafiosi to work on where I want Shamal to grow up in."

The Rain glancing at him earned her a mockingly amused look. Renato wasn't the one buying a castle, if Sonya wanted to pour that money into the local infrastructure instead of Vongola's coffers he had no intention of trying to change her mind. Even if the Outside Advisory branch of Vongola could use the cash or the legal work to help cover them.

Besides which, being foreign would be enough of a hurdle for her. If her pouring an absolutely ridiculous amount of money into the local economy bought her even a little goodwill to ease past that 'not a Catholic' bump, it was more than worth it.

"Well… it is a cover business." Allowed Nilda after a moment.

"Why do you care?"
"I was 'loaned' to be a local introduction for your young man." Confessed the other woman brightly, with a smile that was more sharp than polite. "To keep people from refusing to sell you property because you're not Italian. I'm keeping in mind the likely local responses to you moving in."

Utter. Fucking. Lies.

The hitman didn't even have to look at her for Sonya to know that, her highly unimpressed expression said it all and more.

"You need to brush up on your lying skills." Announced the Russian instead of directly call the other out on it. "If you were really trying to do that, then finding local contractors for any job I need wouldn't be so 'surprising'. Besides which, Bjørn does not require having his hand held."

"I know." Guerra informed the Storm-Cloud simply.

Sonya stared at her flatly for a long moment. "…so, you're my Vongola informant?"

"Pretty much, and the Alliance agent. I don't work for Nono Vongola."

"Ottavia?"

"More often, yes. But for those that she really wants removed somehow or shifted off their… duties." She informed her fellow blonde, rather bluntly. "I need a different job. My marriage is being negotiated so I won't be able to continue that as easily anymore. I'm being shuffled around into things, so if you don't like me just say so and someone else will be offered."

"Why?" Asked the Russian equally bluntly.

"Why what?"

"Why do I need one, and why the fuck would I want one, and to top it off why the hell should I put up with you?"

"To prevent 'he said she said' incidents from getting out of hand, to cut down on the amount of bullshit you're going to have to deal with moving in next door to about three different families that might or might not be pleased to see you settling on their fringes, and that's what this is all about. To see if you can."

Renato lifted a shoulder in a shrug when the thief glanced at him skeptically. He hadn't had to deal with a Vongola Alliance informant in his time as a Don, he in fact fobbed the entire thing off to pay off a debt to Timoteo Vongola, so he wasn't sure what they really did in return for being allowed to linger around.

"It doesn't have to be a hostile arrangement." Nilda coaxed after a moment when it was more than apparent the Russian was not really a fan of the very idea. "Obviously, you're going to have little to nothing to do with anything the Vongola Alliance will want. You can think of me as a local you can ask any kind of question about Italian life instead."

"But that's not all you are." Sonya countered flatly. "I wouldn't mind a friend. An informant is a bit too much for me to feel comfortable with near my responsibilities."

"Okay. I'll let you know when a new agent is available."

Suspicious, the Russian thief inspected the Italian hatchet woman for a long moment. "That's it?"
"I have a lot of things to be doing, I can easily duck out of this." Nilda promised with a flick of a hand aimed at a window. "I stepped in because I didn't think you'd like the 'usual' ways this is handled. Which is usually to not inform someone they've got a CEDEF plant in their household."

"Why, exactly, is the house I'm getting to raise Shamal in his native country so damn interesting?"

"Because you either are the or the about to retire head of a Mafia School, an example of a Soviet criminal and Dying Will Flame expert, have access to an interesting gem-Flame matching service, a Cloud user, and a known thief." Listed off the Rain blandly, listing off the points on one hand just to hammer her point home. "This isn't including Sinclair being a freelance hitman of some note, young Shamal being a rather powerful little Mist in his own right and what he might grow into eventually, anyone you might happen to relocate here or what kind of threats they might be."

Renato wondered if he was insulted to be tacked on to Sonya's list of accomplishments or not, with the brat and the rest of her various minions. Admittedly he'd taken a hell of a back step, with Nono's permission, in being a visible hitman in Italia...

"Am I allowed to kill these people if they do stupid shit? Otherwise I'm firing them the minute I or any of my two Mists find them."

"...you can, as long as there's a reason." Spoke the Rain after a glance downward, probably assuming Shamal was one of her 'two Mists' and contemplating if the kid was up to the task of spotting plants in his mamma's household. "Might be best to ensure someone of the Alliance knows they're behaving stupidly the first few times. Or just tell me, I'll remove them for you."

Not entirely unexpected as an assumption, but a few people were going to get a shock when Anna the Mirror Lady was introduced around. Both of Sonya's Mists had an unhealthy tracking addiction on the thief's person, to the point anyone but an extremely accepting Sky or apparently Storm-Cloud would be a tad bit unnerved. Usov deciding he had enough of lingering in Moscow without Sonya would be equally as unnerving for a few people.

"If they don't work, I'm not putting up with them." Warned the thief in a disgusted tone, suddenly getting up from her spot and crooking a finger at Shamal. "Come on, brat. I need a break from people, and there's a few things I was asked to pass on to you."

"Figure out what we're doing this week." Renato chipped in before they got too far, since there were several days until the Ball they had to fill somehow.

More than likely with parks and a film, which he had to think up excuses to not attend himself. He didn't have a problem with Shamal burning off energy someplace built specifically for children to do so or being silent for an entire hour, but the kid was just shy of being able to do all that unescorted by an adult.

"...that was risky."

"You know some moron would've tried to be cute about their orders since she's 'a communist' Russian and gotten themselves killed by her for trying it. Then we would've had to deal with that." Nilda informed him quietly, arms crossed under her modest chest in something that wasn't defensive but certainly a delayed reaction to dealing with a displeased Cloud. "My job is to prevent such hiccups."

"You could've done the same thing in about a five minute aside." Drawled out the hitman slowly.

"Would she take the complications seriously, or just plan some on the spot murder?"
Admittedly not knowing the answer to that made him shrug. Seeing 'her' people in action in a Russian thieves' clan could certainly be different to how they would operate in another country, he wasn't allowed to see how they dealt with betrayal or anything along those lines as a 'guest'.

"Don't expect her to be 'gracious' about those invites." Renato warned instead, rising to his own feet to find himself some footman for a decent cup of coffee. "Getting her to attend the Balls will also be as hard as pulling teeth, and I don't expect her to be all that amused at the idea of maybe throwing one herself."

"You managed to bring her along for three years."

"After several years of knowing the woman and using the brat as bait."

Nilda contemplated the idea for a moment. "Maybe she will accept if it's Tyr asking?"

The Mafioso paused, shot the woman a highly unamused look, and continued.

He also had to ask if she was pregnant. Hopefully when she wouldn't mind answering that kind of personal question to him, or at least wouldn't hide if she was or not out of some sense of pique.

---

(Tuesday the 23rd of December, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Renato being perfectly willing to take a list of requests to a local hardware store in trade for not having to attend a showing of On Her Majesty's Secret Service at least meant he didn't hear Shamal asking if James Bond was based off the hitman.

Sonya actually didn't know if the Mafioso had influenced things in film, but at least could inform the Mist it was probably unlikely enough to not ask the man if he was ever mistaken for a spy as 'James Bond' as a character was a touch too old to be their hitman. She knew it existed in a variation of a world without him but Mafia Land employees were pretty international, so it was possible someone caught sight of him and made assumptions to draw details from.

Halfway into a lesson with the provided locks and doorknobs mounted on a plank of wood on how to pick them using a pair of bent bobby pins, even if the kid could pick them easier with Mist Flames and her teaching him was just for the rare occasions he might be too drained to muster up even that kind of minor effort, the thief got a touch… distracted.

More than she liked to be, so with a sigh the Russian set the bent bobby pins down. "Who is that?"

Renato, who had buried himself behind a current newspaper once he got the gist of the trick as men didn't really have a convenient excuse to carry bobby pins around, bent a corner and peered in the direction she was looking. "…damned if I know. Why?"

"He's a Cloud." Shamal reported blandly before digging back into his lesson and trying to copy the thief's opened locks using the method she demonstrated for him. "He's Jacopo, but they're calling him 'Ottavio' now he's a known Cloud user."

"The brat you got into a fight with your first year here?" Sonya questioned skeptically, inching the pile of keys out of the Mist's view so he couldn't keep cheating by making copies instead of pick open the locks. "The one that nailed you good in the face?"

"I got him back." The brat protested in a wounded tone, pouting at her for either needing the clarification or for moving the keys. "…but yeah, mamma. That's him."

She wondered how to ask 'did you or he start it' without earning herself more pouts.

"Did you start it?" Renato asked for her behind his paper, sounding entirely disinterested in the answer.

"No." Insisted the Mist disgustedly, giving up on his lock picking practice for a pout over his folded arms even if the Mafioso wasn't looking to appreciate it. "I used a bit more of the art supplies for a moment, I just needed some of the yellows he had three of."

…so, he had. Rather, he had committed an offence a Classical Cloud would probably get into a childish brawl for doing. Valera was equally unwilling to share absolutely anything that was 'his', no matter the bribery or arguments tried, and frankly Sonya wasn't really all that willing to share her personal things with just anyone either.

Which meant the distraction she had was the one of what she was calling 'infringement'.

…who was the brat other than an old opponent Shamal once had, and another Cloud of her polarization?

Was it worth the effort to discover if there was a way to get two 'feral' Clouds to co-exist even temporarily using the kid?

Said kid was either blind as a bat, other than what he needed those glasses for, or not a very good Cloud. He didn't seem to notice her at all, when the last two times she 'infringed' on other Clouds they noticed right the fuck away and went after her as the threat she was to them.

….or ignoring her.

Sonya considered it, for about half a second.

Frankly, she'd rather follow up on the Wolfpack Gang's Cloud brat. Hopefully the dent they made in the 'normal' reactions two Clouds had upon meeting could be extended somehow with more help or assistance from the older Cloud for the younger one. She couldn't raise the kid, he was well established in his territory and she didn't know what removing a Cloud from a territory they were 'claiming' did to them.

"Renato? Can you remove the kid from the room? I'm not going to be able to focus with him nearby."

"What if he's needed in here, little dragon lady?"

"He's reading an atlas. He can do that outside." Dismissed the Storm-Cloud, trying to refocus back on the brat's lock picking efforts but finding her attention drifting to the Cloud instead. "And I really don't want to kill him or needlessly scare the kid, so I can't do it."

"Actually," the hitman offered after a moment of studying the young man she was objecting to, "he's hiding behind that atlas."

Blinking, the Storm-Cloud twisted around to see if he was being honest in that report.

...so he was.

"I still don't care. In fact, I care less than that now." Seriously, other Clouds attacked her either physically or verbally even when they knew they had no chance against her... and this one hides? "Get rid of him, or I will."

"Will do."

Shamal peered up at her curiously. "He's training under Master Tyr, last I heard."

"Tyr needs a better apprentice." Sonya deadpanned flatly. "I've never heard of a meek assassin before."

A Cloud assassin was a contradiction in terms, right?

Well... admittedly a Cloud thief was also a contradiction in terms, criminal terms, so there was that. As was a Cloud stuntman, but Cherep was different.

Her trying to reserve judgement was apparently an impossible thing when it came to other Clouds. Pity.

(Thursday the 25th of December, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Fiorella Vongola pressed a last kiss to Massimo's downy head, giving a smile to the nurserymaid on night duty as she left the toddler's nursery room. Evading Enrico's latest attempt to ruin her gown so she could afford the time to read him a story, then stepping around Federico's attempts to control his younger brother with a laugh, she finally got to the end of the children's wing.

"Behave, boys. Please." She tried to entreat before leaving them to their roughhousing, more than aware enough only Federico heard a word she said. "Just for tonight."

It was Christmas day, the children would be a touch too wild from all the sweets and presents to really focus too much on their manners. Having missed the last three years of Balls her husband threw meant she was sorely out of touch with current events among his friends' and the politicians' wives, and as fun as raising her three boys could be Fiorella really wanted to finally get back to something that didn't involve how much dirt they could convince each other to eat or the 'name that bug' game.

Apparently she had gotten pregnant at just the wrong time, some new woman was making a bit of a headache for her husband's peace of mind. As she had never met a Russian in person, it would be at least interesting.

She couldn't regret Massimo's birth, but the timing perhaps could've been better.

Giving Visconti a smile, she hastened on with him dogging her steps to where her husband was likely finishing up a bit of the family business before it had to be put mostly aside for the Ball.

Not being a particularly dense woman, Fiorella knew perfectly well 'Vongola' was not just a family business that happened to be a touch international. However hard her husband tried to convince her of it.

She got kept out of a lot of 'it', as she wasn't 'Vongola' through birth or association but simply marriage. Tiny things tended to stack up however, the footmen all being armed and trained in the use of firearms with a good portion of the maids, the three racks of knives in the kitchen not for culinary use, even Timoteo's bodyguards matching somewhat with his mother's six main guards in some kind of type.

Not being sure what it all meant in the end made confronting her husband with it pointless, as well as a fight she wasn't even certain was all that important. No one seemed all that upset or uncomfortable with whatever was going on, so she could just wait for an opportunity when she knew more.

Sometimes, watching them trying to hide things from her was mildly amusing.

"Fiorella, dear." Daniella called down a hallway, straightening the lapels of her crushed velvet suit. Instead of the usual red it was a burnt orange color, only a touch too light to be called a deep red or dark brown. "Not even a hello for your mother-in-law?"

"Oh, Daniella. I wasn't aware you would be attending tonight." Fiorella smiled at the elderly woman, as Visconti gave Solothurn a short nod before carrying on in the direction they had been headed in without her. "I thought you disliked these things?"

"I'm too old to keep standing around all night chatting." Corrected Timoteo's mother blandly, a wry smile curving her lips enough to crease the tiny flower tattoo at the corner of her eye. "This year we have a couple guests that have raised the usual interest in the Balls to almost ridiculous levels. Consider me your backup tonight, m'dear."

"The Russian woman?"

"Nikishina's one of them, yes. But she's been attending the last few Christmas Balls so the majority of interest in her is waning. The lady head of the Giglio Nero is emerging from her little enclave finally, to be honest I can't wait for the two of them to meet." Admitted the elderly woman thoughtfully, tapping a cane her Bodeo had been holding for her on the ground before walking without needing it to the top of the only staircase that led to the family level of the mansion. "Fetch my son and hurry up, Fiorella. Don't leave me to the sharks too long."

"Leave you to the sharks, or leave them with a shark?" She questioned dryly, earning herself a bark of a laugh from her mother-in-law. "Very sorry, Solothurn. Two minutes."

Daniella's equally as closed-mouth bodyguard as Visconti merely gave her a short nod, finishing the escort to where her husband was and 'trading off' with the other silent man.

Fiorella wasn't sure why she needed guarding, obviously it was in response to something that had once happened they didn't want a repeat of, but she didn't really mind. There were a lot of people here over the holidays and putting up with a bit of bother with bodyguards during such times at least kept the worry of her sons wandering off on her and getting lost down.

Lord knew if it was possible, Enrico would find a way to do it.

She lived in a massive mansion, with almost everything already taken care of by servants, and all she had to do was raise her sons. Complaining about the security because her husband was a man of note and powerful with his wealth would be a touch ungrateful.

One last man seeking her husband's aid or support for something or another, five more minutes on top of that delay after Coyote Nougat escorted him out of the wing, and Timoteo stepped out of his personal office with a mildly tired sigh and Ganauche following at his heels. "And now, on to the floor show."

"Your mother is already down there." Fiorella reported so Visconti could imitate a statue as he wished, fussing with her husband's tie so it would lie flat and straightening his collar for him. "The boys are either tearing up the playroom again or have finally settled down without me there to distract them for Caterina to read them a story to. Massimo is at least sleeping."

"Odds on if me going in there to settle them down working if they're not already?"

"Poor." She informed him wickedly. "Papa coming to play? You'll never get out of there with your suit intact."

Timoteo studied her expression closely. "They got another handful of mud pass the maids?"

"Somehow. I think they keep it as pockets full of dirt, then just add water, the scamps. I suspect Federico is helping his brother yet letting Enrico take all the blame."

The face her husband pulled was mildly annoyed. "Now why did I think of that?"

"You didn't have brothers, Timoteo." Ganauche reminded him, self-consciously adjusting his eyepatch for the nth time by the look of his hair. "Coyote might've counted as your first...ah, friend, but not by the time you were old enough to know better than smuggling mud into the mansion."

Fiorella pulled a comb out of a decorative vase and handed it to the younger man. "You look fine, Ganauche. The less you think of it the less it will bother you."

The one-eyed man dressed in a very green suit grimaced, taking the comb from her gratefully. "It'd help if people would stop staring."

"They're probably imagining what heroic battle you earned that badge of honor from." Insisted the woman pointedly, gesturing to the vase again when he tried to give the comb back after straightening out his hair. "I had the maids hide combs everywhere, so I could fix the boys' hair when they tried to mess it up before anything 'adult-y'. Like the summer picnic and the family pictures."

"You're indispensable." Her husband informed her warmly, then took a bracing breath and faced the hallway. "Let us now brave the hordes, before my mother finds something to complain about."

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 25th of December, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"She's abandoned her… well, Sinclair." Daniella pointed out for her, as Fiorella took a brief pause in the dancing with her mother-in-law in order to get something wet and cool. "With dear Tyr on the floor, kind of noticeable given the poor man has so few friends."

"...what does Tyr do again?" Asked the wife of Timoteo Vongola politely, committing the ash blonde woman's face in her memory. "It seems to change every time I look around these days."

She didn't know what Nikishina was wearing, but she wanted the tailor's name to get herself one. It looked delightfully breezy if a touch form fitting, especially in even a large ballroom packed with nearly five hundred other people mostly in non-breathing clothing.

Very modest even if it was exotically interesting too, wrist to ankle were covered yet there was almost a scandalously high split up the sides of her skirt to the point of requiring a set of loose pants to cover her sometimes exposed hips and her legs down to the strappy silver stilettos on her feet.

Purple jacket ending in red near the sleeves and skirt, and soft yellow pants. Somehow, even when the 'norm' was only one 'main' solid color to the point both Daniella and Timoteo always wore orange or some shade of it and their guards always picked the same shade from the rest of the rainbow, Nikishina got away with three of them in her outfit, without being asked politely to change into something else.

"He's the head of a new external security branch." Her mother-in-law informed her. "Dear Tyr joined me a touch late to also retire with my generation, so I let him pass to your husband to help out a little."

Ash grey eyes suddenly flicked in their direction, for only a brief moment she caught the other woman's eyes before Tyr spun the woman around again.

Fiorella shivered, for some reason she couldn't put a finger on.

"Russians are delightfully blunt and intense." Daniella informed her pleasantly, a smirk a touch too sharp to be really fond crossing her lips. "She's moving here, not exactly locally but near enough. Now… ah, Ottavia of the Giglio Nero. Dear Luce, over there near Sinclair. The fellow with a yellow dress shirt and tie, and that yellow band around his fedora. With the curly sideburns? Right next to him is Luce of the Giglio Nero."

Obediently, Fiorella gazed in that direction and eventually found Timoteo's newest friend Sinclair speaking with a dark Italian beauty with short hair and a puffy looking hat.

Her color seemed to be either black or white, or orange.

Delicately frowning, she glanced at her mother-in-law's dark orange pantsuit to the new woman's mainly white dress. Just with orange highlights.

There were few others that wore orange, mostly among her husband's key associates as well as himself and his mother. More recently, she had found a trend of orange in her eldest son's formal clothing. Mostly men, and one elderly woman.

No one seemed to be asking the young woman wearing the color to change to match the dress code either.

However, at this angle, Fiorella could see that Luce had a tattoo of a flower near the same place Daniella’s. Not nearly as wide as the elderly woman's, and more modest as well in that it didn't take up half a cheekbone, but certainly enough to explain why her mother-in-law declared the other woman 'dear'.

Flattery included mimicry.

"Why didn't I see Luce of the Giglio Nero in the greeting line, Daniella?"

"We're trying to keep her from being overwhelmed with applications to join her company." Answered the elderly Italian easily, always with a plausible answer that just seemed a touch off somehow. "Dear Luce and her company deals with tracking information, not entirely glamorous but occasionally risky depending on what kind of information you're after and where it might be. She's got openings, and this is the first Vongola hosted event she's attended after taking over for her poor father."

Asking her mother-in-law would probably not get her what happened for Daniella to call a man she had never once heard of as 'poor' and asking the younger woman in question would probably be a touch tasteless.

"Thank you." Fiorella informed the woman instead of asking a question she doubted would be answered, taking a moment to sip more of the champagne she had in her hand. "I terribly missed these events. Not to say I would trade being able to tend to Massimo's first few years for anything, but I am horribly behind in keeping up with the changes to my social circle."

"I certainly haven't." Daniella informed her a touch tartly, keeping an eye on the younger Italian woman and the group around her which contained three of her own bodyguards and two of her son's. "Way too many self-important idiots too full of themselves to realize they're making fools of themselves once a pretty lady is around or enough alcohol gets into them."

"Timoteo probably knows more of that than I do." She reminded her mother-in-law a bit wryly. "I instead get their pretty and airheaded girlfriends and a few trophy wives to 'subtly' discourage from harassing the help, if it wasn't for the rare few handfuls of sensible wives..."

A rather out-of-place grunt of surprise she couldn't put a name to distracted her from finishing that comment, a fleck of something hot and wet splashing across her face had Fiorella turning as she touched a pad of a finger to the hot liquid.

A silver and now slightly bloody heel lowered, and Nikishina eyed the heavy knife now sticking half out of her foot as she slid down Tyr's form to stand on the floor again. "...well fuck. That hurt."
Chapter 94

(Friday the 26th of December, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Tyr didn't exactly let Sonya reach the floor. The hand that had been at her waist suddenly disappeared and instead his arm caught her under her ass, the hand gripping hers let go just so the assassin could grip the back of her right leg and inspect the heavy knife sticking out of her foot.

Then the man turned around in the direction the weapon had come from, frowning rather heavily.

"I didn't see who threw it." She informed him a touch apologetically, as the band suddenly came to a jarring stop as they had the height on a stage to clearly see the crowd and other people started to realize something was wrong through that. "Just that it was there."

Admittedly, trying to catch a knife with her foot was also a really stupid idea. She hadn't wanted to rip her right out of the Sword Emperor's hand, because that probably would've broken a few of his finger bones, so instead she leapt up the guy's form and stuck out her heel instead.

The Russian was a circus trained knife thrower, she knew perfectly well sharp things in the air with this many people around was a bad thing. She just wanted to get it out of the air, then figure out who was being stupid.

…she also dug one of her stabby looking heels into Tyr's back for the balance, hopefully he didn't hold that against her.

"I believe, in this case, you are forgiven for the oversight." He informed her simply, which required a moment of thought to realize he was talking about not catching whoever threw the knife and not her digging a silver heel into the small of his back, shifting her to sit on his forearm for a second just to release her leg and catch the blonde woman into a bridal carry.

Someone screamed, with her stabbed foot probably in full view of anyone glancing around, which started a rapid evacuation of the ballroom's open dance floor and a rise in volume overall as other people started reacting to the reaction and others reacted to that.

Sonya was not amused by her current position or the noise. "I can walk."

She was also now dripping blood on the floor, keeping people from tracking through it before everyone realized the hazard was there was probably a thing to do… but he really could do that without her, really.

"On a knife?" He questioned a touch sardonically just loud enough for her to hear, which was probably the most life she'd seen out of him since last year's minor surprise. "A good fourth of the guests this night is unaware of why the dress code includes certain colors for certain people, as well as somewhat inhuman feats. Some are politicians, a few European celebrities, two are the local and regional police chiefs and their wives."

…fuck. She hadn't known that.

Renato was going to bitch, and the brat would probably not let her go anywhere without him for a couple days at least. She was probably not going to be allowed to 'walk' it off, and her brother's Cloud Voodoo would probably not help right now.

Tyr didn't go far, thankfully. He set her pert ass on the banquet table, right next to Daniella Vongola already doctoring some poor socialite's bloody face, then gave her a courteous little nod as if they had finished their round on the dance floor instead of her jumping him and getting a knife through the foot. "Miss Sonya, thank you."

"...right. Sure." Her foot really kind of hurt now and being thanked for doing something stupid was kind of embarrassing.

Hopefully it was more for their discussion on baby Cloud territory forming, not being a touch airheaded around sharp and shiny things.

At least there was a half-complete bulwark of Guardian Elements keeping the press of panicky people away from their Sky and the two other ladies allowed in their guard, making a little pocket of breathing room where no one else was likely to get themselves stabbed by the sharp implement sticking out of her skin.

"Well," observed the Eighth Sky of Vongola a touch wryly as the master assassin left to likely go hunting, still dabbing around the younger Italian woman's makeup to remove a good portion... of... Sonya's blood, "not the best introduction, but Fiorella? Dear, this is Nikishina. Nikishina, my son's wife Fiorella Vongola."

"My name is Bazanova. I had it legally changed several years ago." The thief pointed out blandly, inspecting her right foot and wondering what the knife was cutting into to make it hurt so much. "My biological father's a jackass, I really don't like him much."

Daniella paused in her work to give her a measured look. "He's alive?"

"Castrated." Sonya countered flatly. "There are some things you just can't get away with in Russia."

"Hmm... ruthless." Announced the Sky pleasantly, sounding perfectly fine with that.

"I thought your eyes were grey." Fiorella eventually managed weakly over the noise in the ballroom as things were sorted out and her husband started trying to corral the masses, still white as a sheet under her blush and eyeshadow... and the streaks of blood that had yet to be carefully cleaned off.

"They are."

"Ah... Miss Bazanova, she doesn't know." Daniella informed her a touch of what was probably supposed to be apologetically, moving a step farther from her just so her Sun Guardian could get next to her and lay out the medical kit to tend to the thief's injury in some kind of peace. "And... you are a tiny touch... very purple right now."

"Very sorry." Sonya bit out sarcastically, unable to really help it in the face of constant pain and a Sun she really didn't like or know well dumping some kind of disinfectant around the length of sharpened steel in her foot. How he got it was something she was chalking up to mysterious magical medical things, her sister had the same damn habit. "Also, how the fuck does she not know?"

"Timoteo really should've informed her after their Federico was born but he insisted she didn't need to know, and it would just complicate her life unnecessarily." Daniella announced in a conversational tone, licking a new corner of the mostly snowy white but now blood-soaked handkerchief in her hands to continue removing the blood from the lady in question. "If you just happen to spill a bit, I will not mind. I don't think even Timoteo could really protest, as that knife was really aimed at dear Fiorella if she was the one splattered with your blood when you caught it for us."

"Do I need to know?" Countered the wife of a Sky instead of pounce on that admission from her mother-in-law, an admirable adjustment even in the face of a near-assassination attempt and either the realization or confirmation she was being left in the dark about something.

…probably very minor Rain or Lightning.

No, wait. There went the paleness as she finally understood she was the target tonight, not the Russian. Probably not a minor Rain then, or at least not as much as she might be a Lightning.

Sonya thought about it, and the various meetings she and Galina did with various parents trying to understand what their kids could do. Lisa did tend to do that more than most of the actual Flame users, so she really only had a small sample size to draw from. Larion's mother, mainly.

"I suppose... Nono might have a point." Offered the thief after a moment, reaching down to remove her left heel because she really didn't want to hop on it if she needed to move while in full view. "A minor one if at all. The concerns can be addressed perfectly well and given his type... you should really know to have a say in how your boys are brought up as they likely share it. Italians of that particular breed seem to all be arrogant sots."

"Arrogant, am I?" Daniella observed idly, finishing up with her daughter-in-law's face the best a piece of moist cloth could do.

"Aren't you?"

"Comes with the territory, doesn't it? We all are."

"How many of my type do you have already?" Sonya countered with a huff, wincing as the right heel was laboriously cut off her foot and pulled from around the knife stuck it in. "I don't want one, thank you. Neither does my brother."

"Everyone wants one."

She pinned the elderly lady with an unamused look. "I don't want one. Neither does my brother."

"Did you only convinced yourself of that, or are you like Sinclair? Too strong to draw in?" Daniella countered bluntly, a hand on her violently dark orange hip and a frown on her lips. "You seem to be protesting a touch much to really feel that way."

The thief snorted. "My point. I wouldn't have minded Tyr, but my brother doesn't like him. As we are... well, what we are, without his agreement not having it isn't really all that much of a point of contention between us. I don't mind he doesn't want it, and your special status does nothing for either of us. Yet you insist, because you really know better than we know ourselves... right?"

The elderly Sky pursed her lips, a few of her wrinkles around her eyes deepening as she at least considered it.

Sonya glanced at the terribly confused and a little scared wife of a mafia Don watching that conversation, then sighed heavily. "Lady Vongola, you don't need to know. I don't honestly think you'll harm anything not knowing. However, a couple things will then make more sense if you know, therefore ask your husband. He really should've been the one to tell you, and you can use my unconscious reactions as an excuse if you'd like."

"I don't suppose you mean your eye coloring." Daniella butted it a touch wryly when her daughter-in-law just stared at her blankly.

The Storm-Cloud released the edge of the banquet table, and the impressions her fingers had left behind in solid wood as the Sun Guardian fussed with her aching foot. "Not really."
Fiorella then stared at the highly polished and now dented wood, wide-eyed.

"Miss… Bazanova." Revelli spoke up from the floor, gripping both her right ankle and the hilt of the knife stuck in her. "Brace yourself."

The Russian put her hands back, and accidentally crushed the edges she was gripping when the knife was sharply yanked out.

…fuck that hurt. "…ow."

The bloody thing was also handed off to someone that immediately left the group, probably so the weapon could be used in various tracking efforts to find whomever it was that was throwing knives even if no one was allowed to carry weapons around.

"That is a touch hard to explain, admittedly." Observed the Sun's Sky in a deadpan. "Not exactly what I asked, but more than enough for my purposes. Glisenti, be a dear and cover that up from view for now."

She sniffed irritably, relocating her hands to a new position to not mess up the Mist Flames being applied as the Sun dragged out a set of suturing needles and thread from a medical kit he took from somewhere. "…thank you for the distraction."

"Would you like another one?" Daniella inquired politely, patting Fiorella on the shoulder as the stunned younger woman was subtly guided into a chair by Brow Nie to recover her nerves in. "A bit of a strange deviation, arguing instead of fighting, but a delightful one even if you do still cost a bit of property damage."

"…Renato's almost worked his way through the crowd, he'll have one for me." Sonya informed her blankly, giving Revelli a look when he glanced up with his threaded needled ready to start piecing together her ripped flesh. "You might want to move, too."

The salt-n-pepper bearded Sun sniffed himself in insulted dignity as he repositioned her foot to where he had better light to see what he would be doing. "That young rascal can certainly wait a moment, you need stitches to help keep this shut until we can move you to the medical wing."

She eyed the blood on the floor and covering the man's hands, considering. Probably a pint if at all, most from ripping the knife out, but she should keep an eye out for any light-headedness. "…joy."

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 26th of December, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Sonya waved off any painkillers, which meant she didn't have to answer if she was pregnant or not. Which meant he still had to find a way to ask her outright and get a truthful answer.

Renato glowered at her 'injured' foot as if it was mocking him, because it really kind of was.

"I think," the thief spoke up after a moment of oddly staring at him for the insulted expression on his face, "I'm done with Balls for a while."

"Good." He shot back shortly, especially as that meant she wouldn't attend any more without him or get distracted more by random Skies to the point she got injured.

Fucking Tyr didn't even bother to catch the asshole throwing sharp things around, leaving the dragon lady with a Sky she didn't like and the civilian wife of Nono's. There was still a man-hunt going on, all the guests were being politely but firmly re-inspected for any possible way to sneak a heavy hunting knife into the Iron Fort.

The hitman had done it once before, as did the Russian. The only reason why they weren't at the top of the suspect list was because the knife had been thrown at Fiorella yet caught by the thief. Sonya also had no possible way to make a knife and stab herself with it with a heel in the air and her hands occupied with the Sword Emperor, as well as the whole 'saving Timoteo's wife by sheer accident' issue. He had managed to pluck her out of Revelli's grips once he was done stitching her injury up and head straight to the medical wing just to remove them.

Sonya didn't really appreciate being hefted around, Renato didn't really appreciate leaving her injured even for appearances' sake. The muscles were mainly healed, and the skin was now lacking the stitching holding the injury shut, but even for Flame users things could remain sore if the body was left with an injury too long.

"...so," tried the bored thief after a moment, "have you told Shamal yet?"

He shot her a look. "It's four in the morning."

"He's almost seven. It's entirely possible he can finally manage staying up all night, even if he shouldn't."

She was also slightly depressed the brat was nearly seven, because he was now too big for her to easily get away with carting him around as she might like. The Mist brat finally grew into his proportions, more a miniature adult than a child with a child's smaller and easily carried form.

Not that it would stop her from hefting around the brat if she wanted, but not something she could do in public anymore without attracting undue attention.

The Mafioso's head hurt as he tried to follow her logic. "...I thought you didn't want to deal with babies."

"I don't." Confirmed the thief flatly.

"...are you pregnant?" Renato tried bluntly, more than tired of trying to find a quiet moment and the right way to ask.

She gave him a strange look, drawing a blank why he was asking.

"There's a rumor back in Mafia Land-"

"Renato, this year there was a rumor you impregnated half the fucking island's female population and the reason you were gone so much was so you couldn't be nailed with paternity issues." Sonya helpfully reminded him a touch flatly, utterly unamused. "Why are you listening to it?"

"This started in the hospital." Muttered the hitman a touch sourly, irked at that rumor being dug up again to be shoved in his face by this particular woman. "And for the record, I didn't."

"Obviously." Snarled the Storm-Cloud, now officially irked at him. "And-"

Whatever she was going to say, even the thoughts still forming in her mind to be spoken, were interrupted by the medical wing's doors being pushed open a touch roughly. Fiorella Vongola blinked a touch rapidly as she stood just inside the large hall, then noticed the two of them watching her.
"...oh, my apologies." Hesitating as Renato threw himself back in his seat as it became obvious he wasn't going to get an answer now and the thief rolled her eyes at his 'dramatics', the Italian lady glanced between them. "Am... I interrupting anything?"

"Yes."

"No." Countered Sonya flatly, gesturing the woman over. "Did he tell you?"

"Dying Will Flames of the Sky." Confirmed the lady warily, eventually allowing herself to be beckoned over by the Russian to join their little circle so he couldn't dredge up their previous conversation. "Timoteo admitted he should've told me sooner, he just... didn't want to."

"You're kind of... blank. Ish." Admitted the Russian in what probably should be a helpful tone, which utterly missed the mark given the other woman's reaction. "A Lightning if at all, frankly. Might be a Rain, but it's really hard to tell with you. You don't have enough to make it obvious, I could only catch it by how you deal with shocks, so the possibility you'll ever pull on it and use it is low. But being able to pit it on others, like me as a Stormy Cloud or Renato over there as a Sun, means you can sort of plot around us. With your... erm, rank? You really should've known about us well before this as you probably deal with a lot of our number. And your kids, that probably the more important part really."

"But... you can shatter wood. With your fingers." Fiorella announced blankly as she sunk into the seat the Mafioso scorned for having it's back to the doors, as if it was impressive not the Storm-Cloud really dialing back her strength the best she could in the face of her own distress. "Some of you can pull things into reality using your minds. Why... why me?"

"...it makes a bit of sense, there's really no female Skies around your general age range." Sonya offered after a moment of serious consideration on her behalf. "Vongola's known for their Skies. Without a strong influence on the mother's side, the more dominant Flame type on the father's would breed true. I guess. I don't deal with bloodlines much, so I am rather unsure about the logistics of that assumption."

"That's not particularly reassuring for her." Renato chipped in for the lovely wife of a good friend, before her sense could be overwhelmed by her current worries.

"It should." She stated flatly, then actually looked at the other woman's face. "Oh... no, Lady Vongola. I meant there was no 'breeding' considerations with you. Nono probably went after you because he liked you, not that you had a special trait you didn't know of and he made the decision based off that. As you don't have it... it was likely more merit than our... Flame stuff."

Sonya warily leaned back away from the wife of the Sky she was trying to badly reassure, uncertain what she was saying wrong as the woman about a half a decade older than her teared up.

The Mafioso caught Fiorella's hand before she embedded her nails into her skin through sheer upset and smoothed the faint stressed nail marks already present out with a touch of Sun Flames. "Lady Vongola, your mother-in-law would have the side of your relationship from your husband's point of view. The little dragon lady's a touch dense, Lady Daniella would be more suited to answering any concerns you might have about any kind of 'suitability' Timoteo would look for in you before your marriage."

"Hey." Protested the woman half-reclined on a medical berth irritably, nettled by his words. "I am not 'dense'. I am slightly socially impaired."

"Same thing." Renato shot back, releasing the married woman's hands once she seemed a touch more settled and politely pretending interests in her healed hands. "You're oblivious."

"I am-" She cut her denial off in a bit of surprise when he shot to his feet and loomed over her.

"Are you pregnant?" Demanded the hitman shortly, finally getting a negative out of her head. "Do you want to be? Because I can certainly help you out with that if you'd like, little dragon lady."

It took a second for things to click together on her end. "...are you flirting with me?"

"My point. You're dense, as a brick." He insisted hotly, snatching his hat off of the foot of her berth and shoving it on before turning on a heel to go check on their godchild. "We've been dating several months now!"

"When the fuck did you ask!" Shot the thief back at him, sounding rather upset now herself.

Renato turned back just so he could see her face for this part. "Right outside of Babylon, remember?"

Sonya didn't for a full moment, then the irritation on her slid off for something quite like surprise mixed with realization and a touch of sheepishness. "...the 'you'll look back and feel foolish' conversation?"

He gave her a pointed look as he shouldered the doors separating the medical wing from a guarded hall opening up to a greater section of the Iron Fort, because he had been right.

Fiorella giggled weakly, grinning wryly when the Soviet Storm-Cloud gave her a mildly irritated look as the hitman left them to womanly discussions of Flame users and the impacts of such.

Hopefully the two of them could bond a little. Then Timoteo wouldn't be quite so screwed trying to repay back a woman, who quietly loathed him due to her brother's harm in his territory, in her semi-unintentional action that saved his wife's life. He'd eventually tell someone Fiorella was with Sonya, probably around the time the thief's irritation with him died down to survivable levels.

...that was going to be a mildly uncomfortable conversation. The Russian knew full well he was going to 'kill' himself off, and this was... probably not timed very well.

Hopefully, he hadn't just shot himself in the foot tossing that in her face like this.

(Saturday the 27th of December, 1969. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Suffering through a cast on her right foot, which wasn't anything but a prop right now, and a few words with the local police as Vongola 'obviously' handed over the investigation of the assault and attempted murder to the police when the knife thrower wasn't found wasn't too annoying.

Omertà was a consideration, after all.

Sonya privately betted the criminal famiglia already had the asshole in custody. They better have him.

Otherwise screw Shamal's schooling, the kid was coming with her.

This was the second time she landed herself in the Vongola medical wing, and she was heartily sick of the place.
"Keep the cast for at least a day or so." Revelli asked of her as he wrote up a page of a medical report she could give to her sister to stick in her medical file, as she laced up her left boot to leave. "Paparazzi at the gates is an expected complication from events such as last night, especially as we opened it up to the locals this year, using a false name might not help you evade them if they report on you and your details don't match up to what the police have."

"I didn't use a fake name." Sonya informed him bluntly, accepting the file to stick in her purse. "The name is one of my aliases, the more civilian one, which has a background available to be researched and nailed down in any investigation."

The elderly Sun hummed appreciatively as he started marking out a suitably doctored report to give the civilian law enforcement agencies, including her alias wholesale. "That simplifies things nicely, thank you."

Sonya slid off the berth, balancing awkwardly on the thick plaster caked around her foot and reluctantly accepting a crutch from one of the Sun nurses that aided the Guardian Suns in their work here. "Sure… I'm cleared to go, right?"

"Of course, Miss 'de Mort.'" Lightly teased the bearded man, a bit wry and surprisingly amused instead of calculatingly reserved with her now. "Have a good day."

"...right." Using crutches wasn't that hard, and she really only needed one to pole vault herself around if need be. The Russian ignored the other crutch offered by a nurse and awkwardly hopped her way out of the wing.

Having to hold a foot immobile because she'd break the cast if she forgot for even a moment was a bit of a pain, but then again… Omertà.

Renato was waiting with Shamal, already packed for at least a week and some days long visit to Moscow, in the waiting room just off the medical wing. Surprisingly, Fiorella was also present with a box in hand and patiently waiting.

"Little dragon lady," the hitman she was apparently dating greeted, attracting attention of the other two she knew of in the little padded chairs with him, "done?"

…they needed to have a really long talk. Preferably without the brat and an innocent in the same room. "For now."

Lady Vongola got to her feet, the box cradled in her hands. "Miss Bazanova, Sonya, thank you."

"I really honestly didn't know you were behind me." She protested a touch slowly, rebalancing on her left leg and resting her right on the ground.

"Either way, I am uninjured when you are." The woman corrected her simply, prying the lid off the box and showing her the contents. "I had Ganauche visit more than six stores, and seven shoe outlets, to find a pale copy of the heels you lost removing a sharp object aimed at me last night. I'm sorry they're not exactly the same."

"...oh, thank you." She still had a free hand, taking the box and inspecting the slightly different style of silver heels tucked away inside made her smirk. "At least this way my sister can't bitch at me for ruining them, even if she can't steal my shoes as she's not the same size."

"Ganauche bought several of them, as he wasn't sure what size you were." Fiorella informed her brightly. "I'm sure at least one of them could be sent to your sister if you'd like."
...seriously, was he defective or something?

Why didn't he grab either the cut-up heel, or the still intact one if he didn't want awkward questions asked about the blood, and use that as a guide?

"I think my sister would appreciate that, if it's possible." Admitted the Russian after a moment of wonder spent over what might be wrong with the Ninth Generation Lightning Guardian. "You didn't have to do this."

"I appreciate being alive." Lady Vongola stated with a small smile. "I also appreciate you for your help in staying that way, however 'accidental' it was."

Sonya froze, eyes widening, when the woman stepped closer and gave her a hug. She was still a bit too surprised to react when Fiorella pressed a kiss to both cheeks and stepped back.

"Thank you." Fiorella repeated with a squeeze of her shoulders, before turning and leaving the waiting room.

Renato waited a beat even after the lady's heels stopped echoing back to them, then lazily stood from the seat he had taken. "Nono would appreciate you waiting just long enough for him to have a word with you, but other than that we're ready to leave."

She shot him a dark look over her… 'gratitude' present.

Shamal heaved a tired sigh as he slid off his seat. "You're in trouble again?"

Shooting the kid a look of his own, the hitman sniffed and straightened the lay of his suit jacket and his cuffs. "Of course not, the little dragon lady's merely-"

"Yes." Cut off the thief flatly. "You're in trouble. Consent is a thing, Renato."

"Of course it is. And, may I point out, I was waiting on that." Countered the Mafioso shortly. "Which, if you've failed to notice, I haven't done anything without your complete consent to it."

…he might have a point there. Sonya still didn't appreciate finding herself in a relationship without even knowing if she wanted it, the man was complicated enough to have as a friend without trying to also figure out how to be a girlfriend on the fly.

"You can date someone without being in a relationship." Renato pointed out for her simply, quietly enough that unless a Mist was specifically trying to eavesdrop on any conversations in this room it would remain between them. "However long you take to decide is how long it will take. I know better than to pressure a lady into anything."

"You'll be waiting a while." She informed him bluntly, working on the entire 'leave the Iron Fort' thing with the use of only one leg.

She still didn't know what if anything she was sexually attracted to. He had the aesthetic her brother thought she liked, so Cherep was probably right about that part as she was really mostly annoyed at the whole 'lack of asking' part than the 'we're dating' one.

Admittedly, that lack of asking was more her failing to understand the subtext in a conversation she really had thought was just about criminal behavior in his dating life…

…foolish indeed.
He snorted behind her, easily overtaking her slower progress and oh so helpfully holding the swinging doors that led deeper into the Iron Fort open so she didn't have to figure out how to get through them.

She pointedly ignored him in favor of seeing where their godchild was at.

Shamal glanced between them, then sighed heavily. "Mamma... you introduced yourself to me as Mister Renato's 'lady friend'. Lying is a sin."

"Am I not a lady?" Sonya inquired sourly. "I am female and yes I am his friend. Therefore, 'lady friend' is still correct. Significant other is a fair bit different, brat. And I do not believe in 'sin'."

The brat blinked up at her. "Then how do you know what you're supposed to do or not to be a good person?"

"It's called 'don't be an asshole'."

Looking as if she just told him a fundamental secret to how the universe worked, Shamal wandered after his godfather in a bit of a daze. "...hey, wait. What happens if you are an 'asshole'?"

"Then I need to realize it and try better." Deadpanned the thief, awkwardly hopping along after him. "Fucking up is inevitable, we're human. We just fail sometimes in various things. Accepting that is shockingly difficult occasionally, but sometimes it's only through mistakes that we learn those kinds of things about ourselves."

"...there's a smoking lounge about two hallways away." Renato offered after a moment, as she was passing him. "I'm pretty sure Revelli wouldn't let you smoke in there, and the brat and I can wait in the parlor right across the hall."

"We still need to talk, Renato."

"Yeah, I'm aware of that."

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 27th of December, 1969 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"I'm... sorry, who are you?"

"I'm Galina." The sharply attired and sensibly dressed woman repeated in almost perfect Italian with the marks of being Mist-learned, with a smile that could probably cut steel effortlessly. "Sonya's personal assistant. As well as the head expert in the Soviet Union on Lightning Flames. You wouldn't happen to know where my boss lady is right now, would you?"

That was... what Nilda thought the woman said.

"She's currently in a meeting with Nono Vongola," offered the Rain a touch blankly, fully appreciating why one of the maids rather desperately and nearly ran her over to handle this particular visitor, "I can take you there, if you think it needs to be interrupted?"

"Oh no, I can wait." The brunette Lightning insisted pleasantly, yet somehow seemed entirely unamused and a touch deadly all at the same time. "She's not going to be happy to see me, after all."

"We can wait outside the room, they're in a side parlor right now."

"...delightful." Galina assured her, that sharp smile not wavering a touch. "Please."
Well, in a way, it made sense a Cloud would take a Lightning on as an assistant. Those with emerald green Flames were pretty indestructible at times but taking advantage of that feature seemed entirely outside of Sonya's behavioral patterns noted to date. Then again, her Lackey had Lightning Flames too.

Thinking that way seemed almost discourteous to the thief's very nature, but Nilda wasn't valued as an agent by Ottavia for being shy of investigating that kind of thing. It was an assumption, not proof of anything but a surprising fondness for Lightnings right now.

…just an idea to keep in mind.

The Soft Rain couldn't exactly stop looking backwards at the woman clicking along in her wake but Lightnings could be pretty hard to read and the only thing Galina's body language suggested was glee. Pure, utter, glee.

Thankfully, that did spike a lot of her previous conclusions. If she was about to be punched through a wall or three for whatever bad news she was here to deliver, the woman wouldn't be this excited.

Well, she wouldn't be this excited if it was a bad outcome that was possible. It might be a good one to her, Nilda didn't quite know this new woman's personality or outlook that well to call it either way.

Russians. Why couldn't they just make sense?

Then again, if they made sense then she and several others wouldn't be so entertained by them.

Croquant Bouche and Ganauche were 'guarding' the door their Sky was through, probably getting a few choice words of his internal security thrown his way by a highly unamused Soviet Storm-Cloud he was trying to both placate and thank for saving his wife's life. Gesturing to the wall opposite of the door to the parlor, where a tiny young Shamal was idly waiting and amusing himself with his Flames, the Rain was utterly surprised and not the Lightning merely greeted the godchild of her boss and took up a position next to him to wait too.

"Hey, Miss Galina." Shamal curiously looked up at the woman suspiciously. "Why are you here?"

"Because." The named woman informed him simply. "Let's just say Sonya's forgotten a few things, and I'm here to both remind her and provide a bit of entertainment."

"Entertainment for who?" The kid questioned suspiciously.

"Myself of course." Galina informed him brightly, that same sense of unease and danger that came with realizing a live wire was loose and hanging about one's head nearly pouring off her again. "Why else would I do anything this far from where we're supposed to be?"

"So... not only is Mister Renato in trouble with her, she's in trouble with you?"

"She's not in trouble with me." Countered the Lightning with a thoughtful frown, tapping a deep green nail against her red lips. "But I'm not surprised that asshole is in trouble with her."

Nilda now would not be parted from whatever the hell this was supposed to be for love nor money. The Ninth Generation Lightning Guardian was already shamelessly staring, with the dark-skinned Mist it was harder to tell anything about him so it was entirely possible he was too.

Shamal puffed out his cheeks at the insult to his godfather, but let it go surprisingly quickly for a slight spoken about a Mafioso he practically idolized. "...is Miss Anna with you?"
"Unfortunately, the Mirror Lady is needed back home." Admitted the Russian, a wry smile for the pout aimed up at her. "I know, I didn't really like leaving her behind as it is. I have a bit of something for you, about that project the two of you are co-opting. Just tell me when you want it, or I'll give it to you on the trip."

Who was 'the Mirror Lady'?

Well, if there was something 'co-opted' between Shamal and another… a Mist?

Assumptions again, but the Rain really couldn't help it. There was almost nothing else to draw from but the words the two of them were using and finding out the truth would be entirely fascinating. "Miss Galina, do you need anything?"

She got a green glance from the brunette, and a dismissive wave after another second. "No, dear. I'm fine."

With a Lightning, Nilda was probably already made as an informant and someone not to trust. Lingering around was probably not putting that to rest at all.

It didn't greatly bother her, Sonya already knew and was aware of it. What the Lightning did with that information would be telling of how her nature expressed herself, but with a Hard Lightning to compare to not more than a meter away it was pretty obvious the woman was a Soft Lightning.

Soft Lightnings weren't really all that desired in Italia, they tended to be a lot more stubborn than it was worth to bend them to certain tasks outside their interests. Then again, with Hard Lightnings it was almost impossible to get to buckle down and focus hard on something for longer than three hours.

Nilda and Galina, as well as young Shamal, didn't have much longer to wait. Which was good, because the tiny Mist had nothing else to say to the Lightning woman and she seemed entirely fine with that. Nothing more to take into account to make an accurate judge of the new Russian with.

Renato was the one opening the doors, and Sonya froze when she realized her assistant was standing with her godchild across the hallway.

Outright froze, to the point even those with Timoteo inside the room still realized there was something up and became curious.

"Why are you here?" Demanded the Storm-Cloud flatly, barely using the crutch she was provided to help conceal how not injured she was to anyone outside the Iron Fort waiting to snag a picture of the guests leaving the mansion so they could speculate more about the disastrous Ball's fallout. "I left you a shit ton of things to do."

Galina merely smirked, which made her 'boss lady' lean backwards away from her. …this was not the relationship Nilda had expected.

"...what?"

"I said 'stop leaving me behind', boss lady." Observed the Lightning woman idly, flicking her nails and checking the coat of polish on it for imperfections. "Which, you noticeably have failed to do."

Grey eyes narrowed suspiciously. "What did you do?"

The smirk turned wicked, the owner utterly unafraid of the Cloud entirely not happy with her presence. "I have a car waiting, and directions. If you would, Sonya?"

"...son of a fucking bitch." Growled out the highly unamused Soviet blonde, awkwardly hopping the short distance she needed to not hit anyone with her crutch or break the fragile cast around her right foot and providing the image they needed her to present for at least a couple days. "Fine, let's get this over with."

"Of course, boss lady." Agreed the Lightning brightly.

Sinclair looked just about as nonplussed at the interaction as Croquant did, which was at least a lot better than the utterly baffled expression on Ganauche's. Shamal, on the other hand, accepted it as a fact of life not worth note and trotted after his godmother with the Lightning.

"...I thought she was a pure Lightning." Observed the hitman after a beat, watching the Russians' somewhat slow progress even if the thief was pretty acrobatic even on one leg and a stick to vault herself along on.

"She is." Nilda confirmed simply, still rather fascinated by the two women's relationship.

Visconti very skeptically glanced at his fellow Guardian who had Lightning Flames, then snorted dismissively.

(ooo00000)

(Saturday the 27th of December, 1969 continued. Moneglia, Province of Genoa, Liguria, Italian Republic.)

Sonya eyed the six-story tall building she was apparently the proud owner of, utterly unamused. "It's... a castle."

"Yes, yes it is."

She considered it, but eventually had to admit defeat as to figuring out why her Lackey bought the damn thing. "...why is it a castle?"

"Well," Galina offered from her side just shy of politely, "aside Peter and I, and your godchild, there are Mingxia and Yaozu to think about. The Mirror Lady, Usov who might just snag his parents, anyone else from the Soviet Bloc you might wish to make away with. Your siblings and your parents, Bjørn, that asshole behind you, Fong if he wishes to visit his little sister, Verde and Adrik when they resurface. Even discounting how many would be temporary guests at best, that's still about ten rooms if they all don't visit at once. Twenty if they do. For about... the next ten years."

The Lightning paused just to take an audible breath.

"Then, of course this is depending on if you keep this longer than that decade, Shamal's future friends or significant other. Your possible future significant other. Mine, the Mirror Lady's, your Lackey's, anyone else's I've already named and the kids of such pairings if we eventually have any. Any friend you make in the future, and any more people you make away with."

Renato was already cracking up behind her rather loudly, leaning against the car and just about at the point of nearly wheezing to get enough air to continue with. Shamal was off exploring the grounds of the castle and running off his energy after a near day long trip by car to get here. It was a gated property on top of a hill, so she wasn't greatly concerned just a touch wary of where her brat was because she had yet to inspect such fencing keeping things out.
Björn awkwardly fidgeted with the file she should've probably actually even just glanced at before this, keys to the gate still in his hands and puffing a bit from rushing down the rather long driveway and back without a car to drive himself around on. "There's twenty-six rooms here, Dama. Bedrooms, not counting... any other rooms. Also, about three acres of land here as well as some of the surrounding countryside. In case we might need an apartment complex or something along those lines built later."

"Of course," continued her Lightning ruthlessly, gesturing around at the slightly overgrown lawn and the plant life slowly taking over the gardens, "there's also the upkeep to think about. Maids, gardeners, maybe some guards? We're pretty close to the local village, so it's possible some will come from there... but for a head housekeeper or just a butler to keep things on track to be neat and orderly?"

Sonya rubbed her temple. "...Galina, how did you do this?"

"I did nothing." The woman sniffed in insulted dignity. "Karma is a bitch, boss lady."

"What's next? First you stick me with a school, now a fucking castle?"

Brushing imaginary dust or lint off her smart blazer jacket sleeve, she shrugged. "I'd say a zoo, but you're already halfway to collecting one yourself."

She merely blinked in the face of the glare she shot her.

"There's only so long you can scare me, boss lady. I've gotten used to it, and I know perfectly well you're not going to hurt me." The Lightning pointed out pleasantly. "Again, stop leaving me behind."

"I can't bring you along yet." Sonya shot back irritably. "Björn has the excuse of being my handler, I add you as some kind of secretary and I won't be able to wiggle under the radar as a lone woman traveling rather than an improbably strong thief. Us together would be more suspicious."

"I visited China. That was fine." Galina countered pointedly, a hand on her hip and gesturing with her other hand. "Then you immediately fucked off, leaving me to answer very awkward questions of where our founder was to the rest of the school. The first school year is half over, you really need to put some kind of facetime in with your damn employees."

"I can't." Repeated the thief a touch desperately, not really able to keep the emotion in her voice out and sighing when the hitman behind her suddenly stopped laughing. "I can't go back, Galina. I'd end up murdering Gedeon in seconds of him opening his mouth, probably old man Zolotov right afterwards, and that's... worse than suicidal. The vory would get involved then, and I can really only take on so many opponents at once. I'd rather not do that to Arseniy and Lisa, or my siblings."

"I'll help you avoid our clan's idiotic heir." Promised the Lightning a lot more seriously than she had been treating the entire conversation. "I've taken over your office for now, Dmitriy's almost done with his prison sentence, and I'm certain your mother will help us. The rest of us will help keep him away if that's what you need."

"I need to leave, but I promised."

The other Russian flicked a green tipped hand to the slightly neglected castle they were standing outside of. "And you're leaving. You're gone for long stretches of time, just be gone in Moscow for a few days every month."

"That's playing with fire." Sonya informed her flatly. "I don't know if I can control myself, Galina. I
"You're a Cloud." Renato spoke up, sauntering over to them now he was finished laughing at her. "For a Cloud, you're perfectly controlled. Try to be more Storm than Cloud, if you're that worried."

…she should not immediately fantasize about throwing handfuls of Storm Flames at a particular Sun user she found annoying.

He snorted back another huff of laughter. "Not what I meant, but sure."

"May I add you still count?"

Galina blinked in a completely lost way, reminding her that other people were not aware of what the Italian Sun could do and that was suspiciously lacking context for anyone else to know what was being discussed in what way.

"The obvious, Galina. He's also a Sun user I find annoying right now."

The Lightning pursed her lips. "Do you two need a moment?"

…well, this was probably as far from possible eavesdroppers as she might be able to get. "Go find my brat, would you? Ensure he's not getting into anything too dangerous?"

Sonya darted up the front steps using the railings instead of the stupid crutch and tested the doorknob to ensure she didn't have to pick it to look over what needed to be done to restore the place and make it habitable while she had a much-delayed talk with her best friend.

Björn hesitated but slipped the key ring he had back into his pocket when she pushed open the front door without needing a key. "I'll... just wait with the car then. We do outright own all of this, paid for in full. I was able to sign as a proxy, so I just have to sign it over to your brother for things to be set as you want it, Dama."

"Wait, one last question." Turning around, the thief gestured to the entire plot of land situated on a hill right outside of a resort town by the name of Moneglia on the Ligurian Sea's coast. "How did we afford all of this?"

"...Dama, you put thirteen bars of gold aside for clan dues." Her Lackey pointed out a touch warily.

"Before you say anything," chimed in Galina in a flat tone, "may I add they were four hundred ounces? Each. Four hundred troy ounces of solid, nearly pure, gold. The kind banks use to trade money around in bulk."

Sonya blankly stared at the both of them. She sort of vaguely recalled robbing a minting office attached to a bank for most of that, then the more recent bank in France added four more because she could easily grab them. "...and?"

Renato very nearly slipped off the stoop-stairway thing, staggering a step instead and gripping some rusty wrought iron a touch hard to the point he got rust smeared on both palms instead of just one like her.

The Lightning put her carefully made up face in her hands, the Lightning-Storm shifted a touch sheepishly.

"Dama, a bar was more than enough to pay the clan for all of us. Actually, it was slightly a touch much. By... more than half of the bar." Her Lackey informed her helpfully, and still a touch warily but more confident in answering this question. "Actually, by standard conversation rates, gold is sold by the ounce at about thirty-six, thirty-seven, euros. You had over five thousand ounces in storage. Even after taking out some money to pay clan dues for all of us, you had more than enough to purchase this place outright at the lower end of the asking price. Which we didn't pay for all of this, but it was possible."

…and she didn't really have to worry about paying Galina's, Anna's, maybe even Usov's, fees next year or ever anymore. Hopefully there was enough to cover her and Björn's dues next year, or equally hopefully he already paid it.

"...so, how much money do I have?"

"How do you not know?" Demanded the hitman hotly, looking torn between being angry and being entirely incredulous with a touch of exasperation added in almost as an afterthought.

Sonya blinked at him, then wordlessly gestured to her Lackey and the castle until she figured out how to actually phrase that. "It's a thief-thing. We all are really bad keeping track of money and how much we're worth. I gave the job to someone else for a reason, mind you."

"She's got a point." Galina offered after a moment of thought. "What we steal and its price then, and what we can actually sell it for, do fluctuate a lot. Depending on a lot of factors."

"She forgot she had thirteen bars of fucking gold." Renato countered, apparently settling on being exasperated from his tone. "Heavy bars of gold."

"It's easy to do." Dismissed Sonya flatly. "They probably weren't the only ones I have... the rest are... somewhere."

The Lightning-Storm held up a finger. "The deposit box you had me rent back in Switzerland? I think you stashed a few smaller ingots there too, Dama."

"I think there might also be another deposit box in... erm, France?" Tried the Storm-Cloud slowly, trying to recall if it was France or somewhere in Spain. "Whatever, one of the accounts gets charged upkeep so the address is somewhere too."

Staring at her flatly for a long moment, the hitman glanced at the rusty brown smears on both palms and then tilted his head back so he could fully see the sky over the six story tall castle and below the brim of his fedora. "You. You, little dragon lady, are a headache."

Having said his piece, the hitman stepped past her and into the slightly dusty entrance hall behind her.

"Forgetting thirteen bars of gold is a bit much, boss lady." Allowed the Lightning fairly, stepping off the dirt driveway path even in her impractical heels to investigate exactly where Shamal had darted off to.

The thief shot her Lackey a look. "Did you forget I had it?"

"...Dama, I found it." Björn clarified for her. "I just knew it was the gold you had stored for dues, not how much you had or what it all was worth. I didn't know until I did a full audit on your accounts this summer to figure out how much there was and how much I had to remove to pay our dues and what I could set aside for your desired home here."

"So therefore no one forgot about it." Sonya insisted loudly, shooting the Mafioso inspecting the marble floors and cracked paint behind her a look. "Or at least, the one that should've known about it did."

"Whatever you say, little dragon lady. Any more stashes of insane amounts of money stored away for a rainy day you can think of off the top of your head?"

…did the stones in the school count?

She didn't know how much money that represented, nor if they were going to count it as 'hers' or just something she might actually be able to access for emergency funds.

…in that vein, the Zolotov Clan's obshchak funds might still count as money she could tap. Depending on what the Sovintnik decided upon if asked, anyways. Or the clan's derzhatel obschaka, the bookkeeper guy actually in charge of paying out of the obshchak when a member needed the assistance. She didn't know who the fuck that was for the Zolotovs, having never needed that kind of help.

She was still a member, at least for another year.

Renato gave her a pointed look. "Now then, does your Lackey have track of those too?"

"...shut up." Snarled the Storm-Cloud, staggering through what was her brand new but somewhat old front door on one leg and trying not to break her flimsy cast-thing in ways most humans couldn't. She slammed the door behind her, just because she now could slam her own damn front door. "Furthermore, I'm not the ridiculous one here."

"Are you not?" Inquired the man absently, testing a slightly creaky door that apparently led into a walk-in closet affair.

It really needed a scrub down, preferably with bleach. The hinges needed oil, or outright replacement, and the window frame's wood was cracking so either a good sanding or new windows all over.

…how did one take care of marble floors, anyways?

"No, I'm not." Yanking her attention from the multicolored stone under her left boot, the thief slightly hobbled carefully beyond the greatly open foyer and to see what the other door right across from the closet-room opened up to. "You don't do exes, Renato."

"...and?"

"What am I supposed to do when my best friend suddenly decides he's had enough of dating me?" Sonya demanded a touch testily, because that was really a big point to why she wasn't a fan of this idea. "I like you as a friend. You're a really good one for me, I don't want to lose that."

"Well, that's not insulting at all." Renato drawled a touch dryly as he came up behind her and peered into an empty but bigger room that didn't look like a really expansive closet. "And, in fact, I have two exes. Both of... well, one of whom you can still find in Mafia Land. The other is more than likely dead, not someone I don't talk to."

She leaned backwards just far enough to give him a searching look. "And how long did these relationships last?"

"My first ex-girlfriend? We were together two years." He informed her bluntly. "We were sixteen, not too shabby for a teenage fling. Broke up mutually just before I even knew you existed, because we were going in different directions and the effort to just stay together didn't outweigh the benefits."
Natalina still works in Mafia Land, I'll introduce you two if you want."

"The other?"

The hitman simply shrugged. "Less mutual, but I was apparently not what she wanted in a man. She broke up with me, about three years ago. I don't know where Irene is anymore. She used to work the hitwoman's trade with me, but she doesn't anymore. Odds are that she's dead or went back to her originating pocket of the mafia for the rest of her life and failed to tell me."

"And how long did that one last?" Questioned the thief suspiciously, leaving that room to see what was around the corner and likely down a hallway.

"...three months." He allowed slowly, a rather disgruntled frown aimed at her now. "Can I point out you've never had a relationship along these lines?"

"Exactly." She shot back shortly, using the wall to keep weight off her right foot. "Frankly, Renato? I have no fucking idea what if anything I'm attracted to. You may be it, or I might actually prefer women."

"Want some help figuring it out?" The Mafioso called after her hopefully, holding up his still somewhat rusty hands when she gave him the look that deserved. "Just saying. Wouldn't mind in the least, little dragon lady."

"How about I figure it out, and we'll talk about it when you get back from killing yourself off?"

Renato sighed a touch heavily at her tossing his upcoming 'death' back at him, which after Shamal threw an entire bitch fit at him earlier this summer her heaping more on top of that was probably equally as bitchy of her, inspecting his palm rather than look at her. "Yeah, that was pretty much what I expected."

"I'm not saying no." Sonya clarified warily, pausing a touch just to wait until he looked back up. "I'm saying check back in a bit. Like a year or two, or more probably three."

"...I'll take it." He informed her wryly, pulling a handkerchief from a pocket to clean his hands on. "I'm going to go see what the upper floors need, yell if you need help."

(Sunday the 28th of December, 1969. Mafia Land.)

Fong paused for a moment, wary over the admittedly strange amount of attention being paid to his person. It was unusual, even for his first day here when he made a few painful blunders that more than showcased how new he had been to anything not styled the same way as his native land.

He didn't think the rumors or tales of the First Underworld Martial Arts Tournament had spread ahead of him that much, as it was only a few weeks from finally being finished.

The fact he won it, even after the unexpected and unscheduled interruption via the Red Guard and a highly unamused Russian Storm-Cloud's brute force extraction of the hostages, should not be widely known yet in any exact detail. Not that he found the conclusion all that impressive, several weeks of a pause enforced due to renegotiations needed to start it up again meant it wasn't a continuous fight to set them all on the same level in the end.

At least he ensured Lu Shui paid for his targeting of the Wo Hop To Triad's hostage. Probably best his little sister had not been present in the country to witness that bout, as while he had a few new scars the Lightning he faced in the end would likely require a fair bit of time and a Sun's help to ever see again.

They would have to see if that fixed the man's fixation or not, or if more 'severe' consequences were needed.

"...is that him? Or one of the others?"

"Who knows? They all look kind of alike to me."

Eyeing the two he could overhear got him nothing, the two men speaking French immediately left his field of sight with visible haste.

…not a positive rumor, then. At least, not one anyone wanted to discuss with whomever fit a description.

Amending his plan for what to do first now he was finally 'exiled' to Mafia Land again, mainly for his own protection from the current unrest but it was still an exile, the martial artist aimed a general wander in the direction of the minor 'Chinatown' slice of the center residential district of the island.

One of the more permanent residents should know what was currently being bandied about in the gossip network.

Strangely, the subtle or not attention aimed his way got worse when he entered the district more of his fellow Chinese natives were likely located. Therefore, he did match whatever description was being gossiped about more than two French speaking individuals could identify.

Warily, Fong sought out the teahouse his Triad had connections to. It would be best to get to the root of the problem and solve it quickly, rumors such as what he seemed to be the target of could mutate in unpredictable ways given the international and multilingual society that made use of Mafia Land.

He didn't really have long to wait, before the tea he ordered was even served someone nonverbally requested to seat himself on the opposite side of the table.

Not someone he knew by sight, but someone he intended to learn the name of rather quickly as he likely had several more years of exile ahead of him and someone readily available to inform him of what had gone on when he was gone was likely smart. The invitation to join him for the tea was accepted politely.

"So..." Wondered the older man curiously as Fong took his first sip. "...did you get the Mafia Land Cloud pregnant?"

The Storm spat out the tea rather quickly, coughing a touch hard as the liquid got into his lungs and hiding it behind his left sleeve as he recovered his breath. "...what?"
(Thursday the 1st of January, 1970. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Timoteo Vongola blinked blankly at his Lightning and Storm Guardians, who had returned to just drown whatever was now bothering them in copious amounts of alcohol. While Ganauche doing something like this was not particularly rare but such incidents didn't normally last very long, and Coyote Nougat joining him without at least reporting in to their Sky first was particularly rare and reserved for incidents that beggared belief entirely.

…given how this entire holiday had gone, he wasn't sure if he wanted to know at all right now. He swallowed that down and squared his shoulders, because if something else was going wrong he should probably know quickly.

The two of them had been chasing a lead, of some type they were not certain would pan out. Something he knew had come from Sinclair, but not the details of as he had been dealing with a very upset wife and managing the security review with Visconti when they left in such a tearing rush.

"Coyote?" Prompted the Ninth head of Vongola warily.

"...your wife's assassin was killed in the process of being apprehended," started the Storm slowly, slurred a touch more than normal which at least meant he had been working on drowning something for a while before the Sky had sought out his newly returned and so bothered Guardians to see what was wrong, "which... Tyr was not pleased about. Neither were the rest of us, honestly."

Frowning, because he had known that already, Timoteo stepped off the only staircase leading to the family floor and further into the sitting room that opened up to his Guardian's various bedrooms and personal studies. "Yes, I was informed of that..."

Ganauche held up the bottle of wine in lieu of a finger to request a moment, as both of his hands were occupied by either said bottle or his own forehead resting on the arm of a couch. "Sinclair gave a tip, just before he left here with his brat and thief and her Lightning girl, that being killed might not entirely be a dead end anymore. We just had to ask Nik-erm, Bazanova, for permission. So, we grabbed the body and went to catch up with them to ask her because we were pretty much at a dead end with it."

"...did she say no?" Asked the Sky warily, more than half expecting a confirmation. No matter how much the Russian in question seemed to not mind his mostly civilian wife, she had not been all that thrilled with anything coming from him for most of a year now.

"Oh no. She said we could this once, and if we got the people involved killed she'd kill us as the one in question is still her clansman and under her protection. She'd do it brutally and cheerfully." Corrected the Lightning depressively. "That's still not the problem, Timoteo."

"There's a Sun in Mafia Land, or more accurately a Sun in the morgue of Mafia Land's hospital." Continued his Storm in a thoughtful manner caught halfway between disbelief and a kind of wondering tone as he rolled his tumbler of whisky around idly. "They call him 'Rasputin', hailing from the same Zolotov Thieves Clan that Bazanova does."

"He does dead people." Ganauche tacked on in a bitterly dry tone, pausing to swallow a generous amount of his wine and nearly emptying it from the sound of the liquid left sloshing around. "Like... bringing heads back to life. Disembodied heads, to something approaching living even if the head's..."
a couple days dead. So, you can ask questions and maybe get an answer if you’re quick enough. Outright zombies, being raised in a morgue… in pieces thankfully."

"Rasputin informed us that the quicker we can get the dead bodies to him, or just severed heads, the better his 'talents' work." Coyote then added for the clarification, plastering a hand across his face too in order to rub at his tired eyes. "Our dead body's head couldn't really answer what his name was or most anything about his life, but we certainly got what seemed to be an alias out of it and Tyr's working on it as we speak."

"The dead can now talk." Timoteo tried to place the new information into his world view, petting his bristly mustache as he tried to work pass the unsettled feeling that gave him. "That is… I don't suppose Bazanova will allow us to take possession of the young Sun for… protection, will she?"

His Guardians didn't answer that question, because the answer was likely going to be either a blunt no or an even more pointed diatribe on how bad Vongola security had seemed to become over the years. He even really couldn't protest such, as he owed his wife's very life to an utter outsider that had very pointed words with him about his security's lack of effectiveness.

There were about six different ways that Rasputin might harm Vongola that he could think off the top of his head, most involving freshly killed agents that might keep their mouths shut while alive yet never be able to keep their secrets once safely dead. Depending on how closely associated the Sun in question was to the Soviet Flame Expert, they were going to have to court his good opinion somehow… even when more than likely his possible patron or current guardian outright hated him.

"How did his existence get pass us all? I thought the CEDEF had security there well in hand, including starting dossiers on the various Flame users that call the place home or pass through regularly?"

"Rasputin doesn't advertise what he does and getting him to admit it is… difficult." The Storm informed him slowly, dragging the hand covering his eyes down his face just to rub at his slightly scruffy jawline that desperately needed a shave. "In fact, even with the letter we had from Bazanova telling him we had permission to ask him for help… he had his assistant 'Igor' Mist-verify it came from her twice and who else might've handled it before even so much as glancing at the body we had for him."

…it was only known by a select number of people, and likely because it was security-related and for the protection of a mostly civilian woman she seemed to not mind that Sonya even entertained the thought of allowing them to make use of the Sun she knew of to get them around a dead end. Silver linings, even if Timoteo hated the thought of involving his lovely Fiorella in somehow capping off or improving his bad standing with the Russian woman that had the influence with the Sun in question.

Who might negatively impact Rasputin's opinion of Vongola and the Sky that led them, rendering any good-will courting useless for a time.

"Treated us to a whole list of questions he would not be seeking answers for, including if the guy had family or the family of anyone he knew. Which does not mean his famiglia, apparently… but the head was too dead to know that answer anyways."

He attempted to smooth down his bristly mustache, still feeling uneasy of such an available option around 'dead men tell no tales' being loose and non-controllable. "I would like to know what he finds 'unacceptable' for his work, Ganauche."

"I wrote a list." Drawing a much-crinkled piece of paper out of the suit he had apparently not bothered to change out of while rushing their dead would-be-assassin to Mafia Land and then rushing back with enough information the ones that hired him could still be found before they concealed their involvement, his Lightning sent a shock of his Flames through the paper to smooth it out and wave in the air. "Figured Tyr would demand it, actually... but he was more interested in what we did get out of the body more than questioning the method of how after he understood who we had to go through to get just a possible handle the guy worked under."

Likely because the Sword Emperor, as a master assassin himself, was aware of what a limited window he had to find the true masterminds of the disastrous assassination attempt before enough doubt or concealment could happen. More than enough time had passed for at least some if not all of those involved could wiggle out of being suspected by establishing alibis or ridding themselves of incriminating evidence. At least having suspicions would be better than having nothing at all.

Timoteo considered taking a nip out of his Storm's poison of choice as he accepted the paper from his Lightning to look over later, but... Fiorella would be highly unamused if she scented anything alcoholic on him or his breath. As Vongola hoisted Christmas Balls, they tried to keep the New Year celebrations to the Famiglia or just family mainly so they'd have some time together during the busy holiday season.

His wife was already mostly upset with him for the Dying Will Flame lies as it was, especially as Federico was a now known Sky just like his father and that was something she was scrambling to understand and help him with if he ever needed it. Daniella seemed only excuseed because his mother had advised to tell her some time ago and arranged the proof he couldn't explain away with a Storm-Cloud's likely absentely given assistance.

"...Timoteo, there's a fucking necromancer in Mafia Land." Ganauche announced flatly into the air, a slightly too sloppy gesture of a wine bottle following that nearly tipped some of the red liquid onto the carpeted floors. "A... Russian necromancer, by the name Rasputin."

The Sky flattened his mustache with the palm of a hand. "...it's not the same Rasputin as the story those Russians have, right?"

Coyote glanced up at him warily. "...he was kind of young to be the same Rasputin as that one from the turn of the century, Timoteo."

"...yeah, because Suns age so predictably." Scoffed his Lightning Guardian bitterly. "Counting Igor? I don't think we can rule it out."

"Well, given Bazanova's split-Flame maybe not being the exception to the norm for Soviet Flame users, Igor might not actually be a Mist in his own right." Countered the Storm after a moment of thought and half his current glass of whisky. "Perhaps Rasputin's a Sun-Mist mix and just splits it off to make his own assistant?"

"Stop trying to help, Coyote." Demanded the one-eyed Lightning shortly. "That's not helping."

"Hopefully," Timoteo interjected before his Guardians could start bickering drunkenly with each other, "as it's Rasputin and Igor, they are just two... or the same, Flame users making use of the historic reputation to hamper or delay any looking to control them. Him. Whichever."

"Because assumptions when it comes to Russians have worked out so well for us so far." Ganauche chipped in bitterly, causing his Sky to wince. "I... don't know who to report the guy to. The CEDEF? Just the Guardians? Should we tell the Vongola Alliance?"

"...perhaps not right now." If anything about Rasputin got out to the wrong people, just because Bazanova relented a touch in her dislike to help him keep his civilian wife safe... and the Sun died...
The Ninth Head of the Vongola rubbed the knuckles of his right hand thoughtfully, twisting the ring he wore as the Vongola Sky he wore on his left thoughtfully.

"I think… we need to find Primo's descendants." Timoteo started slowly, earning himself two equally surprised looks from his Guardians. "Or any other bastard offshoots from the former Vongola Heads. It is… more than apparent we are in need of either fresh blood or a shake-up. Something has slipped too far from my mother's time as Donna, and I find myself less than pleased with the results."

(Friday the 2nd of January, 1970. Arnseiy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"...why are you injured?"

"I'm not, really." Her younger foster daughter informed her wryly, suddenly flexing her right foot and shattering the slightly grungy cast. Working the limb probably specifically held still for a couple days now given the dusty and odd streaks of dirt on white plaster, Sonya somewhat limped a few steps with one bare and one shod foot before her gait straightened out. "Got injured somewhere with civilians, so I had to fake it for a few days."

"Right… you're taking the guest beds for at least tonight, I want to hear this. Your brother apparently brought his… unspecified friend around and they're currently bunking in your hotel suite." Lisa informed her simply, smiling fondly when Shamal stepped around his godmother and held up a bouquet of paper and silk flowers. "Why thank you, young man. I…"

…they were handmade. Not professionally created, with the minor or ignorable flaws a machine would leave behind churning out massive numbers of the same item, childishly crafted with honest care and made with intent.

Purple bellflowers, the color she associated with both her middle children due to Cherep's natural coloring and Sonya's occasional eye coloring shifts, with Canterbury bell sprigs in a shade a 'Mist' could summon to hand. Filling out the edges and spaces between were Cosmos flowers in blue, purple, red, and yellows. Just a handful of gratitude with the joy in love and life, shaded the same colors as her children identified with and her first grandchild's.

"...I think I want to put this in my bedroom, actually." Lisa hadn't ever gotten anything handmade before, not as a gift from family.

Tatiana was more likely to fuss over her, Cherep would try his hardest with Arseniy to ensure she had nothing to worry about over them, Sonya would give the spoils of her work to show she had nothing to worry about over her, and her father wasn't exactly a warm man. Valera was still oh so sourly parting out his toys if he must show any kind of gratitude…

Her foster mother had been a touch warmer personally, but the woman had shown her love through cooking and had been gone for a few decades now.

Renato Sinclair gave the godchild he shared with her younger daughter a pointed look. "That, brat, proves my point."

Sonya shot him a strange look, but the man ignored it.

Shamal scuffed his shoe against the floorboards when the two women turned to him for an explanation. "We made them in school, and Mister Renato said it would be fine if I gave them to you. But I thought you liked flowers that were alive, nonna?"

"Temporarily, yes. Keeping a vase full of them even for a few weeks is a touch tricky because they die so quickly." Taking another, longer, look over the fistful of handmade flowers it was apparent the child learned to make them on the many flat cosmos blooms. They had tiny imperfections which made it all the more charming, whereas the bigger and more intricate cupped and bell flowers had nearly none.

Obviously, someone cheated trying to make his grandmother a 'perfect' gift the best he could. She was very amused as she picked up more on the marks that meant the child before her had labored over the gift himself, including the very glue encrusted centers which seemed to be repurposed buttons.

Lisa was still ridiculously fond of the mass of glued paper and silk in her hand for a gift she had just been given. "But this? This can last, and I love it."

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 2nd of January, 1970 continued. Arseniy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"-and this is my nephew." Cherep breezed past introducing the hitman friend of his little sister's, because he seriously did not recall the guy's name at all, by hefting up said nephew to face the older Mist rather crankily following him around. "Shamal, meet Viper. Vipes, Shamal."

"Charmed." Viper flatly deadpanned in his standard greeting for just about everyone ever.

Shamal curiously peered up into the hooded face staring back at him blankly, hanging from his uncle's hand rather peacefully for a Mist user. "...are you the same 'Viper' mamma's Lackey knows?"

"Mou, I see my reputation precedes me." The older Mist sniffed blandly, tugging the edges of his cloak a touch more because he was that uncomfortable in the stuntman's childhood home even when he had no reason to be. "Perhaps, why do you want to know?"

"Bjørn had a folder dripping with Mist Flames." The brunette child informed the hooded man easily enough. "I wanted to know what it did, but it was way too strong for me. So I didn't poke it, even if I was curious."

"...a Mist with a sense of moderation?" Drawled Viper slowly, tilting his head to the side as he eyed the child. "Fascinating, mou."

"He's lying." The Sun user interjected shortly, giving his godchild a highly unimpressed look over one of Arseniy's newspapers. "He poked it."

"...what?" Sonya asked, now actually interested in this conversation more than she didn't want their baby brother pouting and scowling at her for ignoring him stacking things on her.

"Only once! And that was just a forgetfulness layer!" Shamal hastened to defend himself with, waving both arms in a kind of windmill motion as if that would help any. "I didn't know what it was until I surface-poked it, and I left it alone after that!"

"...next time don't poke things that are not yours." Viper informed the child flatly.

The thief twisted around now, to actually see her own brother holding her brat and the older Mist he was introducing the kid to. "What's under that 'forgetfulness' layer?"

"…mou, be thankful he didn't 'poke' that part."

Sonya gave Shamal an equally unimpressed look his godfather was already wearing.

"I left it alone, mamma." The younger Mist insisted with a pout. "Even if I didn't want to."

The Italian guy and his little sister exchanged a look. He eventually huffed a sort of sour sigh.
"Technically, I suppose he did the correct thing. Afterwards."

From the flattened lips on her, she didn't entirely see it the same way. "Why are you bringing this up, Shamal?"

"…I still want to know what it was, and how to do it."

"No." Viper deadpanned flatly, ignoring the pout that swung in his direction and the skeptical look the eldest Cloud in the room shot him for refusing something that might protect his highly curious nephew from his own curiosity.

Sonya sighed heavily, incurring Valera's irritation for rocking up to her knees and spilling off his toys stacked in her lap just to dig through a jeans pocket. Sliding out two bars of some silvery metal, the thief sat back on her ass so their little brother could restack her and held them up. "These now to teach him, more after Shamal has what will prevent another such incident that puts him at risk in the future."

It didn't even take a blink, suddenly the bars were in the older Mist's hands and being inspected closely. He yanked off his hood and suddenly Cherep wasn't holding up his nephew anymore, the younger Mist was floating after the older one as he selected the cushy armchair for himself. Shamal was directed to a spot right in front of Viper as the other Mist took a seat.

"Gather your Flames, child. I want that money quickly, so learn fast."

The older Italian in the room blinked slowly at the twosome Mists quickly getting into the logistics of Mist-things, then shot a strange look at his fellow godparent.

"Vipes is a bit of a…"

"Miser." Sonya finished for him when he paused to figure out a polite way to phrase it. "Viper is a miserly Mist."

"…yeah, pretty much." Cherep confirmed a touch wryly, rubbing the back of his head. "But at least he's easy to shop for."

"Shop? I didn't bother, I put a bow on a bar of gold and called that good."

Viper immediately got distracted from giving a lesson or three on Mist Flame investigation techniques, eyeing the pile of gifts stacked already in the corner for giving out in a couple days for any gleam of gold.

Cherep assumed that meant the Mist was greatly in favor of being gifted money, if he had to be here at all. Well… he got his friend an actual gift, and that was that. His sister was entirely allowed to be lazy about it, he hadn't actually expected her to give his friend anything but her tolerance.

The Italian hitman guy released the paper to lay across his lap and instead rubbed his face. "Is this from the tiny stash of small ingots you recovered from an entirely forgotten pit in East Germany on our way out here, or the store of four-hundred-ounce gold bars you forgot you had?"

"I didn't forget!" Sonya snapped back heatedly, outright sulking to go with the glare she was shooting him. "And I'm fucking picking them up again, you ass. Since you insisted I should consolidate what I have somewhere central."

"Hide them around the world for all I care, but at least get some idea of what you've got stashed in little bolt holds across the damn continent."

As his best friend looked torn between scandalized and greedy, and entirely not paying attention to the child rather exasperatedly waiting out the argument to get what he wanted, Cherep left his best friend to have his sensibilities destroyed for once by his little sister's sometimes mind-boggling habits.

He… still had to explain Viper's gender-fluid-ness to Lisa. Hopefully Tats' standby of 'if you can't tell, go with male' would not entirely shock his foster mother beyond her sensibilities.

…Russia did things really differently. Being vague on one's true gender was not something they did, it wasn't even a thing some might do for the stuntman before his sister oh-so-blandly pointed out general guidelines for him, but hopefully Lisa's time in Mafia Land had gotten her past a lot of those social stumbling blocks when it came to lifestyle choices.

Explaining things to Arseniy was going to be… well, he had a bottle of vodka stuck in the kitchen for that one.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 2nd of January, 1970 continued. Arnseiy & Lisa's home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"If you want a free place to stay, you're bunking with my brother."

"Sonya, sweetie… four adults and a child in a suite with two beds?" Lisa asked a touch wryly, passing a basket of rolls down the table for the younger Mist in the room to grab a new one. "And one bathroom between you all… it might not be impossible, but maybe a bit cramped tomorrow?"

"And a couch. Someone can sleep there I guess." Allowed the thief thoughtfully around her spoon, nodding to her mother simply as if that corrected everything wrong with that scenario. "I suppose I could? Or the brat…"

"I can entirely sleep on the floor." Cherep chipped in utterly dryly, with a bemused little smirk as he waved his fork in the air. "In fact, I insist. You take a couch, hitman takes a bed, and Vipes can have the other."

"I'll take the damn couch, the little dragon lady deserves a bed if she's taking the brat."

"Or we could sleep on the couch, I'm pretty sure we both can fit if the brat can curl into the armchair." Tried the Storm-Cloud thoughtfully.

Which might be aimed to either the Italian Mafioso or her brother, it was a little hard to tell from just context and she wasn't looking at anyone for the clue of who she meant. The vor overseeing dinner did not want to know if she was referring to the Sun user at her side or not in that statement.

Viper hesitated, apparently his frugal side warring with his sensibilities to the point it was nearly visible in how he paused with half a spoon of ruby red soup hanging in the air.
Arseniy yawned tiredly at the head of the table, blinking a couple times blearily as he inspected the utter menagerie his foster children had dragged home with them this year. A Mist of indeterminate gender, a younger Mist child, and a Sun using hitman.

…*f*uck knew what was coming next year.

The only one not concerned or wary or even remotely suspicious of even one other person in the kitchen was Valera, and the kid had no fear of anyone he might not know even now with his sister at hand and him nearby.

…he wasn't sure if he was thankful Tatiana had to give a miss to the holidays due to work-related issues or not yet.

"More beer, Arseniy?" Lisa inquired in a tone that meant his lover was having a blast presiding over dinner that included her children's various entangled relationships with foreign born criminals. Even if that made their food bill a bit ridiculous to outright thieves.

Admittedly, the Mafioso had a streak of honor to him that made him not that objectionable and the miser was kind of some financial genius of a type helping both the adult Cloud children with managing their money. He didn't greatly care one didn't want to conform to one gender and switched at apparent will, Viper could do whatever Viper wanted to do and Arseniy did not honestly care all that much as he didn't have to live with it.

They weren't bad… just… not Russian.

…he should introduce Sonya to a vor that wasn't positioned nor inclined to immediately piss her off.

Fuck knew if he didn't actually take that in hand no one would poke the bear she could be to even introduce themselves, and while she seemed entirely willing to return to them for the important family gatherings… with her leaving the clan as she was it would put her at some risk when she visited them without immediate good-will with the vory. Her Flame using brats might be more or less respectful of her, but that really depending on what type they were and what benefit she had enabled for them.

"You lot are a fucking headache."

"We love you too, Arseniy." Sonya informed him absently, probably still pondering logistics of sleeping arrangements with what was available. "Can Shamal and I stay over for a few more nights? Other than this one, I mean."

"…yes." He ignored the smirk his lover tossed his way as she returned to the table with three new ice-cold beers for him.

"I get the couch, then." Cherep finished the topic in a pleased tone, turning to his guest. "And you don't have to pay a kopeck."

"…mou." Viper immediately returned to eating, flatly ignoring the smugly pleased stuntman and the slightly wary hitman giving them both looks from across the table.

"Viper, can I ask what 'mou' means?" Lisa inquired curiously, as it seemed they needed a new dinner topic.

"…in most languages, it is the acronym of a memorandum of understanding, 'M.O.U.' In fact, in most Romantic languages which use the same general style of script." Clarified the Mist reluctantly, earning himself a few skeptical glances. "A verbal and oft non-binding agreement of understandings, between at least two if not more parties about responsibilities or duties each hold."

Huh…

"You turned it into a verbal tick?" Sonya questioned skeptically in a confused tone. "Why?"

"Because it is a good reminder that such agreements can and will often be broken, mou."

"…but you said it was a memorandum of 'understanding'." Cherep chimed in next, sounding honestly curious and a touch politer than he would be to just anyone. "If it's an understanding, why would it be broken?"

Viper gave him a flat stare over the spoon in his mouth.

"Well, with what we are?" Sinclair offered after a beat while the stuntman pouted. "It's a decent reminder to have at hand."

"It reminds me to check for lies before getting into any arrangements." Revealed the Mist flatly, in a tone that would close that topic down.

Lisa turned expectantly to Sonya, who paused with half a roll stuck in her mouth.

The hitman snorted at her attempt to avoid suggesting any new topics. "Lisa, you might want to have a word with your daughter about losing thirteen bars of gold, and her new castle."

From the look the tiny thief shot him, she was not amused by his 'help'.

"Wait." Cherep interrupted before anyone could respond to that or his sister could swallow her mouthful of bread. "We got a castle? I thought you wanted a library?"

"Sweetie, how did you afford that?" Lisa asked warily.

Still with a full mouth, Sonya pointed at Viper to pass off the blame she expected from the look on her face.

"No, your brother's friend had nothing to do with you losing thirteen bricks of fucking gold." Renato chipped in sarcastically. "Four hundred troy ounces each."

Viper made a scandalized noise, outright glaring at the woman in question.

The thief slammed a fist on the table as she managed to swallow, thankfully not through it, and turned a less than pleased glare on her own friend. "For the last fucking time, Renato, I did not lose them. They were in a safety deposit box, and Bjørn knew it was for paying clan dues. Someone knew they were there, they were not lost."

"And can you say with any certainty there's no more hidden away somewhere? From before you acquired your Lackey?"

From the expression she was wearing now, she couldn't.

Lisa blinked rapidly, adjusting to the thought their daughter lost that much in hard currency pretty much accepted everywhere. Arseniy was caught on the proof she hadn't actually wanted to leave the Zolotov clan until very recently, because that was a lot of money to store away for the clan to take a cut from, than worried she was losing easily tradable items in bulk.
"Father Luka?" Shamal asked politely when the man acknowledged them waiting for him to take a break, towing Sonya after him for the crime of not knowing the answer to his question before he could ask it. "Why do Russians celebrate Christmas on the seventh of January instead the twenty-fifth of December?"

The Catholic priest that they met last summer blinked down at the child he probably only faintly recalled, running a few of the beads of his wooden rosary through his fingers as they joined him on the mostly empty church steps he was shoveling clear of fresh snow. "Well, young man, currently celebrating Christmas is banned in the Soviet Union and as a law-abiding resident of Moscow I would hope no one observes a Christian Christmas. However, if pressed to guess why we historically celebrated Christmas on the sixth of this month instead of another date…"

"…I didn't know it was outlawed." Commented the thief blankly, which really had no impact whatsoever on her plans nor did she think it would impact Lisa's. It might explain why Arseniy wasn't really a fan of the whole idea, other than the 'gathering up to check in with him and getting presents' bit.

"It's a religious holiday." With a shrug, the fur hatted young man gave the child still peering up at him in confusion a wry smile that didn't correlate at all to how briefly they each knew one another. "The birthdate of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ is actually a strange thing, no one really knows the true date he was born. In fact, several possible birth dates were suggested and discussed about two hundred years after the event would have taken place and certainly well after anyone could just ask or write it down."

The Mist stared at the man blankly, which earned him a small but bright laugh. "Two more notable dates, the twenty-fifth of December and the sixth of January, eventually won out with those that carried Christian faith from those early days onward. There are… some, who suggest the dates were picked because of the old pagan winter solstice and the Roman Saturnalia festival fall within the range. However, the proximity to the turning of the calendar year should also be taken into account for both dates as well. It is equally as likely it was merely added to the end of the year to offset the New Year's celebrations, or just because that was a celebration to hold at the same time as others, so Christians were not left out of any holiday considerations as any other explanation."

Luka pondered the original proposed question for a silent moment, as godchild and godparent exchanged a set of looks, then continued in a more thoughtful tone. "If it is a family gathering on the seventh, well… then we're not celebrating the banned holiday of Christmas, are we? Giving thanks to one's parents and siblings, as well as the rest of the family you might rarely see, is just something everyone does at family gatherings. As well as exchange belated birthday gifts."

Shamal snickered, stuffing a mittened hand into his mouth to hide it. The priest winked at the kid. "I thought you might like that."

…so, he did remember them at least enough to have assumptions of their general character or was assuming all children would delight in sneaking around laws. Not… really something Soviet citizens made assumptions about, which gave the former theory more weight than the latter.
"Entirely unrelated question… Father. Are there Catholic Christian services on the seventh?"
Inquired the Storm-Cloud blankly, the real question she had come with the brat to answer when they already did Sunday Mass with Renato that same morning. "Since we're here and everything and is again not remotely related to this discussion. We just want to know if it's an option to do that day."

Getting home to only turn back around and head here again hadn't been her idea, but Renato had 'connections' things to do so she couldn't rely on the hitman to do it himself. If the Italian really wanted to expand, or at least make notes on who to start with once he returned as someone else, his informant network here it wasn't her business.

"Ah... we're always open." Luka temporized with an amused smirk for her, bending back to his work shoveling the paved paths of the church grounds. "$I cannot say what may or may not be on sermon that day, but it is entirely possible we will be touching on the usual things most Catholics turn their mind to around this time of the year. By popular demand, not because of any other considerations."

"How the hell have you stayed open?" She tried next, more than a touch confused about how a church survived the current political climate in Soviet Russia.

Especially like this, the guy wasn't remotely concerned if she was an undercover KGB agent or something that would report him for anything he was telling her. Benefit of doubt was not something internal Soviet security agents held in mind.

"It hasn't been easy. The government isn't really a fan of us or in belief structures entirely. A number of our brothers and sisters were in fact thrown out of their churches and monasteries already... and a number of the buildings demolished behind them." With a sigh, the priest quirked another smaller smile when Shamal darted off to his salt bucket to help him prevent the stone steps from freezing behind him and becoming a hazard to slip upon. "But we remain faithful and have a faithful flock. That's really all we honestly need to remain and tend to them as we were called forth to do."

Sonya eyed him suspiciously, not entirely sure how he could live like that. She'd be a paranoid wreck… but maybe he was just used to it and didn't dwell on the possibilities. After a point you just got used to pressure or strain your lifestyle pressed down on you, or what others thought about it and might do in response.

…or you broke into pieces and became a shallow mockery of oneself.

"We went to go see the Miracle of Lanciano, Father Luka." Shamal reported to him, shaking a plastic scoop of salt on the cleared sections of stone for the man. "$It was exactly where you said it would be."

"…actually, there are two bloody churches in Lanciano proper, more on the outskirts. We were just lucky to catch mass in the right one without having to go across the damn street to the other one or hunt through the countryside." Corrected the thief blandly, adjusting how much of her Storm Flames she was using to keep warm when her breath misted more than it should given the priest's own puffs of semi-exertion.

Luka tried to hide the smirk by ducking his head, but utterly failed in the face of someone trained for catching deception than he was in giving it. "Ah... my apologies?"

She snorted, unimpressed.

"We can help Father Luka for a bit, right mamma?" Asked her brat curiously, gesturing with the empty scoop to the pathway they had walked up to get in speaking distance to the man in question.
Considering it, and not coming up with a reason why not aside 'didn't feel like it', Sonya glanced back down the footprints left in the snow then to the surprised priest. "…whatever. Got an extra shovel?"

She did a lot of things she didn't want to do, and as it was her godson asking… she could put up with an hour of menial work.

"You don't have to." Luka pointed out slowly.

"I mean this in the 'nicest' way possible." Sonya informed him flatly, holding out her leather covered hands for his shovel. "Go find a pair of damn gloves before you come back out here."

The smile that then crossed the priest's face was amused and wry. "Ah… of course."

…why was he so damn amused with the both of them?

(ooo0000oo)

(Sunday the 4th of January, 1970 continued. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Oh, for fuck's sake."

"Now what?" Cherep asked mostly idly, preparing his couch-bed arrangement so hopefully he wouldn't get a draft down his spine tonight.

Viper was categorizing Sonya's mysteriously multiplying book-furniture, apparently not able to really help but price everything around herself. As long as she put everything back, his sister probably wouldn't care… but he did have a word with his best friend about the hazards of stealing from thieves before letting her into the apartment suite.

The dusty end-table of books affair was the latest stack of paper-turned-furniture to be picked apart and a list made of the contents, and the Mist currently had her face in both hands as such list floated in the air next to her.

"…this is… Cherep, I don't think I can do this…"

"You steal my sister's books, she'll take your hands in revenge when getting them back." The stuntman warned warily, flopping down on his bed to give his best friend a look over. "Or more probably your spine and turn it into a bookmark or something, but hands seem to be her go-to option for lesser infractions so… depends on what she sees 'stealing my books' as. I'm guessing a bit higher than 'annoying her', she didn't even like loaning them to us as kids."

Gesturing nearly violently at the stacks of carefully floating texts that had made up the end table before Viper disappeared everything on it to ensure the dust lining the edges of the books weren't bothered, she wordlessly mouthed something but eventually just settled into a vicious scowl instead.

"It can't be that bad."

"These! These are priceless." Shoving said 'priceless' books in his face, the Mist then gestured to the coffee table that was more book than wood now and waved a hand to include the building piles in the far corner of the sitting room. "I could sell these for a small fortune to any collector interested in the art of the Russian people before the Tsars' fall, some of the others to collectors of rare and out of print books and… they're making an end-table. Or just stacked in a pile. She won't miss it."
Snagging two of the tomes, the stuntman paged through a few of the 'Antiquities of the Russian State' just to see it was a book full of paintings. "Yeah… then she'd murder you in cold blood. Probably. Please don't piss off my little sister, Vipes. There's an entire bar of gold in the end for you if you don't, on top the bribe she paid you to teach Shamal to be careful in Mist ways."

She made an outraged sound for his dismissive flipping, snatching the volumes back quick enough he got a papercut.

Cherep stuck his bleeding finger in his mouth and gave his friend a pointed look, then extracted the digit and inspect the non-papercut marred skin thoughtfully. "I'm sorry she's ridiculous?"

There was a loud snort from behind him, the guy with the curly sideburns wandering into the sitting room on his way to the kitchenette. "Ridiculous is putting it mildly."

Viper suddenly wasn't female anymore, for the entire 'skirt' of the tunic he seemed to prefer wearing to bed suggested he was, fast enough the hitman didn't even blink an eye at the change.

…maybe he caught the switch, the stuntman was not betting on that. "So… I didn't really get the story of the castle yet…?"

"Do I need to start wearing a Goddamned name-tag for you?"

"Might help, yeah." Cherep informed the guy a touch sheepishly.

"Renato Sinclair." Viper volunteered, waving a hand and reassembling the end-table while also calling back the table lamp that had been perched there but for some reason not the glass ashtray. "Mou… his name, Cherep."

"…right."

"One lovely Miss Galina deemed the little dragon lady remiss in her boss duties, more specifically for leaving her behind." Drawled the Italian tonelessly, pulling some kind of beast of a machine out of the lower cupboards and hauling it to the counter. "Apparently continuing some kind of in-joke between them, which started with a school house? Galina failed to report the change of 'a house in the countryside' to 'a bloody castle' her Lackey deemed would be just enough to fit all her followers or varied dependents, then went to ensure her complaint was felt in full using said castle."

From the growling noise the Mist was making, Cherep privately bet Bjørn had some explaining to do when it came to his tutor about where that kind of cash had come from.

"…so now we've got a castle." That he signed his name to, because he got to hold the deed to his sister's library.

Tax season was going to be… interesting. He didn't quite know how it went in Italy, or in any capitalist country, so learning should be… something. At least he was promised help, and that the thief he was holding an entire castle for would pay the taxes on the property for him.

"That she's likely to turn into a library, even if it's six stories tall and has more than enough space to comfortably house twenty-six people within." Renato confirmed blandly, now messing with the sink.

"Which would mean the little dragon lady will become aware of any theft of her books shortly."

Viper made a face, sulking as he pulled himself upright from the floor.

"I'm not sure if Sonya would sell them." The stuntman informed the Mist that slunk to the couch next to him grumpily. "So… asking her to have them since she'd done reading them might not be an
The hitman behind him snorted again, waiting for his machinery to start working.

"Personal experience?" Cherep asked brightly, because as much as a terror his little sister had been as a child about her books, she had to have gotten worse over the paper when it came to those outside her family.

"Nearly lost a couple fingers trying to see what she was just finished reading once."

"Is that coffee?" Viper interrupted before he could get the details out of the Mafioso, warily peering over the back of the couch. "Do us both a favor, keep it away from Cherep."

"Ho?"

"I'm not that bad, Vipes."

"Yes, yes you are." The Mist shot back, already grumpy about the wealth he couldn't touch around them and finding an outlet such as this meant he couldn't derail this before stories got told. "Sinclair, do not give him any. Mou, Clouds on a caffeine kick are impossible and I don't feel like dealing with that again."

"Worse than Mists on a sugar rush?"

"Yes."

The Italian very pointedly clicked off the apparent coffee maker now he had a cup of the black stuff. "Noted."

Cherep stuck out his bottom lip at the Mist, getting an entirely uncalled for suspicious eyeballing in return.

---

(Wednesday the 7th of January, 1970. Arseniy & Lisa's Home, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Right, everyone get to the couch." Lisa dictated like the tiny dictator she was, pointing helpfully just in case the guests had forgotten the way there.

Sonya pointedly rolled her eyes at her brother, getting something small and hard pelted at her blonde head in revenge. Probably a nut, from the bowl of shelled walnuts that had been provided as a before dinner snack if anyone was that hungry.

Renato politely waited for the women to pass him, even the Mist of questionable gender, snagging Shamal by the back of his sweater before he got underfoot with this many people in a surprisingly reasonable-sized house given Soviet sensibilities.

'Packed in like sardines' wasn't entirely out of the question, depending on what part of the city you were in. This house was in a neighborhood on an outside 'ring' of the city, more rural than downtown Moscow and thankfully less cramped with it.

He'd greatly rather stick with the Storm-Cloud than with her male family members, but he couldn't justify getting in Lisa's way as she spent pretty much the entire day cooking enough to feed nearly a dozen people. If he was being polite to one woman, it wasn't in him to snub the rest as it was.

Even gender-questionable, possible ladies.

Tatiana nearly brutally hip checked the front door open, scrambling inside on slippery boots and puffing hard from her haste. "I'm not late!"

Cherep let her run into him with a fond grin, preventing the Sun nurse any damage to either herself or anyone else that happened to be using the hallway. "Sure you're not, sis."

"She's not. We're still waiting on one more." Confirmed their foster mother simply, inspecting her camera for any damage it might've suffered over the year as the rest of the people crammed in her home filed into the room obediently to her orders. "Siblings first. You all know the drill."

"...nonna?"

"Pictures." Lisa informed Shamal simply. "I have one from each of the years they spent under my roof, and as long as they're coming back they can be in Valera's. Anyone else want some while I have the camera out?"

