Summary

Barry is robbed of his powers and locked away in Iron Height for a crime he didn’t commit.

Years later, shunned from his former friends and family, he is released on parole and has to try and rebuild a life for himself.

It doesn't take him long to realize that he isn't as alone as he thinks, and he learns that, sometimes, people aren't what they seem and that one can find kindness in the unlikeliest places.

Notes

This story is very near and dear to me. I have started working on it in early August of 2013, and it has turned into something much bigger than I've initially expected by now.

It can get quite light-hearted at times but is generally more of a drama and deals with rather sad, grim, and adult themes throughout its run.

I hope you will enjoy it. :)
SEPTEMBER 1 st year

It is raining when Barry steps out of Iron Heights for the first time in over seven years.

The late September air is cool and crisp, and he keeps standing there, outside the high walls of the place he spent what feels like an eternity in, unsure what to do next.

He glances nervously back over his shoulder, but the guard who let him out is no longer there, and the door through which he has just left the prison is closed once again.

The backpack he is carrying feels light — there isn’t much left of his private belongings after more than half a decade. Not that he’s really worried about that, not about any long-gone possessions, anyway.

Barry shoots another nervous glance back towards the door he just exited, afraid that one of the guards would reappear at any moment to drag him back into that horrible place…

There is nobody, though.

He is all alone out here.

Hesitantly, he decides to make his way over to the bus stop that lies not too far from where he's standing.

As he walks it suddenly occurs to him how strange it is to be outside again after such a long time on the other side of those huge walls that limited his world like a cage, and finally away from all the awfulness that is hidden behind them.

The relief he is feeling is nearly smothering in its intensity, but there is still the lingering fear that all of this could have just been a mistake, and he silently prays to whatever higher entity there is that this nightmare is really finally over.
There is nobody else around at the small, uncovered bus stop, and he is glad for this brief moment of solitude that gives him the opportunity to calm his agitated emotions.

He seems to be the only one who was released today, and he appreciates the bit of peace and quiet he hasn’t had for years. Even so, the faint but persisting voice in the back of his mind keeps insisting on all of this being a ruse, a cruel prank they are playing on him.

Barry keeps standing next to the bench at the bus stop, too full of nervous energy, and unwilling to let his guard down until his ride finally arrives.

He doesn’t dare to look back again, the fear that he could spot one of the guards exiting and coming over to fetch him is just too daunting. It sits heavy in the pit of his stomach like a stone.

Instead, he looks down the street in the direction the bus will come from, studying it absentmindedly for a moment before he turns his gaze to the ground, frowning at the dirty wet road.

The change for the bus trip is in his trouser pocket, and he keeps his fingers firmly closed around it, worried that he could lose it by accident and would no longer be able to get away from here after all. It’s a silly notion, he knows that, but even so he can’t help it.

As he breathes in the cool air, eyes still on the dirty wet ground where he watches the rings the falling raindrops form on the surface of a puddle, he picks up on the familiar burning sensation of his injured back.

The pain is no longer unbearable, hardly more than an inconvenience thanks to the medication they gave him before he was released, and it seems that the nausea that has been following him around for the last couple of days is finally starting to ease away as well, which is even more of a relief.

The rain gets worse, and he wonders how the others are, whether they know that he is being released today, and whether they even care.

Barry closes his eyes and tries not to think, but to concentrate on the feeling of the cool rain on his skin and the light patter of raindrops around him.

His first trip outside of the prison leads him to his parole officer.

Barry has met with Ms. Jenkins a handful of times before, and like then, she doesn’t seem all that fond of the fact that she is stuck with him as a parolee.

She is a very no-nonsense woman in her late fifties, and she keeps making biting comments about his alleged crimes. She also tells him point-blank that she does not believe him to be able to stay out of prison for more than a few months, with a look other people save for an especially nasty bug. Barry doesn’t argue with her, he feels mostly exhausted and overwhelmed, and just wants to go somewhere he can rest.

Ms. Jenkins gives him the address of his new place, which turns out to be a small apartment in the rundown outskirts of the Keys.

Barry travels there by bus to meet his new landlady. He is feeling rather cold by now, and tired enough that he nearly nods off and misses his stop.

The apartment consists of three rooms, of which he gets a brief tour from the middle-aged woman that is his landlady. He is so worn-out that he hardly picks up on what is said to him, only following the small woman around quietly.

The entrance door leads directly from the rather dingy hallway into what is the living area and main room of the small apartment; and while it isn’t exactly spacious, it isn’t really that small either. He is a bit taken aback by its size actually, and after years of being mostly confined to a 6 by 8 foot cell, it is a bit overwhelming to have so much space to himself again.

There is also a small kitchenette attached to the room, and a couch that looks like it probably hails from sometime around the mid-eighties.

The bedroom is smaller and holds a full-size bed, which is again more than he expected to get; though he doesn’t miss that it looks like its better days have long since passed. It also takes up most of the space, and aside from it there is just a small cupboard squeezed in next to the door.

The last room of his apartment is a tiny bathroom that offers a shower, toilet, and sink.

The notion of being able to take a shower in private nearly chokes him up, and he notices again how his landlady keeps glancing at him nervously as they make their way back to the entrance. He gives her a small smile, which she doesn’t return. Instead, she eyes him with an uneasy frown as she tells him in a firm, stern voice that the rent is going to be due on the first every month.

“This is no shelter, if you're unable to pay you will get kicked out. Do you understand?”

Barry nods quietly and is glad when she finally leaves. He locks the door firmly behind her before he takes his shoes off and goes straight to the small bathroom. His back is hurting again, badly enough that he feels slightly nauseous due to it.

A faint and familiar trembling overcomes him as he pulls his shirt off and briefly views his mangled flesh in the mirror. He quickly turns away again.

After showering, he carefully dries the stitches and burns on his back, and applies the ointment he got from the prison’s infirmary. When he is done with it, he takes two of the painkillers they also gave him this morning before his release. He knows that he shouldn’t use them on an empty stomach, but he feels too exhausted to leave and buy some groceries with the money he got from his parole officer.

Instead, he decides to go to bed and sleep the rest of the day away.

The second day after his release, Barry starts a job as a salesclerk in a small Asian grocery store that still lies within the Keys, but closer to the city center, and thus in a noticeably nicer area. He needs about fifty minutes by bus to get there from his apartment in the morning, and considerably longer after he is done at night.

Even so, he actually enjoys working there, as the owner is a very nice older Asian woman in her early seventies who treats him with kindness despite knowing that he is an ex-convict. It has him on edge at first, unsure of how to interpret her friendliness and patience towards him, but eventually he starts to relax and welcome the time he spends in the small store.

She introduces herself to him as Bo Ming, and doesn’t seem bothered by his stammer, or get irritated with him when he grows nervous enough while interacting with customers during the first couple of days that he starts being pretty much useless, unable to even get a word out. Instead, she simply stays at his side and patiently helps him through his first month working there.
Spending time at Mrs. Ming’s store, having a place where he is welcome and can actually do something with a purpose, quickly becomes the thing he looks forward to when he gets up in the morning.

It is within the first two days that Barry spends in his new little home that it becomes apparent that the walls of his flat are not exactly soundproof.

They are thin enough that it becomes commonplace for him to have trouble falling asleep at night because some of his neighbors just don’t seem to care that they aren’t the only people living there.

To be fair, the noise that’s coming from the other tenants around him is only part of the reason for his sleepless nights. His persisting nightmares, which make it nearly impossible to get more than one or two hours of sleep at a time pose a far bigger problem.

His dreams are a jumble of what happened to him in prison — of Michael and the other guards, and of things that lie much further back. Sometimes, the judging and disappointed faces of his former friends mingle in with the rest, their disapproval and disappointment follow him around. Usually, he doesn’t hear them speak to him, but their disgust and judgement is painfully clear nonetheless.

Barry prefers not to try and go back to sleep after waking up from such a nightmare, which is also the reason why he starts to hate those very early morning hours that make it so much more noticeable how alone he really is.

Trying to cope with the pain and loneliness, Barry starts to sketch again to occupy his upset mind whenever he is unable to sleep. It is an old hobby he hasn’t pursued since his late teens, and with all the free time at hand and nothing better to do, it seems about as good as anything else to pass the time.

During those quiet moment, when Barry sits at his kitchen table and forces himself to think of anything but the awful memories and impressions his mind has forced upon him again, he can’t help but remember the address Len gave him about a week before his release.

The piece of paper that holds said address is still safely tucked away in the bottom drawer of his bedroom wardrobe, and like the other man himself, it is also something that keeps occupying his thoughts during these very early hours.

Unlike most other things, the memory of Len doesn’t hold any fear or agony.

Weeks turn into months, and Barry’s new life becomes routine to him.

January 1st year

Four months into his parole, Barry finally decides to go to the address Len gave him.

He still has his doubts about it, and he isn’t sure what he is promising himself from this, but he has grown tired of sitting alone in his apartment whenever he isn’t at work, and it is mostly this loneliness that urges him to finally seek out the other man’s company.

Aside from that, he hasn’t seen Len in quite a while, and he is a little curious about how he is doing.
None of the papers mentioned that any of the Rogues are currently in the Heights, for which he is grateful, though he never got all that close to most of them, they still made things easier for him in prison.

As usual, this relief is accompanied by a very familiar guilt, a cold, heavy coiled up knot of misery that nestles in the pit of his stomach and reminds him of who those people actually are. Barry tries not to think about it too much.

The address leads him to an apartment complex, which isn’t as seedy as his own, but comes quite close. It is a half-hour bus ride away from his place, and after he walks up to the building, he checks the address two times in the dim light of the close-by street lamp before he hesitantly enters through the open front entrance.

The floor looks gloomy but is not dirty, and while most of the ceiling lights are not working, Barry is still able to see that this place is a definitive step up from his own apartment building.

Len’s apartment is on the first floor, and Barry tries to concentrate on his steps as he climbs the stairs so that his nerves won’t get the better of him and make him turn around and leave again.

There is no buzzer next to the plain looking door that shows a six below the spyhole, and after hesitating for another moment he takes a calming breath and knocks firmly.

For a long minute, Barry is met by nothing but silence, which is somewhat discouraging. He starts to nervously bite his lower lip, uncertain whether he should knock again or take it as a sign and leave.

Then he hears a door being opened inside the apartment, followed by the sound of light footsteps making their way towards him just a second later.

It doesn’t sound like Len…

A woman in her mid- to late-thirties opens the door. She is pretty, rather curvy but not chubby, and has long, curly auburn hair that has a very faint reddish tint. Her face seems a bit plump due to her full cheeks, though her eyes are quite striking, big and brown like that of a fawn, the effect is amplified by her make-up.

“What do you want?” The impatience is plain in her voice as she eyes Barry with a rather annoyed frown. It is obvious that he must have disrupted her with something judging by how irked she seems by his presence.

Meeting this woman instead of Len catches Barry off-guard enough that he isn’t sure how to respond, and it certainly doesn’t help that he can feel his throat closing up on him again as well.

“What is your problem? Are you a bit slow or something?” She gives him a rather impressive sneer, and just like that she doesn’t seem so pretty anymore.

Barry swallows nervously before he forces himself to speak. “N-no, s-s-sor-ry, I-I’m llook-king f-f-for a-a…”

He breaks off, uncertain what to call Len.

An acquaintance? A friend?

Are they friends?

Deciding that asking her outright for the other man would be the best thing to do, seeing as he has already made enough of a fool of himself, he starts anew. “I-is L-Len h-h—”

“For fuck’s sake, if you get any slower you’ll start speaking backwards,” she hisses impatiently.
“You're wasting my time. Come back when you're able to get a freaking word out without sounding like an idiot.”

Taken aback by her harsh words and hostile demeanor, Barry can feel how his voice totally gives out on him. He unsuccessfully tries to protest, but the woman simply dismisses him as she turns away without another look.

The door is shut in his face, and Barry keeps standing there for a moment longer, unable to do anything but stare at it in a mixture of embarrassment and frustration.

Maybe he got the address wrong?

This woman is a total stranger to him, and while Len mentioned something about a younger sister, he knows that she is supposed to be blonde.

Feeling lost and really stupid, Barry turns back toward the direction he came from, and, after giving the closed door one last glance, he starts to make his way back toward the staircase. He pulls the little scrap of paper out of his pocket as he does so and reads it once more.

It is the right place, which means that the other man wrote down a fake address and lied to him.

Of course he has, why wouldn’t he?

Barry grits his teeth and tries to ignore the painful pang in his chest.

He is such an idiot. It’s his own damn fault that he let himself get hurt by something like this. Why would he even expect anything else from a man like that to begin with? Cold is a criminal, after all, and Barry… Barry is probably the last person someone like Len wants to deal with...

Not that he can really fault him for that.

Barry just reaches the top of the stairs when he hears a door being opened again behind him and the rather agitated voice from the woman, he met just a minute ago reaches his ears.

Surprised, he turns around and the heavy knot in his stomach starts to ease somewhat as he spots
Len, who has stepped out of the apartment and is now standing in the dimly lit hallway.

Their eyes meet then, and unlike his own, the other man’s expression is as calm and collected as usual. It doesn’t give away what Len is thinking of him turning up like this at his place.

Even so, Barry is pretty sure that Len must be surprised to see him, after all, it has been a while since he made the offer for him to come by.

Len beckons Barry back before he re-enters the apartment while the woman keeps on speaking in a low but audibly sharp tone to him. She doesn’t seem very happy about being disrupted with whatever they were doing, and by now Barry has a rather good hunch of what that could have been.

His assumption is confirmed when he reaches the entrance of the flat.

“So what?! You send me away because of that snip? You booked me for the whole night, Len! And look at that shitty weather outside! I’m sure as hell not going to look for another john tonight just because you forgot that you’ve already got something else planned!"
Feeling a lot like an unwelcome intruder, Barry stops at the doorway and watches the exchange with a growing feeling of discomfort. The woman’s big curls jump slightly as she angrily waves her hands about, and he notices how her cheeks have turned slightly flushed due to her agitation.

“You’ll get your damn money, Izzy, stop chewing my ear off.” Len grunts and grabs his wallet from the back pocket of the faded jeans he is wearing.

The woman, Izzy, doesn’t seem appeased by that and eyes the two one hundred-dollar notes with open contempt before she snatches them and stuffs them into her purse.

“Fine, you want to spend your evening with that sissy-boy, be my guest. It’s your loss, after all.” Izzy gives Len another hard look before she turns around and starts walking toward the door. As she reaches Barry, she stops and studies him for an unpleasantly long moment.

A rather nasty smile appears on her face as her gaze moves up to meet his, after she finishes scrutinizing him. “You look like someone who can appreciate a good ride, can't you, sweetheart?”

Barry flinches slightly and averts his eyes. Nausea settles over him, and he can’t help but cross his arms in front of his chest, which annoys him to no end because he knows that he always looks like he is hugging himself this way.

“Back off, Izzy,” Len tells her sharply, and Barry watches how the woman turns toward the criminal with a rather dark frown.

She settles for a shrug in the end. “I’m going, I’m going. Don’t get your panties in a bunch.”

The look she gives Barry as she finally passes him and leaves is one of palpable dislike.

“Tata, sissy-boy.”

The door shuts with a loud smack, which causes him to jump, and he really hopes that he doesn’t have to cross ways with that rude woman again anytime soon.

Reluctantly, Barry turns back to Len, feeling a bit uneasy as her words haven’t just been crass but also very embarrassing.

A tense moment passes by in silence before Len smirks slightly and nods toward the couch behind him.

“Take a seat, I’ll grab you a beer.”

Barry hesitates briefly before he makes his way over to the offered seat.

As he does so, he lets his eyes move through the flat that doesn't seem to be much bigger than his own, and he can’t help but wrinkle his nose as he picks up on the mess that greets him everywhere. It’s probably been quite a while since someone took even just a duster to this place.

The couch looks old and worn out but is clean enough after he picks up two empty pizza boxes. Seeing that the small coffee table is stacked full with magazines, papers, empty beer bottles, and something that looks a lot like blueprints, he simply puts them on the ground next to his feet.

Out of the corner of his eyes Barry picks up on something glinting, causing him to look toward the cupboard next to the one window in the room. He raises his eyebrows in surprise when he realizes that the thing that caught his attention looks a hell of a lot like the Stanley Cup peering out in-between a mishmash of books and other stuff.
What is that doing here? And how did he even-

Something cool and hard knocks lightly against his shoulder and causes him to freeze up in alarm.

“Relax, it’s just a beer.” Len meets Barry’s embarrassed gaze calmly.

“Th-th-th—” Barry's cheek feel like they are going to go up in flames any moment now when his voice still refuses to work properly, and he breaks off, averting his eyes. Instead, he grabs the offered can and simply nods his thanks. He can feel the other man’s eyes on him for a long moment afterwards before he also takes a seat on the couch next to him.

It is a relief when Len leaves more than an arm’s length space between them, and Barry is honestly grateful for his mindfulness.

The familiar hissing sound of a beer can being opened fills the room while Barry just keeps holding onto his own, noticing how pleasantly cool it feels in his hands.

“So,” Len says after he takes swig from his beer. “You eventually decided to come by.”

Their eyes meet briefly when Barry glances to him before he turns back to the still unopened can in his hands. He nods wordlessly even though he knows that it wasn’t really a question.

“Didn’t think you would.” Len smirks as if he has just said something funny when Barry gives him a wary look. The other man shrugs and doesn’t elaborate because it isn’t really necessary. They did fight on opposite sides of the law for a long time, after all, and this right here is a bizarre situation, they both are very much aware of it.

They fall silent again for a bit, and while it isn’t exactly comfortable, it isn’t unpleasant either. Barry watches how the other man grabs the remote from amid the mess on the little table in front of them and turns the television on. The noise of some advertisement chases the quietness away before Len changes the channel to a football game.

It’s half-time right now, and cheerleaders dance across the screen in skimpy outfits, offering quite an impressive performance as they do.

Barry’s nerves start to settle down after a few minutes when he realizes that the other man’s focus is on the show right now. He isn’t sure whether he should feel a bit annoyed by this or not. He settles for the latter.

One big worry of his has been, aside from Cold reacting with hostility to his visit or not being there at all, that they would just sit around in a tense and awkward silence before the other man would kick him out again. This doesn’t seem to be something he has to worry about just yet, though.

The game is interesting enough even though Barry has never been a big football fan. That aside, it has been a very long time since he hasn’t spent an evening alone, and while they don’t talk, it is still nice to just have another person nearby, especially one he can feel no resentment coming from.

“You want something else?” Barry, whose eyes have started to grow heavy, startles in response to the unexpected question, and his body grows nearly painfully tense for a second.

“I got another beer,” Len explains when he meets his confused gaze and nods toward the still unopened can in his hand. “You want to stick with that, or should I grab you a Coke?”

The notion of having something other than beer is tempting, but he hasn’t had one in an eternity and actually wants to drink it. His stomach has settled down by now as well, therefore he shakes his head and gives the other man a nervous little smile. “I’ll s-stick w-with i-it b-b-but c-could I-I g-get a-a g-glass o-of w-wat-ter?” Len nods and makes his way around the couch toward his small kitchen.

The game ends about forty minutes later, and judging by the other man’s lack of any real reaction he doesn’t seem to have been all that invested in it either. Barry, who stopped following it a while ago, rubs his tired eyes and fights against the urge to yawn. His half empty can of beer is warm in his hand, and he lifts it up to take another small sip. It tastes rather nasty now that it’s no longer cold, but he doesn’t like the notion of wasting it, especially after he has gotten it for free.

The TV is switched off, and Len gets up to grab himself another beer. Barry declines when he asks him whether he wants another one too.

“You don’t have to finish it.” Len nods toward the can in his hand, and judging by the look he gives it it’s obvious that he can imagine how it tastes.

“I-it’s f-fine.”

“It has to taste like piss by now.”

Barry makes a face and gives Len an annoyed look, which causes the other man to smirk in return and shrug. “Suit yourself.”

He comes back with a fresh beer and a bag of pretzels, and Barry’s gaze hardly falls upon it when his mouth already starts to water. Len doesn’t miss his look and holds the bag toward him after he has opened it. “Help yourself.”

The smell of the snack causes Barry’s stomach to growl embarrassingly loud, and he feels his cheeks heat up before he grabs a handful and mutters his thanks. He expects the other man to comment on this, maybe make a quip about how thin he looks or whether he can’t even afford to buy food for himself. It doesn’t happen though.

“Wanna play a game of poker?” Len asks instead, and Barry can’t help but turn back to him in surprise.

“P-p-pok-ker?” His face grows hot again as he listens to how bad his stammer still sounds. He really hates this damn handicap so much, especially in situations like this one.

“Yeah,” Len agrees and doesn’t seem fazed by his speech impediment, which eases Barry’s nervousness a little.

At his hesitation to agree, the other man gives him a funny look. “You know how to play?”

“N-n-no.” Barry shakes his head and is bemused by how taken aback his host seems by this piece of news for a second. “N-not e-eveyb-body c-can.”

“No shit.” Len snorts and gets up to get the cards. It is then that Barry remembers that poker is usually played with money as a wager and his good mood drops instantly.

“I-d-don’t h-have a-a any m-money,” he explains as Len comes back and quickly adds after he realizes how pathetic this must sound. “F-for sp-sp-end-ding o-on g-gambling, I-I m-mean.”

The other man shrugs and nods toward the bag of pretzels while he starts to shuffle the cards. “That will do just fine.”

They end up dividing the amount of the still nearly full bag of snacks between them. Barry asks for three bowls where they can stash and place their bets, as he doesn’t like the idea of simply putting them on the couch that he doesn’t know what has happened on before. Len shoots him a somewhat exasperated look at that request but humors him. “You have any idea of the rules?”

“N-no.”

Barry watches how the other man shuffles the deck of cards again. It is obvious that he is quite familiar with this judging by how quick he is.

through them. He picks five cards and shows them to him. “This hand’s called a no pair, or a Queen High, because your highest card would be the Queen in this case. It’s the lowest ranking hand you can get other than another no pair with a High Card below the Queen.”

Over the next five minutes, Len explains the different hands and rules to him.

Surprisingly enough, the game turns out to be really not all that difficult. The important thing is to keep a good poker face and remember which cards have already been played.

Barry, who has never really been a fan of games you need to place wagers in, can’t help but feel curious about it.

“I’ve t-to w-warn y-you, m-my p-p-poker f-face s-sucks,” he remarks as he picks up the cards Len deals him and shoots the other man a slightly apologetic look.

“Everybody sucks at this game at first.” Len doesn’t seem bothered and instead organizes his own cards. His face is already giving nothing away.

Barry holds his tongue and doesn’t inform him that he's never been any good at schooling his features and instead turns his attention back to his own hand. He has gotten three Jacks, which doesn’t seem so bad.

Six games later, Len agrees with him wholeheartedly, though.

“You really should never play for actual money,” he advises Barry with a way too amused smirk as he grabs the pretzels from the bet bowl and puts them in the second one he got for himself after his first one had been filled up. “You wanna play another round?”

Frowning, Barry shoots him a dark look and shakes his head. “N-no, th-thanks.”

Right now, he doesn’t think that he will ever try this stupid game again. It isn’t as if Len hasn’t been helpful or anything, he’s even pretty sure that the other man went easy on him. He actually had a couple of really good hands, but he still wasn't able to win a single hand.

His own bowl is holding no more than five meagre pretzels, and he really thinks they would do him more good in his stomach than squandered in another game he will undoubtedly lose as well.

Len grabs the empty plastic bag in which the snack was stashed before and puts his wins back in.
Then he gets up, probably to grab himself another beer, and Barry can’t help but eye the bag of pretzels he left on the couch. He wonders whether the other man would mind if he takes another handful.

“Take the damn bag,” Len tells him from the kitchen, startling Barry by doing so. “I opened them so that they’d finally be gone, I hate that dry salty stuff.”
A part of Barry wants to protest and point out that he doesn’t need charity, but he is well aware of how stupid that would be. “Th-thanks.”

The other man only grunts in reply and returns with another two bottles of cold beer a moment later.

Seeing how hungry he is, the pretzels are more than delicious, and he quickly eats half of the bag before he has to stop because he starts to feel sick.

“You missed dinner tonight?” Len asks after he retakes his spot on the couch.

“Y-yeah, I-I h-had t-to w-w-work b-bef-fore I-I c-came h-here,” Barry answers nervously and hopes that Len won’t inquire further. He is pretty sure that the other man knows that he hasn’t just missed dinner, he can see himself in the mirror every morning and is well aware of how gaunt and tired he looks.

Much to his relief, Len seems to pick up on how uncomfortable this question is for him and turns their conversation elsewhere.

“So, you’ve stuck to the job those wankers got you after your release?” It is rather palpable what he thinks of that.

“Y-yes, i-it’s b-bet-ter th-than n-noth-thing,” Barry points out.

“They don’t seem to pay you well.”

Barry grits his teeth and glares at the other man. “A-at l-least I-I’m e-earning m-my iinc-come.”

As soon as the words leave his mouth, he regrets them instantly. He doesn’t want to start an argument or cause the other man to get angry. It has been a surprisingly pleasant evening so far, and he doesn’t want it to end with him being kicked out. Still, he sticks to his point as he is getting by with legal work, which is what counts, no matter how meagre his income may be.

Against his worry, Len simply snorts and gives him an incredulous look before he shakes his head.

“D-don’t c-call m-me th-that!” Barry hisses angrily. His body tenses up again, and he tries not to grimace as this causes a familiar pain in most of his joints to flare up.

For a brief moment, Len seems taken aback by how upset he actually got over this. Then, he frowns and shrugs. “Right, my bad.”

Barry turns his gaze back on to the cold can of beer he was handed just a moment ago and marvels over how quickly his good mood vanishes again. He starts to regret coming here after all.

It has been a stupid idea, no matter how lonely he is.

“I-I th-think I-I sh-should g-go, i-it’s a-a-lr-ready l-late.”

Seeing that he hasn’t a watch, he has no way to say what time it is exactly, but he is sure that he has already spent a couple of hours here.

“Yeah,” Len agrees in a gruff tone, sounding much less welcoming than before. Barry feels bad all of a sudden, like an ungrateful jackass, and tries to think of something to say as they get up.

“Th-thanks f-for th-the b-beer a-and th-the p-p-p.” A hot flush spreads over his face once more, and he lowers his eyes to the still unopened can of beer in his hand.

“Th-the s-snack,” he finishes lamely.

“Sure.” Len grunts and sounds very much like he doesn’t really want to have him here anymore which is surprisingly disconcerting. Despite that, he hasn’t moved away from Barry nor tried to usher him toward the door.

“I-I…” Barry’s throat feels dry, and he coughs slightly, before he goes on. “I-I’ve r-really e-enj-joyed th-the e-even-ning.” He glances towards the other man who is still watching him with a rather cool expression. “Th-thanks f-for t-taking th-the t-time. I-I… th-thanks.”

His face has grown so uncomfortably hot by now that he is sure it is about to catch fire. He swiftly grabs his coat from the armrest of the couch, puts the can of beer on the edge of the coffee table and turns around to leave.

“Wait.” Barry stops close to the door and turns around in apprehension to see Len come up to him. To his surprise, he is offered the half empty bag of pretzels. “You forgot this.”

For a second Barry wants to decline because he doesn’t want to take anything else from the other man more than he already has since he really can’t offer him anything in return. It seems that his thoughts are plain on his face as Len huffs in annoyance before he pushes the bag against his chest so that he automatically takes hold of it.

“Th-thank y-you.” Barry gives him an uncertain but grateful smile, somewhat touched by this unexpected kindness.

“M-mayb-be w-we…” he starts but stops himself when he realizes that it probably wouldn’t be a good idea for them to meet again. The notion is a bit saddening nonetheless.

“Where did they put you?”

“Wh-what?”

“Where is your place?”

Barry isn’t really sure whether he really wants to give his address away and hesitates which causes Len to sigh in annoyance. “Look, if you don’t wanna tell me, that’s fine.”

“N-no.” Barry disagrees much to his own surprise and swallows before he goes on. “D-do y-you h-have a-a p-pap-per o-or s-someth-thing f-for m-me t-to w-write i-it d-down o-on?”

It becomes clear that Len didn’t really expect him to agree as he studies him quietly for a second with an odd look that Barry isn’t sure how to interpret.

Then, it is gone and the other man nods.

“Sure.”

Chapter End Notes
Hope you guys liked it, and I'm curious whether any of you actually knows about the Stanley cup. ;)

“Did you draw this?”

Barry pauses stocking the shelves with canned beans and looks over to the counter where Mrs. Ming is currently studying a sheet of paper. It takes him a second before he realizes that it is the sketch he made this morning after he’d opened the store and was waiting for the first set of customers to arrive.

His face immediately flushes in embarrassment, and he gets up from the spot where he has been crouching in front of one of shelves. He grimaces slightly when a familiar sharp pain flashes through his left knee, which has been acting up rather badly lately, most likely due to the still damp and cool weather outside.

“S-sorry, I-I w-won’t d-do it ag-gain wh-while at w-work,” he apologizes worriedly and berates himself silently for leaving the sketch lying around like this.

The old woman lifts her eyes from the sheet of paper and turns her attention back to him with a slight frown. Barry feels his face grow even warmer when she studies him for a moment, and the responding apprehension that he is going to get in trouble for dawdling around while at work nearly makes him sick. The notion that he could disappoint her doesn’t help much either as she has been nothing but kind to him so far.

Her features relax again though, and a familiar kind smile appears on her lips as she shakes her head and chuckles. “Don’t worry, Barry, I don’t mind you drawing when there is nothing else to do. You have picked yourself quite a nice hobby.”
She turns back to the drawing, studying it once more, and he suddenly feels the intense urge to snatch it out of her hands and hide it from her and anybody else’s gaze. He knows that it’s probably not possible to make out just whom he has tried to sketch, but it still makes him nervous.

“Have you been drawing for a long time?”

“S-somewhat,” he explains uneasily. “I u-used t-to w-when I-I w-was y-younger and s-started a-again a li-li-ittle w-while a-ago.”

Mrs. Ming hums in understanding and gives him an appreciative look.

“You’re quite talented,” she tells him, and he is surprised by how serious she seems. “A bit rough around the edges but still very good.”

Not sure how to take the compliment, he stays quiet. Despite her nice words he still wishes she would put the piece of paper away.

It seems that the older woman picks up on his discomfort as she does just that. “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to snoop.”

“N-no, i-it’s f-f-fine, I-I… I j-just… u-usually n-nob-body s-sees m-my d-drawings. I-I d-don’t th-think th-they a-are any g-good.”

“Well, this one definitely is,” Mrs. Ming disagrees and asks him what medium he usually works with.

Barry frowns and shrugs. “N-nothing s-special r-really, j-just a p-pen and s-some o-old p-papers.”

He has never bothered to buy any drawing materials, seeing that he doesn’t exactly have the money to spare nor does he think that it is an investment he can really justify.

Mrs. Ming hums again and turns her gaze back to the sketch with a rather thoughtful expression. “Is this a friend of yours?”

Barry had hoped she wouldn’t ask about the person he had so absentmindedly sketched and his cheeks grow hot in response as he averts his eyes. “A-an a-a-aquaintance.”

Again, she studies him briefly before she tells Barry that she would prepare them some tea.

He is glad when she is gone, and he is finally able to grab the paper and tuck it away in the back pocket of his pants.

Sketching is something he took up again because it helps him relax, but he regrets it at times like this when his mind starts to drift off and his hand seems to move more or less on its own accord. This usually causes him to go from drawing little doodles or places to people, especially those he hasn’t seen in years. It is like a bucket of cold water is emptied over his head every time his mind comes back to what he is currently drawing, and he realizes that he is looking at a familiar face from his past.

Barry swallows and turns to go back to the shelf he was restocking.

The folded paper feels heavy in his pocket, and he tries not to think of the fact that he has drawn a new face this morning, one that unsettles and confuses him a little. He thinks about getting rid of it, but knows that he most likely won’t do so in the end. It has turned out surprisingly well and while it is embarrassing, he will probably hold on to it.
The doorbell chimes and announces the arrival of a customer so that Barry is able to get his mind off the sketch.

The notion of Len still follows him around for the rest of the afternoon.

The sound of sharp knocking startles Barry from a light slumber and causes him to tense up with a twinge of panic, until he realizes where he is.

Groggily, he gets up and looks to the clock hanging over the doorway of his bedroom. He frowns when he sees that it is already half past ten. It seems that his catnap has lasted for nearly two hours.

Concerned, he turns toward the door and hisses slightly when a sharp pain flashes through his neck and back. Barry is reminded of why he usually prefers not to fall asleep on the old piece of junk that is his couch.

Another knock follows, a bit sharper than the one before, and he looks toward the door again as apprehension starts to settle in his gut. He never has visitors, especially not this late at night.

It isn’t uncommon for people to be robbed in their own homes here, and he wonders whether he could try to ignore it. This probably isn’t a wise idea though, as a burglar would undoubtedly see it as an invitation to try his luck. Then, he remembers that he still has the lights on and that whoever is there has undoubtedly picked up on this as well.

Barry grits his teeth as he gets up and tries to loosen the tense muscles in his back a bit by rolling his shoulders before making his way over to the door, just as another knock follows. By how harsh it sounds, it is obvious that his late-night visitor is getting impatient with him. He starts to get a bit irritated as well in response and wonders whether a burglar could really be stupid enough to make this much noise. Then again, the people living here prefer to ignore anything that doesn’t happen within their own four walls and the criminals are likely aware of this.

His insides grow hot and cold a second later as he looks through the peephole to see who is passing by this late.

“Just open the damn door already, I can see your shadow through the bottom crack.” Len’s gruff tone is low and a bit muffled through the wood between them, and Barry just stands there frozen for a long moment before he is able to shake off the stupor. He unlocks the door despite a small voice in his head reminding him that this is not a good idea for so many reasons, and that he has to work tomorrow and should go to bed instead of letting an infamous criminal in.

“Are you always this fucking slow?” the other man asks in lieu of an actual greeting.

“I-it’s a-a-alr-ready a-after t-ten,” Barry replies with a frown and crosses his arms in front of his chest, trying to look more annoyed than intimidated. “I-I’ve g-got t-to w-work t-tom-m-morrow.”

“So, you want me to leave again?”

They glare at each other for a couple of seconds before the noise of someone coming up the stairs reaches them, and Barry quickly steps aside to let the other man in.

“Y-you sh-shouldn’t r-run a-around l-like th-that,” he points out after he closes the door. “A-anyb-body c-could h-have s-seen you.”

He gets an unimpressed look in return. “I’m not wearing my getup, I’ll be fine.”
“People could still recognize you.”

“This is the Twins — two huge cities — people here have mastered the art of ignoring each other like nobody else.”

“That’s very careless,” Barry points out with a frown even though he knows that the other man does have a point.

“Maybe,” Len concedes but doesn’t seem particularly concerned despite it, which in turn rubs Barry the wrong way even though he knows the other man’s negligence shouldn’t really bother him this much.

“Stop worrying, I know how to stay under the radar.” Len ignores the exasperated huff he gets in response and instead gives him a crooked smirk.

“You planning on staying there all night?” he asks and nods to where Barry is still standing next to the door.

Barry’s frown deepens before he suddenly picks up on the delicious smell of food and his gaze inevitably lowers itself to the Len’s right hand, where he spots a white plastic bag.

From one second to the next, he realizes how hungry he is and, before he can press the ball of his hand into his stomach, a loud rumble reaches both of their ears. His face turns hot in embarrassment, and he shoots the other man a half-hearted glare as if daring him to make a stupid comment.

Len doesn’t. Instead he lifts the bag and nods toward the table that stands between the kitchenette and the couch.

“I grabbed some food,” he remarks unnecessarily. “Let’s eat before it gets cold.”

The urge to protest is strong, but Barry ignores it. He hasn’t eaten anything but a ham sandwich today since he won’t get his next paycheck until two days from now, and his fridge is pretty much empty as is usually the case this late in the month.

They move to the table and Len starts to take out the plastic boxes that hold the food. It smells spicy and seems to still be hot, which means that he probably picked it up from somewhere nearby.

“I got you the rice with chicken and vegetables.” The other man pushes the white box toward him. “You want the chopsticks or the plastic spoon?”

“Ch-ch-ops-sticks are f-f-fine.” His stomach grumbles again, and Barry tries not to show how painfully hard it is to ignore the hunger and not to simply wolf it down. Instead, he starts to eat slowly, careful so as not to waste any of the rice.

They don’t talk while they eat, which is fine with him — he can hardly concentrate on anything else but his delicious meal. The nausea that has been following him around for most of the day ceases, and he feels better than he has in a while as he picks the last couple grains of rice up with his chopsticks. It is then that he notices that the other man has hardly touched any of his own food so far and is instead watching him.

Barry tenses and halts. He frowns as he meets Len’s eyes. “Is there a reason you’re staring?”

He is surprised by how sharp it comes out and immediately feels bad for it. His current companion has brought him food after all and hasn’t done anything that would really earn his ire.
“S-sorry,” he apologizes quietly and turns his gaze back to the now empty plastic box, “a-and th-thank you f-for th-the f-food. I ap-preciate i-it… e-even th-though i-it wwasn’t n-necess-sary.”

Barry expects the other man to point out what an obvious lie this is or maybe make a snide remark, but Len lets the opportunity pass by once again. He doesn’t understand why the other man is being so kind, but he is grateful for it nonetheless.

“I-I’ll p-pay y-you b-back,” Barry assures him, and this does earn him a derisive snort. His cheeks grow uncomfortably hot again in response, partly in embarrassment and partly in anger.

“I-I w-will,” he grits out angrily and could kick himself for accepting the food in the first place. “Y-you’ll g-get th-the m-money f-for th-the f-food.”

His body has grown stiff with tension, and he can’t bring himself to look at Len.

“If it makes you feel better, then fine, pay me back,” Len tells him and while he sounds slightly irked, he still seems much calmer than Barry expected he would be.

“I-d-don’t n-need ch-charity,” he points out once more and fights the urge to retreat into his bedroom and hide away in there till the other man leaves. He swallows around the painful lump in his throat and shoots a glare at Len instead.

The other man frowns annoyed. “Stop making such a damn fuss over this.”

“I-I’m n-not—”

“Yes, you are.” Len scowls. “This is no pity-party for you, so stop acting so damn defensive. I was in the area and hadn’t eaten dinner yet, that is all. The fucking planet is not solely rotating around you, Allen.”

A tense silence follows and both hold the other’s gaze for a long minute before Barry folds and averts his eyes. The feeling of him being an ungrateful ass returns full force.

“I-I’m s-sorry, I… I r-really ap-preciate th-the f-food,” he speaks very softly and hates the intense urge that tries to get him to cross his arms in front of his chest again in this humiliating way that is so much like hugging himself.

Still, he insists again on paying the other man back as soon as he has the money, which costs Len a clearly exasperated sigh, but he doesn’t protest.

“I sh-shouldn’t h-have r-reacted l-like th-that,” Barry goes on slowly, trying to keep his stammer under control. He glances at Len uncertainly and adds. “I h-haven’t b-been sle-sleeping s-so w-well l-lately.”

“No shit,” Len remarks with a crooked but not mean smirk. “You look horrible.”

Len ignores the dark glare that is directed his way and turns to his food to start eating his noodles instead. They fall into a silence after that which, surprisingly enough, isn’t tense nor is it really uncomfortable, and Barry actually relaxes enough that he starts to grow drowsy as he waits for Len to finish.

“Is there a reason you’re staring at me?” Len’s voice startles Barry, and he realizes that he really has been watching him. He flushes once more and turns away while muttering an apology. Len’s answering smirk is palpable enough that Barry doesn’t need to see it to know that it is there.

“I-I’m f-fine.”

Barry frowns and decides to get up as he feels tired enough that he really fears he is going to nod off should he not start to move. It would probably be a better idea to ask Len to leave, it is already past eleven, and he has to get up again in less than five hours.

“Y-you want s-some t-tea?” he asks instead.

Len seems surprised at the offer before his look turns skeptical. “Is beer also an option?”

Seeing that he usually never drinks alcohol when he is alone, Barry shakes his head with an unhappy expression.

“Coffee?” Len tries again, and Barry feels once more as an embarrassed unease settles over him. Other than three slices of toast, two cans of tuna and a handful of teabags he doesn’t have anything else edible at home right now.

“N-no,” he mutters and doesn’t even want to consider how pathetic he must appear.

“Tea is fine.” His surprised look is met by Len’s calm expression, and Barry notices how the pressure inside his chest starts to ease away again as does the tension in his body.

He gives the other man a tentative smile. “G-good.”

Len starts to stop by once or twice a week. He usually brings food with him and while Barry knows that Len is mostly just humoring him by agreeing to let him pay him back, he is still very glad for the help.

More often than not, his finances are in a very dire state, and he has trouble getting the money he has left after paying his rent to last for the rest of the month without ending up hungry the last couple days of the month. He is quite grateful for Len’s help because of that, despite the fact that it makes him feel like a leech.

They usually don’t talk much, preferring to rather play poker or simply share a few beers in a surprisingly comfortable silence. It’s nice, having someone else around in his flat, and Barry starts to look forward to the other man’s visits, despite knowing how dangerous and reckless an affair this really is.

“Of course you can,” Mrs. Ming disagrees and doesn’t make any move to take the gifts he tries to hand back to her. “Your birthday is coming up next month, take it as my present to you.”

She’d asked Barry to stay after work shortly before he was done with closing, and he’d agreed, thinking that she invited him for tea again. He didn’t expect the set of acrylic paints and the sketchbook she handed him instead.

“B-but-“
“You would be doing me a great favour.” Mrs. Ming steps closer to him and meets his distraught look with a kind smile as she lightly cups his elbow. “Please, Barry, accept this little gift.”

It takes Barry a moment before he has the tumult of emotions under enough control that he wouldn’t embarrass himself.

“Th-thank y-you.” His voice is faint, and he coughs slightly as he averts his gaze. The gratitude he is currently experiencing is nearly smothering in its intensity. “Th-thank you, th-this... th-thank y-you.”

“You are welcome, my boy.” The old woman smiles, and Barry tries not to notice the sadness in her eyes.

He doesn’t understand why she shows him this kindness, but he will certainly never forget it.

“You’re getting better.” Len snorts when Barry’s only response is to glower at him. “You are.”

“I h-haven’t w-won once ag-against you s-so f-far,” Barry grumbles and looks sullenly at the cards the other man is shuffling again. By now he has given up any hope that he would ever be able to win a hand when it comes to this game.

“Doesn’t mean shit,” Len argues with a smirk. “I’ve been playing this since I was old enough to hold a hand, and it’s usually the game of choice with the others.”

Barry frowns but refrains from pointing out that he simply is no good at gambling, in general.

“It would help if you weren’t wearing your emotions on your sleeve all the time.”

“I’m t-trying n-not to.”

This had been one of the reasons why he wore a mask that hid most of his face other than for simply keeping his identity a secret back when he was still the Flash.

He takes a sip from his tea and frowns at the deck Len has now put down between them.

“You wanna take a break and lick your wounds?” The glare Barry gives Len in return is icy, and the other man chuckles in obvious amusement as he gets up. “I gotta take a piss, don’t mark the cards while I am gone.”

“F-funny.”

Instead of cheating, Barry gets himself another cup of tea. Contrary to Len’s usual habit, he has turned up on a Saturday night. This is a nice change, and it means that he doesn’t have to worry about losing any sleep because he doesn’t have to work tomorrow. It also makes it easier for him to relax and enjoy the company.

“You w-want a c-cup t-too?” he asks when the other man reenters the living room. Len grunts a nonverbal decline and instead sits back down on the couch. It doesn’t come as a surprise as he usually sticks to his beer or coffee, so Barry only fills up his own cup again.

They play another game, and he doesn’t do much better than the last one or the one before that. Still, it is nice to have the other man around, who is also surprisingly relaxed tonight and unusually inclined to chat a bit.

“I d-don’t g-get it, I-I’m k-keeping m-my f-face t-tot-tally v-vacant, and I’m s-staying r-relaxed. H-
“How are you able to tell what hand I’ve got?” Barry groans softly and lets his head drop onto the backrest of his couch. He pulls his legs up to his chest and curls his arm around them loosely, getting into a position he is more comfortable with.

“Keep on kidding yourself.” Len snorts.

“Wh-what?” He turns to the other man in confusion. “I did stay expressionless.”

Len lifts his eyebrows incredulously causing Barry’s mood to deteriorate some more. “No, you didn’t. You tried, but failed at it rather impressively.”

“I didn’t!”

“You are like an open book.” Len smirks while he collects the cards to put them away. “Some people can’t help it.”

Not sure whether he should bother to be insulted by this comment or not, Barry settles on wrinkling his nose and giving Len a half-hearted glare. It isn’t as if he hasn’t known from the beginning that he wouldn’t be any good because of this exact reason.

Feeling tired, Barry changes his position so that his side is resting against the backrest with his cheek resting on top of it. He watches the other man quietly as he puts the cards back into their box.

Len gets himself another beer and offers to grab him one as well, which he accepts.

“You have anything planned next Saturday?” It’s an odd question, seeing as Len knows quite well that Barry hardly ever leaves his flat for anything other than work. He shakes his head quietly and pulls his legs a bit closer.

“We’re having a poker night,” Len explains. “If you’re up for it, you can drop by.”

“Y-you and th-the oth-ther R-Rogues?” Barry hadn’t been sure what to expect, but it definitely wasn’t this.

“Yeah,” Len agrees and something changes in the way he watches him. He suddenly seems a bit hostile which causes Barry to tense up involuntarily. “You have a problem with that?”

“I-I… you r-really th-think th-that i-is a g-good idea?”

“Why not?” The aggression has mostly left his voice, and Len eyes him with a mixture of annoyance and exasperation instead.

“Th-they… w-we aren’t exact-tly…” Barry bites his bottom lip nervously and shrugs, not really willing to go into this.

“You liked them well enough before you were released,” Len reminds him and takes another swig of his beer.

“I-it’s n-not th-that.” His fingers have started to dig painfully in his shins, and he forces himself to relax a bit.

“Don’t worry your damn head off all the time about things that are long past.” Their eyes meet, and Len goes on. “They won’t cause you any trouble, but you don’t have to come. It’s just an offer.”

“No, I w-would l-like t-to c-come.” Despite not really being sure how to feel about the idea of mingling with the group of criminals again, Barry knows that they usually don’t invite other people along, and the notion that Len actually wants him to come eases his concerns a bit. It is also nice to look forward to spending an evening outside of his own four walls.

“Good, Sam will pick you up around six.”

“W-we aren’t m-meeting at y-your p-lace?”

Len snorts and tells him that they did that once and that it’s not happening again. He doesn’t go into any details, and Barry somehow has the inkling that he probably doesn’t want to know anyway.

“We meet at our current bolt-hole.”

“Y-your h-hideout?” He frowns and eyes the other man doubtfully. “I d-don’t kn-know i-if th-that is s-such a g-good i-idea.”

“Why? I doubt you’ll go and tattle to the capes about it.” Len snorts but his face becomes somber when he notices Barry’s hurt expression. “Look—”

“I-I’ll c-come,” Barry cuts him off and tries to will away the itching of his eyes while he keeps his gaze on the small coffee table next to him. “C-could y-you l-leave n-now, p-please, I-I’m r-rather t-tired.”

A long uncomfortable moment passes before the other man does so without another word.

Barry meets a young woman who also lives in his apartment complex on the first floor. Her bag of groceries breaks, and its content spill all over the stairs. He gets her another bag from his flat, and they start to talk a bit as he helps her carry everything up to her apartment.

Her name turns out to be Mary, and she doesn’t seem at all fazed by his stammer, which is a nice change to how most people around here usually react to him. Despite his initial reluctance, he accepts when she invites him over for some coffee after they arrive at her doorstep.

They talk for a while, and Barry learns that she has already been living here for more than two years. It doesn’t really surprise him that they haven’t crossed paths with each other so far, seeing as most tenants prefer to stick to themselves, and he is hardly an exception.

Mary invites him over for dinner the following week and he accepts.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you liked the chapter!

I just quickly wanna touch upon something I haven’t really mentioned last time:

This story is very long and a slow burn. This is mainly because I’ve started it as a little pet-project for myself because there were about two or three Barry/Len stories around back then (today, you probably can hardly imagine such a time anymore ;) and I wrote it for myself initially.

I started out with a concept which has changed quite a bit over time, but I mostly wanted and still want to explore and really go into the characters' minds, especially Barry's, and the relationship they have with each other. I want for the story to evolve in a more moderate pace and give it time to grow, so to speak.

Barry has a lot to deal with right now, you will learn more about it as the story goes on, and while he and the Rogues "know" each other in a way, it will still take a bit till they get on a more familiar basis and he starts to really spend time with them. This will start to in a couple of chapters but the real familiarity between them evolves over time.

The relationship between Barry and Len has been a complicated one from the beginning and it is unbelievable fun to write it but I want to give you a small heads-up, it will take some time till they get together. They both have to learn to get comfortable with the notion alone at first, each one for his one reasons, even tough there will be an attraction and they are aware of it.

I also decided to introduce a couple of OCs as it would be kind of impossible for Barry to live somewhere without any interaction with other people. I am usually not a fan of those but they seemed necessary for the story and for Barry to be able to find his footing again outside of prison. Over time they actually really grew on me and I hope they won't bother you too much.

Once again, I also want to thank all of you lovely people who have given me feedback, whether it be in form of Kudos or comments. I appreciate each and every single one of them very much. :)}

Chapter Notes

I decided to post this chapter earlier, I will probably not have time to do so again till sometime toward the end of next week due to work and I want to get it out before then.

Hope you'll enjoy it, it finally introduces the rest of the Rogues. :3

Update: The chapter is now edited by the amazing MeteoraWrites! (6th of January, 2019)

MARCH 1st year

“Bloody hell, mate, just put the damn fiver down already!”

“Don’t stress me!”

“Just put the fucking money down or fold, Trickster!”

“Let me think!”

“You have been thinking for the last three minutes, idiot.”

“And you have an ugly mug!”

Mick sneers and looks about ready to hurl his still nearly full bottle of beer across the table into James face in return.

“Just fold,” Sam advises while shuffling the cards in his hand in a very bored manner. “Your hand sucks anyway.”

“What the hell!? You’re cheating! You’ve been looking at my cards again!” James, who, like the other Rogues, isn’t wearing his costume but normal clothes, presses his hand protectively against his chest. “You damn cheat!”

“For fuck’s sake, Scudder.” Mick grunts in audible annoyance and glares at the other man opposite to him. “I’ll deck you if you’ve been peeping at my damn cards again.”

“I haven’t.” Sam replies with a shrug and still sounds as bored as before.
“Whose turn is it?” Len, who left the room to grab another beer, retakes his seat next to Barry and frowns when he realizes that the game doesn’t seem to have progressed at all.

“Still Trickster’s,” Marco grumbles and throws the man in question a dirty and annoyed look. “Por amor de Deus, just go on with it already!”

“Fine!” James huffs. “You’re all a bunch of mean and impatient idiots! I fold!”

A collective groan of relief fills the air while the blonde gets up and stomps out the room.

“Por fim,” Marco mutters and turns to Hartley, who gives him a rather impressively dark look that causes him to lift an eyebrow. “What? If he’s too stupid to play, he shouldn’t.”

“Just get on with it and play, Piper.” Mick grouses as he rubs his eyes in exasperation.

Hartley does. He throws another five dollars at the pot, but the scowl doesn’t leave his face.

“Bloody hell, that took forever.” Digger throws another bill at the growing heap of money in the center of the table before leaning back with a heavy sigh. Barry doesn’t miss how he tries to peer into his cards and quickly pulls them out of his sight.

“Don’t bother, mate, your poker face says more than enough.” The Australian smirks and ignores his glare.

“Just fold.” Len mutters next to him, and Barry flushes in embarrassment.

“You suck at this game,” Mick remarks with a chuckle while Len throws another five-dollar note on the pot. Barry refrains from commenting and reminds himself that he at least isn’t going to lose any more of his money this was.

Hopefully Len isn’t too mad about the forty-three dollars he has cost him so far. Barry could still kick himself for agreeing to this and accepting the other man’s offer to lend him money for the game in the first place. It would take him forever to pay him back.

“Maybe he just hasn’t the right motivation,” the blond woman opposite to him remarks, and Barry turns toward her with a sinking feeling. Lisa eyes him with a mixture of disdain and contemptuousness. “Like pictures of little-”

“Shut up, Lisa.” Len interrupts her in a sharp tone and both siblings proceed glaring at each other for a long moment before she gives him one last dirty look and backs down.

A moment of uncomfortable silence follows before the game proceeds again.

“I-I’m g-going t-to g-get s-some f-fresh a-air,” Barry murmurs and gets up before Len can say anything.

Seeing that he doesn’t have the slightest idea where he actually is and which way would lead out of the building, he makes do with just bringing some distance between himself and the others.

Sam picked him up shortly after six this evening and brought him to wherever this place is. That must have been a couple of hours ago by now, and he still has no idea where exactly he is or whether he is even still inside Central City.
From what Barry can tell, it seems to be a rather big and rundown building, maybe an abandoned office building or some kind of former factory. In any case, both the electricity and heating are still working, for which he is very grateful, as the winter has come back with a vengeance over the last couple of days, and being miserable is still better than being miserable and cold.

The corridor is empty and dark, and while he doubts that it was a good idea to leave the others like that due to him being completely unfamiliar with the building, he still welcomes the small break from all the ruckus that comes with being around the Rogues.

Aside from that, Barry is sure that Len would have told him beforehand if it was really dangerous for him to wander around alone. It doesn’t really look all that bad either, from what he can say in the little light there is.

From the look of the room he’d just been in with the others, he quickly picked up that they’re in a basement. He has expected that the Rogues’ hideout would be someplace like this, seeing as the underground is probably the safest place for criminals to hide, as it wouldn’t easily alert anybody around of their presence. Unfortunately, it also means that he would have to go upstairs should he really want to get some fresh air.

Eventually, Barry decides against it and picks one of the rooms that is close to the staircase instead. It is dark and dusty, and doesn’t seem like one that is currently occupied by any of the criminals, which means that his presence here would likely not bother anybody.

There is a smaller window close to the low ceiling, and he opens it to let some fresh air in. He keeps the lights off.

It is snowing again, which isn’t that uncommon for the beginning of March, but makes it rather uncomfortable for people like him whose landlords have already cut the heating or who have to use public transit to get to work.

Still, Barry likes it in moments like this, when he can watch the snow fall and glitter in the shine of a nearby streetlamp. It’s calming.

He looks around for something that could serve as a seat, and decides that one of the old boxes will do after he has examined it for its sturdiness. He wipes the thick layer of dust off with a tissue and sits down on it.

Wherever and whatever this place is, it does have thick and dense walls, as he can’t hear anything from the other men; which suits him just fine. The quietness is a nice change, and he is glad that he is able to take a little breather after having spent a couple of hours in such a crowded room.

Against his initial worries, the evening hasn’t been anything close to catastrophic so far. The other men have accepted his presence without a fuss, even though most of them preferred to stay clear of him and, so far, only Hartley and James really talked to him.

It is understandable, as his stammer has been really bad since his arrival, and the tension he feels is probably coming off him in waves. Still, nothing bad has happened save for the occasional digs from Lisa, who seems to have taken a dislike to him the moment she laid her eyes on him. It’s not hard to understand why, especially with her jabs about his alleged preference for young boys.

It still caught him off-guard at first, as he hasn’t expected to be confronted with this again, and it is unsettling to think that Len’s sister really believes this.

Barry knows that Len doesn’t, but he can’t say for sure whether this is also true for the other Rogues.
It’s disconcerting; he’s always just assumed that they don’t. They’re criminals, sure, but he was sure that even they wouldn’t want someone around who is accused of Hebephilia.

He sighs and tiredly rubs his forehead as the light headache that has been following him around since that morning starts to get worse.

The silence of the room is broken when the door is opened about five minutes later, and Barry freezes up in response.

“Hey.” Hartley greets him in his usually friendly manner, and the fear that has briefly grabbed Barry’s inside eases away again.

He turns towards the ginger and smiles slightly. “H-hey.”

“You’ve found yourself a cozy spot.” Hartley remarks from his spot at the door where he is mostly clad in shadows due to the lack of any actual light source in the room. Barry snorts softly in response to his words but stays quiet otherwise as he isn’t sure what to make of the other man’s presence. He hadn’t expected anybody to come looking for him, and while he wanted to get away from the others for a bit, the notion that Hartley did so is still oddly comforting.

After a brief silence, Barry can hear the other man move over to him. He offers Hartley a tissue to get rid of the dust on one of the boxes stored close-by, which the ginger accepts with a grateful nod.

“Y-you d-didn’t n-need t-t-o c-c-come l-look-king f-for m-me,” he points out quietly after the other man has taken a seat.

“It’s fine, I wanted to take a break form that bunch of morons anyway.” Hartley explains and frowns. “Sam won the last round. That jerk’s been cheating again, everybody knows it. But we can’t prove it, so there’s a little bit too much hostility in the air for my taste right now.”

“Th-there a-are n-no m-mirrors a-around.” Barry points out but is also pretty sure that the other man was somehow cheating quite spectacularly while he was present, which lead to him winning three of the four games they’ve had so far.

Hartley hums in agreement, but remarks that Sam doesn’t need his gadgets to cheat. Barry agrees with a soft hum.

“It’s pretty cold in here.” Hartley points out as he watches the falling snow through the open window.

Barry shoots him a concerned frown. “I w-wanted s-some f-fresh a-air, I-I h-hope i-it’s a-alr-right th-that I-I op-pened th-the w-w-window.”

“Sure.” The other man turns to him with a smile. “We’re in a pretty deserted area out here.”

A gush of wind blows into the room and with it some of the falling snow. The cool air is biting but refreshing, and Barry takes a deep breath.

They sit together quietly for the next few minutes, and he listens to the sound of the storm outside, which seems to be getting stronger. It’s a good thing that he wouldn’t have to use any public transit to get home tonight.

“You want to grab a snack?” Barry turns to Hartley. He knows that the other man means well, and he appreciates his kindness, but neither the notion of being babysat nor of being a bother sits well with him.
“Y-you r-really d-don’t h-have t-to l-look a-after m-me,” he tries to point out again. “Y-you p-probably h-have b-better th-things to do.”

“I don’t,” Hartley disagrees easily. “And I’m hungry, so let’s go to the kitchen.”

The ginger gives him an encouraging smile before he gets up to close the window. “I think we’ve still got some left-over pizza from lunch.”

Barry is about to protest, but the notion of keeping on sitting here all by himself isn’t that alluring all of the sudden. Thus, he agrees and follows the other man out of the room.

Like the rest of the hideout, the makeshift kitchen is also located in the basement. Barry wonders how big this place actually is, and considers that it could belong to one of the abandoned building at the outskirts of Keystone. This would at least mean that he has some kind of inkling of where he currently is.

“Here.” Hartley puts a plate with two slices of Pepperoni pizza in front of him. He heated it up in the microwave beforehand and the smell of it is delicious.

“Th-thanks.” Barry accepts the food gladly.

“You want a beer?” Hartley asks after he has made his way back to the fridge and grabbed one for himself.

“N-no, th-thanks. I’ve h-had en-nough for t-tonight.”

The amused look Barry receives in response makes it obvious that three bottles he had so far are not really an amount that usually classifies as enough in this circle.

“If you don’t like beer, you could have something else.” the younger man offers and adds quickly. “But don’t tell the others, they’re such a pain to keep from my personal stash.”

“I w-won’t,” Barry assures with a chuckle, “b-but n-no th-thanks, I d-don’t r-really l-like alc-cohol th-that m-much.”

Hartley accepts that and closes the fridge again. He takes the seat opposite to his on the small table and starts to eat his meal as well.

These words catch Barry off-guard, and he turns his look to the other man, once again unsure how to respond. He settles on an uncertain smile. “Y-yes, it i-is. It’s b-been a w-w-while.”

“Over half a year.” Hartley agrees. “Not that I’m not glad that you weren’t around during my last trip to the Heights.”

The mention of the prison causes Barry’s appetite to dwindle, and he sets the piece of pizza back on the plate with a reluctant nod.

“Sorry, I didn’t mean to bring that place up. I’m an idiot.” It is obvious that Hartley feels bad about it, which causes Barry to push the feeling of dread away that overcame him at the mentioning of that place.

“I-it’s o-ok-kay, I-I’m f-fine.”

The doubtful look the other man gives him then, makes it clear that he doesn’t believe him, but Hartley is nice enough to let it rest. He probably doesn’t really want to talk about the prison either.

“So, how’ve you liked your first poker night with us so far?” The ginger sounds cheerful again, and while it is a bit forced, it is still a nice effort that sets Barry a bit more at ease again.

“I-it w-was inter-resting,” he answers slowly, thinking back to the last hours and how it has been both fun and frightening at the same time. Being amid the Rogues had been quite intimidating at first. It didn’t exactly help that they’re very boisterous individuals, but it has still been a surprisingly not-awful experience so far. It has not even come close to what he initially feared that it would be like.

“A very diplomatic answer.” Hartley remarks with an amused smile and doesn’t seem the least bit offended.

“I l-liked it, excep-pt f-for a-all th-the y-yelling a-and c-c-cursing.”

“Well, that comes with the package.”

Barry chuckles and is about to get up to grab himself a glass of water when a familiar and very sullen sounding voice comes from the open door.

“Did they kick you out as well?”

“They didn’t kick you out, James,” Hartley reminds the other Rogue, who is still hovering at the doorway. It earns him a very dark glare.

“They made me quit!”

“You quit on your own.”

“They harassed me till I did.” the blonde insists and crosses his arms in front of his chest in a very stubborn manner. “I just needed another second.”

Hartley sighs but doesn’t seem in the mood for an argument, as he instead points out that there is still some pizza left if he wants some. This seems the right thing to say as it immediately lifts James’ mood.

“So, why are you two not playing with those morons anymore? Too much of… them?” The morose way in which the younger man is saying this causes Barry to laugh, and he notices how Hartley rolls his eyes over it, but still seems amused as well.

“In the kitchen?” James asks incredulously as he waits for the microwave to finish heating his food up. He briefly looks around with a frown as if he was missing something before he focuses back on him with squinted eyes. “Did Lisa say something mean again?”

Taken aback by this question, Barry stays quiet and stares at the other man in surprise. It seems that this is enough of an answer for James, as he scowls slightly and leans back against the counter.

“Don’t mind her, she’s just pissy because Len and Roscoe had a huge fight the other day, and, as she is twirly-boy’s girlfriend, she takes this shit pretty personally.” The other blonde explains, which causes Hartley to gives him an annoyed look.

He is obviously not happy about James bringing this up. Still, he agrees after a moment. “Lisa usually isn’t like that. She’s just angry at her brother, so don’t take what she says personal.”
“Sh-she th-thinks I-I…” Barry stops himself and hates how ashamed he feels over something he hasn’t done.

“She probably doesn’t.” Hartley disagrees. “She knows that Len likes you, and you have the bad luck that she seems to have chosen you to get back at him.”

“Yeah,” James agrees and shrugs. “They’ve a pretty complicated sibling-relationship at times.”

They move their conversation to another topic afterwards, for which Barry is quite grateful as he isn’t really comfortable talking about any of this.

Like during his time in the Heights, it is easy for him to be around both of the younger men, and the three of them end up playing Crazy Eights, which is a game James is surprisingly good at.

“You really don’t have it with card games, do you?” Hartley asks after their third game, which Barry lost once again.

“Yeah, you suck.” James agrees and gasps when the criminal next to him digs his elbow in his ribs in return.

“I-I’m u-usually n-not m-much of a p-player,” Barry explains with a shrug and starts to shuffle the cards again. It is already late, after eleven, and he should probably go and get Sam to bring him back to his flat before the man gets too drunk to do so. He enjoys the company and not being alone at home for once, though, and the notion to end this already isn’t really all that appealing.

Out of the corner of his eyes, Barry can see someone appear at the entrance of the kitchen as he starts to deal out the cards for their fourth round. He turns toward them and is a bit surprised to see Len standing there, watching him.

“You decide to play a game you’re actually any good at?” the other man asks with a slight smirk as he makes his way over to them.

“Nah, he sucks at this too.” James throws Hartley a dark look when he gets another elbow in his ribs for this comments and mutters that he is just saying the truth.

“Mind if I join in?” Len has stopped next to Barry and nods at the empty chair. He seems more relaxed than before, calmer, and Barry wonders whether this is due to him being a bit buzzed. In any case, it is nice, having these unusually warm hazelnut brown eyes on him, and he smiles and is about to agree when the other blond cuts him off.

“You sure? You hate Crazy Eights.” James reminds Len with an arched eyebrow. “You lose at it, like, all the time.”

The annoyed glare Len shoots the other Rogue in return causes James to duck his head and shut up.

“Join away. The more the merrier or so they say.” Hartley gives his older colleague a slightly amused grin that Len answers with an irritated frown before he sits down.

Barry, who has watched the brief exchanges quietly, isn’t sure what to make of it. He is too tired and relaxed to really worry about this right now, though, so he goes on with dealing out the cards for the next round instead.

The game runs smoothly and while Len doesn’t talk much, it isn’t uncomfortable to have him close-by. Besides, both Hartley and James don’t pay the new addition to the group too much mind and keep Barry involved in their conversations.
It is close to two in the morning when Barry decides that he really has to call it a night and return home. He feels exhausted but unusually loose and happy for the first time in a very long while.

His good mood dims a bit, though, when he notices that Sam is no longer around when they get back to the others.

Neither are Lisa or Roscoe, which is a bit of a relief for Barry, and he picks up on how relaxed the mood is between Mick, Marco, and Digger, who also seem pleasantly buzzed and are currently playing another game of poker.

Much to his worry and Len’s annoyance, it turns out that Sam has left about an hour ago.

“Lisa wanted him to take her and Roscoe to the Saloon, and he probably got stuck there.” Marco explains as he studies his cards and adds with a misgiving grimace. “The bastardo has enough money to buy the fucking bar now, anyway.”

“Fucking great.” Len grunts before he turns to Barry and considers him for a second. “Can’t get you back the way you came, it seems.”

“That’s Scudder for you.” Hartley huffs in annoyance. He joined them on their way back to the living room while James went upstairs.

“Don’t get your panties in a bunch, mate.” Digger takes a pull on his bottle and shrugs. “It’s not even snowing anymore.”

“Yeah, because you would want to go outside in this weather.” Mick scoffs with a smirk, which gets him flipped the bird from the Australian.

“You can stay here tonight if you want, we’ve more than enough room.” Barry, who has just half listened to the other men so far, turns to Len with an alarmed and clearly unhappy expression.

“Right,” Len remarks drily, obviously not missing how little Barry thinks of this idea, before he sighs in annoyance. “That means we will be taking the bus.”

“The next bus stop is nearly twenty minutes away.” Hartley doesn’t seem to like this idea, and gives Barry a concerned once over. “You didn’t even come with a coat, did you?”

“You’re such a fucking clucking hen, mate.” Digger snorts and returns the redheads irritated scowl with a grin that is all teeth.

“That would be Piper for you,” Marco mocks before he gets up and announces that he’s going to take a piss, obviously not all that concerned by Barry’s little predicament.

“You don’t know how to get to your flat from here, do you?” Len meets his glance and isn’t surprised when Barry answers that he doesn’t. “Alright, I’ll grab you something to put on and take you there.”

“Y-you d-don’t h-h-have t-to,” Barry protest feebly, but the other man doesn’t even bother to reply.

This is just perfect, Barry thinks bitterly, and while he doesn’t like any of this, he also knows that it would be a very stupid idea to try and get back to his apartment complex on his own; especially in a weather like this. He still doesn’t even really have any idea where he is right now, just that it is probably somewhere on the outskirts of one of the gems.

“You could stay here, it really wouldn’t be a problem,” Hartley points out once more but doesn’t persist when he picks up on how uncomfortable the notion alone seems to make him.

Ten minutes later, Barry follows Len through a dark factory towards one of the side-streets which would lead them to a bus stop where a nightline is still passing by at this late of an hour and could take them back into Keystone City.

They walk in silence, which doesn’t really bother Barry as he doesn’t fell up to having a chat right now anyway. It is cold and the snow is high enough that it is bothersome to move forward. The black parka that he got from the other man is keeping the biting cold away at least, but it still can’t keep him from silently cursing Sam for simply taking off like that.

It takes them about thirty minutes to get to the bus stop, which is mostly due to Barry himself as he has growing difficulties to go on in the cold weather with how the pain in his joints is getting worse with every step he takes. They are in a more inhabited area again, and it eases the knot in his stomach a bit to have street lights around that make it possible to actually see where they are going.

They are still at the out-skirts of the city’ borders, though, and it is unusually calm, even for half past three in the morning. The bus picks them up just about ten minutes after their arrival at the stop, and Barry doesn’t doubt that the streets would start to fill up with cars, even this early, as soon as they come closer to the city center.

On their way to his flat, it is necessary for them to change the bus two times, and, as if they’ve been jinxed, they have to wait for each one at least fifteen minutes, so that it is already half past five when they finally arrive in front of his apartment building.

It starts snowing again, which doesn’t bother Barry very much now that he is nearly at home, but he doesn’t like the notion that Len would have to make it all the way back to the hideout with worsening weather conditions and a slowly awaking city around him. He may not wear his infamous light blue parka, but it still would be an unnecessary risk for him.

“Y-you w-want t-to st-stay t-till S-Sam c-can p-pick y-you up?” Barry asks a bit hesitantly after they’ve finally reached the steps that lead up to the entrance of the building. “Y-you c-can s-sleep o-on th-the c-couch.”

Len seems surprised about this offer but agrees readily enough. “Sure, as long as I get out of this shitty weather.”

“Y-you d-don’t l-like s-snow?”

The thought that the other man, who actually calls himself Captain Cold, wouldn’t like winter is both odd and funny, and the dark sullen look he receives in return makes it somehow even more so. Maybe it is because he is exhausted and tired, but he can’t stop himself from laughing.

“R-really? B-but th-the p-parka-”

“Shut up and just open the damn door.”

Barry does so, grinning slightly.

His flat is dark and cold without the heater working as they enter, and Barry goes and takes a quick shower after getting the spare bedding for Len from his bedroom. His skin is bright and prickles in a familiar sensation when he leaves the bathroom again. As usual, scrubbing himself down has helped him to feels much more relaxed. While the presence of the Rogues hasn’t exactly been bad, it had still been difficult to have that many men around him that close.
When he reenters the living room, Len is already resting on the couch. For a second, Barry thinks that he might have fallen asleep, but then he watches how the other man opens his eyes and looks over to him.

“You’re heading to bed?”

“Y-yeah.” Barry nods and licks his lips, suddenly nervous. Len keeps his gaze on him, seemingly feeling that he wants to say more.

“Th-thanks,” he starts but stops briefly to clear his throat before he goes on with a slight flush. “It w-was a-a r-really n-nice n-night, I-I… I ap-p-preciate i-it… v-v-very m-much.”

Not waiting to give his guest the option to answer, he swiftly turns around and hurries to his bedroom, closing the door firmly behind him.

“S-stupid,” he mutters to himself as he groggily lays down and buried his face into his pillow.

Despite his agitated state of mind, it doesn’t take him all that long to drift off.

Update: The chapter is now edited by the amazing MeteoraWrites! (14th of February, 2019)

“That smells amazing.”

Barry looks up from the paper he is currently reading and turns to Mary, who has crouched down in front of the oven to take a look of the baking lasagna.

He smiles. “Th-thanks, I h-hope y-you’ll l-like it.”

They are cooking dinner in Mary’s apartment, which has an actual small kitchen instead of just a kitchenette.

The young woman with the short curly black hairs gets up and assures him that she has no doubt.

“It doesn’t just smell amazing,” she says with a wink as she makes her way over to the table he is currently sitting at. “It looks delicious too.”

He doesn’t mind when she sits down next to him. Women usually don’t hold the same source of discomfort for him as men do, and Mary’s calm and friendly nature makes it especially easy to stay relaxed in her presence.

“Oh, is there anything interesting to read about?” She nods toward the paper in front of him and peeks at it curiously.

“Not really, b-but I c-can l-leave it h-here and y-you c-can r-read it l-later.”

“No, that’s alright,” Mary declines, and Barry picks up on the odd look she gives the paper and how she frowns slightly for a moment before she turns her attention back to him. “Do you mind if I put on some music?”

He doesn’t.
The lasagna turns out rather nicely, and Barry can’t help but feel a bit proud when the young woman keeps complimenting him on how it turned out.

“You should definitely be a cook, not a salesclerk,” Mary remarks with a smile as she takes her second helping. “You’re wasting your talent there.”

“I-if you l-like it s-so much y-you c-can k-keep the l-leftovers,” Barry offers, but he secretly hopes that she will be alright with sharing them, even though she bought most of the ingredients.

“Don’t be silly, we’ll share. We both prepared it, after all,” Mary points out with an amused glint in her eyes. “Well, you more so than I, but I helped, and it was our teamwork that made this amazing lasagna possible in the first place.”

Barry chuckles and agrees. “R-Right.”

The notion that he would have some of it left for tomorrow’s dinner is comforting and helps him to relax while Mary starts to tell him some more about a movie she saw the other day. Its genre was science fiction, which is Barry’s personal favorite, next to crime thrillers that is, and he listens attentively while she tells him about how the crew in the film explored a planet they had gotten stuck on due to a line of accidents.

Mary is obviously also quite fond of such adventurous stories, and when Barry asks her about it, she tells him that she loves movies in general, especially older ones like The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, Metropolis, and Citizen Kane.

Barry has never really been a movie person, he likes them well enough that it never bothered him when he went to them with others, but he generally prefers books and always has. Still, it’s nice listening to her tell him about the different stories, and it turns out that she’s quite a talented narrator. She gets him to chuckle more than once, and her calm and soft voice is surprisingly relaxing.

The last couple of times they met up they mostly talked about their hobbies and other interests, not really going into detail about either of their lives. Mary obviously doesn’t really want to touch upon anything too private, and he can completely respect that, seeing as he feels similarly.

He told her that he is working as a salesclerk in a small grocery store in passing shortly after meeting her. Though Mary seems oddly secretive about her own occupation, not that it really matters anyway.

“Oh my god, I’m so stuffed! I won’t be able to fit into my jeans tomorrow,” she laughs after finishing her third helping and rubs her slightly bulged out belly as if to prove her point. She has a surprisingly big appetite for such a small person, and it’s nice to have his cooking appreciated.

After finishing dinner and taking care of the dishes, they move on to her couch, which is a bit smaller than Barry’s own, and covered by a thick dark purple blanket that is cozy enough that he starts to feel a bit drowsy after just a couple of minutes.

“It’s from a friend of mine,” she explains after he has commented on how nice it feels. He doesn’t miss the tentative smile on her lips as she goes on. “He got it for me as a farewell gift when I left home.”

“Y-you aren’t f-from ar-round here?”

Mary gives him an honestly surprised look before she laughs and shakes her head. Barry can’t help but feel a bit embarrassed, but when the young woman picks up on his uncomfortable expression she quickly apologizes and explains that it’s just always odd to her when people ask her that. “I’m from a very small village in Romania.”

“R-really? Y-you d-don’t have an ac-cent.” Barry tries to think if he’s ever picked up on anything that would indicate that she isn’t a native English speaker by the way she talks, but he’s pretty sure she’s never sounded like someone who hadn’t been born and raised here.

“Yes, I get that a lot.” She nods and picks her glass of coke up to take a sip before she goes on. “I’m probably just good with languages.”

“Y-you l-learned it in s-school?” He asks, but again she laughs as if he has said something funny. The slight annoyance he feels in return quickly vanishes after what she says next.

“I never went to school. You see, I have eight siblings, and both of my parents are simple farmers with hardly any land to work on. We never had the money for it, not even for Alin. He’s my oldest brother and the brightest person I’ve ever met.”

Somehow this puts quite a damper to his good mood, and while Barry may not be up to date on what’s going on in the world at large, he is still aware of the fact that Romania is one of the poorest countries in Europe. Mary most likely hasn’t had an easy life.

“Don’t make such a long face,” Mary tells him with a warm smile. “I may not have been able to get the same education as people in this country, but I’m still very happy and thankful for the life I have now. I have a roof over my head, money to buy food, and even a bit extra to send to my family. I’m a very blessed person.”

Barry nods quietly, both impressed and somewhat humbled by the young woman. It has to be hard to live so far away from home, even if she is able to make a better living for herself here. “D-do you h-have any r-relat-tives here?”

“I had one, my uncle, but he died a year ago.”

“I-I’m s-s-sorry.”

“It’s okay, I’m alright now,” she assures him and again asks him to not look so sad. “You know, I may have been quite alone at first after I came here, but I’m not anymore. I’ve made friends, and I’m happy with my life as it is now.”

Mary gets up and tells him that hot chocolate is the best way to lift one’s mood. She also insists that Barry is definitely in need of some himself. He tries to refuse because he really doesn’t want to exploit her generosity, and also because he’s feeling quite full already. She doesn’t listen.

“I make an excellent cup of hot chocolate if I may say so myself,” Mary assures him with an amused twinkle in her eyes while he watches her from his spot on the couch. “It can cure the sick and make the sad happy again.”

Barry snorts softly at hearing this, but decides against pointing out that this is quite the farfetched claim. After all, the uneasy heaviness that usually follows him around and wears him down has already eased away a bit by just being here.

It doesn’t take long until the whole flat is filled with the warm and calming smell of freshly prepared hot chocolate, and while he still feels stuffed, he does accept the mug she offers him a couple of minutes later. The warmth alone is worth it, and he cradles it close to his chest.

“The secret is real chocolate, not that powdered nonsense they sell you in every supermarket,” Mary tells him after she has taken up the spot next to him once more and sips on the hot beverage. “And real milk, no water or the watered-down fat free stuff. My nana made us hot chocolate every year for All Soul’s Day and Christmas, and it was the best. You won’t catch me dead with that bagged stuff you just pour hot water over.”

A rather dark frown appears on her face, and she mutters something in a language he can’t understand; which is most likely Romanian. Her clear indignation over something like instant hot chocolate is quite endearing, and Barry lets his hands drop to his lap and his head fall back so that it rests against the backrest of the couch. He feels drowsy and calm, and he listens to Mary quietly as she tells him a bit about her family after he has asked her about them.

Barry briefly thinks that it’s a pity that the serene and nice moments like this one can never last, but brushes that notion off and instead concentrates on enjoying it.

Barry 40th birthday is on a cool and cloudy Sunday. He spends the majority of it in bed, sleeping the day away as he has felt a bit under the weather since the beginning of the week.

Mrs. Ming invited him to stay over for dinner yesterday after work, and she was kind enough to give him the leftovers of the very delicious longevity noodles she had prepared for him. He eats them for lunch after leaving his bed around two pm, and spends a bit of time sketching on his couch after that.

Nobody passes by, which doesn’t come as a surprise, as Len and the others are planning something and he hasn’t seen much of him since the end of last week. He’s rather glad for the peace and quiet, as it probably would just mean bad news for him should anybody else turn up at his door.

Around half past six, a knock cuts through the silence in his flat, but his initial apprehension quickly vanishes when it turns out to be Mary, who brings him some cake as well as a thermos full of hot tea.

They end up playing some Rummy and talking for the next couple of hours. Barry falls asleep sometime around ten, and Mary puts a blanket over him before letting herself out.

The chiming caused by the entrance door being opened catches Barry’s attention. He looks up from the list of things he has to re-order, which he is currently going over yet again, a bit curious to see who would pass by now. It’s nearly nine pm, and it’s been quiet for the last two hours; with only one customer passing by for some after work grocery shopping in that time.

Mrs. Ming went upstairs about an hour ago, and she leaves it to Barry to close the shop; which he usually does on his own these days. He doesn’t mind helping her in this way, but it causes him to feel a bit uneasy at times when there’s nobody else around in the evening, seeing as the store still lies within the Keys.

Thus, Barry can’t help but tense up a bit as he looks to his latest and probably last customer of the night. His eyes widen slightly when he recognizes the person who is briefly glancing through the store before his attention sets on Barry as well.

A familiar half smile appears on Len’s face, and he is obviously amused by how caught off-guard Barry seems by his appearance.

“Nice store,” Len says in lieu of a proper greeting as he makes his way over to the counter from behind which Barry is still staring at him in a mixture of disbelief and worry.
“Wh-what a-are y-you d-doing here?” he asks, and he can’t help but throw a nervous glance over his friend’s shoulder to the glass door he had entered from; even though the police aren’t exactly common visitors to these parts of the twins he worries they could pass by at any moment.

“Y-you p-pulled a j-job j-just t-two d-days ago,” Barry reminds him with a frown, and he can’t help the slight anger that wells up in his chest at that knowledge. He pushes it away, though. It would be stupid to get angry over such a thing, he has known all along who the other man and the Rogues are, after all. This additional guilt is just something else he will have to deal with if he wants to stay in contact with them.

“Stop worrying your damn head off,” Len’s utter lack of concern about being here, in a public place, in plain sight, is both infuriating and slightly reassuring. He may be a lot of things, but Len is definitely not stupid, and, as his history shows, he generally is pretty good at evading being caught.

“The sign says you close at nine,” Len points out and nods toward the entrance door. “which means you’re already working overtime.”

Surprised, Barry turns to the clock on the wall behind him and realizes that it is indeed already shortly after nine.

Len waits while he locks the door and proceeds with the rest of the closing tasks. They don’t really talk much, and the other man busies himself reading one of the days papers at the counter while Barry swiftly sweeps the floor. The weather is still rather cold, and the rain hasn’t stopped for the majority of the week, so that it was inevitable that customers would drag dirt and mud off the streets inside to make a mess for him to clean up every night.

It doesn’t take long for Barry to finish, though, and about fifteen minutes later he leads Len out through the backdoor, behind which lies a small narrow back street where the trash containers are kept.

“Fucking weather,” his friend grumbles when they step out into the rain that seems to have picked up once again. By now, Barry has realized that Len doesn’t like bad weather in general, not rain and definitely not snow, which is still a bid of an odd realization, considering what the other man picked as his criminal alter ego.

With a soft click, the umbrella Barry had brought to work with him opens, and he steps a bit closer to Len so that it can cover both of them as he lifts it over their heads.

“I-it’s b-been l-like th-this s-since T-Tuesday,” Barry reminds him somewhat amused. “You c-could h-have b-brought one of th-these w-with you.”

“They’re inconvenient as hell.” Len replies with a shrug which causes Barry to lift an eyebrow in slight incredulity.

“Th-they k-keep you d-dry,” he points out.

Len wrinkles his nose in annoyance before he snorts. “Usually my parka does the job just fine-”

The sound of a car reaches them before its lights briefly illuminate the otherwise very dark back alley as it passes by. They’re back in the shadows just a second later, but Barry can’t help himself and tenses up even though the sound of the car is already growing faint in the distance.
Suddenly, the notion of being seen with a wanted criminal so close to his workplace causes him to feel extremely uneasy. So far, nobody from his former life has tried to contact him, and there are no signs that anybody is keeping tabs on him, but he isn’t stupid. He is a liability to his former colleagues as long as he lives, and he knows that. If one of them were to spot him with someone like one of the Rogues, it would give them the wrong idea and cause him a lot of problems he really doesn’t need.

The other man, who has been watching the street with a slightly grim look, turns back to him. His frown is the only sign that he has picked up on the strained quality of Barry’s voice.

For a long moment, he doesn’t replay, and Barry grows more and more nervous while the patter of the rain hitting his umbrella and the other sounds of the world around them grow uncomfortably louder.

“I was in the area, and you’d told me a while ago that you’re working here.” Len shrugs and both fall briefly silent again.

“Y-you kn-know th-that it c-could m-mean a l-lot o-of t-trouble if th-the w-wrong p-people s-spot us,” Barry says quietly, and he hates how this has become his life. “F-for b-both of us.”

“Yeah, I know.” Len’s expression has turned grim, and Barry isn’t sure whether he’s angry at him for bringing this up, or at himself for coming here in the first place.

“The capes are all busy with something that’s going on in San Francisco, including the speedsters.”

“Wh-what?” Barry feels a familiar concern for his nephew and his former friends settle in the pit of his stomach. “Wh-what’s h-happened? Wh-what’s g-going o-on?”

“Your guess is as good as mine,” Len says and looks quite grim all of the sudden. “It’s been all over the news for the last three hours, but they know about as much of what is going on as the rest of us do.”

There is no television in Mrs. Ming’s store, and Barry turned the radio off shortly after noon as there hadn’t been anything but static to listen to due to the bad reception from the storm.

“I’m really starting to get sick of standing out here.” Len meets his worried gaze with a somewhat irritated one. “You wanna lay down roots while worrying about the guys who don’t give a damn about you? Be my guest, but I’m going to look for someplace dry.”

The urge to hit the other man with his umbrella is suddenly nearly overwhelmingly strong, and Barry feels a mixture of anger and shame overcome him, which in turn causes his throat to close up before he is able to respond. Frustrated and hurt, he shoves the umbrella toward Len, who is still glaring at him, and turns around to leave the alley.

If that bastard is so damn troubled by the weather, he can make much better use of it than Barry can.

The rain is cold and grows even colder now that it hits him freely, but he stubbornly ignores it along with the annoying itching of his eyes and the slightly sickening way his stomach has started to cramp up again.

Right now he really hates Len a bit for being such an asshole, and he hates himself even more for letting him into his life to begin with. The other man can go jump in a lake for all he cares!
As if to make this whole situation even worse, a bright flash crosses the sky before the nearly deafening sound of cracking thunder rolls over the city.

…this is just plain perfect.

A hand grabs Barry’s left upper arm the next second and brings him to a sudden halt. This causes an all too familiar panic to rise in him and he cries out in a mixture of surprise and fear before he can stop himself.

Barry knows that he isn’t in any danger, that the person who has grabbed him is Len, but he can’t help it as the sudden contact is still so very unsettling. He tries to break away, and it comes as an extreme relief when he is let go.

Quickly, Barry brings some additional space between himself and Len, while his heart is still racing in his chest like crazy and his skin suddenly itching for a shower.

There’s another flash of lightning followed by another rumble of thunder, but he hardly notices either as he watches Len warily. A familiar unrest has settled into his limbs, and he shifts his weight nervously from one foot to the other.

Len’s face is calm, and gives nothing away as usual as he studies him silently, which causes the unease in Barry to only grow worse.

“Look, let’s just get out of this damn rain, okay?” This request catches Barry off-guard, and he isn’t sure how to reply for a long moment. Len doesn’t urge him on, but waits as he tries to make his mind up in the increasing downpour.

Barry starts to gnaw on his lower lip, unsure whether it would be a good idea for him to have anybody else around right now. He still feels shaken and upset, and he doesn’t want to make a complete fool of himself by accident once again.

He doesn’t want to be alone, either, though...

“Ok-kay.” His voice sounds hoarse, and Barry feels a heavy resignation settle into the pit of his stomach when he realizes once more that he wants to have Len around, despite everything.

He is such an idiot.

Len nods and slowly steps closer to him again, as if trying not to frighten him away.

Barry mutters his thanks when the umbrella is lifted above their heads, and he quietly follows the other man as he leads him to the bus stop through the heavy rain.

Early April, 1st year

The night air feels pleasantly cool on Barry’s face, and it no longer holds the uncomfortable bite of the past months as he makes his way to his apartment building from where he has just exited his bus.

It’s a bit later than he usually arrives home, as Mrs. Ming invited him to stay for some tea and honey cake after work; which he had gladly accepted. Spending time with the older woman is always a very nice experience, and he wasn’t in a hurry anyway as it’s Saturday and Len would likely not bother to pass by tonight or in the next couple of days.

The Rogues are currently panning another heist, and he never sees or hears much from Len during those times. As usual, it’s also left Barry in a bit of sour mood, but he tries not to think about it, and instead concentrate on the fact that this also means that he could sleep in tomorrow.

At least, that’s what he is hoping, anyway.

His nightmares have been a real pain for the last couple of nights, and he usually isn’t able to go back to sleep after he’s woken up from one – not that he really wants to sleep after them anyway.

It would be nice to be able to catch a full night of sleep for once, even though experience has taught him that such a phase usually lasts for at most a week.

Still, he could stay in bed all of Sunday, and he hopes that this is enough to take care of this stupid, nagging bug that has been following him around for a few weeks now. Getting sick is just about the last thing he wants to do.

Barry’s steps slow down a bit when he notices a couple of boys in their late teens standing close to the entrance of his building. A flash of anger and frustration goes through him as he knows exactly what this means by now.

There would be another one of those damn parties tonight. He clenches his jaw in pure annoyance for a moment before he forces himself to relax again. Getting frustrated over this won’t help him, and he really is too exhausted to waste any of his energy on it.
His gaze moves up to the window above his own and he watches with a frown how people move around inside. It’s just his luck that he would get the apartment below such a complete and utter jerk who doesn’t give a damn about the other residents that live in the building. Barry knows that he can’t be the only one who’s bothered by him throwing parties that last until early morning just about every other week, but nobody that lives here wants to get the police involved; and that also includes him.

It’s frustrating, but they’re all worried about getting in trouble; either with the cops or with the man himself, who is well-known to be prone to violence. It would only lead to more problems than a possible full night of sleep is worth.

A small voice in the back of his mind reminds him that this is not how he is supposed to deal with these sorts of people. That looking away is never a solution, and that these kinds of situations will not simply go away on their own. People like this man thrive on the fear and inaction of others-

Barry shakes his head slightly, as if this would help him to shut the uneasy voice in his mind up. A familiar guilt attaches itself to him, and he tries to will it away as well, but with little success. Once, he would have done something about this, he would have stood up, but those days are long gone. He just can’t, not with where his life is right now, and isn’t that a daunting realization?

It’s similar to how it was after he had gone off to college, after he had left his last foster family behind him. The fear of others and of possible confrontation is just like it was back then. He is a coward, he knows that, and it fills him with shame, but it still isn’t enough to make him try and do the right thing.

These days, it’s very similar to back then, when he was young. Keeping his head low can spare him a lot of pain and trouble, just trying to make himself so small that the world itself would overlook him…

The group of young men notice him, and watch curiously as he makes his way past them. Barry keeps his gaze straight ahead of himself and tries to ignore them. They let him pass by without causing any trouble. They usually don’t bother him, other than calling him names and making fun of him, typical behavior for teenagers who just want to impress their friends.

In a way it’s funny how things never really change, and how similar one generation is to the next in this aspect.

When he opens the entrance to the old building that leads directly into the staircase, Barry is immediately able to pick up on the low bass of the music from a couple of floors above him.

There’s no doubt in his mind that this will be another sleepless night as he pauses at the foot of the stairs and looks up with an unhappy frown.

He doesn’t want to go up to his floor anymore. The thought of how he would lay awake for the next eight hours, being forced to listening to that damn music as well as the people talking and moving around above him, makes his whole body feel even heavier.

The laughter of the teens out front of the building sounds through the closed door behind him – they’re probably here for the party as well. Not wanting to run into them again, Barry slowly starts to make his way upstairs. The ache in his knees and hips suddenly feels much more distinctive than it did just a minute ago.

It’s about four hours later when he finally accepts that there is no way in hell that he will even get a minute of sleep with the ruckus that is going on upstairs. The dull buzz of the partying crowd as well as the ongoing music reach him even through the earplugs he usually uses when his neighbors are Tiredly, he decides to get up and make himself some tea. His head has started to hurt rather badly, as has his throat, and he hopes that something warm to drink will help with both.

While his cup of tea is steeping, he opens the window over his sink and climbs out onto the fire escape that lays in front of his apartment. The hope that a bit of fresh air could possibly help him with his headache is quickly gone when he notices that the noise is even worse out here. His upstairs neighbor seems to have decided that opening the windows is a splendid idea as well, and he can hear people talk and laugh just as clearly as if they were right next to them. Barry lets out a tired and exasperated groan and leans heavily on the cool metal railing of the platform he is standing on.

The streets below him are mostly empty other than a couple of teenagers at the corner of the building. Most of the other buildings lay dark, with the exception of the occasional lit window, and he has no idea how anybody in the area is able to get any sleep at all with the noise that is coming from the apartment above his own. He can’t help but envy them for it.

Barry freezes for a second before he slowly looks over to his left, where a man is sitting on the fire escape next to his own with his legs dangling over the edge. He’s hard to make out in the dim light, as the street lamp closest to them burned out a while ago and nobody has bothered to fix it yet.

“I didn’t mean to scare you,” adds the stranger – apparently his neighbor – and sounds both slightly concerned and amused after Barry has failed to reply or moved at all for a very long moment.

“N-no, y-you d-didn’t, y-you j-just s-sup-prised m-me,” Barry tries to explain because he has to appear rather rude right now. His stammer is getting worse again, and he isn’t sure whether it’s due to how tired he is, or because of being surprised. Whatever the reason, it fills him with a familiar unease and embarrassment.

There is no doubt in his mind that he sounds ridiculous, and in a way, he is now glad that he hadn’t turned his kitchen lights on. This way, the other man wouldn’t see how very uncomfortable he is, at least.

The stranger doesn’t reply for a while and Barry knows that he is being studied. The poor fellow probably isn’t sure how to talk to him. It’s frustrating how off-putting his stammer is to most people, it’s a bit like he’s running around with a disease nobody wants to catch.

A familiar feeling of bitterness starts to settle in his stomach and he is just about to apologize and go back into his flat when the other man speaks again.

“You’re a very quiet neighbor, I should really thank you for that,” he says, and he sounds both amused and honest as he does so. “Seeing as I could have gotten a jackass like that guy instead.” He nods toward the source of the noise above them before he pushes himself back a bit and gets up.

Unconsciously, Barry takes a step back toward his window, but he stops before he can make himself look any weirder than he already does. The stranger briefly pauses, and Barry is pretty sure that he has picked up on the movement.

For a moment neither of them moves and the buzzing of the party just a few feet above them fills the night air around them like an uncomfortably thick blanket. Then, the other man, who seems to be just a bit taller and in much better physical shape than Barry, walks over to the side of the railing that is adjacent to his own.
“My name’s Edward,” he introduces himself and offers his hand over the gap between their respective fire escapes.

Barry hesitates briefly before he pushes himself to move so that he can accept the stranger’s, Edward’s, hand. The feeling of another person touching him, especially a man he doesn’t know, is so unsettling that he nearly immediately pulls his hand back.

“B-Barry,” he utters and is glad when Edward lets his hand go just a second later. “N-nice t-to m-m-meet you.”

“Likewise.” His neighbor nods, and even with so little light Barry can make out that he is smiling. “You’re the first neighbor I’ve actually talked to since I moved here three months ago. Usually people just glare at me suspiciously when I so much as look at them.”

That is not something Barry has any troubles believing. He had quickly learned that the people here aren’t very welcoming towards others, and that they mostly prefer to stick to themselves. Seeing how high the criminal rate of this place is, it’s understandable, and in his case it isn’t as if his stammering is making it any more appealing to others to try and have a conversation with him.

Barry guesses that he’s lucky that he has met Mary, who is an unusual friendly and outgoing person. His neighbor obviously hasn’t been fortunate enough to get to know anybody like that around here so far.

“D-don’t w-worry, n-not a-all o-of u-us are l-like th-that.”

“Yeah, I can see that,” agrees the other man, and Barry realizes that he doesn’t feel that apprehensive toward him anymore, which is quite surprising as it usually takes him much longer to get used to people like that, especially other men.

“I think I’ll go back inside and try to catch some sleep, despite those jackasses up there.”

“Y-yeah, th-that’s p-probably a g-good i-idea,” agrees Barry, who then watches how the other man vanishes back in his flat after wishing him a goodnight.

Despite his exhaustion and still ongoing headache, Barry doesn’t miss that this brief and unexpected meeting has lifted his mood a little bit, and he decides to go back inside as well after that.

A low curse slips over his lips when he realizes that his tea is still steeping.

Barry has started to spend more of his free time with Len, and consequently, the other Rogues over the past weeks.

He still feels like he’s sticking out like a sore thumb, but they’re welcoming enough, even though, other than Hartley and James, most of them prefer not to interact with him on their own if they can help it. Barry knows not to take it personal.

It’s always been like that between them, ever since they picked up on what had been done to him back in prison.

The rape of another man is a very uncomfortable topic for most guys, and the Rogues are certainly no exception. Barry even gets the impression sometimes that they feel more uneasy about being left in a room alone with him than he is about being alone with them, which is a bit funny in a sad way.
He doesn’t hold it against them, though. In all honestly, he’s even somewhat glad that most of them keep their distance whenever Len isn’t around.

Barry has just returned behind the counter after finishing his lunch break when Izzy, the prostitute he met at Len’s place months ago, turns up at the Mrs. Ming’s small store. He immediately gets a bad feeling and a familiar dread settles in his stomach.

The woman is wearing rather short and revealing clothes for the weather, but she doesn’t look sleazy, which is mostly due to her wearing hardly any make-up at all, giving her a more natural look overall.

Once again it hits him how pretty she is, especially now, without any dark eye shadow or bright lipstick on. It causes her to look quite a bit younger, and while she isn’t the type he would call beautiful, she is still very good looking. Barry doesn’t want to, but he can’t help but consider that Len is probably thinking the same thing when he is looking at her, which is a thought that fills him with a surprisingly intense unease.

Their gazes meet and she eyes him briefly before a slight sneer appears on her face that is quickly replaced by a smirk. It’s uncomfortable enough that he’s relieved when she finally turns away and starts to look through the store instead. A small part of him hopes that she won’t find anything and will just leave again, but he knows his rotten luck and how unlikely that possibility is.

A couple of other customers are around, and he doesn’t have the time to keep an eye on her. Thus, when he’s finally able to turn his attention back to her, he feels his stomach drop when he spots her as she is making her way over to him with a bottle of cheap red wine and two bags of potato chips.

She puts the items on the counter and gives him an unpleasant smile.

“Well, well, well, look who we have here,” she says in a low and somewhat sultry voice that causes Barry to tense up with growing discomfort. “Lenny’s little pity project.”

A familiar heat rises to Barry’s face, and he glares at her for a second before wordlessly turning his attention towards the things she’s intending to buy. He starts to feed their prices into the register.

“It really is a small world,” she goes on, obviously not concerned by his lack of a reply. “Just the other day I was thinking of you after Lenny and I needed a little break. Funny, hm?”

The words actually hurt to hear, and he isn’t sure whether he is angrier over her intent to make him feel uneasy, or his own reaction to them.

“Th-this m-m-makes f-four d-d-”

“Four dollars and seventy-five cents,” Izzy cuts him off with a smirk. “I can add, and you really should stick to not talking, otherwise people will think you’re a bit slow.”

Barry’s jaw joints flare up in pain as he clenches his teeth, humiliated by the insult and angry over how smugly she is watching him now. He returns her gaze stubbornly, but is unable to say a word.

“Shee.” She lays a five dollar bill down on the counter and picks her purchases up. “Keep the change.”

Izzy gives him a slow once over before she frowns in mock concern.
“You should eat more, sissy-boy, Len doesn’t like the scrawny type.”

The little bell above the entrance chimes again when she finally leaves, and Barry watches her go through the glass door while he tries not to choke on the feelings of shame and fury that are flooding him right now.

“Do you have any popcorn?”

James, who is currently trying to get the program that will let them watch the DVD on the laptop he has borrowed from Lisa to run, shoots him a hopeful glance that quickly turns disappointed when Barry shakes his head.

“We just ordered food,” Hartley reminds him from his spot at the table. He’s currently looking through the collection of DVDs James also picked up during his quick visit to the blonde woman’s room before they came over.

“I don’t like Greek food.” grumbles James, and curses slightly when the portable computer once again doesn’t do what he wants it to. Barry flinches slightly as he watches him hit the poor thing, and he knows that it would be just his luck that Lisa pins it one on him if James breaks it.

He still isn’t sure whether it wouldn’t have been a better idea to just not answer the door when they showed up fifteen minutes ago. It seems that it isn’t an annoying trait exclusive to just Len to simply pass by without a warning, or to only do so after nine pm on a weeknight.

“You said it was fine twenty minutes ago,” huffs Hartley, who sounds slightly irked but doesn’t take his eyes off the DVD he is currently studying. “We could have ordered something else as well if you had said so then.”

“But you wanted Greek, and you always get annoyed when I want to order somewhere else in addition to your food,” mutters James, and Barry, who is currently standing at the small counter of his kitchenette to prepare a mug of coffee for his guests and some tea for himself, feels a familiar fondness overcome him as he listens to the two younger men quarrel. It helps to ease his worry a bit about Len’s younger sister’s wrath.

For a couple of days now he’s been in a rather bad mood, and it’s a nice change to have them around; even if this would cost him some additional hours of sleep. Len hasn’t shown himself the whole week so far, and while Barry knows that the other man probably isn’t thinking anything of it, he can’t help but miss his company.

He doesn’t want to appear clingy, though, and he tries to tell himself that it’s simply because he is lonely most of the time. But after more than eight months out of prison, this isn’t entirely true anymore. He has actually found a small number of people again who make it easier for him to get up every morning. And even if it’s still somewhat hard for him to admit it, two of them are currently sitting in his living room.

“Hey, Barry!” James’ voice startles him out of these thoughts, and he immediately tenses up in response.

“James, keep it down,” chides Hartley, and he shoots the other man an annoyed look before he turns back to Barry. “Sorry, we just want to know whether you’re fine with Mr. Magorium’s Wonder Emporium?”

Barry has no idea what kind of movie it is, but he doesn’t miss how James enthusiastically nods in support from his seat on the couch. He shrugs and agrees.

To his surprise and relief, it turns out to be a harmless children’s movie.

“Why can’t we have a toy store like that?” laments James as they watch how the kids on the screen are clearly enjoying their trip to the so-called Wonder Emporium. It isn’t lost on Barry how Hartley briefly glances at the other criminal with a concerned expression, and his good mood starts to dim.

The food is delivered about ten minutes into the movie, and it turns out to be as good as Hartley had told him it would be.

“I love Barberis’, they make the best Dolmades,” the ginger tells him, and Barry learns that Hartley had been to Greece a couple of times during his childhood, and that he has a soft spot for their cuisine.

“It i-is g-good,” agrees Barry after he has tried one of the grape leaf-wrapped rice parcels, which is a dish he himself has eaten a couple of times before, but of which he never really took a particularly liking to. All of the food is very tasty, though, not that he would have complained even if it weren’t, seeing as Hartley had paid for it.

“Shhh!”

James, whose attention is back on the screen, glares at them in obvious annoyance, and both of them fall quiet to let the younger man enjoy the movie in peace.

Toward the beginning of the third act, Barry starts to grow drowsy, and while he tells himself that he just wants to rest his eyes for a moment, he drifts off within seconds.

Hartley wakes him sometime later.

“We’re going to leave now, Barry. Thank you for taking the time.”

Groggily, Barry nods his head and mutters something unintelligible while his eyes start to close again.

The ginger chuckles and tells him that they will leave through the bathroom mirror before he wishes him goodnight.

“Nighty night, Barry-bear!” adds James in a much too enthusiastic voice that causes him to flinch.

“Not so loud,” Hartley glares at his friend, which causes the younger man to duck his head and shoot Barry an apologizing look.

Barry watches them for a second longer before he nods off again.

His alarm clock wakes him four hours later, and he could kick himself for being stupid enough to spend a night on his couch. He feels like an old man as he limps toward his bathroom to get ready for work, but despite the discomfort he can’t help but realize that he is in a much better mood than he has been in days.
So, here is chapter number five, hope you've enjoyed it.

Just to prevent any misunderstandings, this Edward has nothing to do with the Eddie of the current TV show. I've picked the name quite a while before I knew anything about their Eboard's ancestor Eddie Thawne.

Also, dear Len will be back in the next chapter.

I really want to thank those amazing people who left me kudos and comments. I really enjoy reading what you think of my chapters. It is increadibly rewarding to do so and see that someone has actually gotten invested enough that they really take the time to share their opinion. It always makes my day.

May 1st Year

It’s on his way to the Keystone City Hall that Barry sees Wally again for the first time in years.

It’s a warm early Thursday afternoon. Spring has fully taken over the weather by now, and he is enjoying the sun even though he has to hurry to get back to work within the hour. Mrs. Ming had been nice enough to let him take two hours off because he lost his ID sometime over the last couple of days and needs to get a new one before he could get into trouble for not having it.

Barry still isn’t sure how or where he lost it. He usually keeps it in his wallet, but it seemed to have slipped out one way or another, which is quite a problem because he is legally required to carry it around with him everywhere he goes.

“Don’t worry, my dear,” Mrs. Ming consoled him after she had picked up on how worried he was about it. “You just need to get a new one. These things happen. My grandson lost his passport just a couple of months ago while he was in Germany, and it was hardly any trouble at all to get a new one.”

The old woman means well, and Barry didn’t point out that it’s quite a different story for someone like him to lose their ID.

Barry already went to the police station not too far from the store to make a notice of loss, and, much to his surprise and immense relief, it went smoothly. The officer who took in his information didn’t seem particularly interested in him. He handed him the paper with which he has to go to the KC DOC office and that was that.

It was nearly surreal. Barry had been worrying himself sick since the day before when he accepted that he had indeed lost his ID for sure. He had been certain the visit to the police station would be another horrible and demeaning experience.

It’s as if a weight has been lifted from his shoulders, and while he still feels nervous about the whole affair, he’s no longer really afraid because of it.
There’s still over an hour left before he has to be back at the store, and he hopes that his business at the DOC office will be dealt with just as quickly.

Barry tries to steer clear of the other pedestrians on the sidewalk, which is no easy task with how crowded they are due to the nice weather, which seems to bring people outside in droves. It causes a familiar unease to overcome him while he makes his way toward his destination, but he tries to ignore it. Despite how the day has started out, he’s in a pretty good mood, and he would like for it to stay that way.

Thus, Barry tries to shut the people around him out as he usually does when he is surrounded by too many of them in too little a space. He keeps his gaze mostly down, and concentrates on the cacophony of sounds around him while trying not to actually pick up any actual words being said.

It works out surprisingly well, as being surrounded by so many strangers isn’t that bad of an experience these days. Not like it was the first couple of months after his release, anyway. He still doesn’t like it, but it’s bearable, which is elating in its own way.

It also helps to occupy his mind, and Barry uses the time he has right now to go over the list of things he has to order tomorrow in his head once again. Thus, he is just trying to remember whether they are out of pickles or not when something catches him completely off-guard.

Wally’s voice is like a beacon through the clatter of sounds around him, and it causes him to stop so abruptly that a woman, who has been walking right behind him, collides with him.

“Watch it, idiot!” the brunette hisses, annoyed, and gives him a glare before she moves on. Barry hardly pays any attention to her as his eyes try to search out the man he has just heard. His instincts tell him to scram before his little trip could end in a disaster, but he can’t bring himself to move just yet. He has to look for him.

The familiar voice reaches him again, and as his gaze shifts toward it, he immediately notices the red hair, which has lost some of its brightness over the years. The once vivid red has turned into more of a medium coppery auburn shade, but he still has no problem picking the younger man out of the crowd around him.

His stomach makes a sickening lurch a second later when he realizes just how close he actually is to him, only about ten feet away. He knows with a painful certainty that it would be disastrous should Wally notice him now. It’s sheer luck that he hasn’t picked up on him yet, and before Barry even can come to the decision whether he should stick around for just a moment longer or not, his feet start to move again on their own.

A part of him wants to stop so very badly and apologize for how much he has failed him. Barry ignores it as he is all too aware of how Wally would react to suddenly being confronted by him. Instead, he glances back over his shoulder before he is far enough away that the other man will be swallowed by the crowed, and he notices how somber his expression is. It’s horrible to think that he is the reason for this, that he could not protect him.

The notion causes a familiar guilt to rise in Barry’s guts.

Then, Wally chuckles and a small but soft smile appears on his lips as he turns to the dark-haired Asian woman who is standing next to him, whom Barry hadn’t noticed before. He watches how she turns toward his nephew and lowers her head so that her forehead is resting on his shoulder. She is smiling as well, and just as Wally cups the back of her head they both vanish out of sight.

Barry is left feeling oddly detached from everything for the rest of the day. All the brightness is “Has something happened?”

Barry startles slightly and lifts his eyes from the noodles he has been listlessly moving around in the little plastic container before him for the past five minutes. It seems that he’s been lost in his own thoughts once again, which causes him to frown in annoyance over his inability to prevent his mind from going back to the events of yesterday afternoon.

“S-sorry,” he mutters to Len, who is watching him in a rather uncomfortably intense way from the other side of the table. “Th-there’s j-just s-someth-thing on m-my m-mind.”

Len stays quiet and both drop back into a not so comfortable silence.

Barry feels bad about it, he hasn’t seen his friend in more than two weeks, and he should at least try to keep his attention on him. It’s just so damn difficult to get Wally out of his head. After all these years, he’s finally seen him again, and he could just as well have been a stranger. Iris comes briefly to his mind, and the memory is like a stab to his guts.

“We’re having another poker night tomorrow.”

Glad to have something to focus on other than his troubling thoughts, Barry turns his attention back to Len and smiles, even if it is a bit uncertain.

“A-are y-you inv-viting m-me over?”

The other man snorts and asks him what he thinks.

Len just shrugs. “That’s part of the game.”

“Other p-people l-losing y-your m-money?” asks Barry in disbelief, but he’s a bit amused by his friend’s nonchalance. He envies him for it at times.

“I’ve won that money back by now.” Len points out, and Barry feels the unexpected urge to retort that he probably wouldn’t behave that recklessly with his money if it actually was his to begin with. He doesn’t, though.

Len is clearly trying to lift his mood, and while he hates to be reminded time and time again of who his friend actually is, he doesn’t feel up to starting a fight over it right now. Not that it would be fair or make any difference anyway.

“I-I s-saw m-my n-nephew t-t-today.” It takes Barry a moment before he realizes that he has said this out loud. He tenses and can’t help but feel angry at himself for letting that slip.

Why the hell would he bring that up just now?!

He can feel Len’s gaze on him, but he can’t bring himself to meet it. A familiar shame starts to latch on to him again, and it leaves him with the urge to hide. He doesn’t want to have to deal with this, any of it, he’s just so tired…

“I take it that he didn’t see you.”
These words get Barry to look up in confusion.

“You probably wouldn’t be in one piece if he had,” explains Len with a grim smirk, but he doesn’t actually seem to find this particularly funny.

Barry clenches his jaw and glares at him. There’s a lot he would love to say to the other man right now, like for example where he can stick those stupid comments of his, but his throat has already closed up on him again, and thus there is no real outlet left for his frustration and embarrassment.

Stiffly, he gets up – completely ignoring Len as he does so – and walks over to the kitchen counter to make himself some tea. While he doesn’t think that he could stomach anything right now, he needs to busy himself with something.

A couple of minutes go by and his anger over what Len has said slowly fades again, partly due to the other man actually giving him the time he needs to collect himself and calm down.

After preparing himself a cup of mint tea, Barry slowly walks back over to the table and takes up his former seat. He keeps his eyes on the white mug in his hands.

“I didn’t mean to upset you.” Len doesn’t seem like he’s particularly sorry, but Barry knows that he hardly ever shows it, no matter whether he actually regrets something he has done or not. His words sound honest enough, though.

“Wh-what d-did you th-think? Th-that I-I w-w-would f-find it f-funny?” His bitterness is so strong that he is sure he can actually taste it on his tongue as he speaks. “M-my n-neph-phew h-hates m-me, h-hil-larious, i-isn’t i-i-it?”

The itching in his eyes grows really bad, and he ducks his head a bit. A familiar painful throbbing starts behind his temples and he presses his fingers against it as he tries to take a couple of calming breathes.

Again, Len gives him the time he needs to get a hold of his emotions. It takes a while before the pressure behind his sternum starts to ease to something more tolerable.

Barry swallows and takes a sip of his tea when he is certain that he is no longer in danger to make a fool of himself. He tries to ignore how weak his hand feels as he picks up the cup, and how it’s slightly shaking.

“How did you see him?” asks Len when Barry finally is able to look at him again. “Didn’t you have work today?”