"Not particularly, but if you can get the brat at least once I'd appreciate it." Shamal did have a childhood picture album that somehow survived the house his father raised him in burning down, he should dig it out and give it to Sonya with any other pictures he could finesse out of the Vongola maids. Some of them were armed with cameras as a matter of fact, half to help document the young years of their next generation of Skies and half because a picture was oftentimes worth a thousand words in any kind of report.

Sonya hummed her agreement as she allowed her knee to be used as a kind of stepping stone for her younger brother to climb up on the couch with. "One for me too, Lisa."

Viper very pointedly was not in the room anymore, somehow while also being close enough for him to pick up a wonder of where his and/or her gold bar was and how much they could get for it. The vor of the little family was both scowling and suspicious of the Mist's disappearance, which was probably not doing that guest any favors.

Renato rubbed the bridge of his nose.

Christmas, or at least the 'Russian' variant of the holiday, was almost over. A month or so, then he'd pick the thief back up to do Shamal's First Communion.

Then he'd be abandoning Sonya for a good two or some odd years to raise the brat the rest of the way herself. A good three months at most before he cut himself off from anyone that remotely knew who 'Renato Sinclair' ever was, and he'd never have to suffer through semi-awkward situations with the family of a woman he was interested in but wasn't interested in him or anyone yet.

He had most of a plan hammered out, as long as he could stop recalling little bits he really had to get out of the way sometime before 'killing' himself off. At least a photo album wouldn't be too odd to pass off near or at a holiday people did take family pictures on.

The camera's flash had him looking up again, as the siblings resorted themselves off and Arseniy deemed the entire spectacle over with enough to risk heading for the nearest end of the couch.

"Right." Turning suddenly to catch Shamal off-guard, Lisa clicked a picture of him without a flash and then actually started disassembling her camera. "I'm not sure how the rest of you do Christmas, but we're thieves. You get it to it and it's for you, open it."
"Finding it's half the fun." Arseniy chipped in wryly as he stretched out to not participate at all yet got about four bottles of various different liquors immediately placed within his reach by his foster children.

"But... Mists." Cherep chipped in, pointing to the older one in the room with a solid chunk of gold in hand already. The 'bow' held on with twine, but it was a good amount of the precious metal. "My point, right there."

It wasn't actually a gold bar, but a gold tael. A boat-shaped chunk of gold from the Far East. Still more than what even he could hold in the palm of his hand.

…Sonya then had stashes in the Orient as well, or at least started on one recently.

"Cheat, why don't you."

"Okay. Shamal, sort them out for us? Everything in the house and not already in someone's hands." Sonya asked, slipping a hand into her jacket pocket seemingly to ensure the things in there were still there given she retracted them without anything visibly in them.

Renato cocked an eyebrow at her, because as far as he knew she didn't smoke in her mother's home and her pipe was in the other pocket of her greater wool overcoat.

The thief obligingly slid whatever it was in her hand in his pocket rather smoothly, once the brat had a pile of things in various states of being 'wrapped' on the floor in front of them all to distract everyone with. He didn't particularly like the habit of standing around with one's hands in slack pockets, but he made an exception this once.

…from the feel of it, something very much like a knobby necklace or a string of beads. With a cross attached.

A crucifix?

On a rosary.

He blinked at her blankly. She pointedly paid attention to their godchild instead, who was pulling something that looked as if it would match what she just gave him out of a small bag too.

The hitman was also pretty sure the one being investigated was made out of nearly solid turquoise most of Vongola would not be happy he had. Silver fittings and strung together on string, not chain as the one in his pocket felt like.

Sonya then very pointedly and loudly thought that if no one saw him with a yellow jade and moonstone variant of the rosary in their godchild's hands, then he didn't have to ever admit it was part of a matched set. Then promptly wandering off to get her presents, leaving him with an unseen but matched item of Catholic Christian worship he didn't have to 'lose'.

Renato had to give up, or at least had in storage with Tatiana already, nearly everything he owned or could put a claim to. He'd even be switching which guns he used, as well as the moonstone strips in the grip of his holdout pistol and the fedora the two of them gave him two years ago. Basically, anything and everything 'Renato' was known to have or make use of.

While he honestly did not expect to get most or all of it back at all, excluding the things the thieves weren't storing obviously for his godchild and not him now the godmother had a native address the brat was moving to, some few pieces might be salvageable after enough time passed.
It would be entirely understandable why an Italian hitman had a rosary, as long as he took specific care with the thing to ensure no one saw it in the next few months he could keep it with him. Better than an easily incriminating picture, or anything known to be 'gifted' to him already, would be as a reminder of why he was doing it at all.

As long as no one saw him with it before he 'died', and with a touch of care that would be easy enough to accomplish. As long as no one in a room full of thieves noticed her slip him it, which… actually seemed to be the situation.

Of course, it came from the woman had admitted she had no blessed clue nor interest in their religion but would go along with parts of it as long as they wanted to.

The already battered front door opening yet again gave an obvious reason to pull his hands out of his pockets, and the Mafioso leaned back against the living room wall to clearly see the elderly man that was very reluctantly knocking snow off his boots before stepping inside the house.

Pyotr the Zolotov Sovintnik glanced at him skeptically, then slowly wandered his way over to stand in the hallway right outside the main sitting room of the house.

Lisa had been more than prepared, snapping a picture of the man she was apparently the daughter of even as he glowered at her disapprovingly. "Well finally, father. I was wondering if you'd wait until just before midnight to claim you did arrive on time or something."

All three of the man's grandchildren stopped what they were doing to give both their foster mother and grandfather skeptical looks, even if Sonya had to interrupt her glaring match with Valerian about if the zebra plushie he had been gifted deserved a spot of honor in the middle of her lap instead of the handwritten journal she had been trying to read already.

Tatiana sniffed not entirely hostilely, returning to the pictures taking up her lap and sharing them with Lisa. Cherep blinked a few times but went back to sorting out a socket set easily enough. Sonya was the only holdout, ignoring her baby brother taking advantage of her distraction by piling more of his gifts into her lap for safe keeping.

"April." Pyotr informed the woman simply, then turned right around and went to the kitchen for something suitably alcoholic.

"What's happening in April?" Shamal asked of his godmother, already wearing his rosary and halfway into a rather dusty and old book Viper was outright glaring at in some kind of outrage.

"...I haven't the faintest." Sonya informed him blankly.

"The Pakhan is retiring." Lisa supplied helpfully from the couch between her eldest child and her lover.

"Oh, that means I'm done with the Zolotov Clan in April." Amended the Storm-Cloud thoughtfully.

"Why does he only do that with you?" Cherep asked of his sister before anyone not of the Zolotov Clan could ask how she was accomplishing that nor what the still current members that made up her family viewed that, nodding to their little brother for the identity of 'him'.

"I was stupid and protested getting stacked on." She informed him blandly. "Now he's mostly proving a point."

"You're never getting rid of us, baby sis." Tatiana informed her brightly in an agreeing tone, sorting the pictures she had in her hands back into the envelope they had been gifted in. "Also, we're moved into our place already. You and Bjørn just have to sort out your things from the condo and my old apartment. But now, I've got to run to get back to my shift tomorrow morning."

"Good luck sleeping well on the plane." Sonya tossed behind her, rather grumpily unmoving when the redhead lunged forward to engulf her in a hug that included being smothered from behind by a significant portion of her generous chest.

"Brat."

Cherep gleefully returned his hug, Valerian ignored the Sun pressing a kiss to the side of his head, Shamal blinked when one was pressed to the top of his head, but thankfully the nurse stuck to a simple wave for Renato.

"Bye Gramps, I saw you, Viper! Did you see the vase yet?" Tatiana called down the hallway as she left nearly as abruptly as she arrived.

The older and active Cloud Flame user gave the one he was twinned to a strange look.

"Viper's been training Bjørn in Mafia Land. Of course they've met." Offered the thief slowly. "I wonder which vase she's talking about, though."

"...probably the one in the corner there, Nya. That Viper's been pointedly and entirely blinding himself to the entire week." The stuntman pointed behind him with a thumb to an ancient vessel of white and blue painted porcelain, a wry smile on his face when that didn't seem to make much of a difference to her confusion. "You should've heard Viper gripe about the books you've got in the hotel suite."

"Silence." Said Mist demanded shortly, walking through the wall just to pin their friend with a glare under that hooded cowl.

"Speaking of, would you ever sell a book you own?" Cherep continued without so much as glancing at the other or taking in the highly unamused expression aimed in his direction.

Sonya blinked at him slowly. "...sell?"

"What people do with books they dislike." Prompted the man after a beat when that was all she had to say about it. "Or have no use for. Or I suppose 'donate', to either a second-hand book store or a charity auction or just someone else that might like it."

The thief continued to stare at him blankly.

"...I'll take that as a 'no'!" Concluded the stuntman after another long moment, scuffing a hand through his ill-shaved jawline. "You know, eventually, you're going to fill that castle up with books. What are you going to do then?"

"Build an actual library on the property we already own." Dismissed the Storm-Cloud shortly. "We've got more than enough space. Why?"

"Just checking to ensure my nephew won't die by book avalanche."

"That only happened once."

"To you, then once more to Tats." He corrected cheerfully.

Renato palmed his face in exasperation. Apparently ensuring she bought more than enough
If she had any idea of how many books she had right now, he'd eat his hat.

(Thursday the 8th of January, 1970. The Morgue, Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Edik blinked, turning to warily inspect the far corner of the ill-used viewing room that made up his usual work station. Waiting a few long moments, the Sun eventually went back to documenting his work today and what was left to do for the next shift to finish off.

He could've sworn he saw someone watching him from there, and as far as he knew no one really wanted to inspect any of the bodies currently on ice.

Well… not yet anyways. There was one slightly younger than twenty that his originating syndicate might want investigated, in fact the papers in his hands were probably going to be copied and sent out to them so he was double checking he had everything filled out according to Mafia Land's policies.

Snapping his head up suddenly, not waiting for another flash of something out of place to inform him there was something off, earned him… nothing. Either he was being paranoid, or someone was specifically screwing with his head.

"…Igor. Am I seeing things?" He tried next, prompting Sergej to set aside whatever he did when Edik was working and start leeching his Mist Flames more actively into the morgue's various nooks and crannies.

Mist Flames made everything even more chilly down here, but they were Russians. They could take the cold better than most, even if most of a year in a tropical climate had adjusted their tolerances rather more towards warmer temperatures.

The Mist popping into existence right next to him meant nothing good. "…there's a stronger Mist than me in the room, Rasputin."

Edik gave his assigned support, and a decent friend as much as any Mist liked having a friend they had to guard, a wary look in turn. "Was it because we helped…?"

"I don't know." Sergej commented after a moment, still focused on something only he could see that the Sun couldn't. "It's… not entirely hostile. I think we're being investigated."

"…for?"

"Our allegiance, apparently." Allowed the Mist slowly, not remotely sounding confident in that. "And what we deem acceptable to assist in."

"Nothing, if this is what we earn doing anything." Insisted the Sun sourly, shooting a skeptical glance to where he had spotted someone studying him from a far corner of the morgue.

"…apparently, that's a bad idea. According to the other Mist." Sergei refuted neutrally, even if his Flames took on a frostier edge in response to whatever communications the two were having. "…Rasputin?"

"What?"
"Excuse me for a second."

Edik blinked, and suddenly wasn't in the morgue anymore.

Primakova and Kappel both looked a bit nonplussed at his sudden arrival in the doctor's cramped personal office. Which was fair, the Sun mortician was equally as surprised and as confused as they were for a moment.

"I think someone's attacking my Mist." Edik informed Tatiana slowly in English, running his fingers nervously over the file of paperwork in his hands as he tried not to stumble over the still unfamiliar language he didn't really practice as much as he apparently should've. "Another Mist is, I mean. One Igor said was stronger than him."

His fellow if rather exhausted looking Sun wrenched a phone off the cradle, dialing for the island's internal security and reporting the attack on a bodyguard of one of the employees the moment she seemed to have a connection. The doctor that most of the Russians preferred getting their duties set through pulled a snub-nosed revolver out of a desk drawer and checked the bullets loaded into it.

"Why," Kappel asked the moment he was armed and waiting for what would happen next, "is a mortician Sun being attacked?"

Tatiana hung up the phone once the more important details were conveyed, pulling her own gun out of a holster at the small of her back to then check over. "Aside the usual 'Suns should be healing the living and not dead' complaint we continually get about Rasputin, to the point we changed his name to lessen the paperwork?"

"I have a rather… interesting ability." 'Rasputin' answered for himself a touch dryly, regretting that he never picked up a personal weapon as he had Sergej normally at hand to do anything violent required. "One I feel is not in my best interest to share right now, nor ever, if admitting to it once incurs this kind of attention."

Given the initial reaction to his ability, obviously admitting what he could do would never be greeted with any kind of interest or approval. Edik had known it was a bad idea to help Vongola with their dead body, whatever the Lightning guy tried to claim about not getting him killed for helping. Hopefully, Sergej would be okay and they could go on denying there was any reason for a Classical Sun to be haunting a morgue.

If not, he would need to have a word with Bazanova about what kind of attention she aimed in his direction.
"You have got to be kidding me."

"...why do you like them again?"

"Current evidence to the contrary, they're not actually incompetent." Renato informed her a bit sarcastically, tossing his hat to the coffee table she was semi-sure was newly bought instead of the old one her Lackey used to have. "Shamal survived, didn't he?"

Sonya glanced over to the child in question, who didn't understand English and was currently nose deep in an encyclopedia of lizards studying his Cape Dwarf Chameleon Luigi and his and/or her biology.

"Yeah, well... I would kind of hope so, given he's living in the dead center of their territory." Tatiana mocked back, rubbing her temple and just generally looking miserably tired. "Igor's not woken up yet, thankfully the clan's got his hospital bills since he was injured in the defense of another clansman on our time. Kappel and I have been trading off being on duty at all times, the CEDEF have this interesting assumption of outright owning Rasputin even if we keep saying 'hell no'."

"There is a phone in here, right?" Inquired the thief curiously, getting a wary nod from her sister. "Right. Renato, you have fifteen minutes to make a call before I head to the hospital and deal with any more kidnapping attempts in the same way I dealt with sex traffickers."

The hitman bolted off the couch, changing direction almost mid-step when his fellow Sun directed him to the kitchen.

"I do not think I want to return the brat to the Iron Fort anymore."

"You don't exactly have anywhere for him right now." Pointed out the redhead, slouching down more in an armchair she was certain had come out of Bjorn's old apartment. "I mean, I understand why... but you share godparenting duties. And it is the largest criminal syndicate in Italy he specifically asked for help from and got. Whatever the price it cost him, it's worked so far."

"They seemed to have gone downhill rather quickly." Mused Sonya sourly, drumming her fingers on the arm of the brand-new couch she was sitting on. "Admittedly, international efforts are kind of a new thing for them given the headache of the Second World War and the two heads they had to go through until they could look beyond Italy's borders again... but this is getting... beyond infuriating."

It was something to at least keep in mind. Timoteo was probably horribly unprepared in dealing with foreign interests as Vongola went back to being a stable criminal power, and Daniella would have only rarely dealt with anyone peaceful not from Italy for most if not all of her years. The Mafia Wars did occur before World War Two, meaning even the Eighth Sky of Vongola's time as Donna would've spent fighting against her own countrymen and later directing criminal war efforts in ways the Vindice would not object to.

Their efforts on home ground would probably be a hell of a lot better than their international efforts and aided more by their very long history as the top dog in that corner of the world.
Tatiana, in all her nurse/older sister wisdom, merely shrugged.

"Does Rasputin want to stay, or go home to Moscow?" Eventually asked the younger sister curiously, wondering how the young Sun was taking being such a target for his abilities.

Admittedly, no one really had liked Edik's ability with dead things and Activations right off the bat. Sonya might've but then again, she was more admiring of the new aspect that Sun Flames could be applied to than focused on the whole 'zombie' part.

"I have no idea, he's sticking close to Igor's recovery room or the morgue when he feels up to it."

Mist brat suddenly scrambled off the floor, adjusting Luigi back to his shoulder before the chameleon could fall off him, and dragged the heavy book over to the thief. "Mamma, what is this word?"

The encyclopedia was probably over Shamal's reading level, so Sonya glanced over the passage he was pointing out to her while balancing the book on her lap. "...vivipara? Um... good question. Give me a second, there should be a dictionary around here somewhere."

Apparently, it was over her reading level too.

"All your books are stuck in the room that's going to be yours. I got the master's, just because it has its own bathroom and that way I won't always wake up you or your Lackey trying to get ready for a midnight shift in the hospital." Tatiana helpfully volunteered, smirking wickedly over at the both of them. "Also, because the both of you have left me to move us in and I'm demanding recompense."

The blonde rolled her eyes at her sister. "Whatever, Tats. I have a fucking castle so you're welcome to the master room in the apartment."

"...when did you get a castle?" Wondered the older Russian in pure surprise.

"I'll tell you later. But it involves Galina's bitchiness." Ignoring the brat snickering as he hefted the encyclopedia to his thin chest again, so she had the room to get up and help him, the younger Russian raked a hand through her hair. "Are you done for the day?"

"If you're now here to handle Rasputin? Yeah. I'm going to go knock out." The Sun nurse reconsidered things after a jaw-cracking yawn and a heavy sigh. "Well... I'm going to head to the hospital first and let Kappel know, then probably wait for you to get there and deal with the worse of the attention Rasputin's drawn, then I'm heading to bed."

"Glad I can entertain you." Sonya shot back dryly.

Ten minutes was more than enough time to find a dictionary, translate 'vivipara' into 'viviparous', and then from there to the definition of 'propagation via live birth'.

Shamal's Luigi gave birth instead of laid eggs.

"Okay, now we need a food source." Sonya informed the kid quietly, slipping the English-Italian dictionary shut and setting it on her forlorn and unmade bed which also looked brand new. "It is possible to have them eat pure Flames, as Anna found out... but that might not be the best idea for a main food source given what Renato's going to be doing shortly. He might not have that to spare, brat."

"...a few of Luigi's beetles are imported." He observed slowly, ghosting fingers across the glossy pages of his encyclopedia. "What if... what if they eat Flames? And Luigi's baby can eat them? Then the beatles can go out and find Flames, then come back and be eaten."
Not a bad idea, but why would they come back to Luigi's baby and not just get into the wild and live there? We need to be sure we don't introduce an invasive species to the world, kiddo. That might do a lot of harm that way…"

"Because…" Looking around a bare and half-assembled bedroom for inspiration, Shamal shifted his lizard to his wavy brown hair to free both hands in order to flip through the book of lizards again. "…because they need Luigi's baby to make more beetles? Like they need to be eaten by a Flame-lizard to hatch their eggs, and Luigi's baby is the only one around anywhere?"

The brat suddenly looked excited at the prospect as he thought it over more.

"…that is actually a really good idea." With Renato's abilities, he might just be able to keep an eye or several million on his surroundings then. Tying the new creatures together, ensuring they couldn't reproduce wildly out of hand, did keep things neat and ensured there would never be more than the baby or adult chameleon could or would eat. "But this does mean we need to research Luigi's beetles then."

"…I don't remember what they're called, mamma."

"That's fine. I'll get an encyclopedia of Africa's insects, you can look it up once you can get a beetle to study. You can probably start on Luigi's baby right away, and the beetles just before you hand the pregnant chameleon over, as long as you keep in mind what they're all for. We only have so many more months, brat."

Shamal pulled his pet off his head, frowning as he stroked the lizard's half a foot-long body which was… mostly tail. "…I'm going to miss him."

Sonya couldn't suppress the wry smile. "I know, but it won't be forever. He'll be back, eventually."

The little pouty face he shot her should not be that amusing.

"I need to go do a bit of work. Will you be fine here alone, or should I ask Renato to linger a bit until Tats gets back?"

"I'll be fine, mamma." The almost seven-year-old brat informed her sadly, scratching at what looked to be a dry patch on Luigi's skin much to the lizard's delight. He hauled himself up her bed, snagging the encyclopedia and her dictionary too in order to keep flipping through the both of them. "I'm just going to stay here and read."

"Try not to dwell, brat." Ruffling his hair, and exchanging wary looks with his chameleon, the thief got up and left him in her room.

The hitman standing outside her room looked a cross between confused and a touch guilty. He did follow her a couple steps away from the door, before speaking up. "What's this about 'Luigi's baby'?"

"Act surprised when he tells you, he wanted to do it himself." Sonya sighed, not surprised they were unable to keep him in the dark the entire time but mildly impressed it was this late before Renato caught on. "And if you're sticking me with a dog, then you're not getting away with only a year or so of lizard."

"…ho?" He eventually picked to be amused, given the wry smirk crawling across his face. "I'll be sure to get you a mutt instead of a purebred one, just so you'll have just as much difficulty looking up any health risks."
"Fuck you too, Renato."

"Oh my god, stop flirting unless you're going to do something about it!"

"Well I would, but your sister-"

"Shut. Up."

Tatiana popped her head around the hallway, looking faintly excited. "Really? Finally?"

"What the hell do you mean 'finally'?" Demanded the thief, then only honestly thought about it after the words had left her mouth and just palmed her face instead of looking at either of them. "No, never mind Tats."

Ignoring her, the nurse gleefully turned her attention to the Mafioso. "So... how long did it take to clue Nya in?"

"Several months, a pregnancy rumor, and her getting a knife through the foot." Renato listed off dryly, stepping out of easy retribution range just a touch too fast to be really nonchalant about it. "I eventually got fed up and flat out informed her we were dating when she insisted she wasn't that dense."

"You have some impressive patience."

"I know." Drawled the hitman smugly, buffing his nails on his lapel.

"We're leaving now." Sonya interjected shortly, seizing her sister by the wrist and starting off first. "Brat's in my room, stay if you want, we'll... or she'll, be back in a bit."

It was a bit tricky to not break the Sun nurse's wrist and accomplish the leaving she really fucking wanted to do, but eventually the Storm-Cloud's strength won out over the redhead's desire to gossip.

"Well... if you want advice that bad-"

"Tats, shut up."

(Sunday the 11th of January, 1970. CEDEF Security Center, Mafia Land.)

"Well, no one's dead... right?" Ganauche questioned, rubbing at his temple that was throbbing from a mix of irritating situations and a red-eye flight to get out here again fast enough to help handle the situation. "Bruises and a broken bone aren't really enough to murder her for."

"Sir, you have-"

"She's a fucking Cloud. What did you expect in return for trying to 'poach' her students? A dismissive shrug and a 'fare thee well'?” Interrupted the Vongola Lightning Guardian exasperatedly, raking the hand through his hair before he ended up speaking into his palm instead of seeing the face of the man he was talking to. "She had cause, one you weren't all that transparent about, and we can't deny motive anymore to protest 'uncalled violence'. You tried to do something stupid, she beat your guys up. It's allowed here. Please, for the love of fuck, stop being stupid. We can't do the same things here as we can in Italia."

"That makes nothing sound better."
Nearly jumping straight out of his own skin, he almost tripped over himself turning around and facing the specific Cloud in question that dealt a fair bit of damage to the CEDEF forces keeping Mafia Land more or less contained. "Jesus fuck, Bazanova. Wear a bell or something."

The expression that crossed her face said nothing good for this little interaction, or the possibility he could get through it without hurting Vongola's reputation even more.

"Okay... they're idiots. We're kind of use to being the only option to go to if a Flame user's in trouble, in several places. They were just following old guidelines that weren't updated, your complaint has been heard and I'm fixing it." Ganauche helpfully waved in the face of the man he had been talking to, who was slowly backing up from the highly unimpressed blonde woman.

…if Cristiano really left him here to deal with a tiny Russian woman on his lonesome, he was going to get the guy transferred somewhere a hell of a lot less cushy.

Sonya Bazanova eyed the other man thoughtfully, more the spectacular bruise she had given him just last night he was trying to get her killed over. "You. Fuck off."

Admittedly, he couldn't really bitch one of the most senior of the CEDEF security team leaders immediately left him on his lonesome when she told him to. Said tiny Russian had already handed the other man his ass, that was probably emasculating enough to only really want to go through once per lifetime.

Ganauche was still going to get Cristiano's ass transferred somewhere else the moment he got home. This was a measure of fucked up.

"You, and the rest of Vongola, stay away from Rasputin." The thief demanded shortly. "I don't mind people fucking up with me, Ganauche. I'm an adult and can be an ornery fuck sometimes. I really mind when it's a thirteen-year-old medical student I am obligated to mind the safety of."

"...that'd be a little hard as we do have secu-"

"Rasputin's may or may not be going back to Moscow." She cut him off, still short and irritated but now also slightly sardonic sounding. "If he is then this might've been a pointless conversation to have, but if he isn't the clan will handle his security. Which would also mean, in the end, he's not staying here for long as the clan will likely want him back in Moscow to handle a morgue there. Then my order will have some validity, but the point remains if you do not stay away from the mortician I will be piking your people's heads on various desks until I find the right one to make it stop."

"...I thought you told Guerra you didn't rip people's heads off?"

"I ran out of fucks to give."

…okay then. Mildly terrifying thought, and while Tyr might be highly interested in how she'd do that the Lightning Guardian didn't want to see that. Ever.

"I'll pass it on...?"

"And no, I don't mean if Rasputin stays you can speak to him without me finding out and murdering someone for it." The thief continued in a bitingly dry way. "I mean if you do not fucking stop harassing my sister and our usual doctor about Rasputin's 'security' I will start immediately, today. With whoever tries next, and the desk of whichever idiot is in charge here. Even if that's you."

Ganauche thought about the implications for a moment. "…how did you get in here?"
Sonya gave him a flat stare down. Standing as bold as brass in the middle of the operations room the CEDEF were given when they took over for the Turkish criminal syndicate as Mafia Land’s security, three floors under surface level just anyone was allowed to wander through, pass any number of security checkpoints and guards posted to catch people not allowed down here before they got into anything sensitive.

Stealthily enough everyone was taken by surprise by her abrupt arrival. The CEDEF also probably needed new security measures, even if Timoteo and the rest of them had thought those here were some of the better agents.

"…point taken."

"If I cannot leave here without worrying someone’s going to fuck around and try to take Rasputin against his will, so I can take my brat back home in…" Pointedly looking at her bare left wrist, the Storm-Cloud looked back up at him just as pointedly. "Five hours, I will put someone else's head in a bucket of ice to leave on Don Vongola's desk the next opportunity I have to visit my brat. Next month. If it's rotten by then, it's your fault."

He blinked at her blankly. "I'm not sure that's how it works."

"You can have whatever argument you'd like about it with my ax blade." She suddenly pulled out one of those axes, full sized and just as gold plated as the last time she threatened him with one. "Go right ahead."

"I'll pass, thank you." Insisted the Lightning hurriedly, backing away from the heavy bladed edge shoved nearly into his remaining eye. "Isn't that a touch harsh, Bazanova? I mean, we didn't inten-"

"Thirteen, year, old, Sun."

"Okay, we did seriously screw up somehow…"

"His equally young Mist bodyguard is still unconscious, several days after the fact."

"And yes, that doesn't really look all that good…?"

"Because I pointed you in his direction to help keep Fiorella Vongola safe."

"We'll find who did it! Eventually."

Sonya hefted her stupidly impossible ax over a shoulder, left hand on her hip and an utterly unimpressed look plastered across her face. "The only reason I’m letting Renato return Shamal to the Iron Fort without a fucking argument is because somehow… you’ve yet to fuck up with keeping him safe. If it's the whole 'Russian' thing, you could've just said so."

…her brother, herself, and then her students. All of who did come out of the Iron Curtain, so it wasn’t that far out there of an assumption to make…

"Yeah… no, that's not an issue." Ganauche insisted, ignoring the weird looks the two of them were now getting because the shock of the thief appearing out of nowhere somewhere she should’ve be had worn off for most of everyone else present. "It's just different, okay? You're probably the farthest contact anyone in Italy has, and you're not something we're used to."

"How does that make anything alright?"

"Look, being different is perfectly okay… but that means you have to give someone else a little time to adjust to it and you haven't." He insisted, almost disbelieving it when the damn Storm-Cloud actually looked mildly thoughtful. "We're ironing out the kinks, but you are the first Russian to make it into Italia since World War Two... and even for the CEDEF? Adjusting regulations that work there for here is going to take a little time and maybe a fuck up or two in order to realize they need updating."

She blinked at him twice. "How about no?"

...well, fuck.

"I will no longer tolerate Vongola incompetence. The very fucking last person I have at risk in your security is a six, nearly seven, year old Mist that was placed with you without any agreement on my end. If he even gets a papercut from someone trying to kill him too, I will dedicate my life to making yours and your Sky's very existence as a living fucking hell however I can."

"If we keep your brat safe...? Now, just listen to me woman." The Lightning lurched backwards when that ax got significantly less gold-plated and more long-and-pointy in a flair of lavender tinted fire, acknowledging that descriptor had probably been the worst one he could've picked in his hopes of being neutral sounding. "Sorry, just... please. If we don't 'fuck up' with your brat, can we speak to anyone you have who's an adult?"

"They're adults, they can make their own damn decisions."

"So... as soon as Rasputin's sixteen- HOLY FUCK! I WAS JOKING!"

Kicking a solid metal desk out of her way hard enough it impacted the far wall on the other side of a fucking massive operations room, Bazanova hefted that spiky and long weapon around to where he had been standing hard enough it crumpled the steel plating underfoot like rice paper. Ganauche was already three desks away, regretting the fact he was aiming to keep her attention in the direction with less squishy humans in it which left him everywhere but an emergency exit to run to.

"I MEANT GALINA. YOUR LIGHTNING LADY! I WANTED TO TALK TO HER!" Slamming to a halt before the next desk pulped him against the wall in his way, he frantically ran through everything he might do to survive a hit from something like her. "SHE'S ABOUT YOUR AGE, RIGHT? FULLY ADULT?"

Before he could decide which direction to go in, Ganauche found himself hauled up off his feet and slammed into a steel wall. A hand masquerading as a steel trap seized him around the throat and kept him pinned a few full millimeters off the ground, enabling him to get a full view and new appreciation of the narrow blazing purple glare he was getting.

...thank fuck she was so damn short.

"I don't find child endangerment funny, Ganauche." Bazanova informed him flatly, the weapon in her hand now a full out hammer instead of the poky-thing. "At all. No Russian of my generation would."

"Noted. Okay. Ow?" Having his throat crushed was a surprisingly painful experience he never wanted to go through again, that he could still breathe enough to speak was some grace he wasn't going to question right now. "Your brat, will be... fine. Or else. Got... it...?"

He hadn't expected the fall to hurt, the woman was shorter than him and couldn't hold people up that high. Landing on his feet wouldn't be too out of the question had she just let him go. Getting tossed over a shoulder like so much refuse was surprising, and also a lot more painful.
Wheezing again when a booted if dainty foot suddenly slammed down on his chest, he warily peered up at the Storm-Cloud tossing him about like a cat would bat a toy.

"Outside of your native country, Vongola's just the word for 'clam'." Sonya helpfully informed him a touch flatly, bending over just to lock eye with him. "I didn't want to deal with your syndicate for several reasons at first, mainly because you're massive and the little operations tend to get crushed under such things due to just bloated momentum. Renato insisted you are one of the best, even now he keeps trying to tell me you're really not that incompetent and you're probably the better of the syndicates from your home territory. I don't see it."

Ouch.

"No. Not even when Rasputin's sixteen. You had your chance, you fucked it up, live with it."

"You just said we're massive. That's a lot of people, Bazanova. Who you're writing off or fucking over because their murderers might also die instead of be taken alive and we lose that source of information to chase down threats." For someone that could hit hard, the woman was stupidly light. Even with her standing full on his chest, he wasn't having a whole lot of issue breathing and could probably throw her off if he needed to. "How about observed meetings? Can we just send Rasputin a head instead? Throw us a bone, lady."

"Why do you think I care? I don't, I'm not a humanitarian nor do I care for your people or their issues right now." Apparently, the weaponry she made did have a weight and her massive mauls weighed a ton. "I'm a thief, Ganauche. I steal shit, charge other people through the nose to make use of it or have it, then I move on."

"If we get you something really shiny and expensive?"

She had the perfect angle to smash his head like a rotted pumpkin, the Lightning felt it was perfectly excusable to be intimidated right now.

"...are you trying to buy one of my students?"

"No! Just some small measure of tolerance to glance at one!"

"You want to know what would buy my 'tolerance'? Stop fucking up."

"Okay! Then can we talk about this?" Ganauche would pay someone out of his own pocket to watch every interaction anyone from Vongola had with the woman, just so nothing else happened. Timoteo wanted access to the Sun mortician, his Sky would probably refund the cost if it came down to it.

The smile that overtook her face was not a nice one, nor did it mean anything good. "Properly."

Properly? Like they hadn't...

Oh.

"Hey, Bazanova. I heard some of your students have really interesting skills...?"

"No." Stepping off him, the thief let her weapon go and started walking out of the normally busy office room.
The Lightning Guardian just lay there, rubbing his face tiredly.

Bribing themselves back into a thief's good graces was going to be expensive as hell, and maybe even pointless in the end. If Rasputin decided to never venture outside Moscow ever again…

"Hey, you didn't answer if we could just send heads!"

"You can, doesn't mean you'll get anything out of it." She tossed back negligently as she left him alone in the CEDEF's operations room.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 11th of January, 1970 continued. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"Igor's not woken up since. We're not entirely certain what's wrong, it could be anything from the other Mist breaking his mind to just exhaustion of a sort we're not familiar with."

"…depending on what kind of Mist he tangled with, that might be entirely understandable."

"We need a few Mist nurses, Nya." Tatiana informed her sister simply, running a hand over her fiery red braided bun worriedly as they looked over the still unconscious Mist. "I honestly didn't think about what kind of damage two Mists could do to one another that might not be physical, until Igor wound up in the ICU."

Sonya glanced backwards and down when the brat tugged on her skirt, kneeling down when Shamal gestured worriedly for her to do so. She froze stock still at whatever their godson was telling her, making Renato unfold himself from the wall and reach for his gun and alerting the nurse herself something was shifty.

"Fuck, your project. I forgot." Getting up but pointedly holding onto the kid's hand in her own, the blonde turned to him and stepped closer. "Renato, can you do me a favor?"

The hitman gave her a pointedly disbelieving look, until she stepped close enough for him to pick up on what Shamal told her out of her head.

Another Mist was overshadowing the Mist on the berth.

Sonya very much wanted their brat out of the way, or more importantly very fucking far from the hospital, as soon as inhumanly possible before the Mist caught on to being made and either picked a fight or tried to find a new body to take hostage. Renato fully understood, but really did not want to leave her alone to deal with that with only her nurse Sun sister at hand. "Depending on what I get out of it, maybe."

"Well... you keep insisting so, I should probably at least try it." Sonya did seriously wonder what he thought of doing for an actual date but figured that was suitably vague enough if the Mist overshadowing another Mist was listening in they wouldn't think much of 'it'. "Please."

...he was holding her to that promise. "So long as I can dump the brat off at your apartment after I fetch the parts for his school project. And you wait for me before your next meeting, I want in on that."

Then he was coming straight back, after alerting Mafia Land security and probably Ganauche the one to attack Rasputin had been located.
"Fine." Considering things, because she had committed to a flirty cover for getting close enough to him, the Storm-Cloud lightly tugged on his tie so he would bend down far enough for her to reach up and kiss both cheeks.

Recalling that Fiorella had done it to her, and figuring it was the politest 'flirt' she could get away with while also giving him enough cover to explain why he knew the situation to Shamal. All without actually thinking through the process using even mental constructs of any words.

Renato was actually impressed. If he hadn't been this close to her, he wouldn't have picked up that kind of detail. It explained how the hell she had been managing to keep some of her own thoughts to herself.

"What does the brat need?"

"An encyclopedia for African bugs, more specifically southern Africa."

…ah, that project. "Right. Come on, brat. Let's get you sorted out."

"Rasputin should be back in an hour or so, right Tats?"

"...yeah, as far as I know." Agreed her sister slowly, arching an eyebrow at the younger Russian. "Why?"

"We might as well talk to him about what he wants to do now when he gets back. Want to go grab some lunch with me until he's here?" Sonya very specifically tilted her head to the door Renato was escorting the semi-wary Shamal through, and he caught the thoughtful nod the nurse did.

"...sure. Sounds good."

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 11th of January, 1970 continued. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

Renato very pointedly slotted bullets into a clip, then slammed it home in the butt of his gun and checked the breech of it as a bullet was loaded into it.

Sonya puffed on her brass and bamboo pipe, lighting the resulting smoke with threads of red Flames before anyone could complain about her doing it in a hospital corridor.

"I get it." Ganauche informed the both of them just as pointedly, a metal rod affair that looked like it could conduct any electricity he summoned to hand tapping against his pants leg.

Tatiana was kind of sorry she didn't have a personalized weapon for intimidation herself. Tall, dark, and snarky had cornered the market on guns from the look of it... and her sister had weaponized her tobacco smoke. The Lightning guy could probably scare the shit out of someone just by jabbing the nightstick affair into someone's side, or by making it crackle with his Flames too.

From the look of things, Rasputin was not impressed at all at the muscle amassed to help his usual bodyguard. Probably more for the belated identification of his attacker not leaving his friend alone after the fact, and less for the massed firepower readied to deal with it in a very final way if need be.

The preteen was getting pretty good at dealing with others even if his job description was mostly 'working with dead people'.

"We ready then?" Asked the nurse brightly in the hospital's common language, patting her fellow if glum Sun on the shoulder.

The Lightning turned to the people he brought with him, waving his little rod at them so he would have their attention. "Remember, do not hurt the younger Mist if things become less contained."

Her baby sister snorted out another puff of ashy smoke as the Mist detailed to be the one to 'prod' whatever was overshadowing Igor stepped past her gingerly. "It is a hostage situation, not a raid."

"I'd rather not give you more ammunition." Ganauche shot back a touch flatly, rolling both shoulders that seemed a bit stiff already.

The smile that graced the thief's features was not kind as she pulled the pipe out from between her teeth and started moving herself. "I am sure. Come along, Rasputin. Let us see about this attacker of yours."

Tatiana let them go on without her, having limited combat uses made her more support in these kinds of incidents than someone in the thick of it. The Vongola Lightning Guardian grumbled under his breath on the other side of the hallway from her, going back to tapping his weapon against a thigh in some kind of nervous tick.

…was he really a Lightning?

"Yes, damn it. I am really a Lightning." He informed her a touch bitterly. "I don't know what you feed yours, but I am a Hard Lightning user."

"Potatoes and vodka, but Hard... means Classical, right?" Questioned the nurse slowly. "You're a Classic Lightning. Okay... well, that does explain a few things."

The one-eyed man palmed his face with the hand not holding a possible electricity conductor. "...really?"

"Galina's our benchmark when it comes to Lightnings still, and she's Inverted." Confessed Tatiana simply with a shrug. "I think you people call it 'Soft'?"

"Why is a twenty-something year old Lightning your benchmark for all of us?"

"Flame users in the Soviet Union went extinct for a while."

She got one wide-eye eyeballing her for a moment. "Oh, really?"

"According to our mom, anyways. Yeah." The Sun glanced at the door between them and the recovery room Igor had been placed in to be sure nothing was happening yet by the lights seeping out under it, then back to him. "For about... thirty or some years no one had Flames. About all the old timers that used to have it died off well before my baby sis popped with hers and the ball started rolling again.

"...huh."

"Your eye is really kind of bothering me." She informed him after a moment, hastening on because she was perfectly aware that was horribly insulting now she heard the words aloud. "You want us to do something about that?"

"There's just scar tissue left." Ganauche informed her after a moment of suspicious and insulted disbelief, pressing the heel of his free hand to his ruined eye socket.
Tatiana meant more making a copy of his right eye with Cloud Flames and transplanting that after she made the cells divide a few times to be real than to Activate what was left of his eye to replace what was lost. Her siblings replaced themselves with Cloud Voodoo as it was, surely that couldn't be so hard. "I still might be able to do something about it. Might, it's a thought anyways."

"What can you do our Suns haven't already thought of?"

"You'd be surprised." She was pretty sure no other Sun was the elder sibling to a pair of possibly functionally immortal Clouds, nor knew some of how they did it to wonder. "Do you mind if I research the possibility? I'm sure in reality it'll be a lot harder than I think it will be, and there's just one tiny thing you'd have to do first..."

"To replace my eye? Lady, point out who you want dead and they're gone."

"Real cute. No, you have to make up with my baby sis or my brother and somehow get their agreement to help." Tatiana smirked wryly at the face he pulled at her. "Yeah, tall order I know. But I think they've got half the solution to your little problem."

She would not be doing jack shit without permission, because that might possibly tip someone off to how Cherep could survive his work. Sonya would know better than she would, so the thief could make that call instead of her.

Ganauche made a throwing away gesture. "Nurse, your sister hates us. There's no way in hell she'd let her brother have anything to do with us right now."

"Take it from her older sister, you're not entirely written off yet. Fuck knows why, but somehow you're not." Seriously, anyone else screwing around with her as much as Vongola did and Sonya would probably cut out the middle man to murder them all herself instead of just pointedly mark out territory. "I got to this point with her myself once, the frosty bitch mode thing."

Admittedly, she got to it when the younger thief hadn't been a full Cloud Flame user and dug herself out also before she got good at using Flames. It was still possible to get out of that pit, Tatiana would know. She had needed Cherep's willing and freely offered help, but it was entirely within the realm of possibility.

Maybe.

"You don't ask for easy things, do you?"

"I'm talking about replacing an eye that looks, from the scar pattern around your eyepatch, to have been burned out."

The Lightning huffed, running his hand through some interestingly soft looking wavy hair as he thought about it.

"My name's Primakova, by the way. Tatiana Primakova, not just 'nurse'."

He flushed lightly under his light tan, noticeably. "I knew that."

"Mmhmm, sure you did." Something was happening in that room now, Tatiana gave up being confident those crammed in the room would be able to deal with the situation and pulled her own gun from the small of her back. "I totally believe you."

Ganauche was a dear and stepped forward, so anything coming through the door would have to get pass him first but leaving a clear sightline for her to shoot over his shoulder if need be.
Five painted cinder blocks suddenly being shoved out of alignment meant they had readied themselves just in time, Tatiana pursed her lips and wondered if Sonya was somehow not really pissed off or something.

She would normally throw a hammer clear through concrete, so why not now?

…because that was facing further into the hospital, and the Sun nurse that was her sister was standing in the hallway right outside the room. Having answered her own question with a bit of thought, she almost didn't turn back to the doorway in time to catch what happened next.

Igor, or whomever was puppeting Igor, came out of the recovery room backwards without bothering about the little detail of a closed heavy slab of wood masquerading as a door. Ganauche whacked the kid upside the head with his sparkling green stick, but it passed right through the Mist without connecting physically.

The arcs of Lightning Flames on the man's weapon didn't really care what was or wasn't solid, it spread anyways.

The young Mist fell to the floor like a puppet whose strings had been cut, twitching muscles jerking in protest of whatever Ganauche did.

Tall, dark, and snarky raised an eyebrow as he opened the door a bit quickly. Toeing the body a few times with a leather and rubber soled shoe instead of risk skin contact, then looking up at the Lightning Guardian who was patiently waiting for people to get their acts together and finish up.

"Ganauche got him!" Tatiana called into the room behind the two Mafiosi, earning a snort from her unseen sister.

"You mean someone from Vongola actually did something? Color me surprised."

"Um… I can understand you." The poor guy offered in their native Russian, the consonants and vowels slightly pulled out oddly in the marks of Mist-learnt languages.

"And?" Demanded Sonya shortly, ducking under her Italian stud's arm to look at Igor's insensible body. "It's the first useful thing you and your lot have ever done for me in… three years."

Stepping away from the body, and allowing the nurse in at it, the thief turned fully around and peered around the taller Inverted Sun user's form. "Hey, Misty Miss Tweets. Is the other one gone yet or not?"

"Must you?" Spoke up the lady from suddenly behind Tatiana and not in the room she had entered. "And yes, as far as I can tell there's nothing shadowing Igor's form."

Sonya shrugged. "I do not recall your name."

"It's Rosabella."

"…sure."

"She's not going to recall that either." Tatiana helpfully informed the group rubbernecking in the hallway, glancing up to the tallest Italian stud still waiting for an all-clear. "Tall, dark, and snarky? Haul him to bed, please?"

She earned herself an amused look for batting her eyelashes with her request, but the man did put his gun away and bend to do her hauling for her. Even still held out a hand to pull her back to her feet like a gentleman with a body slung over a shoulder for her already.

Glancing sourly at the Lightning that did manage to take down whatever it was trying to steal Igor's body for whatever reason, the Storm-Cloud huffed irritably as Rasputin slunk around everyone in the way to put her between himself and the rest of the Vongola people. "Fine, whatever. You send Rasputin heads, I will not object to him sending back information. If he wants to. Anything like this shit happens again, I will take him back to Moscow even if he protests and no one outside the clan will be able to make use of his ability."

Guanche glanced at her on her way past him, to her baby sister, then just nodded. "Thank you."

"I still object to anyone even remotely Vongola allied near Rasputin for any reason." Sonya insisted shortly, pressing the teenaged Sun on down the hallway and away from the influences she was objecting to as she spoke. "And my threat stands. I will start piking heads if I feel the terms are not held to."

"I'll still take it." Returned the Lightning patiently. "We are really sorry, Bazanova."

"Tell that to Igor, if he ever wakes up from this shit."

"I'll do it personally." Promised the man, entirely seriously.

Yep, entirely a Lightning.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 11th of January, 1970 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Timoteo let the receiver of the phone he had accepted click back into the rest mounted on the phone's base with a thankful sigh.

"Good news?"

Mustering up a wry smile for his wife, the Sky accepted the book he had been reading from her back. "A mixed bag, really."

Fiorella's expression turned a touch flat. "Can I know, or are you going to claim business even if you accepted a call during time set aside expressly for family?"

It was criminal in nature, having taken place on an island for such, but he might be able to strip it of questionable details so she wouldn't become aggravated with yet more secrets being kept from her. "Ah... I believe I can tell you this. Bazanova has a group of Flame using medical exchange students, one of them was attacked. The individual was caught, but no one really knows if the Mist culprit was really dealt with or if the individual that did it is still at large."

"Sonya has students?" She repeated in surprise, lowering her book and frowning over at Federico's sly attempts to not do his homework even if that was what he was told to do. "I didn't know that..."

"She is the head of a Soviet Academy for Flame users." Which... was a fine excuse for why she was invited to the social events they held. Someone should introduce the thief to her Italian contemporary, perhaps someone that hadn't had the opportunity to piss her off yet. "She loaned out one of them to us, he had an interesting skill set and it would help us tracking down who breached security during the Ball. He was subsequently attacked a few days later, in turn, presumably because of her lending his ability out to us."
Fiorella was distracted enough by that news to allow their eldest son's mischief to slide. "Oh... dear. I take it she was not happy about that."

"To put it lightly, my dear." Confirmed Timoteo sourly, giving Federico a wink for suddenly getting back on track on his work without being scolded by his mother for it. "She's still not happy, but Ganauche negotiated a bit of leeway and his help in apprehending the suspect bought us more tolerance from what he reported."

"This is another thing you can't go to the police about?"

"The Mist overshadowed and occupied the body of his victim instead of leave or try hiding in more mundane places, Fiorella. The police would have been of no assistance." If there even had been such a thing as civilian police in Mafia Land in the first place, that is. "Unfortunately, sometimes we must instead police ourselves."

"But why do you hide so?" Questioned his wife tiredly, settling back with her own book and a worried frown. "Your Sun Flame users would be a blessing to have in the medical field, or even just in places with less than reliable clinics. Storms in construction, or more specifically deconstruction of hazards, and Lightnings in a similar field helping to supply power without the need of massive and dirty amounts of burning coal or the like."

"I... do not recall the exact reasoning, myself." Timoteo prevaricated slowly. With no intent to introduce his wife into the Mafia nor the Vindice he wasn't aware how to answer that question. "I merely know it is now a law we all hold to, as well as 'police ourselves'."

From the look his lovely wife gave him, she did not find that logic all that helpful. "Timoteo, perhaps someone should look into that."

"Perhaps. I will add it to what we are currently looking for in the family's archives, as well as ask some of the more history focused of our number."

"Perhaps Sonya might know?" Suggested Fiorella thoughtfully, and a tiny bit wickedly for all it gave the Sky indigestion to think of his lovely civilian wife seeking the company of a Soviet Union thief and Storm-Cloud that was not even remotely friendly with him. "You did just say she ran a school."

"It is... possible." Timoteo had to allow, because they might actually recall the true reason the Vindice had ruled that way while they in Europe forgot. "I believe it will be another month or so until you can ask."

"Oh?"

"Her godson's seventh birthday, and his First Communion, is early February."

"Delightful, I wonder if she would mind Federico getting a preview of the event..."

"...are you going to insist on this, Fiorella?"

"Is there a reason why I shouldn't become friends with the woman that saved my life, Timoteo?"

Countered his wife a touch suspiciously, which likely meant she knew full well he didn't want her to but didn't see any 'good' reasoning herself. "Sonya was utterly honest and truthful to me even in the face of something she could've used for influence or a reward, right now I find that behavior a touch refreshing and something I would like in my social circle."

Smoothing a hand down and over his mouth and mustache, the Ninth head of Vongola sighed through his nose. "If that is what you would like, Fiorella dear, then by all means become her friend."
I think... she might actually appreciate having one like you before she even moves countries to raise her godchild."

He didn't want to put his wife in that position, where the best route to the thief was through his lovely civilian wife as Sinclair was about to do a bit of personal reputation erasing. It also opened up the risk Bazanova would say the wrong thing at the wrong moment, revealing the criminal influences Fiorella might not be open-minded enough to accept in her own husband and as their children's future.

Someone else needed to go with her...

"For the trips the two of you might take to either each other's homes or abroad, can I ask you select a female bodyguard to include? For my peace of mind, my dear."

Fiorella's frown got progressively less pointed as she recalled that as a wife of a man with political power she wasn't entirely safe outside their home and a possible reason why he was not pleased with the idea. "You... think something she might do would put me at harm?"

"Obviously not, in fact you and the children would probably safer with her as a bodyguard." Not that he had any intent of allowing such a situation occur, he owed the woman enough as it was. "No, I am more concerned for she has selected and purchased a home much further north than us and that is a bit of a trip if you wish to call upon her. With some unfortunate happening on the way that might necessitate an unexpected stop and might leave you open if anyone hates me enough, Fiorella."

Timoteo had enough 'close calls' with his wife, he would much rather annoy her with too much protection than risk another assassin possibly sliding past the Storm-Cloud that hadn't even been on guard for such a thing.

"...do you have a suggestion?"

Guerra, maybe, but the woman was getting married and had 'retired' from being his mother's main and favored hatchet woman. "It's your life, you can make the selection of a guard you might be making into a friend. I only ask you go through my mother for possible candidates, please."

The Rain might just end up part of that in the end, given her personal and unapologetically transparent crusade to become the thief's friend. More moderating influences would be nice... just in case.

"Oh... I can do that."

"Thank you."

Maybe allowing Bazanova's assault on Ganauche slide would be enough of a 'favor' to somewhat redress the balance with the incoming Russian quarter. There was arranging an introduction to the Italia's Mafia School, and possible exchange programs between them that would require some political finessing, possibly helping her Lackey find non-objectionable staff that knew of Dying Will Flames, and... Timoteo really didn't want the woman so near without someone from the Alliance overlooking what she might be doing with her fellow Russians.

He stared mostly unseeing at the opened book in his right hand as his wife settled back with her own, mostly thankful he had navigated that discussion without risking too much of Fiorella's anger.

...perhaps she might like assisting Bazanova's Lackey with finding the proper staff for her new residence. Arranging for Fiorella to overhear any discussion of the topic would be simple enough with a word to his mother, possibly a bit hard to acquire the Icelander's agreement but that would be fairly distracting enough for her to afford him time to see if anyone did know why the Vindice had the laws they did.

(Thursday the 22nd of January, 1970. Lubyanka Building, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"...actually, it might not be against Vindice Laws."

Usov peered at the cramped lettering of the file in his hands thoughtfully, then looked back up to the thief guiding him through this. "Are you sure about that?"

Sonya Bazanova lifted a shoulder in a shrug, prying the bottle cap off without needing a tool for it or a convenient ledge. "Vindice Laws said to avoid scrutiny and police after yourself; but not what is to be done if the governments we are to avoid figure it out in other ways."

Looking back at the pile of files he and the Storm-Cloud had stolen from the KGB scurrying around below their feet, because while Mist Flames were hard to resist if you didn't know they were there... with enough focus the results could be certainly spotted quickly even against a Mist's will, he ran a few fingers over the coded list of 'suspects'.

Of Dying Will Flame use. It wasn't named such, even in any of the codes the Mist had cheated his way through, but they were 'inhuman feats of interests' the KGB were on the lookout for. A handful of names, a longer list of possible locations of said acts, and what seemed to be three generalized lists of what such a feat might be able to accomplish from all available information.

Noticeably, the KGB were now missing six different headquarters worth of copies of such reports. Thirteen agents were dead or otherwise mind-wiped to know nothing, seven boxes of files in no particular order were now missing, and they were only now realizing it below.

The pair of thieves just had to wait a bit longer, to check on anyone checking any further redundant backups they might want to help themselves to.

"Were those laws for the normal criminals or for all? Including syndicate-level responsibilities?"

She looked thoughtful at the question he posed wonderingly, sipping from a bottle of beer stolen wonderingly, sipping from a bottle of beer stolen from one of the break rooms they had discovered while someone below called out a certain sector they might be lingering in as cleared. "That's an interesting question I don't know the answer to."

"Can I get one?"

"How old are you again?" She countered dryly, pulling her booted feet back from the constructed platform they were sitting upon to double-check they had everything they wanted before leaving. "What, like eleven? ...thirteen?"

"Somewhere around there, yes."

Grey eyes narrowed on the files in her hand, then those eyes flicked up to him. "No, wait. You were... six? When we met and Shamal was three at the end of that year. He's six now, you're either ten at best or nine."

...whoops.
"Usov."

"You kept leaving me out of things!"

"You're fucking nine."

"Ten!"

"Whatever." Insisted the woman flatly, pointing at him with the opened bottle of beer. "Fuck, kid. I was working by nine. I don't care about the whole... being in charge shit. The murder on the other hand..."

That's what he meant!

She was utterly unimpressed with his pouting. "Damn it all to hell and back, kid. You shouldn't do shit like that, or this, at your age. A night or there staying up, sure whatever. It's your life. You do more than an occasional night or two at your age and you'll fuck your growth up. Do you want to be shorter than me?"

"...is it really the late nights you're not happy about?"

"I started working at your age, and I've lied about my real age for a number of years." Sonya informed him blandly, pausing to drain the bottle and then speculatively peer at the label stuck to the glass. "No, I can't do anything but bitch that you might be starting a bit too early. You helping me kill Fadei, on the other hand..."

"You were in Mafia Land by eleven."

"Yeah, a few months from my twelfth birthday... not nine or ten. I didn't kill anyone until I was fourteen." She countered pointedly, leaning over the misty blue platform of nothing to see what kind of panic was going on below them now. "I know it seems stupid and pointless, because you are a Mist and your lot all seem ready and raring to go from the start, but a couple years does make a difference later on. Like when you're twenty and wondering why the fuck you're half an insomniac."

"I am perfectly mature enough to weigh the potential impacts to my health fro-"

"Obviously not, or you wouldn't be doing this kind of shit." Scoffed the older thief, groping her other side for another bottle of beer. "Just... fuck, Usov. What the hell was so damn important?"

"You were protecting me! Again! I wanted to show you I don't need it!"

"You're mine. Fuck what you do or don't need, if I can do it for you I want to."

Usov huffed irritably. "That's the point, boss lady."

Sonya paused in twisting off another beer cap, giving him a suspicious eyeing. "...what?"

"If you're going to be this way, I don't feel like explaining." He, admittedly, pouted snottily.

Of course, she didn't let it go. The files they had been over several times already got tossed into the floating box of them, the other beers were pointedly stuck into a satchel she had originally stolen them in, and the thief in question turned to face him instead of sitting sideways on the platform. "Usov."

Nope, not even her 'tending my flock' tone would get him to spill.
"You're a Mist. I barely understand your type, for all I deal with your lot a fair bit. Explain this to me so the slow and apparently socially incompetent Cloud Flame user can understand."

"I don't want to."

"Do it anyways." She countered pleasantly. "Before I end up with yet another Mist hanger-on, who has their own 'reasons' why they want to follow me. Since I have three now, and while the lot of you seem fine together I know yet more would upset all sorts of things."

Usov scowled, irked at the oblique reminder of her godchild who stole his spot. "How about I tell you later."

"How about now?"

"Aren't we in the middle of something?"

"You fucking Mists cheat, there's nearly nothing for me to actually do but point out targets you might not have thought of." Sonya countered blandly, pausing for another draw of her new beer. "Seriously, this is the most boring infiltration I've ever been on of any government building. Even that time in an African palace pales in comparison."

…admittedly, this was less exciting than he had counted on. "There's no sport to it, they can't exactly fight back or make it interesting."

"Probably a good thing, or Mist thieves would put me out of work." Agreed the professional thief. "Now then, Usov. Your reasoning, please."

He pouted again, earning not even a blink from the woman sipping beer, before sighing heavily. "You didn't want to help me. Originally. I was kind of that annoying little snot of a brat you made yourself help because it was what you were supposed to do."

"…okay, and?"

Ouch, boss lady. Not even going to try and claim he wasn't annoying?

"You stuck by me for eight days, doing things you found boring and distasteful. Letting me practically crawl over you and dictate what we were going to do each day." Usov pointed out dryly, wagging a finger at the older woman giving him an unimpressed look over her bottle. "At the time I didn't really think a whole lot about it. It was your job for that week and a bit."

"It was." Sonya confirmed dryly around the neck of her beer.

"No, it wasn't. You could've figured out a way to shove it off on Dmitriy, and his Flames did work. Not as well, but they did. You didn't, because I wanted to bother you for the annoyance you treated me as."

"First of all, you are annoying. Secondly, we had other shit to do that week. You weren't the only thing happening."

"You are not helping your cause here, boss lady."

The beer lowered, and she gave him a confused stare. "…what?"

"I am your little annoying Mist hanger-on." Insisted the Mist pointedly, waving a hand in the air. "That is what I wanted to be. You didn't have to help me, you could've, and indeed did once I was 'stabilized', shoved me off on the Rain man you were nudging into your rightful spot."

Now looking fairly confused entirely, the Storm-Cloud lowered her opened bottle to her lap and tapped her nails on the glass. "I'm lost."

"Fairly often, yes. We've noticed."

That earned him a sour glare.

"Live with it." He insisted, glancing over the platform they were seated on for if she could move yet or not. "How much longer, do you think?"

Sonya glanced downward herself, and at the milling less hostile office workers that staffed the KGB's main office building. Under guard by their more trained and armed fellows who would all probably shoot said other fellows if ordered to. "Another hour, at least. Do you want me to grab your parents before I leave Moscow officially?"

"Please. Thank you." Agreed the Mist brightly, deciding he was bored of this place of office-worker containment now.

It took two seconds to feel out the Mist-soaked marker she had placed for him, having done most of the hard work of their infiltrations over the last week and a half once she returned from dealing with the Edik and Sergej situation. All the thief had to do was plant a few small trinkets donated by several Mists in hard to reach spots, and even if Usov had never visited a location before in his existence he could instantly displace them near said markers dripping with Mist Flames easily enough.

The riskier aspect of this job would be collecting the markers again before anyone stumbled upon them. Which Sonya had refused him helping with, just in case they needed to scramble back to somewhere a day to a full week after the fact. She'd pick them up again, as she planted them in the first place.

"The Vindice didn't show up."

"We're not breaking any laws." Pointed out the disgruntled Storm-Cloud, adjusting to their sudden and likely disorientating sudden scene shift with ill-grace. "There should be a way to summon an officer, I just don't know how."

"Hmmm..." Usov eyed the bald head directly beneath them thoughtfully. "Got an empty spare bottle?"

The guy was getting really red in the face, to the point the shiny patch of skin peeking out from a circle of hair was turning pink. Maybe he needed some beer too?

"Usov, we need them to calm down. Not rile them up for another few hours." Sonya glanced at her second-to-last beer in her hands with a sneer. "If you do something, I'm going to need more liquor."

The Mist blinked, looking up from dropping a half-empty beer bottle she had been drinking out of on top of the really tempting bald guy below them hard enough it would shatter and cool him off. "What was that?"

"I'm perfectly aware you heard me… now get me some fucking vodka." She informed him flatly. "And no, you may not have any of that either. Stop handing out my rightfully stolen liquor, it's mine damn it all."
"So, what does it mean when a Mist decides they want to be the 'annoying one'??"

Cherep glanced up and over at his sister curiously, letting the engineering textbook on aerodynamics fall to his chest. "You're going to have to give me a lot more detail there, Nya."

"Usov. Decided he was 'my annoying hanger-on'. Because my job was calming him the fuck down, way back when before we went off to 'run away to the circus'." She explained simply, leaning over the couch to at least be able to see him clearly rather than just a purple eye peeking around stuffed furniture. "And that's somehow the reason why he's so obsessed?"

"With you." He checked first, looking thoughtful when she nodded. "Anything else?"

"That I could've shoved the work off on Dmitriy, and did in the end, but didn't for a bit longer than week."

"Sounds plausible."

"...what?"

"Confused?"

"Very."

"Mists are obsessive." Pointed out the stuntman helpfully, re-stacking his booted feet on the far end of the couch's' arm and discarding the text to the coffee table where it immediately blended in with the others. "Like... the same way Storms are fanatic. It really has to only make sense to them, and Usov was tetchy when he started. So like what, a six-year-old's sense of entitlement paired with a Mist's developing obsessiveness? Seriously, are you at all surprised?"

"I just kept popping his Constructions with a Storm's Disintegration, which was pretty much the only thing I could do that seemed to help. That really shouldn't earn me an obsessive fan boy. " Refuted the Storm-Cloud sourly, setting her chin on her folded arms. "We also had to talk to his parents that whole fucking week, and old man Zolotov wanted to review the whole mess for who to stick in charge. I had to be there anyways."

"Usov probably doesn't know nor care about that. You helped him, when he needed help, when you had options to not do it." Waving a hand between them to dismiss her points through logic she didn't really get, Cherep just tilted his head in order to keep eye contact. "Again, what you might take from one incident is not always what someone else might. Think Björn, and why he followed after you."

"But Usov wanted to be my very annoying Mist hanger-on, and he got all pouty and mad at me for asking why. This also has some kind of relation to why he's faking his age, the brat's really fucking ten and not eleven or thirteen or... at some age remotely starting puberty."

"...puberty is a very bad measure of maturity. Just look at the both of us."

She glared at him. "I am perfectly mature and responsible, thank you."
Her fellow Cloud just shrugged, stretching out a touch before getting up from the couch. "Look, aside the circumstances for the both of you and what else was going on, and what you or he thinks about it, the whole thing boils down to another 'base facts' situation. He needed help, you gave said help, resulting in he's really obsessed with something about you or just paying you back for what you didn't have to give him."

Sonya huffed at him but took his view on it into consideration anyways.

"Does it bother you? That he's obsessed with something about you?"

"Not really."

Running a hand through his hair, her brother shrugged it off. "Then don't worry about it. Either he'll eventual decide he's paid you back, dedicate his life to annoying you until he gets bored, or never really go away even after you're fed up with dealing with him."

That was utterly unhelpful. "…maybe I should ask Viper or Shamal…"

"You can, they're going to tell you the same thing. And I don't think you would like being charged for Vipes to answer the question." Cherep reached over the couch to pat her on the head before wandering away from her. "It doesn't really matter much in the end, does it?"

"It ties into why Usov's lying about his age." Sonya repeated the pertinent fact again, a touch flatly. "And why he's doing things way too young, like helping me with…"

"…with?"

"…putting down a Sky Rejected Rain, who went batshit crazy from the stress on his Flames or something related to Discordant Flame symptoms, fuck knows he wasn't exactly thinking straight by the end of that."

Turning around rather sharply, the man frowned at her. "What?"

"I've lied about my age, that I was older than I really was. I don't really care about that or the whole 'let's haunt Bazanova/boss lady thing' going on, they're sort of useful now and again. It's… he's pretending he's at the age where some of the vory won't quite always shoo him away from the bloody stuff anymore."

Raking his hand through violently purple strands, her brother scowled. "Oh, no. Okay then. He's being impatient. Skipping a few years because you'll either sideline him or refuse his help with the things he wants to help you with. Don't leave him behind, and he won't skate around your or the 'social rules' or 'culturally acceptable' limitations on him."

"…fuck. I already did."

"Then what he's doing is in response to that. Ease back whatever it is or task him with something else suitably distracting, and he'll stop getting into things he shouldn't."

"I can't take him away from his parents." Sonya protested, shoving both hands through her own hair to clutch the back of it. "They're perfectly supportive… I think. Or at least they're not complaining."

"With a Mist? It might entirely be because Usov sees no reason for them to complain. How sure are you of that?"

…she should probably meet them at least once before kidnapping them all to head to Italy with the rest of 'her' people.

She had made no arrangements that included people or said people's people. Why was this now a thing?

They weren't even her parents!

The thief let her hair go with a sigh but rubbed the back of her neck instead of drop her arms.
"…what the hell are you doing, anyways?"

"It's almost lunch time. Lunch? Food? Things of an edible nature?"

"…is there any reason why you've suddenly started feeding me?" She had been in and out the entire month, helping Usov and the Mist section set up and execute the KGB raid to add the information to what they had already pulled from various law enforcement headquarters.

He had been really good about the odd hour visitations and keeping something warm to bolt down between infiltrations, enough so that the Storm-Cloud was actually really looking forward to 'Skull de Mort's' off-time with all of them just living together somewhere else with her brat and maybe visits from Tatiana now and again.

"I'm still scared of your cooking." Cherep tossed over a shoulder brightly, pulling open the rather old-fashioned fridge this place had come furnished with. "Even if I could survive eating it, I don't want to risk it. So, I'm cooking."

Sonya huffed irritably, stalking around the couch to steal his spot and book… even if it was a math textbook. "I will never get better without someone to practice on."

"I love you sis, but not that much." He shot back without missing a beat. "Do us all a favor, practice on Arseniy until Lisa decides it's alright."

Even if she didn't really like math textbooks, she was keeping this one. Hers now, he could find something else to read. Of course, she didn't want to fucking read it either so instead she glanced around the hotel suite they were sharing.

Of this set of hotel rooms, which she had made the final payment to keep it rented for another half a year just in case old man Yaozu or Mingxia needed a place to crash after she left the Zolotovs, the only thing that was 'hers' was some of the artwork on the wall, her clothing, almost everything in the kitchen that wasn't an appliance, and the knickknacks.

This place had to be packed up in another month or so, but she had after February and Shamal's Christian religious ritual thing to do that in. She also had to go to the school and finally deal with the likely massive pile of paperwork there and hiring of new or different teachers to replace everyone she was yanking or otherwise reassigning… but she didn't feel like it.

Galina got her licks in, hopefully that would buy her a little more time before round two and that zoo.

Sonya was just really avoiding anything that smacked of Zolotov influence right now. She didn't want to deal with Gedeon, or anything to do with him, or even old man Zolotov either. Arseniy and Lisa were probably already suspicious of her avoidance of anything clan related…

Maybe she could stretch visiting Italy halfway through February before coming back, pretend to be occupied with searching out new teachers for March, and then leave for Mafia Land as soon as it turned April.
Sonya very pointedly moved the book away from her brother's hands, when he wandered back to put his things away for the day since he was moving on to something else. "Mine now."

"Oh come on, do you know how hard it was to find an aerodynamic engineering text for motorized vehicles? Which includes motorcycles?"

She reconsidered actually stealing the book from him, for about two seconds. "Nope, but I'm sure you're going to tell me."

Cherep hung over the back of the couch, half on her in hopes of grabbing the paper she immediately dropped to the floor out of his reach. "You don't even like math."

"It's a book, your argument is invalid."

Her fellow Cloud huffed, giving up and just laying draped over her shoulder in what was probably a sulk but she couldn't see his face to check. "Can I at least copy a few things out of there first? Before you make away with my book?"

"Mine now." Repeated the thief, sliding out from under him and seizing the contested text before he could lunge for it in response to her moving. "But yes, I will give you a copy of anything relevant in the book. But it's mine, not your book."

He lifted the entire couch before she got off it instead of the expected scramble, tilting it backwards a little so she'd end up safely in the crook between the cushions and the back rather than on the floor. "What if I want to contest this 'mine now' policy for everything you get your hands on?"

Sonya contemplated her options for a long moment.

Cherep squawked in offence as she used his shoulders as a stepping stone to reach the light fixture that was positioned more for the 'hallway' than the 'sitting room', using it to guide her jump somewhat further into the suite and well away from his hands even if could free them in a split second.

Rolling as she landed, she bolted off with the contested book when the floor shook a little as her brother discarded the couch to scramble and catch up with her. Taking two turns, once into her bedroom and the other to face the window looking out to a side street and not the main, the thief only just managed to wrench open the window and wiggle through it before the stuntman could snag any part of her.

"The hell, Nya? Come back in here, you're not wearing a coat! You don't even have boots on!"

"I'll live." Tossed back the thief, tucking the text under an arm and quickly scaling the brickwork before someone glanced out a window and spotted her. "Don't wait up!"

Now, where to hide it?

…preferably before her toes froze off in the snow.

Bad plan, next time she'd just play keep away with her brother inside her apartment.

(Tuesday the 27th of January, 1970. Voykovsky District, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)
Glancing at the number and address written on her hand, then to the plaque with the same letters and numbers in the same order she was looking for, Sonya glanced between them a few more times just to be triply sure.

…it was entirely possible she might have the wrong address. Maybe.

Stranger things could happen. Usov was a Mist, there were probably uncountable ways he could protect his parents from unwanted solicitors that she would never dream up even if she had Mist Flames.

"...Miss... Bazanova?" Asked someone behind her, causing the Storm-Cloud to blink twice before turning to see who it was calling her name here. "Oh, I haven't seen you in years. Usov tells me you're doing well these days, I can see that it's true. You look wonderful, dear."

"...thank you?" Sonya informed the lady she only hazily thought she might know, or at least might've passed on the streets a few minutes ago, a bit woodenly. Wincing at her own utter fail at social interactions hammering that 'incompetent' idea home that much further, the thief returned the little folded scrap of paper she stole out of her own office while hiding her brother's book to her coat pocket and tried for a smile. "Um... I don't mean to pry..."

"We don't mind living here." The slightly worn looking and green-eyed brunette inform her pleasantly, shifting what seemed to be her produce allotment for the day to another arm. "Your... clan? Offered to put us up somewhere else... but this is where Usov's lived his entire life and we're a bit attached."

In a single-roomed apartment, the size of a matchbox. In an apartment building, which had eight four-or-more families living in the five apartments around this one she was standing in front of. More than a few kilometers outside of clan territory.

"Okay." Agreed the blonde a bit blankly. "Well... I... wanted to know if the both of you, you and your husband that is, would mind... listening to a job offer."

She blinked at her this time. "Um... sure? I mean... now?"

"...if now would work then I guess?"

The slow smile that bloomed across her face took several years' worth of age and stress off her, making her seem less around Lisa's age and a touch closer to Tatiana's. "...I see Usov's descriptions of your social skills are completely correct."

Sonya rolled her eyes and sighed, already feeling a bit of a heat spread across the bridge of her nose in a fucking blush. She hated feeling stupid. "I'm sorry. I'm fucking this up, aren't I?"

Talking to complete utter random people over the phone, no issues. Dealing with people she vaguely knew from working near or at the same place for years, fine. Try to talk to someone even marginally important to her people, apparently she failed utterly trying not to be as abrasive as she could be.

"No! Oh no, not at all. I'm just surprised, he's got a bit of an imagination... yet if anything he understated things from the looks of it."

Rubbing the bridge of her nose, hopefully to hide the worse of her blush, the Storm-Cloud just shrugged. "I suck at people. Can we... skip my awkwardness?"

"Sure, just let me fetch Max." Pulling a set of keys out of her coat pocket, the lady didn't even get to unlock the apartment door before a thinner male than she was used to seeing pulled it open.
"Maksim, it's okay. Nikishina, who changed her name to Bazanova? Usov's friend from the Zolotovs? She was the… um, the reddish one?"

…this probably wasn't a good part of the city, but even still she didn't really care for being regarded as the criminal she really was from someone like Usov's father. "Hi."

"Zina, are you sure?"

"Usov said no one intending us harm could even approach the doorway and she did."

Sonya coughed a touch pointedly. "We're… really not supposed to talk about that just anywhere."

"...will he get in trouble if we do?"

"I'm honestly not sure yet. We're working on clarifying those kind of things... but it's slow going."

Hedged the thief slowly, rubbing the back of her neck for a lack of anything to do with her hands. "So... um. Lunch? I'll pay, for dragging you both out to listen to me. But there's going to be a couple changes with the whole... thing Usov works on for us and I promised him..."

"I thought you said this was a job offer?"

"It is." Confirmed the younger woman simply.

'Zina' blinked at her, and she really had to get the mom's name somehow or outright admit she didn't know it, then glanced to her husband. Maximillian shrugged and plucked the bags out of her arms to set inside the apartment, before stepping out warily and plucking a slightly worn leather jacket from somewhere near the door to throw over his shoulders. As she had the keys out already, she locked it while her husband straightened out his coat.

Given the bloodshot eyes and the time, Usov's dad probably worked second or even third shift and had likely just woken up.

Sonya pressed her lips together, wondering which moron had been in charge of the young Mist's recruitment into the clan and who the fuck she had to punch through a couple walls to get them better jobs and an actual fucking apartment. This was beyond the pale in ungratefulness, given what Lisa got when Tatiana went into becoming a nurse and Sonya ended up subbing in for Dmitriy.

Not to mention what their foster mother got for her daughters saving the Pahkan's life.

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 27th of January, 1970 continued. Voykovsky District, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Samuil Zinaida gingerly seated herself in the somewhat surprisingly clean booth, sliding over for her husband to sit down as well.

A bar was not something she had expected when young Miss Bazanova invited them out to lunch, but as the other woman was paying for a meal neither of them had to cook she really couldn't complain too much.

She really lucked out on recalling the young woman's changed surname after a moment of surprised shock to see a well-dressed if slightly lost looking vaguely familiar person standing in front of their small home. Hopefully, Usov would do the popping into reality thing and remind her what the young woman's first name was before she was forced to admit she didn't recall it.
It had been a few years, and she had grown a small bit. Filled out as well, but it did change some of her features slightly as she lost the childish edge of padding for a sharper adult look to her face. "So, a job offer Miss Bazanova?"

"Call me Sonya." Glancing sharply at the bartender earned her a nod for some reason, and the older 'Flame user' rubbed her forehead before squarely looking back at the both of them. "How much has Usov informed the both of you about things going on in the clan?"

"To be honest... we really don't feel comfortable with your clan." Max informed the young woman simply. "Not for... what you are, or in spite of what you have extended to help us, we are just not those that want to make use of something we didn't earn fairly for ourselves."

Bazanova blinked slowly at him, then hummed for a second. "Ah... that makes more sense, really. Entirely respectable stance to take. This offer I have for you both is because your son is who he is but it's more for his and your comfort, and to simplify the situation, than for any other reason."

The woman really was blunt, wasn't she?

Zinaida leaned over the table slightly, earning herself the bulk of the attention while Max absorbed that. "Then what is this about, Sonya?"

"I'm leaving the clan, myself. I've got a godchild, and his godfather wants him to grow up in their native country, so I'm leaving to go do that for a good number of years." Bazanova drew out a brass and bamboo pipe from an inner pocket of the coat she finally drew off, apparently just to play with instead of puff on as she set the mass of wool to one side. "That being the case, a few number of the Flame users I've been involved with training or otherwise helping have decided to follow me due to various personal reasons themselves. Usov's among them."

"Usov is ten."

"I'm aware. But, as a Mist user, it is almost impossible to contain him if he doesn't want to be without the help of a stronger Mist. Which I don't think we have. I would rather ensure he does any international travel with me than on his own, instead of in some fit of rebellious teenage mischief."

She and her husband exchanged faintly worried glances.

"...is there any way to turn 'off' Flames?"

"This question again?" The, really likely, criminal across the booth frowned faintly. "As far as I am aware, not as of yet. There might be a possibility I know of yet can't do, but as Flame use has a strong connection to personality, trying to turn it 'off' would likely erase or otherwise compromise our very sense of self."

Max had an arm around her before she even finished flinching back from the blandly delivered words, squeezing her slightly before letting go so to keep up the composed face they were presenting.

"Usov will likely remain with you both until he decides he no longer needs to be watched over by parents. However, he's already fudging exactly how old he is to me and several others. I'd rather he grows up slowly than too fast, and part of my crusade involves keeping you both close to where he wants to be."

"How do we do that?" Her husband asked simply, faintly frowning at the woman.

"As I said, I'm moving. With a... substantial number of people. I need staff to keep up the property I purchased in Italy."

"…Italy?" Repeated Zinaida blankly. "You're... going to Europe."

"I am." Confirmed the younger woman simply.

"That is... far."

"It won't happen until April. You both have enough time to discuss it, and with your son, before I need to know if you'll take the offer."

She sighed a bit heavily, not expecting to have a few possible long-term consequences about her son's unique ability pointed out to her along with a far-flung job offer. "…does he really mostly teach?"

"Yes, actually. Usov's in charge of the Mist section, teaching and ensuring most of the Mists that contact us for help get it." Confirmed Bazanova simply, running the pipe in her hands through her fingers a few times. "His day to day work is mainly running after equally as stubborn, confusing, creative people that share his talents and ensuring everyone knows and heeds their limitations."

"He's... ten." Her husband pointed out again, slowly.

"And the most experienced Mist we have." The woman shrugged that off, tapping her pipe on the table. "Usov does a fair few things for the clan, mainly in looking after his fellows, which was why I was so surprised at where you live. I thought we would have expressed our appreciation for his work, but as it might be slightly illegal aid…"

"It's... on our son's merit?"

"He lives with you, you are the ones that brought him up to be the young man he is. It's to your household, as that is where he lives, on his merit. Yes."

Zina glanced to Max, who looked equally confused if she was reading her husband right.

…they hadn't known that.

"So, as to why I've come to you both with a job offer." Setting the pipe down firmly, Bazanova folded her hands and placed them on the table. "I need everyone that would be of use to maintain and keep a castle orderly."

"A castle?"

"Not my idea, but yes."

"You want us to give up everything we have here, to move to Italy and help with the upkeep of a castle." Maximillian asked just to clarify the situation, earning a nod. "Aside staying close to Usov before he could decide to... leave, what else would we get for this?"

"As you're a married couple, probably a house built on the land surrounding it for your own use so long as we live there." Sonya informed them both dryly. "The castle will house a few dozen people, but to be honest I have a fair few rooms worth of just pure books to also think about. I'm probably going to have to hire locally for maids and whatnot, I just really don't feel comfortable leaving the 'head' staff positions so open to people I have no idea about. I know you through your son, as mischievous and as headache inducing as Usov is he is a sensible boy who works hard at what jobs he's given. I'd rather take a more calculated risk on the both of you than some complete unknown."
Straightening up maybe a touch too quickly, she ignored the dry look he shot her in order to ask her question. "How much land are we talking about?"

"...three thousand acres?"

That was a lot of land… "Ever think of having an apiary, Sonya?"

"A what?"

"Beehives." Zinaida helpfully corrected herself, excited now. "I do a bit of… brewing. Of mead."

She blinked slowly at her, confused grey staring unashamedly. "Mead."

"Yes."

"Zina."

"Shush, Maksim." Smiling brightly at the confused woman across the table after Max's half-exasperated bid to derail it, she patted down her pockets for some kind of paper and to see if she had a pen. "With a good selection of beehives, and some control of what flora is around them, I could brew mead in bulk batches? So long as we get a small bit ourselves, of course. You could sell it?"

"...mead it is, then." Sonya hesitantly confirmed, still looking faintly bewildered as she groped for her own purse. "I didn't know it was still a thing to brew it."

"Oh, well… it's an old family hobby."

"I'm not complaining. I like mead, I just haven't seen it in… years."

The woman wasn't that old, either in her late teens or early twenties but certainly younger than her. When did she last see a honey-based alcoholic drink?

A heavily abused pad of paper was drawn out of her purse, and a bit more digging netted the other a pen as well. A paged was torn from the pad, and then both paper and pen were slid across the table for her.

"Well… if you're sure about that list down what you're going to need, and I'll see it's gathered up before April."

Max sighed, well aware he lost this battle even if he wanted to oppose it. "I am a factory worker, Miss Bazanova."

"Okay?"

"I can do only basic housework aside assembly line work." He continued a touch less confidently.

"Can you track numbers? Like costs and deducting it from a set balance?" Prodded the woman, shrugging again when he nodded in confusion. "Well then, someone keeping track of household expenses would be nice. You can then manage the fund your wife's mead brings in to help keep things tidy."

They probably shouldn't have caught the 'fuck knows I need the help' she tacked on under her breath as she tucked away her pipe into the purse and set it aside, earning a certain Mist his father's ire.

"Usov, I believe we spoke about this kind of thing."
"Sorry, father." Usov popped into existence right next to Sonya, beaming at them even if Max frowned heavily for his rude behavior. "Sorry I missed most of this, the Mirror Lady didn't tell me until you agreed."

Bazanova looked at him, at the faintly exasperated look on her husband's face, and slid out of the booth with her coat and purse. "Right. You're all on my tab, order what you'd like. Usov, I believe you should be in school right now."

"I'm not missing anything. There's a me attending class."

The woman blinked twice. "…sure. Okay. Then I'm going to… go."

"Thank you, Sonya."

She shrugged awkwardly. "You asked."

"Well, technically, you asked. I just confirmed I would appreciate it."

The look he earned himself for that comment proved she did know their son rather well indeed.

"Usov." Zina called for his attention as the other woman left them, Max giving the bartender and his three menus a fairly suspicious look until he left as well. "Lying about your age?"

"I didn't lie! I just allowed a few assumptions to stand without correction."

Her husband sighed as he looked over the supplied menu warily. "That is lying by omission, Usov."

Their son pouted outrageously, mainly to make her smile. "Sonya already yelled at me for doing it, and all the reasons why it was a bad idea. I'm sorry."

"She seems… just as nice as the last time we saw her."

"She was drinking beer at the time." Reported their son cheerfully, waving a hand to call back the bartender who apparently also doubled as a waiter. "And then told me to go fetch her vodka, apparently I was causing her a headache."

Max considered it, probably also the fact the woman was a criminal, then shrugged. "At the moment, I think I can fully understand why she asked for that."

(Thursday the 29th of January, 1970. Sonya's hotel suite, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"I am not late, there's a whole two days before you asked me to be on the island and I have a flight out tonight."

"I'm perfectly aware of this. But," Renato shot a glance at the thief's brother, who was also giving him a fairly annoyed look from deeper inside the hotel apartment, "you owe me something. You promised."

Sonya blinked at him, stepping back and letting him in. "A date, right? But… we'd have enough time to do 'date' things in either Mafia Land or Italy…?"

Not if he was 'murdering' himself off. The hitman wanted nothing about their new dating situation to get out beyond his control, because a dead friend being replaced was a lot less gossip worthy than a boyfriend or lover being replaced with someone that looked suspiciously and exactly like a dead ex.

This, and Shamal, were the two things he desperately wanted to pick back up the very fucking moment he could. Not asking her to wait on him left him at a bit of an uncomfortable ledge with her, because it was entirely possible someone else might slide in while he was otherwise gone and he'd either have to out wait that fucker or kill him without pissing off the thief.

"…aw fuck." Muttered the brother sourly, returning to a few pages of some calculations reluctantly. "Did you have to catch on?"

"You knew?"

"Since last summer." Confirmed the other Cloud she was twinned to dryly, lowering the pages again. "He told me. Since you went on that opera-dinner date, when Tats was babysitting my nephew for you two."

There was an utterly blank moment on the Storm-Cloud's end as she rethought some of their previous interactions. The sigh she heaved once things made sense to her was delightful. "For fuck's sake."

"Yes, you are that dense."

"Excuse you, did you want that date or not?"

"Shutting up." Promised the Mafioso agreeably.

Cherep's boots hitting the floor made a surprisingly solid single thunk, and he set aside whatever he was working on quickly. "Sonya… do you want to date him?"

"I apparently already am."

"No, Nya. It's do you want to. Not what seems to be the case." Her brother insisted. "Ignoring him for a moment, what do you want?"

"I don't know!" Declared the woman shortly, throwing both hands in the air. "I'm trying to figure that out."

Blinking purple eyes a few times as he absorbed that, the man then eventually nodded slowly as he got up from his seat. "Okay. Go pack, shoo. You've got bambino's religious cult-thing to go participate in, don't you?"

Sonya gave him a pointedly annoyed look, a snort for the helpful hand shooing motions he then did in response and wandered off to do so.

…religious cult-thing?

"You." Cherep turned to Renato the moment she was out of sight and probably earshot and pointed a finger right in his face. "I hear even a minor complaint about your behavior or any kind of fucked up pressure to get her to go beyond what she's comfortable with… I'll inform our father. Who will be utterly unimpressed with such bullshit and rip out your guts with a rusty fork."

"Frankly, boy, you need to work on your intimidation."

"I am not enough to intimidate you, will probably never be enough to even scratch you, so no. I only have one baby sister," drawled back the younger man pointedly, "my other half to my Flames. I just need to be the one she liked to sound out her problems to. I have an Arseniy to help me keep her safe, so I don't need to be intimidating."

The heavily tattooed and muscled mass of a Russian man and the equivalent to one of Italia's Mafioso… a high ranking one near or about near a Sky's Guardian in influence. Fair point.

"I don't intend to hurt her."

"Intents and what happens sometimes don't entirely correlate all that well." Cherep countered simply over a shoulder, stepping away and wandering back to his abandoned work on the book covered coffee table. "I'd rather just cover my bases, if I can. You've been threatened, so now you can't bullshit an excuse of I didn't know/mean to' when Arseniy comes after you if you ever make my baby sister cry."

…rather conniving for someone that entertained for a living. Not really something he had expected from this quarter, more from the nurse that hadn't actually had another 'word' with him about Sonya's state of happiness.

Then again, he was a Cloud. It had to show up at some time, and his literal Flame related other half was a fairly obvious thing to be territorial about.

Good lord, he wanted to be there when Sonya got it in her head to threaten off her brother's possible serious girlfriends. That would be hilarious to watch.

Renato heaved a sigh, seating his fedora down lower on his brow. Yet again another thing he was putting up with for her sake, more family related bullshit and he wasn't even sleeping with her. "Noted. Are you done?"

"Sure, whatever. Have fun." Pointedly glaring over the top of the papers, the stuntman smiled toothily. "Just remember, I'm watching."

"You have no fucking idea what my name is, do you?"

"...nope."

Eh, the brother wasn't slated to remember who he was anyways.

Sonya poked her head out of the room that seemed to be her usual one, cocking an eyebrow at the both of them. "Are you two done being manly men and staking claims out?"

"This place does have wonderful acoustics." Cherep agreed brightly.

"Why did you leave to pack?“ He questioned in the next second, slightly disgruntled she wasn't even upset over her fellow Cloud's very pointed reminder of who all would be lining up to murder him if he upset her.

The damn woman just shrugged as she stepped out of her room. "Renato, my flight out of Moscow is tonight. I've been packed for most of the day so far."

"Exactly."

"Cherep wanted to, and I like him best." Dismissed the thief simply, leaving them yet again. Presumably to fetch said already packed luggage.
…did not knowing his name but just as 'my sister's friend' make it easier or harder for a Mist to track down and erase the memories of anyone that knew him?

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 29th of January, 1970 continued. A passenger train car, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"…are you joking?"

"You did promise." Renato informed her cheerfully, flicking a wrist at the scenery passing by their train window. "I'm holding you to it."

"And that's going to be our 'date'?" Questioned the thief warily, a bit confused.

If that was what he wanted to do for it, then alright. But that was kind of weird, still.

"No, our 'date' is going to be somewhere else. Preferably on the other side." Corrected the Italian pointedly. "This is just our 'night out', which said we could do 'at a later date'."

Sonya blew out a sigh, leaning back against the train bench she was seated on. "You made me refund a plane ticket, to buy a train ticket instead, just for a 'suitable' crossing?"

Fucking hell, getting through Berlin's section of the border was going to be a logistical nightmare. Especially last second like this.

…screw it, Bjorn could sit on their more 'necessary' luggage. The moment they switched trains, she was getting a few things shipped instead.

"I'm running out of time." Renato informed her less happily and more seriously. "I'd like an expert show me how to do it, at least the quick and dirty way, before I ever need the information."

"Part of why I'm not complaining, just… you could've said so." She countered him pointedly. "I'm aware, so yes I'll take you through. Twice or more if you'd like at different spots… after Shamal's whole… thing."

"Speaking of, religious cult-thing?"

"Isn't it?" She questioned dryly, stretching out her left leg on the bench which had been so conveniently empty but for the Mafioso when she boarded with paper he asked for and had yet to read. "I get you're Catholic, his father was probably one as well, and you want him to be respectful of what kind of life he came from… but this really smacks of peer pressure and 'but everyone does it' kind of shit to railroad children into your religion whether or not they want to be."

Renato blinked at her blankly. Not the I'm faking it, tell me what the hell is going on' blank, but an utter 'what the hell?' kind of blank she tended to get more from other people than from him.

Sonya simply shrugged in return. "It's how I see it."

"…there is a reason we do it at seven years of age." He informed her, still blankly. "Damned if I can remember it right now off the top of my head, but there is one. Not an 'indoctrinate the brats' kind of thing."

"Still kind of shifty."
That made the man crack a smirk, because they were by nature shifty people.

She rolled her eyes. "Okay, so what's after that?"

"A surprise." He promised glibly, waving off that topic. "Leave it up to me, little dragon lady. You'll like it, I promise."

Humming, and frankly unconvinced of that due to her sheer unfamiliarity of ‘dating’ and everything that entailed, the thief tried not to wonder and pretty much failed.

"Sonya, you don't have to do anything but go along and enjoy yourself."

She held up a finger, backing up her mental train to figure out what topic he was on. "Wait… this is supposed to be a two-way street. Right? Shouldn't there also be me taking you on a date?"

"Which this is going to be, at least the first event." Countered the hitman smoothly after a rather long beat of silence and a blink. "While… yes, with most relationships one putting forth all the effort and the other not makes for some lopsided and unstable situations. This isn't. We already had a stable relationship, we're just going to add something."

"I would hope it's stable, we've got the brat…" Sonya trailed off as they went over some kind of harsh bump, steadying herself against the wall of their train car as the whole assembly suddenly started screeching to a halt and knocked some of her luggage out of their spot under her bench. "…the fuck?"

"Good question." He straightened up from his slouched lounging, glancing downwards to her disordered stuff and reached for one of Crina's cards laying from where they had spilled out. "…little dragon lady… what does this one mean?"

"The King of Wands. Traditionally representing a dynamic and classic conquering hero; fairness, honor, problem solving, and the like." She gathered up the antique cards carefully, annoyed with herself for forgetting them in such an easily unsecured place as the outside pocket of her traveling luggage. "Reversed, as you're holding it, means conceitedness or that there are unrealistic goals you've set. Mainly? As a general advice card, it's saying to not be so hard on yourself or so harsh on others."

Sorting through the fragile and old painted paper in her hands, she hoped she got them all and there wouldn't be a missing Major or Minor Arcana card she would have to hunt for on her hands and knees. Sonya looked back up to take back the King of Wands to include in her impending count, but got distracted by the look the hitman was giving it. "…Renato?"

"…curious." Spoke the Mafioso, flicking the card to her and getting up.

Probably to go ask a conductor what the hell was going on, and why they were coming to a very loud stop.

Inspecting the tarot card for any damage, the thief started sorting it in neat piles on his bench while she waited starting with the King of Wands.

Mostly just to assure herself they were all here and hadn't come to harm from her forgetting Crina's last gift to her.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 29th of January, 1970 continued. A passenger train car, Russian Soviet)
"Someone shoved someone else right onto the tracks as the train was passing through. We hit the poor sucker."

"...you have got to be fucking with me. People still do that kind of shit?"

"Apparently so." Drawled the hitman tightly, a bit annoyed at the unexpected bump in their plans. Too much so to be amused at the utterly bizarre method of execution, which was her main reaction. "Now that our train is some lazy moron's murder weapon, we've got to disembark on the next station. We'll be rerouted to another line and compensated for the inconvenience... but it'll still be a day or so long delay."

Sonya paused in shuffling her tarot cards, giving him a strange look, before looking back down and continuing her absent shuffling. "That's not... entirely damning for what you wanted to do."

"Ho?"

She shrugged, tapping the edges of her tarot cards against the wall of their train car to even out the freshly shuffled cards. "I know the better ways through, and you asked for 'quick and dirty'. At worse, twelve hours of work to pass through it. It won't be easy, and I'm never doing that again even if you're helping, but possible."

Eying the stiff painted paper she was fiddling with, Renato reseated himself across from her. There was little else to do but wait to be redirected, so at the moment he was interested in her antique tarot cards. "Where did you get those?"

"A friend."

"You've said that before." Renato prompted curiously. Much to his surprise, he got a very contemplative look instead of an equally as absent but more elaborating answer. "...little dragon lady?"

She considered it, reminded herself that her friend was dead, and still didn't want to talk about it. "So... a friend." He backtracked slowly, unsure why she was all of a sudden closed mouth about it but if said friend was dead then it was not a needed detail. "Where did you learn to use them?"

Sonya blinked at him, wondering if he was trying to be circumspect in asking or something. 'Trying', so still part of what she was reluctant to talk about.

"Her name was Crina." She informed him before he could figure out what he was digging for she didn't want to speak of, slowly and reluctantly as she dropped her attention back to the cards in her hands and her sour thoughts about her forgetfulness that left them in a pocket of her luggage. "She was a Romanian gypsy woman, playing up her heritage as those stereotypical fortune tellers that tend to belong to any circus. With a nauseating amount of incense, to boot."

Renato had no idea what that had to do with what information she was being so bitterly stingy over. He did recognize there was something about this subject she was defensive over, and therefore he wouldn't be asking for more than what she would be willing to talk about.

Sonya utterly did not want to discuss it and was confused herself over her own feelings on the topic. Which made her more stubborn to discuss it, even in spite of her feelings on the matter.
Because she was of the opinion it didn't matter anymore, the woman in question was dead and gone.

…and the Storm-Cloud was still defensively protective of what she had left of the other woman and didn't want to share much.

"You're allowed to grieve for those gone." He tried, which made absolutely no impact on her feelings of the matter. "…or not?"

"She's gone, I've accepted that. There's no longer a point of not talking about it." Dismissed the thief irritably. "Crina was my master of mysticism, while I was with Cherep in the circus."

"Where you learned to breathe fire, juggle knives, and all sorts of acrobatic maneuvers." What she had been doing when the bulk of his network of contacts had been gutted. Renato was actually highly thankful she had been off doing something so strange for something like them, fuck knew what he'd done without her help right afterwards for Shamal. "She taught you and gave you the cards?"

"Right before… Crina died of liver cancer." Sonya dragged out of herself, rolling her shoulders uncomfortably as she smoothed out her deck so it would stack neatly. "I… might've helped. The old bat was an alcoholic, and I shared my liquor with her while with them. Didn't stop once I knew she was dying, as well."

She wasn't sorry about it, cancer was equated with something quite like slow torture in her mind. It was the old woman's death that upset the thief, which she deemed selfish and stupid.

"…your territory is people." He concluded slowly.

"It's what my brother thinks." Allowed the woman.

"No, little dragon lady. Your territory is people, other people. You're acting like a… well, what you mainly are, who got part or all of their territory damaged from something."

Sonya blinked at him blankly. "I've never seen it."

"It's…" Trailing off, the hitman removed his hat to rake a hand through his hair in bewilderment. "…nasty. Even scheduled demolition work in such areas… it's like your equivalence to visiting the dentist for a root canal. Might be necessary, but those like you loathe it almost to the point of unreasonableness."

By the expression that crossed her face, she was not happy he was weighing in on that side of the theory.

"Theory?"

"Theory." Dismissed the Russian flatly. "Renato, seriously? You've managed to piss me off-"

Oh, son of a bitch. No wonder she had basically gone ballistic on him for infringing on her siblings' privacy. For half a fucking year, which… wasn't remotely out of the category of what other Clouds would do if their claimed territory was infringed similarly.

What was he, blind?

"-before, doing this stereotyping shit. It seems to be an Italian thing, assumptions… that infected Gedeon, who never left Moscow… hmm…."
"There's… underlying facts that are easy to make assumptions about." He refuted, a bit annoyed at her bringing that up again whatever her mood. "Like, for instance, your territory being other people."

How did she shift from physical territory to people territory?

Even when there were more than one or two Clouds in any one family, they tended to just share instead of find something else to fixate upon guarding. Visconti's own family was notorious for it, thankfully they resided near Rome and therefore not much would be changing so close to the Vatican to limit what that family of Clouds did in revenge for even public works demolitions taking place.

Sonya just huffed, crossing her arms over her chest and slouching back against the front of the train car her bench was set against. "I'm not sold."

"You once almost ripped Coyote's arm off, to smack him with the wet end a few dozen times, for the ever so serious crime of picking Shamal up." Renato pointed out, with a tone that was both sardonic and dry. "You very nearly did the same to me, when I accidentally got that glimpse of your siblings' past history."

By the flat glare he was getting, she still wasn't sold.

"Sonya, think about your friend. This Crina lady. Why are you so bitter over it? Because she picked to die on you, to go somewhere you couldn't follow." Pressed on the Mafioso, finally getting somewhere when she frowned rather than keep glaring. "You're so pissed off and bitter, and don't want to acknowledge the fact a piece of your territory basically abandoned."

She blinked when he cut himself off, but he was a bit more concerned by the sudden connection he dearly hoped was not something he was unknowingly gambling on.

'He wanted to' being the reason why Sonya was so permissive over Shamal's actions with her, probably meant the tetchy Mist had somehow also become part of her territory. Put in that perspective, Renato wasn't remotely surprised she was blowing off her up and coming syndicate and helping them develop their influence and power more in order to just play house for a brat.

While her syndicate was in what most would think was her territory, Shamal was actually the part that needed development or 'guarding' the most. The brat, unlike a full-fledged Russian vor down to her own baby brother who had said vor to guard him, needed her the most.

…that drastically reduced the likelihood anyone would get past the thief to hurt their godchild, she wouldn't leave him until she was utterly certain he was more than protected enough and even then would make surprise and frequent visits to check on the situation.

Made her continued allowance for Vongola protecting the kid continue when she was so utterly unimpressed with the Famiglia a bit strange.

…which also made the 'my brother bled' complaint Sonya had with them equally all the stranger. Her brother, and twinned Cloud Flame user, was also territory to her given her reaction when he had met the purple colored stuntman.

Why the fuck was she still allowing Vongola even temporary oversight on part of her territory when another part had already come to harm under their watch?

Several parts, given the Sun kid working the morgue of Mafia Land she outright brutalized a few CEDEF agents over…
"I'm not trying to do the same thing." He informed her hastily, earning yet another blink "I'm not trying to abandon or leave you."

"...okay?"

"No, seriously. I'm not. I'll be back."

Renato eyed her suspiciously as she continued to draw a blank at what point he was trying to stress, recalling a few sour snips from this quarter over his future plans. Almost equally about the same time the brat had started bitching.

Knowing his luck, he'd come back and yes. Surprise. The hitman had been part of her territory or might be in the process of becoming part of it, but then he outright left her too long and whoever he'd be next wasn't included or wanted because she was either wary of the repeated 'abandonment' or not wanting to take another such risk on him since he'd possibly leave again.

Hopefully, he wouldn't be giving her trust issues on top of abandonment ones when it came to those making up her 'people territory'. Smoothing his hand across his mouth, he wondered just how the hell she ended up this way.

…and what, if anything, he could do about it.

"So... more than just being highly social for your type, you the... ultimate people-one."

"Do shut up." Sonya requested irritably. "I thought you wanted to know about Crina?"

"I want to know about your cards, actually." Renato corrected dryly.

They had passed a minor kind of factory town not too long ago, it was entirely possible for very disgruntled and annoyed passengers to demand a refund and hoof it with their possessions back to that station to await a new train or arrange a different method of transport. As a matter of fact, while the Mafioso had been too bewildered over the strange act of murder that was delaying them as they had to scrape up the body and allow local law enforcement the time to process the scene before the train could move on to contemplate the same, a couple passengers had picked that very option. Had they waited, just a bare couple of minutes for one of the conductors to run for the nearest public phone box then return, they would've gotten the offer for a transfer to a different line entirely on the train owner's behalf. This wouldn't be very good for their reputation, at least locally for a couple months, so placating their customers and hopefully soothing any upset caused by the significant delay was understandable.

Adding to the embarrassment of the train's main conductor or biding his time for what options would be available. The hitman had picked the latter through sheer lack of the first, by accident.

If required, and it wasn't really likely for the two of them, all the passengers that needed it would be put up at a hotel for a night or two until a replacement train was ready to take over this route.

'Don't be so harsh on others', indeed.

Sonya studied the thick stack of painted tarot cards in response to his question. "What about them?"

"How many retroactively 'proven' readings have you given with those?"

She shrugged, tucking the tarot deck back into her purse instead of back into the pocket of her luggage they had fallen out of. "How the hell would I know?"
Renato entertained himself, for about two seconds, of the thief in her 'gypsy' garb and tending a crystal ball and rattling off a prediction in her bored deadpan. Then he snorted, tossing his fedora to the seat next to him just raked a hand through his hair. "You, little dragon lady, are lucky you're so damn useful."

"You, are fucking annoying today. You're lucky you're my friend."

"Touché."

---

(Saturday the 31st of January, 1970. Dijon, Bourgogne, French Republic.)

Verde waited, slightly impatiently, for Adrik to catch up to him. Lingering in an alleyway just off Rue des Péjoces, the Lightning kept one wary eye on the street traffic and tried not to wonder what anyone thought of him doing so.

A touch late in the evening, when it was more than chilly enough to necessitate some sturdily protective and decently insulating outerwear.

He was not built, or had the mentality, for criminal 'footwork'. He had tried it, and had a moderate success rate, but it was not something he particularly liked nor excelled in all that well.

Thankfully, he did not need to be.

"What are we watching for?" Adrik inquired curiously from a step behind him, causing the Frenchman to sigh and turn to him with a wryly amused smile. "…what?"

"Again?"

"If you're not going to pay attention, being taken by surprise is all your damn fault." The wiry and yet buffer Russian informed him yet again, stuffing both hands into the fleece lined pockets his coat possessed. "You need the practice, anyways."

"I am sufficiently armored to the point."

"Your sparkly green stuff doesn't work if you're taken off-guard." Adrik interrupted a small measure pointedly, strolling on pass the other man in a manner that suggested boredom and some amount of impatience. "You might have four eyes, Verde my man, but you don't have eyes in the back of your head. Yet."

The Lightning refrained from pulling a childish face at the man's back as he followed him out of the alleyway, well aware the 'yet' implied another impending 'lesson' on necessary or desired criminal behavioral patterns for one's continued and comfortable existence.

Of which, he was grateful to receive. Mostly. After the fact.

At least to acquire the lessons without the implied errors that necessitated them in the first place was something he was grateful for. Learning from the process via an experienced individual's advice, or at least a significantly tutored one, in any practical application was always preferable. Acquiring the 'habits' such information was contributing to, was another thing.

Mainly due to the fact they required a fair bit of 'practical applications' of their own to learn.
Adrik's last 'practical' lesson had involved ice cold handfuls of mud and Verde's face, preferably at randomized and sometimes bewildering times of the day. In hopes of enabling the more scientifically inclined of them to be able to catch shifty or human-sized motion out of the corner of his eyes in spite of his general poor far sight, by recognizing the blurry human shapes around him as doing certain actions in his direction.