“Y-yes, b-but…” Barry’s voice breaks off and he coughs lightly, a familiar flush of embarrassment coloring his cheeks, which is so damn frustrating. He hates how ridiculous and weak he has to sound right now. “I h-had t-to g-go t-to the D-DOC-C b-because I l-lost m-my I-ID s-someh-how.”

“You met him there?”

“N-no.” Barry closes his eyes and leans heavily against the backrest of the chair. “It w-w-was on m-my w-way th-th-there.”

Wally had looked so different, so grown up. The couple of times he saw him in costume during his time in prison made it difficult to make out any real changes other than his maturing voice and stature. It’s so damn strange to have seen him like this, no longer a teenager but a man. He missed all of it.
“H-he l-looks so d-different,” Barry goes on without knowing why he does so in the first place, seeing as it hurts to even think about it. “H-he’s s-so m-much older, a g-grown m-man and… h-he… h-his hair’s a b-bit d-darker a-a-and h-he l-look-ked s-so g-grim… he… he w-was n-never a h-happy k-kid b-but he… I w-wanted h-him t-to b-be h-happy…”

With a soft hiss he breaks off and presses the balls of his hands against his once more teared up eyes. His throat hurts, and while he tries to keep it together, he can feel how his control slowly but surely slips from him.

This is all his fault.

The sound of a chair being shoved back causes him to jump slightly and a couple of tears run down his cheeks as he looks over to Len. This has to be extremely uncomfortable for his friend, Barry realizes, and he feels how a familiar and nearly stinging heat spreads through his cheeks at the thought that he has just been about to break down in front of someone who doesn’t like to touch anything more emotional than a smirk or a scowl with a ten-foot pole.

To his surprise, the other man doesn’t do as he had assumed he would and leave, but he instead walks over to his fridge and grabs two beers.

Barry watches him warily as he comes back and offers one of the bottles to him.

“Here, you can definitely use on.” Len sounds grim, and while Barry doesn’t feel like he could stomach anything right now, he accepts it with a small nod.

The beer tastes bitter, and cold, and the sickness ebbs away after just a couple of seconds.

They don’t talk while they drink their first beers, and Barry tries to just concentrate on the taste and nothing else, which works for the most part. He doesn’t notice that he gulps the liquid down unusually quickly, nearly faster than Len, and when he is offered another one, he accepts it without hesitation.

After that, Len grabs the poker cards he keeps around at Barry’s place and they play a game.

“You did well.” the other man comments after their first round.

“I-I l-lost,” remarks Barry quietly, and he hates how feeble his voice still sounds. Right now, he couldn’t care less if he is the worst player on the planet.

“It was still harder for me to read you this time.”

Len gets each of them a third beer and they start another game.

This repeats one more time before Barry is drunk enough that he has a problem holding his cards.

“’m-m th-the w-wors-st p-playr e-every…”

“Hardly.” Len sounds openly amused, which causes Barry to glare at him in turn. It’s so damn unfair that his friend isn’t even buzzed yet.

“I-I h-hat-te p-p-pok-ker…”

“You agree to play it an awful lot, though.”

Another glare and the other man actually chuckles as he starts to pick the cards up from the table. Barry gets up, as he wants to move over to the couch, and quickly find himself on the floor. The change of position startles him so badly that he doesn’t notice the pain that sears through his knees and head at first.

He cries out when a hand grabs his upper arm, but he quickly calms down again when he realizes he isn’t in any danger.

“It’s just me,” Len tells him in a low and calm voice before he chuckles. “Shit, you’re really a lightweight, aren’t you?”

“D-don’ m-make f-f-fun of m-me,” complains Barry, who feels rather miserable all of a sudden. “I-I d-don’t l-like d-drunken p-people…”

Len hums nonverbally and helps him up again before assisting him to find his way over to the couch in one piece.

“Y-you… y-you s-said I-I w-was d-doin’ b-bet-ter t-ton-night…”

“You were,” agrees his friend as he walks back to the kitchen table while Barry lets himself drop to his side so that he can rest his head on the arm of the couch and pull his legs up onto the cushions. “Till you got to your third beer.”

A rather dark scowl appears on Barry’s face, but he feels too groggy to sit up and show it to Len.

“B-beer i-isn’ h-health-thy,” he mutters sullenly.

He nearly nods off over the next couple of minutes till he feels the cushions next to him move and he startles slightly. When he throws a worried glance to his side, he sees Len, and wonders whom else he could have expected it to be. He realizes again how stupid he has to look, reacting so frightened to everything around him all the time.

“Come on, sit up. I got you some water.”

“I-I’m n-not th-thirsty.”

“You’ll regret it in the morning if you fall asleep with nothing but beer in your system.”

“I-I’m t-tired.”

Len chuckles and Barry feels a bit affronted by it.

“S-stop m-making f-f-fun of m-me!”

“You are definitely not a happy drunk.”

The remark is meant as nothing more than a jest, but it causes a memory – no, a bunch of them – to come to Barry’s mind and suddenly he feels furious.

“I-I’m n-no d-drunk!” Barry hisses upset, and briefly he really wants to kick Len for causing him to remember any of those horrible things. He knows how stupid that would be, though, and even dangerous if Len should take it the wrong way. Therefore, he scrambles up into a sitting position and glares at the other man instead.

His reaction seems to have caught Len off-guard, as he just watches him for a long moment.

“I know.” He sounds calm; like he is stating a fact, and the anger is gone from Barry just as quickly as it appeared.
“G-good,” nods Barry, who is a bit uncertain of what to do now. After a moment he adds quietly.
“S-sorry f-for y-yelling at you.”

Len snorts and gives him a crooked smile. “It’s fine.”

“Th-thanks…”

“Sure.” The other man shrugs and remarks that he is use to taking a lot worse from his sister.

“N-no,” Barry disagrees with a frown. “I m-mean f-for… f-for b-being m-my f-friend… f-for b-being s-so n-nice t-to m-me and… and f-for b-b-being h-here.”

This time, it seems that Len isn’t sure how to respond.

He doesn’t reply in the end, and Barry feels too tired to worry about the sudden change in his mood, so he instead just accepts the water Len had gotten for him.

When Barry wakes up with a hell of a hangover a couple of hours later, Len is no longer around.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you enjoyed the chapter!

So, slowly but sure we start to get to the more meatier parts of the story and you will learn a bit more about what has actually taken place that lead to Barry being locked away. Also, more Rogues are coming up and things with Len... well, there would be a lot to say about that.

Thank you sweeties so much for your kudos and, seriously, don't feel shy to leave me comment - you would not believe how curious I am to hear from you what you think about my story and how nice it is to read them.
June 1st year

A knock at his door causes Barry to halt his movements, which leaves the onion he intends to add to the eggs for his omelette only half chopped. He looks at his living room clock, which shows that it’s just shortly after noon. He frowns slightly as he knows Mary wouldn’t be around till later this afternoon, and Len or the others are also unlikely to pass by as they usually won’t pay him a visit until well after it’s gotten dark, and they generally prefer to use Sam’s help if the man can be bothered.

Not that he has seen much of them over the last month…

Barry grimaces unhappily and pushes that thought aside.

He turns his attention back to the door and a slight unease starts to settle over him. Another knock follows and he hesitates a moment longer before he puts the knife away and somewhat reluctantly makes his way over to the entrance of his flat.

It’s early June, and warm enough that he has the window over his kitchen sink open so that the sound of the streets below follow him through his apartment. This low cacophony of life outside his four walls usually has a somewhat lulling quality to it, but it isn’t able to do much to settle his nerves now.

His stomach starts to feel queasy, like something heavy has settled in it, and it seems that he will have to save his lunch to have for dinner later on instead.

The slight sense of foreboding grows worse as he leans forward to take a look through his door spy and see who his unexpected visitor is.

When he spots the person on the other side, it’s as if a bucket of ice water is emptied over his head, and for a second his legs seem to grow weak. He nearly feels sick with confusion and apprehension as he tries to come up with a plausible explanation as to why Jay Garrick is currently standing in front of his door that doesn’t involve any sort of trouble for him.

It’s been years since he has seen the older man last, and, like with everybody else of his former life, he hadn’t expected to do so again anytime soon.

Well, at least not if either of them could help it…

What is he doing here?

Barry swallows nervously and he suddenly wonders whether anybody could have picked up on his connection to Len and the other Rogues.

My former connection to them, he thinks bitterly, as it seems like that part of his life has resolved itself on its own once again.

Still, he knows that there doesn’t actually need to be a reason for him to get in trouble, and that notion alone causes the sickness he feels to worsen.

He actually jumps when another knock sounds in front of him, a bit louder this time and he remembers that the other man is still waiting for him to answer the door.

Barry nervously gnaws his lower lip for a moment and isn’t sure what to do. The notion to not open the door crosses his thoughts, but he knows that this would most likely just lead to trouble should Jay find out that he had simply been ignoring him. He doesn’t like it, but the best thing is probably to just deal with whatever caused the other man to pass by. There aren’t really that many options for him to choose from, anyway.

After taking a deep and slow breath to calm his nerves, Barry reaches for the knob and opens the door.

Jay looks hardly any different than he had the last time Barry had seen him. Well, he probably doesn’t even look that different from when they met the first time. Not bad for a man who was going toward the end of his eighties by now.

There is a moment of surprised silence, and it becomes quickly obvious that his unexpected guest hadn’t expected to get an answer anymore. They watch each other in an uncomfortable silence, unsure what to say.

“Hello, Barry.” Jay is the first one to break it, and actually gives him a weak smile. “I hope I’m not interrupting you with anything?”

Like usual in such situations, Barry’s voice has abandoned him once again, so that he can just mutely shakes his head. There are a lot of questions on his mind, most of which about whether he is in trouble, but right now he can’t even get a single word out.

Jay frowns slightly and Barry knows that it only makes him look suspicious, but he can’t help but start to fidget nervously.

“Can I come in?”

The request isn’t unexpected, Barry assumed that the other man isn’t just passing by to exchange greetings at his doorstep. Still, he really doesn’t like the idea of Jay in his flat and the problems that are likely following along with him.

Barry doesn’t think that he would be able to deal with anything else on top of his current situation.
There is a small part of him, though, which is excited to see the man in front of him again. A part that has been missing his former friend and colleague, and Barry knows how stupid this is, how potentially dangerous.

It had been, and still is, a horrible experience to be shunned by everybody, especially people like the Garricks, whom he really considered family once. Not a single person from his past has come to him since his release, and while he knows that he should most likely be grateful for it, it still hurts.

Again, he answers wordlessly with a nod and steps aside to give the older man space to enter.

Jay eyes him with slight concern before he does so.

Barry closes the door behind him and watches how his guest briefly looks around his small flat. It’s then that it hits him just how poor his current living conditions have to seem to others, and an embarrassed and angry flush crosses his cheeks before he forces himself to avert his gaze from Jay. Instead he walks back over to his kitchenette to put the bowl with the already whisked eggs and the cutting board with the onions into his fridge for later.

His former friend is watching him when Barry turns back around, which is uncomfortable and embarrassing. He tries to tell him to take a seat, but, once again, his throat doesn’t let a single word pass his lips. His flush deepens and he gestures toward the kitchen table instead, his lips now firmly closed.

Jay doesn’t move for a couple of seconds and Barry realizes with a sinking feeling that this is going to become a very awkward experience for both of them if he isn’t able to get it together.

To his immense relief, Jay starts to move over to the offered seat just a moment later.

After showing him the box of coffee he has in his cupboard and Jay agreeing to it with a nod, he busies himself with preparing the beverage for the next couple of minutes, during which time neither of them speaks and an uneasy silence starts to fill the space between them.

Barry keeps his back to the other man, even though he can feel his gaze on him, making him feel about as uncomfortable as is possible for him in this situation. He is mostly embarrassed, though, which in turn makes him angry at himself, seeing as he should not feel this way, he shouldn’t have to…

“Thanks.” Jay accepts the cup of steaming coffee a couple of minutes later and Barry isn’t sure what to make of the fact that the older man is watching him with a concerned expression.

“Y-yy-… y-you’re w-w-welc-come,” he forces out, and hates how ridiculous he sounds even to himself.

His stomach feels queasy, and it’s most likely not a good idea for him to drink a cup as well, but he makes one for himself nonetheless, just so that he has something in his hands.

Another uneasy silence follows and Barry keeps his eyes on the dark liquid in front of him while he listens to the sounds from the streets that reach him them through the still opened window.

“Are you feeling alright?” Jas sounds concerned, which again is both confusing and irksome, and Barry’s grip tightens around the cup.

“Y-yes.”

Jay doesn’t say anything else for another moment, during which Barry can feel his scrutinizing gaze on him, and he hates that the other man doesn’t simply say why he is here.

“Barry.” Jay’s tone causes him to finally look up despite the reluctance he feels. Their eyes meet and his former friend’s frown deepens. “You don’t look like you’re alright.”

Somehow, these words are like a slap, or maybe not the words themselves but the way they are said, like he is actually truly concerned about him.

What the hell had he been expecting? Was Jay really surprised?

“I-I’m f-f-f-fine,” he grits out and stubbornly returns Jay’s gaze, even though it nearly hurts to look at him.

“I think we both know that is not true,” the older man replies calmly, but there is a slight tension to his expression that lets Barry know that he doesn’t like the tone he is using with him.

This makes Barry feel both angrier, and like a petulant little boy. He looks back to the cup of coffee in front of him and stares at it quietly.

“I’m not here to cause you any trouble,” Jay goes on after a couple of seconds have passed. “I was just in the area and wanted to check-in on you.”

Check on him. These words are extremely disconcerting. What is he thinking? That he’s dragging little boys home after work in the dead of the night?

Barry lowers his head a bit and squeezes his eyes shut. He really regrets having invited him in, even though there hadn’t really been a choice to begin with. Sending Jay away would have just made him look suspicious.

“You look exhausted,” states his former friend in that damn concerned tone of voice that causes Barry’s chest to hurt. “Have you been getting enough sleep lately?”

“I-I’m f-f-f-fine,” he repeats tiredly and turns his head so that he faces the open window. “R-really.”

Another silence follows, and he tries to ignore how his eyes have started to itch again, and how all of the sudden the exhaustion that keeps following him around these days is suddenly weighing him down like a ton of bricks.

“You’ve been doing really well so far,” Jay states out of the blue, and Barry closes his eyes and resigns himself to the fact that he can’t do anything but let the other man talk; no matter how much he wants him gone.

“I’m glad,” Jay tells him and his honesty just hurts.

It’s still so hard to stomach that he really believes him to be such a twisted kind of person, a child abuser and a murderer.

Why can’t he just leave him be, then? If he really thinks Barry is capable of doing such horrible things, why did he have to come here? This is just cruel…

“I’m just passing by to see how you are doing,” Jay explains once more, obviously picking up on his discomfort. “Getting used to a normal life after prison can be hard, especially with all the changes that entails.”

For a second, Barry nearly hates him for bringing this up, because he knows exactly what he is talking about. Not about his lost wife or Wally or anything else.

No, he is talking about the Speed Force.

Barry grits his teeth and stays quiet.

“I know that you are angry,” says Jay in a quieter tone, and the regret he is feeling is palpable as he speaks, “and while what you have done is inexcusable, I know that it was partly our fault as well. We should have noticed and helped before… before everything was able to escalate the way it did.”

The other man falls quiet and Barry hopes that this is it. That he has spoken his mind and will just leave now. He just wants him gone.

But Jay isn’t finished just yet.

Hesitantly, like the older man isn’t certain whether he should really touch upon this or not, he goes on. “What happened afterwards should also have been handled differently.”

Something changes in the air between them, and Barry feels nearly smothered by the horror that comes with the realization of what Jay is talking about. The ugly emotion is quickly replaced by a feeling of icy numbness, and he shivers slightly as he keeps his gaze firmly on the table in front of him.

"It was careless to put you in a place like Iron Heights and not keep an eye on how you were doing. I am truly sorry-“

Barry cuts him off mid-sentences because… because there is no way that he would be able to deal with where this is going. He can’t think about it, he wouldn’t! This is behind him!

“C-c-… c-coul-ld y-you p-p-p… p-pleas-se l-l-leav-ve?” he grits out while he stumbles back on his feet. His eyes are still not looking at the other man and he doesn’t think that he could bring himself to do so anytime soon. He is so damn angry at Jay, for believing these horrible lies, for bringing what happened to him in prison up.

… for knowing anything about it in the first place…

Mostly of all, Barry just feels ashamed.

The sound of Jay getting up follows a moment later and a thick silence hangs between them for a long moment before the other man speaks again.

“Of course, I’m sorry for passing by unannounced.”

Barry doesn’t replay, he knows that he wouldn’t be able to hold it together any longer if he tried to.

“Barry,” starts Jay again, more quietly this time. “I know that all of this is hard on you, and you probably think that you are alone after everything that has happened, but if you need help you can call me, okay?”

The pressure behind his sternum is so strong that Barry fears it is going to cause his chest to burst open any moment now as he forces himself to nod wordlessly.

Right now, he would have agreed to anything just to be left alone.

Jay hesitates briefly, probably thinking about saying something else, before he seems to decide against it and finally leaves.
It feels like Barry is moving through molasses as he goes to lock the door. His head hurts and he hardly picks up on how his feet lead him to his bedroom afterwards, where he buries himself under his covers and tries not to fall apart.

Barry doesn’t leave the bed again that day.

“It’s a really nice store,” remarks Mary as she lets her gaze wander through Mrs. Ming’s shop once more. It’s her first visit, and Barry is really happy about the little surprise.

She came back from a trip to Wisconsin sometime last night, but he hadn’t had the opportunity to see her so far, as he had to leave for work quite early again.

“Well,” she goes on and winks at him. “of course it is, seeing as you are working here.”

He chuckles and returns her smile gladly. Over the last two weeks he has really missed her. It didn’t really become apparent to him before, but she has very much grown on him, seeing as she is one of the few people he can actually talk to and confide in, especially now that the Rogues seem to have had enough of him.

“I’ve m-missed you,” he tells her, and feels himself blush slightly as soon as the words are out, as he just now realized that she could take them the wrong way.

Mary gives him a soft look and reaches for his hand, which is resting on the counter. She squeezes it lightly and smiles warmly.

“I have missed you too, Barry,” she assures him before she grins. “You and your dorkiness never fail to brighten my day.”

“D-dork-kiness?” he asks, a bit affronted, as he doesn’t think of himself as particularly dorky.

His friend smiles kindly and squeezes his hand once again before she lets go of it.

“You know how to speak three different elf languages,” she points out, and he feels how his face heats up to his ears in response.

“I d-don’t, I- j-just c-can s-say a f-few phrases.”

“Don’t be embarrassed, it sounds amazing.”

He ducks his head and mutters some feeble protest, but can’t help but feel secretly a little bit proud. In his youth he has been a gigantic JRR Tolkien fan, and he read the Hobbit and the Lord of the Ring books enough times that the librarian gave him the copies when the bookbinding’s started to fall apart.

“And you’re a big fan of Charlie Brown,” she goes on and puts her index finger on her chin as she makes a thoughtful face. “You also like Doctor Who, and you can recite all of the elements on the periodic table by their Latin names, and groups, and you know all kind of odd stuff about them like electrogravity.”

“Exactly.”
Mrs. Ming joins them a few minutes later and she takes an immediate liking to the young woman. She invites both of them to dinner that night, and Marry is all too happy to accept. This ends in a nice and entertaining evening for Barry, as well as some left-overs he can take home.

July 1st, year

It seems that the last remaining light bulb over the staircase between the first and third floor has finally stopped working, and Barry, who is soaked to the bone from the surprise summer shower, and tired enough to fall asleep on his feet, mutters to himself that nothing of this place is worth the $550 rent as he starts to climb the stairs in darkness.

The building is surprisingly quiet tonight, for which he is grateful to no end. Right now he just wants to get out of his drenched clothes and into his bed. It’s been a long day.

Barry doesn’t bother to turn on the light of his floor’s landing, and just slowly makes his way over to his door. His hips have been hurting like hell the whole day, and he hopes that a long hot shower will help with the pain, at least enough that it won’t make it difficult for him to fall asleep.

The strip of light that falls through the gap under his door catches his attention just as he has unlocked it. He immediately freezes.

There is the sound of footsteps and his heart nearly jumps into his throat as he realizes that whoever is in there is making their way toward the door, and thus toward him. The notion to turn around and bolt crosses his mind just as he feels the knob turn under his hand.

Bright light blinds him for a second and a small distressed whimper passes his lips as he stumbles back a step.

“It’s just me.” The fear leaves him just as quickly as it has taken hold at the sound of a low and very familiar voice, and Barry feels a mixture of surprise, disbelief and relief overcome him. The last one is quickly replaced by anger, though.

“Would you move it already,” urges Len when he just keeps staring at him.

“Wh-what are y-you d-doing h-here?”

“Waiting for you to finally enter your damn flat.”

Annoyed, Barry frowns, but follows along as it really would do neither of them any good if one of his neighbors picks up on who his late-night visitor is.

“Wh-what are y-you d-doing h-here, L-Len?” he repeats the question after the other man shut the door behind him. He hasn’t seen or heard from him for nearly two months now, not a single peep. Nothing from neither him nor the Rogues, and he had been certain that this had been it for their… whatever there had been between them.

The other man shrugs and walks back over to the couch. “I haven’t been by in a while and I needed someplace quiet to go.”

There are blueprints covering the small table in front of his couch, along with three empty beer bottles and a white take out box, and Barry wonders with growing disbelief how long he had been making himself at home in his flat already without even bothering to ask at first.
“S-so y-you th-thought y-you c-c-could j-just p-pass b-by?”

Len, who is standing next to the couch by now, picks up his beer and takes a pull before he turns back to him with a grim look.

“Why not? It’s never bothered you before.”

Barry isn’t blind, he is certain that Len is just playing dumb and knows exactly why he is so angered by this.

“Y-you’ve j-just v-vanished f-from o-one d-day t-to th-the n-next!”

“I’ve been busy.”

Again, that damn shrug, as if this doesn’t mean anything.

“Wh-why d-did y-you s-suddenly d-decide t-to s-s-scram?” asks Barry, and angrily walks over to the other man.” D-did I-I s-scare y-you off s-s-someh-how?”

Len barks a laugh before he gives him a rather nasty smirk. “You couldn’t scare off a fucking fly, Allen, don’t make yourself sound stupid.”

“Y-you w-would kn-know a-all a-ab-bout th-that, w-wouldn’t y-you?”

“This from the guy who isn’t able to get a single word out straight,” scoffs Len, and Barry decides here and now that he wouldn’t deal with this tonight. He is cold, and tired, and he really doesn’t have the patience for any of this.

Without another word, he passes his unwanted visitor and walks into his bedroom to grab some dry clothes before he vanishes into his small bathroom.

About fifteen minutes later, once again dry and warm, he re-enters the living room. Len is still sitting on the couch, seemingly working on some ideas to upgrade his cold gun; but he doesn’t look over to make sure. Instead, he grabs himself a glass from his cupboard and watches it as it fills with water.

He more feels than hears the other man come up behind him, and can’t help but tense up in response. It’s so annoying how quiet Len can be if he puts his mind to it.

“You up for a game of poker?”

There is an unusually uncertain quality to the question, and Barry grits his teeth as a surge of frustration flashes through him, before it’s replaced once more by a bone-deep tiredness.

“Y-you inv-vited m-me o-over t-to a-anoth-ther p-poker n-night,” he reminds him quietly, and immediately feels stupid for bringing this up. Over the last two months he had told himself more than once that it had been foolish of him to expect anything from those people, and that it’s even more ridiculous to feel hurt by their sudden disappearance.

Len doesn’t answer, and Barry quietly makes his way back to his bedroom.

He closes the door firmly behind himself.

It hurts so much, every thrust feels like it’s going to split him in half and he can do nothing, not even scream as his face is pressed down into his pillow. The hand in his hairs tighten and he isn’t sure whether he should fight against it and try to move his head so that he could finally get some air down in lungs again, or simply let go and pass out. Maybe this would be the last time, then.

The thrusts become quicker, shorter and harder and he cries into his pillow as the pain shoots up his spine and nearly causes him to throw up.

Then, he hears him grunt and hiss and there is another awful thrust into him and he knows that it’s over for tonight. The hand holds him down for another long moment and he feels lightheaded enough that he hardly notices how the man pulls out of him.

“Good boy,” the mid-forty electrician named David, who is his latest foster father he has been stuck with for now, says. He misses the Perkins, they may have been violent and awful people but neither of them ever sexually abused any of their foster kids.

“Good boy,” repeats David, and pats his head as if he was some kind of dog. “You did really great, Barry.”

His hand moves down his naked back and he caresses him in this twisted tender way that causes Barry to nearly lose it.

“I’m really proud of you, you’re such a good little boy.”

Tears are running down his cheeks and wetting the pillow below him, and he wishes the man would finally leave and he would be able to get Mister Bunny from his hiding place. He just wants to be left alone.

Warm lips touch his shaking right shoulder and he sobs quietly. The hand on his hip gives him a small squeeze and he tries to remember one of the Limericks they have been reading in school the other day.

There was an old man on a boat,

Who said “I am afloat, I am afloat!”

When they said “No you ain’t!”

He was ready to faint,

That unhappy old man on a boat.

It helps a bit, reciting them silently to himself while the man keeps patting him in this horribly affectionate way.

“Such a good little boy,” he repeats and his breath is hot against his ear.

Barry wakes up with a start. His heart is racing and he feels so sick for a second that he’s certain he would have to change his bedding before he could try to catch anymore sleep tonight. Thankfully though, it just takes his stomach a few seconds to settle down again.

Laying there in the darkness isn’t an option, he can feel that bastard’s hands on him still, as well as the phantom pain in his lower body. With a small groan, he rolls onto his side and gets up. His knee buckle, but he is able to get his footing and slowly make his way over to the door.
The small hallway and his living area are dark, and he clumsily searches for the light switch on the wall next to him. A moment later everything is flooded by brightness and he squints his eyes as a sharp pain shoots through his head in return.

A cup of warm tea would be exactly the right thing to settle his nerves a bit.

Barry has hardly entered his living room when someone makes a protesting noise from his couch and sits up with a low swear. It startles him so badly that he actually screams and stumble back.

Len is on his feet in an impressive display of speed. His face showing both anger and confusion as he searches for any potential danger. As soon as his eyes land on him, though, he relaxes somewhat again.

“What the hell?” he asks annoyed, his voice is still a bit harsh from sleep. “Are you nuts? I could have shot you, you damn idiot!”

It’s then that Barry notices the familiar gun in the other man’s right hand, and he realizes that he has been lucky enough to not end up at least partly frozen.

“What-what a-are y-you s-still d-d-doing here?” His voice sounds feeble and trembles a bit, but Barry doesn’t really care right now. He feels a strange numbness overcome his mind, and he can’t bring himself to be angry to find the other man still around; he’s mostly just curious.

He knows from experience that his couch is an awful substitute for a bed.

“What does it look like?” grunts Len, who puts the gun down on the coffee table. “Getting some rest, or at least I was trying to.”

Barry just looks at him for a couple of seconds, but can’t bring himself to point out that he really had no right to be pissed off by his sudden appearance, as he hadn’t been invited to stay over in the first place.

Instead, he nods quietly and continues on his way to the kitchen.

His head is still hurting, and he still feels so disgustingly dirty.

“Are you alright?”

When he throws a brief glance over his shoulder, he sees that Len still hasn’t moved from his spot by the couch, and that he is watching him with a thoughtful look.

It’s then that Barry picks up that his own hands are actually shaking.

“Y-yeah.”

Memories can’t hurt him, he is alright.

Len stays quiet after that, and Barry goes about preparing himself some tea. He ends up filling two cups, and while he knows that the other man would most likely not want it, the notion of sharing it with someone is nice and calming.

To Barry’s surprise, the other accepts the offered cup.

“Thanks.” Len watches him expectantly when he keeps standing next to him, and doesn’t move to take a seat on the couch.
“Could we sit at the kitchen table?” Barry still sounds obviously shaken and averts his eyes in embarrassment.

“Sure,” the other man agrees, still considering him thoughtfully, but he doesn’t inquire about his strange behavior again before getting up.

Barry doesn’t feel like talking, so they end up sitting in silence, which doesn’t bother him, seeing as the other man’s presence alone is soothing. Len understands, and doesn’t seem to mind.

“Why…” Barry stops himself and lowers his head a bit while keeping his eyes on the amber liquid in the cup in front of him. He knows that Len is watching him again, his intense gaze is nearly as palpable as an actual touch, and Barry can’t help but shiver slightly.

A moment goes by before he forces himself to speak again.

“Why did you… vanish?” he reluctantly asks in a small voice, and hates himself for the need to do so at all.

It’s obvious why the other man has stayed away. He’d had enough of him and his oddities, and probably realized that there is something severely wrong with him; like everybody else does at some point or another.

“Was it because of… of something I did?”

Slowly, he looks up to meet the other man’s eyes with an uncertain expression.

“Did I do or say something while I was drunk?”

Len frowns and there is a grimness to the way he studies him now that causes Barry’s stomach to sink.

“No, you didn’t, and it wasn’t because of you.”

That answer is a bit of a surprise, mostly because Barry had expected him to simply tell him off. Still, he knows that the other man isn’t telling the truth, at least not completely.

“I can be… odd at times,” Barry states quietly. “I know that… I’m…”

He chews on his bottom lip for a moment as he glances down to his tea cup before he looks up again.

“I can’t help it.”

Len returns his gaze and he seems unsure what to make of what Barry has just said.

“You’re no odder than most people I know,” his friend finally says before he huffs slightly and rubs his temple. “Look, I’ve been busy. The last few weeks have been crazy and I just didn’t have the time to pass by. It wasn’t anything personal.”

Barry watches him for a long moment before he slowly nods.

“Ok-kay, g-good.”

It’s a lie, at least partly, but Barry doesn’t want to touch upon it; not now anyway.

Not being alone after one of those damn nightmares is soothing, and reassuring, and he doesn’t want to chase Len away again.

“I’m glad that you came over,” he tells him honestly. “Despite my reaction from before.”

Like usual, Len doesn’t seem particularly fond of this kind of talk and he looks rather ill at ease as he responds with a short nod of his own.

After that Barry takes pity on himself and decides to go take a shower. The feeling of hands on his skin hasn’t left yet, and he just wants to get rid of it already.

“Thank you, my dear,” Mrs. Ming says, giving him a faint smile after Barry brought her some freshly made chicken soup.

The old woman has caught the flue, and thus is currently bedridden. Barry, who has ignored her attempts to assure him that she is fine on her own, has been checking up on her once an hour during work to see whether she is doing alright and whether she needs anything.

“James will be here in an hour, then you won’t have to worry about me anymore,” she tells him with an apologetic smile after he has refilled her cup of tea.

“It’s really no trouble,” he assures her again. “You can’t help it, and you are one of the nicest patients anybody could wish for, so don’t worry.”

The day is a rather slow one, anyway. There’s a storm raging over Keystone City, and most people seem to be avoiding going outside. This is quite alright with Barry, seeing as he doesn’t have to worry about locking potential customers out every time he comes upstairs to look after Mrs. Ming. It also gives him the opportunity to count the stores stock.

The radio is static again as he re-enters the store a few minutes later, but he decides to leave it on at a low volume as it gives him at least some kind of background noise while he works.

It’s close to six pm when an Asian man in his mid to late thirties enters the store, and Barry immediately knows that he is the grandson his employer is always talking of so fondly.

He is about Barry’s height, and very smartly dressed. Mrs. Ming told him that he is working for a big company as a financial consultant, and thus has to travel a lot. For the last ten month he has been in China, but returned home today from his stay. A lucky coincident, seeing as it’s certainly going to help Mrs. Ming to have her grandson around right now.

Barry wonders whether the man has come directly from the airport or not, but seeing that he doesn’t have any luggage with him, it’s more likely that he made a quick trip to his apartment first before coming here.

He looks rather tired as he glances swiftly around the store. His eyes land on Barry and he frowns slightly before he starts to walk over to him.

“Hello, I’m James Lai,” he introduces himself and offers Barry his hand with a small smile. “I’m the grandson of Bo Ming, the owner of this store. I take it that you must be Barry?”

Surprised, he nods and stammers an affirmative and it must be obvious that Barry hadn’t expected him to know his name as the other man seems a bit amused by it.
“She really likes you,” he explains with a kinder smile. “She’s told me quite a lot about you during our calls.”

The warmth in his eyes lessens again and he studies him quietly for a moment. Barry is pretty sure that he is going to tell him that he would be watching him, and that he should think twice before trying something stupid just because he is working for an older woman, or something along these lines. He doesn’t doubt that the man knows that he is an ex-convict. Mrs. Ming never mentions it to Barry, but she and her grandson seem to have a very close relationship and it’s unlikely that she would have left that piece of information out.

James doesn’t say anything of the kind to him, though. The slight frown vanishes again and instead turns to the door that leads to the stairs.

“I’ll go up and look in on her. She’s upstairs, isn’t she?”

“Y-y-yes.” Barry nods and, with that, James is gone again.

Closing the store doesn’t take a lot of time after that, as he had enough time to clean everything over the last hour with no people passing by due to the steadily increasing rain. While this isn’t good for business, Barry can’t find it in himself to complain, seeing as the humid weather causes his joints to act up. He’s glad that he could takes his time with everything this way.

He’s just counting the money they’ve taken in that day when James joins him in the small back room where they keep the little vault where their daily receipts and deposits are placed.

It’s ridiculous, but Barry can’t help but feel uncomfortable and a bit worried by the other man seeing him with the cash. Nervously, he puts the money down and turns to him.

“Hey,” James greets him, and Barry picks up that his voice sound less reserved than before and quite a bit warmer. “I just wanted to see whether I can lend you a hand with closing, but it seems that you’ve nearly finished already.”

“Y-yes i-it w-was a-a s-slow a-aftern-noon, I w-was able t-to d-do m-most o-of th-the c-cleaning b-bef-forehand,” he explains and smiles uncertainly. “B-but th-thank y-you anyw-way.”

“No problem, I think lending you a hand is the least I can do after you’ve taken such great care of my grandmother today.”

“Th-that’s n-not n-neces-sary, r-really. I-I’m g-glad I-I c-could h-help a b-bit.”

James watches him again for a moment. It causes Barry to grow nervous and he fidgets a bit before he turns back to the cash.

“I-I w-will b-be f-finished i-in j-just a-a c-couple o-of m-minutes,” he explains to fill the silence between them then offers a bit more hesitant. “Y-you c-can r-rec-count i-it.”

The other man frowns at that.

“I’m sorry if I came off somewhat hostile before, I had a long day and I was worried about lao lao. I didn’t mean to imply anything.”

James smiles a bit sheepish at that and asks him whether he would like to join him upstairs in the kitchen for some hot chocolate. Barry hesitates as he doesn’t really like the idea of being alone with another man he knows next to nothing of any longer than he has to be.
Then again, this is Mrs. Ming’s grandson, and he immediately feels bad for assuming the worst of this seemingly nice guy just because he is so damn screwed up.

“Great, you go on and finish with the money and I’ll go upstairs and prepare the drinks, alright?”

“Ok-kay.”

James grins at that and Barry is left alone once again.

Confused, he watches the spot where the other man had stood just a moment before, and while the notion of spending some time with him makes him nervous, it’s also nice to think that he had been invited in the first place.

He turns back to his work, feeling much more relaxed than he had been before.

Chapter Summary

Barry is reminded that you shouldn’t trust things that seem too nice to be true because they mostly aren’t.

Another small talk on the fire escape takes place which causes him to feel even less save in the rundown area he lives.

…and Hartley and James are pretty much just awesome friends.

August 1st year

Barry glances at the white plastic bag in his right hand, still unsure of whether this is a good idea or not, before his gaze returns to the door in front of him. The smell of the Chinese take-out is artificial and strong, and it causes his stomach to rumble slightly and his mouth to water.

It’s already half past ten, and on a usual Thursday evening he would have already been home, eating dinner or sketching a bit before going to bed. Instead, he finds himself on the old, but not that shabby, floor of Len’s apartment complex.

Sometime during work today he had decided to visit his friend after he finished closing. There isn’t any actual reason for it, he just thought it could be a nice surprise. Len had made himself rather scarce after his sort-of-but-not-really-apologize. He’s come over a couple of times over the last month, every time just briefly, and he always seemed to be in an unusually reserved mood.

Barry isn’t sure what to make of this. After their talk in the beginning of July, he had thought that things would go back to normal, but…

Maybe he’s just imagining things, he worries too easily and it could just as well be that Len and the others are busy again. Len hasn’t been anything close to hostile, or even unfriendly during his handful of visits, just rather... aloof.
This is the main reason Barry is standing in front of the other man’s apartment now. He knows that it had been kind of a rash decision to pass by, he doesn’t even know whether Len would be home, but the idea stuck and didn’t let go of him until he went to the Chinese restaurant just three blocks from Mrs. Ming’s store. Not the fanciest place by far, but they sell well sized portions and the food actually tastes good.

A part of him hopes that Len will be home, will talk with him about what is bothering him. Despite what he may say, Barry knows that something has been on his friends mind, even though he believes that the Rogues have simply been busy during the weeks of absence on their part. He also is certain that he’s somehow the cause for it, which is a rather daunting notion.

Barry huffs quietly and tries to shake the worries off that have started to gnaw at him again. Instead, he lets his eyes briefly wander around, and he is reminded that it has been only a couple of times that he has actually been here so far. Len usually passes by his place or Sam picks him up to take him over to whatever bolt-hole they’re using at the time. It’s more convenient for both of them that way.

He turns back to the door, feeling nervous enough that his palms have actually become sweaty.

“J-just d-do it alr-ready.” he mutters to himself. He has probably been standing here for a good five minutes already, and he isn’t really sure why he feels so apprehensive right now. What is the worst thing that could happen?

On a second thought, he doesn’t really want to try and answer that…

A noise behind the door, someone moving around in the apartment, causes him to tense up momentarily and a nearly smothering panic overcomes him and urges him to turn and leave. Barry quickly pushes the ridiculous notion away. This is silly, he is behaving silly, really.

At least Len seems to be at home, and he doubts that the other man would really react too unkindly to his unannounced visit. Not that he really would have any right to get annoyed, seeing as he usually stops by his flat whenever he feels like it.

Barry takes another deep breath and knocks.

He listens for any sign of someone moving to answer him. When the footsteps start to come closer a couple of seconds later, he feels relief, which is then quickly replaced by surprise and a slight dread as he notices that they are much too light to belong to the other man.

His stomach sinks when the door is opened and an all too familiar face appears instead of Len’s.

Izzy briefly seems just as surprised about seeing him before it’s replaces by an amused and rather catty look. Barry immediately notices her state, how the very short dark purple dress she wears is visibly askew in places, how red and slightly swollen her lips seem, and how her slightly ruffled hair frames her still flushed face in a way that most men would probably find incredibly sexy.

Barry doesn’t, he feels like nothing but a monumental idiot and he’s so damn embarrassed that he wishes the ground would open up under his feet and swallow him whole.

“Well, well, well,” smirks the woman as she leans herself against the doorframe as if this were actually her place. “Sissy-boy, it’s been a while, hasn’t it?”

Barry feels his body tense up and his face flush in a mixture of shame and anger. He’s such a fool for not having thought that this could also be a possibility.

“I have to say, I am surprised,” she goes on, and her smile becomes all teeth. “I wouldn’t have thought that you were someone who’s a fan of the three-way deal.”

Her eyes slowly travel down his body and the urge to hide behind something overrides him as she makes no heed of the fact that she is checking him out. A mockingly pitying expression appearing on her features as she meets his gaze again.

“Then again, I’m sure there aren’t too many who would be interested in you joining them, are there?”

He doesn’t reply, but returns her taunting gaze with a glare. His throat has closed up once more, and he wouldn’t be able to get a word out if he tried. It is so damn frustrating.

“What? Cat got your tongue, Sissy-“

Izzy breaks off when Len turns up behind her a moment later and she shoots him a fake innocent look. The other man is wearing jeans and nothing else, and judging by how his upper body is still slightly flushed and the disarray his hair is in, Barry would be able to say what he had just been doing even without Izzy being the one to answer the door.

“Lenny, it seems you little friend decided to join us,” she tells him in a sultry voice and Barry turns to her in alarm, which earns him an amused chuckle in return. Izzy stops her taunting, though, when she notices how Len is glaring at her warningly now, and she steps closer to him so that she can put her hands on his hips.

“I’m sorry, baby, I know he’s your friend, but you have to admit,” she says and glances over her shoulder at Barry with another nasty little smirk. “he has the worst timing.”

“Go back inside.” Len tells her curtly.

“Of course.” she makes sure that Barry sees the obviously indecent smile she gives him and how she lets her fingers briefly slip into the front of his jeans before she is finally gone.

“What are you doing here?” Len sound unusually gruff, and the way he is looking at him makes it quite clear what he thinks of his little surprise visit.

Barry tries to replay but his voice is still not working, not that he really would have an answer anyway. This had been a stupid idea from the beginning, and while he tried to tell himself otherwise, he had thought so the whole time.

“Fuck, Allen,” hisses the other man, and for a split-second Barry fears that he is going to hit him. He doesn’t understand why Len is so angry all of a sudden, and while he knows that he should react in kind, he just feels embarrassed and somewhat flabbergasted by this unexpected hostility.

“Not everybody is a damn recluse like you, some of us have an actual life. Don’t just turn up here like this again!”

The door is slammed in his face.

He listens to the other man walking away and the silence that follows is nearly deafening. Barry just keeps standing there for a long moment, confused and hurt, but not really angry.

He slowly turns around and leaves.

“Rough day?”

Barry, who is sitting on the fire escape in front of his window, tenses up involuntarily due to the unexpected voice. He looks to his left, and in the darkness he can make out his neighbor, Edward, watching him from his own window.

He doesn’t answer other than shaking his head before he turns back to let his forehead rest against the cool bars of the handrail.

It’s silent for a couple of seconds before he can hear the other man climb out onto his own fire escape. He takes a seat on the edge of the platform, mimicking Barry’s position, and he can see out of the corner of his eyes how the other man takes something from his pocket.

Briefly, the glow of a lighter flickers to life before it dies down again just as quickly. Barry turns his face a bit towards him to see that he has lit himself a cigarette.

“You want one?” Edward holds up the little cigarette pack, which brand Barry can’t make out in the dark.

“No, thanks, I don’t smoke.”

“Clever of you.” His neighbor chuckles as he puts the packet away again and takes a deep drag. He exhales with a small satisfied sigh and Barry shoots him an amused glance.

They fall into a surprisingly companionable silence and watch the nearly empty street below them.

Barry’s thoughts are still mostly circling around what happened a couple of hours ago, and while he tries to keep them away from it, he isn’t able to do so. He knows that he is just robbing himself of any chance of falling asleep this way, but he can’t help it. Izzy’s taunts and Len’s anger stay with him like his own shadow.

The pain in his stomach has lessened a bit by now at least, and it should count as a good thing that he now has some food for tomorrow’s dinner. He nearly spent fifteen dollars on it, quite a bit of his actual food budget, and he still can’t believe that he had been idiotic enough to actually waste it like this.

The small voice in the back of his mind reminds him that he had thought that it would be worth it, a thank you for all the times the other man bought over something to eat. It causes his eyes to start itching again and he squeezes them shut.

“The fine young man in the flat above yours,” starts Edward, which startles him a bit. “the one who liked to party till eight in the morning, was shot today.”

Barry is so caught off-guard by this piece of news that he just stares at the other man for a long moment.

“Poor asshole,” continues his neighbor, and he actually sounds honestly sorry. “Seems he rubbed the wrong way with the wrong people.”

“H-how did it happen?”

“Don’t know, there was quite the ruckus when I came home this afternoon. The cops where here as well. They asked a lot of questions, you know, like, “where were you around this time”, “did you see anything”, and such. Like anybody who lives here would be stupid enough to tell them anything even if they had recorded it on their phones.” he scoffs and flickers the burned butt of his cigarette onto the street below them before grabbing a new one.

“H-he w-was k-killed here?”

The notion is quite unsettling, and Barry briefly shoots a glance over his shoulder to his living room, and he reminds himself that he has already locked his door as he always does at night.

“Yeah,” nods Edward, and he looks over to him with a grim expression. “Allegedly, at least. Because nobody heard Jack Schitt and the door to his flat hadn’t been broken open. They probably used the fire escape to get in and out without anyone noticing.”

Barry frowns and looks down to the street below him.

“Th-that’s h-horrible,” he states quietly. The young man in the flat above his may have been a jackass, but he certainly didn’t deserve that fate. He could hardly have been older than 23, still nearly just a dumb kid.

“He seems to have pulled some small jobs for the Candyman in the past.”

Again, he turns to Edward and studies him in surprise. There aren’t many people who know of Jack Monteleone outside of the police, the twins’ protectors, or other the criminals in the cities.

“I’m not deaf, there’s a lot you can pick up on the streets if you listen carefully enough,” the other man explains with a smirk when he notices the slightly wary way Barry is watching him now.

“I’m not a criminal, relax.” His neighbor takes another drag of his cigarette and exhales the smoke slowly. “Enough of that shit went on in my family growing up, I’m not interested.”

“Y-you’re f-from ar-round here?”

Edward turns towards him with a small smile and shrugs. “In a way, I’ve come around a lot.”

“Y-you l-like t-to t-travel?”

Barry is watching the other man, and he can’t help but think that there is something odd about him. Not really in a bad way, but just… strange.

Like during their last meeting, Barry can’t really make out a lot of Edward other than that he seems to be in rather good shape and also has blond hair, but in a darker shade than his own.

“Not really, I just had to do so a lot.”

“F-family?”

“No… well, maybe in a way,” he explains with a grim chuckle and shrugs. “Yeah, probably because of family. In the end everything goes back to them, doesn’t it?”

Yes, Barry can understand that sentiment.

“What about you? You like to travel?”

“At t-times,” he answers and rests his forehead against the cool metal of the railing again. He spots a man walking his dogs on the other side of the street.

“Where would you like to go?”
Barry smiles and shrugs. It is an unusual question for the other man to ask, but a harmless one at that, and he doesn’t mind it.

“D-don’t know, m-maybe s-somew-where qu-quiet a-and isol-lated. Icel-land w-would b-be n-nice.”

The other man snorts and remarks that he really has to like it secluded in that case.

“Why not Canada? They have much more space than they have any use for.”

“M-maybe,” Barry agrees with a smile, and he decides that he has wasted enough of his sleep time out here, even though it has been quite nice to talk to his neighbor.

“Sleep tight,” Edward, who intends to stay out here a bit longer, tells him.

Barry wishes him a goodnight as well and returns inside.

“I c-can’t ac-cept th-this, H-Hartley,” Barry tells the younger man again, and he feels a spike in his frustration when he notices that James has actually started to put some of the groceries away.

“You offered to cook for us. It’s only fair if we actually provide the things you need to do so,” replies Hartley, who seems to blatantly ignore the fact that they have brought much more food than Barry would need to prepare dinner for the three of them.

“Listen to him. You totally deserve a fully stocked fridge for this,” agrees James while he juggles three apples and two cans of tunas in a quite impressive display of skills. “Smoked chicken enchiladas, here we come!”

“James, put the food down before you break something.”

“I won’t, I am an acrobat after all!” argues the other man, and he shoots his friend a slightly miffed glare. “We don’t break stuff.”

The unimpressed look Hartley gives him in return makes it obvious what he thinks of this claim, but instead of arguing with the blond criminal, he turns back to Barry.

“You can cook us something the next time we’re over as well,” he suggests. “And you could give me some tips, I like to cook, but I’m not really that good at it.”

“If you mean by not really that good, that you’re god-awful, then yes, I can totally attest to that.” James easily doges the can of peaches that is aimed at his head and catches it before it can smash the window behind him.

“You just don’t like it because I like to cook healthy,” grumbles the ginger.

“Pipes, I don’t like it because it tastes bad,” disagrees James with a shrug. “There’s healthy food I like, even from that vegetarian stuff you’re all crazy about, but it’s usually prepared by people who have at least an ounce of talent when it comes to cooking.”

While Hartley seems to try and glare holes in the other man’s head, Barry once again picks up on how different James is behaving today, much calmer and more level-headed than usual. He knows from Hartley that the younger man has had a surprisingly good week so far, and it also shows by how relaxed Hartley himself currently is.
“L-look, I w-will p-pay you b-back f-for th-this, ok-kay?”

Both Rogues turn to him at that and neither seems to like this suggestion all that much. Barry briefly fears that they are going to decline and try to convince him to just accept it instead.

“Alright, that’s fine, but it doesn’t have to be right now. When you have the money together, just tell me. There’s no real hurry,” Hartley assures him, and there’s that sad smile again that causes Barry to avert his eyes because it’s so damn humiliating how everybody is just too aware of how he is seemingly unable to provide himself with something as fundamental as food.

“No more talking about money, guys,” interrupts James, who has now started to dig through Barry cupboards in what seems to be in search of a pan. “Let’s concentrate on preparing this awesome meal.”

“You’re so annoying,” sighs Hartley, and he rubs his forehead as he turns to Barry. “Come on, let’s do as he says before he makes total chaos of your kitchen.”

An hour later the dish has turned out to everybody’s liking, and while Barry tries to tell them that it’s really not as great as they make it out to be, he is secretly quite pleased with himself and how those two really seem to have enjoyed his food. Having the opportunity to cook for others is always nice, doubly so when those people like what he’s made.

“Barry, you’re nuts if you don’t think that this is the most delicious thing ever.” James is currently on his third helping. “This is like ambrosia to the gods.”

Hartley laughs at that and calls his friend an oaf but doesn’t disagree.

Barry’s cheeks grow warm again and he feels an intense fondness for both men. It’s still strange to think about how they’ve started to become friends over the last couple of months, maybe even before that.

This notion causes a number of familiar conflicting feelings inside him to rise, which put a bit of a damper on his mood. To get his mind off them, he asks whether they would mind if he quickly prepares a small dessert.

They don’t, and Hartley lends him a hand with it while James is apparently too full to really move from his seat.

Later, while James is dozing on his couch, tired out from all the food, Barry and Hartley sit together in a companionable silence over some ginger tea at the kitchen table.

Having both of them over again is nice, as is usually the case when they pass by, which has started to happen rather regularly since the Rouges have suddenly reappeared in his life. Contrary to today, Barry had been quite angry with Hartley when he passed by Mrs. Ming’s store out of the blue one late afternoon after not hearing even a word from him for two months.

Hartley took it with patience, and while Barry was a bit cold towards him at first, he didn’t ask him to leave. This led to the ginger staying around long enough to help him with the closing and his initial anger and hurt finally gave way to feeling glad that he had seen him again and that he was alright.

Barry has asked neither Hartley nor James so far why they had made themselves scarce for so long without any explanation, and he will probably leave it that way. If Len’s excuse about his own absence had been at least partly true, it means that they probably had been busy with another heist or something connected to one, and he really doesn’t want to get too involved in any of that.
He just finds it a bit odd that he hasn’t read anything connecting to the Rogues in any of the newspapers so far when skimming the ones offered at work.

“Is the book about meditation to help you with your sleeping issues?”

Hartley nods to the book he has been looking through for the past few minutes.

“Yes, a friend g-got it f-for m-me.”

“Has it helped so far?” asks the younger man curiously.

“S-somew-what. It of-fers m-mostly b-breath-thing t-techn-niques a-and they help m-me r-relax, b-but n-not r-really w-with f-falling asleep o-or g-going b-back t-to it.”

“That sucks.”

Barry agrees, but he knows that this is one of the things he can’t really change, so that he doesn’t try to let himself get pulled down by it. Problems with his sleep have followed him around since childhood, and while they are especially bad right now once more, nothing of this is anything new to him.

Hartley and James decide to leave around half past twelve, when Sam comes to pick them up from Barry’s bathroom mirror.

“Seriously, the next thing we’re getting you is a damn standing mirror,” grunts the acrobat as he climbs into the mirror-verse with some apparent difficulty.

“Screw you, Scudder, you’re getting older too, and uglier by the minute.”

Sam only snorts with a smirk and steps aside when James finally enters.

“Thanks again for the wonderful meal, Barry,” thanks Hartley, who is next to enter the mirror, and gives him a warm smile.

“And don’t forget that we’re passing by again next Saturday!” adds James, which causes the ginger to shoot him an annoyed look.

“Only if it’s alright with you, and you have time for us,” Hartley points out and ignores his friend’s protests.

Barry agrees and watches them go.

His flat appears very quiet after they leave, and he decides to go to bed.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you liked the chapter!

I want to briefly touch upon the version of Len in my story and how (jackass-ish) he probably comes over right now.

I tend to write some things out rather plainly while others are kept more subtle and for the characters and story to explain over time, which is the point with Len's current behaviour that may confuse some of you - or not and if not, then don't bother reading on as it is really not that necessary for the story and just some extra information.

In this chapter especially, Len comes over like a total bastard for how he has treated Barry in this and the last chapter… and he kind of is, tbh, but before you grab your torches and pitchforks, I wanna remarks that he isn't behaving like a dick because he actually wants to hurt Barry or because he doesn’t care for him but because has some isses regarding his feeling for him and trouble how to deal with them.

Len is about five-ish years older than Barry in this story (not as big of an age gap between them as there is on the current TV show and while they’ve never really put an actual age to about anybody in the comics, I've still always considered him a couple of years older than Barry). This makes him around 47 years right now and, so far, he's had nothing but heterosexual relationships in his life (well, he deviated once slightly but you will learn about it later in the story).

He grew up in a time and in an environment where men just weren’t gay and those who were, weren’t considered real men and while Len doesn’t have problem with gay people per se (he couldn't care less about Hartley’s sexual orientation as long as it doesn't interfere with their business), he has very much a problem with the notion that he could be one of them - like one of those people his father sneered at (and so did his grandfather, his actual male rolemodel during his earlier childhood).

To keep this from getting too long, Len likes Barry, very much so - so much so that he can't ignore that he feels more for him than he should as a heterosexual man and while he is good at dealing with problems in general, when it comes to this he is pretty much at a loss what to do about it.

Thus, he may make some questionable decisions and choices and may try to reassure himself of being a 'real' man by sleeping with Izzy or any other whore or by keeping some distance to Barry and trying to convince himself that he doesn't see him as anything else but a very good friend.

... and unintentionally hurts Barry by doing so.

So, enough of my rambling, next chapter will be up on next Sunday. I am a bit busy with university and work and June will be an utter horror when it comes to exams… but I still hope that I can keep my schedule of once a week.

I hope you guys have enjoyed the chapter and thank you so much for your amazing feedback. It really makes me always happy to hear from you.
Chapter Summary

Barry is reminded that you can try to forget your past but it will still stick with you, no matter what. He also learns that he probably won't have the possibility to talk to Len for a while longer.

Chapter Notes

Warning: Deals briefly with traumatic past events, so please be cautious when reading on.

This is more a in-between chapter. I wasn't sure whether I should post this alone or together with the next one but I think it stands well enough on its own. It is a bit of a breather before things pick up with the Rogues and the rest once more.

Also, thanks so much to all of you amazing people who took the time to give me feedback. It makes me really happy to see that you enjoy this story! :)

And I want to thank my wonderful new beta, the amazing palpablenotion, for being kind enough to edit this chapter and doing a really magnificent job at it.

Update: The chapter is now edited by the amazing MeteoraWrites! (14th of February, 2019)

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

A loud rapping against his door startles Barry from his nap, and he feels so disorientated and confused for a moment that he is too afraid to move.

The knocking sounds again, louder than before, and he finally realizes that he’s in his own flat, on his couch, safe. Well, mostly safe, because whoever is in front of his door doesn’t sound like they have anything too good in mind for him. A soft curse passes his lips as he tries to sit up, which causes a sharp pain to flash through his body, so much so that breathing briefly becomes difficult.

With a groan, he rolls onto his side and is able to push himself over the edge of the couch in a way that has him landing on his knees. Another sharp pain flashes through his head and he wonders what caused him to be so damn dumb as to actually fall asleep on that cursed thing.

Whoever is in front of his door starts to bang on it again, and with such force that Barry is sure that the wood won’t last much longer if this should persist. Starting to get scared, he forces himself to his feet and watches his entrance indecisively for a couple of seconds. He hasn’t forgotten that the former tenant from the flat above his has died about a month ago in his own four walls, and he wouldn’t be able to do anything should there really be someone out there intending to harm him.

“Open the fucking door, Allen!” hisses a familiar voice, which causes him to momentarily relax.
before he realizes that it probably shouldn’t calm him down given that an obviously furious Len is in front of his door.

He jumps slightly when there is another bang against his door, and he’s certain that he saw it shaking on its hinges this time. Reluctantly, he makes a couple of steps towards his entrance and asks loud enough for the other man to hear him.

“Wh-what a-are y-you d-doing h-here, L-Len?”

“Open this fucking door or I’ll kick it in!”

“I-it is n-nearly m-m-midn-night! St-stop m-making s-such a-a r-ruk-kus and c-calm d-down!”

Another forceful hit against the wood and Barry really starts to get scared. He has no idea what has the other man so agitated.

Then Len speaks again, but this time he doesn’t sound like himself at all and Barry is suddenly frozen in fear.

“Open this fucking door, you little bitch, or you can be sure that your next lesson won’t just end with you bleeding from your ass!”

It’s Michael, and then he hears the laughter of some of the other guards through his door as well, just as familiar and just as horrifying. Barry loses the control over his bladder and wakes up.

It’s become something of a habit for Barry to read the newspaper when it gets slow during the work day. Usually this happens in the early afternoon, from around one pm till four, when most people are at work and the pensioners and young mothers have already done their grocery shopping for the day.

He enjoys this opportunity to read up on what’s going on in the twins, or in the world at large, and Mrs. Ming doesn’t mind. They sometimes even talk about any interesting news there’s been when she invites him up for a cup of tea after he’s finished closing at times.

Barry puts down the last can of beans that will fit on the shelves near the counter, and decides that now would be a good time to grab a paper and busy himself a little. He carries the box with the rest of the cans back to the small storeroom before walking towards the newspaper rack that is close to the entrance.

Mrs. Ming is usually the one who takes care of the magazines, and he always likes the little surprise of seeing what’s new there other than the daily papers. Thus, he is slightly disappointed that there are no new science or cooking themed magazines yet. He decides to pick the “Daily Bits”; one of the smaller news magazines, which isn’t too heavy on gossip. There’s also the “Central City Citizen” available, but he can hardly look at it without getting goose bumps, so he always forgoes it.

The black and white title of the magazine is easy to spot, and he’s already looking forward to the couple of crossword and Sudoku puzzles they always offer their readers. His good mood vanishes as soon as his eyes land on the front page, along with its head line, and he feels his stomach start to sink.

“Flash saves the day again! The Twins’ most notorious criminals are back in Iron Heights – how long will they decide to stay there this time before pestering the cities again?”
Under the bold words, there is a picture of the Central City’s National History Museum with a couple of police cars in front of it. Barry scans it swiftly, but can’t make Len or any of the others out. It was probably taken after everything was already over.

The story is on pages four and five, and there are actually a couple of pictures of the Rogues; but only mug-shots, which means that they had most likely already been taken into custody before the first reporters were able to get there. There are also pictures of the damage that was done to the museum during their fight with the Flash, but it doesn’t look too bad, mostly just crashed vitrines.

Barry makes his way back to the counter while he’s reading the article, and he learns that Wally hadn’t been able to catch all of the Rogues; which usually is the case with them. They are good at causing distractions, and more often than not there are at least one or two who are able to get away. This is also one of the reasons why they never stay in prison for long; they always haul each other out as soon as the opportunity to do so offers itself.

This time the unlucky ones were Captain Cold, the Top, Piper, and Captain Boomerang, and – should you trust Wolfe’s statement – it would be the last anybody has seen of them outside the walls of his prison. Barry doubts this very much, but quickly proceeds on because he really doesn’t need to be reminded of this man and the merciless way he’s handling that horrible place.

He skips the next part of the story, which is mostly about Iron Heights and the question of how safe this place really is, and goes on to where the author is talking about the recent series of gallery and museum robberies that had kept the twins’ police on their toes.

Barry usually tries to ignore it when any report about Len and the others is on the radio or in the papers, which is why he is quite surprised by the sheer number of heists they have been pulling over the last couple of months. Suddenly, Len’s claim that he has been busy doesn’t seem so far-fetched anymore.

Frowning, he reads the list of places they have supposedly robbed, and he wonders how they’ve been able to get away with that many jobs, especially so close to each other, as the police and both Wally and Jay had to be very much on alert due to the frequency of them.

Then, he notices that one of the robberies had taken place on a Thursday about three weeks ago, and he knows that this is more than unlikely, seeing as that was the rather disastrous night he wanted to visit Len at his home, and the Rogues hardly ever do a job without Cold.

Somehow, this seems fishy to him, but there isn’t really much he can do about it. It seems like he wouldn’t see again Len for a long while, not that the man hadn’t been avoiding him anyway, and he isn’t sure whether he would really touch on the subject to begin with. He likes Len, even though he can be such a damn jackass at times, and he also likes the other Rogues, but he still feels very uneasy every time he is reminded of what they do for a living and who they once were to each other.

The article goes on with some speculations about where the rest of the Rogues could be hiding out right now, and some quips against the CCPD and KCPD as well as against both of the cities speedsters for letting this happen, and their seeming inability to make sure they don’t cause any more chaos for the cities.

Barry feels quite unsettled after finishing it, and he can’t help but worry about the men who are now most likely already in their cells in the Heights.

He doesn’t feel like solving any puzzles anymore, and instead puts the paper back to the rack before starting to clean the store, even though it isn’t necessary at this time.
Mrs. Ming, who comes to check up on everything a bit after three, pick up that something is worrying him, and brings him some tea and crackers. Barry doesn’t feel like talking, and she doesn’t try to urge him to. He’s still very grateful for her company.

Mary picks up on the fact that something is bothering him as well, and convinces Barry to join her on a trip to Jones Park, which is about an hour away by bus. It’s a rather big park at the southern border of Keystone, not too far away from the Missouri River, with wooden picnic tables, a playground, and even a small pond.

Due to the nice weather it’s quite crowded when they arrive, and Barry mostly feels tense and uneasy for a bit. His younger friend seems to have expected it though, as she leads him to an area that isn’t as full of people where it is much easier for him to breath.

They pull out a picnic blanket Mary brought and have a late lunch consisting of tuna salad and a fresh baguette they had bought on their way here.

Barry starts to relax, and while a part of him probably would have preferred to stay indoors and hidden away from the world, he can’t deny that it is nice to be out here with his friend.

Mary clearly enjoys their small endeavor, and her good mood is quite infectious, after all.

September 1st year

The next stop is his, and Barry, who has been watching the city move by outside the bus window, gets up to get to the exit in time.

It’s hot in here, partly due to how packed it is, and partly due to the unusual heatwave they are currently having this late into summer. It causes Barry to look forward to finally getting out of here.

The bus is clearly lacking air conditioning, which makes it even worse for him compared to the other passengers, as he is wearing long sleeves and pants. This has also caused him to get a couple of funny looks so far, but he’s use to them by now and just ignores it.

A young woman, who has been sitting next to him, gives him an annoyed look as she moves to let him pass, and he is once again reminded how this unusual high temperature for this late in September causes everybody to grow increasingly irritable and impatient. He stammers a thanks, but she only huffs in return and swiftly moves over to the seat at the window he had occupied before.

As soon as the bus comes to a creaking halt and the door opens a gush of fresh air greets him, which isn’t much cooler but much less stuffy.

The streets are mostly empty, as the majority of people are trying to escape from the 100 plus °F heat and hide in their homes or someplace else to cool off. Though there are a couple of teenage boys out, most likely around 17, who are listening to music on one of their mobile phones at the street corner before his apartment building. They make a couple of stupid comments about his choice of clothing, but let him pass without any trouble when Barry doesn’t show any reaction to their goading.

It’s Saturday evening, close to nine, and while it isn’t completely dark yet, he already feels exhausted enough to look forward to his bed. Thanks to the new people who moved into the apartment above his, he usually doesn’t have to worry about being kept up by loud techno music till dawn anymore. They’re still very noisy, but no more so than the other people around him, and he is usually able to ignore them with the help of his earplugs.

As soon as he enters his apartment building he’s greeted by much cooler air, and he stops for a second at the bottom of the staircase to enjoy the comfortable change of temperature. The building has no air conditioning, as it’s rather old, and its outer walls are made of bricks, which makes it possible for the air inside to not overheat during the day.

After another moment he starts to climb the stairs up to his floor. The entrance door opens behind him just as he has reaches the first landing, and he briefly glances over his shoulder to see who it is.

“Hey neighbor, what a nice surprise to finally meet you somewhere other than the fire escape.”

Edward grins up at him from the foot of the stairs before he jogs up to him. Barry, who is quite surprised by this unexpected meeting, tries to take a step back from the other man as unobtrusively as possible as soon as the other man reaches him and stops in a much too close proximity for his liking.

The other man doesn’t seem to notice.

“We’ve been neighbors for over six months now, it’s about time I finally meet you without bars between us,” he goes on and Barry notices that he seems to be in a very good mood today.

The last time they had spoken was about a week back. It had been late at night again, as he usually climbs out onto his fire escape when he can’t sleep these days. The current weather makes it nearly unbearably hot, even during the nights, and it hardly makes a difference whether he’s inside or outside, but he still prefers it to the cold. It’s just nice to get some fresh air without freezing. It helps him to think and relax.

Edward isn’t always there, and he doesn’t always join him even when he notices him outside, which is an oddly calming observation on Barry’s part. They still usually meet about once a week out there, never on arrangement, although it’s kind of a predictable possibility, seeing as neither of them has the healthiest sleep pattern. It’s a nice coincidence though, and some nights Barry even hopes for Edward to join him out there for a bit.

Having the other man standing directly in front of him is an entirely different experience than having some safe distance and two metal railings between them. It’s also the first time that he sees him in proper lighting, without shadows concealing any of his features. He notices that he has to be a bit younger than he initially guessed, maybe not in the end of his thirties but more towards the middle or even the beginning.

His hair is about the shade he had initially guessed, a darker strawberry blond. Now, in the light, he’s also able to make out that his eyes are a very dark blue, and he notices the bout of pale freckles across his nose and cheeks. Like most people right now, he is wearing a T-shirt and shorts, in his case, simple grey Bermuda's.

“Are you just coming from work?” asks Edward, and Barry feels rather awkward when he realizes that he has been eyeing the other man rather openly for what must have been at least a couple of seconds.

“Y-yeah, th-the s-store closes a-at s-seven o-on S-Saturd-days.”

“You’re working from Monday to Saturday?”

“U-usually.”

His neighbor nods quietly and it’s then that Barry notices he’s studying him rather unabashedly now as well. He quickly grows uncomfortable under his scrutinizing, because he knows how odd he has to look in his long sleeve shirt and pants during this heatwave, but Edward picks up on it and turns his gaze back to face him.

“You want to join me for a beer? Or a glass of cold lemonade? I went a little bit overboard and made a whole jug of it just this morning. It turned out pretty amazing, not to toot my own horn,” offers Edward with a slight smirk.

The thought of accepting the offer and spending some time with the other man alone in his flat doesn’t sit too well with Barry. Edward seems to be a rather nice guy, who is surprisingly friendly towards him, but he knows from experience that this doesn’t necessarily mean anything.

“S-sorry, b-but I-I am r-rather t-tired.”

“I see,” says his neighbor, and he watches him with a slight frown before he remarks somewhat hesitantly. “You look rather pale. Maybe you should wear something shorter in this heat?”

Barry flushes and averts his eyes.

“I-I… I d-don’t…”

“Sorry, look, it’s none of my business to tell you what to wear. I didn’t mean to make you uncomfortable,” Edward interrupts him when he notices how self-consciously he is reacting to his remark.

“N-no, i-it’s f-fine. I kn-know th-that it i-is s-stupid t-to r-run ar-round l-like th-this i-in th-this h-heat b-but… b-but I-I… i-it m-makes… I-I h-have t-to.”

Barry doesn’t need to look to the other man to know that he’s studying him with a mixture of curiosity and concern now. It’s rather predictable how people react to an explanation like this, and he feels like such a fool again for even attempting to.

An uncomfortable silence follows, and Barry asks himself if this was the last time he would be invited over to his neighbors flat. He isn’t really sure whether he would be glad about it or not.

“Well, if you feel better tomorrow you can pass by anytime. I probably won’t leave my flat if I don’t have to. I’m not the biggest fan of this weather, and I think we’ll get up to 104 tomorrow, which is fucking insane.”

Barry meets the other man’s eyes in surprise and notices that he isn’t watching him like he is cuckoo, which is quite unexpected.

“So, just pass by whenever you feel like it, I really don’t mind.”

“Ok-kay,” he answers hesitantly, still a bit caught off-guard that he hasn’t put him off with his odd behavior.

“Great,” smiles Edward, and he turns to proceed up the stairs to their floor, but shoots him an amused glance before he does so. “Well, I will be spending the next hour either in my fridge or under an ice-cold shower, so just come back a bit later should I not immediately answer, in case you change your mind about the lemonade.”

Barry just nods quietly, not sure how else to response to that, and watches how the man swiftly proceeds up the stairs while he follows at a much more moderate pace.
The conversation with Edward keeps his mind occupied for a while afterwards.

Chapter End Notes

Edward is going to be a regular in this story as you have probably already guessed. As I've stated before, I started this story a while before the TV show was even announced and I don't want people to get confused with a character that shares his name. This Edward has nothing to do with the TV show one, I initially intended to call him Eddie but because I fear that this could lead to confusion, I will change it to Eddy instead. Yes, not that huge of a difference but, well...

Anyway, credits for the change go to palpablenotion, who suggested it to me.

Next week's chapter will have more Rogues and also some Jay in it.

Feel free to let me know what you think, I always enjoy hearing from you!
Someone is in his flat.

This realization causes Barry’s mind to snap to attention even in its half-asleep state. His stomach cramps up painfully at that notion, but he forces himself to stay completely still and quiet. He listens, and tries to decide if he hadn’t just spooked himself for no reason.

There’s the noise again, footsteps. Someone’s in his living room.

The fear is nearly smothering, as his mind hasn’t completely caught up with where he is right now, and he’s certain that one of the guards is out there. Maybe even Michael. This notion causes him to groan quietly when his stomach makes a painful and sickening jolt.

Then, there is a knock against his bedroom door and Barry freezes again.

Before he has the opportunity to realize that it’s quite unlikely that any intruder to his home who wants to cause harm him would be considerate enough to knock before entering, a familiar voice sounds through his closed bedroom door.

“Barry?”

It’s James. He frowns and tries to come up with an explanation as to why the younger man would be in his home right now, in the middle of the night no less.

“Hey, Barry?” asks the criminal again, a bit louder this time. “Are you awake?”

Someone snorts at that on the other side of the door and it isn’t James. Barry feels the apprehension return at the notion that the other man isn’t the only one here.

“For fuck’s sake, Tricks, why are you even pretending to care? Just open the damn door already and wake him up.”

“N-no!”

The word has passed his lips before Barry even realizes it.

“You are awake!”
James sounds oddly delighted by this, and the door handle starts to move a second later much to Barry’s horror. It stops suddenly again, though.

“You’ve heard the man, he doesn’t want you noisy twerps in his bedroom.”

“Hey! I am no twerp, and I am not noisy! You’re the twerp!”

“Whatever, just let him get up in peace,” retorts Sam before he directs his next words toward Barry. “Sorry about the very early wake up call, Allen, but this annoying fellow here wouldn’t stop pestering me about getting him over to your place. Just take your time, I’ll make us some coffee in the meantime.”

“I am not annoying!!!”

Barry, who is still in his bed, listens to them move away from his door. He turns towards his small analogue clock with the glowing hands, and sees that it’s already past five in the morning. For a split-second he panics because he thinks he’s overslept for work, till he remembers that today is Sunday.

The thought of leaving his bedroom isn’t a very appealing one right now. He’s still tired, and had hoped to be able to sleep in today, but he also doesn’t want to leave those two unsupervised while they’re in his living room. It isn’t as if there is a lot they could take, or that he thinks that they would do so to begin with, at least not James, but the notion itself doesn’t sit well with him.

With a low sigh, he gets up and slowly makes his way over to the door. His right hip has been causing him some trouble for a couple of days now, due to the cool and wet weather, and he tries to ease the pain by taking smaller steps, mostly shuffling his feet on his way to the door.

The light in his living area is on and he has to squint, as the brightness makes it difficult to see for a second. He’s still able to make James out, who is scurrying over to him.

“Barry! Can you make us pancakes?!”

From the direction of the kitchenette, he can hear Sam snort before he picks up on the sound of water running. It seems Sam is making good on his promise to make coffee. This doesn’t lift his mood at all.

“Please, with chocolate and strawberries and everything you always see in the commercials!”

“C-could y-you s-step b-back a-a b-bit, p-please?”

James frowns for a moment before he realizes that he is quite close, and quickly does as asked. A slightly embarrassed expression crosses his face.

“Sorry, didn’t want to make you uncomfortable.”

“I-it’s f-f-fine,” smiles Barry tiredly, and he feels already a bit better with some additional space between them. He rubs his eyes before meeting James’ gaze once more. “I-I d-don’t h-have th-th-ing-gredients t-to m-make p-pan-cakes, J-James.”

The other man makes a face as if someone has just kicked his puppy, and Barry knows that it’s ridiculous but he actually starts to feel bad because of it.

“But you make the best food.” argues James, as if this would make a difference.

“I-I a-am s-sorry b-b-but-“
“Yeah, your fridge looks like one of the saddest places I’ve ever seen,” interrupts Sam, which causes Barry to frown in annoyance. He carefully steps around James to see what the other man is doing. As he had expected, his fridge is currently wide open with Sam studying its contents, much to his displeasure and embarrassment.

“C-could y-you c-close i-it, p-please?” he asks sharply and the criminal’s amused glance towards him causes him to bristle. “Th-this i-isn’t y-your p-place. D-don’t o-open a-anyth-thing w-without a-asking f-first.”

“Calm down, I was just looking for milk,” Sam tells him with a frown, and audibly closes the fridge again. “Not that there is any, for that matter.”

Barry scowls slightly and makes his way over to the other man. He tries not to show how much his hip is bothering him right now.

“I-I h-haven’t had th-the t-time t-to g-go sh-shopping y-yet,” he explains, and silently berates himself for feeling the damn need to do so in the first place. “I-it i-isn’t a-as i-if I-I w-was exp-pecting a- anyb-body.”

He notices how Sam studies him quietly for a second. His expression doesn’t give much away, and he doesn’t know why but his embarrassment suddenly grows worse.

“I-is th-there a-a-anyth-thing o-on y-your m-mind y-you w-would l-like t-to sh-share?” he bites out and he feels the urge to hit his unwanted guest, as his considering expression changes to one of open amusement.

“Nah, I am fine,” replies Sam with a shrug, and he shoots him a smile that shows too many teeth. He then turns to James. “Well, it looks as if you dragged my ass over here for nothing, Tricks. Why am I not surprised?”

“Hey! I didn’t!” argues the other Rogue, but he seems rather half-hearted about it. His disappointment about the whole thing is hard to miss, and Barry starts to feel slightly worried about the way he’s behaving right now.

James has been doing so much better for a while, and seeing him like this again is quite disconcerting. Maybe it’s because Hartley is still in Iron Heights. The two are usually always together, and it would be plausible that he is reacting to his friend’s sudden absence rather strongly.

“Let’s just go,” says Sam, who turns towards the bathroom, and Barry considers covering the damn mirror above his sink with something as soon as they’re gone, seeing as he isn’t keen on any more of this unannounced early morning visits.

“But, Sam,” whines James, and he throws Barry a helpless look before his expression suddenly brightens and a wide grin spreads over his lips. “Wait a minute, you don’t have the ingredients? Well, no trouble there! Sam and I can go and pick all that stuff up, you just have to tell us what you need.”

Both Barry and Sam protest this suggestion at the same time.

“What the hell, I’m no damn delivery service, James!” argues the other Rogue, clearly irked by his friends idea.

“I d-don’t h-have th-the m-money t-to b-buy a-all th-the ing-gredients y-you n-need f-for p-panc-cakes,” explains Barry, and he firmly adds when he sees that James wants to object. “And I d-don’t w-want y-you t-to s-steal th-them.”
His friend actually looks a bit disappointed at that statement, while Sam scoffs quietly but lifts both of his hands in a placating manner when Barry glares at him in response.

“We wouldn’t steal them, we would buy them, fair and square, really!” tries James again, and he throws a look to the other criminal as if to ask him to confirm his words. Sam stays quiet and only returns his colleague’s gaze with a rather annoyed one. He obviously doesn’t think all that much of the suggestion to actually go shopping.

Ignoring the lack of support, James turns back to Barry again with a pleading look.

“You can pay us back later, like with the stuff Hartley and I bring over,” he goes on. “As soon as you have the money, you can give it to us. This is no different, Barry.”

Barry expects Sam to comment on this, as it’s obvious that it wouldn’t happen any time soon that he gets the amount money together that they would have to spend. The other man doesn’t, though. Instead, he rubs his forehead and sighs rather loudly.

“You are such a fucking pest, Tricks, I have no idea how Piper can stand having you around all the time.”

James only grins, well too aware that the other Rogue has given in and will get him to a place where they can buy the ingredients they need for breakfast.

“Come on, Barry, please?” asks the younger blond, and he gives him his best puppy eyes, which cause Barry to actually chuckle despite the situation he’s in right now.

“Y-you are n-not g-going t-to st-steal t-the f-food,” he reminds them and is mostly looking at Sam while he says so, which causes the other man to huff but nod his agreement nonetheless. “G-good, and I w-will p-pay y-you b-back.”

James just nods dutifully before he turns around and is about to hurry back to the still open bathroom door, before Barry stops him once more.

“D-do y-you n-need th-the l-list o-of ing-gредients or d-do y-you kn-know wh-what t-to p-put i-into a-a p-panc-cake b-batter?” he asks, but he’s quite certain that he already knows the answer.

Five minutes later, he is alone in his flat again, and is still not sure what exactly has just happened. His mind feels too groggy to really worry about it for now though, and he decides to take a quick shower before his two guests return. He’s careful about covering the mirror for the duration of it.

It doesn’t take long for James and Sam to get the needed ingredients, and they’re back about twenty minutes later.

“And they call us criminals,” mutters Sam rather irritably as he puts the paper shopping bag on the kitchen table. “Four bucks for a carton of stupid eggs, really?”

“Wh-why d-did y-you b-buy s-such exp-pensive o-ones?”

“What do you mean? They just had these one. How the hell should I know what’s expensive when it comes to this stuff?”

“Y-you d-don-n’t go sh-shopping v-very often, d-do you?”

The incredulous look he gives Barry in return is answer enough, and he decides to let the topic rest and instead ask him if he still wants to have some coffee. Sam agrees readily.
It doesn’t take long for the pancakes to be done, and the sweet smell of them soon fills his small flat. It’s a bit amusing when Barry notices that they even bought strawberries on their shopping trip, and it turns out to be quite a nice addition to the sweet taste of the rest of their food.

“I understand now what the twerp was going on about.” Sam tells him after he eats the first few bites of the dish and shoots Barry an appreciative look while he ignores James to make the exclamation of “This is fucking brilliant. I don’t think that I’ve ever eaten such tasty pancakes in my life.”

Barry frowns slightly and shoots him a wary look, as he isn’t sure if he means it or he’s just making fun of him. He knows that he cooks well enough, he always had a knack for it. He usually likes it when Mary praises his meals, but it’s different when it comes from someone like Sam, whom he wouldn’t have expected to hand a compliment out like that. Contrary to James and Hartley, he hasn’t spent much time with him so far, and, like with the rest of the Rogues, he usually has the feeling that he prefers it that way, which is fine with him.

“You aren’t really good with compliments, are you?” asks Sam with a smirk, and it’s then that Barry realizes that he has been watching him with a rather dark expression so far.

“S-sorry,” he mutters and turns back to his plate while he tries to will the heat in his face away.

“I told you he’s an amazing cook,” interjects James and he huffs. “You guys never believe me about anything.”

“Come on, Trickster, that isn’t true,” Sam assures him, audibly amused by his friend’s sulking. “I wouldn’t have agreed to come here if I hadn’t taken your word for it, would I now?”

James squints at the other man for a second before he smiles again, and Barry notices once more how easily his mood seems to change these days.

There’s nothing left of the food after they’re finished eating, which is quite an impressive feat, seeing as there had been quite a big stack of pancakes to begin with. Still, while he had hoped to have some left overs for later today, it’s nice to feel full and have his cooking appreciated like this.

It’s honestly surprising to him when both James and Sam help him with the dishes.

“Don’t look so shocked,” grins Sam as he brings over his plate and mug to the kitchen sink, and he shrugs slightly. “Despite what most of our bolt-holes look like, most of us prefer having it clean as opposed to living in filth.”

“Th-then wh-why are you n-not t-taking b-better c-care of y-your p-places?”

“Honestly? Because the others don’t, and you can be sure as soon as I touch something those jackasses will expect me to clean up after them as if I were their damn mother,” explains Sam, and he thinks for a second before he adds. “I think it’s the same excuse for the others as well. Well, expect for Digger. That slob just couldn’t care less.”

Barry watches the other man in disbelief before he snorts and shakes his head.

“You are th-the l-laziest b-bunch of p-people I-I kn-know.”

James helps him with drying the dishes while Sam returns to his seat at the table with another mug of coffee.

“So, now that we’re all sated and everything is clean again, what do you think of a game of poker?”
While James is immediately all for it, Barry hesitates. Partly because he had expected them to leave now and, partly because he has no money to bet with.

“We can play for the crackers.” suggests Sam, and he holds up the bright bag of said food which they had brought back from their small shopping trip. Barry doesn’t like that the other man seems to have immediately grasped what his reason for hesitation is.

“Yeah, crackers!” agrees James readily and he makes his way over to the table to take his seat again.

Barry follows at a more moderate pace, but decides to play along. He doesn’t have anything else to do today, and it’s nice to have them around despite his initial reservations.

This morning has turned out to be surprisingly nice after all, and he decides to go with it for a bit longer.

A small voice in his head urges him to ask about Len and the others, but he shoves it aside. He feels relaxed right now, and he doesn’t want to bring an end to his good mood so soon. Still, the worry stays despite his effort to ignore it.

Jay passes by one evening a couple of days later. Barry has just come home from work, and was preparing himself some soup when a knocking on the door catches his attention.

Like last time, he is quite taken aback by the unexpected visit, and his throat closes up on him before he is even able to utter a single word. Not that he would have really known what to say anyway, seeing as he thought the other man’s last visit would be a onetime occurrence.

“Hello.” Jay greets him with a somewhat uncertain smile, and apologizes for passing by unannounced once again. He doesn’t mention that it is likely due to the lack of a phone on Barry’s part.

“I hope I’m not interrupting anything?”

Barry eyes Jay somewhat warily but seeing as he hasn’t been doing much other than preparing his dinner, he shakes his head and steps aside to let him in. It’s rather obvious that he hasn’t come by to just exchange a couple of words on his doorsteps.

The older man thanks him with an oddly relieved expression on his face, which Barry isn’t sure what to make of. Had he expected him to send him away? As if he really had that choice.

With a slight frown, he closes the door and motions Jay to take a seat at his kitchen table like last time.

Again, he shows him the package of coffee and, again, the other man accepts.

They don’t talk as he prepares the drinks, and he tries to concentrate only on the little task, and not on the presence behind him.

“Thanks,” nods Jay as he accepts the mug about five minutes later.

Barry nods and takes the seat opposite to him. His throat still hasn’t really relaxed enough for him to not sound like a complete idiot should he attempt to speak right now, so he prefers to stay quiet instead.
Jay has most likely come here for a reason, and he could just tell him so without some forced niceties beforehand. It’s a bit rude, but Barry hasn’t been sleeping well again, and he feels tired and uncomfortable enough in his own skin as it is. So, he doesn’t really care. The other man doesn’t comment on nor seems bothered by it, though, and instead takes a sip of his coffee.

It’s then that Barry picks up on the paper bag that is standing on the table next to him, and he frowns again as he realizes that he really hadn’t noticed it before. The notion that he could be so unsettled by his former colleague’s visit worries him, but he forces it away.

The paper bag is suddenly slid towards him, and Barry freezes in response. He can’t stop himself from blushing in embarrassment as he realizes that he must have been staring at it.

“It’s just some of the meatloaf Joan made yesterday,” explains Jay at his wary look, which he counters with a faint smile. “She really wanted me to bring some along. She also packed some mashed potatoes and gravy.”

Barry has to look away at that. A hot pain shoots through his chest, and for a few seconds he is sure that his face would crumble under the misery he feels just now.

“P-please g-give h-her m-my th-thank-ks.”

“Of course.”

Jay sounds tired, really tired, and Barry wonders why he even bothers to pass by, or why he would bring him food. It wouldn’t do either of them any good.

“Your first year of parole passed yesterday,” remarks the older man, and with that all of this makes a lot more sense. A surge of sadness nearly causes Barry to tear up before he is able to fight it off, and he nods quietly in reply.

The thought that this could be something akin to a little celebration for just that occasion is sickening. Mary wanted to do so as well, but quickly let go of that idea as soon as she realized how uneasy and depressed this idea made him.

“I can understand that you probably don’t feel like it, but this is really a good thing, Barry. Something you can be proud of.”

It’s odd, hearing Jay say this with such honesty, as if any of this means anything…

And maybe it does, at least for the old man.

“Y-yes,” agrees Barry quietly as an icy coldness take hold of his inside. This is his life now, it doesn’t matter whether it’s a lie or not. The shards are already surrounding him and the only thing he can do is pick them up and try to make the best of it. It’s just so tiring, though.

“Barry,” says Jay, and suddenly he sounds grave enough for him to actually look towards him again. “I really don’t want to upset you, I know that your life is hard enough as it is right now without someone else adding an additional burden to it, and I will leave again if you want me to.”

They hold each other’s gaze as the older man goes on in a more tentative voice.

“You probably don’t believe it when I tell you that I am sorry for what has happened, and that I am still worried about you, but I am. I never wanted any of this to happen, none of us did, and I know that you didn’t either.”
Barry isn’t sure how to respond, or how to feel. His eyes are itching again, and he averts them while he presses his lips together and he tries to concentrate on his breathing and only on his breathing.

A rather tense silence follows, and he’s grateful that Jay doesn’t try to talk to him while he tries to keep a hold of his composure.

The pain in his chest spreads to his stomach, and he starts to feel slightly sick, but he’s able to calm down enough to not make a fool of himself in front of the other man.

Barry swallows a couple of times and coughs slightly before he reluctantly turns his gaze back to his guest.

“Y-you w-want t-to s-stay f-for d-dinner?”

As soon as the words are out he could kick himself, because he’s pretty sure that Joan has most likely already prepared something, and what does he really have to offer other than instant soup and the meatloaf Jay himself has brought along.

Against his worries, the older man seems pleasantly surprised by this offer and agrees readily.

The mood between them stays somewhat stiff, and Jay is doing most of the talking, sticking to very general and safe topics. Still, when the other man leaves about an hour later, Barry feels oddly relieved and slightly hopeful.

“Something’s worrying you.”

Mary’s voice pulls him out of his thoughts and he looks over to her. They are currently in her flat, watching some old black and white movie she’s a huge fan of, and he realizes then that he must have drifted off into his own thoughts once again. He feels a bit bad about it, as she had been looking forward to showing him this film.

“S-sorry, it’s n-nothing,” he apologizes. “I’m just a-a b-bit t-tired.”

Her worried expression causes him to regret his words immediately.

“Are you having trouble sleeping again?”

She doesn’t ask if it’s the nightmares, she doesn’t have to, it’s obvious that she means them. Barry turns away from her and back to the television, where a young couple is dancing in a 40’s setting.

“You don’t have to tell me, Barry,” she adds quietly when he hasn’t answered after another long moment. “I don’t mean to snoop.”

He frowns and shoots her a brief apologetic glance.

“Y-you aren’t, M-Mary, I’m… j-just n-not f-feeling s-so g-great r-right n-now and th-there is r-really n-no r-reason f-for m-me t-to b-bother y-you w-w-with i-it.”

His younger friend gives him a sympathetic look before suddenly getting up.

At his confession, she explains that she’s going to make them some tea, and despite her insistence for him to stay put, he follows her along to her small kitchen.

“Y-you d-don’t h-have t-to, M-Mary, I d-don’t w-want t-to b-bring y-you d-d-down w-with o-one of m-my st-stupid n-nightm-mares again.”

A couple of weeks ago, she had asked him for the first time about his obvious trouble sleeping, and Barry, who has been exhausted and in an especially sad mood, had actually confided in her, at least partly, about what his dreams are about. He didn’t go into anything specific, and he left all the gruesome and ugly details about what had been done to him out, but Mary still seems to have gotten the gist of it.

“Barry,” starts the young woman, and she turns away from the stove where she had just put the really outdated kettle she usually uses to heat water on one of the hot plates. Her expression is a serious one.

“This is no trouble, really. You’re having nightmares, which is a serious issue, one that isn’t your fault or something you can do anything about. I’m not angry or annoyed by it, or if you confide in me about what is bothering you.”

She nods toward the entrance behind which lays her living room and where the movie is currently still playing.

“We can watch the movie any time. I’ve seen it so many times that I know it by heart, and I want you to enjoy it as well.”

“I am,” Barry protests rather feebly, but he’s stopped from any further arguing by the clearly incredulous look his friend is giving him. Feeling like such a damn burden again, he averts his eyes to the ground and frowns unhappily. When he came over about an hour ago, he had really hoped that this would be able to lift his spirits, but instead he is bringing Mary down with him because of how damn stubborn his mind is about antagonizing him with those damn memories.

A soft touch to his right upper arm causes him to flinch back, and he’s surprised and slightly worried that he hadn’t picked up on it at all that Mary has made her way over to him. She pulls her hand back, but meets his gaze with a tentative smile.

“You are really no bother, Barry. We all end up in rough spots at one time or another and those experiences always leave scars. It’s better to have someone to confide in,” she tells him quietly and holds his worried gaze calmly. “It makes the healing easier. You don’t have to, though, I don’t mean to force you, but just know that you can talk to me. I’m a good listener.”

The lump in his throat makes it hard to swallow, and he turns away from her. The embarrassing itching in his eyes is back and he really doesn’t want to cause her any more worries.

“Th-thank y-you.”

“Oh course.”

While Mary finishes preparing their tea, he goes back to the living room. He still isn’t able to concentrate on the movie, but even so he keeps his eyes mostly on the television screen in front of him. His friend joins him about five minutes later with two big mugs of herbal tea, and he accepts his with a grateful nod.

The movie ends just a moment later anyway, and Mary turns the television off before she takes her seat next to him. She keeps quiet and waits for him collect his thoughts.

Barry really doesn’t want to talk about what’s troubling him so much. Not just because he doesn’t want to burden his friend, but because he is mulling it over all the damn time when he’s alone with his thoughts. He had been hoping he would get a little break from it during his visit here.
“S-someo-one I-I-,” his voice gives out on him and his face turns uncomfortably warm again while he keeps his eyes stubbornly on the carpet in front of them. Mary doesn’t say anything, and after a long moment, he is able to start anew.

“S-someo-one… s-someo-one I kn-know h-has b-been… h-he… th-they a-are i-in a-a r-rath-ther r-rough a-and d-d-danger-rous p-place r-right n-now a-and… i-it i-i-isn’t a-as i-if i-i-t w-w-wasn’t th-their o-own f-fault a-and th-they kn-knew th-th-the c-c-cons-s-sequences o-of th-their ac-ctions b-but…”

Barry breaks off and clenches his teeth. The familiar anger towards Len and the others for doing this, for being who they are, rises up in his chest again. He’s also upset with himself for being stupid enough to actually care, to care enough that it keeps him up at nights and causes those damn memories to haunt him again even while he is awake.

The Rogues are not like him, hardly any other prisoner was like him when it came to his role at that place. There had been a lot of abuse going on, physical and mental, with other inmates as well, which resulted in a stay for more than one unlucky bastard in the infirmary ward every other day. What happened to him was different, though, and Barry doesn’t even want to consider what that says about him.

Still, despite his certainty that neither Len nor one of the other currently imprisoned Rogues would have to face something like that, he is well aware of what a brutal and disgusting hole that place is.

While the guards usually don’t try their luck with any of them, they would certainly make clear who the ones in charge are if anybody is stupid enough to provoke them. And if the Rogues are good at anything, it’s at picking a fight with any person they don’t like.

“Th-they a-are s-so s-s-stupid, s-so d-damn… a-and I-I a-am e-e-even w-w-worse b-bec-cause I-I sh-shouldn’t c-c-care…”

Barry rubs his eyes angrily and tries to will the urge to cry away, which has been bubbling in him for quite a while now. From experience, he knows that giving in to this will only make him feel worse, and he really doesn’t want to break down in front of Mary.

Briefly, he thinks back to the dream about Len he had weeks ago. The memory of it still makes his shudder, and afterwards had been the first time in months that he wasn’t able to keep it together.

The saying may be that letting it all out makes the pain more bearable, but he knows that this isn’t true. He felt horribly lethargic for days afterwards, and he really doesn’t want to repeat that again so soon, or at all if he can help it.

“Barry,” Mary’s quiet voice nearly startles him, as he has been so deep in his own head. Swiftly, he brushes over his eyes again, just to make sure, and glances over to her. She meets his gaze with a sad but calm expression.

“I am really sorry to hear that something like this has happened. I don’t really understand what is going on, or what those people did to cause themselves such trouble, but I know from experience that it can be a rather dangerous thing to get mixed up with those kinds of folks.”

One of her hands reaches for his upper arm, and he lets her. His body tenses up of its own accord, but he hardly pays any mind to it and neither does she.

“I-I d-didn’t w-want-t t-t-o…,” he croaks and swallows around the lump in his throat before he goes on. “I-I… b-but th-they h-helped m-me wh-while I-I w-was… th-there.”

He breaks their eye-contact to look towards the now turned off TV again.
“They helped me while they are not good people they are still much better than many I have met so far.”

A slight throbbing starts in his right temple, and he reaches up to rub the spot slightly. He usually gets headaches when he’s in a mood like this.

“I don’t know whether I want them in my life and… everything is so damn complicated…”

It used to be so much simpler, not easy, but not as messed up as it is now, not since before he went off to college.

A bitter sounding laugh passes his lips before he quietly goes on.

“I’m so ridiculous, I don’t even know whether they want to have me around for much longer anyway…”

Len had made it rather clear in keeping his distance, and by how he reacted to him the last time they had seen each other, that he had reached his limit towards him. It probably shouldn’t have been as surprising as it was back then, Barry realizes in hindsight. There had been no reason for the other man to want him around, and he is well aware of what a mess he and his life actually are.

“Damn…”

It’s difficult to keep the sadness at bay, and he jumps slightly when Mary’s hand, which is still resting on his arm, squeezes it lightly. For a split second he wants to look over to her again, but he catches himself before he does so. He knows that he wouldn’t be able to keep it together should he see pity or anything similarly disheartening on her face.

She doesn’t speak, though, and instead moves her hand slowly around his back, as if to give him time to adjust to it. His muscles grow taut enough that they actually start to hurt as he feels her move a bit closer, and while there’s nothing threatening about her, he still can’t help himself but to whimper very, very softly.

Mary makes a low shushing noise before pressing slightly against his back, and it takes him a moment to realize that she is urging him closer.

“It’s alright,” she says in a quiet and comforting tone. “You are not alone, Barry, and you are not ridiculous for caring about others.”

Something flares up painfully in his chest and he squeezes his eyes shut tightly while giving into the light pressure between his shoulders.

Her hair smells of pineapple, and he doesn’t know why but he keeps concentrating on that while he tries to keep his breathing slow and even and the cutting emotions at bay. Mary just holds him and rubs his back tentatively while he fights for his composure.

It is much later, when he is alone in his flat again, in his bed and unsuccessfully trying not to think about what occurred that evening, that he realizes that he hadn’t felt threatened by her at all. Not even with how close they had been, and despite how bone-tired and psychically spent he feels, he still is able to be somewhat reassured by this.

Chapter End Notes
Hope you liked the new chapter (with a higher percentage of Rogues in it).

Your feedback is always very much appreciated.

The next chapter will be up next Sunday and it will finally have some Barry/Len interaction again.
“Is this actually any good?”

Barry looks up from his spot at the kitchen table, where he is currently playing a game of UNO with James, to see Sam, who had been napping on his couch so far, waving something at him. His face grows uncomfortably hot when he recognizes the item, but he forces himself to still meet the other man’s slightly curious gaze despite his embarrassment.

“Is what any good?”

James, who has just collected another card from the stack, is now also looking at his colleague, clearly curious about what he’s referring to. A slightly disappointed frown appears on his face when he sees that the other man is actually just holding a book in his hand.

They came over a couple hours ago, once again unannounced, and while the hour wasn’t that ungodly early this time around, it still cost Barry a couple of hours of sleep he could have used. Thus, he had been rather curt at first, but despite his initial plan to get rid of them as quickly as possible, he somehow ended up making them breakfast once again instead, much to his exasperation.

And this time, at least, they had already brought the ingredients he needed. It also helped that James was enthusiastic enough about assisting him in preparing everything that his initially sullen mood soon lightened a bit. Sam offered to make coffee, and spent the rest of the time at the table reading a paper he had brought along.

“D-don’t l-look th-through m-my st-stuff,” Barry tells the other man rather sharply, and he tries to will the humiliation away that is currently welling up inside him.

“I didn’t look through your stuff,” scoffs Sam, and he nods in the direction of the small coffee table next to the couch. “It was just lying there, I didn’t know that it was off limits, seeing as it was in plain sight.”

“I-I d-didn’t exp-pect you t-to c-come o-over,” Barry reminds him, and can’t help but feel rather irked by the other man’s behavior. “I-I d-didn’t kn-know I-I’d h-had t-to p-p-put m-my s-stuff a-away.”
“You don’t, I’m not going to make off with it. Sheesh. I was just asking, get your head out of your ass, Allen.”

Sam rolls his eyes but before he can lay back again and vanish out of their line of sight, James stops him.

“How is it porn?”

While Barry feels like his face is close to going up in flames, this question seems to amuse Sam quite a lot.

“N-no, i-it isn’t,” he answers rather tersely and shoots the still chuckling Rogue a dark glare.

“Then what’s the big deal?”

“You d-don’t t-touch o-other p-peop-ple’s s-stuff w-without ask-king f-f-first.”

“For Pete’s sake, I am so damn sorry I picked up a book that was laying on your coffee table,” huffs Sam while James asks once more what it actually is about.

“Huh?”

“‘Calm Your Breath – Breathing exercises to reduce anxiety’,” recites the other man from the cover of the book, and Barry really wants to kick him for it.

“Breathing exercises?”

James pulls a face and gives him a rather odd look.

“Like with pregnant women?”

Sam snorts at that while Barry bites down on an annoyed groan and rubs his forehead in frustration.

“N-no, it’s s-supposed t-to h-help w-with c-calming d-d-down a-and g-getting r-relaxed.”

“Seeing how high strung you are all the damn time, this has probably been quite a useful investment,” mutters Sam loud enough for him to catch.

“You have problems with getting angry?”

“N-no, I-I h-have t-troubles f-falling a-asleep.”

Which isn’t really the only reason Mary got it for him, he’s sure, but he certainly isn’t getting into the rest of the baggage he carries around with these two.

“Oh… well, warm milk works for me rather well, maybe you should try that?” remarks James, and he watches Barry with a thoughtful expression.

“Genius, I’m pretty sure he’s tried that one already.”

“C-could y-you p-pleas-se p-put th-that away alr-ready?”

Barry shoots the other man a rather dark look after he notices that he is still holding the book.

They glare briefly at each other before Sam finally puts it back onto the table.

“Th—that i—is n-one o-of y-your b-business.”

“As if I care.”

A rather tense mood settles over the three of them afterwards and, for a while, Barry and James proceed to play their game in silence.

“You know, Sam has trouble sleeping at times too, maybe he can give you some tips?”

The younger blond glances over to the couch, where his friend is already out of sight again other than his feet. A rather incredulous snort is the only response he gets from him.

At Barry’s surprised look, James goes on.

“Warm milk doesn’t work for him either.”

“Yes, which is because I usually can’t fall asleep due to you jackasses making enough of a racket to wake the dead,” grouses the other Rogue from behind the backrest of the couch. “Not everybody wants to drink themselves unconscious every fucking night just to drone you twerps out.”

“Hey! I am not a twerp!”

“No, you are just an annoying bugger, Tricks.”

“Hey!”

Sam sits up with a huff again and shoots his colleague a rather dark look before he nods to Barry.

“I’m pretty sure that his troubles sleeping has nothing to do with noisy pals, so don’t blather on about something that is none of his business.”

As if on cue, there is a rather loud thump against the wall separating him from to his right-door neighbors, before a man starts to scream furiously in a language Barry has discern by now as probably being Italian. A woman quickly joins in soon after, and it seems that the couple next door is having one of their usual quarrels.

All three of them turn towards the source of the noise for a moment before James looks back to Sam with a lifted eyebrow, which causes the other man to huff in annoyance once more.

“Try earplugs,” he grumbles towards Barry before vanishing out of sight again.

About half an hour later, while James is using the bathroom and Barry is preparing himself another cup of tea, he hesitantly turns towards Sam, who had joined them for their last round of UNO.

“S-sorry f-for g-get-ting s-so w-wrought-u-up b-before.”

Sam, who is shuffling the UNO cards, turns to him with a slightly surprised expression that quickly turns into one of amusement.

“No worries, I’m used to being surrounded by stingy people.”

His slight scowl causes the criminal to laugh and grin.

“Allen, forget it, you’re obviously sleep-deprived, and I do actually know what that feels like. So, no hard feelings.”

Barry frowns, a bit doubtful, but nods.

After a brief moment of silence, Sam repeats his question from earlier.

“So, is it any good? The book, I mean.”

The other man’s curiosity still seems a bit strange to him, but he decides to answer nonetheless. He shrugs a bit and leans back against the kitchen counter.

“It h-helps m-me t-to r-relax somewh-what, b-but n-not r-really w-with s-sleeping.”

“And the anxiety part?”

This causes him to bristle visibly, but Sam quickly raises both of his hands in a placating manner and adds that he is just asking and not making fun of him.

“It i-is n-none of y-your b-business,” Barry grits out, and against his initial expectation of these words rubbing the other man the wrong way again, he just nods and shrugs.

“Fair enough.”

James comes back afterwards and they proceed with their next game.

Having them around isn’t really all that bad, but Barry still asks whether they don’t have anything else planned for today shortly after half past eleven.

“You wanna get rid of us already, Allen?” asks Sam in a mockingly hurt tone and he laughs at the rather dry look he gets in return.

“We aren’t really up to anything right now.” explains James, and he takes another sip from his glass of water before he goes on. “We usually don’t do much when more than three of us are in the Heights, especially not without Cold.”

“Nice, Tricks. I’m sure Len will appreciate your blathering about our inner workings to an outsider,” snorts Sam, but he doesn’t really seem that troubled by it.

“Cold likes him.” James points out with a shrug and he throws one of his cards down on the growing stack.

This comment is somehow able to make Barry feel exceedingly uncomfortable, and he fidgets in his seat while keeping his eyes on his own cards.

The next couple of turns are played in silence.

“D-do y-you kn-know if th-they are… a-alr-right?”

He can’t bring himself to look at either of his guests as he says it, and is somewhat angry at himself for asking in the first place. Still, it has been gnawing at him for a while now.

“Well, as alright as you can be in that fucking shithole,” remarks Sam as he picks a card up. He sounds quite nonchalant about it, and it doesn’t really help to ease his concern.

“Don’t worry, Bear.” adds James, and he sounds much more sympathetic than his colleague. “They can take care of themselves. We can be pretty tough if we have to.”
He shoots the other blond a hopeful glance and nods hesitantly. “Y-yeah, I-I kn-know.”

The question about whether they are going to haul them out of there is on the tip of his tongue, but he can’t bring himself to ask it. He shouldn’t have touched upon the topic in the first place, but still, he feels a bit better now.

“Hey, are you any good at making burgers?” asks Sam after a long moment of silence passed between them, and he meets Barry’s surprised and slightly annoyed look with obvious amusement. Before he can tell him that he can look for another cook, James cuts him off enthusiastically.

“Yes! Please!! Burgers!”

Despite the initial urge to tell them off, as he isn’t their damn private cook, he can’t really bring himself to do so. He’s feeling better thanks to them, after all, and while they have mostly forced their presence on his Sunday, they have also brought food, and have behaved surprisingly well for the most part.

“S-somewh-what.” he concedes hesitantly, and winces when James cries in delight once again.

It seems he wouldn’t get rid of them for at least another couple of hours, after all.

A rather harsh knock causes Barry to jump and spill most of the hot contents of the mug he has just filled over his right hand. With a soft curse, he puts it back on the counter before turning to his door with a worried expression as he grabs a dishtowel to dry himself.

It’s already half past two in the morning, and while he has gotten unexpected visitors before at a very early or very late hour, it has never been at as unreasonable a time as this.

Barry already regrets having gotten out of bed to make himself some tea. Once again, he hasn’t been able to fall asleep, and mostly tossed and turned for hours on end till the ache in his back and neck got too bothersome to bear.

There is another knock, again forceful enough to startle him, and he can’t help but feel a bit scared. His mind goes back to the dream he had nearly two months ago, and he unsuccessfully tries to reason with himself that this couldn’t be Michael. It couldn’t, the man wouldn’t be this reckless...

“Barry?”

His body freezes and his blood turns ice-cold when he hears the familiar voice of Len coming from behind the closed entrance to his flat.

For a horrible moment he expects him to hit the door again, more violently, before hearing Michael talking to him, threatening him. The fear he feels right now is so utterly smothering that for a moment he can’t breathe.

“Barry, are you there? Can you please open that damn door?”

Len doesn’t scream, or hit the door again, he doesn’t sound furious either, but oddly exhausted and this somehow shakes Barry out of his stupor.

The memory of that awful dream still lingers, but he is able to get himself to move even though he feels anything but sure on his feet.
At the door, he hesitates again and strains his ears to listen for anything. The hallway seems quiet once more, and he briefly wonders whether his tired mind hasn’t just played a horrible prank at him.

“L-Len?” he croaks quietly and doesn’t pay any heed to how much his voice is shaking.

“Yeah,” comes the answer from the other side, and despite his strained gruffness it’s still audible how relieved he is. “It’s me. Can you let me in?”

Hesitating for just another brief moment, Barry finally unlocks the door and does as asked.

His stomach makes an uncomfortable jump as soon as his eyes land upon the other man, and he immediately make a step towards him as if to assist him, but he freezes just a second later. The notion of touching anybody, even Len, who’s now standing in an obviously battered state before, him and is probably too exhausted to do any real damage even if he would want to, still makes him exceedingly uneasy. Especially after the fright he got just a moment ago.

“Hey, Allen,” greets the criminal with a crooked and tired grin, and Barry notices how heavily he is leaning against his doorframe. “Long time no see.”

A tense and uncomfortable silence follows and he isn’t sure how to react to any of this.

“Y-yeah,” he finally agrees quietly, before stepping back a bit to give him the space to enter.

Len doesn’t need more of an invitation than that, and limps his way over to the couch, which is the nearest possible place for him to get off his feet.

Barry watches him for a couple of seconds before realizing that his door is still wide open, and he quickly closes it again.

“Shit,” hisses the other man under his breath as he sits down rather clumsily. Judging by the pained expression on his face, moving isn’t a very pleasant experience for him right now. Len stays very still for a long moment after he is finally seated, his eyes closed, and Barry has the feeling that he’s trying to cope with how most of his body is likely letting him know what it thinks of him not resting sooner.

Then, he exhales slowly and turns his gaze to him. He looks bone-tired.

They watch each other quietly for a while, and Barry can’t shake the feeling of how surreal all of this is. It’s been about three months since he has seen the other man.

This causes his unannounced guest to bark a laugh before he flinches and makes a face as if someone has just stabbed him. Barry moves before he realizes what he’s doing, and just a moment later he is standing next to the other man and studying him with growing feelings of concern, frustration and a bunch of other emotions he really doesn’t want to think about right now.

“Y-you’re h-hurt,” he states rather curtly and swallows around the lump in his throat that has formed sometime over the last few minutes without his noticing.

“Y-you’re h-hurt,” he states rather curtly and swallows around the lump in his throat that has formed sometime over the last few minutes without his noticing.

His voice gets loud enough for a second that it startles both of them.

“Y-you a-are in p-pain and y-you l-look l-like s-s-someone wh-who h-has b-been r-roughly p-patched up after a-a c-car accid-dent.” Barry goes on after an uncomfortable moment passed between them.

Someone has obviously already taken care of his wounds, which is good, really good, because Barry doesn’t think that he could do so now without causing the other man some serious unintentional discomfort.

“Y-you sh-should b-be r-resting, y-you sh-should b-be in a d-damn h-hospital!”

“I’m fine, stop worrying so damn much! This is hardly the first time I’ve gotten hurt,” grunts Len, and he gives him a clearly annoyed glare.

“And th-that m-makes it b-b-better in what w-way?!”

“What do you want from me?! I didn’t come here for you to nag my damn ear off!!”

Barry wants to ask what he’s come here for then, he nearly does, but he’s able to catch himself. Both quietly glare at each other stubbornly for a while before he turns around and makes his way to his bathroom. He can feel Len’s surprised and puzzled gaze follow him out of the room.

The bottle of painkillers they gave him the day he was released is still in the small cabinet below his bathroom sink, and he pulls it out to study its expiration date. The pills are still fine, safe to take for another year, and there’s still nearly half the bottle left. He takes them with him back out to his living room, where Len is waiting for him.

Barry grabs a glass of water for the other man but hesitates to bring it over. “H-have y-you eaten a-anything r-recently?”

Len, who is not really able to turn his upper body to face him, throws him a confused look over his shoulder before he seems to get what he means. “I had dinner.”

“Th-that w-was m-more th-than eight h-hours ago,” states Barry, who is still able to remember when mealtime is at the Heights. “Y-you d-didn’t eat a-anyth-thing s-since?”

“Haven’t really had the opportunity to.”

Barry frowns but nods and puts both the glass and the bottle of pills down on his counter before walking to his fridge.

“You really don’t need to bother, Allen, just give me the damn pills,” Lend tells him in an audibly exasperated tone. “I’ve had them on an empty stomach before.”

Ignoring him, Barry picks out the ingredients he needs to make a simple sandwich for the other man. Seeing as it’s the beginning of the month, and he got his paycheck just a couple of days ago, he has enough food to throw something decent together.

Len scowls at him when he holds out the plate of food in offering a couple of minutes later. For a moment Barry is sure he isn’t going to take it and make this whole damn situation even more daunting, but it seems that he’s also too tired for any of that.

“Thanks,” he grumbles quietly, and Barry just nods before he walks back to his kitchenette to heat up some water for tea.

After the sandwich is gone, which takes much less time than he had expected, he hands the other man two of the small white pills along with the glass of water. As before, Len accepts them without complaint and actually looks a bit relieved as soon as he’s taken them. Despite his insistence that he is fine, it’s obvious that he doesn’t feel anything but awful, and he doesn’t seem to have gotten any drugs to help him with the pain before now.

“No coffee?” asks Len when Barry offers him a mug of still hot tea a short while later. He accepts it rather reluctantly.

“No, not for you anyway. Your body needs to quiet down and caffeine wouldn’t help with that.”

“Tea tastes like dishwater,” replies the other man rather sullenly, and Barry can’t help but chuckle even with how worn-out he is feeling.

“It doesn’t, you’re just picky.”

“You are such a child.” Barry rubs his temple, behind which a familiar throbbing pain has started up again, but he smiles slightly. He is so damn tired, but at the same time he feels better than he has in weeks.

Despite his battered state, Len is obviously doing alright and could be far worse off, all things considering.

“Are the others okay as well?”

“Good.”

“Sit down already, you look dead on your feet.”

Len meets his surprised gaze and nods to the spot next to him on the couch.