While there were perceivable results, and the scientist had been somewhat successful in catching sight and then subsequently dodging some of the mud, he had not yet mastered the exercise given his ratio of three mud balls dodged out of ten.

"…did the meeting go as expected?"

"Nope." Admitted the Russian bluntly, rolling his head to loosen up the muscles of his neck. "We're… um… screwed. For about, a good half of this city. We need to move. Again."

Verde sighed again, pinching the bridge of his nose under his glasses firmly for a moment to ward off a headache. "Again."

"Yeah well… are you at all surprised?"

"I've gotten the point." He refuted blandly as he reseated the rounded glasses.

Six different cities, five different smaller towns, and now an even dozen 'failed' attempts to remain under the notice of any established criminal syndicate while they built up a reputation as weapon dealers. Hopefully there remained enough time to secure their more sensitive equipment, or he would be forced to remake their 'assets' from scratch elsewhere.

The Lighting was utterly bored of melting off the serial numbers of different firearms to remove the easiest tracking methods, of replicating parts of them through the use of hand tools and the odd grinder, the manufacture of new ones of his own from noted measurements, and otherwise making up various solutions for others to do the same in 'the field' so to say. Although the practical experience in manufacturing safety equipment with makeshift parts was appreciated, frequently repeated and simple drudge work they really sold to the powers they were attempting to coax a give-and-take relationship with had been difficult to remain focused upon.

More than a few days he allowed Adrik to hassle him off his work way too easily or get distracted with some of the various texts he could pick up in secondhand stores. His friend did at least ensure he wouldn't nag him about eating or realistic measures of rest when there was a deadline of a sort to meet, but still…

With his refusal to start manufacturing more than the odd painkiller or the less easily abused drugs on very specific occasions, which seemed to be the 'main' use anyone that had ever approached either them about wanted more than a weaponsmith, it limited them in the scope of their efforts even further. No one, apparently, wished for a 'freelance' weapons manufacturer to remain so. Worse, he had the scientific know how to become a drug designer for specific causes and effects, and his disinclination had proved a sticking point a time or twice.

All those facts made for frequent relocations and even more work through middle-men 'mediators' that required a cut of any profits, and equally as many eventual 'betrayals' the Russian had to very carefully navigate Verde through without getting them both killed escaping.

Without a reputation in any area which they could not forge hastily, anyone that would negotiate on their behalf nominally had pre-existing allegiances they would honor more than two relatively unknown men. As the Lightning did not wish to risk another close call using the other as his negotiator to established syndicates, the last time they were in a big enough city had very nearly ended in Adrik's death when he refused a time too many to lead a few individuals back to 'meet' Verde…

"...it is almost February."

"And tomorrow, once we're somewhere else, we'll start trying to head back." Agreed the Russian slowly, glancing at the scientist over his shoulder. "But you realize, this next part's the harder one."

"More difficult than remaining under the 'radar' and yet with a comfortable enough stable income to live off of?"

"Yes." He sighed heavily, pausing so Verde could walk beside him instead of behind. "This part? I don't know how to do. Evading the notice of bigger groups was something any of our clan was taught to do as a matter of fact, because when we're out and about very often 'no thanks' doesn't really work."

"You were unsurprised by where you were going, when Bazanova... retrieved us."

"I know of it, but personally? That was the first time I visited on my own merit than because someone else was dragging me along." Adrik informed him simply with a shrug of his shoulders. "Getting there is almost impossible on one's own without someone else that already knows the method taking you with, I was more or less covered because my clan maintains a presence there and she works for them. It's... the island's phenomenally useful for us to sell things through, so the moment one of our number reached there the head of our... order had a number of things done. Including buying real estate there we normally almost never use."

Verde considered those facts, and their new aim on the morrow. "...then, we should focus more upon those who also would appreciate such a venue rather than seeking the approval of a differently oriented group who would be able to afford the manpower to inconvenience us."

He earned himself a blink and a thoughtful hum. "Probably a sound place to start. But then again... those specific operations don't always have 'customer privacy' at the top of their services."

"We have... had, a measure of excess in our funds." The Frenchman had little to no idea how to 'bribe' a member of this criminal world in safety but, as with 'negotiation tactics' and 'practical survival skills', he suspected he was in for an emergency crash course in the near future. "Some of that could be repurposed in the aims of finding a method rather than setting up a new forge."

"Verde, my man. How would we replace said funds if one or two attempts doesn't work, if you don't continue working to bring in more?"

"How then are we to focus efforts upon..." ...oh. "...this is nearly impossible to accomplish alone, is it not?"

"Alone? It's going to be hellishly tricky to do with just us two." Adrik agreed sourly as they left a main road for a less well traveled path towards their current 'bolt hole'. "You, right now, are insanely lucky the boss lady's not forcibly recalled me to do her petty errands for a pittance and has instead allowed me to fuck around out here teaching you a few things. Technically, with how much I owe her, I shouldn't be doing anything but her dredge work to possibly get out of her debt. A few years if she's nice about it, a few decades if she's not."

Verde blinked at him blankly. "...Adrik?"

"I owe her not only an old favor, but also my life and a significant chunk of cash." Announced the Russian dryly, glancing back the way they came suspiciously for a long moment before continuing to walk. "Any one of those things could be used to… probably make my life a living hell, depending. No one would help me if she decides to call any one of those due. I'm… not really sure why she's not done anything with it yet."

"You are an old childhood friend, are you not?"

"Acquaintance, maybe." Corrected the man sourly. "Sonya didn't really have friends as a child. She mainly had contacts, even that far back."

That… did not entirely correlate. "Then why did she provide you the aid at all?"

"The girls asked her. Galina got her to come out and fetch us, using a favor which we don't owe her anything for. The extraction, I mean. Tatiana asked she cover the cost of the hospital, for 'he'll pay you back, eventually'. Therefore, she pretty much owns me until I can pay her back." Adrik puffed out a slightly condensation loaded sigh of his own, then looked over at him again. "And, also, we're being followed."

"...do I owe her for the hospital work?"

"Eh… it's different. You're aiming to become a… well, one of her minions. You'd be entitled to her protection and aid in the aims of keeping you alive, if you do it." The man waggled a finger nearly under Verde's nose. "If you fuck up, on the other hand, yes. You'd still be beholden to her for that price. Which she might use to knock some of the money-grant-thing you bargained for if she's really annoyed."

"Why is my situation and yours not similar?"

"Intents. I don't want to be one of the boss lady's minions. You do. If you owe her something, it'd just be par for the course of being her minion and getting her protection. You'd do your science thing to repay her, but if you ever want to break away then things get sticky because everything needs to be accounted for and balanced out. Things are already sticky for me, and I don't want to have her protection."

"Why not?"

Adrik paused and looked at him questioningly. "Because my gang leader gets out of jail in a couple months to maybe another year. Then I'm going back with Nicolai and Ziven, probably not the girls, to continue my actual life's work. I was playing hooky when we met, Verde. The other guys had to get out of jail eventually."

"That is…" Profoundly dissatisfying. The Lightning also paused and considered it further. "…will we remain in contact?"

"Pretty sure, yeah. We can easily go through the sisters for most things, and I don't believe Nicolai intends to remain back in Moscow for very long before getting out and about again. So, I might visit. If the boss lady lets me go."

Verde probably had more than enough to worry about in the short term, catching sight of something vaguely smudged and blurry in the reflection of his spectacles cast by an oncoming car. Probably not another pedestrian as there were none on this street, giving Adrik's claim of being followed even more weight.

He very much took the adage 'forewarned is to be forearmed' seriously, especially with the 'combat' use of his Flames. Being physically impervious to everything was a useful skill, and while he might owe a blonde Russian thief some gratitude for the quick development into something he could control… he was going to remember her punting him in the face a few times through a couple walls probably until he died.

"I suppose we should split up here."

"Divide and conquer. But just remember, they're probably banking on the idea too."
Chapter 98

(Sunday the 1st of February, 1970. Ganymed Brasserie, East Berlin, German Democratic Republic.)

"The group at the back, under the painting." Sonya pointed out to her dinner companion lowly, taking a sip of her white wine as the hitman glanced in that direction. "Old and thin is Heiner Faulstich, fat and greedy is Ryhor Janučkievič, the man between them is Raphael Blücher, and the last guy on the end is… I think he's Elias Ocean. Any one of them but the last guy would be what you're looking for."

"And they're all eating dinner together…"

"Are you surprised?"

"No, this is exactly what I thought we would have to deal with the first time around."

Snorting, the thief set her glass down and gave him an unimpressed look. "With the brat? I wouldn't have risked him that way. It was known as 'Tunnel Fifty-Seven' for a very specific reason, it wasn't the first nor will be the last."

Renato gave her a half-smirk of amusement, turning his head back one last time to consider the men before facing her fully. "Alright. Who are they, individually, and what would be best in your opinion."

"Faulstich is a physician. As long as you can amass the price for his 'non-general medical advice', an off-the-books consultation that is, you can receive a prescription for some ill that must be filled in West Berlin. His way is a touch slower, you need paperwork that will not trip anyone off as faked, and he will report patients that match whatever 'most wanted' lists the GDR is currently looking for. Not the one you want to rush through, piss him off enough and he'll likely still report us to make up for the number of patients that 'mysteriously' disappear after getting his help. I will… probably trip off an internal investigation, I recently did a few things around here that I might be still 'wanted for questioning' for."

As the doctor was mostly in it for the money, really did not care what happened to his 'outside' patients in the end, it was possible the 'a murder, a betrayal, and getting robbed' requirements might be fulfilled through him. However, that involved a lot of government attention she hoped he didn't want to court. Otherwise she might have to leave the split country alone for a good long while.

"Janučkievič is less hands-off and government involved, think of someone a lot less powerful than Nono or even old man Milos but in the same general rank of influence around here. Lisa told me flat out to avoid anything to do with him so he's moderately unfamiliar to me, but from several years of passing through here I do know he's more of the type that will rob his 'customers' on occasion as long as it suits him. He controls the territory near the Bornholmer Straße border crossing, and generally does usual things around there. Which might include unregistered and illegal crossings, he's probably your best bet even if I don't know how he'd react to a 'sudden' request from outsiders."

The Belarusian native was… well, a typical criminal with a decent amount of power behind him. His 'job' was mostly to increase his power and wealth with any means available, and he did so with meticulous care. The fact it fucked a few handfuls of people over was probably something he didn't care about nor paid a whole lot of attention to. Per usual in their line of work, to be honest.
Sonya actually didn't know why her foster mother informed her to have nothing to do with him, just that she had. As such she was leery of disobeying Lisa's recommendation, but not so much she'd rule him out as a matter of fact if he was anything like what the Mafioso was looking forward to.

"...think she might've had dealings with him that went sour?"

"How would he connect me to her? I didn't take her name."

"That cook on the other side, Maddie? Knew you were Lisa's girl."

"Because I told her." Sonya refuted slowly.

Renato waggled a hand from side to side as he took another glance at the man she was speaking of in a way that seemed more a scan around the room than specifically to gawk at the man she had pointed out. "Who apparently has sons and therefore the information is out there around here. If something happened, between him and your mother, and he belatedly connects the two of you...?"

Sighing, the Storm-Cloud rubbed at her temple. "Okay, so maybe not him."

"The other two?"

"Equally less likely to have the possible backstab you are looking for. Blücher's one of Hasso Herschel's people, the guy who dug out Tunnel Fifty-Seven? They've got... other methods now. Expensive, not likely to be fraught with hiccups or upsets. More business with the civilians than... our side of the tracks. Ocean... I don't know enough about. I think he's another thief, but I could be wrong if he's branched out since Lisa last saw him."

"So Janučkievič it is."

"We could take a day or two and hunt around for anyone else you might think will work." She allowed slowly, because while the fat guy was the first one she thought of as 'risky' when he first made mention of this kind of outing they didn't have to go along with what little she did know of these parts.

"We don't have that kind of time, not if we're going to be early to help the brat for 'bambino's' First Communion." Refused the Italian gently as he glanced to her. "Unless you think you'd rather respect your mother's recommendations."

Nibbling on her last mussel of the Moules Marinièrer she ordered to use the time to ponder, the thief eventually set down her fork and shrugged. "While I would normally heed Lisa's orders, she said not to deal with him alone. Right now, I'm not alone."

"She probably expected you to ask for some help to deal with him, then."

"It's been almost fifteen years for her," Sonya mused slowly, "I'm not sure anything my mother has to say about the man will impact our movements much unless we want to try a different section of the barrier."

Renato considered that, then gave a one shoulder shrug as he returned to polishing off his dinner. "Then that part's up to you, little dragon lady."

(Monday the 2nd of February, 1970. Schivelbeiner Street, East Berlin, German Democratic
As it was entirely possible Sonya's previous connections might actually end up being a major part of their expected eventual 'betrayal' in the near future, Renato headed off to do the initial negotiations with their picked ticket across the Berlin Wall the moment they agreed on the target and what limitations they were willing to live with for said negotiations.

The thief was actually rather upset she was set on the sidelines for that, she wanted to see the Mafioso in his element and how he worked. Especially when it came to enticing a neutral underworld power into humoring his request. There were all sorts of things she could learn from a professional about the component elements of his side of the lifestyle, even without actually asking him for clarification on why he'd do this or that thing over another.

However, she had… been involved around here for several years.

Aside the latest round of thievery, with the Eastern Soviet leader of the country and other random contracted jobs, there was Lisa's old contacts and her use of their services as well as her own previous movements through the area when she was younger and knew less of how to get around on her own.

If her foster mother's previous history with Janučkievič really was hostile, or at least not cordial to pretending indifference to each other's extended auxiliaries, then the moment it was apparent Renato was involved with Lisa's daughter things would end up that apparently 'desired betrayal' that this was supposed to go through.

Possibly.

Both she and the hitman were skeptical of operating under the assumption they would be double-crossed expressly for that alone, if it would happen. For the time being, they were going to go along with things as if they didn't expect any issues yet keep the complications in mind so they weren't surprised if it did happen.

She did really wonder what kind of price the local slum lord would demand in return for the service.

Renato had better come back and pick her up for it, instead of doing it on his own. Even if it was a hit, because while Sonya didn't remotely like the idea of being told to kill someone… she could at least play lookout while he did his thing.

"Excuse me, miss…"

"Not interested."

"Actually, I rather think you are."

Turning slightly to tell whomever it was to take a hike in a more forthright manner, Sonya's intents abruptly derailed when she realized whomever it was now walking aside her wasn't actually who she was talking to. Instead the thief came to a sudden and flat halt, because the last time she was around some Mist overshadowing another person was Sergej.

"Do you have a death wish?" Inquired the Soviet Storm-Cloud with honest curiosity, contemplating the power and range of this particular Mist.

She had yet to ask any of her own people what kind of limits were apparent on their astral projecting trick, much less how long it would take for a disembodied Mist to recover after being shocked out of a borrowed body by a Lightning.
The smirk that scrawled itself across 'his' face was ill-fitting, an expression that was just a touch too exaggerated and made by muscles that weren't entirely responsive in the method that expression would require if it was an oft-used one as it suggested. "Interesting question, but not as you seem to think."

In broad daylight and on a semi-occupied pedestrian street with civilians and innocents, much less involved with something that could possibly be called 'delicate' in nature so Renato had the tools he needed to get across the Iron Curtain without the island's backing in the near future, there were limits on what Sonya could do.

A couple creative work-arounds, of which she was at least aware of shoving ten pounds of sharpened ax through his head was not one of them much to her regret, but there were things she could do.

In fact, she started on them even if the idea was flimsy and the control needed to not attract attention would be hellish.

It didn't mean the Mist would know that.

"You see," the other continued in a pleasantly affable tone as a pair of middle-edged women passed them by, as if they were friends meeting up after a long period of absence instead of semi-hostile Flame users, "I have this… interest, my dear. Of which, you are interfering in. I… don't appreciate it."

"Pity." Deadpanned the thief flatly, pulling the brass and bamboo pipe out of one coat pocket and checking to ensure the tobacco packed into the bowl hadn't fallen out since she last checked it. Deciding it was fit enough for what she intended, she reached into another pocket for the ill-used matches she was carrying around due to civilian sensibilities while traveling. "For you see, I have these rather stubborn responsibilities of my own. Which don't include allowing anyone to impede or otherwise inconvenience my students, wherever they happen to be."

"Hmm… yes, that is part of my complaint against you." Continued the Mist in his really fucking annoying understanding tone, looking fairly amused but still in that ill-fitting way as she lit her pipe with a few experimental puffs. "My interests lay a tiny bit more… far afield. It's remotely involved, I will admit, but not the current issue we seem to have."

"We?" She echoed flatly, snorting out enough ashy grey smoke that the physical form the other was wearing tried to cough at but the Mist puppeting it hadn't expected him too so they both ended up rather jarred in a seemingly painful way. "Oh no. There's no real issue. There's just this…"

Blowing out yet another lungful of smoke-tainted air, Sonya extracted her left hand from the pocket she had tucked the match box back into and then held them up between the two of them.

The other had kept his borrowed form, smartly, outside of her range. She wouldn't be able to shove her hand through his chest, however much she might want to in spite of the fair number of people that would highly disapprove of such a thing being around.

However…

The tobacco smoke she had practically wreathed the Mist's borrowed form in had been given no such attention, and the Russian allowed a spark of her Storm Flames to jump from her finger and burn through the smoke to scorch a little burn mark on his flannel clad chest to show the Flame user he had not thought through confronting her fully.
They were close enough, it was more covert than flashy as if someone blinked they would've missed the entire action hidden by their forms and the general levels of light around. She wouldn't be able to give him more than second-degree burns without risking more attention than she wanted, and maybe catch his clothing a-Flame, but that might actually be just enough.

Sudden and spontaneous self-immolation had its own folklore about it the civilians would connect it to than something as esoteric as Dying Will Flame use, it happening here in the middle of a pedestrian street wouldn't be all that unusual besides another part of a statistic if a finally 'confirmed' phenomena via eyewitnesses. It would be inconvenient to be noted nearby, especially with the purpose for her presence here and her previous actions, but entirely possible she could either kill his host or less likely possibly the Mist itself.

Her threat delivered, because she was at least half-sure even if he abandoned the meat puppet something about his Misty astral projection bullshit would still catch a-Flame, the thief barred her teeth in the mockery of a pleasant smile as she slipped her hand back into her pocket casually. "If you ever try anything with another of my students, for whichever aim or whatever purposes, I WILL MURDER whatever it is you think you hold dear until you BEG me to kill you too. Okay?"

The eyes, which she was assuming weren't naturally a dark and almost unearthly blue, widened momentarily then narrowed almost… appreciatively. "Very cruel of you, my dear."

"I'm not your anything."

"We'll see about that." Dismissed the Mist arrogantly, batting a hand to conjure an ill-disguised harsh breeze to blow away the insubstantial trap Sonya laced him in.

Any attention she might've attracted by the locals on the same street side also evaporated as they lost all interest in the two of them, way too quickly for that to have been natural.

Forced to take another two steps back before the young and very tired man that likely worked third-shift from the look of him trudged right into her, and attracting all the wrong attention for someone suddenly seeing her when she hadn't been there in his opinion, Sonya nearly missed the man she had been speaking to suddenly requiring the control of his body.

Nearly.

The Storm-Cloud didn't chase after the man, even if she really wanted to the possibility he knew anything about his uninvited or otherwise guest was minimal given Mist temperaments and how they tended to view their victims, and instead ran her mind back over that 'confrontation'.

Did Vongola have any long-range Mist assets getting too big for their britches?

Frankly, it was the general Italian's brand of over-confident arrogance all over this. In assuming that if a Mist kept a Storm further than arm's reach and did whatever confrontation in broad daylight with innocents around, it would prevent said Storm from being able to do anything in retaliation.

Then again, Italy wasn't the only place that could breed overconfidence.

Sonya had more than one medium-long distance Storm trick, thankfully. If the Mist ever got to grips with her again, she'd just breathe straight Disintegration at him instead next time. Even if it might get her arrested or noted, she'd just have to work something out with the Mirror Lady.

She'd have to invest in a hip-flask of liquor too, but that wasn't a great imposition if she was honest. Then there was actually acquiring another Storm Flame seed jewel to keep on her, which was actually more likely for her to try next just simply to keep the other unbalanced trying to deal with her.

Let him assume a breeze would prevent her from reaching him again, she'd pick her time and wait until she could get more than just some poor sap caught in the crossfire and not the moron she was pissed with. If it went suitably remote enough, she could also just chuck an ax-blade through his next meat-puppet.

"There you are. Do you know how long I've been-" Renato suddenly sprouted from the alleyway behind her, cocking an eyebrow and likely lifting the entire situation from her head as she wasn't really in the mood for the effort to conceal it from him as he approached her at a casual saunter. "...as far as I'm aware, no. I'll certainly double-check, but most of their assets had been recalled and more interested in their native land well before the thing on the island. The first one I mean, also before the brat was even new to the both of us."

Mafia Land was in the middle of the North Atlantic Ocean right now, on the part of the loop that hit colder waters for the half-bullshitted 'winter' season for something mainly tropical in nature. Something done so the foliage was more or less synced on a seasonal schedule, especially for easy maintenance when it came time for things to grow fast-rotting fruits or burst open pollen pouches, and so the critters that lived there had a sense of what time was passing and when to breed to restock the prey species.

That was about four thousand kilometers of distance to traverse in less than three weeks, also including what kind of recovery the Mist had to go through after getting shocked out of Igor's body by Ganauche the defective might reduce it yet more.

"...it does sound like it, more and more." Allowed the hitman, sliding a hand around the small of her back and gripping a hip to turn her in the apparent way they needed to go. "The range would certainly be suggesting somewhere in Europe as an origin point to cross so much space in a realistic amount of time, but the distance and the ability would've been at least noted down somewhere. Mayhap an official inquiry first, before-"

"It doesn't have to be a 'recognized' one, not even one expressly remotely connected." Sonya interrupted a touch shortly as she followed his direction blindly while she fiddled with her still burning pipe, but her metaphorical hackles were still rather ruffled and calming herself down after being forced to allow her prey to escape her due to a bad situation to safely murder it off in was a touch difficult. "With that kind of weather phenomenon, it could be entirely possible they only think they are without anyone else being at all the wiser."

"Even more curious." Decided the Sun softly as his eyes narrowed on the street ahead of them, his thumb making entirely distracting circles on the jut of her hip bone she was weirdly and keenly aware of right now.

He ignored the look she shot at his... well, jaw. The thumb stopped rubbing the strip of skin between her slacks and the blouse she was wearing today when the man apparently decided on something.

"I'm... not entirely certain it's the first time I've heard about this individual." Renato informed her slowly, tilting the brim of his hat in another direction so she would shift that way with him so they could move on from that specific street. "Or at the very least, I am unsure if this is the first time I've heard of their handiwork. It doesn't tickle a memory, but more like a piece of gossip I once heard and gave little thought to."

Catching her look this time, he merely gave a shrug that pulled at the arm around her hips and dipped a few fingertips into the waist of her pants.
"This was way back when, little dragon lady. I mean back when I was about Shamal's age."

That didn't necessarily mean anything, aside there might be a copycat running around. Mists were fully willing to fuck with everything, including their physical ages and up to their very form as well as the impression everyone else had about said features.

Otherwise it was a very old Mist for their line of work, which meant a lot of experience she should at least account for now s/he wasn't going to be assuming quite so much about how lethal she could possibly be to him/her.

"Unless he, or she, pops up again I think we should move this to the back-burner until we have more information." He announced after a few more semi-companionable moments of silence. "The man you pointed me to has a job for us. For tomorrow."

"Of course." Dryly returned the thief before busying herself with her tobacco, utterly unsurprised.

So much for her 'twelve hours' thing but then again, she should've accounted for ornery syndicate bosses in the first place. Ah well... maybe their next go around.

"More my side of the tracks than yours." Continued the hitman, his tone touched with a bit of sarcasm. "I wasn't sure if you wanted in on it or not."

"Not, really." For one, she had issues with people that thought they could give her those kinds of orders, and for another it would probably be really unfair. As much as she thought Mist thieves might be. "That doesn't mean I'm not up for pulling watch or guarding your back, but I should probably stay out of the professional's way while you work."

"You just want to watch." Renato dismissed with a smirk.

"Possibly." Sonya shot back around the brass in her mouth blandly with a tiny smirk of her own, finally reaching a point the bulk of her unease with letting that Mist go wouldn't bore a hole through her thoughts. "Are you complaining?"

"A lovely lady admiring my work? Absolutely not."

She'd get the arrogant Mist eventually, it would just take some patience that she was well used to putting into practice. Until then, she not only had things to do but more things to plot for in the near or far future that were more interesting than contemplating something that had unfortunately removed itself from her reach for the time being.

The Mafioso, obviously dipping into her thoughts shamelessly with how close he seemed to want her, chuckled darkly.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 2nd of February, 1970 continued. Ipswitch, Suffolk, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.)

Skull managed to hide his jaw-cracking yawn, mostly by smothering it in his beer he ordered when they showed up to this little British pub with the man of the hour. Safe and sound, and about desperately happy to see the troupe he left behind in fear of their safety.

Mauricio, who had willingly enough slogged his way through the Moscow Rain Bar for the control and minor uses of their Flames without actually picking up any of the mindless minnow habits the last couple months, was having probably the most fun he had in a while regaling the partial outfit he had stopped in Budapest with to try saving one of their number with his watered-down yet still somehow exaggerated adventures in Soviet Russia.

It was probably a mark of how much he had expected to be fucked over that the man had somehow no complaints about where he was sent to learn a few Rain tricks or how bare the accommodations had to have been with the Großes Volksfest's winter lodgings.

Glen the Texan gunslinger was appropriately fascinated by practically everything Mauricio could tell him of icy Moscow, but the magician's words were occasionally challenged by Nojan the Joyless bearded wonder with a bit of heckling by Lothar when something that could be described as 'shifty' was brought up. Mainly so the Spaniard wouldn't admit to anything that might get the stuntman in trouble, but also just to be a bit of a bitch and a little shit from the sound of it.

The Rain had suffered through the culture shock fairly well, put his charisma into evading around his fellow Flame types without admitting anything possibly incriminating to either himself or Cherep, and generally had been an industrious little bee trying to find out how to hide his nature from anyone that wouldn't have his well-being in mind. Some of those antics he was expounding upon now were things the Cloud hadn't heard of while waiting on the Rain to decide he had enough tricks or skills to forge onward again outside the Zolotov Clan's Misty information blockade.

He really didn't have much else to do just yet, both of his motorcycles were being shipped across the Channel to await the start of his world-tour with a few numbers of other acts… and Viper very pointedly pushed him out of the room when they went in to both report in to the man bankrolling the whole tour as present. Mainly to do the negotiations for who owed who what and how much would be made for whom, which yeah the Mist would probably be the best idea to do it.

Especially as… it wasn't just Cherep that needed to live off the payout now.

Reminded of the whole 'sanctuary' idea, which collided with the reminder of a big chunk of property he was holding onto for his baby sister, Skull wondered… exactly how hard it would be to make a civilian-friendly Flame user's enclave?

Obviously it was possible, Mafia Land was such an enclave that few around the world could access or even get to with enough effort. He might not know all the rules and what safety measures were put in place to keep it that way, but it existed. Mostly for criminals.

It was really shitty that people like him, or Mauricio and tiny little Mingxia, had to play by mafia rules when they had little to no interests in that lifestyle. Even still, there were all the Flame users that weren't lucky enough to find a moderating Cloud to interfere on their behalf or had a Flame-friendly family that enabled the hell out of their avoidance. Shamal was… well, with who his godfather was probably more than sold on where his life was probably going to go, but his adorable nephew probably was one of the next generation of criminals even before his little sister decided to mother the hell out of him.

"Heavy thoughts, stuntman?"

Blinking a bit blankly, Skull looked up at the African shaman who was sharing a side table with him. "Oh… something like that."

"Many hands make for a lighter load." Nahum offered wisely in his deep brassy voice, which was kind of an awesome vocal range that probably made for an equally awesome singer.

Which probably tied into his entire act, that voice could likely be hypnotic used the right way and even with absolute nonsense much less African chants it was attention grabbing.
The chicken bones through his nose and earlobes were a bit ick, on the other hand.

"Well… to be honest, I was kind of wondering how hard it would be to buy an island." Admitted the Cloud a bit sheepishly, because to anyone that didn't know Mafia Land was a thing it was probably a bit out there.

Oops, and the whole 'Flame sanctuary' thing and how that tied into the wonder. Which were not things they could speak of in a civilian-friendly place like this.

After giving him a heavy stare, probably because thieves plus money equaled a headache for everyone else and he might've been infected with it given Viper's miserly habits being a drain on his own and the frankly illegal methods he had to recoup that by, the ebony skinned and completely bald shaman tapped long fingers against his glass of straight rum. "And what would you do with it then?"

"There are places for those like my sisters and Vipes, but not for those like me and Mauricio." Skull informed him simply enough. "I was wondering how much of a headache actually carving something like that out might be."

Not that the stuntman really wanted to start contesting the 'right' or 'obvious' use of Flame users with the worldwide mafia ranks. That was a bloody, dirty war he didn't remotely believe he was ever going to be happy dealing with. Not to mention the utter headache keeping such a sanctuary free and clear of both…

…were there any 'Vindice' Laws against a government knowing about Flames?

It might be against Omertà, but Skull didn't swear to the Vow of Silence. The only thing he might hurt doing that would be his own siblings, not to mention the Zolotov Clan itself as his 'originating' syndicate catching flack for not 'reining' him in when he was younger.

Still way too many drawbacks and questions, not enough benefits. "I don't think it's going to be me to make such a thing but getting the information for someone else to build off of might be something to do."

"Pity." Hissed out Aziz in German, spooking the fuck out of the Cloud stuntman who had almost forgotten the snake charmer was also at their table and listening in.

"Damn it, man. Squeak every now and again or something."

He got a tongue stuck out at him before the heavily tattooed man finally took a sip of his cider.

The newsboy cap the snake charmer was wearing did nothing to soften the really wild image the very colorful man had, but the whole vest and buttoned shirt thing kind of did give him a kind of factory worker look. It was bizarre, especially paired with the guy's ability to hold himself still enough to imitate a statue. Even after you noted he was sitting there and got used to how he looked, Aziz could still surprise people when he picked to move.

"About this… idea of yours." Nahum started in what could possibly be described as delicate if it wasn't for the semi-thoughtful frown on the man's face. "Why an island, specifically?"

"There is already an island, but that's… a touch murderous to start with." Confessed Skull vaguely, rubbing at his chest and giving the heavily tattooed of their number a dirty look. "It was really more just a wonder about how hard it would be to mock up something similar."

"So, an island may not be the best idea."
"There's three main… points? I think, that any such place would have to conform to in order to be… left alone by a few… factions." The stuntman allowed before his next swallow of beer, which he was aware was of no help to the two listening to him but were rather important anyways. "There's the Laws, there's the more obvious Vows that might not apply depending on the how, and then there's the whole secrecy aspect. No government office, no military service, and just general 'look after your own mess' kind of things."

Tapping his fingers now on the table between them, the African shaman obviously mulled over the bits of information Skull could tell him. "Honestly speaking, stuntman… why not just take over a small country instead?"

"Okay… I'm not sure how you went from 'island' to 'country'."

Aziz, now that he was specifically keeping the snake-man in his sights, also looked fairly confused himself.

"There are island-nations, some of which would be easier to control those seeking entrance into, and if you are not allowed 'government office' then finding someone else to hold it for you…"

"Ah… no. Not me." Skull denied flatly, raising his arms in a cross before his chest before the man could really get going. "Besides which, pacifist. I am not the one you want to be talking these kinds of things over with."

"Who would that be, then?" Nahum countered in a curious tone, now fingering his bones in a method that made him want to shudder.

"My baby sister, maybe. But she'd be as unamused as I am at the suggestion." When the shaman actually had the gall to look thoughtful, the stuntman planted his face in his hand. "Seriously unamused. And while we're both halves of the same coin, she's not nice. I love her dearly, but even to me she's more of a sweetly tempered grouch than an inherently nice person."

Admittedly, Viper could also be called a sweetly tempered grouch to him too. Then again, criminals and being nice probably worked out as well as trying to mix oil and water. Someone somewhere would try to take advantage of it, and while he was safe enough as a complete pacifist…

Cherep had tried to help, ended up with his first… minion, and really didn't want much more. At least until he had a better idea of what he could realistically do. Mauricio worked out, kind of… or he could be useful and all not-infringing helper it this worked out.

Hopefully this wouldn't… balloon out into something like his baby sister's growing enclave of minions.

He lost count of that sometime recently.

Skull shot the African shaman a suspicious look, which Nahum merely smirked in return for. "Just something to ponder then, yes?"

Aziz heaved a sigh, apparently making a gallant effort in drowning himself in his cider in spite of how little was left in his tankard.

(Tuesday the 3rd of February, 1970. Courthouse of the Pankow/Weißensee Districts, East Berlin, German Democratic Republic.)
Renato was obviously very good at his job, even if you only took it on merit for how long he had been at it and being more or less fully intact still. There was also the fact he wasn't horribly scarred up by his lifestyle, which was another marker of either his skills or his Sun Flames. That may or may not be applicable because while Sun Flames helped healing… it didn't prevent a whole lot of scarring.

It wasn't even him trying to boast or anything foolish like that, there were scores of equally criminally inclined gutter-brats that crawled out of the same slum-hole he did. Out of all of them, he only knew three survived it.

One lost a damn leg and retired back to their shared 'hometown', such as it was, to carve fishbone trinkets for the rest of his life. Another picked up cooking and assassinations and was cheerfully murdering his way through any and all five-star restaurants he could still get into barred from at least ten separate countries and a list of warrants for his arrest at least as tall as he was.

The last was… well, himself.

Having pissed off a fair number of criminal famiglias on his own meant he was never very sure how much was just insane luck and how much was just skill, as not even Renato had managed to scrape out of his meager beginnings entirely unscathed from the comparative 'step down' in quality anyone from that branch of life suffered under.

Relatively, maybe. The hitman was alive and all that.

Even could be considered 'with a wife and kid' if you tilted your head to the side and squinted hard… and ignored the dubiously legal claim he didn't have on either except in the world of fantasy-based rumors.

It was something he had accounted for and planned out for his next 'try', mocking together at least a rumored ‘beginning’ that wouldn't immediately equate who he would become as 'was once gutter trash' to see if there was a significant or at least appreciable difference. A semi-decent syndicate would have to go belly up for it, but out of the three he knew for a fact were chasing him for their own reasons… he at least had the opportunity to pick a good one.

He might even spend the effort to maybe gain a civilian mastery over something to account for 'missing' years he didn't have the foreknowledge to prep, if he was that bored in the coming years.

Having the opportunity to show off a little skill to a contemporary and good friend before he had to leave her of course meant nothing would go smoothly or neatly in this little 'favor'.

Especially because it was a hostage exchange.

Renato could spot three things majorly wrong with the whole picture, and that was just with both sides showing up for him to moderate this little occasion as a neutral third-party to call the shots then wildly aiming various caliber weaponry around everywhere suspiciously.

There was an unaccounted for possible sniper or interfering busybody on the same roof he had set Sonya on, the hostage was likely wearing a highly suspicious looking belt of probably explosives that either had a fuse or a timer to account for, and he was mostly sure whatever was in that briefcase for the 'price' was mostly or completely not what was asked for given how green the man holding it so desperately looked.

…right.

Hopefully the Russian thief's desire to stay out of his way while he was working would also translate to getting the innocents out of the crossfire if it came down to it. While Renato had no intention of harming the lady being exchanged that didn't mean everyone else out here was of a similar mind, and he was also kind of forced to ensure the men trying to get said lady back remained mostly whole. As they were Janučkievič's men, and that favor they were angling for falling through would cut an unexpected day or two delay to their timetable which was already getting tight.

"Gentlemen, if you're all quite done sizing each other up?" Drawled out the hitman as he crossed the shadowed parking lot to where he assumed and indeed would be the 'middle ground' of this meeting would be, in a pool of light cast by two offset streetlamps.

Ignoring the guns that immediately swung in his direction, more from the 'hostile' side than the men he was somewhat aligned with due to reasons, he glanced first from the goon with the briefcase to the lady hostage with the burlap sack over her head.

Because of course they were going that clichéd.

"In the interests of ensuring no one twitches wrong and gets shot in the back," or the front but he was being tactful, "and possibly inconvenience someone important, I have been asked to ensure this deal goes through. As such, state your terms."

A few, either from the reassurance his not being armed should not give anyone or the tone he was taking with both sides, of those hostile gun barrels lowered. Not entirely on the side that at least should've known he was going to show up, which was really a value of 'not good' of its own.

"Who the hell sent-

"How do we even know that's even the girl we're here for?"

Renato, and most of Janučkievič's men, looked to the opposing side of the exchange rather pointedly. The poor dear probably couldn't see very well, and the lady tripping would delay everything even more. Furthermore, the expressed concern was a valid one. Swapping the real target out for a fake was always a good tactic.

"Because I said it was. How do we know you-"

"No, no that's not how this is going to go." Interrupted the Mafioso a bit pointedly, which left all the guns on his right side lowering even as a few more on the right to refocus on him. "If you refuse to show your side of this arrangement is as requested, they do not have to show their side of the agreement is as you asked."

Shooting the small caliber gun out of the other man's hand before he could fully free it from his jacket and train it on him then evading the slightly wild retaliation shots by taking a few steps to the side before it became apparent the grunt was still alive, the Sun user re-aimed and allowed the barrel of his gun to start glowing yellow. Just enough for the warier of the men out there to suspect something was off, but not a whole lot to cast suspiciously strong golden-yellow tones into the near-dark surroundings.

"Pick. One."

The current spokesperson on that side of the parking lot made the rookie mistake of looking at someone else for guidance over the hand he was babying, and a slightly older man positioned as the hostage's main guardsman sighed slightly angrily before ripping the burlap sack off the girl's head none too gently.
Obviously, they had gone to the precaution of also gagging their hostage. If she was wearing something explosive and knew it, she wouldn't be able to warn someone of it until too late.

Lowering the pistol still simmering with his Sun Flames, Renato first glanced over at the side he was temporarily on for the mook with the suitcase to obligingly pop it open and show at least the first rank of East German Marks neatly stacked and available to be seen. The stack of obviously cut paper behind it only showed a few too-strongly colored edges before the movement made everything stack up behind the real money it was padding out.

Minor blessings.

Glancing back, mostly for show to ensure no one over there had any major nitpicks that might make this entire thing go sour before it had to, the hitman let his eyes get caught by the slightly terrified and majorly desperate hostage's. Who glanced downward the best she could, then back up to him with wide eyes, not remotely comforted by his shallowly inclined head to show he got her message.

…so, the assumption of explosives was probably spot on. At least, she was desperately scared of something about herself. Or something underground possibly.

Or under her own skirts.

_Fucking_ wonderful.

"Right. Two of you, one with your side of this exchange and someone to guard you while your hands are busy, come over here so we can get this over with."

_How the fuck was-

The manhole cover almost under his right toe shifted somewhat unnaturally for having nearly fourteen stones of pure human standing half-on it. Almost too easily, and nearly forcing him to slip backwards as things under that foot wrenched sideways all of a sudden.

_Sonya._ Either the thief intended to steal the explosives to deal with in a Storm's disregard for heavy ordinance, or the hostage outright if something went majorly wrong. Anyway it went down, Renato was _entirely_ alright with that kind of meddling.

It left that possible interfering busybody or equally likely sniper at his back, but the hitman could deal with that if he wasn't going to be forced to protect someone in the middle of a firefight with little to no cover available.

He slid backwards and a touch to the side as casually as he could, while both sides gravitated to where they'd have a clear sight down the parking lot _and_ unobstructed fields of fire from each other masking his movements as just shifting to accommodate a new 'center ground'. If they forced the girl to just move forward, and didn't pull her to either side to be escorted by someone _other_ than what seemed to be the more senior veteran over there…

It would put his back to where that possible sniper was lingering the last he caught sight of a roughly man-shaped shadow _and_ would ensure the girl would end up just short of the manhole cover for the handover. Her skirts would at least conceal most of what was going on down there but then again, he hadn't asked the thief to do this and she deserved a bit more cover for volunteering herself to solve a bit of a sticky situation.

Gratified when that side of things worked out as he wanted it, the _Mafioso_ slid his gaze to the side he was forced to support but he wasn't very appreciative of to insure his intents would not be anticipated by anyone decently smart. Green-tinged and money-man shuffled forward almost as if he was equally as much a hostage as the lady being exchanged, clutching the briefcase full of money and fakes to his chest and just generally looking unwilling to be there.

…he was also wearing jeans. Something even his Soviet best friend didn't do in her homeland unless somewhere she deemed safe enough from government observation, as apparently jeans were somehow considered a luxury and not something good Soviet citizens wore out and about.

Foreign?

What the hell was the man doing here, much less in the middle of a hostage exchange?

Renato rapidly ran his mind over all the details Sonya had given him, paired it up with a few tidbits he learned on his way in and out of Janučkievič’s place, and discarded a couple of the less likely options.

The Storm-Cloud had been somewhat surprised 'Elias Ocean' was dealing with the slumlord of this sector of the Iron Curtain…

…hmm. What was the girl's name, again?

If it turned out to be Ocean's daughter, or wife or what have you, the hitman was going to shoot someone. It meant it was possible the busybody that might be a sniper was the older thief as well, and if it wasn't nearly impossible to directly copy Sonya's innate strength in less inhuman manners he'd be suspicious that person under the manhole cover wasn't the Storm-Cloud.

Or otherwise, Ocean had been forced to get local muscle backup to regain the girl and sent another of his 'crew' with some and not all of the money required to get her back. Then it was possible money-man was so green under his dusky skin because Janučkievič’s men assumed it was all there and it being revealed to be a bit of cash with a lot of padding was going to piss off both sides in short order.

…and he was stuck in the middle.

Obviously, all four of the people doing the actual handover slowed down when they got within a few feet of each other. The Mafioso had to beckon them forward a few times so things wouldn't have to be thrown and possibly busted wide open as the farce it was, and so the Russian thief could have the best possible position to deal with whatever was upsetting the hostage.

"The terms for this arrangement was, as far as I am aware, that the girl was to be unharmed and returned for a set price." Turning to the girl in question and ignoring the sliding manhole cover as it offset itself a little to allow a slim person to maneuver around it without it becoming obvious someone was doing such, the hitman eyed her general condition. "You can obviously still nod or shake your head, so I ask you to confirm that is the case and you are unharmed from your captivity."

Honey brown eyes widened momentarily, and something obviously equally as feminine and slim in size shifted her drab wool skirts a touch before the girl's elbows were forced to pinch tight to her waist as the belt holding the bulky containers slightly slackened. Showing some admirable courage, she nodded firmly once and didn't glance downward.

Approvingly, Renato shifted without giving anything away himself so he could look at the man possibly screwing them all over and shift the bulk of the attention away from whatever Sonya was doing. "That being the case, I then ask you to set down the briefcase at your feet. I will count to three. When the hostage steps forward, you slide the money over and we all go home."

Slowly, obviously unwilling to get on with things which could be excused through any number of reasons but did not help right now, the case was set delicately on the pavement as asked.

Taking two steps backwards himself now that the girl's mysterious and suspect belt was MIA somehow if only from the front, although there were two big burn spots in the fabric covering her stomach that were suggestive in their own right, the hitman moderating this exchange very loudly counted to three.

Three things happened. The girl stepped forward to show the manhole cover completely back into position and nothing suspicious about it left on the ground she had been standing on, the case was kicked but it skidded a touch too far to be easily recovered, and the damn thing popped open.

What the Italian Sun user could see at half the distance was finally apparent to the hostage takers, and the immediate outrage was very predictable and the few really jumpy men opened fire on the six individuals in the middle who may or may not be aligned with either side. Mostly due to the sudden excitement making a few trigger fingers slip before things were ready, and counter shots equally as sloppily done on the returning side.

The sudden decision of the solid metal manhole cover to eject itself into the atmosphere was a touch momentum arresting for a split moment before the heavier calibers could come into play, the lack of smoke at least suggested it wasn't because of an explosive going off, and Sonya bodily lunged out of the sewers to snag hold of the girl's left ankle then the back of her skirt and pull her bodily into the ground to remove the innocent from the field.

The possible foreigner-born man scrambled in after them and only took a shallow glancing hit on the inside of a knee as someone tried and failed to kill the hostage before she was sprung from the situation scot free, leaving Renato in the middle of a two-possibly-three-way firefight and caught neatly in the crosshairs of both sides.

The first volley was obviously badly aimed, as most of the men brought up or zeroed in their sights on specific targets and the rest wrestled against their surprise and the various methods of concealed carry to bring their own firepower to bear. Two badly wide shots hummed passed the hitman, proving someone on either side had been tasked with keeping the unknown in their sights as was prudent but whomever it was sucked horribly, and one more caught mostly fabric as the Italian shifted and wove for some distance from the entire debacle.

Taking advantage of the residue from his first shot of the night he unloaded a full Sun Flame shot straight into concrete some few feet away between both sides, and hopefully in the direction others were aiming in to blind the unwary, then started picking off the heavier caliber guns on both sides as far as his memory stretched.

Obviously he hit a few mooks, pity that but even his memory in the dark of specific placements and even trying to account for flinches or repositions was impossible when there was a sudden scramble like this.

"If I may point something out," drawled the hitman sarcastically as loudly as he could into the ringing silence his flash of Dying Will Flames caused everyone with two brain cells to rub together, cocking his holdout pistol in his left hand in hopefully unneeded preparation if the gunshots picked up again, "it seems someone has stolen both the money man and the hostage. Shooting each other will not help anything."

Sonya was surprisingly good at the whole 'stealing people' bit for something he hadn't been aware she did, hopefully the thief had encouraged the hostage and the tagalong to move on further away from any possible violence in case someone went after them.
Hmm… the other man might be bleeding. He was unsure if he wanted the guy to be left behind or not.

"What the fuck was that?"

"I'd almost say a Mist Flame user." Renato confessed blandly when no one else had anything to offer the man, the veteran guy who was badly unnerved and already twitchy, rubbing wary fingers on the hole in his suit jacket and calculating out exactly which moron did it. "If it wasn't for the mostly human figure that grabbed the hostage. If it was a Mist, then whatever did the grabbing would've been entirely inhuman."

Already shifty and jittery from the near-firefight they all had already glancing gotten into already, no one else moved or spoke for a tense moment.

"…you're another one, right?"

"Whatever gave you that idea?" Mocked the hitman a touch sourly to cut the tensions down a bit more, already fully aware the veteran was one himself but no one else was.

Kind of obvious when he knew for a fact he shot a bullet the man's way to remove that assault rifle out of his hands… but the gun and the man holding it was completely unmarked. A touch winded, but without major injury.

Lightning, obviously.

"Right, you three. Go back, tell the boss what happened." The veteran and possible Lightning ordered shortly, eyeing Renato's mainly unmarred frame warily even as the Sun Flame user reseated the secondary gun back in the holster secured to the small of his back. "You, you're coming with us. So, if the girl's damaged or whatever from this bullshit we won't be held responsible."

Eyeing the man curiously for a moment and glancing back at Janučkièveč's men only once to ensure they really were mainly intact, the Italian inclined his head in what could be mistaken for agreement.

Really, it was to hide his satisfaction with how surprisingly well this worked out for how much had looked to be going wrong at the start.

His and Sonya's end of the bargain with the master of the Bornholmer border crossings was just to keep the men behind him alive, hostage optional. In close quarters, and with a fully aware and possibly protective Cloud lurking below… even if Renato went first as it seemed the other man wanted the remaining three were likely about to die horribly.

Including he who seemed to have shot a hole through not only his suit but a skimming mar into his skin, which meant easy revenge to boot.

Getting a jump on things before the veteran if possibly painfully new Lightning could try ordering him about and reestablish the authority he'd already undercut to prevent the likely clash of personalities between different criminal outfits trying to cooperate, the Mafioso followed along Sonya's path and entered some interestingly broad pair of brickwork tunnels that had a secondary channel to the side which thankfully contained the actual sewage from this part of Berlin.

Removing his Sun Flames from his main pistol got the slightly yellowish glow to fade, and instead Renato lit a hand in a method of light-giving the Storm-Cloud showed him. It allowed him more than enough illumination to pin down tiny drops of fresh blood, and to orientate himself to where Sonya had retreated to with her unexpected extra.
Humming pleasantly, the hitman then waited patiently for the mooks he was going to led into a lethal trap to catch up.

The story behind this entire farce would be moderately interesting, and exactly who he was going to send his tailoring bill too would be whichever moron had decided to stiff a large number of moderately armed men he had been tasked to moderate between.

(Wednesday the 4th of February, 1970. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"I won't be available for… most of next year." Tatiana dismissed easily as she double-checked the list on her clipboard as mostly done so wasting a bit of time wouldn't get her on the bad side of her current resident doctor, because as cute and as soft as the guy's hair was there were plans being carried out.

Besides which, if that resulted in her picking the next round of Mist for the hospital… maybe they wouldn't immediately fuck off for parts unknown.

The busty redhead was fully aware those few possible-but-not-really Mist nurse trainees already sent to the hospital before hadn't actually been there for medical lessons. They had been part of Usov's Mist net of informants, which was still horribly green and working out the kinks in multinational information networks before going back to Moscow and ensuring the Soviet sensibility of burying their heads behind an iron curtain of 'fuck you, we're perfectly fine over here' wouldn't harm them all in the end.

Green Mists weren't really a risk in and of themselves, they were initially creative little buggers and of all the Flame types Mists were the ones that hit the ground running from the start. Unfortunately, that didn't mean all Mists would be able to skate by without adequate medical care.

As seen with Sergej, who was still unconscious after being beaten up and taken over by a hostile Mist. Hopefully he'd recover, or one of the incoming Mist nurses would be able to draw him out of his own head, otherwise she was fairly certain Edik would end up a very bitter mortician haunting the morgue on his own. The teen could work perfectly well as such, but the bitterness kind of impacted his quality of life.

Avdotya, with an entire school year of chasing after stubborn and willful brats empowered in the most obstinate ways imaginable when they got hurt, would hopefully end up better equipped to be Kappel's main nurse aide in the Sun's place. Instead of getting sidetracked so often with minor issues she hadn't needed to involve herself with, hopefully she had learned to delegate.

At the very least, school children shouldn't be all that removed from the headaches a hospital staff could generate.

"Not even a weekend retreat here or there?" Ganauche faux-pouted at her, which worked really well for him even with the eyepatch. Gave him a kind of roguish air, kind of a modern-day pirate aesthetic. Bit of a foppish one in a three-piece suit, but that wasn't entirely objectionable.

Obviously, the guy was trying his best to charm her. Equally obviously, Tatiana was not going to help him with the irritation his whole outfit had caused her baby sister. They had to apply the elbow grease, in the direction they damaged, by themselves.

That didn't mean there was no reason to humor the guy. Aside the whole charming eye candy he represented while he tried sweet talking her, there were the other benefit to allowing the guy to 'court' her. Which included dinners and the occasional shiny thing.

So sue her, she liked the glitter. Right now it was cheap trinkets she might've lingered over while he was getting the CEDEF up to scratch or the occasional bunch of flowers that looked freshly picked around the island instead of professionally grown and cut, but it had the possibility of getting better in quality the longer she allowed the 'line of communication' to remain open without shutting it down.

Free glitter, which she didn't have to steal or source herself. The possible rumor gathering she might be able to do if it got far enough was also attractive.

"Maybe now or again, but not often." Allowed the nurse brightly, actually more thinking of scoping out her baby sister's castle and seeing how suitable that would be for an occasional beachside retreat. "I've got a term in the Soviet Mafiya Academy, being the main nurse on staff. So... a bit removed entirely I will be."

Both eyebrows, which showed how ill-used the Lightning Guardian was to the whole missing eye situation so likely something that happened recently, rose up almost against the guy's will. "You're going to work there."

"Nya founded the dratted thing. And, even with the Zolotov Clan's fully willing permission, getting it stable and more importantly unfettered from obvious influences so all the dratted Flame-ing brats will coagulate there for the bits they need to know is a bit of an effort. We all pitched in a bit." Shrugging, as if it wasn't a great big deal as it seemed to be to anyone even remotely outside of the Soviet Union, she flashed him a smirk. "Sorry."

Unfortunately with Lightnings, it was kind of hard to know if you surprised them if they were on their best 'public' persona. Ganauche might be putting his all into charming her, but this was also an information gathering exercise on his own end.

"Founded." A one-word comment about nothing that had a wealth of possibility but little avenue of confirmation, and the man changed the subject. "Little sister's got you on a short leash then?"

"More like I'm one of the few that specifically looked into Flame natures and how that might ricochet into health problems if we over think something." Tatiana confessed easily enough, not addressing if Sonya had any say or influence over her working hours because he didn't have to know that. "Doctor Kappel and I have been a bit occupied logging the possibilities, which tend to show up in some interesting results."

"But... Flames don't harm the Flame user?"

"As long as that specific Flame user is aware of that and doesn't think themselves into logical fallacies." Corrected the nurse as she hugged her clipboard to her ample chest, shaking her head over that 'golden' rule which tended to be full of pitfalls of its own. "Take Storms. Taken to the furthest logical point, that should mean Storms can burn off anything not 'them'. However, that leaves open the possibility they cannot take anything 'not them', up to and including food or water. Dying off via starvation or dehydration instead of illness or poison."

The expression that scrawled across the Mafioso's face was a study in bemused confusion.

"Then, of course, you have to think of all those tetchy brats that don't know 'Flames won't harm the user as long as you believe so'. They pop on fire, assume they really are on fire, and burn themselves alive with their own Flames." She considered the man standing in a hospital corridor talking to her, then shrugged. "Or electrocute themselves, given present company. We lost a pair of Storm twins.
that way, they weren't aware of that little feature."

"Huh... hey, do you all know why the Vindice have the Laws they do?" Wondered the Lightning in a tangent she would never have guessed at, but it was one that made her think anyways.

"...hmm." Eyeing the man and wondering how 'open' the line of communication she was going to allow should be, the Sun thought about it.

"Do you?" Ganauche asked, obviously startled she hadn't immediately professed her ignorance.

"There's... a bit of a thing coming up." Tatiana didn't know what the next intent for the information pulled out of the KGB was going to be put to, but there was the lingering fact no one had any idea if the Vindice had claim on that information or what should be done about the government's knowledge of the information. "I might be able to ask for you."

Maybe. Depending on a lot of factors. Including if her baby sister was ever going to try to clarify things so Usov could get what he had been not-so-transparently angling after. As bewildering as an 'introduction to a Vindice Officer' was for someone to seek out, apparently it wasn't far enough out there any Mist would consider that 'trite'.

Someone should probably figure that out, anyways. Just to be safe.

"...son of a bitch."

"Speaking of, in a not entirely unrelated news... how long are you going to be lingering around these parts?" Not remotely off-put by the highly wary look that question earned her, the nurse freed a hand from her clipboard just to put it on her hip and tilt things so her chest was just a touch more obvious. "I ask... because my ex is getting out of jail soon. I might need a guy to 'obviously' occupy me, and one that won't immediately run off from the very sight of his unimpressed face."

If he made a pretty boy to chat up to her, she probably made for a tasty bit of arm candy for him as well. Vongola wasn't small fish, however insular the Italian Mafia Families had been up until the surprise takeover over a sixth of the island that gave Vongola's Outside Advisory Branch security oversight here. Ganauche had admirers of his own locally, more for who he was connected to and less for him, and equally less 'professional' places to work that viewed obstructing the nurses because you wanted to shag one silly just a tiny bit dimly to warrant immediate removal of your person.

The Vongola Lightning Guardian grew a lot more serious in a blink of an eye. "Domestic abuse?"

"What? Hell no, I would've murdered the ass." Dismissed Tatiana a touch shortly, not really amused by the implication she would've put up with that kind of shit. " Clan tradition. We start out near home and steal our way as far out as we can get until some or all of us get arrested for it. Depending, especially if you get really far like out of the Iron Curtain far, you might stay local where you are or go back to our territory to either do it again or find something different after your prison sentence."

Ganauche thought about it. "What happens after that?"

"Either we go domestic and return to the clan for something more sedate and less exciting or make a niche for ourselves wherever we are and allow ourselves to be used as a handhold for the next generation's strings of thefts out and about. More the first than the last, but possible."

"I've got another couple weeks. Might be stretched for a month or so more..." Allowed the Lightning thoughtfully as he smoothed a hand over his jaw. "When do you need a pasty?"

"This summer, early." Just before she had to head back to Moscow, actually. "Nicolai is... well, he's a big guy. Muscles, I mean. No Dying Will Flames, so it should be easy enough to hold your ground against him, but it still should be said."

A whole lot of beef on that slab, in truth. Tatiana's preoccupation with buff men had gotten her into trouble there, and while she entirely appreciated where her ex was coming from… she wanted to heal.

It was rewarding, she liked it, and her skills were phenomenally tailored for the job. Playing house, either back in Moscow or just wherever the gang was, for her 'first' serious boyfriend wasn't remotely as interesting or appealing to her right now.

No respect intended, Lisa. Maybe in a few more years, after she got her doctor's license.

The minor problem not allowing marriage or anything 'family' orientated for the lower ranks of vory, deciding when you were domestic enough with your current partner to settle down together until the vor of the pair had the rank for having dependents without getting them messed was a bit dicey. Especially when the two of you didn't agree when that should happen, or you had plans that didn't coincide with the other's assumptions.

With the school nurse thing, Tatiana would look pretty domestic from the outside. While there was an opening for the school nurse to be a permanent thing, the Sun also didn't want to treat a bunch of snot-nosed brats figuring out how to murder each other off via Flame skills a portion of them had for the rest of her life. Given the whole tiff she and Nicolai had was due to her wanting to professionally learn to nurse or get a doctor's license instead of waiting on pin and needles for him to finish his vor requirements, so he could sweep her off her feet and they'd live happily ever after…

Well, she'd like to hedge her bets. They were all criminals, just because it was something civilized people did didn't necessarily mean they would behave the same way.

Hopefully she was jumping at shadows, but prison changed people. So did time.

…or doing time, as the case might be.

"If possible," because she was totally counting 'helping me with a vor who was my ex' as a personal favor and not part of Ganauche's point hoarding, "and you can do it… I won't put in a good word for your syndicate, but I will put in a good gush or two about how helpful this will be for me."

The whole 'missing an eye' thing kind of made peering at people suspiciously a touch hard for the guy, but he gave it his best shot. "I'll think about it."

More than she could count on, for someone a whole lot more interested in her influence over her little sister and the Flame nurses than for herself. "Fair enough."
"Stay here."
"That's not-"

Sonya turned around and all but bit off the man's nose as she glared the intruder into submission. "Stay, fucking, here."

"Mash, we need to take care of your leg anyways." The girl offered peacefully, beckoning the dark-skinned man with the British accent over to where she had set herself to remove the last of her bindings. "Let's stay out of the way for now."

As the thief finished that in her head as 'we can run once she's gone', she also included the hostage girl in a slightly Dying Will Flame tainted glare before slinking back along the tunnels she had brought them down. Equally as unsure if she should retain some kind of hold or line of sight on the girl they had been there to ensure was returned or ransomed to a separate syndicate for re-ransoming back to someone else, the Russian merely limited herself to a range where she wouldn't be obvious to the two of them but fully concealed in the dark to await whomever tried following them down here.

Hopefully Renato wasn't going to be mad with her, for interfering.

She hadn't intended to, but then Elias Ocean somehow ended up on the same perch she had been on to watch things go down and practically spazzed out about the explosives tied to his daughter.

The man was… sort of a friend of her foster mother's?

Either that or an old acquaintance she had recalled fondly, so the woman's foster daughter allowed herself to be nagged into freeing the girl being held hostage from her lethal accessory after she pointed out it could be easily removed with a bit of stealth. Then shit went south, and she had to leave the Sun using hitman in the middle of a firefight without having a perch to observe how that would end.

What was with everything and anything conspiring together so she couldn't watch her friends do what they were best at?

…after Shamal's religious cult-thing, she should probably head back to China for a moment just to see if Ballsy Toddler Boy was alright or not.

Oh… and the brat's mom.

Sonya ran her thoughts back down that tangent, irked she was yet again snipping at the heels of a kid she was not related to. And said people's people, even still again.

She really had to stop doing that.

Some obnoxiously cheerful humming, in an eerily familiar register even if the last time she heard him hum was… never, caught the thief's straining ears under the quiet murmur of voices squarely behind her and the odd liquid splash of the sewer water echoing oddly off the uneven walls. Orientating herself to where that was coming from, she also managed to pick up the scuffled footfalls of someone uneasily walking along with said person humming.

…two? Renato's tread was markedly louder than his wont but still what could be described as 'patiently/carefully' placed footfalls, yet it wasn't only his steps she could pick out. There was someone really nervous with him, maybe another… and…

…three. One more, significantly stealthier than anyone else was either being or trying to be.

Three mooks and a hitman, walking along dark as pitch sewer lines, straight to where she stashed girly-hostage and Mr. Brainless.

Were they Janučkievič's men, or the hostage people come to collect the hostage again?

Sonya didn't really understand why Renato would be leading more hostage-takers to her, so more probably the men of the man they were trying to get a favor from. Quickly checking on the girl and the uninvited tagalong herself, who were still whispering suspiciously but entirely unaware of where the Storm-Cloud was lingering, and she slid further into the darkened labyrinth of tunnels to see what the hell was really going on.

"Will you fucking stop?" Someone commented waspishly in a low tone, as the footfalls resolved into four distinct treads to her ears. "They'll hear us."

"My dear man," drawled the hitman almost lazily, but did interrupt his obnoxious humming, "the odds of us successfully sneaking up on whomever stole your hostage is slim as it is. I'd rather this not turn into some cut-rate horror movie."

Hostage takers, then. Why the fuck was the hitman suddenly buddy-buddy with them?

"...horror movie?" Inquired someone really softly, almost inaudibly even to her closing in on where they were to the point she was guessing that was what he said, but the Italian answered the man anyways.

"In the middle of the night, in pitch dark, with unknown hostile... something, ahead? Why, if something lunged out of the dark to bodily haul one of you away down a junction... I'd be utterly unsurprised."

…did Renato want her to play a horror movie villain?

Sonya finally glimpsed some light ahead, cast by the palm full of Dying Will Flames of the Sun the Italian was holding aloft for visibility purposes. That would mean their night vision would be terrible, and if she did snag someone… she'd have to move quickly, luckily her friend was apparently leading them all in a rather broad circle instead of the straight line to where she stashed the hostage. He was getting them near, but not close enough to count for very much.

"Stop taunting the idiots." Grouchy and opinionated snapped, irritated and highly unamused as his group passed a junction that she could maybe use if she timed it right. "If one of them pisses themselves-"

Lunging faster than anyone purely human could account for, the Russian bodily tackled the trailing man of the group into a side tunnel and firmly out of any visible range. Wrenching him even further to the side and off balance for the expected follow-up probably on her heels, she ensured she was supported on the brickwork separating the earth they were buried within and the brick walkway… right over the trough of sewage this network of tunnels managed. Dropping her victim, she resized one of her physical copies of the Bec de Corbins while shielding any possible light with her body to hook into the mook's collar and practically dredge him through the noisy and noxious murk for a short distance before throwing him away from her and easy discovery.

He screeched rather satisfyingly actually, and the liquid noises were all sorts of suggestive. Tossing him down about three meters of curved brick tunnel also enabled her to keep him out of sight if not hearing range as something powerfully hot and blindingly bright skipped too high and too far to the wrong side of the tunnel.

"…what the FUCK WAS THAT?" The speaker's voice cracked with terror, but there was almost something strange about how as the noise echoed a bit.

"Pipe down!" Snarled the same opinionated mook heatedly before she could give the odd echoing sounds more attention, blinking wildly as what was probably afterimages of Renato's Sun Flame bullet faded from his sight and whirled to try to glare at their only light source. "And you-

"I said I didn't want this to turn into a cut-rate horror movie, but did you listen to me? No." Renato tossed back in a voice that was a touch shaky itself, although she could identify that as pure glee instead of anything like terror as she circled back to them warily. "Put your back to a wall, hopefully that'll keep another of us from getting grabbed by… whatever that was."

It would, but she had a pick on a stick she could grab with as well if she didn't want to be sighted just yet. Resizing things instead of summoning them into being fully sized at least ensured the smaller flare of Cloud Flames wouldn't be obvious around her admittedly not very substantial form, especially with Renato's likely unintended cover of a Sun Flame bullet to hide it within. Even somewhere dim and dark like this, colors like light purple could be covered up by blazing yellow.

She didn't need to grab anyone out of a light source next, while the highly opinionated idiot reluctantly did as the hitman ordered… the other one didn't. He bolted, back the way they had apparently come.

Moving equally as quickly, the thief ensured she skipped over Renato's little pool of visible light by going over the men's heads and bouncing off the wall right over the last remaining mook on her way to secure the last one. She barreled into that man's back roughly, pushing him a touch gleefully herself into the muck before using her polearm to snag his belt and fling him down the tunnels as well.

The outright scream she earned was a touch bone-chilling, if you didn't know what had elected that kind of response out of him.

Spooked well out of his rational mind, the last mook next to Renato started rapidly saying prayers to as many people he could think of in a tone that wasn't at all calm or under his breath. Clutching hard at a fully automatic rifle and wildly aiming it down each of the three tunnels their section of the sewers branched out into, it made her less quick to remove him as well as she really didn't want to get shot again.

The hitman, on the other hand, took one long look at the man as Sonya padded her way closer… then snuffed out the palm full of Flames providing light.

Hooking her weapon into his belt as well, or possibly his coat as it was pitch dark now and she really didn't care at this point, she yanked the last man off his feet and into the sludge for his own dunking. Ears ringing from his entirely high-pitched squeal of fright before being tossed down the tunnels away from them, she sighed as her last standing 'victim' started outright cackling with no care for whomever might hear him.

"Yes… real amusing." Her own night vision had suffered with this digression, while Renato's Sun Flames only really provided just enough light around him for maybe one or two other people it still was light she had been using to orientate herself for her 'attacks'. Not to mention that blinding flash of Flames. Blindly feeling forward as carefully as she could, Sonya was still surprised when she hit something solid, warm, and alive even knowing the hitman's last position. "Come on, let's get out of here."

"That was satisfying, in so many ways." Renato rumbled back at her a touch roughly, tracing her arm back so he could find her waist. "Brilliant, little dragon lady. Sublime, even. Did you hear him squeal?"

"Obviously. It was right next to my ear." As it meant she didn't have to risk pulling his arm out of his socket she put up with the near-fondling, so they could get sorted out to leave. "Did you kill that first guy?"

The Sun Flame bullet hadn't been aimed at her obviously, but the tunnel did curve a touch and it was entirely within a decent sharpshooter's skill to hit something they only had a split second to aim at if he used a regular one. She might've thrown what's his name a touch hard and high, it was also entirely possible the guy had been visible for a moment.

With how much screaming he did, not to mention the next shout which cracked on fear, it was entirely possible she missed the crack of a gun underneath it all.

"Hmm… well, he did shoot me."

"What?" He was nearly hip to hip with her, as the tunnel's walkways weren't wide or anything. Blindly feeling along the side of him she was up against, she still startled when warm fingers suddenly gripped her hand poking him and moved her to his other side and the hole in his clothing there. "…you shot him for maybe a hundred euros of tailoring repair?"

He wasn't bleeding from what she could feel, at least. Well, Sun. He wouldn't have bled for long anyways.

"Perhaps. Ah… hmm."

Three pairs highly wary eyes turned to the two of them as she brought the Mafioso into the service station she stashed the hostage and her uninvited guest into, which did have a few low emergency lights on that allowed them to actually see each other instead of needing another palm full of Flames.

Sighing, Sonya disentangled her hand just to gesture to the older thief. "Renato, this is Elias Ocean. With him is his daughter, Maria Ocean, and Mr. Uninvited."

"Totally called it." The hitman drawled out sourly over the sounds of the injured man spluttering then yelping as the makeshift bandage around his knee was tightened, glancing over Elias' whole body before turning to the hostage-girl and giving her a slight bow without knocking the Russian thief over. "My apologies for how we met, miss Ocean. I am glad to see you are fine now."

"Thank you?" More a question than anything, she glanced from her father to the pair of them. "Um… it's nice to meet you too."

"Charmed." Dismissed the thief way to shortly to be strictly polite. "Can we get out of here now? This place reeks."

Renato smoothed the heel of his palm down her spine, which was different enough she glanced at him in confusion. "I have no objections. Gentlemen, lady? Somewhere warmer, perhaps?"
"Yeah..." Giving her a last look, half in confusion and a touch of wariness, the older Ocean gave his daughter a thankful little smile before gesturing to the service access he likely got in by. "...I believe I owe the both of you drinks."

"We have to go talk to Janučkievič." Sonya interjected to limit any socializing, not really wishing to do more for the friend of her mother's. This worked out but really, she could go a while without being fast-talked into risking her neck for his daughter yet again.

"I kind of want to know what they're doing here." The hitman informed her lowly, but not so quietly the others wouldn't be able to hear. "Especially how they ended up in the middle of a hostage situation with us."

"Then I want a damn shower. Fat and greedy probably won't be awake until the sun rises."

Elias snorted a laugh, then promptly choked on it through what seemed to be pure surprise at her mouth.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 4th of February, 1970 continued. East Berlin, German Democratic Republic.)

In a drab little hut of a building's cellar, past a small number of humorless German natives who very nearly got into a scuffle with them until Sonya spoke some kind of gibberish to calm them down, Elias Ocean made good on his promise of a drink.

Of course it was the 'native' wine, which was really imported, called Bull's Blood. The shit was harsh and utterly, painfully sour. Little dragon lady, of course, downed it as she did vodka.

A cast-iron stomach, that one.

The dusty, cramped, and entirely working man's underground bar fitted into a dimly lit cellar wasn't greatly packed with individuals but did have a number of regulars already. Between the Ocean father-daughter pair, what seemed to be a British citizen helping them for a certain value of 'help', an Italian Mafioso, and a Russian thief, they got the far corner table to themselves even if elbow space was apparently at a premium.

"What brings you two to East Germany, anyways?" Maria Ocean inquired after dubiously regarding her mug of wine for a second then focusing on them instead. "Not that I remotely mind, but it's curious."

"Slumming it, apparently." Sonya deadpanned utterly unhelpfully, negligently dropping her own pointedly empty clay mug to the table with a clatter.

Which had been the first one poured, actually.

Renato had to laugh, even if it was tinged heavily with wry amusement. She had decided to take exception entirely to the elder Ocean's very presence, probably sometime when they had been on the same rooftop and she got convinced to interfere even if the hitman didn't mind the help with such a touchy situation.

Even still, Elias seemed well used to brusque and borderline rude Russians and how to deal with them.

Waving down one of the few waitresses, he ordered an entire bottle of the strong red wine and inquired about the possibility of some kind of whisky. The plainly dressed girl promised to at least look in exchange for a number of the local currency, handing over the half of a bottle she had on her tray already to tide them over for a short while.

The Russian being bribed for patience cocked an eyebrow but allowed it and a refill of her mug as she pulled out her pipe to fiddle with while the liquor lasted in nonverbal allowance of such.

"Personal reasons." Renato clarified equally as unhelpfully for them, but then again if they didn't have to admit to a young and vulnerable dependent then they wouldn't. "We need to get across the Wall in a bit of a hurry, so we talked to Janučkievič about an exchange of services. It's how I just so happened to end up moderating a hostage exchange. What about yourselves?"

"Just a bit of local nastiness." Elias dismissed, likely falsely to prevent either of them turning the group in for a reward from what local presence took umbrage at them. "We had to go through Janučkievič as well, for the muscle we didn't have around here."

"We know." Sonya informed him blandly around the pipe stem in her mouth, taking a moment to blow smoke off to the side instead in anyone's face. "We saw you in Ganymed."

"Along with Faulstich and Blücher."

"He invited me along to that one."

"Faulstich? Father..." At his daughter's disappointed words the older Ocean grimaced uncomfortably and hunched up somewhat in his seat. "Needs must, I suppose. Even still..."

"You're alive, we're fine, and I can fix things eventually."

"We were trying to stop Faulstich." Maria reminded him a touch pointedly, rubbing at her temple tiredly. "He's who I got caught by... um, finessing some information out of his office. His local handlers on the wrong side of the track didn't appreciate it."

"You know, if you keep interfering with the local balances of power the people around here will never get off their asses and handle it themselves. Which also means they won't prevent a resurgence of the same stupid problem with just new names and more victims."

Elias clicked his tongue, eyeing the smoking Russian thoughtfully. "And with that... you're connected to Elisaveta Primakova, aren't you? That's her brand of brutal logic entirely. I suspected so up on that roof with your 'I'd rather watch' spiel, but now her hardline with avoiding local issues word-for-word? How do you know her? A student, protégé?"

"My mother." Allowed Sonya blandly as she pulled the pipe out of her mouth, highly unamused by this tangent and making it obvious through narrowed grey eyes and an icy tone. "She spoke rather fondly about you, but I don't see why. That leap of logic is entirely stupid, because you're not helping the people around here and it's fucking obvious when someone new just moves in to continue the same crap."

"We might've had different opinions about things, but there are results that can be appreciated about both methods." Defended the older man pointedly, ticking a finger at the blonde in an admonishing manner that completely bounced off her unimpressed visage. "Besides which, aren't you a little old to be Lisa's daughter? It's been a few years, more than a decade since I last saw her, but you are more than old enough to have been born around when we were working together."

"I'm adopted, jackass."

Elias studied her for a long moment, taken aback and a bit regretful of his hardline questions now.
Maria very pointedly gripped the mug he hadn't taken a drink from and forced it into her father's face, so he'd drink the wine or end up with it poured out in his lap. "You might be the Russian expert here, dad. But stop insulting the daughter of an old friend because you're just that suspicious."

"More than cold, mate." Chipped in 'Macintosh, call me Mash' apparently just to be heard, busying himself with his mug when both generations of Ocean gave him a short look of his own. "Never mind."

"Look, you can try to claim whatever you'd like. If I recall correctly, your group just moves on well before the end results happen anyways." Sonya dismissed flatly, examining the level of wine she had left in her mug before polishing it off negligently. "Eventually, you'll end up out of places to run too and straight into the consequences of your actions. Until then, let's agree to disagree on that."

"Continuing." Renato interjected when it became apparent young Miss Ocean had her father well in hand and the thief at his side had nothing more to say on the subject. "So you ended up taken hostage, your father got a local power to represent his interests in getting you back. Whose idea was it to fake most of the price?"

"Was it?"

"Yes." Confirmed the Mafioso, as the woman seeking clarification had been underground and moving to remove the suspect belt around Maria's waist when that got revealed. "Obviously. Only the topmost level of the bundles assembled for the hostage exchange were real German Marks, the rest were cut up paper trash used to pad out how much it looked to be from a distance."

"Look, look, look. We had two days to get the money together." Mash defended hastily. Earning himself two skeptical looks, a sigh, and a last curious stare from Maria. "Some of it was always going to have to be faked, getting enough to at least mock together something that looked like enough was hard as it was."

"If you had needed money, there's a bank branch a few streets over from here." Sonya pointed out bluntly, ignoring the surprised blink she got from the younger Ocean and the heavy sigh Elias did.

"We don't have an account there." Pointed out the older Ocean patiently.

"Who said anything about making a withdrawal? It's not that hard to get into a bank vault and steal what you need."

Renato palmed his face as their current drinking buddies exchanged a few highly skeptical or confused looks, trying to decide if she was being serious or factitious in that. "Little dragon lady, not many have the gall you do to misplace a metric ton of gold and regard it as something anyone can do in an absent-minded moment."

She outright growled at him, shifting in her rickety wooden chair to ensure he felt her blistering glare. "I've done a bank in less than two days, with a bit of my brother's help. It's possible with limited hands. Further fucking more, it is a requirement for people to exchange a set amount of currency into at least a bit of Marks when you get into East Germany legally. That's another money source that could've been appropriated if cash is needed in a fast hurry, and conveniently nearby. And, it was not a metric ton of gold."

…point.

"There's also picking pockets, if we're going all the way back to basics, and with how sharp the class divides are around here it's patently obvious who would be the more lucrative to go after. A day of work at it, and you'd have a nice comfortable amount. Robbing a high-end store for their end of day deposits is also not all that difficult if you go in during the day and just wait for night."

Elias coughed a touch uncomfortably, and Mash slouched down his chair until he ended up under their rough-hewn table and out of sight. Maria took in the reactions, sighed heavily, and took a long draught from her mug of wine.

"I can't tell if that's just high standards, or you being a bit of a snob when around the less... imaginative." He marveled, taking in the reactions to her little spiel and contemplating just how steep the disparity of ability might be between them and her.

"Stuff it, peacock."

"Temper, temper, little dragon lady." Renato teased delightedly, topping off her mug with the nearly empty bottle of wine as the barmaid came back with a full bottle, the asked for and apparently as rare as hen's teeth whisky from how much Ocean splurged on it, with a few shot glasses to drink it in. "You'll be hearing about those thirteen bricks of solid gold for a long time, rest assured."

Sonya stared at him blankly for a moment while Elias poured him a finger of neat whisky, not even a mental commentary on what she really thought of that running through her head aside a strong surge of annoyance. Then she suddenly kicked out a leg of his chair, so the hitman very nearly took a tumble onto the dirty and grimy floorboards.

Almost choking on her sip of Bull's Blood, Maria hastily set her cup down and smothered her snickers into a palm as Renato dropped the liquor to seize hold of the table and prevent a dirty tumble.

"Okay, look little miss. We don't steal from hardworking, honest people. Most of those things aren't methods we'd ever do."

Blowing out an entirely exasperated sigh as she put out her pipe, the Russian turned back to Elias Ocean. "By who's definition of 'honest'? If someone is honestly trying to skim enough together from working for the local slumlord to afford their sick mother's medication... and you pick to rob him of his money and not the factory owner who pays taxes and his workers only just enough but doesn't bother to do anything but line his pockets with that extra cash in 'legal' ways..."

Elias rubbed his temple tiredly. "It's like trying to talk to Lisa all over again..."

"Are we done here yet?" The blonde woman asked of him tiredly, tucking away the brass pipe despite how hot the bowl might've been with embers in it recently.

Renato straightened up to his full height after downing the shot of actual whisky gratefully, sorting out his tie and the fit of his suit jacket and ignoring the broken chair he had been sitting in. "One last thing, Sonya. You, Mash, you owe me two hundred and fifty euros."

"...what?" Accompanied by a wary look around the edges of the table, the dark-skinned Brit frowned irritable. "How do you figure that?"

"Your shoddy ransom attempt put a hole through my suit." Helpfully gesturing to the hole in question, which thankfully wasn't somewhere more obvious but still rather vexing in its own right, the Italian extended a hand expectantly. "Either pay for it now, or I'll collect it later... eventually."

"Uh... I only got Pounds or German Marks, mate."
"Then I'll be seeing you later." Renato informed him pointedly with a wicked grin, extending a hand to help Sonya to her surprisingly steady feet for how much of the harsh wine she had downed the last half-hour. "Ciao."

"Why does it feel like I just made a deal with a devil?"

"It's survivable." The Russian informed him bluntly, completely accepting and allowing him to put his arm around her in something she merely expected now. "Just try not to get any further in debt."

Mash sank back down slowly, hiding under the table yet again. "Oh... thanks."

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 4th of February, 1970 continued. East Berlin, German Democratic Republic.)

"So, this is the lovely lady you mentioned?" Ryhor Janučkievič inquired in a tone that probably should've sounded pleasant, but it was ill-practiced enough to be entirely plastic and insincere instead. "Mmm... I can see the attraction."

Sonya arched an eyebrow, but kept her mouth shut and instead looked at Renato curiously. It was his show, he did most of the work on this end. She was also unfortunately aware she was not very... diplomatic when she felt badly.

A full night's work, a little bit of liquor she didn't have to buy, and between them Renato was more 'obviously' the one to be wary of at first glance so he got a couple hours of sleep in before it was an acceptable hour to call on a man like the Belarusian native and local slumlord. Tired was putting it a touch mildly, and with it came being irritable the longer things dragged on into the blustery winter morning.

Thankfully she got a lot of liquor down while no one was paying much attention to her in the bar, but that tipsiness was fading quickly to leave behind the exhaustion nibbling at her metaphoric heels.

"Quite a pretty one, isn't she?" Boasted her best friend strangely. He pushed off the wall he had been lingering against and sauntered the few feet over to the two of them.

Oh... and Janučkievič's handful of completely humorless and stone-faced bodyguards. All of whom were highly unimpressed, equally beefy if not carbon copies of each other with a few varying features of difference, suspicious looking men.

"She's not all that great for conversation, but then again... she doesn't really have to be."

Snorting softly, she dismissed the whole conversation as more or less pointless posturing and muscle flexing contest. Instead, she examined the warehouse they had been asked to go to in order to meet the slum lord.

Half of it was a garage, refitting something in the backseat of the cars and general maintenance that might be needed or not. The other half was the more warehouse part, stacks of crates and boxes in certain piles or loaded into large and spindly looking shelves. The only thing that separated it from any old garage or warehouse she had ever seen were the tall stack of tires and the pallet of car batteries, a strangely put-together tower of ripped out backseat car benches, and the packing center in one far corner.

"So... my men are alive, as I asked. In spite of some... difficulties."
"You mean Ocean's group. I'm aware, he approached my companion last night." Renato shrugged dismissively, flicking a wrist to her but straightening up to actually do some kind of reporting. "The hostage you sent us after was wearing some kind of suspect belt she was terrified of, meaning it's quite likely the negotiations should've never gone through... or otherwise they really didn't trust you."

"Not really surprising, what is surprising is the negotiations went through anyways."

"We are professionals."

"Quite interesting." Janučkievič informed the Mafioso insincerely, smoothing a hand over his sizable jowls as he inspected the both of them together. "Given what was on the chopping block, I actually wouldn't have minded it falling through as long as my men weren't killed. There wasn't any way you should've known that, but it's always... refreshing to have competent people on the payroll."

Sonya blinked, and looked at the overweight man in working/business man dress skeptically. That was not the way into the hitman's good graces, because it was pretty obvious if you observed the man for any amount of time in a social setting it became quickly apparent he was very considerate of women.

Renato, contrary to her expectations, didn't shoot the man through the head for irritating him. Then again, they did need him for the moment.

The Italian instead got a very nasty smirk on his face as he squared up to the other. "Oh, I had the suspicion. So, we had a bit of fun instead. Making full-grown men piss themselves in fright."

"I... hadn't heard of that."

"They're probably too embarrassed by the dunking they got in the sewers to expound on their little late-night adventures much." Announced the man slyly, buffing his nails on his lapel and examining them intently. "That is... if they managed to crawl out of there yet. They might just... disappear, instead."

Ryhor Janučkievič narrowed his eyes contemplatively. "Interesting."

"Isn't it just?" Inquired the hitman faux brightly.

"...quite." Agreed the local slum lord, but in a way that made it sound a touch repressive and a lot more unamused. "As to my side of this little exchange, Sinclair. You asked for a clear way across the Curtain. If you and your... lovely companion would come this way."

The Belarusian led them all, all five of his bodyguards and the two foreigners, over to the garage half of this operation. One of the sedans was mostly done having its back bench removed, and some of the boot 'adjusted' so there was less cargo space. Leaving a narrow as hell gap of smuggling space, and the thief glanced skeptically at the hitman's shoulders.

"You and your little lady will have to sit a bit... tightly together, admittedly. And quietly, you blow this operation and we'll have a bit of a difference of opinions on how much longer the two of you stay alive."

"Of course." Renato answered for the both of them, examining the cramp space they would have to sit in. "And our luggage?"

"Will have to be handled a touch differently." Announced the overweight slumlord with a dismissive shrug. "It'll be waiting for you on the other side."
So now… did the work they did equate out the possible price of their possessions in Janučkievič’s mind?

Or did the possible future work they might do together more enticing to ensure he’d try to at least keep them respectful of each other?

The hitman and crime boss studied each other warily for a long moment, before Renato inclined his head courteously. As they had started it they might as well see it fully through to where it’d go now it was out of their hands. "Well then, I suppose we’ll be taking our leave now."

"Until later, Sinclair… young miss Primakova."

Sonya glanced at the older man suspiciously from where she had been inspecting the hard 'back' to the much thinner backseat that would be installed after they got in the car’s hidden… pocket space. "My name is Bazanova."

"Hmm… so you say." Agreed the man negligently, waving them on as bodyguards decided to glare at her with various amounts of unimpressed looks.

She and Renato exchanged a set of looks of their own.

"The continuing trials of being a tall bastard?" Started the thief pleasantly, as Janučkievič and his five bodyguards left them to it.

It wasn’t what she really wanted to say but that was likely more than not-tactful, so she was avoiding it for now. Besides which, he was a lot of Italian to cram in somewhere so… tiny.

"You're the one that's going to have to sit on me." Countered the hitman equally as pleasantly, stretching out his spine just that tiny bit more so he fully towered over her the best he could with six feet and change frame when it came to a woman that was five and a half feet even. "I'll also take the opportunity to apologize, in advance."

"For what?" She intended to take the opportunity to nap, because in the dark there wouldn't be a whole lot of anything else to do but talk.

Which violated that 'be quiet' part of being smuggled.

"Of course you would." Muttered Renato a touch despairingly, softly enough it’d stay between them and not them and whoever really wanted to eavesdrop in a semi-busy factory/warehouse affair. "Well, after earlier this winter can't say I'm all that surprised."

Sonya slapped a hand over her face, cursing just about everything out in as many languages as she could as she felt her face heat up a bit. "Shut. Up."

"Ho? What's this now… embarrassed? I didn't think you did that emotion."

"Surprise, I'm human." She snapped back, taking a deep breath and trying fruitlessly to bury the chagrin as deeply as she could before dropping the hand and looking back up at him squarely. "I denied I did that for a couple years. My siblings are taking the opportunity to get in a few well deserved 'I told you so's."

The Mafioso's 'innocent' face absolutely sucked. Massively.

"I now also have a 'medical collar', which has tags inscribed with a phone number to call if someone needs an explanation. With a bell."
"Tatiana's suggestion?" He inquired a bit needlessly given his mind-reading trick, a slightly infuriating smirk starting to crawl across his face.

"Shut up and get in the car."

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 4th of February, 1970 continued. West Berlin, Federal Republic of Germany.)

"I told you."

"Yes, yes." Dismissed the Mafioso flippantly, relentlessly picking off even imaginary specks of dirt that might have clung to his clothing from their smuggling... and then taking off his hat for the third time this hour to inspect it next. "Now then, miss world-class thief, where does one pawn off the belongings of another?"

"...at a pawn shop." Sonya sniffed, checking to ensure that while her nose was freezing cold and likely as red as could be it wasn't dripping or anything like that. "First though, if they're at all intelligent, they'll strip it for hidden compartments or things of a personal nature that might tip off anyone not a fence that it's stolen. Generally unpack it all too, mostly to see what they got to work with. This is assuming they're not pawning the thing off at someone who won't care it's hot, and they have half an idea to share between them."

"How... mundane." Renato set the fedora on his head then cracked his neck, unfolding his frame from the bus stop they had been 'released' at slightly further into West Berlin than she had expected. Their luggage was now two hours late, and neither were at all charitable to assume a great mechanical failure or some kind of raid was going on to cause it. "Then where is Janučkievič's outpost on this side of the Iron Curtain?"

She frowned thoughtfully, gazing off into the air over this hemmed in piece of cramped neighborhood. "Off hand? I don't know... but I bet Maddie can tell us."

"Isn't Maddie's little... den, a touch outside West Berlin? I was fairly certain we were well within West Germany's borders when you took us to meet her."

"One of her sons lives locally around here, and I do know the woman's number."

The hitman inclined his head to her, sweeping an arm down the street they had been extracted from their illicit cargo hold on. "Then lead on, little dragon lady. This is your show now."

"We don't have time to make Janučkievič, or whichever moron decided to make off with our stuff, regret it. Especially if it wasn't shipped at all and is still on the East side." Sonya warned, uncomfortably aware this was supposed to be the year she finally showed up for the brat's birthday on time... and all because Renato was likely making a point of keeping her nearby enough to do some forcible temporary kidnapping if she got 'distracted'. "I can steal it back no matter on which side it is, but that would cause me to backtrack a bit and go around for a hassle-free crossing and cost us time."

He sighed heavily, dark eyes scanning the semi-busy streets ahead as he steadily followed her along the sidewalk. "I'm aware. Frankly, we might just have to do any 'date' thing with you fully aware of it in America at this rate."

"...well, there's..." Not tonight, they were both probably too cranky and grumpy to do more than find a suitable hotel tonight and sleep for a few solid hours. If brat's religious cult-thing was this weekend, and they had a few more countries to skip through…

"Your thing for Don Bergamaschi and the Cerrito Crime Family. You planned for it after bambino's whole thing this weekend."

"Ah, yes. That thing." Which… she'd do while Björn waited in Mafia Land for Verde and Adrik, even if she was pretty sure she'd have to go out and pick the men up herself in the end. The… castle she now owned for reasons needed a scrub down to begin with, so a full cleaning and maybe some grounds keeping could be hired out to the locals to help get things ready for this summer.

The island they worked for really was something you were invited to on either family or syndicate merits, not because you were unaffiliated to start with. Getting there from a cold start… if anyone could do it the scientist was probably the only one with the smarts, but if that translated to street-smarts with or without Adrik's insider's knowledge piled on top…

"...what the hell is in America, anyways?"

"Renato, it's the United States. Fifty some semi-interlocked States and Territories, more or less autonomous regions you can freely visit between without bothering about customs or passports needed. Until you get to the higher government levels, then things get kind of the same. They all have their own variations of laws, state taxes, ideas on what's 'acceptable', and sights to see. Similar structures, the money spans a great amount of distance, but differing people. What isn't there in the States?"

"The European Communities."

"Covers half the territory the States does."

"Exactly." Tossed the hitman back a bit repressively. "All the interesting things are in Europe.
History, culture. The Louvre, the water canals of Venice and Amsterdam, the remains of Ancient Rome, Athens, the nightlife of Paris, London, the Vatican. Scottish Highlands, Italian countryside, French vineyards, Swedish mountain ranges."

"Greece isn't part of the European Communities yet, neither is Great Britain."

"It's still Europe."

"America has New Orleans. New York, the Big Apple and Broadway. Manhattan. The Grand Canyon, a massive saltwater lake, five Great freshwater lakes, the Mississippi River. There’re still massive steam boats with casinos on them you can gamble a fortune away in, any number of abandoned gold mines and their assorted ghost towns in the West, Chinatown in California to the French Quarter in Louisiana. For that matter, it's got Hollywood."

He sucked on his teeth for a moment, and when she risked a look backwards the man looked tempted much to his own disgruntlement.

"I'm not saying it's better than anywhere else with its thousands of years of history." Sonya clarified likely unhelpfully, now walking backwards because the expression he was pulling was damn near priceless. "I'm saying it's different. That's pretty much what the US is, across the board. Same framework, different applications. I don't know another country that spans deserts and a saltwater lake to tropical islands and two full mountain ranges, the frozen tundra to the swampy bayous, several different forests types from redwoods to maple trees, and even a petrified forest. You go about a hundred kilometers in any direction there, not only will the landscape change but the people making up the local surroundings will differ as well."

"That's not always a good thing."

She shrugged. "Neither is all history, too."

"You're aware it's moderately surprising to hear all this out of a Soviet woman's mouth, yes?"

Humming an accent to show she was fully aware of that, the thief swung around again to keep at least half an eye on where they were going so she could find the main roads and orientate herself again. "As I said, Renato, it's different. And sometimes, different is good."

He quickened his steps until he came up on her side, palming her hip in now what was pretty much his 'usual' thing when walking around with her. "There I might have to concede the point, I think. Different is good sometimes."

"Manhattan might just be your kind of place." Sonya offered fairly, but as she had never visited it ever it was really something she could only say due to reputation alone. "If I recall right, New York had a massive Italian influence you can still find. It might be interesting to see how it's changed from what you know as a native from the 'Old Country'."

"I'm still fairly certain Sicily's countryside or Rome's cityscape would still trump any such thing." Claimed the hitman a touch snobbishly, apparently just to make her roll her eyes at him because he dropped the tangent pretty quickly. "What's close by to San Jose? Since I believe you saw more of California than I did, from what I learned of the situation."

"...San Francisco? Well, Las Vegas is a touch out of the way... but there's still Chinatown, the Golden Gate Bridge, Hollywood..." She trailed off, wondering... "...Alcatraz Island."

"Isn't that a prison?"

The smirk that crawled over her face was probably a bit impish. "Wanna break in?"

"I thought the usual response is to break out of such facilities in our line of work." Renato offered in a faintly wondering tone, following along rather compliantly when she made a sudden turn do to nearly missing the street sign they needed to get to downtown West Berlin even if she very nearly shoulder checked his ribcage. "Isn't it currently occupied by the Native Americans of the land?"

Was it?

Hmm...

"And? It's no fun without the risk of discovery."

"I am more than sold, little dragon lady. As long as I'm allowed to organize an actual date sometime this month."

"Oh... am I rushing you?" Well, more like derailing something he wanted to try for her own interests... was it good or bad he was fully interested too?

There was taking advantage of his interests to avoid a point she was unsure of. Which might be bad of her.

"No, nothing like that. I don't mind, I greatly like your taste in humor seems to be a touch ridiculous and over the top. I'm rather fond of such things myself, admittedly." Icy fingertips yet again dipped into the waistband of her slacks but given how cold it was and how long they were waiting out here… for a Sun user of his quality to actually have heat retention issues it was somewhat actually concerning, so she ignored it. "America is probably a better idea than what I had, the risk of discovery around these parts is a bit high."

"…discovery?"

"If you replace a friend with someone that looks somewhat like a dead friend, it's somewhat eerie coincidence. If you replace an ex with someone that looks exactly like a dead lover, it's a bit noticeable and possibly creepy. I'd rather not do that to you." Renato explained, a touch depressively now. "You don't deserve that kind of reputation, and I can wait if I have to. A lot of my informant network is European, and all it takes is one loudmouth."

"Well… alright, but that's a lot of territory." Sonya might find that a bit of a reach, who cared what people looked like and looked similar to which dead person but then again she was finding herself a bit deficient in a few things she hadn't thought she'd be.

Maybe it was a thing, and she just never cottoned on?

Human behaviors did sometimes irritate and annoy her, who's to say this wouldn't be another thing?

"I've found if it is remotely a statistical probability… it's wise to plan for it." Drawled the man next, a touch sarcastically this time as the conversation likely hit some kind of sore point. "I've seen completely brilliant things come from those I would've sworn on the Holy Bible itself that they were incompetent morons, and the reverse can certainly be true with those I thought competent pulling completely suicidal shit. I'd rather not compromise what I'm about to try with unknowingly gambling on fool's luck."

"Isn't that just human nature?" She wondered aloud, mostly for the benefit of those passing them on the sidewalk than from any true need to speak her thoughts. "No one ever has completely avoided some kind of fuck up in their lives. Hindsight and the benefit of knowing the full situation outside of right then sometimes does make fools of us all, no matter how carefully one tries to plan things out."

He hummed and turned that over in his mind for a second, glancing upwards to the mostly clear late afternoon sky as they plodded relatively cleared streets for Maddie's middle-eldest son and where he lived. "Point. Then again, I'm almost to the point I can drop off completely and make a few mafia groups… nervous. Maybe another month, and to trip right at the finish line would be terribly embarrassing."

…she had mostly managed to forget this was one of the last times she'd be able to be out and about with just 'Renato', not whichever murderous Sun Flame using hitman would replace his current 'self'.

"…sorry."

"It's… something to keep in mind." Refuted the thief dismissively, pinching the bridge of her nose mostly just so the heat reflection from her leather gloved fingers would warm up her sinus cavity and stop the ache. "I am going to miss you, Renato. Even if you can be an infuriating asshole sometimes."

"I'll try to make it quick and painless, at least the 'announcement' for it." Offered said sometimes infuriating Mafioso blandly. "Slightly off topic, but… do you mind…?"

Sonya glanced up, a touch confused, then shook her head when she saw he was pointing a thumb over his shoulder on the side she wasn't on. "No. You can have Janučkiević, I certainly will never "use him again so him going suddenly bankrupt or flat out dead won't bother me much."

"Delightful. Another for the list, then."

"Do you… actually have a list of people you want dead in the next few years?"

Again, the man's innocent look sucked. A bit ruined this time by the smirk that fought for space in his expression to boot.

She thought about it. "If you get up to Russia, can I tack something on? Entirely optional, and just something to nibble at if you're in the mood for something different?"

"…ho?" Renato cocked an eyebrow curiously. "I'm listening."

(Thursday the 5th of February, 1970. Moscow School #3054, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Why?"

"I don't want to always put everyone asleep." Mingxia explained to Anna the Mirror Lady, wary of her monstrous spider but it seems the thing had been banned from school grounds as it was never there. "If I ever use my Flames, I would want it to be targeted. To calm this person and not another or the rest of the room. For what I intend to do, enough care will ensure I don't panic and put a whole room to sleep if ever pressed outside my comfort zone."

The dark haired if extremely pale young woman considered her proposal fully, which was the biggest blessing those actually in authority roles had to the young Chinese teenager displaced in their midst.

Being able to question what she learned and what use it could be put to was still somewhat bewildering sometimes, but she was getting used to it with the school-wide encouragement they were all under. The possibility to calm a witness and not Tranquilize an entire courthouse was very enticing to Mingxia, and if used sparingly she might be able to slide it under the notice of many as 'just something about' her manner.

Hence why, even if the Mirror Lady's pet scared her near-witless, she would converse with someone she was somewhat sure held a component to what she wanted.

…that she could reach easily. Usov and the male Mists tended to… not be around ever unless something was going on. While she could interrupt, especially for scholastic reasons as this… it would be rude.

"Mist Flames, from the outside at least, seem to be intent driven. You can confuse this person looking at something, but you can also ensure whomever else is immune to your Constructed understanding." Continued the young Rain after the Mirror Lady gestured for her to expand on the topic. "Larion the Rain and the rest recently found a method by which Rains can 'stack' the effects of their Flames on a target. Which is only possible in one other Flame type, yours. Maybe there's more similarities, or I can pick and choose who I Tranquilize instead of just 'everyone'."

"…they did that because the Boss Lady specifically challenged them to do it, by throwing off their initial attempts easily to the point it looked or was effortless." Anna explained for her in return, a touch amused by the situation if she was reading something as confusing as a Mist correctly. "I think they intend to try ambushing her with the entirety of the Rain section and see if that puts a dent in the Boss Lady's Stormy immunity. Excuse me one second."

Turning completely around, the woman in charge of the girl's dorms pulled something rather alive and unhappy to be handled creature out of a reflective surface and tossed it in the box set next to her office door. The mirror behind her rippled even after her hand had been removed, and the look into another girl's dorm room from what seemed to be a vanity mirror revealed three very surprised girls staring blankly back into Anna's currently dark blue eyes.

"May I ask, again, that any hazing attempt be conducted in easily cleaned up areas. Not the dorms, within which you also live for part of the week. Ladies."

One of them, a girl with brassy bright copper curls paired with a smattering of freckles over delicately pale skin that made Mingxia somewhat self-conscious of her straight black hair and tanner complexion, cheerfully grinned back into the mirrored portal. "Sorry, Mirror Lady. Won't happen again."

"As this is the fifth time I have had to inform you, Miss Fink, please learn to lie better."

"As always, I appreciate the opportunity to practice."

"I'm sure." Countered Anna patiently, examining the hand that gripped whatever living thing she had pulled likely right out of their hands and was now squeaking irritably in a box. "If you continue to fail so horribly, I might see it in my little black heart to arrange some remedial lessons for you."

Fink's features froze for a split second, torn between confusion and a touch of horror. "…that won't be necessary, Mirror Lady. I appreciate the consideration, though."

The Rain observing the interaction winced at the very idea of a Mist giving someone lessons in lying. More than three in the same room was already hard to take for her, and Mists with a point to prove were not very… nice about their abilities to bend reality.

"As for your own proposal, Miss Sōng, I find it interesting enough to assist you in finding a method by which to focus-direct Rain Flames for specific purposes." Anna continued their discussion as she turned around and reseated herself in her office chair, a very fluffy one that almost looked like an armchair if you concentrated really hard. "Although... before you dig into any major project please keep in mind we only have a few more months here."

Mingxia nodded, a touch distractedly. "Is Miss Fink part of the criminal part of the school or the Flame group?"

"Criminal side only, she doesn't have Flames. That is why she's resorted to sticking some kind of creature into the room of a Sun that recently showed her up a bit thoughtlessly for the consequences she'll make apparent. You can just ask, Miss Sōng. We're listening."

"I just did."

The Mirror Lady's smirk was a touch… not comforting as she got up to investigate her squeaking guest. "I mean even outside this office, little one. You're attached to the Boss Lady now, we're keeping both an ear and an eye out for you. Not literally, mind you... but well, I suppose that's also possible if you feel the need."

"...what is that thing?" Asked the Rain, instead of give thought to floating eyeballs and dismembered but still living ears following her invisibly.
If she made it obvious she was thinking about it, likely a student Mist would take up the 'gauntlet' to ensure she knew why they wouldn't via actually doing it for a while. All in the aims of educational purposes, of course.

Both the rat-like tiny beaver animal and the very thought put in her mind by Anna were ick. "A young Russian mole-rat." Explained the Mist, holding up the creature so it was fully visible. Along with dark blue eyes to match the head of the girl's dorm, probably to ensure the creature remained pacified as it was removed from the building. "Now then, Miss Sōng? I suggest you call it a day a touch early. From what the others have informed me of, you have a surprise waiting at the gates."

Not about to question how she'd know that, Russian Mists had networked themselves together to the point they knew everything or otherwise they'd get obsessive about learning new information presented to them, she just nodded instead. "Thank you for your time, Mirror Lady."

"As we can split off copies of ourselves, I have a whole lot of time to give out now." Dismissed Anna brightly, lightly tossing the creature in her hands through her mirror again… to what looked to be an attic room with a still nightmarish spider sitting patiently in a massively ornate web spanning from floorboards to ceiling rafters to even the tiny window that backlit it.

The monstrous Pavuchky pounced on the offered prey lightning quick, to the point Mingxia blinked and the squealing creature was already half wrapped in a silk cocoon and being dragged back to the intricate web it lived on as paws twitched feebly. The rat-creature was about palm sized, the outlandishly colorful spider was easily five times that now.

It was also terrifyingly silent, all that could be heard was the weakening squeaks and attempts to squeal through spider silk and maybe a soft rustling. Which wasn't coming from the grotesque arachnid.

That would give her nightmares for weeks.

With a proud and pleased little sigh as she admired her dreadful pet, the Mist merely waved a hand as the Rain carefully edged out of her seat and then backed out of her office so as to not turn her back to the mirror-portal thing or invited the massive spider to chase her.

…it was entirely possible Miss Anna didn't bring her pet around to the school because there was no way anything like Pavuchky was remotely natural, and therefore explaining its existence to anyone outside of the umbrella of Flame use knowledge was nigh on impossible.

Mingxia would take it to mean at least the Mirror Lady did have some sense of what was socially acceptable still instead of making those that wouldn't or couldn't understand just not see what would give them issues.

There was that Misty-Lightning guy that occasionally checked into the Flame training section, seemingly the oldest of both groups but picked on for having traits of a different section anyways, who tended to just make people forget they were annoyed or angry with him if he found their attention 'tiresome'.

Maybe helping Master Yaozu with his 'is it possible to defy that which is another's will' experimentation should be a thing to do.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 5th of February, 1970 continued. Moscow School #3054, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Fong grunted, a touch surprised by how much weight his little sister had put on over a bare few months, and hugged her back so he didn't drop the bag he was carrying to awkward angles. "It is nice to see you too, Mingxia."

Then again, his first exile to Mafia Land also put more weight on him than he was used to being. Some of it might be just padding in the winter gear she was bundled up sensibly within, but more than enough of it had to be from getting fed enough regularly for what her size should have been.

Which caused him a small pang of regret that he hadn't been able to help that.

"Big brother! You didn't tell me you were coming!"

"It's your first New Year's both away from my side and outside of China, how could I not?" He reminded her, squeezing back as she burrowed into his probably inadequate coat for how terribly bitter Russian winters seemed to be. "I brought a few things with me, as to keep sifu's griping to a minimum and so you have something from home this coming year."

"I kind of missed it, sifu muttering as he moves about." She informed him demurely, spoiled by a small smirk as she slid backwards to allow him space finally. "It's comforting, as long as he's complaining as usual everything's fine. But, please tell me you brought wine. He's very unhappy with the local idea of 'acceptable drinks'."

"And a few other bits for at least the traditional meals tomorrow, but I am afraid you will have to be the one to cook it." Allowed the Storm, returning her wry smile with a fond one of his own. "I will also admit I do not know the way from here. I apparently know the place you both now live at, but the streets…"

His little sister practically glided ahead, over the wretchedly treacherous planes of ice hidden by snow drifts and freshly plowed street sides. "I know, Miss Sonya's brother Cherep spent a few weeks guiding me around so I'd know how to get to a couple places. I've only recently been skipping visiting where my section goes to practice, but I know the way home from here."

"The… purple man, right?" The one she had been with while he very unwisely cornered her in a hospital waiting room while her mother gave birth to her new sibling. "I admit, I haven't actually met him yet myself."

"He's really nice. He had a Rainy friend going through the same lessons I was given to get caught up, and as his friend was an adult and knew the way home for him Mister Cherep took the time to teach me the way home for me."

Fong kind of had to focus on the inadequately plowed sidewalks more than his little sister in order to not slip, but Mingxia had few of the issues he seemed to have with the local terrain. "He also taught you to walk on snow, I take it?"

Mingxia whirled around, and as a martial artist himself he now knew that was a trained maneuver and not just her happiness with him showing up for the festivities tomorrow given life through movement, to give him an impish look. "Big brother, I have no idea what you might mean."

The likely dry look he tried to give her in return completely bounced off the young Rain's inner serenity. "If you insist, Ming."

She giggled, more when he immediately felt his left foot try to slide out from underneath himself and he very nearly took an embarrassing header into a snow drift more than waist high.
Which was apparently rather low for the accumulation of icy flakes around here.

Retracing her steps back to his side, she gestured to her feet. "Russians wear heavy boots for a reason. The deep treads give them more grip on slippery things and keeps them nicely off the cold and sometimes very wet ground. I asked Miss Galina for a pair, and while heavier than I was used to they keep my toes nice and warm."

Comparing the half an inch of material that separated her from the ground, then at his traditional and mainly thin cloth shoes, the Storm sighed heavily before attempting to find a less slippery spot to continue walking on. "I see."

"Sifu is likely instructing Scruffy in Tai Chi right now." Mingxia informed him slightly more seriously, as he regained his balance. "They should be done before we get there. I believe, if you ask, my science teacher will not mind helping you sort out your own wardrobe for a Russian winter, big brother."

"How are your lessons going?" Fong asked, interested perhaps a touch more for the mysterious glimpses into what subjects a heavily criminal influenced school might teach students like her and not wanting to admit he had a limited amount of time to spend here. "Are you taking some kind of self-defense training on the side, or is sifu giving you more lessons?"

"Mmm, no. It's optional ballet training, even sifu was surprised it was offered to any that wanted it. And, well," some of her enthusiasm was reduced as she adopted a ponderous expression, which made him want to punch whoever it was that made her feel less than happy with her situation, "I had to catch up in a few classes. More than I expected, actually. I was horribly behind, especially in geography and history. And… I'm not very good at math, I'm afraid."

"I would place a wager you are better than I am in each."

While it did bolster her smile, it wasn't nearly enough in his opinion. Instead, his little sister shook her head before peering back up at him. "You are not stupid, big brother. There was the expected, I didn't know any Russian history but that was understood as I am Chinese and we 'exchange' students are allowed to self-study it alongside Chinese history. I didn't know even how to hold a gun, much less shoot it, either."

Fong blinked down at red eyes that matched his own. "A… gun?"

"It's mandated by the Soviet government. All schools teach their students how to handle at least small arms." Explained Mingxia a bit bewilderedly. "I'm apparently rather decent with a rifle, more than I am with a handgun. Aside that, and I am better at Home Economics than most of my class and everyone is more or less the same for physical education, I… did not know how big the world really was, nor what science could explain."

She was now a better shot than him, as he had never learned to actually shoot the things. Interesting.

"The world being big is something you really have to experience rather than learn about to fully understand. I'm afraid that kind of jolting bewilderment will always be there, but eventually it fades into 'what's new here?' and sometimes excitement to see new things." It was probably a bad attempt at comfort but then again, he still had some remote issues traveling so far from the 'Far East'. "I don't know anything about 'science', to be truthful."

"That's part of the issue, big brother. What we knew while in Hong Kong, and what is known in other places in the world, are sometimes terribly far apart from each other."
"And now you can learn."

Fong wasn't really sorry she hadn't had the opportunity before, schools in China weren't at all safe right now. It was highly likely, if he or Yaozu had sent her to the local schoolhouse, she would've gotten caught up in the Red Guard debacle even if she didn't wish to. Now she was safe to learn everything she wanted, and he was happy for her taking it so seriously to the point she worried over the implications.

…if a bit annoyed she was worried at all, yet not able to actively fight something as intangible as ignorance with physical force. That would require political maneuvering, no little amount of either public sway or massive amounts of blackmail, and even then might not be addressed completely to her satisfaction. He wasn't very skilled in those arts.

The trial of being at least a decent brother was balancing between brutalizing whatever tried to take away his little sister's smile and letting her explore life herself. Even if that meant letting her explore the edges of a razor-sharp canyon full of intents and other people, which he found somewhat hard sometimes.

He kind of dreaded the first time she fancied herself in love with someone he couldn't immediately remove from the land of the living if they so much as glanced at her wrong because she would get upset with him then.

…well, now said future suitor would have to contend with the very Russian that was sponsoring his little sister's scholastic career. Fong, brightened by the prospect someone else would share that headache of being the obstacle to any romantic foolishness anyone would have to face to steal his little sister away, took in what subject she was currently expounding for him and what they hadn't known.

She was massively happier out and about, allowed to grow and learn and be outside without risking anything vital if she so chose. He was honestly glad to see it.
(Friday the 6th of February, 1970. Reggio Calabria Cathedral in the Roman Catholic Diocese of Bova, Calabria, Italian Republic.)

"Sonya, this is His Most Reverend Excellency Giovanni Ferro, Bishop of Reggio Calabria. Your Excellency, this is Shamal Tringali Nikishin's godmother Sonya Arsenevna Bazanova, from the Soviet Union, here to witness Shamal's First Communion and celebrate him reaching a milestone with us."

Blinking twice at the man she had been just introduced to, because this certainly wasn't what she expected at all when he offered a 'mafia priest' to talk to, she stared as Renato very obligingly removed his fedora then kneeled and kissed the man's extended ring finger and the rock sitting there.

…this was now actually slightly disturbing. In spades.

Nice breezy office, still incredibly disturbing contents.

"Just to be clear, you're the first Bishop I've ever met and I have no idea what to do." Sonya announced likely a touch hastily when she became the new man's full focus, embarrassingly aware she likely just fucked that up all over the place.

"It was explained to me, my child. Be at peace, I am fully aware of the reasons you both have sought a moment of my time." Gracefully, in a way that was likely polished and refined from a lifetime and then some of public speaking and directing religious ceremonies, the apparent Bishop of this Cathedral invited them to seat themselves before his very massively cluttered desk. "Come, speak what troubles your mind to me."

"All of it? …um," looking at the still hat-less hitman now standing with her, he mouthed 'your excellency' so she'd know that was also a title she could call him without issuing insult, "…your Excellency? I'm aware it's more or less insulting when I say and question views others hold skeptically, even if I don't mean to be."

Seating himself with a bit of a tired sigh for the work laid out that seems to be undone, or maybe just from old bones because he was easily twice her age if a touch prematurely bald under that skull cap, Bishop Giovanni Ferro instead gave her his full attention as he placed his folded hands before him on said somewhat papered desktop. "How else would you learn? You are seeking more information, to understand what we do and your duties as a godmother to a member of my congregation. It is all you can do as a fallible human on this earth chosen to guard and guide the young entrusted to you to seek clarification on his needs, and it is all I can do as a leader of this flock to ease your way to true understanding."

Well, point to the Bishop. Even if 'true understanding' sounded a touch ominous, or maybe that was just her sudden onslaught of nerves speaking.

Gingerly stealing forward and encouraged by the still polite patience the man had with her even if she probably was being sort of rude doubting him and his intentions to hear her out to his face, she slid into one of the chairs available for guests to this office. "To start with… and so I know the limits of this, you are aware I am not entirely… nice?"

Renato snorted, so she kicked him in the ankle as he picked the seat next to her to wait this out in.
"I am. This is the birthplace of the Vongola, the churches that I manage includes a number of parishes in the Vongola Famiglia's main home territory. I am aware of the elements that make up the diocese I have been appointed to, young lady."

Sonya glanced over at the hitman, cocking an eyebrow for both confirmation and if he knew of Dying Will Flames as well. He gave her back a smirk but not a nod, so she assumed some parts of it weren't entirely admitted to. At least to this man, it was possible priests a lot more remote than in whatever religious authority there was were given the whole picture.

Were religious structures included in the Vow of Silence?

The military was right out, for semi-obvious but mostly unconfirmed reasons. However, she still didn't know if the government wasn't allowed or now if religious organizations were or not.

"...the back of your hair is sticking up." Turning back to the Bishop while he dealt with his hat-hair issues, why he didn't put the damn thing back on again was a little beyond her, she coughed a bit uncomfortably at the wry smile aimed in her direction. "I... apologize. I am aware doubting you to your face is rude, but the stakes alone..."

"Prudence in the face of the unknown is not always a sin, although neither is it a virtue when taken too far. Moderation, my child, is the key to balancing between them."

"Right..." She couldn't really help it, this was a religious man and she had questions on the mechanics of his faith. It was all sorts of awkward, and the asshole next to her could've told her they weren't just going to see any priest but a really important one. "I, through the results of my work in my homeland, have sourced myself a sixteenth century Septuagint version of your 'holy' book. I need to learn a variant of Greek first, but I would like to at least read through a bible before I ask about your... uh, doctrine."

"An interesting choice." Ferro announced evenly, detangling a hand just to smooth it over the chain and cross hanging from his neck as he leaned back slightly in his chair. "May I ask what motivated it?"

"I didn't actually intend to own the book specifically, it came to me through a series of events. However, now that I have it I may as well make use of the tools available to me in order to not waste anyone's time. A thief I might be by my very nature, I draw the line at stealing religious scriptures just to own them."

If it was a book she stole for other reasons, and there were religious scriptures within it, it was entirely different.

The concession of a long-held decision, even one with caveats, earned her a nod. "On behalf of my brethren, who may never know of your restraint within their chapels or libraries, I thank you. If you have questions or indeed if you ever feel like sharing your Holy Book with us, even if only through your godchild, I would appreciate it."

"...sure." If Shamal wanted to take it to church, or Mass, she didn't greatly care. Otherwise it was her book and it would remain so now that she had it. "My current question, and concern if I must be honest, is what is one's 'First Communion' and why is it done at seven years of age?"

The very darkly dress man nodded slowly again. "The third sacrament, the first reception of the Eucharist, is given once a young Catholic reaches the point by which they can understand moral responsibility and reason. More than just understanding good from bad, sin from virtue, it is also at which point an individual can reason for themselves which choice before them would be in standing for a God-fearing individual and which is the sinful temptation before them."

Third? "What happens before that? The first two… sacraments?"

"Baptism and their first confession."

"I know of confession… but what is the First confession of?"

"Sin, my child." Ferro informed her simply. "Baptism occurs when someone converts to Christianity or shortly after one is born. Confession, the first one, shows that reason can be and will be applied to their actions going forward now they no longer have the pure innocence of childhood. To recognize a moral disorder in their actions or venial sins they might have performed or become a part of and realize such is wrong."

Sonya glanced at the man next to her. "Was Shamal ever baptized?"

"He's Italian, of course he's been baptized." Renato informed her blandly. "It was in his records when I picked him up from the police station, everything on that end is as it should be."

"Like I would know that, Renato."

Frowning a touch sharply at first, the hitman considered her thoughtfully and nearly visibly rethought what he had been about to say. "I suppose. I didn't ever tell you, little dragon lady, because I don't think of it. Actually, until I realized just now, I would've assumed you've been baptized as a matter of course as well."

Oh, there was a question. She… didn't think she ever was. "…I don't actually know, and I'm highly reluctant to actually speak to my father about if I was or not. Religion in Soviet Russia, or even just Moscow's streets, seems to be a touchy subject these days."

The other Italian in the room appeared thoughtful when she turned back to him. "If you feel the lack affects you, my child, any House of God would be more than pleased to fold you into their flock and give you a baptism."

"I'm only vaguely sure what that is, so any lack would never have been apparent to me before. Although I do appreciate the consideration and offer to rectify it, your Excellency. She'd… think on it later. "If I may continue on this tangent… does Shamal have to make something up? Should we review things he's done recently for his 'first' Confession? Or-"

"It is up to the individual involved, but the only time a 'fake' confession is use is to show and instruct a child on how one performs confession for later in life. Of which, young Nikishin already knows and is prepared for." Interrupted the Bishop a touch patiently, shaking his head as he straightened up in his office chair. "It is not earth shaking, nor should it be terrifying, to confess. Errors are human and remembering your error then attempting to make amends for it should be encouraged."

"We'll talk to him tonight, little dragon lady." Renato chipped in while she pondered that over. "We've got all of dinner or maybe lunch if we finish here sometime soon, I can guide you both through the process. So you're familiar and comfortable with it, and to remind him of the procedures again."

Staring back at him flatly, Sonya huffed. "Your religion is complex."

"It's very old."

Tisking, she sat back in the admittedly well-padded visitor's chair herself and examined the Bishop setting aside time to talk to her. "Returning to the main topic, your Excellency, and this age of being able to reason for the underlying principle of why this First Communion is happening now…"

The man nodded encouragingly.

"I'm… well, concerned. It is entirely within your right to do as you believe in, I do not mean to nitpick that. However, it seems to me seven would be way too early for a child to reflect on and commit to a belief in truth. I'm not sure, and therefore why I seek an answer now, but I don't believe Shamal's ever thought of religion as something to believe in instead of something to just go along with. Is it… right to question that? Proper? Is there a point I should, an age or if he ever expresses doubt, or is it insulting for a non-Catholic to question that? I'm… unsure."

"The question is fundamentally different for one such as you, who went without God being a main staple in your life and are only confronting the lack now, and a young Catholic child to whom God is and had always been a large part of their lives and brought up to believe. For your godchild, and any Catholic at his age or otherwise going through the same steps, it isn't a question of commitment to understanding but of his very lifestyle." Allowed Bishop Ferro thoughtfully, cupping a hand to the bottom of his chin as he pondered over her expressed concerns for a long moment before focusing back on her. "It is a position to be aware of when dealing with outsiders to our faith, and as a parent attempting to guard the young innocent in your care entirely a concern. I do not believe it is rude, as you do not seem against young Shamal being Catholic when you are not interested, but it should be handled delicately."

"Shamal can be whatever he wants to be." Agreed the thief diplomatically as she could, unsure if she had insulted anyone in the office yet or not. "It's his life, his choice to make, and I can't pick for him as I don't know. I just want to be sure he's fully equipped in everything as he needs to be, but I can't do that if I'm not aware of what is or isn't right and the reasons why."

"I, or Sinclair, will speak with him about your concerns." Decided the man after some more thought in a very silent office. "If you do not feel as it is a subject you can approach safely, as it seems to be."

Was his advice given to prevent her asking the kid what he really thought, and therefore prevent the possibility she would interject doubt in him about a faith in the divine, or because it wasn't something he thought her equipped to talk about?

"I think I should, Your Excellency. If only so my very suspicious, untrusting companion here can sit in and make her position clear." Renato drawled, not entirely sarcastically but enough so that she winced slightly.

Turning to the hitman, she shot him an aggravated glare. "I would've asked you in the first place, if you hadn't kept pushing me to talk to a priest I don't know about this instead."

He went still, which was confusing until she turned back to the Bishop and caught the edge of the stern look the man was aiming the Mafioso's way. Sonya blinked innocently when attention went back to her, which earned her a huffy laugh-sigh from the moderately older man as he resettled himself in his well-padded chair.

"I am sorry, my child. This must have been brewing for a while, and I do appreciate you did clarify things to me instead of asking just anyone that holds Catholic Christian beliefs that if handled badly could have been rather insulting. Your concern for the strength of our faith is touching, even if you do not share it." The man's mouth quirked up, glancing somewhat distractedly at the pile of work waiting on him to finish. "I can assure you, we are made of sterner stuff. Your good intentions does you well, bless you."
"…thank you?" She tried, uncertain what the proper response to that should be. "I have one last question that needs to be addressed… well, not now but certainly soon. I've purchased a property much further north than this, due to not wishing to infringe on Vongola territory with myself and my peoples' presence. How does a Catholic… move 'churches'?"

"I will write young Nikishin a letter of introduction, when you and your godchild find a local church you both like simply give the letter to the pastor in charge of the parish." Here the Bishop grimaced slightly, more puzzled and internally directed than at her. "Churches that are 'mafia safe' are few, may I ask where you will be relocating your godson?"

"Moneglia, in the Province of Genoa. Liguria region." Given what Bjørn had to say about it just about everyone local or not knew where she was moving to, so that much wasn't worth it to gloss over.

"I will seek the stance of the Archdiocese of Genoa, the Diocese of Chiavari, and the local churches on the topics of crime and the mafia. Then have the information relayed to you." Ferro informed her rather helpfully. "Although the confessional is sacred, no matter which priest it is they will hold their silence about what sin is confessed, if the pastors are simply uncomfortable with servicing the spiritual health of someone focused on that life for the safety of us all it should be known to all beforehand."

"I do not mind making the trip down here if Shamal needs it." Sonya offered on her own end, because he really didn't have to put effort into smoothing the way for just anyone when from the sounds of it a letter normally did it. "There is a local train station to my… new home."

"The Cardinals and Archbishops are usually aware of such conflicts their flocks might face, my child. You may not have to travel so far just for your godchild's comfort, but such an offer is appreciated. Rather, I believe I can arm you with a list of mafia friendly churches more locally to the Province of Genoa itself in preparation of any upsets you are not sure how to handle."

"Alright." The impression that she was somehow incapable to explain something Shamal wanted to know rankled a bit, but without the hitman she was a bit deficient in anything 'spiritual' right now.

She could work as fast as she might but learning something hastily was just a way to make more errors.

"Out of questions?"

"For now, I'd like to review what I have already before posing more and there's nothing else major coming up shortly I'm concerned by. As far as I know." Admitted the Russian to the Catholic Bishop a touch wryly. "I'm not moving Shamal until his school year is done, so preparations to shift churches can certainly wait until you figure out the lay of the land and after this… First Communion thing."

"An acceptable timeline." Ferro agreed in a tone that could only really be called 'peacefully'. "Then I will see the both of you again come Sunday Mass, my children. The Lord be with you."

"And also with you, Your Excellency." Renato responded for them as he got up, which was fantastic because she had no idea how to respond to that politely. Accepting the hand held out for her, Sonya bobbed a nod to the elderly man herself.

"Sinclair." Called the Bishop before they could leave his office, pinning the hitman with a patiently stern look over the papers he had picked up. "Being aware you might not be the best one to speak to your fellow godparent about her concerns is one thing, leaving her to flounder in uncertainty rather cruelly is another."

Hesitating a moment, the Mafioso dipped his head to acknowledge that point before opening the doors for her.

She at least waited for the heavy walnut doors to be shut first. "Someone's in trouble."

"You, little dragon lady, should rethink that."

"Ho?"

"Otherwise I won't protect you from all those little Italian matrons that will be positively aghast you're not Catholic and yet are attending Mass this Sunday with us."

"I think, as long as I keep my mouth shut, I'll be fine."

The grin Renato shot her was not particularly encouraging. "We won't be the only members of the Mafia there. There will be a couple others that will know."

"And if I'm attending Mass with Catholics, how many will assume I'm Catholic without asking?"

Sonya countered suspiciously, smirking when the man scowled. "Exactly. I think I'm safe enough."

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 6th of February, 1970 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Sonya!" Practically leaping down one of the main staircases, Fiorella dashed the distance before the Russian could disappear to do whatever she was visiting for. "Can I speak with you?"

Grey eyes blinked at her curiously and a little warily for her haste, a glance given to the man she was accompanying, and the other woman lifted a shoulder in a shrug as she turned back to her. "Sure? As far as I'm aware, the brat I'm here for won't get out of school for another hour or so. So, we can't make off with him for his birthday just yet anyways."

"Actually, I believe they're on a bus heading here. But yes, we are a touch remote out here for the children's schooling. But do please wish him happy birthday from me as well tomorrow." The manor home she lived in was much too grand for even just an extended family and some bodyguards, Fiorella rather adored that half of it was reserved to be an orphanage. She and her family would never be able to use all that space, and it was being put to some very good work instead of rarely aired out for parties. "I wanted to ask, and only if you don't mind, if I and Federico and maybe his brothers attend your young Shamal's First Communion?"

She stared back blankly. "...I thought it was a big thing, and there'd be more than just the brat going through it?"

"...are Russians not Catholic?"

"...no?"

"I think, ladies," Sinclair interjected a touch pointedly but mainly politely, "this discussion should move a few doors down. Lady Vongola, Sonya's explained most of the Soviet Union as atheists and we're currently educating her to the process for Shamal's milestones. A second opinion would be greatly appreciated, as both a mother and a Catholic yourself."

Sonya glanced up at him suspiciously, then rolled up her left sleeve even as she rolled her eyes. "If "I was not scared, I was being cautious." Sniffed the man faux arrogantly, batting a hand dismissively as the woman between them piled a curious assortment of chains and tiny weapon charms onto the plate the footman waiting by the doors was holding. "Stop getting me in trouble."

Fiorella, adjusting to the fact Sonya wasn't Catholic after a bit of thought, smiled at them both. "If I can get your agreement to let us observe the process, Federico's First Communion is next year."

"...sure." Agreed the Russian warily, obviously confused but not seeing any harm to it to deny her request for what she probably didn't fully understand. "Is there... certain dates used for a 'First' Communion, or is it just held some point after a kid turns seven?"

"It depends on the parish, and the priests within. First Communion Mass is a specific date normally, usually done in the spring after Lent, but with high profile children involved some of the churches stagger when they hold it and for whom randomly. It is usually posted some weeks beforehand otherwise." A bit odd to need to tell a fully-grown woman this, but she could adapt. "Do you have a Bible? It's... well, generally a thing to give the children either a Bible passed on from their parents or one to own themselves here for their First Communion Mass."

"I have a copy of your book." Digging into her somewhat battered looking purse, the blonde pulled a massively ornate and bejeweled Bible out of its depths.

Fiorella stared at the innocently ragged looking satchel suspiciously for a second. How in the world had she fit that in there? Much less carry the heavy looking book of scriptures bound in so much metal without notable strain?

"Are... all 'Clouds' very strong?" Sonya had crushed polished and carved wood in her bare hands last Christmas, Fiorella hadn't connected that to 'always stronger' rather than just 'when in pain'. Foolishly perhaps, but she had been given a bit of resistance to learning more about Dying Will Flames from those that had the ability.

"Depends on how one's initial ability manifests." She informed her absentley, examining the tome in her hands critically. "...I should've had this thing rebound before now. Hindsight, I guess. I didn't intend to read it until I understood Greek, but as I had no idea what would be needed for this celebration thing I sent it along to my Lackey just in case."

"...how one's ability manifests?" Echoed the slightly older brunette, confused.

Grey eyes flicked back up at her curiously. "They're Dying Will Flames for a reason, Lady Vongola. Usually, in most cases unless you get into generational family lines when it's by example instead, it is an ability that becomes apparent when one believes they are about to die... and they deny such with pure willpower alone."

Oh. Oh dear.

Wincing, as when she put into that into context a few of her past questions on the phenomena became horribly insensitive and tactless, Fiorella bit her lower lip harshly to keep from actually cringing. "I... see. Miss Bazanova, I have then been very rude to a few individuals around here... to prevent a recurrence, can I ask you a few questions on Dying Will Flames? Even if they are insensitive?"

The ancient and carefully elaborate Bible was folded to her modest chest, and the Russian turned to fully face Fiorella before she answered. "As long as you excuse me when I question something Catholic and end up being insensitive, I guess I won't mind such an exchange. I'm not a full expert, I know more about Clouds, Suns, Mists, and some about Storms, Lightnings, and Rains."

"More than good enough, thank you." She could then get 'Sky' from either her husband or her mother-in-law and confirm things through her Timoteo's Guardians. Either way, it was an avenue of exchange she could at least count on if she ran into another insensitive topic she was blundering into.

It was nice to have the actual titles explained to her and what uses they were normally put to, even if she didn't know why others would still try to impress a 'Sky' with a full array of 'Guardians'. Finding out other things, aside 'personality types' that seem rather… rigid to her, was a touch difficult with a limited number of people she knew were Flame users around here.

"Little dragon lady… first of all, that book in your hands is entirely too much. Though I'm not surprised you own something like that." Sinclair suddenly spoke up, eyeing the object in question skeptically. "Secondly, I have a Bible that was owned by his father the brat can use. That might be a bit over the top to give him for his first Mass as a young Catholic instead of as an innocent, and unintentionally make the others feel a bit… under prepared."

"That's a good point." Fiorella admitted, glancing back to the object in question.

It was lovingly anointed with jewels and gilt, the painstaking craftsmanship only tarnished by a sort of distinguished age was well apparent even with what little could be inspected around the other woman's arms, more a thing the Bishop should read from or a family heirloom kept in a place of pride than a personal Bible to carry with someone everywhere.

"Um, additionally… would young Shamal even be able to lift that?"

Sonya shrugged a shoulder again. "He's a Mist, he can literally do whatever he wants to."

"Really?"

"It's a good rule of thumb. If they tell you something you think is outlandish odds are it is utterly true, and you should take any mention as the warning it is."

Croquant Bouche had told her a few things over the years she had thought were in jest, had he been completely serious instead?

Well now, Fiorella had all of five minutes of Sonya's absently given assistance and already two things she thought she knew had been turned on their heads. The people around here weren't being difficult intentionally, they were somewhat insulted or reminded of horrible experiences she was being insensitive about… and Croquant either actually didn't have a sense of humor or had one she didn't realize was there.

"I think," she started delicately, refocusing on the Russian giving her polite attention for what she might say next, "I am going to enjoy having you around, Sonya. Do you mind if I visit or ring you up now and again, if I have any questions?"

"I travel for work." She warned instead of immediately agree. "And aside school holidays or maybe a weekend here or there, I might not be around regularly to anticipate a schedule or anything like that. However, I do have a number of people moving down here with me to help with upkeep of my place. Some of them might actually be better suited to answer questions, depending. Galina is a Lightning, and my… secretary. The Mirror Lady's a… well, Mist."

"That's adorable." A tiny Russian Mirror Lady? How could that not be adorable? "Thank you for hearing me out, Sonya. I feel a need to visit with Father Galdino before Mass tomorrow, so I will leave you both here."

"Lady Vongola." With a polite nod to her, Sinclair tucked the blonde up to his side and gestured out of the foyer. "Unless you've got something else to give the doorman, little dragon lady, we should move out of their way."

"What is with you and doors?"

"If you stand in the way, odds are you're going to get hit by them."

"...there's a story behind that, isn't there?"

"If I tell you, will you please get out of the poor man's way?"

Fiorella, seemingly forgotten, backed away and left the couple to their rather delightful bickering with a shake of her head.

"Can I just not go through doors? If I go through the window, will you bitch less?"

The man covered his face with his hat, which did nothing for the exasperated chuckle. "Please don't."

(Sunday the 8th of February, 1970. A hotel suite, Calabria, Italian Republic.)

"Are you sure?" Shamal winced when his mamma got distracted enough to pull a little hard with the comb she kept in her purse, which she noticed really fast and gentled her tugging again.

"Fiorella Vongola conveyed the request." Renato confirmed evenly, twisting a hand in the air. "I'll slide you past notice in a way, if you bring an 'heirloom' Bible to Mass to be read from for your godchild's First Communion. Most attending this morning will actually assume with that you are Catholic, because why else would you have such an ornate Holy Book brought down here?"

"Because I have little to no bloody idea what the hell is a requirement for one's 'First Communion'? They'll know I'm not when I don't get up for your symbolic cannibalistic eating of flesh and drinking of blood thing."

"Why should I risk bringing it? It's hot, Renato. Stolen not too long ago. I give it to the Bishop to read from and someone might notice if they have any idea of Moscow news. And you, I really want to meet whichever ancestor you got this hair from brat, then sucker punch them a few times in the gut."

"Apparently, His Excellency hadn't realized you brought it down with you and that's why he didn't ask you himself when we saw him." His godfather continued over his snickers, sounding dryly amused over her third complaint this morning about his hair. "We could slick it back if it bothers you that much."

"Then it looks greasy." Turning on the hitman next, she waggled the comb at him too. "And you, why do I keep dressing up for these kinds of things if you're not going to do it too?"

He hadn't seen her dressed up in a demure purple suit jacket and skirt combo over a dark red blouse before, it looked pretty new too. Did she buy it expressly for Mass?

"I am dressed up, I'm just always this classy." Drawled his godfather blandly, pushing off the wall and straightening his tie fussily then tugged sharply at the cuffs of his suit. The cheap tin dice cufflinks glinted at the young Mist watching them argue, which made him happy to see them still in use even if they were cheap tin and the older man had higher standards for his clothing. "The reason why, little dragon lady, is because not too long ago there was the Renaissance. A lot of Greek and Latin books were removed, rediscovered, borrowed, or otherwise relocated to private libraries around Europe. The theological and religious texts of Christian belief were part of that, and while we are building back up the Vatican Library and other such institutions some score of topics are still a bit… threadbare. With mistranslations and errors no matter how careful we are."

His godmother cocked an eyebrow at the Mafioso, unimpressed, which earned her a sigh. "Then came the Protestant Reformation, and a lot of that relocated information was devalued or even repressed entirely to the point some of it might've been destroyed. Then America became a thing, the Thirty Years' War, and then of course the more recent nastiness and the damage that did. We lost a lot of scriptures and religious documents. Please, if not for me or any Catholic then to make today all the more special for the brat to have a piece of history there too."

She looked at him next. "Do you care at all?"

"It'd be interesting." Neither of them could read it, so if a priest in the funny hats could then why not?

Renato pressed a hand over his face. "Oh for fuck's sake…"

"What?"

"It's catching."

"What is?" Sonya demanded again, tossing the comb and a weird long brass and wood thing into a clutch instead of her purse. Considering the very heavy and fancy Bible sitting on the end table of her hotel bedroom for a moment, she eventually sighed and picked that up too. "You're not being very clear."

He gave her a flat look over his palm, glanced down to Shamal, snorted, then strode out of her rented bedroom for the rest of the really nice hotel room's main living room. "You both deserve each other."

"…okay then." Glancing at the really heavy book in her hands, the glittering jewels that sparkled in the early morning light and the metal holding it to the cover, she dumped it on her bed and plucked a thin hand towel to wrap it up in. "Are you ready, Shamal?"

"Do you even know what's going on, mamma?"

"It's a religious cult-thing. I'm not sure I want to know, but yes I did go ask a guy in a dress about what it is and why you do it now. " Shifting the white towel wrapped Bible to the side a bit, she turned back to him and sat on the bedspread herself to pull on a pair of black closed toe heels. "I don't need a big production and some religious ceremony to be proud of you, brat. I am, simply because you exist and that's that. All I need to know is that it's important to you, and that's more than enough for me to go along with things anyways."

Shamal wasn't sure if he should be impressed she'd admit ignorance even if it sounded like she wasn't happy with it, exasperation at the 'cult-thing' label, or pleased she was being honest with him. Not that he expected her to lie to him, but even if she didn't know what was going on he was still happy she was going to be there too. "Thanks."

Picking up the plain black leather-bound Bible his godfather told him had been his father's and rescued out of their house after it had been burned down, he ensured the charred edge wasn’t obvious to anyone without Flames and put the turquoise rosary his godmother got him last Christmas into his pocket.

"I'm ready, mamma."

"Well, at least one of us is." She teased, slipping her other heel on and getting up with her own Bible. "Come on kid, let's start the process of making you a young man."

Pausing to pick up her purse, the thief shuffled things to one arm so he could have a free hand to hold.

"I'm really happy you're here... on time."

"One more smart-assed comment and I'm turning this show boat around. You can do your cult-thing next year instead."

Shamal snickered.

"That would be embarrassing." Renato observed sardonically as they joined him near Sonya's temporary front door, smirking himself. "Being kept back a year, having to take your First Communion with Nonno's eldest..."

He stuck his tongue out at the older man, skirting behind his godmother when the hitman cocked an eyebrow in return. "Careful with that, brat. You're standing next to a thief, she might just steal it."

"What do I get for doing your dirty work?"

"Anything you might want, little dragon lady. Just name it."

Blinking at this change to their dynamic, the Mist glanced up at the half-bewildered expression on said thief's face. "You're... flirting with me."

"Yes, yes I am." Confirmed the hitman with a bit of exasperation, palming the car keys he got from somewhere to drive them around. "Do you really need confirmation?"

"It helps. Sometimes flirty things can be outright confusing instead."

"That explains way too much." Renato muttered sourly as she opened the door for them.

(ooo000ooo)

(Sunday the 8th of February, 1970 continued. Reggio Calabria, Calabria, Italian Republic.)

"It wasn't too noticeable, as you were minding the boys for me and the nursemaid it actually looked as if either you went in line first or were waiting for us to get back to get in line yourself." Fiorella assured Sonya, actually one of the few to ask the Russian thief to page through her Bible to see the contents after the Bishop of Reggio Calabria read from it. "Although, not many non-Christians attend Mass around here as it is, so I don't think anyone greatly wondered what you were doing."

The Storm-Cloud was watching her fingers move across the elaborately decorated pages like a hawk, almost similar as she had been watching when Bishop Giovanni accepted the tome from her all the way up to the holy man returning it after Mass with his thanks. There was a lot less hostile suspicion in this variant, so Renato assumed she had been highly uncomfortable loaning out the ornate book to someone she had only just met.
She probably only did it because Shamal had thought it would be 'interesting'. He wasn't sure if that was a comforting or disturbing thought.

Mist brat's imagination and possible boredom added to her permissive behavior and skills?

When Renato got back, it might just be possible the brat would end up the ruler of some small country or something just because he wanted to try it.

He was watching Coyote Nougat instead, as one of the bodyguards loaned out by the woman's Sky husband, who was not at all comfortable with Sonya's sharp watch on his main charge. Guerra was less wary, but also keenly watching for any sudden movements.

Fiorella was completely ignorant to the overtones in the various stares going on, or at least thought little of it. Her three sons were seated at a nearby table with their nursemaid and the Mist bodyguard of their own, along with a large number of the other children that had attended Mass to witness their siblings' own First Communion with their parents.

"It's gorgeous, Sonya. Thank you for bringing it along for His Excellency. I think you made his year with this."

"...sure." Allowed the thief uneasily as she accepted the metal and jewel encrusted affair back.

Shamal, for once not banished to the children's table nearby for more appropriate company than the adults around him, peered up at his godmother when she plopped the heavy thing in his lap. "When are we going to learn Greek, mamma?"

"We can make a thing of it this summer, I think. See how much we can get through before you have to go back to school." Much more comfortable now the book was back in 'her' possession, or at least the brat's, she gave him a tiny smirk. "As well as find that church of bone I only vaguely recall might exist somewhere."

"An ossuary?" Echoed the wife of a Sky in some measure of surprise. "There's Our Lady of the Conception of the Capuchins in Rome, Sonya. Even if it's not entirely made of bones outright. The chapels in the crypts below it is lined with skulls, of an age of monks and friars had their bones arranged to decorate it."

"That's rather… macabre."

"We don't have a lot of land to spare, Bazanova. A few centuries upon centuries upon centuries of graveyards..." Nilda Guerra smiled slyly at the shorter woman. "The bones are of course treated with respect, but more space was eventually needed everywhere. Stacking up the bones when the graveyards became crowded turned almost into an art form. The catacombs of Paris are indefinitely worse, in that respect. Kilometers of tunnel lined with bones."

"You both are being suspiciously helpful." Sonya commented blandly, leaning back in the chair set out for those joining the celebrations going on in a square close to the Cathedral.

It was only one of a few, the second one they passed, and the one preemptively scouted out by Vongola's CEDEF for if Fiorella got it into her head to join the local celebrations after Mass. Which it had, as it was a big day for Shamal and the lady was very conscientious about not infringing on their godchild's milestone celebration just because she wished to speak more to the godmother and give her eldest a full preview of the event.

Renato felt a little itchy leaving security up to others, especially others that very recently fucked up about confidentiality or getting info-mined by Mist, but he was trying to not think about it. Keeping half an eye on the rooftops was just… habit.

"You're an expert. When I yet again run into things I don't understand, I'd like an expert waiting in the wings to tell me if I should really press or allow my husband's people to very politely redirect me." Fiorella informed her brightly, shooting Coyote a look when he stiffened up and opened his mouth. "Don't even. I am fully aware of what my husband's been up to, and that only a few of you have been honest with me. Someone could have told me what I was asking was slightly insensitive instead of let me go blindly on bringing up bad memories."

"…it's not a pretty topic, Lady Vongola."

"Exactly. Someone only needed to remind me the name, and the obvious." Huffed the older Italian lady seated at the table at her husband's Storm Guardian, glancing backwards to be sure her baby and his brothers were doing fine at their table. "I still feel horrible about that."

"It's not always lethal. My sister did it through straight willpower instead… after she knew it was a possibility." Allowed the ash blonde thoughtfully.

Sighing out her somewhat complex feelings on the topic, Fiorella gave her a small thankful smile.
"So yes, I am trying to get you to think well of me so I can bother you here or there for an answer or two. I hope you don't mind."

"Do as you need to do, Lady Vongola. I'll inform you if I minded."

"Speaking of your sister, have you spoken to her yet? I think she and Ganauche have a thing now.
He sounded very admiring when he called back to check in with Timoteo and ask for an extension."

"Oh, for fuck's sake." Slapping a hand over her face, heedless of the makeup she was wearing,
Sonya sighed heavily. "Really, Tatiana? Your taste in men still sucks."

Fiorella blinked blankly, more than a little surprised by that reaction, as Coyote coughed around a sip of wine.

Nilda snickered into her palm. "A bit of a recurring problem?"

"I swear to whatever's holy around here, she's going to get herself in trouble one of these days."
Mourned the Storm-Cloud sadly, pulling up her clutch to dig around for her pipe but left it in there instead of pulling it out. "She had been taking it easy on that front for a few months, I suppose we were due yet another beefy boyfriend from her."

"Ganauche isn't beefy." Mulled over the Rain thoughtfully, playing more than sipping her glass of wine in one hand. "A bit doughy right now, but he is on light duty to ensure the concussion didn't knock something loose. He's also perfectly a gentleman when it comes to his girlfriends, even from rumor alone. A few bad breakups, but those happen."

"It's likely your sister doesn't have a 'thing' for men, it's a side feature of what we are." Renato chipped in for Suns in general, apparently uselessly.

"It's her favored way to blow off the extra energy that stacks up on her." Sonya clarified in an utterly dry tone, flicking a wrist at him to dismiss that. "I'm aware you all can get rid of it in other ways, but that hypermetabolic activity you all have? To the rest of us it looks like you're either fitness nuts or sex fiends, and even still you have the possibility to be slightly hyperactive in everything else on top of that."

"Well, it's either that or twitchy insomniacs." Allowed the hitman equally as dryly with zero shame.
"Trust me, it's the better option."

"And I almost compulsively need violence or adrenaline surges to retain an even temper, you don't see me picking fights with those that would never be able to keep up." Shot back the thief, elevating her nose into the air with a tiny sniff of superiority that made Shamal snicker.

"No… instead you'll argue with everything and nothing at all."

"You don't have a black eye, do you?"

"A bit lower, I have a bruise on my ankle about the size of a heavy coin from you kicking me."

"Um… is that why Visconti spends more than half the day in a gym before and after any social functions?" Fiorella interjected a bit hesitantly, studying the Storm-Cloud worriedly. "Are you alright?"

Sonya honestly took stock of herself, and anything she might be feeling, before lifting a shoulder to dismiss the issue. "I'm… a little uncomfortable. But I'm used to it, I have other outlets I can use. Renato's really good about arguing with me, which does take a big edge off."

"…wait, that rumor is true?"

The young Mist sitting with them scoffed loudly at the Storm Guardian's question. "I told Mister Bouche that mamma argues instead of fights with people, if he didn't believe me it's not my fault."

His godmother petted his hair, frowning and her other hand reaching for her purse again and the comb there this time. "I didn't know you caught on to that."

"I'm not stupid, mamma." Preened the kid, smirking as he peered up at her from under her hand. "You always cuddled more and were more agreeable after you argued with Mister Renato. Your other half isn't so easy to pick out, but you're not very nice when someone tries to interrupt your reading before you're ready to put it down so it's obviously about your books."

"Three parts." Renato chipped in sarcastically. "And you realize, part of your issues might just be you share a talent with me and your sister, right? You're a damn mutt, so anything within the range of all three is entirely possible to give you issues."

"You have got to be the most terrifying teacher I ever heard of." Nilda announced blandly, looking faintly impressed.

"I'm the damn librarian." Sonya corrected shortly, handing the brat the comb instead of doing it herself this time. "…mainly."

"Even worse." Corrected the Rain simply around a sip of wine.

"Well, Don Bergamaschi and their American branch the Cerritos are about to find out shortly." All but purred the hitman wickedly, a shit-eating grin sneaking across his face as he glanced at the now mildly amused thief in question. "They did ask for a few related lessons on the nature of the gift."

Nilda looked terribly depressed she couldn't get free that quickly to just hop countries and see how that would go down. In contrast, Coyote looked very glad that would happen very fucking far from Vongola territory first until the damage would be known.

"Do you do guest lectures around the world for work then, Sonya?" Fiorella asked curiously.
"...of a... type." Allowed the Storm-Cloud eventually. "More like crash courses. The thing for Don Bergamaschi isn't the only one going on, I've got a green Frenchman getting the same course who's almost done and about two more Moscow local but not in school situations going on. Then Chinese exchange students, and a few other intercity arrangements..."

She thought back to what was waiting for her to do back in Moscow, winced away due to a kind of depressive certainty if she didn't stall long enough she'd end up murdering the wrong people for her continued existence, and the knowledge that she had responsibilities she had to avoid due to a Flame nature related issue... the Russian frowned, then glanced down to the brat they were gathered to celebrate seeking a distraction. "Anything you want to do today, brat? I don't think listening to old people talk would be very fun."

"It's better than what's going on at the kid's table." Shamal informed her with blunt honesty. "But I don't mind sitting for a while, I maybe ate too much at the buffet table."

"Well, now you know. And we don't have to sit here, we could return the Vongola people and take a trip elsewhere for the day. I have to head to the States soon, but that doesn't mean I need to leave tomorrow."

The Mist brat considered that, tiny hands wrapped around his cup of highly doctored coffee milk on top of the damn near priceless Bible his godmother dumped on his lap for safekeeping. "Can we go to Rome and see that bone church today? Please?"

He very conscientiously didn't look at the hitman, but Renato caught the 'before he had to leave them for a long while' anyways out of the brat's thoughts.

Fiorella smiled at Sonya when the thief looked up at her. "We'll leave you here, I think. Massimo probably needs a nap near desperately, and the boys do deserve a reward themselves for behaving so well all morning."

"Thank you. Until next time, Lady Vongola." Acknowledged the Russian for the other woman's consideration, then glanced at the Rain still watching her with amusement. "...Miss Silver-white."

"You're doing that just for the hell of it, aren't you?" Nilda questioned keenly, a wry twist to her lips. "Rosabella said you called her Misty Miss Tweets again, I bet you do know our names you just pick not to use them."

"And now I know it bothers you, I'll never stop doing it."

"Touché."

(Tuesday the 10th of February, 1970. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Miss Sonya."

"Master Tyr." Greeted the Russian in question evenly, turning to face him from the day room she was waiting in for both the hitman normally near her and whichever Vongola Alliance agent Timoteo would attach to her to observe the compromise between her as the head of a Moscow based Mafia School and the Bergamaschi Famiglia. "Can I help you?"

A fair assumption for the reason he was approaching her, as he found some interest in speaking of less focused upon aspects of Flame nature and Cloud aspects with her across the various balls they had been acquainted. He was also currently interested in why his apprentice Ottavio would not speak of her at all, but that was likely a Cloud Flame related issue he was more than sure about the components of.

The younger Cloud, although respectfully gifted to the point his nature had expressed itself before even gaining conscious use of his Flames, did not remotely compare to her as a Cloud user. That didn't even encompass her other types to bring to bear or himself as a likely factor, because between the two of them she was the better Cloud Guardian candidate even handicapped by requiring a separate but equal connection to her brother as well as herself.

A lingering sense of inadequacy from his situation of being pressed on a Sky that didn't want him and a bit of childish jealousy mainly, but the child was painfully green to the point of being transparent about it to his eye.

…then again, Ottavio wasn't quite quality enough for Tyr to be sure he would've accepted the young Cloud as his Guardian in the first place anyways.

"This," bringing up the water-tight container he had carried out here to the more public part of the mansion, "is the head of the man that ordered the car bombing and wounded Ganauche… which also brought harm to your brother."

If the current spate of rumors were correct, coming from Coyote Nougat as they were gave it a bit more weight behind the claim than he normally gave them, the slightly Sun-touched Storm-Cloud cocked an eyebrow at him at first.

Unfolding her arms, she accepted the plastic pail and screwed off the lid to see the severed head on ice within it. An utterly nasty, wicked smirk curled up her lips as she freely admired his handiwork. "…oh."

"It took a bit of waiting I was not pleased with once he covered his tracks enough to encourage enough reasonable doubt to save his life, but he eventually did do something else Stupid I could then kill him for. I regret it wasn't expressly for the harm he caused you and your other Flame half, but it was him nonetheless."

"…I think I'm going to turn this into a soup bowl." Commented the thief after a moment, tucking the lid under an arm and reaching in to lift up the head by the hair the previously living man had been somewhat vain of. "Did you leave enough spine to make a base from? You did… how lovely."

"I thought drinking mugs were more popular?"

"How... medieval of you, Tyr. No, a soup bowl for me I think. I'd rather not taint the mead the parents of one of my people intend to brew here, but I can certainly make my own borscht and eat it out of this."

The Sword Emperor had no issues with what she intended to do with his gift, he was merely interested in why she picked a soup bowl instead of what might have been assumed she would do with it on the basis of her nationality. "I will be sure to save you the head of the man that ordered the assassination attempt on Lady Vongola for you as well, and get it cleaned of what is likely rotting flesh right now, so you may have a matching set."

The tip that mead was about to become locally available was equally as interesting for an avenue to watch, change wasn't always equally embraced everywhere and someone might just do something Stupid with that route as much as they might try something more direct. Either way, the fallout would be spectacular.
"That's very sweet of you, Master Tyr. I appreciate it." Continued the Russian in a rather intriguing lilting tone, not quite something he could attribute to her Russian accent but something that couldn't be expressly explained away as just a 'pleased' tone. "I suppose I should check on those heads I ripped off in Moscow and see if any could be saved, so I can have an entire stack of skulls to serve soup in. I might have ruined the spines piking them on stakes, but alas if so."

Tyr felt his eyebrows climb up while she replaced the severed head back into the pail, as he pinned down what that tone was and what it meant.

…not entirely objectionable of an event, all told. Indeed, the fact he had overlooked inviting the possibility entirely was a bit Stupid of himself.

Then again, giving Clouds grisly trophies as gifts probably did have its own note in their circles as 'obvious courting behavior'. Less for Guardian aspects and more for… purely physical reasons.

This required more thought than he had initially given it, a mistake he needed to rectify immediately.

While indeed it seemed she had no intention of holding himself and his fledgling Varia organization on the same level as she likely thought of the CEDEF right now, or even Vongola as a whole in spite of being part of it, this was rather rude and churlish thing to do to a useful and mostly innocent young lady whom seemed involved with a Mafioso already.

Even if he and Sinclair had a moderately amusing rivalry going on, they were both killers who respected each other's methods but thought their own was better overall and were in the middle of attempting to prove it through example, stealing the hitman's woman out from under him would be crossing a line with both the other man and her.

Coaxing Sonya to flirt using violence with him was his own fault. One he would suffer willingly as he invited it unknowingly of her awareness of the phenomena, one he assumed she wasn't at yet due to her Mafioso's less straightforward behavior with her, but also one he was aware would tax his self-control rather severely.

With Clouds, it was either friendship based or seduction orientated. If she wasn't yet 'mature' enough in Cloud terms to be aware of her own reaction or intents when it came to 'gifting' violent behavior, then she would do it through what she thought and indeed was friendly behavior for her inherent type.

They were somewhat like cats in that way, presenting trophies to each other in a 'admire me/my skill' process of boasting to catch a Sky's eye as the 'best' Cloud. Doing something similar to them either earned the interloper scorn, if they were far from that level of development or they judged the 'trophy' to be of a lesser skill, attention that could be good or bad depending on a lot of factors… or their highest form of flattery.

It was entirely subject to what the individual you were dealing with and how they took the gestures. He knew of Clouds that showed their trophies in obscure ways outside of the safety and proper order of their initial territories. One tamed wild animals to usefulness, a female Cloud that collected finger bones of previous lovers, the current Visconti Famiglia Head had a rock collection from the tips of treacherous mountain climbing expeditions, the Ninth Generation Cloud Guardian's third-cousin had pieces of shipwrecks from around the world, and even one very old Cloud that worked here as the main Cloud tutor for the Flame orphans hoarded ancient coins unearthed by his hand alone.

That she would use his gift to her in creating what could become her collection of 'admire me' trophies… was still flattering itself even in spite of her actual intents behind it.
If she did collect all those previous heads, then it wouldn't mean Sonya collected skulls as her trophies. If she only added one or two, in order to not be shown up by his offers, then it was just accepted as friendship-motivated as he intended and she might be collecting skulls as her badge of skill to display to other hostile Clouds scoping her out for possible conflict. Including his as they were gifted by another skilled individual in the area she decided was a skill she liked to flaunt or appreciated in others.

If Tyr received a head or two in the coming years, either prepared to be used as bowls themselves or as fresh as this one, then he really had fallen into a very Stupid situation of his own making.

Then again, he asked for it.

The Sword Emperor wasn't sure which possibility he would rather her go with.

"I'm afraid I must leave you here," it earned him too sober grey eyes blinking at him in some surprise, which meant he was not finishing out this flirt correctly as to not damage his standing with her, "but I do look forward to seeing how they turn out."

"I'll invite you over for lunch when they're done." Sonya promised, a touch too considerately for Tyr to feel safe leaving as abruptly as he planned as she watched his movements curiously.

"I've never had borscht before." Allowed the Sword Emperor slowly, not twitching a muscle outside of acknowledging that point. "I'm not even sure what it is aside a Soviet Union type of soup, if pressed to be honest."

"It's… interesting." Tempered the Sun-touched Storm-Cloud slowly, but another smirk was curving her lips again as things got progressively safer for him. "Renato got through a bowl of my mother's recipe, I think you could too."

Safer, but not entirely apparently.

That was a taunt, clearly. Either she thought she was at fault for his apparently too hasty reversal and was attempting to reassure him by showing a possibly noticed rival was fine after a similar incident and inviting him to reassure herself or him that he was just as good or baiting him in revenge for the same situation taken in a less personally faulted way.

Neither of them things he wanted her to think. One was galling for him to inflict on her needlessly, the other equally so in a different and more personal way. Tyr was about to lose this interaction, and he wasn't sure of the reasoning behind it to be confident in why.

Wracking his mind for something else to say on the subject to demonstrate he had not balked at her intentions for his gift or her plans to add to it, the Sword Emperor cocked his head to the side.

"Before I go… where should I send the other head?"

"In the care of Tatiana Primakova, at Saint Julian's."

"The hospital there has a name?" As far as he was aware, it was nearly always referred to as 'Mafia Land's hospital' or in less often cases as 'that island's hospital'. Very few seemed to know of any such name, likely for reasons he was unaware of or simply through sheer laziness.

"My sister and a few of my students do work there."

Nothing in that context told him anything about much at all if it was a security related term hidden for specific reasons or not, which seemed to be her favored tactic when speaking with others. Give just enough information, see if they panic or do something Stupid with it.
Tyr honestly couldn't tell if it was intentional or not, nor what she did with the resulting information besides watch for it. "An oversight on my part, my apology."

Instead of specifically answer that comment with something, she hummed instead thoughtfully as she set the plastic container at her feet. "Did you not say you had something to do, Sword Emperor? Am I keeping you from anything important?"

"It is significantly less interesting than you are, however moderately pressing a situation."

The actual smile he got now was touched slightly with fondness, a new development. "I appreciate the gift and your time, Master Tyr."

…he had somehow gotten through this intact, or at least without damaging his position with her, and he had no idea how. "Miss Sonya. Have a good day."
Chapter 101

(Wednesday the 11th of February, 1970. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"What, exactly, are we waiting on?" Sonya inquired rather idly more than anything else as Renato joined them in the room they were wasting time within, sifting Shamal’s hair through her fingers as she watched him toil away on his homework.

Apparently, it was a greatly distracting habit of hers. Brat hadn't gotten more than three of his math questions answered in the fifteen minutes he'd been out, and two of them were wrong from what the Mafioso could make out from nearly halfway across the room through his moderately messy handwriting.

"Nono's intent on ensuring the attaché won't piss the hell out of you, he's already denied the last three options offered on the allies of Don Bergamaschi's end since the beginning of last month. Not really for more than just 'his personality is going to tick her off, let's not' than anything specific." He informed her simply, as it really seemed as if she didn't care when things got kicked off.

The delay didn't bother him any either, after this he had a few last-minute things to put in place then maybe one last visit to manage before he disappeared but both wouldn't be harmed even if he spent a few more weeks away from it. It was a bit unusual, the hitman would've expected things to have been set into stone well before she got down here rather than a few last-minute fixes needing to be put in place before they got the blessing to take care of this little 'guest lecture' of hers.

However, a delay was greatly more desirable than another cluster fuck. He'd live with it as long as there wasn't yet another facepalm inducing hiccup of bloated stupidity spilling over on something sensitive. Vongola and her people weren't inept, it was too large and way too old to have ever really been hilariously incompetent for very long… or at least it seemed to be everywhere but near one Soviet Storm-Cloud he could name.

Shamal tilted his head back against the couch she was lounging upon, resting the crown of his head on her knee. "Are you going to be here for Valentine's Day then, mamma?"

"I have no idea."

Closing an eye for a moment to study her through the remaining open one, the Mist suddenly shot to his feet and darted out of the library room before the Mafioso could bark at him to go back to his work.

Glowering after the brat and the door he failed to close behind him properly, Renato stalked forward. Mostly to check that yes, the kid would have to redo what little he managed to get done because five of the math problems were horribly wrong not just two. "Do you even know what Valentine's Day is?"

"I'm Russian and an atheist, not retarded nor unobservant." Snapped back the thief shortly, looking slightly put out over the sudden abandonment of the brat and his eternally disordered hair of her person. "It's a religiously flavored and heavily romanticized holiday that turned into some kind of night of romance these days. Obviously."

"…is that it?"

"It's a day for giving chocolate to whomever even crosses your path, if you're a child, and a romanticized holiday that today means an obligated and overpriced date-night, for adults. When once it was more a pagan fertility festival, at least back in Roman times." Sonya rattled off in a bored tone, merely looking a touch annoyed and not really feeling it. "Something about a dog, a goat, and skinning them both then whipping a woman or hundreds with the skins in hopes to gain some measure of fertility. They once lined up for that crap… then there was something about some kind of sex lottery..."

"Ho…?" Drawled the hitman with a measure of amusement for the history dump, contemplating things and his luck as he neared her choice in seating. "More information than I needed, little dragon lady."

"Then why ask?" She tossed back, actually looking rather sulky than irked.

Nothing had really gone wrong recently, per se, but then again nothing recently had gone really right yet either.

Taking the gamble on his bipolar luck, he dropped heavily onto the couch next to her and put his head in her lap to make himself comfortable.

A pause and then light fingers stole the hat off his head, so the Russian could peer down at him questioningly. "Are you tired or something?"

"…sure, let’s go with that." It wasn't even a lie, either.

The longer this whole situation took, the more rest time he got between dodging people he was only semi-certain wanted him dead between his own hit work around the world and the odd occasional spectacular mess he got embroiled in.

He couldn't do that forever, balancing between being just available enough to target instead of enticing someone going after a softer spot yet still actually working, which was entirely the point.

Almost an optimal position to be in for what he wanted to do…but rather exhausting to juggle his own needs between outright stupidity and a risk of chance. Taking a break from it, and losing himself into the deeper parts of the Soviet Union where few outside it had ever managed to worm their way into meaning his latest round of murderous tails got stumped hard by unamused Soviet criminals ripping back into them for the infringement, was rather nice.

Almost exotically nice right now, especially as the Russian hadn't shoved him off her yet as she dealt with her personal twinges of surprise and unease at the sudden new situation.

He felt weirdly expectant right now, and a slight bit jumpy with little reason to be given very few would strike at a syndicate of Vongola's size just for an independent that would be leaving shortly anyways, but like everything else good in his life right now he was taking shameless advantage while not damaging it as best he could manage.

It didn't exactly mean he had stopped thinking of when they might show back up, bloodied and highly unamused with his delaying tactics… if they survived Sonya's bizarre and oft backwards motherland in the first place.

Well, put in that perspective then Italia would be equally as strange and backwards to her.

…interesting.

Perching his fedora on her own head, ignoring it when the brim immediately sank below the tips of her gem studded ears, the Soviet Storm-Cloud considered him thoughtfully for a long moment before obligingly sinking her fingers into his hair. Apparently to feed her addiction in trying to neaten such impossible things, hesitantly at first but growing bolder the longer he didn't comment.

The practice she had gotten in with Shamal was greatly paying off in his opinion, as impossibly strong as she was there weren't any painfully hard tugs as things failed to resist her ordering things to her liking.

"Your hair is a mess." She informed him blandly, as if he had no idea how bad it could get.

Renato didn't keep wearing the damn hat they got him for no reason.

With the thief now happily occupied with the futile attempt of straightening out his hair, which admittedly had a curl to it that was a measure worse than what their brat possessed, he tried to think of something to speak of so she wouldn't let her mind wander and then decide this was too much for her sense of personal space…but found himself focused on the stupid bucket of bloody ice set next to the door their godchild had bolted out of instead of something else more mundane.

…with a head in it.

That did deserve a bit of consideration in its own right. He had known that man, and his head was chilling in a bucket until she got it boiled, bleached, and likely set with some kind of metal or waterproof bowl to hold soup.

Fucking Tyr, again. The normally unflappable master assassin of Ottavia's hastily beating a strategic retreat in the face of actual and honest friendly overtures from this particularly confusing woman would've been hilarious to watch go down… if it wasn't an indication of what he was outright abandoning to the whims of fate for the next few years.

Sonya figuring out what to do with other people aside get annoyed with them or occasionally argue with a rare few.

"Why soup bowls?" She had shown absolutely no interest in making art of human remains when they went to visit a few sites with something similar, so the whole thing was a touch out of left field for him.

"Hmm?"

"The head. That head over there in particular."

"I can't do what I would've normally done and spike them on my fence or something... anyone that remotely might be able to talk to Moscow police could easily figure out where I've been operating from that." Sonya answered simply enough, more than distracted to be allowing her mouth to run without actual thought put behind censoring or otherwise editing her words.

Not that such a thing was normally an issue with her, but ingrained habits were hard to shake. Besides which, she never said anything more when he tried such tactics than when he simply asked straight out. Unless she felt really strongly about the situation, which wasn't really a common thing when speaking to her.

"And I can't obviously display them to say someone's gone and pissed me off... especially as I suspect I've gotten real estate in pure civilian territory. So, I have to sort of hide it and since so..." Trailing off, she tugged a touch hard on his hair to get something straightened out.

Futilely, as again there was no way to make things straighten out without it tangling up again immediately once it was let go.
"...you need a haircut."

"Probably." Renato dismissed simply before prompting her to finish her thoughts. "And so what?"

"Well... I suspect several people will certainly try to gain an audience with me for whichever reasons... both soon when I officially move addresses to if I survive past Shamal's childhood. If I delay talking to whomever long enough I can always offer to serve lunch in recompense for wasting so much time. And really, small talk is all about small pointless stories, right? ...like who exactly is making up my dinnerware they might just so happen to be eating out of at the time."

He barked out a laugh, jostling her and gaining a hard look for moving his head so much.

That wouldn't work well more than once, but that once... he wasn't sure who he wanted to be the one to torque the little dragon lady's nerves that much...

Glowering until he resettled back into her lap, Sonya huffed irritably as she inspected her likely completely ruined work. "Do you want a comb or something?"

"I bother with it more than enough as it is, so no."

"Hey!" Shamal very loudly protested, scowling up a little storm as he clutched a tiny packet of brown paper in his hands in the doorway. "You're in my spot, Mister Renato!"

"You abandoned it, it's no longer yours." Shot back the hitman lazily, smirking at the strange expression on the Russian's face as she warily shuffled her gaze between them.

"...I thought I was the thief here?" Sonya questioned slowly, not extracting her fingers but not moving either. Unsure if she wanted to coddle their godchild enough to bother with the effort of trying to shove him off her without inciting an argument or two, or just keep on doing what she had been in the middle of and would likely never finish with no matter how much effort was applied because that was what she was occupied with right now.

Sulky Mist brat sniffed in insulted outrage before she could figure it out, stomping over to the couch but getting derailed off his irritation with the hitman when he was reminded why he shot off on them with his homework undone. "I... um, got you something. For Valentine's Day, mamma. I... kind of never got you a birthday present or anything. Sorry."

"Ah... I... didn't expect you to-"

Cheeks puffed out warningly, which made Sonya shut up before she finished articulating her thoughts.

"So here." Shamal informed her pointedly, making the small parcel disappear from his hands and appear right on Renato's forehead in lieu of her lap.

"Brat!"

Said thief rescued her plainly wrapped gift before he lunged off her and the couch for the Mist, who immediately poofed out of physical reach with a gleeful snicker. A more than decent display of Mist skills, that his godmother's Mists taught him, which gave the brat an edge over the others of his age from what the Mist tutor in-house had to say about the kid's development recently.

Catching on a second too late all the results of that little maneuver, Renato straightened up and turned around only to see Shamal happily occupying Sonya's lap now. The little smug grin the kid had was also rather irking as well.
Plucking the strings apart as easily as she did tangles, she opened up the package to reveal an equally bland little cardboard box with only a watermark impressed on the heavy paper to show it wasn't just any box. Lifting an edge of it with a finger, the thief blinked then looked down at her lap's new resident in askance. "How did you find some of these?"

"I saved up all the money I earned over this summer." Shamal informed her, dropping any pretense of teasing the hitman for stealing back his 'pampering' spot and instead leaning backwards against her modest chest. "One of the maids knew of a confectionary store, and I had it special ordered... because it doesn't seem all that popular, mamma."

"Unfortunately, I rarely find many of these out here. Thanks, brat." Too swiftly to see what it was, she popped one in her mouth and settled in to cuddle the Mist brat instead of letting him work on the things he kind of had to do for school.

Shamal preened under her words and in her arms, which tempted the damn woman to go back to trying to yet again neaten out his hair again. Which meant nothing would ever be done any time soon by either individual.

Renato sighed heavily and rolled his neck to crack it. "I can go see how much longer they'll be if you'd like, little dragon lady."

"Mmm." Sonya simply shrugged a tattooed shoulder, peering up under the brim of his own hat at him while she swallowed whatever it was. "If they take much longer... I'll just leave without them. There's a limit, or there should be, for how long I delay my own work for a third-party problem with the arrangement."

Swiftly boxing backup whatever treat it was their godchild gave her, then sliding the package somewhere out of sight in a movement almost too fast to keep track of even with his skills, she resettled the Mist brat in her lap then peered up at him over the brunette and wavy hair obscuring the lower half of her face.

"Actually... I think I'm going to do just that. I've got that thing Tyr gave me to give to Rasputin, and warn my sister, then I'll head to America. If you want to join me or wait for Vongola to get its act together... I'll catch up when you get there."

"You didn't exactly give a solid date to be ready by." Renato pointed out reasonably, well aware Timoteo would not be pleased if she just took off before he settled on a decent prospect out of the pool of them he had to go through since he nixed the original Mafioso suggested.

Then again, she was right. It was a courtesy more than anything that she was allowing a Vongola Alliance oversight on her 'lectures', something that she really didn't have to do in the face of recent troubles in spite of that being the arrangement agreed to. If it took much longer then someone could use that to argue on the grounds someone or something was trying to delay it so she'd fail to uphold her end of the agreement. She didn't belong to that Alliance, Don Vongola had no hold on her either personally or otherwise, and as long as the situation was done even Don Bergamaschi likely wouldn't complain much.

Unless, of course, someone tried bringing the brat into things. Which shouldn't happen, as it was on Renato's merit the kid he got saddled with was housed in this Famiglia's territory rather than anywhere else. Trying that was sketchy in the extreme, as it was more than a reach.

Not that being such would limit anyone lacking an ounce of sense.

"I think... I can waste a few more days. I don't have anything too pressing to attend to, and spending "Brat needs to finish off his work first." Drawled the hitman a touch sarcastically, pointedly glaring down at the abandoned homework which was still wrong for more than half the worksheet that had something done on it. "Otherwise I believe he's going to get nothing constructive done."

Shamal considered it. For all about two seconds, before Sonya mulishly tightened her arms around him and made any possible relocation moot. Brat also seemed entirely alright with his godmother deciding to defy the Mafioso's semi-order instead of him.

"I don't visit that often, mostly over holidays." The Soviet Storm-Cloud reminded him equally as pointedly. "A day or two of subpar work won't really affect him all that much, especially paired against an entire year of otherwise better work and tests. Besides which, school at his age is mostly basic foundations that will be repeatedly recovered and then defined more in the coming years."

"We want to instill a good work ethic early, rather than end up with a little slacker well before he starts questioning the reason he needs all of these lessons." Shot back the hitman quickly, before that could go anywhere. "No, the work's not the important part as it will be continually covered as the basics are expanded upon. The getting it over with before letting himself get distracted is. Let him finish first, then steal him for the rest of the night."

Considering it herself for a few more seconds, probably just to be difficult if he had any measure of her personality, the thief sighed and loosened her grip. "He's probably got a point, brat."

"Aw..."

"Ho? 'Probably'?"

"How the fuck would I know what benefits structured lessons have? I was homeschooled." She reminded him pointedly, settling back in the couch she was just shy of lounging upon. "Seems simple enough to me, if it's important do it and if not it can wait until the important crap is done."

"Lisa had specific blocks of time set aside for school work to be done instead of anything else, didn't she?" It was a guess, but the woman was ruthlessly efficient enough Renato would bet heavily on the possibility.

Sonya frowning, more out of confirmation than any disgruntlement, proved his point.

"Brat, work. Now."

Looking pretty unhappy the only barrier between him and yet more math problems had been dealt with so easily, Shamal slid to the floor to start working on his homework again.

"Questions number three, seven, and thirteen are all wrong." Renato helpfully pointed out, earning himself an ugly look for it. "Six and nine are both off because you forgot to..."

"I get it, Mister Renato." Sulky Mist brat informed him pointedly, going to town with his eraser to try said problems again.

Sonya eyeballed what was visible with her higher perch over his shoulder, then the older Italian skeptically. "You can tell all that when it's upside down, you were halfway across the room when you did glance at it, and through Shamal's sketchy handwriting?"

Brat actually squeaked in outrage at the slight to his penmanship, critically studying what he had done already and getting slightly depressed as he realized the truth in her words. It was nothing practice couldn't fix, which the kid would get in as the years rolled by, so the hitman hadn't bothered to say anything about.

"There's a little place in my cold, black heart for math."

"...I fucking hate trigonometry."

"You're a-" Cutting himself off, Renato swiped his hat off her head and gave her a semi-disgusted look as he replaced it on his own. "...you're an acrobat. How the hell do you know what you can and can't realistically do without trigonometry?"

"By doing. That's what practice is for." Sonya insisted flatly. "Cherep's good enough for the both of us, so I leave such things up to him if I ever need it. Which I never have yet, basic mathematics is more than good enough for my line of work."

Her brother was apparently a bit of a math hound to go along with his stunt driving skills. Interesting, but not really fundamentally altering in any way. Her twinned Cloud didn't particularly like him all that much, but as he didn't see a need to cultivate the brother's opinion that was just fine as far as he was concerned.

"I'm going to go warn Nono you're running out of patience, see if that hurries anything."

She blinked at him twice. Mostly out of confusion. "But... I'm not, really."

"So, you won't decide to suddenly split and catch up to whichever Vongola Alliance attaché once they actually reach the States?"

Sonya's very blank face was telling, and she kept insisting his 'innocent face' sucked.

"I turn my back for two seconds and you're going to run off, aren't you?"

"...I have a Shamal. It'd be more like five minutes." Pointed out the thief in what sounded as she thought was logically, as if that was a major factor in any decisions involving sudden mobility. "And I already said I can spend a few more days just doing nothing, if I have to. I'd really rather get to work sometime soon, if he so feels that generous, but I can live with it."

Rapidly running out of patience, then.

(Monday the 16th of February, 1970. Wo Hop To Triad controlled hotel, San Jose California, United States of America.)

Sonya gave Renato a very unimpressed look for knocking on her door so late in the evening, shifting her gaze to the Triad guard masquerading as a concierge of a decently sized hotel she found to hole up in for the meantime. "It's fine, I've been expecting them. I'm not expecting any more Italians, so if they show up you can bounce them all."

The young Triad tough gave her a nod, glancing at the hitman as his instincts picked him out as the one to be wary of, rubbing the part of his pinky finger that had been hacked off before he took his leave.

"Triads, little dragon lady?"
"What part of 'Chinese exchange students' did you miss?" Deadpanned the thief, jerking a thumb behind her so the two of them would know they could enter without her chucking something heavy or sharp at their heads. "Who's this?"

"Dante D'Attilio, Miss Bazanova." The unknown introduced himself, still standing in the hallway instead of entering her rented space. "The Etiquette Instructor of your Italia sister school."

"...right." Leaving the door open so he could decide to enter or not on his own, the Russian padded back to the couch on bare feet to pick up her book again. "Did you head straight here or-"

"I had to hunt around a little, I honestly didn't expect to find you first before you found us. It was a matter of luck I got a tip from Cerrito's men a new tiny blonde Russian was spotted out here in Triad territory. Since when did you have a working relationship with the Triads?"

"Since last November, or maybe a bit earlier but I'm not sure." It was apparently mostly Fong's fault, for however he did in the Underworld Tournament.

Apparently the asshole won it and failed to inform her, and there was a bit of connection between them as Sonya went in as his hostage then did all that emergency relocation so visibly to just about any groups also there to see it and carry tales on. The Triad here were a Wo Hop To branch gang, so the fact they knew more than enough to connect her to their Oriental parent branch by reputation alone.

It was nice, to be honest. It seemed the entire West Coast was mostly Triad territory with a couple other pockets here or there, which was kind of understandable as the US used a lot of Chinese immigrants to build the railroads around the turn of the century which gave a priceless opening to the Triads to move in long before things were remotely settled enough to leech things from the East Coast and the more European influences there.

Italians were obvious, she had some dealings with them but aside one or two semi-moderate sized syndicates they weren't out in force around here. There were more Mexican Cartel branches than them, and there were a few small Russian holdouts, but mainly it was Triad and Mexican territory out here.

Right now, she wasn't risking civilian attention tossing down a room or two for listening devices. It was more likely she'd be thanked for finding anything instead. It was the best she had looked for, and indeed got.

"So, what's the plan you two thought up?"

"Didn't really get that far, we were trying to catch up to you."

"Yes, because I obviously can't be trusted on my own." Resituating herself on the couch she had been reading upon, she tucked her feet back into the lightweight cotton knit blanket provided but put the history text she had been in the middle of in her lap instead of going back to reading. "All I intend to do is do the briefs, unless someone magically ends up being too interesting for their own good."

"Not that interested in finding yourself some interesting students?"

"I have more than enough students back home." Refocusing on the Vongola Alliance attaché sort of poking around the general entranceway but pointedly not anything closer, Sonya drummed her fingers on the hardcover in her lap waiting for her to get back to it. "What's your story, anyways?"

"I've worked with Sinclair before." D'Attilio informed her simply enough, shutting the door behind himself and leaving his own luggage by the door instead of bringing it fully in as he finally left the little entranceway. "It was decided that if I could at least work with one of you it'd be good enough, especially as you decided not to wait for someone to be picked out."

"I was there for half a month, I spent more than enough time waiting around on bureaucracy when I informed Don Bergamaschi I'd be ready after the turn of the year and Don Vongola knew exactly when I'd be in the country."

The other Mafioso held up his hands, with a nod of recognition to her point. "Understandable, but it did jolt a few things loose and off the rails. That being the case, we're going to have to plan in the field so to speak."

"Plan what? If Don Bergamaschi didn't warn what's his face, it's not my issue."

"The logistics of what you're teaching, how much, and to whom."

"Do you think I'm stupid?" Inquired the Storm-Cloud curiously more than harshly as she felt it might've deserved only after she spoke. "I have a plan for what I teach, as far as I'm aware of you're just here to bear witness and ensure everything remains as arranged. And maybe introduction, but I thought Renato was the one that would do that."

"And I am also a teacher, miss." He reminded her a touch pointedly in return, earning a touch more attention from Renato who decided to about drape himself across the other end of the couch for this conversation. "Our ideas of what is 'good enough' for any one subject is likely different."

"I'm more inclined to think it's insulting."

A slightly hotter than human-normal hand closed around her bared ankle, and a gentle tug that accompanied it had her looking back at the Sun Flame user sitting across from her. "Little dragon lady, this part is going to require a touch of grace."

"Letting some other organization's agent judge me doesn't sound all that fun."

"I'm not here to judge you." Insisted the other Mafioso calmly as he dropped his hands. "But there likely will be differences, and just to ensure no one can try to use that against you when things are said later on."

That was probably the oldest trick in the book. The 'I'm on your side' attempt to get into someone else's guard easily. A squeeze to her ankle had her turning her attention back to the hitman, who merely blinked innocently at her.

…his innocent face still sucked hardcore.

"D'Attilio and I worked together some years ago, and on the rare occasion we do trade some information back and forth." Renato informed her simply enough, rubbing his thumb around the jut of her ankle bone out of what seemed to be absent mindedness than intent. "A long time ago, comparatively speaking. Before the brat. Fact of the matter at hand, he's not bad."

"Resounding sell, Sinclair."

"Do be quiet." Snipped the Mafioso back in what could be called pleasantly, almost downright friendly for him. "He's fussy, a bit of a tight ass. But no, he's not the type to lead on any particularly interesting contacts for nebulous powers he's not explicitly beholden to."

"Are you admitting Vongola's higher ups aren't exactly competent there?"
"I wouldn't go that far."

The cough from the other side of the room informed her that the other Mafioso didn't think so either or agreed with her. She didn't know enough to call it either way.

"...am I...?" 'Inheriting anything' was how she wanted to finish that, because if he was murdering off his personality then that also meant he needed to abandon even his information network in some method, but she didn't know how much he trusted the other Italian.

The wry twist to Renato's mouth wasn't really an answer. "The point of this being you don't have to worry he's going to sell you out to Vongola. He's respectful of them as any Italian associate would be to a major power, but not heavily involved nor intending to get that way."

Sonya honestly didn't want to inherit any part of his network, mostly because it would force her to actually admit the hitman was 'dead' in whatever way he intended to go in the face of someone she might actually end up invested in. Falsely, as the man would survive just not under the same name.

Most of it she would prefer to go to Shamal, if the man had to parse out bits and pieces to others.

A sharp tug to her ankle yanked her across the couch and halfway over Renato's lap so he could speak to her in a sort of whisper instead of loud enough the other man could hear. "I'd rather not drop critical parts, just keep an ear out for him."

Irked at the rearrangement, without even asking as well, made the thief glare down at him. She was actually somewhat taller than him, or sitting higher on him, than she was on the same level. Which was new but not appreciated. "I'll reserve judgement."

"All I can ask." Shrugged off the hitman, smoothing the hand from her ankle up the back of her leg and catching under her knee. "Do you want us to fuck off elsewhere or would you mind making space...?"

"There's only two beds, and I got the other one on the unlikely off-chance Tatiana might end up slumming it with me for a night or two." Sonya allowed slowly, pointedly removing the Sun user's hand from under her with a bit more force than most humans seemed to find comfortable. She did shift a little backwards more on the man's knees, because it might just be he was a touch uncomfortable with how she ended up on top of him. "He can have the other one, if you don't mind sharing with me or the couch."

Renato paused, glanced downward along her form to where she was straddling him, then back up. "Tempting me?"

"...for?"

"D'Attilio, go to bed. The adults need to chat."

There was a sarcastic sounding huff from behind her, which did slightly annoy Sonya until the man strolled off to investigate the rooms available and took only a brief look at hers before moving on to the next. "Horn dog. You're not that older than me, Sinclair, but I'm not interested in hearing you flirt with yet another skirt for the umpteenth time. However gracious or interesting she is."

She hadn't really thought of that. As annoying as she found it when the hitman flirted with some serving girl in front of her, others might end up annoyed with the situation the same she did if he flirted with her.

"I'm going to pass on climbing into your bed for now, little dragon lady. However nice the invitation might be." That discarded hand slid back to behind her ass, seemingly just to hold that feature of her form. "From what I heard in the Iron Fort before I left, Don Bergamaschi is maybe one of the few that expect you to manage this. On balance for the rest of the Alliance, most are on a 'wait and see' kick and there's only a few that expect this to end in a Flaming ball of fire."

"Such faith. Where do you land?"

"I know better than to doubt you." Renato drawled out dryly, digging fingers into her ass through the thin cotton pants she was wearing… which she didn't remotely appreciate him doing and he thankfully stopped with a quickness. "This all being the case, you can somewhat weigh the dice in your favor from right here."

"What dice?"

"…please tell me."

"I'm aware, thank you." Sonya cut him off wryly, lips twitching at the disgruntled look she got back. "The fact of the matter is, is that I'm not sure if that's in my best interests. All I intend to do within Italy is sit there until Shamal's old enough to handle his own business. Why would I involve myself in your country's criminal ranks in any great amount? I get the local influences, but Bergamaschi and Vongola are half a peninsula away from where I intend to live."

"You'd be surprised how quickly something minor in the south will affect something in the north. And while you're not interested, that doesn't mean your soon-to-be-neighbors won't be or won't be influenced by such organizations in various directions."

Sonya growled, because she just knew he had a point there. She just really didn't want to admit it. "Why does it have to be Italy, again?"

"Because the brat and I are Italian." Renato reminded her simply, the hand she hadn't had an issue with yet ghosting up her spine. "So, it would be advisable for you to blow a few people's expectations out of the water a few times and cement some kind of reputation others can't tarnish easily."

"…is there a particular reason why you're feeling up my ass?"

"Grope of opportunity. If you're going to sit here so willingly, I'm getting something in before I regret the missed chance."

"Then I'm going to bed." Getting up and throwing him a short look for the quick squeeze he got in, the thief slid to the side pointedly to break his hold on her. "You're weirdly touchy right now."

"I'm operating under the suspicion this is about as far as I'm getting." The Mafioso informed her wryly, sprawling out on the couch and digging her hard-backed text book from under his thigh where it got shoved when he forcibly moved her. "Anything new on your end?"

"On any Italian front? No, Bjorn's scheduled a deep clean and a few repairs of the castle and there's a block of time I have to be in-country for staff interviews for there… but that's going to wait for either the end of spring or mid-summer." Pausing for thought after accepting her book back, she considered him and wondered if he'd care about local news or not. "I thought drugs were something Vongola aligned Italians didn't get into?"

"…they're not."

"You might want to remind Don Cerrito of that, from the looks of things. Some of his men recently got into a scuffle with a local Mexican cartel branch about cocaine distribution logistics and who had the rights to the local consumer base."

Renato's expression was unimpressed at best. "Cocaine?"

"America's drug of choice right now." Sonya confirmed for him. "That and marijuana, but weed is more locally produced. Very lucrative to import cocaine right now, probably."

"There are lines, little dragon lady. Especially for Vongola Alliance members and even their various branches." He insisted flatly, kicking out both legs down the length of the fairly well-stuffed couch as he made himself as comfortable as he could. "I appreciate the heads up on where to start here."

"If anything, I think the Triads would appreciate getting whatever becomes available."

"I'll be sure to do my part for recompensing your local contacts for our presence, sure." He allowed, flicking a wrist at her before slanting down his hat to block the lights. "We do appreciate you sharing your wealth, little dragon lady. Goodnight."

"...are you going to be comfortable enough out here?" The couch wasn't exactly a new one, or very cushy. Even sitting on it for a couple hours reading her thighs were getting a touch stiff from the odd pressure it gave back for the use.

"There's no way I'd be able to behave myself in your bed without someone else to buffer and keep in mind. I'd rather sleep out here than let things get out of hand against my better nature."

"Sure." As she wasn't sure if she was ready for anything she did appreciate his restraint, even if it would be better for him to get some actual rest instead of napping on a broken-in couch. "Good luck."

There was a soft snort before she shut the bedroom door behind her.

---

(Tuesday the 17th of February, 1970. Wo Hop To Triad controlled hotel, San Jose California, United States of America.)

"How, exactly, do you want to do this?"

"Secure location, a limited class size, and control over kicking out the troublemakers or just general control over behavioral corrections are the points I'm not budging on." Sonya informed Dante shortly as she set down her spoon in the empty bowl that once contained her fruit-laced oatmeal. "Aside from that, the rest of the details are up to negotiation."

"If we rent out a meeting room here, would you moderate the class size to whatever would fill it?" Renato's fellow made man inquired after taking some notes down, flipping a cheap plastic pen between his forefingers and thumb a few times in thought over options that could mean volumes depending on how they were tweaked.

The noise irritated him somewhat, one of the few reasons why he only occasionally checked in with the other man. Dante had a few habits that got on Renato's nerves and to be fair he had a couple that irked the other as well, so the infrequent catch ups were more than good enough for them both.

"Possibly," digging around her purse, the thief stole the cheap pen and replaced it with a rather handsome looking plated fountain pen before the Mafioso could react, "depending on how many syndicates you want to fob off on me."
"…only Sicilians, or those with the blood, I suppose." Dante allowed slowly, eyeballing the new pen skeptically before deciding to go with it as just a pet peeve of hers. "More than twenty, less than fifty?"

"Mmm… question. If Don Bergamaschi wanted these people educated, why didn't he arrange someone to do it from Italy instead?"

"He doesn't. The brief is more to buy the American Don off from what he wanted to happen which isn't going to happen." Offered the other Italian, after waiting a beat to see if she'd let the topic slide or not. "More or less a boon that most offshore branches don't get even if something goes catastrophically wrong in their favor."

"So… he's paying more because I'm foreign? Or because someone thinks I'm less important than information…"

"You did agree to it, little dragon lady."

"That doesn't mean I should ignore the reality of the situation behind the scenes." Sonya countered simply enough, a gleam to her grey eyes that made D'Attilio pause and study her warily for another long moment. "I have my own ways to get back at those that think they can order my death and get away with it but catching the innocent grunts between two such hostile powers is rather ungracious."

"The whole point to this outing was to smooth over hostilities." Dante pointed out in a tone that was well controlled, but Renato caught the disquiet the other Mafioso felt about possibly setting up a few fellow associates for a brutal and lethally short lesson in Cloud diplomacy methods. "Additionally."

"Don't panic. If you asked around, the rumors of my being an oddly rational Cloud is mainly true. However, a bad boss shouldn't be in power for long. It is equally my responsibility to hold him to a standard of interactions between two syndicates of varying power as it is yours to ensure his drug running doesn't spread."

"I'll need to check into that first to get the full scope of the situation before I report it to Nono."

"The newspaper and the article detailing the civilian view of a gang fight is under the coffee table in my suite. It should at least be a decent place to start on the bare bones of the situation."

"Noted."

"Pending confirmation on that, for the sake of this conversation," clarified the other Italian after a moment of rolling that around in his mind, "this exercise of intercontinental education was mainly for the sake of keeping relations more or less on good terms."

"Sure." Sonya agreed way too lightly for it to be taken seriously, pawing around her tattered purse for the brass and bamboo pipe to fiddle with now they were done with their Oriental-flavored breakfast.

"…Miss Bazanova."

"No one asked what would buy my forgiveness for the hit contract placed on me, nor the situation that resulted in my own best friend being tasked to kill me. I promised to drop the whole matter and not go to the Vindice if Don Bergamaschi paid the hospital bills, which he did and so I won't, but I see no reason to think highly or even at all of the man or his syndicate for this clusterfuck. As a matter of fact, I intend to avoid having anything further to do with him once I finally get one Flame user that might immigrate somewhere. Doing this was more to ensure it wouldn't deteriorate more and for my own personal amusement than anything."

Renato blinked blankly at her. Dante pressed his mouth into a line but actually was rather thoughtful over the point as well. Which wasn't particularly problematic, as the young half-Chinese girl waiting tables decided they were done with their breakfast dishes and cleared off the table they were seated around while this was going on.

…in retrospect there was a lot of talk about how much the little dragon lady disliked dealing with Rains and making good on things when someone was in the wrong, but very little aside the hospital bills about what the thief was taking away from the negotiation table herself.

He couldn't decide if that was a specific oversight the Russian somehow coaxed out of the incident to hold over someone's head later or if it was just something she thought up since. He also couldn't tell if he was impressed, slightly confused, or exasperated.

It was entirely possible she didn't mention it at the time to evade any further scrutiny over the cover story for why Renato was never going to do the job to kill her and why pressing the point was a bad idea, or just because she was somewhat testing the Italians trying to negotiate with her to see how much they'd take if given an inch. Finally, it was entirely possible she had forgotten or omitted it on accident or on purpose.

It was kind of brilliant in a way of stalling and otherwise coaxing just tiny bits more than thought of out of a situation. Which made his inability to decide if it was on purpose or not somewhat aggravating.

With the Storm-Cloud in question, either could be possible.

"...ah." Dante tried slowly, stalling on the subject and entirely unsure of what to do or if he should do anything about it.

On one hand he could be possibly setting up another Italian, a particularly powerful one that would probably greatly like the warning on the situation, on the other he did rather want the Russian as a contact if Renato was offering himself as an intermediary and the opportunity to make the connection a good one.

For the sake of the job he had, as one of the instructors for Mafia School, there was also the consideration of forging good relationships with sister schools that might expand not only his student base but their influences around the world in other countries that might've been hostile to his students without the networking.

Dante was always a touch more responsible than most Mafioso Renato knew, which was probably why he was the one he had known for the longest time without dying off.

"When were you going to bring this up?" Inquired the Soft Sun Flame user idly.

"About when Don Bergamaschi thinks he might be able to ask something else from me." Sonya answered honestly enough, eyeing first her pipe then the other Italian rather pointedly.

"He doesn't smoke."

"As far as you knew, Sinclair. I don't mind, miss."

"...it has been a few years since we last saw each other face-to-face, but I doubt it." As a matter of fact he knew the other didn't smoke yet still, he just didn't see a reason to deny the Cloud a vice that was notorious for calming nerves if she needed it for any reason.

The thief eyed him sternly instead of taking him up on that. "You know it's rude to smoke around those that don't, right? If you don't, I don't mind not smoking."

"I don't smoke, and I don't mind those that do smoke around me." Dante insisted, thumbing the more solid writing utensil against his hand a few times as he leaned back against his dining chair. "Can we get back to the subject at hand?"

"Aren't you here to arrange the finer details?" Wondered the Russian in a carefully manufacture tone of bemusement, tapping the long end of her pipe against the table. "I gave the points I will not move from, arrange the rest from that."

"...and you're going to judge me for how well I do this, aren't you?"

"Well, you are the intermediary. So yes. I don't know the Don, for the sake of good relations I probably shouldn't approach him until he's fully aware of and committed to not attempting my murder that would require me to off him in return. Unless of course... you want him dead."

"You did steal from him first."

"Actually, he stole from me and my clan first."

Pausing, the Italian inclined his head to acknowledge the point. "Fair, if you wish to categorize people as an object to be stolen for this argument."

"I will get as petty as I need to be to keep my responsibilities safe enough to do their jobs and live their lives." Sonya professed simply enough, but by the way her features tightened even the one that couldn't mind-read understood she didn't like that comparison.

"I believe that is something most would do in the same position." Allowed the other Mafioso, packing away his notepad and considering the pen he had been given to contemplate if he should give it back or not. "I'll get things set up, then."

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 17th of February, 1970 continued. Cerrito Crime Family Headquarters, San Jose California, United States of America.)

If anyone glared at him the same way Don Cerrito was glaring at the blonde bird, Vito Romero would run for the hills as fast as he could. Not ignore a man as powerful as the crime boss while reading some hard backed... history text?

Seated between what looked to be two Mafiosi from the old country, the girl with the sharpish features was kind of the oddest one out in that collection. On the other hand, she was way too cool with the hostile attention aimed her way by someone the worst of the thugs Vito knew of would avoid annoying.

Something very strange was up.

"Romero, I need you to... watch this... girl."

From the tone, it was highly doubtful 'girl' was the descriptor he wanted to use.

"Of course, Don Cerrito." There was really little else he could say to that. "...for what?"
"She's a thief."

"With nothing to steal." The blonde answered for herself, not even looking up to appreciate the ugly look shot in her way. "That really is more like bolting the barn shut after the horses run off."

"Miss Bazanova. Please." One of the Mafiosi asked, half-exasperated.

"I am sorry, who is the one wronged here?" Asked the girl sarcastically, finally looking up from the book in her lap. "I really have little patience for a grown man pitching a fucking fit over getting bitch slapped for stupidity. As a matter of fact, given how this bullshit is turning out, I have no patience left at all."

A nearly silent sigh through the nose, and the Mafioso that seemed the less dangerous of the two of them turned to him instead of continue trying to talk to her. "Miss Bazanova is a Soviet Flame expert, she needs a… guide, and someone to vouch for her proper presence in your territory, while she's here."

"And keep her the hell out of everything."

"If I wanted to steal something, nothing you have would stop me." Slamming her book closed, the young woman got to her feet and tucked it away in a ragged looking satchel being used as a purse. "Stop being a child, Cerrito."

"I do agree with her." Drawled the other Mafioso, the one Vito really did not want to ever meet down a dark alleyway. He as well unbent his lanky frame to get up, ending up taller than him and adding a few inches for a moment as he stretched out his spine. "For what it's worth."

"Sinclair, please. I think this has gone badly enough we don't need your help." Snipped back the Mafioso with the most tact in the room in their native Italian, giving both an exasperated look of his own. "If you would get started, Miss Bazanova, I'd greatly appreciate it."

The pretty and utterly shallow smile the grey-eyed blonde suddenly sprouted was not at all compliant nor comforting. "Sure. Would you like to come along, Renato?"

"I think I'll pass today, little dragon lady." Renato Sinclair' declined smoothly, dropping back on his heels and readjusting his hat so the brim would at least attempt to conceal the nasty smirk on his face. "Just to let you… ah… assert yourself without seemingly borrowing anything from someone else."

Joseph Cerrito shot a mostly confused but somewhat wary as well look at the unnamed Mafioso. "I assumed he was her bodyguard…?"

"…Miss Bazanova has little need for a bodyguard, Don Cerrito."

That rather sounded… strange and just a little ominous. The woman looked like anyone that bench-pressed recently could break in half with a harder than usual hit, but neither Italians looked to be having a joke at their expense.

It was possible, but by how anticipatory the other man looked for someone to ask the obvious question… Vito wasn't taking bets. He also wasn't going to be asking the obvious, because that seemed to be exactly what the darker Italian wanted so he could get a good laugh in.

Probably at his expense. "Where to, then?"

"The meeting room, Romero." Don Cerrito informed him, mostly occupied with trying to glare a hole in the woman's blasé attitude and accomplishing absolutely nothing by it. "Let's get this farce Given the hardening edge to the sigh the man he didn't know a name for blew out, it was possible if Vito got the others out quicker he might be able to salvage something for his boss. Not really sure what, but something.

"This way then, Miss… Bazanova." She was at least biddable, for what it was worth. There was still something really strange about the entire situation that made it so Vito wouldn't be expecting jack shit until he knew more, but it was something.

Outside of Don Cerrito's office, the taller Mafioso split off with just a backwards wave to saunter off somewhere else and the woman looked at him semi-impatiently to lead on.

Which he did, but that attitude wasn't going to win her very many friends. Especially with where they were going, and Vito sort of got why Boss Cerrito had the more argumentative and asshole-ish of their number gathered up today in a tiny ass meeting room.

He was probably sabotaging whatever the girl was up to, and while he was sorry he wasn't nearly enough to warn her or try anything to mitigate things.

He'd hang around and pick up the fallout, but that was about as far as his goodwill went right now.

Gesturing to a specific door, Vito invited the girl to pass him and head on in and took up a position next to it just to hear how this was going to go down.

The door shut with a quiet 'snick' behind her, there was a beat of silence, and then the voice of someone he knew for a fact was Marcus Crispino. "So, we're buying hookers now? Nice, c'mere bunny."

...yeah, that was about-

An ear-splitting scream wasn't what he expected. Nor the subsequent thumps and then the massive edge of some kind of gold blade was shoved through the door about waist high with a splintering crack.

Vito had to stare and wonder who the fuck was stupid enough to walk around armed with something like that. Obvious and showy, and entirely impractical when it was easier to hide a piece instead.

"Fucking assholes! Get me the fuck down from-"

"Shut the hell up before I give you something to really whine on about."

"Bitch, you broke my arm."

"Then maybe keep your hands to yourself, jackass."

What?

The bird did this?

Trying the knob netted him no resistance but trying to open the door got him sworn out as Marcus was apparently straddling the blade in it. "Fuck! Whoever the hell that is, stop it! You cut it off, and I swear I'll do worse to you!"

"Back the fuck up then, Marcus."
On his very tip toes, the quarter-blooded Italian-American did so. It would've been funny, had the man not been one slip from losing a rather vital part of himself.

"Get in and shut the mother fucking door." Glancing up, he got the full brunt of a red-eyed glare from the blonde woman that he would've sworn had grey eyes before this. "Now. Or you will be my next target."

How he missed the massive gold-plated battle ax in her hand would be something he'd wonder for the rest of his life. She didn't have that before getting into this room, and if she needed-

"Now." As the demand was accompanied by her hefting that thing, which was heavy looking enough that even if she threw like a girl it would do some respectable damage anyways, Vito cautiously slid into the classroom around Marcus and his flailing attempts to grab him.

The guy pinned to the door by another massive gold battle ax wasn't having it, or his position. "You little bitch, the moment-

…okay, bird could throw better than any professional pitcher. The ax went through the top half of the door and from the sounds of it crashed into a wall hard enough to penetrate it, scaring any number of the maids on the other side from how they screeched and swore in response.

"Next one will not miss." Promised the woman, those red eyes bleeding purple next. "Now, shut your fucking mouth."

Of course, Marcus wasn't that smart. "What other one? You threw-

He did at least shut the hell up when she merely held out a hand and some kind of purple fire lit up then spat out another of those gold battle axes in it.

Which did explain where she got them from, somewhat. Slightly. Not at all, but he could hope it would if he gave it a bit of time.

Vito made sure he was in the nearest open seat, probably Marcus', before she could turn her attention back to the rest of them. All of whom were suspiciously silent behind him, and before this he would've called the whole room a 'rowdy lot'.

"Now then. As you may or may not have been told, I am a Soviet Union expert on Dying Will Flames. These kinds of Flames." Another threatening heft of that stupidly impossible ax, then it was set on her shoulder as she examined the associates in the room likely staring back at her as her eyes bled out the color to go back to her seemingly natural grey. "Yes, I can make my own weapons to beat the shit out of all of you. Infinity. I can rip off your fucking arms and beat you with the soggy end until you're dead, and never get fucking tired of it. The next asshole to try feeling me up will be losing their hands instead of be pinned against a moving piece of wood by their junk, understand?"

A pause occurred, where no one spoke.

"I will take silence as assent. Lovely."

"Vito, man, what the-"

Thunk.

Vito did not glance over, because he was pretty sure that wasn't another gold ax. That was some gunmetal grey polearm with a pick end, and he didn't want to be the next to attract her attention or experience what else she could pull out of nothing to use.
"Excuse you, I am talking here." Leaning in on whoever that was, and the short end-table it was embedded in if he remembered the room's layout right, the stupidly impossible woman leaned in and smiled sharply at whoever was next to him… then spoke in still accented but clearly understandable Italian. "Until such time I ask a question, keep your fucking nonsense to yourself. That goes for the rest of you as well, keep your fucking traps shut until I say you can speak."

…probably understandable, she did show up with two Italian Mafiosi so the odds were on her already knowing the language and just letting people talk around her without mentioning it would net her some information was pretty good.

He at least wasn't the only one that flinched when she yanked out that weapon from the wood it was lodged into, from what little he could see of the various legs and feet around him.

"The lot of you have been picked, handpicked I would say, by your boss to learn all about Dying Will Flames and how not to fuck up your next attempted abduction of one." Chick apparently knew full well what was going on, full credit to her if he wasn't fucking stuck in the middle of it. "And thus, we come to our first major issue. Most of you probably do not want to be here, I especially do not want a fuck-load of assholes that do not want to be here… but you are going to just have to suffer. I will teach you to standards, and you will uphold them. Even if I have to beat it into your heads for you to become close to competent."

The fact her eyes bled purple again probably meant nothing good, even disregarding that weapon in her hands which then flashed out of existence the same way it came into it. It was as far as Vito's experience with 'Dying Will Flames' went, and that was regrettably going to be expanded upon apparently.

"Now, this is the part where you can talk. Who knows anything about Dying Will Flames?"

Someone in the back shoved themselves to their feet noisily, and Vito just wanted to bury his face in his hands and ignore the next five minutes. He didn't want to know what was about to go down, but he also didn't think he'd get away with not watching or running for it.

"Bitch, you might've gotten lucky once-" Was about as far as whoever the hell that was got, then quicker than a rattlesnake the woman lunged forward and someone else was thrown into the wall that used to be behind her.

Silverio Rotelli wasn't a light man, either. He was one of the heavier enforcer-types they had, generally the guy they fetched to ensure the locals remained far away from where they were operating if they needed something done quick and dirty like, and apparently some hundred pound-nothing woman tossed him ass over teakettle as easily as someone else would sling a towel over their shoulders. Of course Rotelli wasn't the type to take that laying down, he scrambled upright and tried to swing back at her for the manhandling.

Vito then got a front-row seat to why Marcus claimed the girl broke his arm, it took an unbelievably light jab for Rotelli's forearm to bend in ways the human body wasn't made for as she flat out ignored his heavy fist impacting her ribcage to focus on returning the insult. She then fisted a hand in his shirt and threw him at Marcus, who had been suspiciously silent for a while trying to wiggle out of his rather precarious position.

Luckily for both, the door broke under the abuse instead of making the other man slide down that ax blade he had been straddling… which poofed into another batch of purple fire instead of slice either open. Both men ended up at the shoes of that other Mafioso, the one called Renato Sinclair.

"Couldn't help yourself, I assume?"
"Morbid curiosity, little dragon lady, I swear." Claimed the full-blooded Italian, eyeing her handiwork with interest before glancing up with a shit-eating grin on his face. "Want me to take out the trash?"

"Eh, throw them somewhere. If they wake up, they can come back... if they're brave enough."

From the despair inducing dark laugh of delight he gave, Vito was pretty sure if anyone else got tossed... or even survived today, they'd be running for it instead of risk whatever the fucking Mafioso was gleefully looking forward to.

...no, wait. If everyone refused to come back and risk bodily harm or being target practice for some apparently not-imaginary medieval weaponry, would they be defaulting on the offered lectures through delinquency instead of her for being unable to control a classroom of the worst thugs Don Cerrito could scare up?

Someone was going to have to bite the bullet and tough it out and Vito had the sinking suspicion it'd be him, so they at least didn't end up holding the short end of the stick. He couldn't remember who all was in here, and he wasn't glancing around for any reason even if he was curious.

"As for the rest of you, someone had better answer my question really fucking fast." Those grey eyes flashed from purple to red and then back to grey, as she practically prowled back to the front of the meeting room again. "Or I will assume I should start from the very beginning... and that might take a bit of time. Who knows how long we will be locked in this tiny room, waiting for someone to have the courage to answer a tiny little question like that..."

This was going to go downhill fast. Most of the men in here would probably eventually bite some kind of bait when their tempers chewed through their common sense, then get their asses handed to them in various humiliating ways and kicked out in short order.

Worse of all, they started it too. Stocking a room with a bunch of hot-headed enforcer types to hopefully scare her off so they'd get a better return on whatever Don Cerrito was up to. Just gave her ammunition to use in return, instead.

Unexpectedly jarring turn-around in expectations, really fucking galling to boot. Vito's next week was going to go downhill, just as quickly as this room emptied.

"No one?" The woman had the guts to pretend some very faked surprise as the Mafioso dragged off her two initial victims. "Well then, I guess I should start at the very beginning. Listen up, assholes. This will be on the test."

Might as well change 'week' to 'the whole of next month' instead, from the look of things.

Vito gave up and put his face in his hands when one of the hotheads in the room got fed up by being treated like schoolchildren instead of the supposed adults they were, shoving himself to his feet without a word and just simply lunging for the woman.

That one was tossed out the second-story window, instead of out the already broken door, almost instantaneously from the sounds of it.
Out of the twenty-seven men they started with, five were in the hospital because of their 'instructor' and three others had split without looking back over the course of two 'lessons' given over two days. Lesson number three, the part where the monstrously strong if dainty looking lady from Soviet Russia finally got into Dying Will Flame users and how they tended to 'express themselves', Vito was really regretting not joining the ones bailing out.

The unfortunate side effect of having some responsible bone in his body, it sometimes struck at the worst times and left him in a stuffy second-story meeting room turned makeshift classroom.

The rest of them… were either too hard-headed to realize they were contending with what amounted to a brick wall in human form or thought that eventually someone would just have to get lucky through the stacked odds not in their favor. Eventually.

Miss Sonya Arsenevna Bazanova had already introduced her 'other' trick yesterday, the one with the tobacco pipe and setting on fire the resulting smoke or possibly other people, which made four in the hospital for 'blunt force related trauma' and one for second- and third-degree burns. Today was apparently a 'testing patience until someone snapped' kind of day because she showed up bare-handed and seemed just waiting for someone to start anything, so she could beat them down without any of her Flame tricks this time.

As if they needed the extra embarrassment, the whole class was a laughingstock of everyone else in the know… and none of those fuckers would put their money where their mouths were and try it out for a day.