The notion of sitting isn’t very appealing to Barry right now, not with how close they would be, seeing as the other man has placed himself mostly in the center of the couch.

“I’m fine.”

“Bullshit.” scoffs Len, and he gives him an annoyed look. “I’m not going to bite, so just sit down.”

“No, you lay down and get some sleep. I don’t think staying up talking is something you should do right now. You need rest.”

“On this piece of shit furniture?”

The incredulousness of Len’s voice probably should be irking to him, but it causes Barry to halt instead, as he is right. His couch is clearly no place for anybody to recover. “You can be so damn troublesome.”

“Takes one to know one,” snorts the other man tiredly, and he pats the cushion next to him in invitation. “Just sit down already.”
Barry doesn’t. He watches him quietly for another moment, pondering his options.

“Y-you c-can t-take m-my b-bed f-for t-tonight if y-you’re p-planning o-on s-staying. I w-will m-make d-do w-with th-the c-couch.”

“Stop being so damn ridiculous, I’m not going to make you sleep on this thing.” The way Len studies him with a darkening expression isn’t comfortable, but he still meets his eyes. “You’re angry.”

It isn’t a question, and Barry stays quiet. Mostly because he isn’t sure whether he really is or not. Right now, he’s just exhausted, and slightly overwhelmed by this turn of events.

“Wh-why h-have y-you c-come h-here, L-Len?”

“You don’t want me here?”

Barry frowns and looks away. This shouldn’t surprise him, and it really doesn’t. He’s known the other man for a long time now, and he is well aware of how mulish he can be if he puts his mind to it.

“I-I w-will ch-change th-the b-bedding,” he utters and turns to head to his bedroom. This is really not necessary, he knows that the criminal couldn’t care less whether he sleeps in a bed with fresh sheets or not, but he wants to get some distance between them.

“You don’t need to change that fucking bedding, Allen, I’m not sleeping in your bed.”

Len sounds like he is honestly getting angry, which is unsettling, even now. Barry still ignores it and proceeds on. He closes the door behind himself and just stays in front of it for a couple of seconds before starting with what he had come here to do.

His initial relief about seeing the other man again is slowly making way for a mixture of confusion and frustration.

What had Len been expecting? How did he think that he would react? The last time they saw each other Len slammed his door in his face and didn’t show himself again afterwards. Not before he and the others got locked up in the Heights.

“D-damn i-idiot.”

Barry isn’t sure whether he is talking about the other man or himself, and he doesn’t really want to think about it either. He can easily go through the motions of changing his bedding without paying any mind to it, but he wants to focus on the task as he prefers it to letting his thoughts go back to his guest, who is currently sitting in the other room waiting for his return.

For weeks now he has been so worried about him, about all of them, that it actually cost him sleep on more than one occasion. And now, seeing Len again is an extremely reassuring thing on one hand, but on the other it also causes a tumult of emotions in his chest he hadn’t expected.

The other man had been right, Barry may try to tell himself otherwise but he is angry at Len, angry and hurt. He has been this entire time if Barry is honest with himself.

After he is finished with the bed, he grabs the old bedding and takes it to the bathroom to put with the rest of his dirty laundry before making his way back out to where his guest is waiting.

Len is still sitting on the couch when he re-enters the living room, his head laid back and his eyes closed. For a second Barry wonders whether he could have fallen asleep, and frowns slightly in concern at that thought, seeing as this position would hardly do him any good regarding his injuries.

“You finished sulking?”

Barry bristles at those words, and meets the other man’s tired eyes with a scowl as he opens them slightly and turns his head to look at him.

“Th-the b-bed i-is d-done, y-you c-can g-go and l-lay d-down if y-you w-want t-to.”

They watch each other in silence for a long moment afterwards. Len doesn’t return his scowl, nor does he glare at him as Barry had expected. Instead, he just looks exhausted.

“I came here because I wanted to see you.”

The words are unusually soft-spoken, and Barry isn’t sure how to react because he honestly hadn’t expected the other man to say anything in regard toward his reasons to coming here. Especially not something like that.

“I’d been wanting to pass by for a while. I mean, before the whole mess with the museum that took me out of the picture for the last couple of months,” Len goes on and keeps his eyes locked with Barry’s. “I know that I behaved like an ass when you passed by before.”

He snorts and rolls his head back so that he is looking up at the ceiling again while he lifts a hand to rub his eyes.

“You idiot, you probably spent most of your money on that damn take-out. You’re so infuriatingly stupid at times…”

“It’s ok-kay. I sh-shouldn’t h-have p-passed b-by,” says Barry after Len has fallen quiet again, and he turns his own gaze towards the window above the sink. “I w-was s-stupid. I d-didn’t c-cons-sider th-that y-you c-could h-have a-a g-guest.”

His cheeks grow hot and he tries not to think of Izzy, or the way she looked at him like he was something disgusting and pitiful at the same time.

“I w-won’t d-do it a-again.”

The way Len looked at him back then, so very furious, is still clear in his mind. It’s just as unsettling as it was then. He knows what it means when people react like that to him. It wasn’t the first time this has happened in his life, it won’t be the last, and that thought is so very daunting.

He swallows and coughs lightly before he quietly adds. “I-I d-didn’t w-want t-to emb-barrass you.”

His words are met with silence and neither of them say anything for a while, but he is able to feel the other man’s gaze on him the whole time. It’s uncomfortable, and he knows that Len wants him to look back at him, but he can’t bring himself to.

“Y-you sh-should r-really l-lay d-down,” he says after the tension has become too much for him to stand anymore, and he briefly glances at Len before he walks back over to the kitchenette to pour himself another cup of tea.

The other man doesn’t move from his spot, and while Barry has his back to him, he knows that he is still watching him. Why couldn’t he just do as he’s told, just this once?
Then, he can hear him get up and Barry briefly believes that Len has finally taken him up on his offer to use his bed for the night, before he realizes that he is actually limping towards him instead of the bedroom.

“Wh-what are y-you d-doing, y-you sh-shouldn’t m-move a-around, y-you’re h-hurt,” scold Barry in frustration as he turns to face him. “J-just g-go t-to b-bed alr-ready.”

“I will,” assures Len, who has stopped just a couple of feet away from him at the kitchen table, on which he is bracing himself. While he’s obviously trying not to show it, it’s hard to miss what a strain it puts on him to simply be on his feet right now.

“You don’t need to sleep on that piece of junk, though,” he goes on and gives a slight nod towards the couch. “Your bed is big enough for both of-“

“No!”

“I’m not going to try anything, for fuck’s sake! I am not a rapist and I am not going to hurt you in any other way either! Take a look at me, do you really think I could cause you any harm even if I wanted to with how messed up I am right now?”

Barry frowns and averts his eyes again. He doesn’t notice that he has raised his arms to hug himself in that pathetic subconscious way he hates so much.

“Th-the b-bed is h-hardly b-big e-enough f-for b-both o-of us, i-it w-would b-be u-un-necessarily unc-c-comfortable and y-you n-need r-rest.”

Len huffs in clear frustration, but doesn’t reply, which gives Barry some hope that he has finally decided to let this stupid idea drop. When he notices that he is once again moving closer, he can feel his stomach sink, and despite not wanting to, he turns back to him in slight alarm.

“Easy there,” says Len in a calm voice, and halts a bit more than an arm’s length away from him. It has to be difficult for him to stand without any kind of support, but Len doesn’t show it as he meets his wary eyes.

“Barry, I came here because…” Again, Len huffs in frustration, this time over himself, though. Barry isn’t sure what he’s trying to say, or whether he actually wants to really know.

“L-Len-“

“Share the bed with me, nothing will happen to you and… and I really want to have you close by.”

They watch each other quietly after Len stops speaking. A mixture of bewilderment and a faint warmth spreads through Barry, and while he knows that he shouldn’t agree to this, that this would quash any chance for him to find any sleep tonight, he nods wordlessly.

It’s odd to observe how Len’s expression relaxes at that, and how he actually smiles. A real smile. Not a smirk.

Suddenly, Len doesn’t seem so sure on his own legs anymore, and he lets Barry usher him towards the bedroom without any further protest.

As expected, Barry doesn’t find any sleep that night, but he’s surprised by how oddly nice it is to have the other man resting next to him. It’s unsettling, of course, but it’s also nothing like he’d thought it would be. And at the same time, also it’s a bit comforting. After all, he does know that Len wouldn’t hurt him, no matter what his subconscious tells him at times.

Thus, Barry finds himself awake and listens to the slow and soft breathing of the warm body next to him while the night slowly makes way for dawn. He can’t really bring himself to regret it in the morning.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter has been uploaded a day early because I will be at a family's BBQ tomorrow and thus probably won't have time to do so then.

So, it seems that Len is back in the picture and I hope that has pleased some of my dear fellow Barry/Len shippers as much as it has pleased me.

I want to briefly touch upon something regarding Barry and how he seemingly can't catch a break. It will get better for our favourite blond speedster (or not so much speedster right now) but it will happen in due time. Things won't always be just bad for him, though, like with everybody's life, there will be up and downs. He just has to deal with a lot more than an ordinary person due to his special circumstances.

And, hey, he does have the Rogues (for better or worse) and they may not always be the best source of support he can have but they really do help him and makes it easier for Barry to deal with everything.

I've been asked how long this story will be and I honestly can't answer this just yet. I will be long, lets keep it at that. Singularity is just the first part of a (probably) two part series, and it will likely have around 100+ chapters.

Anyway, hope you guys liked this chapter and feel free to share your thoughts because you have no idea what a joy it is to read them.
Barry runs into Edward in the staircase again.

“Still don’t fancy any lemonade?” asks the other man with a lopsided smile as he shifts the two paper bags of groceries in his arms so that he won’t lose his hold on them.

“W-would y-you m-mind if a f-friend o-of m-mine c-comes al-long?”

Barry really doesn’t want to be rude, especially now that he’s being invited over for the second time, but he still isn’t sure what to think of his neighbor. Even though he’s been nothing but nice toward him so far there’s just something a bit strange about him. It’s something he can’t really put his finger on, and he would feel much safer with another person around. Aside from that, Mary had offered to tag along should he want to accept Edward’s offer for a drink after he told her about the neighbor he usually meets about once a week on his fire escape.

“The more, the merrier,” grins the other man, and he tells Barry to just knock after he’s asked his friend about joining them.

Mary, who had told him that she would be home today, agrees readily enough, and actually brings some of the fried cheese balls she made the night before along.

“Nice,” Edward mouths to him after Barry introduced them, when Mary is already on her way to the living room. At his slightly disapproving frown, the other man just chuckles and reminds him that he brought her along.

“Aside from that, I’m a real gentleman,” he adds and winks at him before he follows the dark-haired woman into the next room.

Despite his concern, it turns out that Edward is mostly just fooling around. He obviously has no real interest in Mary, who takes his rather blatantly flirting with good humor.

There is no lemonade, as Edward hadn’t bought any lemons during his shopping trip today, so they settle on root beer and snacks while making small-talk. It’s a surprisingly nice affair, and Barry starts to relax enough within the first twenty minutes to really enjoy it.

They can’t stay for more than an hour, as Edward is going to meet up with friends after that, but they agree to get together again in the coming week. With that they also agree to do a video night, as the other man actually possesses a rather nice flat screen TV and a DVD player; along with quite an impressive movie collection. Barry just needs one glance to notice that his neighbor seems to be quite fond of horror movies, and he really hopes that they won’t end up watching something gory.

After they’ve said their good-byes, Mary comes back to Barry’s place with him and stays for dinner.

“He’s nice,” she remarks as she helps him cut the onions for a Bolognese sauce. “And definitively a cheerful fellow.”

Barry hums in agreement while he cuts the tomatoes. When Mary fails to go on, he notices that she is watching him with a slightly worried look.

“You don’t like him?”

“No, he’s f-fine,” he disagrees quickly, and he really means it. “I… it’s n-not r-really him, it’s m-me. I-I’m n-not s-so g-good w-with…”

His cheeks grow hot and he turns back to the cutting board. Mary knows what he means, he hasn’t told her so far outright what happened to him, but she is a very attentive and bright young woman. She’s most likely already started to draw herself a picture of what’s still haunting him from his past.

She touches his elbow tentatively and he glances at her to see her smiling softly and reassuringly at him.

“I think he’s nice, I really do, and I don’t think that you have to be worried about him,” she tells him with a surprising certainty before her expression suddenly hardens. “But should he ever hurt you, I will make sure that he is going to regret it for the rest of his life.”

Barry is slightly taken aback by the fierceness with which she has spoken, and he’s not sure how to react. Mary, who notices it, blushes slightly and smiles a bit embarrassed but the seriousness doesn’t leave her gaze.

“We’re friends, Barry, we’re going to stick together.”

“Yes,” he agrees, and despite how slightly unsettling it is to get a glimpse of this unexpectedly unkind side of his friend, he still feels warmed by her words.

“We are.”

She smiles and squeezes his elbow lightly before she lets go again and turns back to her task.

“A m-mirror?”

Barry looks up from the small object in his hand he had been given by Len just a moment ago with a confused expression. “You w-want m-me t-to have a…” he stops and frowns as he realizes what this probably means.

“I c-can use th-the m-mirror i-in m-my b-bathr-room like I-I’ve d-done s-so f-far,” he points out a bit hesitantly and doesn’t like how heavy the small item suddenly feels in his palm.

“Yes, but you can’t carry your bathroom mirror around with you.” Len gives him a look as if he’s behaving like an especially slow child, and Barry’s frown deepens. It’s annoying at times how his friend seems to expect him to just take what he says at face value.
“Wh-why w-would I w-want to c-carry it ar-round w-with m-me?”

“In case you need to contact us,” replies Len rather curtly, and he goes on before Barry has the opportunity to ask any more questions. “Just take it, you don’t have to use it, and it’s hardly heavy enough to be a bother.”

“B-but-”

“Barry, just do me this favor, okay?”

“Wh-why? Is s-someth-thing g-going on? A-are you in t-trouble?”

“No, nothing is going on,” grunts the other man, and while he is meeting his eyes easily, Barry is well aware of what a good liar his friend can be when he wants. “But you aren’t exactly living in the safest area of the Gems. You could always run into trouble, and you don’t even own a damn cell phone.”

“I d-don’t n-need one.” he replies rather snappishly, and he immediately feels bad for it afterwards, seeing as Len actually just wants to make sure that he’s alright. “L-look, I w-will t-take it, b-but you are n-not listen-ning in on m-me, alr-right?”

Len looks honestly puzzled for a moment before he snorts and shakes his head in amused disbelief. “You really think Sam would need this thing to spy on you if he wanted to? You’re surrounded by reflective surfaces all damn day.”

The other man quickly realizes that was probably not the wisest thing to say when trying to convince him to accept the small mirror, as Barry’s expression is now clearly showing alarm and wariness over this piece of information.

“Scudder doesn’t do that shit,” he scoffs before he smirks. “Why do you even think he would want to? You think he fancies you?”

These words cause Barry to bristle and he shoots the other man a dirty look before he stuffs the small item into his pocket and turns around to leave the room.

“Where are you going?” Len is immediately close behind him again, and Barry wishes the man could just take a hint.

“I th-think I-I h-have h-had enough of y-your ch-charming p-personal-lity f-for today.”

“You’re really getting pissed over this?” Len follows him along into the hallway of the rundown basement they are currently in. It’s barely lit at all, as most of the bulbs have stopped working probably quite some time ago. The lack of light gives the whole place a rather eerie appearance as soon as one leaves the couple of rooms that are in active use.

“It was a joke!”

“Y-you are n-not f-funny.”

Barry hopes that Sam isn’t in the middle of a poker game and will be nice enough to take him back to his flat. This hideout actually doesn’t lay too far away from his apartment building, so he could find his way home on his own if he has to, but it’s rather late and he really would prefer not to.

A hand grabs his right wrist and he freezes up immediately. Len lets go just a second later, and Barry quickly gets some additional space between them while his skin starts to itch all over. He swallows with some difficulty, and it’s so damn hard to keep his breathing even and ignore the unsettling feeling of being in fear despite knowing there is no reason to be.

In moments like this he really hates Len a little, because he knows how horrible this is for him, how it scares him to be touched when he isn’t expecting it; especially when he’s already in an agitated state of mind. He glares at him and tries not to let himself feel so damn shaken by this brief touch.

Len is returning his look with that damn closed off expression of his once again that makes it impossible to read him. Barry swallows again, feeling suddenly less annoyed and more wary. He averts his gaze to the side and studies the wall beside him.

“Look, I shouldn’t have said that, I didn’t think, and I didn’t mean anything by it,” starts Len after the silence between them has grown increasingly uncomfortable.

Barry presses his lips together and keeps his gaze on the dirty wall with its flaking paint. His arms itch badly, and the urge to hug himself is so strong it’s almost painfully right now. He forces himself to keep still, though.

“Th-this is n-not f-funny, L-Len.”

“I know.”

Their eyes meet and Barry searches the other man’s face for a second for any trace that he doesn’t mean it. His body relaxes a bit when he can’t find any.

“I d-didn’t m-mean to r-react l-like th-this either.” he states quietly, and he awkwardly shifts his weight from one foot to his other while looking at the ground. “S-some th-things j-just… it m-makes m-me w-want t-to j-just g-get away.”

It makes him want to get out of his skin, to be more precise. To scrub himself until nothing is left, but Barry couldn’t share that with Len, or anyone else for that matter.

“I get it.”

Barry glances at Len and notices the severity with which he is studying him.

“You still want to go back to your place?”

He hesitates for a moment. Sam picked him up earlier today, shortly after noon, and most of his time here has been fine, aside from when Mick and Marco started a fight over a poker game, or Lisa’s quips, which, to be honest, have lost quite some of their bite since he’d been around the last time.

Still, he’s getting tired, and he doesn’t think that he wants to watch another game of poker for at least a week; even with how amusingly snarky the Rogues usually are.

“Y-you w-want to c-come along?”

Len considers him for a moment, but doesn’t seem bothered by his request. Then, he smirks. “Sure, so long as you have coffee there and not just that herbal dishwater.”

“Barry, could I speak to you a moment before you go?”

Barry, who has just grabbed his backpack from the small room he usually uses to eat or rest during his breaks, is surprised to see his employer at the bottom of the stairs that lead to her living area upstairs. He thought that she would have gone to bed by now, as it’s already after ten.

“Of course.”

Suddenly, a nagging worry settles heavily in the pit of his stomach and he tries to think of anything he’s done today that could have caused him to be in trouble. It’s unlikely, and even if he should have messed up in some way, he’s pretty sure that Mrs. Ming wouldn’t fire him, but the notion itself is still quite unsettling.

“Don’t look so worried, my dear,” laughs the old woman, and she gives him a fond smile before she explains that she has to ask a favor of him.

“You see, my great-grandniece is being Christened in two weeks and I am planning on attend the ceremony. Afterwards I would like to stay with some family that I haven’t seen in a while, so I will be in Chicago for about three weeks. Under normal circumstances I would have to close the store for that duration of time, but I was thinking that this might not be necessary with you around.”

She laughs again softly when Barry just looks at her with big incredulous eyes, as if he had just misheard what she has said.

“You want me to look after your shop while you’re gone?” he asks, just to make sure that he has really understand the meaning of her words.

“Yes, my dear, you would help me a great deal by doing this. And I would raise your wage for the time you are handling everything on your own, of course.”

“But… do you really think that is a good idea?”

While it is really nice to think that she would actually see him fit for the task, despite who he is, he isn’t certain whether this is really something she should do. He’s an ex-convict on parole after all, and trouble tends to sniff him out like a bear does honey.

“I do,” Mrs. Ming assures him, and she gives him a soft look and a somewhat sad smile that causes him to feel a bit uneasy. “You have been doing such a fine job from the very start, and I know that you are a reliable person who is capable of handling this store while I am gone.” Barry swallows around a small lump in his throat and isn’t sure how to say to that.

“Don’t feel obligated to say yes, though. I don’t want to force you,” the elder woman goes on, “You don’t have to, I just think that it would be a nice solution for this little problem that would suit both of us quite nicely. If you don’t feel comfortable with it, though, I understand, and I won’t hold it against you.”

She is honest about it, he knows that, and it’s so strange to realize that she trusts him so much.

“Though If I have to close the store, I will not able to pay you for the time I am gone.” she adds with a regretful expression, and it’s obvious that this concerns her.

Barry swallows again and shakes his head with an uncertain smile.

“N-no, i-it’s f-fine, I w-will t-take c-care of th-the s-store w-while you are g-gone.”

Over the last year most of the tasks of running the store have fallen to him anyway, and he is pretty sure that he would be able to hold down the fort on his own for a couple of weeks.

“Thank you, Barry.”
Mrs. Ming gives him a grateful smile and then both say their good-byes before Barry finally leaves.

“Right, you’re already out on legal terms for a year,” remarks Mick, who is sitting opposite of Barry, and is currently shuffling the cards for their next game.

“Shit, man, can’t even remember the last time I was able to stay out of that hole for that long,” chuckles Sam, and he takes a pull of his bottle. “No less on parole.”

“Probably because they never let you out on parole.” snorts the other Rogue before he starts to deal the cards.

It’s just the three of them right now, and Barry still isn’t sure what possessed him to agree when Sam asked him whether he would like to join in for a round.

“True enough,” agrees the brunet, and he picks up his cards. “Can’t say I see the charm of it.”

Mick grunts in agreement and Barry hopes that they leave it at that. His luck doesn’t work like that, though.

“You wanna celebrate and get smashed?”

The appalled look he gives Mick at that causes both of his current companions to laugh outright.

“Seriously, Allen, live a little,” snorts Sam as they start the first round. “Check.”

“I’m qu-quite f-fine, th-thanks,” he returns rather drily. “Check.”

“You are one of the most boring people I know,” disagrees Mick, as he throws down one of the one-dollar plastic chips Hartley turned up with about a week ago so that they could at least pretend they’re playing for money whenever Barry joined in.

“I l-like b-boring.”

“You don’t say?” scoffs the bald man, but there’s no malice or hostility behind it. “What you need is some real fun.”

“N-no, I d-don’t.”

“Hey,” interjects Sam, and he gives the impression of someone who is certain that he has just had a brilliant idea. “We could play a drinking game, we haven’t in a while.”

“What are you, ten?” The annoyed glance Mick throws the other man makes it clear what he thinks of that.

“We could play ‘Circle of Death’, Lisa would definitely be all for it.”

“Hell no, I won’t play that retarded game again.”

“You’re just pissed that you weren’t able to finish that tongue twister without making a total ass out of yourself.”

“I’m not going to play that, or any other drinking game. You wanna get plastered? Just grab another beer.” Mick shoots his colleague an irked glance before he turns his attention back to the game.
Barry’s thankful when the topic moves from his parole to the fact that Hartley is currently having a hissy fit because one of his rats has vanished and he is certain that Digger had something to do with it. “D-Digger d-doesn’t l-like h-his p-pets?”

Sam snorts while Mick scoffs.

“Nah, it’s the other way around. The little pests can’t stand him,” explains the pyromaniac, and he takes a pull of his beer. “Probably think he is some kind of disgusting moldy cheese.”

“Yeah, he definitely has the smell at times.”

Both men snort while Barry isn’t sure whether he should be disgusted or amused.

“They aren’t really his pets. Apart from a couple the rest usually vanish back into the sewers after a while. He just calls them when he needs them.” remarks Sam with a shrug. “Which I’m damn glad for, seeing as they’re nasty little vermin.”

“Yeah, for such a neat freak, he definitely has weird taste in pets,” agrees Mick with a disgusted frown. “I mean, he lets them crawl all over him.”

“We all have our oddities.”

Sam seems rather undisturbed by his colleague’s rather questionable choice of co-workers. Barry had picked up on the rather laid back way with which the man usually handles things a while ago. Which hadn’t exactly been what he’d expected. Mirror Master has never been one of the Rogues who would outright blow a gasket, but, like most of his colleagues, he just always seemed rather hot-headed.

Then again, the times Barry himself put on a mask and fought any of them is nearly a decade gone. People change as years go by, he definitely knows this, and why shouldn’t it be the same for them?

“If you’re finished staring into space, Allen, it’s your turn.”

Barry flinches slightly and flushes in embarrassment as he realizes that he has let himself get carried away by his own thoughts.

“S-sorry.” he mutters and throws one of the plastic chips at the slowly growing pot in the middle of the table.

“Are Piper’s rats really that fascinating to you?” chuckles Sam as he exchanges two of his cards. “I’m sure he’d let you pet one of them if you asked him.”

The only answer Barry gives the other man is an annoyed look, which seems to amuse him even more.

They play for another fifteen minutes before the round ends with Mick winning. After that Barry takes his leave to go look for Len, who is most likely still in his room tinkering on his cold gun.

“Had enough mingling for today?” the other man greets as Barry enters, without looking up from where he is currently sitting at his workbench. Some music is playing on a low volume in the background from the small portable radio next to the cot that serves as a bed.

“Y-yes.” The room is rather dimly lit as the only light source is the lamp on the bench, and he can’t help but frown slightly.

“You are r-ruining y-your eyes,” he comments and turns the ceiling lights on before walking over to him. Len glances briefly at him with a look that’s a mixture of annoyance and amusement, but doesn’t disagree.

Barry takes a seat on the empty crate he has used as a seat the last couple of times he’s been around, and just watches the other man work for a while in silence. Len never seems bothered by his quiet presence, which is oddly comforting in a way, and he enjoys these quiet moments between them.

He never asks him what he’s working on, he doesn’t really want to know, even though he is somewhat curious. Len never tells him either, as both of them seem well aware what thin ice they’re treading.

Thus, they sit together in a comfortable silence, listening to the low music from the radio in the background as the minutes tick away.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you guys liked it!

Regarding my OCs, I get that not everybody of you likes them and that is fine, I usually see them as the weak link of most fanfics I’ve read so far (with some really nice exceptions, tho), and I will try not to go overboarded with them but they will be a part of the story and I don’t intend to change that (I just love my little OCs too much to delete them).

Next chapter will introduce someone new (not so new), so stay tuned.
Of Concussions and Unexpected Encounters

Chapter Notes

This chapter has been edited by the very lovely palpablenotion.

Thanks again to everyone of you who took the time to leave me a kudos or a comment, I always love them and really appreciate it.

November 2nd year

The lock of the door latches with the usual brief rattling sound as Barry turns the key. It is late, already half past elven, and he is really looking forward to his bed before he has to get back to the store again in about seven hours.

Mrs. Ming had offered him the use of the couch in her flat while he is working the store on his own as it usually takes him nearly an hour to get to the store from his home in the mornings and even longer the other way around as the intervals between the busses grow longer the later it gets. It is really kind of her and he has considered it more than once already but he can’t bring himself to do so. It just doesn’t feel right and, knowing his luck, he worries that this could get him in trouble one way or another.

At times like this one, though, he really has a hard time not taking her up on the offer. Even with the current shorter opening hours it is quite a hassle to handle the store all by himself and with how unusually busy it has been today, he had to stay about an hour longer to finish closing and prepare things for tomorrow.

It also doesn’t help that the weather is rather cold, fittingly so for the beginning of November, and the drizzle he had woken up to this morning has become an outright shower towards midday that is still holding on.

Well, it isn’t as if he doesn’t like the rain. The patter against his window always makes it easier for him to relax and fall asleep.

Still, he could do without the freezing temperatures…

Opening his umbrella, he makes his way towards the bus stop that sits about five minutes away from the store and starts to go through the list of items he has to order the next day in his mind once again.

The last five days have gone by surprisingly smoothly and the initial gnawing worry about making some stupid mistake that would have severe repercussions for him or his employer have slowly started to ebb away.

Most of their usual customers knew him quite well by now and a couple of the older ladies, who were friends with Mrs. Ming, complimented him on what a fine job he is doing in her absence. … which was nice and unexpected.
In general, though, nobody picked up on the fact that the actual owner of the store wasn’t around and, after the first two days, Barry realized that nothing has really changed that much.

A car passes by next to him and lightens up the dark sidewalk he is currently on.

The streetlamps in this area are mostly not working so there are rather long patches laying in darkness. It is uncomfortable to pass through them at night with nobody else around and, for a long time, he really dreaded this way.

As with anything else, he has gotten used to it over the months and especially now, with how tired and busy his mind is, he hardly pays any mind to his surroundings.

Thus, the hit to the back of his head catches Barry completely by off-guard and he hardly has the presence of mind to dampen his fall with his hands. A sharp pain in his knees and palms adds to the one in his skull before someone lands a kick to his hip.

Automatically, he rolls onto his side and pulls his limbs close while ducking his head and his hands covering his neck. Another kick against his back follows, which causes a white-hot pain to flash through his body and he starts to feel oddly lightheaded.

Someone grabs his hairs and pulls his head back while someone else forces his arms away from his chest. He feels paralyzed and frightened enough that he isn’t able to produce a single sound.

Memories overcome him, from his time in the Heights and from further back – a mixture of events Barry tries to never think of if he can help it.

Hands are patting him down before one reaches into his coat and he chokes on a whimper, certain of what would now follow. There is laughter, it sounds odd, like through a thick wall of cotton.

Then it is gone and he is alone again.

Barry keeps laying there, not moving an inch. He feels shaken and confused and he isn’t able to think straight. The only thing he is really aware of, is that his head hurts and that he feels sick.

His body starts to tremble and while it could be due to the rain that is still coming and causing him to quickly grow wet and cold, even in his current state of mind Barry is well aware that he is going into shock.

The rational part of him urges him to try and get up, just move and get to safety, while the scared and confused part just wants to stay like he is right now.

Even though he knows how ridiculous it is, he somehow is sure that all of this could simply pass by should he stay small and quiet enough.

This helped him a lot as a child.

Barry has no idea how much time has passed when he suddenly picks up on footsteps just a moment before they stop next to him. A couple of cars have passed by so far, he thinks so at least, but it is hard to pick up on the world around him with the throbbing in his head and it grows steadily harder with every passing minute.

“Bugger, jimmy,” someone says and again it sounds as if he was hearing the person talk through water. Not a good sign, Barry knows from experience that he must have gotten himself quite a severe concussion.
Just his damn luck…

Still, despite how dizzy he feels, he is certain that it is a man.

“Someone mistook ye fur a punching poke?”

It is most likely meant as a rhetorical question; Barry still tries to answer but isn’t able to get his voice to work. The throbbing behind his temples and forehead grows worse and he starts to feel really sick.

The stranger doesn’t say anything for a long moment and even though Barry can’t see his face in the darkness, it is obvious that he isn’t exactly excited about running into him out here.

Barry expects him to simply walk away but it still causes his stomach to sink when he actually does.

“W-w-wait, p-please…”

His voice sounds faint and feeble and the pain in his head increases so badly that he whimpers softly. He doesn’t think that the man would stop but he is surprised. The steps halt for a second before they come closer again and stop next to his head once more.

A tense silence follows and Barry knows that the stranger is pondering whether he should help him or not.

“Ye have ony dosh oan ye?”

The words sound like gibberish to him in his current state and Barry just makes a confused noise which causes his current companion to huff.

“Money, ye have money?”

There had been a total of two bucks and twenty eight cents in his wallet. Clearly not worth a mugging and Barry feels a slight satisfaction at the notion that the people who attacked him didn’t get more out of it.

This stranger would most likely not have seen this as a satisfying reward, anyway.

“I-I g-g… m-mug-ged…”

“Richt…”

It is harder and harder for Barry to stay focused and a part of him just wants the stranger to go and leave him in peace. The part of him that actually helped him through most of his life stomps the other one quickly down, though.

“I-I… m-mon-ney a-at h-home.”

His tongue feels heavy and it becomes difficult and awkward to talk. He really hopes he would not lose conscious before getting away from here. He is really not keen on the idea of dying on a dirty and wet sidewalk.

“Thay git ye guid,” mutters the stranger and the frown with which he is currently studying him is palpable to Barry despite him not being able to get a good look at the other man.

“P-pleas-se… h-help m-me…”

He doesn’t want to die.
This realisation hits Barry like a punch and it steals his breath for a second because, for the longest time, he has been in a really dark place now and while he forces himself not to listen to this ugly little voice in the back of his mind, he knows what it is telling him – what it has been whispering to him for the longest time...

Barry told himself that he was just exhausted, he always assured himself that he would not even consider this notion. A part of him knew that it was at least partly a lie, though.

Over the years it had become so very hard to cling to the thought that this life is worth all the pain, even now that he was no longer alone… but apparently, it is enough for him as he really doesn’t want it to end like this. He knows that Mary would be incredibly upset, so would be Mrs Ming and Len too…

… Len.

The other man has stayed quiet for a long minute, oblivious to what is going on in Barry’s mind, before he hisses something that sounds like a string of swears under his breath.

“Yer better makin’ tha worth th’ pumpin’ effort, pal,” grunts the stranger before he kneels down next to him. “Whaur tae?”

This is a good question.

On the one hand, Barry really wants to get home but he is not so far gone that he doesn’t know what a stupid idea it is to actually try to make it there in his current state.

“Th-th-there i-is… a-a sh-shop… b-b-back th… th-there…”

It takes him a surprising amount of effort to lift his hand to point in the direction he has just come from. “Shop?”

He doesn’t have to see him to know that his somewhat reluctant Samaritan isn’t sure what to think of that.

“W-w-work…” Barry explains feebly and is relieved when the stranger grunts in understanding before he asks him whether he thinks that he can be moved.

Barry agrees, not really all that certain, but rather eager to get away from here.

Being touched by someone he doesn’t know anything of is as horrible of an experience as always, especially now, and while he tried to brace himself for it, it is still worse than he had expected. The other man doesn’t comment on his reaction as he is most likely assuming that this is due to the fact that he has just been assaulted and mugged.

It doesn’t take them long to get back to Mrs. Ming’s shop, not even two minutes, as Barry hadn’t gotten that far before the assault. Still, it is a very daunting experience.

Moving hurts and the nausea he is feeling becomes so bad that he is actually throwing up a couple of feet away from the back entrance.

The stranger is understandably not thrilled by this and mutters something under his breath Barry isn’t able to pick up but is quite certain that he probably doesn’t want to know anyway.

“Whaur ur th’ keys?”
With some difficulty, he is able to pull the small keychain out of his trouser pocket and hands it to the other man, who picks it up and asks about which key it is. He sounds quite irritable by now.

Barry can’t hold it against him. He is pretty sure that neither of them both expected their nights to go like this.

After he pointed the right one out and the door has been unlocked, they move into the small room where he usually counts the cash. It is also the nearest one to the back exit.

The other man helps him to the table with the chair and it is a real blessing to be off his feet again. Barry has grown rather worried that they would finally giving out under him any second now.

“Dae ye sell heavy?”

At his confused look, the other man huffs in annoyance and repeats his question in a clearly irked tone.

“Beer, ye sell beer?”

Barry nods slightly and flinches as even the little movement causes a sharp pain to go through his head, making him feel like it is about to crack open at the top.

The other man frowns and asks if he should pick him up some aspirin as well, to which he agrees readily.

While the stranger is gone, Barry slumps down at the table and can’t really bring himself to worry about the guy possibly helping himself to more than just the drink. Instead he thinks about what to do now.

It is clear that he has been hurt and he isn’t sure whether he should just go and lay down or not.

If he has a concussion, of which he is mostly certain by now, it is likely a really stupid idea to let himself fall asleep. At the same time, he is well aware that he wouldn’t be able to keep himself up for long and he sure as hell won’t ask the strange man to assist him with staying awake, not that it is very likely that he would want to help him anyway seeing how impatient he has already grown.

Barry can’t be sure but he has the feeling that the man is at least some kind of shady person and the notion of having him around when he is in a position in which he isn’t able to defend himself in any way, is growing increasingly unsettling.

The throbbing in his head is steadily worsening and he feels how the nausea is getting stronger again as well. This makes it even more difficult to come up with a plan of what to do now.

His first thought is to contact Mary but he lets got of this idea quickly again as he doesn’t know the number of her mobile phone by heart and she is visiting a friend in Kansas City till the day after tomorrow and thus isn’t around, anyway.

Aside from that, he really doesn’t want to worry her or burden her with taking care of him till he feels more like himself again.

Then, his mind goes back to Len once more and this time it takes him only a second to remember that he still is carrying around the small mirror he had been given a couple of weeks ago.

Despite having had no intent to ever use it so far, he usually puts it into his trouser pocket, where he finds it now as well much to his relief.
A sharp pain goes through his right hand as he grabs for it and it takes him a couple of moments to realize that he seems to have been unlucky enough to get it injured while being mugged. He studies the swelling below his knuckle area of his hand and wonders how he would be able to pay for the medical treatment or if it maybe would heal by itself should he bandage it firmly and be careful enough not to move it too much.

Well, he is not going to worry about this right now.

Instead, Barry turns his attention back to the small round reflective surface in his fingers and he realizes that this probably would have been a good alternative to depending on the help of some guy he doesn’t know anything about in the first place.

It is then that the stranger enters the room again and Barry glances at him.

As he has assumed, the man has helped himself to a beer but was also carrying an orange pill bottle and a Coca Cola.

“’ere, some asprin ’n’ a coke.”

The goods are put next to where he is mostly resting on the table and Barry utters a small thanks.

“Sae, whit’s aboot th’ dosh?”

Barry took a moment to decipher what he just said and his tongue feels oddly heavy as he answers.

“Y-you’ll g-g-get i-it… j-just a-a m-mom-ment…”

The other man frowns but before he can object, Barry has turned back to the small mirror and, after hesitating for a second, calls for Sam.

The stranger, who sips on his beer, is clearly thinking that he lost it after he has peered over his shoulder to see what he is talking to. He then nearly chokes on the drink, though, as Sam’s face appears on the small reflective surface just a moment later.

“Barry?” asks the other man and his slightly annoyed expression with which he has answered his call is quickly replaced by a much more concerned one. “What the hell happened to you?”

“M-mugged.” Barry explains and is frustrated by how slurred he sounds despite his best effort.

“Where are you?” Sam really seems worried now.

It probably is a bad sign that Barry needs a moment to remember his current whereabouts.

“W-w-work…”

“Okay, stay put, I will be over in a few.”

The little mirror shows the reflection of his own face again and Barry stares at it blankly for another couple of seconds before letting both his head and his hand drop onto the table. He groans very quietly and tries to will his stomach to calm down again.

“Whit th’ hell?” mutters the stranger next to him and causes Barry to flinch as he has momentarily forgotten all about him.

“Did ye juist blether tae a jimmy thro’ a mirror?”
Barry frowns but nods and decides that he has enough of thinking of this man as the stranger and asks him for his name.

“I-I’m B-Bar-ry,” he adds when the other man doesn’t reply and simply stares at him with an odd expression.

“Evan,” answers his now no longer nameless companion before his frown deepens and he takes a gulp of his beer.

The sound of a door being opened somewhere outside the small room cuts through the silence that has settled between them. Footsteps follow, from more than one person, and Barry can hear Sam telling someone else that it is this way.

A moment later, Sam and Hartley enter the room and he can’t help but feel immensely relieved by their arrival.

“How are you feeling, Barry?” The redhead crouches down next to him and studies him with open concern.

Barry tries to answer but can only produce a miserable sounding groan.

“Who the fuck are you?”

Both, Barry and Hartley glance over to where Sam is currently eyeing Evan with a suspicious look.

“Awright, calm doon. Ah hae nae dane anythin’ tae him. If it wur nae fur me, he wid aye lay outdoors in th’ pumpin’ storm.”

“... was that just English?” asks Sam as he studies the other man with a confused frown, which in turn causes Evan to scowl in annoyance.

“Awa’ an’ bile yer heid!”

“Stop it, Sam, we have other problems than you starting something again,” interrupts Hartley with a glare to his colleague before he turns back to Barry and tentatively touches his shoulder. He makes a shushing noise when he receives a small whimper in response.

The redhead turns back to Sam and tells him to get some ice from the store which causes the other man to grumble in annoyance but still do as asked.

Afterwards, his friend asks him where he is hurt and it is ridiculous how hard it is for Barry to come up with an answer.

It becomes obvious that his hand is most likely broken when Hartley touches it slightly and the pain it causes is enough that he cries out in protest.

“Sorry, I won’t do that again,” assures his friend and asks him not to move it if he can help it. Barry tries to nod but finds himself throwing up instead. Hartley is quick enough to avoid it, for which Barry is immensely grateful because he knows that he would have felt horrible otherwise.

“S-s-sorry…”

“D-d-diz-zy… a-and… m-my h-head h-h-hurts…”

Barry closes his eyes and groans again softly, no longer content with the bright light around him. He listens to how Hartley sends Sam to catch Len as soon as the other Rogue comes back. Sam does so without protest.

Hartley turns back to him next and asks him whether there is a place for him to lay down.

“U-ups-stairs…” he answers before he realizes that Mrs. Ming most likely wouldn’t appreciate a bunch of strangers in her flat. His protests fall on deaf ears, though.

“You need to rest, Barry, you are seriously injured. I am sure you employer will understand this.”

Hartley touches his shoulder slightly again and meets his upset expression with a reassuring one before he turns his gaze to Evan, who is still standing at the same spot as before. It is obvious that he isn’t sure what to make of this situation.

“Can you help me get him up?”

“Aye, sure. Bit thae fellow promised me fiftae bucks fur mae help.”

Barry frowns and is quite sure that he never mentioned a certain amount of money the other man would get as a reward. Especially not one as ridiculously high as this.

“Well,” answers Hartley and his tone makes it clear that he has just decided that he doesn’t like Evan all that much. “We can clear that one later.”

“A’m waantin’ th’ dosh.” insists the other man and while he doesn’t sound aggressive it is hard to miss that he isn’t joking.

“I am sure you do,” answers the redhead and while he doesn’t sound aggressive it is hard to miss that he isn’t joking.

“I am sure you do,” answers the redhead and there is a slight edge to the way he speaks that hasn’t been there before. “And you will get it but I would really appreciate it if you could help me with getting him upstairs first.”

A strained silence follows and Barry, who has closed his eyes again, suddenly feels extremely uneasy.

Then, he can hear Evan start to walk over to him and the aggression in the room seems to decrease palpably again.

“It’s alright, Barry, we are just going to touch you to get you somewhere more comfortable,” says Hartley in a calm and once again soothing voice before he takes a hold of his right arm. Evan grabs his left and while he knows that nothing would happen to him, he can’t stop himself from feebly protesting.

While Hartley pulls his arm over his shoulder, the other man hesitates.

“Whit’s it wi’ him?”

“None of your business. You want your money, you better start moving.” Hartley gives him a hard look and Evan grunts something that is probably an insult before he finally does as asked.

The way upstairs isn’t very long, Barry knows that, he has gone there a number of times already, but it still feels like an eternity to him until they are finally in the small cosy living room of Mrs. Ming’s flat.
His head is hurting so badly by now that he is now entirely sure it is going to split any moment now and he is hardly ably to support any of his own weight anymore as his knees seem to have turned into jelly somewhere along the way.

They get him over to the couch and, as soon as they have helped him to sit down, he throws up again.

Barry grows quite distressed over it as this is Mrs Ming’s home and the notion of what has just happened is pretty much horrifying to him.

“I will take care of that,” Hartley assures him as he carefully pushes him back so that he is laying down. “Don’t worry about it, the carpet will be as good as new when I am finished with it. Just try to calm down a bit, getting upset is not helping you right now.”

“Ah wull fetch masell anither beer, yi'll waant me tae git something else fae doonby tae?”

Both Barry and Hartley look over to Evan, who has walked back to the door that leads directly to the stairs.

“No, it’s fine, but don’t help yourself to anything else or you can be sure that the next thing you know is that you’ll wake up in a police car,” warns the Rogue and while the other man briefly looks as if he is getting pissed, he seem to think the better of it and just mutters something rather hostile sounding under his breath before leaving them alone.

“You really have a knack for getting to know the worst kind of people,” muses Hartley and shoots Barry an amused glance before his expression turns more serious again.

“You want me to get you some water?”

“N-no… s-sick…”

“Okay, then let’s just wait for the others to arrive.”

“L-Len?”

“Yeah, he will be here soon,” agrees Hartley and crouches down next to Barry’s head again before he cups his shoulder lightly. “He knows a doctor who can help you.”

Another fifteen minutes pass before Sam finally comes back along with Len and a very grumpy looking older guy.

Barry can’t help but feel a bit better as soon as he sees his friend.

An expression flickers over Len’s face, so quickly that Barry is hardly able to pick up on it but even in the hazy state his mind is in right now he is pretty sure that it had been worry. The sudden urge to have Len closer is nearly painfully strong and he utters his name before he even realizes what he is doing. He feels like such a damn fool just a second later.

Len doesn’t seems annoyed by this, though, and gives him a very thin smile before he turns to the old man whom he and Sam have brought along and who is undoubtedly the doctor Hartley mentioned before.

“If you want the money, start doing your job, Simmons.”

The doctor, who is rather short and thin fellows in his early sixties with a very wrinkly face, shoots
Len an annoyed and very unimpressed look.

“Watch your tone, boy, or you can look for someone else to take care of your friend,” he grouses and gives the criminal a hard look. “You know that I don’t do late night visits anymore and I should have shot you two for being insolent enough to turn up in my damn house.”

“You did shot at us, you old geezer,” reminds Sam with dark glare to the older man, who ignores him.

The doctor instead turns his attention to Barry, who is watching him with a mixture of fear and apprehension. He steps closer to him but is stopped by Hartley before he can go to work.

“It is difficult for him to be touched by people he doesn’t know.” The redhead explains, which causes Simmons to give him a slightly exasperated frown before he turns back to Barry.

“Well, that is too bad but it can’t be helped if you want me to treat him.”

“Just go to work, he will be fine,” interjects Len and Barry isn’t exactly comforted by those words. Then, the other man walks over to him, though, so that he stands close to the end of the couch where his head is resting and it makes this whole situation a bit less awful.

Barry throws up just a couple of minutes into the examination, even though there is nothing left in his stomach anymore and he is mostly just dry heaving, which is just as horrible of an experience as he remembers. He also starts to grow increasingly disorientated much to the doctor’s concern.

“He has quite a severe concussion,” concludes the old man after he finishes examining his head and neck while Barry keeps making small distressed whimpering sounds and keeps his eyes firmly closed. “I will give him an injection that should help him with the headache and nausea but I still need you to keep him awake for as long as he displays symptoms of disorientation and sickness. After that he can sleep but you need to wake him up every thirty minutes.”

Simmons turns to Len with a serious expression and adds that they need to grab him again should the symptoms not go away within the next four hours.

“It is most likely necessary for him to go to the hospital in that case.”

Barry makes a protesting and upset noise but falls quiet again when a sharp pain shoots through his skull in response.

“Stay still, you idiot,” admonishes the doctor annoyed. “Moving around will only worsen your state and I really don’t want to come here again tonight if I can help it.”

He gives him the injection shortly afterwards and tells the Rogues what exactly to be mindful of for the next couple of hours. Barry hardly listens to it as he feel groggy and sick but is glad when he soon realizes that the shot he has received, is helping with both the pain and the nausea. The old man starts gives him another shot close to his right wrist, which catches him by surprise but he is too tired and oddly relaxed to really react to it.

“His hand is broken. Most likely the metacarpus.”

There is some more talk but Barry doesn’t really care. The throbbing pain in his right hand, on which he hasn’t really picked up on so far, starts to decrease and he just feels grateful for how much better his body as a whole starts to feel again. The light-headedness grows a bit stronger over the next minutes and he can’t help but be fascinated by the chandelier above him.
He has never noticed how nice it looks.

“Don’t let him fall asleep until he no longer feels disorientated.”

Barry frowns and turns his head slightly so that he can see the doctor. To his surprise, he is no longer kneeling next to him but standing a couple of feet away behind the small couch table along with Len.

“We will,” assures Hartley, who is still close-by and meets his confused gaze with a friendly and reassuring smile when he notices it.

“That would be 350 bucks, then,” says the doctor and for a moment Barry isn’t certain whether he has really heard the old man asks for such a ridiculous amount of money but when he glances over to him and Len again, he can actually see the later one pull out a bundle of notes and hand it over to the doctor.

A feeling of incredulity overtakes him at that but he isn’t even able to protest.

“Well, it has been a pleasure to make business with you as always, Snart.”

The sarcasm is not to miss and Len only grunts in response before he tells Sam to get the old man back to his home.

“Barry, do you want me to make you some tea?” Hartley’s voice startles him a bit as he hasn’t noticed the man crouching down next to him again.

It takes him a while before he is able to really process his question but he finally nods slightly, which causes his friend to give him a warm smile before he turns to Len and asks him whether he could keep an eye on him while he is gone.

It is then, when Barry looks past Hartley, that he notices that Len is currently talking to Evan and, judging by his sour expression, he hasn’t really found a liking for the other man.

The Rogue hands the other thug a couple of notes and it is obvious that Evan is just as glad to finally get away from here as Len is to get rid of him. Briefly, the man, who is most likely a Scot judging by his thick accent, shots Barry a glance but vanishes down the stairs without any actual parting words.

“R-rude…” mutters Barry and can’t help but feel a bit annoyed by this behaviour. He would have liked to say his goodbye and thank him for his help.

Hartley, who has also watched the strange man depart, shoots him an amused look and agrees with him before he gets up and leaves for the small kitchen next door.

Len appears in his stead just a moment later and, with some effort, Barry moves closer to the backrest of the couch so that he can sit down next to him.

Having him close is nice and he can’t help but smile as soon as he has taken a seat.

The other man’s grim expression cracks a bit and he returns his smiles faintly.

“The stuff Simmons gave you has to be quite good.”

Not sure what Len means by that, Barry only keeps on smiling and is glad to have him here.
Evan’s accent is thick, really, really thick and the reason for this is because I have a very odd sense of humour.

... and I work with an online English-Scottish translator, so...

Palpablenotion pointed out to me that his lines could be trouble for people to understand, thus I’ve decided to add ‘translations’ to the end of this chapter (and probably the further ones he is in).

It is possible that the few updates will happen with some delay over the next couple of weeks (till around mid-July) due to a number of bigger exams coming up and friends from Germany coming to visit me for a week in the beginning of July because summer is just awesome.
Barry has an appointment with Mrs. Jenkins the day after being mugged. He is hardly awake when he remembers this and as soon as he does, still half asleep and not completely aware of his surroundings, a familiar apprehension and dread overcomes him.

These appointments are always an awful affair for him and he is so damn glad that they were reduced to once every other week now that he has passed his first year out of prison without any incident. There were still the check-up calls he has to do twice a week but not having to be in the elder woman’s presence makes this hardly look like such big of a deal.

“Did any little boy catch your eye while you were at work this week?”

Questions like these always are like a slap and she never fails to make him miserable. Her disdain for him has been plain from the get-go and like with everything else, Barry just tries to keep his head down and take it. She could be one of the quickest tickets back to the Heights for him and he would take any verbal abuse and ridicule over that any time.

Still, the visits to her office are a thing he dreads every single time and he already feels himself becoming depressed before he notices the odd heaviness that has settled all over his body. Worried, he tries to open his eyes and see what causes this odd sensation but as soon as he does so, a sharp pain shoots through his head that is intense enough to draw a soft groan from him.

It is then that he realizes that he isn’t laying in his bed and while he quickly concludes from the feeling of the cushions under him that he is resting on a couch, he is certain that it couldn’t be the old piece of junk he owns. The notion of being somewhere where he hasn’t expected to wake up causes a familiar fear to rise in his chest and he tries to get his own body to work again so that he can sit up and find out where he actually is.

Barry flinches when a hot pain flashes through his right hand and the memories of the former night flood back into his head, which causes a nearly smothering stupor to overcome him.

For a long few minutes he keeps laying still on the couch that is part of Mrs. Ming’s living room and just listens to his own breathing.

His body is hurting all over. He has hardly picked up on it before but now the pain is intense enough that the slightest movement is an awful experience, especially his head. At least, he has to be doing better and it hasn’t woken up in the hospital. He doesn’t even want to imagine what kind of trouble that would have meant for him.

Well, considering that he owes Len nearly 400 dollars now, he doesn’t actually feel all too relieved.
It would take forever to pay him back and he already owes him so much. Barry pushes that thought away and decides to worry about it later, when his head isn’t throbbing that badly anymore.

The noise of someone opening the door to the stairs and entering the room a couple of minutes later causes him to freeze just as he was close to drifting off again.

“How are you feeling?”

Len studies him with a calm expression that doesn’t give much away but it isn’t as closed-off as it had been last night. He doesn’t seem as tense anymore either and Barry wonders whether the other man could have really been that concerned about him.

“How are you feeling?”

Their gazes meet for a moment and Barry still feels a bit overwhelmed by the emotions that are currently filling his chest to the brim.

“I’ll grab you some water.”

With that, Len gets up and heads to the kitchen.

Barry swallows and lifts his left hand with some effort to rub his eyes. He feels so exhausted again and wonders how long it would take for him to recover enough to be able to take care of the store again.

The thought that he would have to keep it closed at least for the next couple of days makes him feel miserable with guilt and while he is certain that Mrs. Ming wouldn’t hold it against him after learning the reason, he feels so bad about disappointing her after she trusted him with it.

His eyes, which have been fixed on the light above him, move absentmindedly to the side and he notices a nice looking wall clock above the entrance to the room.

At first, he doesn’t really pick up on what he is reading there but when he finally does, he feels sickened by the horror that floods through him then.

“N-no…”

It is already half past ten, and he is quite certain that he has slept through the whole day because he knows that Hartley had made sure he stayed up until around eight before he allowed him to fall asleep. He briefly remembers that he has been woken up a couple of times but now all he can think about is the fact that he didn’t call his parole officer.
Barry has to get to a phone.

“What the hell are you doing, idiot?”

Len’s sharp voice causes him to halt his attempt to get up and he looks over to him while he is more sitting than kneeling on the floor next to the couch.

“I-I… I-I n-need t-t-to-”

“You have a damn concussion, the only thing you need to do is stay put and rest.”

The other man’s impatience is obvious and Barry feels immensely frustrated and a bit scared when he walks over to him with an exasperated scowl on his face.

“Can I help you back onto the couch without you freaking out on me?”

“No,” he disagrees vehemently and hates how frightened he sounds. “I-I n-need t-t-o c-ccall m-my p-par-ole o-offic-er. I-I m-missed i-it a-and I-I… sh-sh…”

The pressure behind his eyes gets stronger as he thinks about what kind of trouble he has brought upon himself.

“I-I c-can’t g-go b-back…”

With his shaking left hand, he starts to rub his eyes and huffs in anger and frustration when this doesn’t help with the tears that have started to run down his cheeks. He turns away from Len so that his back is to him.

The throbbing in his head, which has just been slightly annoying but not unbearably painful, slowly increases in intensity and he feels how the familiar nausea from earlier starts to come back again.

“I-I c-can’t,” he utters, more to himself than the other man, because if he is certain of anything then it is that he wouldn’t be able to make it through that damn hell again, not for another decade, not for another month.

A touch to his shoulders startles him badly enough that he cries out and flinches away, which in turn causes his headache to spike. With a low groan, he sinks against the couch next to him and tries to will the pain away that is now slowly spreading from his temples down to his neck and shoulders.

“Barry,” he hears Len say and berates himself for how he has reacted because he should really have known that it is the other man, nobody else is around, there is no threat, other than his own damn mind.

“Can you tell me the name of your parole officer?”

His friend is talking in a low and calm voice but isn’t trying to touch him again, for which Barry is very glad.

“J-Jenk-kins… S-Sam-mantha,” he answers and while he would have hesitated under normal circumstances as Len’s question should have made him wary, he doesn’t even think of the possibility that the other man could have something in mind that could potentially harm the woman. The sharp throbbing pain is too intense to really think much about anything right now and he just wants it to stop.

“I will help you back onto the couch,” he hears the other man say. “I won’t hurt you, there is no
Despite being told about the touch beforehand, it is still deeply unsettling and Barry is so very glad when he is back on the cushions and the other man’s hands are gone. A blanket is spread over him he hadn’t picked up on so far and he utters a quiet thanks.

“Just try to rest,” says Len and Barry wonders how he could with how horribly his head is hurting.

A moment later he is gone.

The next time Barry wakes up, his head doesn’t feel like it is going to split from the top downwards anymore but he still feels exhausted enough that it is a pain to move.

It doesn’t take him nearly as long to remember where he is and what has happened. The urge to fall back asleep is strong but he is thirsty enough that he has started to feel slightly sick and he needs to use the restroom.

There is nobody around again, everything is quiet but the lights are still on. A look to the clock shows that it is close to four and after he has been able to get himself to a sitting position and turn his gaze towards the open kitchen door behind which he can see the window, he realizes that it is in the morning as it is still dark outside.

Moving is just as awful as before and it is hard for Barry to get onto his feet for which he needs a ridiculous amount of time. Seeing that he has been here before, he knows where Mrs. Ming’s bathroom is and, after hesitating for a moment as his legs still feel mostly like rubber, he is able to make his way over to it.

After he has relieved himself, he washes his hands and can’t but shudder when his eyes fall upon his own reflection in the mirror. He looks pale with dark enough circles under his eyes that he could rival a racoon. Frowning, Barry turns away and makes his way back to his resting place.

Len is there when he enters the living room again, sitting at the couch with a grim expression and he doesn’t know why but he feels his stomach sink.

“H-hey,” he greets quietly and can’t bring himself to move past the door frame.

“Hey,” replies the other man and to his relief, he doesn’t sound really all that angry, mostly just exhausted. Barry can understand that.

“You keep standing there and I will have to carry you over here again after your legs give out under you.”

Barry’s face grows hot and he makes a small protesting sound but still starts moving again as Len does have a point.

It shows how mindful his friend is that he has placed himself on one of the ends of the couch so that there is still space between them after Barry has taken a seat. Being off his feet is an incredibly good feeling.

They sit in silence for the next couple of minutes and the former drowsiness returns.

“Y-you a-asked m-me f-f-for m-my p-p-parole o-offic-cer’s n-name.”
Barry turns his head that has been resting at the back of the couch and meets the other man’s eyes. He frowns slightly.

“W-why?”

“What do you think?”

There is a slight edge to his voice and Barry wonders what has him angered again. Even with how tired his mind is right now, he knows that they most likely didn’t harm her. Threatening his parole officer, especially someone like Ms. Jenkins, would just mean a hell of a lot of consequences for him and he is certain that the other man knows that as well. Besides, people like her don’t get intimidated easily.

“D-did you ask H-Hartley t-to t-talk t-to her?”

Len scoffs at that and shoots him a clearly amused but not very friendly look.

“I did and they had quite an interesting conversation.”

Barry frowns again and isn’t sure why the other man seems in such a bad mood. A tense moment passes between them before Len heaves a sigh and rubs his eyes.

“She thinks you called and you don’t need to worry about her for now.”

“Y-you d-didn’t h-hurt her,” he asks a bit wary as he doesn’t like the supressed aggression that is coming off Len in waves.

“We didn’t do anything to that bitch, so don’t worry your head off.”

And suddenly Barry understands and he really doesn’t want to talk about it anymore.

Still, he briefly wonders what Hartley has learned from his conversation with the older woman and just the simple notion of this causes him to feel sick with humiliation again.

Another silence spreads between them and the exhaustion starts to seep back into him as he studies the ceiling above them. Despite everything, he knows what they have done for him and he can’t help but feel grateful for it.

“Th-thank y-you, L-Len.”

Barry’s voice is faint and raspy and he expects the other man to snort or glare or do something else he usually does when he is in a bad mood and someone presents themselves as an easy target for it.

Len doesn’t, though.

Instead, he looks over to him and studies him quietly.

“Sure.”

There is something in his expression Barry doesn’t know how to read.

“You really have the most rotten luck.”

“Th-thanks,” he answers dryly and causes the other man to chuckle. His mood becomes more solemn again and he wonders how Len will take his next words. “I w-will p-pay y-you b-back f-for th-the d-doctor.”
The annoyed scowl that appears on Len’s face isn’t really a surprise but Barry still had hoped he would not make this difficult again.

“You don’t need to pay me back shit, Allen.”

“Y-you p-paid n-nearly f-four h-hundred d-dollars—“

“Stop being such a damn idiot all the time, will you?!“

The sudden surge in his friend’s anger causes Barry to flinch back and emit a small protesting and scared noise for which in turn causes him to feel immediately embarrassed.

The fury seems to drain from the other man and he studies him with a tired look instead.

“Whatever. You want to pay me back? Fine, just give me the money when you have it together,” Len gets up and turns back to him. “You feel like you can keep something down?“

Seeing that his throat has closed up on him again, Barry nods quietly while he keeps his eyes on the small table in front of him. He doesn’t feel hungry, mostly just thirsty, if anything, but he is just glad that Len seems willing to let their former topic go. It is obvious that he doesn’t expect him to get the money together to pay him back and Barry hates that he is likely right about it.

Len vanishes in the kitchen without another word and Barry, too tired to move much, just keeps sitting and listens to him in there.

About ten minutes later, he comes back with a bowl of tomato soup and a slice of toast as well as a big glass of water, which he puts on the couch table in front of him. Seeing the food, Barry feels his stomach make a small lurch and suddenly his eyes start to itch all over again.

“I can get you something else,” says Len who hasn’t missed his reaction and while he sounds mostly gruff, there is also a slight note of concern in his voice.

“N-no… th-thanks, I-I…“

Barry bites his lip and rubs his eyes before he briefly glances at the other man.

“Th-thanks.”

Len frowns and seems both doubtful and confused by his odd reaction but nods. It is understandable that he doesn’t get it. Barry knows how silly it is for him to get sentimental over this simple meal but he can’t help it. It is so close to his childhood comfort food that it hurts.

“You don’t like tomato soup?”

“N-no, I l-like it… v-very m-much…“

A soft chuckle passes his lips and he thinks that sometimes things work in a really, really odd way.

“C-can y-you s-stay f-for a b-bit?”

Len seems a bit surprised about this request when Barry turns his gaze back to him but nods and, after another moment, takes his former seat again.

They don’t talk while he slowly eats his meal but it is nice to have Len around nonetheless. His presence is reassuring and calming and while there is a lot Barry should be worrying about right now, he instead concentrates on him and the feeling of companionship.
After he is done, he feels so tired that he has problems keeping his eyes open and he doesn’t protest when Len helps him lay down.

“Go back to sleep.”

A hand cups his shoulder and he hums in agreement as his eyes slide close once again.

The older lady is obviously enjoying James unabashed flirting and takes it with good humour against Barry’s initial concern.

Still, he would really like for his friend to turn it down a bit. Thankfully, Hartley seems just as annoyed by his colleague’s antics as he is.

“James, the box with the canned corn isn’t going to put itself away,” calls the redhead over to the other Rogue, who rolls his eyes in response but does as he is told in the end. The con artist makes one last flourishing bow to Mrs. Brown, who is giggling behind her hand like a young girl, and wishes her a very nice day before he goes over to the shelve that holds the canned vegetables.

Hartley huffs in annoyance before he turns back to Barry.

“There is really no reason to worry, we have everything under control,” he reassures him once again and nods to the door that leads up to Mrs. Ming’s apartment. “Just go upstairs and rest some more. You are still as white as a ghost.”

He says the last bit with obvious concern and Barry has to fight the urge to repeat that he is fine. It is really getting annoying how nobody seems to take him serious when it comes to his own health.

“I c-can help,” he argues. “You d-don’t n-need t-to d-do all m-my w-work f-for me.”

“You have been mugged not even four days ago, Barry. You are still suffering from symptoms of your concussion and the last thing you should do now is take care of a store.”

It is frustrating how stubborn Hartley is about it and it doesn’t help that he has a point, no matter how little Barry likes it.

“I f-feel b-better, you d-don’t n-need t-to d-do this, Hartl-ley. Wh-what if s-someo-one r-recog-gnices you and c-calls th-the p-police? Th-this is s-so d-damn reckl-less of you!”

When Len told him about Hartley and James taking care of the shop while he was recovering, he initially thought that the other man was making a joke. Unfortunately, no such luck there.

His friend sighs and gives him a look that is more sympathetic than exasperated by his insistence. “Barry, we have been criminals for a very long time by now, we know how to go out in public without running the danger of being arrested. You really don’t need to worry about this.”

“Which is sometimes the best disguise there is. When people don’t expect to see someone in a certain situation or location they usually don’t,” explains Hartley with an amused smile and lifts his glasses slightly off his nose as if to show them to him. “Aside from that, we are both wearing disguises.”
Barry frowns but has to agree that the other man does look surprisingly different just by the few little alterations he made to his usual appearance. The thin rimmed oval shaped glasses and the clothes he wears as well as the loose ponytail in which he wears his long hairs make him look a lot like a college student who is working here part-time in-between lectures. He is too old for this, of course, but at the first glance he really could pass as one.

James, on the other hand, has died his familiar blond hair into a deep auburn and Barry is still not sure what to make of it, as it actually makes the man look eerily different. His character has stayed the same, though, and he has started pestering Barry about dying his hair as well so that they could be in partner look again as soon as he entered the shop about twenty minutes ago.

“Please, Barry, don’t worry so much. We know what we’re doing.”

Hartley reaches for his left arm, slowly enough for Barry to pull away if he wanted to, and squeezes it slightly.

“Just go back upstairs and catch up on some sleep. You still look like you’re going to keel over any moment now.”

“I am f-fine,” he insist stubbornly but knows that his friend is right. He still feels very much out of it and making his way down the stairs has left him feeling dizzy and tired.

“No, you are still recovering,” corrects Hartley but doesn’t sound unkind as he does so.

“We will take care of the store, don’t worry about it for now.”

Not really pleased with this but no longer as troubled as before, Barry finally relents and lets his friend help him back upstairs to Mrs. Ming’s apartment again.

“You really should have let us known about what had happened. I was worried that you were dead, laying somewhere in some damn side alley.”

Mary looks both furious and close to tears and Barry feels like a monumental jackass for not informing her about his whereabouts.

“Well, I told her that this is most likely not the case,” interjects Eddy who is sipping on a coke, “but you can never be sure in the Keys. I thought it would be more likely to find you shot in your own flat, to be honest.”

The other man ducks his head and looks very much ill at ease when Mary glares rather furiously at him.

“This is not funny,” she states firmly before she turns back to Barry and her expression finally softens a bit. “I was so very worried. I came back and you were gone.”

It is humbling to see how much he means to this young woman.

“M-Mary, I am s-sorry, th-that w-was awf-ful o-of m-me.”

His voice sounds a bit coarse and he coughs lightly to clear it but before he can say anything else, he notices that Len entered the room again. His friend had left about ten minutes ago after Mary has forcefully made her way up to them, closely followed by Eddy and Hartley, who had looked somewhat exasperated and quite amused by the young woman at the same time.
The redhead quickly lost any trace of humour when he noticed Len’s pissed off expression, though.

Len’s mood doesn’t seem to have improved much, even though his expression is clam and gives hardly anything away. There is a palpable tension and hostility coming off him and Barry starts to get a bit annoyed by it because he notices how Mary is clearly intimidated by it, while Eddy doesn’t seem to pay him any mind at all.

Len passes them without a word and vanishes into the kitchen, where he gets himself a cup of coffee.

“A charming fellow,” snorts Eddy and Barry isn’t sure what he should think of how he is watching the Rogue with open interest now.

“Are they hiring?” Eddy meets his alarmed gaze with an amused smirk and shrugs. “Not saying that I am interested, or anything, but it is generally good to be aware of such things.”

“Th-they d-don’t… th-they, aren’t…”

“Could you not bring it up that you know who they are in front of one of them?” asks Mary in a low and very much exasperated tone but Eddy only shrugs.

“They know we know, they aren’t stupid. I mean, Snart’s mug-shot has been all over television just three months ago and even without the blue parka it isn’t hard to recognize that pissed off face.”

The other man’s smug smile wanes when he notices Barry’s horrified expression and he quickly adds that he wouldn’t cause him or his friends any trouble. “Look, they don’t cause me any problems, I won’t cause them any problems. It is as simple as that.”

Somehow, this doesn’t calm his worries very much, but seeing that there isn’t much he could do about it, Barry just nods and hopes that this wouldn’t come back to bite them later.

He likes Eddy but he also knows that he had been involved in criminal activities earlier in his life, most likely due to his family, and Barry has seen such cases often enough to know that it is hard to really get away from something like that.

“Anyway, when will you move back to your own flat again?” asks Eddy in an obvious attempt to change the subject. “It has been about a week since you’ve been mugged, hasn’t it?”

“Yes,” nods Barry and glances briefly over his shoulder towards the kitchen, where he can see Len sitting at the table with his back to them. He turns his attention back to his two visitors and smiles tiredly. “I w-will go b-back s-somet-time t-tomorrow.”

“That is great,” adds Mary. “We can come by and pick you up, then.”

“Well, the ‘me’ part of ‘we’ is excluding himself from this little endeavour,” remarks Eddy and ignores the woman’s irked look. “I have other plans and I think Barry would most likely prefer to accept the help of his friends to move back to his apartment.”

It only takes a moment for Mary to get what her friend is talking about.

“Oh.”

“Yeah, ‘oh’,” grins Eddy and gives Barry a wink. “Has to be rather neat to travel via a pocket dimension.”

He doesn’t replay, as he is really not comfortable talking about this with anybody other than maybe the Rogues themselves, and he is quite grateful when they redirect their conversation to safer grounds afterwards.

Chapter End Notes

I've somehow hurt my back and it seems to be bent on driving me crazy (that damn bxxx), so that I'm unable to concentrate enough to do anything really productive (like, for example, studying). Thus I've decided to put this chapter up today already.

I hope you guys enjoyed it.
“What has happened to your hand?”

Jay sound honestly concerned and Barry wishes the man would have waited a couple of weeks longer before passing by again. Then, he would have gotten rid of the cast already and he wouldn’t have to worry about explaining any of this.

“An accident at work.”

It is a lie but Barry really doesn’t want to bring up what has really happened to him. Thinking about the mugging still causes him to feel slightly sick.

The way the older man studies him, makes it obvious that he doesn’t believe him, which isn’t really surprising, seeing that the bruise on Barry’s right cheek is still faintly visible, at least if you look for it.

“A work accident?”

The disbelief in his words is nearly palpable.

“Y-yes,” agrees Barry curtly. “I f-fell off a l-ladder in th-the s-storer-room.”

“Did the ladder also punch you?”

Jay meets his irked look firmly.

“Have you been mugged?”

His anger dissipates at this question just like that and Barry is slightly taken aback that the other man would actually consider this possibility before assuming that he got involved in something illegal that came back to kick him in the face.

“That’s f-fine,” he answers finally after a long moment of uncomfortable silence and steps aside to let the other man inside.

“It’s f-fine,” he answers finally after a long moment of uncomfortable silence and steps aside to let the other man inside.

“That is not an answer, Barry,” remarks Jay as he enters the flat. “When did this happen?”

“About t-two w-weeks ag-go.”

Barry makes his way over to the small kitchenette and decides to make both of them some coffee.
“Two weeks?”

Jay sounds surprised but there is something else in his voice and in the way he is studying him now as well that Barry can’t really interpret.

“It’s f-fine, r-really, I just g-got a c-concussion and b-broke p-part o-of m-my m-metacarpus.”

He shrugs slightly, with his back to the older man now, and grabs the can of grinded coffee out from his cabinet. Working with his right hand still in a cast is difficult and slightly frustrating but he knows that it would be just for another two weeks, so it doesn’t really bother him that much.

“That is not exactly what I would qualify as fine.” Jay sounds grim and while Barry is still not looking at him, he can feel his eyes on his back.

“I-it c-could h-have b-been w-worse.” Barry knows that all too well, thus he is not going to complain about how this little assault ended.

Jay stays quiet and he wonders what the other man is thinking. The open concern he is displaying isn’t something Barry has expected and he isn’t sure what to make of it.

It doesn’t take long for the pleasant aroma of brewing coffee to fill his living area and Barry carefully takes two cups with his left hand before walking over to the table, where Jay is already sitting, seemingly deep in thoughts.

The older man thanks him when he hands him the coffee before Barry takes a seat opposite to him. Jay eyes the cast on his right hand with a slight but grim frown before he looks up to meet his gaze.

“How is your hand doing?”

“G-good.”

Trying to work with it is still difficult but he has mostly gotten used to its restricted usability by now.

“And your head?”

Barry frowns slightly and shrugs.

“A concussion is nothing to underestimate,” reminds Jay in a grave voice and Barry really wishes the man would let it drop.

“I h-have rec-covered f-from it.”

“That is good.” Jay sounds honest as he says so and Barry wonders why this suddenly matters so much. It isn’t the first time he’s had a concussion.

“Did you go to the hospital?”

The question causes Barry to bristle for a second before he shoots Jay a rather annoyed look.

“C-could w-we p-please l-let th-this d-drop, it’s o-over, n-nothing happened.”

“You have been hurt,” Jay reminds him and gives him a stern look, as if he was being a brat. “This is not something to just shrug off.”
“It’s n-nothing,” he insists and really doesn’t want to talk about this anymore. This could get him into a lot of trouble should Jay somehow find out how he got his medical treatment.

Barry averts his eyes to the mug in his hand when the other man’s intense gaze becomes too uncomfortable for him. He knows that he is making himself appear just that much more suspicious by acting like that but he can’t help it.

“How long do you still have to wear the cast?”

“Ab-bout two w-weeks.”

“It has to be rather difficult to handle work right now,” remarks Jay and there is honest sympathy in his voice.

“It’s ok-kay. I c-can h-handle it.” Barry lifts his mug and takes a sip, just so that he has something to do because he can still feel the other man’s gaze on him and it is becoming quite unsettling.

“Barry,” Jay’s voice softens again a bit, “You are not getting in trouble for being mugged. Things like this unfortunately happen, especially in the Keys.”

Barry swallows and nods. He knows that this is utter nonsense but the older man doesn’t seem to and somehow this is a very saddening realisation.

“I know that it’s not easy for you to believe me when I tell you that you can come to me or Joan if you need help, but I mean it.”

Turning to the other man for help hadn’t even entered his mind that night and Barry thinks that this says more about their relationship than anything else could. Still, would he have the misfortune to run into this kind of situation again, he probably would not ask him for help either.

The silence is most likely an answer in itself and he knows that Jay isn’t happy about it but there is nothing else he could offer him. It is nice that the older man actually still seems to care about him in some way, but Barry is not stupid. Jay thinks of him as a criminal and he knows how quickly one misstep could get him sent back to the Heights.

“Have you been able to pay for the visit to the doctor so far?”

Barry glances at him with a frown and really doesn’t like where this is going.

“Yes, a f-friend l-lent m-me th-the m-money.”

“Those doctor appointments are not cheap,” remarks Jay before he adds in a softer tone. “I could-“

“No, it’s alr-right,” Barry cuts him off and hates that they even touched upon this point.

“Barry, it would really be no problem.”

“N-no, I c-can h-handle it,” he refuses stubbornly and forces himself to meet Jay’s gaze. “Ththank y-you, it i-is a v-very k-kind offer f-from y-you b-but it is n-not n-necessary.”

While Barry really would love to have a way to pay Len back, he isn’t going to get it that way. Being dependent on other people has always been a demeaning experience, being in someone’s debt is even worse.

For a moment he fears Jay would try to convince him to accept his money once more but to his relief, he doesn’t.
The mood stays somewhat chastened afterwards and while they talk a bit more, it isn’t long before the older man takes his leave.

Afterwards, Barry is glad to be alone again.

Mary passes by his flat after he has come back from work, which isn’t all too late as Hartley and James are still helping him out and both insisted on him leaving shortly after seven, despite his objection.

She makes them hot chocolate and they end up at the couch, talking while listening to some calm music on her mobile phone. It is nice and relaxing and she ends up teaching him a couple of words in Romanian.

Someone knocks at his door.

Barry, still mostly asleep, groans slightly and pulls his pillow over his head.

Then, he realizes that the knocking is coming from the bedroom door. It is loud and persisting and for a horrible moment he isn’t able to say whether he is awake or still asleep.

“For Pete’s sake, Allen! Are you dead in there!?” asks a familiar sounding voice he needs a moment to place.

“Seriously, you have five seconds to give me a damn sign that I am not talking to thin air or a corpse, otherwise I am going to come in.”

Her annoyance is audible and Barry has utterly no idea what Len’s sister is doing in his apartment in the middle of the night. At the thought that something could have happened to the other man, his stomach makes a very uncomfortable lurch and he forces himself to get up and move to the door before that crazy woman would actually enter uninvited.

“About time,” she hisses into his face and gives him a brief once over which causes his cheeks to heat up uncomfortably before she turns around and walks into his living room.

“Wh-what are you d-doing h-here, L-Lisa? H-has someth-thing h-happened t-to L-Len?” As soon as the last part is past his lips he could kick himself. Could he be any more obvious?

The blond woman shoots him an amused look before she scoffs.

“My dear jackass of a brother is as fine as he can be. Drowning the last of his brain cells in beer while playing poker as we speak.”

This is a relief, even though her unexpected visit makes even less sense now.

“Wh-why are you h-here, th-then?” he asks, slightly irked now by her intrusion and he swears softly under his breath when he notices what time it actually is. “It’s n-not even t-two y-yet!”

“So?”

Lisa shoots him an unimpressed look before she turns back to a big paper bag on his kitchen table, he notices just now.
“I h-have to w-work t-tomorrow,” he reminds her and slowly but surely feels his patience thinning.

“You don’t,” she argues and nods to his still casted hand. “Hartley and Tricks are taking care of the store because you hurt your wrist.”

“I a-am also w-working!”

“Good for you, if it makes you feel better.”

Barry can’t decide if this flippant behaviour is actually amusing or infuriating. This woman is unbelievable!

“Wh-why are you h-here, L-Lisa?” he asks her again and tries to keep calm as his stammer would just get worse otherwise. “And h-how d-did you g-get in?”

His glance to his entrance door doesn’t show any signs of a forceful entering and he really hopes Sam hasn’t brought her over or he would seriously punch him the next time he sees him.

“I picked the lock.”

“Wh-what!”?

Lisa snorts when she meets his disbelieving look and shrugs.

“We are criminals, Allen, we do stuff like that.”

“No, y-you d-don’t! N-not w-with p-people y-you kn-know!”

“Of course we do, why do you think most of James’ doors hold booby-traps?”

Barry isn’t sure whether she is joking or not but it doesn’t really matter, seeing that it really angers him how nonplussed she is about breaking into his flat.

“Y-you c-can’t d-do th-that, L-Lisa!”

“Oh?” she replys in a fake surprised tone. “Who is going to stop me? You?”

“Th-this is m-my f-flat! You h-have n-no r-right t-t-to c-come h-here w-without m-my perpermission!”

Her taunting expression changes when she notices how worked up he is getting over this and she frowns.

“You are quite a touchy guy, aren’t you? You really should think about who you pick as your friends if you have problems with them turning up like this.”

“Th-the others h-haven’t b-broken i-in here s-so f-far,” he points out angrily and ignores the little voice in the back of his minds that points out that, yes, they actually have. “I d-don’t wwant y-you t-t o d-do th-that again! D-do you unders-stand m-me, L-Lisa? You c-can’t j-just ppick th-the l-lock on m-my d-door a-and intrude l-like th-that.”

“For fuck’s sake, alright,” she huffs and shoots him an annoyed look but he doesn’t miss that she is quite taken aback by his reaction. “I will keep knocking on your damn front door till all of your stupid neighbours are up the next time around. Because you seem to sleep like the fricking dead.”

They glare quietly at each other for a couple of seconds and Barry wonders how long she was standing in front of his apartment and tried to get his attention like any normal person would before she lost her patience and performed a break and enter. Not that it really gives her any points seeing how god-awful early it is.

“Wh-what is th-this?”

Not wanting to prolong the uncomfortable air between them, he nods towards the bag and the things she has started take out of it and put on his table.

“Food, as far as I can say,” she replays dryly. “But then again, I am not the crazy smart scientist between us two.”

Ignoring the little jab, he finally walks over to her and studies what she has brought along.

“Th-those are th-the ing-gridients f-for spag-ghetti B-Bolognese.” He frowns and looks over at her on the other side of the table. “Are y-you p-planning t-to c-cook?”

The incredulity has to be plain on his face but Lisa just nods and smiles sweetly. “That is the plan.”

“A-at t-two i-in th-the m-morning?”

Barry groans softly and decides that he is definitely too tired for this. He still ends up joining her, as he feels even less like getting her to leave again, which undoubtedly would involve another fight.

Against his worries, preparing the meal with the blond woman is a surprisingly calm affair. She seems quite impressed by his obvious knack for cooking and even though she makes it clear that she is the one who has the say during the preparation, she let him work mostly the way he wants as soon as has realized that he actually knows what he’s doing.

“Not bad,” she tells him with an appraising nod after she tried a bit of the nearly finished sauce. Despite still being a bit miffed about her unannounced turning up, Barry can’t help but preen a bit, much to Lisa’s amusement.

They eat in an unexpectedly relaxed atmosphere without talking much other than for Lisa complaining briefly about his lack of a television. Aside from that she doesn’t pick on his flat, much to Barry’s surprise.

“What is that one about?”

She nods towards a novel that is resting on the chair next to her where Barry put it before they started preparing the food.

Judging by her expression, she isn’t really all that interested in learning more about it anymore. He smiles slightly and explains that it is actually quite a funny read.

“It is a b-bit of a p-parody r-reg-garding s-some p-popular c-concepts and imp-portant historic-cal p-people wh-who inf-fluenced its d-development.”

“That sounds fascinating,” she remarks dryly and Barry decides to let it rest. Not everybody shares his love for science.

In the end, he never learns why Lisa decided to pass by in the middle of the night to cook spaghetti but he believes that they are on somewhat friendlier terms now when she leaves about an hour later.

Mrs. Ming is quite upset to learn what has happened to him while she has been in Chicago and she immediately vanishes upstairs for a moment to fetch some tea and almond cookies.

“I am so glad that nothing worse has happened,” she gives his cast a worried glance. “You really don’t have to be back at work already. You should be at home and rest, Barry. Getting a lot of rest is the best medicine in situations like these.”

“I am alr-right,” Barry assures her with a warm smile but agrees to close the shop earlier today and join her for dinner afterwards.

It is good to have the nice old woman back.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you liked it!
The soft ringing of the doorbell causes Barry to momentarily stop dusting the shelves with the drinks and he turns to see who has just entered the store.

It has been a rather slow day so far with just a couple of customers, mostly due to the bad rain once again, which has been persisting since midday. His mild curiosity is quickly squashed and replaced by a familiar feeling of dread when his gaze falls upon Izzy who is accompanied by a Hispanic woman he doesn’t know.

A rather sardonic smile appears on the auburn haired woman’s lips as soon as she spies him but it is just for a second before she turns away to make her way over to the isle with the fresh fruits. The other woman, a bit taller and more slender than Izzy, meets his gaze with an amused smirk before following her friend.

Barry frowns slightly and decides that he would go on with the dusting after his current customers are gone. He doesn’t like the thought of standing with his back to them and so makes his way over to the counter.

The women talk quietly as they stroll through the store while picking up a couple of things to buy. He can’t understand them and he is rather glad for it. Judging by the looks they are giving him whenever he is in sight of them, it is obvious that he is most likely the topic of choice.

Barry keeps his eyes on them, secretly glad for the break as his right hand is feeling a bit sour again, which isn’t really unusual as he has been using it quite a lot over the day, but the pain seems somehow more distinct now, so much so that even just dusting has started to agitate it.

… thinking about it, he probably would prefer the pain over these two women, though.

It takes Izzy and her friend about ten minutes to finish their shopping and come over to him with their intended goods.

“Well, hello there, Sissy-boy,” greets the auburn woman, which causes her friend to snort but otherwise stay quiet. “It has been a while.”

Barry feels how his face grows hot due to the embarrassing nickname Izzy seems to have decided to stick with when it comes to him but forces himself to stay calm.

“He is quite a scrawny fellow,” remarks the other woman and eyes him unabashedly. “Looks like he has sticks for arms.”
“Don’t be rude, Cam,” admonishes Izzy in a clearly fake tone. “Trannies are generally skinny, otherwise they would look like an actual man.”

She turns towards him with a smile that shows way too many teeth.

“Aren’t I right? And Len doesn’t exactly like blokes.”

“C-can I-h-have t-the i-items y-you w-want t-to b-buy?”

Barry’s voice is strained but he is glad that it isn’t actually giving out on him. He swallows and nods at the couple of things both women are holding in her hands.

“So, Sissy-boy is interested in getting ride from the infamous Captain Cold?” laughs Cam and obviously ignores his request. He feels himself tense up in a mixture of anger and mortification.

“I think so,” agrees Izzy with a smirk. “He definitely looks to me like a gal who like big strong men, don’t you, Sissy?”

“L-leave.”

So far, Barry never had to throw a customer out, even though it has happened that some behaved rather disrespectful towards him, especially teenagers. Usually, he ignores it and leaves it at that. It doesn’t matter what other people say, it hurts, but it doesn’t matter, he knows that.

This, however, goes too far and he isn’t going to take this kind of insult just because those two women need a doormat.

“Don’t be like that,” huffs Izzy and throws him a sardonic smile. “We are just having a little talk between girls.”

She winks at him and he really feels like grabbing the jar for the tips and throwing it into her face.

“N-no, y-you a-are b-disr-respectful a-and o-offensive b-because y-you a-are h-holding a-a s-silly g-grudge a-against m-me f-for b-being f-friends w-with L-Len-”

“Watch it, Sissy-“

Barry ignores her and stubbornly goes on because he really has enough of her and her ridiculing of him. He hasn’t done anything to her, for Christ’s sake!

“I-it c-causes y-you t-to b-behave l-like a-a l-little b-brat a-and th-there i-is n-no r-reason f-for m-me t-to t-take th-the b-brunt o-of y-your j-jealousy.”

A tense moment of silence follows in which both just glare at each other and it isn’t hard to see that Izzy is now the one who would love to smash the tip-jar into his face.

“Is everything alright here?”

Barry’s stomach make an uncomfortable jump. Mrs. Ming is standing at the doorway that leads to the back area of the store and watches them with a slightly concerned gaze.

“You are the owner of the store?” asks Izzy and shoots Barry a dirty look.

“Well, yes, my dear, I am,” agrees the old Chinese woman and makes her way over to them so that she too stand behind the counter. “Is there a problem?”
“Yes, there is,” states Cam and nods towards Barry. “Your employee is one of the rudest guys I’ve had the misfortune to meet so far.”

She sneers at him and goes on about how he has been insulting her friend openly just now.

Mrs. Ming lifts her eyebrows slightly at that and studies the two women in front of here for a second.

“I have to say that this is very hard for me to believe. Barry has been working here for over a year now and he has been nothing but hardworking and polite,” she explains in a calm tone. “Even to people who haven’t necessarily earned it, which is a remarkable trait.”

Izzy starts to scowl at the older woman but before she can say something, Mrs. Ming goes on.

“I don’t know what the cause for this little dispute between you has been as I haven’t been around, but I am certain that Barry didn’t mean any harm by what he said.”

She meets Izzy’s dark look and studies her for a second before she goes on.

“Sometimes it is the clever choice to listen to what other people tell you, even if it doesn’t seem like it at first.”

“He insulted me,” hisses Izzy and glares at her. “Are you telling me that this is common place in your shabby store?!”

Barry feels himself bristle at the insult and he can’t help but grow angry over it all over again as it is directed towards Mrs. Ming this time and not him. To his surprise, the old woman just smiles, friendly, and shakes her head.

“Of course not, my dear. I am quite certain that this is a simple misunderstanding that has just occurred and I certainly don’t want you to feel as if I don’t take your words seriously.”

Izzy and Cam seem both a bit surprised and pleased by this turn of events and watch Mrs. Ming turn to Barry, who suddenly feels a bit sick as he isn’t sure what to expect.

“Barry, I want you to get me when these two young ladies pass by again. I can take care of their shopping and we won’t have to worry about any further problems, wouldn’t you agree?”

“S-sure,” he stammers and glances to Izzy and her friend, who appear less than satisfied by this. He doesn’t want this to proceed and he is pretty certain that Izzy wouldn’t give it a rest with this presented solution.

Still, it is touching to think that Mrs. Ming doesn’t even seem to consider that those two women could tell the truth and this helps as he turns to them once more.

“I-I d-didn’t m-mean t-to insult y-you,” he says towards Izzy who seems still as irked as before but is a bit surprised by his words. “I-I r-really d-didn’t b-but I-I w-will n-not l-let y-you t-talk t-to m-me l-like th-that. Th-there is n-no r-reason f-for th-this anym-mosity, w-we b-both kn-know th-that I-I… I-I a-am n-not… h-he w-wouldn’t...”

His voice breaks off and he turns away again. He really hopes Mrs. Ming doesn’t understand what this is about, not because he thinks that she would have a problem with his feelings towards another man, which, to be fair, he doesn’t even really understand himself, but because this is not something he wants to discuss in general.

A brief uncomfortable silence follows before Mrs. Ming asks him whether he could go back to the storeroom and see whether they still had enough bin bags or whether they had to reorder them.

“I will take care of our customers,” she assures him when he hesitates and while he really doesn’t like the idea of running away from this situation, no matter how uneasy it makes him, he does give in in the end.

Barry leaves the store without glancing back to either Izzy or her friend.

“I fucking hate that bastard!”

Roscoe’s agitated voice is the first thing that greets Barry after Sam got him over to the hideout the Rogues are currently using.

“And back to the caterwauling,” says the other man with a sigh and appears quite exasperated about the ruckus his colleague is making.

The Rogues did another job this late afternoon. Barry hasn’t known about it and it was just a couple of minutes ago that he learned so from Sam after he had asked him to pick him up.

Despite him not wanting to get involved in any of this, it still bothers him that Len has kept quiet about it. It isn’t as if he wanted to know any details, all of the Rogues are well aware that he isn’t comfortable around them when they are talking business. This isn’t really a problem, as the criminals usually don’t seem all too keen on having him around during these times anyway.

Nonetheless, Len has started to tell him when they are planning something, just as a sort of heads-up and he appreciates it. He doesn’t want to pick up the papers again and be surprised by a damn headline telling him that a couple of them have ended up in the Heights once more.

“Wh-what h-happened?”

Barry, who has picked up by now that Roscoe doesn’t just sound really pissed off but also in pain, turns to Sam in concern, who huffs and shrugs.

“The red jackass got to him and broke his right ankle.”

“How?”

The notion that Wally would do something like that doesn’t sit well with him. He tries to rationalize with himself that it is more likely that this happened due to an accident, though.

“What do you think?” asks Sam drily. “Roscoe caused the Flash to slam into a wall and he gave him the favour back as soon as he had his footing again. Bastard has been in an abysmal mood for months now.”

Barry doesn’t reply and follows the other man instead to the big room the Rogue’s have chosen as the main room.

Roscoe is laying on the old couch, his ankle, which is thickly bandaged and has an ice pack resting on it, is propped up on a pillow. Judging by his expression, he is in severe pain. Lisa is standing next to him and looks tense and worried while she talks to her brother in a rather agitated manner.

Len, who doesn’t seem to have been severely hurt during the heist, much to Barry’s relief, looks grim and like he is in a really bad mood. Not surprising after a failed job.
Barry turns his gaze back to Roscoe, who is sweating noticeably despite the rather chilly temperatures in the basement room.

“D-did h-he s-see a d-doctor?” He turns to Sam, who shrugs.

“Old geezer Humphrey has been here before.”

At his confused expression, his friend snorts and explains that he means the sunny gentleman who had taken care of him.

“D-doctor S-Simmons?”

“The one and only,” agrees Sam while he glances over to Roscoe who is currently hissing a string of swears again. “He said that it is either a very severe strain or a fracture of the later mallus or something.”

“The lateral malleolus?”

The other man gives him a surprised look before he snorts in amusement again and shakes his head.

“Yeah, that thing.”

Barry frowns and looks over to Roscoe in concern, who has one of his hands pressed over his eyes and looks unusually pale. Without an actual x-ray it is hard to say whether the lateral malleolus is still in place or not and thus whether a surgery is necessary.

Dr. Simmons helped him, and while he appeared rather unorthodox, he obviously understands craft. Still…

“Hi, Barry!”

He snaps out of his thoughts and looks over to the table where James and the rest of the Rogues are currently sitting. All of them also nursing visible marks of their latest run in with the Flash.

“H-hey,” he returns with a faint smile. “Y-you are d-doing a-alright?”

“Peachy!” agrees James which causes his colleagues to shoot him rather nasty glares. The blond man does seem to be in the best shape of all of them. Hartley, with one eye completely swollen shot, the right side of his face badly bruised and his nose visibly broken, seems to have taken to worst of it, aside from Roscoe that is.

They are all still wearing their costumes, which is a bid odd of a realisation to Barry as he hasn’t seen them do so in a very long time. Apart from the Trickster, nobody is wearing their masks, though.

“You want a beer?”

Barry turns to Sam and shakes his head before he makes his way over to Len. Lisa has crouched down next to Roscoe and runs her fingers calmingly through his hair while she speaks softly to him.

“What are you doing here?” Len’s bad mood has been expected and while Barry feels slightly irked about the other man not telling him about this heist, he decides to not give in to the urge to answer in kind. He really doesn’t want to get into a fight with the other man, especially not when he is so obviously ready to use any opportunity to get rid of some of his frustration.

“I-I w-wanted t-to p-pass b-by,” he explains and studies Len briefly. “Y-you’re a-alright?” “Sure,” grunts the other man but seems to relax a bit.
“Because he looks any worse for wear,” remarks Lisa angrily and shoots her brother a dark look before she turns back to Roscoe who is gritting his teeth. “He isn’t the one that damn nutcase smashed into a wall.”

Barry feels the urge to point out that this is something the other man most likely brought on himself but pushes it away. He is not going to start an argument about this right now.

“H-has d-doctor S-Simmons l-left h-him any p-pain k-killers?”

“Does it look like it?” grouses the blond woman and shoots him an annoyed glance.

“He was in a hurry,” remarks Len and takes his glasses off to rub the bridge of his nose. “Said to keep his leg still and cool and to give him some aspirin.”

Lisa scoffs at that and shoots her brother another nasty look. “Because that old drunkard knows anything of what he is blathering about.”

Len sneers and nods to Roscoe.

“You want him to go to the Heights instead?”

Both sibling glare daggers at each other and Barry starts to feel rather uneasy.

“Is th-there a d-drugs-store around?”

They turn their attention to him and give him a near identical frown before the blond woman’s expression becomes slightly hopeful.

“You want to get him something for the pain?”

So close after a heist it would be nothing short of idiotic for them to show themselves in public and Barry knows that too. He, on the other hand, could easily get into a drugstore and buy a couple of things that would help Roscoe to deal with his injury.

Barry nods but adds a bit embarrassed. “I-I d-don’t h-have a-any m-money o-on m-me, th-though.”

This isn’t a problem, as Lisa quickly fetches her wallet and presses a fifty dollar note in his hands, even though he insists that this is way too much. Len, on the other hand, doesn’t really like his idea but only tells Sam to get him back to his flat so that he could use the drugstore in his living area. Just in case and Barry is really glad for his mindfulness. While the chance is very slim, he doesn’t want to run into trouble and have to explain what he is doing so far away from his home this late at night.

Sam grumbles about having to play taxi once more but waits for Barry to come back from his little errand nonetheless. It doesn’t take long for him to walk to the drugstore and back again, maybe fifteen minutes, which is enough time for the other man to make himself a sandwich and steal one of Len’s beers, much to Barry’s displeasure. It doesn’t help that he isn’t using a plate either.

“What did you get him?” asks Sam as they enter the hideout again a couple of minutes later.

Barry lifts the small white bottle to show him.

“Ibuprofen.”

“And this is any better than Aspirin, why?”

“… the more you now.”

Barry shoots Sam a brief amused glance before they make their way back to the others.

Len and Mick helped Roscoe to his room while they have been gone, which is probably a good idea as the best way to recover for the other man is to rest and sleep.

“I c-can imagine th-that h-he isn’t h-hungry r-right now,” he tells Lisa after Len brought him to Roscoe’s room and he has handed her the medicine along with the change. “B-but I w-would r-really advise f-for h-him t-to eat s-someth-thing n-noneth-theless b-before t-taking th-these. I c-could only g-get t-two hund-dread m-milligram p-pills b-but you c-can g-give him f-four of th-these at once, th-that sh-should help h-him w-with th-the p-pain.”

“I will see to that;” agrees the blond woman and her relief is nearly palpable now that she has something to help Roscoe with the pain.

Lisa studies him for a moment before giving him a faint smile.

“Thank you, Barry.”

Neither Barry nor Len feel like joining the others again afterwards and instead go to the later one’s room. Tomorrow is Sunday, which means that he has some more time before he would need to ask Sam to get him back to his flat again.

Len’s room isn’t very big but it holds a bed and a table that is sturdy enough to serve as a work bench. There is also a small rather shabby looking cupboard where he has stashed some clothes and work tools but that is about it. Barry has kind of expected that he would prefer this kind of sparse environment, it fits the other man.

The air in here is cool and a bit humid but not uncomfortably so. It smells a bit stale, though and Barry decides to open one of the smaller windows that are close to the ceiling.

“I’m taking a shower,” Len informs him, after he has picked up some fresh clothes, and leaves the room without waiting for a response from him.

Feeling a bit tired, Barry takes a seat at the table and eyes the blueprints but can’t bring himself to be really interested. Instead, he rests his head on his arms and closes his eyes for a moment.

A warm hand touches his neck and startles him out of his sleep.

Len’s calm voice causes him to pause, despite the urge to get up and away from him as quick as possible. The throbbing of his pulse in his ears lessens and his body relaxes a bit again as he opens his eyes and spots the other man, who is standing next to him, once again wearing normal clothes.

“You’re okay?”

“Y-yes,” he sits back up and rubs his eyes. “S-sorry, I d-didn’t int-tend t-to f-fall asleep.”

“Usually the case,” remarks Len and pulls the second seat closer that Barry usually uses.

“Thanks for getting the dipshit medicine.”
He nods and gives him a tired smile.

“I am g-glad I c-could h-help.”

A broken or strained ankle can hurt like hell the first couple of days if you don’t have anything to relieve the pain and he really doesn’t wish that on anybody.

Len hums softly and keeps on watching him with a calm look that doesn’t give much away that Barry could use to find out what kind of mood his friend is in.

“You d-didn’t t-tell m-me th-that y-you w-were p-planning on d-doing a h-heist t-today.”

It is not a reproach but simply a statement. His earlier irk from not being informed about this has waned by now and he is mostly just curious of why. In the end, it is none of his business.

“I didn’t know I have to.”

The other man doesn’t sound gruff or annoyed as he says that.

Not the answer Barry has hoped for and he feels a familiar disappointment arise in his chest.

“N-no,” he agrees quietly, “y-you d-don’t.”

He freezes when Len grabs his left wrist and squeezes it lightly.

“I didn’t know you’d want to know.”

Their eyes meet and Barry feels slightly taken aback by how intense the other man’s gaze is. There is no anger or any other negative emotion, it is just the way he is watching him, as if he was trying to read him.

“I-I…”

His throat is suddenly very dry and he swallows.

“I d-don’t n-need t-to kn-know any sp-specifics, I j-just w-want t-to kn-know th-that…”

He stops and averts his eyes so that he is looking at the blueprints and the notes on the table in front of him. Len’s hand on him is just a simple touch but it is still so very intimate and makes it hard for him to find the words he is looking for.

The other man doesn’t urge him and waits quietly. Barry can feel his gaze on him.

“I d-don’t w-want t-to r-read in th-the p-paper about anyth-thing h-happening t-to y-you and n-not… n-not b-be p-prepared.”

His face grows uncomfortably hot and he feels rather stupid as soon as the last word has passed his lips. There is no way to be really prepared for such a scenario, whether it be them being arrested once again or something more serious. He could know that they do a job and it still wouldn’t make him feel any better in case something should happen. The only difference is, he would not be caught as off-guard as he had been last time.

Over the last year they have become very important him, not just Len, and while he hates what they are doing, who they decide to be, he doesn’t want to see them hurt.

They are his friends, it’s as simple as that.
A familiar guilt starts to crawl up his mind but he stomps down on it forcefully, because he just couldn’t deal with it right now.

His left wrist is squeezed slightly again and he turns his attention back to Len.

“Okay.”

They sit together quietly for a moment before Barry nods.

“O-okay.”

“What is such a nice little fellow doing all alone here in this dark place?”

Barry freezes up as soon as he hears the deep raspy voice behind him and he silently curses himself for not having paid more attention to his surroundings.

The laundry room of his apartment house he is currently in is a dingy old place with most of its ceiling lights broken other than for two old neon tubes, one of which keeps flickering as soon as it is turned on. This causes the big room to hardly be lit, with many dark corners and places to easily hide.

Barry has hated it from the first time he had to do his laundry here and while he got used to the creepy feeling and the musty smell, it never made it any easier for him to come down here.

Right now, he wishes he would have just stayed in his room. It is already half past nine and the majority of the other residents aren’t using the laundry room after seven anymore as it has happened a number of times that someone got mugged here at night.

Usually, Barry prefers to do his laundry very early in the morning, so that he wouldn’t run into anybody but he is quite tired and he doesn’t want to get up at half past four again tomorrow morning.

He likes to use Sunday to catch up with some sleep when he is able to and thus has decided to finish this off today. A stupid idea, he really should have known better.

“Barry, relax, you look like you are going to snap any second now,” chuckles a suddenly much more familiar voice that causes him to whirl around in anger and embarrassment as soon as he realizes who is actually standing behind him.

“Woah, careful there or I am going up in flames if you don’t turn down that glare a bit,” grins Eddy and steps next to Barry to the table where people could sort out their clothes. He puts his laundry basket down, which is already overflowing with dirty laundry and gives him a rather amused smirk.

“Seriously, you should just have asked me to come along if you are so scared of this shitty hole down here. Not that I don’t—”

The other man breaks off when Barry, who has grabbed his own basket after hastily throwing the last couple of freshly washed clothes in it, makes his way towards the exit in a rather swift tempo.

He has hardly reached the foot of the stairs when Eddy is suddenly in front of him, which causes the tension he is feeling to increase uncomfortably.

“Wait f—

“O-out of m-my w-way!”

The other man looks honestly taken aback and steps aside to let Barry proceed; he does follow him though.

“Look, I am sorry, I didn’t mean to make fun of you. It was supposed to be a stupid harmless joke.”

Barry ignores him and keeps his eyes in front of him. He feels like such an idiot, he has had to look like such a fool. Why does he always have to freeze up like that? He would never be able to fight someone off if the first thing he does is go stiff like a board because of the fear that is nearly smothering him in such situations. It is understandable why Eddy finds it amusing, he is a damn walking and talking joke!

“Barry, listen, I am really sorry, it was a mean and stupid thing to do. I won’t do it again, I wasn’t thinking, which is one of my less charming character flaws but I am working on it.”

They are nearly at their floor and before Barry can set his foot onto the last step, Eddy gets in front of him once more and causes him to stop as he doesn’t want to collide with him.

“Will you just slow down for a second and think?” asks the other man and sounds rather exasperated but also guilty. “You are making a pretty big deal out of this. I ju-”

“B-big d-deal?!” hisses Barry and surprises both of them with his vehemence. “Y-you m-made m-me th-think s-someo-one w-want-ted t-to…”

He breaks off and turns his gaze towards the ground where he is glowering at the dirty steps in silent frustration and humiliation.

For a brief moment, Eddy doesn’t reply and Barry wonders what he is thinking and whether he has said too much. Most of the time he has the feeling that other people could simply see the horrible and disturbing things that have been done to him by looking at him long enough. It is so damn embarrassing.

“I won’t do something like this again,” says his neighbour finally in an unusually soft voice, “and I am really sorry I have been such an insensitive ass to begin with.”

They keep standing there for a couple more seconds with Barry not looking up from the steps.

“Okay?” asks Eddy and there is no impatience or annoyance in his voice.

“Y-yeah.” Barry swallows and lifts his eyes to meet the other man’s gaze.

Eddy smiles.

“Good.”

Hope you guys liked it and let me know what you think. :)

I'm going to lift my current once(-ish) a week schedule for my uploads due to being simply too busy in real life and due to having too many stories I'm working on right now that need my attention as well. This doesn't mean that you will have to wait like a month between each chapter from now on, I just don't want to bind myself to a fix schedule right now that I can't keep. I hope you understand.
I went over the first eight chapters, I've picked up quite a bit from palpablenotion and ladyofpride so far and wanted to polish them a bit. I feel somewhat embarrassed by how many mistakes I've found but it is probably a good sign that I've picked up on them in the first place. The chapters should be a more smooth read now, I also changed a bit of the writing and think it improved them but it is not necessary to re-read them to keep up.
I've had a rather busy week and feel quite exhausted but I want to update at least one story. It's rather easy to do so with Singularity thanks to having a lot of it already done (most of that still needs editing done, tho), so I've decided to put this one out. It is not edited yet other than by myself and I will switch it with a betaed version as soon as I've got it.

With this chapter Barry will stumble in a rather dark place for a bit and Len is probably not coming over as the nicest guy. This is no new status quo, though.

November 2nd Year

Barry is sweeping the floor while listening to the news on the radio. It is still rather early and over the last half an hour since he opened the story not a single person has shown up, which is fine with him, as he woken up with a slight headache this morning and hasn’t been able to get rid of so far.

The nervous energy, that urges him to move even though he feels slightly sick, has been following him around since he left his bed and while he tries to tell himself that it is nothing, that he has just a bad day, Barry knows that it is most likely not the case.

The Rogues had planned another heist for yesterday, he didn’t learn any specifics from his friends as he doesn’t want to know too much about this kind of business, but it was supposed to be an easy break and enter, nothing too big, nothing too complicated.

Len usually tells him about their job these days as kind of a heads up and he hasn’t seem particularly nervous about this one, which put Barry’s mind at easy.

At least, till he woke up this morning.

Now a sense of foreboding is following him around with every step and he isn’t sure what to make of it. Thus he turned the radio on, with the slight hope to learn more, even though he really would rather not.

“And to other news,” says the female newscast over the old radio behind the counter and Barry halts in apprehension.” Last night Keystone City’s port has been scene of another confrontation between the Flash and the Rogues. The twin cities infamous criminals broke into one of the warehouses very early this morning, most likely to steal jewellery and other valuables that have been stored for an upcoming exhibition in Central City’s art gallery. Luckily, the Flash–”

Being still the only person in store, Barry walks over to the old portable radio and turns the volume a bit up to learn what has occurred just a bit more than an handful hours ago. His stomach sinks as he listens to the female voice and learns that the heist escalated rather spectacularly when during the resulting fight between the Flash and the Rogues a supporting wall of the building got damaged and caused parts of it to collapse.

The Flash, hindered by the criminals, couldn’t get to the people in time when part of the building collapsed and a couple of dockworkers and two security guards got hurt due to that. One of the men is in such a critical condition that he is still in the ER and it isn’t sure whether he would make it.

The whole commotion allowed the Rogues to get away but Barry can’t bring himself to feel any real relief as he hears that.

He just feels sick.

Sick and so very guilty.

“Shit like this happens,” hisses Len angrily, obviously fed up with the topic of their current conversation and likely also the situation in general.

The other man hates it when things don’t go according to his plans and last night was just an abysmal fiasco. Barry knows that, he has seen this happen before once or twice and it usually is a cue for him to back off and let the other man find another target for his anger but tonight he just can’t bring himself to stay quiet and look away.

It is close to midnight, Len has just arrived about ten minutes ago and they have spent the majority of it arguing, which is never a pleasant experience, especially because the other man could be so very intimidating and he is all too aware of it.

“It is a fucked up situation but it happens,” Len glares at him, daring him to say something and Barry hates how much this scares him, despite knowing that the other man wouldn’t hurt him. He curses himself for it but he can’t just stay quiet.

“P-people g-got h-hurt!” he angrily points out and ignores the small voice in the back of his mind that orders him to shut up and reminds him that he knows that he shouldn’t do this. Arguing with Len when the other man is so clearly already in such an agitated mood would just end in him lashing out and for both of them regretting it later.

Despite knowing that, Barry returns the glare stubbornly. He is upset in a way that makes his inside feel cold and brittle. This is his fault as well, even if he hadn’t been part of it, he still knew about it and he didn’t do anything to prevent them from making this mess, from hurting people.

How the hell did he become like this? Just a damn bystander to whom this angry man and his colleagues are more important than innocent people?

The small voice starts to remind him about why exactly he is letting this happen and he squashes it with all his force because he can’t listen to this. He doesn’t want to know any of this!

This is his damn fault… if this man dies…

Both of them are standing in his living room, between the couch and his kitchen table, and the air is so damn thick that Barry is sure whether it could even be cut by a knife.

“Yes, people got hurt,” agrees Len and he is so tensed up and angry that he looks ready to punch a hole in something. “They usually get when we get caught by the Flash or any other those fucking capes.”
“Th-that i-is n-not th-the F-Flash’s f-fault!”

“Of course not, how could shit like this be a cape’s fault,” Len sneers and makes a step closer to Barry who forces himself to stand his ground despite the urge to retreat. “Because we both know how fucking infallible they are, don’t we?”

“D-don’t, th-this h-has n-noth-thing t-to d-do w-with th-that! Y-you t-tried t-to r-rob th-that p-place a-and y-you m-messed u-up! If th-that m-man d-dies i-it’s b-bec-cause o-of y-you a-and nob-body else!”

An icy and uncomfortable silence follows and Barry immediately feels sorry for what he has just said.

“Screw you.”

Len turns around without another word, which catches Barry off-guard as he hasn’t expected the other man to react like this. Suddenly, an intense fear overcomes him and he hurries after the other man.

“W-wait, L-Len, I-”

“What?”

The other man stops and turns around to him, a cold expression on his face that causes Barry to stop.

“You’re sorry?” he scoffs.

“Who gives a fuck, Allen? We both know what this little hissy-fit of yours is really about, don’t we?”

Not sure what to say, Barry stays quiet.

The other man sneers at him and is about to leave before he stops again, obviously thinking the better of it, and turns back to him.

“You really should stop acting so high and mighty, you are not any better than the rest of us. You have to know that people still would pick any of my Rogues over someone like you? A rapist, murderer and ch-”

“S-stop! I-I d-didn’t-”

“Who cares?!?”

Len’s voice gets so loud that Barry is certain his neighbours above him have to have heard it. It causes him to freeze and stare at the other man in a mixture of fright and dismay.

Len couldn’t really believe this, he is just angry, he has to be.

“You are just another fucking criminal to them, a sick twisted little man they put away for nearly a decade and they couldn’t even give a shit about what happened to you as soon as they closed the lock behind you.”

A sickening fear overcomes Barry when Len steps closer, so much that he can actually feel his hot breath on his face but he can’t get himself to move an inch.

“Maybe they are right. Maybe you really liked to get a little bit too touchy with your nephew,” the other man goes on with a cruel little smile on his lips. “They do say that it are usually the ones you suspect the least who turn out to be the most deranged and I am pretty sure nobody would have suspected the gem’s adored scarlet hero to be such a twisted little sicko.”

“S-stop…”

Barry’s voice is faint and weak and he realizes that tears have started running down his face but he can’t really be bothered by it right now. He hurts too much for it, he feels raw all over in his inside and sick to his stomach.

“You are a sad little person, Allen,” goes Len on in an uncomfortable calm voice that cuts deep into his chest. “I may be a scumbag and a criminal but nobody would put me on the same level as a damn paedophile and rapist.”

Another smile spreads over Len’s face, as unsettling and nasty as the one before.

“Who knows, maybe you really enjoyed what they did to you? Some kind of twisted self-punishment for what you have done? It would fit you.”

A small noise escapes his throat and Barry isn’t sure if it is one of protest or pain but it doesn’t matter. Len seems to have said his part as he turns around and walks toward his bathroom.

At the door, he stops again and faces him one last time.

“Don’t contact us again.”

Then he is gone and Barry keeps standing there, between his couch and kitchen table, and tries not to fall apart.

“Come on, I need your opinion on it.”

Mary, who is currently wearing the familiar purple apron with the small white sheep on it, which Barry got her for a birthday a couple of months ago, nods toward the pot next to her on the stove. She is cooking some new curry recipe she found in a magazine a while ago and has invited him over for dinner to try it out.