Don Cerrito had spun a fast and pretty tale, spreading to his main supporters the whole farce was some kind of penance turned opportunity. In a 'risk the lower thugs, get the information traded off to the higher valued associates, call it good' kind of thing and not the imploding attempt to run the 'teacher' off. About half the house bought it full sale, Vito wasn't one of them but kept his mouth shut.

Notably, neither of the two Mafiosi from the old country believed a word of it either and Don Cerrito had to spend a whole lot of time and effort trying to get them to keep quiet about it.

"You. Next passage."

Vito snuck a glance to the side, feeling a kind of sinking feeling grip his chest when he recognized who she was calling out to read aloud from her little worksheets brought in today.

Expecting it and it coming up were two very different things.

Matthew Lentine wasn't the smartest man on the block, a bit slow with his words sometimes, but he was a good man when it came to machinery or even telling a tale. Little grumpy when it came to figuring out written words put before him or trying to listen to a fast talker, but that didn't mean Vito or any of the other associates in the room would appreciate their 'teacher' calling him out for it or picking on him for an issue he couldn't help.

Matt knew perfectly well he wasn't getting out of it, but he did at least shoot the 'teacher' an ugly look first. Her highly unimpressed expression made him turn back to the few sheets of paper stapled together instead of try something, and after a moment to hastily scan the words printed neatly in blocks on the page started to read haltingly from it.

It really only took a few seconds to get Bazanova to pause and frown, but it was more thoughtful than annoyed despite what Vito expected.

The last time someone fucked around with what reading she mandated needed to be done, not half an hour ago, she tossed that fucker through a wall instead of allowing it to continue this long. There was a hole in the wall from him crashing through it without the benefit of any protective gear, and as a matter of fact Vito half-expected the man was playing dead so he wouldn't be forced to crawl back through the hole and read more.

The scrape of one of the abandoned chairs being dragged over wooden floors interrupting Matt's stuttering voice made several people flinch, but all she did was pull it up across from the guy and settle her pert ass in it.

"Stop." Rather needless of an order as Matt had already paused with his head down, probably expecting to be the next one tossed, her unvarnished nails tapped on the paper he was holding mid-way down the page. "Read this word."

"…ex—— no dis-tinct."

"This word."

"Ten-n… be… an, ic…? Tendency."

Another pause, and the blonde dug a pen out of her pocket and marked up her left wrist before pointing at another word on the pages before Matt. "This word."

"…I don't know that word."

"Sound it out, take your time."

He shot her a suspicious look, glancing back down at the letters on the page and hunching his shoulders up. "Ax… er… ar-da… t… ion."

"Exacerbation." Corrected Bazanova simply. "Ex, ac, er, ba, tion. To make something worse. This word."

"Then why not just put 'makes it worse'?"

Matt earned a pointedly expectant look, but not an answer.

Frankly, Vito was sort of sure the woman had picked her vocabulary to be as difficult as possible just to mess with the others. Some of these words he didn't know without a dictionary on hand, and he actually finished compulsorily schooling. He also suspected he wasn't the only one aiming to hit the books later tonight, so they'd understand what it was she had before them, which also might be half a point in itself since this was all really sensitive information they were warned to keep secure beforehand.

With a heavy sigh, and highly reluctantly, the man twice her girth obediently looked back down. The next pause was a touch longer, and somewhat seemed to pay off for him. "Pro-ber-ba-t-ion."

 Mostly. It was kind of a word.
"Propagation."

…wrong word.

Reaching the end of what patience he had left, Matt attempted to shoot to his feet. The dainty hand fist ed into his wife-beater tank top forced him to sit down again, heavily.

"Propagation. A Cloud Flame user's ability. Meaning to make more." Bazanova informed him with pointed patience as she let him go then leaned back in her chair to study him thoughtfully for once. "You just had to say you were dyslexic, I would have moved on."

"…what?"

"Dyslexic. Congenital word-blindness, like some are face-blind or color-blind. The written words swim around on you, do they not? Difficulty telling 'e's from 'a's, 'p's from 'q's to 'd's and 'b's from 'six's or 'nine's, guessing at words even with the context clues before you or never really being sure what you read, are some issues those with dyslexia have and it seems you as well possess."

Matt looked at her in askance, poleaxed without her needing to use her magical weapons. "There's a term for it?"

"It is not widely known of, most of the identifying work was done in Britain at the turn of the century. Not a whole lot continued from there either, but it is a known issue that may arise in the human condition." She offered to him as she got up and kicked the chair away negligently. "Just remind me if I forget, and I will pick someone else to read. I will also define whichever unfamiliar word you may come across after the lesson, if you require."

Then she thumped her fist right on the table next to Vito, giving him a very insincere smile as she pulled her unmarred left hand out of the splintered top piece of wood.

"Hopefully you know where we left off. Keep reading."

He'd put a finger on where they were, smartly it seemed. Old trick from school, but one that paid off highly as she then didn't have a reason to knock him unconscious for the rest of the lesson.

Obediently rattling off the 'Rain Flames and their characterizing differences' passage they were reading aloud like a bunch of middle-school brats got him space from the blonde, as she picked someone else for the next paragraph and continued down the living room turned 'classroom' with her back to the middle of the gathered men.

With the space, Vito risked a glance at Matt's still rather stunned looking face. His somewhat battered mug was almost funny paired with that expression, but knowing the man personally made things a touch more sobering.

A couple of the guys around looked highly tempted to risk Bazanova's wrath and start whispering to each other, almost like the school children she was treating them all as, but the sudden start and the suspicious level of attention everyone suddenly paid to their own worksheets probably meant the blonde bird had turned around and caught Vito looking around.

She gave him a very pointed look when he risked a glance, glanced once herself to Matt still sitting there. Not looking at anything in particular, definitely against what she had ordered them all to do… but then she silently moved on without saying anything to them both.

Uncharacteristically. She had literally punted a guy out of the room not an hour ago for trying to ignore her orders, yet apparently the big guy got a pass.
Then again, Matt was already pretty dazed. Maybe she just had a thing against kicking a man while he was already down.

Vito slowly returned to his own worksheet, feeling vaguely sheepish and a bit like the school kid the woman was treating them as. As a matter of fact, the whole situation now felt like some kind of remedial summer school thing with the whole 'read this' incident.

Weird.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 20th of February, 1970 continued. Cerrito Crime Family's Headquarters, San Jose California, United States of America.)

"There is no way to 'cure' dyslexia. It is a crossed wires kind of thing, I am afraid." Sonya was informing some brute of a man in her tone-less and difficult to read deadpan when Renato checked into her makeshift 'classroom', disposing of a whole fistful of papers in her hands using her Storm Flames. "Something you were born with or caused by too many knocks to the head, not a thing you learned wrongly or can undo. The only thing I can recommend is dedicated practice to learn your way around it, and unfortunately a lot of practice. Get yourself a book of crossword puzzles and a pocket dictionary, then just work at it until you get a little faster at reading and writing or find some workaround for recognizing letter groups or trouble words."

"…my third-grade teacher said I was just stupid."

"Your third-grade teacher is an uneducated moron." Countered the thief flatly as she flicked ash off her hands, actually sounding honestly annoyed with said unnamed teacher. "There is nothing wrong with you, there is no stupidity involved. It is merely the way you are from birth, otherwise known as genetically, or the result of traumatic brain injury. Both of which are not things that can be changed. Unfortunately, it is a disability you will just have to learn to cope with. As a method to make it easier on you is still unknown, there is nothing else I can say or do to assist you with this."

The man twice her girth and more than a head taller than her rubbed a broad hand over the back of his neck, well-muscled shoulder slumping at the news. Curiously he didn't look all that defeated at her words, just a bit resigned and wryly accepting.

Renato figured he had stepped into something he wasn't really involved with nor should be involved with and rapped his knuckles on the doorway, so they'd know he was there. "Should I come back?"

Sonya glanced up at him, lifting her tattooed shoulder in a dismissive shrug. "As I cannot do anything for this, it is entirely up to Mister Lentine here how much effort he wished to put into it and thus not something I can be involved with more than I have already offered."

The man, ridiculously enough, shuffled his feet awkwardly like some nervous schoolboy in front of a teacher. "Call me Matt, Miss Bazanova. Um… thanks."

Obligingly stepping aside for him, the hitman left the door open as he walked into a rather damaged seating room turned classroom. Wasn't a point to close it, anyone attempting to spy inwards could just peer through the gaping hole in the wall for easy access. "Enjoying yourself?"

"Once they stop being rowdy," allowed the Storm-Cloud with a thread of amusement in her tone, merely watching him advance on her rather than start moving herself, "the lot of them are not particularly bad students."
"Rowdy, is it?" Renato drawled with amusement, smirking at the diffident shrug he got as he came to a stop next to her. "'Rowdy' is why you've already started racking up a hospital bill not halfway through this thing?"

"And would you believe it? Don Bergamaschi already agreed to pay the hospital bills." She purred back, fighting the smirk trying to gain purchase on her lips but failing spectacularly. "So thoughtful of the man, is it not?"

"Mmm… there might be some difficulty convincing the Don of that." Not that he particularly minded, her mischief was entirely appreciated… at least by him. "However I believe you owe me a date-night, little dragon lady."

Sonya was markedly more amused now to the point it was actually visible just looking at her, thankfully he had seemed to catch her at a really good mood in spite of the difficulties one of her students suddenly had. "Ho? Indeed, I do. I believe it is also your turn to pick when and where."

"How about something classic? Dinner and a show?"

"What show?"

"Leave that part-" The clink of masonry being lightly kicked against a wall had the Mafioso turning around sharply, almost fast enough to catch whoever the hell it was using the hole in the wall to try spying on the two of them. "…shit."

Sonya glanced at him skeptically, then turned more to the hole to see who it was he needed to quiet in a fast hurry. "Mister Romero, did you require something?"

"Ah… nope. Just. Did Matt already leave?" Warily peeking around the shattered plaster and bricks still standing, the… half-Italian American tried for a smile that came out more like a grimace aimed at the both of them.

"He left already."

"…right. Sorry. Saw nothing."

Renato huffed sourly as the other man dashed down the hall and passed the still opened door. "Great. Now it's going to be gossip fodder, and there's no way Dante's going to miss it."

"Ask D'Attilio to keep quiet about it now, then pay off a Mist to make him forget later." Offered the thief a touch warily, still somewhat confused by the sudden tone shift but willing to help him still. "Or we could put it off until he leaves?"

"Rumors' not going to believe it, maybe I should've caught you outside instead." Tisking, the hitman turned back to the still puzzled Russian. "No, little dragon lady. Put it out of your head and let me handle the details. I need to run and catch… Romero was it? You just go find the tools to make yourself more pretty, and I'll pick you up around seven tomorrow for it."

"…okay?" She eyed him sternly. "No breaking my students. At least until I get to it."

"Of course."

There was yet another pause. "Do you… really think I am pretty?"

Sonya was thinking more about the times he had refrained from giving into Shamal's demands to say it too so she'd believe the brat, having assumed he hadn't because she didn't fit his criteria of 'pretty' and they didn't typically tend to lie to one another if it wasn't serious.

Renato blinked slowly, with a mild headache from trying to follow her thought process back through that incident and then forward back to now through all those moderators she apparently tended to filter certain experiences through. "...yes, little dragon lady, you are pretty."

"Oh. Okay." She got about a step before something else occurred to her to ask first. "...what should I...?"

"A cocktail dress will do." Offered the hitman a touch tiredly, grinding the palm of his hand into his left eye momentarily in attempt to alleviate the pain there. "Go with your usual colors, please."

"Like my little red dress from the first Ball we attended?"

"...that will do perfectly." While yeah, she had been sixteen at that point in time... the Mafioso would not mind at all any kind of repeat with short hems and garter belts to admire. Especially now she was twenty.

Made him feel less like an old lecher perving out on a much younger woman. Four to five years wasn't really that much of a gap at their age.

---

(Saturday the 21st of February, 1970. Island of Corsica, Mediterranean Sea, French Republic.)

Verde skidded, haste causing his battered footwear added to rain slicked cobblestone resulting in his feet losing grip on the material underfoot most unsatisfactory, as he dropped to a marginally painful kneeling position in an utterly disgusting alleyway next to his fallen friend to somewhat frantically press hard on the gunshot wound.

"...Verde. Verde. It's... not that bad." Adrik protested lightly, more from an inability to breathe through a punctured lung of all things than from any levity taken from this situation.

Flatly ignoring him the scientist pulled a small plastic card from his pocket, the local library card he had acquired for additional reading material or limited research opportunities, removed the belt the other man was wearing to plug up the hole with the allowance through the semi-ridged plastic to only let air escape if need be before yet more air was sucked in and caused a collapsed lung.

Hot and slick hands already covered in blood gripped his and then shoved him off, the Russian groggily hauling himself bodily up against the brick wall he was half-collapsed next to before providing the pressure on the card the Lightning had been intent on himself. Check him, and you're going... to have to finish him... off. If we're lucky.

"To hell with luck." Snarled the scientist with ill-temper, free hands curling up uselessly as things were as contained as could be without any supplies or medical professionals at hand. Luck is what got us into this situation.

"It's... the quickest way back to... that hospital, and the... whole 'no... need to explain why... I'm shot' thing. Would be nice. Boss lady... would... also be good for the... the fees, too."

Twitching, he shot the wounded man a blistering glare for the entirely valid distraction before turning on the one that shot at them both. While as a Lightning he found bullets to be less than a significant obstacle, the one without Flames between them had no such protections.
They had a week left in that arrangement between himself and Sonya and depending on traveling time they might just get through this with possibly less than a day to spare. Verde would be highly upset if his relative freedom would cost his friend his very life, but he was also highly aware it was Adrik's choice to assist him in seeking the lofty goal he had been perusing and to risk his life for it.

Once it turned March, the thief would return to France and seek them out. If Verde did not get them into Mafia Land and to her Lackey Bjørn before she found them, his end of the arrangement would be forfeited along with all the frustrating and halting progress the two of them made to date.

The both of them had poured too much time and effort to see everything fail just short of their nearly impossible finish line, and that did give the scientist enough motivation to turn on the hazily recovering criminal armed with one of his own creations with the extended magazine capacity.

A lot had gone wrong in last hour, more than he had accounted for after getting used to the routine at the other man's elbow the last couple of weeks.

He hadn't quite gotten to the 'disposing of bodies' part of being a 'made man', but at the moment Verde felt doing by dictation this once would be suitable. Normally he-

-he was stalling.

Frankly put, he was not a murderer nor had the mentality of someone that could kill for a living. Adrik had been very understanding about that detail, explaining that knowing your limits and where not to go was key to avoiding the possibility of ending up a mere shallow mockery of oneself. However, the Russian had also not spared the Frenchman from any murder-orientated lessons either.

Right now, Verde found it was still very much beyond his capabilities to murder even in this situation. Between this one, who turned his manufactured weapons against them in hopes of separating the Lightning from the one enabling his freedom, and Adrik… he'd chose the latter every time.

Even still…

A sharp kick to the back of his calf had him moving to at least separate the infringing criminal from the handheld pistol, and the scientist got caught up yet again between what he felt like doing at this moment and what he knew he wasn't good for.

They couldn't let the man go to run and report their position to someone more fit to catch them, not only was Adrik injured and unable to move in his crazy Russian leapfrog-flat out run pattern which normally let the man edge around armed individuals chasing him… but it was entirely possible their assaulter had the tickets for the ferry they needed.

Tickets for Mafia Land's 'day-trip' ferry, the 'price' of this botched exchange.

Not using the tickets for the return trip would significantly devalue the worth of them, meaning Verde had paid twice the amount a single one-way ticket would have cost them only to use half of both, but also with criminal inflation it meant he had to practically subside on coffee and whatever small cheap thing Adrik could coax him to eat mid-project to amass the amount of weaponry required for the trade.

Even if the actual trade of modified and manufacture illegal weapons would not have taken place, the two of them had been prepared for that possibility. This should've been the one and only meeting Verde would show up to, requiring the other side to actually have the tickets and prove it before the Lightning reveal himself. As long as they were produced and verified, a thief of the Russian's skill would have little issue stealing them off a target once the event had concluded.

However, it was raining. Not heavily, it could barely be classified as precipitation instead of a rather salty misting seeping into anything available, but there was also enough moisture in the air to make things slick and clammy without factoring in the wind or the lack of sunlight cooling things more. Their 'target' had indeed double-crossed them in the end as expected, but also brought in more muscle than either had anticipated for taking control of just one rogue Flame user.

All the practice and experience in the world would not have saved this particular tragedy of errors from happening, it was too much at the wrong moment and at the wrong time with all the worst factors in play.

Verde… still could not bring himself to shoot the instigator of this particularly bad day. He could play with the idea of wanting to, especially as it was possible that Adrik's gunshot wound would be fatal if left without treatment much longer, it was just a matter of… …it was possible they could escape from this situation yet still without murder. Death was not necessarily the only option.

"…Verde."

Instead, the scientist lit his hand with his emerald green Flames and used it instead of the weapon in his hand to render their opponent unconscious non-lethally. Through several hundred volts of electricity, and a tap applied directly to the forehead.

"…that works." Adrik allowed slowly, audibly exhausted but also somewhat wry to the Frenchman's ear. He was somewhat alarmed to note the man had somehow worked himself up to his own feet while he was distracted debating the situation and the results they both had to contend with, adjusting his patch work medical aid to reside under his flannel long-sleeved shirt. "Check his pockets."

"Adrik."

"You're not a thief." Interrupted the Russian dryly, slicking a hand through his waterlogged hair and smearing rapidly thinning blood onto his face in exchange before tightening his belt the most he could stand then laboriously pulling back on the button up shirt. "If it's not there… I'll have… to go find them."

Verde was the only one uninjured. However, belaboring the point would net neither of them anything of significant value. He made a poor thief, in spite of the attempts to educate him by a professional.

Twisting back to his unconscious target, the scientist rapidly but thoroughly checked both pockets and the lining of the fellow's clothing as the thief taught him to in order to find hidden recesses or post manufacture additions in cloth. Using his thumb and forefinger, testing the give of the lining by sliding the material back and forth.

It was one such hidden pocket, the opening disguised by a standard inner jacket pocket lining, in which their prize was secreted. The only reason they had not let this one man 'lose' the two of them in the scramble away from his more armed fellows. "…I have them."

"Thank fuck."

After inspecting them for not only the watermark but the other marks of validity Adrik had advised him upon, he tucked the tickets into his inadequately insulated jacket's pocket and rounded on the injured man next. "Now, cease aggravating your wounds."
The thief gave him a gimlet stare but did refrain from moving more until Verde had his arm thrown over his shoulder and started moving them while keeping his compromised ribcage adequately compressed and as motionless as either was capable. "Seriously... two words. 'Stop it'. Would've worked fine."

"Again with this?" His speech habits had been a on and off conversation for a while now, one he did not particularly care for.

Especially now, as everything Tatiana's medical texts had 'coughing blood' as a significant sign of severe internal bleeding to the point of advising immediate medical attention immediately they could neither afford nor pause for here. Not all of the blood on Adrik's face was there from his hand, which would not assist them in evading attention until the scientist could find them the correct dockside.

Thankfully there was enough moisture in the air to assist with cleaning it off quickly and preventing it from congealing into hard rusty streaks anywhere it spread from the injury.

Verde became more alarmed when Adrik failed to respond to the nearly formulaic argument they had repeated practically verbatim for several weeks, and even if it would cause him a headache glanced over out the corner of his eye. His spectacles were not up to modifying his peripheral view, but the ashen skinned Russian had his mouth compressed into a thin bloody line and that was easy enough to make out against shadowed walls and the dim false morning light after a moment.

"...Adrik?"

At his prompt the man grunted, then coughed out another mouthful of blood. "Not... enough... to... speak 'n... move."

"...silence is then preferable." Concluded the Lightning, well aware the other would catch on to his concern and worry easily enough. His ability to conceal things was dismal as of now, especially paired up against the thief's trained ability to note such weaknesses.

"...sure." Shifting slowly, which still caused him pain from the tightening of the hand encircling Verde's rather thin wrist, Adrik shifted so the bloodstains and the hole in his flannel shirt would not be immediately apparent to any that glanced at the two of them. Pressure on the wound was then supplied by the scientist, as it fit the 'supporting the other' visage they apparently were attempting to project.

An out of place rasp of metal against thin metal attracted the Lightning's attention, he very nearly stumbled and took them both to the ground when he realized the other man had somehow come into the possession of a small flask and was thumbing the screwed top off. "Where did you acquire that?"

The Russian merely gave him a tight grin, much as he did when something criminal he was unfamiliar with was afoot, and dumped the contents of the very likely stolen flask over the front of his jacket. It caused a very noticeable if now waterlogged scent of whisky to rise off the other man, and the emptied metal container was then discarded too easily to have been one of Adrik's possessions.

...their possessions.

Verde very nearly stopped at that realization they would be forced to abandon everything but what they had on them for right now, but the thief's knee impacted the back of his and forced him forward another step.

"No. Docks." He insisted as strongly as he could, which was not remotely comparative to how he would normally sound when correcting the Lightning's errant behavior. "Fuck anything, else. Get to the... docks."

"You gentlemen alright down there?"

Blinking a bit owlishly at the policeman that was shining a flashlight into his face, the French native nervously adjusted his hold on the suddenly silent Russian and thanked their soaked garments for whatever concealment of the blood they might give. "We are, officer. I am afraid I am tasked with ensuring my friend reaches his bed this morning."

Verde's attempt at deceptive words and a calm tone were not nearly sufficient to convince anyone nothing should be alarming, much less someone who made a career out of catching the less law abiding in their delinquency, but the alcohol Adrik liberally doused himself in gave key corroboration to convince the approaching law enforcement officer to take the statement as truth. "I see. Hurry up, there's sounds as if some gang of idiotic criminals are running around all excited like."

"As a matter of fact, such is why we are taking the backroads. Three streets over behind us there was... a significant number of very rude fellows that nearly knocked us over after checking us for whatever they search for."

Given a more immediate threat to safety and public order than two men attempting 'to get home', the older man refocused on the way they had come instead of the suspicious dark stains on the wounded man's clothing. "Damn. Get off the streets quickly then, though it sounds as if you had some good luck to get away once... better not test it again."

"Indeed. Excuse us." Even if he followed the thief's advice the best he could, it still somewhat surprised the scientist that such social interactions could be 'geared' in such ways.

He did not believe himself very good at such things, but even an inept moron would learn some small trick at a master's elbow given adequate time to watch.

Verde was not particularly robust in form, was eminently satisfied with such normally, and yet again he found his lack of physical prowess negatively affecting his current aims. Physically hauling the other man along required a fair bit of upper body strength, which he found difficult to supply while also attempting to keep Adrik's ribcage as still as possible yet also hold the highest volume of blood within the wound at the same time as the other equally important aims.

He was failing, possibly horribly given the ever-spreading dark stain down the other man's front. They were moving closer to their goal, yes... while the Russian's conduction degraded even faster without basic medical aid they still could not afford to apply on the public streets.

The only grace they had was the lack of heavy pedestrian traffic, it was a touch too early in the day for even the bakers to start out for their ovens. That did not meant there were no others sharing the streets with them, even if the third-shift workers and a few fishermen ambled along in the dark as well, however their situation seemed no different than other late-night drinkers attempting to progress home or to their work shifts as well.

Adrik was trying to help the best he could in his condition, and being whipcord fit as he was provided a significant amount of the strength to at least carry them both on as long as Verde held him adequately on target and still. It was more aiming the Russian than carrying the bulk of his weight, which fell off by increments until a nearly burdensome amount was left solely on his shoulders.

Instead of comment upon the situation, which would not assist their aims at this moment, Verde instead marched on the best he could while also attempting to keep an eye out for the ferry boat.

Mafia Land servicing ferries did not mark themselves or their docks differently, it was the ferryman's marked attire which would indicate where the vessel he manned was aimed to travel. Adrik had scouted out and pieced together rumor and secondhand information to learn of the only mark that would confirm the two of them had come to the end of their misadventure, then for suitable concealment took the scientist through the method so he could come to that conclusion as well.

The symbol in particular was actually the alchemical symbol for arsenic, embroidered in black into the cap all such workers wore, which had interested Verde into asking why of someone that would not react hostilely to being questioned. The Russian he was traveling with did not know, but the Lightning assumed the woman that did work for the island would be able to tell him.

A sudden increase of weight had the Frenchman shifting course unexpectedly, and through fogging glasses he did glimpse someone actually standing out in the misty dawn watching the two of them. Without alarm, Verde had to assume, as nothing really changed as they staggered closer. Relying on the Russian's eyesight over his impaired one, the Frenchman reluctantly let go of his friend to produce their prize from last night's misadventure.

All the ferryman did was take the tickets offered silently, examining them intently then ripping them in half and returning a pair of stubs before waving them on disinterestedly.

The cabin onboard was already half full of particularly shady looking types and given the Lightning's less than stellar combat ability, he chose to instead retreat to the far railing to lean his friend up against.

Encouragingly, Adrik did blink at him once he was situated. His tanner skin was still ashen, washed out by the dim light struggling against steel grey clouds overhead. The bloodstain was alarming, as was the fact there was very little clinically sterile enough in the possession of either to pack into the wound to staunch the bleeding.

Verde was particularly fine with silence as of this moment while he tried to think of some way to preserve the Russian's life, as long as the other man indicated he was yet alive in some method until then.

"Move."

"Ticket."

Alarmed, the Frenchman attempted to peer over his shoulder. Then he removed his thoroughly opaque glasses and blearily tried to make out the situation back on the pier without the condensation in his way.

Their ferryman was holding out what seemed to be an expectant hand, to a large group of significantly and familiarly colored toughs appearing rather heavily armed and encircling him. The captain of the boat seemed singularly unmoved by his entrapment, merely chewing on something protruding from his mouth which could either be a pipe or an unlit cigar.

"We just need to-"

"If you don't have a ticket, you're not getting on my ferry."

A pause, in which by the slight movement of what he took to be facial features and hair shifted around as an alternative method pass the man was contemplated by their rather intent pursuers.
"Damn, you two seemed to have made it in the nick of time."

Verde couldn't really help the crackle of Lightning Flames that arced across his skin, which he had to hastily snuff out as water did prove to be a conductor for his Flames especially when he did not wish for them to travel.

From what he could assume once his issue was dealt with, a thin looking male was making some kind of expression he could not make out but was speaking to either him or Adrik. "Lucky you, huh?"

"We've… got nothing." Somewhat slurred out the thief as pointedly as he could manage, rolling his head weakly to the interloper. "And, his patron… will be… rather… displeased… if you… try."

"I just want to watch the show." Claimed the other man simply enough, raising both hands in a fruitless gesture of innocence.

…what 'show'?

An out of place scrape of chains had the Lightning reluctantly returning his attention back to the dockside, where their indomitable ferryman was being assisted… by a very dark splotch of something vaguely man-shaped who had the entire group held in equally as dark chains.

"For Violating the Rules of Sanctuary, you are Under Arrest."

"Meet the Vindice." Their unwanted interloper commented idly as he shuddered at the understandable yet somehow incomprehensible tone. "Always fun to see a newish Flame user react to one."

"…fuck." Adrik coughed out with some measure of blood, back pressed against the railing rather harshly for someone already injured.

If Verde could see what was supposedly so alarming, he might appreciate the reactions of the others more. As it was, all he could understand was what his other senses were telling him.

Which was summed up as 'stay in place if you want to live'. Not particularly a hardship, and in truth the Lightning was somewhat glad of his inadequately weather-proofed glasses failing to be useful as of now if the voice alone made him this uneasy.

Which was questionable as… Verde was not one who was shy of distasteful information. If it was information, it was worth knowing simply for being knowledge if not put into practice due to whatever was distasteful. The feeling he suddenly had was at odds with his understanding of himself, possibly then not his own feeling and therefore suspect.

Were there more than just 'seven' types of Flames?

Black chains and innate aversion to oneself were not an ability that neatly fit into the types he already knew of.

…portals might be, although Viper had employed a more economic 'phase through' variant which was perceived less spectacularly than pitch black holes opening in the dock planks and failing to expunge those dragged into it to the sea below.

When whoever that was finally disappeared into his portals as well the lack of the unnerving feeling actually somewhat warmed the dreary morning, curiously.
"So-"

"Don't... fucking-"

"Desist." Verde snapped at them both, irritated and somewhat exhausted now things were marginally safer. Especially with the interloper stressing the Russian out, Adrik required rest and relaxation not some new situation which made his heart beat more and worsened the bleeding before something could be found to staunch it.

That man glanced at him, to the injured Russian, then looked back and harder at the Lightning.
"Alright. No need to get feisty. I was just curious."

Adrik snorted. "And... I'm a... fish."

"You could be sleeping with those fishes-"

"You were warned." Their ferryman cut in shortly, startling all three of them and attracting even more attention from those residing in the ferry's covered cabin. "I'd rather not have to air out my ship from the stench of your electrified corpse later."

Holding up his hands as he silently turned and slunk away, the interloper left them.

Turning to the two of them on his deck, the grizzled seaman then sighed heavily. "I'd also rather not be struck by lightning while out at sea, if you could."

...was Verde a lightning rod?

Could he survive that?

"...my apologies." Allowed the scientist slowly, not entirely certain how to prevent his recently developed nervous tick of summoning his Flames to guard his skin when surprised. The ability was highly useful as an instant guard, but if he proved to attract lightning strikes if nothing else was available to draw it off...

The ferryman likely eyed him suspiciously, or made some face he was unable to make out aside the slight movement of whatever was in his mouth for a silent moment, before moving on to the steering wheel and a freestanding dash open to the sky. "There's a first aid kit hitched to the port quarter railing. If it'll calm you down, take some supplies from there."

...what side was 'port quarter'?

Additionally, did seafarers pack a medical kit differently or in another container than the white marked with a red cross affair he was already familiar with?

(...000000)

(Saturday the 21st of February, 1970 continued. San Jose California, United States of America.)

"So... the boys and I were wondering..."

Sonya flatly regarded Vito 'Vic' Romero questionably, wondering when he was going to spit it out. Probably the smartest man in her 'class', the only reason why she was putting up with him lurking around, but it was really rather annoying he was shuffling around whatever the fuck it was so much even after getting a run-down on impatient traits of both 'Storms' and 'Clouds'.
"...if there was a point to this."

"Aside arming you with the information to make an honest go of interacting safely with any further of my type or other users you may encounter?" Asked the thief dryly, earning herself a sheepish shuffle of some feet for the effort. "I hold no ill-will towards any in the class, unless they behave stupidly."

The man had been lingering, rather annoyingly, around her long enough to the point she wasn't certain if he had a question or a concern to pose rather than attempting to 'keep an eye on her' as his Don asked. They were outside, far from anything 'important' that Cerrito might not like her in and generally the point he left her to her own devices, and she was really keen on figuring out what Renato thought was 'classic' for a date.

She did kind of need to hurry up and go change, and as lucky as it was to find a red cocktail dress similar yet different enough to not be the same one she wore to the Ball that first time was... the lack of decent footwear was irritating. She could find knee-high black boots, but they were all fucking uncomfortable as hell.

She wanted her old 'fancy' boots back... but she burned them up with Storm Flames, so unless she ordered herself a new pair and wanted to try to describe the event on how she lost them to Horatiu the old cordwainer...

...should she go check up on him?

Romania was rather far from here, and the weird old bootmaker guy in love with her legs was kind of more a civilian contact than a criminal one. Then again, he was also part of Crina's... network?

Did he count as a contact?

He didn't really have information for her, just a service she greatly liked.

Either way she wanted at least a new set of 'fancy' boots again, and probably a couple sets of 'extra just in case' pairs of walking boots, so it was likely going to have to be one of those 'suck it up and try your best' social interactions. She hated those, it seemed like she usually failed at them somehow. Sometimes horribly.

...she really missed Crina. The old bat didn't require special handling, all she had to do was show up with a bottle of something and everything was good between them for however long the thief lingered.

"Miss Bazanova?"

"Try asking plainly." Deadpanned the thief, shifting her attention back to the man. "I am not in the mood to guess what it is you are trying to get to."

"Well, you helped Matt."

"What does that have to do with anything?"

Vito was about to say something, paused and visibly rethought whatever it was, then tried to speak again before she interrupted whatever it was.

"Look. I might have an issue with Don Cerrito and Bergamaschi, and Don Vongola, but that should not translate over to the foot soldiers. Currently, I am your instructor and my job is to ensure you have the information you need to go on dealing with those like myself and not get messily murdered in the process."

It wasn't something she was always going to hold to, but on the occasions where the minions weren't key or carrying on whatever stupidity their boss was doing…

"Then why beat up half the class?"

"A gross exaggeration, I merely dealt with the outliers who refused to behave." A bald-faced lie, given she had been provoking a few to react to her, but eh. Who didn't expect to be lied to eventually? "Try to recall what I have already taught you about my type, if you would please."

"What? You're…" Vito trailed off at Sonya's pointed look, glancing around at the open pavement leading up to the Cerrito Crime Family's villa, then skeptically inspected her. "…uh, you like violence?"

"Violence does help those of my kind rather nicely." Allowed the Soviet Storm-Cloud wryly with a wicked smirk. "And, not to put too fine a point to it, the bigger guys are pretty much the only ones able to survive my ill humors as long as I am careful. Why not have a little stress relief as long as the option is there?"

The man spluttered, probably out of either surprise or aggravation for how little she cared to pick it out. "What? Why didn't you just-"

"Why should I have?" She interrupted blandly, crossing her arms and glancing down the lane to see if Renato had turned on the road with the car he promised to find yet. "It is not my responsibility to hold your hand, only to ensure you know what you risk."

"It wasn't our choice to risk anything!"

"It was your boss', and while I am understanding I am not that gracious." Sonya corrected unhelpfully. "I have refrained from permanently damaging anyone, all injuries will be healed eventually with minimal scarring. You know the basic information, if have little practice putting it in use. However, around here there is only myself and then Renato… who was not part of this arrangement."

Vito glared, apparently rapidly rethought the likelihood he'd survive doing that more than she was willing to humor, then huffed as he changed targets to glare at the road.

"Tomorrow we will review what you and your… friends have learned. The day after D'Attilio will check to see how much you all retained for reporting back to his masters. Then we will be leaving you all to it."

Sonya was, kind of, debating on stealing something from Joseph Cerrito right before they left. Just as a… warning of a type. Yes, she was a thief, but she really had no intents to steal anything until he decided guarding the villa from the possibility was something he was going to make a point of.

It would prove the asshole right, which was why it was only a thing she was 'debating' about and not 'intended' to do.

Digging through her purse, the Russian found both a new hole and her pipe. The fabric of her tote-purse thing affair was about ready to give up from the abuse she put it through, she just hoped it would survive long enough for her to find a replacement that wasn't easily snatched or had less space.

"We were always going to be fucked over, weren't we?"
"I do not believe you understand the critical parts of this arrangement." She observed dryly, sourly inspecting the empty if rather clean bowl of her pipe and wondering where the tobacco fell out at. "Then again, with how casually the entire farce has been treated I am unsurprised."

"...what do you mean?"

"The information I am giving you, and your 'boys', is expensive." Glancing up at him, Sonya had to smirk wryly again at the skeptical expression on Vito's face. "Technically, this information cost someone on your end their life. He tried to shoot me, I killed him in return. Not only that man's life, the protection of your attempted kidnapping student that saved his Tutor's life that I owe, my own interference in your 'neck of the wood', and a bit of political trading in Italy. All of that, and 'this' will smooth all that over..."

"Would Don Cerrito be... settling? Any?"

"Do you really believe that blowhard's claims?"

His expression went flat, which probably meant she shouldn't insult his leader to his face just yet.

"Discarding Don Cerrito's... continued hysterics," allowed the thief with a measure of distaste she wasn't particularly bothered about showing, "the information is closely guarded and protected as part of an entire trade. Of which, both myself and D'Attilio are involved with and have our own special rules from those entities we all really do not wish to bother much. Which is the reason your Don is 'settling' any. He might have a thing to press on to Bergamaschi, but I have a much bigger thing to press back if he tried."

Vito studied her suspiciously, Sonya merely pulled her tobacco pouch out of the many things her purse carried every day and repacked her pipe.

"At the very least, I would assume you realize you now have information which has worth if only through trades. If you will not believe me on the exact value, I suggest you keep an eye on what use your Don puts it to in the coming days instead."

A car that finally wasn't a Cadillac sedan finally turned down the lane the two of them were waiting on, which wasn't a heavily armored one either as the convertible also wasn't riding low. Renato pulled up to the curb skillfully, but the Storm-Cloud glanced back to the man who had been keeping her company instead of pointedly guarding the last hour or so.

"All I really will insist upon is the secrecy aspects. I have dealt with my own country's... awareness, I will be rather displeased to be forced to come back and clean up after you lot as well."

Vito was more sliding away from the hitman's unimpressed attention than listening to her anymore, but Sonya while amused didn't particularly care. As long as he heard her, then he could do whatever made him happy.

"You ready, little dragon lady?"

"As long as Vito here has no other inquiries to pose." Under the Mafioso's hard look, obviously the American had nothing to say. "Then yes."

(Sunday the 22nd of February, 1970. Sonya & Tatiana's Apartment, Mafia Land.)
Hanging up the receiver of his new phone, the Lightning-Storm Lackey rose to his feet and snagged the leather satchel holding his documentation and notebooks on the long-term plans in the works. He expected to be able to sneak out of the apartment without waking Tatiana, as she had a far room not close to the 'front' door.

He did not expect to suddenly be returned to his seat, a folder which he was positive was one of the long-term investments left to build itself slapped down on his new desk.

"Bjørn… mou, what is this?"

"The… Poseidon stock?" That was what was written on the folder and, unless he horribly mixed up the files transferring them to their new apartment, what should be inside.

"Poseidon's stock crashed." Viper informed him shortly, dragging a newspaper from the stack of them next to his office chair to show him the Financial section and the headlines proclaiming just that. "You should have sold it earlier this month, when it peaked at a ridiculous two-eighty per share."

Grabbing the 'offered' paper, Bjørn leafed through it until he reached the part in the Weekend News that detailed the slip Poseidon stocks had in value. Twenty-four dollars in a day was a bit much for any one investment to go down within hours, and this was from January… tenth.

…shit.

With how much he bought the shares for, it wasn't looking good. "This is why we diversify."

"Yes, but it is also why we watch the fucking market." Snarled his tutor with ill-humor, circling around the Lackey without actually having the physical space to do that in but ignoring any issues in the way. "Mou, what have you been doing instead?"

Arranging and ordering the refurbishment of an entire castle with the addition of some remolding, new constructions, and the upkeep of the grounds.

"Speaking of which." Viper drawled venomously, circling back to standing within Bjørn's desk as he fought off a cringing sense of embarrassment for overlooking the entire situation. "However did you get that kind of money?"

"Dama has a lot of things sent in to be sold off." He knew for a fact she capped out the credit limits Mafia Land allowed their agents for 'business fees' twice, to the point the island actually paid some of it back the first time and just silently took the rest of it without crediting her with it the second. He had simply done what Galina had and diverted some of that to be sold off later and for a better price through the fences, which was paying off for the additional paperwork.

There was both the 'for whom it may concern' contract and the recent 'fuck these people' contracts she had taken last year, which paid well but raised her profile somewhat alarmingly. Which she wasn't here to appreciate so it would likely come to an unpleasant surprise when she checked back in herself for new ones to amuse herself with. All the belongings of that one German politician she intensely disliked sans the books, as well as the better parts of that one Triad group… paired with the recent debacle with the gold bars…

With that perspective, the loss of this one investment wasn't staggering. Bjørn had bought them for about seventy-five Australian Dollars a share, now they were worth about a dollar at best if it fell back to the original 'stable' price before the inflation. It was steep and reduced a lot of what he had planned for the near future from 'possible' to 'incredibly risky', because metals were one of the 'main' investments that made up one of the hopefully stable portfolios he had put together, to the point a few semi-important things would have to be pushed back for a time.

The stable renovations, and possibly even the bulk of the new constructions on the grounds in Italy. That wasn't particularly hard, if somewhat behind the timetable he wanted to get the castle finished and ready by. Mainly so Sonya would not have a reason to actually start asking why things were not ready for herself and her godchild by this summer.

Not to mention the rest of the 'people' she had claimed, including the about to arrive Verde and those they might not be able to hire right away now.

"While enlightening," droned out the Mist sarcastically, letting him know that the self-claimed 'Esper' had been rifling through his head even through his Storm Flames and Lightning-rapid thought process, "I would be happier if you had made some of that… excess the old-fashioned way. Have all you been doing is fencing shit, *mou?"

"Of course not." It was just… faster-paced. Investments did require being checked, however he had let that slide recently with everything else going on. Items to be fenced did require checking themselves, but normally there were people doing the selling on his behalf and the proceeds became a respectable trickle when properly managed.

With all that going on, the Lightning-Storm had been focused on the property renovations and detailing exactly what had to be put aside when to order what value of contract he should arrange in at certain times so Sonya's absently errant stealing sprees would be maximized to supply the most when it was needed.

Viper made a tisking sound, retreating further into the cowl they always wore. "I had hoped you would evade the narrow tunnel vision of Lightnings, it seems I should ensure this lesson is painful enough you will evade any further… mistakes."

"It's not a Lightning- born mistake. Any perfectly normal human can make the same." Bjǫrn defended himself, slightly sheepishly but still strongly. Embarrassment thankfully never lingered long, but it was still galling to have a failing pointed out and be the topic of conversation.

"But as a Lightning, it's easy to blame instead." Countered the miser simply, turning their attention to the various stacks of information he had accumulated for the moment. "If you had intended to evade such a descriptor, you have to avoid all of it, mou. It's why so many freaked out over Sonya's mere presence, she wasn't particularly threatening nor aggressive enough for some people… then they got obsessed over why not."

"Which makes her aggressive."

"Exactly." Viper insisted flatly, whirling around on him while still standing in his desk. "Until you match expectations, you will forevermore be poked and prodded until you fall into those neatly sorted 'boxes'. Either own it, mou, or evade it. There is no in-between for those like us…"

Considering the problem of Poseidon NL stocks before him, and the Mist who brought it to his attention, the Lackey sighed. "Viper, is there something specific you wanted me to do with this?"

There wasn't much he could think of other than sell them and try to recover what value had been lost through different investments and the shuffling of a few others.

"It depends. Mou… who told you about these stocks?"

"An investor from England." Bjǫrn had all the relevant names and details recorded, in bits and pieces across six different ledgers covering three different topics, which would only require a bit of hunting to assemble again either by him, the miser, or a professional cryptologist. "Why?"

"Time for a field-trip." Insisted the Mist wickedly. "My last lesson to you, student. I will show you the process of how rumor and speculation destroys good information… mou, twisting something as simple as a mere nickel mine into something priced higher than gold."

"There's a nickel shortage."

"That does not excuse anything being priced ten times more than it's worth. If there was a drought of nickel, perhaps… not a shortage." Spat Viper venomously, making the Lackey belatedly wonder if some poor idiot had tried to give them the same information only to run into the miser's ill-humor when it didn't pan out as claimed. "Besides which, there are methods for investors like us… to recoup the financial losses we take on shoddy advice. Mou."

That sounded… somewhat threatening.

"I have one arrangement due to be put in motion within the hour." From the call he just had, which was alerting him one of the ferrymen Sonya somehow generally picked to be chauffeured by to wherever in the Mediterranean had the Lightning inbound on his boat.

Those ferries had limited ranges with their equipment, if it was a good day they might be able to call in an hour ahead and have their return trip somewhat filled before even docking with the island. This wasn't a calm day, the seas were somewhat choppy outside Mafia Land's wake which did give the whole island an eternal vertigo sensation.

There was a reason nothing was built higher than four or five stories around here, stormy days could likely knock anything higher over into the other buildings and into the streets.

As Mafia Land was a moving island they could avoid some of it, but every now and again they were caught out in a storm or two. At least they could avoid hurricanes with regularity.

"An hour is fine." Viper allowed graciously, making Bjørn suspicious he was about to incur fees. "Mou… as long as-"

"I need to get this done first." Sonya was the one supplying the money for his living situation and her reputation to guard his life, it was the least he could do to handle her orders before getting distracted with even someone she was paying to teach him their specialty.

"Then you need to pay me a hundred euros. Mou, twenty for every minute beyond that."

"I have to assemble the information first!"

"Get working fast, then."

"That's inflation!"

"Of course it is. It's my time." Insisted the Mist pointedly, the tattooed triangles on their face flexing somewhat over the nasty smile. "My time is expensive to waste, especially in bulk."

Bjørn was not going to win this, so to prevent 'haggling fees' from being stacked on top of everything else he wordlessly pulled the relevant files to figure out who gave him that suspect advice. There were more than enough such fees on the receipts from Viper's tutelage already, and he had yet to scratch at paying off some of the money the Mist had charged the Storm-Cloud for training him up.
He had paid a day off, but that was the start of it where he didn't ask 'stupid questions' or 'repetitive failures' which had their own little fees. Which didn't include the whole 'business suits' or 'proper attire' fees from other establishments.

It was going to be years before he could pay anything off, and he suspected there would be more 'wasting time' fees in the near future just so Sonya didn't wander back and wonder where the hell he was when she wanted more things to steal for whichever reason.
Sonya curiously peered over the edge of the convertible Ford Mustang Renato somehow sourced for tonight as they pulled in, mostly in a construction lot and some distance from the drive-in movie theater down a slight hill. "A movie?"

"Well I promised something 'classic', didn't I?" After parking on the really shifty looking dirt hill he manipulated the radio, eventually finding the station the movie's soundtrack would be broadcasted to given the 'waiting' music cut by the half of the announcement that was currently playing. "And you were so looking forward to it, too. So the basic of dates, a night out with dinner and a midnight movie showing. Perhaps a bit of bar hoping if we're still awake enough."

A good call, they probably both didn't normally do 'daylight' schedules very often and this interval likely helped neither very much. He napped as a matter of fact just about anywhere he could get in a small amount of rest, and frankly most of her work was done in the middle of the night when there weren't innocent bystanders just waiting to get in her way.

"What are we watching?"

"A 'Nightmare in Wax', apparently a 'House of Wax' rip-off with a much tackier spin." Admitted the Mafioso, adjusting the driver's seat back so he could stretch out his legs. "A passable if not particularly scary mystery horror movie from the sound of it."

She didn't particularly mind but was curious over why he picked this. "Horror?"

"Well, yes. You'd take a member of the fairer sex to a horror movie in hopes she'd get frightened and cling to you for the safety. Preferably sweetly instead of with deadly force." He glanced at her, and the skeptical expression she was probably wearing, and smirked. "This'll be campier than scary, little dragon lady. I'd rather not get my rib cage crushed."

"I wouldn't do that."

"Have you ever watched something legitimately in the category of horror before? Just to know what your reaction is?"

"Not specifically... but I don't watch a lot of cinema, or television to be honest." She thought taking a girl to a drive-in theater was 1950s kind of thing, not...

...well, they weren't all that far removed.

Renato dug a hand behind her lower back, gripping her right hip and hauling her yet again across the car seat to his lap. "Are you calling me old?"

"I said nothing," Sonya countered, slightly annoyed he didn't just ask her to move over more. Only slightly, because the middle of the night in a desert was fucking chilly and the Sun user was a living furnace right now. "Although, from what I know of this little trope we're in... shouldn't there be popcorn?"

"We just had dinner." Instead of directly answer if he had any or not, the hitman reached into the back bench of the car to pull a picnic hamper out of it to set in her forlorn and empty front passenger's seat. "Although, if we were going to recreate a horror-themed tacky teenage 'dream date' trope, there'd also be some heavy petting or shagging in the backseat… and possibly a very cranky serial murderer or late-night handyman lurking about to kill us both once we're distracted."

"Yeah... let's skip that part." Toeing open the basket first, she then shifted forward to actually reach it from her new and very comfortable warm seat.

He had a couple small snack-like things packed in the basket, a block of cheese and a few apples were on the top along with the neck of some bottled beverage. Likely alcoholic, but it seemed to be just wine and there were glasses tucked in the far back corner to drink from.

"How about some light petting instead?" The left arm she had thought was set on the window sill was apparently a hell of a lot lower than that, given the fingers that traced up the outside of her garters on that side as she leaned back with the wine and glasses.

She wasn't... entirely sure what he meant by that. Agreeing to something she wasn't entirely certain of was never a good idea. On the other hand, she had already ruled out what she felt like was a touch too much for her right now.

"...as long as you don't poke my stomach." Sonya agreed slowly, easily pulling the cork free as he held the glasses for her.

She couldn't even get herself to accept Tatiana poking her there, until she figured out what the hell that part of her should be left alone. However, it was weird the brat could touch her there and it was fine. The thief had no idea how that happened, just that she wanted it to stop reacting to Shamal and eventually it did.

As long as he avoided that, and any other adverse reactions she might have, she didn't see a problem with a bit of experimentation.

"I do not need more reasons to join you in your bed, little dragon lady." Renato deadpanned, while she was contemplating what steps might have led up to the brat's immunity from her weird reactions and concluded it was probably Shamal's frequent visits to cuddle with her when they were in the same place. "I'd just rather not cross any of your unknown personal boundary lines accidently, and that sounds like a great recipe to getting my hand crushed."

...how did that coincide with her being perched on his lap?

"Because, if anything, I'm apparently a glutton for punishment."

"...we are going drinking after this, right?"

"Oh, hell yes. I think I'm going to need a couple stiff drinks in commiseration for behaving myself so much."

The radio crackled with the start of the movie reel's soundtrack, derailing any further conversation in favor of settling in to see what the movie was about.

(Monday the 23rd of February, 1970. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"I don't know what else to say." Tatiana informed both Verde and Adrik apologetically, adjusting the IV stand slightly so she had a better reach to fiddle with his nasal prongs that were supplying his wounded lungs with oxygen. "Pneumothorax, a collapsed lung, of this severity is kind of an end-game injury. If he had gotten shot anywhere else, maybe except for a major artery, it would've been fine. But with this where it is and how bad it is... there's now a high chance Adrik's lung will re-collapse in the future even if he follows his prescribed recovery schedule precisely. His field days are well over with, unless he wants to risk it."

"I'm not up for doing stupid shit." Drawled the bedridden Russian lightly, more out of respect to his healing organs than out of acceptance or indifference.

"Well, it's also the second time in a year you've been in here."

The cut-purse security expert huffed sarcastically instead of responded verbally.

Adrik wasn't really a front-line kind of thief, anyways. His best use was from the rear, keeping an eye out for anything going catastrophically wrong or where the local police were at, or when stealth was something they could keep up for the entire job rather than being in the thick of any conflict or dust up. Now the man couldn't even risk that, for one merely travel could deflate a lung on him and for another trying to carry too much on him would equally stress out his compromised systems to the point it might be lethal.

Partially, currently, Tatiana was a bit more concerned by Verde's expression.

To be more precise, his apparent non-reaction to what amounted to the crippling of his main personal support in this lifestyle he had been suddenly and very rudely shoved into without consent.

As part of her nurses' training, especially here and dealing with so many Dying Will Flame users from all corners of the world coming through, she had gotten a couple lectures on how and why to treat certain Elements. The Sky lectures were more of a 'don't ever do that ever, unless a doctor is there' kind of thing, but the other six Elements were more useful to her.

In particular, a Lightning's general ability to not react until a split second before whatever emotion escaped their grip. She had some experience with it, but it being defined into words and terms was very clarifying.

Bjørn wasn't really like that as far as she knew, but Galina could flip switches like a pro if need be. Going from biddable and sultry to wickedly violent and sarcastic before someone could react to it. Usually by then the Lightning was entirely too close to evade or ward off, and frankly if Verde was about to snap in a similar way then she wanted to be nowhere near him.

On the other hand, she was Adrik's friend and as the Lightning was one of his as well. In the thick of it was where she had to be.

"...Verde?"

"Is your ability with Sun Flames not enough to heal the injury?"

"My strength or skill as a Sun is not really the issue." Tatiana started off slowly, taking the free visitor's seat in Adrik's recovery room for this discussion. "When a person has no Flames, it's both harder and easier to heal them through Activation. There's no innate resistance to me, like trying to heal over surgery incisions on my sister was ten times harder than healing Adrik from his, but there's also this... absent factor. My Flames only affect Adrik's injuries in increments safely, up to an arbitrary limit which is different for everyone, and it has to be done slowly. If you don't have Flames, too much at once can be worse than just taking another gun and shooting him again."

Verde fiddled with his glasses, again for the tenth time this morning alone. Exhausted and a bit more
"It might just be an unfamiliarity with Flames, or just something Adrik lacks naturally which explains why he doesn't have Flames of his own when we do." Shrugging, the nurse sighed and shifted her apparently a touch too old and broken to be comfortable anymore shoes so they would stop hurting the bridge of her feet. "For myself? I've done nothing to study the phenomena, Doctor Kappel and I have been focused more on the physical toll merely possessing Flames has on the human body rather than how they interact with separate entities."

"Possibly genetic, otherwise an innate resistance of the physical form which inhibits the ability?"

"There's been no great study into it to understand what it actually is, it just is, and the process is well documented enough to be known as a factor Sun Flame healers are warned of." One of these days, she'd get who made her little sister's boots for her and get herself a pair. Eventually. "If Adrik had Flames, then this wouldn't be nearly so much of an issue. While the complications might linger on anyways, the bulk of the stress and damage would've been easily smoothed over by even a half-assed Sun user."

The egg-head gave her a blank stare.

Apparently, that didn't help him much. "It's by factors. If you have no Flames, I can still heal you but there's still complications to watch for. If you have Flames, I can still heal you but the risks for complications are reduced. Either way, I'm still better than natural healing."

Verde glanced down to his interlaced hands, apparently just to stare at them.

"In the end, the fact you did put something to stop the air leak in Adrik's lung in place was a fantastic patch-job in situ. The injury was just a touch too serious for immediate and makeshift triage to help with much." Tatiana glanced to the man on the berth herself, ensuring the thief was still listening too. "Given what happened the fact he's alive is the best outcome, everything else is a bonus."

"Like my immediate retirement?"

"What have you been doing lately?" Shot back the Sun dryly, a touch lightly to hopefully spark any terror or bile he had been saving up to vent to someone that would say just the wrong thing at the right time before it happened. "Even when we were in East and West Germany? Stick with it, instead of find Nicolai again once he's out up until he does something stupid again and gets arrested for it."

Adrik very nearly snarled something, probably insulting or rude, but then apparently rethought everything he was about to say in a fast hurry. Likely from a couple years of following her and knowing full well she didn't put up with that kind of bullshit if it was baseless.

Shit.

"You still have options. You're still a Zolotov, the clan will put you up somewhere as long as you teach or sustain a fallback point or just supply a link in some kind of chain where they put you. Even more, you owe Sonya a bit more than a little money… and while the clan will manage it in exchange for the rest of your mortal life… she needs teachers. In Moscow."

"I banked a few things on being able to pay them off later." Admitted the bedridden Russian sourly, rubbing a hand to where he had the surgery to open his ribcage to remove the air leaking from his lungs from his body and patch the holes so the membranes no longer allowed it. "This is a rather…"
critical setback in my plans, boss lady."

Tatiana sighed, rubbing her temple. Not entirely what she was going for, but progress.

Better for her fellow thief to blow up or vent his despair at her, then at the Lightning who apparently never really had a solid friend before in his life catching the ugly side of this situation. Verde and her baby sister were two peas from the same pod, but while Sonya got herself a Cherep to buffer her awkwardly sharp edges around others it… seemed as if the Frenchman never found something like that in his.

Given her recent preoccupation with getting to know Ganauche a little bit better, she knew Lightnings as a type of personality a touch better than she did with just Galina to draw from or second-hand accounts from the brunette Russian's misadventures as a school teacher to other Lightnings.

They were all primadonnas at first. Every fucking Lightning ever, in some way or shape or form, were all stubbornly opinionated on their ‘main’ purpose in life and how to go about getting there. Not overtly, in a lot of cases it was hidden in ways you'd have to invest some real effort into discovering the nuances of, but all of them had a very specific idea of who they are and what they were going to do with their lives well before most ever thought of wondering about the same.

It depended on the Lightning in question, and what degree of Inverted or Classical they were, what they picked and when it kicked in hardcore to the point of possibly being life-endangering if they didn't get it. From there they all ended up with some kind of bullet point list on how to get what they want and what order they were going to get it all in.

For Verde, from what she had observed from sharing a domicile with them for a time, it seemed he had been allowed to devour any and all information available to him so he somehow decided learning everything was his main purpose in life. Shifting the Frenchman off that would’ve been a herculean task for any just one person, and for vague or dismal results, so it was probably never tried before it all cemented into the scientist persona he now identified himself as to the exclusion of all else.

The fact he could be a phenomenal anything with a brain like his never seemed to occur to him, it was just information gathering and learning all of it that was his main life goal. Not putting it to use in ways that wouldn't immediately benefit his short-term situation and longer-term goals, just acquisition. Everything, anything, was all about learning or studying the sciences to him and furthering his knowledge base to learn yet more.

Her sister's little Lackey decided Sonya was a good boss to have from one semi-absent interaction with her, an act of more sympathy for them both having broken limbs at a time in their lives more than mercy, then made it happen through sheer perseverance and grim dedication. Through several months of the Storm-Cloud flat out ignoring him and refusing to even consider it, across several countries and kilometers of both developed and rough terrain with little to nothing to his name, and all the way up to a situation that likely would've eventually gotten him killed for risking.

…but not immediately, but a little preteen Icelander orphan runaway would've been shipped back to Iceland with a media storm nipping at his heels if he had been picked up by the police. Which would've put him directly in the path of whoever had the kid before he escaped that clusterfuck and ended up following the Storm-Cloud, and likely ended with his death to ensure anyone else that thought they could run from whoever it was would think again.

She knew perfectly well how bad it was for Björn before he ended up in Mafia Land working for Sonya, she had access to his medical files. The teenager still gave no indication he was aware that he might've failed to follow her little sister far enough, what happened was his goal and now all he had to do was perform to expectations and his life was set forever according to him.

Galina was… she had never really been too out there as a person, either as a kid or as an adult. There had been no extreme decisions she suddenly had as the answer to her own existence or role in life, but the woman was efficient in practically everything mundane and routine. That had frustrated the Lightning somewhat fiercely, that she wasn't a great thief or just generally a key player in the group, to the point just before her very untimely walk in East Germany when her Flames popped. Which had occurred right after Adrik left them to draw the heat off the girls, with both Ziven and Nicolai already arrested and awaiting processing in a jail cell beyond their reach when it seemed everything was falling apart before it should've. With enough self-pity liquor Galina finally spilled every little inadequacy she felt she had, in excruciating detail, to Tatiana before storming out of their little hiding spot. That didn't last more than five minutes, certainly before the Sun could recover her bearings and give chase, because then two idiots spotted her and thought to have a little fun with the foreign woman.

Then Galina was another of the 'rare' Russian Flame users, who could murder with a touch near effortlessly and short-circuit anything electrical with the same ease, which the redhead honestly believed salvaged what the other woman thought of herself and her self-esteem. The fact she had a skill, a notable and priceless one at just the right time but it was just a touch hard to spot and draw out, gave Galina more than enough motivation to try turning her hand at a different criminal skill she hadn't considered at first until she ended up 'gifted' with a new purpose.

Ganauche was… another like Verde, with a disturbing twist.

He had been hand-fed his purpose in life, probably specifically groomed to be a Guardian to a Sky from very early childhood from what little she could glean from casual 'get to know you' talks, and the possibility that he would've been overlooked as one probably never occurred to the guy. To plan for or even that it could've happened in the general way life worked out sometimes, she had gotten absolutely no recognition of the possibility from their chats to the point she was almost certain he wasn't trying to hide that realization from her.

Additionally, Ganauche wasn't small fish outside of his Vongola connections. The Mafioso was equally trained to be a Guardian Lightning as well as he was given a whole lot of social connection lessons he was putting to use on her. The possibility that the 'other' training was given to be a fallback point just in case he didn't become a Sky's Guardian Element…

If it happened to one it probably happened to more and that was actually semi-terrifying to contemplate. How many other Italian or otherwise Lightnings were fed the same bullshit that 'they would be a Guardian to a Sky' when Skies were so fucking rare to begin with that it was statistically near-impossible. Then there was the possibility that some great number of others raising or training a Lightning wouldn't be aware they needed more than one life goal to safeguard the whims of fate…

Meaning when they were overlooked in Ganauche's or some other Lightning's favor they probably suffered a more debilitating mental break like Galina risked for a few utterly terrifying moments. With the removal of their very purpose in life, Lightnings didn't tend to do too well with that from all evidence she could gather.

…which made the 'very reckless' label Lightnings tended to operate under also semi-terrifying in its own way.

Of course they were reckless, what did they have to live with if they had no purpose left in life?
If they failed their main 'role' as 'a Lightning Flame user'?

Or worse, when they thought they failed only to end up attached to an entirely different Sky than they focused all that initial attention on?

It all boiled down to a very nasty situation the healer in her actually was balking against, but one she didn't remotely believe she could change or salvage in any possible way from where she was. Ganauche was… well, set in his ways like any Lightning would be by his age and entirely non-comprehending to her attempts to point it out gently. To affect the situation somewhere she wasn't involved in would require political capital of a phenomenal measure, which she didn't have.

The only thing she could do is see if it was possible to 'rehabilitate' a fully adult Lightning, and at least get the information out there so hopefully a few parents of such Flame users would balance things out against those who would use their children like that.

Tatiana wasn't really certain if that was a decent thing to do, given she wasn't really sure where she wanted her currently really causal relationship with a Vongola Lightning Guardian to go in the first place. Ganauche might just end up a good friend against the odds, or a guy she might honestly contemplate settling down with in the far future, or something even different from all that.

Bringing her work home with her didn't sound like a good basis for a long-term relationship she was maybe playing with seeking, and it wouldn't be fair to him either to base such a thing partially off her disgust with how his country treated Lightning users and her hope to 'fix' some of it.

...the next time she was home, she'd talk to Lisa about it. Hopefully her mom had half an idea on what she should do on the various possibilities, but at the very least a second opinion would be nice.

Too bad Sonya absolutely sucked at girl talk… then again, her little sister was moving there. She had to know some of the political landscape in the criminal factions in power, as just to gather some more detail to make an informed decision with was never a bad plan when at a loss at what to do.

Tatiana blinked twice, looked from the very still Lightning in front of her to the bedridden thief who had yet to say anything to each other instead of her… then sighed heavily.

Men.

"Okay, look. The both of you. Verde, it's not your fault." Holding up a hand before Adrik could spit whatever was on the tip of his tongue, she waited until the green Frenchman was at least looking in her general direction. "Seriously. Getting shot is an occupational hazard. Sonya's been shot, I've been shot, you've been shot at. We play with guns too, we use them and frequently guns are used against us. It's just a matter of time before we all get shot somewhere painful and debilitating. Sometimes it's later, sometimes it's earlier, sometimes we dodge the possibility, sometimes we just can't."

Sometimes they could fix it, like her sister's liver cysts, and more often they couldn't.

Verde didn't really give any indication of listening, but he likely heard her full well and was turning it around in his big brain so it would fit in place.

Turning on her former gang member, the Sun quirked a wry smirk for the semi-impatient and mostly aggravated look on Adrik's face. "You, you need to know you are very good at what you do. You survived and escorted Verde through that entire mess and I honestly was worried for the both of you. So what if you're now paying the price, you did it against any and all odds I would've placed on the possibility. Now, plan the next job better."
"Thank you, captain." Drawled the man a touch sarcastically, more than used to her little pep-talks and probably not seeing the humor in it right now. "Can we get on with things now?"

"I have rounds to do." Tatiana allowed graciously, rising to her feet and gathering her things to do that with. "You two geeks plan your next steps. You made it, alive and everything, so now what?"

Adrik looked back down at his healing rib cage, because with no Flames of his own and an operation that opened up the cage of bones to patch him up everything was likely still sore and painful for him, but the wiry guy actually looked to be plotting instead of just stewing.

Verde very nervously pushed up his spectacles, and kind of fidgeted in place instead of glance at the other man.

"Hey… Verde. My man, we made it. What are you going to demand out of Sonya first?"

"…any and all information on the other types of Flames she is aware of." Bitterly admitted the Lightning, then there was a semi-awkward pause where Adrik finally caught on that his friend blamed himself still. "How… I mean-"

"I have options. I swear. They're just not… not the ones I thought I would have."

Hallelujah, they were talking instead of stewing in silence.

Shutting the door quietly behind her, so as to not interrupt the manly-bonding time they both probably sorely needed after a scare like this, the nurse gave Kappel a small smile. "Finished here, doctor. Where to next?"

"Usually, types like your little friend in there tend to react negatively to their newly compromised situations." Commented the dour German idly, but marking things off on his clipboard anyways to note Adrik as a 'lesser' risk for violent reactions as they progressed down the bland hospital corridor.

"Adrik's always been able to roll with the punches aimed his way." Most scrappy orphan types were like that, she'd know because they all were if they came from that specific neighborhood in Moscow. "There was a touchy moment, but he's past the short-term now. I'll observe for future developments, but I don't expect anything too major just yet."

"As long as you are aware." Kappel commented distractedly, peering at the paperwork clipped to the wood in his hands as they moved to the nurses' station to get their next recovery patient to test for acceptance to his or her postoperative condition. "Speaking of this… I was curious to where you feel as if your medical career is going."

"…doctor?"

"Do you still feel as if you would do best in pediatrics?" Brown eyes peered at her over those damn half-moon glasses, which she was more than certain he didn't need but wore anyways for some other reason. "I require to know soon, Primakova. You are adequate enough I should pass you off to a specialist for further refinement in one field of medicine. I would rather not, as you are a nurse I find to be the most useful out of the complete passel of Flame users we have been sent and would rather you do more than become a nurse practitioner. My specialty is general practitioner, if you feel as if that is not the role for you then I likely will not be able to further your career in any meaningful way from this point on."

Tatiana rocked back to her inadequately comfortable heels, a bit bewildered at this sudden question out of the blue. "I've… doctor, I've got a stint being the school nurse coming up."
"I am aware." Drawled Kappel a touch wryly. "However the point remains it is both the role of a general practitioner as well as a pediatrician to tend to school children of ages six to sixteen, and it is experience that will look good on any resume."

"…can I do both?"

Blowing out a sigh, the German came to a full stop to turn and face her squarely while she caught up to his side again. "While having a secondary specialty is a very considerate of any physician, and all should have at least a basic understanding of all fields to recommend others if a patient requires a different specialist to handle some ill or another, it is best to start with one. Pediatrics, general practitioner, or surgeon?"

"Surgeon?" Echoed the Sun Flame nurse in bewilderment.

"You assist me adequately." Kappel insisted, high praise indeed coming from him. "And indeed, when given the opportunity to perform a little yourself you are well composed and quick even in the face of complications. With your Flames, there is the added bonus of healing any major complications as they develop pre, during, or post-operation. As such, I feel as if neglecting the option would be ill-done of me."

"I… um. Do I have to pick now?"

"Of course not. The sooner I know the earlier I will be able to assist you on your way or start the proper paperwork to formally attach yourself as a student of mine instead of a medical intern." Instead of immediately move on, as was her general understanding of what the ex-Nazi preferred to do when getting into praise which he found to be a sort of gateway to inflated egos but still something to gingerly hand out when warranted, Kappel instead eyed her with an intent she couldn't identify. "Unless, you wish to remain a nurse?"

…Tatiana just wanted to heal.

Although it was through Lisa's pregnancy issues she found her way here, and the pediatric ward of St. Julian's was criminally neglected for those like her mother who had similar issues… she could possibly pick it up as a secondary instead and get something that would enable her to remain in the thick of the hospital with Kappel.

The good doctor was not a thief, he didn't bother trying to steal the clipboard from her. He simply took it from her unresisting hands, then physically turned her around away from their next patient. "Take the rest of the day off, contemplate were you wish to go from here."

She had no more vacation time to use, but when a doctor put a nurse off shift that was that according to the hospital's guidelines. Kappel could do that if he felt she was not up to performing to expectations, and rarely put it to use so he'd likely not be questioned on why he did it.

Woodenly, the Sun absently retraced her steps to get off the recovery ward and into the hospital's main floors. She didn't really make it all that far, and Ganauche found her aimlessly staring at the same speck of discolored beige wall when he showed up for their lunch-date. Which meant she had been staring at this wall for a good hour at least.

"Err… Tatiana?"

"…I'm halfway there."

Holy fuck, she had almost made it to doctor. She just had to pick where, and then she'd be on the final phase to becoming one. Admittedly it'd take yet more years of study and patients and long nights of frustration to finish, but being halfway there…

"Yay?" Offered the Lightning Guardian warily as she started grinning, looking really confused as he peered at her with his remaining good eye. "With what?"

"…becoming a doctor." Seizing him by the face, she tugged the Italian down for a nice long kiss because she felt really good and wanted to share it with someone.

Surprised or not, and like all Lightnings, the guy was at least quick on the pickup and gave back as good as she gave. Tatiana ended up nicely breathless, feeling tingly, and smothering her semi-hysterical giggles of relief into his shoulder.

Which didn't help her breathlessness any.

"…alright. I think you need a break." Ganauche observed wryly after studying her giggle-fit for a moment. "I thought you'd be more worried, given your friend's situation you told me about last night, but I guess the reservations to that stupidly expensive seafood place you adore on the beachfront can be in celebration instead."

"Oh, fuck. Thanks for reminding me." Ineffectually swatting him on the arm but appreciating him popping her bubble slightly to bleed off the hysterics of relief, Tatiana attempted to draw in a real breath for the first time in what felt like minutes. The Mafioso very thoughtfully rubbed her back as she struggled a little with her air situation, waiting with surprising patience for her to get her act together even if that ran the risk of them being late for that reservation.

Admittedly, the crab shack eatery was stupidly expensive but she adored their salmon-stuffed crab cakes. It was something she only once mentioned in his hearing, and that was an aside to another nurse about where to take an asshole of a guy trying to pressure her into dating him in revenge for the idiotic behavior.

"I have no problems with bubbly, glowing Suns being happy and spreading the joy around." He informed her a bit saucily, a raunchy grin sliding across his face as she probably ineffectually pouted at him for poking fun at her. "But I think the hospital might prefer you to work off that… glow somewhere else."

Whoops, she was glowing. Aimless and undirected Activation had some interesting side-effect, more notably restless behavior as any passerby got a charge of stamina from her. Which in a hospital, with sick people needing rest and relaxation, wasn't a great idea.

Maybe in the physical therapy rooms, but if she didn't wish to be stuck in there for the rest of the night until it faded they should get a move on. "Run!"

"Whoa… wait up!"

"How'd you get past the nurse on duty at the front desk, anyways?" Tatiana asked curiously as they made for the basement and the one-way access to the underground tunnels out of here, skipping steps down the well-trod path she usually took to get home like most of the nurses did after shift when they weren't at a hundred percent and able to watch their own backs.

"Might've… picked up a trick or two from your little sister." Ganauche informed her wryly, gamely keeping up with minimal puffing merely and missing a couple things trying to get in his way from his left side. "Her breaking into the CEDEF office here was pretty much heart-attack inducing, but… whoops, sorry! But good for motivating the grunts into investigating the how she managed it."
"Care to share?" Because marveling over the weird and twisty turns her little sister's mind went through to end up 'crawl across the ceiling' as something entirely legitimate to do when in a crowded hall with other people she didn't even have to avoid was always fun, if also slightly exasperating.

"Aren't you also a thief? Shouldn't you know it already?"

"We develop off in our own ways after the bare basics, and while I'll never keep up with Sonya's progress… I'd rather know enough to tease her instead of just wonder."

Surprisingly, the guy was right on her heels still instead of back a way even with the obstacles in his way when she turned to see if she should wait before opening the passageway with her nurse's ID card. Well, given he was in what seemed to be 'light' duty from the injury that took his eye and developing a bit of a paunch from inactivity.

Caloric intakes for Flame users were all over the charts as it was, Dying Will Flames were a type of energy and that energy had to come from somewhere. Certain ones were more energy efficient, like Clouds and Suns, others were more intensive to use, like Mists and Lightnings.

It was possible Ganauche was still trying to work out what should be his diet for a reduced work load yet around his continued Flame usage even most of a year beyond his injury, poor guy.

"Thanks."

"For?"

"Stopping." Ganauche informed her wryly, holding the heavy bulkhead door open once she got it unlocked. "I might know what your sister did to corner me, but she's also not nearly as tall as me or has as much muscle mass. It's hard to do what she did and fit into the places she had to have been in to get around a few things."

"Well, you stick around long enough you might learn a couple more little thief tricks."

His single brown eye inspected her closely. "Is that an invitation?"

"Maybe." Darting off down the tunnels without waiting for his response, Tatiana started jogging for the beachfront exits to drain off some of her excess Sun Flames and ignoring the Lightning Guardian's exasperated shout of protest for yet more running.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 23rd of February, 1970 continued. Cerrito Crime Family's Headquarters, San Jose California, United States of America.)

Passing out the second set of neatly stapled together packets out to her classroom, Sonya paused next to the big guy with dyslexia. "If you wait after class, I will read the information you require off for you and clarify a few terms if need be."

"…thanks."

"For the rest of you, this is the last time we will be reviewing this information. D'Attilio will be testing the lot of you for retention tomorrow, and there is no second chance. You fail to learn, and your syndicate is screwed."

"You're not getting penalized for bad teaching?"
"Thankfully," she started with a nasty smirk, "there is no bonus or penalty for how many of you pass or fail. I merely need to be here and supply the information, what you make of it or take away from these lessons is another thing."

There was an uneasy shifting around the classroom as they absorbed that, and unfortunately she had weeded out a lot of the bigger and hotheaded Americans so far to the point the wiry and smarter remainder wasn't so easily provoked. Those that assumed their size and girth would see them through everything were always up to scrap with someone that seemed smaller and weaker than them, aside from Matt the dyslexic there were only a handful of bigger built but cautious men that proved the stereotype wrong.

"You couldn't have told us that sooner?" Vito inquired a bit exasperatedly as he took his worksheet from her hand instead of waiting for her to set it in front of him. "Like when we had a couple more people in here?"

"No one asked." Sonya dismissed simply, handing out the last couple of sheets easily enough.

There was only a baker's dozen of 'students' left and reducing the number of hot-headed Italian-American associates from the room had greatly reduced the amount of fun she got out of countering the ones with bigger personalities. Then again, it also left her with the ones she could teach something to and who would probably either greatly abuse or make the best of the information.

"The lot of you may have the next two hours to review the information on your own, and to discuss things between yourselves, before I start posing hypothetical situations you will need it to navigate through." The thief had woken late, because she and Renato had gone bar hopping after the really tacky horror movie and at least the hitman's snacks had enable them to go up to closing time in all the local bars easily enough. She'd like some personal time to think about a couple things, but as the late start meant she had to head straight here to make her own class it'd would have to be at the expense of easing up on her students. "I would highly advise you contemplate how and when this information would be best put to before I dispose of it for security reasons. Mister Lentine?"

She got a wary eyeing from the man, who was already trying to make out the neat type before him.

"Attempt to make out as much as you can for now." He didn't require having his hand held, just enough time to muddle through. With the lack of time she would be forced to help him, but that didn't mean she had to be condescending about it. "Although I feel as if the discussions may assist you more at this point."

She earned herself a shrug, so she left them all to their own devices as much as she could while still being in the same room. There was a chair for her, now that her class had been thinned out, but she scorned that in favor for a slightly flimsy looking side-table.

Renato's 'light petting' seemed to be just feeling up her thighs and arms, which really wasn't too uncomfortable for her. Especially as he had been nice and toasty hot, when she had not been dressed appropriately for near-desert nights. Comfortable, unlike the time that Chinese tub bath where other women she didn't know scrubbed her down.

Meaning it was really rather likely she would only be comfortable enough with a good friend to try anything... interpersonal.

With the hitman intending to dodge a few personal problems of a lethal sort soon, it meant she likely didn't have the time to develop that with him. Disappointing, because as embarrassing as it was for Renato to very pointedly lay down exactly what he was seeking from her in front of Lady Vongola it was clear cut and a solid indication he'd put effort into it as well.
Sonya dithered maybe a bit too much with uncertainty for that, but it wasn't entirely her fault. The Mafioso knew perfectly well she wasn't really great with people and tried to be politely subtle about it.

Additionally, she probably wasn't anywhere near close to the point where she could be comfortable in a physical relationship. Even with Renato, trying to think about attempting anything he seemed more than willing to try with her made her uneasy with nerves.

…also, if you really thought about it, about the mechanics and what some of that action really was about sex was just… gross. And really unhygienic.

No, she hadn't figured out how masturbation worked with this body. Which was actually somewhat alarming, because she knew she had once been able to do it as Rachel… and being fully human and female it shouldn't be all that different from one form to another.

Different, yes, but not by that much. Which might have to do with her disinclination to fool around with another adult in a similar fashion to her sister's favorite stress relief option.

Mostly, her currently observations boiled down to there was something significantly different about this body. Which was pointedly obvious, because in her last life she hadn't been able to bend steel bare-handed or melt things to their component elements and her coloring was entirely different.

She was also about half an inch taller, for what it was worth from being of average size in both lives. Her features were a bit sharper, and she'd take the thin-bladed nose over something a lot fatter even if she had better lips as Rachel.

Aside fundamentally different body chemistry being a possible contribution, there was also… well, the matter of soul or whatever it was Dying Will Flames drew off of to give it specific forms. There was a greatly likely possibility that whatever element one's Flames were being drawn from also affected one's sense of self to impress certain templates to one's outlook into something easily describable to one or two traits for people who grew up separately and in wildly different ways. It might have some influence with the differences between her physical form of now and the form she had in another lifetime.

Regardless of what was the cause, the result was what she had to deal with. Which was an aversion to physical relationships with other people, unless she was already close enough with them to feel comfortable.

…meaning at least a year or two of acquaintance was needed before she sought a relationship with someone else. Even then, she'd be back to this point she was at with Renato.

Possibly not interested in anything further, which was rather rude in a 'leading another on' about something she wasn't ready for.

Why did it all have to be about sex?

Couldn't she just have a cuddle-buddy instead?

Well, in that case she should just invite Fong back to her bed. The martial artist was just clingy enough to count as 'cuddly' but really, she just preferred Shamal's cuddling to even her siblings.

"Uh… Miss Bazanova?"

Glancing up from her lap, she curiously eyed the man she didn't know standing a smart and a bit far distance from her. "What?"
"You're a 'Storm', right? We've got a bit of a… argument going you might be able to settle."

"Ho?" Sliding back to her feet, the thief followed him back to a knot of five or so men that had surprisingly been arguing without actually catching her wandering attention. "What is the issue?"

"You'd be able to burn your way out of everything, right?" Asked the man next to Vito, hastily enough she felt there was another argument behind this one. "I mean, Disintegration is pretty limited as an ability…"

"Except for the Vindice, and you are not thinking hard enough." Deadpanned the thief. "The Vindice has a general law of 'clean up after yourself', meaning we cannot just walk through solid walls at will. We would need some set up of reasonable doubt put in place in order to not attract the wrong attention. I believe the exact wording is a Flame user is 'expected to keep any rumors or knowledge of what they could do contained from civilian or governmental scrutiny if unable to abstain from using their abilities'."

One of the bigger guys she didn't have a name for perked up, glancing once at the man who posed the first question. "So, you can do more than just burn things?"

"My Storm Flames can make me immune to poisons." She allowed slowly. "Which included medical anesthesia and alcohol, and drugs I do not wish to feel the effects of. As I am immune to my own Flames, I can also light a fire with Storm Flames and remain mostly unaffected from the resulting smoke or heat."

"…huh."

"I also know Chinese Storms who utilized their Storm Flames similarly, one to eat steaming hot food without burning his mouth and another to somehow negate friction or his own momentum in exchange for burning off a bit of energy elsewhere that will not negatively affect him."

"It's not just physical things, then?"

"Technically, energy in this topic is a physical object." Sonya corrected slowly, wracking her mind to explain that particular insanity to purely human students. "While I am unsure how actual science clarifies that, any Mist is actually spending energy to create a physical object that can be interacted with completely. Which then turns their energy expenditure into something another Flame user can then act upon, as I've burned through a Mist's Constructions several times before, yet it is merely energy given a ridged form."

Vito gave her a shifty side-eye. "So… can you burn a fire?"

"I could remove the components any fire is drawing from, if I had the security to do it in. Which would burn out what fuel it had to burn on."

Shooting the guy on Vito's right a smug look, the second and apparently a touch more inventive guy leaned back with a smirk. "So, you could Disintegrate water to supply your own air, wouldn't you?"

"I suppose." Allowed the thief after recalling her previous thoughts on the subject and the major reason why she never tried it. "This is assuming I have someplace prepared to vent the resulting hydrogen and an endless supply of water to use and am nowhere near someone that would be vulnerable to the extreme heat generating enough to be breathable would cause. While I am immune to such results of my own Flames, another would not be… and neither I nor another would be immune from a hydrogen explosion that might be caused with inadequate ventilation."

She'd probably get the truth of the matter if she tossed a handful of Storm Flames into a bucket of water, but she really wanted her own place to put a hole into if things went horribly wrong before doing those kinds of experiments.

Something to do this summer, in other words.

"So, she can't walk across the bottom of an ocean." Concluded the only guy who had been silent so far, a bit disgruntled. "Can we move on?"

Sonya considered that. "…I actually do not know if I could or not."

Technically, if she held her hands in front of her mouth and nose and only Disintegrated the water there, it was possible the hydrogen would merely escape between her fingers and she could breathe in the heavier oxygen if she positioned things correctly to drop everything else into the water. Water currents would remove the heat leaving just the factors of vision, terrain, and crush depth to be concerned with.

Propagation might also help with keeping oxygen levels up, but that ran the risk of disappearing oxygen from her own body when she lost focus for any reason. Which might not be a good idea, especially in an inhospitable situation like being under a few hundred tons of seawater.

An interesting question to explore later, at least.

Fuck she loved teaching. There were always one or two really good questions to ponder from each event.

"Who posed that question?"

"Um," spoke up the man that had fetched her sheepishly, who she had honestly forgot was part of this conversation entirely, "I did?"

"Keep thinking." Sonya half-ordered, rubbing a thumb up her jawline for a moment. "Just because someone ends up with Dying Will Flames, it does not mean they will be inventive enough to put it to full use."

"What do you mean?" Vito asked curiously, blanking his face of anything but polite interest when she shot him a look.

"Rains in great concentrations all tend to end up as sheep, no arguments and passively going along with everything with no idea how badly it looks from the outside." She allowed wryly. "Equally, gathered Storms tend to never stop arguing with each other in some method or another. As far as I know, more than a few Mists in one room tend to get into ruthless competitions in how 'best' one can 'break reality' and Lightnings end up running through everything they need to learn before they have the understanding of how best to apply it even separated out. Suns are… just too hyper for anyone else when there's more than two. Clouds do not gather naturally, honestly."

She was given strange looks by all the men there, and a couple more eavesdropping horribly nearby.

"What happens when you do put two Clouds in the same room?" Asked the man next to her.

"One will probably die." Given her reactions to both Dorokhov and the Wolfpack Gang the first time they met, unless said two Clouds knew each other beforehand and were secure in whatever they claimed in territory… and they weren't in one's territory, any situation like that would never end well. "It is possible to have them ignore each other, but that requires a lot of factors to be just right."

Hence why seven separate Clouds could interact as peacefully as they could for their types that first Vongola Ball she ever attended. They were in Visconti's territory, who had a Sky and territory everyone wouldn't infringe upon, and they all were aware of that then never did make a move the older Cloud would have to respond to.

She really needed to talk to both of them at least once more, but that had to wait until she could do a rapid and glancing shot through Moscow without needing to interact with Gedeon at all.

Hopefully, when Dimitry got back from prison, he'd be able to do something about the Sun in a method that wouldn't get him into the same troubles she and the next Zolotov clan's Pahkan had.

"You lot have an hour and a half left," Sonya reminded the entire group when no one responded, and everyone else listening in, "I am now expecting better than basic answers from all of you."

Someone in the back of the room behind her swore softly, and a vast majority of the men in the room hurried to put their heads down and review all the information she was supplying. Vito was very surprised when she planted a hand on his little end-table desk.

"You warned everyone, did you not?"

"…maybe." Allowed the guy uneasily, warily eyeing her as he shrank backwards the best he could without physically moving his chair.

At least she got some in before someone spoiled her fun.

Tisking, the thief wandered away to go back to running her mind over her current personal issues. It wasn't quite as good as the time she spent thinking in between aims during a heist, but decent enough to turn over her current issues.

There was even the possible bonus of another good idea or two, if she could coax something good out of this group.

---

(Tuesday the 24th of February, 1970. COMSUBIN Main Headquarters, Italian Republic.)

"Do you have anything else to add, Lieutenant Commander Murgia?"

Standing at parade rest in front of the assembled brass, the blue haired woman shook her head. There really wasn't much else to say, because in spite of what she knew happened and what evidence was left on her... the site of the incident had been professionally wiped.

Beyond professionally wiped, if Lalia had to comment on the situation. There was nothing left beyond her own bullets lodged in a few walls and the casings from her sidearm. Not the bullet casings from the gunshot wound she had in her left bicep which was not a figment from her imagination or even bullet holes from the gunfire she returned after she had been shot.

Even her blood was missing, and there was no sign anyone bled where she knew for a fact she had.

There was something galling about the whole situation. She would have accepted it if one of those war horses on the board were behind it, but she knew the COMSUBIN cleaners and they weren't that good. Outside civilian cleanup crews wouldn't have half the competence the military professionals would with the same materials, meaning it wasn't them.

Which left her with a very short suspect list, and she wanted revenge for this mockery.
Lalia did not enjoy being made a fool of. Reporting a firefight she got into with unknown assailants, and even had been wounded by, only for nothing to be found called not only her competency in question but also her mental state.

COMSUBIN was not a nice and shiny military outfit. They were all trained as assassins, demolitions experts, saboteurs, and snipers. The type of soldiers sent in when shit went south and little else could be done about any situation, in final and very permanent ways, yet to be set up so effortlessly and with her own assistance…

"Lieutenant Commander, I am placing you on administrative leave for the duration of this investigation." Commander Scalzi boomed out, catching her wandering attention after a short few minutes of their deliberation as easily as he could catch the attention of an entire parade field of soldiers. "You will not be confined to quarters, as there seems to be no casualties from this incident, but I would advise you to not try leaving the country."

"…yes sir."

The old and greying warhorse huffed out a harsher than normal sigh, eyeing her severely as the rest of the board got up to move on to the next issue they had to deal with this day. "For what it's worth, Lieutenant Commander, I'm more inclined to believe you. The problem would be convincing anyone else who don't know you personally of that."

Giving him a short nod, the best she could scrounge up, she turned on a heel and marched out of the hearing chamber. Having her reputation safeguard her standing to the Commander's eyes was a silver lining, but that warning about other opinions likely meant she'd be sacrificed to keep public opinion on COMSUBIN's side even if the top brass believed her side of the story.

That was probably too generous, she knew perfectly well a couple of the Majors would use her situation to further some political gambit or another. Once you got high enough in rank, it always seemed everything was either personal or political.

Colonel Frasca would ensure she'd get kicked out in disgrace if he could, which was the only member of the board she knew had motivations aside political ones.

He had hated her for years, ever since she bested his dead nephew's range scores effortlessly at the start of her military career. Had she known the situation beforehand she would've handled the entire thing with more grace, but at the time she hadn't and inadvertently insulted the dead man.

Turning down the twisting staircase leading to the general operations part of the base, Lalia turned off the path to her quarters and instead headed off to the medical bay. Her bandages needed to be changed anyway, the only proof she had that last night was not a figment of her imagination.

The angle was entirely too wide and too high to have been self-inflicted, which galling had been a question that needed to be asked and proven false. With a lack of any other evidence that there had been a firefight she had been involved with, ensuring the documentation of her injury and how it was healing was solidly irrefutable was the least she could do.

It was still highly likely she'd be asked to retire herself early or resign silently to preserve COMSUBIN's reputation. They were shady enough as it was, a scandal of one officer possibly being mentally unstable or possibly recklessly risking civilian lives when off-duty wouldn't help anything and could turn into a skeleton in the closet that could haunt not only just her but the whole unit.

"Lal! Oh, Lal!"
"I don’t have the patience right now, Corporal Grillo."

The rushing blond sniper slid in step with her, side eyeing her calmly. "I heard. What are you going to do about it?"

Lalia sighed, clamping a hand to her gunshot wound. "At the moment, wait. There's nothing else to do right now that will help me."

"And later?" Inquired her student knowingly, a sly little smirk on his face she kind of itched to smack off.

…well, she wasn’t discharged yet. She could put Grillo through a few more field exercises, and maybe a couple more where she could shoot at him fully blame free. It would be something to do while she waited for the inevitable, at least it would kill blocks of time and ensured there would be someone to kick that asshole Frasca into retirement only to take his place even with her gone.

Showing a rare amount of self-preservation, Grillo slid away from her smirk as she shouldered open the swinging doors to the sick call clinic. "Later? Corporal, you shouldn't be worried what I'm doing later. You should be more concerned with yourself."
Chapter 104

(Wednesday the 25th of February, 1970. Alcatraz Island, San Francisco Bay, California, the United States of America.)

"Would you please just..." Sonya trailed off out of pure bewilderment, giving the Mafioso stepping out behind a rocky outcropping of the sea-splashed rock she was perched on a strange look. "...what the ever-loving fuck, Renato?"

"What?" Asked the still damp yet fully dressed hitman, tugging the cuffs of his fucking suit jacket in place fussily.

He even had his shiny Italian leather shoes, and his hat!

She just palmed her face instead of responding, well aware the nosy asshole would pick up exactly what out of her head if he wanted.

They swam across the bay to do their break-in of Alcatraz Island's defunct prison, mainly to avoid the Coast Guard's routine-more-than-security sweeps and any of the occupying Native Americans from spotting them. They'd ended up on the far side of the island's north-west tip, to plan as that would likely be the less watched if there was any kind of watch going on.

Yes, there were waterproofed diver bags they used to ensure neither of them froze on this trip once out of the water. They weren't that big, and just fitting a towel into it kind of strained the thin plastic.

Sonya managed a pair of flannel cloth pants and a decent knitted sweatshirt in dark colors from a local shop, with a rather smaller towel to dry off with wrapped around a pair of flats. No socks, not even a comb for her now salt matted hair, and she had the suspicious theory something sprang a leak as it was.

Yet Renato apparently felt as if settling for something else than his usual was far below his dignity, and somehow managed more than her. A great amount more than she had, no matter how she packed everything up.

It was one hell of a swim from Treasure Island to Alcatraz, the two of them cheated heavily through most of it using a kind of flotation device, rope, and her strength to cut through the bay's currents. With all that she couldn't manage to hold onto miscellaneous things, so he had managed their 'supplies' as well as the directions here and she also could've sworn he had as much limited space as she did.

Now he was fully dressed, in a slightly creased and a bit damp full suit and had put his shiny black dress shoes back on. With both socks and a tie just to top everything off. Even his hat had somehow survived the trip in whatever he did without being crushed. Mussed, obviously a bit more crumpled than he liked, but again fully dressed somehow.

"...you are such a peacock."

Given the look he shot her for that, he didn't agree with her sentiment. "If we get caught-"

"Oh please. Who's going to catch us?" This whole situation was practically risk-free, the only real risk to them was the Coast Guard who would just accept a rather stupid 'late night romantic swim' if they were picked up. "I kind of really hate you right now."
"Lies." Scoffed the man, unfairly hot fingers sliding across her damp and chilly flesh over the edge of her pants to end up planted on her hip yet again. "If you wanted me to prepare a little something more for you to be waiting, you only had to ask."

Like she would've thought about it, when she had no idea what he was running all over the city to do while she was otherwise occupied teaching. It did explain how he got everything over here, aside the damn hat she had thought he left behind with the car.

"Additionally," outright purred the asshole she called a friend through his shit-eating smirk, the different temperatures between him and the end of winter night ocean air making her shiver as he pulled her closer and tucked warm hands actually into her clothing and over her clammy skin, "*you really only have to just say so for me to… ah, warm you up."

"Dream on." Scoffed the Storm-Cloud, slipping out of his hold with a twist and turning her attention to the rocky cliff face that stood in their way to the prison proper. "I might not often use my abilities for heat, but I can."

…and admittedly, it was cold enough she didn't really want to risk burning off her clothing in the first place, so she was going to have to be chary with that particular skill. Flimsy as damp cotton was as thermal protection, it was at least something.

"Ah well, suppose I'll just content myself with the utterly lovely view."

Given he said that while she was already started on her way up the rocks, and glancing back did indeed inform her he was eyeing her ass, Sonya figured this was going to be one of those nights. The kind of one where he felt really frisky, and anything nearby was going to be flirted with just because he could do it.

It'd be interesting to be the target of such a mood for once, even if it was somewhat ill-timed.

Scaling the rocky cliff which made up the northwestern side of the island was of little issue to either of them, and the first of the real obstacles in their way was a rather rusty and spiked tipped barbed wire fence perched on a small lip of pure rock. Renato, very pointedly, looked at her expectantly once he reached the same lip of stone she was on.

She smirked, then simply jumped over the damn thing. Easily clearing both the height and distance, without needing to use her polearms or axes. Or the damn hammers practically freezing a hole into her bicep since solid metal warmed slower than thinner pieces.

His utterly unimpressed expression was somewhat satisfying from the other side through the fencing. "Really?"

She sniffed and crossed her arms under her chest, half in mock-insult and a tiny bit for the cold but the rest of the emotion was smug superiority. "Oh wait… what was your plan to get through the fences?

Glancing down both directions the obstacle stretched off into, which was somewhat hard to see given how dark it was even with a waning moon overhead being closer to full than half, the hitman held up a finger at her before sauntering off. In the direction of a rusty and rather dubiously perched structure that took up the more western northwestern lip of the island by itself, which you couldn't pay her enough to go into without a reason for it.

Curious, the Russian did wait the ten minutes it required for the Mafioso to come wandering back on the inside of the fence with her. "…and you didn't even let me watch."
"Little dragon lady, I've got a couple ideas for you to watch instead..." Trailing off with a salacious waggle of his eyebrow, he was entirely unmoved by her flat look.

"Does that line ever work?"

"Never." Renato boasted cheerfully, as if that was something to be proud of.

"...what exactly would I be watching?" Sonya inquired next, curious over both the logistics of being invited to do so as well as being somewhat unsure about the contents of the 'loaded' question.

As well to see if he would actually answer her.

They had time, this part of the island was apparently rather unpopular at night and ensuring no one was curious over any unfortunate noises they might have caused crossing the fence was never wasted effort. Talking through such a wait was a bit like defeating the purpose, but she was curious.

There was a blink, but he didn't linger too long on her likely awkward question and instead smirked wickedly with no small amount of glee. "Well, anything you might want to watch."

More than likely the intent was sexual in nature, but she really didn't understand exactly what was being offered because there were several things she could think of that might be it. Her frustration with come-ons and pickup lines were most really didn't make much sense to her, and the rest she tended to take too literally at first... then get somewhat embarrassed if she ever did realize what was really being said later on so when someone else tried the same thing she just got irritated all over again.

The hitman's 'anything' probably really meant 'everything', which didn't help narrow down anything for her. The suggested voyeuristic escapade could be anything from watching him eat to another invitation to observe how he worked his trade again, as well as any other 'naughty' possibilities he probably meant instead.

"Do you need the specifics?"

"It would help a little..." Sonya affirmed wryly. "...but sure."

"...what."

"I want to watch."

An utterly blank pause happened for a full second, then the murderous asshole she called a friend looked delighted and entirely too amused at her admission for her peace of mind. "A voyeur? I can work with that, I can work with that very well. Where and when, little dragon lady?"

"Why not here and now?" Demanded the Russian sarcastically, planting a hand on her hip and gesturing to the rocky outcropping tucked into the side of a building they were hesitating on.

There was barely enough of a moon visible through San Francisco Bay's foggy shores to make out each other's outlines from more than four feet away, much less anything that could happen that required invitations to see from closer. The gloomy night assisted their break in by keeping most near either heat or light sources if they were awake instead of inspecting the bay's waters, making the possibility of being spotted low... until they got into the actual prison. It also meant it was hard to make out what the other was doing with any degree of precision and watching anything would be hard.

"Here is a bit cold..." Mused the Italian slowly, actually putting effort into her flippant question and eyeing their surroundings with an eye for whatever he had in mind for this. "But, I suppose, if that's what the lady wants..."

"Do what... Renato, why are you loosening your belt?"

"You wanted to watch, here and now." Given the shit-eating smirk he was wearing, whatever his offer was had a high likelihood of being either indecent or perverted.

Or both.

Rolling her eyes at the man and his frisky mood she was apparently encouraging with her questions, she abandoned the entire ridiculous conversation and him before he actually did whatever he had in mind and her toes froze. Instead she walked off in her inadequate shoes to explore where they ended up instead of awaiting his next corny line or confirmation she wasn't sure she needed about what kind of offer he gave her, because they were out here for a reason.

There was some kind of several tiered building to their immediate left and a bit of greenery to the right at the very northern tip of the island, further on was what looked to be a coal or similar kind of dirty energy plant next to a warehouse building.

Then there was that rusty eye-sore of a condemned building, asymmetrical and built more to conform around the island's odd contours more than for human sensibilities.

That all rounded out the northern section of the island, and while there was a road paving a lot of the 'interior'... it was occupied. There were a couple late-night wanderers, the Native Americans that occupied the island who were either night owls or simply insomniacs, and here or there were dots of couples taking advantage of being off the foggy San Francisco coast to admire the dim patches of starlight here or there or the distant glowing city line to the east.

Then there was a long, thin building a bit beyond the eyesore of a cliff side building they had arrived near. It was also edged right up against the cliffs to the point there was fencing anchored to it, meaning they couldn't go around it to avoid being spotted, but it was likely going through the building would take them at least a quarter of the way into the island and possibly to the jail cells they were really here for.

...that was probably where Renato got over the fence. He wasn't marked with any rust or suspicious rock dust, which... probably meant little to nothing about what method the hitman used to join her on the island proper.

Hmm...

"It's the old prison labor building." Announced the Sun Flame using Mafioso blandly as he sauntered up to her side, probably knowing full well she hadn't known that and was looking forward to finding it out herself.

Her glare earned her a mocking raise of an eyebrow.

"Shush." Sonya huffed at him, sliding her way into the puddles of dark around the few working outdoor lamps to work her way to the less condemned and shifty looking building. Renato rather silently followed along rather cheerfully for him, weirdly alright with just following her as they got deeper into the island.

They had all night. No real reason to go lightly on this little outing, as she wasn't sure when next they would end up able to do something like this again.
Of course those occupying the island had taken advantage of the beds available. Meaning the jail cells were almost entirely occupied, especially as they contained everything one needed for personal hygiene.

Sonya was not put off from her goal of breaking into the prison even if there were civilians milling about their target, and watching her slither and slide around everything but the floor as she attempted to find them an empty cell so they could finish 'breaking in' was… distracting.

Greatly.

The woman was way too damn limber. He was staring to get… even more ideas.

Of which, he was utterly certain none of them would be investigated anytime soon. Unfortunately. She only offered to watch, while that was enticing in its own right… it was probably the theme this relationship had entirely.

Renato was really just along for the ride, mostly. Sometimes accidental and unexpected steps forward or not, Sonya was too chary about interpersonal contact to be comfortable with much right now.

Of course he was interested in matching up differentiating skill sets with the professional thief she was, knowing how not to act or think like a hitman or specifically as something distinctly else helped him enormously when getting around law enforcement or even just fellow hitmen on the trail of another that did this or that hit… especially as he knew exactly how long she'd been stealing for and the fact none of it had caught up to her yet marked her out as a very successful one.

There were these sorts of 'life-expectancies' for various criminal job classes, mostly unstated and rarely actually quantified to anyone outside them. The Mafioso had been around and working long enough to know the general ones for hitmen himself, and the fact assassins tended to die messily quicker but thieves slower. Even with those facts, a girl that started near the age of ten and had worked on through a decade's worth of contracts however she went about it was markedly impressive.

Where he would've just made use of the preexisting infrastructure available to him if he was planning this outing, mainly the dock and the ferry even if that ferry was out of service since the utterly expected takeover of the island, such issues were normally easy enough to get around if you knew how to work the people involved. Somewhat noticeable, but not too alarming for the people involved, and would get them to where they wanted to go in decent time.

Sonya, on the other hand, hadn't even spent a moment wondering about any method which utilized a boat or other seafaring vessel once she learned the docks weren't in use anymore. Instead, probably predictably as thieves kind of needed to be unnoticed in their areas of operations until well after the fact to be successful ones, she thought of a low-tech but in the end elegantly simple solution to the problem of transportation.

Something that would cost them either little to nothing or could be acquired locally and not be thought of with suspicion even well after this night. Easily acquired, easily disposed of, able to do both with anonymity, and the actions of would never stick out in anyone's memory.

Admittedly the amount of what they brought along could've been expanded upon with a few simple words from him… but the opportunity to have a shivering and scantily clad leggy blonde cling to him for the warmth had been too tempting of a possibility to pass up.

Alas, she didn't behave to expectations per usual. Clouds might not be greatly known for being cold-weather resistant, but Storms and Suns were. Apparently pulling on that side of her Flames more, the lightly dressed Russian barely gave the cold another thought once she adjusted.

...meh, still an utterly lovely view to admire. Especially behind her, and even more when she was clambering up something in front of him.

Now perched on a high and mostly abandoned part of the main cell house's vaulted dead-ended catwalks, watching Sonya ghost around and over the late-night owls of the ex-prison's residents to get what she was after, Renato made note of what she was doing around which obstacle to ask the why later on.

Without some serious help, he highly doubted he'd be able to do the same maneuvers. It wasn't even just a question of strength or ability, flexibility maybe, but of temperament he honestly hadn't expected to lose out to a Cloud by.

He'd fully admit he was a somewhat impatient asshole. If someone was in his way, more likely men than a lady or two, it was highly likely that someone was about to have either a rough encounter with the ground or about to have a horrible day. Even when on the job, a hitman was more likely to remove any witnesses to his or her movements in very final ways rather than spare the effort of moving everything around the clueless civilians wandering about.

Made it somewhat obvious where and when a hitman was operating, but a risk Renato ran willingly enough for speed and security in the moment.

Sonya, on the other hand, flowed around them like water. Yes, they might be in her way and that had to annoy the rather patient Cloud something fierce as it was… but the people she was avoiding would likely never realize she was in the same general area much less close enough to lift their wallets. Which meant it would be next to impossible for anyone to reliably track her movements, even if they knew for a fact she had been around specific areas or people.

Blinking, the Sun narrowed his eyes and watched the pale smudge that was the thief closely for a second as she made her way around the ground-level floor below and a late-night walker in her way. She could almost reliably evade even his watch, mostly by accident it seemed, but as of right now she wasn't really doing a lot to prevent his ability to keep track of her.

Probably out of absent-minded thought more than intent… but yes, she was lifting wallets of those in her way. Removing what looked to be American currency bills out of the billfolds before just as delicately replacing them, so the owner would not immediately notice the theft before moving on her ponderous way to find what she wanted.

...they made quite a pair, didn't they?

Now highly amused, Renato turned his attention on how exactly he was going to get down to the ground floor to join her the moment she found whatever it was she was after.

Acrobatics weren't really his thing. He was athletic enough, but some of the maneuvers the thief made to get down there were a touch outside of his comfort zone. Especially if he couldn't see half the things she had to have used as hand or foot-holds to get down there. After getting half-towed to the island, making use of her insane strength against the ocean's tireless currents, the hitman didn't really want to rely on her Cloud Flames just to make the final stretch of this little outing.
Catwalks and... hmm, yeah, more catwalks. There were the obvious buttresses and scaffolding supporting said catwalks that provided a really flimsy path for anyone walking from a cell to anywhere else, made of gratings and metal railings which while it allowed him to easily see down to the ground floor clearly... it would also mean there was little in the way of cover from some unwary idiot looking around and spotting him trying to move.