Initially, he didn’t want to accept but the sad and slightly hurt expression in her eyes, when he was about to tell her so, caused him to change his mind.

They haven’t seen much of each other over the last weeks as he made himself rather scarce to any person who actually wanted to spend some time with him. It aren’t really that many these days anyways and he prefers it like that.

Still, despite rather wanting to hide in his flat and crawl under his blanket to end another day, he still accepted Mary’s invitation to spend the evening with her just to set her nerves a bit at ease as it was hard to miss how much he has her worried these days.

Even though he feels not at all like moving seeing that his body seems to have turned into lead sometime over the last couple of weeks, which makes everything but resting to an awful ordeal, Barry forces himself to get up from his spot at Mary’s small kitchen table and makes his way over to where she stands.

She is already holding a spoon with some of the curry out to him and he accepts it with a faint smile.
Like everything he eats these days, it tastes simply bland to him. He knows that she put a lot of effort into it, though, and nods approvingly.

“I-it i-is d-delicio-ous.”

Judging by her frown, she doesn’t believe him and he immediately feels like such a piece of dirt again.

“I-it i-is,” he tries to insist and averts his eyes to the still cooking curry.

“Thanks, Barry,” she says in a quiet voice that sounds painfully sad.

They stay like that for a moment, neither sure what to say next.

“Can you help me set the table? I think it will be done in about five minutes. We just have to wait for the rice.”

He does as asked.

There is not much of a conversation going on while they eat. Mary tries to start one up a few times but he can’t really bring himself to say a lot. He feels exhausted and depressed and can hardly think of anything else but his bed.

Barry is well aware of what an ass he is for how he repays his friend’s kindness but he can’t help it and it only causes the heavy feeling in his chest to increase, which seems to make even the smallest movement more strenuous.

“Why don’t you put the movie in while I put the dishes away? I will join you in a minute,” Mary suggests after they had finished their food and he helped her with doing the dishes.

Barry nods tiredly but briefly considers making up an excuse to be able to leave, like feeling sick or having a headache, but he can’t bring himself to do so. His depressed mood isn’t her fault and she doesn’t deserve to be lied to just because he isn’t able to deal with his messed up life. Thus, he makes his way over to the living room and looks for the DVD.

The film she has picked is another old one, a comedy called ‘Some like it hot’, and he wonders whether he would be able to laugh at anything in it.

It would be a nice change.

Mary makes them popcorn and sweet fruit tea and they spend the first half of the movie mostly in silence. His friends laughs at a couple of scenes in the beginning but stops when she notices that he doesn’t seem to get into it at all. For a while, Barry can feel her gaze on him and he wishes she would just turn her attention back on the screen and not make him feel like such a damn sideshow attraction. It is unfair, he knows, but his skin has started to itch again.

It is during the scene after Sugar and her ‘female’ friends arrive in Miami that Mary reaches for the remote and stops the film.

Surprised, Barry looks to her and can feel his stomach sink when he meets her concerned eyes. She doesn’t say anything at first and he thinks that she isn’t sure how to start this conversation even though he is already pretty certain where this is going to go.

“Barry, you know that you can talk to me about anything that is bothering you, right?”
The honesty with which she is saying that causes the urge to get up and leave to become nearly unbearable. Mary seems to notice it, as her gaze grows even more worried.

“What happened?”

“N-noth-thing.”

Barry turns away from her and wishes she would not do this right now. He doesn’t want to deal with any of it… he just wants to hide away in his bed and shut it all out…

“Something must have happened,” she insists firmly. “I don’t want to be nosy. I know it is not my place to be but I am worried. Not just me but Eddy too.”

“I-I a-am f-fine, I-I a-am j-just a-a b-bit u-under th-the w-weather.”

His voice is trembling slightly and he sounds exhausted. It doesn’t surprise him that she doesn’t believe him, he has to appear like such a wreck.

“You look sick and pinched, Barry,” she argues and her frustration is audible for a second. “You are shutting yourself off, you only leave your flat to go to work and, as soon as you are back, you hide inside it again.”

Out of the corner of his eyes he can see how Mary is reaching for him but stops when he noticeably tenses up in response. Her voice is much softer when she goes on after an uneasy moment of silence.

“I’m not forcing you to confide in me, Bar, if you don’t want to talk about it just yet, it is fine. I just want to help you.”

Barry swallows and closes his eyes. His hand is trembling a bit when he rubs the bridge of his nose slightly and he takes a shaky but deep breath before he forces himself to meet his friend’s gaze again.

“Y-you kn-know th-that I-I a-am a-an e-ex-c-convict.”

It isn’t really a question but Mary still nods.

“Th-they p-put m-me th-there b-bec-cause I-I k-k-… k-killed m-m-my w-w-wife a-a-… a-and r-r-… r-raped m-my u-u-un-dera-age n-neph-phew.”

Barry watches how Mary’s eyes grow wide in a mixture of disbelief and horror.

“I-I a-am a-a m-mons-ter,” he goes on and forces himself not to look away, despite what he can recognize on her face. “I-I’m s-sick, y-you r-really d-d-don’t w-w-want t-to f-frequ-quent w-with a-a p-p-person l-l-like m-me, M-Mary.”

Barry keeps sitting there for a moment longer, feeling horribly guilty and the urge to apologize for putting this on her. He gets up instead and walks to the entrance.

The hallway he enters is dark. He doesn’t bother to turn on the lights.

“Barry, dear, do you have a moment?”
Barry, who has just about been to leave, isn’t really surprised about being stopped once again on his way out. It has become some kind of an odd game between Mrs Ming and him over the last couple of weeks. She would ask for his help regarding one little thing or another, like exchanging a bulb or helping to put up a picture or something similar, before inviting him to stay for a cup of tea and cookies or, as it has become common place for a few days now, small sandwiches.

He really has to look bad if she sees it necessary to provide him with meals. In some way this is probably even funny, he just can’t bring himself to look for it.

“S-sure,” he agrees tiredly and slowly follows her up the stairs to her small apartment.

It is as nice of a place as it has always been and the warmth it emits is something he can appreciate even now. He just doesn’t like the couch to much anymore, though. It remembers him of when he had been mugged and how Len kept him company afterwards…

At the small coffee table, in front of said couch, rests a box containing a couple hundreds of puzzle pieces by the look of it. Next to it is a very small part of the already started picture and he doesn’t know why but the sight causes him to smile. He can’t really say that he is surprised to learn about this little hobby of his employee. She seems the type who would enjoy spending her time fitting the small pieces together.

“You like puzzles?” she inquires with a warm smile as she has obviously notices his look and he nods slightly.

“Y-yeah, I l-l-liked t-to d-do th-them w-when I-I w-was a-a k-kid.”

Doing a puzzle is a very calming task, you can solve it on your own and it is easy to hide it away in a small box and start all over again later. Aside from Mr Bunny he had just two other things that followed him through his whole childhood and one of them was the puzzle of a little girl with a big straw hat and a pretty but simply white dress standing in a meadow full of flowers. It was a hard one, with more than five-hundred pieces, but he was able to solve it in less than one hour when he reaches his fourteenth birthday.

“That is wonderful,” remarks Mrs Ming and explains that she too is an avid friend of puzzles but that her waning eyesight is making it harder and harder for her to follow this little hobby.

“Maybe you could assist me a bit with it sometimes after the shop is closed?” she suggests and quickly adds. “You don’t have to, though, my dear boy. I can understand if you want to get home instead.”

Barry studies the puzzle and to his utter surprise, he doesn’t just feel the same lethargic way as he usually does when he is confronted with any task these days, may it be serving customers, preparing a meal or simply getting out of the bed in the mornings.

“N-no, i-it… I-I w-would l-like th-that.”

Mrs Ming smiles warmly at him and it is obvious how pleased she is by him agreeing to this.

“Wonderful.”

She ushers him over to the couch before she tells him that she would make them some tea.

“And a couple of sandwiches. It will be easier for you to concentrate on full stomach,” she adds as she makes her way over to the kitchen.
Barry watches her vanish in the next room and doesn’t correct her.

Instead he turns toward the puzzle and starts to study the pieces.

Barry finds himself reaching into his pocket and holding the small mirror he got from Len a while ago more and more often these days. It annoys him to no end and he decides to throw it away.

Len hasn’t shown himself in over a month, neither has any of the other Rogues, and it is obvious that having this little thing around is of no use for him anymore and most likely could even cause him some trouble in the end.

In the end, he can’t bring himself to do so, though, and puts it into one of the drawers of the small cupboard he has in his bedroom instead.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you enjoyed it and let me know what you think, I always appreciate your feedback very much. :)
It is late when Barry gets a visit from Eddy about one and a half weeks after he talked to Mary the last time.

“So, a little birdy told me you are a paedophile?”

Barry bristles and shuts the door into his face. At least, he tries to because the other man turns out stronger than him and pushes his way into his flat. Eddy ignores his angry protests and closes the door behind himself.

“Calm down, I am not here to roughen you up, idiot.” Eddy gives him an annoyed look that quickly loses its intensity when he notices that Barry isn’t just upset by his unwanted intrusion but also scared. “Sheesh, stop looking at me as if I am about to give you a trashing. I am just here to talk, alright?”

Barry doesn’t reply.

“Man, you are such a difficult fellow,” Eddy grumbles and scratches the back of his head, “and a stupid jackass, just so you know. Do you have any idea how upset and worried Mary is because of your little confession?”

Barry keeps quiet and once more feels how a smothering tiredness overcomes him.

“Barry,” the other man goes on after an uneasy moment of silence. “What the fuck happened? What is wrong with you?”

“N-nothing.” His voice is feeble and Barry notices a familiar and painful lump in his throat as he speaks. “C-can y-you p-p-please l-leave?”

“Not before you tell me what is bothering you? You are obviously not alright,” Eddy insists and his frown deepens the longer he keeps studying him. “What the hell turned you into this depressed heap of self-pity?”

Barry bristles at that, angry and hurt to have said something like this to his fact, and briefly thinks about asking the other man to leave his flat once more. He is sure that it would be probably pointless, though. The other man seems hell-bent on making him miserable.
Thus, he stays silent instead and tries to ignore the sickening feeling that causes his stomach to seemingly curl up into a painful knot.

“Shit, you look awful, man, like really horrible. Did someone… hurt you?”

The last question is asked with a visible reluctance and Barry nearly cracks. What does the other man mean? Like being mugged again or being beaten up or does he know more?

Is it really like Barry is walking around with a fucking sign around his neck that says rape-victim on it?

Why couldn’t they just leave him alone?!

“Hey, look, I didn’t mean… fuck, don’t cry, man, I’m really not fit to handle this kind of mess.”

Frustrated and ashamed of his own damn inability to keep it together, Barry turns away from Eddy and tells him once again to leave. His voice is trembling horrible and he regrets not keeping his mouth shut as soon as a sob forces his way out of it a second later.

Barry presses a hand over his mouth and tries to smother the next one or the one after that but it only makes it worse. Tears start to run down his face and he just wants it to stop.

He makes an unsteady step away from Eddy, toward the couch and his legs give out under him. The other man grabs him, surprisingly quick in his reaction, and Barry cries out in fright and protest like the touch itself is hurting him.

“Fuck, Barry, calm down. I am not going to hurt you.”

Barry doesn’t listen, he just wants the other man stop touching him and desperately tries to get away from him. Eddy, who seems to understand, lets him go and swiftly gets up again to get a bit more distance between them.

“Bar-“

“I-I-I d-d-didn’t… I-I-I d-d-didn’t w-w-want i-i-it… I-I d-d-didn’t w-w-want i-i-it!!!”

His skin feels too small for him, too tight, and he can feel them again, their hands, all over him. It is such a horrible feeling, it is so damn disturbing, he just wants to get away from it so badly but he can’t, he never can.

“What–”

“I-I-I d-d-didn’t d-do i-i-it!!! I-I a-a-am n-n-not… I-I I-I-loved th-th-them, s-s-so m-m-much… b-b-but I-I-I c-c-couldn’t p-protect th-th-th-them… I-I c-ca-c-can’t…”

Barry grits his teeth and there is so much anger and self-loath in him that it nearly causes him to burst.

“Fuck, are you crazy!? Stop that!”

Eddy is suddenly at him again, grabbing his hands and pulling them away from his face and Barry realizes just then that has actually crawling at himself. His eyes have difficulties to focus on his hands but when he finally does, he can see blood at his own fingers. There is no pain, though.

“Shit,” Eddy hisses again, much quieter now, though, and when he speaks to Barry again his voice is oddly low and strained. “I believe you, alright? You didn’t do that, I know.”
These words catch him utterly unprepared and Barry looks at Eddy in utter bewilderment.

“I d-d-didn’t k-kill I-Iris…” he explains quietly and his voice is thick with emotions. “I-I-I l-love W-Wally, I-I w-would n-never… I-I w-would n-never h-have h-hurt e-either o-of th-them...”

“I know,” the other man assures him with an odd certainty Barry can’t understand. Why would he believe him? He doesn’t know him at all!

Why would a near stranger believe him!? Something breaks in him and he starts crying once more, harder than before and even less able to restrain himself.

Everything hurts so much. He wants it to stop so badly.

Barry’s mind grows foggy over the next few minutes and he hardly notices how he slumps against the other man or how a hand starts to rub his back a bit hesitantly.

Later, he isn’t sure how long as it feels to him like it could have been mere minutes or hours, Barry comes around again to realize that he is resting on his couch, with the blanket from his bed spread over him.

It takes his tried mind a couple of seconds to catch up with what has happened. When he does, he grows momentarily sick enough that he is sure he is going to throw up. The feeling is only fleeting, though, and he instead pulls the blanket over his face, as if to hide from the world around him.

There are voices.

Barry freezes and it is hard for him to not panic till he remembers that Eddy is most likely still around. The other man isn’t alone, though, and when he recognizes who the second voice belongs to he feels nearly smothered with apprehension and shame.

It seems that Mary has noticed him being aware of his surroundings again as he can hear her come up next to the back of the couch just a moment later.

“Barry?” She sounds hesitant and worried and he feels so bad about pulling her into this dump of his life.

“Pui.” She tries again and he listens how she walks around the couch to crouch down next to him.

“Can you look at me, please?”

For a long moment he doesn’t move before he slowly pulls the blanket down again and his gaze meets the worried face of his young friend.

“Hey there,” she says with a smile that doesn’t reach her eyes and Barry feels how the lump in his throat and the itching of his eyes returns when he realizes that he is the reason for the sadness he can recognize in her expression.

“Shhh,” she hushes softly and very tentatively touches his right arm. “It’s alright. Everything is alright.”

Barry swallows and takes a shaky breath.

“I a-am s-s-sor-ry…”

Whether he means about causing her the trouble to come here this late at night or for how their last meeting ended, he isn’t sure. Most likely both and more.

“There is no reason for you to be sorry, my dear Bear,” assures him Mary and for a split-second she looks like she is going to cry as well but she is able to regain her composure quickly and instead gives him a somewhat watery smile.

“She is right, you are currently a walking, talking and breathing heap of depression,” Eddy agrees from the other side of the couch and meets Barry’s surprised and slightly worried look calmly. “This happens, there is nothing you can do about it but ride it out till the worst is over.”

Unsure how to replay, Barry stays silent. He still feels so tired, even worse than usual, which is most likely due to his little embarrassing crying fit from before. Just thinking about it makes him want to hide under the blanket all over again.

“Barry, I would like to take care of your face before you go back to sleep, okay?”

Confused, he meets Mary’s eyes and it takes him a moment before he remembers what has happened. He groans in sheer mortification and can’t stop himself from reaching up to his face. It is just now that he notices the slight persisting pain there and he flinches when he touches one of the streaks his nails have left behind.

What the heck is wrong with him? How could he go like this into work tomorrow?

“Don’t worry, the scratches are not too deep, I am sure they won’t leave any scars.” Mary squeezes his arm slightly and gives him an encouraging smile before she gets up and briefly leaves his flat again, most likely to grab some things for his injuries.

“You really had her worried,” Eddy remarks next to him and Barry can’t but feel uneasy by how the other man seems to watch him now. “You ever feel this shitty again, you come to one of us, alright?”

Barry swallows and nods quietly. It is still so hard to believe that those two people really care for him this much. He has been such an idiot to not see this earlier…

“Good, otherwise I am going to kick your depressed ass the next time around.” Eddy looks dead serious for a moment before he smirks and winks at him.

Barry feels how tears start to prickle in his eyes once again and nods with a faint smile.

“Sure.”

Somehow, his body doesn’t feel so heavy anymore.

Mrs Ming gives him an herbal paste to put on the scratches after work the next day.

Barry knows that he has her worried quiet a lot and despite feeling utterly exhausted, he agrees to stay after work to try and proceed with the puzzle for a little while. She makes him tea and Dim Sum and for the first time in weeks he is actually able to really taste something again.

“Take care, my boy,” she tells him as he leave close to ten and reminds him once again that he really isn’t as bad off as he tried to make himself believe.

There are nice people in his life, people who care for him.

“I-I w-will,” he assures her with a grateful smile before he adds a bit hesitantly. “I-I r-really appreciate y-your k-kindness.”

The old woman seems briefly surprised before her expression becomes warm and she steps a bit closer to him so that she can take hold of his left hand.

“I know, Barry, and I’m really glad that I have been lucky enough to get such a kind and fine man like you to assist me with my shop.”

She squeezes his hand slightly before letting go of him again.

“Th-thanks,” Barry utters and decides to leave before his damn unstable emotions could cause him another embarrassing scene.

The air that encloses him as he steps outside is cold and he pulls his coat a bit tighter around himself, freezing slightly.

With not even two more weeks till Christmas, most people are glad that the temperatures have dropped enough to allow some snow to fall. Right now, the night sky is clear with no clouds around and even with the bright lights of the city he is able to make out the moon high above.

Barry watches it briefly before urging himself to move again as it sure isn’t getting any warmer and he really doesn’t need to catch himself anything. Aside from that, he doesn’t want to miss his bus, as the next one would not come before another forty-five minutes and while Mrs Ming insists on him to come back in such a case, he really doesn’t want to bother the nice old lady any more than he has already.

The street lights from the way that leads to the corner with his bus stop are still not fixed and he walks the distance with the familiar apprehension that always follows him these days as a result of having been mugged in this area.

It is hard to discern whether there is someone waiting around in the shadows and it is a really uncomfortable experience to not know whether he is being watched or not, especially because his mind tends to play tricks on him, seemingly hell-bent on convincing him that it is the case and that he is in danger.

He is halfway there when he notices a dark figure coming around the corner where his destination lays and proceeds to make his way toward his direction. This causes Barry to slow down, despite the more rational part of him insisting that this doesn’t have to mean anything and that he is being ridiculous again.

To his surprise and confusion, he can see how the stranger lifts his hand and starts waves toward him just a second later.

“Hey, it just so happened that I was in the area and I thought we could ride the bus home together!”

The tension leaves Barry’s body when he recognizes Eddy’s voice and he watches how the other man starts to jog toward him.

“What are you d-doing h-here, E-Eddy?” he asks when the other man stops next to him.

“As I’ve said, I was in the area,” Eddy explains with a shrug and a familiar smirk and when Barry just proceeds staring at him, he huffs and rolls his eyes. “Come on, slowpoke, you don’t wanna miss your bus in this piss poor weather, do you?”

Barry feels a smile starts to slowly spread over his lips as a deep gratitude fills him. He is certain that his friend came here to accompany him home, probably still worried about him after how out of it he has been yesterday.

“R-right,” he agrees and the both of them start anew toward the bus stop.

They are lucky, the bus arrives just a couple of minutes after they reached their destination and while Barry feels too tired to be very talk active, it doesn’t seem to bother Eddy, who keeps on talking enough for both of them for the most part of their way home.

It is a bit after elven when they finally reach their floor and Barry is very grateful for it because he feels utterly spent.

“Don’t fall asleep on your feet.” Eddy is watching him with an amused grin, obviously not missing how tired he is, before he wishes him a good night and moves on to his flat.

“Eddy?”

His friend, who has just put the key into the lock of his door, halts and looks back to him. They turned on the floor lights but the couple of them which are still working aren’t enough to illuminate all of it so that the other man’s face is mostly in shadows.

“Th-thanks f-for… f-for p-picking m-me u-up,” Barry tells him and he really means it.

Eddy smirks and shrugs.

“Sure thing but don’t let it get to your head,” his friend tells him in good humour. “After all, I’ve told you I was already in the area, haven’t I?”

Barry nods and finally enters his flat with a warm and comfortable feeling resting in his chest.

“Someone is knocking,” remarks Eddy from his position at the couch while not moving his eyes from the science magazine he has brought over and is currently reading.

“Well, then would you be kind enough to move your behind up from the couch and answer it?” asks Mary in a slightly irked voice. “Barry and I are the ones cooking, you could at least do something to earn you seat at the dinner table.”

“Hey, I am here for moral support and to tell you how amazing your food is,” complains the man but is already getting up. “You people are so ungrateful.”

Barry, who is currently with both of his hands in the filling, doesn’t listen to them and instead studies the door with a worried frown as he isn’t expecting anybody.

Briefly, just for split-second, he thinks of Len and immediately could kick himself for doing so. Mary has been right all those months ago, some people are just not healthy to have around. Understanding this is important, even if it hurts like hell at times.

“Hello and welcome at the Allen residence, how may I help you?” Eddy greets whoever is in front of the door after opening it.

Mary huffs in annoyance next to him while Barry chuckles over the other man’s rather childish antics. The situation loses any of its humour a moment later, though, when he hears Jay answer.

“I’m actually here to see Barry. Is he at home?”
The older man sounds slightly suspicious and Barry quickly grabs a paper towel to clean his hands and makes his way over to them.

“I-I’m h-here.”

Eddy steps to the side to make him space and Jay’s expression immediately relaxes when he sees him.

“Hallo, Barry. I’m sorry if I bother you, I just wanted to pass by and wish you a Merry Christmas.”

Jay’s last visit lays nearly two months back and Barry has assumed that he may have decided that he wasn’t worth the effort in the end. Then again, with how bad his depression has been for the last couple of weeks, he is actually glad that the older man hasn’t passed by. It probably would only have been a very uncomfortable affair.

“Th-thank y-you, J-Jay,” he answers honestly. “I-I h-hope you a-and J-Joan are g-going t-to h-have a v-very M-Merry Ch-Christmas as well. P-Please s-send h-her m-my r-r-regards.”

“Of course,” Jay agrees before his gaze turns toward Eddy again, who is still next to Barry and it is hard to miss that he is a bit surprised to find another person around, which in turn is a bit insulting.

“Is that another friend of yours, Barry?” Mary joins them and regards Jay with a rather curious but friendly look.

“Th-this is J-Jay G-Garrick,” he introduces the older man, seeing that he hasn’t really any other possibility, and hesitates a bit before he goes on. “H-he is… a-a f-former w-working p-partner of m-mine.”

“You look quite different without the helmet, anybody ever told you so?” Eddy asks and his grin widens when Jay gives him a slightly annoyed frown. He gasps the next moment when Mary jabs his elbow rather forcefully into his side before she turns to Jay again and introduces herself.

“I am Maria Nicolescu but people usually call me Mary. It is a pleasure to meet you.”

Barry is glad when Jay relaxes again and returns his friend’s greeting warmly.

“Yeah, well, I am Edward,” the man next to him grumbles while he still rubs his side. Jay’s frown returns but Eddy ignores it and instead turns around and makes his way back to the couch where he swiftly lays down once more with the magazine in his hands.

Barry feels a slight irk rise in his chest, annoyed that his friend would behave this rude towards Jay. What the heck is up with him?

“I am really sorry for disturbing you,” Jay says again and causes Barry to turn it back to him.

“N-no, it i-is f-fine.”

The older man passing by really isn’t a bother and it isn’t as if he could have called beforehand and asked whether he could come by or not with Barry’s ongoing lack of a landline or a mobile phone, which are both too expensive for him right now.

“It’s n-nice of y-you t-to p-pass b-by,” he goes on and while he doesn’t feel comfortable around Jay anymore, he really means it. The other man has taken the time to come here, after all, even if it doesn’t take much longer than the blink of an eye for him.
“Actually, I have something for you, but I can see now that you are probably not going to have any real use for it.” Jay hands him a paper bag, similar to the one he brought by before, and Barry accepts a bit surprised. In it are a couple of containers with some more of Joan’s cooking and he can’t help but feel touched by this nice gesture.

“Th-thanks, J-Jay, I r-really ap-preciate it.”

The older man nods. “You are welcome, Barry, and I am really glad that you are spending today not alone.”

It is odd to hear this, to have Jay treat him so nicely. He doesn’t understand the other man most of the time, he really doesn’t and while a part of him wants to shy away, he forces it to quiet down.

“Y-you w-want t-to c-come i-in f-for s-some c-coffee?” he asks and quickly adds that it doesn’t has to be for long.

“We also have hot punch if you want, we just finished it,” Mary remarks.

“Hey! Why don’t I know anything about this?!” Eddy shoots her an indignant glare but the young woman reminds him that only people who work are earning their share.

“But Garrick didn’t do anything either,” he complains with a fake hurt look.

“He is a guest,” Mary states with a frown and walks over to where Eddy is still lying and who is watching her with slight suspicion as she comes closer. “You’re getting up now and you’re going to peel the maroons.”

“What, but just brought them over and they are still hot.”

“Deal with it.”

“You are the most heartless woman ever, you hear me? Ever!”

Barry sighs quietly after watching his two friends for a moment and turns back to Jay who doesn’t seem certain whether he should be amused by what he is seeing or not.

“Y-you’re r-really n-not b-bothering us a-and w-we m-made qu-quite a l-l-lot of p-punch” he tries again and can’t help but feel a bit nervous when Jay turns his gaze back to him.

The older man seems to notice it as his face briefly darkens with an emotion Barry isn’t sure where to place. Before he can get worried about somehow having gotten himself into a trouble again, Jay’s expression relaxes again and he gives him a faint but friendly smile.

“I would like that very much.”

Chapter End Notes

I really wanted to upload this on Thursday already but I’ve been too tired after work and the last couple of days have been really busy for me, so it turned into another Sunday upload again. RL can be so damn needy...

This chapter had me worried for a while now, tbh. Barry is badly hurting in it and dealing with the aftermath of his fight with Len is hard for him seeing that the other man has become his main source for support by now and whose words have been pretty devastating to him.

I hope his reaction to all this is understandable and doesn't come over too crass for some people.

The next chapter will introduce another one of my fav characters of the Flash (and, oh boy, am I looking forward to them :) and the one after that will have some Rogues in it again and will shed some light on why the kept their distance. Len will take a bit longer to re-appear, though.

I hope you enjoyed it and let me know what you think, I'm always curious to read your thoughts on it. :)
The weather gets worse at the beginning of the New Year and both of the twin cities get buried under a thick blanket of snow during the second week of January.

Barry, who doesn’t like cold weather in general as it causes the pain in his joints to worsen, dreads every time he has to go outside. The fact that he is travelling by bus to and from work isn’t making things much easier as the bad weather conditions make it also more difficult for traffic to function in general. That most people seem to be in a constant bad mood these days is just another reason why Barry is glad that he usually uses the public traffic system at hours where hardly anybody else does.

Looking out of the shop window, Barry watches how the snowfall that has started over an hour ago is still going strong and while he really hates the cold and wetness of this time of the year, he can’t help himself but marvel over how beautiful even the dirtiest part of a city becomes when it is covered by an inch of freshly fallen snow.

He already caught himself a number of times sketching a bit during the day as hardly any person has passed by so far. It seems that he isn’t the only one who prefers to stay inside in such a weather.

Out of the corner of his eyes he catches a movement and turns his attention once again back to the young teenager who has entered the little shop about twenty minutes ago. It is obvious by now that he isn’t intending to buy anything and Barry can’t say that this surprises him all that much. The boy is one of the street kids of this area and most likely just wants a place to stay for a bit to warm up. This is not a problem for him, as long as the teenager doesn’t cause any trouble.

As if on a cue, he notices how the kid is stuffing the candy bar which he has been eying briefly into his pocket and Barry has to bite down on a frustrated groan.

Calmly, as to not call the teenager attention to the fact that he has been caught, he makes his way around the counter to the entrance door and locks it before turning the sign from “OPEN” to “CLOSED”.

It doesn’t take the boy long to notice what Barry is doing and he is suddenly next to him and pulling at the door but to no avail.

“What the hell!? What the fuck is wrong with you jackass!?” yells the kid and whirls around to glare at him with such an intensity that Barry is certain he would have gone up in flames if such a thing was possible. “You are too stupid to see that you still have a customer in here before you lock up!”

“C-calm d-down,” he tells the boy calmly and really isn’t surprised then the kid starts to imitate him.

“N-n-no, I-I w-w-won’t c-c-c-calm d-d-down, r-r-retard! Open the fucking door and let me out!”

“If y-you d-don’t w-want m-m-e t-to c-call th-the c-cops f-for sh-shopl-lifting, you w-will w-wind d-down a a-a-bit and s-stop m-making s-such a r-ruckus,” he tells the boy sternly and really hopes that this would do the trick. There is no way that he would actually call the police over something like this, especially because the thief is a child and while he has been given this job he is still not supposed to interact with anybody underage on his own.

The teen visibly bristles at the mention of the police and for a moment Barry is certain that he is going to try and smash the glass of the door due to the panic he can see flicker in his eyes. His worry turns out unfounded when the kid’s expression suddenly makes a shift from fearful to taunting.

“So what, call the cops! You think I am scared of those pigs? Ha! They can go fuck themselves!”

Barry frowns and while he is pretty sure that the kid is living on the streets, he still doesn’t want to get the police involved, especially because such an attitude could get the little fool in quite some trouble. Thus, he asks for the boy’s parents’ number.

“Or d-do y-you h-have any other r-relatives I c-can call?” he probes on when the teen just glares darkly at him from under his too long bangs before stubbornly turning his gaze to the ground.

“L-look, you c-can either g-give m-me eith-ther th-the n-number of s-someone t-to c-call or I w-will h-have t-to g-get th-the p-police inv-volved.”

Slowly but surely he starts to grow frustrated, especially because he has the shop closed and while he doesn’t expect any customer to turn up anytime soon, he still doesn’t like it. Unfortunately, Mrs. Ming isn’t around right now, as her grandson is currently in town and has taken her out to eat lunch together before visiting some exhibition in one of the smaller art galleries Central has to offer. She could call the police or handle this little shoplifter any other way she deems fit and Barry wouldn’t be forced to break the top condition of his parole, which is to avoid any unsupervised contact with minors.

He could have let the boy get away, of course, but this wouldn’t be right and certainly would have done any good for the kind in the long run. Still, with each passing second, he regrets more to not have done just that.

“K-kid-,” Barry tries again but the teenager cuts him off angrily.

“I’m no damn kid, you old fart!”

Barry doubts highly that he is any older than thirteen but he keeps from mentioning so and instead goes on calmly. “I kn-know th-that y-you d-don’t w-want t-to g-get in t-trouble.”

The boy scoffs at that but glances curiously at him.
“C-come, l-lets g-get over t-to th-the c-counter and sh-show m-me wh-what y-you h-have t-t-taken.”

He doesn’t really wait for the teen to follow but is certain that he will. The boy is a big talker but by his initial reaction it has become quite obvious that he is scared of getting in trouble with the police, despite his boasting.

As expected, he hears the young teen start following him just a moment later.

The kid stops next to him at the counter and gives him a rather petulant glare.

“S-so?” asks Barry and lifts an eyebrow slightly.

With a huff and some mutterings under his breath, which he isn’t able to pick up on and most likely doesn’t want to understand anyway, the boy starts to pull out his stolen goods from different pockets of his clothes.

Barry notices once again how shabby and run down the teenager is looking and that he is quite thin, which could be due to a lack of regular meals or just a growth spurt as it wouldn’t really be that uncommon for boys his age. Still, he starts to feel slightly concerned for the kid and wonders when he had his last warm meal.

It doesn’t take long for the boy to put all the things he tried to lift onto the counter and as Barry has expected it turns out to be mostly snacks like small chocolate bars, small party sausages and chewing gum as well as two lighteners.

“Here you have it,” the kid grumbles and gives him the evil eye once again. “Happy? You have you shitty stuff back, not like anybody would want it anyway.”

While the teen is behaving like a real brat, Barry doesn’t miss how he keeps eying the sausages and chocolate bars yearningly and he can’t help himself but feel bad for him because he knows just too well what it feels like to be hungry.

“What!? I grew a second head or something without noticing it?” the boy asks irritably when Barry just keeps studying him for another minute.

“I h-have a s-sug-gestion f-for you.”

The kids dark glare changes slightly and he starts to look more wary but also curious.

“Yeah? What kind?”

“Th-the th-things you t-took w-would h-have c-cost h-hardly m-more th-than f-five d-dollars, all in a-a-all,” Barry remarks and really hopes he isn’t making a monumental mistake as he goes on. “I w-would s-say I c-can overlook it th-this t-time and th-this t-time o-only if you g-give m-me a h-hand in t-taking c-care of th-the s-store f-for th-the r-rest o-of th-the d-day.”

The boy looks honestly taken aback at that suggestion and eyes Barry sceptically. “With what? Cleaning?”

“If y-you l-like t-to b-but actually m-more w-with h-helping m-me r-res-stocking th-the sh-shelves.”

Due to his joints acting up for a while now, he has done just the minimum of restocking where it really was necessary for a couple of days now. He usually doesn’t have a problem in cases he could just carry cans one or two at a time but with the heavier stuff it has turned into a real pain for him.
If this should really work out, and the sceptical site of him is currently having a field day at pointing out what could possibly go wrong, it would be a rather good solution to this predicament for both of them.

“And you wouldn’t call the cops if I help you with that?” the boy asks in a rather suspicious voice and eyes him with a growing frown. It is obvious that he isn’t sure what to make of this offer.

“Yes, as long as you try not to make off with something else, this whole matter will be settled for me,” he agrees but quickly adds. “But should I ever catch you stealing again, I will contact the police and you won’t get off that easy, understood?”

The teen keeps eyes him oddly but shrugs. “Sure, whatever, man.”

“Good.”

Barry is glad that the kid seems to listen and seems honest enough about it.

“Then, please tell me your name. I am not crazy about calling you kid any more than you are,” he goes on with a kind smile and feels slightly amused by the clearly offended look the boy is giving him at that.

“I am no kid, I’ve told you so already, alright?” he grumbles and hesitates a long moment before he offers somewhat reluctantly. “Axel.

It isn’t a surprise that the kid doesn’t offered him his last name, Barry hasn’t expected him too and he accepts that. Instead of asking him for it, he introduces himself.

“I am B-Barry, nice to meet you, Axel.”

Axel harrumphs and shrugs.

For the next two hours, the teen helps him with restocking the shelves, some cleaning, tidying up the storeroom and folding empty carton boxes to put them into the containers next to the back exit.

Despite his initially rather grumpy attitude, Axel warms up to him a bit when Barry comments on what a good job the teen is doing, which is both endearing and sad.

During the last hour before the store closes, they are mostly spending their time behind the counter, waiting for any customers that most likely won’t turn up anyway as the snowfall hasn’t decreased at all so far and the white blanket that is visible through the store window is growing higher and higher.

“That sucks,” Axel remarks after he has watched the area outside the entrance door that is lit by the shore lights for a couple of minutes in silence. “How come you haven’t had to shut down yet? There isn’t anybody passing by.”

Barry smiles and watches the kid with slight amusement.

“I didn’t know you wanted to assist me with the customers.”

“I don’t! I am not some stupid gay salesclerk,” the teen replies swiftly and rather vehemently before he seems to realize to whom he is currently talking.

“B-being a salesclerk is just as good of an occupation as any,” points Barry with a slight frown but can’t really bring himself to be affronted by the teen’s words as he has obviously talked without thinking and is likely not really meaning it. Not that this makes it a lot better but he know how teenage boys can be.

“It is an honest and h-hard j-job, n-nothing y-you sh-should l-look d-down on.”

“Yeah, whatever,” grunts Axel and crosses his arms in front of his chest.

A silence settles between them once again and like before it is tense but not really that uncomfortable. Barry can see that the boy is counting the seconds before he is allowed to leave and he worries about whether he has any place to go. During the winter it is the worst for homeless people, especially children and while he would like to help Axel, there isn’t a lot he could do.

The teenager notices his gaze and turns to him with a rather hostile sneer on his face but, before he can rebuke him for staring at him, the silence is broken by a rather loud rumbling of the boy’s stomach. Axel flushes in embarrassment and glares angrily at Barry as if to dare him to comment on it. He doesn’t and instead both turn back to the entrance door behind which is nothing to see but darkness and snowfall.

Closing time finally comes and Barry proceeds as usual with Axel mostly staying behind the counter and skimming through some magazine he has picked up about ten minutes ago at his suggestion.

When everything is finally done, he leads the boy to the back exit and into the cold night air.

“Finally! Sweet freedom you have me back!”

Barry chuckles at this rather exaggerated words and turns to the kid after he has locked the door. “You d-did a r-really g-good j-job, A-Axel, th-thank you.”

The teen, who is currently stretching himself like a cat, halts and turns to him with a surprised but also slightly pleased look.

“But r-remember, I c-catch you again-”

“And you will call the cops, yeah, yeah, I haven’t forgot,” the kid grumbles and pushes his hands deep into the pockets of his coat, which isn’t all too thick and really not fit for this weather.

“G-good.” Barry nods and hesitates before he goes on. “You kn-know, I th-think d-despite everyth-thing, y-you h-have earned y-yours-self a t-treat, s-so wh-what d-do you s-say about m-me b-buying you s-something f-for d-dinner?”

Axel, who has studies the dirty ground with a rather morose expression, snaps his head up so quickly that Barry fears the kid could get whiplash from it and stares at him with a mixture of disbelief, wariness and hope.

It would rip another hole in his already meagre budget for the rest of the month but he is sure that the teenager hasn’t eaten anything warm for a while and there it this rather cheap Chinese restaurant not too far away from here that has still been open around this time and actually offers rather decent food.

“But I tried to steal from you?” Axel points out and Barry doesn’t miss how he lifts one of his hands to dig its heel into his stomach as if to prevent it from making any noise again. He suddenly feels really bad for the kid.

“Y-yes and I h-hope f-for b-both of us th-that it w-was th-the l-last t-time,” he remarks sternly before his features soften again. “B-but you h-helped m-me a l-lot as w-well and I th-think I owe y-you a th-thank you f-for th-this. S-so, wh-what d-do you s-say?”
Axel proceeds studying him with a frown for another long moment and just as Barry starts to think that he would decline, his expression changes and a wide grin spreads over his lips.

“Wicked!”

Chapter End Notes

I hope you enjoyed the chapter. :)

Axel has been introduced and in case you aren’t sure, yes, it is Axel Walker. This version of Axel is based on the Axel of the comics (mostly pre New52), so he is definitely younger than the one you know from the TV show.

Next chapter will bring some of the Rogues back and Barry isn’t really that sure how to feel about it.
Here You Are Again and It Still Hurts

Chapter Notes

So, my bus to my hometown is leaving in about half an hour but I thought I'll put this up now because I'm not sure whether I'll have time to do so later on after coming back.

This chapter is not edited other than by myself yet but I hope it isn't too bad when it comes grammar and spelling errors. ;)

Again, I have to thank those lovely people who took the time to give me feedback, I really enjoy reading them, it is so incredible nice to see that someone is getting invested enough in my story to leave me a comment at times. :)

Barry is ripped out of his sleep by a sudden knocking. The immediate response of his body is to freeze up while an adrenalin rush causes his heart rate to spike at the same time and for a horrible long moment he has no idea where he is or whether he is safe.

Then, he notices the blanket he has cocooned himself in and the pale light of the glowing hands of his small alarm clock and the realisation that he is in his bedroom takes off the worst of his panic. He still feels frightened but he is pretty sure that any actual burglar would probably not have bothered with knocking and it only takes him another second to remember who has the bad habit to pass by his flat early in the morning. This causes a surge of anger, worry and hope to flash through him and he doesn't give himself the time to think about what would be the best thing to do now before he already starts to fight off his paralysis and gets up.

“Barry?” Hartley voice is somewhat muffled by the closed door but Barry has to problem understanding him or to pick up on James, who tells the other Rogue to knock again.

He doesn’t give him the opportunity to do so.

Both of his unexpected visitors seem a bit startled when he rips the door open without any warning and while James exclaims his name in happy surprise, Hartley seems to pick up on that Barry isn’t exactly pleased to see them.

“So he is awake? Great, he can make us pancakes.” Sam’s voice comes from his living room area before the man in question appears around the corner and his easy smile quickly vanes and is replaces by a frown as his eyes fall upon his expression. “… or not.”

“Wh-what are you d-doing h-here?” Barry nearly hisses at them and they seem honestly taken aback by the anger he is displaying.

It makes him even more furious because what have those bastards expected!? That he would just welcome them back and cook for them after they didn’t show their damn faces for nearly three months!?

“We wanted to visit you,” James pipes up after an uneasy moment of silence has passed and while Barry just kept glaring at them. Despite not wanting to, Barry can’t help it but feel a bit bad about how confused and slightly hurt the other man sounds. “Sorry for waking you up.”

“V-visit m-me?” he repeats and clenches his fists which is really not the brightest thing to do because the joints in his fingers immediately flare up in hot pain. “J-just l-like th-that?!”

“Barry, what-“

Hartley is cut off by Sam, who has joined his colleagues in the meantime and is eyeing Barry with an annoyed frown.

“What crawled up your ass and died there? Sorry for interrupting your beauty sleep, Missy-“

“Shut up, Sam.” Hartley throws his friend a warning glare but the other man ignores him and goes on, audibly annoyed.

“What? He is behaving like an ass, so why can’t I give him the favour right back?” Sam turns to Barry again, who still feels like he has just been slapped by what the other man has called him. “Sorry for giving a fuck about you. We thought you would like to know that we are still a-“

“Sh-shut u-up! Y-you h-haven’t sh-showed y-yours-self f-for th-three m-months a-and th-this i-is a-all y-you c-can s-s-say?! Y-you j-just… y-you th-thought I-I w-w… w-would…” Barry grits his teeth and presses the heels of his hands against his eyes which are itching badly enough that he is certain he going to make a damn fool of himself again.

For a couple of seconds nobody says anything and he only hears his own breathing in his ears that sounds much too loud.

“Barry.” Hartley’s voice sounds so clam and gentle that Barry hisses slightly in protest because the other man has no right to talk to him like that. This doesn’t stop him, though, and what he says next is like a punch in his guts. “You think we abandoned you.”

It isn’t a question and it sounds really silly now that Barry has heard the words out loud but… it is exactly what he thinks.

They have abandoned him after all. After Len left that night, Barry hasn’t heard nor seen anything of any of the Rogues since. They just seemed to vanish…

“We didn’t-” James starts but quickly breaks off again and while nobody has said anything and Barry is still pressing the heels of his hands into his eyes, he is pretty sure that Hartley has cut the younger man off with a quick hand motion.

Barry doesn’t understand what they want from him, why they act as if it wasn’t obvious that they’ve turned their back on him…

… except if they haven’t been avoiding him.

His stomach starts to sink while a small voice in his mind whispers to him that this is great, that, if this is really true, he should be happy. He isn’t, though, and instead he only starts to feel sick.

“Barry,” Hartley speaks in a low and nearly calming voice as he step closer to him, which causes Barry’s body to tense up even more.

“It’s alright,” the ginger assures him and makes a hushing noise when a small noise escapes Barry that sounds an awful lot like a sob. “Hey, it’s fine, there is no reason to be upset. I think you’ve misunderstood the whole situation.”

“Yeah, like the part where we weren’t avoiding you but trying not to get killed by a crazy team of psychos for the most part of the last couple of months,” adds Sam, who still sounds tensed and very uncomfortable but no longer hostile.

Barry lowers his hands and looks toward the other man with wide and horrified eyes before he even realizes what he does. A couple of hot tears run down his cheeks but he hardly picks up on them.

“Wh-what? Wh-what h-happened!? A-are y-you alr-right? Are th-the o-others alr-right?”

“Yes, everybody is fine, Barry,” Hartley assuresses him and meets his confused and worried gaze with one that is just as concerned. “We had some trouble for a while and were out of the country but everything is settled now.”

“Out of th-the c-country?”

“Russia!”

Judging by James tone of voice and by how he is bobbing up and down on his heels he seems to hold some fond memories of that place.

Sam’s pissed off expression tells him that the other man does not.

“Yeah, fucking Mother Russia,” agrees the brunette and looks a lot like he has just bitten in a lemon. “Some crazy arsehole send a head hunter team after us because some shit Digger got himself into a while ago. That jackass seems to have done a few jobs with those wackos a couple of years back and missed to mention this to any of us.”

“And they were totally pissed off because he had stolen some information on a huge Aztec calendar that can help you to talk to gods!” James provides with a grin and Barry decides that it is really too early for any of this.

“Y-you s-still w-want p-pan-cakes?”

His voice sounds raspy and he feels utterly exhausted, now that his chest no longer feels like it is bursting open any moment due to being stuffed to the bring with too many emotions.

James immediately is all for it. “Yes! With strawberries and whipped cream!”

“You really don’t have to,” Hartley protests and gives him a concerned once over. Barry realizes then that he has to look rather horrible to his friend, seeing that he lost around ten pounds over the first one and a half months they were gone and it is rather difficult for him to put them back on. He has been thin before but now gaunt is a much more of an accurate description. Aside from that, he has had troubles sleeping again for the most part of the last week and being awoken after just about three hours isn’t helping either.

“But if you want to, then it is totally fine,” suggests James, which causes Hartley to give him an annoyed glare.

“James.”

“What, he’s offered it?”

Barry rubs his eyes and wipes the traces of tears away that are still visible on his cheeks before he utters that it is fine and moves past his friends towards the kitchen. There, on the table, he sees two plastic bags of groceries and for a second he feels like crying all over again.

“We bought all the stuff you need,” James explains after he has turned up next to him and smiles widely. “Even maple syrup and we paid for everything.”

“Th-that’s g-good,” Barry murmurs and walks over to the bags to see what they have bought. It is way more than the basic ingredients he would need to prepare pancakes and it such a damn nice thing to do because they really didn’t have to. So far, he hasn’t been able to pay any of them back for even a single purchase and he knows that the money they are using is stolen and that this somehow should it make less meaningful but it doesn’t.

Barry pushes the line of thoughts away and instead turns his attention back to the purchases. It is mostly basic and canned stuff but also a couple of fresh vegetables and fruits, for which he most likely can thank Hartley for.

As James has said, they have got him everything he needs for preparing breakfast and he has to smile when one of the items he pulls out is a pack of Jelly Babies. Definitely the other blond’s choice.

While Hartley helps him put the stuff away he doesn’t need right now, Sam and James take a seat on the table and start a game of poker.

It doesn’t take Barry long to prepare the batch for the pancakes and he listens to the other men as he does so, a bit surprised about how nice it is to have them around again. He still feels tired and a bit sick but something has loosened in his chest and it doesn’t seem like the weight of a small car is bearing down on him anymore.

His mind briefly goes to Len but he stubbornly refuses to think about him as he really doesn’t want to be reminded of the ugly and hurtful things the other man said to him the last time they saw each other. Barry isn’t sure what to make of the whole situation the Rogues brought themselves into just yet but he is pretty sure that even if this hadn’t happened, Len would have kept his distance.

The notion is saddening even though he should know better by now.

His small flat is soon filled with the smell of freshly fried pancakes and coffee. Hartley helps him whip the cream as he doesn’t has any electrical hand mixer and usually uses the whisk if he really needs to. The cold weather is making his joints seemingly stiffer with each day, though, and he is glad when the other man offers to do the little task.

Again, the food turns out to everybody’s liking and while Barry isn’t particularly hungry, he too eats two of the pancakes with a bit of whipped cream. He doesn’t miss that Sam keeps studying during the meal but pretends not to notice.

Afterwards, while they play another game of poker that Barry sits out, they tell him a bit of what had been going on during the last couple of months. Most of the story makes him wonder how his friends have been able to get out of this alive at all and some of it sounds so damn ridiculous that he most likely wouldn’t have believed it weren’t it for his own experience as a superhero and the knowledge that one’s life could get really crazy if you are involved in this kind of things.

“And then the whole underground cathedral started to collapse and those creepy shadow people appeared again but they just kept standing there while we bolted out of there.” James seems way too excited about their little adventure in Russia and Barry is certain that most of this would have caused him to end up with even worse troubles to sleep at night than he already has.
“Stop talking about that shit, Tricks,” Sam grunts clearly annoyed and gives his colleague a hard look. “You’re just inviting trouble if you keep mentioning them.”

“You’re not seriously believing what that senile idiot of a priest told us?” asks Hartley and seems more amused than really exasperated about the other man’s concern.

“You’re not the one that creepy kid has been following around for weeks,” Sam reminds drily and Barry really doesn’t want to know what that one is about.

“What did you come back?”

“Early Friday afternoon,” answers Sam and eyes him once again oddly. “So, Cold hasn’t paid you a visit yet, I guess.”

Barry feels himself flush in embarrassment and averts his gaze to the still dark window over his sink.

“N-no.”

He doubts that Len would show any time soon either and in a way he is glad for it. He doesn’t know whether he could face the man again.

“You two had a fight or something? Because that jackass has been in a horrendous mood even since before the whole thing with the suicide-idiots started.”

“Sam,” Hartley warns but the other man simply shoots him a dirty look.

“What? I’m just asking.”

“Are you sure those head-hunters are no longer coming after you?”

If there is an obvious way to try and change a topic then it would be this one but Barry doesn’t care about subtlety right now. He doesn’t want to talk about Len, he doesn’t even want to think about him if he can help it.

The other seems to pick up on this and thankfully play along.

“Their leader lost his head in a quite literal way and I doubt that any of them were able to make it out from there before getting squashed to death,” Sam explains and shrugs. “Even if they should have survived by some miracle, I highly doubt that they will be able to come after us anytime soon and the information they wanted from Digger is obsolete by now anyway.”

“But if they’re dead, we could see them again as ghosts or shadow people,” James points out which causes his colleague to visibly bristle.

“Shut your stupid trap, will you?” Sam hisses and looks about ready to hurl his coffee mug at the other man. “We aren’t going to talk about any of this shit again, alright!?”

“Sheesh, fine,” James grumbles and rolls his eyes before he turns to Barry and asks him whether he could make some hot chocolate.

“He isn’t our servant, James,” Hartley reminds him disapprovingly but Barry tells him that it is fine.
He doesn’t really want to talk anymore right now, anyway.

It is close to eight when his friends finally decide to leave and while he is glad that he is able to go back to bed, he is also a bit sad to see them go. After all, it has been a while that they have been around the last time and their visit has been a really nice surprise in the end.
While Sam and James are already in the bathroom, Hartley holds him back for a moment. Barry already knows what he is going to say and a familiar feeling of dread overcomes him.

“Look, I don’t know what has happened between Len and you but this has nothing to do with the rest of us,” the redhead explains and chuckles at his gobsmacked look as Barry hasn’t really expected to hear that.

“You are a good guy, Barry,” Hartley tells him in earnest and while he is smiling, the worry is still not gone from his face,” and while we are mostly not, we know that we can appreciate to have someone like you around.”

Barry’s throat starts to close up again and he ducks his head a bit as he utters a small thanks.

The other man’s amused expression changes to one of irritation a moment later but Barry’s worry that this could be due to something he has done or said is quickly put to rest.

“Len can be such a jerk at times and I’m pretty sure that he made certain that you know so too,” his friend says, which causes Barry to avert his eyes with an unhappy frown. When Hartley goes on, his voice is softer and a bit quieter. “He really seems to like you, though, Barry. I know that doesn’t excuse any of what he did or said but whatever has caused your current estrangement is really gnawing on him.”

A mixture of emotions walls up inside Barry similar to the ones before and he pushes them away forcefully because he doesn’t want to start feeling miserable just yet again. He wonders whether Hartley would still think so if he had been there and heard what had been said.

“Y-yeah,” he agrees quietly as there is not really much else to say to it.

Hartley gives him a sympathetic smile and steps a bit closer to cup his shoulder. It is a very light touch and Barry is able to keep himself from flinching.

“It has been good to see you again and thank you for the breakfast. It really was just amazing.”

With that, his friends follows the others into the bathroom and Barry is once again alone in his flat just a moment later.

He stands there for a couple of seconds longer before he sighs and rubs his eyes. He is still very tired, even more so now that his stomach is filled, and he decides that he would take care of the dishes later.

Right now, Barry just wants to catch a couple more hours of sleep.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you liked it!

In this chapter my love for the paranormal comes a bit through, it is just a small gag for anybody of you who knows about ghosts and smudging or shadow people. ;)

Next up, Lisa joins us again! :3
It is a week after Hartley and the others have showed up in his flat that Barry gets a visit from Lisa, this time, much to his surprise, just before midday.

“I need a place to get away from those idiots for at least a couple of hours or I won’t be held responsible for what I am going to do,” she tells him in lieu of a greeting and doesn’t wait for him to invite her in before she pushes past him.

Barry, quite taken aback by this rather brusque intrusion, just looks after her for a second before quickly closing the door. He just hopes that none of his neighbours has noticed his unexpected visit…

Lisa stop close to his couch and lets her gaze slowly travel through the room.

“God, and I thought I have been depressed before,” she grumbles under her breathe but still loud enough for him to pick up on before she speaks to him directly again. “You still don’t even own a telly, do you?”

Again, she doesn’t wait for Barry to answer but instead walks over to his kitchenette and makes a beeline to his fridge.

Barry swiftly follows her.

“You c-can’t j-just m-march in h-here l-like th-that, L-Lisa,” he half says, half hisses and the only answer he receives is a rather unimpressed look from the blond woman before she turns back to the now opened fridge.

“Sam told me that you are a real chef. You wanna be a good host and cook me something?”

“N-no,” he states firmly and feels increasingly frustrated. “B-but you are g-going t-to l-leave a-again.”

She darkly frowns at him and closes the refrigerator door with more force than necessary.

“Too bad, Sweetie, you are stuck with me for now.” The smile she is now giving him is anything but friendly and both of them proceed glaring at each other for the next couple of seconds as Barry isn’t really sure what else to do.

“You always in such a pissy mood?” Lisa finally asks when she seems to have enough of scowling at him. It irks Barry because this is just ridiculous. He has every right to be not exactly welcoming after her more or less forcing her way inside.

“Y-you alw-ways imp-pose y-yourself on others, wh-who c-clearly d-don’t w-want your c-company?” he asks sharply in return and immediately feels sorry for it when a hurt expression crosses Lisa’s face in response. It is quickly gone again, though, and replaced by anger instead.

“Well, because you stammering version of a scarecrow are so popular these days, aren’t you?” she asks sharply and sneers. “You’re expecting some little boy to come by and don’t want me to interfere with your fun?”

There is hardly anything Barry hates more than those awful insinuations. Every single time it is like a punch and he feels utterly mortified for a seconds that people are really thinking that of him.

“L-leave.” His voice sounds strained and thin and he is pretty sure that it is plain on his face how damn much he is hurting again.

“Look, I am sorry, I-

“L-leave!”

Lisa doesn’t but she falls quiet for a moment and studies him with a slight frown.

“I am really sorry, Allen, that was a low blow.”

“J-just g-go, you kn-know absol-lutely n-nothing and y-you h-have n-no d-damn r-right t-to t-talk t-to m-m-me l-like th-that.” Barry feels how his eyes start to itch again and he angrily wipes his hand over them. He hates this so much, he just wanted a damn Sunday to relax a bit.

“I know and it was horrible of me, I am just in a pissy mood and my mouth often works too quickly for my mind to catch up. This is no excuse but I really don’t want to make you feel bad.” Lisa huffs and pushes her fingers through her hairs in a rather exasperated manner. “Let me make it up to you, please. I’ll order us some pizza and we can start over again, okay? No hissing and spitting at each other but talking like the grown-ups we are supposed to be.”

The notion to spend any more time with her isn’t exactly thrilling and Barry’s relaxed mood from before is now gone as well.

Before he can decline, though, she goes on with a pleading look. “Please, Allen, I’m really sorry for what I’ve said and there aren’t exactly many places I can hang out with somebody without me ending up in a damn holding cell. Just let’s start over, alright?”

Lisa does look sorry and despite not really wanting to have anybody around right now, Barry bites his lower lip and nods reluctantly.

“Great!” The woman gives him a wide triumphant grin before she pulls out her mobile phone and starts unlocking it. “Basilio’s is the best pizzeria in Keystone and they even deliver in this rundown area, you’ll love it. They’ve the best Tiramisu you can imagine.”

“L-Lisa, I r-really d-don’t h-have th-the m-money f-for th-that,” Barry interjects and despite his lack of appetite he offers to cook them something instead. He still has enough of the groceries Hartley and the other brought over that he could make them something nice, after all.

“I’ve told you already that this is on me,” she reminds him and just lift her hand to stop him from protesting anymore. “It’s my redemption for being such a pissy cow, alright?”
"This isn’t necessary, really."

"When is the last time you’d Italian food? And I’m not talking about this piss-poor excuse you get in those cheap spots around here."

"L-Lisa—"

"Barry, I really feel bad about what I’ve said before, so please, let me make it up to you."

A bit caught off-guard by her calling him by his first name, Barry just looks at her in surprise for a moment, which Lisa seems to take as an agreement because she gives him a satisfied smile and starts to dial a number she seems to know by heart.

"Do you like anchovies and capers?" she asks him as she waits for someone on the other line to pick up and he just shrugs a bit helplessly, because it still doesn’t sit well for him that he is invited for lunch but he doesn’t really see any way to get out of this.

Lisa proceeds to order a Pizza Napoli, along with a big bottle of diet coke and two servings of the formerly mentioned Tiramisu.

"So," she says after she ended the call and looks to him, "what are you doing on your days off without a TV? Any suggestion for how to pass time till the food arrives?"

Seeing that he usually either spends his free time trying to catch up sleep, reading or drawing, he isn’t really sure what to offer her. Usually, when Mary or Eddy are over, they talk or play cards and while he still is a bit wary of the first option, he thinks that a game of Crash is probably acceptable for both of them.

Lisa agrees and they end up playing a couple of rounds. There isn’t much talk going on, at least not on his part, while his guest tells him a bit about why she has actually turned up on his doorstep.

It seems that her brother and Roscoe had gotten into another fight, about some rather asinine reason she doesn’t really go into other than mentioning that it involves a job they are currently planning. Both of those hotheads started a quarrel over it, which resulted into Mick and Sam having to pull them off each other.

Barry thinks that it is understandable that she is upset about it and he lets her get some of her frustration off while mostly staying quiet during her little rant.

"Seriously, I don’t get them. They’ve known each other for over fifteen years by now and it isn’t as if this was the first time they’d to work together but this is clearly still not enough reason for those idiots to get over their stupid little grudges," she huffs as she picks another card at which she proceeds to glower at it like it’s the source for her annoyance. "It’s ridiculous that two grown up men like them still tent to behave so damn childish as soon as they’re in the same room."

A pained expression crosses her features and she shoots him an unhappy frown as she goes on. "And they always pull me into it one way or another, as if they hadn’t been on each other’s throat before I had even known Roscoe."

Not sure what else to do, Barry gives her a sympathetic smile and briefly thinks back to when he fought the Rogues as the gems’ protector. Even now, he can still vividly remember that during their clashes with him both Len and Roscoe weren’t able to not get into each other’s hair somehow.

It seems that some things are simply not meant to change, no matter how much time passes by.
“So, you and Len are currently not on speaking terms either, hm?”

Barry tenses up and it takes him a second before he can get himself to give Lisa a reluctant and uneasy look. His throat feels dry again and he only shrugs half-heartedly.

“Don’t worry, I am certainly not going to hold it against you. My dear brother can make everybody want to get away from him at times,” she grumbles and her next words are cut off by the knocking at his door. The delivery guy must have arrived with their order and Barry can’t help but feel relieved over the disturbance.

He gets up to answer but Lisa just waves him off and tells him that it is fine.

“Don’t worry, he won’t pick up on who I am,” she smirks and gives him a wink. Barry really wants to protest as he doesn’t want to deal with the repercussions should the police find out that he has a wanted criminal in his flat but Lisa is damn quick if she puts her mind to it and is already at the door before he can even utter a word.

His body tenses up in apprehension and Barry feels a familiar sickness weigh down his stomach as he listens to her greeting the delivery guy, a young man probably in his mid-twenties. He curses her silently when she actually starts to flirt with him for a bit before she finally pays for their order.

“You look like you are going to snap in half any moment now.” Lisa gives him an exasperated look as she brings the bags over to the table. “Relax, that guy thinks I am just some average cutie, nothing more. It isn’t the first time I’ve ordered something from them, he knows me and thinks my name is Jessy.” She smirks and seems quite amused for a second. “Tricks thinks it’s hilarious.”

Barry certainly doesn’t but he isn’t surprised that James would be all for this kind of charade.

“Th-hat g-guy w-won’t f-find it odd th-that h-he m-meets y-you h-here?” he asks with audible incredulity but, again, Lisa just waves him off.

“He thinks I am a prostitute.”

Judging by the easy way she is saying this, it doesn’t seem to bother her at all that someone could think that of her. Barry can’t help but feel a bit taken aback by it, though.

She notices this and the amused smirk returns. “What? Like a quarter of all the women you meet in this area are fancy ladies. You really think I mind if some bozo who knows nothing about me assumes something like that?”

Barry doesn’t replay, he isn’t sure what he could say to that, and instead gets up to grab them some plates for their food.

The pizza turns out to be just as good as Lisa has told him and while Barry initially hasn’t had any real appetite, he ends up eating two slices, which results in him ending up feeling like he is about to explode.

“Sam’s right.” Lisa studies him with an odd expression he isn’t sure how to take. “You do eat like a bird.”

“I d-don’t,” Barry protests and thinks that two slices don’t really qualify as a bird portion.

“This pizza is as thin as air,” Lisa retorts and lifts an eyebrow as she reaches for her fourth slice. “It h-has a l-lot o-of t-t-topping,” he grumbles and reaches for his glass of coke. “A-and th-the ch-cheese is f-filling.”

The blond woman looks about to retort before she seems to think the better of it. Instead, she turns back to her new slice of pizza and takes a bite of it.

They decide to eat their dessert a bit later, much to Barry’s relief, and decide to move over to the couch.

“I am too full to play cards.” Lisa groans and let herself drop onto the couch with a groan, her right hand rubbing her belly like it’s hurting her. Barry isn’t really surprised by that, she was able demolish five slices on her own, after all, which was quite an impressive task in his opinion.

Again, it is his guest who does the lion’s share of talking, which doesn’t seem to bother Lisa, and he listens to her as she tells him a bit more about what has happened during the Rogues’ stay in Russia and who those people are that had been after them.

Barry hasn’t heard anything about the Suicide Squad so far other for what he learned from Hartley the other day and he wonders whether his former colleagues are aware of them or not.

Then again, there is hardly anything that can pass Bruce’s attention and he guesses that they most likely are familiar with them. It is a good thing the whole spectacle didn’t lead to the JLA or any other superhero to get involved. This would have certainly caused his friends to end up in the Heights once more if not to something even worse.

“Sam’s actually talking about smudging our current bolthole and don’t asks me what that is, I have no idea,” Lisa chuckles and takes a sip of her coke before she goes on. “He’s driving Len nuts with it. My dear brother doesn’t want to have anything to do with that paranormal shit after Russia and I can’t hold it against him. He isn’t showing it, of course, but the whole thing has him pretty much spooked, not that it is any different with the rest of us.”

Her smile falls and she pulls an unhappy face.

“Seriously, that whole experience has left us all with an impressive aversion regarding anything ghost related,” she goes on and runs her pointer over the rim of her glass of coke. “I could still throttle Digger for getting us all involved into that mess.”

“B-but everyth-thing t-turned out okay?” Barry asks, still feeling somewhat worried about them despite Hartley’s reassuring words.

“Yeah, we’ve gotten away with all the important parts still attached,” Lisa agrees and grins amused, “and Sam’s convinced that he brought a little unwanted friend along with him.”

“A-ah gh-ghost?” Barry can’t help but sound a bit incredulous but Lisa doesn’t seem to take it the wrong way as she only shrugs.

“It seems like it,” she agrees. “Nobody else of us has noticed anything so far but he’s insisting that some little kid-ghost is still following him around to this day. Thus, his idea with the smudging-thingy.”

Hearing this causes Barry to get goose bumps and he can’t help but wonder whether this thing, may it be a ghost or not, has followed the other man here the other day. Thanks to his work with Zatanna and other heroes that are connected to the occult, he is well aware that such things like ghost, demons and so on do exist and can pose quite a source of danger. He really doesn’t like the notion that he could get into trouble with such a thing on top of everything else.
“Don’t look so damn worried,” Lisa laughs and rolls her eyes. “I’m pretty sure those things aren’t contagious.”

Barry doesn’t correct her even though he knows that they very well can be if you are unlucky enough...

They topic changes to how he has been doing over the last couple of months and he feels a bit caught off-guard when he notices the slightly concerned way Lisa seems to study him at times as he tells her a bit about what has been going on in his life.

She’s undoubtedly picked up on his loss of weight and seems to worry about this just as Mary, Eddy and Mrs. Ming do. He doesn’t understand why but it is quite embarrassing and he tries to stay clear of this subject as good as he can. Lisa seems to pick up on his unease and asks him how his hand is doing instead. Like the rest of the Rogue, she is aware of him being mugged a couple of months ago.

“F-fine, j-just st-still a b-bit st-stiff.”

It took nearly two months for Barry’s hand to completely heal, which hadn’t been too unexpected as his body tends to heal extremely slowly ever since he has gotten injected with the nanites. Despite kind of expecting that the bones in his arm would take longer to mend, it was still annoying as hell, though.

“You seem to move rather oddly at times,” Lisa remarks out of the blue and Barry really doesn’t understand why she has to be so damn blunt at times. “I’ve noticed it for a while now. Do you have rheumatism or something?”

“S-someth-thing l-like th-that,” he agrees quietly and turns his gaze to the small couch table in front of him.

“That sucks.”

It is a bit surprising how honestly sympathetic she sound and he shoots her a wary glance. Lisa doesn’t miss it.

“Why the hell do you seem to think the worst of me all the time?” she grumbles but adds somewhat awkwardly. “Look, I know I’ve been kind of a bitch to you at first but it really wasn’t anything personal.”

Hartley words from Barry’s first poker night over at the Rogue’s comes back to his mind, who said just about the same thing.

“I don’t really know you,” Lisa goes on and meets his eyes with a serious expression, “and people can be horrible fucks even if they don’t look like it but I really don’t get that vibe off you. I am pretty sure the whole thing with you being some deranged murderer who goes after young boys is bullshit and I don’t want you to think that I really believe that stuff. Okay?”

For a long moment, Barry just stares at her as, honestly, he would have expected her to say about anything but that. It is hard to believe that Lisa doesn’t think of him as this awful person he is made out to be, especially with the things she often throws at his head.

“You’re a really hard nut to knack, aren’t you?” She sighs and gives him a faint smile before her attention is drawn from his eyes further up and she frowns. “When was the last time you’ve gotten a haircut and I don’t mean by a blind monkey.”

His indignant look causes her to smirk and she tells him not to be so damn sensitive all the time.
“I’m not the one insulting you.” She grins and nods to his hair. “You’re the one running around like that after all.”

“N-not f-funny,” Barry remarks drily, which causes Lisa to shrug and asks him whether he is cutting his hairs himself.

“Because it does a hell of a lot look like it,” she adds with a meaningful look that is quite annoying.

Barry frowns and nods somewhat reluctantly. It isn’t as if he has the money these kind of things and, while he knows that his skill isn’t anything close to that one of an actual barber, he hasn’t really given that too much thought so far.

“Well, we will have to do something about that.”

Lisa sudden declaration catches him off-guard and he shoots her a wary look.

“What?”

“I’m going to cut you hair,” she informs him with a wide smile. “So, I guess you’ve the comb and scissors in the bathroom?”

Of course, Barry adamantly refuses to let her anywhere near his hairs. At least, at first, because Lisa is certainly not lacking when it comes to being persistent and it doesn’t take her long to wear him down. It does help to convince him when she tells him that she is the one who usually cuts her brother’s and Roscoe’s hair and that it is kind of a hobby for her.

Thus, about twenty minutes later, Barry finds himself sitting on a chair in his bathroom that is hardly big enough to give Lisa room to move as she takes his current cut in. One of his bigger towel is around his shoulders and he listens to her mutter under her breath that this is one of the worst haircutting she has ever seen. It doesn’t really bother him as he is sure that she has at least somewhat of a point. He prefers to keep his hairs short for exactly this reason but even then it often looks messier and worse off when he is done than it did before.

By now, it’s been a while since he has cut them the last time. It was shortly before his fight with Len and by now his hair have gotten long enough that his bangs actually become troublesome again, which is always a good indication that it is time for another cut.

“You’ve really thick hair,” Lisa mentions and causes Barry to return his mind to the here and now. He tenses up when she once more runs her finger through them. It is uncomfortable but he tries to keep himself as relaxed as possible.

“Don’t worry, I won’t cut you,” Lisa assures him as his reaction isn’t lost on her and he just nods stiffly.

“It’s really soft too,” she goes on and laughs. “I’m envious, mine maybe looks nice but it feels like straw to the touch.”

Barry shoots her a quick glance and can’t really imagine this to be true. The woman has really beautiful long and thick hair and while he has never really thought of it so far, it does look like it would be nice to run his fingers through. Iris hair has been incredibly soft...

The notion of his former wife causes him to freeze and he immediately forces the thought out of his mind.
Having Lisa cut his hair isn’t a pleasant experience as a lot of touching is involved, even if it is just his scalp. Still, it helps that the woman keeps talking to him despite his painfully obvious lack of active involvement in the conversation as he can concentrate on her voice. He wonders whether she’s noticed how tensed up he is.

It is likely and the notion that she would try to help him relax is nice and… unexpected.

It takes about half an hour till Lisa is satisfied with her work and Barry is just glad when he can finally get up again and get some additional distance between them.

Still, when he catches glance in the mirror of himself, he halts and can’t but marvel over his new haircut, which does indeed look much, much better than what he usually runs around with.

“I’ve told you so,” Lisa reminds him and is obviously pleased by his reaction.

She helps him clean his bathroom before they return to his living room. As neither of them really feel like sitting on his couch anymore as the thing is incredibly uncomfortable, he gets the thick spare blanket from his bedroom he usually uses when the heating isn’t working and spreads it out at the ground for them to have a place to sit.

They end up playing another rounds of Crash before she shows him how Back Jack works.

Barry is really surprised when he looks at his clock what seems to be just a bit later to him and sees that it is already ten to eight at night.

Lisa decides to leave shortly after they’ve eaten the rest of the pizza and the tiramisu for dinner and Barry is a bit sad to see her go. After all, it has turned out to be a surprisingly nice afternoon with her.

“Thanks for letting me stay.” Lisa, who has turned to him again after they made their way over to his entrance door, really seems to mean it and Barry can’t help but briefly wonder whether she is lonely at times as well.

“Th-thanks f-for th-the m-monkey-f-free h-haire-cut,” he replies and Lisa chuckles before she gives him a quick hug that catches him completely by surprise but is over too fast for it to become uncomfortable.

She leaves after that and Barry decides to sketch a little bit as he is feeling in an unusually calm and relaxed mood.

He isn’t really surprised when the sketching turns out to be one of a female ice-skater.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you liked the chapter!

Did anyone of you spot the brief nod to what happened to Barry's powers? :3 Don’t worry, a much more elaborate explanation will follows later on.

Also, I so love Lisa, she is just such a great character. I don’t know why I’ve come up with her liking to cut hairs as a hobby but a good friend of mine tends to do so (she says it is really relaxing) and it just sneaked into this chapters somehow.
I'm thinking about writing an Interlude for the next chapter before I go on with the actual story, from either Lisa's or Len's POV. I've decided to pep the story up a bit by introducing other people's POVs at times. It won't be something regular but I think it could be fun. :)

Len is grabbing a new can of beer when the ringing of his doorbell cuts through the comfortable quiet of his flat.

It seems that Izzy must have forgotten something again. That woman could be such an airhead at times, especially when she has drunken enough to get tipsy, which is quite a feat on her part as she could put a Viking to shame by how well she is able to hold her drinks.

Closing the door of his fridge, Len opens the can and leaves his kitchen to makes his way over to the entrance door. He picks the Cold gun up as he passes through his living room, its weight familiar and somewhat comforting in his hands as he has always prefered to be safe than sorry, and tries to remember whether he has still some aspirin laying around. The headache from this morning is still bothering him and while having sex helped to relieve some of the pain, he feels how it starts to come back already.

To have Lisa greet him from the other side of his door is, to say the least, a surprise and by the slightly disapproving frown she gives him, he isn’t sure whether it’s going to be a good one.

This is better not going to be about Dillon again, he has had enough of that idiot for a lifetime.

“What are you doing here?” he asks more gruffly than intended but, as expected, Lisa only aches an eyebrow at that.

“Nice to see you too, Lenny,” she huffs but judging by the amused and somewhat exasperated glint in her eyes, she doesn’t seem to take his standoffish demeanour the wrong way.

Good, he really doesn’t think he has the patience to deal with her right now should she lay into him again about his last fight with her boyfriend.

God, he really needs some painkillers.

Without another word, he turns around and walks back to his living room, leaving the door open for Lisa to follow. He feels her annoyed gaze in the back of his head but ignores it. It’s already past eleven at night, too late for her to have the right to expect any kind of hospitability.

“I’ve met Izzy when I entered the building.” Lisa informs him after she closed the door and turned back to him. Judging by her expression, the prostitute’s name seems to leave a foul taste in her mouth and Len, who has dropped himself onto his couch, frowns slightly but stays quiet. His sister’s dislike for the other woman isn’t exactly a secret and he doesn’t intend to have another conversation about her, not least because it tends to lead them fighting over Lisa’s relationship with Dillon and they’d already clashed with each other enough for one day.

“She told me you two spent quite an enjoyable evening together.” There is an unmissable accusation in her tone and he really doesn’t understand why she can’t just leave this damn topic rest.

“You’re here to talk with me about my taste in women again, Lisa?”

“Taste in whores would be more like it,” Lisa replies and Len shoots her an angry glare for it. They hold each other’s gaze for a moment before his sister’s expressions softens a bit and he recognizes regret in her pretty blue eyes.

“Let it rest,” he tells her as she was about to apologize for her crass words. He takes another sip from his beer and looks down at the can with a grim look, waiting for Lisa to finally spill the beans about why she’s passing by this late.

Lisa doesn’t, though. She keeps standing next to the small couch table, studying him quietly. It annoys him but he lets her, knowing that she would inevitably tell him what is bothering her.

Whatever she wants to talk about, doesn't seem to be something she likes to breach all that much either, as she makes her way to his kitchen, instead, straight towards his fridge.

“It’s alright if I take a beer?” she asks a moment later, said beverage already in hand, and Len fights to urge to smirk as the hissing sound of it being opened cuts him off before he even has the possibility to reply.

“Mi casa e tu casa,” he tells her and turns back to his own can to take another sip.

Lisa makes her way over again, around the couch, and takes a seat next to him.

For the next couple of minutes, a comfortable quiet settles between them and they drink their beers in silence. If it weren't for his certainty that she wasn't just here to spent some time and a few drinks with him, he would actually really have enjoyed her presence.

Despite how easy it is for Lisa to make him want to go up the wall more often than not and how she knows better than anybody how to get under his skin, she is also the person who he generally feels the most comfortable around. She knows him better than anybody else and he can afford to let his guard down around her as she would always have his back, no matter what.

Like he would always have her back.

“I’ve been over at Allen’s place.”

The can of beer stops a mere inch from his lips and Len freezes for a second, not sure whether Lisa has really just said this or whether his damn mind is finally calling it a day.

He lets his hand holding the beer sink and looks over to her, his face guarded and a mixture of confusion and anger fighting for dominance in his chest.

“What?”

Why the hell would she do that? He didn’t even know that she knew where Barry lives.

Lisa shrugs, meeting his eyes firmly and there is a slight pinch to the corner of her lips that lets him know that she thinks he is behaving like an idiot again.

“I needed a place to get away from you and the others,” she explains. “There was just too much testosterone around after you and Roscoe decided to try and bash each other’s head in again.”

“And you went to Allen’s place for that?”
“I did,” Lisa agrees and aches her eyebrows at him. “You know that there aren’t that many places for me to get some peace and quiet from you and the rest.”

Right, that is something Len has been very much aware of as his sister likes to loudly bemoan this fact every other day. What is new, though, is that she seems to have some kind of interest in Barry and it doesn’t exactly sit all that well with him.

“You don’t like him,” he points out as if to remind her of that little fact.

“I didn’t like him,” she corrects him with a slight smirk. “Mostly because you do. You know me, I can be petty like that when you drive me nuts with all your bitching about Roscoe and me.”

Len frowns but doesn’t bother to correct her on that one.

“So you’d a sudden change of heart and decided to pester him?”

Lisa gives him an unimpressed look.

“What if I did?” she asks as a rather unkind smile appears on her lips. “You’ve obviously decided that you’re fed up with him, so why can’t I have him instead?”

She is making it sound dirty on purpose, he is well aware of that. He knows that Lisa would never cheat on Dillon as she is faithful to a default when it comes to that dumbass. This still doesn’t stop the rush of anger that courses through his body, though. Len forces himself to stay calm, to not show the irritation her words have caused, and instead gives her a reproachful look but refrains from saying anything.

He turns back to his beer, the throbbing in his head suddenly becomes much more noticeable again.

A loaded silence follows and he knows that Lisa is studying him.

“Take him if you want.” The words are cold and sharp and he tries not to think of Barry or how their last meeting has ended.

A tense moment passes between them and he sullenly studies the small couch table in front of him that is currently covered by blueprints and a couple of magazines Izzy had brought over before.

“… you’re such an asshole, you know that?”

Lisa lets the annoyance and disapproval bleed through this time as she speaks and Len snorts because her insults are really getting old.

“You like him, Len,” she goes on, watching him closely for any reaction and he is careful to give her none. “You took him over to our fucking hideouts, you’ve never done that with anybody else before. This is the first time in I don’t know how long you volunteered in spending any time with anyone besides us Rogues or your whores.”

It has always been a trait of his sister to be a damn nuisance whenever he really doesn’t has any patience left for it. Right now, he is very close to tell her to shut up and leave.

Len closes his eyes and pinches the bridge of his nose, trying to will the increasing pain behind his temples and the base of his head away.

Lisa has fallen quiet again and he can feel her annoyed gaze as if it was an actual touch. The brief peace doesn’t last long.
“I don’t know what happened between you two but I’m not blind and I see how this has been bothering you for weeks now, Lenny.” She touches his shoulder and despite still being pissed at her for pushing her nose into business that has nothing to do with her, Len feels some of his anger wane at that.

“I’m fine, Lisa,” he grumbles and opens his eyes again to look to her. “Nothing for you to worry about.”

Her hand slips from his shoulder and he watches how an all too familiar exasperation settles over her pretty features.

“Stop being such an idiot, you stubborn mule,” she tells him seriously. “You’ve been in an abysmal mood since whatever happened between you two took place and I’m honestly impressed that Mick hasn’t tried to fry you yet or that Marco didn’t shoot a lightning up your ass!”

Her eyes are hard and daring him to protest and Len wonders what has her so wrought up. This is obviously not about Dillon and he still doesn’t get why she is interested in Barry all of a sudden. Is it because the other man helped Dillon by getting him meds that one time?

Whatever the reason, Len can’t say that he likes her sudden change of heart, contrary how he would have welcomed it just a couple of months ago.

“You wanna insist on this leaving you cold?” his sister goes on and he nearly rolls his eyes because she just knows how to annoy him. “Fine, but let me tell you that it’s not the same for Allen. Whatever happened between you two, it left his traces on the guy.”

Len turns to her with a frown and tries to ignore the familiar guilt that nestles into his chest.

Lisa huffs and pushes her fingers through her long hair, looking both very frustrated and unexpectedly concerned.

“Really? You’re surprised by that?” she asks and moves so that her side is leaning against the back of the couch, now fully facing him. “Why are you doing this? Getting someone actually decent into your life and then fucking it all up because of your damn daddy-issues?”

“Shut up-”

“Nobody gives a fuck about what he thinks about anything!” Lisa interrupts him, rising her voice to do so. “He is a piece of shit and hopefully rots in some hole for the rest of his miserable life! Lenny, that bastard is long gone, don’t do that to yourself. Nobody of us would bat an eye-”

The anger is so potent, so omnipresent all of a sudden, that it forces Len to get up, to just move, to do anything other than sitting still because this is his sister and while everything in him screams to make her shut up, he would never touch her. Over the years he has come to accept that he may be his father’s son in more ways than he likes to admit but he would never cross that line.

“Damn it, Len!” Lisa is up now as well, following him as he stomps to the kitchen, like the damn stubborn and stupid sister she’s always been.

“This conversation is over.” He tells her and forces himself to calm down, to at least put on a semblance of being in control over his emotions.

When he turns back to face her, he is relieved to see that she is still glowering at him, even though she must know how furious he feels right now. She’s never been scared of him and it helps. It helps him to get a grip of himself despite the anger and guilt and all the other ugly feelings that are currently ravaging his inside.

A part of him wants to tell her that she is an idiot and that she’s gotten it all wrong. He isn’t homosexual, he’s never been interested in another guy. Maybe he was a bit curious when he was younger but he never felt the urge to act on it.

Touching upon this would open up a whole new can of worms, though, and he is not going to do so.

Trying to state his point without even being sure about it anymore would be a stupid thing to do and Lisa is way too smart to buy any of his bullshit. He may prefer not to look at his relationship to the other man but even so he is away that has no idea what Barry really is to him, he hasn’t had for a long time now.

... and, like a fucking coward, he took their last fight as a way out, as a reason to cut him off…

Damn…

Len takes a deep breath and holds it for a couple of seconds before exhaling it slowly, forcing his body to relax somewhat, to let go of the urge to fight. His headache has grown worse and he decides that he would take whatever painkiller her could find and go to bed. This day has been going on too long as it is.

Lisa, who has waited silently and patiently for him to recollect himself again, is watching him with a concerned frown when he looks back to her.

“I’m not having this conversation with you,” he tells her seriously. “This is none of your business.”

Her lips thin when she presses them together in a clear display of her dissatisfaction. It is hard to miss what she thinks of that.

They stare each other down for what feels like a couple of minutes but probably has been nothing more than a few seconds, before his sister averts her gaze and sighs heavily. It causes him to relax some more because she has obviously come to the conclusion that she wouldn’t bother him anymore, at least not tonight.

“He is a good guy,” Lisa says quietly and this time Len is the one to look away when she returns her eyes to him. “Whatever happened, I don’t think either of you deserves this.”

She steps closer to him, then, and lays her hand onto his chest, above his heart, a gesture nearly as old as herself, and it succeeds in getting him to meet her concerned and sombre gaze once more.

“You’re a clever man, Lenny, despite how stupidly stubborn you tend to be at times. Just try to remember that we left him behind us decades ago.” Her expression lightens a bit up and she gives him a slight smile. “And don’t forget that you can be as badass as you want, it still doesn't mean that you don't have to apology for being a complete twerp to someone who’s a nice person and actually willing to put up with you.”

Lisa steps back and empties her can of beer before throwing it to the trashcan next to his kitchen counter. She doesn’t appear annoyed anymore but there is still the worry from earlier when she studies him once more.

“Go to bed and get some rest. You're looking awful.”

Despite everything, Len has to smirk at that and nearly points out that she is one of the reasons he isn’t feeling all that hot right now. Instead, he gives her a small nod.
“Will do.”

Lisa smile again, faint and somewhat sad.

“Good.”

His sister leaves shortly after that and Len is left with doubts and regrets that keep circling in his mind for the majority of the remaining night.

Chapter End Notes

This is the first chapter of this story that I've written in another POV than Barry's and it was quite interesting to do so as in the initial version of Singularity you would not really get a insight in Len's (or any other person's) mind and most motives and such is mostly revealed by what Barry experiences with them.

I'm not really intending to change this all that much, I like how I did it so far and I'm not really sure how much I like giving the reader to experience other character's inner working on their own (I hope that makes sense) just yet but I thought it would be something interesting to try. There will actually be another chapter in Len's POV very soon, but after that it will probably be some time till one comes around again. Feel free to tell me what you think of this little Interludes, I would like to know. :)

And I'm currently uncertain how to post the next chapter... I've planned one more before Barry and Len finally going to interact again but I'm not sure whether I shouldn't just put them together as one. It would be crazily long, though, 9000+ words and I don't know whether this would be too long... urgh, have to think about it some more. If I put it together, you will get all of it this Sunday, otherwise, a somewhat short chapter this one and a long one next one.

Anyway, hope you liked this little experiementsal chapter! :) Let me know what you think and as always so much thanks to anybody who leaves me feedback!
41 or How Surprise Parties Can Be Awesome and Not

Chapter Summary

Barry's birthday holds a lot of surprises.

... and some Len. ;)

Chapter Notes

This chapter isn’t edited yet and it’s quite long, so please excuse any errors that creeped into it and I wasn’t able to spot.

I also wasn’t certain regarding whether to split this and make this into a two part thing because it is quite long in its current form. I decided against it in the end and hope that the length is okay with you – I myself love long chapters but I’ve by now decided that I want to put mine out in pieces you don’t need to long to finish, simply because I don’t want it to become a chore for you guys. :)

Ps.: Sorry, I deleted this chapter by accident just after uploading it moments ago because, it seems, I'm about the clumsiest person ever. -.-'

FEBRUARY 2nd YEAR

“Life isn’t fair,” Eddy huffs and eyes Barry with a dark look. “How the hell are you already 41? You don’t look anything close to 40.”

“He isn’t smoking,” Mary point out before she tells the other man to stop talking and watch the movie.

“That with smoking and looking older is total bull,” the other man grumbles. “I know people who've smoked like chimneys since they were ten and they don’t look any older than they are supposed to.”

“Good to know, Eddy. Could you please quiet down now and let me and Barry enjoy the film?” Mary seems rather irked about her friend failing to stay quiet for longer than two minutes at a time. Barry can’t say that he is surprised about it. Eddy isn’t a big fan of old movies and the couple of times he has been over to join them for one of their movie nights it has always ended up with him talking through a good part of it.

“You think it is the water? You drink an absurd amount of water every time I am around.”

Marry groans while Barry just shrugs.

“They say that drinking a lot can keep you look younger for longer,” adds Eddy and studies him thoughtfully.
“For heaven’s sake, what is it with you and your fixation on his age?” asks Mary clearly annoyed now and she turns her gaze to Barry as well. “He probably has good genes, some people are lucky like that, and it probably doesn’t hurt that he doesn’t drink or smoke like certain others of us do.”

“Yeah, you should wind down a bit when it comes to that, Marry,” agrees Eddy and laughs when the woman hits his shoulder in return. “Such a display of violence, really.”

“Just keep on talking and I won’t invite you over the next time we have movie night.”

“And miss those eighty year old flicks without colour and tone!? You are so damn heartless at times.”

Eddy’s shoulder gets another punch for this and Marry turns to Barry with a huff.

“This is your fault, you’ve introduced him to me.”

“S-sorry.”

“Hey, what the hell are you apologizing for? You should demand some money from her for it.”

Barry snorts but refrains from commenting and instead proceeds listening to them bickering while he tries to at least keep somewhat up with the movie.

“So, it’s your birthday today?” asks Axel and looks quite surprised about this piece of information. Mrs. Ming has asked Barry about five minutes ago whether he could stay behind for a bit after work and when the boy made fun of him for being in trouble, he explained to him that this is most likely not the reason.

“How old are you turning? Like fifty?”

Barry’s face falls slightly at this question and gives the teenager a disbelieving look that actually turns sour when he notices that the kid is dead serious.

“D-do I l-look l-life f-fifty t-to you?” he asks calmly and wonders whether Mary and Eddy have been making fun of him the whole time.

“Don’t know,” shrugs Axel and follows him to the shelves with the paper towels, “I can’t tell the age of people to save my life and you’re wearing old people clothes and are always lecturing me.”

“Old p-people c-clothes,” Barry sputters and frowns when the boy just laughs, clearly amused by his reaction. He looks down on himself and wonders what is wrong with his clothing.

“You wear grandpa pants,” Axel points out readily.

“I d-don’t, th-these are n-normal-,” he stops as he is really not going to discuss his sense of fashion with a teenager who is wearing a shirt that could rival James’ usual attire. Axel just grins but let go of Barry’s seemingly questionable sense of fashion and instead asks him whether he is going to have a birthday party.

“N-no.”

“Why not? Your birthday is just once a year, you should celebrate it.”

Barry chuckles and explains him that he is a bit too old to still have birthday parties.
“What? There is no age where you don’t have b-day parties anymore,” Axel objects and gives him a looks as if he has turned crazy.

“W-well, once y-you s-start w-wearing g-grandp-pa p-pants, th-things s-start t-to ch-change,” Barry points out and smiles when Axel rolls his eyes but doesn’t comment any further on it as he seems to decide that this topic doesn’t really interest him any longer.

Instead, the teen starts to pester Barry to buy him one of the chocolate bars with the peanut butter fillings that are his favourites.

Over the last couple of weeks, Axel has started to turn up twice or thrice a week and while Barry doesn’t feel comfortable with a minor around, he doesn’t really see that big of an harm in it either as Axel usually vanishes again after a couple of hours and Mrs. Ming is also aware of his presence and doesn’t seem to mind that the young teen tends to pass by every now and then. She even has started to bring small plates of cookies down whenever she notices that Axel is around. The boy likes her well enough as well, most likely due to the food, and hasn’t caused any trouble at all so far.

“Wh-what d-do y-you th-think of an ap-ple instead?” asks Barry as he finished dusting the shelves and is amused when he receives a clearly unimpressed look in response.

“You n-need t-to eat f-fruits, y-you kn-know th-that.”

“Yeah, but they taste like shit.”

“A-Axel,” he warns the boy as he really doesn’t like for him to use this language and the teen actually has the decency to look somewhat guilty.

“But it’s true, apples taste sour.”

“If you s-stuff your f-face f-full w-with ch-chocolate all th-the time, I’m n-not r-really s-surprised that you th-think s-so,” Barry tells him seriously and walks over to their fruit section where he picks up one of the pears and weighs it before he offers it to the boy.

“Eat it a-and y-you c-can h-have a p-pean-n-nut b-butter b-bar afterwards.”

At Axel’s disgusted expression he rolls his eyes and explains that they are really sweet.

“I l-like th-them m-mys-self v-very m-much.”

“Yeah, because that is a shocker,” the boy mutters but reluctantly accepts the offered fruit.

Axel has to leave about twenty minutes later as Barry is about to close the store.

“Happy Birthday, Barry,” the teen wishes him as he is on his way out.

Barry smiles and thanks him.

“Well, and thanks for the peanut butter bar… and the pear.”

“Y-you’re w-welcome,” he replays warmly and watches the kid vanish into the night with a slight feeling of worry. Axel told him the other day that he has a place to stay, though, with a couple of other teens, and while this is not the best possible solution it qualms some of his concerns regarding the kid. He hasn’t told Barry anything specific but that is alright, he hadn’t expect him to.

Despite it going towards mid of February it is still rather cold and especially hard for anybody without home.
Barry pushes that thought away, as there isn’t much he could do about it, anyway. He neither has the money nor is it actually legal for him to interact with any child. As frustrating and sad as it is, he can’t really do anything the help Axel other than buying him the occasional snack and let him stay in the store to warm up or pass some time.

Mrs. Ming joins him during the closing to give him a hand. Both of them talk a bit about whether he has any plans for tonight, which he does not, about the progress of the puzzle they are still working on and about her grandson, who would come back to Central City in about a week.

“You are not going to meet up with your friends to celebrate your birthday? It is an important day,” she remarks as she finishes sweeping the floor. Barry knows that she is of the opinion that someone’s birthday is a very special occasion in one’s life and that it shouldn’t just pass by like any other one. He still remembers how unhappy she was for him when he told her that he would spend his birthday alone last year.

“I-I a-already h-have,” he tells her with a small smile. “M-Mary and Eddy a-are b-both n-not around t-tonight s-so w-we c-celeb-brated y-yesterday.”

Both, Eddy and he spent yesterday’s evening at Mary’s place, who actually baked him a really delicious Romanian chocolate sponge cake that is called Amandine. It was a very nice time they spent together and while he isn’t all that happy about them getting presents for him as he doesn’t want them to spend their money on him, it is still reassuring in a way to think that he does mean enough for them to do so in the first place.

“I am glad to hear that, Barry.” Mrs. Ming seems relieved about learning this and, once again, Barry feels grateful for her and the other people in his life, who show him that it really isn’t as bad as it can seem at times.

They go up to her apartment afterwards and he is quite taken aback when she presents him with a little cake she baked for him.

“You r-r-really d-didn’t h-have t-to.”

“But I wanted to, my dear. You are helping me so much with the store and while I may not look like it, I do get to that age where I couldn’t take care of it on my own anymore,” she tells him with a humorous twinkle in her eyes before she ushers him over to the kitchen to take a seat on the table. It is nicely set and she even put on a vase with a small flower bouquet.

“I l-like m-my w-work,” he tells her and it is important to him that she understands this, “and I kn-know th-that th-there aren’t m-many p-people wh-who w-would w-want m-me t-to w-work f-for th-them.”

It is a sad truth of who he is and he seems it would be much more fitting if he could get her a little something as a thank you than the other way around. He really appreciates her kindness and the positivity she gets into his life even when he feels so depressed that he hardly wants to face another day.

“Barry, I am blessed to have you,” she tells him in a soft voice and squeezes his hand slightly, “and it doesn’t matter what other people think, I know what a wonderful and kind man you are. So please, just sit down and let’s celebrate your birthday for a little bit.”

He knows that it would be ungrateful to protest so that he ends up nodding instead and finally taking a seat.
The cake is really good and they have some herbal tea to it that fits really nicely while she tells him a bit about Chinese birthday traditions when he asks her about it.

It is after they both are finished with their pieces of cake that she gets up and briefly leaves the room just to come back with a small wrapped box. Before Barry can protests once more, she asks him not to and just to accept it.

“It would mean a lot to me,” she tells him honestly.

He studies the gift in her hands before he looks up to her again and smiles a bit forced. “Th-thank y-you, B-Bo.”

She returns it brightly and hands him the little nicely wrapped box.

It turns out to be a small vibrantly blue stone on a thin chain, a necklace, and he isn’t too sure what to make of it at first.

At his rather puzzled look, Mrs. Ming chuckles and explains to him that it is a Kyanite. “It is a gem that is said to have the benefit to align all the chakras in your body, especially the throat charka.”

They have talked about Chinese medicine and their view of the human body and the energy within it a couple of times already and even before the concept on energy fields and charka hasn’t been new to Barry. Still, he never paid it too much mind even though he did find it an interesting topic.

“Th-throat chakra?” he asks somewhat warily and watches how Mrs. Ming expression softens a bit.

“Yes, it has calming properties and is said to help people dealing with their fears as well as with communication and self-expression.”

Barry looks back to the small gem inside the box and studies it oddly intrigued by her words. It doesn’t look garish in any way and he is pretty sure that he could wear it under his shirt without anybody noticing that he is even having it on him. He is well aware that it is most likely a silly thing to hope that this maybe could really help him with his speech but, still, even just as a simple present it is a very thoughtful and kind one.

“You are very welcome, my boy,” she assures him with a happy little smile, obviously glad that he has decided to accept it. “Do you want me to tell you a bit more about this stone?”

Barry agrees and they spend the next forty minutes talking about the Kyanite and gemmology in general, as it turns out to be an interesting topic for the older woman. He enjoys listening to her and while he is sure that it is just imagination, he thinks that the little gem, which he is now wearing around his neck, feels pleasantly warm against his skin.

Barry arrives home later than usually this evening due to the small birthday celebration he had with Ms Ming. It is already close to eleven but he doesn’t really feel in a hurry. Despite tomorrow being Saturday, he would not have to go to work as a pest controller would pass by the store to take care of a mice problem they have had for a couple of weeks now. It is also most likely a little additional present for him, even though his employer didn’t say so directly.
His mind is still occupied with the nice evening he spent with Mrs. Ming so that he doesn’t pick up that there is faint light coming through from under his door in the dully lit hallway.

Thus, he is very much caught off-guard by a loud cheering that welcomes him the moment he pulls the door open. It causes him to freeze as he has expected to come home to a quiet flat but before any fear can really take hold of him he realizes that the source for the ruckus are a couple of very familiar faces.

There, in his living room that is decorated with paper streamers, balloons and so much confetti that parts of the floor can’t even be made out anymore, are Hartley, James, Lisa, Sam as well as a quite uncomfortable looking Roscoe.

“Barry! Happy Birthday!!!”

James is suddenly on him and flings his arms around his neck to give him a nearly painful bear-hug. It causes Barry’s body to grow stiff in a response but to the other man’s credit, he lets go of him just a second later and makes a swift step back.

“Uh, sorry,” James apologizes with an embarrassed look but is still in visibly high spirits.

“James, calm down,” Hartley sighs as he comes up to them. He turns to Barry with a warm smile and congratulates him as well but leaves it at a handshake.

Feeling slightly overwhelmed, Barry just nods and tries to return the smile while his eyes keep on looking between his friends and the decorated room.

Lisa is the next one who comes up to him and gives him a very brief hug and a kiss on his cheek, which causes him to flush slightly. She doesn’t miss it and seems quite amused by his reaction.

“Careful, or you can really pass as a prude old man,” she tells him with a wink while she squeezes his hands. She then turns around and beckons Roscoe over who does so a bit reluctantly and, like Hartley, settles for a simply handshake and a nod. Barry is rather glad for it.

“Well, he has the fitting attire,” Sam remarks as he is chewing on a corn dog and just smirks when Barry shoots him a rather dark look in return.

“Be nice, jackass,” Lisa warns her colleague, “and you are one to talk. You still stick with your stupid outfit from the nineties.”

“Hey! That’s because my outfit was the only one that didn’t suck.”

She ignores her friend and instead grabs Barry’s hand to lead him over to the table that is similar decorated as the rest of the room and holds a number of finger foods as well as a cake that is rather odd looking.

“I did the decoration,” James informs him in a very smug way when he noticed Barry eyeing the cake slightly taken aback. “Hartley baked it but I did all the rest! It looks marvellous, doesn’t it!”

At the expectant look he receives, Barry stutters his agreement, even though he isn’t sure what to think of all the little marzipan Hello Kitty, dinosaur and other random figures that stick out it in every direction or that the icing is a mixture of the very familiar colour combo of blue and yellow.

“I made the mistake to leave him alone for five minutes,” Hartley explains in a low voice and eyes the cake and little sugar figures with a pained expression. “I still don’t even have an inkling where he could have gotten these from.”

Barry chuckles and remarks that it is a rather cheerful looking cake.

“Yes! Exactly!” James agrees before he turns to Hartley with a triumphant grin. “I told you he would like it! Not everybody wants your boring kind of cakes.”

“I prefer boring over that any time,” Sam adds under his breath but seems amused over his colleague’s creation.

Barry, who is now standing next to his table, silently watches his friends and is uncertain about how to respond. He hasn’t counted on them passing by and even less so on them going so far to throw him a surprise party. The realisation that they did that for him is a bit overwhelming.

“Th-thank y-you.”

His voice sounds breathy and he can feels his face grow hot because it has to be obvious that he is currently struggling to keep his emotions in check.

“R-really, th-thank y-you, th-this… i-it’s… y-you d-didn’t h-have t-to…”

While both Sam and Roscoe seem rather uneasy all of a sudden, Hartley and Lisa give him sympathetic looks. James grins broadly and tells him that it is fine.

“It’s the job of friends to throw awesome parties, after all,” the other blond point out.

“Indeed,” Hartley agrees before his expression becomes a bit more sombre. “And we also want to apology for not letting you know about what has been going on.”

Barry wants to protest as he is pretty sure that they had quite more persisting things to worry about than him during their time aboard but before he can do so, Sam huffs and tells Hartley to let it finally rest.

“We didn’t even have the means to write him a stupid postcard if we wanted to,” the brunette points out with a frown.

“It’s r-really ok-kay,” Barry agrees and adds a bit more quietly. “I’m s-sorry f-for as-suming th-the w-worst.”

“What are you talking about?”

Roscoe, who is standing next to Lisa, gives them a puzzled look but the blond woman only pats his arm and assures that it is nothing. His frown makes it clear that he isn’t satisfied with this answer but he lets it go. Barry is surprised that Lisa seems to know about what has happened between him and the other men and watches her a bit wary as she turns back to them again.

“So, who wants some coffee?”

Barry spends the next two hours eating, drinking and enjoying the cheerful and boisterous mood. Still, when Lisa asks him whether he would want to dance with her to one of the songs they listen to on her mobile phone, he declines and can’t be moved. He has never liked dancing much and wasn’t any good at it either.

Despite everything, he isn’t all too keen on making a fool out of himself in front of the other men and while Lisa is rather huffy about it, she accepts it when he tells her that his joints are still acting up. Which isn’t a lie, seeing that the cold weather still isn’t doing him any favour.

The blond woman instead turns to Roscoe, who obviously doesn’t really want to join her either but gives in when she starts to pout, much to Sam’s amusement.

Hartley helps Roscoe to push Barry’s couch to the side to create a small makeshift dance floor they can use.

“That is exactly the reason why I don’t have a girlfriend,” Sam remarks and makes a slight notion to the dancing couple with his beer. “It has always to go according to their will otherwise you are fucked... or not.”

He chuckles over his own rather tasteless joke while Hartley shoots him a peeved look.

“I really don’t think that _that_ is the reason you don’t have a girlfriend.”

“Screw you, Hart.” Sam grins. “You don’t know shit about girlfriends, so excuse me if I don’t really care about your opinion.”

Hartley shoots the other man a slightly annoyed look but both let that subject drop again, seemingly without any bad blood persisting between them.

The current song on the phone ends and a new one starts, which is quite quicker paced than the one before.

“Hey! I love that song!” James exclaims and turns to Hartley. “You wanna dance with me?”

Hartley smiles amused and agrees so that they end up joining Lisa and Roscoe at the dance floor.

“Well, looks like we aren’t the two most popular people around here,” Sam shoots Barry an amused glance before he grab another one of the fried cheese balls Lisa prepared for the party.

“I am,” Barry disagrees with fake earnestness and chuckles along when the other man snorts.

“Careful, or you will start to grow an ego,” Sam warns him with a broad grin.

“I’m a v-very h-humble p-person b-by n-nature.”

“No shit.”

Sam gets up to grab himself another beer from Barry’s fried and offers to get him one as well. He agrees.

Roscoe joins them just a few minutes later, while Lisa stays with Hartley and James. He has a rather strained expression on his face and hisses softly as he takes his seat again.

“Th-the ankle is s-still b-bothering y-you?”

The other man just grunts in returns and takes a long swing of his bottle while generally looking quite morosely.

“The pain you bear for true love,” Sam adds with a smirk and doesn’t seem bothered at all when his friend flips him off.

“I’ll g-get you s-some ice t-to c-cool it.”
“It’s fine, I just overdid it a bit,” Roscoe grumbles but doesn’t try to stop Barry when he still gets up.

It just takes a minute for Barry to grab a small towel and put some ice in it. He is just closing the fridge when the small orange bottle with the left-over pain killers, which he got on the day of his discharge, comes to his mind and he decides to fetch one of them as well should they not have expired by now.

Despite his initial words, Roscoe looks clearly relieved when he hands him both of.

“You sh-should c-contact D-Dr. S-Simmons again if you h-have s-still t-trouble w-with your ankle.”

“That incompetent fool doesn’t know what he is talking about half of the time,” Roscoe grouses and downs the pill with some beer, which causes Barry to reconsider whether it has been really such a good idea to give him the drug.

“Still, he is a doctor,” Sam remarks and glances at his colleague with a suddenly slightly annoyed expression. “Who knows, maybe he can bring an end to your constant whining. It would be definitively worth a shot.”

“Screw you.”

“You see, always pissy these days,” Sam points out before he seems to consider something. “Oh wait, that hasn’t really changed. Never mind. My bad.”

Both men start a small argument after that and Barry, who isn’t really interested to get involved in it, turns his attention back to the others just to notice that they seem to have had enough of dancing right now and are making their way over to them again.

“You two, no fighting. This is Barry’s party,” Lisa reminds them with a slightly exasperated frown when she picks up that both of the other criminals are currently involved in calling each other names.

“He started it,” Sam nods to Roscoe who gives him a dirty look in return.

“How mature,” the other criminal sneers before he adds with a sniff, “and I did not.”

“I really don’t care,” Lisa huffs before she notices the towel with the ice in Roscoe’s hand with which he is cooling his ankle and her expression softens. “Is it hurting again?”

“It’s fine,” he grumbles but doesn’t seem really all that bothered when Lisa lays her arms around his neck and pulls him closer to her chest before kissing the top of his head.

“I’m sorry, honey, I shouldn’t have asked you to join me.”

“It is fine, Lisa, really.”

Roscoe lays one of his arms around her waist and turns his head so that he can press a kiss against her collarbone. Barry suddenly feels extremely out of place as he watches this. A slight pain briefly flares up in his chest but he tries not to notice it.

“Come on, guys, no smooching outside your rooms,” James reminds them with a slightly disgusted look which earns him rather nasty glares from both of them and Lisa takes the seat next to her boyfriend again.

“So, what do you think of your party so far, Bear?” the blond woman asks with a wide smile and Barry is so surprised by that new nickname that he fails to answer for a moment.
“Barry-Bear! I like that,” James exclaims and turns to him. “Can I call you that from now on?”

He frowns but before he can tell the other man that he would have him rather not to do so, Roscoe call James an imbecile, which provokes another quarrel.

After Hartley has been able to calm James down again and Lisa successfully prevented Roscoe to lunge at the other man for hurling some of the cake into his face, the mood relaxes again and they end up like they usually do most of the time, playing a game of cards.

Seeing that Barry isn’t really in the mood for poker and it is his party, they settle on Crash, even though both, Sam and Roscoe are obviously not all that pleased about it.

“So, after all the dunces have settled down again,” Lisa starts and turns her attention to Barry once more. “How do you like your party so far, aside from those buffoons’ childish behaviour.”

“It’s g-great,” Barry replies easily as it really is. He has been a bit worried at first due to Sam and Roscoe being present but they don’t seem to mind having him around and haven’t been hostile towards him at all so far.

It still is hard to believe that they would do such a nice thing for him, though.

“Th-thank you, I r-really ap-pr-e-ci-a-te it.”

“Good.” Lisa smiles widens a bit, obviously happy to hear so. He wonders whether she thought that he would somehow react otherwise. When he thinks about it for a moment, he realizes that this is not really such an unfound assumption as he has reacted rather negatively to her during her last surprise visits, not that it wasn’t understandable at the time.

“Hey, Barry,” James’ voice pulls him out of his thoughts again. “Is Barry like your real name or the short form of something?”

Roscoe makes a scoffing sound at that but keeps from commenting when Lisa gives him a warning look. Thankfully, James didn’t pick up on it but keeps looking at Barry expectantly.

“I th-think it is sh-short f-for B-Barth-tholomew b-but I am n-not r-really s-s sure,” he answers somewhat hesitant but honestly and isn’t really surprised when all of the people present give him rather odd looks for it, which causes him to duck his head slightly embarrassed.

“How the hell can’t you be sure about your own name?” Sam asks with a frown as he snatches a handful of spicy nuts. “Your parents forgot to tell you?”

Barry bristles at that but forces himself to calm down just as quickly. He keeps his eyes on his cards and shrugs slightly.

“N-never h-had th-the op-port-t-t… op-portun-tty t-to ask th-them.”

An uncomfortable silence follows and he wishes with all his might that they will let this topic drop.

“So, what stands in your ID?” Hartley asks, causing Barry to briefly glance at him.

“B-Barry.”

“Well, that settles that, doesn’t it?” Sam points out before he wrinkles his nose. “Not that you would miss out on anything with Bartholomew, it is a rather stupid name.”

“If you say so, Samuel,” Lisa remarks drily and ignores the other criminal’s protest as she turns to Barry. “I like your name, it is easy and happy. It fits your.”

“Are you calling him easy?”

“Shut up, Sam, will you?”

“You said it, not me.”

“Just turn back to the game, it’s your turn anyway.” Lisa sighs before she looks to Barry once more. “Ignore that idiot. He’s just envious because he is names after one of the arch-angels and a priest told him that is why this little ghost boy follow him around.”

“Would you shut up!” Sam tenses up nearly palpably and shoots the blond woman a dirty look. “We are not talking about this shit!”

“You mean ghosts?” Hartley asks innocently and obviously tries his best not to smirk.

“Fuck you!”

It is shortly after one in the morning when they decide they have enough of Crash and Lisa suggest to play a game of Black Jack instead. Barry agrees readily enough and it is just as she starts to shuffle the cards when a sharp knocking on the door cuts through the room.

Concerned, as Barry has no idea who could pass by at his flat at this time other than maybe a neighbour that could be bothered by them, he looks over to the door with a slight frown.

“You’re expecting someone?” Lisa asks quietly and it is then that he notices that his friends have stopped talking. They are currently eyeing the door with rather wary expressions.

“No.” Barry shakes his head and gets up, so do the others. “I’ll see who it is.”

The notion that one of his neighbours could be coming to complain about them making too much noises is ridiculous as he is most likely one of the quietest occupants around, even now with them over. Still, he isn’t able to come up with another explanation as Mary wouldn’t come back before next Tuesday and Eddie has told him that he wouldn’t be around for the weekend either.

Briefly, the notion of Jay comes to his mind and his stomach drops immediately. Then, he remembers the current time and that it is more than unlikely for the older man to pass by this late.

His mind comes to a grating halt when he finally looks through the door spy and for a long moment he can just stand there and stare in sheer disbelief.

“I can see your shadow from under the door again,” a familiar voice remarks and Barry has no idea what Len is doing here this late or, as a matter of fact, at all.

“Len?” Lisa calls out from her spot next to the table and also sounds puzzled about her brother’s appearance.

“Wonderful,” Roscoe mutters but relaxes visibly and sits back down while the blond woman makes her way over to where Barry is still standing before the closed door.

When he fails to open the door, Lisa gives him a confused look that is quickly replaced by one that holds an uncomfortable amount of understanding. He fidgets slightly as she studies him before she ushers him to step aside so that she can open the door. He doesn’t protest.

“What the hell are you doing here?” Len sounds audibly annoyed and Barry, who stands a bit behind
Lisa, tenses up when their eyes briefly meet. They hold each other’s gaze just for a second, though before the other man’s moves on to where the other men are and his expression darkens.

“I could ask you the same thing? It’s nearly one in the morning, Len.” Lisa points out and crosses her arms.

“What are you doing here, Lisa?” Len repeats, ignoring her question, and there is a slight edge to his voice that makes Barry nervous. Lisa doesn’t seem impressed by it at all, though, and instead rolls her eyes.

“What does it look like, genius?”

“You didn’t tell me about this,” Len replies and somehow he is able to make it sound as if she has done just a really asinine mistake.

“So what? I’m not allowed to celebrate the birthday of a friend without your blessing? Get your head out of your ass, Len.”

Both proceed to seemingly try and glare each other down for a long minute before Len turns to Barry.

“Can I come in?”

A bit surprised about the question, he just nods mutely and watches the other man do just that.

“Hey Len! We have cake if you want!” James waves towards the nearly half gone birthday cake that somehow looks even worse now than it did before. Len just glances at it before his eyes fix on Roscoe and he frowns.

“What is he doing here?”

“Really, Len?” Lisa asks incredulously before she huffs and rubs her forehead in an unmistakable frustrated manner.

“I am not surprised you are unable to grasp the simple concept of being invited along, Snart.” Roscoe sneers at the other Rogue and the hostility suddenly seems to skyrocket in the little apartment.

“Careful, Dillen, or you can call Simmons again and it won’t be only for your ankle.”

“You decided to come here because your whores got fed up with you?”

“Roscoe!” Lisa hisses and shoots her boyfriend a warning look while she keeps standing in front of Len so that she could try and stop him should he decide to go after the other Rogue. “You aren’t helping.”

“What are you doing here, Len?” she asks again after she turned back to her brother and studies him with a frown. “You always turn up uninvited at other peoples’ doorsteps at hours like that?”

Hearing that, Barry can’t help but look at her in disbelief seeing that this is quite a strong statement coming from her considering that she hasn’t been doing any better regarding this in the past. He doesn’t point it out, though.

“None of your business,” Len tells her coldly and causes Lisa to bristles in anger. Barry is certain that an argument is going to start between them now and he is suddenly very glad that his neighbours never call the cops when other residents fight because the siblings would probably not care about keeping it down despite how late it currently is.

To his surprise, it doesn’t happen, though, and he watches how the blond woman’s expression turns from angry to concerned and weary.

“Stop being such a damn jackass all the time, Len. You’re making it so damn hard for yourself,” she speaks quietly enough that only her brother and Barry can hear her. “Try to keep your fucking temper in check for once, okay?”

Something crosses Len’s face, surprise and another emotion Barry isn’t able to pick up on before it is gone again.

Lisa turns around then, to the other Rogues. “I think we've bothered Barry for long enough.”

“What? No! I still wanna have cake and party!” James protest and is clearly not happy about the prospect to leave.

“You had enough sugar that we’re probably going to regret it for the next week, Tricks,” Sam says as he gets up from his seat again and stretches himself.

“I didn’t!” the blond protests with a petulant frown and crosses his arms in front of his chest. “There’s still cake left and we were just going to play Black Jack.”

Barry also doesn’t want them to go. He really doesn’t as this would mean that he is going to be left alone with Len and the notion alone causes him to nearly feel sick with apprehension.

A careful touch to his shoulder startles him and he look to his side, where Lisa meets his tensed expression with a slightly worried one.

“It has been really nice, Barry,” she tells him and squeezes his shoulder lightly.

“Y-yes, i-it w-was,” he agrees and wants to add that she should not leave him alone with her brother but can’t bring himself to. Lisa seems to pick up on it nonetheless, as she gives him an encouraging smile and steps a bit closer to hug him again.

“He feels really bad about whatever has happened between you,” she whispers and adds before she pulls back. “Don’t worry, I’ll kick his ass if he behaves like a jerk again.”

The blond woman winks at him before she turns back to give Len one last hard look but doesn’t say anything.

It doesn’t take more than a couple of minutes for his guests to vanish into his bathroom and Barry, who has followed them along to the door, watches them go with growing unease.

“Don’t worry, we will come by tomorrow to help you with the cleaning up,” Hartley assures him, which causes Sam, who is already on the other side of his cabinet mirror, to scoff. “Speak for yourself, ginger.”

The redhead ignores the other man and instead waits for Barry to nod before he follows the others into the mirror-verse. All trace of them are gone a moment later and there is nothing else to see other than the reflection of the tiles that are opposite to the mirror.

It is uncomfortably quiet after having so many people in his flat at once and Barry really doesn’t want to move and go back into his living room. He sighs softly and rest his forehead briefly against the doorframe.
Right now, the late hour is catching up with him and he considers simply keeping standing here. Len would undoubtedly come to check up on where is and why he needs so long, though.

Slowly, Barry makes his way back to his living area, where he spots Len standing next to the kitchen table, eyeing the remaining of the food they have had with a thoughtful and rather grim expression. The other man notices him just a second later and turns to him.

An uneasy and awkward silence follows and Barry, who has stopped close to his couch, crosses the arms in front of his chest and lowers his gaze, so that he is studying the colourful confetti on the ground.

“The others are gone?” Len finally asks after a minute has passed in an uneasy silence.

Barry nods but stays quiet. He doesn’t trust his voice right now and he doesn’t want to show Len how much he is still hurting.

Again, silence, and while he is not looking at the other man, he knows that he is watching him. Barry looks up slightly alarmed when Len starts moving closer to him and it is nearly impossible to keep standing still. The heavy knot of apprehension and worry in his stomach causes the queasiness to grow worse as he watches how the other man stops just a bit more than an arm’s length away. Their eyes meet briefly before Barry averts them again.

This is such an uncomfortable situation the he plays with the notion to simply turn around and bolting into his bathroom, so that he could lock the other man out and keep him away. It is a stupid and cowardly idea but nonetheless very alluring.

Len’s voice is even and calm and when Barry glances at him, there is nothing to take away from is expression. It is frustrating and unsettling because, like usual, he hasn’t the slightest idea what the other man’s mood is right now.

It takes Barry a couple of seconds before he realizes that he has failed to replay and nods quietly.

A slight frown appears on Len’s face but otherwise he doesn’t seem like he is angered or bothered by his lack of an actual answer.

“Your voice?” he asks knowingly and Barry doesn’t know why but this question is upsetting. Len has no right to be here, he has no right to do as if any of this matters to him. He has made it more than clear that it isn’t the case.

“Here.”

The other man’s startles him slightly and Barry warily turns back to him, a bit surprised as he notices that he is offered a white plastic bag that he hasn’t picked up on before. He eyes it a moment before he glances to Len, feeling increasingly uneasy in his own skin.

“It won’t bite,” his unwanted guest assures him and keeps offering what is most likely a present to him.

Barry swallows and makes a step back. He has no longer crossed his arms, now it is much more like he is hugging himself again and he knows how ridiculous he has to look but he can’t help himself. Having Len around is so damn unsettling, his skin is itching again and he feels too exhausted to deal with any of the emotions that are currently fighting for dominance in him.
Slowly, Len lets his hand that is holding the bag sink back to his side.

“It was bull,” he tells him in a low voice and Barry, who has been watching him warily so far, frowns in confusion. “All I said the last time, it was all bullshit.”

Len heaves a heavy sigh and pinches the bridge of his nose before he goes on. His expression is no longer void of emotions. He looks tired and tense.

“I said some pretty messed up things. I tend to become a total bastard when I feel attacked and don’t….” The other man stops and purses his lips as he turns his gaze to the ground, at which he then glares as if it has somehow personally affronted him.

Barry isn’t sure what to say or what to think of it and the anger that flares up in him at these words only last briefly before it is replaced by a tiring sadness that starts to surpass all the other emotions he is currently experiencing.

“I didn’t mean one thing I’ve said,” Len goes on with his grim gaze fixed on Barry once again. “I wanted to hurt you and I did a pretty good job there, didn’t I?”

There scorn in his voice but it is obviously aimed at himself and Barry thinks that this is supposed to make him feel better, knowing that the other man feels at least a little miserable for how he talked to him, for the ugly things he said, but it doesn’t. It only makes the lump in his throat more painful and the itching in his eyes more persisting. He has to look away.

“Barry, I know that nothing of it is true, okay?”

Len steps closer to him, he can feel it, his presence is nearly tangible and he presses his eyes shut but can’t bring himself to move. The other man stops so close to him that Barry is sure he could touch him should he lift his hand just slightly.

“This won’t happen again.” Len sounds serious, like he really means it, and Barry still can’t stop himself from scoffing at him.

“D-don’t,” he tells him in a husky voice and with a half-hearted glare.

“It won’t,” Len insists, which causes Barry to grit his teeth and averts his eyes again.

“Th-then y-you’ll j-just…” His voice gives out on him and he coughs slightly before he tries again. “D-don’t p-prom-mise s-someth-thing y-you c-can’t k-keep.”

Len doesn’t replay as he probably too knows that it would be a lie should he argue about this. Instead he stays quiet and another uncomfortable silence settles between them.

There is a nearly painful heaviness to his body Barry hasn’t noticed before and he is pretty sure that this has nothing to do with how tired he is. It is the depression of which he has hoped that he would have left it behind him by now and that crawls back into him like something cold and hard that is made up of nothing but sharp edged to cut him.

It startles him when Len suddenly steps even closer, so much that there are hardly more than four inches left between them, and looks back up to him with a wary frown.

“I won’t,” Len agrees in a low and unusual soft tone. “But I’ll try to not let this happen again.”

They both know that this is something he most likely won’t succeed in. He has a horrible temper and is rash to a fault, not a person Barry should want to have around himself.
Mary’s words come back to his mind, how some people are not healthy for one, and Len is most likely a paragon for that. He should send him away. He really should.

“Barry.” There is an unfamiliar uncertainty to how Len says his name and when Barry glances at him, he can see that his eyes are not as guarded anymore. There is guilt, worry and anger as well as reluctance. The last one confuses him for a moment till the other man speaks again and he understands.

“I’m very sorry.”

Barry closes his eyes and wonders to how many people Len has said these words so far.

Most likely not all that many.

His chest hurts as does most of the rest of his body and, for a moment, he ask himself whether he could hurt the other man just a little bit back by telling him to leave.

He doesn’t.

“Ok-kay.”

Barry is looking at the ground again but even without seeing Len he can feel how some of the tension leaves him. It is strange to think that this, whatever this is that is between them, actually could matter to the other man this much.

“But,” he goes on and forces himself to meet Len’s eyes with a hard look. “If y-you e-ever s-speak t-t-to m-me l-like th-that again, y-you’re n-no l-longer w-w-welc-come here. D-do you u-unders- strand?”

Barry doesn’t want to think back to how awful he felt for the first month after their last fight. It was torture to get up in the morning and he doesn’t want to go through something like that again, not even for Len.

Maybe, especially not for him.

“Understood,” Len agrees readily and it is hard for Barry to believe how relieved he actually sounds about this.

Out of the corner of his eyes, he notices how the other man lifts his hand so that the touch to his shoulder doesn’t come entirely unexpected but it still causes him to shudder slightly in response.

It suddenly makes Barry very uncomfortable to be this close to him and he quickly makes a step back to regain some additional distance between them. Len lets him and nods to the table behind him instead.

“Let’s sit down.”

The notion to get off his feet is more than welcome to Barry.

When they are both seated, opposite to each other, Len presents him with the white bag again.

“It really won’t bite,” he remarks with a slight smile when Barry just keeps eyeing it as if this is going to be exactly what would happen should he reach for it.

“Y-you d-didn’t h-have t-to g-get m-me anyth-thing.”
“I know.” Len meets his gaze calmly and nods to the bag. “Just take a look.”

Barry can’t help but feel a bit curious. The bag is pushed towards him some more, so that he can easily reach for it, and he does so somewhat reluctantly after another moment.

It is surprisingly heavy and he glances briefly to the other man, wondering again what he could have gotten him. It definitely isn’t take-out this time.

A very expensive looking set of oil colour brushes as well as a precious looking wooden box greets him when he finally looks inside. For a couple of seconds he just studies them, totally flabbergasted by this kind of present, which undoubtedly must have cost a little fortune.

“I c-can’t accept th-this.”

Barry closes the bag and pushes it back to the other man, who doesn’t seem to have expected this kind of reaction.

“And why is that?” Len’s expression has changed and he looks clearly annoyed once more, which causes Barry’s stomach to drop in apprehension of what is going to follow. Still, he doesn’t falter and meets his eyes firmly.

“This i-is w-way t-too exp-pensive,” he explains quietly, “and y-you b-bought it w-with th-the m-money o-of other p-people. I-I c-can’t accept i-it.”

Len studies him quietly for a long moment, which gets increasingly unsettling till Barry has to avert his eyes.

“What do you think where the money for the food we got you did came from,” the other man asks and while he tries to sound calm, he doesn’t succeed in stopping the anger to seep through. “Or for all the damn stuff you ate tonight?”

Barry doesn’t replay. He knows that Len is right, there is no reason in arguing with him about this. Living off charities that have been purchased by stolen money is something he tries not to think about if he can help it, the guilt it causes him usually makes him sick otherwise.

It is so damn ironic that he is really nothing more than a criminal these days. Maybe not in the sense other people believe him to be but he has fallen back on living off stolen money by accept the goods he has gotten from Len or Hartley more than once already.

It certainly is nothing he is proud of.

Len frown deepens and briefly he seems about say something but stops himself before he can do so. Judging by how pissed off he must be by Barry’s reaction to his present, he has most likely nothing nice to say to him and he is obviously well aware that he would say some rather nasty stuff should he not be careful.

Despite everything, it helps to see that Len actually tries to make true on his promise.

“L-Len,” Barry’s voice is very quiet as he starts to speak. “I r-really ap-preciate y-your g-gift, it i-is a v-very th-thoughtful one a-and… and I w-would l-love t-to r-receive it u-under a-any other c-circums-stances b-but I c-can’t a-accept it.”

He swallows and wishes once more that things were different. That his live were not this messed up and that the relationship he has with the other man wouldn’t be so damn difficult and confusing.
“I’m… I-d-don’t w-want t-to b-be a c-criminal a-and wh-while I ac-cept th-the f-food y-you g-give m-me, I d-do s-so b-bec-cause… b-because I n-need t-to. It’s d-different w-with th-this, th-though.” Barry lifts his hand to rub his temple behind which a familiar pain has started to spread out again. He closes his eyes. “Th-this d-doesn’t m-mean th-that I… th-that I-I d-don’t ap-preciate your h-help or h-having y-you a-around. I kn-knew f-from th-the b-beginning wh-who y-you are and I-I d-don’t k-kid m-myself into b-believing th-that y-you w-will ch-change b-but I-I… y-you are s-still important t-to m-me.”

When he didn’t hear anything from any of the Rogues it hurt so damn much, not just Len’s words but the notion that they would simply drop him like that. It is stupid and dangerous but he has grown fond of these people, they were there for him when nobody else was.

He would never forget that.

“Okay.”

Barry opens his eyes and turns to Len in surprise, not sure whether he has really just heard right.

“I get it.” The other man doesn’t sound angry anymore and the aggression from before is gone again as well. He doesn’t look particularly happy as he is watching him now but he doesn’t seem that upset anymore either.

This is not the reaction Barry has expected and he is so very grateful for it.

“Th-thank y-you.”

Len huffs and rubs a hand over his face, clearly still a bit frustrated, but he smiles slightly when he looks back at him again.

“You are such a pain in the ass, Allen.”

The air around them relaxes and Barry chuckles slightly.

“S-sorry, I-I g-guess.”

With a frown, Len looks back to the bag.

“Great, two hundred bucks out the window.”

“T-t-two h-hund-dred b-b-bucks?!” Barry sputters in a mixture of horror and disbelief that causes the other man to bark a laugh.

“That artsy stuff of yours is fucking expensive,” Len agrees and shakes his head. “And there is such a ridiculous amount of it around.” He snorts and remarks that the sales woman in the art supply shop clearly thought he is an idiot. “I had no idea that there are different kind of brushes or that there is extra stuff you need to thin these colours out.”

When Len notices that Barry is eying the bag again with newly found curiosity, he pushes it back towards him. “Take a damn look before your eyes fall out.”

Barry knows that he probably shouldn’t but still accepting the offer.

Before, he didn’t paid too much attention to any details and only picked up that both, the oil colours and brushes are from Winsor&Newton, which is a very high quality brand when it comes to art supplies. He studies it a bit closer now and while he wouldn’t change his mind, he can’t help but feel disappointed at the prospect of not being able to accept the surprisingly thoughtful gift.

The heavy wooden box contains a range of 76 oil colours while the brushes are made of weasel hair, which makes his heart ache a bit as he has read about how great they are to paint with. They don’t look anything like the handful of brushes he has gotten from the one dollar store close to Mrs. Ming’s shop and he picks one of them up to feel the softness of its tip.

Damn it, he really would love keep at least one of them.

“You could still accept it,” Len points out and seems slightly amused by how taken Barry is by the art utensils.

Barry shoots him a small smile before he turns back to the brush is currently studying. The notion of his friend standing rather helplessly in an art shop, not being able to make head or tail of anything he sees there, is quite funny. It is nice to think that Len put such an effort into getting him this present.

He puts everything back into the bag and, with one last wistful look, pushes it back towards the other man.

“Th-thank you, L-Len. It’s a g-great g-gift,” he tells him earnestly. “I ap-preciate it v-very m-much.”

“You aren’t keeping it,” Len reminds him but doesn’t seem all that irked about it anymore. Instead, he seems rather pleased about Barry’s words.

“S-still, I c-can a-appreciate th-the th-thoughtf-fullness.”

Their eyes meet and they watch each other for a bit in a comfortable silence, relieved that there is no real tension left between them anymore.

“Y-you w-want s-some c-coffee?” Barry offers, no longer feeling as exhausted as before and no longer really that keen on the idea to have the other man leaving again this soon.

Len gives him a relaxed smile and nods.

“I’d like to.”

Chapter End Notes

Oh my god, I’m so happy that this is finally out and I really hope that you liked it, it is one of those chapters I really enjoy and mean a lot to me but were a little sh to edit.

I’ve initially written this about one and a half years ago and a lot of the story has changed by now so that I had to change it a couple of times accordingly, especially because of Len – believe it or not, this version of Len is way more open and communicative than he initially was (that closed-up derp).

And I don’t know whether any of you picked up on it but I put Barry’s birthday in February, even though it actually is in March – I did so because he more or less got that birth date after he moved to his first foster home, they needed one for him due to school application and such and he didn’t know it himself as he was really young back when he lost his parents. Everything will make more sense later, I promise. ;)
Also, please let me know what you think! X) I’m really curious how you see his and Len’s reunion – I’m really happy all that bad blood between them finally starts to thin out and things can go back more or less to normal again.

Next chapter will be a Len POV again, the one after that will introduce a shady character and the one after that will shine some light on what was up with the Rogues’ whole Russia business. :)}
A comfortable quiet has settled over the little apartment in the early morning hours and Len, who has picked himself another beer from Barry’s fridge, closes its door with more care than usual as to not cut through the rare peacefulness the rundown building only seems able to provide at a time this late.

The bottle opens with a soft hiss and he takes a sip of the cool beer as he leans back against the kitchen sink. The taste is earthy and bitter and a welcome change to the two cups of coffee he had so far.

He lets his eyes wander through the sparse living room for a moment and can’t help but feel a certain disdain for this place once more.

It’s old and seedy and even though Barry obviously takes good care of it, he doesn’t seem able to make it look any less rundown and uninviting. Even the ton of confetti that is currently resting on nearly every surface the living room doesn’t help much there.

Len’s isn’t picky when it comes to his living accommodations as growing up in a seedy camping trailer that was definitely too small for four people taught him early on that one should be glad to live someplace that provides the basic standards of running water and electricity.

Despite that, he doesn’t like Barry’s place, hasn’t from the first time he passed by. It’s too depressing looking and there is a hopelessness that clings to it which doesn’t sit well with him because he isn’t sure whether it stem from the former owners or the other man. The other residents, who mostly consists of the breed of people who are at least partly the reason for why the Keys are this criminal ridden dump, or the fucking landlady, who thinks it’s appropriate to cut off the heat in the beginning of February, aren’t exactly helping to lift his low opinion of this place.

Calling a trailer park his home during the his childhood and early teenage years and always at the mercy of a choleric drunk as a father, Len knows what it is like to feel helpless, unable to change anything about one’s living condition, and afraid that only one wrong move could mean another hell of pain.

It was a part of his childhood he gladly left behind and seeing how Barry has to live a life that is in a way so similar to that one makes him want to hit something.

Len frowns and turns his gaze to the brown glass bottle that feels cold enough to the touch that it slightly stings.

Another uncomfortable thought tries to push its way to the forefront of his mind, one that causes something cold and heavy to settle in the pit of his stomach.

It isn’t exactly hard to guess that Barry had a shitty life so far with his wife murdered, his former family and friends turning from him and being put into prison for something he didn’t commit. Beyond that, there is more, though, and Len has known so for a long time by now.

After learning the former Flash’s identity, he looked the person up who was such a thorn in the side of him and the other Rogues and what he learned wasn’t what he had expected.

Len takes another pull from his beer before he rubs his tired eyes and tries to bite down on a frustrated sigh.

Sometimes, hell, most of the time, he really wishes he hadn’t. Some things irreversibly change the way you look at someone, you just can’t help it, and Len is pretty sure that, if the whole fucked-up business with Barry’s imprisonment hadn’t happened soon after him finding out who the scarlet speedster really was, this knowledge would probably have started to mess things up for the Rogues in one way or another.

Despite what anybody may think, Len’s heart isn’t made of ice and the abuse of a child… he always hated that kind of stuff.

Barry had been livid after realizing his betrayal and Len still remembers vividly how close he seemed to actually kill him that night.

Never before he had seen the man so enraged or scared.

Back then he thought it was worth it, though.

He felt somewhat guilty about how he had obtained the knowledge of his secret identity but not enough to not use it to his advantage.

This was, at least, until he learned more about who the Flash actually was, more about who Barry Allen was, and he nearly found it amusing in a twisted way how ridiculous fate could be at times, how similar the lives of sworn enemies could turn out to be and how they could still end up on opposite sides of the law.

Len briefly turns his attention to the blond man, who is sitting at the couch, head still resting at the back of it, and who hasn’t moved at all over the last couple of minutes.

They both grew up with it, grew up in broken homes and at the mercy of abusive drunks with nobody there to protect them. Len remembers those years of his childhood, no matter how much he tries to get rid of them, they are a part of him, burned into him, and this awful rotten part of his past still sometimes succeeds to haunt him at nights even now.
Despite how bad having to live with such a father, a helpless drunk of a mother and a little sister he had to look out for, he still is grateful that he never had to put up with foster homes on top of that. He knew from other kids, from friends and others at that time, how messed up those places could be and that child service was not above placing siblings in different homes.

To this day, he isn’t sure what he would have done if they had ever tried to take Lisa away from him.

Seeing that his father was a cop, even if it was a miserable one, this never happened to them. Instead of being handed around, Len and Lisa were stuck with that nightmare of a man, but they were in there together, at least.

Barry, on the other hand, hadn’t been that lucky.

Len’s gaze turns back down to the bottle in his hand and he absentmindedly studies it for a second before taking another pull from it.

He remembers the photos, the medical reports, and he has utterly no idea how one kid could have so much rotten luck.

Parents vanish out of the blue when he is six, which leads to him becoming a charge of the state and being put into an orphanages for the first two months before a circle of what can only be described as misery started for the little boy.

Len pushes the memory of what he had learned about Barry’s early life away, unwilling to think about any of it right now, and instead tries to stir his mind away from the other man’s or his own past.

It settles on the surprise party Lisa and some of the Rogue’s threw Barry and how the relationship between them and the blonde seems to have grown far more than Len would have anticipated.

Lisa’s concern for Barry caught him off-guard a couple of weeks ago as she had made it quite clear before that she didn’t like him. He still has no idea what caused it as his sister can be annoying tight-lipped if she chooses to be but he is grateful for her change of heart nonetheless. Her uncalled hostile behaviour towards Barry bothered him from the start and it is good to know that he wouldn’t have to worry about this anymore.

His gaze moves over all the confetti and paper streamers and he can’t help but feel slightly amused by how absurd this makes the little apartment look that stubbornly seems to refuse to let go of its plain and rather dreary looking appearance.

Lisa and the others really went all out with the cake, the food and this absurd amount of party decoration. Judging by how nearly every inch of the apartment is covered by brightly coloured paper, Len is pretty sure the others share his opinion on how shady this place actually looks like.

His sister probably thinks that he feels right at home here seeing that she never liked the places he picked for himself or understood why he would not make any better use of the money they stole than wasting it on getting drunk, whores and improving his weapon.

“You could keep a less sordid apartment, at least,” she told him with a wrinkled nose just a couple of months ago after she came over with some pizza for a movie night. She didn’t bother to keep her disdain off her face as she looked around his place. “This hole is just plain depressing to just visit, Lenny.”

“One’s home should be more than just that,” Lisa pointed out and Len, now standing in Barry’s kitchenette, still has to smile at the memory because that is just such a typical thing for her to say.

In another life, in one where they both had been luckier and chosen a different path for themselves, he is certain that his sister would have ended up owning a home that is just like the ones in those magazines Hartley and she like to read. Clean, tasteful, warm and welcoming, someplace to settle down and have a family…

Len brings that train of thought to a halt, cuts it off before it could go any further and cause a very familiar and just as unwanted guilt to rise that has already started to stir in his guts.

He takes another pull of the cool beer and decides to move back to his former spot on the couch.

The muscles in his shoulders and neck started to tense up due to how uncomfortable the piece of junk furniture is and the notion of spending any more time on it isn’t exactly thrilling but he had worse before and Barry is there.

His gaze moves to the other man’s face as he sits back down next to him and he can’t help but notice how relaxed the blonde looks for once with all the tension from earlier tonight seemingly gone.

Barry’s cheek is resting on the back of the couch with his eyes closed and lips slightly parted. He looks like he has fallen asleep but Len is pretty sure that it isn’t the case yet. It probably wouldn’t take long for it to happen, though, not with how utterly exhausted he seems.

Len’s eyes flicker to the living room clock and it shows him that he has been here for more than three hours already, which is a bit unexpected as it really hasn’t felt all that long to him. They’ve spent most of it talking about the last couple of months they missed from each other’s life, too relieved and glad that they were finally able do so again to pay the passing time any mind.

He can’t remember the last time it felt this good to make up with anybody other than maybe Lisa but with her he never has to fear that things between them would really break apart enough that they would go their separate ways for good.

Len takes a sip from the beer and returns his attention back to the other man. It isn’t lost on him how much closer they are sitting now compared to how they’ve started out just a couple of hours ago.

It is a welcomed change to how distant Barry was at first but even with how quickly his initial reluctance to get close to Len has started to wane after he accepted the offer of coffee, it still doesn’t sit well with him that it has been there in the first place.

When Len came here, he knew how unlikely it would be for Barry to outright welcome him. He also expected him to shy away, like he tends to do with people he is wary of, and Len is well aware that he deserved this status in the other man’s mind as he pretty much earned it.

This doesn’t change the fact that was frustrating and worrying how unwilling Barry was to get near him.

After how comfortable the blonde has gotten in his company over time, this felt and still feels like a setback, like a failure on his part, and Len hates it.

He doesn’t do rash things, not since he left his early teenage years behind him, and throwing his cool out the window like this just can’t happen.

This isn’t business, though, which means that he doesn’t have to keep such a strict grip on his emotions. His rare bursts of bad temper are usually hardly a problem in this regard, the people he tends frequents with outside a job generally don’t matter enough to him that he would even care if they tell him off and leave.

Damn, in Amunet’s case he would pay her actual money to do just that but that stubborn obsessive woman has made it more than clear that-

Len scowls down at the bottle in his hand and shoves the notion of that woman away again as he is not willing to waste anymore on her than he already has to.

Especially not here.

He turns his gaze back to Barry, instead.

With him things are different and, of course, more complicated. Len doesn’t want to scare him off by not being able to keep his damn temper in check.

This is probably why it feels so good to see Barry like this again, calm and relaxed and not worried of having him around. In a way, this willingness to let his guard down in his presence is probably a more promising sign that things between them are going to be alright than anything else could be.

Even so, Len is somewhat wary of how well things have gone tonight, despite with Barry not accepting his present, which he hadn’t really expect him to do in the first place. Initially, it seemed much more likely to him that his visit would just result in another fight between them and it is still difficult for him to trust how easily things between them seem to have smoothed out again.

Lisa’s words have been gnawing away at him for a while now, though. So has his guilt and, in the end, both succeeded in urging him to come here tonight. Now, he is glad that he did, and thankful that he decided against wussing out after arriving at the front of the apartment building.

Next to Len, Barry starts to move a bit, likely to adjust his position as he is obviously not immune to how rundown his couch is either. Once again, he notices how utterly exhausted his friend looks.

“You should go to bed.”

Barry is startled by his words despite the low and calm tone he used, which means that he must have been close enough to drifting off to forget that he still has company.

Len doubts that he is able to relax like this around many people and it is oddly pleasing to think that he is one of these few he trusts enough to do so.

Barry seems a bit disorientated for a second, which, as usual, comes hand in hand with fear. The tension leaves his body as soon as he is able to focus his eyes again and spots Len, though.

“S-sorry, d-didn’t m-mean t-to f-fall as-sleep on y-you,” he mumbles but doesn’t move. He seems completely spent and not for the first time tonight, Len feels concerned over his health.

It would be hard to miss that their fight and the following months have left traces on Barry, no doubt mentally but also in a more visible way. He has always been slender, even back when he still ran around as the twin’s protector, but after his time in prison he has lost nearly all of his muscle mass and generally enough weight that it would have concerned any decent doctor.

Now, he looks even worse.

The fifteen pounds or so Barry had been able to gain over the last year are clearly gone again and with them some additional ones, which leaves him gaunt and tired looking and Len with the bitter guilt of knowing that he is the reason for this.

“Your neck is going to kill you later on if you fall asleep like this,” he points out and despite his concern, he can’t help but smile when Barry only hums in agreement, obviously too close to falling asleep to really be able pick up on what he has just said.

It is a relief that the other man doesn’t has to work tomorrow because Len doubts that he would call in sick for a day even if he was half-dead on his feet.

Contrary to what most of the public thinks, many people who went to prison and are no career criminals tend to do about anything to not get sent back to a place like the Heights. They let others run all over them, let themselves be exploited and worked into the ground, just to not return to the horror that some penitentiaries hold ready for them.

In his numerous stays in different prisons, Len learned that there aren’t exactly different types of inmates and the personalities one can meet in these places are as different as they can get.

What can be found in every single prison there is, though, are groups.

People in these places tend to group. Find strength in numbers, so to say. A rule he learned early on, and still has the scare to keep this memory fresh even these days.

If one is able to find a place amid others, the time spent in prison doesn’t have to be as bad as it would likely be otherwise.

It is simply a necessity to find a group to stick with, even if people have to offer things they would never be willing to do or give in the real world. Letting go of one’s pride is still a preferable option to being on your own because anybody who doesn’t find someone to run with is fair game and this will always end badly.

An uneasy heaviness settle in his guts as he studies Barry’s relaxed features.

The sort of prisoners Len actually tends to see as their own class are usually the ones with the highest suicide and death rate in most penitentiaries. They are made up of people nobody wants to acquaintance with but everybody loves to take apart if the possibility presents itself – like, for example, child abusers or murderers, corrupt pigs and anybody else who was somehow connected to the police outside the walls.

It doesn’t come as a surprise that Barry had been marked from the second he entered the prison as he was committed for not only being a child abuser but was also quickly outed as a former forensic scientist.

The time the other man spent behind the high grey walls of Iron Heights had been hell for him, Len knows that, probably any inmate during his stay there does. The Rogues hadn’t been around that much at first but words tend to spread fast in closed spaces and even in a place like the Heights it wasn’t commonplace for an inmate to fall victim to so much cruelty…

“Everyth-thing alright?”

Len is startled out of his thoughts and realizes that his mind has taken off its own path without him noticing. His gaze refocuses on Barry, who is watching him now with a slightly worried expression.

“Yeah, just thinking.” He straightens himself a bit and hisses softly when a sharp pain shoots through his neck and shoulders in response as the couch hasn’t gotten any less uncomfortable with time.
Len should have bought him a new couch for the couple hundreds of bucks instead of a box full of oil paints, he would definitively have gotten more use out of it.

“Y-you d-don’t n-need to s-stay around.” Barry’s quiet voice cause Len to turn back to him and he doesn’t miss how unhappy he looks despite the smile he tries to give him.

It occurred to him before that Barry doesn’t want him to leave and while it is hard for him to grasp how forgiving this man can be, he can’t say that he is really surprised.

“Don’t you wanna go to bed? You look spent,” he replies and immediately notices how the other man’s face falls a bit before he turns away to look down to the cup of by now cold tea in his lap.

“R-right,” Barry murmurs and Len fights the urge to frown.

“I can stay, if you want me to. I don’t have anywhere to be tomorrow anyway,” he says.

“Y-you d-don’t have t-to.” Barry keeps looking down at his lap, the corner of his lips slightly pulled down and once again a picture of wariness and disappointment.

God, Len would give a lot to not always be the cause for the other man to feel like shit. The most frustrating part is, that, in moments like this, he doesn’t even understand what he did wrong in the first place.

“Do you want me to?” he asks bluntly and watches how Barry glances at him with a uncertain look before he turns to study the small and mostly empty coffee table in front of them.

“Y-you d-don-”

He watches how Barry starts to gnaw on his lip, nearly oozing nervousness, and not for the first time Len wonders what the other man really sees when he looks at him.

A friend or a criminal?

Both?

… or maybe more?

It has always been difficult to label himself when it comes to their relationship, not only due to his own feeling and how he preferred to push them away and not face them if he could help it, but also because of how Barry seems to cling to him and trust him but shy away from him at the same time.

Len has no major in psychology but it is hardly necessary in this case. He gets it that Barry is scarred from all the shit he had been put through but there is something else to it as well and if he could take a guess he would say that it is probably guilt.

Despite how Barry seems to consider him and the other Rogues his friends, Len is certain that this doesn’t come without any troubles for him.

One doesn’t change being a hero just overnight. To be part of this kind of business one needs a kind of dedication most people would likely never really get, and a person like Barry will likely stick to his belief of right and wrong even if circumstances force him to change. He hasn’t let go of this part of himself, even after years and years of abuse that would have causes any other person to turn hateful towards the world around them, he still tries to do the right thing, live a good life.

As Len watches him now, looking so worried and uncertain, he asks himself once more what is going on in the other man’s head.

“I can leave,” he finally says when a couple of tense minutes ticked by in silence and Barry doesn’t seem to have come any closer to a decision.

This seem to shake the blonde out of his thoughts as he turn to Len with a frown and studies him briefly with the same wary frown as before.

“If y-you l-leave…” Barry breaks off and purses his lips slightly, giving his expression something very unhappy but also defeated that doesn’t sit well with Len.

“I won’t start avoiding you again.”

It isn’t hard to guess what the other man is probably worrying about and, well, Len certainly feels like a bastard all over again.

Go figures.

Some of the tension seem to leave Barry at that and he shoots him a look that is wary but also hopeful.

Len feels the urge to reach out and touch him then, just grasp his wrist, like he has done so often before, like it has become nearly commonplace between them. A clear sign of the other man’s trust and he can’t bring himself to because he knows that it is very likely that Barry would tense up and pull away.

“So, w-we’re r-really ok-kay ag-gain?” Barry asks and while this is what Len hoped for, having the other man forgive him and allow him back in, it still doesn’t sit well with him that he is the one asking this.

“Don’t you think I should be the one asking?” It comes out harsher than he intends to but, to his relief, Barry only gives him a faint and weary smile before he lowers his head to the side again, so that it is resting on the back of the couch.

“D-does it m-mater?”

Len feels a familiar anger rise in his chest, something cold and slick and nasty that always rears its head when he notices how much the other man has been messed with, how much they’ve beaten him down that he has this little self-worth.

What is even worse, is that he knows how he is also one of these people responsible for this and it makes the urge to break something nearly irresistible.

“I’m n-not m-mad anym-more, L-Len.” Barry meets his angry look with surprising ease, which is probably mostly due to how close he is to falling asleep. “I’m j-just g-glad y-you… th-that w-we are ok-kay ag-gain.”

It is nearly surreal how bad this makes Len feel as he knows that Barry isn’t pretending or anything like that. He really has forgiven him just like that.
Len did want them to get back to whatever they were before their fight, whether it be friends or something else, but he expected Barry to hold at least some grudge for a while.

It would have been understandable, Len himself can be a pissy and resentful fuck when he feels wronged or betrayed, and while it is not one of his finest character traits, it is the reason why he wouldn’t have hold it against Barry should he have decided to not forgive him right away. He didn’t really expect him to do so, anyway, as the blonde was just not the person to harbour ill feelings towards others this but he would have thought that he would stay somewhat angry at him for little a while at least.

This is clearly not the case, though, and this can’t exactly be good for Barry.

“You know that you’ve the right to be pissed at me,” he tells him seriously.

It isn’t a question, at least it shouldn’t have to be.

Barry, whose eyes has started to drift close again, blinks at his words as if in surprise and gives him a questioning look.

“Yes, I kn-know,” he agrees somewhat puzzled.

“But you aren’t?”

The anger is still there, Len tries to keep it out of his voice but Barry obviously doesn’t miss it this time around as he tenses up again before he forces himself to straighten up.

The wariness with which he is now studying Len is rubbing him the wrong way and he nearly snaps at him for it, for being so damn timid nearly all the fucking time. He doesn’t and he bites down on the words, instead, because he promised the other man he wouldn’t hurt him like this again.

And it isn’t really like Len is actually angry at Barry anyway or that any of this is his fault.

Barry seems confused and concerned and suddenly very much aware of how close they actually are and how little space is left between them. Len nearly curses himself for how he is seemingly unable to not mess things up where the blonde is involved.

“You w-wan’t m-me t-to b-be ang-gry?” Barry asks tentatively and starts to fidget with the cup of tea that he is still holding.

Len isn’t sure how to answer this.

He doesn’t want Barry to be angry at him but he also doesn’t want him to forgive him this easily just because the other man thinks that he would bolt otherwise.

“No.” Len takes a moment to think about how to touch upon what is bothering him before he goes on. “But I also don’t want you not to be angry at me because you’re scared that I will leave again.”

Barry looks away and he doesn’t miss the slight flush that cross his cheek as he does so or how uncomfortable he looks for a moment.

“Look, I messed up, I said a lot of horrible stuff and-”

“I kn-know,” Barry cuts Len off with an unhappy frown that is directed at his couch table again as he is still not looking at him. “And I t-told y-you b-bef-fore th-that I w-won’t s-stand f-for s-something l-like th-this ag-gain. S-so, w-what else d-do you w-want f-from m-me?”
Once more, Len seems to prove his ability to say just the wrong things when it comes to the other man. He really didn’t mean to hurt or upset him again.

“I want you to understand that this isn’t going to happen again.”

Despite how asinine this must sound to the other man, Len has no intention to repeat such a stupid stunt. Just looking at Barry makes him want to kick himself for how he simply shut him out so carelessly and unwilling to really think about the consequences of this.

Lisa’s words caused the nagging worry to become nearly unbearable but he didn’t expect…

No, this would be a lie, he did expect Barry to react this badly but he hoped that he wouldn’t.

“D-don’t p-promise th-things l-like th-that,” Barry replies and there is a slight tremble to his voice that is painful to listen to.

“It won’t.” Len repeats earnestly, even though he knows that the blonde is likely right to be sceptical. Still, even if Barry doesn’t believe it, this is something he is dead-serious about.

There would be many other ways in which he would end up hurting Barry, he doesn’t kid himself about what kind of person he is, but he wouldn’t let himself do this to him again.

Being abandoned is probably its own little hell for him and Len is still furious at himself to not think of this when he decided to prove again what kind of an idiot he could be if he put his mind behind it.

“I won’t just leave like this again,” he states firmly and watches how Barry closes his eyes with a nearly pained expression, which causes a couple of tears to run down his once again pale cheeks.

The blonde brushes them away and shoots Len an uneasy glance before he looks away again.

“Y-you aren’t ex-xactly m-making it easy f-for m-me t-to b-believ-ve y-you.”

“I know.”

Barry huffs in response but it doesn’t sound angry.

“I d-don’t… y-you l-left b-before.”

It doesn’t need much elaboration on what he means for Len to understand.

Of course Barry wouldn’t completely buy his excuse with Russia, not that being hunted by a group of deranged head-hunters didn’t make it difficult to keep in contact with anybody.

Still, even without Digger’s past catching up on that dumbass and therewith the rest of them, Len would have kept his distance from Barry anyway, at least for a time.

“I won’t leave again,” he repeats firmly and doesn’t like how the other man’s shoulders seem to tense up at this or how he wraps one of his arms around himself as if he was trying to hug himself. It is hard to watch and the urge to reach out and somehow offer comfort is so strong that it causes his fingers to twitch.

“I kn-know wh-why y-you g-got a-angry at m-me l-last t-time,” Barry says quietly and still isn’t looking at him. “I… I s-said s-some th-things… I… I sh-shouldn’t h-have b-but… wh-what d-did I d-do th-then? I… I j-just d-don’t unders-stand it…”

It is unexpected.
Len hasn’t thought that this is still bothering Barry, at least not this much.

And what is he supposed to say?

That he is sorry but he got cold feet because he realized how fucking close they’ve actually become? That he chickened out because he realized that there seems to be more than just friendship between them, at least when it comes to him, to what he feels for the other man? That just the prospect of this is fucking terrifying to him?

It is rather simple, really, no matter how hard Len tries to push this topic away and wants to make himself believe that it is just too complex to handle.

In the end, it always runs down to the same damn reason.

He is a coward, who is still haunted by the shadow of a man long gone from his life.

How sad is that?

“You didn’t do anything,” Len finally answers when the silence between them has become too uncomfortable, despite how little he wants to touch upon any of this. He owns at least some honesty to the other man.

“But y-you l-left,” Barry points out and start to sound frustrated. “Wh-why? D-did… w-was I t-too… c-c-clingy?”

Len closes his eyes for a moment and tries not to feel so damn helpless or angry.

“No,” he replies and it is hard to keep his voice even as he does. “You weren’t.”

A silence settles between them again and it would probably be a good idea to elaborate, to explain himself a bit better than with just these few words, but he can’t, even though he knows how much he is hurting Barry this way all over again.

It seems he is unable to keep his promise from the very start…

Len frowns down at the brown glass bottle in his hand but turns his gaze back to Barry when he notices him shifting next to him.

Blue eyes meet his.

“I…” Barry licks his lips nervously, briefly glancing to the side before reluctantly focusing back on him. “I kn-know th-that… I-I c-can b-be… h-hard t-to b-be ar-round at t-t-times… n-not j-just… y-you kn-know, b-bec-cause I’m… b-because of w-what h-happened a-and… b-but b-because… o-of wh-who I w-was…”

The blonde’s expression hold so much resignation but no accusation and Len feels like strangling someone because why can’t this man understand that this wasn’t his fault!?

“Barry-”

Barry cuts him off, obviously unwilling to let himself be interrupted again.

“I d-don’t… I-I… L-Len, I d-don’t l-like wh-what y-you and th-the others d-do f-f-for a l-living b-but I-I… wh-when I s-said b-bef-fore th-that y-you m-mean a l-lot t-to m-me I m-mea nt it a-and y-you h-have n-no id-dea h-how…” He breaks off and a familiar unease settles over Len as he watches how close to tears he seems once more.
Barry watches him with too shiny eyes for a long moment, seemingly uncertain how or whether to go on before he takes a calming breath and forces himself to do just that.

“Y-you p-probab-bly d-don’t unders-stand h-how i-import-tant y-you are t-to m-me.” A slight flush spreads over Barry’s cheeks and Len feels an unexpected warmth settle in his stomach as he watches this. “Y-you’ve b-been th-there f-for m-me wh-when n-nob-body else w-was a-and I w-will n-never f-forget th-that. It m-made m-me unders-stand th-that I’ve m-misj-judged y-you b-before, y-you and th-the others. I d-don’t m-mean t-to s-say th-that I ap-prove of wh-what y-you are d-doing b-but… y-you a-aren’t a b-bad p-person, L-Len. N-None of y-you is. Y-you h-have f-fault b-but y-you aren’t b-bad o-oor c-cruel a-and I… I th-think y-you g-give y-yourself t-too l-little c-credit f-for th-this.”

Len isn’t sure how to response to that.

This is certainly not what he has expected Barry to say.

The other man isn’t finished just yet, though.

“I kn-know th-that I’m n-not m-much b-better i-in th-this r-regard.” Barry swallows as his voice has started to sound rough and somewhat brittle and he coughs lightly. It isn’t hard to see how difficult it is for him to meet Len’s gaze right now. “I s-said s-some h-horrible s-stuff t-to y-you b-back wh-when… I’m s-sorry ab-bout it. I-I… i-it’s… I’m r-r-rid-diculous, r-really, I-I’m in n-no p-place t-to j-judge b-but… b-but I… I f-felt s-so g-guilty ab-bout wh-what h-happened t-to th-that s-secur-it-ty g-guard…”

The blonde closes his eyes, a pained expression of his face, and Len suddenly is unable to fight the urge to reach for him any longer.

Barry’s wrist is slim compared to his own, hardly more than skin and bones, and his hand closes so easy around it. He has expected the flinch and talks hold of the cup of tea before it could cause a mess while meeting the other man’s wide and slightly alarmed eyes with a hopefully reassuring and calm expression.

“It’s alright,” Len says as he puts the cup on the small couch table next to them. “I won’t hurt you.”

The flush from before returns on Barry’s cheeks and he averts his eyes, likely ashamed by his own reaction to the unexpected contact.

Len would give a lot to take his discomfort away from him. He has never been good with words of comfort though, Lisa can certainly attest to that, so that he settles on a very light squeezes of the other man’s wrist instead.

“I get why you were angry back then and you didn’t overstep by telling me that that guy’s life would be on me should he die. We both know that it was the truth.”

People dying is just a part of this business and while Len insists on the Rogues to follow his no killing rule, he is well aware that some unlucky bastards will get killed by what they are doing, whether it be other criminals or innocent bystanders who are unlucky enough to be at the wrong place at the wrong time. He doesn’t like it, but he made his peace with this part of his life a long time ago.

Barry hasn’t and likely never will, though. Even without his powers, he is still a hero at heart and his need to believe in people, in something good that may be hiding away deep down in them, is about as big as his need to help others.
Years in prison weren’t able to beat this out of him…

As a Rogue, Len mostly had to deal with speedsters in his long run as a criminal so far as he and the others are quite territorial and prefer to stick to the Twins when it comes to doing business. But even so, he had his handful of run-ins with other heroes and while he realized soon enough that, in regard of powers, the Flash was up front with likely the strongest of them, he always thought him lacking due to how unwilling he seemed to accept that some people are just evil, maybe not unable but certainly unwilling to reform.

The Rogues themselves took advantage of his seemingly gullibility once towards the beginning of their hero-villain relationship, agreeing to a temporary truce neither of them every intended to actually keep, and, for the longest time, Len found it just as hilarious as the other how easily it was for them to play that scarlet idiot of a goody two-shoes.

He doesn’t anymore.

Len watches the pale tired looking face of the other man and wishes that he could be that man he still seems to believe him to be.

A better person.

“I can’t promise you that this won’t happen again,” he tells him instead because he is not willing to lie to him about this.

“I kn-know,” Barry agrees and there is such an profound sadness to him that Len starts to worry that the blonde could actually decide that he can’t live like this, with him being a part of his life any longer, and would ask him to leave.

And while it most certainly would be the better choice for Barry to make, the one that would mean less pain in any case, the selfish side of Len, the one that wants to be close to the other man, urges him to not to let this happen-

He startles slightly when Barry moves the hand in his grasp so that he can take hold of his wrist in return.

It is a light touch, nearly hesitantly so, but still very much there.

A surprised silence settles between them and Len watches Barry, somewhat taken aback by his unexpected action but also very pleased by it.

The blonde looks tense, though, and Len doesn’t doubt that he would pull back at the slightest indication that this was a mistake.

“I m-missed y-you.”

Barry’s voice is very faint, enough so that, for a moment, Len isn’t sure whether he has really said anything in the first place.

“I m-missed you, L-Len.” Barry closes his eyes and ducks his head, once again giving off the impression as if he is actually hurting. “I m-missed you s-so m-much…”

He is crying, tears start to run down his cheeks and Len nearly feels sick with guilt and self-loath.

If he was a better man he would end this here, stop whatever this between them is because there is no doubt in his mind that this will only end up in more pain for Barry, for both of them.
The sad truth is, that he is just as unable to push him away as the blonde is to pull away, though.

There aren’t many good things in his life, not many good people who actually want to be part of it, and if Len is anything, then it is a very selfish man, who takes what he wants…

Barry whimpers when he cups his neck with his free hand and he makes a low shushing sound, trying to calm any stirring fear before it could cause him to pull away.

“It’s fine,” he murmurs and slowly pulls him closer, mindful to not make it feel like he is forcing him to move along and scaring him away by accident.

Barry shudders and briefly baulks but relaxes again when Len halts as well before he lets himself be urged on, so that he ends up with his head resting on his shoulder.

“It’s alright,” Len repeats as he rubs the other man’s back who is clearly fighting to get a grip of himself again. “We’re alright.”

It isn’t a lie, at least not right now.

Just for a bit, for a couple of hours, he needs to have this.

Len turns his head so that his lips brush against Barry’s temple, a faint contact that cause them both to shudder in response.

“I won’t leave you,” he says and means it with every fibre of his body.

He couldn’t do this to either of them again.

Barry tenses up in response and grows utterly still for a moment before his body starts to tremble like a leaf under Len’s hands.

“P-please,” he whimpers and buries his face in the crook of his neck. “Y-you c-c-can’t d-do th-this t-to m-me a-again…”

Len hates how desperate and scared he sounds.

“I won’t.”

Making promises like this is dangerous, they both know that, but Len can’t help himself right now. He just wants Barry to calm down and not to feel so miserable anymore.

“I won’t,” he repeats and feels how another tremble goes through the blonde’s body as he sobs in response, obviously not able to keep the grasp on his emotions any longer.

They stay like this for a long while, Len holding Barry in his arms as he cries and offering silent comfort.

Drawing soothing circles at the back of the other man, Len notices again how much weigh the other man has lost over the last couple of months. He can feel the bumps of his spline even through the thick shirt he is wearing and it is an unsettling notion but by now Barry can hardly weigh more than 130 lbs.

Len would have to make sure that Barry has enough to eat, he knows that Hartley has helped him out with food a couple of times so far but it has obviously not been enough.

Barry grows still in his arms and it takes him a moment to realize that it is likely a response to how he himself has tensed up without noticing it.

Len forces himself to relax and starts to draw soothing circles on the other man’s back once more. The blonde stays quiet though and it quickly starts to worry him.

“S-sorry.” Barry’s voice is raspy from the crying and he coughs slightly.

“It’s fine.” Len gives his neck a light squeeze with his other hand, relieved that he seems to do a bit better now. “You deserved a good cry.”

Barry chuckles tiredly and sniffs before he moves his head slightly so that he can press his forehead against Len’s jaw.

“Thank you,” he sounds wobbly like he is still fighting against tears, which probably is the case.

Len hums and briefly thinks about pointing out that it would probably a good idea for Barry to move to his bedroom and finally rest. His exhaustion is nearly palpable by now and he himself is starting to feel the late hour as well, not to mention that is back is currently declaring war on him for deciding to spend this much time on this piece of shit furniture.

It really shouldn’t come as a surprise that he feels Barry to start relaxing then, not just some of the tension easing away from him, but his body growing slack and his breathe evening out.

He sighs as he resigns himself to the fact that he would spend at least the next couple of hours on this couch and adjusts his position a bit, so that his back wouldn’t kill him right away, at least.

“Definitely should have bought you a new couch,” Len mutters and lets his cheek rest on Barry’s head before he closes his eyes and pulls him a bit closer.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter took quite a bit longer to finish than I thought it would and while it wasn’t exactly “not fun” to write it definitely felt more bothersome at parts than it is usually the case.

Tbh, I’m not sure how happy I’m with it just yet, as I’ve just finished going over the ‘final’ version the second time and still changed something at every second passage or so while doing so. Still, I actually put quite a bit into it I wanted to touch upon but I hope it isn’t too much or has become too scattered.

I missed to update last Sunday as I was just starting it after uploading the last chapter of Anomaly and while I did mention before that I will probably not be able to keep up with a weekly schedule, I still feel a bit bad about it and decided to give you a longer chapter for the longer wait. ;)

Anyway, I hope you liked it and your feedback is as always very welcome! :3
It is about a week after Barry’s birthday that Jay passes by at his apartment.

“Happy Birthday, Barry,” the older man wishes him with a warm smile as he enters the apartment. “I’m sorry for not coming by earlier, but I had business to tend to in San Francisco.”

Seeing that Barry is surprised that Jay has taken the time to pass by at all, he assures him that it is fine. He does know that the JSA had been involved in some incident down at the West Coast a couple of days ago but he hadn’t thought that this was the reason the older man didn’t shown up on his birthday.

He didn’t think that there had been any reason for it, if he was honest.

“Did you celebrate?”

Barry, who has just reached the kitchenette to start preparing some coffee for his guest, freezes for second before he forces himself to relax again and hopes that Jay hasn’t noticed.

“Yes, m-my f-friends c-came over and w-we had a n-nice evening,” he answers and tries not to sound as nervous or as guilty as he feels. It is a good thing that he can busy himself with filling up the pot with water and avoid to look at Jay because, otherwise, there is probably no way that the other man wouldn’t notice how uneasy this question has made him.

Thinking about the consequences it would have should Jay learn about him and the Rogues causes his stomach to cramp up painfully. He doesn’t doubt that there would be hell to pay for him and he is still angry at himself about how careless he has been that night.

It was in the morning after the little surprise party while he made breakfast for Len and himself that he really thought about it and realized into what a mess this could have actually turned into and that he is damn lucky that the party hasn’t had any bad repercussions for him so far. If any of his neighbours had come by to complain and recognized one of the Rogues he would likely be already back at the Heights again.

That thought alone is sickening.

“Mary and Edward?” Jay asks and, oddly enough, seems rather pleased by that notion. Barry just nods; he has always been a rather awful liar and this hasn’t changed over the years.

Jay doesn’t seem to pick up on anything not being alright, though, and instead tells him that he is glad that Barry did spend his birthday with his friends.

“Mary seems like a really nice young lady.” he remarks before his smile vanes and a frown takes its place. Barry is pretty sure that he thinks about Edward and he can’t really hold it against the other man.

Both of them hadn’t really talked much during Jay’s brief visit on Christmas and while Eddy is a really neat guy when you know him, he can also appear like anything but if he puts his mind to it. Barry can completely understand why Jay would not exactly consider his friend as a good influence on him as Eddy kept being rather rude towards him during his whole stay, much to Mary’s and his annoyance.

“Barry.” Jay’s tone of voice makes it clear that he doesn’t really want to touch upon whatever he is going to say now but that he sees it as necessary to do so anyway. This causes Barry’s stomach to drop a bit as it is rather obvious what this is going to be about. He keeps his gaze firmly on the box of coffee in his hand and can’t bring himself to turn around and face the other man.

“I am really glad that you have found friends and I don’t want to interfere with that.” Jay says and the frown is audible in his voice. He pauses for a second before he goes on. “But you should be very careful with whom you are interacting these days. I don’t want to see you to get in trouble again.”

These words cause Barry to bristle even though he has expected them and, for a brief moment, he feels a familiar anger flare up in him, mixed with betrayal and hurt, but he forces the emotions down, knowing that acting on it would only make things worse for himself.

It also wouldn’t be fair toward Jay should he get angry. The older man only means well and is looking out for him and while it is still hard for Barry to deal with the fact that his former friend could believe these awful things about him, he still appreciates that he cares enough to worry.

“I w-won’t,” Barry answers curtly and swallows with some difficulty as his throat starts to close up on him again.

Jay studies him quietly and his gaze is like an uncomfortable pressure at the back of Barry’s head. He is obviously pondering whether he should leave this topic alone for now or go on.

“I know you won’t.” There is this sadness again, so very plain in Jay’s voice, and Barry has to close his eyes for a moment because the sudden pain in his chest is nearly overwhelming.

He wonders whether the older man really thinks so but as he doesn’t want to talk about any of this, he stays quiet and is just glad when Jay changes the subject back to his actual birthday.

His former friend stays for about an hour that mostly consists of uneasy small talk before he has to leave again and while Barry is kind of glad about it, he can’t help but feel somewhat sad to see him go as well.
Despite what has happened, he knows that Jay still cares about him.

… he just doesn’t understand why.

After both of them have gotten up from their seats but before Jay turned to make his way over to the door, the older man reaches into the pocket of his jacket and pulls a white envelope out.

“Again, Happy Birthday, Barry,” he says and hands it to him.

Barry hesitates a second before he reluctantly accepts it with a quiet thanks. He fears that he already knows what he will find in there.

It is a typical birthday card, a simple but nice looking one with a mostly white cover other than for the big bold letters that say “Happy Birthday” as well as a couple of colourful balloons above them. His stomach drops again when he opens it and, besides the neat handwriting that is undoubtedly Joan’s, there is a fifty dollar note greeting him.

“I-I c-c-”

“Barry,” Jay interrupts him and meets his distressed expression with a very serious but also concerned one. “I know that you don’t like to receive financial help from me and I can understand and respect that but this is for your birthday. It doesn’t mean that I don’t think you are capable of taking care of yourself or that you are now somehow in my debt. I am not blind, I can see how hard you work to live a somewhat normal life even after everything that happened and I can only recommend you on that. I don’t give you the money because I pity you or because I have any bad intentions on mind but because I know how much effort you put into making this work and because I see how difficult it is.”

Jay’s expression has become sombre and Barry has to look away because he suddenly feels so damn ashamed.

He didn’t kill Iris or hurt Wally, he would have never done that, but it doesn’t matter because nearly everybody else thinks he did.

It is their truth.

It is Jay’s truth.

The older man wants to help him, despite thinking of him as a sick and twisted person. It is so damn confusing, it makes Barry’s head hurt.

“I don’t want you to stop trying because you break under the burden you have to carry,” Jay goes on and his voice is so damn empathetic and warm that it causes Barry’s eyes to sting again. “You are not alone, Barry.”

Barry hates him a little bit for saying so. If this was true, where has Jay been during his time in the Heights? Where has anybody been while he was a child? Why did he end up all alone again and again and again?

Barry shoves those questions away. It isn’t Jay’s fault, it is nobody’s fault, not even his own. It is just his rotten luck, it has always been just that.

The throbbing behind his temples grows worse and he lifts a hand to rub it his right temple in an attempt to ease a bit the discomfort away. He feels sick again and tired and very much looks forward to being left alone once more.
“Th-thanks, J-Jay,” he answers quietly and glances briefly at the other man with a vain attempt of a smile. “I-I ap-preciate i-it. P-please, t-tell J-Joan s-so as w-w-well.”

“Barry-”

“I d-don’t f-feel s-so w-well, I-I w-would l-like t-to l-lay d-down a b-bit. C-could y-you l-leave n-now, p-p-please?”

Jay watches him clearly concerned and Barry fears that he would insist on staying.

Thankfully, he doesn’t.

“Okay,” Jay agrees quietly.

Barry has his gaze directed towards the mostly empty cup of coffee in front of him and can’t bring himself to meet the other man’s eyes again. They keep standing there for an uncomfortable moment before Jay speaks once more, in a very quiet and tired sounding voice.

“I am very sorry for everything that has happened.”

Barry swallows and closes his eyes as he nods.

“Y-yes, m-me t-t-too.”

“You don’t look like a walking heap of misery anymore,” Eddy remarks and keeps on studying Barry curiously. “You made up with your boyfriend?”

Barry, who has just been about to let himself be lured off to sleep by the rumbling and slight movement of the bus’ around him, tenses up and shoots the other man a disbelieving and slightly mortified look.

“God, stop looking at me like that, there is hardly another soul around,” Eddy chuckles and nods towards the rest of the bus which is nearly completely empty other than for his friend, Mary, Barry himself and two other people, who sit close to the front while the three of them are sitting in the last row. Neither of the other two passengers seem to pay them any attention.

“Could you at least attempt to use your mind before blurring nonsense like this out,” Mary, who sits at Eddy’s other side, asks in annoyance.

“What? It was just a question,” the other man huffs but, judging by the slight grin that is pulling on the corners of his lips, he knows exactly what has rubbed the young woman the wrong way.

“No, it is just another sign of your ongoing lack of tact.”

Barry, who has slumped a bit lower into his seat, isn’t certain whether he wants to kick the man next to him or just pretend that he hasn’t opened his big mouth to begin with. He really doesn’t feel up to have this conversation, not this late at night and definitely not in a public bus.

“You two are way too touchy,” Eddie remarks with a familiar smirk and shrugs. “I’m just glad he’s been in a better mood these days. That’s all. If he doesn’t want to talk about it, that’s fine.”

“You are unbelievable.” Marry gives the other man a disapproving look before she looks over to Barry. “Don’t feel bad because of that imbecile, Barry.”
“Why should he feel bad? I didn’t do anything other than ask a question.”

“Yes, a very private one, in the middle of a bus with other people around. And what is that stupid remark about a boyfriend? Do you really think that is funny to him?”

“So touchy…”

Barry slumps a bit lower and covers his face with one of his hands, wishing they would have already arrived at their destination.

He jumps slightly when the other man lightly bumps their shoulders and meets his irked and unsettled look with his usual amused one.

“I didn’t mean any harm, Bar. I am just glad that you are not so downtrodden anymore.”

Even though Barry wishes Eddy would at least attempt not to be so damn direct all the time, he can appreciate his sentiment.

“Th-thanks.”

“Sure.” The other man grins. “So, no troubles with your better half anymore?”

“For Pete’s sake,” Mary hisses, which causes Eddy to smirk in satisfaction like he has aimed for just this kind of reaction from her.

Barry, who notices how the old lady closest to them has turned around to give them a slightly annoyed look, turns towards the dark window and tries to appear like he doesn’t know the man next to him.

Thankfully, Eddy leaves him be after that.

They arrive at the bus stop closest to their apartment building not ten minutes later and Barry is immensely relieved to finally get off the bus again. Eddy grabs his bag with the couple of art utensils he purchased at the flea market they spent most of today’s evening at and just winks at him when he tries to protest. Feeling too exhausted to really be bothered by it, Barry lets the other man proceed and just follows his friends.

Mary gives both of them a hug when they reach Eddy’s and his floor and wishes them a good night before she proceeds up the stairs to her own flat.

“I am just ribbing you a bit,” the other man remarks as he hands him the bag back after they stopped in front of Barry’s door. “You know that, right?”

Barry frowns slightly but nods in agreement. He does know that his friend doesn’t mean any harm with his stupid sense of humour, no matter how frustrating it can be at times.

“Thanks for coming along today,” Eddy goes on, who had been the actual mastermind behind the idea to make a trip to the small late-night flea market in Central City. Both Mary and he have surprised Barry at work and asked him whether he would like to join them. Seeing that it was Saturday, he agreed and while the weather had been just lousy, it still turned into a very nice night.

“Sure, th-thanks for inviting m-me along.”

“Because we could have spent an enjoyable evening without you around?” his friend asks with an amused grin before he wishes him a good night and takes his leave.
Barry watches him for a moment longer as he makes his way over to his own flat, a faint smile on his lips as well. Eddy may be a dumbass at times but he is a good guy when it comes down to it.

With a small yawn, Barry turns to unlock his own door and enters into his dark living room.

Before he has the opportunity to reach for the lightening switch, a hand grabs his throat with a grip strong enough to prevent any tone to pass his lips.

The door is pressed shut behind him and he finds himself in the darkness of his flat, all alone with an intruder he can’t make out. The bag in his hand drops the floor with a soft thump and he reaches for the hand that is holding him in a painfully strong grip.

“Don’t make a sound,” a deep and unfamiliar voice says that he can hardly make out over the rushing of his own blood in his ears.

“Tell Snart that Blacksmith is starting to lose her patience and that she will make sure to remember him where his obligations lie should he keep this little hard-to-get game up.”

Barry has no idea who this person is or whom he is talking about but before he has any possibility to really form a coherent thought, something hard and blunt hits the side of his head and everything turns dark.

Barry wakes up with a splitting headache and for a disorientating and frightening moment he has no idea where he is.

He lays on something hard and it is pitch-black around him.

Briefly, he thinks that he is back in the isolation cell in the Heights and he instinctively curls up in a small ball and tries to stay as quiet as possible.

Then, he notices that ground he is laying on hasn’t the same feeling to it and it isn’t as cold. Reluctantly, he reaches with a hand for it and notices that it is wood. This confuses him till he realizes that his surrounding isn’t completely dark either and that there is actually light falling through a window.

His kitchen window.

He is at home.

His confusion increases and he flinches when he is stupid enough to actually frown despite how much his whole skull is hurting.

What has happened? What is he doing on his living room floor?

The intruder comes back to his mind like a punch to his stomach and he freezes once again.

There is no noise around him, he listens intently but he can’t make anything out other than his own breathing that sounds way too loud and quick.

He still waits a couple of minutes more before he tries to sit up. It causes him to grow disorientated again and briefly he is certain that he will throw up.

The sickness passes, though, and he keeps sitting there on the ground for a while, confused and unsure what to do next.
The notion that the stranger could still be around is frightening to him but he knows that, should that person really wanted to harm him, he would have done so already. It seems that Barry has been unlucky enough to be picked as a messenger and it makes him sick to his stomach to think that anybody could be aware of his friendship to Len and the other Rogues.

What if Jay and the rest do so too?

He quickly realizes that it is more than unlikely, though, seeing that he hasn’t been sent back to prison yet, after all.

When about another five minutes have passed, Barry crawls over to the wall next to his door and attempts to get up. It is difficult but he is able to do so on his second attempt. The world around him is spinning, though, and he needs to keep standing there till his sense of equilibrium is able to regain its footing.

God, he really hopes he hasn't gotten another concussion. He hates those…

The way to his bathroom takes him forever and he has no idea how late it is but he feels tired enough that he would bet that he couldn’t have had unconscious for all that long.

It is after he has splashed some cool water onto his face that he remembers the small mirror in his pocket but he hesitates to reach for it. This could very well be a trap for his friends if someone already knows about his connection to them.

The throbbing in his head grows worse, though, and it is hard to think. He looks over his shoulder out the door and tries to listen for any sound that would be a sign for anybody to be still around.

There is nothing.

Not that this has to mean much if he is dealing with someone who understands his craft.

Turning back to study the small mirror in his hand, he waits for another couple of minutes before it becomes nearly impossible to keep standing upright and he decides to contact the others, despite knowing that this could possibly a very stupid mistake.

Even so, he is in pain and scared and while he tries ignore it, a part of him is convinced that things would be alright if just Len were with him.

Hesitantly, Barry calls for Sam and a slight panic starts to raise in him when a long moment passes by without the other man answer. The notion that something could have happen to them causes him to feel sick and he calls again, this time a bit louder as he grows increasingly worried with each passing second.

What if his attacker got to them? Or this Blacksmith? What if-

Sam’s face turns up in the small reflective surface and Barry immediately feels like such a damn idiot because as soon as he sees that the other man is wearing his familiar Mirror Master mask, he remembers that the Rogues are actually doing a job tonight.

Judging by Sam’s annoyed expression, he has bothered him most likely in the middle of it.

“For fuck’s sake, you are better dying or I am going to kick your-”

His friend breaks off as soon as he seems to have finally notices in what state he actually is in and a mixture of concern and frustration crosses his face.
“Really? What the hell? You are like a fucking magnet for trouble, man!”

“S-s-or-r-ry,” Barry stammers and suddenly feels really sick.

“Allen, if you have not already, sit down, you look like you are going to keel over any moment.” Sam huffs in exasperation and thinks for a moment before he goes on. “You think you can wait for another hour or so or is it serious enough that you need immediately help?”

“N-n-no… a-another h-hour i-is f-fine.”

“Yeah, fine my ass,” Sam grumbles and frowns. “Look, we will be done in a bit. Just try not to move too much, alright?”

“S-s-sure…”

“Fucking perfect,” the other man mutters before he vanishes again and Barry’s own reflection looks back to him.

Exhausted and still a bit frightened by what has happened, he staggers the couple of steps back to the wall behind him and let’s himself slid down so that he ends up sitting on the floor again. His head is throbbing like hell and he remembers that he has still a couple of painkillers left in the little bottle behind his cabinet mirror.

Looking up to it, he decides that it would be way too much of an effort to get them, though, especially with how disorientated he starts to feel again, and he settles for closing his eyes to shut the bright light of his bathroom out instead.

The next thing he knows is that someone shakes his shoulder slightly. The touch freaks him out badly enough that he recoils so that he ends up hitting the back of his head on the tiled wall behind him. He nearly loses his conscious again due to the awful pain that flashes through him due to that.

“Idiot, you wanna end up breaking your damn skull for good?” hisses a familiar voice and even through the thick vail of pain he is able to recognize Len. The relief he feels then is nearly smothering and without thinking of what he is doing, he reaches a hand for the one that is still cupping his shoulder.

“L-Len…”

His vision is slightly blurry due to the tears of pain in his eyes and he can’t make out any specific features of his friend or anything else around them. The hand on his shoulder shifts a bit, so that he is cupping his neck and Barry shudders lightly when the other man’s thumb starts to draw small calming circles behind his ear.

It is Lisa and Barry, who has briefly closes his eyes, opens them again and is able to make her familiar form out behind her brother.

Len hums in agreement before he tells Barry to stay calm. He doesn’t understand what the man means till he is suddenly picked up in bride style and carried back to his living room. His protests fall on deaf ears but he is placed onto the couch just a moment later anyway, so that he tries not to feel too mortified by what has just happened.

“I c-could h-have w-walked.”
Both, Len and Lisa ignore this little piece of very doubtful information.

“What happened?” asks Len instead and carefully presses Barry’s chin to the side so that he would turn his head. His frown deepens when he studies the spot where he has been hit before. “Who the fuck did this?”

“I d-d-don’t kn-know,” Barry answers truthfully and doesn’t notice how his hand once more reaches for Len’s wrist.

“Don’t freak out, Hon, I am just putting a cool cloth onto your temple to help with the swelling and pain a bit,” Lisa tells him in a soothing voice and Barry realizes that he hasn’t even noticed that she made a small trip to his kitchenette. He shudders when a damp and cool cloth is put onto his right temple a moment later and for a second the pain grows even worse before the cool starts to help.

“Barry, what has happened? Who hit you? Was it another mugging?” Lisa sounds honestly concerned and he tries to focus enough that he can meet her eyes and give her a reassuring smile. He isn’t very successful with either.

“N-no… I c-came h-home and s-someone w-was h-here.”

“Someone broke into your flat?” the blond woman asks and again sounds worried but also angry.

“Y-yes, h-he d-didn’t w-want any of m-my th-things, th-though, I… I-I th-think...”

“What do you mean?” Len sounds gruff but doesn’t pull his hand away that is currently resting on Barry’s right upper arm.

“Th-the m-m-man… h-he w-wanted m-me t-to g-give y-you a m-message...”

It is then that Barry realize once again that his friends could be in danger.

What if that person wanted him to contact them and get them here?

His stomach sinks at the notion, before he can tell Len about his worries, though, the other man cuts him off.

“A message?”

His voice sounds eerily cold again and Barry can’t help but tense up in response.

“What message, Barry?” asks Lisa and he doesn’t miss how she shares a brief look with her brother.

“That... th-that B-Blachs-smith is g-growing imp-patient and th-that sh-she w-will m-make s-sure t-to r-remind y-you of y-your o-oblig-gations...” he explains and frowns slightly. “I d-don’t kn-know wh-who it w-was, i-it w-was d-dark and I c-couldn’t m-make out anyth-thing.”

“That is fine, honey,” Lisa assures him and sits down on his small couch table before she reaches for his right shoulder to give it a light squeeze. She then turns to her brother again and both share another look that Barry doesn’t understand.

“M-maybe y-you sh-should l-leave, wh-what if h-he i-is s-still around?”

His concern is palpable and he watches how Lisa’s grim expression softens a bit as she meets his eyes again.

“Don’t worry, sweetie, he isn’t.”
“H-how d-d-do y-you kn-know th-that?” he asks and can’t help but grows a bit frustrated over their obvious lack of concern regarding their own safety.

“He wanted to threaten me, nothing more,” replies Len in Lisa’s stead with a grim expression. “Not yet, at least.”

“Wh-who i-is h-he?” Barry inquires as he fights to keep his eyes open. His head is still hurting horribly but now an intense drowsiness has joined the pain as well.

Neither of the siblings answers before Len suddenly gets up and makes his way over to the bathroom again.

“L-Len-”

“Take care of him, Lisa, I will get Simmons.”

With that, the other man is gone.

“L-Lisa, wh-what’s g-going on?”

The blond woman, who has watched her brother go with an annoyed frown, turns back to him and doesn’t seem all too keen on answering him anymore than Len has before.

“P-please, wh-who w-was th-that m-man?” he asks again and watches how Lisa frowns down at him for a moment, obviously considering whether to tell him anything or not. She seemingly comes to the decision to indulge him as she heaves a sigh and rubs the bridge of her nose as she turns towards his kitchen window. She studies the dark for a bit before she sighs again, softer than before, and turns back to him.

“Kenneth, that jackass’ name is Kenneth. He is a middleman for an underground organisation we have had some trouble for a while now.”

“Wh-what organisation?”

Barry frowns again and immediately regrets it when another hot pain shoots through his head.

“Keep still,” Lisa admonishes him softly before she goes on. “Barry, all of this is a rather complicated story and I really don’t think that it would be a good idea to tell you about it in your current state.”

“B-but y-you w-will t-tell m-me about it l-later?”

She seems a bit surprised about his insistence before she chuckles. “We’ll see.”

Barry wants to protest and tell her that he does have a right to know what is going on after being attacked by someone because he knows them. His mind starts to drift off, though, and it becomes increasingly difficult to keep his eyes open.

“Stay with me, honey, you can’t rest just now,” tells him Lisa.

Barry hopes the doctor wouldn’t take as long as last time around. It is difficult not to give in to the tiredness but he makes an effort to answer the questions Lisa starts to ask him for the next ten minutes before Len returns with the old grumpy man.
And cue in Blacksmith&Co!

Len, what the heck did you get yourself into? Well, something that means quite some trouble, that's for sure. ;)

I hope you liked this chapter, it isn't very Barry/Len centric but this and the next one will help to progress the story, the one after that will introduce one of my absolute favs in the whole Flash series and also have a more private Barry/Len scene again, which I still have to write.

With the last chapter, I changed some of the B/L dynamic to how I've initially written it in the story, which is completely fine as I like how things are progressing now but it also means some more re-writes and changes and thus probably some more time in-between chapters being uploaded. I will make sure to make the chapters longer in return, though. :)

I also have two other on-going stories I'm working on, which will also take up some of my time and work and studying keeps me busy in RL as well, so please don't think ill of me for needing some more time to finish the chapters of Singularity. This story is really, really dear to my heart and I work on it as quickly as I can, not only because I want to provide you with new chapters but also because I immensly enjoy doing so. :)
March 2\textsuperscript{nd} year

“So,” Axel starts and gives him a curious look,” someone decked you?”

Barry frowns but tries to look as nonchalantly as possible when he answers.

“Yes.”

A moment passes by and while he isn’t looking at the boy he can imagine just too well how he starts to grow impatient.

“So?” asks Axel again after he has failed to come forth with any actual explanation. “What happened? You got into a fight with someone?”

Barry gives the boy a slightly annoyed look.

“D-do you r-really th-think th-that’s any o-of your b-business?”

“Why not? You’re ashamed of being beaten up?” Axel scoffs and shrugs. “Shit like that happens.”

That is really not something he likes to hear from the young teen and he studies him a concerned look.

“D-does th-this h-happen t-to you a l-lot?” Barry asks carefully as he doesn’t want the kid to become upset again. To his surprise, Axel doesn’t seem all that bothered by that question, though.

“Nah, don’t worry, I’m pretty quick and know where to hit so that it hurts.”

It is a bit unsettling to think that a thirteen year old boy would know how to stand up for himself in a physical fight. Barry has never been good at that when he was Axel’s age and he usually just tried to avoid such situations, but with the kid’s temper it is most likely the opposite case for him. The teenager has made it more than obvious by now that he is someone who would go all up into another person’s face should he not like what they have to says.

It is a rather troubling notion.

“Cheeze, don’t look so worried.” Axel huffs and Barry realizes that he has kept studying him for the last minute with what must be a rather concerned expression. “I can look out for myself, you know? And me and my friends watch each other’s back, so it isn’t as if it is me against the world, alright?”

The teens seems a bit annoyed by the thought that Barry could think that he isn’t able to take care of himself and adds with some bite. “I’m not the one who looks like he has been helping out as a punching bag.”

Barry ignores the little quip and instead wants to ask him about his friends with whom he seems to stay but before he can do so, a customer comes to the counter with his purchases and he has to turn his attention to him.

The man gives him an odd look, most likely due to his swollen right cheekbone that has turned dark purple by now. He doesn’t comment on it, though, for which Barry is really glad as about every other of the customers he has had today so far tried to ask about it in one way or another or made some stupid remark.

“You want my help with restocking the shelves again?

Barry, who has watched their customer leave, turns to Axel next to him and smiles in surprised by the nice offer.

“If you’ve t-time.”

The teen shrugs.

“Sure.”

It is a bit later, about another hour till closing, when the boy tries his luck once more and asks him again what has happened.

“Wh-why are you s-so interest-ted in m-me g-getting p-punched?”

Barry give the kid a curious look but doesn’t really feel bothered by the question anymore.

“I’m not,” huffs Axel and shrugs again. “It’s just obvious that something has happened, that’s all.”

Seeing no danger telling the teen a bit about what occurred, he explains to him that someone broke into his flat and he caught him by accident. He doesn’t mention that this person wasn’t there to steal from him, though.

“Dude! You’re so fucking lucky that you’re still breathing,” Axel tells him and much to Barry’s surprise, he actually seems really concerned by what he has just learned. “I know a guy who caught a burglar by surprise as well and got beaten to death by them.”

The thought alone causes Barry to feel slightly sick but he is well aware that this could have happened to him as well. He has trouble finding any sleep at all again due to how every noise in his apartment kept him awake as his mind provided him with images of what could possibly lurk in the dark.
Also, it doesn’t exactly calm his nerves hearing Axel tell him that and he can’t help but feel concerned over the upbringing the boy has once again.

“W-watch y-you l-language,” he reminds him half-heartedly, not really sure what else to say as there isn’t really much he could do to help the kid. Axel rolls his eyes and declare that he has had enough of old people for today.

“Don’t let yourself get shot, alright?”

The teenager obviously tries to make it sound like a joke but there is this unexpected worry in his eyes again of which Barry isn’t sure what to make of. He tries not to think too much about it, though and instead gives Axel a fond smile.

“Of c-curse, wh-who w-would b-buy you your p-peanut b-bars if n-not m-me?”

“Don’t forget all that disgusting healthy stuff.” The boy gives him a cheeky grin before he takes his leave for tonight.

Barry watches Axel go and vanish into the night through the front windows of the store, as he does quite often these days.

A part of him points out that he is being extremely careless and stupid by allowing the kid to stay around seeing that it could mean a one-way ticket back to the Heights should the wrong people pick up on it and that is something he doesn’t even want to think about.

His attention is drawn back to the here and now when a young woman comes to the counter to pay and he is quite glad for the distraction.

A couple of other customers later, the store is mostly deserted other than for an older lady who seems hell-bent on memorizing all the expiring dates on their canned tuna. He goes over to offer her his assistance but she assures him that she is fine. When she notices his bruised cheek, she frowns and tells him in a very severe tone that it doesn’t pay off to be in a gang. Barry agrees and has difficulties not to chuckle over her odd piece of advice.

After the older woman is gone, the store is left empty other than for himself and Barry decides to start with the closing.

Now, with nothing else around to occupy his mind, he can’t but think back to the incident two days ago. The memory alone makes him increasingly uneasy to be all alone in the shop and he briefly feels for the little mirror in his pants pocket without thinking.

Barry knows that Sam is checking up on him, Len told him so much this morning before he left for work, and even though this calms his nerves quite a bit, he doesn’t particularly like the notion of another person following him around, especially because he doesn’t want his friends to think that he can’t take care of himself.

Still, he didn’t protest too much either as he isn’t keen on a repetition of what happened last Saturday night either and he still hasn’t learned what all of this is actually about just yet.

Point eleven o’clock he locks the doors and makes another round through the store, to make sure that everything is at its place before he grabs the cash drawer to count the money he took in today.

After finishing this, the last thing Barry does is to bring the trash out before locking the backdoor and makes his way over to the small restroom downstairs. Mrs. Ming already bid him goodnight about two hours ago but he still tries to be as quiet as possible as to not accidently alert her to how he is leaving tonight.

“Finally,” Sam greets him with a rather annoyed expression as soon as he steps in front of the mirror. “Do you’ve any idea how boring it is to watch you at work? I had to check up on you ever thirty minutes or Len would have kicked my face in and I have lost five rounds due to that. You owe me two hundred bucks, just so you know.”

Barry frowns but refrains from pointing out that he isn’t exactly ecstatic about being monitored either. He can understand that Sam isn’t happy about having to play his babysitter and he is grateful that he had someone watch his back today as it calmed his nerves quite a bit.

“Come on,” Sam says and motions him to finally start moving. “I’m in the middle of a game again and I know that Digger isn’t able to keep is damn fingers to himself with my cards around.”

“Is it ok-kay if I j-join you t-to th-the h-hideout instead of y-you g-getting m-me h-home?”

The other man gives him a slightly surprised look before he shrugs. “Sure, why not, but be warned, most of the others are on the best way to be shitfaced.”

They arrive at the hideout a moment later and while Sam makes his way back to the others to go on with his game, Barry chooses to seek out Len’s room. The headache that has followed him around for the most part of today has grown worse again and he is pretty sure that the other man wouldn’t mind if he uses his bed to rest a bit. He just needs someplace dark and quiet right now and where he knows that nobody would ambush him.

The air in the other man’s room is stuffy and Barry decides to tilt the window before he takes his coat and shoes off and lays down. He is gone in seconds.

“So, th-that g-guy is an a-assassin?”

The notion that he had an actual professional killer in his flat just a couple of days ago is quite unsettling and Barry tries not to think about what could have happened if this man had decided to give the Rogues another kind of message to make his point clear, one that would have certainly left no doubt in how serious he is.

“Well…” Lisa hesitates and glances to Len, who is leaning next to the entrance of his room, arms crossed and a rather dark expression on his face. The other man made it quite clear what he thinks of her telling Barry anything about this and it isn’t only frustrating but also quite hurtful as he hates to think that Len does trust him this little.

Lisa shoots her brother a dirty look when he keeps his silence and turns back to Barry. “Kenneth’s definitely a killer but it’s not his main occupation.”

“M-main occup-pation,” Barry repeats with a confused frown. “Wh-what is h-his m-main oc-cupation, th-then?”

The blond woman seems to think for a moment how to answer this question, tapping her index finger against her chin, before she sighs softly and leans back into the chair she is currently sitting on.

“He is a middleman for a criminal organisation,” she explains. “One we’ve had troubles for a while now. A rather nasty bunch that’s pretty hard to deal with.”
“W-what c-crimin-nal org-ganisation?”

The first person that crosses Barry’s mind is the Candyman but he has the feeling that this probably isn’t about them. Jack Monteleone has never seemed interested in starting any troubles with the Rogues in all the years he has been the Twin’s drug kingpin and instead prefers to kind of coexisted with them. Seeing that Len and the others usually keep out of his way, things have always been kind of relaxed between both parties as far as Barry can say.

Someone like the Candyman would be a dangerous enemy to have and certainly could pose quite a threat to the Rogues but seeing that both cities offer enough place for more than just a handful of criminals to make a living, there has never been any clashes, at least from what Barry is aware of, which, to be honest, isn’t that much anymore.

“The Blue Velvet,” Lisa explains with a rather dark expression that makes it quite clear what she thinks of them and Barry has utterly no idea who that could be. The only thing his brain provides him with is the memory of a movie of the same title he watched with Mary a while ago.

“Wh-who’re th-they?”

“That’s a good question,” Lisa replies with a faint smirk that seems more concerned than amused. “One we would love to know the answer to as well, believe me. They’ve been causing us trouble for over a year now and we still know next to nothing about them other that they seem to have pretty much spread through all of the Northwest.”

“So, th-they aren’t c-city b-based l-like M-Mont-teleone?”

Lisa chuckles even though it is obvious that she doesn’t find his question particularly funny. “It’s said through the grapevine that our dear Candyman has trouble with those jackasses as well and I’ve honestly no problems believing that.”

This is kind of unsettling, seeing that Monteleone has been able to claim the Twins as his own for more than three decades now and is usually quite successful at keeping other organisations out the cities’ borders. It was rumoured at the CCPD that he has pretty tight connections to a handful of very powerful crime families but it could never be proven while Barry still worked there.

The Rogues’ misfortunate trip to Russia crosses to his mind.

“D-did th-they send th-the S-suicide Squad after y-you?”

“We don’t think so.” Lisa’s expression turns sour at that memory. “This has probably really been just thanks to Digger.”

The Australian has made himself rare over the last month as Barry hasn’t seen him much around the last couple of times he came over. He never really wanted to ask about it, though, as Len still seems pretty pissed about the whole Russia thing.

“Th-they d-don’t w-want you around, th-though.”

It is a statement, not a question, and Lisa gives him an amused smirk before she nods.

“Yeah, you could say that.”

“Wh-why? C-Central C-City is b-big.”

The blond woman snorts and shrugs. “Yeah, the Twins are big and we’ve been able to share our turf with a number of bigger and smaller fishes over the years, as long as they were clever enough to not try and pick a fight with us.”

“B-but th-the B-blue B-velvet d-did?”

Her smirk vanes and her expression becomes sour once more.

“Yeah, they aren’t really keen on the idea of sharing.”

“Th-they w-want you g-gone?” Barry starts to feel slightly uneasy at the notion that a criminal organisation that is obviously powerful and dangerous enough to mess with the local kingpin tries to go after his friends.

“Not initially.” Lisa reaches up and starts to twirl a streak of her hair absentmindedly as she glances at her brother with a rather terse expression. Noticing Barry’s confused expression, she goes on. “They wanted to hire us but we told them no.”

“P-probably n-not in th-the n-nicest w-way?”

She grins and shrugs again.

“We don’t like it when others try to boss us around.”

“S-so th-they s-sent you a w-warn-ning w-with K-Kenneth?”

Oddly enough, Lisa shakes her head at that.

“No, this was a courtesy of Blacksmith.”

Confused, Barry asked who that is as he has heard this name a number of times now but still has no idea who that actually is.

“An ugly whore.” Lisa hisses and he is slightly taken aback by how venomous she sounds as she does so. His surprise is not lost on her and she explains with a slight scowl. “She runs the blackmarket around here and is a lying, backstabbing bitch you definitively don’t want to cross ways with.”

“Th-the b-blackm-market?” This piece of information is certainly not what he has expected. He hasn’t heard of any local blackmarket before now and it isn’t for the first time that he wonders how much things have changed since he stopped being the Twins’ protector.

The smile Lisa gives him in response doesn’t sit well with him, it’s both amused and slightly indulgent.

“How do you think we turn our loot into money?” she inquires. “Someone has to buy it from us.”

Well, that makes sense but he has always assumed that the Rogues would mostly sell their stolen goods outside the Twins’ borders or, in case of other criminals, go to smaller dealers for this as there is certainly no shortage of those around here.

“H-how l-long have y-you already b-been d-doing b-business w-with her?” Barry asks and tries to think of ever having heard anything of a blackmarket within the Gem Cities’ borders before but his mind comes up completely blank. He wonders whether this is one of Wally’s new rogues the younger man has to deal with these days.

“Pretty much forever,” Lisa explains and shoots her brother a glance as if for him to confirm it.
“Well, long before I started with this, anyway.”

This catches Barry off-guard and he can’t help but turn his gaze to Len as well.

The other man smirks when he notices his confusion.

“There’s a lot the police and others don’t know anything about,” Len informs him. “We’re pretty good at keeping tight about stuff that isn’t any of their business.”

Lisa gives her brother an odd look as she hasn’t expect him to suddenly break his silence before she seems to remembers than Barry indeed has been a cop once.

“Don’t feel bad about it, Barry,” she tells him and appears just as amused at his costs as her brother is, which is quite annoying even though he knows that this jibe really shouldn’t be a surprise. Lisa probably doesn’t mean anything by it but Len has been in a piss poor mood since the incident with Kenneth and the man can be a bastard when needs to get some of his frustration off.

“You cops like to believe that you actually know what’s going on in the Twins when you really have no idea,” the blond woman chuckles and Barry can feel his stomach sink at these words and his mood turn slightly depressed once again.

The notion that he didn’t really knowing his own city even back then, as he was still the Flash, doesn’t sit well with him at all.

It is a blow he hasn’t expected.

While Lisa has no idea about him having been the cities’ protector once, Len does, and he hates that that the other man steered her in this direction as it is still humiliating and painful to be reminded of what a failure he was even back then.

Still, Barry knows that it was probably supposed to be just a small jab and that Len most likely didn’t intend for it to really sting, he is just still pissed about him learning any of this.

Pity that this doesn’t make it any less hurtful…

“I’m n-not a c-cop anym-more,” he remembers Lisa quietly and he is glad to see how her amusement vanes nearly instantly.

For an uncomfortable moment, neither of them speaks.

“Well, that’s a good thing, otherwise I would have to kick your ass,” Lisa chuckles and while her smile seems a bit forced, Barry still appreciated her attempt to lift his mood.

“R-right,” he agrees and clears his voice before he tries to change the topic back to what they have initially been talking about. “H-how c-come th-that th-this B-Blacks-smith s-sent th-this K-Kenneth t-to w-warn you if h-he w-works f-for th-the B-Blue V-Velvet?”

“The Blue Velvet and Blacksmith are pretty tight these days. You trouble one and the other one will come after you as well.”

“You t-troubled th-them?” Barry watches how Lisa huffs in annoyance while she runs her fingers through her long hair before she start to twirl a strand of it around her index finger once more. He noticed by now that she seems to do this a lot when she is nervous, bored or agitated.

“It depends what you define as trouble,” she goes on with a frown. “That bitch has wanted us to join her for a couple of months now and we’ve always declined her generous offer.”

The sneer with which Lisa says that makes Barry wonder what happened between his friends and that Blacksmith person. The Rogues are generally made up of people who don’t let anybody try and push them around and should this woman have tried to do just that, he isn’t surprised that there is nothing but animosity left between them.

“Sh-she d-didn’t l-like th-that.”

“No, she didn’t,” Lisa agrees and purses her lips as she crosses her arms. “Amunet always had a delusion of grandeur and while she never liked us, she played nice because we were good for business. Now, with those jackasses of the Blue Velvet backing her up, she’s totally lost it and thinks that anybody who wants to have any place in either of the cities has to do her every bidding. Damn bitch.”

Lisa looks very much like she wants to punch someone and it isn’t hard to imagine whom she is currently picturing in her mind. When it comes to dealing with her anger, she is really a lot like her brother.

Everything of what Barry has just learned is quiet concerning as neither Len nor the other Rogues would ever back down in such a situation even if it would be the sensible thing to do. They are just too stubborn and too proud to even consider it.

Briefly, Jay comes to his mind and he wonders whether the older man knows about Blacksmith or the Blue Velvet. There is really no way that Barry could ask him or give him any information regarding this, though, as Jay would likely assume that he is somehow involved.

It is so damn frustrating…

He pushes those thoughts away and turns back to Lisa with a concerned look.

“D-do you th-think B-B-Blacksmith c-could h-harm y-you?”

It has become rather obvious that the blond woman, while she doesn’t seem to like this Blacksmith very much, seems to recognize her as a possible threat and, considering who his friends are, this is not very reassuring.

“Don’t worry, Barry, we know how to take care of ourselves.” Lisa smiles and leans forward so that she can take hold of his hand that had been resting on his knee. “I may not have been a Rogue for as long as the others are but in the years I’ve been with them we’d some rather nasty conflicts and we always were able to come out on top.”

This does calm Barry’s worries a little bit but, at the same time, he isn’t sure what she is talking about and the notion that they actually have to put up with assassins and stuff like that on a seemingly regular basis is both upsetting and concerning.

“Don’t worry your damn head off.” Len interjects in a rather gruff voice and causes Barry to look over to him. “We’re one of the biggest players in the twins, there aren’t that many who’re stupid enough to try and mess with us.”

The other man shoots Lisa a dark and warning glare as if to dare her to say otherwise. His sister rolls her eyes and gives him an annoyed look in return.

“Yes, and I didn’t mean to indicate that we’ve to deal with that shit every day but we do have to every once in a while,” she remarks drily and turns back to Barry, which causes her expression to soften a bit once more. “But he’s right, you really don’t have to worry about that. This just comes with the job and usually idiots who try to pick a fight with us are quite quick to grasp what a stupid idea that actually is.”

“But th-this w-won’t b-be th-the c-case w-with B-Blacks-smith.”

Barry watches how Lisa’s expression loses some of its warmth and while she is pretty good at covering her emotions, she is not like her brother, and he doesn’t miss the concern that briefly crosses her face.

“No,” she agrees seriously,” probably not.”

His stomach sinks at these words and Barry realizes what an idiot he has been to let himself forget about all the trouble the Rogues have to deal with that doesn’t include speedsters.

Neither Central City nor Keystone City are anything like Gotham or Chicago but they too do have a distinct criminal body. Most people don’t really realize that, though, due to how bright the cities generally seem and with the speedsters around to protect them.

A big part is probably also that most criminals prefer to stay under the radar and the media thus mostly only picks up on people like the Rogues or Rainbow Raider or anyone else who decides to dawn a sometimes pretty gaudy looking costume.

Barry, while not unaware of this, has always assumed that Len and the others are mostly left alone by the general criminal population as they do provide a very good distraction and, despite what they may look like at the first glance, are damn dangerous to mess with.

“Barry, you really don’t have to worry about us, we can take care of us but it isn’t the same for you,” Lisa points out seriously and while he knows that she is just saying the obvious, he can’t help but feel a bit insulted by it.

He tries to ignore his hurt ego, though, as should Kenneth turn up in his doorway again, there is probably nothing he can do to protect himself. With how messed up his body is right now, he could hardly stand his own against anybody, let alone a huge buff guy like that who looks like he could squash his head with his bare hands.

“I kn-know,” he agrees quietly,” b-but th-there isn’t m-much I c-can d-do about th-that.”

His speed is gone and while he knows how to fight, he is in no shape to do so. It is both, humiliating and depressing.

“Don’t look so damn crestfallen.” Lisa sounds annoyed and gives him a slightly irked glare. “We’ll look out for you, stupid. You really think we’ll let those jackasses get to you?”

Her words are both surprising and touching and he isn’t sure how to reply to this so that he stays quiet instead.

Len, who has been watching them quietly so far, steps away from the wall and makes his way over to his bed, where Barry is currently sitting.

Barry watches him with a mixture of confusion and slight apprehension as the other man still seems tensed and in a bad mood and he isn’t sure what to expect.

“Here.” Len offers him a small round mirror that isn’t even the size of his palm and it looks very similar to the one Barry has gotten from him months ago.
“Ano-th-er m-mirror?” He frowns and turns his eyes back to Len in confusion. The other man only nods.

“Yes, an upgraded version of the one you’ve now.”

“Up-g-grad-ed?” Barry moves his attention back to the small object that is still offered to him and he has failed to accept so far. He frowns and can’t say that he likes the sound of that. “In wh-what w-way?”

It doesn’t surprise him when Len makes a rather exasperated noise and grumbles under his breath that he is always so damn suspicious.

“It can get you to our current hideout in an instant without Sam needing to pick you up.”

“Wh-what? H-how?”

“How the hell should I know? Ask Scudder if you want a lecture on it,” Len tells him sharply and his agitation is nearly palpable for a moment, so much so that it causes Barry to cringe.

A tense moment passes in which he keeps his eyes focus on the ground and tries to not to feel so damn intimidated by Len’s presence alone.

“Really?” Lisa asks in exasperation and while he isn’t looking at her, he knows that she is talking to her brother.

“Just take the mirror,” Len tells him once again and this time there is no anger left in his voice, only weariness. “It’s safe.”

Barry very much doubts that but he holds his tongue and instead turns his gaze to the mirror that is still offered to him. Without looking at Len, he takes it and mutters a small thanks.

“You just have to grab it and say mirror, spiegel, speculum. That should do the job,” the other man explains before he abruptly turns around and leaves the room without another word.

Confused and slightly hurt, Barry watches him go.

“Don’t take it personal.” Lisa gives him a faint but comforting smile. “He may act though and all but the whole situation with Blacksmith and the Blue Velvet has him very much on edge. Especially after Kenneth has turned up at your place like that.”

She touches the back of his hand again.

“He’s horrible at showing it but he’s really worried about you. He didn’t want to tell you anything because he thought that this would somehow protect you.” Lisa scoffs at that notion and pulls her hand back to rub her forehead.

“He’s such an idiot at times.” With a soft sigh, she gets up. “But it’s hard to stay angry with him for too long when you realize that he actually tries to do the right thing. Even if it is in his little awry way.”

Barry stays quiet as he understands what she is saying but it still doesn’t sit well with him. Len can be so damn complicated at times, making him feel safe and just plain good at one moment and hitting him over the head with what a jerk he can be the next.

It is confusing and exhausting.
“I think you should rest a bit more, you still look like a raccoon with those dark shadows under your eyes,” Lisa suggests and Barry nods in agreement even though he doesn’t really want to be left alone with his thought right now. She seems to notice as she steps close to him again and meets his concerned gaze. “Len isn’t angry at you and he’s probably already feeling like an ass for how he’s behaved just now. I know it sounds like I’m making excuses for him but he really is under a lot of stress and the one thing that worries him the most is that you could get somehow hurt due to this messed up situation.”

Barry purses his lips, still not really happy with the situation, but nods and tries to find some comfort in knowing that Lisa is probably right.

“Ok-kay.”

Chapter End Notes

Hope you enjoyed the chapter! :)

It is very heavy on the talking part but there was a lot to touch upon and I hope that it was still enjoyable for you.

There will be another interlude between next chapter and the one after that as it has been pointed out to me that Barry really never gets a break and I want to do something about it. ;) It will be Len heavy again as well and he can hopefully make up for how he has behaved towards Barry in this one.

Also, next chapter will introduce another big character from the comics. So looking forward to that one. :3 Though, it will be a rather sad and emotional one again, just so you’re warned. ;)

Bonus Chapter: Barry’s Past – A Brief (?) Overview

Chapter Summary

Barry's life before Singularity.

Chapter Notes

WARNING: There are lots of possible triggers in this chapter like brief mentions of rape, severe physical and psychological abuse, depression and suicidal thoughts! Please do not read if any of this could be harmful to you in any way!

AN (please read this as you’ll probably end up confused otherwise):

I’ve decided to change the order in which I’m going to upload the next couple of chapters a bit by working this one in. It’s kind of an overview of what had happened in Barry’s life before Singularity started.

Also, this chapter is not written in the same style as the rest of this story!

It’s actually a revision of my latest version of plot layouts I use/used for this story. I dismissed my initial idea of starting this story sometime before Barry gets out of prison but everything in this chapter still took place in his life before Singularity, just not everything is going to be reverenced later on, so you can see is as a source for some bonus information. :)

As this is a revision of plot outlines, it mostly consists of shorter passages and sentences with no direct speeches, as it summarized what occurred in Barry’s life in about 33 years in one (long) chapter.

I’m not going into great detail with every plot point I touch upon and not all of them are really that important as some were just meant to help me organize the timeline. I will go into more detail with the ones that are important for the story in future chapters, this here is really just to give you a rough idea of what took place before Singularity.

I hope that this will give you a better sense of what’s going on and help you to understand some things form the chapters so far that may still are unclear to you.

Also, some things you read here may seem a bit confusing and/or odd but there is a reason behind everything that’s happened to Barry and how people interact with him and it will be explained in future.

Anyway, I thought you could like this little bonus chapter and next up will be the chapter I’ve initially intended to upload today. :)

I’m sorry for this longwinded introduction but I will leave you go on to the story in just a moment, I just still need to mention that this chapter hasn’t been edited but I hope there aren’t too many glaring error left despite of that.
Barry’s parent vanish when he is six.

+

He’s put into Central City’s Little Flowers’ Aid orphanage after the authorities aren’t able to find any recordings of the his parents by the names he provides and thus no other relatives who could possibly take him in.

Barry spends most of his days there alone, missing his parents and feeling overwhelmed by suddenly being put into such an alien environment with so many other kids of whom many are older than him. The other children quickly start to avoid him seeing that they’re convinced that he makes bad things happen.

He stays there for three months, his only companion and source of comfort is his little plush bunny Mr. Bunny he got from his mother.

+

Barry is put into his first foster home that consists of a family with two other foster kids. He quickly learns to miss the orphanages as he starts to get beaten on a regular basis by the mother who doesn’t seem to have any love or patience left for any of her foster children. The father is next to never around and Barry talks to him only a handful of times.

He stays there for four months before he is sent back to the orphanage, not knowing what he did wrong.

+

In his second foster family, he is the only foster kid there but they have two biological children, two girls, who are already in their teens and mostly ignore him.

The foster father, John, is very nice to him, though, and spends a lot of his free time playing with him and doing fun stuff, while his foster mother doesn’t seem to like him very much, even though he tries his best to be good.

After the first two weeks, his foster father starts to join him in the tub during his bath times, which Barry finds great at first as they play pirates and other funny games with the handful of toy figures one of the older girls has handed down to him.

Then, one night, John tells Barry that he wants to teach him a very special and secret game, which he isn’t allowed to tell the others about because this would cause them to get envious. Barry isn’t sure what to think of the new game, it’s confusing and scares him a bit, especially because he doesn’t like the taste or being touched in that way but the notion of going back to the orphanage and being put into another host family like his first one scares him even more and he tries to be good and doesn’t complain.

He starts to dread the times alone with his foster father.

This goes on for nearly a year before his foster mother catches them playing the secret game one night.

He is sent back to the orphanage once again.
Barry goes through a number of foster families over the next couple of years and his streak of bad luck holds on over that time as he’s either physically or sexually abused and sometimes both. He doesn’t like being touched by others any longer and starts to develop a bad stammer, which makes school another source of misery for him as his classmates keep making fun of his odd way of speaking and how poor he looks.

When Barry is nine, he confesses to a very nice young teacher about what is happening to him at home. She has always been very kind to him, letting him stay inside during the breaks so that he wouldn’t get bullied and even sharing her lunch with him on occasion. He secretly wishes that she would decide to be his new foster mother.

The teacher promises to help him and for a very short while Barry is convinced that things would get better.

She does nothing in the end, though, and she avoids him from then on till she transfers to another school a month later.

Barry doesn’t talk to other people about his home life after that.

At eleven, Barry is put into the care of a couple who are already looking after four other foster children. He has a very difficult time there as he is once again abused by the father while the mother keeps verbally abusing him and ridicules him for his stammer and the fact that he still wets his bed at nights when his nightmares are especially bad.

Most of the older foster children don’t seem to like him much either, as they are put to look after him for most of the time but after the first two months there, he actually befriends the family’s oldest foster son, Albert.

He stays there for about two years before he has to leave again.

Finally he ends up with his last foster family, which consists of a Keystone City cop as his new dad, who tends to drink too much and generally has a horrible temper, a foster mother that seems to live in her own word for most of the time and hardly seems to take notice of him or the two younger foster children. It isn’t exactly perfect there but while Barry still gets regularly beaten, he is no longer sexually abused.

He ends up being the one who takes care of his younger foster siblings when he realizes that his new foster mother couldn’t care less whether there is something to eat for them on the table or whether their clothes are clean.

He endures the rest of his early teenage years in this finally last of a long series of broken homes and despite everything going on at home, he is able to keep his grades up in in school as he is desperate to get a scholarship and finally be able to move out.

In the end, he finish high school as the top of his class.
The older Barry gets, the more time he spends out of the house, often staying at nearby trailer park overnight when his foster father becomes too much to bear, which is nearly all the time now that his wife has left, and only really just comes home anymore to look after his foster siblings.

Barry is offered a scholarship for the CCU, which he gladly accepts and moves onto campus.

His stutter starts to get better with time and while he keeps mostly to himself, he is generally friendly to the other students of his house.

Barry is still bewildered when it doesn’t take long for him to find a group of people he feels comfortable with and, which is even more difficult for him to grasp, seem to like having him around. He thinks that it’s probably mainly due to his roommate Simon, who is a few years older than him and studies psychology.

The kind older teenager seems to suspect that his shyness and constant jumpiness is connected to something bad that occurred to him in his past and tries to talk about it a couple of times. Barry always blocks him off, not willing to go back there even if it was just in his mind.

It is towards the end of his first year of university that Barry meets Len for the first time.

His friends drag him to a party in one of the more shabby areas that Central City has to offer so that they can celebrate that they successfully survived their first two semesters. While he takes a break outdoors from the too crowded place with his eyes stinging from all the smoke and his head hurting from the too loud music, he witnesses how a young man, who’d later become the infamous Captain Cold, is beaten up by some thugs in a nearby alley.

Barry comes up to him after the other men left to ask him whether he’s alright or needs any help. Len is in an understandably bad mood and brusquely tells Barry to fuck off before limping off into the night.

Barry meets another boy in his late teens during an excursion to Gotham when someone tries to mug him in the afternoon during which he and the other students got time off to go and explore the City for themselves. He was unlucky enough to lose his group in a nearby mall despite their professors warning, ending up in this unlucky situation.

The mugging does end with a bloody nose for the thug, who threatened him with a knife, before the man takes off, cursing both of them in quite a colourful language.

Barry is left with the strange teenager who likely saved him from being stabbed to death.

The dark-haired young man, who is wearing plain washed-out jeans, a grey hoody and dark sunglasses, asks him whether is alright but he feels so flabbergasted by what has just happened, that he can only nod.

Before his nameless saviour can take off, Barry is able to find his voice again, though, and thanks him before introducing himself. The other boy hesitates before he does the same, giving him the name Matches Malone, which, Barry thinks, is quite an unusual sounding name, more fitting for a gangster in some old mob movie than a person in real life.

Barry, who isn’t really that good with new people under the best of circumstances, is uncertain about how to thank the other man for his help. Matches is about to move on when Barry forces himself to speak and asks him to wait a second. He rips a piece of paper off his notebook to scribble down his email address before he hands it to the other man and tells him to contact him should he ever pass by the Twins.

It is on his way back to Central City as he looks through one the other student’s gossip magazines they’ve picked up in Gotham that he realizes whom he’s actually met that day.

+

Against his expectations, he receives a mail a couple of days later from Matches, asking him something related his studies, which creeps him out a bit as he’s never mentioned to the man what he’s doing.

+

Despite Barry’s initial wariness, they stay in sporadic contact over the following years.

+

Barry develops an interest in forensic science and decides to major in it.

+

His stammering finally subsides enough that it hardly bothers him anymore these days.

+

Simon invites him along to a trip to an air show in Coast City, where he meets a young man while he and his friends are talking about one of the jets.

The stranger, a recruit of the Airforce judging by his clothes, more or less butts into their conversation and starts to tell them all the pros and cons of the model they are currently looking at.

Simon and the guy, who introduces himself as Hal, hit it right off, while Barry stays back, feeling a bit intimidated by the rather loud fellow and soon takes his leave to look around alone.

+

During his last semester at university, Barry meets Iris while attending a police ball he got dragged to by Simon. There is an instant connected between them and he agrees to meet her again for coffee next Saturday.

+

After graduating with honours, Barry is hired as a forensic scientist for the CCPD.

+

Simon moves to Canada.
Barry doesn’t stay the newest CSI for long as a young woman, Patty Spivot, joins their team just a couple of months later. The both of them become very good friends in next to no time.

Barry is invited along to a dinner at Iris’ brother’s home, where he meets Wally for the first time. He immediately takes a liking to the small shy boy. Unfortunately, he can’t say as much about the kid’s father.

Barry and Iris engage.

Barry is 24.

Wally is 11.

A freak accident happens in the laboratory late one night as Barry works over a Cold Case when he is hit by lightning and showered in a shelves full of deadly chemicals.

The second Flash is born.

His new powers freak him out to no end and he calls in sick for the next two weeks.

Iris comes over when she has enough of him telling her that he has a really bad flue and she should stay away from him for six days straight as she senses that he is lying and in trouble.

He confides in her what has happened.

His fear of her reacting as badly to his powers as he did turns out to be unfounded and he can’t help but adore her for how understandable and comforting she is.

Barry starts to try and help people at nights after work, still very unconvinced that he could ever really be a hero like the Flash even with having powers like his.

Barry and Iris marry.

He confronts his first real villain, a man who calls himself the Turtle Man and whose powers are just outright bizarre. Iris finds his narration of the whole event quite funny, though.
His relationship with Patty starts to become strained, mostly due to her being aware that he is hiding something from her as he still isn’t certain whether he should tell her about him being the Flash or not.

+

Barry meets Captain Cold for the first time. His initial impression is that the other man is a damn annoyance with his odd sense of humour and his seemingly compulsive need to make stupid puns.

+

Barry and Iris start trying for a baby.

It quickly becomes palpable that he has problems to sleep with her on a more regular basis, which worries and embarrasses him to no end but he feels a bit better when Iris stays patient and kind and doesn’t get angry over it like he feared she would.

+

Barry meets Jay Garrick for the first time during one of his fights as the Flash. He can’t help but feel awed by meeting his favourite childhood hero and quickly starts to look up to the actual man even more.

+

Barry is 25.

Wally is 12.

+

Barry starts to get concerned about his nephew’s home life. He doesn’t like his brother in law very much and sees the typical signs of abuse whenever he is around either Wally or his mother.

He tries to talk to Iris about it but she asks him to let it be for now and promises that Rudolf is already working on it. She suggests to get Wally over more often, though.

+

Barry and Patty go to a conference in Chicago. A bombing happens there and Patty finds out that Barry is the Flash. She is quite pissed about having been lied to for so long but agrees to keep his secret.

Their relationship starts to warm up again.

+

Mirror Master appears for the first time, robbing a bank and Barry is glad when Jay joins them a bit into their fights as he can seriously use his help to beat this guy.

After delivering the criminal at the police station, Jay invites Barry over for some coffee. Barry hopes that he doesn’t look as giddy as he feels when he accepts.

+

Barry goes to Gotham to assist one of his seniors with a case, apparently as some favour the old man is doing a friend at the GCPD.

During a hostage situation at a nearby children’s hospital, he meets the Batman for the first time and it doesn’t even take five minutes for either of them to realize who’s under the other’s mask.

+

Barry meets Ralph Dibney, the Elongated Man, while working on a murder case. They become good friends over the next couple of months as they start to assist each other whenever the opportunity presents itself.

+

Heat Wave appears for the first time.

Barry can’t help but notice a theme there when it comes to his villains, which is both bizarrely amusing and quite worrying.

+

Barry and Rudolf get into a heated argument during the Christmas party at the West’s, which results in Wally being no longer allowed to stay at his uncle’s and aunt’s house.

Iris is angry but doesn’t really blame Barry.

He still feels horrible about the whole situation.

+

Barry has some more encounters with Captain Cold. The confrontations become more challenging as the other man has started to improve his Cold Gun but, even so, Barry can’t help but notice that he actually starts to enjoy their confrontations despite the criminal’s rather lame sense of humour.

+

Barry meets Green Lantern when Dr Polaris turns up in Central City and they’ve to team up to defeat him.

+

Ralph and Sue come over for dinner.

Barry and Iris befriends the other couple and they start to meet up more often.

+

Barry is 26.

Wally is 13.

+

The Pied Piper has his debut.

+

A few months after the disastrous Christmas dinner, Wally calls Barry late one night.
He sounds terrified and is hardly able to get a word out as he doesn’t seem able to stop crying.

Barry runs over to the Wests’ home and finds the boy in a really badly beaten state with his nose broken and his whole face badly bruised. He can’t find either of his parents and decides to bring the kid to the hospital.

Iris horrified by what happened to Wally but she is still concerned about her brother and her sister in law and asks Barry to look for them. He does so, looking all over the Twins, but comes up with nothing.

It seems to him as if they’ve simply vanished, which is nearly like an earie repetition of what happens to him as a child. He doesn’t mention this to his wife when he returns to the hospital an hour later.

Wally can’t clear up the mystery around the disappearance of his parents either as his father seemed to have suddenly gone crazy and beaten him badly enough that he lost conscious for a short period of time.

+

Wally is taken to child service. Barry and Iris immediately decide that they would take him in.

+

The Justice League of America is born when Barry and a handful of other heroes team up to defeat the white Martian Blanx.

+

Barry and Iris get custody over Wally.

+

Barry and Iris go to a gynaecologist as their trial for getting pregnant has stayed unsuccessfully so far.

The doctor can find no medical reason and suggest to give it time and for them to concentrate on Wally in the meantime, which both of them agree to be probably the best thing to do.

+

He starts to work together with the other superheroes on a more regular basis over the next month, which results in him getting to know many of them pretty well and becoming very good friends with Hal of all people.