Renato considered the obvious first, walls. There was a far kitchen and canteen affair where they entered the building at, obviously where the former prisoners ate and the prison staff cooked said food, but that would remove him from the actual cell area they were in right now.

Which was a complication he wasn't sure he appreciated.

Losing sight of Sonya might just mean he'd fail to find her again before dawn broke and they both had agreed, no matter what happened, that they had to be off the island and at least making their way back by then. It was the latest she could be out at yet still make her personal goals this week, Dante was done and finished with testing her 'class' for retention and she apparently had one last thing to pass onto her students before they wrapped up here. It was also possibly hoping too much that she would remain in place, because evading discovery might just be needed and if he didn't know she had to... they could miss each other too easily as it was.

However, backtracking was his best bet to getting down without causing himself some kind of injury in the middle of the attempt and wasting time and Flames.

Which, if it happened, he was somewhat positive the damn Russian would never let him forget for the rest of their natural lives if she caught on.

If he didn't go down the far wall well outside of this little 'cell block', that left the 'main' cells in the middle. Yet again three floors total, there was both more people and more dubious methods to get down by.

The three free-standing 'walls' in the middle, with corridors of cells lining each on both sides, that made up the middle of this jailhouse was packed with the sleeping occupying Native Americans that had taken over the island as another Reservation. What looked to be a far recessed line of ground cells nearly invisible from his current position on the ground floor, a jutting line of more cells built out in an inverted V-shape on top of them, then the highest line of cells jutting out from atop them yet ensuring his sight lines were most disagreeably fouled and getting spotted could come from any corner.

That made climbing directly down off the highest wall-mounted catwalk he was perched upon a dicey proposition, even if Sonya apparently found next to no issue going down that way.

As he had no desire to be shown up in his breaking-and-entering skills, even to a professional thief, Renato was highly tempted to go down the same way. Somewhere she couldn't watch, if only to earn another exasperated glare and that would allow him to use yet another cheesy pickup line to get her to actually straight out glower over again. Which hopefully would also get her more used to being flirted with.

Eventually, equally as hopefully, she'd actually get a clue and realize it when other people flirted with her without someone needing to club the woman over the head with the painfully and brutally obvious. He wasn't going to hold his breath, the fact she now listened to him flirt with her was honestly decent progress he was utterly fine with. Why cheesy and tacky worked when everything else hadn't said volumes, about what he wasn't sure of yet.

Besides, that was kind of aiding the opposition and Renato was enough of an asshole to be ambivalent over encouraging that possible end-result.

Apparently finally finding what she wanted, the thief on the ground floor looked up to ensure he was watching then pointed out whatever kind of cell she wanted for them before entering it.

Cell block D, ground floor. Because of course this wouldn't be simple enough. Getting out again would be interesting, especially if that was near when everyone here would start to wake up.

The only bright side was that there was a wall instead of an opposite line of cells to keep in mind and said cells the little Russian finally picked were apparently undesirable enough to be limitedly populated.

He examined the far wall facing cell block D skeptically from his shadowy corner instead of immediately move to join her. There were the bars one would expect penning in the windows, which would provide a kind of handhold that wouldn't be too objectionable if the shadow of a fully-grown man climbing down them wouldn't give him away…

...now if only the damn Storm-Cloud hadn't picked a cell more than halfway down the damn building.

He was going to have to backtrack or go around for a different entrance, because he didn't feel confident enough to pass by the cells on the ground floor without giving the game away if just one person looked up at the wrong time and he couldn't just kill anyone that did so. Sonya could by copying a damn monkey if she wanted, he was just going to have to get creative if he couldn’t figure out exactly which cell she picked to wait for him in once he was down there.

Cell block D had the solitary confinement cells… it was highly likely the blonde woman was currently in one. Apparently, she decided with the lack of prison guards to contend with she wanted to get into the most secure part of Alcatraz to 'escape' from.

Humans as a type didn't tend to like occupying such places… maybe he could convince her to take a momentary break to 'warm' her up. Besides which, not 'letting her watch' again would earn him a dirty look and possibly open that conversation back up about what she asked to see from him.

A very odd game of chicken they were playing with that. Sonya might have her suspicions but until such time he confirmed it she might actually get curious enough to just stay and watch, but one Renato could almost not lose.

(Thursday the 26th of February, 1970. Neuchâtel, Republic and Canton of Neuchâtel, Swiss Confederation.)

"Do not leave this city." Viper demanded shortly, earning a confused but accepting nod from the Lightning-Storm Lackey he'd borrowed from Mafia Land.

Bjørn's fingers twitched over the dossiers the Mist had given him that he had barely just cracked open, just seated in a 'borrowed' office desk to pursue the information and pick out who's life they were going to ruin for losing him several thousand Australian dollars on a bad investment. "Do you need any of this?"

"No." Adjusting his cowl, the Esper ran a skeptical eye over the Mist Flames lacing the space to ensure it was safe enough to leave the young man at his own devices. As long as the Lackey was smart about everything, not even the cleaning staff should bother with this room until he took down the Flames embedded in the walls. "Mou, you need to figure out which idiot gave the poor advice you fell for and only that. As long as you focus on finding our next mark, I can at least ensure you remain in one piece while I take care of... other business."

He was more or less sure Sonya would be highly unamused at someone or something breaking the Icelandic Lackey at this late date, given how much money she had poured into the Mist's pockets to shape him into her personal investor and money man. However, being the only and recognizable assistant to Mafia Land's sole Cloud Flame user made the young blond man highly visible in the right circles.

Very specific, and very dirty circles. The ones the Icelander didn't yet know how to swim within and they were in Switzerland to start teaching him.

Given what Viper was hunting, and the fact Björn couldn't be easily 'disappeared' without attracting a lot more attention than any self-respecting Mist would court to preserve operational security, the other made a respectable distraction for the last few details he needed before investing in some heavy-duty backup.

As long as the Lightning-Storm stayed in place.

"...is that all I'm doing?" Questioned the Lackey obediently when the Esper lingered just long enough to encourage questions to be asked.

"Of course not, mou. However, it's all you need to know and concern yourself with for now."

Smirking as he accepted the fifty euros the Lightning-Storm handed over with a highly unimpressed look, Viper slid the bribe into a dimensional pocket for later sorting. "My own business, something which your patron has promised to assist with in exchange for taking the time to train you."

Björn heaved a pointed sigh, then actually fetched out his wallet to make an even bigger bribe for information. Two hundred this time, a respectable amount to top off the fees he had already charged the other for his 'assistance'.

"There's a group of Mists, and associated idiots, who thought they could hide a mark from me.
Mou... very nearly got away with it too, and I intend to show them the error of their ways."

Suspicions and only rumors of collusion weren't nearly enough in this situation.

If he was going to nail some idiots to the wall for trying to 'disappear' his target and costing him the hefty bounty price, the Esper wanted to be more than sure he was targeting the right idiots and had an estimation on how much push back he could expect afterwards. As well as any associates or allies he had to evade or otherwise manage to not be hostile to him… or wipe said allies out before moving on the main target.

More information was needed, less targeted than just investigating the actual culprits and more general lay of the land details.

Even if he gave up the reputation he lost on that botched job as just the consequences of overreaching, there was the possibility some enterprising Mist stumbled upon a way to hide someone from Viper's Thoughtography. He wanted to know not only the process but how to evade another situation like this… and the money. Especially the money, for both the job and the not so inconsequential bonus for acquiring a location quickly.

If he were going back to offering the ability for sale once again, he needed to ensure another mark wouldn't be hidden at the wrong moment. Cherep had taken the ability in stride, actually almost indignantly for the easy-going Cloud because Viper never made mention of it before getting sick, meaning it was a good possibility he had marketed it to the wrong pool of customers. Making mention it was just a 'Mist's twisted sense of privacy' instead of being overly invasive gave evidence that those more used to his Flame type would accept it as another skill to make use of easier… possibly.

If a Cloud, when another made mention of his type's typical habits, thought little of Viper's ability as something to object to… then other Flame users that were used to Mists would likely see it as useful instead of something to lethally inconvenience him for. Now there were actually Flame users working into positions of power again, or at least into positions where they could advise those in power, perhaps his slightly unusual Esper ability could be profitable to make use of instead of cost him connections.

Before the stuntman said something, Viper had just been after some revenge and a little bit of extra money he could swindle out of everyone available during a bit of a dry spell in jobs for information brokers. Rather, a widespread lack of acceptable jobs for information brokers.

Now he was not only after the money to make up for that botched job, but also whichever unlucky puppet that stumbled upon a way to hide people from him.

Even if there was work he could take that might pay equally as well or take less effort these days. Work was picking up again, equally as many suicidal and shitty contracts as there were survivable jobs from more respectable powers but all were becoming more lucrative to the point a freelance information broker could survive off them again.

There were things he could think of to make use of that information on how to hide someone from another Mist for and removing someone able to hide future marks from the miser was mere prudence before attempting to sell the ability again.

Drumming his fingers on the desk, the Lightning-Storm scanned the nearby files provided by the building they were 'technically' camping out illegally in before glancing back to the Mist. "Should I maintain a safe bolt-hole until you return?"

"...it would be appreciated, mou." Viper admitted lowly before he stepped between what was and what wasn't to start in on his own work for today.

He wouldn't need to teach the Lackey to secure his living area, apparently Russians had their own standards for setting up a safe location to use as a staging area. Adding Mist Flames could always be done after the basic grunt work was over.

Bjørn learned to do it by watching Sonya's process of making a small staging area to work out of while he was learning the ropes of being a thief's Lackey. Appreciatively paranoid or not, the Soviet woman apparently hadn't spread the method to her brother as well. Which was the only aspect about the previous skills Bjørn had before coming into his tutelage the Esper would credit the woman with, otherwise he was holding her brother's less meticulous habits against her.

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 26th of February, 1970 continued. Wo Hop To Triad controlled hotel, San Jose California, United States of America.)

Dante hadn't taken Bazanova's disinclination to socialize with him right after being introduced personally, with Clouds it was rarely if ever personal unless you made it that way or they were pissed
Indeed, practically the moment he was finished 'looking over her shoulder', and a suitable distraction happened the night before to put her in a good mood, she actually designed to notice him as someone more than 'that associate guy with my boyfriend that happened to be around'. Over breakfast that wasn't this Triad hotel's complementary morning fair or something he had to source himself, which he was fully aware was more their dinner than something eaten after waking up.

"D'Attilio, have you noticed a kind of 'clumping' situation when too many of the same kind of Flame users group up together?" Asked the blonde curiously, after peering at him blankly for a whole second obviously trying to recall his name. "As in too many Rains in one group forget just because they can debate an issue calmly that doesn't mean everyone agrees with them or their views on it?"

"...now that you put it into words... limitedly." Allowed the Italian Mafia School instructor slowly, attempting to parse through previous interactions with some student groups that approached him for mediation purposes. "How did you notice such a thing?"

It was part of his duties, ensuring agreements reached between students would be held to and the consequences of not doing so were apparent to all parties as well as the other Instructors, but he dealt with either a class at once or limited groups outside of scholastic hours.

"Before the Moscow schoolhouse was bought and things resituated into a whole, Soviet Flame users were trained up in their own groups situated far enough away from each other to prevent... headaches."

The dry way she stated the history of her school's pre-establishment days made him crack a smirk, because even when left to their own devices a limited variant of her 'clumping' habit tended to happen even in Mafia School's student body. To 'prevent headaches' that came from dealing with a Flame type that didn't correspond to another user's was almost word-for-word the excuse he heard about why they had to break up larger groups before they could cement into place.

"We didn't exactly notice right away, but I sure as hell noticed when the Rains became kind of an island of non-progress nor interactions when even the Storm group fragmented apart due to internal conflicts and got kind of absorbed into the Sun group's cheerful optimism bullshit that turned into some kind of living thing. The less said about the Mist group the better. Only Lightnings do decently well in large groups of their own, if a bit hasty with everything they do."

"I don't have personal experience beyond limited coincidental happenings that might be what you've noticed," allowed the Etiquette Instructor thoughtfully after swallowing his next bite of bagel, "but I do know we're encouraged to prevent more than five of the same type of Flame user students from grouping up together. There's probably something factual the older instructors could supply in answer for why those rules are in place."

Being able to point her in a direction was sometimes just as good for Cloud Flame users as having the information they wanted, which also had the benefit of earning him credit for being at least knowledgeable in what topics she was interested in asking about even if he didn't have all the answers.

He hadn't required Renato's assurance that she'd get around to talking to him eventually, Bazanova wasn't the first Cloud he ever interacted with. The fact that she was probably the first Cloud a number of loose international Flame users beheld before interacting with Italian versions probably explained a few curious happenings that reached back to him in an enclave as sheltered as a Flame school for baby Mafiosi.
It was curious she hadn't been nearly as hostile while he was carrying out his responsibilities, especially as it implied she would not handle her own to standards. From what he knew from the rare few young Cloud Flame students, they hated that something fierce.

The fact she was older than his lone Cloud student or the others in Mafia School as well as something beyond just another Cloud likely explained her disinclination to hold it against him personally.

"No personal experience?" Questioned the thief in question a touch skeptically, which was attention grabbing in its own way.

"Nothing I can share without compromising my students' personal privacy." Amended Dante as calmly as he could.

She stared at him flatly for another moment, obviously displeased by his ducking of her question even if it was a valid reason to. Renato, the utter asshole, cocked an eyebrow in pointed disappointment but kept silently nursing his coffee on the other side of the small hotel table laden with breakfast food the man hadn't touched yet.

...right, not just a Cloud. Storms would be highly displeased at being denied information they were seeking, especially if it would aid their own responsibilities in some way. If he actually had such information or not was immaterial, he already confirmed he might've noticed something like she was wanting confirmation for so not telling her was risking her temper. Especially if she offered some information in return only to be denied.

"I'm rather young for a Mafia School instructor." He informed her with blunt honesty to make up for pigeonholing her somewhere she didn't entirely fit. "I've only taught two years of students so far, of which none have graduated yet, and none of them I will compromise the safety of by carrying tales to someone they might need to interact with at a later date."

She blinked, apparently not expecting an admission of inexperience from him. That really didn't speak well of any other Italian Mafiosi she might've interacted with beyond those from Vongola or Sinclair himself, or it could possibly be a cultural difference between expectations of age and experience.

Dante wasn't old, but he was in his mid-twenties only a few years shy of Renato's age yet apparently older than her by equal or more years. Frankly, before ending up in Mafia School barely two years ago he hadn't ever expected to be an instructor to students at all in his lifetime.

If a Russian actually expected him to have more experience, and be firmly in place long enough to have former students... and she was younger than him...

As well as a 'Soviet Flame expert'. One already published and well experienced enough to catch such issues as their current topic of discussion.

An incident of tempting the wrong individual to gain her desired knowledge was less infuriating to a Storm than setting up the exchange appropriately only to be outright refused for arbitrary reasons. Which wouldn't exactly mesh with Cloud habits of accepting the direction as just as good as the information itself for simply putting forth the effort.

Renato had warned him, it was really his own fault for blindly walking into the issue without adequate thought.

Apparently, the Soviet Storm-Cloud was equally as unsure what the right response from her should be as he was himself. A moment more of scowling at nothing, then she shrugged the whole incident off as she returned to eating her yogurt.

He wasn't sure if she'd keep his failure to be helpful in mind for eternity, or eventually just assume it was an Italian thing. He also wasn't sure if that thought was galling or not.

"Smooth," mockingly observed the other Mafioso over the rim of his coffee cup, "real smooth, Dante."

He flipped the other man off, chagrined and a bit irked at his inability to peacefully interact with a full-grown Cloud as well as he could with younger ones. Even if there was only been one young Cloud in Mafia School right now he interacted with to judge other Clouds by.

"So," she changed the subject before he could adequately respond to his fellow associate's needling, gnawing somewhat absently on her spoon as she pondered the last of her breakfast but gently as it couldn't resist gaining teeth marks, "what was your verdict on my efforts here?"

"More than adequate to ensure no one should complain once we're back in Italia again." Not that Dante expected everyone to be happy with the outcome entirely, but the easier methods by which to annoy the Storm-Cloud was snipped short by Don Vongola's insistence on him double-checking against their own standards.

Her cutting down the class size she had been given by literally beating up the dregs and tossing them out on their asses wasn't something he intended to include on any report he had to make but mentioned to at least a handful of Dons he knew of who would ensure Don Cerrito's bitching remained in his little corner of the world. No one should be all that surprised at her response to be given an entire class of the less than respectable members of the American famiglia and allowing them to crawl back if they wished was more than he could've said about how he'd handle the same situation.

The mere fact there had been enough of a class size to review information with at the end was impressive enough as it was. Fifteen people surviving meant she hadn't been intent on chasing off the entire class.

"What is your 'one last thing' to do with them?" Inquired Renato lazily, from appearances more interested in refreshing his drink from the pot on the table than the answer if one wasn't aware the hitman was asking at all meant he was greatly interested.

A lift of her shoulder was the first answer as she swallowed her bite of granola laced yogurt. "I wanted to see what they know of Flame users before the incident with all us European ones."

"Americans? I can save you the time, nothing."

"Stereotypes, Renato." Mocked the younger woman back dryly, ticking her spoon at the man in rebuke. "And exactly. Anyone with half a brain cell would know if you popped with Flames in Europe or the Eurasia Continent you have to join up with the Mafia just to survive... but that doesn't hold true here simply because the States doesn't have a highly networked underworld that spreads rumors of their passage further than they can run."

From the slow blink the other Mafioso gave, he didn't quite see it the same way. Instead of actually say that to a woman called an 'expert' on the topic, he instead boldly stole her scarred spoon to try a bite of her breakfast. "Whatever you want, little dragon lady."

"I've completely lost a mid-aged Sun, who was not a fan of the Mafiya at all. I know he wasn't killed near us, I know exactly how many Flame users die in Moscow or the surrounding area through the reports the Mist group seems delighted in burying my office in." Allowed the thief wryly, skeptically eyeing the spoon returned to her dismally then the remains of her breakfast before abandoning both for preparing her tobacco pipe instead. "That doesn't mean he is dead, but that he did escape Moscow perfectly well even after being outed as one before anyone might've caught him. Getting away from us isn't all that impressive, no one was interested in going after him, but the fact he tried at all is rather suggestive of what older civilian Flame users would do instead of conform to expectations if they gain their Flames later."

"I wasn't objecting to your idea." Refuted the nominally asshole-ish Mafioso rather simply, finally picking out what he wanted to eat now he knew for a fact it was all safe and both Bazanova and himself were showing no ill effects. "It's an interesting thought, but if they get this far don't they deserve their freedom?"

"You think I'm doing this to trap others?" Countered the thief sarcastically, curling up in the armchair moved over to the table for just these kinds of meals that just so happened to occur with them all in the suite at the same time to wait out Dante so she could indulge herself. "Hardly."

"So why ask then? Just to know?"

Bazanova remained silent for a long moment, more than enough time to pique the curiosity of both Mafiosi she was seated with. "There's two variants of Dying Will Flames. Of Sky, and Of Earth. But you never hear 'of Earth' Flame users anymore."

Renato looked entirely skeptical, but Dante made a surprised sound he didn't intend and got both of their attentions rooted to himself.

"The Simon Famiglia."

"Who?" Demanded the other Mafioso shortly, utterly confused and per usual highly irritated he had no idea what they were talking of.

"Ancient history, ancient Vongola history." He offered then corrected himself quickly before the hitman decided violence would 'encourage' the information he wanted to correct the long-loathed 'ignorance' he might suffer from. "The Simon Famiglia were once allies of the Vongola Famiglia near the start. They were the only known Earth Flame using set in all of Mafia history I ever managed to read. But, Miss Bazanova, they're dead. To a man, they were all dead before Primero and his generation handed things off to Secondo."

"Only one set, out of the entire world?" Refuted the thief blandly, barely blinking over the information few would ever know being presented and instead poking his assumptions full of holes. "Where did they come from? Where did the Earth Flame user gain his Elements from? Are there opposites like an Earth Flame is to a Sky for the rest of the Elements of Sky?"

Dante... didn't know.

"Out of the entire world, there's only a few sections of which might be the likely candidates for where they might've come from... if we can exclude Europe as too well known. A hundred or so year drought in Flame users, which social group have been reduced to the point even the mafia wouldn't hear a whisper of it anymore?"

"Native Americans... Africans? The Ottoman Empire's remains... or the remains of the Aztecs and other such far off tribespeople." Grimly concluded the older hitman, looking slightly put out at this discussion happening between two of his associates without having any idea of the topic himself.
"That's why you weren't remotely upset to learn Alcatraz was occupied by Native Americans right now, or that we'd have to work around them. You could've said something about wanting to see if there were any Flame users in that group, little dragon lady."

"Initially, that wasn't the plan. I wasn't bothered because they wouldn't be the ones to catch something like us, and it's not necessarily Native Americans that are Earth Flame users. They're just... a not-known quantity to anyone in the mafia." Admitted Bazanova simply with another shrug, cradling her prepared pipe instead of immediately light it. "I only thought of it when I was waiting for you to join me in the solitary cell, and by then I already knew no one there had anything of note."

"That doesn't really explain how the Simon Famiglia ended up respected friends of Vongola in the era of Primero, or why another hasn't been found in the two hundred and some years since the last known Earth Flame user and his Famiglia died."

His counterpoint barely gained a reaction from the Soviet Flame expert. "I'm merely interested in confirming or refuting my theory. Either way it comes out, I still gain something from asking the question. And if not Native Americans, or Canadians or South Americans or even Pacific Islanders, then that means there's parts of Europe and Eurasia that require a harder look or three or Africa might just be it... but that is way too hot for investigation."

He rubbed at his jawline, dubious if anything could be found at this late date. "They might all be dead and gone, not somehow living under the suspicion of any Mafia associates in the world."

"Or they might've carved out their niches well before any late comers tried to pry in after them."

"...I'd be interested in the answer, if you find any Earth Flame users." There were a couple others that might equally be as interested-

"No." Refused Bazanova flatly, instantly. "If I find them, alive, I will be telling no one. Unless they're long dead, but if they are alive and don't wish anything to do with this day and age's mafia I will not be the one to try changing their minds."

Blinking at the utterly abrupt and entirely unexpected shutdown of the topic, which wasn't something he had thought while there was an ongoing exchange of information... ...this was because he hadn't managed to answer her first question, wasn't it?

Was it?

It wasn't entirely a certainty, as it could equally be her Cloud instincts rebelled at the mere thought of clipping another's wings even accidentally. Storms would be that petty to refuse someone something in the same vein they were denied.

Unable to decide which it was, or if it was less personal than Flame related as something professional she honestly didn't intend insult by, Dante let the conversation be derailed without protest. He had no right to the results of her research, nor was there a reason she'd offer that kind of information to him for free.

"I've got one last question, if I may." Dante interjected before getting up from the slightly makeshift kitchen table affair they had, as today was his last day with the two of them.

He had a flight out later tonight, and the two of them would do whatever was next themselves, so the opportunity to pose his lingering question before he likely never saw them together again. He spent most if not all his days in Mafia School, while Bazanova might visit for scholastic reasons as she was currently and was about to be a former principal of another school... Renato never would.
"...shoot?" Offered the Russian uncertainty after studying him for a moment.

"When's the wedding, and who do I have to murder to ensure am I invited?"

Renato shot him a blistering glare, but the woman merely blinked at him curiously. "I'm never getting married, why ask that question?"

Both Mafiosi glanced at her blankly, exchanged a set of looks, and Dante decided he had probably pressed his luck more than the Sun Flame using hitman would appreciate for at least the rest of the year when the man narrowed flinty black eyes on him as he fully scowled.

Maybe most of next year, as well.

No wonder the other Mafioso was so handsy with the woman, and that was before he learned she had no intention of commitment to anyone much less him. It was going to be worse than how Renato was around Nataline while the two were dating, wasn't it?

Then again, they were all young idiots that far back. He had to have grown up just a little over the last decade or so it had been since then.

He glanced at Renato's somewhat conflicted but also somewhat insulted face then decided he probably wore out his welcome here and turned to her just to give her a crooked smile. "My thanks for your hospitality, Miss Bazanova. I'll get out of your hair now and settle things for you in Italia."

"...sure."

(ooo000ooo)

(Thursday the 26th of February, 1970 continued. Cerrito Crime Family's Headquarters, San Jose California, United States of America.)

A fully-grown man, not to mention a self-made man and associate of the Cerrito Crime Family, should not fucking pout.

Vito half-heartedly glared at Matthew Lentine, but not really able to put much heat into it given the conversation topic.

Now the guy knew his reading disability was even limitedly known of and there were ways around it, he had gotten into crossword puzzles on the advice of their temporary instructor in hopes of raising his reading level and try for his GED. A General Education Diploma, America's equivalent to Europe's General Certificate of Education O-Levels, which to be fair the guy needed for practically any kind of honest work.

Which, weirdly, the Russian bird hadn't needed an explanation for when Matt informed her of his future aims and possible plans.

Made sense, in a way. She was in the career of education, she should be familiar with the terminology.

...still kind of stuck with him as a bit odd a girl from Soviet Russia was familiar with the United States’ education system to not need explanations for alternate education paths.

The fact Bazanova was leaving made Matt not happy the only one to know of and identify his disability was going to be hard if not impossible to speak more to if he found another issue he wasn't sure how to get around or wanted to speak to someone that knew anything about it.
"I only suggested crossword puzzles because they are more involved with problem-solving parts of the mind than just reading a book. More likely to pay off with a tangible reward quicker than just finishing a story itself in spite of the issue." Admitted the blonde haired and grey eyed woman blankly, looking up from the badly tattered if still somewhat new book of crossword puzzles the man showed her. "Which, again, there is nothing wrong with you aside a kind of processing information error and this showed you that full well. Suppose it worked just fine, I guess."

The big guy shuffled his feet sheepishly in front of her like the student she treated them all as, but from what the man had said before this little meeting upon their 'graduation' from her class the possibility of something he could do to prove his detractors wrong had been a bit more than just tempting to him.

"No, I don't know anything about American Flame users." Vito informed the woman flatly to hopefully hurry this whole 'meet and greet' thing up, which earned him no kind of appreciable reaction as she returned to inspecting Matt's progress in his book of word puzzles.

"Not really surprised. You are all imports, not Natives." With a sigh, the slim lady handed back the bound bundle of papers to their owner before glancing boredly at him. "What with the 'required' traceable Sicilian blood La Cosa Nostra require to be 'acceptable' as associates? The possibility you had any idea of what I wished to know was so low to begin with that I very nearly never actually posed the question to you. I have time though… Renato's being weird, and I do not feel like dealing with that right now."

That was… actually really insulting. "You think you can find someone that could answer the question better than actual Americans?"

"Actual Americans are the Native residents the 'White Settlers' and Pilgrims kicked off their own damn land, that name has been mutated from what was 'original' almost no one else can accurately claim to be actual Americans without a lot of asterisks behind them." Pointed out Bazanova dryly without any sign she was aware it might be a sensitive topic, stretching out her spine and not remotely looking at either man that actually did bother to see what she wanted from them today. "So… yes, actually. I merely need a reason to actually speak to a Native American medicine man, or perhaps their elders. Without violating Omertà at the same time… somehow."

"The 'original' Native Americans weren't bands of peaceful hippies dotting the land," Vito refuted maybe a little pointedly, "more than most were war-like bands of roving family groups turned tribes. They barely had a system of writing or any publications, fought against each other insistently, no structure for disaster relief when their numbers were ravaged by diseases-"

"That could apply to the Dark Age of Europe's near fall to the Black Plague. The Spanish Flu." Interrupted the thief flatly, glancing up to the bright afternoon sky probably to judge the time and how late it was getting. "The justification of Rome's conquering of everything they came across until it fell. The Crusades, so on and so forth. Just because they lost their lands and did not entirely survive being conquered with their culture intact is no reason to devalue them as a people, and the fact they have not violently thrown off the hostile occupying culture actually makes them stand out a little from historic examples regardless of why. Introducing virulent strains of diseases into what amounted to untouched populations who had no immunity to any variant of it will always ravage a population until the survivors develop the resistances. Judging them by European standards side-by-side does everyone involved a disservice."

"I think we, or the Pilgrims and later settlers, would have noticed Flaming Native American warriors if they had any Dying Will Flames to them. Something would've been noted about it somewhere, that's not easy to miss."
"Unless the diseases that ravaged their number took the small percentage of Flame users they had before open hostilities started. There is never really a whole lot of us, even if we are highly visible in ways, not even in Europe. I recently ran across what happened to a faction of the Triads that attempted to fight European Imperialism near-openly against the Laws." She shrugged a shoulder almost lazily, but at least remained on this topic instead of going back to the other one. "There's several possibilities as to why they would not have used such abilities equally as openly, which include the Vindice or a variant of the Laws as just one, rather than simply 'they have none' or 'they are all dead'."

Matt slapped his rolled-up paper book in his hand a few times. "If… there's not 'many' of you…?"

"...the information I taught you is likely never to be of use in your lifetime without a major happening to shake up the former 'standards'." Admitted Sonya blandly, actually looking at the big guy straight on instead of stare at the sky more. "No one in Europe or Asia likes to let their Flame using lines go, meaning if anyone in America has the ability they are either on loan as I am or like Renato in being here for his own reasons without the intention to stay. There is the possibility you might eventually run across hostile or on the run Flame users, hence why the exchange is not entirely useless to the point of being valueless. However, if I assume correctly from the 'base' education level of my class, such interactions may not be in your sphere of responsibilities."

Vito had long since drew the same conclusion, especially with Don Cerrito's plan to have the information passed on to his more ardent supporters to be put to 'better use' once she left them. It wasn't really all that surprising she had caught on, if a little sour. "Why are you telling us this?"

"Why would I not?"

"You're…" gesturing to all of her, he wracked his mind on how to phrase it without being insulting. She could punch him through a wall, he'd seen her do it before with another guy.

"A communist bastard? Or bitch, given your gender Miss Bazanova." Mused the heavier man slowly, and bluntly.

"I suppose." Allowed the blonde woman as she slid down the short brick wall to stand on her feet again, a tiredly amused twist to her lips even if her tone had been as bland as usual.

"...sorry." Matt fussed, actually somewhat hovering over the tiny Soviet lady as if tainting her presence with a profanity or two might actually damage the monstrously strong woman somehow when a guy thrice her weight class hadn't so much as made her pause.

He manly resisted the urge to bury his face in his hand at guy's behavior, for the uncountable time this week alone because someone did something either utterly ridiculous or insanely stupid around her.

"There is a lot I could say to answer that accusation, most of which would be excuses or justification in type. I will instead say it is a preoccupation I have had since childhood, to arm myself and those that seek answers from me with the somewhat hard to acquire truths about this stupidly tricky quirk of human nature. Any grudge I may have with your leader has nothing to do with my association with his people, and I do have a sense of pride in my work."

And… instead Cerrito stuck her with an entire class of assholes that either got their asses beat down or grit and bore the insult of learning from a girl half their size to finish her lessons. The fact she succeeded teaching them anything to Mafioso D'Attilio's satisfaction was either a tribute to her stubbornness or professionalism. Vito himself was a surprise entirely, but he wasn't the only one to 'pass' her lessons so his addition wasn't entirely necessary.

Mostly his being a sympathetic ear for the other guys to bitch and whine at because he got lumped in with the rest of them probably cut down the number of 'casualties' from the whole incident, and probably just helped them attempt to keep up with her lesson plan so a number of people passed it.

Matt probably only passed the whole farce due to his slightly disturbing drive to not embarrass himself to the only one that hadn't expected him to be the stupidest guy in the room just because he couldn't read or write well. Vito got roped into helping him through the written information in class and reviewing after hours more often than anyone else, much to his disgruntlement.

The big guy was a little hard to refuse though, like an overgrown bulldog begging for attention with a semi-disturbing intent. Especially when he was intent on something to better himself through.

"If something happens in that 'major happening'... that you didn't cover in the basics, who do we ask for clarification?" Asked Vito curiously, because this was the last time they had to deal with the Soviet Flame user.

Given how Don Cerrito felt about her, if there were any future interactions it probably wouldn't be as neutral in intents as now.

"D'Attilio, I guess. I am unsure how Italians structure their alternate education inquiries."

Matt kind of grimaced sourly, because the Italian associate hadn't been impressed at all with him or how slowly the guy talked. "How do we reach you, Miss Bazanova?"

An eyebrow rose curiously, or skeptically as she was a bit hard to read correctly, and she very deliberately thought that question over longer than any translating efforts would require. "There are ways. None of which are guaranteed nor quick. If you desperately require advice from me alone, a letter can be sent to a place simply addressed 'M.L.I. St. Julian's' in the care of a woman called Primakova. There is a phone number, for my office, but that will be defunct in as little as a couple months."

...M.L.I.?

Mafia Land Island?

Well fuck. He wished he knew that before, the fact she might actually hand out a highly coveted invitation to visit the massive criminal haven could've been used to motivate some of the harder headed associates that gave up on toughing out the classes.

Of course, had someone put effort into talking to the woman about what she might be able to offer in return for not behaving like idiots in her classes he could've learned that sooner. Vito grimaced and gave up on the whole situation as headache inducing as well as mainly his own fault.
Chapter 105

(Saturday the 28th of February, 1970. Mafia Land.)

Sonya blew a sigh out over her spiced black tea, which was maybe a touch too hot to order while on a tropical island in the middle of a 'spring-summer' season, exasperated with the entire conversation yesterday and her associate's preoccupation with it the day before. "What does it even matter?"

"…curiosity." Renato claimed to her face, sounding both false as hell and like he was lying through his teeth now she knew how to catch him at it. "Besides which, I have the sinking suspicion this might be a 'religious' difference I want to know the root of before you wander off into jack shit nothing again and I never get the answer."

That actually sounded more likely, and she frowned at him in puzzlement while she adjusted again to the island's oppressive heat this close to the equator. "If you must know, I have no intention of marriage because it's stupid. We barely pay taxes unless we absolutely have to so the so-called 'benefits' of being married are not worth the mere effort, 'registering' myself as someone else's main and favored 'bedfellow' with any kind of structured government that leaks everything in the face of any old Mist is a security risk waiting to happen, and finally I have no need for a husband to define myself through or want to risk that shit happening to. I have my brothers and my father for any needed 'male influences', and I'm utterly fine with just them."

By the hitman's expression, apparently all that had never actually occurred to him.

"Additionally," she continued blandly after another sip of her still hot beverage, "what does any kind of paper or 'marriage license' matter to me? If I chose to stay with a person for the rest of my life, I will do so. On my own merit, for my own benefit, and because I want to instead of being told to or expected to do so by random other people I could not care less about due to what a random piece of paper says about me."

"So… it's not you being afraid of commitment or a desire to avoid 'holy matrimony'?"

She shot him a look, half-skeptical and more incredulous, which the asshole hadn't the decency to look abashed over.

"Why the hell would I pick up the brat, much less get attached to my foster family, if I had a fear of commitment?" Wondered Sonya exasperatedly, snatching her pipe off the table between them to light and then hopefully smother her irritation with him under the nicotine hit.

"I noticed you didn't address the religious overtones."

"There is more than just one method of 'marriage', some of which don't require the Christian God to see through. Like just a government… registry office… thing. Thus, such a concern is pointless."

"Merely curious, little dragon lady." Insisted the Sun Flame user indifferently, as if he hadn't thrown some kind of silent fit over the whole situation for about two whole days now.

Unless this wasn't what upset his apple cart so damn much, and he had just used it to distract her with.

At her highly unimpressed and utterly unconvinced stare, he flashed her a smug little smirk and changed the subject as he folded a long leg to rest it on his other knee. "What are you going to do for the next month and however many days?"
…until she was free of the Zolotov Clan?

Or until she started taking Shamal on full-time for him?

It was the end of February, and then all she had to do was the bulk of March before April came around and she likely had to return to Moscow for the changeover of powers and all that other political bullshit she probably would pay little to no attention to. It'd affect the Flame training groups they needed to know if they were getting cut off from any supply lines or finance links, so she could help them afford operating costs next year or if the clan would remain a backer.

Frankly, there were a couple things she really should be doing to prepare for that but couldn't stomach the thought of. Like reach out to the other two Clouds of Moscow and review information with then inform of her upcoming absence from the territory, or even heading to the Mafiya School and at least showing her face for a while so Galina wouldn't blow a few fuses on her.

"I think… I'll head to Romania. Probably. Or at least I'll try to end up there…"

Viper had apparently abducted Bjørn for something related to his financial instruction she was paying for, and she was more than fed up with picking out her own contracts again. It was at least more fun to bitch out the poor Icelander in her head when she ran into something objectionable, than bitterly musing on her own failings and faulty memory. She could wait a week or so, but then she'd move on to the other things she had waiting for her to get to.

Renato snorted, she wasn't entirely sure if the distance between them across a table would keep him out of her thoughts so it might be in response to that, and finished off his cup of espresso. "Why not come with me instead?"

The invitation startled her, but the man wasn't obviously watching her for a reaction or looking even faintly expectant for a positive answer.

Well, it was a suggestion. Whatever he might be up to or planning could actually be more interesting than dealing with civilians that might not know any Flame user history even if they had suggestive stories about them. "I'm not sure if I can go. Or even when the next time I have a block of unclaimed time come up again, and I've already been meaning to get this particular thing handled for about a year now."

A blink, and he smirked crookedly at her. "Well fine then, I suppose I should head on back to what I was doing as well… just out of curiosity, do you have any preferences if I find you and the brat a professional chef?"

Sonya pulled hard on her pipe, peering at him dubiously through the resulting smoke before salty sea breezes blew it away. "What?"

"You now have the space for one." Offered the Mafioso idly, as if that was the part she would find most objectionable about his offer. "Besides which, heaping the entire process of cooking on you when you have an utterly unpredictable schedule such as working for Mafia Land taking contracts? A chef as part of your staff would make it easier on you, as well as your own people making sure if there's any delays the brat won't be home by himself."

"I'm somewhat certain such a person is on the books to be hired already." There would have to be one, because as sure as shit she'd kill her entire staff with food poisoning trying to cook for any number of people. She didn't know if anyone she 'had' already wanted to cook for a living either, as a matter of fact she should take stock and figure out where everyone wanted to go after hiding behind her to free them up. "Why are you expressly going to find me one?"
"I know a chef, who might just so happen to need an employer who won't ask any questions about his previous places of employment." He offered casually, as if that wasn't obviously another killer for hire that only may or may not share his job title. "He's... more or less ensured he's barred from cooking in any civilian outfit anywhere within Italia."

"You're not dumping another of your old friends off on me, are you?"

"Not in so many words, no."

Yeah, she didn't believe that.

Under her unimpressed glare, the man rolled his eyes and leaned back in his spindly café chair again. "Rest assured, we were never friends. Just a bit of mutual back scratching."

"Like getting a job with someone that won't ask his qualifications?"

"Ask for qualifications all you want, just not where he worked at before, you just won't get an answer of he'll offer to show you why he gets fired every now and again." Countered the hitman simply, turning his head to the side and inspecting the skittish messenger boy that had been skirting the two of them for a few hours now.

The very reason they both hadn't split off before now, because he had the marks of a Mafia Land agent yet for some likely stupid reason the kid wasn't secure enough in himself or the island's security to approach either of them. The time to adjust from the change between a seaside shore area and a middle of an ocean island was also somewhat a factor, but they were both variants of swelteringly hot and salty currently.

"Should we order refills? Again?"

Renato scoffed, apparently losing what patience he had to bicker with her instead of immediately waltz off and crooked a demanding finger at the kid.

Sonya sighed regretfully, draining off the dregs of her tea so she could finish her latest bowl of tobacco before they moved on. "Which of us did you want?"

"...erm, both?" Flinching at the statement that came out more like a question that earned him a pointedly disproving glower from one half, he scrabbled in his black vest pockets to pull out two folded flyers before delicately laying them on the table instead of actually hand them over. "A response is... desired."

"They're asking for Flame users to volunteer a few months or weeks out of the year." Reported the Russian aloud when he didn't reach for his, already in her pamphlet and less than interested in the fresh-faced agent's fidgeting. "Apparently for 'stand by' things, like that fishing net trap I dealt with for you I guess..."

"You're joking." Snatching up his own folded paper, the hitman glanced through the same information she was perusing less hastily. "Why now? There hasn't even been an invasion with a decent amount of us yet, surely this can wait until something trumps the island's security first."

"...they, or the idiots in the hospital, thought I went berserk when Lisa went into labor. They called in a Chinese Storm, thankfully one I knew of who equally thankfully left when I demanded it instead of trip off any instinctual desires to rip his head off while we were both trapped in a private waiting room." She reported to him thoughtfully, examining the shiny and very professional 'request' for volunteers. "Same as those Turkish assholes, just more polite and asking for it first."
"…this is fucking lazy."

"In a way, sure."

It was equally as smart and efficient as it could be lazy or stupid, there were social as well as cultural differences between all the Flame users in Mafia Land that could share a type but have wildly different expectations for their or other's uses. The difference was the lens by which you peered through to see it.

"This is… actually surprisingly smart in a way, honestly." When the Italian shot her a skeptical look, Sonya could only just shrug a tattooed shoulder as she put her thoughts into actual words. "It was Ganauche, wasn't it? I just punched his nose for the CEDEF behaving as they would back in Italy around a Moscow Flame user like Rasputin. If this is his response, reaching out to those foreign Flame users so there's at least a regional expert on file to ask if there's any further major culture clash that could happen, while also padding out the ranks with the 'exceptional' of each for a stretch of time to gain that information from…"

Because once this was widely known of, of course certain factions would likely ensure their 'best' were put forth the minute someone actually designed to agree. Regardless of their own respective desires or the opinions of the people being voluntold, Vongola was a powerful entity in a distant land that good connections too might just help with any number of things… and because showing off.

Bragging rights and showing up competitors wasn't expressly a reason in itself, but still a motivation to account for. Everyone liked to look good in this lifestyle, from Mafiosi to vory to everything in between.

Renato looked less than sold on any of that being major reasons why the Ninth Generation Lightning Guardian picked to do as he had. Or maybe just her words hadn't been enough, she wasn't sure what the utmost limit of his mind-reading range was right now.

"…well, damn. I guess I don't mind he's likely fucking my sister now."

How much of the CEDEF are Flame users? I didn't see many when I went in there…"

"I'm not answering that." Flicking his pamphlet to the inner folds, the Sun examined the 'desired qualifications' part of the request.

"I refuse. For at least the short term, I have little to no idea what my schedule may look like to volunteer even a week or so. You also have national representatives of my motherland in the hospital." Sonya at least belatedly informed the kid forced to wait on their responses, eventually.

Once she realized he was still standing there.

"Ditto." Her tablemate chipped in, after she kicked him lightly to put the poor teenager out of his misery.

Gratefully, the Mafia Land agent bobbed her a nod and vacated the street in a fast hurry. Without so much as thanking them for taking the time to let him get his thing over with, and very nearly running their usual waitress over who had their bill in hand.

"How rude."

"They really don't make the agents like they used to." Agreed the hitman blandly, who had swiped the bill from the girl before she could. "I suppose this is where we split, little dragon lady."
"...be careful, Renato." It was the best she could do in a public space, which Sonya found rather distasteful given how inadequate it seemed against what the Italian was likely off to finish preparing for.

By the infuriating smirk the asshole tossed her as he rose to his full height, the sentiment wasn't needed. "Of course, I'm always careful."

…why was she going to miss him, again?

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 28th of February, 1970 continued. Sonya & Tatiana's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

Sonya was putting her room back together when Tatiana got home, which answered if the thief would know their new address without being told. Until said Storm-Cloud was done messing with her books, the nurse was not going over there.

She'd done that song and dance once before, thank you very much. Death by irked baby sister was not in her plans.

Instead, she started in on dinner. That was the 'arrangement', if Sonya remembered.

She cleaned, Tatiana would cook.

Well, up to now, it was more Bjørn cleaned and the Sun cooked. Bachelor cooking was... ew. The Lightning-Storm could cook, but his standards for 'adequate' and 'too gross to eat' was weird.

However, from what little she could see from the kitchen-center of their new three-room apartment... it looked as if her sister had already gone to town cleaning up the 'common' bathroom she'd share with her Lackey when in residence. That bathroom was missing the little collection of tiny blond beard hairs that usually dotted the sink and had new hygiene products lined up for later use, and it looked as if someone finally swept the hardwood floors from said bathroom all the way to the front door.

Apparently yes, Sonya remembered.

Tonight they would have... some beef stroganoff, without mushrooms even if Sonya would eat Lisa's mushroomed food likely from self-preservation alone, because Tatiana probably should go grocery shopping and that was pretty much most of what she had left to make something from. She wondered, if she asked really nicely, if her baby sister would mind running errands tomorrow instead of spending a day recovering from her trip with a good book or three.

If she would, they could have some golubtsy tomorrow.

Putting a pan of water on the stove to boil for the potatoes roused her sister for a moment, mostly to check it was the nurse and not a robber by how brief the emergence would've been had Tatiana not asked about grocery shopping.

"I could." Sonya agreed absently, three dust encrusted books tucked under an arm and obviously itching to get back to shelving the unholy pile of papers into their rightful places. "Anything specific you want me to pick up for you?"

"Well, if you could not forget the mushrooms, because I'll eat those... cabbage. Specifically. And whatever cuts of meat you feel like shelling out for." Everything but seafood was actually surprisingly expensive on a floating island in the middle of the ocean, which probably should've been unsurprising but still. "In other news, Verde's back."

"...fuck."

"Adrik's been shot through the lung, and it collapsed, before the two of them could get here." Tatiana continued blithely, slicing the spuds in cubes and wondering if she had time to bake some biscuits too. "He's... not going to be good for much now."

A few too many beats of silence had her checking over a shoulder to see if her sister was pulling faces or what, only to earn herself a semi-concerned grey stare for the effort. "Are... you okay?"

"Me? I'm fine."

"Tats, that was a former associate of yours. You don't feel anything now he's functionally crippled doing something objectively stupid for a near-stranger?"

She dropped the pot's lid after adding in cubed potatoes, she didn't slam it. "I'm fine, Nya."

The books ended up on the somewhat beaten up kitchen table that used to be Bjørn's, and her baby sister warily padded around the obstruction to come up to Tatiana's side. "So, what's Adrik's issue?"

"He's crippled, not... having an issue." Corrected the nurse a touch sourly, waving her knife a few times in emphasis before starting in on a few sprigs of chives for later toppings. Cutting things up was soothingly therapeutic after a hectic hospital shift and cooking for more than herself fed her inclinations to nurse those around her of any hurt. "Pneumothorax isn't treatable, the integrity of his lung was compromised. As he's had one, another is highly likely. So just traveling isn't really recommended, as his lung could just collapse from changing air pressures and the like after being weakened so..."

"...so, he needs three seconds with a medically inclined Mist user every few months or years, or a new lung?"

Stabbing the chopping board, Tatiana whirled on her baby sister before her mind caught up to the suggestion and she actually thought about it. Blinking blankly down at the only Soviet Flame expert and Storm-Cloud blankly staring back at her, the nurse eventually sighed exasperatedly and covered her face with faintly potato-onion scented hands. "Or I could ask you to Propagate his lung, either entirely or just the damaged part, then Activate cellular division so it's real without your Flames and he'd have an entirely new lung his body won't reject or a perfect lung again. Oh, for fuck's sake..."

"When would you need me to do-"

"Nya, I love you. Shut up right now." As it was entirely unknown what health risks a Flame-generated organ would pose to the human body after surgery, they could even get Adrik's medical bills heavily discounted beyond what the Zolotov Clan already got because it was testing of a theoretical medical procedure for future use or selling.

The clan paid his bills right now, if only because it was technically on Sonya's behalf he was off in France even if she hadn't expressly tasked him with guarding their newest foreign Lightning user. She hadn't said not to, which technically was permission in and of itself when it came to her.

Her idea would be just another one of a few hundred different medical tests going on for science, because yet again St. Julian's was the ultimate pinnacle of somewhat black-market human testing in the medical field. They had cutting-edge anesthesia combinations, nearly unknown vaccinations not available anywhere else until the side-effects were more known, experimental drugs and antibiotics, theoretical surgery techniques being tested, and the prototypes of a thousand different medical tools alone… half of which were in storage since being replaced by the resulting equipment or better performing alternatives per the agreements to test the equipment in the first place.

Tatiana apparently had a date with some papers after dinner, writing down the entire process and step-by-step guide for the imaginary surgery she had been thinking for Ganauche's eye based on the 'mere idea' that a Cloud Flame user could Propagate human flesh as they could everything else they got their hands on. Admittedly an eye was a hell of a lot more delicate than a lung, but the process by which a duplicate could be made would be the same. If her baby sister required study to replicate entire…

…no, there was no way in hell Cherep knew what comprised all the body parts he had replaced over the years. Beyond 'bone', 'blood', and 'skin', a child even at the age he'd been when Sonya dragged him home wouldn't know how to put themselves back together in exact detail down to the delicate nerve fibers that ran through the spinal cord alone.

Likely, a Cloud could replicate any old body part all they wished. As long as they had the Flames for it.

If they thought about it.

That would be a fairly interesting conversation to have with Doctor Kappel, because her Cloud siblings' possible immortality had never actually been brought up to him. He was going to be pissed they omitted that, as she had been when they finally came clean to her, but it was really likely the former Nazi would help her disguise how exactly she knew the process was sound for the proposed surgeries.

"You want to do this, or should we call in our dork of a-"

"I'll do it, he doesn't want to come back here." Sonya cut her off next, sounding unamused over the mere suggestion.

"Okay then… I need paper when you go shopping." Glancing at the potatoes to ensure the pot wasn't yet boiling over, Tatiana moved on to the beef tips that nearly cost her an arm and a leg and the half an onion left she would be slicing up next instead of mention one of the sister hospitals around the world that could be convinced to spare them a surgery suit and a recovery room for such a medical miracle being 'discovered' there. "A large amount of it, and a few pens if you don't have any."

There was going to be a bidding war anyways, because 'discovered by a medical professional in Mafia Land' was never going to be in any history text ever. Even if it couldn't become something shared with more civilian medical communities, there were enough criminal friendly ones that would hide where the replicated organs were coming from to ensure the process would be widely available just enough to generate a lot of interest and bragging rights.

More likely there would be an imaginary 'cloning facility' invented that made a breakthrough with… whatever some PR specialist dreamt up to disguise obvious Flame use.

The red tape in her future… and that was just her. Sonya would likely demand a few reams of her own, simply because it was their brother's ability she likely wanted no one to connect to him or her. Tatiana didn't want any whisper of that getting out herself, which likely meant a titanic amount of secrecy clauses to be argued over and enforced.

At least, until it came out some other way. Undead Clouds… would be a mite bit hard to miss rumors "…about when are you thinking about doing the lung thing?"

"Oh, it's not going to be for months. I've got to get with Doctor Kappel and we've got to write up a process, have it reviewed by the Head Doctors, then probably explain the entire thing in detail to the surgery teams or just one so they can put together a game plan for the actual surgery, then you'll be asked to replicate a few organs for both my practice and dissection for any obvious complications that might happen to the tissue, we need to check if it's just the lung or the lung and the thoracic cavity for what's really the biggest risk and if it would help at all to begin with, and only then would we even tentatively schedule Adrik for surgery. But," Sonya was unamused and very unappreciative to get a sudden hug as fiercely as Tatiana could give one, especially as she ended up face-first into her older sister's cleavage again, "I really appreciate the kick to the rear, sis. Thanks."

It was easy to state, hard to do. Something she had half an idea how to start the process, but she had been expecting years and Ganauche to somehow either get his whole syndicate written off or finally assuage some of the Storm-Cloud's ill feelings to happen first.

Shooting her a very betrayed looking glare and raking a hand to order her somewhat longer than usual hair, the younger thief shuffled backwards to shield herself behind her books again. "...I'm going to Romania for a month or so."

"Have at."

"I'll also probably skip in and out of China first."

"Noted."

"Sometime in there, I'll throw Verde… and I guess Adrik, so he doesn't do anything too stupid before you get to him, in my house in Italy."

"I appreciate it."

"…that's it?"

"Galina told me what you told her, in a very… roundabout manner." Admitted the nurse blandly, nibbling a raw onion slice that didn't want to get off her knife before glancing over to her wary baby sister's new position. "Do your thing, sis. Gedeon has tried to get a hold of you, we're preventing that by being really unhelpful. Oh, but old man Zolotov would appreciate it if you're in country by the second week of April. Apparently, you need to be there for political bullshit when he formally hands things over."

Sonya eyed her dubiously. "Sure."

"Are you going to go grocery shopping for me, or should I do it after my shift tomorrow?"

"I said I'd do it." Insisted the Storm-Cloud stiffly, frowning now. "I also apparently need to talk to Verde tomorrow anyways. So, a couple of days at least before I leave again."

"Phenomenal." Tatiana insisted back brightly, judging she had enough onion slices and putting her knife in the sink's basin for the thief to clean up later. "And thanks."

"…I highly doubt you're thanking me for talking to Verde, or grocery shopping. Especially since you're cooking."
"For talking to me about Adrik." Corrected the nurse a bit wryly, blinking rapidly from what she'd insist was the onions and not emotion. "I wasn't thinking too much about it to be honest, because yes that is one of mine and he went and fucked himself over to the point I can't heal him. I know he's got high hopes for Verde's brain, but... why was he so damn stupid about... he didn't have to do that..."

"Maybe he's after something?" Posed Sonya warily, from the sound of it not sure if she should leave her big sister to her onions or linger around. "Aside the whole 'guy saved my life' thing?"

"Adrik was the idiot that was fully willing to steal from old ladies we lived next to and shoot himself in the foot when they reported him to each other. Why'd he had to show he grew up now and not in a few more years?"

"...because people change?"

With a half-laugh that came out a bit more strangled than she intended, the Sun pressed the heel of her left hand to her left eye then only realized that might not have helped much. "Not by much, apparently."

The fork she had picked up to check on how done the potatoes where was tugged out of her grip, mostly because it was in her left and that was not only on which side Sonya was but also being dangerously close to poking something sensitive out. "Tats... you are not allowed to be bipolar. I refuse."

"You do, huh?"

"You'll forgive me for asking, but what the ever-loving hell?" She even sounded horribly confused too, warily lingering out of arm's reach just in case yet still standing there looking both alarmed and suspicious. "You're normally not... mopey."

"I'm a Sun, we do everything with a vengeance." Sniffing as she felt an impending sneeze, Tatiana glanced at the mascara coating the heel of her palm sourly while blinking hard to clear the onion oil from her eyes. "Also, may I point out onions?"

"...do you need Ganauche?"

The blurted-out laugh was painful, and not just because of surprise or because she had been trying to sniff again. "How the hell did you hear about that already?"

Her sister snorted dryly. "I was in Italy for a few weeks."

Like that answered anything. Besides, they were still in the 'get to know you' phase so nothing of a physical comfort side was going on to justify that question. "Why are you suggesting him?"

"Because I suck with people, and apparently I did something wrong here." Pointed out the Storm-Cloud with exasperation, glancing down at an apparently forgotten fork before eyeing the dangerously bubbling pot of potatoes dubiously and putting it down on the counter. "What did I do?"

"Nothing. Just reminded me of something, and didn't let me pretend I was utterly fine?" Countered Tatiana blandly as possible without laughing, dumping her onions and the beef tips into an unheated pan sitting forlornly on the stovetop with the pot of potatoes. "I hate pain, so I was avoiding even thinking about it. Yet here you come along, all innocent and grumpily concerned and now my eyes are watering and can't stop."

"All I did was ask a question!"
"Exactly. You didn't do anything wrong."

Frustrated, her baby sister outright glared for a full second before stalking away with insult lining every step. Surprisingly Sonya then came back without her books, but something wrapped in foil in hand instead. "Here, chocolate. I'll even consent to another hug if that'll help."

She sounded so sour over it too.

"Why do you have chocolate?" Dark chocolate too…

"I buy one every month and leave it in my purse for… emergencies."

"Hmm..." Tatiana managed through a mouthful, idly poking the potatoes with the fork to see how tender they were now, "smart idea."

The younger woman eyed her like another thief would eye a particularly unfriendly guard dog, or how a particularly competent civilian might eye a ticking bomb, very gently leaned in for a kind of glancing contact that could masquerade as a hug if someone's arms were disabled, then vacated the kitchen with a vengeance.

Apparently to await dinner's completion in the relative safety of her room instead of risk Tatiana's 'unstable' moods.

It really was the onions, she just smeared the oil all over her eye and that was why she got teary. Free chocolate, free fine gourmet candy, was a bonus she just really didn't want to give up. If Sonya drew the wrong conclusion, that was entirely on her and her loss.

…and now she just stole candy from the evil little mastermind thief that was her baby sister.

Savoring her next bite the nurse then wrapped up the rest of it and stuck it in her purse, so she wouldn't ruin her appetite. Who knew the next time she could get one over the blonde thief, accidently as well, so she was going to ensure this lasted as best she could.

Then she finally fucking sneezed, thankfully away from the food they'd be eating in as little as an hour.

(Sunday the 1st of March, 1970. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"Have you been… living out of here?"

Verde pulled his face out from behind a textbook he managed to badger Tatiana into giving him, blinking first blankly at the blonde thief that just let herself into Adrik's hospital room then with a measure of puzzlement. "Where else would I go?"

"Did Bjorn not get you a hotel room or something?"

"He did." Offered her fellow Russian before the Frenchman could quibble about what he felt should or could risk and how much it limited him somewhere like Mafia Land. "Long story short, Verde's more interested in bugging the nurses for reading material."

Sonya was hard to read on a good day, but he was sure that was a 'skeptical' cocked eyebrow. "Well... okay."
"Something up, boss lady?" Adrik asked, mostly so she wouldn't inquire about anything else he was currently unable to harass the scientist into doing. Like eating regularly.

"Today's been a little... strange." Shrugging off whatever it was that made it strange to her, she refocused back on her new Lightning. "So, you survived."

The fact she sounded rather unenthusiastic over Verde's admittedly mostly lucky run from France all the way back here annoyed him, he'd put good money it would likely piss off the other man. Then again, given what they were talking to, it probably wasn't really impressive because she did it at least five or more times a year.

Without counting her Mafia Land contract work.

"...are you going to hold up your end of this challenge?"

"I believe I said 'alone'. Not 'with a personal bodyguard that will hand-guide you through it'." Sonya observed tartly but rolled her eyes as the two of them exchanged a more or less panicked looks at the thought of the Lightning having to do all that over again but this time on his own. "But fine, whatever. You want to hide behind me, so be it. I finally have room for yet more people, count yourself lucky you got in before yet another asshole decides to dedicate their lives to my service for random reasons of their own."

Verde opened his mouth, Adrik slid a foot off his medical berth and kicked the Frenchman in the thigh before he said something stupid in response to the thief's less than pleased response to picking him up as another dependent.

The fact was that she was going to, however he got there, was more than good enough to bite a tongue and let her be as bitchy as she wanted to be.

"What's next, then?"

"For him? I need a body to be in a place my brother owns for me, while he's there letting in everyone needed to make it habitable he can do whatever he wants until I have more time." The considering look he earned was not encouraging. "For you? I'm altering our deal."

Adrik honestly wouldn't fight it, letting him duck out on her yet again to wander after Verde had been enough of an allowance on her goodwill as it was. As long as whatever the change was wouldn't kill him.

Maybe not even then, given how much money he also owed her.

"Our arrangement was information based for doing my end, my sister needs a guinea pig for medical-Flame research." Sonya announced blandly. "That's not to say I'm releasing you from the rest of it, but I'm sure if I require a teacher in information technology later Verde can cover the basics perfectly fine on his own. This way, I can at least get something out of that."

"...ouch. You calling me unreliable?"

"Aren't you?" Countered the other thief dryly, ignoring the outraged puffing up the Frenchman was doing on his behalf.

He rolled that slight around in his head. "There are worse things to be called, I guess. And it probably does seem that way to you..."

"It wasn't, and still isn't, immediately urgent. Since you had better things to do for Tatiana, and technology advances in accumulating degrees these days, I had little problem shoving off you repaying me." She informed him bluntly, ignoring his wince because she was right and what she got out of that hasty deal on his end would’ve been equally incrementally valuable the longer she waited to call him out for finishing his side. "However, at this point, I'm a little suspicious you're not going to survive to pay me back all that effort and time."

"Your inflation is appalling."

"You're the idiot who made a deal with me, should've recalled what happened to the last moron that tried the same." All but purred the Soviet Flame user wickedly, which was a sharp enough change in tone that it made both Verde and Adrik blink at her in askance. "So now, there's still the issue of not only the medical bills I paid for you but the remaining balance on our trade of favors."

"If I let you change the details, that means I don't owe you nearly as much."

"A fraction less amounts to still expensive as hell…"

Adrik scowled, tempted but also keenly aware whatever it was she was driving for could be even more risky and he wasn't even out of the hospital yet. She was right, he owed her a shit ton. From the sounds of it, it would also enable him to remain more or less free around somewhere he could easily keep in contact with the so far silent Frenchman. That kind of benefit was suspicious.

"What I want is not combat likely." Sonya clarified for him when he apparently spent too long glaring at the half-healed surgery scars, not really all that far from the scar he had from the appendix one he got last year. "One could, in fact, call it cushy. Think of it as a milk-run, so you can relearn your limits somewhere safe… ish."

He shot her a skeptical look. "Then why offer it to me?"

"Everyone else is spoken for, and Verde would not know how to do it. You owe me enough you won't let anything I don't want slide." A lift of a tattooed shoulder, and the woman actually bothered to look at the Lightning she was now responsible for. "In fact, if you agree… I won't even protest the whole 'got to Mafia Land with a bodyguard' instead of 'alone' issue with his deal."

"Agreed." Adrik spoke hastily, before the scientist could open his mouth and somehow make the situation worse by demanding clarification.

He wasn't sure what kind of 'worse' there might be between the two of them, but Sonya's bland acceptance even with caveats was better than risking the Lightning having to do it all again. Without backup.

"...you planned on my failure."

"Of course I did. Most would, in my position." Sonya admitted to Verde's statement as if the whole thing was inconsequential and wasn't the hinge upon his future freedom and safety swung. "However, you survived and technically I suppose since you had to drag him back here it counts as alone for that little bit which was the end goal I set. I'm not petty enough to deny what you want on principle or anything, even if you cheated, so fine. I'll secure yourself as much as I will mine until you earn it fairly."

"Why is that an expected point of contention you are using as leverage?"

"We're criminals." She blandly claimed to his face. "We all cheat, that you did as well is actually as inconsequential as the fact you two were only caught because Adrik needed medical aid. I expected it, I knew he was with you, as anyone else that offered the same would be equally as expectant if less accepting. There's an argument to be made that you made the connection with Adrik to the point he would aid on your own before meeting me, which means it was not intended to count towards the 'alone' mandate as it was a previous connection established and from that point on you refrained from forming any others to aid you against the arrangement."

Verde's somewhat constipated look of consternation was actually pretty funny, paired with the utter indifference that was Sonya entirely.

Besides which, the lady thief had a good point. The way the deck had been stacked against the man, the only way he could've survived her challenge was to cheat like hell. Which… was the first instinct for anyone in the Mafiya, especially when staring at the base of an insurmountable obstacle. Them showing up at Mafia Land on time at all was a big obvious sign they 'cheated' getting the Lightning here.

That she was going to honor the deal anyways was pretty fantastic as it was.

Technically, Verde hadn't asked anyone for help. Adrik volunteered his time and efforts without needing it, mainly to get around that mandate of 'alone', on what was practically automatic.

In hindsight, incredibly stupid thing to do without clearing the interference as acceptable with the one laying out the stakes. He very nearly ruined everything for the Frenchman, it was a rather… galling thought.

Of course, since Sonya was being ever so thoughtful and almost 'nice' for her… Adrik had no room to wiggle out of anything she demanded. Even if it'd start rumors of his 'unreliable' nature, he had to take his lumps and be appreciative for it.

"Err… Sonya? Out of curiosity, mind you… what did I just agree to?"

Instead of immediately lay out his near future as she saw it, his fellow Russian turned to him at first blankly but it shifted to a rather calculative curiosity before long. "…you've put a lot of work into Verde, and have a lot of faith in him to stick your neck out this much. Why?"

"Aside taking a beating with me to keep me alive? Even if it was pretty much in his best interests anyways?" It didn't shift her attention much, although Verde shot him a nettled look for referencing a beat down in an admittedly pretty lady's presence. "The man's brilliant, Sonya. I don't mean just intellectually smart, but he's that too. When his Flames popped, there's only so many places he could survive much less live and if not us then the Americans or French crime syndicates would do worse than we would. My… ah, career path… it's getting complicated. He's likely to keep on the cutting edge of technology just out of practicality for whatever he settles on doing with his life, and if I need help… I could get it from him for practically nothing now."

"Verde's your version of job security?"

"Well… he was." Adrik shot his healing chest a sour look.

She obviously pondered the situation a few moments more, before huffing a short sigh. "Tats has an idea about that, I wouldn't count yourself out just yet."

"Nurse Primakova informed us there is nothing to be done." Almost spluttered out the Lightning in protest, nearly instantly irate out of more being informed the wrong thing than irritation she might've withheld something.

"As of right now, there is nothing." She corrected absenty. "There's not a Mist nurse in residence yet, so Tats was correct in telling you that. Even the possible short-term, and highly subjectively beneficial, suggestion has not been more than discussed yet."

Verde outright glowered at the shorter woman. "Why not?"

"Because it is Flame based, and that requires testing that is not possible yet as there are no medically inclined Mists to assist with. Hence the arrangement with Adrik. He remains in reach for Tatiana to test her ideas out on and record any drawbacks to both supposed methods of correction, and otherwise start in on securing my castle where you're going to live at least until you pick your own little dot in the ground, and I'll release him from our old agreement after some time."

Well… to be honest, if the boss lady even thought she could fix the unfixable, Adrik would've stuck close to her anyways. The conscription to be Sonya's head of domestic security wasn't really his thing, but the woman was a lone thief who already had a Lackey and a schoolhouse to maintain. In short, it could be worse.

Bonus, it would be where Verde would be for the next however few months or so.

"You're being… suspiciously understanding and nice." Stated the bedridden Russian warily, because none of this fit with the childhood image he had of the girl.

The fully-grown version of the same female gave him a hard to read look. "I am a Cloud. I dislike it when other idiots have ideas about what I can or cannot do. Entreating a Cloud for protection from the same seems to be a thing the world over. Verde's not actually the first one from outside Moscow to do it, as a matter of fact... I was expecting a new dependent to show up."

"So... why the run-around if you expected it?"

The baffling woman gave another dismissive shrug. "I didn't have the room then."

Verde stared at her hard, with a kind of dark glower going on. "And now you do?"

"I said 'castle'. Twenty-six rooms, six stories tall, of fortified stone castle off the north Italian peninsula. Which I am already running out of space in to the point there's now plans to build an apartment block on the land it came with." Sonya paused, looked semi-thoughtful for once, and sighed heavily while cradling her forehead. "And a few houses for married couples."

"...I get to hire help, right?" Adrik asked, he didn't squeak.

Nope.

"And train a replacement to standards, yes." The look she shot him spoke volumes for how unimpressed she was with his question. "I'm not stupid, Adrik. You're temporary but eminently more trustworthy while I get used to the people you'll put in place."

"Well, doing it alone would probably make up the headache I've caused you, boss lady."

"I am aware that is Tatiana's title, stop using it for me. I am not her."

"That's... a little obvious." Offered the bedridden man slowly, unable to help the glance to her chest.

Sonya followed his look and shifted backwards somewhat to redefine that part of herself and critically eye the feature much to Verde's embarrassment. "I'm not that small... am I?"

A small part of Adrik's brain shorted out, partly from a natural male instinct to not go there with a woman's self-image when he had just been unfavorably comparing her to another woman and partly... from she could knock his block off self-preservation.

"Anatomically speaking," started the scientist who had moved out of kicking range during the course of the conversation, still pointedly staring flatly at the ceiling instead of the woman now looking semi-expectant at him, "Nurse Primakova's... measurements... are somewhat unusual for human norm. By statistical average, you fit squarely within easily and scale somewhat more to the... heavier end."

"...Verde, no. You never go there with a girl." Adrik groaned out around a wheeze, half because trying to laugh made his lungs hurt and half because the strain of keeping up with extended conversation also kind of hurt in a different way after getting his ribcage opened to deal with his leaking lung. "You especially don't call a girl 'heavy'."

Yet again, baffling, the strangest woman he ever held a conversation with just shrugged.

To compound the issue entirely, the scientist was quizzically peering at him blankly from behind his coke-bottle glasses then glancing to Sonya's complete non-reaction as if to say 'evidence does not support your claim'.

Dear lord, he even thought it in the Frenchman's accent.

"How long did it take for you to pick up Russian?"

"Adrik insisted, on the basis the language was more secure than speaking English so close to England."

"I am asking for reference, there's another that learned mostly the hard way and I was curious how long it naturally took for someone else. Most of half a year, and he barely had any grasp on it."

"...four months for basic understanding. I have yet to flesh out the vocabulary adequately enough for comfort."

"Huh." After that comment on nothing, the Soviet Flame user glanced from her French fellow back to her countryman then back. "Until such a time Adrik feels physically fit enough to start working for me, I will not ask you to move locations unless you are that uncomfortable walking down a busy thoroughfare here."

"It is not that I am uncomfortable..." Hedged the scientist waspishly. "I do not belong here and that is apparent to everyone."

"You think a Mafioso from Italy belongs on a street with a bunch of Triad thugs, or American Mobsters belong in the same drinking hole as Russian vory? It's all an act, Verde. An illusion, a pretense of confidence and not the fact anyone really feels that secure here. Admittedly that confidence is based on violence, and the knowledge of 'if you fuck with me, my fellows will fuck you up'."

Verde had looked actually interested, up until she clarified what the real understanding here was based upon. The utterly deadpanned look completely missed the mark, because Sonya was now musing about something else and not paying attention to appreciate it.

"Um... Sonya." When she finally looked at him, Adrik jerked a thumb to the third-floor window overlooking the side street the hospital was built upon. "Are you... stalling?"

"...I don't want to go back out there. It's even worse than when it came out I was a Cloud."

Grumbled the thief sourly. "The personal space bubble thing isn't back, but way too many people are watching and not doing anything."

"Any idea why?"

"No."

"Anything really weird stick out to you?"

Sonya eyed him suspiciously, but the fact she practically outright owned the both of them probably made her more verbose than with anyone else she barely knew. "I've gotten a couple suggestions to 'stay and relax' when I pass a couple cafes. I think they were all Triad connected too. Otherwise it was just too many people paying attention for what I know is normal."

"Think you might be getting too well known for the anonymous services?"

"Fuck I hope not, Tats doesn't have the time to help me with that." Sonya bitterly mused, pondering over Adrik's suggestion but giving up with another dismissive shrug. "Well whatever. I don't care when you start as long as it is sometime soon, Adrik, but I will release you from service when Nicolai is freed up and makes it back to Moscow. Depending on what happens, you'll either still owe me the full balance of medical fees or I'll reduce it for help beyond the requirements of duty."

"Probably more than I deserve."

"Yes, yes, it is." She glanced at her new Lightning scientist then back. "But then again, I now have more reason to let you slide than I started with."

Verde blinked back at her blankly. "Why look at me?"

"Why indeed." The woman turned on her heel, digging her tobacco pipe out of her purse on her way out of the hospital room. "When Bjørn returns, have him set you both up in my place in Italy. Or just tell Tats you want to leave earlier."

"What shall I be doing then, if Adrik is tasked with security?" Demanded the Frenchman at her back skeptically, not earning even a pause or a look back.

"You have a cause to chase already, if you remember. There isn't anything like Flame sciences just yet, you might want to look into starting the process while things catch up."

---

(Tuesday the 3rd of February, 1970. Bristol, South West England, United Kingdom.)

"How about a whisper or two of 'body armor'?” Mauricio inquired aloud more absently than really listening for Skull's response, reviewing his contingencies for the probably likely crash that would happen on this world-tour. "Start it early, to get the jump on any suspicions later on if the worse happens?"

"That's... actually pretty likely to weigh in mind if anyone gets around to asking. And I have, or will have, the connections to make it even murkier for when someone gets around to checking." He really only wore the full body leather jumpsuit because it concealed everything from neck to toes, meaning if there were bruises no one could tell right away.

It was easier to hide things if no one saw them in the first place.
Especially gaping injuries or shattered/misaligned bone. Sonya's standby of giving him a bloody nose to explain any blood was also supremely useful, if somewhat painful to cause himself if there was no injury to his face at first.

Skull zipped up, snagging the gloves set in his helmet then rounded the dressing part of his dressing room to fully see the rotund little Spaniard still not paying much attention to much anything but his own hands as he plotted. Checking the time, not that he had to because this circus outfit had a program manager that would send a runner if he wasn't in place more than fifteen minutes before the current act ended, the stuntman took a seat at the brightly lit vanity mirror that was the bigger draw to getting this room to prep in.

Rolling his eyes at the continued if less smart suggestions the Rain was running over to help him manage his role as his 'hype-man' and press agent, he started applying his makeup for the few short minutes he'd be helmet-less before and after his stunt act. Just so 'Skull' would be harder to connect to 'Cherep' on his off-time if anyone saw him out of 'uniform'.

It was by far not the biggest dressing room in this theater, that went to a pair of magicians turned lion tamers who were apparently in between cruise lines entertainment shows or touring themselves that headlined the whole tour, but he really only needed the mirror.

Showboat performers would be used to more amenities, more than any traveling circus type would be used to making due with. The German guys weren't all that bad, a little flamboyant but at least Roy took good care of their animals while Siegfried handled their props so they weren't all over the place like other performers he knew of.

They were the 'headliners', Skull was kind of leaching their fame as he would be performing before the main act. He wasn't the opening act at least. A group of Asian acrobats were doing that with some damn impressive tumbling routines without most of the props the acrobats he knew of needed for the same.

Eventually the Cloud would get around to asking their nationality, he was a little wary about issuing insult because he didn't know the culture very well but mostly he just didn't want to.

Might be a grudge in there, because Sonya got chased off from the circus in Asia. He didn't want to treat the mix-gender group with any hostility, they had too long scheduled together to start off with drama this early.

Closing out the program was either the firework display or whichever local musical act their patron arranged. Occasionally absolutely brilliant, their first event had the Animals performing right after their more day-evening show with a concert.

Free concert. Bonus.

Occasionally, now and again, their lineup would be changed up here or there depending on a couple of factors. The musicians obviously with local flavors or big bands when possible, but he knew an escape artist would be picked up in America for the part of the tour in North America but would leave them after Australia. In Mexico there would be a stand-up comedian Skull would share a time-slot with, before Canada they'd pick up a Wild West cowboy act he wondered if Glen knew anyone there to give them all a break when need be, who would split off from the tour before they got back to England again.

Basically, this was a showman's version of breaking into a new or previously untapped market for their specialties. Get together, show off for a little bit, then wander into whatever looked more interesting than where they had been. Some signed up for the whole thing, like him and the German duo, some for only part for a safe or lucrative way to travel in style to a new place, like the Asian acrobats and the Wild West show.

He didn't mind the wander and shifting cast list, the more people he got to talk to and get to know in this side of the business the better. Rubbing shoulders with them as entertainers was just a bonus.

Picking up the purple lipstick he technically stole from the Grobes Volksfest's dressing department, just simply because he couldn't find another shade as perfect that matched his coloring, Skull smeared it over his lips while only half-listening to Mauricio's ramblings.

"...and, perhaps, a bit of crowd networking."

"Nope." Denied the stuntman pointedly, popping the 'p' so the makeup around his mouth was as even as he could get it, half-expecting the suggestion to be posed yet again. "Give it a couple months, Mauricio. By their terms, you're still 'hot'."

The Spaniard Rain threw up his hands. "I cannot manage your reputation without-"

"Mauricio, please. Just give it enough time for me and the other acts to overshadow your possible sightings. we'll live just fine with a few shows without you networking the crowd for us after this. We're going to be here for a long while." Capping what was left of the lipstick, he was running out but finding the same shade was practically impossible, he turned around instead of watching the other man through the mirror. "Another month at the latest, two preferably. Then those in the 'world under' will be forced to step lightly around you before doing something more… directly inconveniencing."

"I have been patient this long, another month will not be too bad." Allowed the Rain a touch grumpily, sighing heavily and finally focusing on the man he was 'managing' the reputation of.

It made Skull feel rather guilty to repeatedly remind the man why he couldn't do half the things he thought up, he wouldn't be nearly as peaceful if someone else was hemming him in so much. The only thing that reassured him even a little about doing it was that the man only needed a reminder or two to recall the reasons why he shouldn't do what he suggested and hemmed himself in. Mainly.

"...I don't suppose you would mind if I then turned my attentions to networking with the staff here then."

"I have no idea why you think to ask my permission for that, the more people you're seen by the safer you are. If the crowd is a touch too risky, then the employees are your next best bet." The Rain would likely pick up a lot of decently useful contacts doing that, and with him doing the business side of socializing Skull could focus on the fan-base more.

Mauricio tapped the tips of his fingers together thoughtfully for a moment. "Indeed."

"Try not to burn bridges behind us." Interjected the stuntman dryly, strolling over to the door when someone knocked on it.

"I would never dream of doing-"

"Two words, snake oil." Skull juggled his things to pull his gloves on, then glanced back with a wicked smirk for the sour glower aimed at his back. "See you after the show, Mauricio."

"Break a leg, Skull."

"Hopefully, you don't mean that literally."
Mauricio visibly thought about it before grandly doffing his floppy colorful hat that was a gift from Aziz for helping save his life. "Very well, not literally."

(Tuesday the 3rd of February, 1970 continued. Bristol, South West England, United Kingdom.)

Even knowing his family really didn't like his career choice for the obvious reasons of risking his life for fame, Skull loved being a stuntman. Probably a ridiculous amount.

The crowds cheering him on were a draw, as was any money he could make out of what was basically having fun messing around with bikes and momentum, but what he would probably never give up even if there was nothing he could gain from stunt work was the few moments of pure flying.

Being in the air, without limits or constraints, on his own terms and ability. The closest he could get to utter freedom, to being just himself... instead of a runaway Czech boy trying to duck shadowy men who wanted his immortality or the awkward and somewhat misplaced middle child of a criminal family.

He loved Lisa, and the rest of the family, but mainly their foster mother for allowing him to prattle her ear off with all his misgivings and thoughts until he did fit in more and the awkward edges rubbed off enough to fit. His sisters were too far entrenched in that life to have understood his few more civil years of upbringing and what view it gave him of their actions, Arseniy had been terrifying up until he basically quailed as much as he physically could in the face of Sonya's badly stifled tears.

Admittedly that incident had been entirely awkward as hell for everyone involved, not just their old man.

Skull ran both eyes and hands over Diana, checking one last time over the 1969 Indian Motorcycle he was minutes from starting up and jumping the ramps being moved into place for his act. Last second checks were more just for peace of mind than to catch anything, because there was a complete tune-up done yesterday where any issues from the summer of driving around on roads would've been caught.

Freshly washed, waxed, and polished. Diana was looking pretty with her black and blue coat offset with silver details. Skull honestly preferred purple, but he had limited options if he wanted a bike right then and not later when India Motorcycle Company could paint him a custom job.

There were only a couple more empty minutes before his next show, as things were shoved into place or secured by stagehands or the audience scurried back to their seating after taking advantage of the break for their own needs, waiting it out was always hard for him. As per usual, his thoughts were jumping around all over the place, especially as he was antsy to start.

He kind of wished he could dedicate his shows, but that would draw attention from the wrong comer of the world to his family. Also defeating the purpose of making himself a 'persona' for show business that didn't share a nationality with his real self.

Lisa deserved more than her fair share, frankly. One or more would have to go to Arseniy, just for helping him keep out of their lifestyle after he solidly concluded he didn't like it in the least. Tatiana would be amused, Sonya likely unimpressed and annoyed by the same.

Viper getting something dedicated to her would likely end up with Skull paying through the nose for all and every insanely expensive meal they ever had for life… but frankly he suspected he was always going to be footing the bill for those.

Ooh, and one each for his baby brother and Shamal. One was a bit too young to appreciate it, but the other-

The PA system set up cracked to life without a whine of feedback a lesser trained announcer might accidently set off, Skull rose to his feet quickly so when the curtains concealing the changes to the stage and him pulled back he wouldn't be on his knees still.

An almost helpless smirk cracked open the stuntman's mouth as the spotlights were manned and turned on him the same second as his form and bike were revealed to the gathered crowd waiting for him.

Showtime.
(Wednesday the 4th of March, 1970. Sonya & Tatiana's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

Ganauche hid the fistful of colorful lilies behind his back when the wrong sister opened the door in response to his knock. "Err... hello, Bazanova. Is... Tatiana ready?"

Sonya peered at him suspiciously for a long moment, which was horribly unnerving as she had not been remotely happy to see him the last time they were in the same building, before padding off into the apartment but leaving the door open for him. "Tats, your boy toy's here."

...boy toy?

"So... do you mind?" Asked the Lightning Guardian warily after edging in just enough to be taking that wordless invitation to come inside and shut the door to hold the air conditioning in, not really sure what to do with either answer that question could earn him.

"Tats is her own person." The Soviet Storm-Cloud informed him blandly, curling up on the somewhat battered sofa with the obvious bullet hole patches with an equally battered looking book. "My minding is not your opposition. Yet."

The flash of purple eyes over the top of that paper collection had him stiffening up all over again.

"Then again, if she becomes unhappy about anything..."

"It's mostly her idea."

"I don't care."

Before he could respond to that or heave a sigh of relief because the little sister was kind of one of the bigger things he was worried about taking things the wrong way, the bouncy Sun nurse flounced into the main room of their apartment. "Ready, Ganauche?"

"Always."

Even knowing the whole relationship was more being mutually used by each other than anything, when a Sun decided to be sociable in a really friendly way it was actually really addictive and more than a little flattering. Activation was a kind of charisma in itself, especially when they got bubbly with their delight and Flames so it started triggering sympathetic reactions in everyone else around.

The same trait that made Hard Flame Suns excellent nurses made them fantastic friends, and even better lovers.

Really, the fact Tatiana had informed him of her intents was more than most could hope for when a Sun decided to befriend someone. That was either variant, too.

She was greatly amused at the slightly awkward offering of the wildly colored tropical lilies, which admittedly he picked on his way out here from the CEDEF security offices. Ganauche was normally smoother than this, but this was the first time anyone from her admittedly intimidating family had been present to witness his actions too.
Maybe he should graduate to professional work, Tatiana fully deserved it and he'd be a hell of a lot less nervous over hand-picked gifts under Sonya's scrutiny.

However, the nurse was still delighted by anything he brought her. Even a handful of dying plants, she actually seemed to like them more than the cheap trinkets or even the diamond studded little cat charm for her old silver charm bracelet he scraped together the funds to buy her.

It was possible there was something about diamonds or platinum and thieves he didn't know about yet. He was having fun figuring things out and she was having fun stumping him in trying to ask, which was the only really important part in the exchange.

Sonya looked less than amused to have her water glass repurposed as a vase but allowed it peacefully enough while her sister arranged things to her liking.

"Don't wait up." Announced the redhead with a smirk, practically flopping on top of her prickly sibling in lieu of a more sedate hug of farewell or anything else. "I'll be home late, so there's things in the fridge for you if you get hungry."

Whatever the muffled response was made her laugh and earned the blonde an extra hug on top of nearly being flattened into cushions. The Storm-Cloud sighed heavily under the Sun, squirming after a bare moment unhappily from the close contact constraining her.

Bouncing off her sister, Tatiana flounced over to Ganauche's side in as few steps as she could get away with. "Okay, we can go."

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 4th of March, 1970 continued. Sonya & Tatiana's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

Sonya snorted softly as the door shut, trying not to think how often Vongola tended to screw up around here as she pried herself out of the crease between the back and the couch cushions she got shoved into.

Surely things would be different here. Ganauche was kind of defective, but Tatiana wasn't defenseless or vulnerable.

Fingers tapped on the ragged history text she was somewhat sure was taken from Albania that she was no longer reading, as her thoughts started churning around in circles.

It wasn't anything like Rasputin's situation, and that reminded her to ask either Usov or Anna to spare the time to see if they could do anything for Igor the moment she saw either next. Her sister was also pretty canny now she was grown and surer of herself, to the point the nurse could work and live somewhere like Mafia Land without so much as one major scuffle to talk about inconveniencing her.

Then again, Italians. She really hadn't been all that impressed with Renato's countrymen. In fact, had she not met the hitman first she would've concluded all Italian criminals were way too hidebound to be useful for much.

Frustrated, and now suspicious, the blonde glared down at her book as if it had insulted her.

Tatiana would not appreciate being spied upon. She could take care of herself, and Sonya even attempting to imply she couldn't would be… probably ugly.

Maybe… maybe only once?
Not because she doubted the nurse, just her date for the night. She only met him a few times, and that wasn't as the man her sister was somewhat interested in.

It would drive her up a wall to not at least check in on them. As long as her sister didn't catch her at it, like how Cherep stupidly waited outside the bar for her when Renato popped up in Austria, it should be fine.

…or she could just be brutally honest when her sister asked why she was following them. She had been informed about Sun Flame habits and those injured around them before, telling Tatiana it was just her Cloud-senses getting in a snit about potentially harmful influences near her even if she knew better than to doubt her elder sister… that just might just work too.

The nurse was also… likely unpracticed. Still a trained thief, but the edge had to be taken off over three years of bookwork or study for her profession. Her Fut Gar backhand was still harsh, and her sister was indefinitely more socially competent than her, but the sly skills were of an unknown quality. Getting caught was actually a rather sketchy possibility once she thought it through.

Ganauche's Lightning nature would be less than an obstacle, as the Mafioso himself. She knew perfectly well how to stalk mafia men now, and she highly doubted he'd be the exception.

Decided, she left her book on the coffee table next to her glass of water now holding a collection of wild blooms.

As she really didn't want to be spotted, Sonya took less traveled paths. Which were underground here, as the rooftops of Mafia Land were more populated than the thief appreciated. Forcing her to surface every now and again to just keep up with the couple.

She still really didn't appreciate the night-life here.

Yes, there were bars and nightclubs and whatnot… but here you could go in daylight hours and avoid the posturing drunk criminals tended to get into with each other. Everything got a lot less civilized when the sun set, and that was well before the booze was brought out or disputes about this or that lady's favors occurred as more people turned their attention to relaxing for the evening.

She kind of had to get used to it now, because there was no way she'd restrict herself indoors at night for as long as she lived with her sister.

Infuriatingly, when she passed the Chinatown sector, yet again she got asked to take a moment with this little old lady sipping tea on what was probably the porch of her business. Despite being obviously really busy, to the point the offer had to be made twice after the first one was ignored.

Baffling, said little old lady tutted her for glaring and manhandled her rather bravely to sit across her little veranda tea table. "You need break, not good for you."

…well, tea. Giving her sister enough of a head start to be fully distracted before sneaking up on her date with the Italian wasn't necessarily a bad plan, and it had been a while since she had a decent cup of green tea. "What's not good for me?"

"Angry, stress, you need relax." Humming something incomprehensible under her breath, an additional cup was produced from somewhere she was honestly impressed to not catch and poured before being pressed on the Russian. "Finish tea."

"Do I want to know what's going on?" Sonya inquired a touch less annoyed than she started in Mandarin Chinese, sniffing the fragrant liquid appreciatively and somewhat to catch anything that shouldn't be in simple green tea.
"Oh good, you speak a sensible tongue." Brightening even more, the tiny lady drew herself up approvingly and gave her a head to toe glance over. "You will make a fine wife and mother."

"This again? I do not need to be married to stay with someone, and I especially do not need to register my personal life with something as fucked up as a government that might mishandle the information to my or my supposed significant other's detriment."

Nodding somewhat sadly, the elderly lady sighed wistfully as she stared up at the stars just emerging in the dusky sky overhead. "Sensible, in a way. It is how I lost my husband... a rival group paid for the information. An insultingly low amount, but they found me. Had it not been for my husband, I would not be sitting here now."

Blanking on anything to say to that, the thief merely cradled the handle less cup of tea as she watched her tablemate warily. She hadn't looked, nor expected, to run into a lot of people that understood her desire to not get hitched.

Which were really mere excuses, because she just really didn't want yet another fucking name. Sheepish and a little regretful was her entire reaction, and it was somewhat startling to feel from just a few words of agreement.

"...it was long ago. You do not need to look so concerned. And, I notice you say nothing about being a mother."

"What do you know of my son?" Snapped the Russian suspiciously, only to blink blankly when she was yet again beamed at.

"You know the gender!"

"Of course I do, how could I not?" Shamal was rather obviously a little boy. Even that one time she got him in a dress he had shown no curiosity over gender roles or discomfort in his own skin, or even a desire to wear a bit of her makeup instead of play with it like anything new he encountered when he could.

What she really wanted to know was how a little Asian lady on Mafia Land knew of her godson, or that she even had one in the first place. If the Italians was telling people if they asked she was going to skin Ganauche and send Timoteo the results. Even if Tatiana would not appreciate needing to regenerate the skin on her boy toy if she wanted to keep him.

"Aa, yes. That's right. I should get you something to eat." Rising off her creaky knees, the old woman hobbled off inside the building before Sonya could gather her wits to refuse.

Tempted to just get up and leave, but reluctant to just in case she roused old sore memories she had really little right to do to the elderly, the Storm-Cloud drummed her fingernails off the cup.

She... didn't know where her sister was going on a date with Ganauche. It should be easy enough to figure out since she knew her siblings... except there was the Italian half to account for.

Hunting after mention of their passing would just tip off the nurse what she was doing later on, when rumor and gossip managed to catch up with her. Tatiana had a better information network than she did, especially being a nurse working in Mafia Land's hospital. Centralized, always present, probably delighted to help things along or add in a few touches of her own when gossip passed her by.

If she stayed, as polite behavior of a Chinese guest demanded even if she wasn't really sure where the little old lady generated from but that was the closest culture she was familiar with, she'd be thwarted in her intents this night.

Knowing, intellectually, that Tatiana and Ganauche had been on a couple of these date-nights without catastrophic happenings inconveniencing the Sun half was one thing. Didn't really help her much because she didn't see that for herself, and the man was getting to the point of being able to hurt her sister.

Sonya only had one older sister and didn't feel like giving hers up for any stupid reason, but… it was entirely possible this delay had likely let the couple get too far ahead now.

Something tangy and savory started sizzling behind her but also up a story or so, and with an annoyed sigh the thief made herself comfortable. If little old lady wanted to feed her, so she didn't see that for herself, and the man was getting to the point of being able to hurt her sister.

The whole not being able to see what was being made was an issue. Either hopefully the serving platters to share was also something her hostess's culture also conformed to or a taste tester wandered by sometime soon.

Studying the pedestrians either coming or going with an eye to corral a suitably expendable person, she noted Fong's appearance but since Mingxia would likely be upset if the Storm died in an embarrassing dietary snafu she was involved with she passed over him.

There was also the whole 'strongest Storm Flame in the world' thing she shouldn't forget.

Fong wasn't nearly as disinterested in her presence as she was in his, given the bee-line he made for her. "Sonya, I am glad someone managed to hold you for a short moment."

"I am being fed, but my hostess deems English as less desirable than what Chinese I know." Switching back to Mandarin, just in case the lady was eavesdropping from above and mistranslations were sometimes worse than being overheard, she eyed him warily. "There's not going to be another Tournament so soon, is there?"

"It's likely there will be enough momentum to ensure there will be another later this year, however I doubt another hostage arrangement will happen." The martial artist examined the table set out, glanced upward for some reason she wasn't looking to find out, then refocused on her. "Sonya, are you aware of what is being said?"

"About?" If this was another of those 'wild gossip' things like the 'she was pregnant' one Renato basically had an aneurysm over trying to figure out without directly asking… she was going to punch someone.

That had been somewhat embarrassing.

"That you're pregnant?"

Exactly the same, wow… it'd been a few months and that hadn't distorted somehow yet?

Sonya shot him a skeptical look. "I am not pregnant. Who started that rumor?"

Fong, the ridiculous battle-happy dork, heaved a thankful sigh as he sat himself down off the veranda almost at her booted feet. Even if that left the tip of his ever-present braid to dip into the grit on the paved road this building was situated on. "I am unaware, but a few are now convinced I was the one to… ah…"
"Contribute to my imaginary condition?" Her sarcastic drawl earned a huff of laughter, and although she looked over the tea table she couldn't see an extra cup or where the little old lady pulled hers out from. "I regret to inform you that it isn't the first time I've been the target of mafia gossip, and if you're living here it's only a matter of time before you become the subject of another one. Hopefully, that time you'll do something that I'm not connected to."

"Hopefully, the next rumor will be delivered in a less… surprising method." Muttered the man sourly, settling his hands in his wide sleeves and apparently settling in to keep her company while she lingered in Triad territory.

She hadn't been greatly bothered when ducking through the Chinatown sector of Mafia Land before but then again, she did somewhat recently 'blow her top' in China to the point they were still trying to decide what they made of her.

"I was somewhat worried you were pregnant before attending the Underworld Tournament as my hostage, had you been nothing I would say would convince the others I was not the father of your child."

There was a mutter of something else she was going to pointedly ignore, referencing her gunshot injury and how terrible the Storm would feel if his drive to invite her to spare his sister the same experience had killed her unborn child. The sentiment was understandable but the implication she'd be that reckless with a baby, especially her own before it could live, was somewhat insulting.

"To note, the Martial Arts Tournament the Triads is trying to get off the ground isn't the only Mafia only tournament in existence. To be clear you should probably say the entire title." She picked to continue with instead of address that, sipping her green tea when he blinked at her blankly. "There's the Underworld Cooking Tournament."

"...I believe I misheard you."

"Probably not."

Fong blankly stared at her, eyes just a touch wide, probably the closest she could get him to dumbfounded in such an open area like this. Sonya sipped her rapidly cooling tea idly while he adjusted.

"Someone got a cooking tournament established, before a fighting tournament?"

"According to what I've learned about it working for the Black-Market Spice Trade, it's utterly cutthroat and nearly a combative tournament in itself." Offered the thief just because his reaction was highly amusing if she was being delayed here, smirking when red eyes stared at her reprovingly. "And I only worked for them once, getting a recipe. The next place to be holding it is in debate right now but the Committee deciding should be done soon, if you wanted to go see one."

"I will pass." Decided the Storm solidly, pretending he didn't comprehend her expression and instead peacefully radiating contentment to sit there.

"Are you waiting for something?"

"Validation."

Validation for what?

Before she could ask, or even puzzle over his one-word answer, little old lady bustled out of her place of business with a large platter of… some kind of fried steamed bun.
Fong looked delighted. Sonya figured she found herself a taste tester. Old and insistent beamed at the addition.

…oh, wait. "I am not pregnant. I have a godchild, I thought you were speaking of him."

"There's time." Decided old and forward decided after a moment to fucking pout at the news, reaching over to pat her shoulder once the platter was on the tea table and the martial artist was given his own cup of tea. "You both are young and healthy, it will not be long."

Why the hell was she being reassured?

…and why was Fong included in that?

From the sigh a touch lower and to her right, the Storm she was seated with found the little old biddy equally as exasperating as she did.

---

(Friday the 6th of March, 1970. Zürich, Canton of Zürich, Swiss Confederation.)

Björn nervously glanced over, but Viper wasn't paying him any attention.

Swallowing a touch hard, he hadn't… intended to do any 'hands-on' work himself until the miser poked holes in his arguments with cruel logic, the Icelander squared his thankfully broad shoulders up then stepped out of the Mist Flames concealing him up to this point.

His being 'wishy-washy' would reflect badly on his patron, in the end. Being that 'soft, toothless target' at Sonya's back would mean she would be forced to spend too much effort securing him against both her own and his fairly earned enemies. If he could handle his own work, without wasting money on a team of bodyguards to do everything for him aside just another set of eyes to watch his back when his eyes were turned away, that would simplify and reduce complications by factors.

…and save a significant amount of money. Viper was rather more intent on the whole cutting cost aspect, but Björn was contentious of the drain of time and effort. Sonya was running low on both, he was no longer her only minion to mind.

It was different if there was only two of them, now there were more targets who all might not be able to defend themselves. Given Russian sensibilities, being the reason they were targeted was not something he wanted to explain to the Soviet woman.

Narrowing his gaze on the badly startled Swiss stock broker, gaping at him stepping out of the badly illuminated corner of his own personal office, Björn allowed a tight smile to slip loose. "Schüpbach, I require a… word."

"...who the hell-"

Driving a heavy knife into the man's office desk, thankfully a wooden one which allowed that without requiring Viper's Flames for intimidation, cut the Swiss man off with a startled oath. "Schüpbach, I require a… word."

"You told a few men that the Poseidon stocks were something to invest with early." Tugging his knife out of the heavy wood, ignoring the nervous twisting in his guts and the lump in his throat actually doing this himself caused, Bjørn allowed what little light the man's tiny lamp gave off to play over the edge. "Who advised you to claim that?"

"Look, whoever you are, I don't have to answer."

Driving his knife into a hand he snatched and yanked across the desk this time, the Lackey allowed his lips to peel back for a toothier if blander smile. The smell, and the hot blood, added with the automatic flinch from harming someone's hand… Viper wouldn't let him throw up or shudder and right now he was bewilderingly thankful for it.

"Make the time." Bjørn advised his victim as tonelessly as he could manage. "If not…"

Twisting the knife just a tiny bit earned him a full-body cringe from Schüpbach. "Fuck… a man by the name of Singline. In England. Now get fucking out!"

"Mou… no." Viper droned from the back corner behind the Lackey. "Answer honestly."

Blanching, the man tried to pry the Lightning-Storm's grip off his arm and the knife. Desperately, failing, and actually making his injury worse without requiring the Icelander to do it himself.

…apparently either Mist Flames or Viper themself was known well enough to terrify civilian stock brokers.

Or this wasn't a civilian stock broker.

Shifting his offhand grip quickly, Bjørn gripped the hand trying to pry his off and gave enough of a shock of Lightning Flames to make the man sit up and take him equally as seriously. "That is not who you should be worried about. Now again, who told you to promote Poseidon stock to international buyers?"

"I already told you!" Hissed the man dressed in tweed, likely in shock and now more than half terrified out of his mind. "I've got nothing else for you."

"The hard way, then." Bjørn concluded grimly, yanking his knife free and leaning back as he inspected the dark blood clotting slowly on it. Pulling a handkerchief out of his breast pocket to clean it before returning it to the sheath his right-hand pants pocket was altered to allow strapped to his thigh, then and only then did he return his gaze to the man slamming his phone receiver into the cradle in frustration. "This would have been over with had you been honest."

He earned a mockingly sarcastic laugh as Schüpbach sat back in his chair with a nasty sneer. "No, no it wouldn't. I know people like you, no matter what I say it's never going to be 'enough' or 'true'. Fuck you."

"Unfortunately for you, I have a fool-proof way to know if I'm being lied to." Pointed out the Icelander simply, with a glance over his shoulder to the still utterly shadowy corner of the lonely office. "So actually, you don't know people like us."

"Us..." Given the glance in the same direction he looked in, now the Swiss stock broker was plotting in how to ensure they were implicated in his assault or murder.

Reaching forward, slowly to prevent any scuffle starting early, he touched a finger to the blood pooling on the scarred wood. The viscous fluid evaporated into nothing but dusty ash. "I am afraid… you will not be surviving this."
Schüpbach spent a whole moment too long trying to understand what he was seeing, by the time he thought to scream for attention Viper had long since ensured no one would hear him.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 6th of March, 1970 continued. Zürich, Canton of Zürich, Swiss Confederation.)

Viper had a horrible sense of humor.

Björn queasily poked the medium rare steak of veal the Mist ordered for him while he was a bit busy, taking care of the… 'remains' of his first interrogation effort. Having to do it all alone was apparently part of his 'lessons', which he only learned of after they extracted actually correct information.

After a couple hours.

"You're too wordy. It slows you down." Whatever language the other was using was… incomprehensible, but the meaning got across perfectly well as it was. "Short, concise, to the point. Mou, the longer you draw things out the more risk you expose yourself to."

"I hardly see the point." The Icelander offered in his native language still, resigning himself to paying for a meal he wasn't going to eat even if that would make the Mist get short with him for wasting food. "It's unreliable."

"What are your alternatives then, mou?"

"Bribery, better odds to gaining true information. Blackmail, if I didn't wish to pay an individual that already mislead me." He immediately listed off sourly, drumming his fingers on the table between them. "I do not mean to say I am ungrateful for the lessons, Viper. It's just… wasteful, not to my tastes. I don't want to do that again."

The hooded Mist scoffed with irritation. "You've been infected with Russian sensibilities, I see."

"Not all of them. Just the non-vory ones."

"I'm not sure if I should dismiss that as soft or appreciate it as ruthlessly practical." A moment of visibly pondering the issue, then Viper shrugged both the Constructed image of contemplation as well as the whole topic off. "Mou, regardless…"

"We already knew where to go next, why did you insist on this?"

"You need… blooding." Offered the genderless figure dictating what he did here, pausing in their leisurely grazing to pick up the wineglass instead. "Confidence in yourself will save your life in tight situations, but to gain it truly you not only need to know what you are capable of but what you can do in the end. Faking only gets you halfway there, take it from the illusionist here. Mou, the moment someone presses pass that what barbs do you have to ward them off?"

"Aside a highly pissed off Russian who pays my salary?"

"Will that save you in the moment? Mou… against those that do not know of our Elements?"

Björn kept his mouth shut.

"Will that prevent anyone coming after you? Even if it's suicidal?" Pressed the Mist insistently, tipping the wineglass just so the red shadow it casted in the dim lighting backlit the purple triangles tattooed on their face and gave a red gleam to hidden eyes. "There's always going to be that one moron to test limits, to press just that tiny bit more. Sometimes it works, sometimes it doesn't. When it does, that individual is brilliant. A maverick and an admirable risk taker. When it doesn't… well. Morons are about a dozen per centime. The stupid, idiots, the village rejects. This isn't to prepare you against the smarter of our number, mou, this is to arm you against morons and those that think they're brilliant but really are utterly retarded."

When the Lackey didn't respond, or at least didn't respond right away, Viper settled back into their seat and polished off their glass of wine.

"So… admittedly, your suggestions are more than decent. Mou, I am particularly a fan of the blackmail route, so we shall try that one next. Eventually, you will hit up a method that gives you an appreciable amount of truth for a price you find just right. To understand how much truth you get for each, we need a new name and the ability to control the whole system beforehand. This was only an investment of time, and as you saw held a dubious amount of truth in it."

"I'd put more faith in someone lying in my face, even when in pain, to ensure I end up facing something I cannot actually survive against."

"That can happen." Allowed the Mist idly. "As can being led into a pre-set trap for someone hunting among information brokers without paying for it. Being sent after those with nothing to do with the topic you want to register a complaint against like a hitman or assassin, mou… or ending up hunting someone outside the umbrella of the mafia."

"Aren't we doing that?"

"Mou, Schüpbach was selling information to those like me for a price. That more than validates him as the top layer of the crime happening in this country, and when I spread the news among the other information brokers about his misleading of an associate of a Cloud… well, mou. No one important will miss him."

Glancing down at his still full plate, the Icelander looked up as he pushed it away. "Is… there anyone I need to be aware of coming after me for his…?"

Viper snorted. "No."

(Monday the 9th of March, 1970. Butwal, Kingdom of Nepal.)

The last contract Renato Sinclair would ever take for Mafia Land led him through some interesting terrain and hunter squads before even reaching the fringe of a little kingdom he had little idea actually existed.

Being in a remote little country off the northern tip of India at least meant when the fastest idiots trying to kill him caught up, they stuck out just as badly as the Italian did himself. Outside the interference of luckless murderers he quickly put into the ground, the contract he was here to do was a kind of social dispute getting out of hand.

Only… someone had connections. Rather respectable ones, given this was a legitimate Mafia Land hit contract.

It was far enough outside his 'usual' known haunts and completely beyond his nominal network of contacts that Renato hoped the change would help cement the idea he was losing his grip with all the other distractions happening in his life. Even if a rather murderous group trying to kill him got 'disappeared' here, as per usual when some moron thought they could take him, picking contracts so far outside of 'known' areas of operation was generally regarded as a fast way to get caught.

Or the desperate scraping together the bare minimum they can get to struggle back to their feet.

Reporting in for the fine details in-country, however…

"Run that by me again?" Inquired the Mafia almost cautiously, too confused to really put much heat into the question.

His 'host' and contact point sighed, as if he was intentionally being difficult. "Those Hindu bastards are refusing to sell, because one of their 'sacred' cows like to rest in the field. We need that field, for our... operations. Kill the damn bovine, but. Use this. Please."

Automatically accepting the small tarnished copper figure of a robed lady with eight arms, and some kind of headdress or crown that was at least pointed enough to be of use as asked with enough effort, the hitman flattened his mouth into a thin line and stared hard at the man.

Religious differences weren't all that surprising for the Mafia to get tangled up with. Belief was a strong driving aspect in a large number of humans, and about half the world's history of conflict had something rooted in religious intolerance or hate. A bit… bewildering in this aspect, but Mafia Land was international.

A Catholic hitman being called in for a tiff between some civilian Hindu group and this well-connected band of Muslims was... well, a bit strange. Outsourcing the blame was understandable for future neighbors who only had a single reason to be at odds right now, but the bad luck to grab this specific contract instead of something less out there was phenomenal.

Even for him.

"Anywhere in particular you want this to happen?" Renato inquired simply and a bit blankly, once he adjusted to the proposed murder weapon in hand. He rolled a thumb over the tip of the headdress to feel how dull it was and how much muscle would be needed to actually use it to kill something.

Animals tended to have thicker hides than humans, getting this through a cow's skin and the muscles even somewhere like the neck would take a bit of doing. He'd have to lend his Flames for the problem, just so he wasn't at it all night to the point he got caught at this.

"Overnight, and perhaps in the same field their cow likes to nap within. They'd sell it in a heartbeat if you can."

Technically, putting a hit on a cow was covered by Mafia Rules a Mafia like him had to obey. Going after mascots and figureheads of hostile syndicates was a hitman option more than an assassin's, because taking away a point of pride to demoralize another group you were at odds with wasn't direct enough for them. Additionally, between an animal's life and that of a human being's... well, the Church would greatly prefer keeping the innocents alive so attacking their symbols was indefinitely more acceptable.

As in this... job.

No one was really innocent in this fraction of the world, he was hired by drug dealers to run off a group of traffickers in more human merchandise from a stretch of earth one didn't need and the other wanted to expand into.
However, religiously holy bovines being tossed into the mix was... a... new one for him.

Scratching the back of his head with the hand not holding the proposed murder weapon, the Sun Flame hitman glanced from the tarnished copper to the contact and back again before shrugging. "Alright then."

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 9th of March, 1970 continued. Butwal, Kingdom of Nepal.)

A rice paddy.

A hit on a holy cow, to take place in a rice paddy, using a religious figurine.

Renato was never going to breathe the word of his last Mafia Land contract to anyone, even to himself. It was a knickknack paddy whack, like the children's nursery rhyme.

If anyone heard about this, no one would ever respect him again. He'd be a laughingstock, a joke, and frankly he was well aware that would gall him for eternity even if he shed the name known for this.

The long-horned and mostly white colored cow with three rather large splotches of black fur on its rump chewed on something idly, eyeing him with absolutely no wariness or caution as the hitman delicately picked his way across the earthen mounds separating this water drenched section of terraced farm fields from the lower valley plots that weren't in contention less than a meter down and set into the earth at least half that way.

Coming to a stop in front of the animal still earned him absolutely no reaction. The damn beast in fact rolled over, settling into the waters lapping its side and smearing mud over the upraised flank to keep away the biting insects aided by a few wet slaps of a tufted tail.

...he was going back to take another 'last' Mafia Land contract. He'd make the time, and if no good contract was available he'd ensure the 'last' professional act of Renato Sinclair was suitably bloody and hard to miss on his own.

This was not what he was going out doing, a fucking knickknack paddy whack was never going to be remotely impressive to anyone.

For Christ's sake, the cow looked highly unimpressed already and he had yet to do anything!

(Thursday the 12th of March, 1970. Rome, Italian Republic.)

The waiter delicately set out the desserts ordered on the table, whisking away the remains of dinner she had been delicately picking at to avoid this part. Luce of the Giglio Nero smiled softly at the teenager, then with a soft sigh returned her attention to the latest Elemental Guardian prospect she had found herself face to face with.

"Down to business then, I suppose." Started the Sky serenely, deliberately misinterpreting why the buff man had been sent to meet with her instead of the Don that had asked for this meeting. "What was it your famiglia wanted to know so badly?"

"...lady Luce-"
"I'm aware we are not the easiest information brokers to find," barreled on the Sky heedlessly, taking ruthless advantage of the awe around her Flame type to avoid a massive insult about to be issued souring relations when she really didn't have the time to deal with it, "we're preparing for a bit of... something about to happen which is really rather distracting. I must admit, while my famiglia respects dedication in our work to a rather bemusing degree... to reach us through our preparations shows a flattering amount in your own."

Drawing himself up rather proudly, under the slightly mistaken impression she was impressed with him, the slightly younger Rain paused rather obviously trying to think of something.

He would never get another chance beyond this once, it was one of the less risky meetings Luce had to suffer through. Having gotten out of her territory once, in a social function that ended rather disastrously but not nearly as badly as it could've been, shutting herself in again until the Arcobaleno reformed for the pre-Cursed jobs would do no one much good.

Not her own famiglia or Vongola, or anyone else that got 'insulted' or 'suspicious' over her distance.

The next time she saw this young Rain, Luce and the rest of the Mafia would know Lal and Colonello. Even on their own, one of those Rains could effortlessly outdo him blinded and with one hand tied behind their backs.

Mostly, her people were digging out an underground secret library and sorting out what had to be hidden there for the next few years. Just so a damn curious and suspicious thief wouldn't discover the wrong detail at the just right time to warn the rest. It had to be done and finished soon, otherwise any of the future Arcobaleno would be able to find it when they cased around suspiciously after meeting her from the barely worn paths from the foot traffic.

A full year of no visitors, and it would require a day or three of intent search for Sonya to find it. After Luce died, and the Arcobaleno tried to help Aria adjust to her new role as the Ninth head of the Giglio Nero and their Sky, then the thief would have the time and effort to spare on securing someone else's territory.

The problem with being an Arcobaleno Sky, rather the biggest issue being a future one with the gift of foresight. She would have the best of the best around her, the pinnacle of Flames but more importantly of specialized skills, and if she had Guardians when they met her the Arcobaleno would be too reserved around her for them to come together just enough for Checkerface to Curse.

They'd do the rest of it after she betrayed them so they would survive... or not, until Vongola Decimo broke the Curse or it was no longer needed.

Even when she didn't intend to, it was nearly impossible to stop comparing every other Flame users to the ultimate examples of each she would know personally in time.

No other Sun could come close to Reborn's blisteringly strong Flames. Any average Storm off the street could never match Fon's tempered if still wild inferno. No diplomatically trained Rain like this young man could match Lal's banked if fiery blaze or Colonello's lazy but steadfast scorching fires. Even Verde's brilliance eclipsed the same phenomena his Flames were named after in ways that might never be seen again, much less overshadowing how the bent Lightnings in Italy remained in their conduits without so much as flickering outside them. Viper was practically untouchable in their Mist even by other Mists yet could sear holes in any that tried to direct or dictate a shape they had to take. Skull's unquenchable, eternal embers that would require a near-god to snuff out against his will to even how his little sister Sonya's Flames practically seethed when parted from him, both still easily eclipsed any of the rare Clouds that still drifted free on their own.
When young Flame users like the baby-faced Rain across from her tried to impress her, she was never impressed nearly enough. It wasn't even his fault, it was hers.

Luce was always well aware she was a spoiled Sky, it was times like this that reminded her of why rather clearly.

The Rain Guardian Candidate being offered to her, as she couldn't take his being shoved in her direction to forge good connections with a close neighbor in any other way, finally settled on something to say. "Donna Giglio Nero, nearly outside our territory a... small blot of unknowns operating in Tivoli, Lazio. The few we, I mean my famiglia, sent to investigate found nothing unusual to report but the lack of business we would normally receive from the locals has dried up."

…the Gesso Famiglia. More accurately, the start to the vassal syndicate that would help Aria so much in a decade or so after the heirs met and became friends in Mafia School.

Pursing her lips tightly for a moment, actually rather surprised there was a reason beyond being the most banal or keeping connections mutually agreeable to attend this meeting, the Sky rewarded him with a businesslike nod after deciding on how much to say. "The locals are not intentionally snubbing you, it is just they found a local problem already being solved and have taken to talking to their native son with their... issues, than those outside the city."

The surprisingly diplomatically trained Rain slightly settled back in his seat to memorize the information for later reporting to his Don. "Just the locals? That... would explain the decrease in requests..."

They'd be murdered to a man if they tried to 'discourage' the formation of a local criminal syndicate before it formed up, since they looked at it as a small thing right now and not the men of an entire township deciding to pull together after a rather harrowing event. A full out fight between the old guard and the new up and comers would do nothing but irritate the locals and the rest of Italy's Famiglias, because it would inevitably spill into the civilian sector with one too new to be well defined for the other to know how to fight them.

Luce spent the energy to foresee the short-term outcome of a few responses she might give, which made her a touch spacy and a little more than distracted than recommended when dealing with relative unknowns like the young man across from her. Aria would need them in time, and that was really all the Sky cared for to nudge things in their favor.

"They might just welcome some help, as long as you refrain from trying to smother them." She decided simply, after some more time spent making sense of what she saw when the young man was seemingly alright with waiting out her distraction. "The Todd Famiglia has been trying to sink their nails into them and fighting that influence off has rather disorientated their information gathering abilities and drained their energy somewhat."

His face went completely blank. "The... Todd. I see."

"Have completely failed in their aims. Hence the... ah, issue the men in Tivoli objected to in the first place. The care for their countrymen deserves some kind of reward, don't you think?"

Todds were... mainly assassins, just a touch too far outside of respectable for most southern Italians to tolerate. They rarely had anything to do with the others in-country that close to Rome, Vongola wouldn't let them drift so far south. However, there was the formation of Tyr's Varia Squads to account for.

Apparently, someone sensed a rival.
The fact a high-ranking member of the Gospella Famiglia as the favored nephew of the current Don had no idea the Todd Famiglia were slinking around his home territory like that meant someone didn't ask for permission or even informed them as per the courtesy accords in the Vongola Alliance required for every member. It didn't matter if one wasn't part of that, the other was and that was the only important part as far as the Alliance Dons were concerned with.

Only the CEDEF didn't have to inform other Dons of their movements, and the CEDEF was more concerned with rooting out traitors or betrayers to the Vow to be hindered for such a thing.

"My compliments to your uncle, young master Saverio. I rarely have delightful dinner companions these days, since we insisted on making ourselves so busy." Luce concluded their meeting, after nibbling the last of the chocolate mousse off her thin dessert spoon.

Her cooks were nowhere near as skilled with the treat, she refused to tell them she liked the dish otherwise they'd perfect it and then drown her in it until she didn't anymore. She had to get it where she could until Skull invited her to take advantage of his sister's chef and his skills for her next birthday.

Startled, and torn between finishing his apparently excellent introduction to an apparently amenable Sky or rushing home to report the trespass against them to his Don, eventually the Rain concluded there was nothing more to do to better his chances but take his leave.

The rumors born from this, the fact the Giglio Nero were in the middle of some kind of preparation of something big, would ease some of those invitations she had to spend hours on politely refusing in ways that would not offer further insult. Some feathers would be ruffled and smoothed equally, as they weren't the ones she spoke to or at least there was some kind of explanation for why it was only Don Vongola's invitation she accepted so far.

Luce really hated politics. It was rather boring when you already knew the reactions, and as they were not hers why bother manipulating them in better and better positions when they'd get there just fine on their own?

A future ally made things only slightly more interesting, but not by much.

Probably why no one of her line had tried taking over the world, why spoil everything like that when so much already had the teeth of risk blunted to be ignorable?

( Friday the 13th of March, 1970. Sonya & Tatiana's Apartment, Mafia Land.)

"I'm really proud of you."

"Mmm…?" The absently tacked on questioning tone added on belatedly to the end of the entirelyabsently made sound proved the blonde thief was paying no attention to anything at all.

Tatiana, who had strictly structured schedules so she could be paid and matched up with Doctor Kappel's working hours when a nurse was needed to fill out the hospital's roster, hadn't really seen her sister for a couple days.

Obviously, someone had also spent the time to add to her security measures. She nearly tripped over one this weekend in the early morning and got her bell royally rung when something was adjusted just a slight bit outside of where they had been before. As a matter of fact, it looked as if a few more 'tiny' readjustments had gone on, so she actually prevented stubbing her toe on the coffee table for once this week and didn't trip over the armchair she bought to go with the couch as she flopped down into it.

Sonya kind of slept through the mornings, went out and about for some grim reason she refused to eased up on around lunch and sometimes into the evening, and while she'd sometimes eat the easily heated leftovers the Sun left in the fridge while she was working… not nearly enough for her to feel as if she was feeding her baby sister properly.

Or at all, really. She was likely eating out mainly, because the other thief didn't do much more than nibble on things stocked in the fridge. Which worked, because that gave Tatiana a few more minutes here or there to cram in a few more pages of her current medical journal instead of spending the time cooking something else on her meal breaks.

From what rumors and whispers that reached her well after the fact, this whole week had been Sonya polishing up her acrobatic skills and just generally being pointedly seen out in the streets.

"You didn't stalk me and Ganauche on our date last week."

"I tried." Shot down the Storm-Cloud immediately, pulling her nose out of a letter that got hand delivered earlier that morning which woke her up this early and glancing over to her. "I got waylaid. Ended up having dinner with Fong and this really forward little old Asian lady that told me I was young and healthy enough to have a child sometime soon and to not worry about it."

Trying, and utterly failing at, stopping the snort of laughter made her sinuses hurt. She hadn't heard that, or any 'really forward little old lady' being utterly terrified out of her wits for annoying the only Cloud in Mafia Land.

The only reason Sonya wouldn't retaliate or ensure someone knew she thought they were too forward was if the 'forwardness' was to be expected. She would know, she had a lot to do with the Triads recently…

"Is that… ah, usual for little old ladies to reassure people they just met about?"

"Annoyingly enough, yes." Sourly groused the other thief, somewhat drifting back to the letter. "Not to say I don't trust you or believe you can't deal with anything that happens, Tats… I just don't fucking trust Ganauche."

…right, baby sister admitted to trying to stalk her on her date. "It's been a month and some of light date nights."

Sonya shot her an entirely skeptical look over the top of the papers, utterly unimpressed with that logic and having no reason to hide it.

"I can take care of myself, Nya."

"Of course you can. Ganauche?"

"Don't you know him from your time attending the Vongola Balls?"

"Vaguely." Dismissed the younger thief blandly, folding up her letter as apparently the nurse was now more important than whatever some poor kid knocked on the front door to deliver to her. "I know he's a Lightning, one of Timoteo Vongola's Guardians, and he's a bit defective. He's also prone to being a target, someone tried to blow him up using a car. It's how he lost his eye."

"You were there? Wait… a car bomb, or a bomb in a car?"
"Ask Cherep, the two of them were talking about a 'clicking noise' that was wrong with it before it went boom."

In her ever so educated opinion dealing with the ass end results of those kinds of situations, and the injury patterns that tended to also happen she and the others in the hospital tended to treat, Ganauche was fucking lucky.

…also, lucky Sonya didn't gut him for bringing something harmful around their brother.

Tatiana made a slightly frustrated sound, mentally reviewing scar patterns and how they had to been caused but with only a partial set of data to work from meant she was likely missing a lot of factors. She only saw the scars around the eyepatch, so there was known missing patterns.

Obviously, as the Lightning was still alive, they hadn't been up close and personal with any exploding car.

"So… there actually is a lower chance you'd help Ganauche get his eye back if he asked than I figured."

From the utterly blank look on her little sister's face, that was a 'not even if hell froze over' response she didn't want to actually give her.

"Will anything change that?"

Pondering the question, obviously to give her time to stall with than to really think about it, the Storm-Cloud decided inspecting the rug placed out to give a bit of insulation between air-conditioned cold floorboards and bare feet was more important than looking at her. "…do I have to?"

"No, you don't have to." The response was an utterly suspicious and entirely doubtful frown, and Tatiana smirked wryly. "It's your Flames. If you're not going to tell anyone that Cherep can do the same, or that you learned from him, then that's your right. I'd like you to, because something else to study and draw conclusions from when we also fix Adrik's lung is… you know, helpful."

Sonya leaned her head against the couch's backrest, scrutinizing her closely. "You're not going to put in your feelings on the matter?"

"I'm a nurse, mine should be obvious and I don't feel like asking you to do something you don't think is a good idea as your sister and not just as a healer. Unless you decided to do it yourself, I'm not weighing in."

"But you will ask for Adrik?"

"Adrik we know, he's one of ours who won't fuck you over for helping him. Ganauche is new and isn't ours. We're way too new as a couple to start manipulating assets to help the other out of their own problems." Tatiana announced solidly, arms crossed and frowning back at the blonde watching her from the couch. "Besides, I don't know him that well and I rather like you better still."

Her baby sister's lips twitched, which meant she was amused she just didn't feel like expressing it. "I'll think about it. I'm going to head off since Viper hasn't seen fit to return Björn by now, I'll probably dump off Verde first to coordinate the cleaning and outfitting of my castle before going to China and Romania in that order."

"Works for me, you going to do your contracts later this year then?"

"Kind of used to spending months on other things and not the things I really should work on." With a shrug that wasn't really that dismissive just accepting, the younger thief got up to pad off to her room to start packing up again. "I really only need about four months to finish it all off, thankfully."

…yeah, four months to do what normally took other contract thieves a full year to do. Not even counting the Lackey she also needed to afford the room and board for, which was a tiny bit more on top of what she also had to do.

She'd fail, she liked more time to plan things out. The blonde was more used to making due with what she could grab and could improvise better.

…then again, Tatiana was a safe cracker slash forgery expert. She needed more time, Sonya didn't.

(Saturday the 14th of March, 1970. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

Shamal startled, flinching away from the cool hand he hadn't expected pressing against his forehead and nearly took a tumble off the medical bed when he got a bit unbalanced. Since he had been watching the sky out the window instead of anything going on in the room, he swallowed down the irritation he had for the interruption and stared up at his visitor.

Lady Fiorella smirked at him, elegantly seating herself in the empty chair next to the bed so he didn't have to crane his sore neck around to see her face. "How are you feeling?"

"... I'm okay." It kind of sucked he was sick on the weekend, he had kind of hoped if he ignored the fever long enough he'd recover enough to go on the club trip. It almost happened, but he kind of…
passed out rather unexpectedly.

The young Mist had been rather mortified when he woke up only seconds later, especially as a maid had only been halfway to the medical wing to get him checked out. Revelli, old lady Ottavia's Sun Guardian, had not looked at all impressed with him waiting so long before admitting he was sick to someone.

"Lady Fiorella, you really shouldn't be here." Shamal attempted to instruct the nice lady, his stern tone somewhat ruined by a bit of a nasally break in his voice. "Sick Mists do strange things."

He was handed a tissue with a stern look until he obligingly blew his nose. "I wouldn't want one of my sons left alone in a sick bay, I don't think your mother will like the thought either. Besides, you won't hurt me."

"It's not a matter of 'want', Lady Fiorella." He didn't whine, he simply protested with a particular tone and maybe a bit of waving of arms so he'd be taken seriously. "I don't have control, that's why Master Revelli had everyone else moved out for a bit."

The pretty brunette very pointedly looked down the room both ways, where absolutely nothing that could be labeled strange or weird was going on. "You seem to be rather impressively in control, young Shamal. Daniella lent Glisenti to Revelli's aid, but she's had little to do from what she said when I talked to her."

After blinking at her a bit fuzzily, Shamal harrumphed and sulked in his cot. "At least someone has sense to be on guard."

If he hurt Lady Fiorella, Nono Vongola would be very unhappy. As would his godfather. His godmother might not be remotely concerned, because coming in here was the other pretty lady's fault so if anything happened it'd be expected rather than to be upset about.

Shamal would actually agree with Nono and Mister Renato. He had the Flames, Lady Fiorella did not. If he hurt her it would be his fault.

"Someone let slip you can't focus enough to read yourself." Commented the pretty lady, carefully picking up the old book Miss Sonya allowed him to borrow from her. "I have about half an hour or so of free time, would you mind if I read a bit of your godmother's book if I read it aloud?"

"...would you?" He was almost done reading it, he was on the last story with the wolf and the goat. His godmother had asked to try and find a moral to each fable, and while some were easy the others took a bit of thought.

The young Mist found in depth thought kind of painful right now, but Miss Sonya hadn't said he had to find any meanings alone. Getting help was always a valid option, Mister Renato said so.

"Where would you suggest I start?"

"The beginning?" Shamal had the time, and if Lady Fiorella was volunteering he might as well make the most of the opportunity the best he could. "Please?"

Chapter End Notes

Full credit goes to Colin Mochrie of Whose Line is it Anyways? fame for the knickknack paddy-whack joke.
Chapter 107

(Monday the 16th of March, 1970. De Mort Castle, Moneglia, Province of Genoa, Liguria, Italian Republic.)

Verde found it somewhat disquieting when he was tasked with starting on transferring the luggage instead of physically muscling another man into the surprisingly tall building. Sonya showed absolutely no strain from it, unlike the only time he had to be Adrik's support, easily bracing the taller man with only one arm shoved under his to prevent undue stress on his ribcage while she supported his forward progress at his pace.

"You could've stayed behind…"

Her fellow Russian gave a painful snort, eyes locked grimly on the looming doors and the interior where he could afford to rest in relative comfort.

Instead of hover uselessly around the pair when he couldn't assist either, the scientist checked over the medical supplies Tatiana had assembled the moment Adrik refused to be left behind even if he was not currently physically fit enough for any security related duties. The wiry Russian was only just healthy enough to be discharged without expected complications, whereas any 'civilian' establishment would sensibly refuse for at least another week of recovery.

That was assuming another medical center was unaware how recently the man had his ribcage pried open. The skin was healed, the muscle mostly healed, the bone knitted together under the influence of Sun Flames… but the organ remained damaged and the ache remained as the body tried to adjust to the new state of being injured and not in different places.

The nurse sent along nearly ten grams worth of opium derived morphine, evenly divided into portions of oral tablets and injectable forms for managing any pain Adrik caused himself or to help the man get some rest in spite of it. With the expected equipment to properly administer an IV, a near jumble of sterilized bandages if a brace for his ribs were desired, less addictive medication variants for self-medication when lesser pains plagued his waking moments… and the equipment to take a culture or samples if yet another complication came about.

Tatiana had run the Lightning through the very butchered requirements to be a hospital lab technician for St. Julian's, mainly to embarrass and motivate one of her fellow Flame using nurses working on qualifying for the same. The end result was he was now legally and technically qualified for the more basic research-oriented medical roles, and while Verde honestly did not expect the information to actually be applicable when the next medical emergency arose… it made for an appreciatively solid base to build off of in his studies.

Zipping the cooler closed again once assured the vials endured the trip intact and reassembling the clearly labeled plastic if sturdy medical chest which could be utilized as a seat easily enough, the Frenchman tucked the field-worthy military issued container under one arm and used the other to secure the preserved provisions they would live off of until supply lines were secured.

Not his terms, Verde had been informed that was what the contents were intended for when Sonya had him accompany her to ensure they could live for a short while if something concerning happened. The one-armed man that sold them the food supplies had seemed rather militaristic, and his words merely confirmed the impression taken of either a mercenary or military bent.

The lesson that 'provisions' and how to find an adequate measure to last a set time was infinitely more complicated than he expected was… not expected. Adrik had secured theirs while Verde had been doing the bulk of the manufacturing of weapons they sold to afford it, so the detail of where the spoiling resistant food came from or how the thief provided alternate clothing for another man had been somewhat ignored. When confronted with what is normally considered 'personal' details so a slim blonde lady could purchase the items needed for hygiene routines, clothing size and styles preferred, if Adrik had any allergies or if he had them himself to last for a short while before they could find the places to provide them locally… he found himself less observant than he desired.

He blinked somewhat uncomprehendingly when Sonya leaned her countryman against the wall of the foyer just to dig out a key from her pocket. Apparently paired with the lock in the front doors, however… why was it in her pocket if she utilized it to open…?

…thieves. Logic dictated she then hadn't done as he expected, if the tool nominally used to unlock barriers was still secured with her clothing. Was it still termed 'breaking and entering' if it was one's own domicile?

"And the gate key." Adding a significantly heavier and longer if excessively old-fashioned wrought iron skeleton key over that came from her pocket, the blonde shoved a hand through the short ashy blonde strands to smooth back the hair in her eyes. "Two floors above, there's another set of rooms like these little… walk in closet things. I don't think they're supposed to be actual bedrooms, but the real estate idiot obviously thought they were and counted them as such."

"What about them?" Inquired the wiry Russian as he fought his body against excessive panting that might jar his ribs excessively.

"You two can pick from them… once this place has a good scrub down. I'd advise you to remain on the ground floor until then, Bjorn's notes says there's a draft from somewhere but it's at least clean enough." Sonya shoved open the rightmost door from the entrance, showing a cot already in place and a makeshift writing desk already assembled. "Down the hallway on either side once you're past this foyer thing are two 'public' bathrooms. The kitchen is on the right, all the way down the hall and opens up into a conservatory and a formal dining hall the hallway also connects to. Other way down the hall has a library and a backroom kind of lounge affair… then there's everything above this floor which is mostly made up of rooms and yet more bathrooms."

"People like to be clean…"

"Adrik, I have two floors of nothing but bathrooms and bedrooms. Four bathrooms alone on each floor. Seven bedrooms and five baths on the second, eight and four on the… third and fourth each. Two each on the ground floor." Sourly snipped the blonde back, hands on her hips and an equally annoyed expression on her face. "Also, no room has an actual closet but the master's. So… you're going to need to either keep your things in packs or buy some damn drawers."

Adrik glanced up, at the freshly painted fresco walls and ceiling enclosing them to the marble paving the floor but lingering on the baseboards that had been obviously painted over as well, then gave Sonya a strange look. "What's above that on the fifth?"

"A fucking guard tower, or some kind of viewing room slash bell tower slash aviary thing, which can be made into one more bedroom with a little remodeling. Which I'm probably going to, because I will put money on one of the three Mists that will live here will take one look and claim dibs."

"...you said six floors, right?"

"Yeah… there's this tiny square hatch room thing stacked on top of everything else. About the size of a walk-in closet affair, if it was half the size of these two foyer rooms."
Gingerly pushing himself off the wall the male Russian shuffled over to the opened door, hopefully to recuse himself from any further activity today but more likely to investigate the room for whichever he liked to know before settling in. The traveling had likely proven to be straining for him enough, and to be frankly honest they had enough supplies to spend at least an entire week doing little but walking the grounds or investigating the structure for obvious problems needing repairs.

Lowering her tone in a surprisingly soft register, the other thief gave him a pointed look. "There's only one cot set up here, I'll buy another and anything else you think will help before I leave you both to it. The first group I send you will likely be another of our kind if not type by the name of Usov and his parents, because the mother has a business idea to set up on the grounds and the father will be the household purser."

"Is this where I am to work, then?"

"Yes and no. You could, but this is just the first place I've claimed as my own. If you feel it's not going to do, merely pick out your own. However," glancing out the still open front door, the woman turned back after a strangely lengthy pause, "be aware the further out you go the less likely I or someone else that defines themselves as mine can immediately respond if you need the help."

Verde was not particularly a fan of communal living, however used to it he was from his years in a college dorm. He was also quite finished with running from one location to another because someone decided to try 'poaching' him or his skills for their own use. "You spoke of building additional infrastructure?"

Sonya actually appeared mildly disgusted with the reminder. "I take it you'd prefer something custom built as well?"

"Hazards of lab work. Sometimes contaminations occur, I would rather not put your or anyone else's child at risk. I will pay for it myself, as long as I can design the addition."

"...can you?"

"Architectural design is a field of study I have some familiarity with."

"Is there anything you don't have 'some familiarity' with?" Adrik questioned sourly as he gingerly wandered back to join the two of them in the foyer of this castle, likely more from the insistent pain that was going untreated than actual disgruntlement.

"Psychology." Reported the Lightning honestly, setting down his burden to locate at least an anti-inflammatory to take the edge of the discomfort the other man had to be feeling this late into the day. "Anthropology, oceanography. Mainly social sciences are outside my purview, natural ones were my current preoccupation until such time I could no longer safely study. I began my studies on applied sciences and know them better than others."

With a scowl, the wiry Russian did at least accept the two little white pills and a bottle of water to wash them down without protest of being 'fine' when he was rather obviously not.

Distracted with repacking the jarred supplies, Verde did not realize Sonya was closely watching him as if he was a new individual she did not know again. "...what?"

"Did... you study geology?"

"Before Adrik tempted me into what there is of information sciences, indeed."

She now either looked highly exasperated or somewhat annoyed, he was unable to differentiate the
...I beg your pardon?

"With documenting what you can learn of Flames from what is already present in the mafia." Clarified the shorter thief flatly. "I can use someone that knows geology, and if you learn it I don't have to task Scruffy to do it. He can instead keep more accurate logs of what we find, then you can make sense and find the fucking why."

The Lightning cocked his head to the side, well aware what his 'initial' grant was to pay for but not seeing a reason for the demanded haste. "Can I not do both consecutively?"

From the slight frown, the Storm-Cloud was either not sure what the correct answer would be or doubted he could.

Or Verde was attributing traits to her baselessly.

"I suppose... you very well might. Take note that aside the spinal jewels working for all, and the cinnamon stone garnets working for Storms, no one in Italy knows anything about the jewel matches for different Flame users." Before he could ask what gemstones had to do with Dying Will Flames, or indeed follow up with any other related questions to the topic he had been somewhat hushed from asking on their trip out here, the woman turned on a heel to leave them rather abruptly. "Usov will need to be installed as at least temporary security oversight before I start transferring the information down here."

Adrik appeared entirely unhelpful when the scientist rounded on him for whatever explanation he might be able to offer. "I said I had an old 'childhood friend' that might be interested in the chemical composition of shiny rocks, right? Have you met Sonya yet, Verde my man?"

"Hilarious." Deadpanned the Frenchman, coaxing a painful laugh out of the other unintentionally. "Why are crystal formations mentioned in context to Dying Will Flames?"

"Because the 'Flame rings' I told you about. Remember? They're some band of metal with seven different 'stones' affixed, which Flame users can use to 'boost' or 'refine' their Flame use through. Shatter like nothing else, incredibly expensive, and when I said the girls poured an insane amount of money into finding those 'cheaper' alternatives... well, for one I meant an insane amount of money and for two the alternatives aren't all that cheap either."

...the medication appeared to be working adequately enough, if Adrik could ignore the pain when speaking a touch longer than he normally could this past week.

"I don't think she wanted to speak of the issue here." Offered the remaining Russian thoughtfully, glancing skeptically around them at the few meters of the entrance to this entire castle. "Which... I kind of agree with for right now. I need to... check for any obvious or not listening bugs."

"...is she... well known enough to expect such measures?"

"I don't think so, but there's no reason to be reckless." With a shrug, the man somewhat stiffly shuffled his way back into the room Verde intended to insist he take. "It'll take me awhile, but by the next time she comes around hopefully you can ask whatever and she'll actually take the time to expound."

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 16th of March, 1970 continued. Vibo Valentia, Province of Vibo Valentia, Italian
It occurred to her, about three-fourths the way down the street to the gates of the stupid place, that just waltzing in and ducking whatever security was there might not be the best idea. Especially as it was approaching dusk.

Sonya paused, even if there was an opening just there and if someone was quicker than what was probably humanly normal it was possible to reach a carefully pruned oak tree somewhat deeper into the front lawn, and sourly eyed the tall walls separating the Iron Fort of Vongola's from the rest of this outskirts of Vibo Valentia.

She could do it with Ganauche and the CEDEF, because they were being stupid and reckless. They needed the very obvious reminder they weren't somewhere such shit they tried to pull could be excused, and that if they pressed she could make all of them regret it severely.

Ducking Timoteo's security, on his personal home he lived in with his civilian-ish wife and his children, would be… boorish.

Although… she was utterly alright with being boorish. It was being diplomatic, especially since her sister decided to see what an Italian Mafioso was like, that the Storm-Cloud paused over.

Disliking Nono was one thing, he was kind of an overbearing asshole who tended to get way too distracted to deal with outsiders very well. Compromising Fiorella's security, and her three sons whom one of which was the same age as her baby brother, wasn't really something she found acceptable.

Daniella was also annoying, but Tyr lived within these walls too…

…so, she'd make mention of the hole she pinpointed but she wouldn't be using it.

Maybe it was bait? A Mist lying in wait right there, or at least assigned to the walls as a kind of safety net, could catch significantly determined saboteurs if they were utilized as part of the security arrangements.

Sonya rubbed her temple in frustration, unable to decide if it was just a piece of bait or really a hole in their security arrangements. With Italians, either could likely be it.

Thankfully someone had already spotted her just standing on the sidewalk eyeing their walls speculatively. The thief just really couldn't say much positive about the greasy-faced idiot guardsman posted on the gate.

Had she really been intent on her first idea he wouldn't have, and she'd already be in.

Fumbling first for a ham radio under his tiny guard shack desk, to report sighting her and probably ask what to do, the man who turned out to look somewhat older than her against her first glance impression then pretended ignorance while also trying to subtly keep an eye on her. He rather failed horribly.

In response, the Storm-Cloud dug out and made use of her pipe. She had to replace her purse finally, when the hole that liked to dump out her tobacco got wider to the point of threatening the integrity of the entire thing. This one was at least less tote-like, being a repurposed WWII messenger bag.

It fit a decent sized book, her wallet, whatever files she needed for work, and her pipe with the tobacco pouch somewhat tightly… but it worked. Still easily stolen to the point she was resigned to always keeping a hand on it while she used it, but at least it had no holes.

Yet.

…or was Disintegrated into nothing like that one set of clothing she burned off.

Much to her annoyance, when someone reached the gates in response to her showing up… it was that cowardly baby Cloud.

Sonya stared down at the brat, who very pointedly did not let the tall estate walls be moved from his back as he inched down to where she was… and he gave her a snotty look back behind a thin pair of lenses covering half his face.

"Why are you here?"

Instead of favoring the child with attention, she didn't recall what his name was or anything about him aside the fact he was Tyr's apprentice and the brat had once picked a fight with her godson, the thief removed her pipe from her mouth to inspect the wear and tear she had subjected it to so far.

Away from specifically infuriating situations, it had lasted significantly longer than she expected. The brass was a tiny bit gnawed on, and there was a split in the bamboo when she gripped it a touch too hard once, but it was at least still serviceable.

…huh, there was a new kink to the pipe since she last took note of the damages. Maybe she should invest in a new one for when this one broke, or a pack of cigarettes again.

The littler snot apparently used up all his bravery snipping a question mostly coherently, because out of the corner of her eye she could tell full well he couldn't decide what to do with her apparent non-reaction. Glancing at the somewhat dumbfounded guardsman, back to her, at the wall at his back, then back to her again, shooting a rather desperate look to the gates, then back at her again.

When Tyr came out to collect his wayward apprentice, Sonya actually designed to speak. "I'm not impressed."

"Neither am I." Spoke the Sword Emperor simply, which had his tetchy student quailing and somewhat huddling behind him. "Miss Sonya, did Ganauche inform you…?"

"…no? I just… I left Mafia Land rather early yesterday." She knocked out the half a bowl of tobacco kid even if she didn't remotely like him. "Why should he have contacted me?"

"Your godson is somewhat… concerning… ill."

Sonya stared at the master assassin. Said man stared back rather unruffled, even while his apprentice cringed into the wall and the guardsman somewhat fainted or something in his little hut.

"Miss Sonya?"

"Either invite me inside or get out of my way."

Tyr rather thoughtfully did, somehow managing the brat behind him to not be half-supported by the wall or leaning on him anymore at the same time. "I believe you know your way to the medical wing."

Yeah, she'd been there more than enough times. On her way past, she did at least glance to see the guardsman wasn't out cold just looking as if he'd really like a vacation or retirement to happen already… and already hyperventilating.

Somewhat insulted and rather disgusted, the Storm-Cloud bolted up the drive the moment she had a clear shot. The doorman at least had better control of himself, he didn't stagger away from her as he yanked the front doors open for her instead of risk the thief ripping them off their hinges.

It took her less time to enter the designated area of the Iron Fort than she recalled it took when hobbling out of it, and the Russian came to a blank halt when she realized Fiorella was sitting next to Shamal's bed. Her brat was asleep, and if it was 'concerningly ill' according to an assassin then asleep was probably a good thing, she rather more sedately approached the two.

The civilian woman hadn't noticed her despite the haste anyways, looking nearly comically surprised for a second when she looked up in response to a change in the shadows in her line of sight. "Oh, Sonya! I thought someone said you were on foot at the gates? How did you get up here so fast?"

"I ran." Sliding closer, Sonya investigated and concluded there really was a fever involved because that was way too high for it to be natural flux in body temp. The Mist brat was not happy with her significantly warmer hand touching his forehead, scowling in his sleep and shifting away. "Why are you here?"

"I wouldn't want my sons to sit alone being miserably sick." Confessed the woman immediately and simply, which likely saved her from being unceremoniously ejected if her reasoning proved less brat-orientated. "Your eyes are purple again."

Slipping onto the cot her godson was rather fitfully napping in, Sonya was somewhat surprised to have her same apparently too warm hand seized and then have a Mist nearly wrap himself around it. "It happens. Dying Will Flames tend to come out in times of high stress or distress, so when you use them to solve such issues it becomes an automatic reaction to the same before long."

"Oh… that… makes an obvious amount of sense…” By her tone, sense she hadn't thought of and was somewhat irritated that she had to ask.

"...should he be doing this?"

Shamal wasn't twisting enough to pull the IV stabbed into his arm out, but if he had a fever then why the hell was he curling around her?

Being part Storm, and a little bit of Sun, Sonya's body temperature was a little high. She was, to quote Lisa, the 'second cuddliest' of her children. Tatiana earned first place and Cherep would likely tie with Valera because Clouds didn't really have a lot of excess heat to them. Perhaps not, and their mother would favor her biological child more and Tats would get knocked off her throne of 'getting the most hugs in the winter'.

"I was told, to tell you later if you bypassed Revelli who went to try to 'intercept you', that it is suspected to be meningitis. An inflammation of brain tissue." Fiorella reported clearly, an apologetic and somewhat wry twist to her lips as she fingered the copy of Aesop's Fables she let the brat borrow off her. "He had a lumbar puncture for testing, so somewhat drugged and not feeling very well… paired with the sick feeling he tried to ignore making him dizzy and drowsy… he's probably a very sore and miserable little boy."

The thief she was speaking to was trying not to hyperventilate at 'lumbar puncture’ or allowing herself to hold that against the older Sun. Medical things were Tatiana's specialty, all she knew of the spine was that the fluid should remain inside the spine.
Was it a safe medical test?

When had it been discovered?

How the fuck did that help anything?

Sonya harshly bit her lower lip, ignoring the trickle of blood because of course she failed to restrain the force just enough to prevent breaking skin, and took a deep breath.

"Mamma?" Shamal, blessedly coherent if not entirely aware given how his eyes slid trying to focus on her, mumbled groggily while gripping harder on her hand. "Are you late or early?"

"...I have no idea."

"Is... is Mister Renato here?"

"No." She didn't think so, if someone a Sun considered 'theirs' was ill... and as strong as the hitman was?

Renato would've been plastered to at least the far wall the entire time had he known this was going on, if not directly at the brat's side, glowering in his stupid gargoyle mode and just generally making himself a pain in the ass while his little charge was sick. Tatiana had all sorts of interesting tidbits about how she learned to reign herself in, and given some of those horror stories shared second-hand through Andrei about how the younger Suns were adjusting to their habits...

"The... then you're early." Decided the brat way too confidently, moving very awkwardly in trying to plaster himself around her hip. "I'm tired..."

"Go to sleep then."

What Shamal then mumbled wasn't really understandable but given he did as she bid she figured she could guess. After pulling a pillow down further and plastering his chest to the outside of her thigh.

"Sonya?"

"Is it safe to rub his back?" Her left hand was now freed, but a lack of something to do with it had her hesitating with it held out over him.

Her inability to use her own Sun Flames had never galled her so much before.

"Why... oh, right. Revelli's a 'Sun'!" Fiorella looked puzzled as she set the tome on the bedside apparently Shamal was assigned, given it was the only one that had medication laid out on top of it as well as a modest lamp for what she guessed was used as a reading light. "I didn't ask. I'll go see about doing so now and retrieve the good doctor, so he can return to work."

"Why did he leave in the first place?"

"He said he didn't want a hole in his wall."

Sonya snorted disgustedly... but then tried to recall if she left craters in any of the concrete or floors on her somewhat heedless dash in here.

"You have my apologies, Miss Bazanova." The elderly Sun announced from the same doors she had come through not too long ago, answering the rather absent question if she had broken anything that distracted her for a second but not so much she hadn't heard him coming. "It was rather unfair of me, given how considerate you've been with us in the past."
"My intent was to get to Shamal, not create complications or make your job harder than it needs to be."

"I appreciate it. And I did heal the young man of his lumbar puncture after the procedure."
Threading a few fingers into his goatee, which was looking a bit saltier than peppered, before turning right around. "Rubbing his back will not harm him. Should I inform the maids you will be remain."

"Of course I will be staying."

Revelli nodded distractedly on his way out.

"I'll visit again after dinner." Fiorella decided, rising to her feet somewhat less than gracefully for her usual gait. "And see about getting you some books from the library, your young man informed me you love to read."

Sonya glanced up at her blankly for a second, before returning to ensure there were no major changes in Shamal's state. "…thank you."

(Thursday the 19th of March, 1970. Mafia Land.)

Renato had expected to turn in the contract that shall never be mentioned ever fucking again, take the rest of the night to murder a few brain cells off, and then find himself something new and indefinitely better for a 'final' contract than said contract which needed erasing from existence… sometime tomorrow morning.

He did not expect a busty redhead Sun nurse to be waiting for him once he left the hitman's contract hall, looking grave enough no one was bothering her even if she was in her hospital uniform on a street full of thugs and criminals. If an in-uniform nurse was waiting for someone on Body Avenue the general assumption was someone had died horribly, and they needed a known associate to identify the remains for insurance or revenge-hit reasons.

Harassing said nurse was then seen as a bit tasteless because it could very well turn out to be your associate, or very lethal depending on whom needed to be contacted… and if they needed a convenient target to take out their likely sudden bad mood on. As a matter of fact, instead of being catcalled everyone passing her by on the street were pointedly ignoring the nurse in the hopes of it not being them she was here for.

The Soft Flame Sun had precious few associates left that hadn't already bit the big one, and after a moment adjusting to the sight of Tatiana very pointedly waiting on him he offered her his arm with an equally grim expression wondering who it was that died now.

At least she didn't look upset enough for it to be Sonya. No Sun would be that composed after losing family.

"We're going to the hospital," announced the redhead obviously, but he really wondered why that needed stating, "I'm going to give you a couple things, which you are not to open or even acknowledge until you get to where you're going and are safely in criminal held territory."

"You sound rather certain I'm going." Renato observed idly, thoughtlessly… then picked the why and what up out of her mind even while trying not to do it.

It was slightly hard when the nurse was wondering how to discreetly inform him of Shamal's mild but possibly serious illness, the frankly illegal and 'criminally untested' meningococcal vaccine the hospital had for vaccinating others from it that needed slight adjustment for the number of orphans she didn't know about, and a small major problem she had recently run into that echoed of a conversation the hitman once had with her sister in a Moscow bar.

…why hadn't he informed Revelli the Eighth Generation Sun Guardian of the 'Sun Flames can make viruses worse' finding of hers?

Or even Brow Nie, as the Sun Guardian he actually saw more frequently?

'It's Vongola' Sonya had dismissed at the time, for why she hadn't mentioned Storms making better Mist-wranglers herself when she noted the discrepancy even when she had no reason to hold her tongue about it. Renato, upon reviewing his own thoughts and the paired memories, hadn't once thought to pass on the tidbit Tatiana had to suffer through to notice even after admiring the nurse for finding the truth of the matter out personally before he accidentally harmed his own ward.

He'd been through what Vongola knew of Sun Flames, just out of practicality because there was no reason to skip reviewing it if there was something he had not known detailed down somewhere. The hitman was more than certain there was nothing on the nurse's findings in there, or at least he didn't see it in what he got a hold of. Saying nothing, when he hadn't even been asked to keep it to himself, was actually… utterly out of character for a Sun when it could eventually harm his own.

Twice over, Tatiana adored 'her nephew'. Suns were obsessive assholes when it came to being or maintaining a healthy baseline in those they accepted, having two like them 'forget' the same thing was beyond utterly suspicious.

Equally as certain as she was that he was going now, he'd… think of something for ensuring his last act as 'Renato Sinclair' was suitably dignified to exit on, the hitman adjusted his hat with his free hand and allowed the Hard Flame Sun at his side to squeeze his arm as much as she wanted. She didn't know of his sudden change of heart and was still trying to think of something suitably clandestine to say no one else would understand without having the history between them to allow it.

He rather appreciated she held her silence instead of blurt something hasty out in desperation.

If anyone used Sun Flames on Shamal while he was sick, especially near whatever bodily function his illness was attacking… Activation boosted viruses…

Why the hell had no one else in Italia noticed it?

They had the most left over that strange dip in numbers the last century. Tatiana was a more than admirable nurse, but they had a good number of Sun Flame medics, nurses, and full-fledged doctors. By numbers alone, there should be more Italian Flame-medical findings than elsewhere and something as basic as 'Sun Flames can Activate what you don't want' was or should be basic knowledge.

…something was sour about the whole situation that very quickly made Renato's shoulders ache with how tense they went on him before he forced himself to remain relaxed and amiable in the nurse's hold before she thought he was going to brush her off without an adequate reason to follow.

Either something was preventing that from occurring, either within the Iron Fort itself or the whole of Italia entirely, or the Suns involved that could notice were being made to ignore it when it cropped up.

Worse, there was now the possibility something was preventing Vongola from gathering Flame-related information that might contradict or change how they viewed something related. It was only a possibility he could conclude, but the possibility alone was alarming enough.

The whole situation stank of Mist-meddling, and there was one for sure he knew thought Vongola was it's to manipulate but no one seemed to really know or take the possibility of a massively powerful Mist merely lurking about seriously. Thankfully Sonya was fully committed to murdering said Mist in a horribly painful fashion the next time it popped up, incorporeal and using a civilian as a meat-shield or not, so perhaps the problem would be solved relatively soon and someone could unravel the whole issue from adversely affecting his native country.

"Give me some faith." Tatiana decided on asking, very nearly dragging him into Mafia Land's underground so no one trying to follow them to see what could be spread as gossip because they were suicidality bored could follow.

She would've succeeded at yanking him along if he wasn't equally as intent on following her to pick up the Vongola order for vaccinations and the courier request contract to be allowed to handle it. Very illegal, under-tested, not widely available to the civilians because the side effects weren't well known vaccinations.

"Given." Renato offered instantly, morbidly amused at their situation even with the worried itch squarely between his shoulder blades at the underlying one.

Normally, one didn't want a hitman to be with them down shady dark passageways. Busty nurse wanted him to hurry the fuck up already and to stop being so difficult, he complied silently as they got further into the tunnels on their way to the hospital's few entrances.

He'd trust her if only because it was Sonya's sister and her purview was everything medical in that family, which kind of included what little family he also had. Knowing what was running through her head merely confirmed what he would've suspected, which was that she had no ill intents for him personally.

Any Suns around her adorable shit of a nephew that triggered an Activation charged viral infection on the other hand… she would want them to die horribly if anything happened.

---

(Friday the 20th of March, 1970. The Iron Fort, Italy.)

Sonya jerked awake an instant before Sinclair managed to smooth a hand down her back. "My apologies for being late, Tatiana wanted me to transport the vaccinations as I was going this way as it was."

The blonde Russian tried to hide her yawn, gingerly straightening up from her half-collapsed position in a waiting chair even if that pressed her back against his fingers and blearily glancing around until she spotted the window letting in a bare gleam of true dawn. "At least you were told, I just came over to visit and surprise... brat had a lumbar puncture already and wasn't feeling good enough to stay awake for long."

Fiorella wasn't sure why that earned a pensive frown from the man, and a sharp look to Sun Flame nurse checking in to see if she had to wake up one of the doctors or if it was only more visitors before silently excusing herself to wait in the lobby for an emergency.

Accepting she didn't know enough to even guess was a hard adjustment to make, especially being a full-grown adult as well as married and a mother. A secret society with their own special skills and double-talk expressly designed to hide their abilities made it somewhat hard to understand from the outside looking in as a 'non-user' of Dying Will Flames like her.

A significant look between two individuals she would've assumed held the same or radically different positions or social rank ended up influencing things she had no idea was included in whatever type they identified with. There was a pattern, she just didn't have the information to make use of it.

Yet.

"I'm going to deliver the vaccinations so Revelli or Brow Nie can give them to the various brats and staff as your sister demanded, I'll return well before anyone thinks to bring breakfast."

"I'll be sure to save you the coffee." Sonya offered around another yawn, settling back in her chair to wake up instead of going back to being half slumped over the side of the bed their godchild was sleeping in for a few more moments of rest herself.

An amused sounding huff and the darkly dressed 'Sun' Flame user turned right around and approached Fiorella standing next to the swinging doors. Instead of protest, she specifically had a maid wake her to relieve the native godparent of any burdens so he could focus on his godson's recovery and they both knew she could deliver the same, she just handed it over instead.

Yet.

"You spent an entire minute studying him before even waking Sonya up, and you were visibly alright with the situation after inspecting his medication laid out for when he wakes." Reminded the lady of the manor with amusement, hands on her hips and giving the man a rather practiced expectant look he tried to ward off with a very flimsy innocent expression. "That is not the whole story, no matter how cutely you try to act."

The insult that passed over his face, topped off with the adorably disgruntled glower, was even more amusing. "...and?"

"And nothing. You don't need to lie to me, Sinclair. Have a good morning with whatever you really wish to do, I highly doubt I'm qualified to sit in on whatever conversation you need to have with your fellow 'Suns'."

Black eyes narrowed at her without even a minute change in expression, and Fiorella simply beamed back at the man's suspicious scowl before moving on.

Eventually, someone besides the Russian quarter she had been introduced to would stop lying to her face or making very understandable excuses for what they were really going to do. Fiorella had spent nearly a decade of her marriage becoming or being aware her husband and his staff were keeping her out of something, now they were being just a bit slow in recalling they didn't have to anymore.

She just really hoped her suspicions that Timoteo and his men were trying to keep her out of something else wasn't true.
All three of the Suns in the older one's office were probably not in the best of moods, one hadn't slept in nearly twenty-four hours and the other two had been somewhat rudely roused from bed at the Soft Flame Sun's demand. However, the ill-feelings had been left by the wayside as their professional responsibilities demanded when he reported the need that drove him to do so before socially acceptable hours for visitation.

Revelli pushed up the reading glasses he didn't need right now to pinch the bridge of his nose where they normally rested. "I did heal the lumbar puncture. Miss Bazanova even asked if I had. Why didn't she-"

"That's the problem." Renato interrupted shortly before he could finish the expected question, gesturing widely to include all Italian Suns in their home country and those outside both categories that were seeking to inform them of the issue even after so much time had passed. "None of us thought of it. Not me, and I was only informed several years ago of the finally documented discovery and I knew you all didn't know. Not Sonya, who probably never thought to ask her sister in the first place because she can't use her minor talent with Sun Flames. Not Nurse Primakova herself, who was the one to Activate healing of a needle mark post injection and infected herself with an Activate-strengthened viral infection to discover it could happen and is currently involved with Ganauche."

Considering they were speaking of another fellow if Soviet Union Sun Flame user, who was the sister to the hitman's fellow godparent, they'd draw the same conclusions as he did.

"Tatiana only thought to tell me, who she knew had heard it from her instructing doctor because I bought her a drink for running into it before I hurt the brat. Not her boyfriend she spends more time with or would be able to say if you all back here knew the possibility or not with some certainty, me. She eventually realized while waiting for me that it was odd... but if you didn't know before I got back here then she forgot again to talk to Ganauche about it."

Brow Nie put down the paperwork Doctor Kappel had filled out and had published in-house for Mafia Land's hospital staff, in a series of publications restricted from being taken off the island aimed to raising general awareness across all hour shifts and native lands so everyone knew the same information as another. This copy had come from the German doctor's records, which Tatiana had broken into as easily as breathing when he asked for a written something to hand off to the other Suns in Italy.

Reaching for a binder to file it with the rest of the Sun-centric information the nurses needed to keep up with, he quickly slotted the pages away for later encrypting and disposal then found some blank paper to start making an in-house memo to start ensuring the same. The papers detailed a bit of the incident itself, some theories how it could happen on a cellular level, and suitably redacted hospital records of the same possibly happening with a Sun attending the 'routine' procedures verses the ones without such complications occurring that general or nurse practitioners didn't need to know right away to be aware of the phenomena.

It still had Flame terminology included in a professional document, it had to go before someone more law enforcement than criminal got lucky snooping around. Regulation rather than a necessity this deep in Vongola territory, but still an appreciative hard rule when it came to information on Dying Will Flames somewhere accessible to outside influences.

"And you?" Asked the Sun once he had everything he needed assembled, glancing over to ensure both the others were aware he was keeping up with both his duties and the conversation.
"I? I forgot about it until Sonya said the brat had something called a 'lumbar puncture' that might've allowed the possibility. While Tatiana was talking to me I was very intent on checking to see if you all back here were aware of that since somehow a Russian nurse from Moscow hadn't been... as well as the biggest Flame utilizing hospital in the whole Mafia. Then I forgot..."

"So..." Icy brown eyes turned on the younger Sun without a Guardian bond, as the Eighth Generation Sun Guardian adjusted to the idea he was not getting updated on medical discoveries that would help him safeguard the health of his Sky's responsibilities. "...who."

"I don't know. I don't even know if it's inbound or outbound focused, but I do know it's a Mist and it's entirely likely this isn't the first time we've run into this specific one."

With a puzzled frown, Revelli tugged on his neat beard a few times while he thought. "We? As in Vongola, you, and your lady thief? ...the same one that attacked Miss Bazanova's students?"

"Exactly. Whoever it was tracked her down afterwards, piggybacking a civilian for a confrontation about 'her' interference in 'his' responsibilities, while we were in East Germany only a couple handfuls of days later. Whoever it is, it's powerful and hard to deter in messing with someone who could've been a solid ally for us before it screwed you over. Sonya thinks it's a Mist that believes they have some right to Vongola or her people but doesn't believe you necessarily need to know it thinks that way for whoever to be a colossal pain in our collective asses."

As the younger Guardian was drafting mafia-only public service announcements for later distribution, the older Guardian carried on the conversation his inquiring glance asked. "Are we being forgiven for that incident?"

"You've met a Cloud before, Revelli. Right? Of course not. Especially with how utterly retarded the CEDEF behaved panicking over possibly losing the service we had been allowed to use, trying to secure hold on Rasputin without so much as speaking to Sonya first as the legal guardian of the Flame using medical students the hospital is tempting to stay."

"No, you're not forgiven. The only silver lining for Vongola is that Sonya is very intent on murdering the Mist messily once she finally coaxes the damn Flame user into her reach."

"If we don't catch this miscreant first."

"We didn't even notice it first."

Brow Nie stacked a two-page report together, which apparently wouldn't have so many medical terms to lose anyone not in their field before delivering the salient points to the right people, rising to his feet during the pause while Revelli sourly accepted that fact. "Sinclair, can you accompany me?"

At his somewhat confused but admittedly slightly sardonic look, the younger Mafioso just sighed as if he was being intentionally difficult.

"If you forgot on your way in, it's entirely possible something this supposed miscreant Mist has laid down will cause me to forget before I can pass on the relevant information to those that need to know. You managed to bully your way through with only a reminder, I'm not as confident I could do the same without such if I set these down before speaking to Nono."

Renato glanced down at the writing scrawled across the pages, and sure enough there was in bold lettering a reminder to speak of the situation with Timoteo as a pseudo headline just in case any sudden forgetfulness struck.
All three of them were Mafiosi, admittedly. Only he was a hitman, the other two had been identified as Suns by Vongola then specifically trained to handle the personal health concerns of their Sky and fellow Guardians in a hospital or medically equipped place like this wing from the very start. They weren't weak-willed men or Flame users by any means, but the Soft Flame Sun in the office was the only one to need a stubborn sense of self-entitlement to secure his life and even faked confidence in what he was doing to just survive his work.

"Ho... possible?"

"All we have is subjective hearsay." Admitted Brow Nie apologetically with a regretful shake of his head. "Not to say I disbelieve you, but we can't actually declare some unknown Mist is messing about on information gathering efforts on so little evidence. Which likely does play right into that Mist's hands in the end, hamstringing us from adequately finding the outer limits of the damage to address or correct the problems it's causing us."

Neither Sun had much to say in response to that, admittedly.

"We'll have to do another lumbar puncture. See if the cultures changes any between the first and second, ensure I didn't instead harm my patient unknowingly instead of ease his time here." Decided the older Sun with a weary sigh after a moment to allow the younger's point to stand, rubbing the back of his neck then smoothing down his goatee fussily. "While a split-Flame Storm-Cloud breathes down my neck for harming her baby in front of her for a procedure that shouldn't have been necessary to repeat... wonderful. Just what I wanted to deal with this early in the day."

"I'll distract her." Renato promised as he straightened up to assist the Ninth Generation Sun Guardian, snatching his fedora from the hat rack as he did so, as it was the least he could do to assist his fellow Suns. "Somehow, I'll get her out of the medical wing for however long you'll need."

"About half an hour."

"She'd probably appreciate the opportunity to take a shower and mess around with her pipe now I'm here and can substitute just in case the brat wakes up or wants anything."

The older Sun grumped rather unhelpfully as he turned to assemble the needed tools for his next sample extraction. "Good luck explaining that one after the fact."

"Sonya is very conscientious of the side-effects of her behavior. If she tries to leave, then we need to worry about collateral damage or a death-toll."

"I'll have a nurse fetch Visconti and Solothurn and let them know, then."

"No." Refused the hitman immediately, pausing before he could follow a rather patient younger Guardian out of the older Sun's office. "Get Tyr. She won't mind at all murdering the Cloud Guardians, she's not really a fan of either Sky to pull her punches if she wants to vent. I've seen her fight before, turning humans into ballistic missiles isn't out of her reach nor is sneaking up on them even utterly enraged. For some dumbly odd reason, probably because he actually speaks to her, she likes Tyr enough to not want him headless even if he pisses her off."

Revelli gave him a smarmy kind of smirk that kind of made the Soft Flame Sun itch to pistol whip it off his face, but thankfully didn't quip something stupid at him.

(Saturday the 21st of March, 1970. The Iron Fort, Italy.)
Sinclair had somewhat tricked Bazanova out of the medical wing while a second spinal tap had happened on their brat, which by the wider staff of Vongola's headquarters was accepted as a necessary evil even if that meant the hitman was in the dog house with the Russian thief once she realized what had happened. They appreciated the consideration aimed their way, so they were extra careful both delivering items to both individuals and trying to give the couple as much privacy as could be gained in a semi-public location as the medical wing.

Especially as the Storm-Cloud now flatly refused to leave her godchild's side at the Sun's insistence, even to talk to her fellow godparent somewhere less public. The child wasn't getting any better even now on the correct medication to treat the infection noted on the first culture, so the uneducated assumption was that the second procedure had been needed in the end anyways. A secondary medical station was set up nearby but outside the same room the thief was practically dwelling in for lesser medical emergencies to work around the Flame user drama currently going on.

However, Lady Fiorella had noticed and logged the reactions as odd. Then invited Nilda Superbi ne Guerra, her recently married bodyguard she was amiable in turning into a friend, to explain to her why the moment she reported back in after her somewhat lackluster honeymoon. Pointedly, to show she was fully aware of the situation and getting suspicious over the repeated evasions.

Downing about half of her espresso in one go, because she was not paid for this nor really wanted to be the one in this position, the Rain rather miserably wondered how to explain the visceral fear most felt when staring into the face of a very unhappy momma Cloud diplomatically enough to someone who would hopefully never see it.

"You've seen Bazanova crush polished wood in hand, right? Accidentally? Without really meaning to?"

"Yes."

"Now imagine you're the nurse or doctor in charge of young Shamal's recovery. You did one test that unfortunately and unavoidably hurt him while she wasn't here to invalidate a situation, then it comes to be it has to be repeated for his well-being while a monstrously strong woman that mothers said kid is in the room."

Fiorella crossed her arms over her chest, multitasking in keeping an eye on her older two boys roughhousing in the back courtyard while having this conversation, and pursed her lips in an utterly unconvinced way. "Sonya is a wonderfully meticulous woman, she hasn't harmed anyone with her strength. It was on accident she broke the banquet table, and frankly entirely understandable why…"

Because the woman was flinching from Revelli pulling a knife aimed at the other woman out of her foot.

Nilda nodded simply. "Exactly."

"Nilda, I still don't get this."

"Sonya's very contained. What's her breaking point? When will she not be so nice about being able to crush people in one hand or behead them with a punch?" The Rain closed an eye and nodded at the puzzled expression now on her charge's face. "All the Clouds in the Iron Fort are known elements, Lady Fiorella. Most of them either grew up here or come from lines that would know. We know perfectly well how far they can be pushed before they start getting bothered to avoid such an incident happening or to do so where they can be suitably distracted. Problem solved easily enough. But a Soviet Russian example of a Cloud? She only visits about once a year and doesn't tend to spend a whole lot of time angry while here."
The civilian woman finally looked away from her boys, as if the nursemaids and the guards slash footmen weren't also keeping an eye on the twosome for any issues, to look somewhat graver about the topic of discussion as she gave her bodyguard her full attention.

"Those in the know see this: Sinclair, her longest-known associate who has seen her breaking point at least twice before, decided that for the safety of all involved she needed to be distracted from their godchild's side during the procedure. Meaning it is either very likely she would've terrified the staff into incompetence or stressed everyone involved out more than safe when a needle is that close to the kid's spine. Which is not the time to either be terrified for your life or realize you can't stand watching the procedure happen. They're really thankful he's done that for everyone and know full well not to hold it against Sonya because it's likely she wouldn't even intend to scare everyone, so we get this situation now."

"That's... not fair."

"It never really is." Sighed the silver haired woman, draining the rest of her coffee and putting the cup down before she gave into the impulse to fidget with it. "That's why Sinclair's not defending or trying to explain himself, even if it's not personal just practical. That's also why Sonya's not punched him or anyone else working there through a few walls, she agrees with his decision and is instead just working through her hurt at being misled and not there for Shamal while he was being harmed even with good intentions. That's why everyone else is giving them space to work through it and not carrying tales to other people, even you."

Fiorella, instead of being reassured it wasn't personal in her respect either, huffed in irritation. "If everyone could stop deciding what is or isn't my business, I'd be less suspicious when these things happened. I don't even need the details, just an 'I'll explain after it's over' would do."

…very thin ice, there.

Nilda rubbed her temple, not even sure who was on thin ice in this conversation. All she knew was that there were perilous and choppy waters still ahead of her and her charge, and the tangle of blame was certainly deep enough to catch just about everyone in it.

Timoteo was certainly perched on a whole patch of it himself, Fiorella likely didn't even suspect what was lurking below her own, she'd catch flak no matter how it eventually worked out, and…

"...Sonya, you want to handle this one? I seem to have a nagging headache."

"Sure." Came the utterly unenthusiastic response, which finally alerted her charge they had been joined by the Russian herself. "It is, stupidly enough, habit. If you don't know, then likely talking to said person would get you in trouble. If you do know, you don't need to ask. Questions are more 'allowable' for children, once you pass a certain point no one wants to speak of it anymore. Even to older if equally as new Flame users. First reaction to being asked by someone fully grown, even by you Lady Fiorella, is to deny everything. Apparently, that's caught more than just you in the net of."

Sonya had perched herself on the half-wall that neatly sectored the patio seating area from the rest of the back garden and the courtyard, fiddling with a very awkwardly bent tobacco pipe and her pouch of the shredded tan leaves.

The Rain made note to send a footman with an order to replace her smoking tools and probably pick the other woman up some more tobacco, loose leaf or otherwise. The Lord knew she was likely almost out, and the pipe was a lost cause after she pitched it at the hitman's head in revenge for lying to her about their godchild's health.
"How are you feeling, Sonya dear?" Fiorella asked, out of not only politeness but because the lady was honestly invested in the couple and was rather tense with them at odds like this situation.

Looking up from her pipe slowly, the thief glanced from her to the bodyguard and back again before sighing heavily and giving up on her pipe. "I? I can't even get mad. Which, frankly, doesn't help. The nurses don't know me, I don't know them, there's no reason why they should've been able to tough it out even if they were afraid of me. And that's another thing I can't get angry at, because I am dangerous and unknown so it's sensible they're afraid of my reaction when the brat's being harmed in front of me. I was afraid of me, and that incident was only being scared of harm to him not watching it. I didn't invest time in them so they'd know better, even knowing other Clouds have reputations that make it a necessity to be wary of our reactions. I didn't handle it, Renato made a call to account for that as the one that would know, and… now this."

Giving a flourish of a hand to include her fellow blonde in her previous explanation, for why the Iron Fort's staff weren't taking anything snapped at them personally while she worked through her own issues, Nilda glanced longingly at the pot that should've held coffee on the shaded patio table between them.

It was empty, unfortunately. A maid had been by some time ago, but it would also take a bit of time for a request to be refilled to be asked and the promised liquid to be delivered. They would get snippy at any woman here for carrying it to the kitchens, Nilda and Sonya because they were guests or not a maid and Lady Fiorella because a lady shouldn't have to do so when she had maids who would love to do it for her.

The Cloud woman reached over and plucked the silver carafe up, investigated the empty pot for a moment, stuck her hand inside with a bright flash of something suspiciously purple… then set down a full pot of coffee.

"...Sonya, don't take this the wrong way… but I love you." Breathed out the Rain, all but taking possession of the cask to cuddle with. "I love you so much right now…"

"Drink water as well." Advised the utterly unimpressed woman as she returned to trying to unbend her pipe. "Cloud Flames disappear after a while after all, but it should taste the same."

"How long will this last?" Even as she asked, Nilda was pouring both herself and Fiorella a cup to savor.

"Two or three months." When the Rain inhaled in surprise at the wrong moment and nearly spluttered out the lovely Flame-hot and appreciatively strong Italian coffee, she earned an utterly indifferent blink that was sort of mocking around the edges. "Maybe four now, I don't know."

The Lady of Vongola was too uneducated in Flame terms to understand why that was a little surprising length of time, especially as Clouds didn't often intend their Propagations to last much beyond initial use, glancing between them.

"...why?"

"Why not?"

It couldn't be for any professional reason, an incident with a faked replica winking out of existence in front of an expert or a camera somewhere and she'd be wanted by the Vindice for breaking Omertà or risking it unnecessarily.

A suspicious little wiggle of an idea occurred to her, but she highly doubted the thief was in any kind of mood to banter about the subject and confirm a few details for the ex-hatchet woman. Nilda instead set the suspicion aside, because if she was right then in time it wouldn't matter if she got the information now or later.

If she was wrong… well, wasn't that interesting?

"Nilda, dear… is there a reason why you seem a bit coffee-mad today?" Fiorella decided on asking when the silence stretched, from the look on her pretty face well aware this was another 'Flame user only' exchange she was excluded from.

"My honeymoon had atrocious coffee." Admitted the Rain bluntly, which was the very least of the issues the event had to begin with in her opinion. "I have no idea why Superbi had us go to England for it, miserable weather and they're all tea drinkers."

There was a snort, which reminded the two Italian ladies the Russian one preferred a type of tea.

"You'd hate it too. They add milk and sugar to theirs. Sometimes lemon."

"Some people add milk and sugar to coffee, too." Sonya drily returned.

"Heathens."

"In fact, you're supposed to drink black Russian tea with either jam or sugar chips." Continued the thief in a bland tone, ignoring the wild blinking from Lady Vongola and the utterly disgusted one the Rain was aiming at her. "There's even a select group of people that drink tea with yak butter."

"Bullshit." Nilda refuted, mostly out of disgust. Only to blink herself when she merely earned herself a raised and superior eyebrow making her doubt her gut reaction. "…really?"

"Really. It's a specialty in Tibet and northern China." Continued her fellow blonde evenly. "I've even tried some once."

"Have... we been serving your tea wrong?" Inquired Lady Vongola delicately.

"It can be 'properly' taken in any way. Straight, with sugar chips, or with jam."

"Oh good." Pleased, assured they weren't making a social faux pas in her culture and that the woman wasn't really all that irritated with anyone but apparently her own inaction, Fiorella momentarily paused.

Nilda could almost see her thought process. Sonya was apparently feeling better to the point of bantering with a few select others yet drawing attention to that might set back that unintentional progress. Scrambling for something else to carry on with, the Rain tried to hide a wince when the wife of a Sky turned her attention to the platinum blonde.

Apparently, she succeeded too well.

"How is married life treating you, Nilda?"

She tried for a polite smile, but by the alarmed look on her charge's face and even the slow blink from the Storm-Cloud she thankfully failed utterly in that. "It's... not all that different from being 'single', honestly."

Fiorella peered at her over the table warily.

"Political?" Sonya asked blandly from the wall, shrugging when Nilda nodded appreciatively. "That sucks."

"Oh..." fumbled the civilian, obviously having not expected that response from what she had only known as an employee of her mother-in-law, "...please don't take this the wrong way, Nilda... but how?"

"We have our own culture, Lady Fiorella." Answered the thief before the Rain could figure out a proper mixture of lies and truth that wouldn't cause the older woman to feel betrayed when the truth finally came out, in a way that was utterly true yet entirely not the full story. "We've been in hiding so long that it was unavoidable. Certain dynasties, like the one you married into, have been around for centuries while others are a lot newer. Because we have to hide about half or more of ourselves in 'public', we tend to stick to our own or those in the known when we can."

"My family's not important," Continued the ex-hatchet woman equally as casually, "but we're loyal. A bit more important family wants into this social circle, hence my marriage to allow their head to enter this corner of the world and rub elbows with your husband."

Not to mention a smuggling route for ammunition 'traded' to fatten the deal the Don of her famiglia wanted. Her husband wasn't objectionable, but maybe a little too interested in his sparring buddies than his striking new wife. She learned that one out on the honeymoon, but once a spy always a spy.

Nilda didn't mind at all. An heir to secure the line, then she would return to being an active Rain agent for Ottavia or Nono with her husband's blessings and more secured from gossip as a married mother instead of a single woman following others around. Silvano would be and was paying through the nose to secure her willing help, and either a very uncomfortable night or some awkward help later he'd have the son or daughter he honestly did want to have.

He just didn't like women in a sexual manner. Taking a wife from a notoriously hardline loyal famiglia was his attempt to avoid controversy and salacious rumors over his preferences, yet still get what he did want from a marriage and continue his famiglia into the future as he was responsible for.

...in a couple years. Silvano was working up the courage to actually father the baby with a woman, the fact she was very feminine apparently didn't help him much.

The 'political' excuse was entirely true, and Nilda was working on ensuring everyone believed it but the two of them were perfectly fine with it being so for their own reasons. She was just getting used to using utter truth to lie with, her methods were normally a lot more direct or didn't need words to begin with.

Apparently, she needed to take notes from Sonya.
"Mamma?" Shamal nearly slurred out around an utterly exhausted yawn even if he just woke, little head lolling slightly as he tried to peer at her. "Are you late or early?"

"I'm here, aren't I? Renato's over there too, if you can see him."

Frustratingly, the tiny Mist boy almost dwarfed by her practically occupying the same berth as him puzzled out her words then the meanings for a couple long seconds before understanding. It was somewhat obvious, given when he tried to look around then give up per usual. "You're... on time? Thanks... mamma."

Sonya strove really, really hard to keep any of her feelings off her face. "You're welcome. We'll go for gelato once you feel better, all three of us."

"...yay. I'm tired."

"Go to sleep then." She prompted him blankly, using a hand towel dipped in ice water to dab on his forehead and hopefully soothe the brat a little bit so he wouldn't complain about her being next to him and being 'too warm'.

It would've been somewhat amusing how quickly Shamal's head thumped back into his pillow to do as she said if this wasn't the seventh time they had a variation of the very same conversation. Always with the same amount of surprise to see her with too, the brat didn't show any recognition to have seen her before... and she got here before the asshole hitman.

She would bite her tongue and let the kid needle her about being late for the rest of their natural lifetimes if only they could have a different conversation for once. Anything to show he was improving and not... still fighting off some microscopic infection trying to kill him.

Old Revelli didn't need to say anything, Tatiana's silence over the phone was equally as unneeded. She knew perfectly well losing memories and any sense of time passing was horrifically bad in this situation.

Mists had the lowest body temperature of all Flame users, lower even than Rains who had just under human normal base temp and noticeably lower than Clouds who were just a touch higher than a normal human. Fevers for Mists tended to be really inhibiting, and unlike a fully adult version who just sneezed in Constructed amphibians for a couple days... Shamal barely had any grip on his Flames to do more than leak un-Constructed Mist Flames fitfully now or again.

Even when Suns got sick to the point of suffering a fever, they drained off their Flames trying to burn through the illness in a fast hurry to the point of 'feeling cold'. Preventing them from boiling their brains alive or being too restless to recover from high energy levels, the moment they got and were suffering Shamal's current issue of being asleep more than awake.

There were different coping mechanisms throughout all Flame types, according to the old Sun that ran this place, for all sorts of plausible reasons but... Shamal apparently wasn't making use of his type's.

No one quite knew the full reason why Mists tended to unconsciously create Constructions while sick, especially as they tended to be not very good at it, just that they did. Current Italian theory was it was a self-defense thing, in creating a whole lot of targets and chaos to disguise their weakened positions until they recovered. Sonya privately thought that was bullshit, because from the sounds of it nothing a Mist made while sick was remotely believable as 'normal' or would be useful as anything other than a major sign of compromised Mists.

The brat hadn't done any of that, which made a few Flame users that should've known otherwise assume it wasn't that serious of an illness until it was obvious to those without Flames. There was an utterly flustered little maid getting gifts from both the godparents when they needed something else to do that wasn't related to their current worries, because she actually dragged their brat to get checked out when it became apparent to her.

Frankly, a guilty feeling Sun was her limit. Trying to deal with two guilty-feeling Suns fussing around her, one for the whole 'lumbar puncture' event that was now the known reason Shamal was this damn sick and the other for never preventing this possibility in the first place, was well beyond what Sonya could remotely even begin to handle.

She'd be a whole lot less understanding of the issues had both not resulted from what was charitably called Flame lore, which was so incredibly spotty that nearly no one really knew what they were doing with examples from other types to raise or interact with anymore. Everyone at least stubbed their toes on the issue once in their lives, more likely it would happen several times before the happening became widespread common knowledge.

Renato's guilty feeling was… somewhat understandable if a little hard to swallow. Mainly, in the end, the man wasn't a healer by nature even if he was by temperament. A Sun with more inward bent than outward expression of his Flame nature.

He could sub in as a healer in a pinch, with an atrocious bedside manner and more brute force than skill, but medical advancements and regulations weren't what he kept up with. As far as the Inverted Sun was concerned, as long as he knew what not to do and kept others more or less in one piece to get professional help later he had done more than enough as it was.

More than enough for combat wounds or the occasional accident he wanted to erase on another adult or possibly a child as he grew.

He'd never, once Kappel informed him of what Tatiana found out the hard way was possible, do what Revelli had and healed the kid when he was sick. Accounting for another's actions or inactions that might affect their godchild was entirely something a parent or guardian did for various brats, and frankly there were avenues by which the same information should've reached the Eight Generation Sun Guardian without the hitman so much as saying a word to anyone.

As there were various things in place to prevent exactly what happened, to keep Vongola abreast of Flame-related findings in something as critical as the medical field, that each method all failed them so utterly was not his fault. The hitman was not part of nor Vongola's keeper, it wasn't his responsibility to the Famiglia to keep it updated as best he could. As the brat's, on the other hand…

Intellectually Renato was equally aware of that information as she was. Accepting that was another issue, especially when it wasn't him that bore the brunt of the consequences.

Revelli was at least old enough to be aware and accepting that sometimes shit just happened on him when it really should've been avoided. Even if he utterly loathed the fact he accidentally dosed the brat with a hyper-variant of a bacterial meningitis infection when it was a known issue with viruses and Sun Flames. The new stronger than recommended for children medication was now making a dent, slowly and by increments she could measure with as obsessively as she was watching, which would hopefully stack up enough to start making a difference sometime soon. It was looking as if Shamal would come out the other side physically fine once the illness ran its course.

In the end, although there was harm done it would hopefully not be permanent.

Said medication mix was, as the vaccinations that were distributed a couple days ago, another 'Mafia Land' special order courtesy of Tatiana delivered by a very dazedly behaving Ganauche. Not a variant typically used by civilian institutions, but this time not nearly as illegal or untested as the vaccinations.

It was a lot more effective than the general antibiotics Revelli had started the brat on the moment they suspected it was a lot more serious viral infection than just a common sickness… the new medicine was even equally more effective than the 'legal' variants he changed to using when the results of the first lumbar puncture was known and they could identify the correct reason out of many possibilities.

Physically, the kid should be on the mend now.

Mentally was… another question entirely.

If this forgetfulness would spread to any of Shamal's memories or his fully healthy state once the illness ran its course was a bit more concerning. It was possible he'd have some difficulty with using his Mist Flames after such a high fever, or logical processing that his type wasn't really all that well known for in the first place, which… she'd accept and deal with as long as he was still a little opportunistic brat she called a godson.

Shamal kind of had to live, Sonya wasn't really sure what she'd do if otherwise… and Renato was certainly taking the whole thing a lot worse than she even was.

…and she was the fucking Cloud in the grouping.

By the time she felt settled enough to glance away from their godchild's little form without feeling as if the moment she looked away he'd get worse, the hitman had already slunk out of the medical wing's recovery hall without a word.

More than likely to go shoot up the firing range located somewhat removed from the 'garden' parts of the Iron Fort's grounds. He was chewing through their harmless clay targets for moving target practice faster than those assigned to maintain training courses had expected to deal with, and from the gossip Nilda shared with her on rare occasions outside the medical wing… they were actually running low on those innocent targets.

To the point a Vongola Mist agent was tasked with creating them instead, so at least there'd be enough for the staff to re-qualify as competent early next month.

Huffing a tired sigh, because no she wasn't mad at him but the coping mechanism the Inverted Sun had for personal failures convinced a handful of the maids and footmen that she was for some stupid reason, the thief instead glanced around for the other Sun that was 'braving' her temper.

"He's responding better to the chloramphenicol and ampicillin than the cephalosporin, at least he didn't fall asleep before thanking you this time." Revelli offered quietly when he noticed her looking at him, tapping his pen against his other hand as he took a moment to speak to her instead of just shift guiltily while updating the observation notes on the bratty Mist's illness. "Next time he wakes, try asking him to Construct you something... without, hopefully, agitating him."

Yeah… she had an idea for that.

"...do you want me to drag that rascal back by the ear?"
"For your information, although I don't know why it's your business, I'm not mad at Renato. He's left to go temper his emotions back to something he can be civil with, interrupting that will do no one any good. Let him do his thing in peace." Sonya was just not speaking to him because she felt guilty in forcing the hitman into an untenable position, in having to lie to her to protect Shamal from her reactions scaring the piss out of the medical staff doing a possible complication-heavy procedure on said brat.

The fact it was required for their godson's safety depressed her. That he let her throw things at him without retaliating for the near lethal insults was very sweet of him, and entirely something she shouldn't have done as pissed off as she had been and probably couldn't do for him with any kind of equal forbearance.

Renato read minds, he knew full well what she felt and was feeling. Just because they weren't talking did not mean they weren't communicating.

There was more than enough blame to go around, depending on how you looked at it. The hitman didn't blame her, and the thief didn't blame him, but blaming themselves was another matter entirely.

Finding a pediatrician who could deal with her… Sonya didn't know where to go. Given the latest round of gossip she was subjected to on Mafia Land, the pediatric wing of the hospital there basically all collectively wrote or updated their wills all at the same time when the first rumor of her being pregnant started. That left civilians, because if she couldn't find someone that could face her who knew of her Cloud Flames that only left those that wouldn't realize what she was.

…well, Renato had been using Doctor Kappel for Shamal. Out of probably thoughtless habit, even if the former Nazi was a general practitioner and not a pediatrician. If she explained, perhaps he wouldn't mind staying on for her until she found a way to pull off the apparently impossible or the brat was more in the age bracket he was supposed to deal with.

Shamal, for one of the rare few times he shifted about these last couple somewhat terrifying days, ended up throwing an arm around her waist and cuddling closer in spite of his fever. Sonya adjusted his IV tubing, so it wouldn't be pulled at if either of them moved, then settled back for more waiting.

(ooo000ooo)

(Monday the 23rd of March, 1970 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"You need to go."

Yeah, like that was going to help at all.

"Renato, you need to go." Sonya insisted again without turning to look at him when he didn't respond, not able to help her fidgeting with Shamal's hair as he slept on. "You've put off a whole lot, for both me and him, but you have a couple of things you've been ignoring. I know it. We appreciate you staying here. I do and Shamal will too. But-"Little dragon lady, this actually helps that." Just not the things he had to do after establishing the background situation as 'fraught with complications'. Besides, he left and he wouldn't be able to do a little side-hunting here or there to spare Timoteo the money on all those clay pigeons the hitman would shoot to shit otherwise.

Not just Vongola enemies trying to get close although he had no problem at all taking a few here or there for Nono, there were still trickles of those idiots that chased him into the Soviet Union and then to Timbuktu and back again. Only the really smart or stubbornly bullheaded were left, and Renato honestly found them serious enough as a threat he had to focus to take them out as they finally reached him. If he didn’t take them down as they showed up there’d be hell to pay to just slip out of Vongola secured territory once Shamal was back on his feet.

There was only so far Timoteo could keep clear for one lone hitman, especially as Renato wasn’t exactly pulling his weight in that relationship anymore.

Additionally, she had promised the brat gelato. Shamal might not remember the offer once he got better, but the woman would not be making him into a liar by omission.

…to be clear, he was a dirty filthy liar. Only on his terms, thank you very much.

Sonya wasn’t particularly happy he picked to wander over and take up a position directly behind her stiff-backed visitor’s chair she practically lived on recently but suffered the unasked imposition into her personal space silently enough while the Sun checked on the fever’s progress himself.

It was getting down there, but it wasn’t broken yet.

"Besides," continued the hitman in a forcibly neutral tone while still somewhat bent over her, now he didn’t have to speak loud enough she’d hear him across the damn room, "this is more than likely the last time I can do this until… well."

She was utterly unhappy to hear it and let him know by glaring. At the blankets Shamal was practically cocooned in rather than him.

"You are right in a way, little dragon lady. I keep putting it off." Admittedly for good reason, but Renato was stalling. The excuses were enticing, but frankly it was getting to the point he was inventing reasons to linger even knowing full well doing so was a particularly stupid idea. "You won’t mind taking him a little bit early than agreed so I can get… on top of that, would you?"

"You owe us dogs." Sonya immediately objected as quietly as him, sullenly. "And not until April. I leave the clan then, not now."

"In a week and a half."

"In two weeks and whatever political bullshit my Pahkan wants to go out on. Maybe three, I don’t know what he’s planning."

"A pair of puppies, two weeks at the earliest, and whatever political bullshit it is." Agreed the hitman simply enough as he straightened up again, then continued before she could point something else out in her aims to delay him more. "And yes, the arrangement with Nono for Shamal’s housing will last until his school year is over even if something happens to me. As a matter of fact, we’re disengaging it about two or three years early as it is."

He earned a disgusted glower for preempting her. Yet again, not actually directed at him but at her lap this time.

"The canines aren’t born yet, I had them special ordered. They’re paid for, to be delivered to the brat once they’re old enough to be weaned from their mother. Around June, probably."

"…did anyone think to feed Luiqi the last week or so?"

"Yes, I’ll be taking the dratted lizard with me." The Mist Flame pregnant dratted lizard, and the whole bug colony that would feed the damn things Shamal had been somewhat obsessively maintaining for the last month.
If the baby lizard was born in the next two weeks, then maybe he could leave the 'mom' behind without earning himself a Mist tantrum once he got back. Frankly, unless he was really creative, keeping a pet alive while his own survival would be a touch sketchy was not particularly the brightest idea.

…it was entirely a Mist one, and while Shamal was usually good about troubleshooting his off-the-wall ideas this one had gotten fanned by his Storm-Cloud godmother from conception to practical applications before it could be nipped in the bud at the altar of practicality. Hopefully the lizard would survive so he'd have something to present the brat once he was back, equally as hopefully the creature could be trained to be not useless or get itself killed stupidly.

If the damn thing died he'd invent a whole heroic story of its aid at a desperate life-threatening moment for why he no longer had it, but Renato really wasn't accustomed to failure these days. Even if it was stupid.

"Do you think…" Sonya trailed off before finishing her thought, unsure if her idea had any bearing on the situation at all but being directly behind her let him follow her thought process without too much trouble.

Did Luigi's condition explain why Shamal didn't pop Constructions into existence while sick?

Was the thing still pregnant?

What about the bugs he had been 'engineering' to be Flame-based for the baby chameleon to eat?

"…I'll check." Renato promised before her mind tripped down a few dozen more avenues to distract them both, then yanked the woman's chair about so she had to face him because he really didn't appreciate being ignored.

Sonya knew perfectly well he didn't, and he wasn't used to her being less than obliquely direct in a brain-baking and brutally blunt if sideways way. Not being annoyed with him, or infuriatingly angry, meant he had kind of stalled on how to help her deal with her latest show of 'surprise, I'm human' that was self-directed shame for both inaction and her recent actions.

He didn't mind she felt safe enough to express how utterly unhappy she was with his decision to mislead her at first, and he appreciated the faith he could take care of himself while she was so angry to finish yelling at him until she calmed down enough to think it through herself and see his position. He would've minded had she immediately left him to go blunt Tyr's sword instead.

To her credit, she didn't immediately look away from him. Instead he got the full brunt of her ugly glare for maneuvering her around without express permission as he re-adjusted himself to be level with her even if that meant he was kneeling in front of her seated form. It took less than a second to get the woman to sigh exasperatedly at him and finally shove away the feelings of chagrined irritation she had with her own belatedly realized fuck-up.

Not exactly dealt with, but at least she wouldn't dwell when looking at him anymore. Hopefully.

"I'd rather not go out on a sour note."

"That doesn't mean you deserve anything better." She immediately shot back without heat. "And I'm not faking anything for anyone just because they might get their feelings hurt. Not even you."

"Good. But can you at least look at me when we talk?"
"Frankly, aren't we already at a point we don't even really need to talk?" Mostly because he bullshitted half of it.

He sort of had to give her the point, both of them spoken or not, but there wasn't any reason to admit it. "What do you think the brat's going to think when he wakes up but you're giving me the cold shoulder?"

"...that you did something wrong, again?"

Snapping their heads to the side, the both of them took in a very miserable looking Mist dully staring back at them through glassy brown eyes. As the brat wasn't thinking anything, just sort of absorbing what little of their conversation he heard, the hitman had missed him waking.

Sonya was warily waiting for yet another repeat of the same conversation, but Renato noticed that while Shamal still wasn't entirely coherent he was at least thinking somewhat differently than he would the other times he woke up.

The kid also very distinctly recalled the last conversation he had with his godmother, and the fact the woman should be around.

For once.

Shamal, too groggy to catch on to the unspoken after waking up not too long ago as he wasn't sulking about Renato's upcoming 'abandonment', wiggled onto his side to see them better in the dimly lit hall. "So... when are we going for gelato?"

"Once the Old Sun lets you out of here." Promised the thief quickly, damn near slithering around the Sun's form with a couple very suggestive maneuvers to just hover at the kid's side. "I'm not going to ask if you're feeling better, I don't think you really remember much... but can you Construct me a pillow?"

Staring at her blankly for a full second, the Mist slowly frowned at her in a puzzled fashion. "...were you early or just on-time, mamma?"

"I was early. I got here even before him."

Renato stole her chair since she was back to fussing over the brat, idly brushing off any dust or dirt that might've gotten onto his knees while he waited.

Besides which, the incredulous look on the brat's face as he tried to make sense of that and his fragmented memories was more than enough revenge for the damn woman not staying put and finishing their conversation.

Strangely though, Sonya did not remotely mind the doubt aimed at her.

After Shamal managed to wrap his mind around his godmother being early, with a couple glances at him to check that really happened as she claimed, the kid did do as she asked in handing over a faked bag of fluffy feathers that didn't need to be pulled out from under his head.

A moment spent critically examining the object, then... neither of the males expected the thief to take firm hold of the thing and whack the hitman across the face with it.

"...the hell was that for?" Demanded the Mafioso shortly as he rubbed the side of his face she hit then had to grab for his hat before it hit the ground, keenly aware she hadn't actually put any force or irritation into it because... well, he still had a head.
"Stop being moody. The people around here are starting to think it's my fault." Sonya then hugged the Mist Flame pillow to her chest, a wry smirk aimed at him as their godson tried and failed to smother his shocked snorting giggles behind a hand. "Also, stop manhandling me. You can just ask."

Revelli had asked her to see if Shamal could Construct something the next time the kid woke, apparently. The pillow was, as she suspected from how bad Mists were with their Flames while sick and investigated for a second to be sure it still applied, utterly useless for anything but feeling soft and very squishy. Hitting him with it was all her idea, because she really was tired of being yanked around yet never really found an appropriate way to get her objections across in a way that would not really hurt even accidently but would still be shocking enough to hammer her point home.

She didn't particularly mind being held if he found it so pleasant, just his methods of getting her into his lap.

"…brat, give me one of those." The lady had spoken, and Renato would listen to her protest over his behavior and adjust accordingly… but he didn't lose fights.

Even pillow fights.

It was the principle of the matter, really. The fact it was a fight and as a Cloud Sonya would greatly enjoy a moment or three to be violent with even a useless Construct weapon that wouldn't let her kill anyone had little bearing on the situation.

(Wednesday the 25th of March, 1970. Saint Julian's Hospital, Mafia Land.)

"Do you have a moment, Doctor Kappel?" At the faintly expectant expression turned on her when the older man turned around, Tatiana firmly did not grimace or shift guilty. "Somewhere else…?"

"My office?"

"Erm… I was kind of thinking of getting lunch or something." Having prepared an excuse, the Sun Flame nurse pulled a whole sheaf of papers out from under her arm to show him.

The theoretical surgery notes alone were about seven pages of probable actions and expected side-effects or short-to-long term complications, explaining the Flame related terminology and several processes for replicating human flesh for replacement from damaged or not originals took another fifteen.

"This is a bit… well. We're going to need a bit of time to get through this entirely."

All the pages were hand-written as well. She had more sympathy for her sister's utter dislike for amending her paperwork on the Flame training results, but not by much. It had to be done, and it was in the end.

Just… ow, finger cramps.

"A new project…?" The man was surprised as he accepted it to look over for a general gist.

Likely because until she had everything written out and suitably vague on how she knew 'replicating Cloud Flame flesh' was an actual something that happened instead of a suggestion that could, she had not dared breathe word of this to anyone but her sister and kind of somewhat to Ganauche.
"Something like that, a Flame involved suggestion for a possible surgery. I would like your opinion… and then get your advice on if it's worth it to submit or which path I take from here. I've got a plan, but… you'd know better than I would if it'd work."

Kappel wasn't a fool or easily mislead. He got her general idea in seconds of scanning the first page of her proposed medical procedure, arched a fairly confused eyebrow until he got into how she thought to fix the problem with Flames until technology caught up, and then he got suspicious as expected over her motives for luring him out of the hospital well before he looked back up at her.

Which, to be fair, she wasn't even sure if he left the hospital at all. The good doctor might just actually have a little cot shoved in a corner somewhere, and the general impression most of the Moscow Flame users had of him of always being around or available if need be wasn't just for them.

"Please?"

He glanced down at the papers in his hand, sighed while reaching over his half-moon glasses to pinch the bridge of his nose for a moment, then dropped the hand from his face to gesture towards the general entrance for their place of work. "Lead on then, Nurse Primakova."

As it was entirely likely he knew just as well as she did his office was bugged with listening devices, the former Nazi doctor just really didn't care all that much by appearances, she tried for a grateful smile before doing as bid.

Their conversation would still probably be incredibly awkward, but it probably should happen before something utterly major went down to necessitate revealing the components of that surgery. Not too much information would need to be revealed, but still more than enough for Kappel to buy on supporting her proposal to the Head Doctors. Then there would be admitting that she intended to try for surgeon first and not a general practitioner until after her 'main' secondary as a pediatrician.

Shamal survived his very unfortunate jaunt into Flame related medical complications, from the sounds of it only slightly muddled and hopefully just needing a bit of time to sort himself out again, but her sister had a point. The number of pediatricians that could face down a Cloud or Sky, or even a Sun, parent and actually convince them about salient points of their child's health or care being different than they thought were probably non-existent.

Rain, maybe even Lightning, and more certainty Storm parents couldn't be a whole lot better if they didn't immediately accept a medical specialist had more of an idea of what was or what wasn't healthy for their children than they did. Mist parents… probably never sought out medical help much.

The kids involved in such situation didn't deserve to be overlooked just because it would be harder than hell to deny or argue against their parents about what was 'best' for them.

Tatiana wanted to continue working with Doctor Kappel. The man was at least trained up enough to not take one look at her generous chest and dismiss anything she might say as a brainless-bimbo flapping her lips just to be heard. Frankly, surgeons were kind of the pinnacle of sexist assholes in the hospital and that was an infuriating headache and a half just waiting for her.

It was just… her younger siblings would not be amiable to taking orders from just any medical practitioner barking at them or fussy Sun obsessing over their contributions. They'd also probably feel a whole lot safer with her being the one to handle any kind of involvement they'd have until an actual Cloud nurse was sourced somehow.

This was all assuming they'd even want to help out here or there a tiny bit, otherwise the Sun nurse had the intent to stonewall any inquires to see if her siblings could 'help' the proposed medical procedure along by 'donating' or otherwise being paid for their time and Flames.

Neither of the full-grown Clouds were healers by nature, Sonya was fussy but not entirely nurturing unless whoever happened to be really close to her and while Cherep could he just didn't want to do that for his entire life. Valera would likely join them in the 'indifferent but if Tatiana insisted' grouping given enough time.

The best way to hide where she got her inspiration from was to include more Clouds than just her siblings, at least until such time either Skull himself or Sonya let it slip 'undying Clouds' were possible. Which, as her as a main 'Flame source' from the Zolotov accord with the hospital about supplying more personnel with the abilities, would not happen naturally without a little help.

Hence the German doctor patiently following her out the hospital and into the streets to find a less compromised place to talk. Even if explaining enough to gain his help would be, as noted, awkward to do.

Kappel would not be impressed with any of them. Especially as Sonya kind of forgot to inform him of her broken leg situation when he asked for any further injuries to be aware of, Tatiana for not coming clean about it at the time or alerting him to her siblings' having a medical-related work-around that needed more investigation as there was at least one known side effect possible, or Cherep himself for skirting around actual checkups by insisting the Sun do it if he had to.

He'd understand, probably, but still would not be impressed at all.

(ooo000ooo)

(Wednesday the 25th of March, 1970 continued. The Iron Fort, Italian Republic.)

"Good afternoon, young Shamal. You had a very interesting week, didn't you?"

"...good afternoon, Lady Fiorella." The tiny Mist mumbled back sheepishly, not twitching from his half-sprawled position over his godmother's lap. "Thank you for sitting with me."

Apparently, his lethargic behavior was from exhaustion or just because he was making the most of the time he had Sonya as close as she was.

The child squawked in offense when a finger pushed his face into the half-prone Russian's stomach, pouting up at the woman that did it once he could raise his head again. "And now he knows better than to ignore it if he's sick, don't you brat?"

"Sorry, mamma." Spoke the abashed child, curling into her for more shameless cuddling that was admittedly adorable.

Why didn't her two eldest sons want to cuddle with her anymore?

His color was a lot better since the last time the Lady of Vongola caught a glimpse of him, and her wry smile for the other woman earned her a sarcastic eye-roll that made her laugh instead of a polite excuse of Shamal needing more rest. Still... being lethargic was to be expected after so many days dreadfully ill to the point of unconsciousness, slightly exaggerated or not as the case may be now, but that was acceptable paired with being awake and moving around under his own steam.

Furthermore, the child was aware and not stressing his very dedicated godparents with repeats of the same conversation the rare few times he surfaced from sleep.
Fiorella wasn't remotely sure what and why the 'Flame users' were now concerned with in the child's recovery, she just knew there was something they were keeping watch for, but that was entirely not her business and something she would not ask about.

If it was one of her sons, she would not be happy to have to explain a limitation or worry to a nosy outsider either.

"Are you seeking a 'break' again?" Sonya inquired simply while she took a seat next to them, merely re-adjusting the book of fables in her hand not occupied with her godchild's hair while distracted.

"I didn't intend to until you didn't very politely chase me out again once the greetings were given."

Both Visconti and Solothurn didn't tend to like talking to people, the fact Sonya could hold entire conversations with others using words was an appreciative difference between Italian and Russian examples of the same 'Flame type'. Fiorella had come to appreciate the same, especially as while seeking a distraction from her own worries the woman would not mind distracting or helping with hers now or again.

The Russian merely hummed in acknowledgement of her presence instead of immediately offer her opinions on the strain between her and her husband, grey eyes dropping to clearly printed if faded pages to continue reading for Shamal's enjoyment even if another was now in the room to listen too.

She didn't have an expressive voice, that would be a touch generous even considering some Clouds were nearly outright mute in comparison, but it was soothing in how calm and unhurried she was to be reading something aloud.

Sonya would've likely gotten to the end then restarted the whole series of fables without either Shamal or Fiorella interrupting her had it not been for Enrico. Who got into the medical wing and almost snuck around his mother entirely to see what was going on for himself had, without so much as pausing between one word and the next or even glancing to the side, the blonde set her book down on her knee and reached over to haul the other child up into Fiorella's lap.

As the younger woman went back to holding the book she was reading from, she instead occupied herself with her lapful of son. "Enrico, you shouldn't be down here."

"Neither should you, mum." Her second boy countered, at first confidently but under the arched eyebrow she aimed at him he grew less sure of his statement. "...right?"

"I am an adult. Yes, I too have bodyguards when I leave the family floor but mine is just outside in the hallway. Where is yours, young man? Did you even get permission to come down here?"

Enrico's silence was utterly telling, as if she needed it knowing full well most of the mischief her older children got into was mostly his idea at first. "You need to stop doing this. What if you got hurt or lost?"

"I live here." He countered in offended dignity, wrinkling his nose at her to cement how ridiculous he found her suggestion.

Sonya finally paused in her reading but didn't look up. "Objection, brat. I don't know you, and I highly doubt you know who I am. So, if you were hurt or got out the front gates on me I wouldn't know to tell someone or to not call you an ambulance."

"Hey," Shamal protested, pouting up at her in a somewhat exaggerated fashion, "I'm your brat."

Obviously, through the little conversation she had with Enrico in front of her alone, the Russian was fully aware he was Fiorella's son now. Given how deft she was with handling her own child, it was also entirely likely she’d fetch a young boy trying to slip out of the Iron Fort to drop said child into a maid or footman's arm if only out of practicality. She was sharp, sharper than the older Italian by a measurable difference as plucking her sneaking son out of nowhere showed, but lending her credibility in the quest of all mothers everywhere to pound some common sense into their sons was always appreciated.

Enrico finally realized the blonde wasn’t one of the veritable army of maids or a new nurse that worked in his home entertaining a sick patient, going eerily silent as he finally absorbed some of the lesson of 'not everyone here at home could have your best interests at heart'.

With the resilience of children everywhere, he bounced back from that little setback in his world view exasperatingly quickly. "Shamal, where have you been? You missed a whole week of school!"

Amusingly, the little brunette gave his contemporary's little brother an utterly bland look he more likely learned from his godmother's example. "I'm in the sick bay, aren't I? I was sick."

"Did you get your tonsils removed or something?"

Fiorella wasn't sure if Sonya's sudden frown at the question meant anything, the Russian seemed more confused than anything more serious.

"No. I was just sick. Slept through most of it too." Shamal explained tiredly, smoothing his little chin down his godmother's thighs to apparently find a cooler spot given his blissful little sigh when he found it.

"Federico said you died." Reported Enrico tactlessly, and as brightly innocent as only a six-year-old boy could pull off saying such a thing.

Slapping a hand over her middle child's apparently somewhat big mouth, his mother gave the very still godmother next to her a tight smile. "I'm apparently going to have some stern words with my eldest, sorry about that Sonya."

"...it was a very close thing. We're lucky my sister has little morals about bending a few things when it comes to the health of another, sending us that medication." Refuted the woman slowly after a slightly awkward moment. "Your eldest might've misheard something and told his brother slightly wrong information instead of... well, anything specifically intentional."

"I still need to speak to him about spreading second or third-hand gossip." That was just inviting trouble when there was always more than enough to go around, and Fiorella would very much like to know who spoke of the situation around her son when no one would inform her of anything. "And maybe speak to all of my sons about the harm such thoughtless behavior can do to their reputations and another's."

"It's a good idea." Sonya offered awkwardly, obviously not really sure if her opinion would matter to her or if it was wanted at all from how warily she was watching her.

Shamal, the sweetheart that hadn't looked remotely bothered by what Enrico told him or distressed at the revelation of what was being said about him, tugged on his godmother's blouse. "Mamma...? Can I dress up as a zombie when I go back to school?"

"...I know I'm going to regret this, but why?"

"Because it'd be funny."

The Russian rolled her eyes, then caught Fiorella's perhaps a touch too shocked stare. "Mists, Lady Fiorella. They're all... equally as weird. It would be something a Mist finds funny, to twist rumor into reality when the truth is very different."

"Does... Federico know that?" Was her son helping the other boy?

"It's possible. I don't know a whole lot of Sky behaviors but setting up an amusement a prospective Guardian Element might find interesting does sound plausible. Shamal's of the same general age range as your eldest, I believe, so 'courting' a Guardian might entirely be a motive for him."

The older mother pursed her lips thoughtfully. "You weren't just saying that to make Enrico's comment sound less rude to me, were you?"

From the grimace that twisted the other woman's lips, she wasn't entirely correct. "I don't know Skies. You'd have to ask either your husband or your mother-in-law for a better idea, or the kid himself what he does or doesn't intend."

"Do I have to ask to get any answers around here?"

"With me? Yes." Countered the blonde bluntly, something she was also fast becoming rather appreciative of. "You have to ask me because I'm not a native of this part of the world, and there are parts of it I don't know. There're all sorts of ill-intentions someone might have to volunteer information you didn't ask for when you have no prior experience to judge their claims against. You take the wrong person with ill-intents at their word..."