+

Gorilla Grodd turns up in Central City for the first time and even with Jay at Barry’s side it is difficult for both of them to keep that crazy ape from hurting civilians. His ankle is broken severely enough that he is forced to take a short break from crime fighting business.

+

Wally has problems to connect with other children in his new school. Barry spent a lot of his free time with the kid, working with him on smaller science projects or visiting the comic book store close to the CCPD.
They also spend quite some time at the Garricks’ home as Wally likes the nice old couple and enjoys it greatly when Jay and he do some smaller experiments in the basement laboratory.

+

Barry is 27.

Wally is 14.

+

A year goes by.

+

Barry is 28.

Wally is 15.

+

Barry enjoys working with the JLA and other heroes in general and ends up becoming good friends with Black Canary. Unfortunately it isn’t the same for him and Green Arrow and he mostly stays away from the Star City hero.

+

Wally meets Dick for the first time during a short holiday break the three of them spend in Gotham.

+

Barry starts to get the impression Iris is distancing herself from him.

The fights between them start to become something frequent in their home.

+

Wally gets his powers by a repetition of the freak accident that gave Barry his own.

+

A few months later, Wally becomes Kid Flash.

+

Barry and Patty start spending more time with each other.

+

Barry gets accused of slouching during his investigations at work.

Director Singh and he start to clash with each other on a regular basis regarding this.

Barry doesn’t understand how these mistakes during his investigations can happen as he’s working as attentively as ever.

+
Barry encounters Captain Boomerang for the first time.

+

Wally starts to behave strange. Barry gets concerned about it but the boy does not want to talk with him about whatever is troubling him.

+

Barry and Iris relationship starts to become increasingly tenser over time.

Iris seems to be angry with him and while he can’t be sure, he thinks that she starts to give him the fault for them still not having kids of their own yet as, while he loves to be with her and cuddle, it has started to become more difficult for him to have sex with her due to the nearly constant fighting that is going on between them these days.

Her seemingly thinning patience only makes it more difficult, though, and in turn lets her grow more frustrated.

+

Both Joan and Jay notices that something is wrong the next time Barry comes over to the Garricks’ for some coffee. They ask him about it but thankfully leave it be when it becomes apparent how little he wants to talk about it.

Before he leaves, Jay reminds him that he could come talk to him whenever he needs an open ear. It is a kind offer but Barry knows that he couldn’t bring himself to do so. He trusts the other man but some things he simply can’t share.

+

The Flash and Kid Flash fight the Top.

+

Barry goes on a number of missions with the Justice League and enjoys having people around he can really connect to and something to take his mind off the problems he has in his private life at for a while.

+

Barry turns 29.

Wally is 16.

+

His relationship with his colleagues in the lab becomes tenser when the mistakes he supposedly makes grow in number and become more frequent, finally resulting in a rapist and murderer getting on free foot.

He is suspended from work for two weeks.

Patty supports him through this and believes him when he tells her that he isn’t responsible for this.

+
Barry confesses to Bruce about the problems in his private and working life.

He starts to spend more time in Gotham, helping with patrolling.

+

Barry and Iris have a bad fight after she accuses him of not taking their marriage serious enough. She leaves for the night and stays at a friend’s place.

Wally doesn’t take the fight well and runs off to Gotham to stay with Dick at Wayne Manor.

Barry and Iris have a long talk the next day and while the tension doesn’t entirely leave, things calm down again after he promised to invest more time in them.

+

Barry gets back to work and things seem to look up again.

+

The Rouges team up and pull their first heist.

Barry, not prepared to face off against all of them at once, is able to catch the Pied Piper and Heat Wave but the rest is able to escape with their loot.

He feels like an idiot.

+

His work with the JLA takes some setback due to him wanting to spend more time with his family.

+

Iris and he start to work out at least some of the problems of their relationship and she confesses that she’s just frustrated because she’s still not pregnant regardless their efforts but assures him that she doesn’t hold it against him.

She encourages Barry to spend some more time with the League and at work.

+

Wally becomes a member of the Teen Titans.

He starts to avoid staying at home and instead spends more time at the Teen Titans’ base, which doesn’t go unnoticed by Barry.

+

Barry tries to confront Wally about his odd behaviour, growing increasingly worried about him, and while the boy reacts with an unsettling aggression towards him, he is able to get him to agree that he will spend more time with him and Iris again, in the end.

Barry believes Wally’s strange behaviour is due to him still not being over his parents’ disappearance.

+
For a time things return to something close to normal.

+

_Barry turns 30 years._

_Wally is 17._

+

Barry helps Batman with developing a new operating system for their headquarters at the Watchtower. During a break, they start to throw different ideas for ways to deal with future villains around and while doing so touch upon the topic of his own powers and possible ways to stop them.

+

Once again, Barry and Iris start to grow farther and farther apart over the following months, which causes a nagging concern to nestle and stay in the back of his mind.

+

Wally’s problems at in school increase and he starts to distant himself from Barry again as well.

+

The Justice League fight the Injustice League. Vandal Savage gets involved and Barry is hit with some kind of tranquilizer that represses his speed.

It does take nearly two weeks before he is able to access the speed fore again without feeling pain doing so.

+

Bruce and he start to look into the nanotechnology that has been used to supress his speed.

+

During another fight with the Rogues, Captain Cold and he smash through one of Mirror Master’s portals by accident and land somewhere on the Keystone City docks.

Barry has still not completely recovered from his fight with the Injustice League and has problems maintaining his speed. He and Captain Cold end up grappling at the ground and not for the first time he picks up that there is an odd new kind of tension between them he doesn’t understand and that doesn’t seem purely hero-villain based anymore.

This realisation unsettles him enough that he lets Cold get away without putting up much of a fight as he is just glad to have the other man no longer so close.

+

Troubles arise at work again and he gets suspended for the second time.

+

Barry joins Hal to fight an alien crime lord. Hal gets too cocky and is put under the alien’s spell, causing him to attack Barry and thus giving the criminal an opportunity to escape.
Frustrated, Barry accuses Hal of taking his position as Green Lantern not series enough, which clearly angers the other man, who in return reminds Barry of his own problems at work and home. Both of them part ways in anger.

+

Barry comes home earlier from work than usual, as he wants to try and talk to Iris about how rocky their relationship has become once again and maybe take her out to dinner afterwards.

He finds her having sex with another man in their bedroom.

Barry is deeply hurt and furious and just needs to run.

He has an odd experience while in the speed force and afterwards…

+

Patty stands up for him in front of the department when he is once again chewed out by Singh, which end in a heated confrontation between both.

Barry is temporary transferred from the forensic team. His new task is to clear out the attic and transfer the old paper folders into digital form.

+

Barry feels that he is losing Iris but can’t bring himself to tell her that he knows about her having sex with another man. He doesn’t think that he has the right to complain or even feel hurt after what he did.

She doesn’t spent much time at home anymore, pinning it on work.

+

They stop arguing, they hardly interact at all anymore and Barry feels a still faintly familiar depression slowly take hold of him again.

+

Wally starts to outright rebel against Barry, disobeying his orders during their fights against villains, not coming home after school and staying out till long after his curfew.

It worries Barry and he doesn’t know what to do as trying to talk to the teen seems to only make it worse.

+

Barry confides to Bruce about it as he hopes the other man would maybe know more seeing that his nephew spends most of his free time in the manor these days.

Bruce appears strangely distant to Barry but does not seem overly concerned by Wally’s behaviour.

+

Barry turns 31 years.
Barry confronts Iris about her affair after one of his colleges made a few crude comments about having seen her with another man the other evening.

They have another fight and Barry leaves angry and hurt.

He runs to…

… Len finds out about his secret identity.

Barry threatens to break every bone in his body should he ever use this knowledge against any of the people who are dear to him.

Barry tries to talk to Iris the next day but she seems scared of him and does not want to talk to him.

Barry has a strange encounter with Black Canary and Green Arrow. Both seem hostile towards him.

He and Patty meet that night and he confesses to her that he does not know what is happening to him anymore.

Everything in his life seems to turn out horribly wrong and he has no idea why.

She hugs him and assures him that things will turn out alright.

After the meeting with Patty, Barry runs through the city for a while, trying to clear his head before he returns home to find that someone’s broken into his house.

A feeling of numbing terror overcomes him as he enters and finds Iris dead in the kitchen.

The police arrives and he is arrest.

Barry learns that the other Justice League members actually believe that he has murdered his wife and, to his utter horror, also sexually abused Wally. They also accuse him of giving crucial information about them away to criminals.

It is ridiculous and he doesn’t understand how they could ever even consider this to be true.

Wonder Women uses the lasso on him and he is unable to answer the questions about his connections to the crimes truthfully, instead confesses his own guilty. It’s the same when J’onn reads his mind.
He desperately begs the others to believe him that he is innocent and while both Hal and Ralph stand up for him, they cannot convince any of the other heroes.

+

He is stripped of his powers by the nanotechnology he has been working on with Bruce before he is sent to Iron Heights.

++*

Barry doesn’t fit in with the other prisoners and ends up being used as a punching bag by most of them due to being a former cop and an alleged child abuser.

The guards turn a blind eye on this.

+

One of these guards, Michael Cadwell, takes an interest in Barry and it isn’t long before he takes him to separated holding cells for the first time. There he slaps him around for a bit, talking down on him in a demeaning manner before he forces him to strip while watching.

It creeps Barry out how much this man seems to enjoy scaring and humiliating him.

+

Barry is in constant pain due to the nanobots in his system supressing his connection to the speed force. It hinders his movement and makes it next to impossible for him to defend himself, which is used by the other inmates to have their fun with him.

+

Ralph visits and promise to look into Barry’s case. He tells him that he and Sue believe in him and that Hal would have come as well but that he had to leave earth because of some urgent business with the Green Lanterns.

+

Wally becomes the Flash.

+

Captain Cold, Captain Boomerang and the Trickster are put into Iron Heights.

+

Len avoids Barry.

+

Ralph’s visits become less over the next couple of months and they stays in contact mostly via letters.

+

The Rogues break out.
Barry turns 32 years.

Wally turns 19 years.

+

Barry starts to work in the laundry rooms.

+

The other prisoners bully him and cause him a number of stays in the infirmary over the next months. The guards are not much better due to him being an ex-cop who supposedly did horrible things to his wife and nephew.

+

Captain Cold, Heatwave and Weather Wizard are put back into the Heights again.

+

Barry has no more visitors.

+

One evening during his laundry duty a group of inmates are ganging up on him. They want his sexual service but before it can go too far they are stopped by Len, who is working there as well this evening.

He threatens them, making it clear that they would regret it shouldn’t they leave Barry alone. Due to Mick and Marco also being present, the men back off without putting up much of a fight but tell Barry that his \textit{bodyguards} cannot be around all the time.

Len and the other Rogues go back to work without another word to Barry.

+

The Rouges break out of Iron Heights again.

+

Ralph’s letters stop.

+

A year goes by like painfully slow flowing morass.

For Barry it’s a time filled with pain, humiliation, depression, loneliness and the waning hope of ever getting out of here again. His stutter returns with full force.

+

Barry tries to contact some of his former friends and family as he grows increasingly desperate after…

+
Jay visits.

He seems angry but also doubtful about the whole situation.

They talk for a bit but Barry cannot explain what happened that evening when Iris got murdered or how the Wonder Woman’s lasso could have forced him to lie or why J’onn thought he read in his mind that he’s guilty.

Jay becomes concerned during their talk and asks him whether he is treated alright.

Barry does not want to tell him about his abuse and before he can really answer anything a guard appears to get him back to his cell.

Jay tells Barry he will come by again.

+

Michael brings another guard along for the first time while raping and abusing Barry. His name is Charles Puckett and Barry quickly learns that he is just as cruel as the other guard is.

They start to fetch him nearly every time either of them is around, making it impossible for him to properly rest due to either actively keeping in up at night or due to the nightmares their little sessions cause him.

+

+

Barry turns 34.

+

The Pied Piper is put into the Heights.

+

Barry befriends Hartley after he saves him from getting his head smashed in with a chair by another inmate during a small riot.

+

Hartley gets out again with the help of the other Rogues just few days later.

+

Barry feels very isolated and alone.

+

He learns that Hal died and becomes so depressed that he can’t eat anything for days afterwards.

+

His third year in prison starts.

+

Barry is put to work in the kitchen, which is something he is very grateful for as it is an area where other inmates couldn’t abuse him as easily.
A fight breaks out during a baseball match and he gets badly hurt by Jeremy Tell, Double Down.

It takes him a while to recover as his wounds heal extraordinarily slow these days.

+

Barry turns 35.

+

Ralph and Sue visit for the first time in over two years.

They both are extremely worried by his gaunt appearance and how scared he seem. They apologize for not having come by earlier and promise him that they would get him out.

Barry notices how guilty and oddly tense both of them seem.

+

The Trickster, Heat Wave and Mirror Master are sent back to prison again.

+

To Barry’s surprise and suspicions, James starts to try and befriend him.

+

His forth year starts.

+

Barry’s cooking gets quite popular with the other inmates and he is allowed to keep his shifts in the kitchen.

+

The bullying of the other inmates decreases over the next weeks and Barry thinks this is due to the Rogues being present but when he finally brings himself to ask James about it, the other blonde does as if he has no idea what he’s talking about.

Barry starts to like the younger man after having initially been wary of him.

+

The Top joins the other Rogues in prison.

+

Due to his growing friendship with James, Barry starts to spend more time with the other Rogues. Next to the Trickster, he gets along surprisingly well with Sam of all people.

+

The Rogues break out while Barry is having one of his sessions with Michael.
The other prisoners start to increase their bullying again.

Ralph visits again. He tries not to show it but Barry understands that there is probably nothing that would prove him to be innocent. They part with his friend telling him not to give up.

Barry gets a surprise visit from Simon.

His old friend believes in Barry’s innocent and promises to look into it.

Barry does not want Simon to get involved. He thinks that someone very dangerous has to cause this if they were able to manipulate both J’onn’s telepathy and Wonder Woman’s lasso of truth.

Barry turns 36.

Wally appears as the Flash in his cell one afternoon after bringing Murmur into the prison.

He punches Barry before shoving him up against the wall, clearly furious. He warns him to stay away from him and his family and to write no more letters.

Barry, who has no idea what Wally is talking about and, desperate for the abuse he has to endure to finally end, begs him to believe him and help him. He does not say outright that he is abused but Wally seems to understand because he tells him coldly he deserves every minutes he gets before disappearing again.

His fifth year starts.

A few months go by.

Sue Dibney dies.

Barry is not allowed to attend the funeral.

Wonder Woman comes to interrogate him about his potential involvement in what will later be dubbed as the Identity Crisis by the news.

She treats him like any other criminal.
Ralph Dibney dies.

+

Barry starts to consider suicide.

It has been a long time since that thought came to his mind last but has still the same bitter allure as back then.

+

Captain Cold, Mirror Master, Weather Wizard and the Top are brought in.

+

Barry problems with sleeping grow worse and he’s hardly able to catch more than two to three hours a night.

+

Barry is beckoned by Sam to join them at their table during meals.

Seeing that neither James nor Hartley are around, he hesitates but as he usually sits alone and is shut out by the other inmates, he agrees somewhat warily after a moment.

Len watches him the whole time but does not take part of the conversation. It’s unsettling and sets Barry’s teeth on edge.

Roscoe seems to appreciate his knowledge when it comes to science but is also reserved due to Barry’s past as a cop and his crimes.

+

Barry is mostly left alone by the other inmates.

+

Michael’s and Puckett’s treatments of him grow worse and he starts to get panic attacks while being abused.

It results in his perception to change at times when he is under a lot of stress. It’s like he starts to be able to think faster than be people around him again, which causes seconds to turn into what feels like minutes or even hours.

+

Barry spends most of his time with the Rouge whenever they’re around as the other inmates leave him alone in their presence. He is surprised that he gets along with them so well and starts to feel guilty for it. He tries not to think about the fact that they regularly fight Wally.

+

Len finds him one evening during laundry duty.

They talk for a while and Len tells him that he doesn’t believe that Barry could have done those crimes. He offers to take him with them the next time they break out.
Barry thinks about it but declines in the end.

The Rogues break out.

Barry turns 37 years.

Barry is left mostly alone as the other criminals seem to prefer to avoid him these days.

Simon passes by again. He tells Barry that he has a friend who has looked into his case and thinks that he can help him to possibly get an amnesty due to the lack of any actual evidence and Barry’s good behaviour or, in the very least, reduce the verdict from second degree murder to manslaughter, which would reduce the length of his sentences considerably and make a parole possible.

Barry thanks him but doubts the possibility of it.

The sixth year starts.

Michael and Puckett to bring a couple of other guards along when humiliating Barry these days.

Michael in particular has also started to take a liking to marking his territory, as he calls it, enjoying to cut Barry or burn him with cigarettes during their little sessions.

Piper and Captain Boomerang are put back into prison.

Hartley realizes, that he is being abused when he notices the fresh scars while they are in the showers. Barry denies everything and gets so worked up about this that he isn’t able to talk at all. Piper promises him to leave it alone and to not tell anybody about it, probably knowing as much as Barry does that this would hardly help much as anybody who shared the shower room with him will notice them.

The Trickster joins them.

Barry starts to realize that James is also treated very badly by the guards but mostly in a psychological way.

They tend to lock him into one of the small dark isolation cells for the smallest things, especially when the blonde disturbs them during the night due to having nightmares. This, unfortunately, happens on a rather regular basis as he is afraid of the dark and they don’t allow any lights on in his cells after ten pm.

Barry talks to Hartley about this and the other man explains to him that James has actually been put on medications a while ago due to hypomania but the doctors didn’t give him anything that could make it easier for him to deal with his fear of the dark.

The other man remarks that being in prison usually makes the effect of the drugs next to obsolete anyway.

Barry remembers that one of his former foster brothers had also been very afraid of being left alone in the dark at night and how one an older girl who lived with them back then, had helped him to overcome this fear by using the younger boy’s imagination.

He isn’t really sure whether this would work with James as the other man isn’t a child anymore but a grown adult. Barry hasn’t missed how childlike the other man behaves at times, though, and a couple of days later, on their way to lunch, he ask James to step aside with him for a second during an unsupervised moment.

The other man gives him a confused look when he hands him an old looking button but Barry quickly explains that it is special once as it helps him to sleep whenever he is afraid of what lurks in the dark. He feels pretty silly while saying this but still goes on to explain that James would be completely safe during nights as long as he keeps this button with him.

A heavy silence follows and Barry expects the other man to either laugh outright into his face or call him an idiot.

James does neither but studies the button visibly doubtful before agreeing to try it.

The button does its magic.

++

The Rogues break out again. Barry is offered to join them but declines once more.

Simon visits with another man, Theodor Seaberg, the lawyer whom he mentioned before and over the run of the following conversation it becomes quickly obvious that Seaberg really seems to believe there to be a chance for him to get out of here.

Despite his best efforts, Barry can’t help but start to feel faintly hopeful again, knowing full well that he is likely just setting himself up for getting disappointed again.

Months pass by.

Jay visits.

He has talked to Simon and Seaberg and admits that he too thinks that the way the League handled the whole business with him hasn’t been right. They don’t talk much but Barry learns that Wally is getting married.

+

+

Enduring the guard’s abuse gets harder and harder as Barry’s accelerated cognition forces him to live through hours of pain and humiliation nearly every single day.

He starts to withdraw into his own mind.

+

Simon visits him and tells him they’ve decided to review his case.

Barry starts crying hearing that.

+

He learns that his hearing is set for October, seven months from then.

+

His seventh year starts.

+

Barry spends nearly all of his free time with the Rogues whenever they’re around these days.

+

Months go by slowly and both Simon and Theodor visit him regularly to prepare Barry for his upcoming hearing.

+

Sam is put back into prison and Barry becomes kind of his shadow as he feels safer with him around. The other man lets him.

+

In the last week of September, Barry has his fingers broken in the pantry by Michael as a warning to keep silent about any of this in his upcoming hearing. Sam is watching this unnoticed by either of them.

+

Director Wolfe calls Barry to his office a week before his hearing, where he reminds him that he is in no position to make any accusations against the penitentiary and that, in the eye of the public, he is nothing more than a paedophile murderer who deserves what happened to him during his stay.
Barry is intimidated by the man as he is well aware of how much pain he can conflict on others and how he can make one’s stay in here even worse if he chooses to. He promises not to tell anybody about the raping and physical abuse.

+

Sam tells Barry that the Flash is getting more and more violent with time. Barry faults himself for that.

+

Sam escapes unnoticed one night.

+

The day of Barry’s hearing comes around. He is extremely nervous, throwing up two times in the hour that leads up to it, but thinks that it goes rather well afterwards.

Simon assures him that he is as good as a free man.

+

A week goes by and Barry learns that the verdict of his case has been reduce to voluntary manslaughter but that his request to parole got declined.

He knows that this is a good thing but he still feels devastated about the prospect that he would still have to stay in here for at least another ten to twenty-five years without a parole.

+

The date for another hearing is set in another six months. Simon consoles and reassures him that the next hearing will get the desired outcome.

Barry doubts it.

+

Michael and a few other guard celebrate the refusal of his parole by abusing him for hours on end the following nights. For the first time, Barry is forced to come as well during those sessions.

+

Barry turns Jay away the next time he tries to visit.

+

He loses his appetite and starts to withdraw from the world around him.

+

Barry turns 39.

+

Weeks go by.

+
Bruce, disguised as Matches Malone, visits. Barry does not want to see him but is more or less forced to go.

Bruce is taken aback by seeing Barry in such a bad state but still proceeds to ask him questions regarding Iris’ death and Wally’s abuse. Barry becomes confused a couple of times during their conversation as it is hard for him to think clearly these days and he starts to cry when Bruce just goes on probing about his involvement.

The meeting is ended by Michael getting Barry to bring him back to his cell.

+

The eight year starts.

+

Barry learns that his hearing is postponed for another three months, which causes him to let go of any hope that he will every actually leave this place again.

+

Captain Cold, Trickster, the Top and Captain Boomerang are brought in.

+

Barry tries to stay away from them.

+

Len tries to talk to him but Barry avoids him.

+

It’s about another month till Barry’s second review and he gets so extremely nervous that he’s hardly able to eat anything at all.

+

His lawyer does repeatedly rehearse the hearing with him and is clearly dissatisfied with Barry’s performance.

It is probably partly it’s due to how outright uncomfortable Barry suddenly feels around the other man and he isn’t sure whether this is because Simon has suddenly stopped his visits and he is forced to be alone with Theodor or not.

When he asks the other man about his friend’s whereabouts, Theodor curtly reminds him that it would do them both good if he could keep concentrating on getting ready for the next hearing.

+

Barry has an extraordinary horrible nightmare and his screaming causes the guards to come to his cell.

They abuse him right there.

+
James snatches Barry the next morning and pretty much forces him to join them at the Rogues table. Barry is too ashamed to meet anybody’s eyes and he gives up trying to talk after it becomes apparent that his stammer is too bad for any of what he says to be understandable. James tries to lift his friend’s spirit by making silly jokes and telling stories about their last few coups.

None of the others becomes involved as they are clearly uncertain how to deal with him after what happened last night.

+

A few days go by and Barry starts to stay with the Rogues again.

+

Len breaks another inmate’s femur after he’s ridiculed Barry about being sexually abused.

+

Barry is hardly able to talk whole sentences due to his stammer. Theodor is palpably frustrated about it but increasing his effort to help Barry to pass the hearing.

When he asked about Simon again, his lawyer just tells him that the other man has more important business to attend to and that he should stop wasting either of their time.

+

James gives Barry the wooden button back the day before he has his review so that he will be able to sleep the night.

Barry is surprised the other man still has it and even more touched by this kind act. It is visible hard for him not to cry and he promises James to give it back to him afterwards.

+

The hearing is a horrible experience for Barry. His stammer is so bad that he is not able to answer most questions without needing an eternity to do so.

The referees treat him kindly enough, though, more lenient than during the last time but Barry is too nervous to really notice it.

+

He’s devastated after the hearing. James tries to console him but Barry is convinced that they will decline his request again. He asks James to leave him alone for a time and goes to the far back of the laundry room.

Len finds him there and tells him that they will take him with them the next time they break out. Barry still doesn’t like the notion of this but cannot imagine to live through this much longer.

He agrees.

+

Three days later his lawyer comes by to tell him that the request for amnesty was granted.
While Barry is still shocked by this news, he goes on to inform him that Simon has gone missing a couple of months ago and that nobody seems to know anything about the man’s whereabouts.

The other man says that he’s sorry that he didn’t tell him so earlier but he wanted him to stay focused on the hearing.

He advises Barry to concentrate on the future ahead of him and wishes him good luck before leaving.

+

Barry’s abuse increases over the next couple days. He is reminded that he cannot tell anybody anything about what’s happened to him.

+

Len gives him an address where he can find him should he want to pass by. Barry doesn’t know what to think of Len trusting him this much and he accepts the little piece of paper with a mixture of confusion and gratefulness.

+

The Rogues break out again.

+

Two weeks later Barry is getting out of prison for the first time in over half a decade.

Chapter End Notes

So, there you have it, lots and lots of information has just been shoved your way! ;P

I went over it a couple of times to make sure that nothing of it is actually spoiling or hurting the story that is still to come and I hope it was somewhat interesting to you. :) Nonetheless, if you didn’t like it, don’t worry, next chapter will be about the actual story again! I’ve the next chapter already finished and the one after that is also already half done.

Both of those chapters are rather long and I’m not really sure how you’d prefer it for me to post them as I will get very busy with the beginning of October, which will force me to upload less regularly. Would you prefer for me to upload them on the next two Sundays and then maybe wait a couple of weeks for the next one or would you rather have a week break in between them but therefore not have to wait so long for the one after them?

And, before I finally leave you be, I just want to thank all of you who’ve left me feedback so far. <3 I really enjoyed it and I know I say this every time but it really means so much to me! So thank you and many, many hugs in return! :D
Barry is in the middle of eating supper, exhausted from a long day at work and not really thinking of anything but his bed, when a young boy, who can’t be any older than twelve, suddenly appears in his living room.

He is so utterly caught off-guard by this that he freezes and just stares at the kid for a second. It is when he realizes that the boy is actually wearing a costume that the alarms in his head start to get off but, as he tries to get up, he suddenly finds himself in a bear hug.

“Grandpa!”

His body tenses up nearly painfully in response and a sudden intense panic overcomes him as the first thought that crosses is his parole restrictions and the fact that this is a young child.

There is no time for him to protest, though, because suddenly there is the Flash standing in his living room, close to his entrance door, and Barry feels like someone has pushed him into ice-water.

This is Wally, he hasn’t seen nor spoken to the young man in years and it is like a damn nightmare as he has no doubts that he would completely misunderstand the whole situations. Barry starts to feel sick with fear.

While Wally’s mask isn’t allowing for him to see his eyes, he still knows that the younger man has his gaze on him and the way his already pursed lips start to turn down farther and his whole demeanour becomes grimmer, is extremely frightening and disconcerting.

This can’t be happening…

Barry feels his throat closes up once again, not that it really bothers him right now as he wouldn’t have known what to say to his nephew anyway.

The strange kid is suddenly no longer hugging but standing in front of him. He moves so fast that the feeling of the embrace is lingering a moment on before Barry’s body catches up that his presence is gone.
He is a speedster.

The child is a speedster.

Barry is surprised he hasn’t picked up on it before but, then again, his mind is quite overwhelmed with what is happening just now.

“I’m not going with you! You are all crazy!” the kid cries angrily and is upset enough that he actually starts vibrating on the spot, with his fists clenched and seemingly ready to lunge at Wally, who, on the other hand, hasn’t moved at all over the last couple of seconds, which is never a good sign with a speedster.

“He would never do that!” the boy goes on and throws a surprisingly distressed glance over his shoulder to Barry, who is still sitting and has utterly no idea of what is going on or what this is about.

The auburn haired kid turns back to Wally and points an accusing finger at him. The anger that is coming off him is nearly tangible.

“You are a damn liar, grandpa is a her-”

The boy is cut off when Wally is suddenly at him. He has grabbed the kid’s throat in a painfully looking grip and hisses at him to shut up. This action causes Barry to be shaken out of his stupor and he quickly gets up to his feet with a mixture of fear of what is going to happen now and concern for the child.

He steps past the boy, closer to Wally, who immediately fixes his attention to him, and tries to reason with him.

“D-don’t, h-he’s a k-kid, y-you h-hurt-”

A punch cuts him off and breaks his nose with an audible Crack. It has enough force to knock him off his feet so that he topples to the ground with his back and head hitting the chair he has been sitting on a second before on his way down. The kid cries something in protest and anger but Barry hardly pays attention to it for now, as his head is searing in pain.

Despite that, he feels the ridiculous urge to laugh at himself and his own stupidity because he really should have expected this. He such a damn idiot.

“What’s going on here!?”

It is Jay, who seems to have suddenly found his way into his living room as well, and when Barry is finally able to focus his vision again, he notices that the other man is also wearing his costume.

Their gazes briefly meet and he watches how worry and disapproval crosses Jay’s face before he turns to Wally and the kid, who seem both ready to get at each other’s throat.

“What’s happened here?”

The older man sounds harsh and Barry notices how unusually tensed up and agitated he seems.

“He attacked grandpa!” the kid tells Jay without taking his furious glare off Wally. “He wanted to help me because Wal-”

“No actual names!” reminds Jay the boy sharply and causes him to flinch a bit. The kid looks a bit embarrassed for a seconds before his expression becomes once again dark.
“He just wanted to help me!”

Barry gives the young boy an odd look and isn’t sure what the heck he is supposed to make of him calling him his grandfather. Briefly, he wonders whether he fell asleep during supper and this is a really, really strange dream.

Then, he notices the pain again, and realizes with a sinking feeling that this can’t be the case.

“Help you?” asks Jay and Barry, who has been able to sit up by now again, notices how he glances at Wally with a wary look.

“He attacked me,” the young speedster explains and turns the Flash, who is once again eerily quiet. “I told him that you have gotten it all wrong—”

“Enough of that,” Wally cuts him off with a hard but eerily calm voice and makes a step closer to him. “I don’t want to hear anything of your nonsense anymore.”

“It isn’t nonsense!!! It is the truth, my grandfather is a hero!”

“Shut up, boy!”

Jay gets between both of them and pushes them slightly apart.

“We’re not going to discuss this matter any further while here,” he tells them and gives the kid a warning look, who seems about to say something else, before he turns to Wally. “Flash, you should head back and tell the others that we have found the child, I’ll follow with him after I’ve made sure that Barry’s alright.”

Wally clenches his fists but doesn’t show in any other way what he thinks of that. He simply nods and is gone a second later.

“Grandpa, are y-”

The boy, who has suddenly turned up next to Barry, is pulled back by Jay again, who meets his confused and angry look with a very stern expression.

“You will go to the door and wait there.”

“What!? No! Grand-”

“Enough. You’ve already caused enough trouble for one night.”

The kid glares at Jay for a long moment, as if trying to make him change his mind by sheer willpower, before he finally subsides with a defiant huff and does as he was told. Barry doesn’t miss the look he gives him before he walks over to the entrance of his flat. The concern and longing he can see in those eyes unsettle him quite a bit and he feels bad about it but he is glad that the strange boy is no longer this close.

“Barry?”

He turns his attention to Jay, who studies him with a worried frown as he steps closer to him.

“Come, let’s get you up from the ground,” the older man says kindly and gives him a faint smile.

Barry accepts the offered hand gingerly and realizes once again that his head isn’t the only part of him that has received an injury as his back protests immediately as soon as he tries to stand straight up. He winces and swiftly decides that it would be much better for him to sit for now. It is most likely just bruised, he knows how this feels, and it doesn’t really worry him, even though this would make work tomorrow quite a bit more difficult.

Jay, on the other hand, looks clearly concerned as he watches him.

“I’ll get the kid back to the others and then I’ll get you to the hospital, alright?”

“N-no, i-it’s f-f-fine, I-I’m ok-kay.”

“Barry, you are clearly not okay,” Jay disagrees and sounds unusually strained as he does so, which causes Barry to grow more uneasy again.

“Your nose is broken and your back seem to have been injured as well—”

“I-it’s j-j-just a-a b-bruise,” he cuts the other man off and gives him a stubborn look while he fights to urge to cross his arms in front of his chest.

“You still need to see a doctor,” Jay argues firmly. “You have been hit by a speedster, you have most likely received a concussion from it.”

Which would be fabulous as it would be the third one for him in not even half a year and the second one in just three weeks. Barry grows frustrated just by the notion of it.

“I-I j-just n-need t-to s-sleep i-it off, J-Jay, r-really.”

He gives Jay a pleading look and watches how his stern expression softens a bit.

“Barry, I’m not doing this because I want to harm you or make you feel miserable, but you could have been very seriously injured without noticing it just yet.”

For a brief moment, Barry really wants to point out that he most likely is well versed enough in the subject of being beaten up that he can discern between when he has to be worried about it and when not. He swallows the words down, though, as he doesn’t feel up for anymore of this right now.

Seeing Wally again after all this time and without any warning has him left pretty shaken up and weary. Then, there is still the whole odd situation with the kid he knows nothing about but has the inkling that this would be something else to haunt him from now on.

His gaze moves to where the child is standing and he notices how he is watching him again, with such an intensity that it makes him slightly uncomfortable.

“Barry,” Jay goes on after he has failed to answer and he again speaks in that calm and nearly soothing voice of his that causes Barry’s eyes to start itching. “Just lay down a bit and rest. I’ll be back soon, alright?”

There isn’t really much he can say to change the other man’s mind and he grows more tired by the minute, so that he simply nods his okay. He is just glad that neither Len nor anybody else has been over because that would have turned this whole situation into a real nightmare.

This is going to be another long night for him, he’s already sure of it.

When Eddy opens the door to him the next evening, he does a double-take and doesn’t seem able to decide whether he should make do with a disbelieving frown or an amused grin.
“You’re really one of the unluckiest bastards I’ve ever met. Someone else broke into your flat or were you just mugged again?”

Barry gives him a dark look before he averts his eyes and mutters that it was just an accident.

“An accident?” asks the other man, clearly not believing him. “Really?”

“Y-yes,” he answers tersely before he glances at Eddy again. “C-can I s-stay f-for a-a b-bit?”

His friend seems surprised about the request but nods and makes space for him to enter.

“Sure, mi casa es tu casa, man.”

Barry gives him a grateful smile and makes his way over to his couch. Unlike Mary, Eddy’s and his flat’s layout are more or less the same, which means that they both have no small lobby that separates their living area from their entrance.

The place is as clean and tidy as ever, which is a character trade Barry has always liked about the other man as he himself is a little bit of a neat-freak as well.

“Y-yeah, p-please.”

Eddy is walking over to his fridge and shoots him a questioning look.

“It is a usual answer coming from him as Barry mostly prefers tea or water over any alcoholic drink but today he feels like he could use one. After what he has learned about two hours ago, he thinks he could even go for some harder stuff.

For split second, the notion that Jay probably wouldn’t think too much of him drinking beer while still having a slight concussion and being on light pain meds comes to his mind. It is oddly amusing and he decides that he is not going to worry about this now.

Eddy joins him on the couch, mindful enough to keep some extra distance between them, and hands him the cool bottle.

“A-a b-boy p-passed b-b-by m-my f-flat l-last n-night.”

His voice is low but mostly steady as he tries to concentrate of the cold glass in his hands and keep his focus on it.

“H-he s-s-said… h-he th-thought I-I’m a-a r-relat-tive o-of h-his.”

Eddy hums but doesn’t interrupt him, for which Barry is glad as he doesn’t want to talk about it in the first place but, at the same time, what he has learned is just too bizarre to not talk about it with somebody.
Mary is not home tonight and the Rogue’s have made themselves rather scarce all week as they are having a heist tomorrow. They also don’t really have any easy mean to contact him right now as Sam has caught himself a rather nasty flue in the beginning of this week and Len ordered him to rest as he would be their way in and out the coming night.

They still communicated with him via mirror but Barry did so yesterday shortly before Bart arrived and today he just told Len that he is fine but that Jay is around without actually gazing into the little reflective surface as he knew that the other man would demand to learn about what has happened.

It isn’t just that Barry doesn’t want to talk about it but that he also doesn’t want Len’s mind to be occupied with this while he should keep his attention on not getting killed or caught.

“Is he a relative of yours?” Eddy’s voice startles him out of this thoughts. Barry gives his friend a rather embarrassed and apologizing look before he turns back to the brown bottle in his hands.

“I-it seems so,” he answers quietly and remembers what Jay has told him this late afternoon, after he has come back from work.

“His name is Bart and he claims that he is your grandson from the far future,” the older man told him with a serious but not unkind expression after they’ve both settled at Barry’s kitchen table. Jay had already been waiting for him in front of his door when he arrived home, looking tired and a lot more his age than he usually does.

“Your son?” Eddy asks and shrugs when he gives him a glare in response. “What? Stranger things have happened.”

“N-no, n-not my s-son… i-it’s c-complicated.”

“Yeah, things with family usually are.”

Barry initially thought that the boy was mistaken, that he was maybe confused or simply lying but Jay told him that it doesn’t seem to be the case.

“J’onn read his mind,” he explained and quickly added when he noticed Barry’s look. “The boy offered it and he also agreed to talk to Bruce and Dinah. They all think he says the truth or at least believes that he does so.”

“How i-is that p-possible?” Barry asked and felt still as confused as the evening before.

“Time traveling,” Jay explained and sighed while he rubbed his temple lightly as if it was bothering him. “It seems that he got sent back but that he can’t really remember why or how. According to J’onn, his mind is oddly jumbled when it comes to this part.”

“H-he c-can’t r-rem-member?”

“No, or hardly at best, but he is certain that he came back for something important, most likely to give us a message,” the older man went on and took a sip of his coffee. “Unfortunately, he can’t say for sure.”

“What happened, I mean, after the kid arrived at your doorstep?” Eddy asks and Barry feels how his face falls as he thinks back to it.

“Hey, you’re alright?” Eddy seems concerned by his reaction and he forces himself to nod.

“Y-yeah, f-fine… i-it’s j-just th-that… m-my n-nephew c-came b-by a-as w-well sh-shortly a-afterwards,” Barry explains quietly and tries to ignore how his throat starts to hurt again at the notion of Wally.

His friend makes a surprised and troubled noise and it is oddly touching that he seems to understand what this really means to him.

“Shit, man.”

“Y-yeah…”

Jay gave him a very grim as he focused his gaze back to him. For a split-second he seemed to hesitate before he finally spoke.

“The kid’s confused about the circumstances that brought him here and has trouble remembering the future he says he’s coming from,” he explained and Barry noticed how tensed up he suddenly seemed. “He hardly seems to remember his own parents but he remembers you… and Iris.”

There hadn’t been anything Barry could say to that for a long moment. A sickening feeling had overcome him as soon as he realized what he had just been told, along with a nearly mind-numbingly awful pain in his chest.

“W-what?”

“The boy, Bart,” Jay went on and his gaze is nearly uncomfortably intense as he does so, “He told us that Iris and you are his grandparents and that you are a hero in his future. It seems that you saved the world and Iris never died.”

Barry jumps slightly when someone bumps his shoulders slightly and he realizes, that he drifted off into his own mind once again.

“Your nephew is the accident you’ve mentioned before?” Eddy asks but doesn’t make it sound like he is mocking or reproaching him.

Not really trusting his voice, Barry simply nods. It catches him off-guard once more when his friend touches his shoulder then and he is taken aback by the sympathy he can pick up on in his gaze.

“That’s really horrible. I’m sorry that this keeps happening to you.”

A brief silence follow as Barry isn’t sure how to reply.

“You aren’t in trouble, though, are you?” Eddy probes when he failed to say something for about a minute.

“N-no, I-I… I-I d-don’t th-th-think s-so.”

Jay assured him that he doesn’t have any reason to worry about when he picked up on how pale he had grown.

“None of this is your fault, Barry.”

This wasn’t true, not by far, not if the child is really his grandson, but Barry didn’t protest. Instead, he asked the older man what was going to happen to Bart now.

“He will stay with Max Mercury for now,” Jay answers but didn’t give him any more information than that, which hadn’t been surprising. Still, an odd sense of longing and sadness had latched onto Barry at that moment as he knew that he would most likely never have the opportunity to get to know
He felt rather bad for how stiff and tense he had reacted to him, then, and that he actually had been relieved as soon as Jay and the boy were gone again. This had likely been his only chance to really talk to the child, his grandson from a different future, one where Iris never died and he never were convicted for some hideous crimes he had never done.

Fate is really a strange thing…

“Hey.” Barry shakes the memories off and turns his attention back to Eddy, who is gingerly cupping his shoulder again. “This isn’t your fault, what happened has been done to you. You’re as much of a victim as your former wife or your nephew are.”

It is odd hearing this, especially in such a direct manner.

“I-it’s ok-k-”

“No, it is really not,” the other man cuts him off without raising his voice but there is a certainty and firmness to it that causes Barry to stop nonetheless.

For a couple of seconds, they just hold each other’s gaze and he gets the feeling that Eddy really wants him to understand how serious he is about this.

“You aren’t responsible for what was done to you and your family.”

An awful pain, similar to the one he has experienced hours before, shoots through Barry’s chest and he has to avert his eyes. Hearing this hurts and makes him angry while, at the same time, it is like a balm, soothing.

It is so damn confusing, he doesn’t know how to feel anymore and he is just too tired to deal with any of this right now.

“You wanna watch a movie?”

Surprised, he turns back to Eddy, who gives him a small smile and realizes that his friend must have picked up on how weary he is of everything that has happened in just the last twenty-four hours.

It is a very nice offer and while Barry still isn’t sure why he has come over, he thinks forgetting everything for just a couple of hours is just fine with him.

He smiles faintly and agrees.

It is close to one in the morning when Barry decides to leave for his own apartment, feeling tired but also much more relaxed and in a better mood than before.

He realized a while ago that there is nothing more hilarious than sitting through one of the Die Hard movies with Eddy and listening to his stupid but funny commentary and how he is constantly talking smack about anybody who is on screen, whether it be the good or the bad guys. Like usual, it succeeded in getting his mind off what is currently bothering him for at least a couple of hours and he is incredibly grateful for it.

“You know that you can come over whenever you feel down, right?” Eddy asks him after Barry thanked him for the nice evening. “I haven’t exactly been spoon-fed when it comes to sensitivity but that doesn’t mean that I can’t listen or that we can’t just hang out.”

There is no way that Barry could express how very grateful he is to have Eddy as a friend right now. When he met him for the first time, he would never have guessed that he would become someone so dear to him.

“Ok-kay,” he agrees and adds. “Th-thank you.”

The other man rolls his eyes but grins.

“Sure thing, Bar, but this is getting too sappy for me now, so move your ass over to your own apartment and go to bed.”

The lights in the hallway are on when he enters it, likely due to another resident having just returned home, and Barry makes his way over to his own place next door, glad that he doesn’t have to walk in darkness, even if it would be just for such a short way.

He tries not to show it on around others but his assault from two weeks ago still has him very much on edge and he usually avoids turning his lights off even at night these days.

Thus, he isn’t alarmed when he unlocks his door to a lit living room as he has left the lights on so that he wouldn’t have to return to a dark apartment. It isn’t a good solution, definitely not one he could indulge in for too long as it costs unnecessary money he doesn’t really have in the first place but for now he tries not to think about this too hard but just make it easier for himself to feel somewhat safe when he is alone.

Then, he notices Len sitting at his kitchen table and, even though he knows that it is him, he can’t help it but freeze up.

“Hey,” Len says after a moment of rather uneasy silence has passed between them and gets up. His expression is calm and collected but Barry doesn’t miss the anger that is blazing in his eyes as the other man has clearly noticed in what shape his face is in.

“Wh-what are y-you d-doing here?” Barry asks, still feeling very much taken aback by his unexpected visitor, and it takes him another second to realize that it would probably be a good idea to close the door, which he quickly does.

A familiar nervousness overcomes him when Len doesn’t answer but makes his way over to him instead.

“Y-you’ve a- h-heist t-tomorrow,” he points out as he watches his friend stop just about an arm’s length from him. “I th-thought you’d b-be b-busy…”

Len frowns and, for the first time since he got up from the table, actually meets his eyes.

“We finished with the planning a couple of hours ago,” he explains in a grim tone before he nods to Barry’s face in general. “Funny, when we talked before you told me you’re fine. Didn’t find it worth to mention that someone’s broken your nose?”

He sounds calm but the anger is rolling off him like in waves and Barry feels his stomach turn queasy in response.

“I… th-this is… I d-didn’t w-want y-you t-to w-worry. It’s n-nothing s-serious.”

“Someone smacking you up again is nothing serious?” Len repeats with audible incredulity.
“I-it w-wasn’t l-like l-last t-time,” Barry tries to defend himself. “It h-has n-nothing t-to d-do w-with y-you.”

“So what? You expect me not to give a damn when someone punches your face in if they aren’t somehow connected to me or the Rogues?”

“N-no, th-that’s n-not wh-what I m-meant-”

“What the fuck happened, Allen?” Len cuts him off in a hard voice and Barry doesn’t miss how he clenches his fists, which is quite intimidating even though he tries to reason with himself that this is just Len and that he wouldn’t hurt him.

Even so, his apprehension and fear must be plain to see on his face as the other man clenches his teeth in anger for a second before forcing himself to relax again.

“I’m not going to hit you,” Len points out quietly before he closes his eyes and takes a deep breath. When he turns his gaze back to him, he doesn’t seem as angry anymore and nods to the table. “Let’s take a seat, okay?”

Barry hesitates as he doesn’t really like the idea of telling Len anything about what has occurred yesterday. It is obvious how upset his friend is and he doesn’t want him to do something stupid in case they have a run-in with Wally tomorrow.

Still, he doesn’t want Len to leave either and he knows that the other man does have a right to be angry after he has more or less lied to him.

After their conversation about Blacksmith and the Blue Velvet, Len has made himself rather scarce, though, and Barry has hoped that he could put it off for a little longer before he has to tell him about what happened yesterday. Not that he kid himself into believing that Len wouldn’t get angry over this but he has thought he would have some more time to collect himself.

Somewhat reluctantly, Barry walks over to his kitchen table but stops when he notices the bowl of apples in the middle of it he hasn’t picked up on so far.

“I brought some food over,” Len explains when he turns to him in surprise. “Mostly canned stuff but also some vegetable and apples. There’s also fried rice with chicken and spring rolls in the fridge but it’s probably cold by now.”

This is an unexpectedly kind thing for Len to do after how piss poor his mood has been for the last weeks and how he seemed intent on avoiding him as much as possible.

It makes a pleasant warmth settle in Barry’s chest as he’s grateful for his friend’s help and he tries not to listen to the small voice in the back of his head that keeps reminding him that this things have been bought by stolen money.

“Y-you w-went sh-shopping for m-me?” He grins and chuckles when Len gives him a miffed look in return. Even though Barry can’t be sure, he thinks that this is probably meant as kind of an apology from the other man for his standoffish behaviour of the last couple of weeks, at least he would like to believe so.

“Th-thank y-you.” Barry meets Len’s eyes with a soft smile and while he still looks at their upcoming conversation with apprehension, he is now very glad that his friend has come over, after all.

In a way it is nearly funny how easily Len can lift his mood and make him feel better while he himself hardly is able to do so on his own.

“It’s the end of the month,” his friend points out. “Your fridge usually empties out around this time.”

Barry is glad that Len doesn’t mention that he needs to take better care of himself and eat more. He isn’t blind, he doesn’t miss the looks others gives him when they thinks that he doesn’t notice them or the constant concern in his friends’ eyes. Not to mention that Mary and Mrs. Ming keep feeding him snacks at every possible opportunity that offers itself to them.

Also, while Barry tries to avoid looking in the mirror whenever he isn’t fully clothed, he knows exactly what he looks like…

Ugly and thin, like a badly messed up scarecrow.

The notion alone fills him with dread and not for the first time he wonders what Len really thinks when he looks at him… whether he is disgusted by what he sees.

He pushes that thought away, not wanting to bring himself down again by his own stupid insecurities. Len has come over and he brought him food, it is something he should be happy and grateful for, the other man certainly deserves as much.

“I also brought some fried noodles for myself that are still there.” Len’s voice causes Barry to turn his attention back to him and it is then that he realizes that he has drifted off in his own head once more. Thankfully, the other man doesn’t comment on it, even though there is slight concern in his eyes, and instead goes on. “So, if you haven’t had dinner yet, we could eat now.”

It isn’t hard to tell that Len wants to get him to eat something, likely aware that Barry has been rather sloppy with it after seeing his broken nose. The other man has picked up on how he tends to lose his appetite when he is worried or depressed, which is one of the reasons why he lost this much weight after their last fight to begin with.

“S-sure,” Barry agrees even though he isn’t particularly hungry right now. Still, he hasn’t really eaten anything today as last night events have left him feeling uneasy for the most part and while he had some popcorn while he stayed as Eddy’s, he is aware that this doesn’t count as an actual meal.

While Barry heats the food up, Len offers to make some tea, which is not really something he usually does but is very much appreciated.

Len doesn’t try to get him to talk about what has happened while they prepare dinner nor while they eat and Barry is grateful for it.

There is not much talking in general but the atmosphere isn’t overly tense and he is able to enjoy his food and even finish it. Afterwards, he feels stuffed and tired and is glad when Len helps him with cleaning the table.

It’s around half past two when they settle on the couch and while Barry has work today, which means that he would need to get up in just a couple of hours, he doesn’t want the other man to leave just yet. Having Len close again after how he kept his distance for the last couple of weeks is just so nice, especially after what’s happened yesterday.

His head feels heavy and he rests his cheek on the back of the couch, watching Len watch him for a moment before closing his eyes.

“S-someone c-came b-by y-yesterday,” he says quietly and tries to concentrate on how heavy and weary his body feels and not on the uneasiness and pain the notion of last night causes him. “H-he…
i-it’s… i-it w-will s-sound s-stupid b-but…” Barry squeezes his eyes shut even firmer, hardly picking up on the pain that is caused by this due to his broken nose, and balls his hand into fists for a moment. “H-he s-seems t-to b-be m-my g-grands-son f-from… f-from th-the f-future.”

It sounds so ridiculous and he expects Len to laugh or get annoyed because he is probably thinking that this is some stupid lie he tells him so that he doesn’t have to talk about the truth of what has actually happened.

Len does neither, though. He just stays quiet and after an uncomfortable moment of silence passed between them, Barry forces himself to go on.

“H-his n-name is B-Bart and h-he’s y-young, p-probably n-not m-much older th-than e-eleven or t-twelve.” He swallows around the lump that has formed in his throat and makes speaking increasingly difficult, uncertain whether he wants to go on or not. Just thinking about this makes his head hurt and his stomach queasy because he doesn’t even want to imagine how frightening this must be for the kid.

“H-he…” Barry coughs lightly as his voice gives out on him before he tries again. “He w-was s-so ups-set b-because h-he… he th-thinks th-that I’m i-innocent… h-he s-says th-that h-his g-grandf-father w-was a… a-a h-hero a-and…”

Tears start to force their way through his closed eyes and he feels them roll over his skin, leaving warm traces behind. The back of his throat feels raw as he swallows again and debates whether he should move, turn away from Len so that he wouldn’t see this, but he is bone tired and just can’t bring enough energy up to really care.

Instead, he pulls his legs up, so that his knees rest against his chest and he can put his arms around them.

“I-I d-didn’t kn-know wh-what t-to… I-I th-thought h-he i-is c-confused a-and…” Barry grits his teeth again, welcoming the pain that shoots through his jaw joints, and tries to fight off the guilt that keeps wind around him like a constrictor. “I’ll l-likely n-never s-see h-him ag-ain a-and… h-he’s… h-he h-has t-to f-feel aawef-ful… a-and… W-Wally w-was th-there, h-he… h-he w-w-was s-so a-aangry…”

His nephew hates him, he hates him so much…

Barry has been aware of this, of course, but after all these years he has thought that things could have changed a bit. That, maybe, Wally would somehow have realized that he would never do such a thing to him.

They were a family, once…

How could he have let this happen to them?

Barry turns his head, so that his forehead is resting against the back of his couch, and doesn’t even fight the sob. He is too tired and his inside feels raw and cold. Right now, he just wants to get this awful feeling in his chest to go away.

He jumps when a touch to his neck startles him but he quickly realizes that it is Len.

God, he is such a jackass…

Len came over and brought him food and he repays him by breaking down in front of him again.
Damn it…

“Your nephew hit you.”

It isn’t a question and Barry doesn’t reply.

Despite how calm Len sounds, he knows that the other man is livid, the anger is so intense that it is palpable, and he wishes he could make him understand that none of this is Wally’s fault, that Wally is just as much of a victim as Iris was. Even more in a way, because he has to live on with what’s been done to him and Barry knows how unbelievably difficult it is to move on from something like that. How you can never really leave it behind you and how, even years later, it keeps eating away at you on whenever you let your guard down.

“I p-provoked h-him,” Barry finally croaks when the silence becomes just too much. “I-I sh-should h-have kn-known b-better… i-it’s m-my-

“Don’t.” Len’s voice is hard and there is a warning in the way he speaks that causes Barry to freeze and grow completely still.

The other man swears in frustration as he notices his reaction and pulls his hand back.

“Look at me.” When Barry fails to comply, Len adds in a softer tone. “Please.”

Reluctantly, Barry does so and he feels his cheeks grow uncomfortably hot as he tries to focus his blurry vision on the other man.

Len doesn’t look as angry as Barry has feared he would but there is a visible tightness around his eyes and a tension to how he holds himself that make it obvious that he is not taking well to having learned how he got his injuries.

“Have you seen a doctor?”

The question surprises Barry but it is a welcome alternative to what he has expected Len would say.

“Y-yes, J-Jay c-came over sh-shortly a-after W-Wally ar-rived and h-he t-took m-me t-to th-the hosp-

“Good.” Len’s expression stays grim but he seems less concerned. “You got something for the pain?”

Barry nods and realizes that it would probably be a good idea to take one of the pills now that he has eaten something. The notion to get up and walk over to his bathroom isn’t very appealing, though, and he decides that he would take one a bit later as the pain has subsided a lot by now, anyway.

“You should’ve told me.”

The disapproval in Len’s voice is plain to hear and it causes an uncomfortable guilt to rear its head in Barry’s guts as he knows that his friend is right.

“I w-wasn’t s-sure… y-you s-seemed in a b-bad m-mood, I-I th-though…” he breaks off and averts his eyes.

It is so difficult for Barry to know where he stands with the other man at times. One moment he is kind and understanding, the next he lashes out on him for no particular reason or just ignores him for days on end, making him feel just plain miserable.

They fall quiet again and he can feel Len’s gaze on him, well aware that the other man isn’t exactly happy with his explanation.

“I’m under a lot of pressure right now and I’m not really sure how to deal with everything that’s going on,” the other man finally tells him, sounding both grim and weary. “I get why you didn’t want to tell me. I didn’t exactly give you a reason to but me behaving like an ass doesn’t mean that you can’t come to me if you’re in trouble or something like this happens to you.”

Barry glances over to Len with an unhappy frown.

“I… y-you g-get angry a-and it…”

It scares me.

That is what he wants to say but he can’t bring himself to because he knows how this makes him sound like and he doesn’t want to appear any weaker in front of the other man than he already does.

Len can be quite intimidating, he is tall, in very good shape and knows how to fight, and while Barry is quite certain that he would never try to hurt him in a physical way, there is still this persisting nagging fear in the back of his mind that reminds him how easily anger can turn into violence.

The way Len is looking at him now is uncomfortable because, even though Barry didn’t say it, his friend seems to get what he means.

“Barry, I can have a horrible temper at times and behave like a complete bastard but,” Len says in a calm but firm voice as he meets his eyes, “I’ll never hit you. It doesn’t matter how angry I get, it won’t happen.”

A part of Barry stays sceptical, unable not to, but, even so, Len’s words are both comforting and reassuring and the sudden urge to reach out to him, to actually touch the other man, catches him completely off-guard.

Then, he remembers the other reason why he initially didn’t want to tell the other man about what happened.

“Y-you c-can’t d-do s-someth-thing s-stupid i-if y-you’ve a r-run i-in w-with W-Wally t-tomorrow, ok-kay?”

The Rogues have been surprisingly good at avoiding the Flash for the last couple of months, probably due to Len and the rest of them putting extra effort in planning their heists beforehand but Barry knows how huge the risk is for them to finally cross paths again.

“You mean like turning his head into an ice cube?”

“L-Len!”

To his surprise, Len snorts and, while he still looks pissed, he gives him a tight smile and shrugs.

“We won’t run into him, so stop worrying.”

“Y-you c-can’t kn-know that,” Barry points out with a frown and doesn’t understand how his friend can be so certain in this regard.

“Fine.” Len sighs and rubs his eyes. “I won’t turn him into an icicle should we have the displeasure
“Y-you p-promiss me th-that?”

“For fuck’s sake.” The other man huffs but his amused grin belies his annoyance.

“I’m s-serious,” Barry states firmly because he knows Len and his bad temper by now.

“Yes.” Len lowers his hand again and meets his gaze. “I promise you, alright?”

“Th-thank you.”

He really means it as it is no secret that there is no love left between Len and Wally and that not only due to the obvious reason of the later one being the Flash.

“I-it w-wasn’t W-Wally’s f-fault,” he adds quietly because he wants him to understand this.

Len doesn’t say anything to that, he only purses his lips in a familiar way that makes it obvious that he doesn’t agree with him on this in the least.

For a moment, Barry wonders whether he should press on but he senses that this would probably bring an early end to the once again mostly peaceful mood between them and decides against it. Right now he is just glad that Len isn’t hellbent on doing something stupid.

As awful as it sounds, it isn’t as if he really wants to talk about his nephew anymore, anyway. Thinking about Wally causes the pain in his chest only to grow worse and unwanted memories to try and crawl their way back to the surface of his mind so that it is a bit of a relief that he can put this behind him for now.

“So, there’s a boy running around who’s your grandson from the future?” The amusement in Len’s voice is hard to miss and when Barry turns back to him, he is actually smirking.

“Yeah,” he agrees and chuckles as he lets his head rest against the back of the couch again. “C-crazy, huh?”

“Crazy doesn’t exactly cover it.” Len snorts and shakes his head. “Damn, this world’s getting too fucking strange.”

Barry hums in agreement and can’t help but smile as he watches the other man. For the first time since he had his run-in with Kenneth he starts to feel truly relaxed and comfortable again and it is such a pleasant sensation.

“You’re falling asleep on me again?” Len’s voice is warm and amused but Barry doesn’t pick up on what he is actually saying. It is nice listen to him, though, nice and calming and he decides to closes his eyes to rest them briefly.

He is gone within seconds.

Chapter End Notes

I’m feeling rather tired (because being sick sucks), so I will keep it short this time and just say that I’m really happy about Bart finally entering the story as he’s one of my favourite speedsters (I just have a fond spot for him) and that I know that Wally doesn’t come over as the nicest person right now but this story is definitely not meant to bash him. The way he acts is due to what happened to him, like Barry he has a lot to deal with and he’s convinced that Barry is guilty.

I would like to go a bit more into detail about it but I will leave it for another time.

As I’ve mentioned before, the next chapter will be in Len’s POV. It got pretty huge and I decided to split it into two, though.

I really hope you guys enjoyed this chapter and thanks to all of you lovelies who left me feedback last time around again, I can’t really express how amazing it is when you share your thoughts with me. :)

“You sure that’s a good idea?” Sam gives him a rather sceptical look as they stand in front of the dimensional port that leads to Barry’s bathroom. He glances towards the slightly dimmed sight that he can make out through the dimensional exit and frowns. “This is definitely going against his parole and I doubt that Allen will like that.”

“Nobody will know,” Len replies and shoots the other man an annoyed glance. “If there’s anybody who can make sure that this little trip stays under the table it’s Mamani.”

“Yeah, about that… You really want to introduce Allen to that guy?” Sam, once again, looks rather doubtful about this plan, which in turn really starts to rub Len the wrong way.

“Gael’s a friend,” he reminds him curtly.

“I’m not worried about Mamani,” the other Rogue snorts and shifts his weight from one leg to the other as he turns his gaze back to the even and slightly milky looking surface just about two feet from them. “He’s an alright guy, especially compared to the sort of company you like to frequent with these days.”

Len throws Sam a warning glare for this as he is really not in the mood to bring Amunet up right now. Sam rolls his eyes but lifts his hand in a somewhat honest looking placating way.

“Just wanna say that Allen probably won’t be all that jazzed about being whisk away to the household of such a guy.”

This hasn’t to be pointed out to Len, he has been mulling over this as well as he knows what Barry still thinks of criminals, no matter how lenient his stance on this matter has become in regard of the Rogues.

Still, he is sure that Barry would like this little surprise trip in the end. The other man has been in a rather depressed mood over the last two weeks since his grandson from a parallel future arrived…
and Len’s head still started to hurt when he thinks too hard about that one.

Barry’s life definitely hasn’t become any less strange after him losing his powers and, considering what is going on, that’s certainly not a good thing.

“He’s no worse than us,” he finally remarks to the other man after an uncomfortable moment of silence.

“He’s tight with the fucking mob, Len.” Sam snorts but waves Len’s glare off and nods to the exit of the mirrorverse instead. “Whatever, you’re too stubborn to listen anyway. Just get blondie and let’s get this over with. I need to get back to the game.”

Len gives his friend one last hard look before he turns and climbs into Barry’s bathroom.

The sink creaks slightly in protest under the assault of being used as a stepping stone and he is pretty sure that he would either have to look for a new one for Barry in near future or get him a standing mirror should he and the others stick to this way of entering his flat.

Not that a bigger mirror would be bad investment seeing that this one he is currently using is hardly big enough for a grown man to climb through.

“Barry?” Len calls out as soon as he is standing with both feet on the tiled floor. He wants to make his presence known before he could scare the other man by accident. After Kenneth’s surprise visit Barry has become understandably nervous even in his own home.

For that alone Len would make sure to knock some of that jackass’ teeth out.

A brief silence follows that feels palpably tense before he hears some movement in the living room through the slightly ajar door.

“L-Len?”

Barry sounds confused and hesitant and it doesn’t seem like he is actually coming any closer to the bathroom.

“Yeah,” Len answers and makes his own way over to the door.

The first thing he notices when he enters the short hallway that leads to either the bedroom or the living room, is the smell of lavender. It’s probably the aroma candle Lisa gave Barry a couple of days ago and even though Len usually isn’t a fan of this stuff, he can’t help but notice how pleasant it is. Even with this calming smell, there is still a palpable tension lingering to the air, though.

“Wh-what are you doing here?”

Barry is watching him with a concerned expression next to the end of the couch that is the closest to the exit of the flat.

It is reassuring to see that the other man is as alert as this, even though Len doesn’t particularly like it for him to be in such a constant state of wariness.

“D-did s-someth-thing hap-pen?”

He looks tired, which isn’t exactly surprising. Barry constantly appears exhausted since Len has started to pass by again after their talk about two weeks ago.

Worried and exhausted.
And guilty.

For what, he can only guess as Barry seems convinced that nearly everything going wrong in his life or the ones of people he knows is somehow his fault. It is a source of ongoing frustration for Len.

“No.” He slowly makes his way over to the blonde, trying to appear as relaxed as he can because he’s aware of how the other man seems to unconsciously grow even more apprehensive when he thinks that something is bothering him. “I just wanted to pass by. I’m not interrupting you with anything?”

Barry is still watching him with a slight frown but some of the tension seems to leave his shoulders at that. He shakes his head.

“N-no, I j-just r-read a b-bit.”

The blonde nods to the novel that lays open at the couch, with its pages resting on the cushion, thus giving Len a view of its cover that shows a pretty blond woman, who is drawn in a rather abstract art style. Above her, in big bold blue letters, the title A Devil in a Blue Dress is written.

A crime novel, probably another one he borrowed from Mary as the younger woman loves them about as much as Barry does.

Len isn’t big on fiction, whether it’s in form of books or television, but he likes when Barry tells him about the stories he is reading and while he finds it odd and slightly annoyed that the blonde still seems to prefer the ones where the police is portrayed as the good guys, it is good to see him enjoy something this much.

“You’ve finished The Big Four already?”

Somehow, it always seems to please the other man when Len remembers one of the book titles he has been reading and this time is no exception. Barry’s smile makes his face look very handsome, even with how tired he is looking right now, and Len fights the urge to step even closer because he knows that this would bring at least some of the wariness and thus guilt right back into those blue eyes.

“Y-yes, j-just y-yesterd-day,” Barry agrees and Len doesn’t miss the slight flush on his cheeks.

“You wanna tell me about it later?” he asks because as much as he likes to listen to Barry telling him about the novels he reads, the blonde seems to enjoy talking about them with him even more.

“S-sure,” Barry readily agrees and the smile is still tugging on his lips. “Y-you w-want me t-to m-make you s-some c-coffee?”

“Not now. I actually came over because I’ve a surprise for you.”

Barry’s expression dims a bit but he seems more curious than wary.

“A s-surprise?”

“Yes.” Len can’t help it and steps a bit closer to the other man. It is a relief when Barry doesn’t draw back and only slightly tenses up in response. “I would like you to meet a friend of mind.”

This doesn’t seem the right thing to say and he can’t say that he is surprised.

“A a f-friend?” Barry looks worried now and nervously glances to the direction where his bathroom lays as if he was worried that there is still another person in there he hasn’t noticed so far.

“I didn’t bring him over,” Len remarks drily but feels bad about this slight tingle of annoyance he feels as soon as the other man turns his apprehensive and now once again guilty looking eyes back to him. He goes on in a softer voice. “I actually thought we could make a trip to him.”

“Wh-where t-to?” Barry asks and starts to nervously shift his weight from one leg to the other. “A-and wh-who’s y-you f-friend?”

Len stays quiet for a long moment, already feeling how this slips through his fingers and he knows that he should be honest upfront and just tell Barry about is plan but it becomes quite obvious that he likely wouldn’t be inclined to go along with it then.

“I haven’t given you the most reason to trust me recently,” he finally says and he knows it is a bit of a low shot but he still goes on. “But I would never do anything that could get you in trouble.”

Well, other than frequenting with him at all, that is.

That notion is uncomfortable in how true it is and Len pushes it away, unwilling to be bothered by it right now. He isn’t stupid and he has been in this business for over three decades by now. He knows how to get somewhere without catching unwanted attention and from the handful of people he really allows himself to trust next to his Rogues Mamani is at the first place.

There would be no bad consequences for Barry, he is certain of it, otherwise he wouldn’t be willing to risk it.

“You’ll like it,” he goes on and it doesn’t sit well with him how tensed up the other man has gotten once again. Slowly, to give Barry time to pull away if he want to, he reaches for his hand and closes his fingers loosely around his wrist. “I won’t let anything happy to you.”

Barry frowns and his uncertainty is nearly palpable in the air between them. He swallows and licks his lips nervously before he speaks, all the while holding Len’s gaze.

“I-it w-will b-be ag-ainst m-my p-parole, w-won’t it?”

Seeing that lying wouldn’t make any sense, he only nods, which causes Barry’s frown to deepen for a second before he averts his eyes and starts to gnaw on his bottom lip.

“Nobody will know.” Len gives his wrist a slight reassuring squeeze and wishes that the blonde wouldn’t look so damn worried all over again.

“Wh-why?”

Len frowns, not really understanding the question and Barry picks up on it as he elaborates.

“Wh-why v-v-visit t-some f-friend of y-yours? W-we c-could j-just s-stay in and I c-could m-make y-you c-coffee o-or s-someth-thing t-to e-eat.”

He sounds scared…

Len bits down on a frustrated groan and instead gives the other man’s wrist a slight squeeze.

“Because I think a change of scenery would do you good,” he explains. “Even if it’s just for a couple of hours.”

“I-I d-don’t kn-know…”
Barry sounds uncertain, clearly conflicted over whether to agree or not as his common sense probably tells him what a stupid idea this would be. At the same time, he obviously doesn’t really want to reject his idea outright either and it is hard to not show how sobering this is, seeing how careful Barry is to not upset him, how he obviously keeps expecting him to lash out any second now.

Despite what Len told him, Barry still is wary of him and how he would react in case of another fight between them.

And who could fault him for it?

After telling the blonde that he wouldn’t abandon him again, he did the next best thing, pushing him away and shutting him out once more. It wasn’t like before, he didn’t cut him completely off, but he made it clear that he didn’t want to have him around, and Barry, who already had more than enough reason not to trust him, doesn’t seem able to let go of his suspicious and weariness this time around.

The worst thing is that he isn’t even angry. Like a frustrating repetition from when Len messed up before, he just welcomed Len back into his life, which would be a good thing if it weren’t for the fact that it seems like the other man is now walking on eggshells around him all the damn time.

Barry still voices his opinions to Len when he doesn’t agree with something but before a real debate could happen, he will usually just change the topic these days, looking tensed up and uneasy whenever this occurs.

It makes Len’s skin crawl because he doesn’t want this.

The notion that Barry could be afraid, actually really afraid of him, whether it be of him hurting the blonde in a physical way or just lashing out verbally again, is just unsettling, and he isn’t sure how to deal with it.

There is also the fact that Barry stopped coming over to the hideout which makes no sense to Len at all as he did so only after he stopped pushing the blonde away like the damn idiot he is. Lisa, of course, is convinced that it is because of something he did, which is likely the truth, and resulted in his sister being pissed at him. Again.

“I won’t pressure you into this,” Len tells Barry in a calm voice and starts to draw small reassuring circles onto the back of his wrist. “If you really don’t wanna go, we can stay in, and you can tell me about your book.”

Barry watches him with wide uncertain eyes, but it seems the right thing to say because some of the tension starts to ease away from him.

Did he really think that he would force him into this?

Len nearly stops then, unwilling to turn this into another point of the long lists of things that make his friend uneasy and miserable. He forces himself to go on, though, because Barry deserves to do something that is fun and enjoyable for him. Should he decline again, he would leave it at that.

“But I really think that you’d like it. No bad repercussions, just a nice little trip to get your head off things and I’ll be there the whole time.”

He doesn’t miss how Barry seems to relax a bit more at the last part and it is both confusing and touching how much the other man seems to trust him despite how wary he is of him at the same time.

There is a brief pause when Barry averts his eyes, considering his words, and Len doesn’t need to be a mind reader to know that he likely pondering whether the risk is worth it.
Then, the other man seems to come to a conclusion as he turns his gaze back to him, still looking uncertain but with a faint smile on his lips.

“If y-you are c-certain th-that n-nobody w-will f-find out ab-bout th-this th-then… th-then ok-kay,” he agrees, looking very pale all of a sudden and Len has to fight the urge to pull him closer, make him understand that he would not let anything happen to him.

There is no way in hell that he would let him go back to the Heights.

“Nothing will happen to you,” he assures Barry once more and steps a bit closer, lifting his other hand so that he can cup his neck. “I wouldn’t ask you if I weren’t completely sure.”

Barry gives him another faint, visible strained smile and nods.

“I kn-know.”

It’s reassuring to hear that, to know that he really thinks so, while at the same time a part of Len isn’t sure how to feel about it.

Their relationship isn’t a completely equal one, Len is very aware of that. Barry forgives too easily, he just accepts being hurt and moves on without allowing himself to feel angry.

This isn’t only the case with him, though, the other man seems keen on the idea that people have the right to abuse him, which is a very upsetting notion. Would he ask him about it, Barry would clearly deny it, not because he is lying but likely because he doesn’t even realize that it is even happening.

Len sometimes wonders whether this has always been the case, even before he got put into prison and what happened to him there. It wouldn’t really surprise him as he’s read up on the blonde, and it’s not uncommon that people, who’ve been abused as a child, tend to develop the oddest ways to cope with that. Often not very healthy ones.

“So,” Barry goes on. “Wh-what’s th-this l-little t-trip ab-bout?”

“I thought we could indulge your hobby a bit.” Len gives his neck a tentative squeeze before he pulls his hand back but still keeps holding onto Barry’s wrist.

“My h-hobby?” It’s obvious that the blonde isn’t sure what he is talking about.

“Art,” he explains with a smirk that widens when Barry’s eyes seem to light up at the mention of it. “Art?”

“Yeah, a friend of mine has quite an impressive private art collection. Thought you’d enjoy a little guide through it.”

“A f-friend of y-yours h-has a p-private art c-collection,” Barry repeats with a slight sceptical frown. “D-do I w-want t-to kn-know ab-bout h-how he g-got it?”

Len snorts and gives him a fond but amused look.

“I’m pretty sure he bought most of it.”

“M-most of it?”

“Better not ask questions you know you won’t like the answers to,” he advises easily and grins when this gains him an exasperated huff in return.
“D-do y-you even have f-friends wh-who aren’t at l-least s-somehow i-involved in c-criminal act-activities?” Barry wonders but only sounds slightly bothered. It’s clear that their friendship has soften him up quite a bit when it comes to the likes of him and the other Rogues.

“I’ve you,” he returns honestly and watches the other man blushes in response.

Barry looks away, to the couch next to them, and Len smiles when his friend turns his hand so that he can grasp his wrist in return.

“I’m not ex-xactly a m-model c-citizen anym-more,” the blond replies quietly and there is a heaviness to these words that doesn’t sit well with Len.

“You’re better than any of those pompous capes could ever be,” he says a bit gruffly as he hates the sad look in the other man’s eyes or how he presses his lips into a thin line as he stubbornly refuses to believe so as well.

A brief silence settles between them that isn’t exactly uncomfortable but not pleasant either and he damns his own disability to make Barry understand that all this shit is not his fault, that he can’t think of it like he really deserves that this messed up stuff keeps happening to him.

Finding the right words is hard, though.

“Wh-where is th-this g-gallery?” Barry finally asks, still not looking at Len.

“Vienna.”

This gets the reaction he’s expected as the other man turns to him with huge eyes and gives him a look like he’s gone crazy.

“Wh-What?”

“Seriously, call me when you’re ready to be picked up.” Sam reminds Len once again with an increasingly annoyed frown. “Not a fucking hour before so that I’ve to wait like an idiot for you. I’m not your fucking servant.”

“Shove it, Scudder.” Len grunts and tries to block his colleague out, who hasn’t made a secret out of it what he thinks of being left waiting in the mirror for more than twenty minutes after he went to get Barry.

“You can shove it and look for another moron who gets you around the damn planet in fucking seconds if you keep doing this.” The other rogue hisses. “I don’t know how often I’ve to tell you dumbasses this but I’m no taxi!”

“Alright.” Len, who has been studying Barry so far, turn back to Sam with a glare. “I get it.”

The other man scowls at him but, thankfully, doesn’t go on bitching so that he can turn back to Barry, who doesn’t seem to pay them any mind while he’s looking through the portal that would lead them to their destination. There is a wary expression on his face and he looks very pale and tensed up again, enough so that Len starts to worry whether this has really been such a good idea.

“Well, then move it, we’re not getting any younger here and I wanna get back to the others and win at least some of the money back I lost thanks to you.” Sam huffs and just glares right back when Len scowls at him in response.
“Y-you’ll c-come wh-when we c-call you, th-though, r-right?”

They both turn to Barry, who is now watching Sam with an apprehensive look as if he was worried that the other man could abandon them here.

Some of the anger seems to leave Sam at that and he huffs in frustration, reaching up to rub his eyes.

“Yes, Allen, ’m not going to leave you here,” he agrees before he glances over to Len and smirks. “Well, at least not both of you.”

“You’re a real fucking comedian, Scudder.” Len frowns in annoyance before he turns to Barry and nods to the exit of the mirrorverse. “You’re ready?”

The blonde swallows, looking more like he’s on the way to the gallows than to something that is actually supposed to enjoy, and gives him a brief jerky nod.

Len goes first, mostly out of habit and because he knows that it would make Barry feel safer that way, not because he is worried about any unpleasant surprises as Gael knows that they are coming.

The room he enters is of average size with walls painted in a soft campaign colour and dark furniture that is mostly made of cherry wood. To his right is a bookshelf full of heavy looking books which covers give away their age and, as far as he knows Gael and his interest in rare things, each of these is probably worth as much as a small car. On the left, there is a big desk, sturdy and old looking but obviously kept in good condition, behind which a wide window gives a nice view to trees and part of a garden that is cut off by a tall wall from the surrounding area. Next to the desk is a liquor cabinet and next to it a smaller table with three chairs on which a vase with fresh flowers stands. The ground is carpeted, a dark blue colour that harmonizes with the general colour scheme of the office that Len hasn’t entered in over a year by now.

Next to nothing has changed, though, everything looks just as pristine and clean as always.

Still the same old neat-freak, it seems.

He hears Barry exiting the mirror behind him and turns to see how the other man keeps nervously glancing around as he steps up next to him.

“Remember,” Sam says from behind them and meets his gaze with another dark and warning look, “call me when you actually need me to pick you up, not-”

“Just scram already,” Len interrupts him annoyed.

The other man grumbles something of thankless asshat as he turns and finally vanishes.

“D-does y-your f-friend kn-know w-we’re c-coming?”

Len turns back to Barry, who is visibly ill at ease by being in a stranger’s room he knows next to nothing about. That they are currently in Europe, which is a glaring violation of his parole and alone could get him back to prison, isn’t really helping him to relax either.

“Yeah, he does,” he tells him and as if on a cue, the door to the office opens. Barry freezes immediately and looks to the new arrival, a Hispanic man in his late fifties with a receding hairline, clean shaved and thick horn glasses, wearing plain jeans and a dark polo shirt.

Gael, upon seeing them, lifts his eyebrows and smiles broadly.
“Well, I guess better late than never, right Len? Didn’t you tell me that you’d come around eight?” he asks as he walks over to them. “As tardy as always, mi amigo.”

Len snorts and accepts the offered hand with a smirk.

“Because you’re so damn busy these day, aren’t you?”

“What can I say? It’s my well-earned retirement.” The other man shrugs before he eyes him with a clearly fake concerned frown. “Maybe that’s something you should start thinking about as well seeing that you’re not getting younger either.”

“I’m not made of retirement material,” Len returns easily as he’s really not interested to quit his line of work anytime soon.

His friend chuckles and doesn’t seem in the least bit surprised. Then, he shifts his attention to Barry and he gives him a pleasant smile.

“You must be Mr. Allen, then,” Gael says before he adds with a glance to Len. “Didn’t think this shady bastard could make a friend who’s actually a decent fellow.”

Len snorts but ignores the little quip and instead turns to a clearly wary looking Barry and introduces them.

“Barry, this is Gael Mamani, a friend of mine who used to be someone in the business before he decided to retire his lazy ass and move to Europe to spend the rest of his day gardening.”

“Gardening is relaxing,” Gael replies amused, not at all insulted. “And it’s a talent to realize when it’s time to call it a day and to finally enjoy your life.”

“As far as I can remember, you always seemed to enjoy hunting for these posh knickknacks you love so much.”

“These posh knickknacks you’re talking about are worth more than any of the banks in your beloved Twins will likely ever hold in their vaults,” the other man points out in a slightly miffed tone, which causes Len snort in amusement. While they could go on like this for a while as he hasn’t seen Gael in nearly a year and it would have been nice to grab a beer with him and talk about old times, he really doesn’t want to make Barry feel like the third wheel here, though. Thus, he steers their conversation back to the blonde’s direction.

“You know me, I’ve no interest when it comes to art and that stuff,” he tells Gael with a shrug before he nods to the man next to him. “Barry, on the other hand, does and he’s a bit of an artist himself.”

As expected, Barry’s face turns bright red and he shoots Len a slightly annoyed look as he clearly not happy about being pushed into the limelight.

“Yes, you told me so,” Gael remarks, who is now studying the other man with new interest. “And I stand to what I’ve said before, it’s utterly mind-boggling that you suddenly decided to keep company of people who aren’t as culturally lowbrow as the rest of your merry man.”

“I’ll make certain to mention this to Lisa.” Len tells him with a smirk, which causes his friend to roll his eyes with exaggerated exasperation.

“Your sister is an exception, of course,” Gael replies drily. “She owns the true feminine sense of beauty, even if it seems to slip from her at times if you consider that she wastes her time with the lot of you.”
The Hispanic then turns back to Barry and he too seems to notice how uneasy the younger man is as he gives him another friendly smile.

“So, Mr. Allen, you’re interested in art?”

Barry, who needs a moment to find his voice again, coughs lightly and gives the other man a small nod.

“W-well, y-yes b-but I’m n-not v-very v-versatile in th-this a-area, I j-just… i-it’s j-just a h-hobby,” he explains and actually sounds apologetic as if he was somehow insulting their host by this. Len can’t help but frown at that, once again feeling frustrated by how damn insecure the other man is about himself and angry at the world at large for forcing this onto him.

Gael notices it as well, he notices it by how the man seems to consider Barry in a thoughtful war for a second but, thankfully, doesn’t comment on it and only remarks with a chuckle.

“An excellent choice for a hobby, my friend. You see, I myself have no talent whatsoever when it comes to doing art myself but I dare to say that I’ve the eye for it.”

Len has told Gael beforehand that Barry had been through a lot in prison, he didn’t go into detail but his friend is no idiot and while his family kept him from serving time, he too knows how things work in those places.

“What medium do you usually work with?” the other man goes on and Len watches how Barry starts to fidget slightly, probably uneasy to talk about it. This isn’t really a surprise, he is reluctant to show his sketches to anybody most of the time and actually seemed ashamed that one time when Len found the one sketch of him. Barry told him that it was an older one before sputtering that he doesn’t usually draw him, which was clearly a lie and Len found both amusing and quite flattering.

“Don’t listen to him,” Len interjects with a slight frown. “He’s really good, he drew a portrait of Lisa that looked just like her.”

Barry, once again as red as a tomato, gives him an annoyed but pleading look that clearly asks Len to shut up and causes Gael to chuckle.

“No reason to be ashamed for having talent,” the Hispanic tells him in good nature before he stirs the conversation away from Barry, for which the blonde is visibly grateful. “I don’t want to brag but I’ve to say that I’ve come to possess some quite unique art pieces over the years and if you’re interested, I wouldn’t mind to give you two a small tour through my gallery.”

Seeing that he told Barry about this beforehand, the other man only hesitates briefly, before he agrees somewhat reluctantly.

“Don’t look so worried,” Gael laughs as he hasn’t missed Barry’s hesitation. “I don’t know what Len told you about me but I can assure you that nothing will happen to you as long as you’re a guest under my roof.”

This causes Barry to flush again in embarrassment but he gives a small nod in agreement. Gael’s words don’t seem to help him to relax, though, as he still stays so tense that just looking at him is uncomfortable.

“Well, before we begin with our small tour, what do you think of getting some refreshments? I’ve gotten a really nice chateau and just waited for the right opportunity to open it,” Gael tells them as he walks over to his liquor cabinet. “It’s a Petrus, quite a fancy one that will make your taste buds sing according to a friend of mine who brought it over as a little gift when he visited me from France a couple of weeks ago. It’s from 1982 and think it’s current market price of is around 2,400 euros or so.”

Len nearly rolls his eyes at this and he wishes his friend could lay at least a bit off when it comes to shoving his money into other people’s faces. He isn’t surprised when Barry turns to him with an alarmed look.

“Just relax,” he tells him under his breath. “Gael is made of cash, a couple thousand bucks are peanuts to him.”

Barry jumps when the pop of the cork being pulled out of the wine bottle cuts through the air, and Len nearly reaches out to grasp his wrist once again.

It’s only a moment later that Gael comes back with the open bottle of ridiculous expensive wine and three just as fittingly posh looking crystal glasses.

“It’s probably been a while since you tasted anything else but that dishwater you like to drink so much,” the Hispanic remarks towards Len with a smirk before he turns to Barry, leaning a bit towards him and lowering his voice as if he was telling him a secret. “Our friend here has the worst taste when it comes to alcohol, preferring that nasty malt drink of his even if he is offered something actual tasteful for once. He visited me in Peru about fifteen years ago and nearly got lynched by abuelo because he possessed the audacity to decline a glass of his wine. You see, my family has been owning a winery for decades now and anybody with a lick of taste would give their right hand for a thimble full of it just so that they could tell their friends about this experiencia increíble.”

“Oh, for fuck’s sake, will you shut up?” Len huffs but isn’t able to force the amused grin off his lips. “Your nutcase of a granddad nearly lynched me because he’s just as full of himself as you are, Gael.”

The other man sniffs at that while he starts to fill up the glasses.

“I’m not surprised that such a philistine person like yourself is unable to understand the art of winery or the worth of a bottle of good wine.”

Once again, he turns to Barry as he goes on.

“That man doesn’t realize that life is made up of more than just money and cheap beer. He’s never gotten why someone would actually spend time and effort to get pieces of art and history if not for selling it off afterwards.”

Barry is obviously not sure how to answer and stays quiet, glancing uncertainly towards him as if trying to gauge his reaction to Gaels words.

“Don’t listen to him.” Len gives Barry a smirk as he accepts the glass of wine from the other man. “If it weren’t for me, this old geezer would’ve been sleeping with the fishes for a long while by now.”

“I’m not going to disagree with you there.” Gael grins amused and hands Barry a glass as well. “Len has many faults but the bastard certainly can think on his feet.”

“Cheers,” Len says in lieu of an actual agreement and the other two follow along.

“Y-you’ve kn-known each oth-her for l-long?” Barry asks after he’s lowered his glass again and glances curiously between both of them.

“About thirty years by now,” the Hispanic answers and shakes his head as he chuckles. “Damn, where the hell did all this time go, hm, amigo?”

“Don’t get all sappy on me,” Len retorts with a smirk before he takes a sip of the wine, which bitter flavour promptly causes him to make a face.

“Eres increíble.” The other man snorts and shoots Barry a look that says as much as ‘Can you believe that guy?’.

“It tastes sour.” Len grunts and glances down at the dark crimson liquid in the glass he is currently holding with a slightly disgusted expression. “Told you already a number of times that I don’t like this shit and you still always try to force this rotten grape juice on me.”

Gael actually scoffs at that and lifts to glass to take a sip. He hum appreciatively at its taste before he frowns at Len in mixture of annoyance and disbelief.

“A bottle of this rotten juice is worth nearly three grants.”

“Because that means anything?” Len smirks and ignores the glare he receives in response as he looks over to Barry. He notices that the other man hasn’t touched his wine so far, which he quickly pins on him probably having a queasy stomach again due to his nerves.

“Ignore him,” Gael tells Barry when he too realizes that his glass is still full. “The wine is fantastic.”

Len is about to tell him that he really doesn’t need to drink it when the blond lifts the glass and takes a sip.

Like Gael before, Barry seems to enjoy the flavour of the deep red liquid judging by his pleased hum.

“I-it’s g-good.”

“Traitor,” Len grumbles and is pleased when he notices Barry’s smile and the amused look he gets in response.

They stay for a bit in Gael’s office, finishing the wine and talking. The conversation is mostly held up by Len and his old friend at first, while the blonde just stands by quietly.

Over the next twenty minutes, Barry starts to relax a bit, though, and even lets Gael involve him into some small talk.

Len watches them as the Hispanic starts to tell Barry a bit about sights Vienna has to offer and feels some of his own tension ease away as he realizes that this little surprise trip could actually work out as intended.

He takes another sip of his drink while keeping his eyes on the other man, not considering that it is still wine, and grimaces accordingly in response to the unexpected sour taste, which causes Barry to glance at him with a smile as he doesn’t miss his reaction.

Despite the sour taste in his mouth, Len can’t help but return it.

Chapter End Notes
I hope you like the chapter, it initially was just supposed to be one but I split it in two because it got rather long in the end.

I introduced Gael here, a character you would have initially never met personally other than much later by reference in conversations, which is something I’m really glad about as it will hopefully help to integrate later plot points better in the story.

Also, I’m still sick, I thought I got over it toward the beginning of last week but then I went back to work and after the first day I felt horrible again, so I went to the doc (again) and it turned out that my flue turned into an outright middle ear infection (that’s autumn for me). Well, it’s not so bad anymore, I got good meds and now I’m feeling better again (hopefully for real now ;). Anyway, I’m still quite tired due to that and I just went over this chapter only once before uploading it, so please excuse if you can notice that.

Next one will be up next week and thanks again for all your lovely comments, I was really surprised and happy about how many I got for the last chapter. You, my dear readers, are just amazing! ;)

Here the translation from Spanish to English (put together with my non-existing Spanish skills, so please excuse any - likely - errors here ;):

abuelo – grandfather
experiencia increíble – unbelievable experience
Eres increíble. – You’re unbelievable.
Visit to the Gallery Part II (Len POV)

Chapter Summary

Gael gives Barry and Len a tour through his treasured art gallery.

Chapter Notes

Here is part two of Len’s and Barry’s visit to Gael’s private gallery – this time even with the actual visit itself. ;)
This chapter is not edited, so please excuse any errors you come across!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

When they finally leave the office to make their way to Gael’s private art collection, Barry seems much more relaxed than before, which is likely at least partly due to the wine he has drunk but mainly due to the Latin’s friendly and easy going nature.

Barry still sticks to Len’s side, which is just fine with him, and while the blonde keeps eying their surroundings just as attentively as before, it’s obvious that most of the worry has been replaced by curiosity by now. Len, who feels also more relaxed now that Barry doesn’t seem as intimidated or tensed up anymore, starts to pay more attention to the place as well.

The house they are in is actually an old villa his friend’s father bought decades ago as a family vacation point and everything in here still looks just as prim and proper as it has all the times before whenever Len passed by. Gael may claim that he hasn’t the same need to show his money off like the rest of his family does but he hardly ever acts on these words in reality, packing every room full with visibly expensive furniture and art pieces and keeping an actual staff around to keep everything in good condition.

“Y-you l-live h-here on y-you own?” Barry asks after they’ve passed through the whole second floor without crossing anybody’s way.

“Mostly,” Gael answers. “My brothers and my nephews and nieces like to pass by and spend a few days here every once in a while.”

“He also has a butler and like ten maids who fulfil his every wish,” Len adds with a smirk.

“Don’t make it sound so dirty.” The other man chuckles before he notices Barry’s surprised expression and explains. “He’s exaggerating, I’ve a friend who was once my father’s butler and moved with me to Austria. By now he’s more of a roommate than anything else, though. And regarding his claim of ten maids, there are two lovely ladies in their late forties who pass by two times a week to look after the house and cook for me whenever they are around. “

“s your butler on vacation today?” Len asks as he lets his eyes wander to the old grandfather clock next to the foot of the stairs they’ve just reached.
“Why, you miss George?” Gael chuckles, well aware of how little Len can stand that man and the way the former butler keeps wrinkling his nose whenever he is around, like his master had let an dirty street dog in.

“Fat chance,” he snorts and follows his friend deeper into the big house.

They reach another set of stairs and Len notices how Barry starts to slightly tense up again. He gives him a questioning look but the other man only smiles faintly in return and shakes his head.

Gael, who doesn’t notice their brief exchanges, leads them downstairs to the basement of the villa.

“I know that it’s quite a little tour to reach our destination but considering the worth my little collection has, it’s better to be safe than sorry,” he explains on their way down and shoots Barry a bemused look that says as much as Annoying, I know, but what can you do? before he glances to Len and smirks. “Especially with the kind of friend I tend to keep around.”

“Because I’d steal one of you ugly-ass paintings,” Len scoffs and while he is looking at Gael, he doesn’t miss how Barry moves a bit closer to him.

He isn’t sure what has the other man so on edge again but he doesn’t like it. When he glances again in his direction, Barry keeps his gaze straight ahead, though, obviously not willing to meet his eyes right now.

After leaving the stairs behind them, it’s just about another thirty feet before they finally reach their actual destination, a sturdy looking door that seems to be made of wood but Len knows better thanks to experience with breaking into a number of such private faults and having already been in there before.

Barry, on the other hand, seems surprised when he notices the display next to the door and when Gael starts go through quite an elaborate process of getting access to the room that includes flickering a card over a scanner below the screen, entering a rather long code and scan his hand on the display. Then, finally, probably just because the Latin thinks it is funny as he has quite an odd sense of humour, he pulls out a very ancient looking key, shoots both of them a grin, and unlocks the door the old-fashioned ways as well.

At Barry’s questioning and slightly bemused look, Len only rolls his eyes and shrugs.

“You know, Mr. Allen,” Gael starts with his right hand already resting on the door handle and his gaze on Barry. “In just a moment you’ll be welcomed in a very exclusive club made of just a handful of people who’ve ever been granted the possibility to enter this realm of human magnificence when it comes to art.”

“Oh, for Pete’s sake,” Len grumbles under his breath but loud enough for the others to pick up on it, which earns him a disapproving and annoyed glare from Gael and a clearly amused smile from Barry. “Just open the damn door already, Gael.”

“Remember that you’re not at your place,” the other man points out with a frown. “Either behave or I’ll leave you out here in the hallways.”

It is a joke, a very obvious one, but it still causes Barry to palpably tense up.

“I’ll be on my best behaviour.” Len snarks but reaches for the blonde’s wrists as soon as Gael turns back to the door. He gives it a brief and hopefully reassuring squeeze and meets Barry’s slightly embarrassed but still worried expression calmly, trying to make him understand that there is nothing to worry about.
The other man relaxes a bit again and gives him a small grateful smile in return. Len lets go of his wrist and they both turn back to their host when the door unlocks with a series of clicking sounds of retreating bolts and opening locks that make it clear that this door would probably pose quite an obstacle for anybody who tries to get themselves entrance by force.

“Welcome to my little private kingdom of arts,” Gael tells them proudly and Len feels the urge to roll his eyes come back with a vengeance.

While Len has been in here a couple of times before as he is actually responsible for two or three of the pieces that are in this collection in here, it is quite obvious that Barry has not. The other man actually gasps when his gaze falls upon the first picture that greets them on the wall opposite to the door which leads into a small entrance area from where visitors can either choose to start their little tour by going towards the short hallway that is connected to their left or the one to their right.

“Ah yes, the Le bassin aux nymphéas, reflets du saule, one of Monet’s greatest masterpieces.” Gael sounds quite pleased as he says so and studies Barry in an appreciative way. “You’ve good taste, mi amigo.”

Len, who has never been one for abstract art, has still to find out what this picture is actually meant to show other than oil paint being lazily dappled onto canvas to form leaves on water. He holds his tongue, though, as it is obvious that Barry doesn’t share his opinion judging by his wide eyes and clearly astonished expression.

“I kn-knew th-that it is i-in p-private h-hands,” the blond remarks quietly, studying the painting with a fascination as if it showed an answer to a question he has been looking for forever. “I’ve s-seen p-pictures of it b-before b-but… th-this is… h-he h-had s-such an r-remarkable s-style.”

Gael makes the impression of a cat who has just eaten the canary and shoots Len a clearly self-satisfied look, as if Barry’s amazement pointed out even more what a philistine he actually is.

Len fights the urge to flip him off and instead turns to the blonde, who is still studying the picture attentively and he can’t help but feel oddly pleased by how fascinated his friend is by it.

“I’m in the possession of quite some marvellous impressionistic art pieces,” Gael remarks to Barry. “And of many more movements. What do you think of Caravaggio or Rembrandt?”

“R-really?” Barry actually sounds out of breath, like the simple notion of seeing pieces of this long-gone artists is both ridiculously exciting and hard for him to believe.

Well, Len certainly knows now where the next art piece he gets his fingers one would go.

“Certainly,” Gael agrees, still looking stupidly pleased, and nods to the passage on their right. “Let’s go this route, I prefer to start with the old masters and work my way towards the modern, this way you can follow the evolution of art through the centuries.”

The next couple of hours are spent with Gael leading Barry through the different section of this labyrinth of a gallery while Len follows them around without paying too much attention to what is said regarding the history of the artists, the paintings, the art styles, the brushwork, the coloration, the layering and so on.

While the two other men talk about the single pieces, he watches Barry and how he slowly but surely starts to relax and become more certain of himself till he has an actual discussion with Gael about Da Vinci’s Salvator Mundi that is present in this collection and how it is more likely a copy than the original.
It is nice to see him not that self-conscious of his stammer anymore like he usually is around people he doesn’t know very well and how much passion he puts into what he’s saying, standing up straighter than usual with his eyes blazing brightly as he makes his points and gesturing to emphasize what he is saying.

Len hardly ever sees him like this and he notices once again how very handsome the other man is, making him want to step closer to him and touch him, just a loose grip on his wrist or a hand onto his back, maybe just a brief brush of their shoulders…

No matter how much he tries to deny it, Len is well aware of what this is what he is feeling for Barry and while a part of him really wants to act on it, he also knows that he would likely mess it up horribly if he did.

Lisa may call him stubborn and stupid or in denial but Len knows himself, even better than she does, no matter how much she would disagree with him there, and he knows that he isn’t the right person for Barry. Just looking back to how he fucked things up all over again a couple of weeks ago makes it more than obvious that he is just not able to give the other man what he needs. He isn’t patient and he certainly isn’t a good person and he would always end up hurting the blonde in one way or another.

If he was a better man, a stronger man, he would have cut Barry off for real a while ago.

But he is neither.

He can’t be with him in that way but he can’t let him go either.

In a way, he knows that it’s the same for Barry as well, though.

Barry seems to need to have him around, wants him to be there even though he is very aware of what a potential source of pain and disappointment he really is.

No matter how little Len likes to think about it in this way, he knows that his friend is damaged by what happened to him, broken by a horrible life nobody should have to endure, and this is one of the reasons, probably the only not selfish one, why he can’t let himself just disappear out of the blonde’s life.

Barry, for whatever reason, has decided that he needs him and Len would try to be there for him.

He will make mistakes and hurt him in future just as he had in the past, he is well aware of that, but he will still try to make sure that the other man doesn’t break under everything his life keeps throwing at him. Aside from that, he knows that has also to protect him from danger that comes with being connected to the Rogues these days.

Everything going on with Amunet and that fucker Carmon has made it more than clear that he is the most likely reason for Barry’s life being in danger right now. He still could kick himself for not being more careful, for letting one of their damn henchmen follow him to Barry and realize that the blonde is someone important to him.

Cutting all contact to him would be a possible way to deal with that but it would likely not work and probably even have more disastrous consequences as neither Amunet nor Carmon are stupid and would still end up using Barry as a wager against him to do their bidding.

Fuck those bastards and fuck this damn drug –

Len is startled out of his brooding when Barry laughs, actually outright laughs, not the quiet soft chuckle he usually uses but loud and bright and it is so unexpected that he can just stare at the blonde till the other man notices his gaze and quickly calms down again, looking slightly flushed and embarrassed but still smiling.

“Good thing he didn’t listen,” Gael remarks and meets Len’s confused and slightly annoyed gaze with a smirk. “Otherwise he would likely call me a hypocrite again or an outright liar but shame on him for ignoring us like this. It certainly serves him right.”

“You’re badmouthing me again, Mamani?” he asks gruffly but isn’t able to keep the grin tugging on the corner of his lips because Barry is looking at him in such a fond way that causes his stomach to flutter as if he was a damn teenager all over again.

“When am I not?” his friend retorts with a shrug, which causes Barry to chuckle again and Len to fight the nearly painfully strong need to reach out and pull the blonde closer.

He hadn’t expected this little trip to be such a success but Barry makes it hard to miss how very much he enjoys it here and he is glad for it.

After how down his friend has been for the last weeks, he certainly deserves a small pick-me-up.

“You want me to start and tell him some funny stories about you and the shit you got yourself into when you weren’t old as dirt yet?” Len arches an eyebrow and smirks when Gael frowns at the little quip against his age.

“I’ll remind you that you’re on the best way to be as old as dirt yourself.” The other man sniffs before he turns to Barry. “And don’t believe a word he says. This man is made of lies and bad puns, neither of which are worth listening to.”

“Will you shove it?” Len glares at his friend, not very happy about being reminded of his fondness to pepper up his image with puns, which, yeah, he even knew back then weren’t really that good but they were fun and everybody did things in their youth they aren’t exactly proud of when they are older.

“Why, mi querido amigo, isn’t it getting rather chilling in here all of a sudden?” Gael wonders aloud and actually starts to rub his upper arms as if he was suddenly freezing. “Hope nobody broke the heating, wouldn’t that be cold-hearted of our dear lady Fortuna?”

Barry snorts at that and ignores Len’s glare he gets in return.

“It w-would b-be b-bone-ch-chilling,” the blonde agrees instead.

“Not you as well…” He groans and pinches the bridge of his nose.

Maybe getting Barry to meet Gael wasn’t such a good idea after all…

“I l-liked y-your p-puns,” the other man points out in peaceable voice.

“No, you didn’t,” Len replies drily.

“N-not at f-first,” Barry agrees but adds. “Th-they d-did g-grow on m-me, th-though.”

He very much doubts that as using puns had been the best way to frustrate and annoy the Flash back in the day.

“Well, I for once am glad that you stopped using them,” Gael says. “You certainly had the worst sense of humour.”

“Th-they w-were f-funny in a w-way,” Barry protests much to Len’s surprise.

“For three year olds,” agrees the Latin with raised eyebrow, which causes Barry to chuckle again and Len to give him another glare.

It’s close to three in the afternoon when they finally reach the last room of the collection, which is one of Gael’s most precious possessions and something he invested quite some money and years in to finish.

Contrary to the rest of the collection, it is not directly connected to the route that winds through the different areas but has to be accessed via a rather inconspicuous door that is put just before the small entrance area where they have started their tour before.

“Now to the heart of my collection.” Gael says to Barry as he knows that Len couldn’t really care less about any more pieces of art and just want to finally leave. “It took me more than two decades to finish this and you don’t even want to imagine the money I had to invest to get all the single pieces together.”

Barry, obviously curious now, looks at the door expectantly as the other man once again enters a code on a display next to it that is similar to the one they have seen next to the main entrance door before.

Again a series of clicks follows as locks unlocking themselves before Gael pauses a moment longer because he just has to be so damn theatrical all the time.

“You certainly won’t forget this beauty anytime soon,” he tells Barry with a glint in his eyes before he finally opens the thick security door.

If Len could put a picture to his own definition of tacky, it would be of this room.

One could get nearly blinded by all the gold in here that reflected the bright ceiling lights and the best thing he could say about the furniture is that it looks uncomfortable, the worst that it is just plain horrendously ugly, it’s the same with the walls and the huge chandelier that probably has to weigh three hundred pounds by how massive it is. The rest of the room consists of more paintings and sculptures and that odd looking golden statue of some guy riding a horse on top of what has to be a shrine.

He knows from Gael that it was made for the first King of Prussia but he has no idea why anybody would want to have something like that in their house even if they have enough money to feed it to their horses.

Barry, on the other hand, seems utterly mesmerized by what he sees, which isn’t really a surprise as it seems to turn out that he has just as bad of an taste when it comes to these kind of things as Gael does.

“Th-this is th-the Amb-ber R-Room?” he asks, his voice low as if he was actually humbled by what he sees there right in front of him.

“It is,” the Latin agrees, looking like his grin could easily go round his head if he tried a little stronger. “It is indeed, Schlüter’s and Wolfram’s greatest masterpiece. A room made for the Kings of old.”

Gael, who is taking the whole thing in as well, like he couldn’t get enough of it, doesn’t notice the amused look Barry gives Len, who really starts to have enough of his friend and his annoying need to lay it on extra thickly when he thinks he has an audience he can impress.

"H-how d-did y-you g-get t-to it?" Barry turns back to their host. “It w-was s-supposed t-to b-be l-lost d-during W-Wold W-War t-two, w-wasn’t it?"

“It was indeed,” the other man agrees and again looks so very pleased with himself. “But you wouldn’t believe what can be archived with the right resources and enough endurance and patience.”

“He mean’s thanks to his parent’s money and due to his parent’s connections,” Len adds as he lets his gaze move around languidly.

“You know that’s not true.” Gael frowns clearly displeased by hearing this insinuation. “I didn’t get to a single one of the pieces here with the help of my relatives.” He pauses then for a second before he smirks and shrugs. “Well, except for the money, of course, but it’s not my fault I was born in my family, is it now?”

Len shoots him an amused look before he turns to Barry, who is studying his surrounding with a rather subdued look compared to how he initially reacted to it.

“Too gaudy?” he asks, trying to understand what caused the sudden change in the other man’s mood. He is surprised when there is a familiar sadness in the blonde’s eyes, accompanied by an also well-known guilt and shames as he briefly glances towards him before he shakes his head and looks back.

“N-no.” Then, Barry seems to reconsider it for a moment and gives him a faint smile. “W-well, m-maybe a l-little.”

It isn’t really hard to guess then what has caused this sudden change in his friend’s demeanour as Len hasn’t missed how he tensed up every time they’ve passed a painting or other art piece before of which Barry must have either known or at least suspected that it was outright stolen.

Gael probably noticed his guest’s reaction too, the man is certainly observant enough to do so, but he choose to ignore it as he knew from Len that Barry was a former cop, who was wrongly put into prison and had his former life pretty much ruined.

Both Len and Gael know that one can’t simply get rid of one’s nature and believes so easily, that those things often stuck to one till the end, but Barry has given the Latin no reason to react anything but friendly towards him so far as the blonde knew better than to start a fight over something like a stolen piece of art in this kind of company.

Still, Barry’s guilt and shame over enjoying a tour through Gael’s private art collection doesn’t sit well with Len as he wants the other man to enjoy this little trip without feeling like he is betraying his own principles for it.

Of all the people he knows, he wishes Barry would be a bit more selfish at times, grant himself a bit more leeway, because with where he is right now, he certainly doesn’t have to try and keep himself at such a high moral standard anymore.

Gael snatches the blonde’s attention again by starting to point out where he got the single pieces and what’s the story behind them, which is certainly entertaining for anybody who isn’t Len.

Despite his growing boredom and urge to finally move as he hadn’t expected them to stay for nearly four hours, he waits patiently, once again making do with watching his blond friend who soon seems able to relax and emerge himself into a conversation again.
Nearly another hour later, when they finally leave Gael’s collection behind and make their way upstairs to have dinner with the other man, who hasn’t accepted a no on their part as an answer, Len decides that he isn’t going to visit another art gallery or art museum any time soon again, not even for a damn heist seeing that he has certainly gotten more information on historical artists and politics today than he ever wanted to know.

While Gael is on the phone, ordering something for them to eat, Len and Barry took a seat on the other man’s couch in his living room that is just as spacious and as the rest of the house.

They are both nursing a glass of wine again as Gael, that jackass, conveniently forgot to buy any beer despite knowing that Len would pass by. There is an actual open fireplace in front of them but the chimney was closed a while ago and these days the fire one can watch flicker in there is only of artificial nature anymore, along with the fitting sounds of the logs crackling thanks to an audio file that is played over a hidden sound system.

Even so, it is still nice and even Len can admit that he finds it relaxing.

It’s definitely the same for Barry, who is sitting unusually close to him and seems rather drowsy, probably due to all the walking and also the wine he is currently drinking. The blonde is watching the flames quietly with half-lid eyes and a rather relaxed and calm expression on his face.

Len’s gaze drops a bit and he notices that his lips are slightly parted-

He averts his eyes towards the artificial fire that is burning in the fireplace and takes a gulp from his glass, welcoming the sour taste to banish what he has briefly imagines would the mouth of the man next to him taste like.

Fuck, this is exactly why he never drinks this shit, while he has no problem with beer, wine always make his mind go to places it really wouldn’t otherwise.

He nearly startles when there is a tentative and unexpected touch to his left underarm that feels like it’s burning his skin even through the shirt he is wearing.

So far, Barry has touched him only a couple of times, not even a handful probably, mostly it is just Len initiating any physical contact between them, and seeing the other man’s hands resting on his arm is nearly hard to grasp for him.

Barry’s blue eyes are warm when he meets them and for the first time he notices that the wariness that has been always in there for the last weeks is actually gone and replaced by something he can’t name, not because he hasn’t an inkling of what it is but because he can’t allow himself to go there.

“Th-thank y-you, L-Len,” the other man says quietly and squeezes his arm lightly. “I r-really enj-joyed t-today… w-w-with you.”

A slight flush creeps over the blonde’s face but he doesn’t avert his eyes.

Len wonders for a brief moment whether Barry has every really considered to act on what there is between them, whether he would ever really want to with everything that has happened to him.

In the end, it doesn’t really matter, though.

He stays quiet and cups Barry’s hand with his own.

“He’s definitely not the usual kind of people you tend to pick as friends.” Len, who has watched Barry, turns back to Gael and frowns. His friend arches an eyebrow and shrugs. “Don’t get me wrong, I like him, he’s pretty alright for a former cop. It’s just that you usually prefer to surround yourself by people who are a little more like yourself.”

He snorts and gives the other man a grim smile.

“You mean assholes?”

“Well, I wouldn’t have said it this bluntly but…” Gael grins before he turns his attention back to Barry, who has fallen asleep on the couch about five minutes ago. He studies the blonde for a while before he glances back to Len. “When you told me that he’s would be pretty messed up due to what happened to him in prison you really didn’t exaggerate.”

Len frowns as the statement rubs him the wrong way.

“He isn’t messed up, I never said that,” he argues and has to remind himself that he has to keep his voice down to not wake the blonde next to him.

“Of course you didn’t but we both know what you meant,” the other man points out easily before he lifts a hand to stop Len from protesting. “Don’t be so defensive, I’m not meaning to insult him, I’m just stating the obvious. If you’ve such a problem with the term messed up let’s just call it traumatized, you like that better?”

He is right, Len doesn’t like it but he knows that Gael is only stating the truth.

“Por el cielo, don’t looks so pissed.” His friend chuckles before his expression turns more serious. “It’s a shame what happened to him, he’s obviously a good man.”

“Yeah,” Len agrees quietly and looks back to Barry. The other man has nodded off sitting upright with his chin resting on his collarbone and he would certainly have to deal with a stiff neck should he not change his position anytime soon. He thinks about pulling him a bit closer, so that his head would rest onto his shoulder but Gael is right there and he can’t bring himself to do so.

“How come that you two became friends if I may ask?” Gael meets his gaze calmly as he takes another sip of his wine before he adds. “You usually don’t frequent with the arm of the law.”

“He wasn’t a real cop.” Len averts his eyes to the artificial fire in the fireplace. “He was a forensic scientist-”

“A CSI?” his friend interrupts and sounds oddly delighted. “Jose always wanted to become one when he was young, he drove papi crazy with it.”

“Your brother?” Len snorts in disbelief. “The don?”

Gael shrugs and smirks. “We all were young once.”

“No shit.” Len shakes his head and tries to imagine Jose Mamani as someone working for the law but utterly fails. There probably exists not enough imagination in the world to make this possible.

“So, how did you and a CSI become friends?”

“Don’t know, it just happened,” Len explains reluctantly.

“Just happened that you took a former man of the law under your wings?” Gael asks incredulously.
“You remember that you hate pigs, don’t you?”

“He isn’t one-”

“Same difference, mi amigo. He still worked for the police and you Rogues usually don’t like to mingle with that sort, do you?” The other man points out and isn’t fazed at all by Len’s annoyed glare.

“Maybe it’s just none of your business?” he retorts grimly.

Gael chuckles and looks down to the glass in his hand with an amused smirk. They sit in silence for a long moment before the other man turns to Barry again.

“I can never say with you whether you’re that obnoxiously difficult on purpose,” Gael says while studying the blonde,“ or not.” He turns back to Len and gives him a thin smile. “Are you really that worried that I would harm your friend? Why did you bother to bring him over then?”

“It’s not that,” Len explains. “I trust you, otherwise I wouldn’t have brought him along, Gael. I just don’t like to talk about how we’ve met. He’s a good friend, that’s all there’s to know.”

“A good friend?” Something about the Latin’s amused smirk rubs him the wrong way and it must be obvious on his face as the other man quickly adds in a placating manner. “I’m sorry, I tend to stick my nose into things that aren’t any of my business but old habits day hard, mi amigo. You should know that better than anybody.”

“He’s just a friend,” Len insists and tries not to feel so damn embarrassed and livid about the other man having the damn nerve to say otherwise.

“Okay,” Gael agrees simply, which is just even more infuriating if that’s even possible.

Len glares down at the couch table made of hardwood in front of him, fighting the itch in his right fist that tries to urge him to hit something, preferably the other man’s face.