Fiorella released her middle child's loose lips just to rub at her forehead as she took that advice to heart. "I see... is there anything you can recommend to make this go faster, then? Timoteo said he couldn't right now, and I really want to trust him in that despite all the 'in the know' around here but he's already lied to me about something rather significant before..."

Sonya drummed her fingers into the spine of the book she wasn't reading anymore. "While... I really don't want to help your husband at all... he's right. Actually. What you want is a Home Tutor, but there's never very many of them. I have two, for all of Moscow, and one already has a consecutive contractual obligation somewhere else the moment he's done with his current student. The other one started his assignment half a year ago and won't be remotely finished with his for another year yet. I doubt Italy has more, given how difficult maintaining a Home Tutor's position of neutrality to all involved parties to avoid accusations of this or that agenda regarding their students is for any length of time."

A tutor? "That doesn't sound-"

"They're expressly for situation where the normal methods of instruction aren't viable." She continued rather pointedly, then sighing as she turned back to fussing with her pliant godson's wavy hair. "Which, in your case, is entirely the issue. Vongola's old, Lady Fiorella. Coming up on three-four centuries old, depending how you measure the time. That's a lot of history, a lot of political pull, in this part of the world for our society. A lot of people either want a piece of it or to tear it down, and you are Timoteo's wife and the mother of the next generation of Vongola's leaders. He can't just pick anyone, and there's a couple other long-standing groups that would object to a Tutor for you being pulled from another family instead of them."

As she had drawn the same conclusion over the parts of that deliberation she could see, and it did explain the hovering by the staff when she entertained a few garden parties for the wives of her husband's associates where apparently half knew and half didn't, Fiorella took that under advisement. Somehow and somewhat transparently but given the short approving nod Sonya gave her apparently without causing hard feelings.
"I don't like your husband, it's somewhat well known by this point. I like some of his people, don't really appreciate your mother-in-law, and my sister's somewhat distracted by one of his Guardians. I don't have much reason to mislead you, but I could if you ask me without a witness nearby to refute the bad information. Which is why Miss Silvery-White was very attentive when I explained Flame user habits around fully-grown adults to you, and the fact she's eavesdropping, if you noticed."

She hadn't, either then or right now. Trying to not show how out of her depth she felt, things were so much less complicated when all she really needed to do was keep the gold diggers and twits from harassing the help or behaving rudely to another wife over coffee or otherwise raise her sons, she glanced down at her own boy and stopped him from pulling silly faces at the older 'Mist'… who was pulling faces of his own right back.

Fiorella's confused look was answered by an utterly deadpan expression.

"I've got a Mist. With them, pulling faces when bored is honestly the least of my worries."

"Oh?"

Sonya grimaced again. "There's this kid back in Moscow who's also a Mist, he's been screwing with how old others perceive him as. Because 'he gets left out of all the fun things' and doesn't appreciate it, as he's nine and trying to get into the things only teenagers are allowed to try their hands at while also being too impatient to wait until he is old enough."

"…oh dear." She had a lapful of 'a possible Sky', another maybe-Sky and her eldest was known as one.

What childish misadventures were Skies known for?

"I think… I should probably speak to my mother-in-law rather soon." Lady Daniella had been attempting to let her settle things between herself and her son without influencing them, however Fiorella now found a few pressing concerns she really must speak to an 'elder' Sky about.

Timoteo would only try to reassure her that he and his staff had things well in hand and would handle anything before it could happen, without actually addressing anything she asked of him and the why it mattered between two individuals if she wasn't asking about him or his Guardians. It wasn't that he still believed it wasn't her business, when her sons were expected to follow her husband's Flame type or when she had to rely on his bodyguards in fraught moments too.

…the somewhat infuriating man did think it would be ultimately useless for her to know anything in detail about any other Flame type behaviors beyond the social niceties to accommodate the few users she apparently interacted with, but he was of the opinion if it made her feel better to know then there wasn't much point trying to prevent her learning anything. Fiorella found the sentiment rather insulting, and somewhat worrying because Timoteo believed it was possible to control what she learned.

Worse, it was entirely likely it was possible.

It wasn't until recently that she realized how few friends she had left, none of them from before her marriage and a few after that were likely used to reporting things to Timoteo when asked, that she realized how true the 'outsider' feeling she had was. Her current issue was trying not to correlate her lack of support outside her husband's 'staff' and people to said husband, because drifting apart after school or when you rarely spoke to old friends just happened.

…but her husband probably could, entirely naturally, slowly extract her from the people she would have otherwise had around her that might have different opinions on the subjects of contention. If she could speak to them about it, that was.

She called her parents now and again, but the last time she saw them in person…

They’d probably appreciate seeing their grandsons in in flesh at least once in their lifetimes, honestly. Fiorella should arrange a visit sometime soon.

"…mum?" Enrico asked hesitantly, pulling on her dress' bodice a few times to get her to refocus on him. "Are you okay?"

"Mmm, I'm fine." It was entirely ridiculous to be lonely or feel isolated in an entire house of people and her own sons, so patting him on the back once she let him slip to the ground. "I think we should probably leave young Shamal to his rest for now, Enrico. Say goodbye, dear."

Said young man needing his rest merely waved a limp hand at them both, settling in for what did look to be a nap in progress. Sonya, on the other hand, gave her a very pointed look that called Fiorella out on her bullshit… but she remained silent as she moved her book away from potential drool hazards.

Daniella was entirely correct, calling Russians delightfully blunt and frank. At least they had the tact to make it an appreciative character trait rather than an exasperating one.

Nilda, indeed waiting just close enough to the medical wing's doors to enable eavesdropping if she wished, gave her charge a tight smile as mother and son joined her. "Back upstairs?"

"Indeed. Somedays, I wish there weren't so many… but, well… I now have a fantastic set of legs for a mother thrice over." Enrico gagged at her side, but her bodyguard's tight smile loosened to something a lot more natural.

Now then, was her 'Rain' guard annoyed over being called 'Miss Silvery-White' again or for being called out for eavesdropping?

(Saturday the 28th of March, 1970. Saint Gallen, Canton of Saint Gall, Swiss Confederation.)

"Pack. Up."

Scrambling out of bed for everything he would remotely need for the next few hours as those words rang in his ears without needing to be spoken aloud, Bjørn pinned a leather folder to his chest and his suit jacket with tie in the other and almost reached his shoes.

Before he could get there, there was an entirely nauseating sensation of being pulled apart and also blindly bounced around somewhere tightly constrained.

Tatiana blinked at him blankly, stirring whatever she had cooking on the stove absently as she eyed his rather ungainly emergence from nothing in an undignified flopping manner to hit the living room floor of the Mafia Land apartment. "Do I want to know?"

To add insult to injury, not that Viper would intentionally hamper his health but bruises were fair game entirely if he failed to keep up, the Lackey's brown leather loafers bounced off his head before he could answer. Grumbling sourly under his breath in his native language, he gingerly picked himself and his things up before his tutor could dump the rest on him. "Viper apparently deems whatever happened to be not in my best interest to become involved with."

"Well, good for you." Observed the nurse idly, tasting the thin soup she was tending curiously for a second before adjusting the heat under her pot and continuing to stir it. "Nya was here then left again after about a week. Shamal got really sick, so she's a touch distracted from just about everything right now."

Björn didn't groan in dismay, it was close but he didn't. He did shuffle over to his couch to await the rest of his belongings to be tossed through whatever insanity-space Mists made use of to him, bloody or not as his tutor dealt with whatever they banished him for. "Anything else?"

She likely wouldn't ensure her displeasure at being tardy to report in to her was felt because he was off on business she had arranged for him, but she had asked he not make her wait that long.

"She took Verde and Adrik to her castle, you can coordinate anything you need to arrange through them. They'd also probably like whatever you know is missing from the upkeep there."

A cough jarred him from immediately responding. "Anything else beyond that?"

"I've decided to focus my studies on surgery." Admitted the nurse after a moment to very deliberately draw attention to her plotting. "So, if I eye you like I'm plotting out how many parts I could separate you into… it's probably because I am."

…apparently, she felt a tiny bit sadistic today. "Okay…?"

"Doctor Kappel would appreciate it if you would check in with him sometime soon, just so he can reassure himself you're not hiding any medical difficulties with your Flame types from him." She continued brightly, deeming her soup or stock finished and clicking off the stove.

That was a bit of a non sequitur. Confused what that had to do with anything, Björn shrugged instead of risk speaking more even if she wasn't looking at him to see it and turned his attention to checking over what he did manage to grab in the few seconds he had to prepare as he got sort of light-headed.

Switching from the mountain edged valleys of Switzerland to a sea-level island in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean was harsh. Mists were probably the most experienced Flame type in dealing with altitude sickness, but they also knew of reverse altitude sickness. Viper had informed him, while detailing his extraction options in case of emergency, of the phenomena somewhat pointedly. The miser also offered what short-term adjustments to high altitude areas for someone that lived in low altitude ones like him needed to do, and the reverse just in case, when the Icelander paid for it too.

The near-instant headache was to be expected. As was the dizziness and the somewhat more difficult breathing. The coughing was… something a touch more.

Yes, at this elevation oxygen was denser… but it wasn't like his body knew that. All his body could sense was something had changed, and whether or not he could draw in enough air to continue living was entirely something it felt the right to panic about.

…Björn had been dealing with Mists too long, thinking of his body as if it was a separate entity from him.

"Lackey, why are you having problems breathing?"

Well, nurse. He told her between deep breaths and around some involuntary splutters on his own air, trying to get his body to adjust already.
Glittering yellow Flames coaxed his lungs into doing what the brain was smart enough to identify but was unable to communicate to an automatic function, then two inhales went unaided before Tatiana helped him draw in enough air again without spluttering on it. By the fifth time she had to help him his lungs got the picture, and the headache started to fade as what felt like bands across his lungs loosened.

"I didn't know this was a problem." Spoke the Sun Flame user idly, which really had no bearing whatsoever on what she was really thinking or feeling and was entirely deceptive in giving the illusion of answering being optional.

"Apparently," no coughs, so perhaps he could get to work on arranging the work crews that needed to replace the somewhat old window sills with more sturdy modern glass today instead of tomorrow, "it's a well-known phenomenon in Mist circles. Likely from first-hand experience... but you know Mists, Tatiana."

"Yeah, they do that shit then wonder why we have so much difficulty helping or understanding them later on." With a huff, she left him to breathing on his own to decant what she had been cooking into a strainer over another bowl to separate the liquid broth from the bones she was boiling. "By the way, put on some damn pants."

The moment she spoke the word 'pants', the slacks he had removed last night ended up in his face as Mist Flames apparently waiting for that exact moment decided to ensure his embarrassment was assured for the rest of his life.

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 28th of March, 1970 continued. Saint Gallen, Canton of Saint Gall, Swiss Confederation.)

It took a few hours, but eventually Viper had to admit defeat.

Grudgingly.

At this point, the Esper couldn't even really say what it was that woke them. A void was a void, even in one's senses. The fact Viper had noticed a void of nothing near them at all would have to do, because without even a taste of whichever Mist wanted a good look at them they could not secure a method to track the other down with. Even with the Thoughtography ability, they would not be able to pinpoint the other without something the target called their own.

Names worked, as did a sense of another's Flames. Body parts, from toenails to hair, and blood would do... and in a pinch the blood of family would work equally as well. Better if it was from parents.

They had nothing to show from this scavenger hunt into nothingness, which meant nothing to pin down and eliminate a threat through.

Tugging firmly on the hood they wore, a Constructed facsimile rather than the wool cloth they normally used, Viper turned on a heel and walked back into the real world walking west down a street called Birnbäumenstrasse on their way back to the hotel.

It really would only take a second to appear there, but the Mist was somewhat shaken by the close encounter with nothing. When such rare incidents happened, they tended to choose long-winded and pointlessly complicated methods of travel to slide under the notice of those expecting that by using an ability of speed and convenience going slow would never occur to Mists.
To be fair, it rarely happened.

It was also why Viper counted money in both physical ways and Mist ones. The first thing anyone, much less another Mist, would do to mess with them was target the very trait that was becoming so infamous a Lackey and his patron both wordlessly offered up cold hard cash to get what they wanted without pointless talking or attempting to barter the Esper down to more realistic amounts.

…a pity, as Cherep was the only one to take it as a challenge to haggle with Viper about the price of various 'services' but that was a rare event. Mainly the stuntman didn't care to protest anything except what was too outrageous, because paying his friend was something that made them happy so he would.

The question now was if that void-sense was part of the Mists of Switzerland or not. It could be like the whispered rumors of the ancient one, a boogie-man of a myth credited with the occasional death of idiotic Mists intent on disproving the rumors only to end up removed from the living world.

Viper highly doubted the void-one was the ancient one, as flighty as most Mists were when it came to trading verifiable information the fact there was one enduring trait applied to the rumored being said it all. It was ancient, likely a dead Mist refusing to die much as a Cloud stuntman did on a much grander scale, and highly disinterested in anything but its own aims unless you forced it to be interested.

If that sensed void returned… in a fraught contest of wills between two or more Mists…

Thankfully, there would be a war hammer involved to assist them with tapping down loose nails that thought themselves so clever in short order. Against the void-one it might not help much but injecting something greatly different into a situation to counter expectations was always a valid tactic.
Chapter 109

(Tuesday the 31st of March, 1970. A gelato shop on Via D. Cardona, Vibo Valentia, Italian Republic.)

Shamal, wearing his godmother's light knit sweater because even the mid-morning sea breeze chilled him a bit more than he was comfortable with so soon after being seriously ill, had his eyes on maybe finishing his cup of gelato then starting in on Sonya's. The thief had picked vanilla, rather than copy the hitman in picking espresso or the brat in his chocolate flavor.

Renato snorted when the woman so innocently looked away from a suspicious shiny silver butterfly to take a bite of her treat... a second before the Mist could commit to stealing a bite from her. The game had been going on for five whole minutes now, and while Sonya would allow Mist-made or her own distractions to tempt her away from her gelato she always went back just before the brat could dare do anything.

Getting a polite look of attention from the thief, and a sour glower from the Mist, for the noise the hitman discarded his little paper bowl and the plastic spoon supplied to eat their frozen yogurt with in a nearby trash can. "I should hit the road..."

She tisked, making a sour kind of sneer not really aimed at anyone. "So should I, frankly."

"Ho? ...are you putting something off?"

"Something like that."

Shamal, the utter brat, appeared utterly unconcerned by anything the two of them had been in the middle of before he got sick and derailed a whole lot of plans.

"I need to head to China, at the very least." Sonya continued absently around her little plastic spoon. "Now... if I could only remember that guy's name..."

"Which guy?" The Mist pounced on suspiciously, although making an admirable effort to keep his disgruntlement off his face to keep from distracting the woman from answering.

"Fong's Triad head... Zhōng, that's it. I keep thinking it's Gong. But no, that's the guy whose hand I crushed. Well, that or something with an 'i' in it." She looked pleased, for about all of a second. "... don't ask me his surname. Either one. I don't recall if I was ever told."

"I'll be sure not to." Renato drawled out a touch sarcastically, but apparently any reason for why he'd be so flew over the Russian's head. She dismissed it as just him being himself, rather than being a male interested in her not appreciating her mentioning other men to him.

Fong would be the Triad martial artist on Mafia Land, the hitman had run into him once directly and otherwise glancing around the island's more residential sectors. Which reminded him, he had yet to spend the time or accumulated efforts to learn Chinese from a Mist... he wouldn't have the influence to spend for a while, frankly.

"Regardless... brat. A month or so, probably more like two because I need to have some construction done in a fast hurry, and I'll be finished with the basics of my... place. Then you can come live with me, once you're done with the school year. So, this summer is when you're moving. Plan accordingly."
"Am I staying with the school next year too?"

"That's a bit far to go just for school." Observed the Mafioso dryly when she blinked a few times to contemplate how to enable it if he did want to return next year, even flying round-trip that would still be a few hours to get to school and return so it wasn't feasible even if she wanted to try. "Probably not. More likely, you'll get shoved into whatever's local. Although, speaking of… if you do get a different school… you know perfectly well how to behave yourself, right?"

At first matching his pointed look with a stubborn look of his own, the brat winced when Sonya tossed in her two bits.

"Seriously, kid. I'm not going to have a whole lot of leeway with any time for the next couple years. I won't be able to do a whole lot of these 'drop everything' moments, so if you'd kindly save them for real emergencies I'd appreciate it."

Of course, Mists being Mists, that got translated into 'don't get caught/suspected' in Shamal's devious if young mind. The kid did, since his godmother ruled out something she didn't want to deal with, adjust his plans enough to account for that but the restriction didn't really impact much that he had pre-planned for his current and future school mates.

As far as he perceived things, that is.

Renato wished Sonya the joy of dealing with the inevitable fallout, because as strong as the brat was he was unpracticed and rather inexperienced yet with his plots. He'd get the experience by doing things that might just need 'parental' interference to prevent the Mist from accidently screwing himself over, which had been thankfully thin on the ground the last couple years.

Although, speaking of… "...how much of our... special skills are held under the police's umbrella? If said special skill holder isn't under the Vows already?"

Shamal should, at the very least, be aware of the finite limits of allowable leeway. As should they, just to ensure his excitement wouldn't exceed his common sense.

The only one who would probably know between all of them gave a semi-thoughtful frown. "It's not explicitly clear. Unfortunately."

"More of the brat's kind aiming to take advantage?"

"How ever did you guess?" Ignoring his bark of laughter, and the keenly interested stare from said Mist brat, the blonde discarded her own frozen treat to the child in order to rub at her forehead. "I swear... if it's not Usov and his interest in getting an introduction to an officer of all things, it's the entire damn section deciding that the wording is more important than the intent behind a few orders and of course they're allowed to twist around such things to violate the spirit. Repeatedly."

Well, that stood to reason. What Mist worth their Flames didn't immediately find each and every way around what they've been forbidden to do?

Getting them to heed those limitations were sometimes more trouble than it was worth.

"When are you going to ask, then?"

"I'm not sure I should." Sonya immediately responded, vastly different than he expected her to. "It's not just those like our brat, who more than likely will end up with us before long. There's... a small handful I know of that don't want anything to do with the world we live in."
Renato… was not impressed.

Apparently somewhat transparently, given the utterly bland look he got back.

"One of said handful is a young teenage girl, with an interest in law."

…alright. Apparently he needed an attitude adjustment because the first thought he had was 'well, we need lawyers just as much as anyone else', which while true was entirely churlish. If a lady said no a lady said no… yet apparently that wasn't what he immediately understood from the proposed situation without the details behind it.

"Besides which, what exactly gives anyone the right to another person just because they have some kind of trait?" Continued the professional thief who also stole people absently, eyeing the dregs that were left of her gelato after Shamal got through with it. "Just because she has it does not mean she's not her own person or can live as she likes."

"I believe the prevailing thought behind that particular habit is 'because we belong together', although admittedly I'm no expert." Offered the hitman after a moment, skeptical of even that because he never really dedicated any time to asking around or inquiring about what other options there might be.

He hadn't been interested in anything other than being a hitman. From the start to even now, he wanted to be a Mafioso and he wanted the ability to secure his own damn back from other Mafiosi or hitmen around him.

"Oh please." She scoffed sardonically. "As if that ever goes through anyone's head unless they're poaching independent civilian outfits. And it's an excuse, we all know it."

"I wouldn't be the one to speak about that."

"Actually, you are. Because you don't have a reason to dress it up in pretty political lies and hand wave the practice. You're also a sample of what the men on the ground assume is the rule of thumb for such incidents is, and what they'd do with that information if and when they find it."

The hitman pondered the accusation, as indirect and backhandedly as she issued it. "And what, exactly, would convincing me do for any such knee-jerk reaction?"

"Because you are what it means to be a… well, what you are. If you have a difference of opinions on the subject when asked or whatever, then all the wise guys nipping at your heels vying for your position or attention will adopt the same outlook because 'it must work for him'."

"Will it work for us?" He shot back quickly, earning a shrug.

"It will cut down on disgruntled employees that feel as if there's no reason to be loyal because they didn't want this in the first place. It might even just result in earning you consideration later on for not pulling people that would otherwise live simple lives into infinitely more complex lifestyles they don't survive in long." Sonya batted a hand at him as if to dismiss anything that might happen from it. "Who's to say? As it is now… there's a lot of unsavory parallels that can be drawn to several social groups that either once existed or still do today. Mainly 'impressment', 'conscripted servitude', 'human trafficking', and 'serfdom'. Of which, I'm about to go take advantage of to ensure yet another toddler isn't being impressed into something he shouldn't be before he can decide himself."

"That's a bold claim."

"What would've happened to the brat had you not gone back for him?"
Renato blinked, then thought about it. Obviously, Shamal wouldn't have ended up in the Iron Fort so quickly after being made an orphan and homeless, his father lived much further north than Vongola's home or even allied territories. If anyone, the brat would've ended up somewhere in the Pesca Famiglia's umbrella scrounging much as he had himself in his childhood for just enough food and recognition to scrape out something a touch better for himself.

Mainly half assed living quarters, which only occasionally had enough running water every four days and barely enough room for an actual bed.

…it was half the reason he grabbed the kid in the first place, because that was damn near cut-throat in competitiveness. Sometimes literally. The other half was because the baby brat was a Mist, and Flame traffickers… hmm, point.

He'd done it all before on his lonesome, and how many times had he cursed out the adults around him for not sparing two seconds to warn of easily made mistakes before he cut himself on them?

Now he had the skills and tips to pass on and a baby possible Mafioso-hopeful at his knees, the hitman didn't want to be a damn thing like those stingy bastards who just watched him try then fail over and over again. He'd do better than all of them, and Shamal wouldn't struggle with the unnecessary bullshit he had to string together to be taken remotely seriously.

Then again, when Renato had been seven and scrapping for his dinner being a Dying Will Flame user was practically the same as being any other brat in his little scrap of dirty slums because outside the massive famiglias it wasn't well known what one was. Now that Shamal was seven every luckless moron remotely connected to the pulse of the Mafia knew full well having Dying Will Flames allowed you entrance in any famiglia worth its salt now the structured organizations realized there was fresh blood to snag running about.

Then there was the point of Flame traffickers, and the point it might not have gone away just changed slightly to be more respectable. Otherwise the syndicates that started it all finally wised up and amended their policies to prevent 'disgruntled workers' from aiming to take them down from the inside.

Like picking up a child Flame user that wouldn't know better or otherwise because they were orphaned early, then raising them somewhere they wouldn't have originally to cement their loyalties to structured syndicates of choice.

Which wasn't what happened here with Shamal, and Sonya knew full well… but she was practically the only one and she had been there from the start to have that view. Anyone looking outside in would just see bratty Mist was powerful, Renato's ward since toddlerhood, adored the hitman and took his words to heart. They'd look at her and see mostly the same if slightly different because the thief wasn't Italian nor interested in cultivating local contacts nearly as much as he was.

That lens hadn't been applied to his interactions around here, because this was his home country and the thought they'd specifically set out to do something he had to horribly fuck up in the first place to cause… well, he might not have thought about it but ignoring the possibility now would be both hard to do and stupidly self-sabotaging.

"I'll see what I can do." Renato promised the Russian, which he could do without lying because she was fully aware he would be coming back after his 'death'.

He really needed to think up of a handle to use, he kept putting it off because specifically linking a name to any one specific thing he couldn't control just yet was more than likely impossible. A couple pre-made assumptions of his existence before 'Renato' died would help prevent others from linking the two hopefully somewhat different Mafiosi to the same individual.

Not having any idea just yet meant no one else would have any idea what he'd call himself if he wasn't going to go by name.

---

Saturday the 4th of April, 1970. Wo Hop To Triad's Compound, Wan Chai District, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.

"Lady Cloud, be welcome."

Given the thin, utterly unfriendly smile he got in return, being a 'welcome' guest would fast be straining the definition of the term. Zhōng Duyi returned the expression with a short nod, which thankfully smoothed the ill-fitting and entirely faked expression from her lips.

"This is going to have to be quick, I've had way too much come up and delay me as it is." Pausing, and seeing if he was really all that interested in what delayed her for two whole weeks outside the agreed time, the thief very silently sighed in his face. "My godson got terribly ill."

Ah.

Tactfully deciding to forgive her missing the actual arranged dates to be within his territory with such an excuse to offer, he gestured for Huang to serve the tea. "Understandable. Will you be staying with us long?"

"No, as I've said... I'm now sandwiched between several pressing responsibilities I can't shove off or otherwise ignore. So about two days, in which I have only one burning question to answer." That faked smile returned, although this time not aimed directly at him as much as the situation in general it seemed. "How is that Flame-blind child doing?"

"...to be clear, we are not aligned nor associated with the Big Circle Boys." Admitted the head of the Wo Hop To Triad to start with, earning him not even so much as a blink for the detail which did limit his Triad from gaining the information she specifically wanted. "We have, as well as some other very interested parties, been keeping an eye on the situation. However, as they are formally under censure they are fully aware we are watching them and conduct themselves either accordingly or outside our combined ability to observe."

Grey eyes narrowed slightly, the woman herself seemingly somewhat pensive rather than hostile. "Do you think, if I go 'visit', you could use the opportunity to claim 'outside observer'?"

Zhōng highly doubted he could stop her, and just checking in with him to see if he could use her presence was already entirely unexpected consideration as it was. "If you would wait two or three hours before heading out? I have... some avenues to investigate to smooth your way."

"As long as you do not mind my presence in your kitchens."

His Sun cook preened, pleased, caught himself doing it and tried to settle himself. Badly.

"I wonder if I should be concerned you may try to steal him."

"I've been told I'm getting an Italian chef." Bazanova spoke simply without directly refuting the observation. "Mainly, it seems, because the godfather knows this chef and if I imported anything I'd be sure to hear about it for the rest of my brat's existence."
He inclined his head to acknowledge the points she had against such a concern, even if that was very obviously not a blunt refusal of the possibility. "I cannot say I am entirely sorry to hear it."

(ooo000ooo)

(Saturday the 4th of April, 1970 continued. Fo Tan, Lek Yuen, Hong Kong, People's Republic of China.)

Ballsy Toddler Boy apparently remembered her full well, in spite of the concerns the Storm-Cloud held about missing his more than likely maimed if not dead father and his more immediate social situation as the son of a man that got them if not in trouble then shamed by their fellow syndicates.

A second of staring, apparently just to be sure it was her, and the kid crawled up and into her lap just to curl up and resume his somewhat unsurprising napping on the Cloud in the room.

It took another three minutes for the mom to realize she had a guest.

From how quickly she recovered from being badly startled, Sonya held the suspicion this wasn't the first unannounced visitation this part of or partial family had experienced since last fall. "...good morning."

By the complete non-expression she earned, the mom would beg to differ.

"Is your husband alive?" Inquired the thief, not bothered at all with the idea of waiting a long while for an answer or any movement aside what had already been done.

It was a bit more telling to inspect the surroundings available, in truth.

The Big Circle Boys were a big Triad, and when you got down to it… it was only a branch that decided to be naughty. A bigger than normal 'branch' admittedly, but not really all that large when stacked against what else they had to draw from. That one branch getting caught, or worse making the rest look bad, to the rest of the Chinese underworld would indeed lose a large number of people their lives down to parts of their bodies.

She remembered full well that occasionally a Chinese man she met might be missing a part or all of some fingers. She also recalled why it happened, and frankly self-mutilation just sounded like a bad idea all over.

Sure, the one that committed the infraction would regret it and prove they were fully aware of the price to be paid for fucking up in the first place… it would make it hard for someone to maintain a grip on everything from papers to a weapon depending on how much they lost. Which would mean the odds of them being unable to help some future situation would go up…

Eh, not her culture.

This was… a tiny personal house. Which was actually somewhat generous given what city living was normally like in massive sprawling metropolitan cities like the port of Hong Kong. Fo Tan was a light industrial and residential area, requiring a lot of logistical and infrastructure to support a significant workforce to make such goods, however this tiny home was being infringed upon by local transit construction to connect this side of the Sing Mun River and Tolo Harbor to the rest of mainland China and Hong Kong’s southern or southwestern ports more directly.

The fact hopefully two people and a child lived here wasn't really surprising, the fact they didn't live with another family was. It was painfully clean, which just revealed a bit of threadbare patches and marks of somewhat less gracious fortunes these days compared to what the occupants had been accommodated to.

It could either be what drove the dad to mischief with his local chapter of the Big Circle Boys, what made it seem like a good idea to participate in a martial arts tournament being held by the Triads, or just what drove this small family into seeking criminal help to survive in the first place.

"What does such a rude western demon have to do with my family, and is so familiar my son knows who you are when I do not?"

"To clarify, I didn't know you were even alive or in the picture for the kid." Sonya offered, ignoring the slur because really 'guizi' was actually somewhat correct in a way. "When I made it apparent what he was, it was to spare him the worse of the backlash your husband invited."

Apparently, this mother knew full well what her husband had or was up to and what complications it might pose to her child. The admission didn't earn the thief a damn thing, which was in a way admirable even if it was kind of in her way right now.

At the very least, the woman stopped hovering in indecisiveness and at least committed to gathering information instead of ineffectually trying to beat the Russian off somehow with what she had at hand. Taking the kitchen chair opposite the other woman, Ballsy Toddler Boy's mom crossed her arms and had the gall to look expectant.

…well, apparently the kid got his guts from the maternal side of his family.

"My name is Sonya Bazanova, I am a Russian Cloud and Storm Flame user. It was, during the same hostage situation I am sure you are familiar with where I was held as the Wo Hop To Triad's hostage for good behavior, that your son came to know who I was. It wasn't until near the end of that farce that I learned what he was."

"And what does 'Flame blind' even mean, demon."

"That he is, without exception, the only one I know of who could believably be a neutral party in any situation involving opposing Flame users. If handled correctly, that is."

"And are you here to 'see to it' I am raising my son in the correct way?"

Sonya allowed a small, thin smile to creep across her face. You really had to admire such resistance where you found it, as way too many allowed themselves to be steamrolled without protest by her and others once Flames were brought into the picture.

Yeah, she could murder everyone remotely in her way. As it was turning out, she might not have much of a moral barrier to that possibility as it was a socially learned understanding that murder was not really the best answer even if it was the last one you had. It would get incredibly boring, as well as being the morally wrong answer to all problems she faced, and if she had spent her last lifetime scraping together enough money with the intentions of picking up diplomacy as fast as humanly possible… she might as well make use of it in this one.

Again, if she had to murder something to do whatever it was she was doing… she was either doing it wrong or too inflexible to remain in that role for long and should give it up for a quieter life.

"I am here to 'see to it' you may raise him without unwanted outside influences as you see fit."

Corrected the thief pleasantly, lifting a hand and summoning a rather unremarkable looking double-handed maul out of her Cloud Flames just to set on the woman's bare if highly polished kitchen table. "Whatever you may deem such things are."
Ballsy Mom glanced down at the tool summoned out of nothing but light and a small flash of heat, then looked up with a faintly challenging but now more uneasy stare. "Is there some cultural connotation for why you've holding an oversized hammer?"

"A blunt weapon. A maul. For I'm not going to murder for you..." because if she couldn't then she wouldn't be offering the ability for others either, "but a little property damage here or there is more than enough. Especially given what my 'type' is known to do in revenge for being crossed, whatever such a thing is meant for or means to another."

"Why now?" Questioned the other, older woman suspiciously. With more than a little hostility in her tone to boot. "Why not then? When my husband was still alive?"

...ah. Unfortunate. Probably explained why Ballsy Toddler Boy immediately curled up on her for comfort, and not trying to introduce her around or show her everything he knew to be 'theirs'.

"In the interest of being brutally clear so you have the information to make use of my offer, I'm stretched too thin. It's about to... collapse back into something manageable as I rid myself of some dead weight, but the point remains there's too much demanding my time to get to everyone when I want to." Absolutely nothing that earned her more than a darkening glare, but the thief merely shrugged any kind of blame off. "Besides which, some of your husband's 'fellows' put two bullet holes in my gut while I was minding the other hostages when they tried to take over the tournament. He likely would've been dead well before the docs let me go from that."

It would be somewhat amusing how fast she went from judgmental and pissed off to pale and uncertain, had the situation been somewhat different.

"I should've gotten here earlier, yes. I am not to blame for your husband's stupidity or foolishness in colluding with his fellows in something they all should've known full well would not work out as they wanted. I will help you, if only because I want to see what your son makes of himself. Helping you aids your son, and from what I know of orphaned children... most just really want to know at least one or both of their parents to see what they were like for themselves."

A moment to study her own lap and contemplate things on her end, Ballsy Mom raised her head and looked straight into the Storm-Cloud's eyes. "What do I get, if you're feeling this 'generous'?"

"Financial aid, mainly. As long as you live in China, all I will do is ensure you do not need to seek aid from a Triad that would not have either your or your son's wellbeing in mind. You may if you wish without risking said money, I don't really care as long as you're careful. I will also interject a protest if someone attempts to pressure you once what a Flame blind individual can be used for is better known." Sonya leaned backwards, allowing the child in her lap more room to settle in. "I'd rather you stay here, mainly. Culturally, this is his corner of the world and he should know his history and how to navigate around. However, if you find it too hard to continue or live here then I'll adjust things so you may go where you want."

"History isn't quite what the people around here value."

"Funny thing about history, we're all part of it. Trying to deny it just makes it all the more interesting to others." It'd change, eventually.

Chairman Mao Zedong was merely human, he'd die just as everyone else did in the end. Eventually, just like the Cultural Revolution, the cultish hype around his whole public persona would unravel and leave just what managed to survive and a whole lot of heartbroken, confused, or horrified people as they tried to adjust to the rash of social madness and move on with their lives.
"I don't owe you anything, demon." Deemed the woman after a moment of silence, in which she stared skeptically at the Russian intruder in her home. "Not for the money, as far as I see it it's what you owe my son for making him into a bargaining chip to be used. Not for your 'offer', you're just being self-serving in that and really don't mean to 'help' us much at all."

"Fair enough. I'll give you a phone number, all you need to do to reach me is inform whomever on the other end that picks up 'Ballsy Toddler Boy and Mom requires aid'."

The lady did not look remotely impressed at all.

"This is normally the point someone threatens the other for whatever stupid reason, intimidation or coercion or what have you." Allowing her maul to disappear, the thief reached over for a wrought iron fire poker and curled the poker end around a finger before bending it back to the poky end it started with. "We're both smart women, hopefully the obvious don't need to be explicitly gone over. There's not many ways to abuse the help I will supply you for your son's sake, but it's possible and I won't like it at all."

Had the woman been a little more cooperative, the thief wouldn't do this. However, she was fast finding the whole 'afraid of her shadow' thing as somewhat useful if rather annoying in tertiary social circles. Ballsy Mom wasn't really necessary to put up with, although the child in her lap might beg to differ later on she could do that if the woman survived.

To future-proof, Sonya would put forth realistic measures of effort to help keep the woman alive. If it failed, which would be hard to do but people as a type could be stupid, then so be it.

She tried.

(Friday the 10th of April, 1970. Vod ный, Moskva, Voykovsky District, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Accepting a glass straight vodka from a waiter, Milos 'Old Man' Zolotov spent his time idly observing the guests come to see him 'off' into proper retirement.

This would've happened in a gentlemen's club… but vor Arseniy had very silently glowered at those in charge of planning the whole farce because the guest list included his youngest daughter and a whole lot of vory with unknown or known vices.

Who wasn't here.

They were all professional brats, given who trained them up… but not the match to a Pahkan intent on networking within his own damn syndicate. When old man Zolotov asked, several people volunteered the information immediately.

When he asked why the hell Bazanova was mysteriously missing from everywhere in Moscow, a number of his personal Flame bodyguards/medical attendants reminded him of the little-known intrinsic habits of 'Clouds' that weren't entirely known of in Soviet Russia. More specifically, that the damn woman was straining herself not to do so the possibility while known of wasn't immediately assumed as a motive.

Additionally, that her 'blow up' wasn't actually a rare event for pushed Clouds. Less eye-catching, but more frequent, incidents of property damage or homicidal murder was actually the assumed normal for such creatures.

In the Storm-Cloud's place was the ever-efficient Lightning woman, Galina who was at first very unhappy then somewhat resigned to her current role in her leader's absence. Something that changed a few months ago and was suspect for the point of which contact was finally made with the other Flame user.

Proving that it was difficult to get ahold of the other woman, meaning their very clandestine but still noticeable campaign to keep his heir away from anything to do with her was both understandable and probably prudent.

One of the rare few Mafiya women represented in the lounge of this restaurant and keeping in mind Galina was there as the representative of the Flame school and wasn't available for 'distractions' was hard for a couple other vory or their associated thugs milling about and enjoying the free food and drinks.

More than a few were suffering electrical burns when they 'forgot' a few times too many to be believable or didn't get sloppy enough to have the drunkenness to be believed as genuine.

Gedeon, finally showing either tact or some damn self-preservation, was at least attempting to pull attention away from the lone Flame using influence in the room that didn't have an answer to where the Moscow Cloud woman had gotten to. At least the next Zolotov Pakhan was doing much better networking with the men than females, which was at least progress to be satisfied with. Galina was flat out ignoring the Sun as politely as she could manage, which was actually somewhat significant compared to everyone else that wanted to try prying the why out of her.

The night probably would've passed without a hitch, predictable and fake gliding on every smile or offered congratulations for reaching a point to retire from, had Bazanova not actually shown up.

Then she immediately got directly behind the latest idiot to try 'seducing' an answer out of the utterly disgusted Lightning woman about some aspect of Flame user lore, without very many actually catching on a blonde woman in a slinky black dress paired with knee high black and silver boots they were waiting for had arrived.

…when more than half the room and her own damn father were discreetly trying to keep an eye out for her, and she almost managed to slide by all of them if it wasn't for the idiot harassing her help. Most kept watch out of idle curiosity, a few very specifically for their own varied reasons. He and it seemed her father might know she got in from a balcony access via the awnings stretched over the waterfront veranda, but it seemed not enough vory were watching up just as much as they were keeping attention on the others and the main entrances.

Like any of his thieves would be that predictable.

Galina's utter non-responsiveness to a rather crass invitation was somewhat unusual enough to attract more attention, especially as most assumed she'd if not immediately then quickly shock the latest to try something fresh with her within five minutes. Very slowly, the Lightning dutifully backed up under just one glance from the Storm-Cloud and found different companionship elsewhere near the Cloud's father.

Finally accepting the fact she wasn't interested and there might be something more interesting going on behind him, that vory turned around only to get sized by the throat and lifted delicately off the floor to fully appreciate the blonde's utterly unamused expression.

"For your information," Bazanova started almost pleasantly, "if she had answered that would turn this event from giving respect to our Pahkan's life achievements into something political the Vindice will be forced to attend. Which they might or might not appreciate, so keep your damn trap shut."

His son quickly hid the wince at the news, which could entirely mean he hadn't known that or already risked what the Storm-Cloud was advising against. Milos wondered if he minded at all, because even the rumor of the Vindice attending his 'retirement' party would ensure no one stopped talking about it for years.

Which was a hell of a lot better than gossip from a boring party to wondering just how strong a grip he had on the Flame users entirely if their 'leader' didn't bother to show up.

A beat, apparently just to inspect her victim from head to toe and snort so how unimpressed she was became apparent to all, the woman discarded a vor as if he was a tissue before stalking over to the retiring leader of the thieves' clan with some kind of disgruntlement obvious in her steps. "Forgive the delay, Pahkan."

"Your 'emergency' over with now?" Inquired the retiring Pahkan idly as he inspected the foolish boy she tossed, idly speculating if he had a specific reason to try something they all had known wouldn't work.

"My godson survived his bout of Activated bacterial meningitis infection, and the issue is now well documented enough so future incidents in other children might not happen again." Agreed Bazanova absently as she earned his full attention, spoken in a pleasant tone in a direct contradiction to how she 'discarded' the scrappy bit of an idiot she came upon hitting on her assistant. "Thankfully, although it was slightly questionable for a few days if the brat would even live."

That was a much better excuse than he expected her to have for him.

"Although, I might steal Galina and bail out early. I would apologize, but I came straight here from the airport and have yet to be briefed in all the stupid shit the students have gotten up to and need solving by older Flame users. I don't really have much to report to you but a few contacts in America and maybe something interesting developing in China."

"How is your school coming along?"

"Surprisingly well. They've been autonomous for about half the school year now, aside the funding and the contacts I had to pull in to spare the drain of manpower from you." The blonde raked a hand through hair she left loose, which was a detail that lend credibility to the idea she changed somewhere semi-public just to be attired properly for this event. "There's been no major upsets, but I need to review the reports waiting for me before I can claim it has gone better than projected for you. And hire some actual god-damned teachers for next year."

Milos grunted, not particularly sympathetic at her obvious disgruntlement with paperwork given his own piles on a good day… but his son was aiming to come over and attempt something so letting the woman go would at least prevent Gedeon from showing exactly how little respect the older Moscow Flame users held for him. "I'll be more or less busy with well-wishers attempting to meet my heir or cash in old favors before I don't have the power to give them whatever they're angling for but do let me know when you've assembled everything, and we'll make the time."

Bazanova gave a curt nod, then stalked over to her father to collect her Lightning and greet him before blowing everyone else off as a matter of fact. That fallout would be something to watch in the next week or two.

His sometimes idiotic son tried to follow her with some intent, but he was still Pahkan and got his heir to stop and attend to his father instead of confront the Storm-Cloud somewhere public with the foolish thought she'd conform to expectations and not verbally gut him for the entertainment just because she could.

A few more days, and he'd no longer be able to stave that off… but then again, she'd not be around to undercut his heir's authority from under him anymore either.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 10th of April, 1970 continued. Voykovsky District, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"There's one teacher we have… issues with." Galina started off delicately, only to earn herself an utterly unimpressed look from the woman sharing the backseat bench of a car with her. Giving up on subterfuge, the Lightning delicately pressed the pads of her right hand against her temple. "One of the civilian literature teachers, he's not convinced we're just a school and there's been a few… complaints."

"Of?"

"Inappropriate behavior." To be fair to the individuals complaining, they were obviously incidents of either information hunting or faux interrogations as the man tried and failed to understand what was going on below the surface.

He couldn't get there because the Mists were stonewalling him, no one was without an ounce of self-preservation to tell him anything, and about half the staff had no idea either. Given they were a co-ed school, obviously some of those attempts to interrogate the students that did know something ended… questionably.

Equally as fairly, right now was not the time to inform Sonya of a major hiccup he represented. Galina had to pick from either reporting it all now to get it solved quickly before she escaped again or putting it off until her boss was less travel-worn, tired, and had to force herself to play nice for a few minutes to maintain the façade their ultimate boss wanted to present to any outsiders.

The younger thief nibbled at the lipstick smeared over her lower lip, fingertips tapping against a bare tattooed arm as she thought over what little information she was providing. "Right, I'll deal with it next week."

"…was Shamal really sick?"

"…yes?"

"Ah… alright." She kind of pitied whoever was nearby when the blonde learned of the problem, and everyone remotely nearby while the brat was sick.

Well, sort of. It was a curious thought, what did Sonya do when confronted with something she could not fight or intimidate away from those she claimed?

"How long are you going to be here?"

"Only as long enough as I have to be." Absently responded the Storm-Cloud, ignoring or heedless of the raised eyebrow their 'stolen' driver quirked at them through the rearview mirror as she dug a pack of cigarettes out of her purse with a slight wrinkle of her nose. "See if you can find me a replacement pipe, Galina. Or at least secure a couple packs of cigarettes for whatever you want to review with me."
"What happened to yours?"

"…I threw it at Renato's head. I missed, but it got a bit… bent." Muttered the other woman sourly around the filter between her lips, then lit it with a flash of red Flames that made their driver twitch suspiciously.

Sonya didn't miss that, but also didn't comment. The flash of grey eyes to the Lightning informed the other woman that there would be a few more questions of a general sort in short order.

(Saturday the 11th of April, 1970. Moscow School #3054, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

"Oh. Good, you're back."

"You don't have to sound so disappointed."

Peter McScruffy grimaced slightly. "I didn't mean to make that sound disappointed. Or I did, was. I am slightly disappointed. I didn't get your armor done, not yet. It's… still in progress."

Pausing in reading whatever was in front of her, Sonya blinked slowly and looked up just to aim a slightly confused stare at him.

Instead of continuing, because babbling was becoming a slightly concerning habit when he was uncomfortable these days, Peter shot a desperate look to Galina. Who, instead of immediately help him, just looked highly amused.

"…okay." Tried the blonde woman after an awkward moment. "I didn't expect you to actually make it, just figure out if it was possible."

"Well… prototype. It won't be as you asked about, but somewhat? I mean, I can't finish it until Galina lets me start with the idea I had some time ago…" Trailing off when the Storm-Cloud merely blinked blankly, he scrambled for something to distract himself with. "I should… go grade the tests. That's what I came in today for. Right."

Trying not to cringe externally as much as he was internally, Scruffy slunk off to 'his' desk in the teacher's lounge affair set up right outside of the principal's office. Normally this part would've held a secretary or some student files, and in a normal school that very well might be the case around here… but instead it was more a gathering place given their principal had been MIA for most the school year and no secretary was needed because whoever was there answered the phone if need be.

"…I take it he's doing better?" Sonya inquired to Galina absently, which just made the tips of his ears burn more.

"Phenomenally so," assured the Lightning pleasantly, "once you get past that initial fumbling with new or people he doesn't really know well. He gets better about it after enough time, but you've been gone for a while now."

"Understandable." Apparently deciding that was enough of torturing the Sun today, there was just the sound of paper being shuffled or moved and the slow burn of some tobacco for a few minutes.

Burying himself in his work, he attempted to drown out the occasional comment or question as he went through and graded fifty of the same tests with varying right or wrong answers. Some of the students occasionally answered in ridiculous ways for various reasons, on a dare or because they were bored of playing diligent schoolchildren, and they could be somewhat amusing to read before having the kids retake the test or redo the homework.

"Miss Bazanova." Almost fumbling his red fountain pen at a third voice, Scruffy glanced over a shoulder into the opened office door to see the Mirror Lady's very serious face. "There is an... incident developing."

"Right now, or in general?"

"Right now. I think... you may wish to see for yourself."

"...alright." Curious despite himself, he got up to join the ladies watching one of the Mist's portal-mirrors for something that might just have to do with his coworkers.

Sonya had put her boots up on her desk sometime after he entered the office, Galina was standing at her side with a grouping of files on the Chinese exchange students, and Anna was holding what the two older women were watching. Apparently having gotten into the building via the single window overlooking the bare meter of yard between the schoolhouse and the brick wall separating them from the road, instead of turning her portal into the live reflection of whatever was going on she used a fairly large hand mirror taken from somewhere to show what she wanted the others to see.

There was a significant presence on school grounds even when classes weren't being held, a fair number of their students actually lived on the third and fourth floors in the dorms there for some had homes in a different country and a surprising number of other students were orphans without any kind of home to return to. If there was an incident with the students, it would've either gone through Anna as the head of the girl's dorm or the younger Andrei as the head of the boy's dorm.

The Mirror Lady hadn't ever sought help for the students before. The head of the Sun training section had sought his advice for a few incidents near the beginning, the younger Sun being experienced in dealing with other Suns in volume but not various other Flame types or non-Flame users in equal masses. Anna had the entire Mist section to pull upon if she needed the assistance, and more often than not her own Misty ways were more than good enough to keep the girls in line after hours.

Once he got a good look at what she was showcasing through her hand medium sized hand mirror, Scruffy understood.

It wasn't just a student issue the Mist wanted to show someone else, a member of staff was involved too.

The older Andrei, his coworker Chikatilo, was... speaking to a barely preteen female student. Given body language, he was attempting to intimidate the young... Miss Fink. The copper haired young girl was not impressed at all with the teacher trying to loom over her, a fist on her hip and an entirely skeptical expression on her face.

The older Sun in the room was somewhat speechless at the incident entirely, while almost all the staff of the school was aware Chikatilo was suspicious of something going on he hadn't been aware the man had graduated to trying to interrogate the student body. Miss Fink wasn't a Flame user, but the girl was fully aware of the Flame training exercises and sometimes did assist as a 'non-Flame using' control variable in experiments.

...why a younger girl?

As he aided Yanlin with the sport teams and physical education, some of his boys would've responded better to the older man than a girl on the shooting team who was known to be a bit of a mischief making, occasionally delinquent, merely passable student attending the school because her best friend needed the Lightning Flame training and she wanted to stick with her.

Well, if Chikatilo had tried his sport teams and struck out-

"…Galina, did he just grope that student?"

"…that's what I saw."

Sonya tipped her head to the side, apparently to admire Miss Fink's technique with a switchblade as she fatally stabbed the civilian teacher a few times in both chest and neck just to be sure her assaulter was down and would never try that again. "I… believe that girl needs therapy. Probably not the only one, either. Do we have a psychologist or counselor on staff?"

"Not yet." Clicking a green stone plated pen, the Lightning made a note on the clipboard on top of the files already in her arms. "I'll be sure to source one for the students in short order, boss lady."

"Peter," ignoring his start of surprise, the thief pulled her legs off the desk and got up, "come along. Shoot the body a few disproving looks and fuss over the girl so she knows she did the right thing and isn't in trouble."

"…err, should I…?" A male member of the staff had just inappropriately touched her, would Miss Fink even want him within a hundred meters of her?

"Anna can take you back here if she wants you gone." Allowed the Storm-Cloud after a moment of thought and a nod to acknowledge his point, then stepped through the Mirror Lady's suddenly wall-sized hand mirror to end up next to the blood splattered girl clutching a switchblade.

It was the work of a second for the blonde to disarm the younger student who flinched at the sudden movement and tried to stab her, but after closing the folding blade the weapon was handed back. Delicately, and only after Galina shot him an encouraging look, Scruffy shuffled obediently after her into the portal.

A sudden shift from inside and moderately warm to outside in very brisk spring air made the Sun shudder and allowed him to hear the last few gurgled gasps of what was left of a semi-decent friend. Peter stared down at the other man in askance, unable to really understand why the man would risk everything to grope a student of a criminally-based school.

"Mister Bordrov? Oh… oh fuck, Miss Bazanova, I'm so sorry-

"Scruffy's part of the Sun team. He's not going to report you to the police. Shush."

Miss Fink made a face fairly distressed face anyways, then moved to rub her wool-clad arms only to jerk away at the feel of rapidly cooling blood stiffening the fabric, and forcibly lowered both hands to her side as she tried to look at the results of her handiwork around the older woman's form. "…I'm still really sorry-

"No, no you did exactly what you should've done." Sonya interrupted pointedly, critically eying the dying man dispassionately as he sought help from the entirely wrong quarter if he wanted anything like mercy. "Has anyone taught you how to dispose of bodies?"

Spluttering, and a bit shocked at how clinical the woman was being, the Sun in question wrung his hands and didn't approach the student who just had a disquieting encounter with a male teacher but circled around so she could see him fully instead of try focusing on the stabbed man or the Storm-
Cloud instead of the slushy ground or the sky.

…she was still armed and knew perfectly well how to use it, caution was just prudent.

"Miss Fink, are you alright?"

"I… um, I kind of want a shower." Shivering, or shuddering, the teenager scowled at the body laid out as she shuffled backwards closer to the gun range building and away from her handiwork. "Do we… need to call the police or anything?"

"Ah… no. No, I don't believe we're doing that." Depressingly, from the fistful of ruby red Flames summoned to his boss' hands, he was mostly sure Chikatilo would be an unsolved missing persons' case from now to the end of time. "More importantly, do you need anything? A blanket? Something hot to drink?"

He still didn't know what in hell the man had been thinking, nor how in the world he thought he could get away with something like that. He'd gone drinking with that man and thought him somewhat decent personally if a bit… off. Well not 'off' per say, just not very friendly the same way Dyrbov was.

Fink was a pretty young girl, but just… no.

No, she was barely fourteen if anything. More likely thirteen, and Scruffy just could not understand why. He didn't want to know why.

"It's not the first time shit like this has happened, Mister Bordrov." Fink responded, a rather uncharacteristic scowl on her fair face to go with a bit of defensive hunching. "…can I keep my knife?"

"I highly doubt you're the only one armed here, so as long as you feel safer with one you may." Scruffy reassured the girl, just a touch wryly to go with his non-confrontational and very gentle tone. "Would you like more? A different weapon? A heavier knife? I don't know much about them..."

"I can teach her to throw them, it's not much of an issue if she wants another. I can get her something more balanced." Interjected the Storm-Cloud, dusting her hands of nothing as the body behind her was quickly consumed by her Flames. Refocusing on the younger girl, the thief studied the half-defensive and somewhat belligerent expression stealing over her face. "The official story will be that after a series of complaints about his work ethic and disruptive attempts to 'see' what we're apparently 'hiding'… we were to let him go, except he never showed up Monday for us to fire him. No one knows what the hell happened to him, we all never saw him today, a real mystery. Coincidentally, there will be a school-wide and very pointed assembly next week about sexual harassment being morally wrong."

"…that's it?"

"That's it." Confirmed the older woman blandly. "I would appreciate it if you told me who else really needs to die horribly, if you didn't get them first. My father would enjoy a little diversion, he'd be pleased to hunt down anyone that tried something with you."

Instead of immediately volunteering the information, Fisk hunched further into her bloodstained coat and looked away from the both of them. "It was a long while ago."

That didn't particularly make Sonya very happy, going by the very thin line she pressed her lips into for a bare moment before smoothing everything off. "Very well. Let the Mirror Lady know if you need help getting the blood out of your jacket, or if you'd like a replacement on the school's behalf."
"The same, different, whatever. And... Miss Fink?"

"Yeah?"

"Good work." Awkwardly patting the girl on the shoulder, the thief gestured into Anna's Mist portal which showed a very pale looking teenager about the copper haired girl's age sitting on what was presumably her bed in the girl's dorm. The Lightning using friend, who had apparently been watching for a few moments to understand the delicate situation probably somewhat filtered via Mist Flames.

Once the student very gratefully took her Mist-assisted discreet leave to her friend's company, the Storm-Cloud turned to him with a grave expression. "You're going to have to pretend he was still your friend."

"...what?"

"Your poker face sucks," Sonya informed him bluntly, "he was a friend, wasn't he? Or at least, you thought of him as one."

"Boss Lady."

"No, listen to me. He was civilian, people will miss him. If we don't report him missing, someone else will. You're more than likely going to have to tell whoever asks you that he was a friendly co-worker or whatever it was you knew him better than just casually through, without mentioning or even breathing word of this. A sudden change of heart, when the other teachers thought you were friendly, will be suspicious as all hell. You can't afford an in-depth background check, Peter. You've got paperwork that says you're the only son of a safely deceased couple with proper if still dead grandparents and Soviet lineage, but anyone tries to find old childhood friends of yours or even just anyone that remembers your 'family' in your 'hometown'..."

Just about everything in Scruffy tried to protest, except for his head. He knew what she was alluding to, but he really never wanted to claim a pedophile as a friend ever. However, if he became a suspect in a missing person's case or worse yet a murder investigation then he'd probably see the inside of a Russian jail cell too.

"...I am rather glad we are leaving soon." He wouldn't have to do it for long, but the bar visits with Artemiy would be somewhat hard until then.

"You can also be glad you're not the one that now needs to double-check all the paperwork we have on file for teachers and students alike are valid or would pass a quick to a moderate perusal by law enforcement."

Peter tried for a smile but fell rather far from the mark given the cocked eyebrow he got in response. "Cold comfort, boss lady."

"It's all I've got to offer."

(Monday the 13th of April, 1970. Moscow School #3054, Moscow, Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic.)

Patience was an underappreciated trait in a number of individuals and aspects of life, but Viper's was starting to get a bit strained.
Having a target to go after, information to collect, and a group to gut for anything of worth... made waiting on the strong-arm asset to insure their payout for months of diligent work rather hard. Being 'polite' and properly professional in collecting on a promised favor meant they couldn't bully right through the interlacing Mist Flames coating the building and a good portion of the area Cherep's younger sister was checking in on.

They weren't much of an obstacle, admittedly. Interlocking in some fascinating, very specifically distracting ways or not. It was a web they would delight in adding a few personal touches to, just waiting and open to be tapped and twisted... but that was the point.

It was elaborate, enticing bait.

Viper had more self-control than that, and enough patience to get through the web to their target.

The very instant a Mist touched that web with their own Flames, even funneled through a puppet with their own Flame type, every other Mist connected to it would be aware and knew everything about the intruder. There were a lot of Mist users that contributed tiny personalized touches and overlapping each other once or twice at the least even at the edges.

They could appreciate the distraction to study while they waited, but even that got boring after a while. About a day later, honestly. Then a few more hours were spent hunting down the separate if networked Mists making up parts of that web to interrogate them for new ideas on how to use Mist Flames, keeping out of any aspect of identification and mainly pretending to be a 'new' node of the network. Except for three, who held bigger parts of the web and were not fooled by the adopted identity.

Getting around the interwoven web of Mist Flames yet again, taking particular care around the 'reflection' threads that would catch any Mist merely observing the web if one wasn't careful to pick the ones without said spider-silk threads because it was both rather fascinating and something Viper wished to copy for later use, they checked in to see if the woman they were after was done or not. She wasn't.

The 'Mirror Lady' directed her attention at them once again, the author of those reflection threads that came the closest to catching the Esper than the many who specifically tried in the last few years, but they impressed the feeling of a shaking head on the other Mist.

Instead of turning back to minding her threads of the web, the only one to know full well Viper was in the area and what they were here for specifically paid attention to something else. An understanding of exasperation and a strong dislike was offered, even as the younger Mist admired the Sun's strong features and kept him from even glancing at the building they were lurking around.

A thread of curiosity was answered with merely a sense of amusement, Viper's amusement was given a few friendly pokes for apparently encouraging further investigation. Actually passing on a trick learned in France earned them a few choice bits of blackmail on the 'future' Pahkan of the Zolotov Thieves Clan.

Apparently, they were being encouraged to 'steal' the thief away before the Sun managed to find a way through the Mists running interference.

Viper was actually somewhat reluctant to do so before Sonya was finished with whatever she built a Flame academy for, however much money might be made. Their vice was money; anything with value fell within that. Information was the most difficult and most rewarding currency to trade with, either priceless or worthless by turns and nearly impossible to predict the trends of.
A day spent investigating around earned them currency in Mist Flame tricks and quirks. Something they had only rarely found any group willing to share as freely as the Russian Mist web.

When the brisk Lightning woman returned, carrying yet more files and distractions to pad out the time Sonya needed to do whatever... Viper bowed to the inevitable and stole the woman out of her office.

Sonya blinked, pen posed above a missing pad of paper as her chair was very considerately transported with her without the desk she had been using. "...huh."

"I'm calling in the favor you owe me, mou." Viper announced blandly, stepping into the same realm of existence most other living things occupied.

"...sounds good. Anyway we can extend it for a week or so?" Asked the thief, dropping the pen to the rooftop across from her schoolhouse and massaging her right wrist as she leaned back in her office chair to focus upon the Mist.

"Boss lady," spoke the Mirror Lady reprovingly, not bothering to follow Viper into the perceivable world, "that might be pressing your luck..."

"Alright, fine. Any way we can get this over with in twenty-four hours?"
"That's your plan?" Sonya inquired skeptically, giving the Mist she was assisting a sideways look of pure skepticism. "That is the best you can come up with? Throw the melee specialist straight through the front gate and murder everything?"

"The other plan was to reverse the very thing they are doing to others, mou. On to them."

"I like that plan better." Quickly claimed the blonde woman, now entirely unimpressed indeed as she backed away from the edge he planted her upon to aid him.

Viper heaved a sigh, as if she was being difficult and not coinciding with exactly what he wanted. "Mou… there will be more effort involved. I thought you would prefer to get this over with quickly?"

"I'm not particularly fond of sloppy work." Responded the professional thief blandly, within expectations given the details he had worked out of her brother on the woman.

It wasn't really hard to guess, even without the stuntman's few tidbits weaseled out over months of visits. There had to be a reason why she remained a thief so late into her life, instead of itching her violence lust with bloodier work. Elitism among other Clouds was entirely a possibility, but out of consideration to her pacifistic brother's outlook or just keeping to a predetermined set of values was equally a possibility.

"Good." All but purred the Esper in return, evaporating the Constructed map complete with moving target markers between them in favor for something that looked close to a corkboard supporting a web of multicolored strings than any kind of actual map. "Then this is what I need you to do…"

She already had an idea of the structures down there, ensuring a Cloud recognized the targets she wasn't to allow to die was a bit more important now.

The thief examined the new variation of the offered information curiously, more specifically studying what she was required for and where then when to move or deal with certain subjects, narrowing grey eyes as they caught and lingered on something. "Viper, you seem to be missing a part."

"No, I'm not."

She traced a few of the lines, which the Esper made the string connecting them glow in red as her finger passed over, linking what targets she shouldn't go after for reasons with the possible information that could be extracted afterwards. "What are you going to do with them afterwards?"

"Me? Mou… why ever would I have any need for such people?" Asked the Mist absently, which didn't shift off the Russian's suspicions in the least.

Downside to working with smart assets, they tended to catch on to the unmentioned faster than the brainless thugs they normally worked with.

"As long as I don't have to deal with them, I don't care. I don't want any. I have more than enough."

"…methinks the lady doth protest too much." Observed the miser critically, studying the 'backup' they had wished for and basically kidnapped out of her office to get. "None of them? There's a couple in the process of having their previous entanglements erased, mou… as long as you keep your trap shut about where they come from I could always toss one or two your way."

"Viper, keep them away from me."

Hooded or not, he had no issue leveling a suspicious glare on anyone they wanted to.

The woman glowered back, then sniffed in a decidedly not hostile but disgruntled way. "I'm repaying a favor."

"Exactly." Grumped the miser sourly, hunching further into their cowl and glancing over their target at the foothill of the mountain they were perched upon for the planning aspect of this event. "You have no reason not to talk about this, given what it will result in I find that… disquieting."

He had plans, of which they couldn't quite do without the inevitable rumors of a Cloud's rampage to convince others that the target had all perished to a man and discourage investigation for a few days. There were a number of those without or with destroyed pasts being used as grunts by these Mists and redistributing them to be made use of could only happen if no one knew they might have survived.

Widespread Constructions of templates for conclusions were easier to pull off when there was a reason for a specific assumption to be made.

"Aside common fucking decency? Cherep would never let me forget it if I got you killed, Bjǫrn does respect you and will have something to say if you never check up on his skills, and for fuck's sake my brat probably would like more tips and pointers in the future."

"…mou, I find it smarter to rely on something more… universally understood."

Sonya palmed her face in exasperation, raking a hand back through her hair next just so she could fully level a glare on him. "Like blackmail, I take it? I'm a Cloud, Viper. Why the fuck would I let you have hold on someone of mine like this?"

Viper pondered around the objection, because that was a good point even if it was very obviously not her issue with the offer. "...or, I suppose, I could give you a tiny bit about a new fascination of your brother's if you agree to never speak of this incident as well as supply some… physical force, as agreed."

She blinked at him, somewhat interested.

"Which may or may not be able to be used in revenge for his sometimes nauseating eating habits, mou." Continued the Mist a bit more confidently.

"Now you're talking." Summoning one of her hammers as she dropped her hand from her face, she eyed the distance between them and the front gate of the little community enclave down there per his plan. "To be honest, I might miss getting the range so be sure to… adjust accordingly if it's going to the wrong spot."

"Just throw, then brace yourself to be moved immediately in the middle of their little set up to wreak havoc." Viper advised, already with one eye on the best perch to plant the 'heavy melee specialist' to distract the bulk of the attention for him.

(ooo000000)

(Tuesday the 14th of April, 1970 continued. De Mort Castle, Moneglia, Province of Genoa, Liguria, Italian Republic.)
"Verde! Lunch."

With a guilty start, the scientist lowered the keyboard he was hunched over and glanced around this back hall of the castle he had gotten a touch distracted with.

Now he wasn't focused on something rather complicated and trying to foresee the inevitable complications before they occurred, it became apparent to him what time it was and a few other key details he was sure his current housemate would make him dearly regret.

He… might've failed to sleep last night, as well as eat something this morning, and Adrik would be entirely unimpressed with him once he learned.

…even if he got the packet switching program of the ARPANET project to finally work, sending a data set from one terminal through a central 'hub' and to another via a specific 'address' value assigned to one of four other terminals, now that he had the uninterrupted time to work on it and Tatiana sent along the prototype she had stored for them.

It was just something to do, while he awaited completion of the four of five months of the construction on the private residences near the front gate he would also live within for at least the next few years. The Lightning was not particularly of any help to the Russian's tasks of inspecting all six floors of the castle after the cleaning crew and the men refitting updated window sills in had finished their work.

Now the aim of those invited into the grounds was constructing the independent housing, on the acre of land that made up the 'front lawn' of this place near the main gate and across the drive from the stable house. Verde's house was being built first, thankfully… but that still left him at odd ends for the handful of months the construction would require.

Adrik might become annoyed he continued the experiment without him, on top to the unintentional neglect he caused himself.

Verde wasn't exactly sure which would annoy the other man more.

"…Verde."

Wincing, the Frenchman dropped the keyboard to the crate being used as a work desk and started in on the somewhat more elaborate than expected task of freeing himself from the nest of wires. It kept his attention down, and away from meeting the other man's eyes.

Adrik apparently spent a few moments just taking in the vast amount of changes to the long hall, which they had utilized mainly as storage of the items the Sun nurse sent on to clear out her storage unit containing the personal effects of apparently five other people. Verde and Adrik, Sonya herself as well as her Lackey, and apparently their middle brother the Lightning had not met yet who had an interesting collection of antique tools and machinery parts stored away.

Tatiana was pleased with all the extra room she now had, at least.

"Okay… you need a hobby." Bluntly announced the Russian, without enough inflection in his tone to give weight to any assumption about what he thought of the situation the Lightning was wrapped up in.

"…I believe my hobby is decent enough as it is."

"Wasn't this supposed to keep you occupied for the next two months, or however long it's going to take for your labs to be built and the boss lady to move the information you wanted down here?"
"I do not believe construction will be done so quickly. It is more probable Sonya will return with her other staff before any such labs are completed."

Adrik gave him a skeptical look, scratching the back of his head with a faint frown. "How many 'labs' did you add to your blueprints?"

"Enough." As there would also be a paved road added to allow for unimpeded traffic to move, whatever it might be, Verde took advantage of the scope of the proposed construction to ensure he had at least three heavily reinforced and adequately ventilated vaulted rooms with adequate facilities that would survive whatever he might need for them.

…then three more on top of them, lighter built, for less risky experiments right under ground level and only then the actual ground-level housing with the rest of the scheduled construction.

It took a significant amount of the grant money he had already been given to have the space he would like to work with and ordering the equipment to fill out even half of the proposed labs would require a significant amount of what was left of his inheritance as well as the remainder of what he argued out of Sonya.

The results would be more than worth it, easily upgraded and sectioned off in case of emergency while still being reasonably multipurpose enough to adapt to future studies and discoveries. As the Lightning didn't really require much in the ways of living quarters, he had been tempted to skimp on the proposed housing covering the entrance to his labs… but he was fully aware the other man would be highly unimpressed enough to stage another 'intervention' if he tried.

Deciding not to address the question fully, Verde adjusted his glasses as he finally stepped out of the web of wiring unfettered. "May I ask why it is you've decided to be domestic today?"

"Yeah… if you'd care to take note of the weather outside, it's raining. No construction to keep tabs on, and likely none tomorrow either or at least until the ground dries out." Drawled the Russian a touch tartly. "Additionally, I'm fully aware that's the same damn outfit you wore yesterday, Verde my man."

"Well…"

"If it's not an admission that you skipped sleeping and grabbing something to eat for breakfast, don't even try. You suck at lying."

The Frenchman thought about it but concluded the same when he couldn't find an excuse the other man would believe coming out of his mouth. "I believe you spoke about lunch being ready?"

"Lucky for you, I just pulled the casserole out of the oven." Adrik drawled with arms crossed over his chest, unamused entirely with his less than effective attempt to change the subject. "It needs to cool, so you've got just enough time to take a damn shower."

(ooo000ooo)

(Tuesday the 14th of April, 1970 continued. Outskirts of Lugano, Ticino Region, Swiss Confederation.)

Sonya wasn't sure what she had been expecting.

…'not this' was pretty apt yet didn't really cover everything.

A cabal of memory-tampering Mists was… not entirely outlandish of an idea, but apparently the idiots Viper was opposing weren't what one could call 'well prepared' for discovery or being opposed.

They had the handful of apparently really skilled if completely clueless Flame users and a bare couple more non-Flame users with particular skills they 'retained' as a kind of compound guard. Great idea, full marks.

However, it seems as if they never attempted to see how many of them they could directly control against a hostile invasion or just for the hell of it. Nor did they realize that erasing their personal memories meant the handful they kept wouldn't remember enough to use their skills without direct aid.

The net result was some kind of really awkward looking zombie-mess shuffling after her. Dangerous undoubtedly, but… hilarious. Also, not nearly as difficult as expected to out maneuver.

Her fucking students wouldn't be nearly this bad, at the very least they'd be able to work together in controlling a single person and keeping awareness up to hunt two separate Flame users a hell of a lot better. That wasn't counting Anna or Usov, she meant the newest Mist brats who all probably barely knew what they were doing.

She almost didn't need the amulet Viper pressed on her to hide her from the Mists hunting for whoever was collapsing their underground base bullshit. The thief did need it to cut off the suddenly no longer zombie-like idiots that thought asking a group of unverifiable Mists erasing pasts to fuck with their heads was a great idea and tossing them into the holding pen the miser set up on the borders of this place was easy enough if you ignored their demands to know what the fuck was going on.

Viper was at least good enough to keep a portion of their attention on the safe area, knocking those loudmouths out before Sonya had to.

Her main use, in this situation anyways, was scaring off all the morons that might want to scope out what was going on. The Mists had set up a kind of 'no interest' zone for anyone not specifically seeking them, and the Mist she was here with had used that to ensure all the civilians and civilian emergency personnel would assume either 'avalanche' or 'earthquake'… but it was the thief's job to keep the criminals away.

By being destructive in a 'usual' Cloud's expression of displeasure, while avoiding getting caught by the Flame users here and preventing the deaths of said zombie-like brainless morons.

It took a bit of creativity, admittedly.

Ironically enough, the zombies were better about looking up than anyone else she ever had to work around.

Doubling back, and a quick check to be sure no one else 'woke up', Sonya slid around the back of the shambling mass aiming for the more northern side of this group of houses. Another of Viper's 'destroy this' marks lingered there, lacing around a manhole cover in the middle of the street.

Sonya leapt down from a single-story rooftop, a double-handed maul in hand and whacked the metal disk as hard as she could get away with. The entire street caving in wasn't really unexpected when she destabilized the entire ceiling of the sewer line, but there was an additional side-cave in she hadn't expected and nearly mired herself in to get back to street level.

Obviously what Viper wanted her to cut off, but a fucking warning would've been nice.
Staying low, as the mindless Mist puppets all shot at hip-level to start with if they were armed with automatic weaponry, the thief tried to duck around a garden shed… only to immediately backtrack because someone got the bright idea to split their remaining forces.

The bulk of the shambling mess was directly behind her and likely rounding the building at her back, which just left the rooftop of the single-story that possessed a garden shed as the only bit of cover she could reach in an instant.

Then Sonya had to immediately reverse her momentum the moment she touched the shingles, because it wasn't someone splitting up their forces it was an idiot wandering around like a moron because he didn't realize what was going on. She slammed into the Storm and took them both to the ground, who cursed her out for a breathless second before shutting up when the zombies across the way opened fire on them.

He at least gamely followed her straight through a hedge before they both were shot full of holes.

"What the fuck is going on?"

Apparently, there was enough information left in his brain to make sense of 'ticked off Cloud' being a bad thing. Which wasn't her intent, but 'excited' on a Cloud Flame user did tend to be equated to 'irritated' more often than not.

Gee, she wondered why.

"You did this to yourself. Get into that area over there and wait." Helpfully pointing didn't get the Storm to leave. Even if he was a bit more put together than everyone else she 'rescued' and should at least not require her to keep his fool head on straight.

"Why should I?"

"Do you have any better options?" Sonya countered flatly.

The Storm, a somewhat older man with a bad five 'o clock shadow and looking a bit more beaten than the rest of the zombie hoard she separated out, glanced from where she was pointing to her with the only second pair of yellow eyes she had ever seen. "Well… there's you."

"…oh, hell fuck no." Viper only agreed to fuck with her paperwork, because of a highly probable police investigation into one of her now recently murdered civilian teachers.

There was no arrangement for a new person. She didn't have the money or time.

She pointed a finger in his face and glared. "No."

The Storm, because of course they were all argumentative assholes, merely cocked an eyebrow at her. "Oh really?"

---

(Wednesday the 15th of April, 1970. COMSUBIN Main Headquarters, Italian Republic.)

Technically, COMSUBIN was a naval Special Forces group. Their motto was 'from the sea we assault the enemy' for a damn reason. Rangers and divers, started back during the first World War and never quite stopped being needed.
Lalia Murgia allowed her court martial go on without protest, and now she was ever so politely 'kicked out'. Invited back for training exercises of course, because the only thing Colonel Frasca could not refute in any way was that she was a damn fine trainer and none of her students got themselves killed in stupid ways.

On one hand, she had been somewhat aimless the last year or so since reaching her rank in the Rangers. On the other, she hadn't decided she was done with COMSUBIN yet.

Someone interfered, and Lalia was going to hunt that asshole down to either clear her name or figure out what the fuck that jackass was playing at before blowing his brains out.

Special Forces against civilian police?

It took her about three seconds to steal into the evidence locker, scout out her own name, and take the information she was interested in for review.

As sure as she was that Commander Scalzi, who lead the ranger units, as well as Admiral Matarrese, who commanded the COMSUBIN unit in its entirety, hadn't mislead her or lied about what was known about who attacked her… the utter lack of any evidence the crime scene investigators found from the spot she had been shot at aside what she contributed in blood and bullets?

It was damning, of course. For her, and for her suspicions.

Lalia hadn't believed it was humanly possible, to clear or contain every scrap of betraying evidence in the middle of a shootout. Yet apparently it was, because there wasn't time between when she returned fire for being shot and when the police responded to the noise for anything to have been cleaned up without someone noticing something.

Now she had to figure out who could pull something like that off, without actually giving away why she wanted to know the information.

Sliding the evidence reports, and connected sample containers, back into the cardboard box that held the damning evidence on her she turned instead to clearing out her bunk.

She… really didn't have a whole lot that wasn't standard military issue. About half of what was 'hers' was actually issued to her by COMSUBIN's supply depo, meaning she had to return it to clear out of the unit properly. The rest, if it wasn't for the express intent of keeping her military gear in the best possible shape then it was bought to complement a few pieces.

Her sidearm was hers, as was the uniform she was wearing from jacket to boots, but-

"So!" The entirely unamused glare she tossed over a shoulder completely bounced off the affable grin being aimed at her from a blond sniper, although the expression was a touch less exuberant and she appreciated that. "What's next for the lovey Lal?"

'Lal' unholstered her sidearm and shot three times at where his head should've been without looking back again.

"…aside that?"

"Grillo, they can't yell at me for shooting you outside a designated range area now."

"Alright." Both hands up, her 'replacement' slid back to a normal posture instead of remaining contorted to avoid her bouncing rubber bullets off his face. "Alright, I'll be good. I promise."
…she could load normal bullets into her weapons again. Depressing, but true.

Probably something she should change sooner rather than later, so at least she knew where her first stop would be after this now.

"…um," offered Cornello after a moment of taking in her personal bunk and what she was hesitating over, and she nudged the lid of a backpack closed over the police evidence box before he could see, "need a packhorse?"

"That sounds like you don't believe I can handle my own equipment, Grillo."

The sniper huffed in badly faked offended dignity, crossing his arms over his chest. "Yeah, maybe to you. I know full well you can out march me with fifty more pounds anytime, I'm not that stupid."

Lalia shot him an evil smirk. "So, you're admitting you are stupid? Well, well… it only took me the better part of a year to beat some humility into you."

Cornello frowned at her faintly instead of rise to the bait, sharp blue eyes already suspicious and searching. "And now I'm a slight bit more concerned. Where are you going next? I know they want me to basically replace you, but I'm also fully aware you haven't really finished beating me up in the name of 'polishing the idiot student up enough to not be an embarrassment'."

"Not sure yet." There were options, of course.

Few if any that were in the direction she thought she needed to go in just to figure out who set her up. Body guarding for political morons or their innocent family members, mercenary outfits that might really like a tactician the level of a COMSUBIN Ranger, she could probably enlist in a different military branch that accepted foreigners if she had to.

She wouldn't, but if she had to because she just couldn't adjust to civilian or near-civilian life well enough.

Worse came to worse, she could start up her own branch of mercenaries. Might be interesting and somewhat fun to do if she drew a complete blank in the coming years.

"So…" leaning up against her door frame, the sniper shot her a hopeful grin and waggled his eyebrows under the bandana he picked up from somewhere. "…now we're not potentially violating regulations against dating outside your rank, wanna-"

He bolted off before she could finish swinging her first duffle bag of issued equipment due to be returned at his head. Lalia kicked it instead when it hit the ground, the bag of lopsided and freshly cleaned equipment impacted the idiotic student of hers squarely in the back and sent him tumbling down the hall ass over teakettle.

"…I'll take that as a 'maybe'?"

She pitched the next one directly at his stupid head before he could scramble upright and run for it. At least the asshole did take the equipment with him.

(Thursday the 16th of April, 1970. Mafia Land.)
"Good evening." Fong offered pleasantly, earning himself two badly hidden starts of surprise.

One of the men immediately turned and opened fire on him, forcing the martial artist to immediately dive forward at an angle to both evade the possibility of being shot and get in range to disarm him at the same time.

Gripping the offending wrist, the Storm hauled his attacker forward and over a shoulder to slam him bodily against a nearby wall. Mentally giving his apologies to those who lived above the flower shop, he immediately kicked out to catch the other man in the guts before he could manage to try anything.

"While enjoying the services of Mafia Land, it is not acceptable to perform a 'dine and dash'." Fong informed the both of them, flexing a hand as he ensured his Storm Flames prevented his gripping of a just fired small arms from burning his skin. "Either pay your bill, or... well, I am afraid I must get insistent."

The man he kicked, hunched over from the Chinese man's assault, took out a heavy knife from a concealed spot near his upper chest to try stabbing something tender. The man nearly upside down from being bodily tossed squirmed the best he could to regain his feet, and haul something secured to his back over a shoulder.

Obviously, a refusal.

It took really only two sharp hits to knock both out, and it only earned him a shallow graze on his right wrist from a desperate lunge to wound him before the knife-wielder could no longer contribute to their defense.

Amateurs never understood what was considered impossible to try by experts, it made them sometimes more dangerous than fully trained individuals.

It was an interesting deviation from opposing other martial artists, in all truth.

Fong wasn't entirely certain as to why this was attempted, surely these... fine Spanish men knew such behavior would not go unanswered for long. Dragging them both back so his fellows could press a complaint with the island's bill collectors would be somewhat tricky, as night had long since fallen and having both hands occupied would just encourage any that might try to stall his aims for their own reasons.

Pondering over his options and keeping an eye out to be sure neither was attempting to fool him by pretending to be unconscious, the Storm was not nearly distracted enough to fail noticing he was being surrounded.

Hmm... an attempt at a turf war?

Newcomers, especially if these gentlemen weren't Spanish but hailed from Southern America instead, all couldn't really be said to know the rules of the island. By which, turf wars for territory was rather sharply discouraged.

Taking territory over by starving them of revenue and buying out the failing businesses, and whatever real estate is also sold to make the rent Mafia Land demanded of any venture established on its shores, was the only 'acceptable' method by which such was allowed. This, attempting to attack those that worked in such ventures in a divide and conquer tactic, was not.

Mostly to prevent the already heavily armed visitors and patrons from picking to enter the hostilities themselves for any and all reasons. This was a manufactured island, it was not as stable as a lip of earth that rose out of the sea naturally. Enough open warfare would destabilize the entire island, enough to probably risk the integrity of everything built on top of it.

The occasional invasion by those hungry for influence they only heard rumor of, and the more frequent heavy ordinance accident in the markets, were really risky enough as it was.

Alas, some just refused to acknowledge that what they sought would be destroyed by their actions if they succeeded… or sometimes even if they failed.

Most probably did not care if it was. As long as no one else held the advantage over their own.

"I will advise you all to desist your current aims." Announced the Triad member peacefully, in a vain hope it would prevent a bit of an incident tonight.

As expected, his words alone were not enough.

He had to immediately weave around two men armed with machetes attempting to jump him from a first-level rooftop, around a corner to avoid someone armed with a semi-automatic rifle on the other side of the street, then utilize two walls to get off the ground and avoid a hand grenade.

…handheld explosives. Not a first, but it ensured this would be heard by all awake tonight and there would be those coming to investigate in short order.

Fong kicked the next grenade tossed up at him, right into the face of the man armed with yet more, before being forced backwards to avoid another armed with a pistol from shooting him in his face. That left him with the two armed with oversized knives, who were not nearly as skilled at scaling sheer walls and struggled slightly to reach his position, and the gunmen still on the street level.

A loud crash behind him informed the Storm that there perhaps was someone attempting to go through the building to reach him, but the residents of said building would beg to differ about such aims. A rough demand in a language he did not know but clearly was interrogative, and from the continued commotion said rudely woken man was both highly unamused to be threatened back and entirely well equipped to defending himself and his home against intruders.

Ah… Mafia Land security would not be amused as such developments. Then again, as long as Fong did not request it himself it would be allowed to slide.

Perhaps he should look into taking up some of the contracts offered for those at loose ends or looking for a lump sum of pay. This was actually somewhat more interesting than merely being on hand as extra security for Triad held businesses, and perhaps he would be less bored until events back home calmed down somewhat.

---

(Friday the 17th of April, 1970. Ristorante La Sciabica, Brindisi, Apulia Region, Italian Republic.)

"-and, without putting too fine a point on it, Lady Giglio Nero, my father-"

Luce attempted to not grimace, already more than tired on this one and highly skeptical that anything he might have to say would be at all as interesting as he was trying to make it sound.

Unquestionably the last time she would accept a date from this man.
You would think, being able to foresee the future and all, she could avoid all the really scummy dates as a matter of fact. She probably could in all honesty but checking to see more than if it would be a pleasant first date and if anyone would die if she went out was wasteful of both her talent and energy.

The problem wasn't the first or second date. A nice time out with a bit of dancing or with a couple light drinks to break the ice with were entirely enjoyable… but then all these Mafiosi seemed to think she was 'caught' enough to listen to their thinly veiled attempts to influence what her Famiglia would involve themselves in or dictate terms to a Mafia Donna.

Perhaps she should look into civilians. Boring, but then hopefully one…

…no. Her daughter never had a father figure in her life, did she?

Was that a specific choice of hers?

It was entirely possible she was overthinking the situation. She might not need a man for longer than a night, honestly. A bit lonely, but frankly… did she really deserve much else?

Either she picked a man who would die before she could start showing a baby bump, or she would never contact whoever she selected ever again. Then she wouldn't have to go on any more dates only to become disappointed when the motivation on the other end was more political than personal.

The future was the future, with everything already decided and acted upon and what she saw was just that. No one conveniently spoke in any future she foresaw about the why and how things ended up in that exact arrangement, just whatever was the decision or event at hand, so there were elements of guessing to be made in the end anyways. Educated guesses, but just assumptions in the end.

Often, there was no time keeping objects nearby aside wrist watches or newspapers that might or might not be the future date.

Sonya's kitchen would have a calendar at least… but if the Sky put up more than one or two in the 'Arcobaleno's Mansion' then someone would ask, and she'd need a believable excuse. Reborn would poke most full of holes and Skull would whine about the rest being off from Soviet calendars which would have Fon wonder why they were all based off Christian time keeping and insist on a few Chinese calendars be included just for redundancy's sake.

Which, in the end, would be even more confusing for her if she failed to ensure which calendar was which method of timekeeping.

Luce knew she would be 'just showing' pregnant around a Christmas time. That she wouldn't attend that year's Vongola Ball, and the end of said pregnancy would be the Introduction to her Arcobaleno Elements.

It could be this year, or it could be next year, that she would be pregnant.

She might've asked two years from Uncle Kawahira, but that was only because she foresaw herself doing so and that conversation actually went well enough to set in place what she needed. Everything she claimed was correct, most of the first picks to bear the Curse would've refused and gotten suspicious or hostile to what very nearly happened to them when the next picks took up their burdens.

Then everything she foresaw that might end the necessity of the Arcobaleno would not happen. There were no other possibilities that had as good of a chance of happening as this one.
Two years was somewhat suggestive. Either two turns of the year, or two periods of three-hundred-and-sixty-five days expiring would be 'two years'.

With a Mist marking the time, either measurement possibility could be it.

Either 1971 or 1972 would be the first day they all would meet, and no one thought to bring a calendar or flash something dated for her to foresee.

…well, neither did she. Why could be for any reason under the sun. Likely, because it would never happen and she wouldn't bring one to prevent a different vision from coming true she hadn't obsessively studied to be sure would result in the future she was hoping for.

Fiorella Vongola could've died last year, only to be saved because Sonya had an automatic instinct to control flying blades near her, so that was that incident. There wasn't a Vongola Christmas Ball she foresaw herself attending between that specific event and the one she declined due to being unable to hide a pregnancy, but that didn't necessarily mean she didn't attend one more.

Just that she hadn't looked yet, or it had been drowned by more important events that could happen, or that there wasn't one.

Luce pulled her attention out of her own thoughts, checking on her dismal date of the evening. It really only took one mention of 'what we could do together about' for her to decide this was a lost cause.

Now, was she in the mood for petty revenge or not?

"Excuse me a second." Asked the Sky pleasantly, sliding her dining chair back from the table and rising to her feet. "Feel free to order if I don't come back by the time the waiter returns."

…because she wasn't returning. Poor boy, being such a deferent son might've been cute had he not been so reliant on his father's status to define himself well into his twenties, could dine alone if he thought she was pleased to put up with him scheming for her using her people.

Perhaps that was the problem. Luce seeking male companionship made others think she was also seeking a Don to take the 'heavy workload' off her shoulders. Making all these irritating ends to her dating life her fault for not making things explicitly clear to outsiders yet again.

Civilians it was.

(ooo000ooo)

(Friday the 17th of April, 1970. San Marino, Republic of San Marino.)

Renato really rather liked his name.

He had quite a few of them, to date. Mafia Land handed out new names and fake paperwork to its agents as need be, he'd gone by any number of other 'Italian names starting with R' over the years.

From Raffaele to Ricario, Romano to Rufo. They were all really rather fucking retarded, nowhere near as elegant and fitting as just Renato.

That wasn't even mentioning the sheer butchery that happened to his last name, because outside of Italy being a Mafioso wasn't entirely a distinction between one criminal asshole and another. Both first and last name got twisted well beyond acceptable values given what happened when he pretended to be a different nationality due to political shit now or again.
Perhaps... not a name at all?

A word should work. There were all sorts or moronic braggarts that tried to pull it off, using handles taken from nouns to verbs and everything remotely between.

"...how the hell-" Not waiting for the momentarily physically present Mist to finish his demand, the hitman shot him through the head while he wasn't able to be a pain in the ass.

It was always the Flame users that were the worse. Out of everything and everyone hunting him, it was only his fellow Dying Will Flame users that got the closest and proved to be colossal pains.

 Burning through the Mist's obliquely applied defenses had been distracting and draining enough as it was, he didn't remotely want to trigger yet another fucking 'clause' in to restrict what he could or could not do.

No one got away with dictating what Renato Sinclair could or could not do, to his face or otherwise.

Tying what anyone could do in a designated area to how they identify themselves had been bad enough, the asshole used his fucking full name as part of their restrictions.

No one named 'Renato', 'Sinclair', and 'Renato Sinclair' who identified themselves as 'Soft Sun Flame users', 'Mafioso', or any fucking 'hitmen' could utilize a handgun while within a hundred meters of the unlamented dead Mist. Any 'Suns' in the same area could not utilize their Flames either, burning through that the last twenty-four hours had been nasty so hampered.

Thankfully, he was a damn 'Inverted' Sun. The label courtesy of their Soviet brethren, and a term seemingly dismissed out of hand for all Italians that ever heard it used. It didn't exclude him from the inability to use his Flames because apparently that feature hadn't been as clearly defined, but it did allow him the use of a gun as only 'Hard' or 'Soft' Suns were excluded.

Of course, it took him two days entirely to think his way around the Misty insanity barring him from retaliation for being hunted. Shamal wouldn't have dared to try restricting anyone like this, especially given his godmother's nature, but figuring out how his godson could've done it was the only way he figured out what was going on. Exploring and then defining the limitations of this use of Construction had been mostly a process of elimination, and now he was a bit more beaten up than he liked to be but victorious in the end.

All the others caught in the same bullshit might have either been verified as 'not a target' or let loose, which didn't include what damn group said Mist had been sent along to assist, leaving any others in the area complete unknowns and likely still around.

If his opponent had merely excluded anyone that might interrupt his 'hunting', that left Renato surrounded by hostiles. If he had sent them away, that might've reduced a number of others in the same small town as him.

Depending.

"You know, this is why I was perfectly happy not to be as 'special' as you are."

"...Caesar." Renato tipped his head back against the bricks behind him, glaring up to the assassin-chef perched on a railing above. "How long have you been hanging around?"

"Long enough."

"I swear to God, if you left me on my own to go cook something-"
"I, you ruffian, was in the middle of making a soufflé. Yesterday. Then, if you must know, there was an order for suitably doctored cannoli to induce a single death for some Don's wife's garden party. I just finished it and came to see if you'd like one of the extra non-poisoned ones. Such discourtesy."

Catching the dessert dropped down to him, the Sun glowered at the pastry then up at the man who confessed to making it. "Seriously?"

"I'm not 'one of you'." Caesar reminded him pointedly, adopting the visage of a man taking a well-deserved break and not someone holding a semi-clandestine conversation with a hitman beneath his terrace. "I believe the last time such a thing happened you told me 'leave it up to actual users'."

Renato suddenly remembered, again, why the fuck he didn't really visit the others he grew up with often. They were all as annoying and as opinionated as he was, Dante was the only one with an ounce of tact, and really… there was only room enough for one of their egos in a single city limit. Nobody let anyone forget even the slightest infractions, because he sure as hell wouldn't so the others didn't see a reason to let it go either.

"If you're here, somewhat related to what Dante informed me of last month, then of course I'd love to meet your new Natalina."

"...I was sixteen, we were sixteen." Snapped the Mafioso irritably. "And it's a job offer, jackass."

"Notably, that is both not a 'no' and you have consistently failed to apologize for the incident in question."

"She can apologize for herself, I'm not her fucking keeper."

"Well, at least you can learn." Finally deciding to descend to Renato's level, Caesar designed to gift him with a sharp smirk as he pulled his filleting knives free of their sheaths tucked into his sleeves. "Now you've taken care of your own 'kind', let us deal with the rest of these scoundrels and see about your job offer."

Not in the shape to sneer at some assistance just yet, the Sun merely heaved an aggravated sigh instead of verbally accept. He did pause to eat the sweet tossed to him, because assassin or not it was by Caesar's cooking alone any of them survived without starving to death or growing up malnourished.

Himself especially, with a Sun's metabolism to feed.

(Saturday the 18th of April, 1970. Outside Katuaq, Nuuk, Greenland.)

"It was mislabeled." Skull informed Siegfried wryly, jerking his thumb over a shoulder to the east and deeper into the icy waste that made up the bulk of the country they were visiting. "When it was first colonized, by the Vikings. Erik the Red was exiled from Iceland for murder and moved here only to label it 'Greenland' in his language, hoping the pleasant name would attract more settlers. There's a whole exhibit in the local museum documenting the entire incident and explains everything."

The blond German very pointedly cast a glance north along the spit of land the Katuaq cultural center they were performing in sat, across the wide river-like bays separating it from another chunk of mountainous land a stone's throw from the shore of this one, and then out to the Atlantic Ocean to the south.
Most of which, at least the land anyways, was still capped with snow and ice this far into an 'eastern' spring.

"I fail to see it." The former magician turned lion tamer dismissed with a flounce. "Then again, Vikings. Entirely possible they had a horrible sense of humor."

"Well, only one more show and we'll head over to Canada." Returned the stuntman good-naturedly, tucking his really rather battered helmet under an arm to grip his bike's handlebars with his other hand. "Then... more icy terrain. Probably."

"Urg, I cannot wait until we reach better climates."

"I think we're supposed to get down to Florida..."

Siegfried, amusingly enough, purred at the very idea before shouldering the part of their cage-lion stand thing he repaired for the duo of former magicians. "Lovely. Can't wait."

Rolling his eyes, Skull started pushing Diana the Indian Motorcycle into position for later tonight, when he got to perform again.

...hmm, it'd been a minute since he last saw Mauricio.

Where did the Rain magician get to?

Not that the Cloud was his keeper, but it had been several cities and a few weeks and the man had been more or less behaving himself. Perhaps they could go drinking after the show was over, leaving packing up everything but Diana herself to the extra hands tonight. Skull earned the goodwill from the Chinese acrobat troupe, so they'd pack his equipment up once or twice in return for packing up their props and equipment the last two shows because he wanted to tune up his motorcycle before getting it shipped to their next port of call.

"Skull!!!"

Speak of the devil.

"Skull, would you perhaps be against a bit of an investment opportunity?" The slightly still portly Spaniard slid into step with him as they wound around the ramps being set up, panting somewhat heavily but gamely trying to get all his words out in order anyways. "There's a fine gentleman on the wharf, he was entirely enthusiastic about perhaps selling me some of this material he called 'kigutilik'."

"Sperm whale, more than likely something made of their ivory." Identified the stuntman bluntly.

"...really?"

"Yep."

Mauricio pondered the information for only a moment. "Well, I suppose..."

"No, Mauricio. Ports are havens for smugglers, and ivory is a hotly debated trade item right now. We do not need to help them, they've got more than enough willing hands as it is."

"It is a decent amount to make up for the risk."

"I swear, why is it you can find all the morally dubious money making offers the moment we get in anywhere?" Lamented Skull, pausing in the parking lot of this municipal building just to palm his
"I'm starting to think Nojan was right."

"I," insisted the magician turned hype man fastidiously, "am a financial-

"-Idiot savant. You find things that are just a touch too risky for your skill level, then occasionally jump in with both feet without looking for the tripwires." Finished the Cloud dryly. "Remember the poker game, the 'really friendly, just to pass the time' one, with the Provisional Irish Republican Army guys back in Dublin?"

"We got through that with more money than we went in with."

"Because I know how to cheat and get away with it. Unlike you or them and yes, they were cheating.
Heavily."

The Rain paused yet again, looking slightly confused. "I hadn't noticed…"

"Thankfully, neither did they."

Puffing up, well… a little more than his somewhat heavy-set physique would account for, the Spaniard huffed in offended dignity and took a few flouncing steps away. "I shall take this as a refusal, then. Pity."

"Yeah… real pity." Skull would be more annoyed if the Rain specifically went out of his way to get entangled in such situations, but it was always just as innocent as the man claimed. And the man at least asked before risking the really shady ones that weren't so innocent anyways.

If he accepted without double checking anything, then things got a bit dicey when he either didn't realize the situation's not entirely legal background or didn't realize it applied. The stuntman couldn't really point fingers, given his own 'undying' risks were a hell of a lot more noticeable than Mauricio's occasional side-jaunt trying to make them some more money.

Besides, it wasn't really all that long ago the Rain had been part of a circus outfit just a tad bit less respectable than Master Liam's Großer Volksfest. It had been just his way of life for probably more years than he'd been with a circus, the other man wasn't used to remembering that he didn't have to jump on every and any opportunity he found just to make ends meet. To be fair, there were just as many shady and refused opportunities as there were ones he accepted unknowing of the risks.

Well, it kept things interesting.

Viper would be outraged Mauricio wasn't nearly as bad at making money as they had assumed from the incident they all met in. That the incident in Budapest was an outlier, and Skull would happily pay for dinner just to get a front row seat to that information exchange going down.

He'd pay for dinner anyways, but at least he'd get something out of it then.

(? ?? ?? ?? ??)

The Tri-ni-set Administrator, who was sometimes known as 'Uncle Kawahira' or more hostiley as 'The Man in the Iron Hat', eyed the list in his hands without much enthusiasm or interest as he moved from an icy sheet somewhere far to another place much warmer equally as far.

There wasn't much a point to be anywhere. Not just yet, anyways.
That was a Mist oddly working with one of the Clouds for aims of their own, the Lightnings he had to pick from, one Rain separated out, a test set up for the Storm, a check-in with poor Luce's situation, the Sun's situation checked up on, and the other Cloud he had identified as candidates.

He wasn't really certain about taking both Clouds or just one of them, although he would admit given the guardant Cloud's ability of Propagating his own flesh to fast-fix injuries… causing his Flames to turn in on him in order to separate the pair would be a horrible idea.

A pacifistic guardant user of Dying Will Flames of Cloud would turn worse than his inverted little sister's outward mentality if so wounded. Frankly, Kawahira wasn't entirely sure who would come out on top in that fight, or if there would be a 'winner' at all if by some mathematically insignificant possibility the sister wouldn't be equally as wounded and turn as peaceful as her brother once was.

The female already had a fractured Will as it was, cementing only one facet of her to be expressed enough to harvest the Cloud Flames he needed would be just as difficult as getting a group of criminal thugs to accept a noble guardant Cloud as their fellow. Entwined as they were, both options were equally as damaging as the other.

Kawahira was actually somewhat fond of the male Cloud, as a slight echo of what Dying Will Flame users once had been. No sulking about on the fringes of society as little more than a common thug, free to do what he wanted as he wanted without fear of earning recognition for it. While his innate skill with Propagation was honestly alarming in several aspects, especially with how deeply he ingrained it into his subconscious to be so aware of but unafraid of high velocity impact injuries, he at least turned it into a way of life to be proud of.

…he'd figure it out when the time came.

Little Luce's advice was bearing fruit, and it wasn't much of a hardship to continue following it however it made his bones ache with yet more strain.

Not that horrible ideas had ever stopped me before, mused the ancient Mist as he thumbed the Segno Hell Ring on his left-hand.

In his list of things yet to be done or needing amending, separating the Rains had gone off without a hitch. One remained where the pair had been found, and as far as he was concerned even if the male remained in a military outfit these humans had way too many of it was perfectly fine. The female was at least proving to be interesting, if not very inventive in her hateful hunt of him.

Ah well… it wasn't like she could find him for framing her and enabling her somewhat peaceful assimilation into the rather inane 'underworld' of criminal forces she once worked against. Her current aims would just ensure she was isolated and at loose ends enough to jump on any 'major' offer that might help her desires along.

It was tempting to issue the invites just now, because the Sun was the strongest of the next Arcobaleno candidates he had. Losing that one would be rather annoying, especially as his history was trying very damn hard to catch up to him.

On one hand, if he survived his arrogance-fueled gauntlet of opponents he would likely complement Sepira's descendant somewhat well. The girl was equally as manipulative as all his long-departed friend's children tended to be, he supposed it came with their gift just as much as those eyes did.

If he didn't… Kawahira would have to find a new Sun.

He already still had to find a proper Lightning. There was one possible guardant Lightning he could pick up, but the man hadn't done anything too interesting to measure his strength by besides the apparent 'usual' uses for them in these days. Two inversed, one of which was more active with his Flames and another who had a more advantageous positioning to be made use of. Both of which who didn't tend to use their Flames at all to be measured.

None of which really seemed like Lightnings that should be in the company of the Strongest Flame users of the Age… so perhaps he should scout out along the pre-established lines of communications between his picked victims, a good two-thirds already knew one another which made his job a slight bit easier.

Maybe another one, a more active one, could be found then.

Bit of an accidental name, they didn't have to be 'the' strongest… however, if they were then it would put off the requirement of hunting out the next group that much further. He never bothered to correct it, no one was remotely interested in hearing him explain why they had to be Cursed after they received their burdens.

Most of the Dying Will Flame users these days would last… a day.

Maybe two, if it was a particularly stubborn one.

The very limit of what he was searching for was ten years, depressingly the limit the last of Sepira's line. They used to last longer back in the day, but he supposed the bloodlines had the time to thin out rather far. What was once a skill of honor and dignity was now the prized trait in the bloodiest faction of these squabbling human societies, and for sure nothing looked as it once had to his long reaching memories.

A deep bowl of some steaming broth with noodles soaking in it was set right under his nose, and the Mist flicked his eyes to the serving girl manning the 'Ramen Bar'. "Your order, honored customer. Enjoy!"

"Aa..." …what did he order?

More specifically, what did the man who sat here order before the Mist made him 'remember' something pressing elsewhere to take his place. It took a second, lifting it straight from her head, for him to realize his use of Mist Flames applied to prevent anyone noticing him had instead made a slightly Lightning-natured girl assume he was the one to order and pay for the bowl's contents.

"Appreciated." Kawahira decided on responding, not particularly against consuming something to sustain his strength even if it wasn't what he ordered.

He wasn't even sure if he'd order this in the first place if given the choice.

It seemed to be… something sea-based. There was seaweed in it, and something that very much looked like a cut-away of a spiked conch shell. In some light-colored broth and placed over the noodles.

Why did Luce recommend he move to this society anyways?

He had to lift the language and social customs out of someone's head to even order something to sustain himself on, frankly he wasn't even entirely sure if he had the correct language or customs.

Lifting another round of information from his 'fellow diners', without any of the four from realizing something was rifling around their minds, Kawahira slid two sticks out of a protective paper packet and ensured they broke evenly as apparently was the custom via Mist Flames.
Apparently, one held both sticks in hand and used one end to pinch what was to be consumed while gripping the wood more than halfway up.

…strange.

Well, it wasn't much different from utilizing miniature pitchforks or shovels to transfer sustenance into one's face when you had no other options.

Humans…

…none of the noodles were of size to be easily consumed, either.

Opting to start in on what was sensibly of size to eat, the Mist turned his attentions back to his dilemma.

When to issue the invites?

They would have to be issued some time before he Cursed the Arcobaleno, most of the time they would be complete strangers to one another and without some kind of established trust these human candidates tended to lash out at each other instead of relying on their fellows when upheavals in their short lives happened.

This round had decided to solve most of his headache for him, aside the inevitable jarring that would happen as new or ill-fitting initial outsiders are slotted in wherever they fit. However, if it would remain so was entirely subjective. Either once they were called together or if in the very near future. He never liked tending to his sacrifices to ensure they would remain alive just long enough to be of use to him, although he was prone to doing it more and more until his recent two century 'break'.

It hadn't been nearly as restful as he thought it would be. Having little to no good candidates for the next Arcobaleno might've started his 'hiatus', but to be honest Kawahira just hadn't searched for another set of Dying Will Flame users much at all for an entire century.

He had been doing this for a millennium, he was really tired of being the Tri-ni-set Administrator.

Being the last of his race meant there wasn't anyone else to take it from him, so he had to enforce his own vacations. Unintentional as it had been at first.

Aathira had always claimed he was just sly enough he'd outlive all of them, sometimes he wondered if the very first Sun of the Arcobaleno sacrifices had cursed him with that.

A misplaced clink drew his attention downward, and the ancient Mist blinked blankly down at his mostly empty bowl. All that was left was a bare dreg of the salty broth, and nothing else.

…oh.

That was why Luce recommended this part of the world to him.

Kawahira wondered if anything else this food stall offered was equally as tasty as 'salt ramen'.

Curiously, he was interested in finding out for once in nearly two hundred years.

Works inspired by this one
The Origin of Greatness by ForestAngel, Over the Rainbow by ForestAngel, Sonya by Tsume_Yuki, Russian Roulette Fanart by YazzyFic, Seventh Haven by northpeach, wolfsrainrules, (PODFIC) Russian Roulette: Reloaded by QuinsValoria, Vixen_Tail

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!