“We never really had the reason to touch upon the topic,” Gael says after the following uncomfortable silence has gotten on too long for his taste, “but I’m no homophobe.”

“Good for you.” Len hisses angrily and if looks could kill he is pretty sure that his friend would have died ten times over in the past couple of seconds.

“Right.” The other man sighs before he leans back into his chair and takes another sip from his glass of wine. “So, seeing how very well you take to talking about your friend, why don’t you tell me instead how your business with the black-market woman of yours is coming along. She’s still not over you dropping her like a wet towel?”

Len is certain that Gael is an ass on purpose now.

“Amunet is stubborn but she will calm down,” he tells him and glances over to Barry to make sure that the other man is still asleep.

“Really?” The incredulity is thick in his friend’s voice. “I don’t know whether we’re really talking about the same woman here. Amunet isn’t stubborn, that crazy woman is obsessive. She wanted to shag you for years and you knew that. I’ve really no idea how you could be so stupid to actually let yourself get into this with her, it’s like giving a junky a shot for free and expecting them not coming back for more.”
“She’s out of her luck, then,” he replies curtly.

“Wonder whether she’s aware of that.” Gael nods to Barry. “She knows about him?”

Len bristles at that and nearly get up to tell the other man off but he is still very much aware of the blonde next to him and instead takes a deep breath before he goes on in a forced calm.

“She does.”

“And she didn’t go after him so far?”

When Len fails to answer but his expression darkens, Gael snorts and shakes his head.

“How the hell is he still alive?”

“She knows that I would come after her if she harms one of—”

He breaks off because he wanted to say my Rogues and that just isn’t right, considering how Barry would probably kick up a storm by being put into the same category as them.

“You’re really fucking sentimental for such an infamous badass, you know that?” Gael grins and ignores the glare he receives in return.

“Shove it,” Len grumbles. “She won’t go after him again, I’ve talked to her and made myself clear.”

“You’re actually considering working for her?” This seems to catch the other man off-guard.

Len shrugs and takes a gulp from the by now rather warm wine, which causes it to taste even more awful than usual.

“There’s not exactly a wide range of options I can choose from,” he reminds his friend grimly. “With those jackasses of the Blue Velvet having her back, it’s difficult to keep her at a distance much longer if we want to hold our turf in the Twins.”

“You’ve spent nearly all of your live in those two cities, Len, isn’t that starting to get boring, anyway? Why not look out for a new playground instead? You know that my Cousin has this business in Brazil—”

“No,” Len cuts Gael firmly off. “We’re the Rogues, we’re not moving towns, the Gems are our turf, it’s always been like that and it will stay like that, nobody is going to change that, not Amunet and not Carmon.”

“Have you ever considered that this is probably the best time to let go of these stupid sentiments of yours?” Gael wonders with a slightly concerned frown. “You’ve more to worry about than that puta loca or Cameron. You know that things will get hot very soon in the states with how the public sentiment towards the heroes is changing, maybe it’s not a stupid idea to move someplace else for a while.”

“This concerns the fucking heroes—” Len starts but is cut off by the other man.

“Right, because the public will certainly turn a blind eye on the villains when they start to regulate the people more strictly who are actually doing them some good.” Gael meets his eyes firmly as he goes on. “Alvares is from the twins, you can imagine what happens to people like you when that nutcase actually becomes the next mayor?”

“He’s like many other politicians have been before him,” Len says dismissively, even though he is well aware that his friend is probably right with his worries. Right now, he has enough on his plate than to worry about any fucking politician as well, though.

“Let’s hope you’re right, mi amigo.” It is obvious that Gael doesn’t agree with him and he can’t hold it against his friend as he himself knows that every kind of threat, no matter how small, shouldn’t be taken lightly.

“Yeah,” he agrees quietly and turns his gaze back to Barry, who is fast asleep by now but still is able to look utterly exhausted despite that. “Let’s hope so.”

Chapter End Notes

Hope enjoyed this chapter!

Looking up art pieces that are in private hands or have gone missing for this chapter was quite interesting. I like art and enjoy going to art galleries and art museums in real life (we have quite a couple really neat places here in Vienna when it comes to this) and it was fun and surprising to learn how many pieces of famous artists the public will never get to see in actuality other than on photos or replicas because they are in private hands.

Anyway, at least Barry got the opportunity to see some of these here thanks to Gael! ;)

I actually rearranged the content the next chapters (partly to make them longer :3 ) and to get myself a better overview again as this can be a bit of a problem when you have already written a story but start to add stuff to it. I’m pretty good when it comes to backup chapters for the next three weeks (having to stay in bed and being not allowed to do much other than rest has the advantage that I was able to do quite some writing, which you may have noticed by the couple of one-shots I put out over the last week) and I will probably keep at my schedule to update once a week with them but after than it could take a bit longer between updates (doesn’t has to be the case, I just want to mention it in case it happens).

Also, I really want to thank you guys for your kind feedback again, I really enjoy getting these, especially when I wasn’t feeling so good the last couple of weeks! :)

Hope you all are doing great! Till next Sunday!

mi querido amigo – my dear friend

Por el cielo – for heaven’s sake

puta loca – crazy bitch

Le bassin aux nymphéas, reflets du saule – A piece by Monet that’s worth between 100 – 150 million dollars and in some undisclosed person’s private art collection. The title translates to “reflections of the weeping willow over the water lilies pond”. It was painted around 1920.

Salvator Mundi – An art piece by Leonardo Da Vinci, painted for King Louis XII of France around 1500. Original has been lost for centuries and while it seems to have turned up again in 2005, many experts are still uncertain whether it isn’t just one of the many copies that have been made of this piece. Its worth is 75 to 100 million dollars.

The Amber Room – A room that had been sculpted out of amber by the German baroque sculptor and architect Andreas Schülter and the Danish amber craftsman Gottfried Wolfram. The room began construction in 1701 and was installed at Charlottenburg Palace, the home of Griedrich I, the first Kind of Prussia, before it was given to Peter the Great in 1716 to celebrate the peace between Russia and Prussia. It contained many jewels, painting and gold and around six tons of amber on 55 square meters and was dismantled and stolen by the Nazis during WWII. The Amber room has been lost since then.
Chapter Notes

Here is another chapter or, to be correct, one chapter that has initially been two. I decided to put these two together because I won’t be able to update next week and because it fits due to their content. It got rather long because of it and I hope you don’t mind (you’ve more time to read it, tho ;).

It is not edited, so please excuse any mistakes you find in it. If you like to, don’t hesitate to point any gramma errors and such out to me, I will always appreciate it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

April 2nd year

“It is so nice of you to do this, my dear,” Mrs Ming says as she hands Barry a glass of lemonade before she turns back to the freshly painted walls of her living room with a pleased look, obviously liking the job that has been done so far.

He lets his eyes go over the nearly done room as well and decides that the work of the last couple of hours has really paid off nicely as the fresh colour does give the room a very nice new look.

“You two have done such a really marvellous job and I’m certain James is also very grateful that you’re helping him with this,” she goes on and looks over to her grandson with a warm smile. “The poor boy has to spend his holiday working in my old little flat instead of finally getting some time to relax.”

James, who is already sipping on his refreshment, chuckles and rolls his eyes in mock exasperation. “The poor boy is glad when he can help you with something. I’ve been way too little around over the last two years, I’m glad that there’s something I can help you with, lao lao.”

It is a nice experience to watch both of them to interact so lovingly with each other. The last month has had Barry in somewhat of a depressed mood for the most part and while Len’s little surprise trip is still not failing to let a pleasant warmth spread through his chest whenever he thinks about it, it also causes a familiar dread to follow up close as most of the Rogues are currently back in the Heights due to how massively south their last heist went.

Being somewhere where he can distract himself from the worry that is constantly nagging at the back of his mind is very welcome and to spend some time in such a nice company like this also helps him to forget about his current troubles at least for a little while. Offering Mrs Ming to paint her living room has certainly been a good decision.

She mentioned to him how she was intending to hire someone to do so the last time Barry and she sat over a new puzzle at the beginning of this week and he thought it would be a nice way to thank her for all her kindness by offering to do the painting himself. While it certainly could never repay all the times she invited him to stay for tea and snacks whenever he felt depressed or lonely, it is at least a small token of gratitude.
James decided to join in on this little endeavour rather unexpectedly this early afternoon as he returned about a week earlier from his last business trip and wasn’t willing to let the chance to help his grandmother get away.

Barry hasn’t exactly been happy about the prospect to work this close with the other man but, against his initial worries, it has not even come close to be as awkward or uncomfortable as he expected it would.

“Well, I will leave you two to your work, then,” Mrs. Ming says and gives both of them another warm smile before she vanishes back to her kitchen where she is currently working on their supper. It is supposed to be a small thank you to both of them for their help and Barry is quite curious to find out what she’s making as the older woman has been very secretive about it so far.

“I’m certainly looking forward to dinner,” the man next to him says with a chuckle. “I’m starving.”

Barry jumps slightly as he hasn’t expected James to speak and feels just as stupid as the handful of times before this has happened today so far. Somewhat reluctantly, he turns to him.

“I’m s-sure it w-will b-be g-good,” he says somewhat lamely and gives James a faint smile before glancing down at the ground, feeling a familiar unease settle over him he just is unable to get rid of.

Since his run-in with the Blue Velvet’s middlemen, he has become ridiculously tense around other men again, even though he is very much aware of how silly this really is, especially with James, who’s certainly not interested in harming him.

It’s depressing how similar he feels to how it was just after he’s been released from prison and he hates it…

“You’re ready to take on the last wall?”

Once again, Barry startles slightly and looks back to James who, while still smiling, is now watching him with that slightly concerned curiosity again like he had a number of times already over the course of the afternoon.

“Y-yes,” he stammers curtly before James has any opportunity to inquire whether he is alright as, even though the other man has been surprisingly lenient when it comes to his odd behaviour so far, Barry knows that he can’t possibly have missed his ongoing jumpiness and general nervous attitude around him.

“Good.” James nods and while gives him a somewhat faint smile, Barry doesn’t miss his slight frown or how his eyes linger a moment longer on him with a look that is both curious and a bit concerned. He doesn’t say anything else, though, and instead walks over to the last wall that hasn’t gotten a new paintjob yet.

Barry hesitates for a moment before he follows.

They work mostly in silence for the next twenty minutes and while it isn’t a particularly uncomfortable one, Barry keeps wondering what the other man must be thinking of him and how odd he has to appear by how tongue-tied and tensed up he is despite how obvious it is that his companion tries to be friendly.

He does feel bad for how stand-offish he has to come across but he knows that there isn’t much he can do about it. This is by far not the first time he had to interact with another person who is intimidating him just by being there and trying to force himself to make small-talk with James would make things only more awkward.
It is stupid but with Len and most of the Rogues gone to whom he has become quite close to so far, he feels more vulnerable than he has in a long time, even though he knows that this makes no sense in a situation like this. James is his employee’s grandson, a really nice man, who could not be any more different from criminals like the ones that are currently troubling his friends and while he is very much aware of it, it’s like his subconscious still urges him to be ridiculously suspicious of him nonetheless.

Barry shakes the depression thoughts off and forces himself to turn his attention back to the task at hand. Drawing and painting, even if it’s just Mrs Ming’s living room, are surprisingly effective ways for him to relax, and it certainly doesn’t hurt that he enjoys the task at hand and how he can mostly lose himself in the repetitive simple motions of it.

As a teenager, he earned himself some money by helping out the people in his old neighbourhoods with smaller tasks, among others painting fences or window frames, and even though it was never a very demanding thing to do, he usually enjoyed it. It was a possibility to get out but also do something else with his time other than just hiding away from home-

“My grandmother told me you’re quite an artist.” James’ voice doesn’t fail to catch him off-guard again and Barry freezes for a second before he forces himself to look over to the other man. His face grows hot as soon as he realizes what has actually been said and he can’t stop himself from protesting feebly.

“I’m r-really n-not th-that g-good,” he explains and ducks his head in embarrassment when he notices that James is watching him attentively now.

“I don’t know about that,” the other man remarks and while Barry isn’t looking at him anymore, he knows by the tone of his voice that he has to be smiling. “I’ve seen a couple of sketches you gave her and they look pretty good to me.”

Barry unconsciously bites his lower lip as his cheeks heat up and keeps his gaze on the brush in his hand, wishing that they would not touch upon this. He is sure the other man just wants to be nice but he has never been good when it comes to dealing with compliments, especially when it comes to his hobby as he isn’t really that good at it.

“I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to make you feel uneasy.” James sounds sincere and meets his eyes with a serious but kind expression when Barry glances up.

“I just like your sketches,” he goes on. “At least to me, they seems very good.”

“Th-thanks,” Barry says quietly and already feels bad for how he reacted to this obviously well-meant words. He gives the other man a small smile before he turns his attention back to the nearly finished wall.

They don’t talk again after that and while Barry tries to keep his mind on painting there is still a familiar guilt gnawing at the back of his mind for how unfriendly he’s must come across.

It’s about fifteen minutes later that they’re done and they both start to put the painting utensils away and clean themselves up before Mrs. Ming calls them for dinner.

The surprise meal turns out to be different kinds of filled buns which taste just delicious and seem to be one of James’ favourite dishes, at least judging by how many of them he is able to wolf down. Barry enjoys them too but at a slower pace, savouring the tastes of the different fillings that are mostly new to him, while he listens to James who tells them about their last business trip to Canada and his brief camping trip he had with a friend during his last two days there.
“So, we were lying in this tiny tent, both of us bone-tired after the fishing fiasco and half asleep, and suddenly there is the sound of something big moving right next to me on the other side of the ridiculously thin fabric of our tent.” James turns out to be a rather entertaining story teller, he knows how to use his voice to keep their attention with his hands moving along to his words at times to emphasize certain part, and there is a way to how he speaks, something energetic that is just contagious.

Both Barry and Mrs. Ming listen attentively as he tells them about what was most likely a grizzly bear that accidentally found its way to their camping location in the middle of the night, how he was stiff as a board due to fear while his friend couldn’t care less and actually fall asleep on both him and the bear which was still making its rounds outside their tend.

“I could have kicked his ass in that moment.” James laughs and quickly turns to his grandmother and somewhat sheepishly adds. “Sorry for the language, lao lao.”

He seems to notice Barry’s amused smile then as he turns to him and grins.

“And John had the nerves to complain during all of the next day about how slow I was,” the other man goes on with a chuckle, “because he clearly couldn’t understand how any sensible person would stay up all night just because some stupid bear passed by. He clearly has no idea that we city-boys aren’t used to sleep in places where hungry beast can maul us at nights because they think we would make an amazing midnight snack.”

“I don’t understand why you would want to do a camping trip with dangerous animals like those around, anyway,” Mrs. Ming tells her grandson with a slight disapproving frown. “I don’t even want to consider what could have happened to you out there.”

“You really don’t need to worry,” James assures her. “John is a ranger, if anybody knows whether a situation out there is dangerous or not, it’s him. I just overreacted, you know me.”

“Still, you didn’t even tell me that you would do such a thing,” the older woman goes on. “What if something had happened to you out there?”

James looks rather guilty at that.

“I know but the opportunity to do so just came about and I didn’t want to worry you. We both know that you’d probably have gotten as little sleep that night as I did if I’ve told you.”

“I’m your grandmother, James, of course I would have been worried,” she chides softly. “What else do you have a grandmother for than to look after you?”

Barry watches them quietly as he sips on his cup of tea and tries to ignore the slight stinging sensation in his chest. He’s too old for this, to mourn after something like kind old grandparents, and he feels foolish for doing so anyway.

The taste of the warm jasmine tea turns shallow as the unwelcomed memory of his own childhood forces itself onto him and he tries to will it away, suddenly angry at himself for still having not made his peace with this missing part of his life.

The thought that he had something similar to grandparents once, though, catches him off-guard then and he can’t stop his own mind to bring up the unwelcome memories of the times he spent with Jay and Joan. How those two kind and lovely people were to him more of a family than any of his foster families had ever been and how they accepted him and later on Iris and Wally as well like they actually were their own.
It hurts to remember this, it causes a familiar sharp and cold pain to bloom in his chest like ice flowers on glass-

“You’re alright there, Barry?”

James meets his gaze with a slight worried expression and Barry feels his cheeks grow hot again as he realizes that he got caught up in his own stupid mind once again.

He forces himself to smile and nods.

“Y-yes, j-just t-tired,” he explains and reaches for his cup of tea again, just so that he has something in his fingers. It isn’t lost on him that Mrs. Ming watches him with a familiar concern as well now and it is just plain frustrating how he is able to bring the people who actually care for him down like this every time he is around them. It is really a miracle that they aren’t fed up with him just yet.

The rest of the evening passes by rather quickly and while Barry finds himself in one of those morose moods again, he puts effort into being part of the conversation some more even if it’s just to get some of the worry to vanish from the kind old woman’s face.

Shortly before ten, feeling full and drowsy, Barry decides to take his leave as he still need about an hour to reach home and even though the slight depression from before has mostly left him again, he is tired and just wants to crawl into his bed and sleep.

James decides to take this as his cue to leave as well, which isn’t really surprising as the man has kept yawning through the bigger portion of the later part of their conversation. He is likely still exhausted from the lost night of sleep from a couple of days ago.

“You sure you are alright, my boy?” Mrs. Ming asks as Barry put his jacket on and it’s obvious that she is still somewhat worried, probably because she can sense his mood. He gives a reassuring smile and nods.

“I’m f-fine, n-nothing s-some s-sleep c-can’t t-take c-care of.” Which usually is true as he tends to feel better in the mornings after some rest. He is glad to see when this seems to set her mind somewhat at ease.

“Thank you again for your help, my dear boy,” the old woman tells him warmly and gingerly takes hold of his right hand to give it a slight squeeze. “You both have done a wonderful job.”

No matter what, it’s always pleasing to hear such nice praise and Barry feels a familiar fondness for the old woman overcome him.

“I’m g-glad I c-could h-help,” he tells her and genuinely means it.

Mrs. Ming repays him another kind smile before she glances over to the clock above the entrance to the kitchen. After studying it for a second, she turns back to him with a slight frown. “You will have to take the nightline to travel home, won’t you?”

Barry doesn’t have the opportunity to agree before Mrs Ming turns to her nephew who has just put on his own coat.

“James, would it be a bother for you to drive Barry home? It would take him over an hour otherwise and while I would give him off tomorrow morning,” she says and shoots Barry a slightly exasperated but also fond look, “he most likely would still arrive on time for the opening.”

“Of course,” the other man agrees readily and turns to Barry. “That wouldn’t be a problem.”
“N-no, it’s f-f-fine, y-you r-really d-don’t h-have t-to b-bother,” he tries to decline but James waves him off.

“It wouldn’t be a bother. I don’t have to work tomorrow and can sleep in as long as I want.”

“You really would do me a favour,” Mrs Ming adds and gives her grandson a grateful look. “I wouldn’t have to worry about Barry arriving home safe and sound.”

They are ganging up on him…

Barry isn’t sure what to think of that and while he feels a bit befuddled by this realisation, it’s also kind of amusing. He knows that there really isn’t any way for him to get away from this offer and while notion of being alone with the other man makes him uncomfortable, he doesn’t want to appear rude either, especially with how obvious it is that this would really mean a lot to Mrs. Ming.

“Ok-kay,” he agrees still somewhat reluctantly but thanks James for the kind offer.

“No need to,” James tells him and really doesn’t seem bothered by having to make a detour because of him.

Barry tries not to show his anxiety and reminds himself this is Mrs. Ming’s grandson and he doubts that his pleasant behaviour has only been a facade so far.

After they said their good-byes, Barry follows the other man to his car that is parked in front of the small shop. It is a sleek and expensive looking model in a dark metallic blue that gleams in the light of the street lantern nearby. One he would never have been able to buy even during his time as a forensic scientist.

Briefly, he wonders again how it is that Mrs Ming’s grandson is so well off while she is obviously living a rather modest life and still working with over eighty years. They seem to love each other very much, after all, and James seems like a nice enough man who wouldn’t mind to share his money with his loved ones.

“You’re alright there?” Barry jumps slightly and realizes that he halted a couple of feet away from the car while James has already unlocked it and opened the door on his side. “Have you forgotten something?”

“N-no,” he quickly assures and makes his way over to the other man. “I w-was j-just l-lost in m-my mind f-for a s-sec-cond. S-sorry.”

The other man chuckles and tells him not to worry. “I’m a master when it comes to losing myself in my own head.”

The car is just as nice-looking on its inside as it is on the outside and Barry can’t but let his eyes go over the interior which is obviously state-of-the-art, all leather that feels smooth and soft to the touch, seats that feel way more comfortable than even his own bed and with a main touch display being present at the headboard instead of regular buttons.

“You live in the Keys, right?” James asks while he starts the car which causes the display to light up and some radio music to play in the background.

“Yes, m-my ap-partm-ent b-building is at th-the c-crossing of M-Messner’s and L-Loebs’.”

The other man hums and starts to touch some of the fields on the display which calls up a navigation system where he puts in the address. Barry is pretty impressed by this and also a bit surprised that James hasn’t commented at all on his obviously expensive car.

It is probably unfair but he is used to people who have a lot of money to touch upon this fact even if it is unconsciously and not in a pretentious way. He is glad that the other man doesn’t seem to see the need to do so.

“You alright with KC 3?” James’s question causes Barry to turn his attention back to him. It takes him a moment before he realizes that he is talking about the radio station.

“Yes.”

The music that is currently playing sounds nice enough to him. It is a song he knows from work as there’s usually a radio playing for the customers during the day and he has never really been a picky listener, anyway.

Barry puts on the seatbelt and listens to a female voice that starts to instruct James the route to his apartment building.

The car pulls back and he decides to turn his attention to the window and watch the world pass by outside like he usually does when he travels home by bus as it is kind of soothing to him.

For the next couple of minutes, they drive in silence other than for the radio that plays in the background.

Barry listens to the DJ of the channel as he announces the next song without really paying much attention to him while he watches the city outside. It is a lulling experience and he feels how his eyes start to grow heavy, especially now that the car starts to get warm.

“Thanks again for helping today.” James’ voice cuts through his drowsy mind and causes him to freeze up. It only takes him a moment to get out of his stupor, though, and he looks to the other man who meets his eyes briefly before he turns his attention back to the streets in front of them. “I know that today is your day off and I really appreciate it.”

The other man’s gratefulness makes him feel somewhat uncomfortable as he really doesn’t think that it’s such a big deal. Mrs. Ming has been the first person who has shown kindness to him after his release from prison and she has never reacted with anything but patience to him and his odd quirks unlike most other people would have. He knows that he has been outright lucky to get to work for her and painting her living room is most likely the least he could do to repay her for how she makes him feel less like a waste of air but like someone who deserves this kind of treatment despite of who he is and his past.

“It means a lot to her,” the other man disagrees and adds. “I’ve been worried about her because I’m so much away and it’s good to know that she has someone who does help her with the shop and the tasks that have gotten too much for her.”

James looks over to him once more with a serious expression.

“She’s a very kind-hearted old lady and I was concerned because of that because most people would have taken advantage of it,” he tells him earnestly before his expression lightens somewhat again. “It’s good to know that I don’t have to worry about this anymore.”

Not sure how to respond to this, Barry only nods quietly and turns his attention back to the car window. To his relief, James doesn’t say anything else regarding this matter but turns back to the streets as well.

Usually, it takes him about fifty-five to seventy minutes by bus to arrive home at this hour as he has to change the line once and the busses usually use a longer route after ten. Going by James car reduces this to not even twenty-five minutes and while Barry has felt mostly awkward during their ride he still end up being glad to have accepted the offer after all.

The streets are mostly empty when they pull up his corner and park in front of the building’s entrance.

“I think this should be your apartment complex, right?”

Barry nods and gives the other man a grateful smile.

“Thank you for giving me a lift.”

“Of course.” James returns it easily and Barry is just about to bid him good bye and open the door to exit when the younger man stops him. “I’m not sure whether you’re interested but I’m going to lay a new parquet floor in my apartment and I could need a helping hand. You would get paid for it, of course.”

When Barry hesitation, he goes on.

“You don’t have to, of course, but I think we both would benefit from it and I would pay you fifteen dollars an hour.”

At hearing this amount of money, Barry’s eyes widen slightly as he earns officially seven dollars and twenty-five cents an hours, which is about minimum wage for Kansas but all Mrs. Ming can afford to pay him and that only for thirty-six hours a week even though he often works much more than that.

“The food would also be on me,” James goes on and judging by his amused expression he hasn’t missed his reaction.

“That’s way too much…” Barry knows that he should shut up and not point something so ridiculously obvious out. Also, he probably should not even consider this in the first place.

“I think it’s up to me how much I pay someone for helping me,” the other man points out slightly bemused.

“I can only help you on Sundays,” Barry finally says after he mulled over it for a long moment.

“That’s fine with me.” James smiles again and seems certain by now that Barry is going to accept.

“How sounds Sunday in two weeks to you?”

While Barry really doesn’t like the idea of putting himself in a situation where he would be alone with the other man in a place he doesn’t know and that could potentially turn out badly for him, he also knows what a ridiculously good offer this really is and that he would likely not get another opportunity to make such an amount of money this easily anytime soon again, even if he should only work for a couple of hours or so.

With most of the Rogues currently in prison and him still keeping his distance to the remaining ones, he is struggling again with making ends meet and he would be an idiot to not accept.
At the thought of his friends, he can’t help but let his mind briefly brush upon Len as well, which causes a familiar worry and dread to settle in his stomach. Not willing to think about any of this right now, he forces himself to turn his attention back James and gives him a somewhat reluctant nod.

“Alr-right.”

“Great.” The other man seems quite pleased by his answer and Barry notices how the corners of his eyes seem to slightly crinkle as he smiles. “Is it alright for you if I pick you up from here around ten?”

He nods hesitantly, still uncertain about whether it has been a good idea to agree to this or not.

“He neds hesitantly, still usrertain about whether it has been a good idea to agree to this or not.

“He neds hesitantly, still usrertain about whether it has been a good idea to agree to this or not.

He nods hesitantly, still uncertain about whether it has been a good idea to agree to this or not.

“Just tell my grandmother should you change your mind or something else should come up,” James goes on. “She can relay it to me then.”

“Ok-kay.”

Barry exits the care after James wished him a good night and watches the other man drive off with a mixture of apprehension and worry.

It was probably a stupid idea to agree but he still had the possibility to cancel this even though he knows that he most likely wouldn’t. The other man hasn’t been anything but nice towards him so far and he really could use the money.

It would really make no sense for him to back out of their agreement…

With a soft sigh, Barry turns around and makes his way up the steps to entrance of the building.

Barry comes home later than usual as he has missed his initial bus, which meant that he had to wait for the next one for nearly an hour. At least the weather started to get nicer and the temperatures stayed at a comfortable enough sixty-one degree Fahrenheit even at night.

He is bone tired and the last thing he wished to find when arriving at his floor is a man sitting in front of his entrance, which causes him to freeze the moment he spots him.

The stranger is with his back to the door and his leg pulled up, so that he can let his head rest on his knees with his face turned away toward the other end of the hallway, which makes it impossible for Barry to see whether he knows him or not.

A familiar fear overcomes him and a well-known queasiness settle into his stomach.

It doesn’t help that the lightening of the floor is still rather dingy, even with a couple of the bulbs having been replaced a few weeks ago, and Barry feels a familiar dread overcome him in regard of the place he has to call his home while his racing mind comes up with a couple of possibilities of how to handle this situation.

Like going up a floor to Mary and stay at her place for the night, or try his luck and sneak past the stranger to Eddy’s flat, even though knocking at the other man’s door would most likely alert whoever is currently sleeping in front of his flat. He could also turn around and go downstairs to the basement, to hide away there and maybe find some place that could offer him a spot to sleep.

Barry doesn’t like any of this ideas, mostly because he hates the basement and because he doesn’t want to bother his friends just because he is such a damn scaredy-cat. It isn’t Mary’s nor Eddy’s problem but his and he really shouldn’t burden them with him not being able to handle this as he highly doubts that this man is somehow connected to the Network or the Blue Velvet. They certainly wouldn’t hire someone this sloppy.

Still, he isn’t stupid enough to actually try and confront that guy and he really doesn’t want to bother Mary, especially because he can’t be sure that she has a customer over, so that it only leaves the basement or Eddy. The stranger, whoever he is, is most likely a drunk who found his way inside the building and trying to pass him to get to Eddy’s flat could turn into a bigger hassle than it is worth it seeing that Barry knows how erratic those can be, which means that trying his luck in the basement is the most sensible thing to do.

Silently cursing his rotten luck once again, he is about to turn around when the man starts moving, which in turn causes him to freeze up.

To his utter surprise and relief, he recognizes the man just a moment later when he lifts his head to sleepily look over into his direction. It is the Scot, the man who helped him months ago after being mugged. Barry has to fish for his name for a couple of seconds before he remembers that it is Evan.

He watches how the other man also halts as soon as he notices him. For a second, a rather confused expression overcomes his face before he seems to pick up on where he actually is.

“Bugger…”

With a groan, Evan starts to get to his feet and Barry, who doesn’t feel that intimidated or worried anymore, slowly makes his way over to him. While the other man isn’t a complete stranger to him, Barry still is somewhat wary of his unexpected presence, and he stops short again when it hits him that the other man shouldn’t know where he is living.

“Wh-what are y-you d-d-doing h-here?” he asks and hates how damn faint and apprehensive his voice sounds, so clearly frightened. “H-how d-do y-you kn-kn-know wh-where I’m l-living?”

The Scot stretches himself with another groan before he turns his attention to him with a frown that makes it clear that he finds it rather stupid that he has to even ask.

“Ah followed ye home a while ago,” he explains with a shrug and Barry can’t help but tense up at these words.

“W-what!?”

He probably shouldn’t be that surprised seeing that Evan is a criminal who hasn’t exactly helped him out of the goodness of his heart. Still, the implication that this man followed him without his notice is very unsettling.

“Keek,” Evan says and Barry has utterly no damn idea what this word even means, “dinnae freak out, Ah mean na harm, okay? Ah’m just in a bawherr o’ a dilemma ’n’ need a place tae stay th’ night.”

“And y-you th-thought th-that I c-could offer one t-to you?” The disbelief in his voice has to be very audible as the other man’s frown deepens.

“Ah wullnae mess wi’ yer stuff, a’right? Ah can kip oan yer floor,” Evan grumbles and crosses his arms. He is mostly glaring at him now and Barry feels more exasperated than threatened by his behaviour.

It isn’t lost on him that Evan looks rather rundown, not exactly like a hobo but close to it and he realizes that the Scot most likely hasn’t his own place to stay if he is here and asking him to spend the night on his couch. Back then, when he helped him he already wanted money in return and while Barry has assumed that this is simply because he is one of your average thugs it seems that this wasn’t the only reason.

It is probably a completely asinine to even consider to let that man into his flat, a stranger who could easily overpower and hurt him should he feel like it and he knows that Len would have a field day should he find out about this. Barry can actually picture his friend and his angry disapproval right then and it causes a familiar pang to shoot through his chest.

It would be the more sensible thing to send Evan away and threaten him with calling the cops in case he should ever turn up here again.

Evan helped him, though, and while Barry remembers well enough that he didn’t exactly do so out of selfless kindness, he also knows that most people in that area and that late at night wouldn’t even have bothered at all.

“Y-you t-try anyth-thing and I’l-l’ll c-call m-my f-friends. You w-won’t h-have t-to w-worry ab-bout f-finding a p-place t-to s-sleeping anym-more after th-that, d-do you und-ders-stand?”

Barry hopes that his shaking voice isn’t giving his bluff away as he has never been a good liar, especially in situations like this one.

Against his worry, Evan’s grim expression changes to one of utter disbelief before he grins and nods.

“Sure thing, ye wilnae even notice Ah’s thare.”

Barry doubts this very much but despite the gnawing doubt about this decision, he still turns to his door to unlock it.

“Y-you c-can t-take th-the c-couch,” he tells Evan as they enter and tries not to let on how damn anxious he feels. “Y-you c-can also t-take a sh-shower after I-I’m d-done if you w-want b-but you’ll r-rest afterw-wards. I d-don’t w-want you t-to p-poke ab-bout d-during th-the n-night.”

The amused look Evan gives him at that rubs him a bit the wrong way because he can guess that the other man very much doubts that he would find anything of value here.

“M-my b-bedr-room is also off l-l-limit,” he tells him somewhat tersely now and points to the closed door. “Y-you enter anyt-time d-during y-your s-s-stay and I’l-l’ll c-call m-my f-friends, n-no m-matter wh-what. D-do y-you underst-stand?”

“What if thare is a fire?”

Barry doesn’t find this amusing at all and Evan gets it as his smirk quickly dims away.

“Rricht, na disrupting yer kip.”

“G-good.” Barry nods and informs him curtly that he is now going to use the bathroom and that he could take him up on his offer afterwards and also use the shower. Evan only grunts in response as he is clearly not that interested in doing anything of that kind and instead turns his attention back to the couch.

When Barry exits his small bathroom about fifteen minutes later, he isn’t really all that surprised to find the other man already deep asleep and snoring. He studies him for a couple of minutes before hesitatingly retreating to his own bed for the night.
Barry’s knees ache like hell when they are finally done with the last part of James’ flat and it is a relief to just sit down on the newly parquetted ground after hours of moving furniture around, ripping off the old floor and replacing it with a new one.

There have been a few small breaks and they had lunch but other than that they worked for nearly six hours straight, which is what his joints are currently cursing him for.

“You’re doing alright there?” James, who is still standing, aches an eyebrow at him and while he is watching him with a smile, Barry doesn’t miss the slight worry in his eyes as he does so.

“S-sure,” he assures the other man as he leans back against the wall. “J-just need a b-breather.”

With that, his companion follows suit and takes the spot in front of him, while pulling his working gloves off before he lets his gaze move through the living room, the last area they have worked on, and he seems to be pretty satisfied by how it turned out judging by his pleased expression.

“I have to say, even though neither of us is professional,” the other man starts and looks back to him, “we have done a damn fine job, wouldn’t you agree?”

Barry agrees with a nod and pulls his own working gloves off. “Esp-epecially after w-we f-found o-ut th-that you c-c-can’t use th-the h-hammer on th-these b-boards t-to f-fix th-them.”

James makes a slightly pained face at the tease as it has been him trying to get two pieces to connect in the entrance hall with much more force than necessary or advisable. It really paid off that the other man bought more parquet than really affordable for his apartment.

“Well, I’ve learned something new, at least,” he points out with a grin, which causes Barry to chuckle.

“T-true.”

“You, on the other hand, have a surprisingly extensive knowledge on craftsmanship.” James gives him a curious look. “You’ve learned than from your dad?”

A knot forms in Barry’s stomach, painful and firm, and he stills for a moment as this question has taken him by surprise. He licks his lips and tries to smile but he is pretty sure that is has to look just as unnatural as it feels.

“No,” he answers and averts his eyes to where some of the tools are laying on the ground close to the entrance. “N-not m-my d-d… d-dad.”

The silence that follows is brief but uneasy and Barry tries to will the other to not ask him about his family or anything like that.

“Well, wherever you’ve gotten your mad craftsman skills from,” James says with a purposefully light tone, “I’m still impressed. I’ve never been good with anything involving a hammer or saw.”

“You d-did p-pretty w-well for th-that,” he points out and feels himself relax a bit again.

“I read up on how to lay parquet on google so that I wouldn’t look too bad and in case both of us hadn’t any idea of what we are doing,” the other man confesses before he chuckles. “I’m gladly sticking to my numbers, though.”

James lets his head drop back and sighs. “Done in one day, thank god, I feared we would need much longer, to be honest.” He looks back to Barry and lifts an eyebrow. “You’re up for dinner? I think we’ve earned ourselves something really nice for this and seeing that you did the lion’s share of the work, it’s up to you to choose what we’re getting.”

“I’ve a-al-ready ch-chosen wh-what w-we g-got f-for l-lunch,” Barry points out, leaning back against the wall because even just sitting upright is strenuous right now.

“Because you had done the lion’s share then as well,” the other man reminds him with a bemused smirk and another arched eyebrow.

Barry chuckles before rubs his tired eyes. If he was honest, he isn’t really all that hungry right now. Getting home and into his bed seems much more interesting to him.

“I can also bring you home and we could get something to eat another time.” James has obviously picked up on his exhaustion and meets his surprised look with a warm smile. “It’s rather late,” the other man goes on after a glance at his wrist watch, “and you have been here since early noon.”

With a slight frown, he turns back to Barry and suddenly looks a bit guilty. “I probably should have kept the time better in mind, today is your day off and you probably didn’t want to spend all of it here working.”

“It’s f-fine,” Barry waves him off but can’t fight off a yawn before he goes on. “Y-you’re p-paying m-me, af-fter all, and I exp-pected th-that it w-would t-take th-this l-long f-from th-the b-begin-nig. I c-could h-have alw-ways t-told you th-that I w-wanted t-to l-leave.”

Despite his reassuring meant words, James doesn’t look really convince.

“When do you have to get up for work tomorrow?”

Not really sure what the other man is getting at, Barry hesitates to answer. He really hopes he isn’t offering him to stay for the night because there is no way in hell he would agree to that.

“I could pick you up and get you to my grandmother’s shop,” James explains when he notices his wariness. “This way you could grab some more sleep and I wouldn’t feel so bad about slaving you away today.”

“You d-didn’t,” Barry argues and wonders why the other man is suddenly making such a big deal out of it. It was to be expected that it would take a long time to lay the parquetted in the whole flat and it really hasn’t been anything close to a bad experience for him as James is a rather funny and nice guy.

His initial discomfort regarding being in the flat of another man he hardly knows has lessened within the first hour and by now he doesn’t even feel particularly wary of him anymore. “And it isn’t n-necessary, I c-can t-take th-the b-b-bus. You d-don’t h-have b-bother t-to g-get up th-that e-early.”

“It wouldn’t be a bother,” James explains. “I have to be in Kansas City tomorrow rather early anyway, it would be on my way there.”

Barry’s next protest dies on his lips hearing this and while he really doesn’t want to, he starts to consider the offer. It probably wouldn’t be a lot of extra sleep he would get from that, maybe half an hour to forty minutes, but it would be some extra rest that he really wouldn’t mind to get. Falling asleep has become a rather difficult endeavour for him again over the last couple of weeks due to how his mind tends to start worry about Len and the others whenever it isn’t occupied with something else and being alone in bed at the night usually offered the perfect opportunity for this.

“I d-don’t w-want t-to c-cause you any h-hassle.”

“You don’t,” James assures him. “I really appreciate your help today, Barry, you did make this a lot easier for me than it would have been otherwise.”

A surprisingly comfortable silence sets between them after that when the other man doesn’t urge him and instead leaves Barry time to thinks about the offer.

After a few minute went by, he looks back to James and agrees somewhat hesitantly to the generous offer.

“Ok-kay, if it r-really d-doesn’t b-bother you.”

The other man’s response is a kind smile.

Mary groans loudly and Barry feels how his face grows uncomfortably hot. He shoots a miffed look towards the couch where Eddy is currently giving their younger friend a massage after she has complained about how her shoulders and neck kept bothering her for a couple of days now.

Eddy notices it, of course, and gives him a wide grin in return as he doesn’t even try to hide how amusing his discomfort is to him.

“Turn it down, sweetheart,” his friend says with a smirk. “I think Mr. Prude over there doesn’t like it that you vocalize how amazed you are by my mean and satisfying massaging skills.”

Barry feels his face grow even warmer at that and gives Eddie a half-hearted glare from his spot at the kitchen table before he turns back to his book, intend to just stubbornly ignore them from now on.

“Be quiet, you oaf.” Mary huffs from her spot behind the back of the couch but groans once more when Eddy seems to find another tensed up spot of her shoulders.

Barry doesn’t even have to look over to be aware of Eddy’s obnoxious grin.

“You sure you don’t want to try out my magnificent hands of awesome next?” the other man asks and laughs outright when he shoots him an even darker glare in response.

“Stop being so damn insufferable, Ed,” the pretty woman admonishes their friend, which causes the later one to roll his eyes.

“Yeah, yeah, I know, I am sorry for being my excruciatingly annoying self again. I have no idea how you’re able to stand to be around me.”

“P-patience, l-lots and l-lots of p-patience,” Barry provides drily but still returns his friend’s amused grin he receives then.

“You obviously can’t be suffering too much under this hardship, otherwise you would hardly keep inviting me over,” Eddy points out as he sits back.

“You aren’t all that bad,” Mary agrees cheeky and shrieks in surprise when her friend pinches her side before he quickly retreats to avoid a slap.

“Thanks, madam, I live to serve and please.” Eddy gets onto his feet and makes a flourish bow towards her before he turns and makes his way around the couch and over to Barry, who has been watching them bemusedly.

“You know that some consider it impolite to read while they’ve guests over,” his friend remarks with a disproving frown and nods to the book in his hands.

“You aren’t g-guests,” Barry points out with a smirk but puts the book down to turn his full attention the other man who takes the seat across from him.

“No?” Eddie aches an eyebrow at that.

“Of course not, dummy,” Mary agrees who has also gotten up and put her shirt back on. “We’re his friends, otherwise you would have been thrown out ages ago.”

Eddy snorts and pulls a familiar deck of playing cards out of the back pocked of his jeans.

“We’ve already established that I’m not that bad thus I will take this as nothing but empty threats.” He starts to shuffle the cards and turns to Barry. “You fancy a game, my dear sport?”

“You wound me, I don’t cheat.” His friend huffs in fake indignation. “I’m too good at this to have to fall back on morally reprehensible means like that.”

Mary joins them and takes a seat next to Barry before she shoots Eddy a clearly unimpressed look.

“You do cheat, you even boast about it afterwards.”

“I do not,” he denies but doesn’t really seem the least bit bothered by that accusation.

“Whatever you say, sport.” Mary rolls her eyes and shares an amused look with Barry.

Eddy starts to hand out the cards and nods again to the book he is currently reading.

“’nother crime novel?”

“N-no.” Barry shows him the cover of the thick book James borrowed him. “It’s about m-meteorology, h-how it h-has ch-ch-changed o-over th-the l-last f-few d-d-decades.”

“Really?” His friend makes a face and gives him one of these incredulous looks that are reserved for those moment when he really doesn’t get him. “Why?”

“W-why n-not?” He shrugs in return and reaches for his glass of coke to take a sip.

“Yes, why not?” Mary agrees and shoots Eddy an amused smirk. “Some people like to read something more sophisticated than the newest Playboy.”

“How do you know about my Playboy collection? Have you been going through my stuff behind my back?” The other man waggles his eyebrow at Mary, which causes her to laugh and roll her eyes.

“Y-you c-can t-take a l-look in it if y-you w-want,” Barry offers but Eddy turns him down with a bemused smile.

“Nah. I’m good.” His friend leans back into his chair and picks his cards up to sort them. “I’ll gladly make do with the weather channel in that regard.”

“So high-brow,” Mary replies with fond exasperation and does the same.

June 2nd year

It is on an early morning in June when Barry finds Axel asleep in the staircase of his apartment building on his way to work. The kid is curled up with his familiar jacket stuffed below his head as a pillow, looking asleep but palpably tenses up and grows completely still the moment Barry steps close to him.

“Axel?” Barry asks in a mixture of confusion and incredulity as this is probably the last person he would have expected to meet on his way to the bus stop just now.

“’ry?” the kid mumbles as he squints up at him and immediately seems to relax again. He yawns widely then and sits up with a soft groan before stretching himself in a way that reminds Barry a bit of a cat.

“Morn’,” Axel greets him in a much clearer voice before he yawns once more and gets onto his feet. “You’re on your way to work?”

“Wh-what are you d-doing h-here, Ax-xel?”

The boy only shrugs as he rubs his eyes and mutters something under his breath Barry can’t quite pick up.

“D-don’t you h-have s-somep-place t-to s-stay?” he asks concerned but remembers that the young teen told him that he is living with a group of other street kids.

Axel gives him a slightly miffed look before he huffs. “Man, you can be so damn annoying. I haven’t caused any trouble, have I?”

“Th-this isn’t about m-me w-worrying ab-bout you c-causing t-trouble,” Barry explains patiently, which causes Axel to cross his arms in a deviant manner while he is giving him a clearly disbelieving look. He really isn’t surprised by this reaction and tries again. “You c-can’t j-just s-sleep in s-stairc-cases, th-thiis c-can b-be v-very d-dangerous.”

The teen snorts and arches an eyebrow at that. “Wouldn’t have picked up on that one.”

The boy’s smirk wanes when he notices Barry’s disapproving frown, though. He sighs and rubs his eyes again before he gives him a half-hearted petulant glare. “Look, this is just temporary, alright? I’d a fight with the guys I usually stay with but I’m sure we’ll be cool again in no time, so don’t worry so much.”

“Y-you’ve b-been th-thrown out?” Barry knows that the boy is not appreciating his concern but he can’t help it. The temperature outside are no longer in the area that it could be dangerous to anybody who lives at the street but Axel is nothing more than a kid and obviously one that has currently nowhere to stay, which is just plain dangerous, probably more than the boy wants to admit or even understands.

Axel gives him an evil eye and lifts his chin in a deviant manner as he protests. “They haven’t thrown me out, I told them off and left, alright?”
This does doe much for Barry’s worries and he wonders at which hour the kid actually arrived yesterday night. He came home shortly after half past eleven and Axel hasn’t been around then.

Nobody, especially a young teenager like him, should wander around the Keys this late on his own, even if he was used to living on the streets and to look out for his own.

Then, another thought crossed his mind.

“D-did you kn-know th-that I’m l-iving h-here?” he asks somewhat suspiciously and feels his stomach sink when Axel gives him a funny look.

“Yeah.” The kid nods and wrinkles his nose as he briefly glances around the staircase. “I definitely wouldn’t have picked this crappy place to camp out otherwise.”

A feeling of resignation overcomes Barry when he realizes what this means and he doesn’t really want to know the answer to what he asks next.

“H-have you f-followed m-me h-home b-before?”

Axel actually has the decency to look somewhat sheepish about this but shrugs rather defiantly.

“Yeah, I mean, I tailed you a while ago, not to spy on you or anything, I was just curious.”

Barry’s frown deepens and he wonders if this is a common occurrence that people follow him home on which he has just not picked up on so far. The thought is quite upsetting and he can’t but think of Kenneth and what Len and Lisa told him about the Blue Velvet and Blacksmith.

It is obvious that those people would have no problem whatsoever to get to him should they really want to, a damn thirteen year old and some guy he only meet briefly once before can obviously do so without problem.

He really wishes Len would be back out of the Heights already, he knows that it is pretty pathetic but he would feel much safer knowing that he could fall back upon him just in case.

“Hey, I’m not going to cause you any trouble, no need to look so down.” Axel’s words cause him to focus back to the teen and while he feels slightly sick by the realisation that his private home address doesn’t seem to be so private after all, he tries to give the other boy a faint smile.

“I kn-know th-that, Axel,” he tells him earnestly. “You’re a g-good k-kid, I’m n-not w-worried about th-that b-but about you and y-your c-current l-living c-cond-ditions.”

“Man, don’t fret it, I know how to take care of myself.” Axel huffs but despite his annoyed appearance he still seems a bit pleased by Barry’s concern, which makes sense, seeing that he most likely doesn’t have many people how are honestly worried about him, especially grown-ups.

“You w-want t-to j-join m-me on m-my w-way t-to w-work? W-we’re g-getting anoth-ther d-delivery t-today and I c-could n-need s-some h-help p-putting everyth-thing a-away.”

“You may look all nice but under your façade you are such a slave-driver,” Axel grumbles but promptly agrees when Barry offers to get him some breakfast in return.

It is still dark outside when they leave the building a bit later and he listens to the teenager tell him all about whatever mischief he and his friends have been up to over the last couple of days as he has grown accustom to over the last couple of months.

Having Axel around during the drive to work is a nice change to how he usually only has his own thoughts to occupy himself with and the boy seems to pick up that he really pays attention to him as he keeps on talking for the rest of their way.

“Uh, who’s that boy?”

Eddy stops just a couple of steps in, just enough for Barry being able to close the door behind him, and frowns at Axel who is laying on the couch, flipping through a magazine he has brought over when he arrived last night.

“Why’s that any of your business?” the teen asks in return and eyes Eddy in a clearly suspicious way but doesn’t move an inch from his cozy spot.

“Axel.” Barry shoots the kid a warning look before he turns back to the other man who seems much more amused by the teenager’s rude behaviour than put out by it. “He’s a friend, who’s currently in need of a place to stay.”

It occurs to Barry that Eddy could somehow misunderstand the situation when his friend keeps eying Axel with a slight frown and he quickly adds that it would be only temporary.

“He’s staying at your place, Bear,” Eddy remarks and shrugs. “He can do so as long as you let him, it’s none of my business.”

“Yeah, it is none of that guy’s business,” Axel parrots in agreement and Barry notices somewhat exasperated that he is still giving Eddy a rather dirty look over the edge of his magazine.

“Axel, this is a very good friend of mine and you will behave in his presence, do you understand?”

The kid only huffs but grumbles his agreement before his face completely vanishes behind the cover of the magazine again.

“Sweet child.” Eddy smirks bemused. “Remembers me of myself at his age.”

He nods over to the table and asks him whether he maybe would have some coffee for him.

“You could buy your own one for a change,” Barry points out drily but turns to make his way over to the kitchenette all the same.

“I could but this still wouldn’t make you prepare it for me.”

Barry shakes his head over his friend’s silly reasoning but doesn’t really feel all that annoyed by it. Having Eddy around is nearly always a nice thing, after all.

The pleasant aroma of freshly grinded coffee starts to fill the room soon afterwards and it isn’t long before Barry joins his friend at the table with two hot mugs.

“So, you’ve decided to open a day-care?” Eddy asks as he accepts his coffee. “Does that mean Mary and I aren’t fulfilling enough for your life anymore?”

“D-don’t w-worry, y-you’re s-still p-pretty g-good at k-keeping m-me b-busy m-most of th-the t-time,” Barry assures him with a snort and while his friend’s presence helps to ease his nerves a bit, it can’t drive away the nagging worry about having Axel staying at his place.

It was without a doubt a stupid idea to offer the kid that he could stay here till things with his friends have smoothed out again but he has done so more or less out of affect, just as Axel had been about to leave to look for somewhere to spend the night at that day. He hardly could take it back afterwards, especially with how genuinely delighted the boy seemed by the prospect, even though Barry had initially thought that he most likely wouldn’t want to share his small rather crappy flat with him, seeing that he usually does insist on Axel following a couple of rules as long as he is around him.

Now the fat’s in the pan and he can’t bring himself to asks Axel to looks somewhere else to stay while he hasn’t smoothed over things with his friends. It would not only be cruel to do so but worry him to no end.

“I hope so.” Eddy grins over the rim of his mug after he took a sip. His eyes briefly wander over to the couch again, behind which back Axel is currently completely vanished. The bemused expression wanes then and he turns back to Barry.

“You sure that this good deed is worth all of the potential trouble it could bring with it?” The other man is talking in a much lower voice now, so that the boy wouldn’t be able to overhear them even when trying.

“I know that your parole restrictions are all crap,” he goes on when he notices Barry’s miserable expression. “But they can still get you back to the Heights faster than even the Flash could.”

Eddy’s blue eyes are focus intensely on him as he speaks and Barry can’t help but fidget slightly under his gaze.

“Y-yes,” he agrees quietly and turns his eyes on the mug in front of him he hasn’t touched yet. He knows that he is playing a very dangerous game here, something that would probably have worse consequences than his friendship to the Rogues could have should anybody find out. In such a case, nobody would hesitate for even just a second to lock him back up in one of the dingy cells Iron Heights has to offer.

This is also the reason why he insists on Axel leaving his flat before him in the mornings or that they can’t be seen travelling together again. Understandably, the boy found and most likely still finds this pretty odd and tried to get him to spill the reason for it till Barry got so fed up that he told him angrily that he would need to look for another place to stay if he couldn’t keep his curiosity in check. Afterwards, he immediately felt guilty about losing his patience like that but Axel seems to have taken his words seriously, at least, as he hasn’t tried at all again so far.

“Don’t look so damn down,” Eddy tell him with a smirk. “You can always hide him in the bedroom when someone comes around or send him over to my or Mary’s place if there is time for it. The fire escape would get at least somewhat useful that way.”

Barry smiles slightly before he chuckles and rubs his eyes tiredly.

“Y-yeah, th-that’s n-not g-going t-to h-happen. It w-would b-be j-just m-my l-luck and h-he f-falls off it and b-breaks s-someth-thing wh-while h-he’s at it.”

“You’ve clearly too little faith in others.” Eddy heaves an exaggerated sigh at that and takes another sip from his coffee.

They leave that uncomfortable topic rest after that and go for a game of Crash instead. Axel, seemingly having started to get bored by the magazine in the meantime, joins them while Eddy hands the cards out and more or less demands to join in.

“I’m a master of cards,” he lets Barry know rather proudly and shoots Eddy a dirty glare when the man snort in audible disbelief. “Just wait and weep, old-timer! And just so you know, it’s impolite to whisper while others are around,” he adds in a rather miffed tone, which causes Eddy to bark a laugh and Barry to remind him with a rather disgruntled look that it isn’t polite to pry either.

Axel rolls his eyes but dutifully promises not to do so again.

Both of the men find this rather hard to believe.

A loud crash startles Barry awake from his late afternoon nap. The first thing that comes to his mind is Axel, who is currently reading some comic book on his couch, followed by the horrifying notion that Wally could have discovered their little agreement.

Though, Barry quickly rationalizes with himself that Wally would never hurt the kid and it is much more likely that he himself would be at the core of this ruckus if his nephew should have really gotten wind of any of this. Then he remembers Kenneth and, before he can even think of what he’s doing, he is already out of bed and stumbling towards his bedroom door.

What greets his eyes is a scene he hasn’t expected at all and he watches somewhat bewildered how Sam, who is clearly as surprised as Barry to find himself in this situation, desperately tries to get Axel off his back. The boy, on the other hand, is clearly hellbent on not letting him do so. He has a good grip on the Rogue, his arms locked around the man’s throat and his legs around his middle, and is cursing like a sailor, all the while seemingly trying to strangle Sam.

“Axel, s-stop!”

The teen is caught off-guard by his appearance and Sam uses this moment to get a better grip on his young attacker to pull him off his back and throw him at the ground where he land with a pained yelp. Before Axel has any possibility to get up again, the other grabs his arm and turns it in a firm grip behind his back. The pained expression on the teens face makes it obvious that this is anything but pleasant. “Fuck you!!! You stupid bastard! Let go of me!!!”

Sam huffs in annoyance and turns to Barry, who has come up to them by now. His look is one of annoyance and confusion. “You’ve got yourself a new friend here?”

“P-please l-let g-go of h-him, S-Sam, y-you’re h-hurting h-him.” Barry watches Axel, who keeps cursing the Rogue to the moon and back through clenched teeth while trying to get up again.

“So that this little rabid raccoon can try to suffocate me again?” Sam snorts incredulously and frowns when Axel starts to spit insults at him again. “Damn straight, you old ugly asshole!!!”

Axel yelps in pain when Sam pushes his arm a bit further then.

“I am neither old nor ugly, you stupid little pest,” the man grumbles before he notices Barry’s concerned and misgiving expression and finally lets go of the boy with another annoyed huff.

Before Axel has the opportunity to try and throw himself at Sam once more, Barry grabs his arms and holds him back.

“C-calm d-down! Th-this is S-Sam, a f-friend of m-mine and h-he m-means n-no h-harm.”

“He came out of the freaking bathroom!” Axel protests but thankfully stops to look all that keen on jumping Sam again. “There was no guy around in there when I took a leak about ten minutes ago!” The boy turns back to their unexpected guest and scowls. “He looks fishy, you sure he isn’t a psychopath?"

Sam’s scoffs but doesn’t give Axel more than a dismissive glance before he turns his attention once more to Barry, while still rubbing his throat. “You wouldn’t have some coffee for me?"

“S-sure, as l-long as you c-can b-behave,” he points out with a slight smile and feels how the tensions slowly starts to ease away from him again.

“Hey, I didn’t do anything, it was this little mad version of Rambo who jumped me.” Sam nods to the kid with a slightly sour expression but doesn’t seem like he is really holding it against him anymore.

“You could be a madman, Barry tends to attract this kind of folk,” Axel grumbles, obviously still not sure whether to trust Sam or not, which causes the later one to chuckle.

“Well, the squirt has a point there, doesn’t he?"

“Hey! I’m no squirt, you ugly old fart!”

“Isn’t that brat a real charmer?” Sam remarks drily before he turns to make his way over to the kitchen table with Axel’s suspicious gaze following him all the way. The teenager turns his attention back to Barry, when he touches his shoulder slightly. He gives the kid a reassuring smile. “H-he’s a f-friend, n-no r-reason t-to w-worry, Axel.”

His words don’t seem to really convince Axel but Barry takes it as a good sign that the teen doesn’t outright protest either and instead follows him over to where Sam is.

While he prepares some coffee for the other man, he also heats some milk up to make Axel a cup of hot chocolate, a treat the boy really enjoys whenever he receives it. He tries not to think what Sam’s visit could mean and instead tries to stay concentrated at his task at hand.

When all of them are set with their respective drinks, Barry takes a seat next to Axel and can’t but give the other man a worried frown.

“H-has s-someth-thing h-happened w-with th-the others?”

With Axel around, it is difficult to speak with Sam about the other Rogues as Barry doesn’t want to say something to give them away, even though it is possible that the boy already knows who their guest is. The Rogues’ alter egos aren’t exactly unknown, even though most would have a tough time to recognize them out of their colourful outfits more often than not. This worries Barry a bit while Sam doesn’t seem really bothered by the possibility of the young teen finding out who he really is.

“They’re still on their little vacation,” the other man answers with a shrug. “They’ve all been doing fine the last time I checked up on them, well, according to the circumstances, at least.”

“Wh-when w-will th-they b-be b-back?”

It has been nearly eleven weeks by now and he doesn’t understand why they haven’t broken out already. The Rogues are famous for getting out there as quick as possible and it worries Barry that they are still in there. In the news, he hasn’t found anything about any of them being seriously hurt, nothing that would acquire any of them to stay in the infirmary for more than maybe a day, anyway.

Again, much to his frustration, Sam shrugs and takes another sip of his coffee before he simply adds. “Pretty soon.”
Barry frowns, as this answer is hardly as precise as he has wished for it to be but with Axel around he doesn’t want to pry any further. He is quite sure that Sam is rather uncommunicative on purpose regarding this topic, most likely just to annoy him.

Well, at least Len and the others seem to be alright, which does calm his worries a little bit, even though he would have given a lot to learn more.

“Ι-I s-see,” he mutters quietly and studies the amber coloured tea in his mug for a moment before shooting his friend a wary look. “Wh-why d-did you p-p-pass b-by th-then?”

“Wow, you really seem to have missed me.” Sam snort but the smirk makes it clear that he doesn’t take Barry’s words the wrong way. He sits back in his seat and shrugs. “I was just wondering how you’re doings.”

“Y-you kn-know h-how I’m d-doing, y-you’re k-keeping t-track on m-me;” he points out drily.

They aren’t using the small mirror anymore, after Len and the others have been caught, Sam hasn’t tried to contact him via the small device again, which wasn’t such a surprise as the other man never liked to do so in the first place for whatever reason. Instead, Barry has started to pick up on movements in the corner of his eyes when he passed by mirrors and other reflective surfaces. Not very often, but he isn’t stupid and the conclusion is not hard to make.

“You picked up on that, hm?” The other man doesn’t looked very abashed about being caught at stalking him and instead seems to find it rather amusing.

“You c-could h-have sh-shown yours-self, y-you kn-know?” Barry feels a bit miffed by his friend’s nonplussed attitude which increases when he receives another snort in response.

“Well, you could have called,” Sam remind him and it causes Barry to fall quiet because the other man has a point.

There have been a couple of times when he held the little mirror in his hand and tried to make up his mind whether to contact Sam or not. In the end, he always decided against it as he wasn’t sure whether he would be welcome there anymore now only Mick, Marco, Digger and Sam are still around, especially after he made himself rare around the hideout the weeks before most of the Rogues were caught.

It isn’t as if they have ever been hostile towards him or anything like that but they never seemed all that interested in having him there either and he really doesn’t want to force his presence upon anybody.

“I-I… I w-wasn’t s-sure you’d w-want m-me t-to,” Barry explains honestly after a brief pause, which doesn’t seem to surprise the other man at all.

“You really have to work on your insecurity issues, Allen.” Sam doesn’t sound like he means it in an insulting way but Barry still bristles slightly in response. “You’ve been coming over every other day for months before that,” his friends goes on with a smirk. “Believe me, we would have made it clear by then if we didn’t want you around.”

This makes sense, none of the Rogues usually mince their words when they don’t agree with something and Barry starts to feel rather stupid again.

There is still a thing he doesn’t get, though, which is why they would want to have him around in the first place.
It isn’t as if they get anything from it and he is pretty sure that his stammer is only amusing for so long before it grows annoying.

“Barry.” Sam sounds slightly exasperated now. “You don’t wanna hang out with us that is fine but we’re not going to grab the pitchforks should you want to come over either, okay?”

The notion of these men actually not minding to have him around even though Len isn’t there to justify his presence is strange and Barry studies Sam quietly for a moment, wondering whether this means that they’re actually seeing him as something like a friend as well.

“I d-don’t w-want t-to b-bother you,” he says quietly and doesn’t avert his eyes from the other man’s gaze. “I kn-know th-that I-I c-can b-be… o-odd.”

Sam doesn’t answer immediately but studies him before he leans back into his chair and gives him a faint smirk. “We all have our quirks, Barry, and being shy or having a stammer really aren’t the worst flaws any of us has to deal with every day, so don’t be so self-conscious all the damn time.”

Feeling rather embarrassed all of a sudden, Barry turns his gaze towards the window next to him and nods quietly.

“Besides,” Sam adds after a brief and somewhat uncomfortable silence, “you’re making a really mean pot of coffee and that’s always a skill anybody of us can appreciate.”

The other man’s grin causes Barry to relax a bit again and he gives him a hesitant smile in return.

“L-Lisa’s v-very g-good as w-well.”

“Yeah, but princess usually just makes enough for herself and her sugar darling.”

Barry chuckles at Sam’s sour expression before the other man pulls out a set of poker cards from his jacket and asks him about a game. He hesitates for a moment as Axel is present and it is then that he realizes how unusually quiet the kid has been so far. Initially, he has feared that he would butt in every other second and make a real conversation with Sam mostly impossible. This hasn’t been the case at all, though.

Axel, who picks up on his considering gaze, lifts his eyebrows and shrugs. “I know how to play poker, so it’s fine by me but I don’t have any cash on me.”

“Who said that you little piranha could join in?” Sam asks but doesn’t sounds like he would really mind.

“You scared I will clear you out, greybeard?” Axel retorts, which causes the Rogue to scowl.

“What the fuck? I’m hardly over forty yet, you little shit.”

Despite Barry’s initial hesitations to let Axel join in, he decides that it would be fine to play a game without any actual betting other than for the bag of M&Ms the boy produced out of nowhere. Sam seems fine with that as well, even though he doesn’t seem able to not munch continuously away on their wagers till there is hardly enough left for a second game, much to Axel’s annoyance.

It is two hours after Sam has come over that he takes his leave again, this time through the door, with Barry’s promise that he would come over next Saturday afternoon for a game of poker. The surprise visit of the other man has left him in an unusual good mood and he decides to make himself and Axel a little snack, even though they have had dinner already and he has to be careful about rationing the food to have enough left for the next week before he gets his next pay-check.
The boy likes the idea a lot and even offers to help him preparing the macaroni with eggs.

Barry has just put the freshly boiled noodles into the pan and is about to add the two eggs, when Axel asks him about their earlier visitor.

“That dude, he came through the mirror before, didn’t he?”

At his surprised and slightly alarmed expression, the teen only rolls his eyes and remarks that he isn’t stupid.

“You c-can’t t-tell anyb-body about th-this, Axel.” Barry tells him in a worried and grave voice that causes his younger friend to frown.

“Sure, no worries there, Barry. I have your back, we are bros, after all.”

Barry isn’t sure how to response to that and makes do with a nod and a thin but grateful smile.

Again, he starts to worry about how fond the kid seems to grow of him and how dangerous this could be for either of them.

“Dude, start to stir if you don’t wanna eat burnt macs.”

Axel’s voices gets his attention back to his actual task at hand and he curses softly under his breath when he notices that the kid is right.

“Well, good thing you have me around, you woolgather way too much.” With a smirk, Axel walks back over to the table to take care of the remaining M&Ms, while Barry keeps an eye on their food.

He tries to shush the worries in his mind but notices that he doesn’t feel really that hungry anymore.

“Awright,” Evan greets him and Barry asks himself once more why he always has to open the damn door.

“You n-need a p-place t-to s-stay t-ton-night?” Somehow he should have known that this would be a likely consequence of letting the other man sleep on his couch for one night. If this was going on like that he could really consider opening a motel.

“Weel… aye,” Scot agrees somewhat hesitant and actually has the decency to look a bit abashed by his request.

The still healing bruise on the other man’s right temple isn’t lost on Barry and he wonders where the other man has gotten that from and whether this could become dangerous for him. Letting someone else stay in his flat, as long as they are of age, isn’t exactly against his parole, at least if they aren’t somehow involved in criminal activities themselves. In other words, this here is most likely another violation of his restrictions and the sensible and clever thing would be to send him away. After all, he didn’t own this man anything.

“Ah’ll be gaen before yer up ’n’ ye wilnae notice me at a’,” Evan add as his hesitation isn’t lost on him. “Ah wilnae cause ye any trouble.”

Barry frowns and already could kick himself for going to agree to this but his unexpected guest has been true to his word the last time around and should something happen, he would at least be able to contact Sam. Not that he wants to consider this possibility as he would rather not have Len learn of "F-fine, b-but th-the r-rules are th-the s-same as l-last t-time, you aren’t t-touching anyth-thing and mmy b-bedr-room is off l-l-limits."

The other man looks honestly relieved and readily nods agrees. “Sure, Ah wull be as wheesht as a moose.”

Somewhat reluctantly, Barry steps aside and lets the other man in.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you enjoyed this chapter!

It is rather long but I didn’t like the notion of leaving you off with the initial version of it, where it ended and not update for another two weeks, this way I think it works a bit smoother.

Also, I crossed 300 kudos, which is just crazy and I wanted to celebrate it a bit with you. ;) Starting this, I would have never thought that so many people would like my story or that I would get so much nice feedback from so many kind people. Really, thank you all for it, I can’t tell you how happy this makes me! :)

Unfortunately, this chapter, despite his length, has no Len in it but he will return in the next one, where we will also have another poker game with the Rogues, or at least the ones that aren’t in prison right now. I’m really looking forward to this one!

Till in two weeks!
Of Cakes and Reunions

July 2nd year

“You’ve made us cake?” Sam gives him a bemused look after Barry told him what is currently under the tin foil that is covering the plate he has brought over, and he turns to eye the small gift with obvious curiosity.

Suddenly, the idea to make this doesn’t seem like such a good one anymore, and Barry realizes that he should have just picked up a pack of chips instead from work.

Neither Lisa nor Hartley would have bat an eye in regard of him baking something, and with Len around everybody usually holds his tongue no matter what they think of his hobbies. Today, none of them is here, though, and he regrets that he has just given in to the hunch that this could be a nice kind of thank you for inviting him over again.

Now he isn’t so sure about it anymore.

“Well, thank you, I guess.” Sam steps a bit closer to inspect the still covered food, oblivious to Barry’s doubtful expression.

“You d-don’t h-have t-to eat it, I c-can t-take it b-back w-with m-me w-when I l-leave,” he tells him somewhat unhappily and is surprised when Sam just lifts an eyebrow at that and shoots him a look like he is being ridiculous.

“And get rid of the chance to actually eat something decent for once?” his friend asks.

“It isn’t anyth-thing s-special,” Barry explains and hands him the plate somewhat reluctantly.

“You’ve been living off canned beans for nearly two months, I think there isn’t a single thing out there that couldn’t top this for me right now.” Sam lifts the foil and makes a surprised and pleased noise. “I don’t give a fuck whether you’ve thrown this together in five minutes, Allen.” He shoots him a grin. “It looks delicious, and I know of your mean pancake skills, so I don’t doubt that it will taste just as damn good.”

Barry feels how his cheeks turn warm, and he jumps slightly when Sam barks a laugh as he hasn’t missed his embarrassed reaction.

“Come on, let’s get to the others,” Sam prompts, and they start to make their way to the living area, at least Barry assumes so as it’s been usually there that the Rogue hang out to drink, play cards, or do whatever to entertain themselves in between jobs or while laying low.

It’s odd being here again after nearly three months especially with Len not being around. He hasn’t been over to any of the Rogues’ hideouts so far without the other man being present as well, and he has always just assumed that Len is the actual reason the Rogues in general tolerating him being there seeing that someone like him, who once worked for the CCPD, would be certainly regarded as too much trouble to keep around for most criminals.

Following Sam through a long hardly lit corridor, Barry quickly realizes that this hideout is the same one where he joined them the first time for a game of poker. He has been over here a number of times since then, but it is clear that nobody has bothered to try and clean the place for a while now. Not that this is really surprising seeing that most of the Rogues don’t seem to really care about these things and with both Hartley and Lisa not being around. It is usually both of them who tend to keep the place at least somewhat in order.

Barry can’t say that he has missed this particular part of being here.

It turns out that the large room Sam leads him to, is the one they usually use as community room. So far, only Mick is present when they enter, doing a crossword puzzle in some magazine, and he only gives them a nod in greeting without actually looking up.

“Take a seat, I’ll grab you a beer.” Before Barry can protest, Sam has shoved the plate back into his hands and is out of the room again, leaving him feeling rather awkward.

“Take a seat, I’ll grab you a beer.” Before Barry can protest, Sam has shoved the plate back into his hands and is out of the room again, leaving him feeling rather awkward.

“You heard, Scudder,” Mick says after a minute went by during which he didn’t move from his spot close to the entrance as he is uncertain whether it is really a good idea to join the other man at the table. “Take a seat.” He looks up from his magazine and smirks. “I’m not biting, despite what people may say.”

The embarrassed expression Barry makes in response seems to amuse the other man, and he chuckles, which in turn causes him to tense up even more.

“You’re a stressed out fellow.” Mick leans back into his chair while he considers him for a moment before his gaze zooms in to the plate he is holding. He lifts an eyebrow and nods towards it. “You brought food over?”

“Cake, homemade,” Sam answers in Barry’s state as he chooses this moment to re-enter the room. Digger, who is following his colleague, snorts at that and eyes Barry amused. “Homemade cake? You are a bloody housewife or something?”

“Shut up, Digger, because you aren’t going to eat it.” Sam gives the other man a look that is clearly meant as a warning to watch what he is saying, but the Australian only shrugs while he takes a seat at the table.

“Why waste good food?” Digger asks and takes a pull on his beer. His gaze turns back to Barry, who is still standing close to the door. “Doesn’t care whether a pansy made it or not.”

Barry bristles, and his grip tightens at the plate enough that he is certain that it is going to snap any moment now under the pressure. Suddenly, he has no idea why he has decided to come here, why he has ever considered it. It has been a stupid idea, a stupid, stupid idea.

Sam groans in response while Mick only snorts and gives their colleague a disbelieving look.

“What?” Digger frowns, apparently not sure what faux pas he walked into this time.

“Really, Digger?” Sam asks incredulously, and while he too has reached the table, he hasn’t sat down yet, so that he glares down at the other man.

“Hey, I’ve no problems with pansies, Hartley is one too, and I don’t mind the guy,” Digger argues before he frowns and adds with a slight sneer. “Other than for the disgusting vermin of his that keeps following him around.”

“Remember what Hart’s told you,” Mick interjects amused. “They don’t like it when you call them pansies.”

“Whatever, then gay or homo, I couldn’t give less of a bloody fuck.” Digger shrugs as he is obviously no longer interested in discussing the proper term of homosexuals and instead turns his attention back to the plate Barry is still holding in a near death-grip. “So, what did you make? Brownies? I could kill for bloody brownies, mate.”

It should be somewhat funny and in a way it probably is, but Barry doesn’t feel anything but horrified and sick by what the other men have just said. He isn’t gay, he isn’t much of anything anymore, but he isn’t… He isn’t interested in men, he likes Len, he knows that, but it is different. Len isn’t like…

Barry takes a shaky breath and wonders why the Australian thinks that of him. He is obviously not the only one judging by the others’ reactions, and it is so damn humiliating.

“Relax,” Sam says, and when Barry turns his attention to him, he notices the slightly worried way the other man is looking at him now. “It’s really no big deal, you know that Hartley is also gay and–”

“I-I’m n-not g-gay!”

The urge to fling the plate at the other man is nearly overwhelming, and he hates how they assume that about him, how they dare to do so when they know next to nothing about him.

This piece of information seems to surprise the other men who are now all looking at him with slight incredulity which causes the anger he feels to spike even more.

“Barry, it’s fine.” Sam tries again. “It’s none of our business anyway.”

“Yeah, nobody cares whether you are a Jizz Junky or not, mate,” Digger agrees with a shrug which causes Mick to actually guffaw and Sam to shoot him a nasty glare.

“I-I’m n-n-… n-not! I-I d-don’t l-l-like m-m-men! I-I d-d-don’t l-l-like th-them!”

“Woah, calm down, it’s alright, you don’t have to.” The concerned expression is back on Sam’s face, and Barry hisses in frustration because they are obviously not getting it.

“I-I d-didn’t w-want th-them t-t-to…” He forces the words through clenches teeth and feels with growing frustration how his mind tries to go to places he really doesn’t want to touch upon ever again, and it is so damn hard to stop it. He already has to deal with this shit at night when he can’t steer his own thoughts, he doesn’t want to think about it now as well.
“I d-didn’t…”

If they think he likes men, do they also believe that he liked what happened to him back then? Do they think he wanted-

“Barry, we know that.” Sam’s voice cuts through the jumble of thoughts in his head and causes him to focus back on the other man. Barry grows nervous when he notices that Sam has come over to him without him even realizing so, but, thankfully, he’s been mindful enough to leave enough distance between them to not make him feel cramped.

“Digger’s just a jackass, you don’t need to mind what the idiot says, alright?” Sam tells him earnestly. “He never thinks before he opens his stupid trap.”

Barry studies the man for a couple of seconds, uncertain whether he is telling the truth or not, before he hesitantly looks over to the other two men, who have kept quiet for the last couple of minutes. Neither of them seems amused anymore.

“I-I’m n-not g-gay,” he insists again, his voice uncomfortably thin and weak, and he is pretty sure that this is the last time he has been invited over, at least with Len not being present. He has to look like such a pitiful idiot after freaking out like this.

“Okay,” Sam agrees easily and it is odd to hear him use such a calm voice. “I think we’ve established that by now.”

The other man gives him a faint smile, and Barry eyes him with a mixture of uncertainty and growing embarrassment as he realizes how ridiculous he has actually reacted. He is kind of glad that Hartley isn’t around because he knows what he must have sounded like, and he feels ashamed for it.

“So, now that we’ve gotten that misunderstanding out of the way,” Sam goes on. “I think we should start with the game.”

Barry swallows and averts his eyes to the plate in his hands. He doesn’t feel like he can meet the other man’s gaze right now and simply gives a stiff nods.

The mood is a rather strained and subdued one for the first twenty minutes or so, and Barry only listens to the other men as he is still too embarrassed about his little episode. He mostly just sips on his beer and tries to keep up with the game which isn’t as easy with how restless his mind is.

Neither of the other try to involve him in a conversation for which he is very grateful on one hand but also worries what they are thinking about him now.

They know about what happened to him in Iron Heights, and they usually don’t seem really that bothered by it, at least when he doesn’t go all up into their faces with it.

He is such an idiot, why couldn’t he have just keep his mouth shut?

“Hey, Allen? Can I get some of the cake you’ve brought over?” Digger’s voice startles Barry out of his thoughts, and he looks over to the other man who eyes him with obvious uneasy as if he was expecting that he would freak out all over again. His face grows uncomfortably warm at the realization, and he only mutters a quiet agreement before he turns his attention back to his cards.

“What the hell, Digger?” Mick snorts and causes Barry to glance over to the tall bald man who is eying the other criminal with an amused expression. “You’ve to be out of your fucking depth if you show actual manners.”
“Shut it, dick-wit.” The Australian grumbles as he pulls the still covered plate over to inspect what is under the cover. His eyes seem to lit up in a clearly pleased way, similar to how Sam’s did before, when he sees what Barry has brought over.

“That’s cake?” Mick studies the sweets with a sceptically lifted eyebrow.

“Well, it’s something with sugar,” Sam provide with a shrug as he puts his ten cent to the slowly growing heap of money in the centre of the table; as usual when Barry joins in, their upper bet limit is twenty cents when they play for actual money.

“Ice cream has sugar,” Mick remarks drily before he turns to Barry. “What’s it?”

“G-Galak-k-tob-b-boureko.”

Judging by the looks the other men give him, they have no idea what he is talking about.

“Gala-what?” Digger frowns.

“Huh.” The Australian turns back to the sweets with a curious look. “Definitely nothing I’ve ever tried.”

Sam eyes the food with new interests while Digger takes one of the small rectangular pieces and takes a bite from it. He makes a pleased noise before he shoves the rest of the pastry into his mouth and grabs a second one.

“Slow down, jackass, that isn’t all for you,” Sam protests and reaches for one as well before quickly grabbing a second and third one.

“Bloody hell, wanker?! Why should you get three?!”

“I’m not as ugly as you?”

“Screw you!”

Barry watches how the three men start to bicker about the remaining three pastries and decides that he should have brought more over. It is surprisingly nice to see that they seem to like them.

“That’s good,” Mick agrees after he has gotten himself two pieces as well and gives Barry a considering look. “Can you cook too?”

“He makes some mean pancakes.” Sam informs him as he wipes his fingers with a paper tissue off before he reaches for his beer and takes a pull.

“Can you bring something meatier over next time, mate?” Digger asks as he picks his cards up again. “That sweet stuff is good and all, but a burger would be even better.”

“I’m sure he’s nothing better to do than cook for a lazy ass like you.” Sam scoffs and ignores the dirty look his companion gives him in return.

Barry stays quiet, mostly because he is surprised about the insinuation that there would be a next time for him to come over.

“He could order a fucking pizza to bring over, and I would still die happy,” Mick adds while he sets his wager. “I would even pay for it.”
“Anything but canned beans,” Sam agrees and makes a face as if he has just tasted something really disgusting. Digger only shrugs and remarks that he doesn’t mind canned beans.

“I just want some meat to them,” he explains.

The mood has noticeably lightened when they turn back to the game, and, while Barry still keeps mostly quiet, he feels much more comfortable and relaxed than before.

It is during their fourth game that Sam mentions Marco and that the other man is currently somewhere in South America. Barry has noticed the other man’s absence but guessed that he doesn’t feel like playing and most likely is sticking to his room. That he is on another continent is a bit surprising.

“What’s he doing there?”

“He’s pulling a thing with some guys he knows from way back,” Sam explains before he huffs and glances at the other two criminals. “I should have accepted his offer to tag along, now I’m stuck with those two morons.”

This causes Mick to shoot his friend an amused glance. “Yeah, because that worked out so well last time you did so.”

“Shut up, it was a misunderstanding.” The brunette grumbles.

At Barry’s curious look, Mick goes on to explain with a smirk. “He slept with the wife of one of Marco’s friends—”

“Will you shut up, I didn’t know she was married to that old fart, he could have been her grandfather.” Sam glares at his colleague who ignores him and goes on.

“- and nearly got himself and Marco shot as that old geezer is the head of one rather infamous mob family down there.”

“How should I’ve known that?” Sam frowns down at his cards. “She talked to me in Spanish all the freaking time, and I am not speaking Spanish.”

“You spoke it well enough to know that she wanted to fuck, mate,” Digger points out with a broad grin and calls it quits for this round.

“You don’t need to speak the same language to understand that.” Mick chuckles.

“How did you get out of it? I mean pulling jobs with others?” Barry asks Sam, both curious and slightly worried as he knows how severe these people take such an affront.

Sam shrugs and explains that Marco knew the Don’s son and that he was able to convince his father to not shoot them.

“Marco, that jackass, actually was pissed at me for more than a month afterwards,” he goes on and sounds like he is still very much annoyed by this. “As if he hasn’t been changing beds every night with married women like other people change their damn socks.”

“Well, he didn’t let himself get caught,” Digger remarks and gets up to grab himself another beer from the kitchen.

“Do you often? I mean pulling jobs with others?” Barry asks as it is somewhat of a strange notion that they are not exclusively working with each other, even though it shouldn’t, seeing that he knows for a fact that they haven’t always in the past.

Still, he has somehow gotten the image of them only as the Rogues stuck in his head, and he has never noticed one of them doing a thing with anybody else over the last year. Then again, he may have been around quite a lot but not enough to be able to really know about these kind of things.

“At times,” Sam answers. “Mostly when most of us are in the Heights, especially when Len’s one of them.”

At his surprised expression, the other man smirks and shrugs. “Cold usually has the best nose for lucrative heists and a way to keep the speeding dildo off our backs.”

Mick snorts in amusement and agrees with a somewhat grim smile. “He may be a fucking dick, but he does know how to do the job.”

“When aside from that,” Sam adds and puts his cards down after folding as well,” we drive each other nuts if we have to lay low too long and stick together at the same time. Usually we scatter for a while in situations like these.”

Barry wonders why they haven’t helped Len and the others to break out yet, and when he hesitantly asks about it, he is surprised when both Mick and Sam only shrug.

“There are reasons,” the latter explains, which really isn’t telling him anything at all.

Frowningly, Barry studies his cards, and, while his hand isn’t that bad, he doesn’t really feel like playing anymore and thus folds. Mick hums clearly pleased by this as he pulls the small heap of coins over to him, though it most likely doesn’t even sum up to three dollars.

“Th-they’ve b-been in th-there f-for qu-quite a w-while alr-ready.”

“We have been in the Heights for longer before,” Mick tells him and pulls a zippo out from his pant pocket. “No reason to worry.”

Barry watches how the bald man opens the lighter and doesn’t miss how he immediately starts to relax at the view of the flame.

“You are good for another round?” Sam nods to the cards he is currently shuffling, but Barry doesn’t really feel in the mood for another game and shakes his head. Instead, he asks him whether he could get him back home as he feels a bit tired, and, even though it has been rather nice to see them again after the bumpy start, he doesn’t want to overstay his welcome.

Sam agrees, and Barry follows him out of the room while Digger and Mick start another game.

“Thanks for the Galaktata again,” Sam says with a smirk after he’s delivered him to his bathroom. It causes Barry to snort, but he can’t bother to correct his friend as the Greek dish does have a rather hard name to pronounce, and he isn’t feeling up to try to do so again.

Sam, who stayed inside the mirror, grins and nods once more before he is gone again.

Barry watches his own reflection for a second longer before he turns around and leaves his small bathroom. He feels surprisingly content and decides that a warm cup of tea would be just the right thing to end this day on a good note.
Barry doesn’t know what has woken him, but he is familiar with these kind of situations and instinctively keeps still and his breath as even as possible as to not give away that he is no longer asleep.

Nervously and tensed up, he listens into the darkness around him.

For a long moment, there is just silence, his own breathing, and the loud throb of his pulse hammering in his ears before he notices the dreadful feeling at the back of his mind that tells him that someone is in the room with him.

The realisation is nearly sickening—

“It’s alright.” A familiar voice breaks the silence and his heart nearly jumps up his throat. “It’s just me.”

Barry sits up hurriedly and looks around with wide eyes towards where the entrance to his bedroom is. In the faint shine of the light that falls through his curtains from the streetlamps below, he can make out the familiar silhouette of a man.

“L-Len?” He scrambles to his feet but keeps standing next to his bed as his mind, still groggy from just waking up, has difficulties to decide how to react to this.

It has been over three months now that he’s seen or spoken to the other man the last time, and there is such a chaos of emotions tumbling around in his chest that it’s nearly overwhelming him.

A small part of him has feared that he could be the reason that Len choose to stay in the Heights, even though he knows how ridiculous and presumptuous such a thought really is. It is hard to come up with another plausible explanation, though, as the Rogues hate that prison just as much as any other criminal does, and they usually make sure to escape again as quickly as possible.

“Yeah, it’s me,” Len answers quietly, and Barry picks up on how tired he sounds, which causes a familiar concern to settle over him.

“Are y-you alr-right?” he asks worriedly. He is well aware that the Rogues’ escapes from Iron Heights usually involves them to get at least somewhat banged up on their way out because the guards there may be a bunch of horrible people, but that doesn’t mean that they are incompetent when it comes to doing their job.

Without thinking, Barry makes his way around his bed towards Len, whom he still can hardly make out in the mostly dark room. He stops an arm’s length in front of him, more out of habit and due to nerves than fear.

“I’m fine,” Len assures him with a soft chuckle and moves a bit closer, obviously not satisfied with the distance between them. Barry tenses up but doesn’t step back, instead he studies the other man’s face with a sickening feeling as he is able to see it more clearly now.

There is an ugly and painful looking dark bruise on his right cheekbone and another one on his left jaw where he must have gotten hit by one of the guards’ batons; Barry nearly groans when the memory of how it felt when Michael and Puckett used these weapons on him catches him off-guard. How they punished him for being a bad-

He stomps down on these horrible scars his time in that hellish place has left behind and bites down on a whimper. He suddenly feels out of breath, like something heavy is pressing down on his chest, and even though he knows that he is far away from there, that all of this lays in the past, he can still feel their damn hands on him-

“Hey.” Len steps closer and forces him to turn his attention back to him. There is an angry expression on his face which scares Barry for a moment before the other man makes a low calming noise and lifts his hands in a placating manner. “It’s alright, I’m not going to hurt you.”

Of course Len wouldn’t hurt him, Barry knows that, should know it at least, but it is so difficult at times. He swallows and coughs lightly before he tries to speak again.

“Y-you’re h-hurt,” he points out unnecessarily but hopes that the other man understands that he isn’t scared of him but of the traces that horrible place left behind on him. Traces he himself still bears to this day…

“I’m fine,” Len repeats in an unusual soft voice and meets Barry’s worried and frightened gaze with a look that is both sad and grim. “It looks worse than it is.”

That seems rather unlikely but, if anything, Len is very resilient, and as Barry studies him, he can’t find any other obvious injuries and is relieved to notice that he doesn’t hold himself like he is trying to hide that he is hurt or in pain either.

Still, the bruises look horrible and painful, and he can imagine how much these have to hurt.

“Y-you d-don’t l-look f-fine,” Barry murmurs quietly and can’t help himself but reach out for the other man’s bruised face. To his surprise, Len doesn’t pull back but watches him with attentive eyes. His cheek have stubbles that scratch lightly under Barry’s hand as he cups it for a moment before he lets his fingers move up slightly to the bruised cheekbone. He touches it very carefully, feeling how unusual hot the skin is there and can’t stop a small sympathetic noise that escape his throat at that. He knows that this is a fresh injury, and that it still has to hurt a lot.

Len doesn’t flinch under his touch, though, and when Barry turns his gaze back to him, he notices that the other man is watching him intently, which causes him to flush and pull his hand back. He averts his eyes, feeling rather awkward due to his unexpected bold behaviour.

The last months had him very worried about his friends, especially Len, and it is good to see him again. That doesn’t change that he is still as confused and intimidated by his own feelings for the other man, though, at least not any less than he has been before he vanished again.

A warm strong hand cups his neck, and he tenses up in response, lifting his gaze to meet Len’s who meets his eyes with a look that is both thoughtful and somewhat troubled.

“You should have more faith in us by now, Allen,” he tells him and squeezes his neck slightly. “You know that we’re as tough as nails.”

Barry chuckles and closes his eyes as he lets himself lean a bit into the touch. “Y-you’re a d-damn th-thickhead, th-that’s w-what you are.”

It’s good to have him back, alive and well. He was worried sick when he learned about the Rogues’ last run-in with the Flash, and he is still grateful that his friend kept his word and didn’t do something stupid to get back on the speedster. It still resulted in most of the Rogues being locked away in the Heights again, but it could have turned out way worse, especially if Len had tried to spur on the confrontation with Wally.
“Having a thick skull is a good thing in this business.” Len seems amused by his words and starts to urge him closer to which Barry relents after just a moment.

He still feels groggy from having just woken up after what can’t have been any more than two or three hours of sleep, and he is too relieved than to really care too much about how close he is to the other man right now. Len wouldn’t hurt him, and there is something so profoundly reassuring about knowing that he is with someone he can trust like this.

“Hey,” Len says quietly, voice low and warm, and Barry shudders when he feels his breath against his ear as he rests his forehead on the other man’s shoulder. “I’m sorry I woke you.”

This is just such a silly thing to worry about and Barry can’t help but chuckle. “I’m not,” he disagrees quietly and hesitantly lays his hand to rest on the other man’s hips.

The notion that Len would have likely just left again if he hadn’t woken up, doesn’t sit well with him, but he tries not to be dragged down by it. Not yet, anyway. He hasn’t seen him in more than three months, he just wants to concentrate on having him here for now.

The other man hums softly and moves his hand from Barry’s neck so that it rest on his back. Then, his second one joins it, and Barry finds himself in a loose but comforting embrace.

They stay like this for a long moment, and, though he can’t be sure, he thinks that Len needs this just as much as he does.

When Barry finally pulls back, he feels a bit lighter and much calmer. He is still tired and has to get up for work in just a few hours, but he still wants to keep his friend around at least for a bit longer.

“Y-you w-want a c-cup of c-coffee?” he asks and shudders slightly when one of Len’s hands caress his back lightly before he finally lets go of him.

“You’ve to get up in a couple of hours,” his friend points out and adds when he notices his disappointed expression. “Maybe a cup before you leave later on?”

“Y-you w-want t-to s-stay?” The notion is both exciting and a bit troubling to Barry, even though it wouldn’t be the first time that Len stayed overnight. He feels the urge to glance back to his bed as his friend would likely prefer to rest next to him again instead on the old couch which is a near guarantee to wake up with an arching back. It still kind of hard to believe for Barry that Evan seems to actually like using the old thing.

Len follows his look before he turns back to him to study him carefully, probably trying to gauge his reaction as he answers. “I’d like to.”

A familiar nervousness nestles into Barry’s stomach at these words, but even though a part of him wants to protest, he knows that he can trust Len. Also, he is tired and can’t deny that, even though he is a bit scared by the prospect of sharing his bed, he wants to have him close.

He missed him so much over the last couple of months, and he don’t want him to leave so soon again.

“Ok-kay,” Barry agrees quietly and isn’t sure whether he imagines it or not, but it seems like some of the tension he has hardly picked up on so far leaves the other man at that.

“Good.” Len sounds rather pleased, and Barry feels his cheeks grow warm again in response.

After getting a spare blanket for his friend, Barry returns to bed while Len decides to take a quick shower before joining him. Due to the little light, he can’t say whether the other man looked like he came directly over from escaping prison, but he assumes so which causes a pleasant warmth to spread through him.

Laying on his side, the blanket pulled up to his chin as he just can’t help himself despite it already being summer and much too warm for this, he listens to the sound of the shower through the ajar bedroom door and to how Len moves around the bathroom for a bit afterwards before he enters the short hallway again and makes his way back to him.

There is something oddly homely to this, and Barry can’t help but welcome it as it has been so long since he felt this pleasant kind of comfort the last time which comes with knowing that there is someone else living with you, even if Len isn’t really.

For now, for the next couple of hours, he can just pretend, though.

The sound of the bedroom door being pushed opened causes Barry to still, and he listens to Len’s steps movie towards the bedroom before he pauses there. It causes him to look over to the other man, feeling just as nervous as last time before he joined him in his bed.

It is relief when Barry notices that Len has fully clothed himself again, which is likely not the most comfortable way for him to sleep, but it eases some of his nagging worries away, and his friend clearly knows so as well.

He moves over a bit more to make sure that Len has enough space, and his friend seems to take this as an invitation to join him. Watching him lay down next to him makes him feel both excited and apprehensive. The mattress shifts slightly again as Len turns to his side, so that he ends up facing him.

They watch each other in the dim light as a comfortable silence settles between them, and Barry feels himself drift off, slowly but surely.

Without thinking as his mind has grown drowsy and sluggish, he moves his left hand from under his blanket into the space between them and is pleased when Len reaches for and takes a hold of it just a moment later.

Feeling calmer than in a long time, Barry closes his eyes.

Chapter End Notes

I hoped you enjoyed the chapter! :)

Against my initial worries, I did find time to prepare and upload this chapter today, so yay for not missing another Sunday! I can’t promise that I can keep this up, though, but I promise that I’ll try.

I want to thank all of you for your feedback on my last chapter. I was a bit worried about how well it would be received as it was mostly focused on Barry and his interaction with OCs (and no Len being present in it ;), but people still seemed to like it, which makes me really happy. :D

Regarding Barry’s little freak-out in front of Sam and the others, he is currently not interested in any sexual relationship, and while he is aware of his feelings for Len, he is pretty much spooked by the topic of sex or just the notion of his own sexual orientation, or lack thereof. It’s something he doesn’t want to think about, and, due to the Rogues knowing of what happened to him in prison, he hasn’t expected them to consider him as gay and quickly jumped to the wrong conclusions. Poor Mick and Digger, they certainly didn’t see it coming and will probably be more careful about what they say around Barry in future. ;)

And here is just some small extra info regarding this chapter: The first part has been written over two years ago by now while the second one is about three weeks old. I initially didn’t write about Barry’s and Len’s reunion, but I thought it would be a nice addition.

Btw, I read up on the use of comma in English writing, and you may have noticed an increased number of them in this chapter because of it. I’m still sure that I’ve probably gotten most wrong, but I’m trying to improve myself and my English skills bit by bit! ;)

Next chapter will have more Axel, Len getting pissed again, and Barry’s search for a broom.
A sharp knocking causes Barry to startle up from his nap. Disorientated, he pushes himself into a sitting position while looking around for the source of the sudden noise.

He spots Len at the kitchen table, where his friend is currently working on some blue prints, and their gazes meet for a second. The other man has gotten up and nods over to the door with a grim look. Barry, still not totally awake yet, needs a moment to realize that he indicates him that the sound came from there.

Concerned, after glancing towards his entrance, he turns back to Len and nods towards the bathroom as it would do neither of them any good if Jay or anybody else would learn that one of the Rogues is lazing about in his living room.

Unsurprisingly, Len seems to agree and swiftly grabs his stuff and moves to his temporary hide-out while Barry gets up and makes his way over to the door.

Another knock follows, louder than the one before, and he gets the impression that, whoever is in front of his door, grows impatient which can’t mean anything good.

A look through his door spy confirms this, but not for the reason he has suspected.

Barry quickly unlocks the door and opens it to a rather beaten up looking Axel. The boy seems to have gotten a pretty bad trashing, judging by how bruised his face is and the split lip. His right eye is completely swollen shut, and he is holding his right arm pressed against his chest that indicates that it’s likely hurt as well.

Despite the state he is currently in, the boy looks utterly livid, though.

Before the kid can say anything, Barry ushers him quickly inside his flat as he is pretty sure that Axel wouldn’t keep his voice down considering how upset he looks.

“Axel, wh-what h-happened?”

“Those backstabbing arseholes happened!” The boy spits the words out like they leave a nasty taste on his tongue, and Barry notices that he is slightly shaking. Carefully, he lays a hand on the kids shoulder, succeeding in getting Axel to finally meet his eyes.

“C-come, s-sit d-d-down, and I’ll l-look at y-your injuries,” he tells him in a low and hopefully soothing voice.

“I don’t need you to look after my injuries, I am fine! Those fucks didn’t hurt me!” Axel looks like he is about to go after one of Barry’s few pieces of furniture should he not calm down soon, and he really doesn’t need the kid to worsen his injuries and break something at the same time.

“Ok-kay,” he agrees calmly and tentatively gives Axel’s shoulder a light squeeze. “I b-believe you, b-but I’m w-worried, and y-you w-would d-do m-me a g-great f-f-favour if you’d l-let m-me m-make s-sure of it m-myself.”

For a long moment, Axel only returns his look with a tense expression and is obviously unsure whether he should allow him to do so or not. Barry is immensely relieved when he finally relaxes a bit.

“I’m fine,” he mutters stubbornly even though he steps a bit closer to him.” Those losers are way worse off than I’m.”

Somehow, Barry doubts that, but he stays quiet and instead steers the upset teenager to the couch he himself has been resting on till a couple of minutes ago.

“You w-want a g-glass of w-water?”

Axel, who looks suddenly much paler than a moment ago now that he is sitting, only shrugs.

“D-does y-your h-head h-hurt?”

“I’ve no concussion, don’t worry.” The kid grumbles but doesn’t sound particularly convincing. Barry is just about to point this out when he notices how his young friend visibly tenses up. Concerned, he is about to asks again whether he is alright when he realizes that Axel’s attention has turned somewhere behind him, and he doesn’t need to look to know whom the teen has spotted.

Len meets his eyes with a grim expression. “Who’s that brat?”

“Hey! I’m no brat, you old ugly fart!” Axel hisses, even though he keeps eying the other man with obvious wariness.

“Axel,” Barry reprimands him but without any real heat behind it. He knows he has other things to worry about than the young teen’s foul mouth, and as he looks back to Len, he can feel how an uneasy heaviness settles into the pit of his stomach. The other man is still standing close to the bathroom and looks about as displeased by the kid’s presence as Barry thought he would. “H-he’s a f-friend.”

Len’s frown deepens, and it isn’t hard to get what he thinks of this. To Barry’s surprise, he doesn’t say anything else and simply goes back to take his former seat at the kitchen table.

Barry doesn’t kid himself into thinking that this is over, though, it is obvious that Len doesn’t like this situation at all, even without him directly saying so, but he is still glad that his friend keeps this to himself for now with the boy around.

“I’ll g-get you s-something t-to d-drink, j-just r-rest a b-bit, alright?”

Axel, who has also been watching Len, looks back to him and gives him an unhappy nod in agreement. “’kay.”

Later, when the teen is patched up and out on his couch, snoring rather loudly, most likely due to a broken nose, Barry joins Len at the table, where the other man is currently nursing a beer while looking at one of the blueprints he is working on in an absentminded way that makes it clear that he isn’t really paying any mind to it.
“This could get you faster back to the Heights than any of us ever could,” he says in a grim tone the moment Barry has seated himself opposite to him and lifts his gaze to meet his. “Nobody will give a fuck about you wanting to help that kid. You’re an alleged child abuser.”

“I-kn-know,” he agrees quietly and starts to nervously chew on his lower lip. The notion of what could happen should anybody get wind of him housing someone underage is weighing heavily on him to say the least.

The look Len gives him in response is one of annoyance and frustration, and Barry has to avert his eyes. He doesn’t like it when the other man is angry at him, especially because he is already livid at himself for getting in this dumb situation in the first place.

Feeling Len’s disapproving glare on himself is a bit unsettling, and he decides to get up and make some tea. Right now, the other man isn’t a very comforting company, and even though he understands and has even expected it, it doesn’t help either.

While he waits for the water to start boiling, he watches the falling rain through the window and wonders what has happened between Axel and his former friends. The boy hasn’t exactly been forthcoming with an explanation of how he got himself into being beaten up, and Barry hasn’t really tried to make him talk. He knows that Axel would tell him when he feels comfortable enough to do so and bothering him about it would only upset him more and get them nowhere.

Len stays quiet as well, but Barry can feel his gaze still on him and can’t help but dread any further conversation with him right now.

The water starts to boil, and Barry takes the pot to pour it into his cup while watching how it turns slightly red as soon as it touches the tea bag. It is then that he hears the other man get up and just a moment later he notices a presence behind himself and grows still.

Slowly, he looks over his shoulder, to where Len is standing close enough that it makes him slightly uncomfortable. He frowns, sets the pot down and turns around, so that they are facing each other.

“You’re ang-gry.” It isn’t a question as he already knows the answer which is really rather hard to miss as Len doesn’t bother to mask displeasure. Barry has realized a while ago that he nearly never hides his emotions when he is alone with him like he does when others are around.

Len frowns which deepens when Axel mumbles something in his sleep from his spot on the couch. “You’ve to be more careful,” his friend tells him, and there is a tension around his eyes and to how he holds himself that makes Barry nervous.

“You m-mean l-like n-not l-letting f-fugitive p-pass b-by m-my f-flat?” he can’t help but ask despite that.

“We know how to keep the trouble away from you,” Len replies grimly. “The little idiot doesn’t. He most likely didn’t even check if someone was seeing him coming here.”

Barry reaches up to rub his forehead, behind which a slight painful throbbing has started again, and tries to think of a way to explain to the other man why he did this despite knowing how stupid of a decision it actually is. “H-he w-was h-hurt a-and s-scared, h-he p-probab-bly h-has n-nowh-where e-else t-to g-go, L-Len.”

“He shouldn’t think that this is a place he can do so to begin with.” Len grunts and throws a dark look over his shoulder to where Axel is still snoring. “You’ve enough trouble on your own plate, and you’re already hardly able to deal with it.”
The words hurt, and when Len turns his eyes back to him, he seems to pick up on it as well as his expression softens a bit.

“Barry-”

“H-he’s a-alone,” Barry cuts him off. “H-he h-has n-nobody h-he c-can t-turn t-to oth-er th-an o-ther s-street k-kids, and i-it s-seems h-he d-doesn’t e-even h-have th-th-that any-m-more.”

“So do dozens of others, you wanna take care of them as well?” Len doesn’t sound angry anymore but calm and reasonable. “You owe nothing to that kid or anybody else, you’d do much better looking out for yourself for once.”

Slowly, as if not to scare him, Len steps closer, and Barry, who has momentarily turned his gaze to the ground, looks back up to him.

“You don’t want to go back there, you know what they did to you the last time.”

“Y-y-you d-don’t h-have t-t-to r-r-emember m-me,” Barry tell him upset, angry that the other man would see the need to bring this up, but before he can say anything else, he is cut off.

“It would be even less save for you now.” If possible, Len looks even more tensed up then before as he says this, which confuses and worries Barry.

“What do you mean?” he asks, but the other man shakes his head and nods to Axel with a grim frown. “Nothing you have to worry about if your ass isn’t put back there because you take care of some snotty child.”

At times like this, when Len makes it so very plain that he doesn’t trust him, Barry feels the urge to pull on his own hair in frustration because he gets that the other man wants to look out for him and keep him away from danger, but instead of sharing with him what is going on, he treats him like he is unable to look out for himself. Like he hasn’t survived the majority of his life on his own.

“F-fine, k-keep y-your d-damn s-secrets.” He turns back to his cup of tea and decides that he really doesn’t want to be around his friend any longer. The pain behind his temples grows sharper, and he knows from experience that it only would grow worse over the next couple of hours.

Closing his eyes for a moment and trying to ignore the presence of the other man behind him, he takes a slow and calming breathe before he turns around. Len is meeting his gaze with a thoughtful and still rather grim expression, and he briefly wonders whether the others see him like this as well, too weak and inept to take care of himself. He pushes that notion away with an unhappy frown and looks over to the couch as he doesn’t want to meet his eyes right now.

“I’ll g-go t-to l-lie d-down f-for a b-bit, I… I’m t-tired.” He nods to Axel. “P-please d-don’t s-scare h-him w-when h-he w-wakes u-up. J-just t-tell h-him t-t-to f-fetch m-me if h-he n-need s-something, I’ll l-leave th-th-e d-door a-ajar, a-aanyway.”

Barry isn’t surprised when Len stays quiet, and while this is annoying and a bit hurtful, he is pretty certain that the other man would not kick the kid out while he is resting.

Without another word between them, he goes to bed.

“What are you doing?” Barry shoots a glance over his shoulder to Marco who is currently sitting at the table in the living area of the Rogues’ current hideout, drinking some coffee and reading a book.
“D-dusting?”

“No shit.” Sam deadpans before he chuckles. He has taken the spot opposite to the other criminal and is currently tinkering on his mirror-gun as it seems to have gotten damaged during their last heist.

“Why are you dusting, Allen?” the Latin asks and even though there is a frown on his face, he still seems more amused than anything.

Barry stops and turns to them with a slight frown of his own. “B-because th-this p-place is a m-mess,” he points out slowly. “And I d-don’t s-see wh-why th-this w-would b-be b-bothering y-you.”

“Oh, don’t worry, it doesn’t.” Sam shrugs with a smirk before he turns back to his gun. “Clean away, Allen, run riot. I’m certainly not going to stop you.”

Barry isn’t sure whether the other man is making fun of him or not, but before he can say something to him, Marco speaks up.

“You really don’t have to do that,” the other man says as studies him. “We’re fine with how this place is.”

“Speak for yourself,” Sam grumbles and gives the other Rogue a dark look. “This place is a dump.”

“Wh-which w-wouldn’t b-be th-the c-c-case if you’d c-clean every once in a w-while,” Barry remarks and isn’t surprised when both of the other man gives him rather unimpressed looks in return.

He doesn’t see what the problem is, he isn’t going to touch any of their rooms, just the ones they are all using and maybe Len’s if the other man doesn’t mind.

“I w-won’t t-touch a-any o-of y-your th-things if y-you’re w-worried ab-bout th-that,” he assures them because, really, he isn’t their cleaning lady, and he knows that James isn’t the only one who booby-traps his door.

Marco frowns again while Sam gives him another amused look like Barry has totally missed the point. The Latin finally just shrugs and turns back to his book, seemingly no longer interested in his cleaning activities.

Not really sure what this was about, Barry turns back to the shelf.

He doesn’t see why a bit of cleaning would bother any of them but he will make certain to stay away from any of their stuff just in case. Still, after he has started to come over more often again since Len and the others has broken out of prison, he couldn’t help but notice how run-down and dirty this place has actually gotten, and he has always been a bit of a neat-freak which causes him to feel rather uncomfortable to be here these days. It has improved over the last few weeks with Lisa and Hartley being around once again, but it still is pretty bad.

“We have gotten our own housekeeper now?” Mick, who has just entered the room with a beer in one hand and a lightener in the other, doesn’t seem particularly bothered when Barry looks over to him. He seems more surprised and slightly bemused.

“I’m n-not y-your h-housek-k-keeper,” Barry corrects drily.

“You’re the one with the duster,” Mick points out with a smirk before he makes his way over to the others.

“Let him work.” Sam huffs and rolls his eyes. “There’s finally someone who’s cleaning this shithole, how can you not be delighted about that?"

“You do know that you could clean as well if this really bothers you this much,” Marco suggests for which he gets a very dark look in return from the other man. “So could you.” Sam frowns.

“I’m fine with how this place is.” Marco shrugs and turns his attention back to the pages of his book. Barry is pretty sure that it is another Mark Twain novel.

Sam only scoffs and wrinkles his nose. “Seriously? I’m actually thinking about getting a tetanus vaccination because of how sordid this place has gotten.”

“All of y-you c-could h-have c-cleaned wh-while th-the others w-were g-gone,” Barry interject and nods to the room in general. “Y-you’ve b-been around f-for m-most of th-the t-time, and y-you h-haven’t even v-vacuumed once as f-far a-as I c-can t-tell.”

None of the present men seem to feel particularly guilty about this little fact, and Sam only inquires with an incredulous look whether they even have a vacuum cleaner.

“Hartley usually uses the broom,” he explains when he notices Barry’s frown, which only causes it to deepen because that would be just great.

“You’re a r-ridiculously l-lazy b-bunch, you kn-know th-that, r-right?”

“Guilty as charged,” Mick agrees easily before he suggests a game of poker. “You wanna join in as well, Allen?”

Barry declines as he is going to look for the former mentioned and possibly non-existing vacuum cleaner instead.

Twenty minutes later, it has become more or less a certainty that the Rogues do not own one, which is annoying and frustrating at the same time as he isn’t looking forward to use a broom to sweep up the basement.

How does it come that not a single one of them every thought to get one? It’s ridiculous.

Still, it can’t be helped, and he does know at least about the whereabouts of the broom he has seen been using before.

“What are you doing, Barry-bear?” James unexpected voices causes him to jump slightly.

“Sorry,” the other blonde apologies somewhat guilty. “I didn’t want to startle you.”

“It’s f-fine,” Barry assures him before he decides to try his luck and asks James about a vacuum cleaner. As expected, his friend doesn’t know either where one could be or whether they even own one.

“Why do you want to vacuum, anyway?” James asked a bit puzzled.

“I j-just w-want t-to c-clean a bit,” he explains as he lets his gaze sweep through the room once again, still not able to believe that there really couldn’t be a vacuum cleaner somewhere around.

“What?” The other man reconsiders his question a moment later, though, as he gives their surroundings a brief once-over and hums in agreement. “Cleaning is probably not such a bad idea.”

“Y-you w-want t-to h-help m-me?” Barry asks as he makes his way over to where James stands at the entrance to the small storage room.
As expected, James does not look very keen of this suggestion. “Do I have to?”

Barry snorts and shakes his head. “N-no, it’s f-fine.”

“I could get Hartley,” James offers. “I’m sure he would like to join you.”

“H-he isn’t b-busy w-with anyth-thing else?”

“Nah, he’s just napping.”

Of course.

He gives his friend a bemused look and shakes his head. “N-no, it’s f-fine, I’m p-pretty s-sure h-he w-would n-not ap-preciate you w-waking h-him up.”

“Yeah, you’re probably right,” James agrees and makes a slightly pained face. “He usually gets rather cranky when I do that.”

While not helping, the other man sticks around and tags along to receive the broom Barry has seen Hartley put back in one of the old closets you can find around her.

As usual, James is doing the main part of the talking, which Barry is more than fine with as he generally prefers to listen to others, even though he isn’t entirely sure how to feel about his friend’s ideas regarding some explosive chewing gum. He can’t help but point out what kind of unsettling concept that is, which causes James to sulk for a bit but not to leave.

In the small cabinet close to the stairs, he finds the broom as well as a mop and an old rather battered bucket. He carries all of it back to the kitchen, from where he plans to start his little cleaning crusade. James stays, once again in a good mood, and they start to throw rather ludicrous scientific ideas about possible further inventions back and forth.

Barry can tell that the other man enjoys it that he plays along, and so does he as it is nice to brainstorm these kind of things with someone else. There aren’t many people in his life with whom he can do so anymore, and while he doesn’t really miss his job at the CCPD or being the Flash, he does miss the work and coming up with solutions to problems which required this kind of thinking at times.

“You were a CSI before, right?” Barry, who is just about to finish mopping the improvised kitchen, halts and shoots the other blond an uncertain look.

“Yes,” he agrees somewhat hesitantly.

“That is pretty cool.” James remarks before he seems to remember what this actually means and quickly adds. “Despite you being a former cop, I mean.”

“Th-thanks.” Barry gives the other man a faint smile and turns back to mopping the floor.

It is kind of a dirty little secret when it comes to his former occupation that everybody knows of, and while he himself doesn’t particularly feel like discussing it with anybody, let alone a group of notorious criminals, it is a bit assuring to hear the other man say so.

“You ever worked on one of our cases?” His friend asks out of the blue and causes him to grow still for a moment. There is no reason for him to be so nervous about this as James nor any of the others, aside from Len, know anything about him being the former Flash, but he doesn’t understand where this sudden change of topic came from.
“You have,” the other blonde concludes from his reaction, and contrary to Barry’s expectation, he doesn’t seem angered by this little fact but curious instead. “You ever got one of us in prison?”

It feels like his stomach is twisting up in a knot, causing him to feel slightly sick as he looks at the other man, unsure how to respond or why he would even ask this.

“Hey, what are you two up to?” Both James and he look over to the kitchen entrance to find Lisa standing there, a confused frown on her face as she studies the mop in his hands. Her expression turns slightly annoyed then, and she lifts her eyes to meet his. “Are you cleaning?”

“Ding-ding-ding!” James agrees, which causes Lisa to shoot him an annoyed look but otherwise ignores him as she focuses back on Barry instead. He doesn’t miss how her lips are slightly pursed as she seems to think about what to say, and he wonders what he has done to irritate her.

“You don’t have to do that,” she starts and nods to the mop in his hands before she glares at James. “You really don’t have to clean after these pigs.”

“I don’t mind him cleaning after-”

“Shut up, Tricks, it isn’t his responsibility to look after your lazy bum. You can always clean after yourself,” Lisa reminds him sharply, which causes the other Rogue to bristle and protest. “Hey! I am not lazy.”

Barry watches them argue for a moment, and while it is kind of nice that his friend is worrying about others taking advantage of him, it still gets really annoying what a big deal everybody is making of him just wanting to do some cleaning.

“I kn-know th-that I d-don’t have t-to d-do th-this,” he tells her and while he tries, he isn’t successful in keeping the slight hurt out of his voice because Len is apparently not the only one who seems to think that he is either stupid or weak or both of these things combined. “I’m n-not y-your c-c-cleaner, I d-don’t d-do th-this t-to m-make y-you l-like m-me or l-let m-me s-stay b-but b-bec-cause I d-don’t f-feel c-comf-fortable w-with h-how m-messy everyth-thing is.”

Why would Lisa assume something like that of him? Why does Marco, for that matter? Is it because it is so unusual for them to have someone around who wants to live someplace that is actually clean or is it himself? He knows that he comes over meek and rather subdued more often than not, but he certainly won’t let himself be exploited in such a way, and he has thought that the others are aware of this as well.

Getting some order into the hideout doesn’t seem all that appealing anymore…

Lisa steps closer to him, and as he looks back to her, he notices that her expression has softened a bit.

“I see, well, that is something I can definitely relate to.” She gives him an apologetic smile before she nods to the mop in his hand. “You wouldn’t mind me giving you a hand?”

Barry is a bit surprised about his friend’s sudden change of heart but can’t say that he wouldn’t welcome some help as there is still quite a lot of cleaning ahead of him. “N-no, th-that w-would b-be g-great.”

“Good.” She seems satisfied by his agreement and turns to James, who is currently munching away on some chocolate bar he got from the fridge, and gives him a hard look. “You will join in too.”

“Eh, no I won’t?” The other man frowns and nods to Barry. “He said I don’t have to.”
“Well, too bad, I say you do, you lazy ass.” Lisa grunts, and stems her hand into her hips. “Or are you really okay with Barry doing all the work for you while you are just mooching about?”

“But I’m alright with how the place looks—” James tries to protest, but Lisa cuts him off.

“I know, and this is still disturbing to me.” The blond woman huffs as she wrinkles her nose. “I couldn’t care less, though. You’re going to help, or you can be sure that I’ll tell Hartley who sabotaged his last couple of dates.”

James makes a surprised and alarmed protesting sound, but Lisa cuts him off again, this time with a sharp movement of her hand while glaring him down. “I’m not joking.”

The other man seems about to protest for a moment longer before his shoulders slump, and he mutters his agreement.

“H-he r-really d-doesn’t h-have t-to,” Barry says, but Lisa only gives him a slightly exasperated glance in return. “Do you really want to clean this shitty place all on your own? You do remember how big it is, right?”

“W-well, n-not all of it, j-just th-the g-general areas,” he explains which causes Lisa to pinch the bridge of her nose, something her brother also tends to do a lot when he is frustrated, and sighs in supressed exasperation. “You’re either way too nice or a complete idiot, Bar.”

Barry bristles at this words but has no opportunity to argue when Roscoe chooses this moment to join them in the kitchen.

“Here you are,” the other man says as soon as he spots Lisa and smiles slight. “I’ve been looking for you—”

“Good, I was just about to go and fetch you,” the blond woman interrupts him and walks over to him.

“You were?” Roscoe asks with a now somewhat wary expression.

“Yes, we’re finally going to clean this disgusting bolthole, and it isn’t going to be just me and Barry.”

“What? But I have to—”

“Your magazines and books can wait,” Lisa states firmly. “This is more important right now.”

“Wait a minute—”

“No, this is going to happen, and this is going to happen now.”

Barry watches how Roscoe’s protest wanes away under Lisa’s glare as she has obviously no interests in leaving this matter just to him, and while he really feels the urge to point out that she doesn’t have to do this seeing that it has been his idea in the first place, he doesn’t. It is more than likely that she would only get more annoyed, and he is glad that her irk is not directed towards him right now.

“You and James can go and grab some more buckets and mops, there’re a couple in the closet next to the stairs in the ground floor. I’ll try and get the others to lend a hand as well.”

“But, Lisa—” Roscoe’s protests fall on deaf ears, and they all watch the blond woman leave the kitchen without giving them another glance.

For a couple of seconds, all of them are looking at the entrance quietly, and Barry is pretty sure that he isn’t the only one who is taken by surprised by the sudden turn of events.

Then, Roscoe turns around to face him with a grim and pissed off expression on his face that causes Barry to tense up in alarm.

“Great,” he scoffs. “Thanks a lot, Allen.”

“I d-d-didn-”

The other man ignores him and heavy sigh before he turns to James. “Come on, Trickster, let’s get the cleaning stuff.”

“But I don’t want to!”

“Nobody cares.” Roscoe grunts annoyed before he leaves the kitchen as well.

“Aww man…” James huffs frustrated but follows his friend with still slumped shoulders.

Barry just watches them go, unsure of what has just happened and worried that all of the Rogues are going to be pissed at him for getting them involved in this.

Well, it can’t really be helped anymore.

At least this would speed up things considerably.

Chapter End Notes

Seems like things between Len and Barry have started to get a bit more tense again. But Len finally met Axel, so yay for this!

Also, I love what a natural Lisa is at bossing people around. ;)

Next chapter will be up either next week or the week after that, I’m not entirely sure how I want to post it just yet. I’m thinking about changing my uploading schedule to once every two weeks whenever I’ve a lot on my plate in real life or want to invest some more time in other stories (because I tend to get a really crazy urge to write some of those at times), so that I can keep it at one chapter at least every two weeks. This is just something to keep in mind so that you aren’t surprised (or worried, because some of you are just the sweetest people :) when I miss to upload on a Sunday.

Also, in the next chapter Barry will get quite a scare, and Len will be in a horrible mood.

Thanks so much for reading, and I really hope you enjoyed the chapter! :)
Seeking Comfort and Finding None

Chapter Summary

Barry runs into someone he would rather have not seen again. It leaves him scared and with a bruised arm which causes him to turn to the Rogues. Unfortunately, Len isn't as understanding of his situation as he hoped he would be.

“This probably falls under child labor,” Axel grumbles as he makes his way over to the counter with another heavy box full of old papers and magazines, one of many which have been stashed away and forgotten in the storage room of the shop a long time ago.

“Y-you o-offered t-to h-help,” Barry reminds him while he goes through another box. Mrs Ming has offered him to pick whatever perks his interest as a thank you for clearing out the storeroom after closing the store today, and so far he had found a handful of magazines for himself and Mary, mostly about cooking and home decoration, but also some older journals about chemistry and electronics. “And y-you’ve g-gotten a wh-whole b-batch of f-fresh w-walnut m-muffins in advance, s-so d-don’t c-complain.”

The teen only mutters something unintelligible under his breath as he joins Barry in sorting through the content of the dusty boxes. Mrs. Ming has mentioned to Axel that there are also some comic books somewhere in between the magazines, and that he could keep them if he wants to, which is clearly what the teen intends to do right now.

It is already quite late, about an hour after the shop has officially closed, and they are the only ones left inside by now as Mrs. Ming has already gone to bed. Barry likes being able to spend time here, a place he feels really comfortable at, while he can also relax a bit and spend some time with Axel. The boy has really grown on him over the last couple of weeks, and it usually really helps his mood to have him around.

“Why haven’t these been thrown away already?” Axel asks as he shows him a magazine cover and points at the release date. “This is from 2002! I have been a toddler back then!”

“Y-yes,” agrees Barry with a smile. “Th-they a-are t-truly a-ancient.”

He only gets an unimpressed look in return. “Well, you’re old, so over a decade has to be nothing for you.”

Barry can’t help but laugh hearing that. “H-he, I’m n-not th-that o-old.”

“You’re over forty, you are ancient,” the kid points out, and Barry smiles due to how certain he sounds about it.

“Y-you’ll b-be f-forty m-much s-sooner th-than you m-may b-believe j-just y-yet.”

“If you say so,” Axel flippantly agrees but obviously doesn’t think there is any validity to that statement. A sudden gasp from the boy causes Barry to tense up and turn to him in alarm.

“Look at this! This is one of the first issues of Racoon-Man: The Great Journey to Mars! How fricking cool is that!? They’ve to be worth at least thirty bucks now!”

A cover of a guy in a very questionable racoon costume is shoved towards Barry for a second before Axel puts it aside and starts to dug through his box with new-found gusto.

“I also l-liked h-him a l-lot w-when I w-was y-your age,” Barry mentions to the boy and isn’t sure whether he should be amused or insulted by the incredulous look he receives in response.

“You know Racoon-Man?” Axel asks sceptically and frowns down at the comic he has just put aside.

“Y-yes, I also d-did r-read c-comics wh-when I w-was y-younger, l-like m-most k-kids d-do,” Barry explains with a chuckle and shrugs when Axel eyes him like he has grown a second head. “I l-loved t-to r-read about R-Rocky J-Juergens, a-and h-his adventures as th-the m-masked R-Racoon-M-

“Really? But… you usually just read those boring magazines about science and stuff, or those boring novels,” the boy points out and turns his attention back to the comic in his hands with a slowly deepening frown. “How old is Racoon-Man?”

Barry snorts and wonders whether the kid would believe him that Rocky Juergens, aka the Rakoon-Man, has fought criminals long before he himself was even born. Then again, he doesn’t want to destroy Axel’s view of the world and instead remarks that a superhero’s age hardly matters.

“Th-they an-wh-what th-they s-stand f-for inspire p-people, and it w-will d-do s-so l-long after th-they’re n-no l-longer in p-print. Th-their ages are n-not imp-portant.”

Judging by Axel’s doubtful expression, the boy doesn’t really seem to agree, and Barry can hardly hold it against him. He is still young, and for kids it’s sometimes hard to grasp how the world has already existed a long time before they arrived and still will do so a long time after they left again.

They proceed working through the big amount of older magazines and papers in a comfortable silence for a while, and Barry finds a couple more of interesting journals and magazines as well.

“What else did you like to read when you were a kid?” Barry looks over to Axel and sees that the kids is watching him with a contemplating and curious look.

“Well,” he starts and thinks for a moment before he goes on. “I l-loved t-to r-read th-the G-Grey G-“W-well,” he starts and thinks for a moment before he goes on. “I l-loved t-to r-read th-the G-Grey G-

His young companion hums and keeps watching him like he isn’t sure what to make of this new side of him he hasn’t been aware of before.

“So, you had a lot of the issues?” Axel asks a bit hopeful which causes Barry to smile again.

“N-no,” he explains. “I m-mostly r-read th-them at th-the l-l-library and at th-the s-store wh-where I h-helped out after s-school.”
“Really? In a library?” Axel asks in utter disbelief and eyes him sceptically as if he was trying to evaluate whether he is lying. “They’ve comics there as well?”

Barry chuckles bemused by the slightly outraged tone of the boy and nods.

“Y-yes, th-they’ve c-comics t-too,” he assures Axel who is still looking at him as if he has just told him that the moon is made of actual cheese. “N-not th-the n-newest ones, at l-least n-not b-back th-then, b-but our s-school l-library often g-got c-comics and other b-books d-donated b-by f-folks wh-who d-didn’t n-need th-them anym-more. W-We actually h-had q-quite a b-big s-section th-there.”

“But those are comics,” Axel reminds him and still sounds like he thinks that he is missing something very essential here. “Why would they offer comics to read?”

“J-just f-for th-that exact r-reason,” Barry explains and nods to the issue the teen is still holding. “You r-read it, wh-which improves y-your r-reading s-skills and m-makes it easier f-for you t-to k-keep up in m-more s-school r-related s-subjects as w-well.”

Axel studies the book in his hands with another frown before he shoots Barry another doubtful glance. “Our teachers didn’t want us to read comics in class.”

Barry feels a familiar fondness for the young teen overcome him as he agrees. “M-mine d-didn’t e-either as y-you’re s-supposed t-to p-pay at-tention d-during c-class, Axel.”

The boy grumbles something under his breath before he turns back to going through the box. Barry is just about to do the same, when Axel speaks again. “Who was your favourite?”

It isn’t hard at all to recall that one, and it fills Barry’s chest with a sort of heavy and slightly painful nostalgia as he thinks back to how he often hid away in those issues when he was young and the real world had hardly anything to offer but abuse and misery.

“Th-the F-Flash.”

This causes the teen to snort. “Figures.”

“W-what is th-that s-s-supposed t-to m-mean?” Barry asks and can’t help but feel slightly insulted by the kid’s reaction.

“You’re like the old Flash, at least how they’ve written him, all honest and trying to help everybody,” Axel explains with a shrug and gives him an amused look. “Though, you’d probably look stupid with that hat, not that the old geezer doesn’t.”

“Axel,” Barry admonishes and feels rather irked on Jay’s behalf. “J-Jay G-Garrick is a h-hero, wh-who h-has s-saved m-more p-people th-than you h-have p-probably m-met s-so f-far, it r-really d-doesn’t m-matter wh-what c-costume h-he w-wears w-while d-doing s-so.”

“Jeez, whatever, I don’t have a problem with his get-up, I’m just saying that his hat is rather… funny looking.” Axel shrugs and reaches for one of the magazines he has put aside before. “Look, the other Flash’s get-up was neat, all red and cool-looking.” The kid shows him a cover of where Barry himself is shown during his first year as the Flash. He nearly pulls a face seeing himself in his old costume, looking painfully tensed up as he poses for the camera.

This has been an eternity ago…

“The Flash’s current costume is looking rather shitty, though,” Axel goes on which causes Barry to frowns and asks what he means.
“The new one, with the modified mask, it makes him look pissed off all the time.” Axel gives him a funny look at that. “You didn’t notice the difference? Really?”

“I d-did, b-but I h-haven’t p-paid it t-too m-much a-at-tention t-to it.” He has noticed Wally’s version of the costume, he has caught a couple of glimpses in papers and on TV, but he usually hardly lingers long enough to study them. Seeing his nephew, in or out of costume, is still a very uneasy and painful experience, and he usually prefers not to.

“Trust me, the old one was way better,” Axel tells him seriously before he goes back to looking through the box.

Barry watches the kid for a moment longer, his good mood gone, before he finally turns back to the task at hand as well.

Two hours later, close to one in the morning, both of them have finally emptied the last box, and while Barry locks the door behind them, Axel is trying to read one of the comics he has picked for himself in the near darkness.

“You’re g-going t-to r-ruin y-your eyes,” he points out to the kid, who shakes his head and disagrees. “Nah, I have the sight of a hawk.”

“S-still, w-wait t-till w-we’re b-back at h-home, okay?” Axel gives him an annoyed look but puts the comic away with an exaggerated sigh, which causes Barry to smile. “Y-you c-can r-read all you w-want w-when you’re s-somewh-where w-with an actual l-light s-source.”

The temperatures have started to drop again over the last week, and the night is quite cool, so much so that he actually regrets not to have taken his thicker coat to work instead of the lighter summer-jacket he is wearing now.

They make their way over to the bus-stop, and Barry starts to feel slightly uneasy again with how badly lit this path still is. He tries to fight the fear down, though, as he doesn’t want to worry Axel. It isn’t the first time that they have to use the bus this late, and he knows that he is just a bit on edge because he hasn’t slept so well the last couple of weeks.

“You think it will rain?” He turns his gaze to the teenager next to him who is alternatingly glancing up at the sky before he worriedly looks back down to the bag with his new possessions. Barry turns his attention up to the sky as well and notices that it has vanished behind a thick layer of clouds.

“Th-they’ve s-said th-there w-would be a s-storm t-tomorrow,” he remarks. “B-but I d-don’t th-think th-that you’ve t-to w-worry about it t-tonight. I’m s-sure your c-comics are s-save.”

Axel snorts but looks a bit relieved. He still folds the upper part of the plastic bag back so that its goods are completely covered and carries it pressed against his chest.

They are lucky tonight and don’t have to wait more than maybe five minutes before the next bus arrives. The ride goes by in mostly silence, as his younger friend is absorbed in one of the comics about the Racoon-Man while Barry makes do with watching the familiar building pass way.

As usual, he gets out one stop earlier so that Axel can get up to his floor and wait for him there to unlock the door without anybody seeing them enter together. It’s obvious that the teen still thinks that he is overly paranoid but doesn’t protest.

The air has become even colder over the last forty minutes, and he shivers slightly as he watches the bus drive off before he too starts to move again. Like usual, the streets are mostly vacant which puts some of his worries at ease.
The temperatures dropped quite a bit now that August is coming to an end, and as he pulls his jacket a bit tighter around himself he can’t help but marvel over the fact that in just about three weeks his second year out of prison would come to an end as well.

Time is an odd thing, even now without his connection to the speed force or maybe especially now. It feels like it is flying by on some days while keeps slowly crawling by on others.

It does take him about ten minutes till he is able to make his apartment building out, and he feels exhausted enough that he can hardly think of anything but his own bed. He would make Axel a small snack before laying down, but he would postpone his shower till tomorrow morning. All of his limbs feel heavy, close to lead instead of flesh and bones, and he is incredibly glad that today is Sunday, and that he wouldn’t have to get up in only a few short hours.

Barry notices the stranger that is walking towards him on his sidewalk quite late as he has kept his eyes mostly to the ground, silently prep-talking himself to speed up a little bit so that he could arrive home earlier. The shadowy figure is tall and broad, undoubtedly a man, and Barry’s feet automatically slow down on their own. He glances over to the other side of the street which is still as empty as before and considers passing over there but isn’t certain whether this could attract the stranger’s attention and maybe a possible bad reaction.

Despite his gut feeling that tells him to be wary of whoever this person is, Barry decides against changing sides and tries to walk as close to the houses as possible so that there would be enough space between them while passing each other.

The man is walking slowly, obviously in no hurry, which should be a good sign but unsettles him even more. He keeps his eyes glued on the ground and tenses up when they are just about to pass.

A hand grabs his upper left arm, and he flinches due to how painfully strong the grip is. His throat closes up again and only a thin alarmed croak escapes his lips when he looks over to the stranger, thinking about how absurd this is because he really should have seen this coming, he should have listen to his instincts. He is so damn stupid…

Not that it would have really made a difference. Barry isn’t quick on his feet anymore and running away would most likely only have gotten him some additional problems.

The stranger doesn’t speak, which doesn’t do anything to make this whole situation any less unsettling. Barry doesn’t recognize his face, it is hard and angular, and he has nearly unnaturally intense green eyes that bore themselves into his.

For a horribly moment, time seems to freeze around them, and the stranger only stares at him, not blinking, not speaking, while Barry’s body starts to shake in fear.

His stomach makes a nearly painful lurch towards his throat when the man finally says something, in a still all too familiar voice that gives his identity immediately away. “Your little friend is quite a handful, isn’t he?”

Barry’s eyes grow wide in fear and worry, a reaction that causes the other man to chuckle deeply.

“Don’t worry, he is fine.” The grip around his arms intensifies and causes him to groan in pain which in turn makes his captor smirk. “You remember me of a little kitty I once had as a child. He was also always scared…”

Without any apparent effort, Kenneth pulls him closer and thus partly lifts him off the ground, so that their noses are nearly touching. “He would freeze whenever I grabbed one of his little legs, like you do right now. He would never utter a sound, only stare at me with those wide scared eyes of his.”

Barry’s hand desperately tries to claw the other one off his arm but the grip could as well have been of iron, he can’t get it to move at all. His unsuccessful struggling only seems to increase Kenneth’s amusement and for a long moment he doesn’t say anything but only keeps watching him like a bug squirming under his thumb before he presses down on it.

Then he lets go of him and it catches Barry so off-guard that his legs nearly give out under him. He swiftly backs off to the house wall next to them without taking his eyes off the taller man.

It is nearly surreal when Kenneth nods at him next as if they were friends before he moves on into the direction he has initially been heading to, without sparing him another glance.

Barry stares after him for a couple of minutes as he doesn’t dare to move and turns his back to the man. When Kenneth is finally rounding another corner and vanishing behind it, he quickly makes his way towards his building while desperately hoping that Axel is really alright.

“What the fuck is that brat doing here?!”

Len sounds as furious as Barry has expected, and he can feel Axel actually retreat a bit more behind him at the other man’s angry words. He shoots the kid a worried look before he turns back to Len who has made his way over to them by now.

“L-Len-”

“Shut up!”

Barry flinches back and can’t help but feel alarmed by how livid the other man sounds. His body tenses up painfully in response, and he tries to fight down the panic that tries to get a grip on him. He has known that Len would react like this, there is no reason for him to lose his head over it like this.

“You shut up! Don’t talk to him like that, you ugly ass!” Axel hisses and comes out from behind Barry with a clearly angry expression of his own on his face.

Sam, who stands close to them as well, snorts bemused by the kid’s spine but his grin is quickly gone again when Len fixes him with his glare.

“What the hell is wrong with you, Scudder?!” Len nearly bellows at the other Rogue. “You think this is a damn day-care centre?!”

“Hey, I was just playing taxi, Barry is the one who wanted to take the brat along,” Sam explains with a shrug and swiftly makes a step back when Len moves closer, his fists clenched and obviously ready to punch him.

“Because you jackass are too stupid to think on your own? You need me to tell you how fucking idiotic this is!?”

“L-Len,” Barry interjects as he fears that the other man really would start a physical quarrel with Sam and forces himself to stay calm when the furious gaze is turned onto him once again. “It w-was m-my id-dea, S-Sam j-just d-did m-me a f-f-favour.”

The words don’t seem to do much to calm his friend down and Barry can’t help but feel somewhat scared by his reaction. Len usually doesn’t react like that, he grows angry and upset but in a much quieter and controlled way.

“Hey, what’s the ruckus about?” Barry looks past Len, to where the hallway they are currently standing in makes a turn, and spots Lisa coming around the corner, a worried frown on her face that quickly is replaced by surprise when she notices Axel. “Who is the kid?”

“Hey! I am no kid! I will be fourteen in two months!” The boy’s protest seems to amuse Lisa, and she lifts an eyebrow in response as she walks up to them.

“Nearly all of fourteen?” she quips and chuckles when Axel scowls at her in response. Her expression grows more serious, though, when she notices her brother. “I guess you didn’t know that we would have another guest?”

Len only gives her a dark glare in response before he turns back to Barry.

“This is no fucking orphanage. You want to look after the brat? Fine, I won’t stop your stubborn ass, but don’t get us involved in this.”

His voice sounds much calmer again but no less intimidating than before.

“Fuck you! I don’t need your help, you ugly old f-”

“A-Axel!” Barry cuts the teen off and grabs his arm to pull him a bit back and away from Len who may appear much more collected again, but he is obviously in a really bad mood, and the kid either doesn’t get it or is foolish enough not to care.

Thankfully, Len ignores Axel and instead turns to Sam. “Get the damn child back to his flat.”

“L-Len, I w-wouldn’t h-have b-brought h-him h-here if I w-weren’t w-worried a-about h-his s-safety-” Barry shrinks back a bit when the other man turns to him again with impressive scowl on his face.

“I don’t care! I told you that this brat will mean trouble, and you are either too stubborn or too stupid to see it. He’s your problem, and you take care of him.” Len looks so angry, it makes Barry nearly feel sick, and he has no idea what causes his friend to behave like this. He knew he would be anger, he expected it, but he has thought he would still help…

“K-Kenneth kn-knows ab-bout h-him.”

A nearly tangible tension falls over them, and Len, who was about to turn around to leave, has stopped in his track and looks at him in a way he isn’t sure how to read.

“You’ve seen Kenneth?” Lisa sounds honestly worried and steps closer to him while giving him a concerned once over. “Did this bastard hurt you again?”

“Wait? Someone attacked you?” Seeing that Barry has been rather sparse with his explanation of why he wants both of them at the Rogues’ hideout all of a sudden, he isn’t surprised by Axel’s question.

“I-I’m f-fine,” he tries to assure the boy. “H-he j-j-just… t-talked.”

He doesn’t miss the incredulous look both Lisa and Sam give him at that, but neither of them point out how very unbelievable this is for which he is grateful.

“Sam, can you get the kid to the kitchen and get him something to eat?” Lisa asks but doesn’t take her eyes off of Barry.

“The hell, Lisa? Do I look like a nanny to you?” Sam huffs while Axel protests against being called a kid once again.

“Just take him there, for fuck’s sake.” The blond woman hisses at her colleague, and it becomes clear that she too has trouble keeping her temper in check right now. She forces herself to sound calmer when she goes on, though. “There are tons of left-overs in the fridge, he can grab himself something to snack on and stay there while we talk.”

“Food? Nice!” Axel’s sudden change in demeanour is hard to miss that the prospect of something to eat, but it isn’t the same for Sam, who scowls at her in return. “I am no-”

“Just take him there already,” Len cuts the other Rogue off and shoots him a warning glare which finally gets him to agree, even though he still doesn’t seem all that jazzed about being assigned to babysit the teen, no matter for how briefly.

“Fine, but as soon as the brat’s there, I’m gone,” he grouses and gives Axel a sign to follow him. The kid doesn’t seem so sure about leaving either, though, and gives Barry an uncertain look.

Axel hesitates a moment longer, before he nods somewhat reluctantly but still doesn’t move. Instead he glances warily towards Len, and he turns back to him once more. “Are you going to be alright?”

“Of c-curse.” Barry gives the kid a reassuring smile and a brief squeeze to his shoulder. “H-hurry al-long, I’m s-sure y-you’ve t-to b-be s-starv-ving b-by n-now.”

This seem to do the trick, even though Axel’s gaze lingers on him a second longer before he finally turns around to follow Sam. Barry doesn’t miss how he gives Len the evil eye as he passes him. The other man ignores the kid.

“Come on, brat, the earlier we reach the kitchen, the earlier I get rid of you again.” Sam grumbles, still audibly annoyed.

“Because you are all sunshine and kisses to be around, old fart,” Axel retorts and easily avoids the slap that is aimed for the back of his head. Barry watches them vanish behind the corner before he turns back to the others with an uneasy feeling as he really isn’t looking forward to this conversation.

“Let’s get somewhere more comfortable to talk,” Lisa suggests and nods to Len’s room that is just down two doors. The other man doesn’t say anything and starts to move towards it instead, obviously agreeing with his sister’s idea. Barry hesitates to follow him as he still feels a bit unsettled by how his friend has reacted before.

A tentative touch on his elbow startles him slightly, and Lisa meets his eyes with an apologizing expression before she nods to the room her brother has just entered.

“Don’t worry, he isn’t really angry at you, he is just generally in a crappy mood right now,” she explains which doesn’t really succeed in reassuring him, but he still follows her.

Len’s room is one of the bigger ones, which may be beneficial regarding space but makes it also one of the coldest seeing that it is underground, and there is no heater installed. Barry knows that the other man uses a transportable heater during winter when it is getting too cold to really do anything in here, but it probably would still be a while till then, and he regrets to not have been mindful enough to bring his thicker coat with himself.
There are only two chairs at the working table as Barry is usually the only one who joins the other man in here for any amount of time, and he decides to make do with one of the empty boxes that are stashed in the corner. Lisa shoots him a partly amused, partly exasperated glance but doesn’t protest over being offered to take one of the chairs.

“So, what’s happened?” the blond woman starts when all of them are seated. “You said that you’ve seen Kenneth again?” Her expression becomes more concerned as she gives him another once-over and asks again. “Has he hurt your?”

The pain in his upper left arm isn’t really that bad anymore, and Barry is pretty sure that it hasn’t really been damaged other than being a bit bruised. He shakes his head and tries to give her a reassuring smile. “No, I’m fine.”

Lisa looks doubtful, but before she can say anything else on this topic, Len interjects.

“Where have you met Kenneth?” He sounds calmer than before, much calmer, but there is still a slight edge to the way he speaks that makes it obvious that his temper hasn’t really settled down just yet. Nonetheless, Barry is glad that he isn’t yelling at him anymore as this has him left feeling still rather uneasy around him.

“On my way to the apartment,” he explains and feels his stomach sink when he watches how the brief confusion in the other man is quickly replaced by understanding and renewed anger.

“You walked there again?” Len asks with a slight scowl before he scoffs. “Of course you did, you damn idiot.”

Barry bristles at the insult, even though he knows that Len has a very valid reason to react like this.

“What do you want me to do? Hide away at home till you have sorted things out with the Blue Velvet and that woman?” Speaking becomes harder again as his throat has started to close up, and he is grateful when Lisa answers before her brother has the possibility to do so, seeing that his words don’t seem to have done anything to soothe the other man’s anger.

“Of course not, Barry, but walking four blocks home late at night is something rather stupid to do in your position, and I know you know this as well.”

He frowns but doesn’t protest as he is well aware of how reckless this actually was.

“I get it that you care about this kid,” Lisa goes on in a softer voice. “But for someone in your position, he could mean a lot of really bad trouble.”

“So am I supposed to do?” Barry asks quietly, and a familiar weariness starts to cling to him. “Kick him out and tell him not to pass by the store anymore?”

It takes Lisa a moment to answer, and he hates to realize that she probably really doesn’t think that this would be such a bad way to handle this situation.

“You want to help the kid, and this is a very noble thing to do,” she says in a soft tone even though her face holds a rather grim expression. “But you’re not in a position where you can afford doing this.”

Barry averts his eyes and bites his lower lip as he listens to her. His head is hurting once again, and he slowly reaches for his right temple to rub small soothing circles, not that he has any hope that the pain would leave him again any time soon. He is way too tensed up and exhausted for this to “There’re people out there who want to hurt you because they know that they can get to us that way, and when they realize that the kid means something to you, they’ll not stop from using him as well,” Lisa goes on in her calm and reasonable voice that bothers Barry nearly more right now than having Len yelling at him again probably would.

“Aside from Blacksmith and the Blue Velvet, there is also the very real and likely possibility to consider that someone finds out that you letting a teenager stay at your place. You can’t hide this forever, someone will pick up on it sooner or later, and they won’t care that you just want to help the boy.” Lisa is right with all what she has said so far, and Barry is well aware of it as she is just speaking out all the concerns that have been following him around since he allowed Axel to stay over in his flat for the first time.

“Th-there’s n-nobody l-l-looking after h-him.” He gives Lisa a pleading look, willing her to understand.

“Taking care of that boy won’t atone you for anything that happened to your nephew.” Len’s voice is unusually cold as he suddenly decides to take part of their conversation again.

Barry feels how his body grows stiff and his breath catches in his throat. It is as if someone has pushed him under ice-cold water, and for a moment he is utterly overwhelmed by the misery and pain that swaps over him like a wave.

“Len!” Lisa hisses and actually kicks her brother forcefully against his shin. “What the hell!?” Len, who has kept returning Barry’s upset gaze coldly, turns his attention to his sister with a glare and grunts. “He is behaving like a complete moron—”

“And you are proofing once again what an utter jackass you are!” Lisa cuts him off furiously. “You can’t say shit like that—”

“Why?! Because I hurt his feelings?” Len sneers and looks back to Barry with a grim expression. “It’s still the truth.”

“God, you are such—”

“N-no, th… th-that’s n-not th-the r-reason.” Both, Lisa and Len seem surprised about him having said anything, and Barry thinks that this is both upsetting and insulting. He swallows before he speaks again and forces himself to meet the other man’s eyes firmly as he does so. “Y-you c-can th-think wh-whate-ever y-you w-want b-but y-you d-don’t kn-know m-me—”

“Because you are so fucking difficult to figure out?” Len snorts and smirks rather nastily. “You’re really not as complex as you like to think. You’ve messed up spectacularly, and you aren’t able to let go of that part of your life which in turn provides the rest of us a bunch of extra problems. It’s really not that hard to get.”

Barry feels how his eyes start to itch and he really, really hates how the other man is so very capable in hurting him with just a few words.

He also hates himself for actually caring so much about what he says or what he thinks of him, and he knows that he really shouldn’t because while Len isn’t completely off with what he has just pointed out, he really doesn’t know that much of him. It is a bitter realization that it is most likely the best to keep it like that…
“Really, Len?” Lisa’s voice cuts into the tense moment between them, and Barry averts his eyes while swallowing with some difficulty around the lump in his throat. “He’s the reason for the problems we have? As far as I can remember, it wasn’t him who shagged that psycho in the first place. He’s certainly also not responsible for her totally ticking out about this having been nothing more than a damn one-time thing for you or her starting her own little revenge war against us because of it, you damn asshole!”

“No, you shut up! I’ve had enough of you and your fucking bad mood! You—”

Both of the sibling stop glaring daggers at each other and instead turn to Barry as he suddenly gets up from his seat.

“I’m going to lay down for a bit,” he utters before he turns around and quickly leaves the room.

He just needs somewhere to be alone right now.

Someone is in the room.

The familiar feeling causes a shudder to run through his body, and while Barry is still hardly awake, his mind immediately tells him to be alert. He grows still and for a horrible moment he has no idea where he is or who could have come up to him while he has been sleeping.

“It’s alright, it’s just me.” His body relaxes again as soon as he recognizes Len’s voice, and he remembers that he is in one of the basement room of the hideout.

Slowly, Barry presses himself up in a sitting position and looks over to the other man, whom he can hardly make out in the nearly complete darkness in here. He notices how stuffy the air is and realizes that he has to have been asleep for at least a couple of hours.

“Is everything alright?” His voice is craggy and a cough slightly to clear it.

“Yeah, everything’s fine.” Len moves closer, and while Barry can hardly see anything, he can clearly hear his movements. He feels the old plain mattress he chose as his resting spot move when the other man sits down which in turn causes him to tense up once again in response.

“Y-you want m-me t-to l-leave?”

The makeshift-bed only consists of the mattress itself, but it isn’t exactly small and does offer just enough space for two people, though Barry doesn’t really like the idea of having the other man this close right now. They have slept in the same bed before, just a couple of times, and despite his worries, he has nearly always been able to fall asleep, but he doubts that this would be the case this time around as well.

Len doesn’t answer for a while, and both of them sit together in the dark silence of the room for a bit, an uneasy tension between them.

Barry wonders how late it is. He is thirsty, and his head is still hurting.

The other man moves again, he can feel it by how the mattress shifts slightly and, he looks back over to him. Even that close, he can hardly see him out-
A hand touches his arm, and he immediately recoils.

“D-don’t!” His face grows hot, and he turns away.

The air between them, which hasn’t been all that comfortable to begin with, turns even tenser. They both stay quiet, and Barry starts to notice how oddly oppressive Len’s presence really is and how he still doesn’t want him to leave at the same time. He rubs his face and sighs tiredly.

“I-I sh-shouldn’t h-have b-brought h-him h-here.” Barry lets his fingers rest on his chin and closes his eyes. “I-I’m s-sorry, I p-panicked after…”

Kenneth comes back to his mind, and he shudders.

Len doesn’t respond, and he hasn’t expected him too. It is probably for the best, anyway.

A couple of minutes goes by after that with neither of them saying anything, and Barry wonders whether he would be able to fall back asleep should he lay down or whether his thirst would keep him up. His drowsiness increases again, so much that he nearly forgets the other man next to him and is startled again by him speaking. “He hasn’t hurt you?”

It takes Barry a moment to get what the other man is talking about. “N-no.”

His arm hurts where Kenneth has grabbed him, but it is nothing more than a bruise and nothing worth to be worried or upset about, especially for Len as Barry is too tired to deal with any more of his bad mood.

“Good.” Len says after a brief moment of hesitation, and Barry turns his eyes to where he can make out Len’s faint silhouette. He smiles sadly when he realizes once again how crappy they both are at talking to each other. It’s obvious that the other man feels bad about what he has said before as he usually is when he has gotten carried away by his anger. It doesn’t make it better, but beggars can’t be choosers…

“I d-don’t l-look a-after Axel b-bec-cause o-of W-Wally.” Barry rubs his eyes again and adds somewhat hesitantly. “W-well, h-he’s p-probably p-part o-of i-it b-but n-not th-the o-only r-reason.”

Len stays quiet, but Barry knows that he is listening.

“I d-don’t w-want h-him t-to th-think th-that th-there’s n-nobody h-he c-can t-turn t-to sh-should h-he n-need h-help. H-he’s a k-kid and ev-very k-kid d-deserves t-to h-have s-someone l-l-looking out f-for th-them.”

Nobody deserves to have to grow up alone, and there are too many out there who have to nonetheless.

Barry pushes that notion away and takes a deep breath, which causes him to once again pick up on how stuffy the air actually is. With a small yawn, he slides towards the other edge of the mattress and gets up.

“What are you doing?” Len asks as he too gets up.

“I-I’m th-thirsty,” he explains and winces when a sharp pain shoots through his back after straightening himself up too much. While the mattress is comfortable enough, it is obviously rather old, and he starts to doubt whether it would be really wise to try and go back to sleep on it later.

“You want me to get you something?” Surprised, Barry looks over to Len and once again feels a bit sad about their situation in general.

Len wants to be nice and probably tries to make up a bit for before, but he is so tired of this.

“N-no,” he declines quietly and closes his eyes. He feels exhausted and sick and having the other man around doesn’t help.

An uncomfortable silence follows as neither of them moves or says anything, Barry too tired to wanting to deal with any of this right now, and Len likely unsure how to apologize.

In a way, Barry would actually prefer for it to stay like this as he really doesn’t want to have to deal with another apology and be reminded of how worthless those really are in the end…

He wishes that there is nothing for the other man has to try and apologize for, in the first place.

“I shouldn’t have talked to you like that,” Len starts, and the regret is thick in his voice but before he can go on, Barry interrupts as he doesn’t want to hear it.

“N-no, y-you sh-shouldn’t,” he agrees tiredly and reaches up to rub his eyes. “B-but y-you d-did, a-and y-you’ll d-do s-so ag-gain and ag-gain, a-and I j-just d-don’t… c-can w-we n-not t-talk ab-bout th-this r-right n-now? P-please?”

His voice cracks, and he hates himself a bit for how weak he is.

Another tense silence follows, and he is both relieved and disappointed when Len finally speaks.

“Okay,” the other man says quietly and there is distance to his voice that hasn’t been there before which causes Barry to suddenly feel like crying because he doesn’t want this either.

“Ok-kay.” He swallows around the lump in his throat and rubs his eyes again, brushing the unshed tears away before he can make a fool of himself again.

“I-it h-has g-gotten r-rather s-stuffy i-in h-here,” he goes on, mostly just to fill the silence because being alone in the dark with Len suddenly feels rather oppressive, and he just wants to leave. “I-I’ll k-keep th-the d-door o-open f-for a-a b-bit t-to g-get s-some f-fresh a-air i-inside.”

Aside from wanting to get away, he also needs to check up on Axel, whom he has left alone without warning, and while he knows that nothing would have happened to the boy in the meantime, he can’t help but feel a bit worried and guilty.

“You can use my room to rest some more,” Len offers in a cool voice that makes Barry’s eyes itch even more despite the kind offer. “The brat has nod off on the couch, by the way.”

“Oh…” It is good to hear that Axel seems to have done fine without him around, even though he hasn’t expected Len to acknowledging the teen presence at all after how he reacted to his arrival.

In all actuality, he has feared that the other man would insist on the boy to leave again.

“Th-that i-is g-good. H-he h-hasn’t c-caused a-any t-trouble, h-has h-he?” Axel isn’t exactly an easy child to handle, and he doesn’t doubt that there is a lot of ruckus he could cause should he get bored and the opportunity to do so presents itself to him.

“No, he’s spent the last hours watching TV after grabbing some food.”

“How d-did h-he g-get th-there?” Barry asks as he is curious about how Axel has found his way to the living area as Sam had made it rather clear that he saw his babysitting duties fulfilled with getting “Hartley showed him,” Len explains rather curtly before he walks over to the door. The hallway outside is dark as well but still somewhat brighter than the room they have been in so far, and Barry can’t help but wonders once more how late it actually is.

“You look like you are ready to keel over.” Barry frowns and turns his attention back to Len whose face he can at least somewhat make out now. He notices that the other man is studying him with a frown again.

“I-I’m f-fine.”

“Yeah,” Len agrees but doesn’t even try to hide what he really thinks of that. Instead he turns to leave the room and tells him to follow.

Barry does so reluctantly.

Chapter End Notes

Thanks for reading, hope you liked it!
“I didn’t cheat.” Eddy makes such a scandalized expression as he says this that Barry can’t help but laugh while Mary seems to only get more annoyed by it.

“Of course you’ve cheated,” she insists and nods to his cards. “You probably exchanged half of them during the last game, you scam!”

“Too bad you can’t proof anything,” the other man smiles sweetly which causes Axel to snort even though the boy is also eying Eddy in a clearly irked and wary way.

“W-we aren’t p-playing f-for anyth-thing anyw-way,” Barry tries to appease Mary and winces slightly when she turns her scowl on to him next.

“That doesn’t change the fact that he has been cheating.” The young woman’s expression only darkens when she looks on to Axel who sits next to Barry. “Let aside that he shouldn’t do something like that in the first place, he did so in front of Axel.”

“So what?” Eddy asks and glances at the boy in question with a smirk. “The little shit probably knows everything there is to know about how to chisel your way through a game without me needing to show him anything, isn’t that right?”

Before Axel can answer, Barry interrupts him and tells Eddy not to call the kid that. “W-we t-talked about using th-this k-kind of l-language wh-when he’s ar-round.”

“I’ve been called worse than that before,” Axel points out with a shrug which doesn’t do anything to mellow Barry’s annoyance.

“Th-that’s n-n-” A knock at the door cuts Barry off.

“You’re expecting someone?” Eddy, who has turned towards the entrance to the apartment like the rest of them, gives him a curious look that quickly becomes concerned when he notices how pale Barry has gotten all of a sudden.

“Hey, don’t worry,” his friend tells him. “The kid’s my nephew, remember? No need to fret.”
Barry knows that Eddy means well but while his friend is so willing to lie for him, he just doesn’t feel comfortable with it. He never has and probably never will, which is also the reason why he is so bad at it. Besides, there aren’t really that many people who would pass by via his entrance door on an early Sunday afternoon other than the ones that are already present or Jay, and the notion of the older man finding Axel being inside his apartment is alarming to say the least.

He isn’t allowed around kids and teenagers without any supervision, and, considering that, he isn’t really breaking any rules as Mary and Eddy are here as well, but he still knows what kind of picture this would paint.

“I could hide,” Axel offers, and while he tries to sound nonchalant about it, Barry doesn’t miss that he has grown a bit anxious as well.

“Don’t be stupid,” Eddy disagrees with a slight frown. “You’ve any idea in what kind of a trouble he would get should whoever is in front of the door still notice you?”

Axel scowl at him in response but doesn’t argue as he is most likely aware of lacking his suggestion has been or what kind of repercussions this could mean for Barry.

“I can answer it.” Mary gives Barry a reassuring smile and is just about to get up when he tells her not to. “I-it’s f-fine, I’ll h-handle it.”

Judging by the worried and doubtful way his friends are looking at him right now, they don’t seem so sure about this which doesn’t exactly do much to calm his nerves. Still, he has known that this would happen sooner or later, and it would be unfair and cowardly to try and hide behind them as this is something he has gotten himself into, after all.

“It’s f-fine,” he repeats when he notices Axel’s worried expression and gives the boy a small smile just as the knock sounds again. He turns to the door with a concerned look and gets up.

Even though he has kind of expected it, he still feels his stomach drop when he spots Jay through the spyhole on the other side of the door.

The older man’s friendly expression that greets Barry when he opens the door, dims as soon as his eyes fall onto him, and he wonders how guilty he has to look to cause such a reaction.

The thought causes a surge of anger to flash through him a moment later as this is ridiculous. There is no reason for him to feel bad about having Axel around, he hasn’t done anything to the kid or anybody else!

“H-hallo, J-Jay,” he greets him and feels his face grow warm when his voice cracks in the middle of it. This is already such a damn farce, and the older man hasn’t even stepped a foot into his apartment yet.

“Hallo, Barry, I hope I am not disturbing you with anything?” There is a slight note of suspicion that clings to how he says this, and the way he is looking at him, has Barry to fight the urge to forcefully shut the door into his face. This is so damn demeaning. The older man seems to notice as he starts to frown and studies him with a mixture of worry and another much less well-meaning emotion.

“No,” he answers after a tense moment passed between them and doesn’t even try to hide how exhausting his former friend’s presence is to him as he steps aside to let him in. “I’m j-just p-playing c-cards w-with s-some f-friends.”

Jay’s frowns again as he enters which quickly turns into an openly surprised and then infuriated expression when he notices the others at the table. Then, it is gone again, and he just studies Axel in an eerily neutral and calm way for a moment.

“Who is the child?” He doesn’t sound angry or accusing, or, at least, he makes the effort not to, and while Barry feels very much out of his depth and slightly sick, he can appreciate it. Before he can open is mouth to answer, though, Eddy beats him to it.

“That is my nephew, Axel,” he explains with an easy smile. “His parents are in kind of rough spot right now, and I offered to let him stay with me for the time being.”

His smile dims a bit, and the way he looks at Jay next is not very friendly and has something rather hostile to it. “You don’t need to worry; I’m keeping an eye on him while we’re over. We don’t wanna anything happen to him, do we?”

Mary hisses something under her breath, and judging by how Eddy flinches a moment later and by the pained and irked expression that crosses his face, it is likely that she has just kicked him under the table in response to his words.

Barry feels how the blood rushes to his face, and if he could have, he would have smacked the other man right now as well for not keeping his mouth shut. He is well aware that Eddy has done so to make a point, to have his back in a way, and to tell Jay to back off. Seeing how he tries to do so is still horribly demeaning, though.

He is surprised when he notices that Jay looks quite taken aback by the other man’s words. He guesses that it is because Eddy is once again his direct and crass self, but it becomes obvious that this isn’t the case when Jay turns to him next with a considering frown. The older man doesn’t say anything but regards him with a look he isn’t really sure how to interpret.

“What?” Eddy asks in a painfully audible taunting tone that makes Barry cringe slightly and shoot him a pleading and angry look. His friend either doesn’t notice it or doesn’t care as he still goes on. “You thought he didn’t tell us his dirty little secret?”

“Eddy, that’s enough.” Mary hisses and gives her friend a furious look while Axel looks both curious and puzzled.

“Yeah, right. We don’t wanna scare the kid after all.” Eddy sneers and shrugs before he turns back to the table to collect the cards from their last game and shuffles them again.

“What dirty little secret?” Barry feels his stomach sink when he watches how Axel turns to Eddy for an explanation before he looks on to him with a frown. “You have dirty secrets? Really?”

This causes Eddy to snort which quickly is replaced by another pained wince when Mary kicks him once more under the table, this time audibly so.

For a long moment, neither of them speaks. Barry can feel Jay’s eyes on him, but he can’t bring himself to meet the gaze. He doesn’t want to see the expression on his face. It shouldn’t matter, whatever the other man thinks of him, it really shouldn’t anymore. Sadly, despite his best efforts, it still does in some way because he is still left feeling miserable.

“You’ve told them?” Jay asks as if Eddy hasn’t just said so, and Barry feels angered and hurt by this because he is once again treated like he is an actual twisted and abhorrent person who should be too ashamed to tell anybody about his crimes.

This frustration is also the reason why he finally turns to the other man, his chin slightly lifted in a stubborn and daring manner, and agrees. “Y-yes.”
Barry knows that it is stupid, but he dares Jay to berate him for it. To make him feel even worse for who he is made out to be these days.

To his utter surprise, his former friend doesn’t. Instead, he only studies him quietly for a couple of seconds before he nods slowly. “Good, I’m glad you’ve someone you can confide in.”

The anger is suddenly gone, and Barry is left with an all too familiar emptiness instead. He watches how Jay’s expression turns grimmer again, then, and already knows what he is going to say next.

“You know that this could get you in very serious trouble very quickly, Barry,” Jay reminds him in a slightly reproachful tone and looks back over to Axel who is still watching them with obvious confusion. “Having someone underage in your apartment, even with other adults around, borders on violating the restrictions of your parole. You would be in grave trouble should anybody find out about this and tell this to your parole officer.”

A sickening worry overcomes Barry, and he has to look away as it becomes unmanageable to meet the other man’s eyes. He knows how right Jay is about this, it is a fear that follows him around everywhere these days.

“You considering to tattle on him?” Eddy meets Jay’s now obviously annoyed expression with a smile that shows too many teeth. “Just trying to clarify where you’re standing on this one, Mr. Garrick.”

“I don’t know you,” the older man replies in a hard tone and the dislike is plain in his voice. “But I know when I see people who mean trouble, and while you don’t seem to take Barry’s situation very serious, I can assure you I do, and I really don’t think you are the kind of people he should surround himself with right now.”

Jay’s gaze moves to Axel for a moment who is looking more confused and annoyed be the second. “You seem to know about his situation, and you still bring you nephew over which is clearly something you wouldn’t do if you really had either of their well-being in mind.”

Something crosses Eddy’s face, an odd expression Barry can’t place, but he is certain that it doesn’t mean anything good. He is just about to interject when Axel suddenly speaks up.

“What the hell are you all going on about?! Why is it such a big no-no that I’m over at Barry’s place? You think he’s gonna eat me or something?” The boy has meant this question for all but has his eyes focused on Jay at whom he is glowering now.

Barry feels his stomach sink and really starts to regret that he hasn’t told Axel about the reason why he is so concerned about anybody learning about his presence in his home. His younger friend was curious about it at first but let it rest as soon as he picked up on how uncomfortable the topic made him. It still concerns Barry a bit that Axel doesn’t seem all that bothered about this.

“We all have secrets,” the kid told him with a shrug when he had asked him a while ago about whether he was angry at him for not telling him the actual reason for being so secretive, and it really wasn’t a reassuring answer.

“You know those memes about the Pedobear?” Eddy asks nonchalantly, and Barry feels so horrified about this ridiculous question that he can only stare at the other man in disbelief for making such a crude joke about this.

“For heaven’s sake!” Mary hisses and actually throws her tea spoon after the other man who is a bit too slow to evade it and makes a protesting and pained noise when it hits him square on the forehead.
“What’s wrong with you, Edward!?”

Eddy turns to her with an equally annoyed expression, but before he is able to say something, Axel beats him to it. “You’re a paedophile?”

Barry doesn’t answer, he wouldn’t really know how to, and with Jay around he doesn’t even try. What good would it do him denying it with the other man just insisting on it being the truth, anyway? He would only end up in troubles all over again. This whole situation is so damn sickening and painful, and while he tries to keep a calm demeanour, he can feel how his eyes start to itch.

“The hell?” Axel scoffs when nobody comes forth with an explanation. “Are you all stupid? That’s such bull.”

“W-watch y-your w-w-words,” Barry berates him weakly and hates how thin his voice sounds. The boy tries to meet his eyes, but he can’t bring himself to do so, and he turns back to Jay instead who has watched their exchange silently so far.

“D-did y-y-you p-pass b-by f-for a-a r-r-reas-s-son?” he asks quietly and keeps his gaze at the point past the other man’s shoulder as can’t help it but feel ashamed.

Jay doesn’t answer immediately, and Barry wish he would just leave again, he feels sick to his stomach and just wants for everybody to be gone and to be left alone.

“No, I just wanted to pass by and see how you are doing.” There is regret and worry in the older man’s voice, and he honestly seems to feel sorry about what has just happened.

“What? You didn’t come over to make his day?” Eddy asks from his spot at the table with audible bite. “Wouldn’t have thought so with how you’ve outdone yourself just now.”

“Just shut up already,” Mary says in a quiet and grim tone, and Barry doesn’t need to look at her to know that she is giving their friend a reproachful look. Eddy does, and a rather tense silence follows that drags on for a couple of very uncomfortable moments before Barry just can’t stand it anymore.

“I-I f-feel a-a b-b-bit i-ill,” he tells Jay, still without meeting his eyes. “I-I th-think I-I’ll l-lay d-d-down… y-you c-can s-s-stay i-if y-you w-want.”

He glances at the older man and tries to smile but fails. He probably should say more, he just can’t bring himself to, though. Without another glance to any of them, he hurries into his bedroom and shuts the door behind him firmly.

It is most likely an incredibly stupid idea to let Jay alone with Eddy, even though Mary is around to keep the latter somewhat in check. He also worries about Axel and what the teen could say by accident. What is the boy to be thinking of him now?

Standing with his back to the door, he marvels over how quickly this nice afternoon has turned gone painfully south within just a few minutes. It’s so tiring, all of it, and he wonders how long he will be able to go on like this, living this lie they’ve chained him to.

His eyes are burning, and he brushes a hand over them as he slowly makes his way over to his bed.

He just wants to sleep and all of to go away for just a bit.

Barry buries his face into his pillow and tries to forget where he is. The pain in his chest is sharp and throbbing, and he concentrates on only his breathing.
Mid-September START of 3rd year

Barry watches with a mixture of slight amusement and resignation how the first thing Len does after he has exited his bathroom is eying his living room with a suspicious look. He knows that his friend is looking for Axel, and while it still irks him a bit how he seems to be ridiculously averse to the boy, he has realized by now that the other man is more bark than bite when it comes to the teenager.

“Where is the brat?” Len asks in his usually gruff manner he uses whenever Axel is around and finally walks over to the kitchenette with the two white bags of Chinese take-out in his left hand.

“Axel’s s-staying w-with h-his f-friends,” Barry explains quietly as he follows him.

Len frowns at that. “Haven’t they kicked his ass the last time around?”

The memory of that night causes a slight spark of worry to flare up in Barry’s chest, but he tries to ignore it. He has worried when Axel came up to him, in a surprisingly good mood, and told him the he and his former buddies have made up again.

“Th-they s-seem t-to h-have w-worked th-things out,” Barry tells him as he stops next to his couch while Len proceeds to the kitchen table. The other man only hums and doesn’t seem overly surprised about this turn of events. He probably had his own share of falling out and reconciling with people that are similar to Axel’s friends.

Oddly enough, this reaction appeases Barry’s worries somewhat, and he nearly asks the other man whether he thinks that he should be concerned about Axel but stops himself before he does so. Len is obviously relieved to not have Axel around, after all.

It isn’t even as if the boy has been staying over every night anymore for a while now as he has made up with some of his former friends a couple of weeks ago, at least to such a degree that he spends most of his time with them again. Despite not really needing to anymore, Axel still comes over at his place at least once or twice a week, though.

Seeing that Len has kept his distance again over the last month, and the fact that the couple of times he chose the pass by where coincidently the same on which Axel was around, he doesn’t know about it.

Barry isn’t sure whether he likes the idea of them spending an evening alone with the other man again. It has been a while since it was just them, and while he has expected things between him and Len to get a bit strained after letting the teen into his life, he still hasn’t been prepared for how uncomfortable and tense their relationship has become over the last handful of weeks.

Then again, he probably should have seen it coming, especially after how Len reacted to him not wanting to hear his apology that night about which he still felt bad…

While Len puts the different dishes he brought with him out on the table, Barry starts to prepare himself some tea and coffee for the other man.

It is a bit of a surprise when he notices that his friend has brought over more food than usual, and it takes him a moment to realize that it is most likely because he has thought that Axel would be over as well. That is unexpected and a bit confusion, especially with how obvious Len made it that he would rather not have the kid around.

Even so, Barry feels a faint warmth fill his chest at the notion that Len would actually have brought something over for the kid as well, even though he doesn’t like the idea of him staying here.

He also feels a bit pleased when he notices that Len has brought him his favourite dish, stir fried soybeans with tofu and carrots which causes some of the tension to ease away that keeps clinging to him whenever the other man is around these days.

After the tea and coffee is ready, and they’ve taken their seats, Barry digs in with gusto as he hasn’t eaten lunch yet. The food turns out to be delicious, and he isn’t sure whether it is because of its preparation or because of how hungry it is.

It takes him a while before he notices that Len is watching him, which causes him to halt and frown curiously at him. “S-someth-thing th-the m-matter?”

The other man, who doesn’t seem at all embarrassed about having been caught staring, only smirks slightly and shakes his head. “Nah, I’m just thinking that I should have gotten you a second.”

Barry flushes and notices that, while his box has been mostly emptied by now, Len hasn’t even eaten half of his.

“I h-haven’t eaten y-yet,” he tells him a bit defensively and adds curtly. “I j-just d-didn’t h-have th- the t-time.”

“That’s good, otherwise I would have brought this over for nothing,” Len replies with another of his slight smirks, and he seems more amused than annoyed by clipped tone. He definitely seems to be in a better mood tonight which is a nice change for once. Barry can’t help but relax a bit as he mutters his agreement, flushing slightly, due to how defensive he must have sounded.

“You haven’t been over much the last few weeks.” The comment causes Barry to halt, and for a long moment he only stares at the couple of soybeans that are still left of his meal as a familiar heaviness settles over him. He isn’t sure how to reply seeing that Len has done the exact same thing.

“I-I’ve b-been b-busy.” It is a lie, and he doesn’t expect the other man to believe it.

Len snorts and meets his annoyed expression calmly. “You suck at lying just as bad as at bluffing.”

It is just such a stupid little comment, there is clearly no hostility behind it, and Barry still feels very upset all of a sudden.

“M-mayb-be I’m j-just t-too s-stupid f-for it,” he points out tersely and looks down at his nearly emptied box of takeout. He feels no longer hungry.

This seems to catch Len off-guard as he doesn’t immediately respond, and a tense silence settles between them instead.

Barry bites his lower lip and closes his eyes for a second, not sure why he is starting to feel so miserable again… which isn’t true.

Len’s words from a couple of weeks ago are still so very clear in his mind. They follow him around wherever he goes, no matter how much tries to distract oneself with other things or what time of the day it is.

“We both know that’s not true.” Len’s voice is calm but not in that cold distant way Barry has become familiar with over the last couple of weeks. Somehow this doesn’t make it any better, though.
“I’m n-not s-stupid,” he agrees and coughs lightly because his voice sounds too thin. “I c-can n-ever at-tone f-for wh-what h-happened t-to W-Wally.”

It hasn’t bother him this much at first, Len’s words, that is. He is used to him lashing out by now. It doesn’t mean that he likes it, but he has come to accept it.

Still, what he said about Wally, about him trying to use Axel to make himself feel better, it stuck to him and has started to gnaw away at him, no matter how hard he tries to ignore it.

Maybe the problem is that Len could be right about it. Barry has never looked at his need to help the boy from this angle, but it would make sense…

“What happened to your nephew is not your fault,” Len tells him firmly, and there is audible regret in his voice which causes Barry to nearly break because he is so familiar with this, with useless apologies and empty promises, and being hurt again and again…

“I-I l-let th-this h-happen t-to h-him-”

“You didn’t,” the other man cuts him off sharply, and there is an urgency to how he speaks that hasn’t been there before. “I shouldn’t have said any of this, I didn’t mean it, I was just a fucking idiot again.”

The sound of the other man getting up causes Barry to lift his gaze and look over to him in slight alarm, and he before he even realizes it, he gets up to, making a step back, nearly stumbling over his own chair.

This causes Len to halt immediately, and a pained expression crosses his face. His good mood is obviously gone now, and Barry can’t help but feel a bit like a jackass for it.

“Look,” the other man starts again as he meets his eyes. “I wasn’t angry at you back then. You just were unlucky enough to come over when I was about to bite the next best person’s head off.” He rubs a hand over his face and heaves a sigh. “I don’t know what to tell you, Barry. My apologies have to sound like damn jokes by now, and I get it that you’re angry at me, it’s good that you’re, you should be.”

Barry gnaws at his lower lip nervously and doesn’t notice that he has crossed his arms in front of his chest again, making him look a lot like he is actually hugging himself.

He doesn’t get Len at times, nothing of him, not his bad temper or how miserable he seems to feel after having hurt him.

“I th-think y-you’ve b-been r-right,” he suddenly says and blinks rapidly because his vision starts to get blurry. “I-I… I th-think I’m u-using A-Axel b-bec-cause… I f-failed W-Wally…”

Because he is just as much of a miserable person as Jay and the others know him to be.

Len steps closer, he rather feels than hears it, and he quickly turns his attention back to him. He tenses up in response which in turn causes the other man to pause once more.

It is difficult to make the other man’s expression out through the unshed tears in his eyes, and he just doesn’t want another fight between them. He is so tired of this…

“You’re helping Axel because that is just the person you are,” Len argues quietly and sounds so certain about it as if he actually knew this to be a fact.
Barry nearly laughs due to how ridiculous it is as he knows that he isn’t the kind of person Len tries to make him out to be, he has never been anything but a failure for all of his life.

“Barry,” Len’s voice is smooth and low, and Barry nearly jumps by how startled he is when he looks up and finds the other man standing in front of him, close enough that he could easily reach for him. “You’re a good person, everybody who knows you knows that.”

“N-no,” he disagrees unhappily. “Th-they d-don’t.”

He sees Len reach for him, and while the urge to flinch back is strong, he forces himself to stay still because, no matter how miserable the other man’s words have left him again, he still missed this… missed him.

The hand that cups his neck is big and rough, and warm, and there is still a part of Barry that is angry at Len, but it is small compared to the need of finding some comfort. He forces himself not to think about it or what it means when he makes the step closer to the other man so that he could lean against him, rest his forehead against his shoulder. He just tries to imagine that he is safe and that it doesn’t feel like the world is weighing down on him.

The other man makes a small surprised noise as he has obviously not expected Barry to welcome the offered comfort. He only needs a second to adjust, though, and loosely lays one arm around his back, pressing his lips against the side of his head.

It should unsettle Barry, how close they are, how intimate this really is, but he tries not to think about it or anything else. He is so tired of everything, he just wants to feel safe, even if it’s just another lie and will last only a moment.

“Everybody who counts knows it,” Len finally replies, and his breath his hot against Barry’s skin, which causes him to shiver. “And there’s something seriously wrong with those who don’t.”

Barry nearly protests, nearly points out that they aren’t, but catches himself because he doesn’t want to talk about this anymore. He doesn’t want to make himself feel any more miserable, especially now that he has someone who helps him to ease the pain away that threatens to crack his chest open.

They stay like this for a long quiet moment, Len stroking his back in a way that feel soothing and nice while Barry tries to regain a grip over his emotions.

He already feels rather embarrassed about how he has lost it again, even if it was just briefly. Especially with Len around seeing that the other man is really only part of the reason why he actually is so upset right now.

Barry sighs softly and moves his head slightly, so that he can rest his cheek on his friend’s shoulder with his eyes still closed.

“S-sorry.”

“I’m the one who needs to apologize,” Len reminds him. “Not you.”

“It’s ok-kay,” he replies as he presses his forehead against the other man’s throat and his jaw, feeling his stubbles there.

“It’s not,” the other man argues, and while he is probably right, Barry can’t bring himself to hold onto his hurt feelings anymore. Nearly a month of doing so has been exhausting, especially with what has happened with Jay just a bit over a week ago. He just doesn’t want to be angry at him anymore.
“I’m sorry I keep hurting you.” The regret is plain in Len’s voice as is the apology in how tentatively he runs his fingers through his hairs.

Barry hums softly and loosens his arms that feel a bit stiff from how tight they’ve kept holding onto his own chest before he moves them so that he can settle his hands onto the other man’s hips.

“I know.” Len rests his chin on his head and firms his arm around his back a bit. “I’m really sorry about that.”

“It’s ok-kay.” Barry likes how safe his friend makes him feel, and while a part of him tries to remind him that he should pull away and get some distance between them, he can’t bring himself to do so. “I kn-know y-you d-didn’t m-mean it.” Which doesn’t exactly make it okay, and he is well aware of it, but he also understands that the other man is in a rather tough spot right now, and it wasn’t like he didn’t have a point in what he said.

“Still shouldn’t have said it,” Len points out and brushes his lips against his forehead again, causing Barry to slightly shudder by this intimate display of affection that should probably alarm him way more than it does.

“N-no,” he agrees quietly and lets his arms wander around the other man’s back to return the slight embrace.

They stay like this for a couple of minutes, the world around them shrinking down till there is nothing left but each other.

That is, till his right side neighbours start to fight again, loud enough that Barry is certain Marco could likely get the whole conversation they are currently having in what must be either Portuguese or Spanish.

Len snorts before he chuckles, and Barry can’t help but smile as well, amused by how rotten these people’s timing is.

Neither of them pulls immediately away, though, and Barry only moves his head enough so than he can press his forehead against the other man’s collarbone and sigh softly.

“Your place sucks,” Len remarks calmly, which causes Barry to chuckle and shoot him an incredulous look. “Y-you’re one t-to t-talk.”

“I’ve no annoying neighbours,” the other man points out.

“Y-yes, ins-stead you’ve an-noying f-flatmates.” He smiles, which grows a little bit when Len returns it, obviously bemused by his all too true statement.

“Sam told me you’re badmouthing us behind our backs.” Len starts to scratch the back of Barry’s head lightly, causing him to shudder in response. “It seems he did tell the truth.”

At his slightly irked glare, the other man only shrugs and explains that these are Sam’s words.

“I d-don’t l-like h-him s-spying on m-me,” Barry reminds him darkly but doesn’t protest otherwise as Sam is checking up on him for a reason. It still would be nice for him to actually show himself when he does so and not make it feel so creepy.
“He isn’t spying on you,” Len correct with a faint smile. “He just keeps an eye on you at times. You obviously don’t like using the small handheld mirror I gave you any more than he does.”

Barry frowns as he rests his cheeks on Len’s shoulder and thinks about pointing out that this doesn’t exactly makes it alright for Sam to constantly hurt his privacy. He doesn’t, though, he still remembers his last run-in with Kenneth and what could happen to him if he should decide to come after him again and this time for real.

There has been something horribly familiar in the way the killer looked at him that night a bit more than four weeks ago, the same sickening way people usually do when they intend to hurt him and are looking forward to it.

The notion causes him to shudder all over again.

“H-he s-still c-could j-just m-make h-himself n-noticeable,” he points out with a frown, forcing himself to focus back on the conversation as he doesn’t like to think about that dangerous and twisted man any more than he has to.

“He wants to mess with you,” Len explains with a slight shrug. “He likes you.”

Barry gives the other man a doubtful look. “H-he m-messes w-with m-me b-b-because h-he l-likes m-me?”

That is such a stupid kind of logic that it would totally fit to Sam. That man can be such an annoyance.

“We’re an odd bunch,” the other man remarks and Barry notices how his smirk is turning into an actual smile which is both amused and unusually relaxed. It seems that some of his good mood has returned again for which he is glad.

Despite still not liking Sam’s tendency to mess with him on purpose, he glances up to meet Len’s gaze with an amused smile of his own. “Y-you c-certainly are.”

They return to their meal then and after finishing it, they settle for a game of poker, playing for the shrimp chips that Len has brought along with the rest of the food. Barry enjoys how light and comfortable the mood between them has become once again as they haven’t had a lot of time for themselves for a while now with everything that has been going on.

In the end, Len leaves shortly before midnight, and while Barry knows that is a good thing because he needs to get some sleep before he has to get up again for work in a couple of hours, he is also honestly sad about seeing him go.

“We really have to get you a mirror,” the other man grumbles as he considers the sink with a frown. “That thing doesn’t look like it’s going to last much longer if either of us keeps using it as a steppingstone.”

Barry isn’t sure what to think of that remark regarding an actual standing mirror, even though some of the others have commented on the exact same thing a couple of times by now. Still, he can see where his friend is coming from as the sink has started to become slightly loose due to its constant abuse.

“I’ve told him so a number of times already.” Sam’s unexpected appearance in the mirror causes Barry to flinch back in alarm and he shoots the other man a half-hearted glare for it, which earns him a cheeky grin in response.
As Len is about to make his way into the mirror-world, Barry reaches for his arm and touches him slightly at his elbow.

The other man halts and turns to him with an ached eyebrow, slightly surprised by his action seeing that Sam is there, and Barry’s face grows uncomfortably warm as he averts his eyes to the tiled wall next to them.

“Th-thank y-you f-for c-coming o-over,” he says quietly after a moment and forces himself to look back to his friend to meet his gaze with an earnest but slightly uncertain look. “It w-was r-really n-nice.”

Len doesn’t immediately respond, and Barry starts to worry that he has made a mistake, after all, Sam is right there, and he knows that the other man doesn’t like to display these kind of affections while anybody else is around.

He is just about to pulls his hand back and mutter an apology when Len moves, turning slightly to him to take hold of the hand that has been on his elbow just a second before. It is unexpected, and Barry freezes despite himself even though the touch doesn’t scare him.

There is another brief pause in which they just meet each other’s gaze before Len slightly nods. “Yes, it was.”

The other man’s face is oddly sombre for a second before it is replaced by a faint but warm smile.

Then, Len’s hand is gone from his, and Barry watches him enter the mirror without another word. He tries not to notices how Sam is looking between them with a considering and clearly curious expression.

They are gone just a moment later, and Barry decides to go to bed. He is tired and doesn’t feel up to deal with the emotions that are currently tumbling over each other in his chest.

“Why can’t I join in?” Axel whines from his spot at the couch as he glares at the table where some of the Rogues are currently playing another game of poker.

“Because you’re a snotty little brat,” Sam grumbles and puts his wager down.

“I’m not, you old ass!”

Mick snorts and shoots an amused glance at the teen. “Do you even know how to play?”

“Sure! I’m an ace when it comes to poker! I never lose!” the kid boasts loudly, obviously very certain about his own skills in regard of this game.

“Yeah, I’m sure you don’t,” Sam adds drily which in turn rubs Axel the wrong way again. “Screw you, you ugly-”

“Axel!” The boy’s angry demeanour deflates a bit, and he gives Barry a sulky glare. Barry, who is also sitting at the table with the rest of the men and reading one of Hartley’s magazines, returns it with an unimpressed look which seems to annoy Axel even more.

“It’s not fair!” he protests and crosses his arms in front of his chest with a huff. “I could totally beat them!”

“You could also totally shut up, pestinha,” Marco grouses, making it rather obvious that Axel has started to grind on the Latin’s nerves.

“And you could cut your hairs, lady-man!” the kid replies with a sneer.

Digger, who has just taken a pull of his beer, spreads the mouthful all over the table as he let out a guffaw, which causes the rest to protest in disgust while Marco gets up and turns to the boy, anger blazing in his eyes. “Seu pedaço de merda!”

Axel is quickly on his legs as well and seems ready to bolt the room if necessary but still tries to stay his ground for now, with his chin lifted in a defiant manner. “Fu-”

“Axel, th-that’s enough!” Barry shoots the teen an exasperated look before he turns to Marco. “P-please c-calm d-down, M-Marco, h-he’s j-just b-bratty b-because h-he’s b-b-bored.”
He has really hoped to spend a quiet afternoon with them as he isn’t feeling too well. Then again, he really should have known better. His friends’ moods have steadily grown worse over the last couple of weeks, and Axel is certainly not helping to diffuse the persisting tension with how he seems to be hellbent on being a brat today.

“Y-you are, and y-you’ll ap-pologize f-for ins-sulting h-him,” he tells the boy firmly which earns him an outrageous protest. “What!? No way! He started it! He insulted me first!”

Growing frustrated, Barry wonders why the kid has always to make things difficult, not just for himself but for both of them. The Rogues are in general not much keener on the idea of having Axel around than Len is, and it has been hard for Barry to get them to agree that he can bring him over these days.

It isn’t just because they don’t like having a kid around, but also the fact that Axel can be incredibly snotty if he puts his mind into it. Though, to the teens credit, most of the Rogues aren’t exactly all that friendly or welcoming towards him either.

“Axel, y-you w-will ap-pologize, or you’ll s-spent t-the r-rest o-of t-today b-back in m-my r-room.” It probably is a somewhat unfair thing to demand of him, but Barry has to get him to understand that he can’t act like this around the Rogues or people in general.

Axel meets his eyes with a furious glare, and for a moment he seems to quarrel with himself whether he should press on and protest further or not.

Thankfully, he decides against it, and after giving Barry one last scowl, he turns to Marco and more sneers than says. “Sorry.”

With that, he sits back down on the couch, obviously intend on ignoring them from now on.

Barry sighs quietly before he turns back to the Latin with an annoyed expression. “Y-you c-could w-watch w-what y-you s-say t-to h-him as w-well. You kn-know th-that y-you’re g-goading h-him on l-like th-this.”

“Or the brat could just not come over,” Marco returns with a shrug after he has sat back down and turned back to his cards. “We aren’t a fucking Kindergarten, no matter what you seem to think.”

“Hey, the little snot’s annoying, but he isn’t that bad,” Sam argues much to Barry’s surprise. “I mean, compared to the rest of you, he’s actually quite a nice addition.”

“Screw you too, Scudder.” Mick smirks before he adds. “I don’t mind the kid, he’s no worse than I’ve been at his age.”

“That’s a shocking revelation,” Marco remarks drily and grins when the other man flips him off.

This is exactly the kind of behaviour Barry doesn’t want them to display when Axel is around, but he is well aware that it is like talking to a wall when it comes to this. He turns back to his magazine and tries to ignore the others as well as the slight pain in his lower abdomen that has been bothering him the last couple of days.

Hartley and James join them about half an hour later, and so does Len not too long afterwards.

“You wanna join in the next round, mate?” Digger asks after he has won the last game and is now shuffling the cards again. Barry smiles but declines, the pain in his abdomen hasn’t subsides so far, and he doesn’t think that he would be able to really concentrate. Aside from that, he is pretty sure that the rest would prefer to go on and play for actual interesting amounts of money that are above a couple of cents at a time.

“You’re alright?” Hartley, who has sat down next to him, studies him with a slightly concerned look, and it isn’t really surprising that he has picked up on his discomfort. The ginger is very observant when it comes to things like that.

“Yes, j-just a b-bit under th-the w-weather.”

“You’ve been under the weather a lot the last couple of weeks,” James points out as he picks up the cards Digger has dealt him and gives him a curious look. “You’re coming down with something?”

“Let’s hope not,” Mick interjects and shoots Barry a wary glance. “I’m really not keen on getting sick.”

“Always so concerned about your fellow men.” Hartley snorts before he turns back to Barry. “I could get you some aspirin, if you want.”

It is a nice offer, and for a moment he considers it but decides against it in the end. His stomach feels a bit queasy, and he knows from experience that this only grows worse when he takes pain-killers.

“It’s probably the Weather-Witch. I start to feel sick around him as well when I’m too close.” Barry bites down on a frustrated groan while most of the Rogues start to laugh over Axel’s quip, and Marco seems ready again to hit the boy by lightning.

“Hehe, Weather-Witch, I like that!”

“Shut up, Tricks, or you I’ll punch that fucking grin off your face, idiota!”

“Oh noes, the Weather-Witch wants to jinx me!”

The bottle of beer hits James square in the face, and Barry has just enough time to get on his feet and back away before Marco lunges over the table for the other blond.

The brawl doesn’t even last twenty seconds before the Latin is pulled of the other man. Still, both of them have been able to get away with something to show for it as James has a bloody nose and a rather nasty looking bruise around his right cheekbone where the bottle has hit him, and Marco has both a split lip and a black eye.

“Fucking idiots!” Len seethes and seems about ready to punch both of them just for good measures. “You can bash your damn skulls in as much as you want but do it somewhere else!”

“Why? You worried about your little sweetheart?” Marco hisses in anger and gets punched square across his jaw for this by Len. Another brawl breaks out, this time between both of them, and it takes the other Rogues quite a bit longer to get both of them apart.

Barry, who is standing a bit to the side, watches this with a mixture of horror and embarrassment and has to fight the urge to just retreat from the room. Axel, he notices as he glances over to the teen, has gotten up from his seat at the couch as well and is watching the bunch of grown men with a curious but also very wary expression. He seems ready to bolt should he have to.

Marco is spitting curses in Portuguese at the other man as Digger and Hartley pull him back, while Len is able to regains his composure.

“Bloody hell, calm down, mate.” The Australian grunts and adds in a warning tone when Marco throws him a dirty look. “You hit me, and I’ll shove one of my boomerangs up your ass.”
“Wouldn’t you two like that?” Mick snorts and returns the nasty glares he gets from his two colleagues with an easy smirk. His attention is pulled back to Len when the other man shakes his hand off that has still been holding his arm in a rather firm grip. Sam lets also go of him as well a moment later but seems a bit more hesitant to do so.

The air between them becomes tense again when Len walks over to Marco who has also gotten his two colleagues to let go of him by now, and Barry asks himself in frustration and worry why the others don’t stop him. He really doesn’t want to watch them starting another brawl all over again.

Len looks no longer furious or upset, though, instead he has that eerily collected expression he always gets when he is really pissed off but able to keep his temper in check. It is almost more unsettling in a way.

Marco seems to have been able to calm down as well, but still appears a lot readier to start something again. He only meets Len’s gaze with an irked glare, though.

For a moment they just seem to try and stare each other down before Len starts to speak, without breaking the eye contact to the other Rogue. “Neither of us likes this current situation, Mardon, and getting at each other’s throat is the stupidest thing we can do right now. You know that.”

“Because you’ve kept such a cool head just now, haven’t you?” The Latin sneers and stubbornly refuses to back down. “Our current situation is your fault because that nutcase of a bitch is somehow really surprised that she wasn’t anything but a quick fuck for you.”

Len tenses up for a moment, giving the other man a really pissed off glare, and Barry is certain he would hit him for this. To his surprise, Len relaxes again instead and heaves a quiet sigh while pinching the bridge of his nose, a familiar gesture of his that makes him look both quite exasperated and tired at the same time.

“Yeah, I know. But letting our tempers get out of hand won’t solve this problem, we need to keep a levelled head.” Len points out grimly and adds after a moment. “And I’m working on the situation with Black.”

This causes Marco to scoff and cross his arms in a defiant manner. The Latin doesn’t argue with him about this, though, and instead mutters something under his breath Barry can’t pick up but is pretty certain that it is in Portuguese again, most likely more swears.

He wonders what Len means when he says that he is working on the situation with Blacksmith. Whatever it is, he is pretty sure that he wouldn’t like it one way or another.

A noise from the entrance to the living room causes Barry to look over to it. There he spots Roscoe who has stopped there and is now studying the situation in front of him with a slight frown and a wrinkled nose. It isn’t surprising when he finally settles on giving all of them a look of disdain and haughtiness.

“A bunch of toddlers have more dignity than the lot of you,” Roscoe points out, and Barry doesn’t miss that he has fixed his gaze on Len as he says so. The latter’s expressions darkens considerably at that.

“Careful, Roscoe, Len may just have told us to not kick each other’s faces in, but I’m sure he will make an exception for you,” Sam says with a smirk but doesn’t seem seriously annoyed about his friends condescending manner.

Roscoe scoffs and is just about to say something else when Lisa turns up next to him, already wearing a slightly disgruntled expression. She has obviously heard part of what has been said. “You idiots are fighting again?”

Like Roscoe’s before, her eyes immediately go to her brother, and she starts to scowl in exasperation.
“What the hell is wrong with you all? We’ve already enough trouble at our hands, we don’t need you jackasses to go at each other’s throat in addition to this.”

“Pig’s arse, we didn’t fight, princess,” Digger protests and nods to Marco with a smirk. “Mate’s just a bit sensible today, that’s all. All’s ace again, though.”

Marco looks about ready to jam his elbow into the Australian’s face who is still standing next to him, and the other Rogue is clever enough to quickly get some distance between them as soon as he notices his furious glare.

“Let’s go back to the game,” Len tells them in a tone that sounds more like an order than a suggestion. The others don’t protest, and with that most of the tension in the air is dissipating again.

Barry still feels a bit flustered by what has just happened, though, and decides to move to the couch to try and read some more of the magazine.

Axel hardly pays him any mind, most likely because he is still a bit miffed about what has happened before.

Over the next five minutes or so, Barry can’t help but notice that he keeps throwing slightly concerned looks to the Rogues, even though he obviously tries to appear nonchalant about what he has just seen.

“Are y-you alright?” he asks quietly and isn’t surprised when Axel turns to him with a slight scowl and replays in a chilling tone that he is fine.

Lisa and James join them a bit later, and the four of them end up playing a couple of rounds of UNO.
The mood has turned more comfortable again by then.

Beginning of October 3rd year

Barry exits the bus, humming to himself while carrying the two paper bags of groceries he has just bought, and wonders whether he should make himself some rice with chicken or a ham and cheese omelette for dinner tonight.

He really likes the beginning of the months and how this means fresher food and more options for him to cook. Thanks to Len, he doesn’t have to worry about going hungry anymore, and while he is incredibly grateful for this support, he still usually prefers fresh vegetables and self-cooked meals to the canned food his friend tends to bring over.

The sound of the bus driving away follows him as he walks up the stairs to the entrance of his apartment building, and it is a relief to finally enter it as the staircase as the wind has grown even worse and more chilling the later the afternoon got.

It has become palpable over the last two weeks that autumn is finally here. The temperatures have started to steadily drop again, and the weather is getting worse with each passing day. Not that it bothers Barry all that much. He has always liked autumn and how everything seems to calm down, and grows quieter as well as how colourful nature becomes for a few short weeks. It is a season he really feels comfortable with.
The staircase is vacant as he starts his way up to his floor and still tries to decide what to have for dinner.

He is so deep in his own thoughts that it takes him a moment to notice the man that is standing in front of his apartment as he sets foot on his floor.

His good mood is gone the second he recognizes him, and it is replaced with a kind of dread and worry that causes his stomach to drop uncomfortably.

He comes to an abrupt halt and just looks at Jay for a moment with a tiring knowledge that the relaxing afternoon he has hoped for would be no more.

The other man, who has watched him arrive, doesn’t miss his reaction, and Barry can’t help but feel a bit bad for it even though he has every right to feel upset about seeing him again.

Jay’s last visit has left him feel horrible and humiliated for weeks, and while Axel hasn’t started to be afraid or wary of him, as he is insisting that he doesn’t believe any of what he has learned back then, it could still have caused the kid to hate and avoid him.

The floor is quiet when neither of them speaks for a long moment, and the tense silence quickly becomes uncomfortable enough that Barry’s stomach starts to feel queasy again.

He can’t help but wonder why it has to be this way as Jay and he have been friends once, close friends. He actually even considered him family, and now he isn’t sure what to call the other man anymore. Jay certainly does mean well even though it is still hard to believe for Barry that he actually cares about him after everything that happened and how the rest of his former friends seem intend to live on as if he has never even existed.

Even so it doesn’t make it any easier to have him around these days.

The bags in his arms grow heavy, and it causes him to let go of this uneasy thoughts and urge himself to finally walk up to his unexpected visitor despite how little he wants to have another conversation with him.

Jay, who didn’t seem sure what to say or do so far despite the fact that he has been obviously waiting for him, seems to take this as a good sign and actually smiles at him in a friendly but noticeably uncertain way.

“Hallo, Barry,” he greets him, and there is a slight concern to the way he studies him that is utterly uncomfortable.

Not really sure how to reply as his throat has tighten up again, Barry only nods and steps past Jay to get to the door, mindful of leaving enough space between them as he does so.

“Let me hold one of the bags,” the other man offers, and while Barry isn’t comfortable with it, he knows that it would be stupid to decline. He is glad when he notices that Jay steps away again after taking hold of one of the paper bags, apparently aware of his aversion to have other people too close to him.

They enter his flat in silence, and Jay follows him over to the kitchen table where they put his groceries down. He steps a bit back and away from Jay, meeting his eyes only for a moment before he turns around and walks over to the sink. Despite not being thirsty, he fills a glass with water and takes a few sips, though his stomach still feels slightly queasy so that he decides to just keep it in his hands.
While he doesn’t look at Jay, he can feel his eyes on him, and while it really shouldn’t have such a strong effect on him it is still upsetting. He knows that he should have sent him away because now he would have to listen to one of his well-meant but painful advices again.

Barry swallows around the lump in his throat and sips at his water once more.

“Can we sit down, Barry?” The older man meets his eyes calmly and gives him a small but honest smile. “I’d like to talk to you about what happened last time, and I’d also like to apologize.”

This is not what Barry has expected, and while he can’t stop himself from feeling morbidly curious about what Jay has to say, he stays suspicious.

He nods slightly and waits for the other man to take a seat before he takes his own opposite to him.

Jay turns his gaze briefly to his hands which he has folded on the table in front of him. He frowns down at them thoughtfully before he looks back up to him with an earnest expression. “I’m sorry for the trouble my last visit has caused you. I know that there would have been a better way to handle it, but I’ve been caught off-guard to find a kid in your flat.”

His former friend pauses and the way he presses his lips together for a moment as well as his frown make it clear that he is still not happy about that. “I know that Axel is Eddie’s nephew, and that you weren’t alone with him, but I still don’t think that it is a good idea to let someone underage into your home. You didn’t break any of your restrictions, but you could still get into serious trouble for it should your parole officer find out about it.”

Barry has lowered his gaze while Jay has been talking so that he is now studying the glass in his hands. He can still easily imagine the somewhat reproachful way with which the other man is now watching him, though, as if he was not only a twisted person who sexually abuses kids but also stupid enough to play with fire despite knowing how dangerous this could be for them.

“I know that my presence lead to the boy finding out about you, and I’m really sorry about that. There was clearly been a better way to handle this. This doesn’t change the fact that it was wrong on your and your friend’s part not to tell the kid about this in the first place. He should-”

“S-stop, p-please.” His throat hurts, it feels raw, like sandpaper grinding on sandpaper as he swallows, and he is so fed up with all of this.

Barry isn’t surprised to see that Jay doesn’t look happy with him when he finally meets his eyes again.

“Barry, this is not a game,” the other man reminds him in a grave voice. “You’re a potential threat to the boy, but so is he to you. While Eddie’s and Mary’s presence may keep you from making any mistakes, what will happen if Axel turns up on your step one day because his uncle isn’t home, and he knows and trusts you because he has been over with Eddy before? What if he thinks it is a good idea to spend some time at your place till his uncle comes back? Would you send him away?”

This is so damn absurd. Barry has no idea how to answer this. Does Jay really think this little of him that he would do such a twisted thing to a young boy? Do all of them?

What a stupid question… of course they do…

Abuse. It always comes back to that, abusing and being abused, his whole fucking life is like a house made of those bricks. It is so damn painful… What did he do to make them think he is like that?

“What w-w-would you w-want me t-t-to d-do?” he asks grimly, and the anger that grows inside him starts to become harder and harder to keep down. “R-r-run a-around w-w-with a-a s-s-sign th-th-that r-r-reads ‘W-Warning: P-paed-doph-ph-phile! K-k-keep y-y-you k-kids a-a-at b-bay!’?”

Jay doesn’t find this any more amusing than he does. “Of course not, but I would have expected you to treat this issue with the kind of seriousness it deserves.”

“Y-y-you th-think I-I-I d-d-don’t kn-know h-h-how s-s… s-serious th-this i-is?!” Something in him feels close to snapping, and Barry has to fight to keep from yelling at Jay because, despite everything, he is just trying to look out for him. Even if all of this is nothing but a hurtful farce.

The other man doesn’t answer immediately but watches him with those damn sad eyes, as if Barry is the biggest disappointment in the whole universe.

It hurts so much.

“Why did you let the kid into your flat, then? I’m also honestly surprised that Mary would agree with that, seeing that she knows about this part of you.” Jay doesn’t mention that he isn’t at all surprised that Eddie would agree to any of this, though, and it irks Barry to no end that the other man dares to judge his friends, any of them, as if he knew anything about them.

“H-have y-you e-e-ever c-cons-sidered th-th-that th-they’re n-not w-w-worried ab-b-bout th-th-that b-b-bec-cause th-they kn-know I-I w-w-wouldn’t h-hurt A-Axel?” he asks in a hurt and small voice, and it is painful to see the exasperation in Jay’s eyes like he has just said one of the stupidest things one could possibly think of.

“Barry, I believe you that you don’t want to hurt the kid or anyone at that matter, but you-”

“I-I’m s-s-sick,” he finishes for Jay, and it is like his inside has turned to lead, like it is trying to pull him down, turning just to breath into a chore.

They stay quiet for a long moment then.

“Yes,” the older man agrees as quietly and sounds honestly sad as he does so.

Barry closes his eyes and takes a deep slow breath while trying to keep the hurt and anger from drowning him.

“I-I d-d-didn’t h-hurt W-W-W-”

“Barry-” Jay tries to cut him off with a warning in his voice, but Barry presses on because he wants to be heard, just once.

“I-I d-d-didn’t!” He hisses and glares at Jay angrily and hurt. “I-I d-d-didn’t h-hurt W-Wally o-o-or I-Iris!”

“Stop it! We both know that this is a lie,” Jay disagrees grimly and the anger is now plain on his face. “You did, and you have to come to term with that! It isn’t fair to yourself or Wally, or anybody else if you try to hide from this, no matter how painful it is!”

“I-it i-isn’t a-a l-lie-”

“Barry! We have proof that you did it! There is no damn way that you didn’t commit those crimes!”

Jay actually grows agitated enough that he hits the table with his fist, his eyes blazing with anger and sadness, and disappointment. Barry startles, bad enough that the spills half of the water in his glass over his hands and table, and for a long and awkward moment, they fall both back into a tense silence.

Quietly, Barry gets up to get some paper towels to clean up the small mess. His eyes are burning so badly that it is hard for him to see.

Neither of them speaks as he wipes the table dry, and again he can feel the other man’s eyes watch his every move. He doesn’t sit back down after he has thrown the used paper towels into the bin.

“Barry,” Jay finally starts again, and he sounds so damn sad, so regretful that Barry grows seriously sick. “You can’t go on like this. I know that you’re really trying to live a normal life, and that you’ve done really good so far, but you have to face what you did, and you have to come to terms with it. You will not become better if you can’t do that.”

Barry, who has his back to the other man, watches the cloudy and darkening sky outside, and, once more, he marvels over how he can hurt so much without anybody having actually laid a finger on him.

It is ironic that the people he let so close to him, those who meant and somehow still mean so much to him, are the ones who are the most awful to bear.

“J-Jay,” he starts in a quiet and slightly raspy voice but keeps his gaze on the sky. “I-I c-can’t exp-plain wh-why D-Diana’s l-lasso… I…I d-don’t und-ders-stand it e-either b-but… I-I d-didn’t-”

“Barry.”

“N-no, p-please, l-l-let m-me f-finish.”

Jay falls quiet again, even though it is palpable that he would rather not have to listen to what he is going to say now.

Barry swallows to wet his dry throat a bit before he goes on.

“Y-y-you n-never r-really t-told m-me h-how y-you r-really c-can b-believe th-this of m-me, e-even w-with th-the d-damn l-lasso… y-you sh-should h-have kn-know th-that I w-would n-never d-do th-this t-to W-Wally o-or I… I-Iris… th-that…” He breaks off and swallows again while he brushes the tears away from his cheeks. He takes a slow breath before he goes on. “B-but i-it d-doesn’t m-matter a-anym-more. I-I kn-know th-that I-I t-talk t-to d-deaf e-e-ears wh-when I-I b-beg y-y-you t-to b-believe m-m-e th-that I-I d-didn’t a-a-abuse W-Wally o-or k-kill I-Iris. Y-you j-just w-won’t h-hear m-me, a-a-and w-w-while I-I d-don’t u-underst-stand, i-it… I-I h-have s-started t-to w-wonder wh-what g-g-good i-it w-would d-d-do n-now anyw-way.”

It isn’t funny, nothing about this situation is or should be, but Barry can’t fight the urge to chuckles, because in a sad way there is still something bizarrely amusing to this.

He is such a joke for really believing that he could have a normal and happy life. He has never been good enough for it, he has always been nothing but a failure, failing himself and the people closest to him…

“I-I’m t-tired o-of a-all o-of th-this, o-of b-being t-told t-to b-b-be s-some k-kind o-of m-monster wh-while I-I’m n-not, a-and y-y-you m-may b-believe wh-whatsoever y-you w-want, I-I c-can’t ch-ch-change it… I-I c-could n-n-never… th-they n-n-never b-believed m-me, wh-why w-would y-y-you…” Barry breaks off briefly and brushes over his eyes again, and even though it is a rather redundant thing to do by now, he still doesn’t want Jay to see him crying.

He turns around to the older man who once was his friend, and can’t bring himself to meet his eyes.
“P-please d-don’t p-p-pass b-by a-anym-more. I-I c-c-can’t… p-please, j-just s-s-stay a-away f-from m-me. I-I kn-know y-you m-mean w-well, b-but… y-you kn-know n-n-noth-thing, y-y-you… I-I j-just c-can’t d-do th-th-this anym-more…”

A tense moment passes by between them. Barry can feel Jay’s gaze on him, and he just want him to leave so badly.

It is just too much...

Then, Jay does just that without another word.

Barry listens to him getting up and crossing the room, and as soon as the door closes behind the older man, he starts to cry.

Chapter Summary

Barry tries to find some comfort after his last talk with Jay and remembers something from a long time ago.

Chapter Notes

Hi there!

There is a flashback in this chapter, I marked it by having the text in that section entirely in italic. I hope this won't confuse anybody.

I'm quite busy right now as I've a big exam coming up next Tuesday and don't have much time for anything else but to try and squeeze all the required knowledge into my head, so please excuse if you find more errors than usual in this chapter. ;)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Barry realized early on that Sam isn’t very fond of being used as a regular mean of transportation by him, Len, or pretty much anybody, and he certainly makes no secret about it. Especially when Barry calls unexpectedly like it’s the case right now.

Though, despite his ongoing complaining about them using the mirror verse to travel between the Rogues’ hideouts and Barry’s flat, he has yet to refuse taking him over to their place.

This is also the reason why Sam appears in his mirror in front of him with a rather annoyed expression that makes it clear that he has most likely been forced to leave a poker game again.

The other man face turns slightly wary the moment he catches sight of him, though, and he studies him with a frown. “You’re alright?”

There is a palpable unease to how he watches him, and Barry can’t say that he is surprised. The majority of his friends aren’t really that good when it comes to dealing with emotions, whether it be their own or the ones of others, and him having obviously cried just a little bit ago must set Sam pretty much on edge.

“Y-yeah, I’m f-f-fine, j-just a b-bit u-under th-the w-weather. C-can I c-come over, or w-would it b-be a b-bad t-time?” he asks and tries to keep his voice as even and firm as possible.

Judging by how Sam eyes him, he is clearly not buying it but doesn’t asks about it again. Instead, he shrugs. “Sure, there isn’t much going on right now anyway.”

Barry gives him a grateful smile and climbs into the mirror with his friend’s help.

They fall silent after that, and after the short trip through the in-between dimension he quietly follows
Sam down to the living area where a couple of the others are around, once again going after favourite pastime - playing poker.

“Hi, Barry!” James, who spots him first, greets him with a wide grin while nodding to the little heap of money in the middle of the table. “Guess who’s going to win!”

“Better guess who’s going to end up with a kick in his ass if he doesn’t shut up.” Mick grumbles in annoyance while Digger lifts his hand in lieu of an actual greeting.

“You wanna join in?” Sam asks, and Barry doesn’t miss how he is looking at him with the same wariness as before. As if he was expecting him to break down right then and there.

Not wanting to make his friends feel uncomfortable and not really feeling up to play a game right now anyway, he gives Sam a small smile and shakes his head. “N-no, I’ll l-lay d-down on th-the c-couch f-for a b-bit, if th-that’s alr-right.”

His friend frowns and shrugs. “Sure, do as you like. There’s no reason to ask.”

Barry nods and makes his way over to the couch. He doesn’t really intend to interact with any of them right now, he just wants to be among other people.

He listens to them and tries to concentrate on their voices instead of thinking of what has just happened between him and Jay not even an hour ago. The memory alone causes him to feel sick as well as tired to his bones.

Resting on the couch, listening to his friends play, it doesn’t take long for his mind to become heavy, and, before long, he has nodded off.

“Woah…”

Barry, who is currently looking through some of the science fiction novels that are for sale, turns his attention back to the comic section where he has left his nephew. He smiles when he sees that the little boy is completely absorbed in some comic book, and judging by his slightly agape mouth and big eyes he seems to have reached a very interesting part of the story.

After watching Wally for another moment, Barry directs his attention to the clock above the entrance and sees that they still have more than forty minutes before they would have to leave to meet up with Iris on time.

With another bemused glance to his nephew, he turns back to the novels he has been looking through and tries anew to find something that grabs his interest.

The bookstore they’ve entered about twenty minutes ago is rather small and a bit dingy but not badly so, and it is one Barry has visited a couple of times before. It is also not far to the mall from here, so that they still have enough time to look around for a bit longer before they would have to leave.

Wally makes another excited noise, and Barry turns his attention back to him with a fond smile that quickly grows when he notices how intensely focused the child is on what he is currently reading.

The little guy will definitely get this issue seeing how much he seems to enjoy it. Barry just hopes that it is not another one of The Flash, even though he is well aware how likely this is the case due to how much his nephew likes them. Still, he can’t help his slight dislike for this comic, it just causes him to cringe every time he brings himself to read one of them.

The majority of this comic series is plain silly for the most part, and he doesn’t like how goofy they tend to portray him. Even worse is how they explain most of his powers with magic, and while he has nothing against the people of the occult, this always is able to rub him the wrong way.

“You are such a dork,” Iris told him with a bemused smile after she had asked him why he is so bothered by these comics, and he had tried to explain to her the little he knew about how the speed force works.

Contrary to him, she thinks that the comics about his alter ego are mostly cute and hilarious, and she likes to read them to Wally before bed whenever the boy stays over. She also loves to show Barry especially outrageous parts just to tease him. “Look, this Flash is running on a massiverainbow. Can you do that as well?”

Iris never fails to find his sour and slightly scandalized expression funny, and he is just glad that those issues are gone as soon as they visit the Wests again.

After looking through most of the novels without anything catching his eye, Barry briefly lets his gaze wander through the store without looking for anything in particularly.

Like before when they’ve entered, there are just a couple of other customers around. Two teenagers in the Manga and Anime section and a woman, slightly younger than Barry himself, who is looking through the erotic novels that are offered further back.

The clerk behind the counter is also still reading the same thick fantasy novel which has an elf and a wizard fighting on the cover, and Barry hasn’t missed how that man keeps glancing at Wally with a slightly annoyed and concerned expression, as if he expected the small kid to cause some kind of trouble. This is ridiculous, and it really starts to bother Barry quite a bit as his nephew is probably the most well-behaved and quiet child you can imagine.

Wally, thankfully, hasn’t picked up on it so far, and Barry hopes he wouldn’t as this would inevitably lead to the little boy wanting to leave. His nephew is a very shy and easily frightened child that usually never wanders off too far when they are somewhere else, and it has been a nice surprise that he actually seems to enjoy this place enough to leave his side.

After another not too friendly glance from the guy behind the counter, Barry decides that he would look for new reading material the next time around and decides to go over to Wally and see what the kid has found for himself.

“Hey, Shrimp,” he greets the boy who jumps slightly in response. Wally looks up to him with a wary glance that quickly is replaced by a much happier one once he realizes that it is just him. Barry tries not to frown at this reaction and instead nods to the comic his nephew is holding, asking curiously.

“What are you reading?”

“Of course…”

While Wally is mostly a really quiet child, much too quiet for his and Iris’ taste, he seems to break out of this habit as soon as someone mentions the scarlet speedster, and this time is no exception.

Barry flinches slightly and is not at all surprised when the shop clerk gives both of them another annoyed glance. He ignores him because, really, Wally is just a child, what does that man expect? It isn’t as if his nephew was causing any havoc in here.

“Oh?” he asks with a smile and crouches down next to the boy so that they are on the same eye level. “Do tell, what is he up to this time?”
Wally’s eyes sparkle in giddiness as he starts to animatedly tell him about his favourite hero and what adventure he is having in the issue. Barry can’t help but be infected by the little boy’s good mood even though he is still not happy that it has to be that comic again.

He has been getting the feeling that he sees more and more merchandising about his superhero alter ego every time he goes shopping, and this ridiculous amount of attention that is given to him is simply uncomfortable. Unfortunately, it only gets worse whenever he puts a lot of effort to stay out of anybody’s sight.

At least it isn’t as bad as it is for Bruce, who has to deal with some people currently developing some kind of television show about the Batman, even though they know absolutely nothing about him. His friend’s mood has been down the gutter since they made it official which doesn’t make working together with him any easier these days.

While many of the other don’t really get what Bruce is so pissed off about, Barry can completely understand and is really glad that the Flash is one of the lesser popular heroes. He can only be found on paper so far, whether it be in novels or on comic book pages, and he would be happy if this would stay this way.

Well, there is this Justice League cartoon, of course, but it doesn’t really count as everybody, including Batman and Hawkman, are portrayed rather outrageously cheerful.

It is harmless enough and doesn’t even bother to try and come up with some secret identities for them as some of the novels and comics have tried. Thanks to the current The Flash comic, kids thinks that his secret persona is called Steven Swift, which is just…

The only beef he has with the show is that he doesn’t like how they have made him into the lovable but not too bright jokester of the group which is again something many other interpretations of him share, and something he utterly doesn’t get. At least Iris thinks it is cute, and Wally loves it of course. They bought him the bedding with the show characters on it for his last birthday, and he was delighted about it. Rudolph wasn’t, but that was to be expected, and the man actually let his son gush over the Justice League and especially the Flash for once without telling him to stop.

“- and then he got them to the police station and brought the magic necklace back to the wizard!” Wally ends his summarization of the comic happily, and Barry tries not pulling a face at this story. Though, it probably isn’t one of the more flinch worthy ones as he has had adventures which were at least kind of similar to this.

“Huh, that seems to have been quite some adventure,” he smiles and nods to the issue. “What was your favourite part?”

The small boy seems clearly excited about someone willing to talk to him about his favourite superhero, and he turns the comic a few pages back to show him a panel where the Flash is generating a small twister with his right hand which then proceeds to knock out a couple of the Rogues.

Barry nearly chuckles when he notices the rather inaccurate drawings of the criminals and how they seem to have given the Pied Piper an actual skirt. He notices that Captain Cold is shown without hair once again, something most artists seem to do for whatever reason, which is quite funny as they also keep drawing Heatwave with rather lush ones.

“He defeated the Rogues although they’d sat up a really mean trap for him, and he saved all of Central City’s citizen from being turned into money!”
This storyline is certainly not the most imaginative one, but Wally is clearly enjoying it, and Barry can at least appreciate that.

“That sound like he did a good job at protecting the Twins,” he remarks with a smile, and Wally immediately nods in agreement and turns back to the last page again with a big grin. His expression falls over the next couple of seconds, though, and his eyes become sad as he watches the page. Concerned, Barry is just about to ask him about what is wrong when the kid quietly speaks again.

“I wish he was my friend, maybe he…” He breaks off and closes his mouth, a horribly dejected look on his face, and Barry feels the urge to pull the little boy closer and hug him till he feels better and not so damn sad anymore. It is so painful to see his nephew like that, this wonderful and bright child that is made to believe that he is anything but by his own father.

“Hey,” Barry says in a soft but warm voice and cups the back of Wally’s head. “I’m sure that the Flash would like you very much as well and would definitely want to be your friend.”

The little boy gives him a doubtful look before he shrugs. It is obvious that he doesn’t think so.

“Wally, you are such a great kid, there is no way that he wouldn’t want to be friends with you.”

Again, Wally only shrugs, and Barry doesn’t miss how the corners of his mouth have dropped, and how he is watching the Flash in the last page again with a kind of resignation that a boy in his age shouldn’t know.

“You know, he likes comics.”

This piques his nephew’s interest, and he turns to Barry with a surprised but slightly incredulous look. “How do you know that?”

Barry knows that he really shouldn’t tell him any of this, but he hates to see the kid so sad. He leans a bit closer and starts to speak in a very hush voice which immediately causes Wally to grow more attentive.

“I’ve met him at work before—”

“You have!? ”

“Shhh,” he hushes the kid and can’t stop himself from smiling despite the curious looks they get from the other customers or the glare they receive from the clerk.

“Sorry,” Wally whispers through the fingers of his two hands with which he is covering his mouth now.

“’s okay,” Barry assures him kindly before he goes on. “And yeah, I’ve met him before.”

“How is he?” his nephew asks excitedly, and it’s visibly difficult for him to keep his voice down.

“Well, very nice but rather quiet.”

This causes Wally to look at him in a doubtful way before he turns his eyes back to the Flash on the last page of the comic he has still opened where the hero is waving at the readers with a bright smile. He studies it for a couple of seconds before he turns back to him with a frown. “You sure?”

Barry chuckles quietly and nods. “Yeah, and he told me that he likes comic books and is very interested in science.”
“Like me,” Wally whispers in a wondrous voice and starts to grin widely. “I like them too, Uncle Barry!”

“Yes, I know,” Barry agrees with a bemused smile and tenderly cups his nephews back of his head. The kid returns his smile brightly and steps closer to give him a hug, something he often does with him but hardly with anybody else, not even with Iris.

“I love you, Wally,” he tells his nephew and decides that they would make a small detour to the ice-cream salon down the street before going to the mall-

The small body in his arms is suddenly gone, and so is the comic book store around them. It happens instantly, and Barry is left feeling utterly confused and disorientated for a brief moment before he picks up on something else – voices.

He recognizes them easily enough; they belong to the Rogues after all.

The realization of where he actually is right now, and that he has to have fallen asleep on the couch follows quickly enough. With it, the happiness and warmth he has felt just a few seconds ago is replaced by something cold and heavy, and for a while he just keeps laying there with his eyes closed.

He keeps listening to the others and notices that Len and Roscoe have joined the game, and Digger seems to have left while he has been asleep.

Barry doesn’t pay attention to what they are saying, he feels too groggy and sad to really care, and just having them around is enough. It is nice not being alone, especially now that he has pushed away the last person from his old life who still gave a damn about him.

He doesn’t regret asking Jay to stay away, though, as he really couldn’t deal with this anymore, but it is still painful and frightening. The other man has been a friend for so long, he and Joan have been so important to him, and now they are both gone like anybody else is.

This isn’t really true, though, as they have been gone for a long time already, Barry knows that, but he has been stupid enough to hope that they would welcome him back after he got out of Iron Heights and Jay turned up on his doorstep for the first time.

Like with Wally, he has lost someone very dear to him with this nice older couple.

The dream he has just had wells up in his mind again, the memory of so long ago, and Barry realizes that he can’t deal with that right now and forcefully tries to push it away. He doesn’t want to think of Wally or Iris, or anybody else he has lost. It hurts too much, and he is just too tired.

All of this has haunted him for so long now, why couldn’t it finally let go of him and leave him in peace?

Barry chuckles quietly to himself due to what an idiot he is. As if this would ever go away should he wallow in self-pity long enough.

He takes a deep breath and startles slightly after he has reached up to rub his eyes. It seems like he has started to cry again, and he quickly brushes the tears away as he really doesn’t want one of the others to pick up on this. Heat rises to his cheeks, and he squeezes his eyes shut as he rubs his sleeve over them with more force than necessary.

Has he been crying in his sleep?
Moving causes his stomach to start feeling queasy once more, and he notices how dry his throat has become during his nap. He takes a couple more of slow calming breaths and is relieved when he is able to stop the tears.

After he is certain that he wouldn’t embarrass himself in front of the others, he brushes over his eyes once more and wipes his cheeks before he slowly presses himself up in a sitting position.

A sharp pain flashes through his head momentarily, and he notices how the queasiness grows a bit worse but not badly enough that he has to lay back down. He realizes again how thirsty he is-

“Hey! Look who’s woken up from his beauty-sleep!” James loud voice causes Barry to wince slightly, and he really dreads facing his friends as there is no way that he doesn’t look at least partly as bad as he feels right now.

With a soft groan he gets up and flinches when his back and neck to flare up with pain in response. The couch in the hideout is in a much better condition than the one in his flat, but this certainly doesn’t mean that it is an ideal place for him to rest, and his tensed up muscles let him know all about being foolish enough to fall asleep on it despite it.

“You wanna join in?” James goes on and sounds just as cheerful as he has when Barry arrived which makes him wonder how many of the past games he has won so far.

“We can totally change for cents again!” his friend adds, and while it is a very nice thing of him to offer, it is out of question that the others wouldn’t like this all that much. As if to confirm his notion, Roscoe speaks up next and is audibly less enthusiastic about this prospect.

“Believe me, nobody would mind you quitting so that you can play for cents with him, but don’t drag the rest of us into it, you buffoon.”

“You’re a buffoon, Twirly!” James argues. “And I’m sure everybody would like you to quit and for Barry to join in instead!”

This causes Roscoe to scoff, and Barry decides that he is definitely not going to linger around long enough for them to start some fight he could possibly get somehow involved in.

“I wouldn’t mind playing for cents for a round or two.” Sam, who looks rather bored by their current game, shoots Barry a smirk that quickly vanishes and is replaced by a frown.

“Not really surprised about that,” Mick remarks with a snort as he studies his cards. “Your game’s been sucking the whole evening.”

“Not everybody can be as awesome as I’m! It’s my middle name, you know, James Awesome Jesse!” the blonde interjects proudly for which he earns a number of rather dirty looks.

“Oh for fuck’s sake, just shut up, Tricks.” Mick grunts but doesn’t really seem that annoyed by the other man’s boasting.

James sticks his tongue out at him in return, but his good mood seems to get a damper when Roscoe speaks next in an incredulous and slightly amused tone. “Have you been crying, Allen?”

Barry, who has just made his way towards the exit of the room and was about to walk past them, freezes at Roscoe’s question. He shoots the other man an alarmed and embarrassed look before he quickly shakes his head and utters a negative.

“Did you have a nightmare?” James asks, and contrary to Roscoe, he actually sounds concerned. “I hate those! You should fetch Hart, and get him to make you some hot chocolate. That always helps me.”

The heat that rushes to his face is uncomfortable, and Barry doesn’t miss how all of them are staring at him now. Len, whom he hasn’t dared to look at so far, has his expression schooled and is just watching him with a slight frown.

It is incredibly embarrassing, and he tries to deny it again, but his throat has closed up. To his utter horror, he can feel how his eyes start itching again so that he gives up and instead simply turns, and more or less flees the room.

His skin feels all itchy again as he walks the dark hallway. He would give anything for a shower, but he feels too embarrassed to risk running into anybody else. He just wants to hide away somewhere and try not to think about how very ridiculous he must have looked to the others just now.

While he isn’t really paying attention to where his feet are leading him, he can’t say that he is surprised when he ends up in front of Len’s room. He spends most of his time here anyway, and he usually uses it as an option to withdraw whenever he doesn’t feel so good.

This time, Barry hesitates to enter, though. He doesn’t know how Len would react to finding him in his room after how he just made an idiot out of himself, and he doesn’t want to risk another fight with him again.

Barry is aware that it is probably silly to worry about this, but even after he and Len smoothed things out between them, he has gotten more apprehensive around him once more. Len hasn’t missed it, and neither of them likes it. Unfortunately, Barry just can’t really help himself.

Still, even so he doesn’t like the notion to move on to the room that has become more or less his own over time. He prefers Len’s over it anytime as long as they aren’t fighting, mostly due to its familiarity and the notion that it is Len’s which is somehow comforting.

Not really willing to worry about this anymore as Barry is just too exhausted, he decides to enter. As expected, seeing that the rooms in the basement generally don’t have the best ventilation, he is immediately greeted by stale air. As his stomach is still feeling quite queasy, he lets the door a bit ajar so that some fresh air could come in, and without tuning on the lights, he walks over to the bed.

He is still thirsty, very much so even, but he doesn’t want to leave again and run into anybody else by accident. Thus he simply lays down and pulls the other man’s pillow close to him, so that he can press it against his chest and bury his face into it.

Len’s smell fills his nose, and he thinks of how messed up his life has become and of how messed up he is, and he hardly notices as he starts to cry quietly again.

Barry doesn’t remember what he has dreamed this time around, or whether he has dreamed anything at all when he wakes up again. It can’t be more than an hour or so that he has been asleep judging by how exhausted he still feels, but his head hurts rather badly and he is feeling sick to his stomach once again.

A soft groan passes his lips, and he realizes that he is still holding the pillows close to him. A familiar embarrassment settles over him, but just for a second or so before his attention is pulled back to how bad he feels.

The noise of a chair being pushed back causes him to freeze, and for some odd reason his mind seems to fail him then because he is suddenly a child again, and he is certain that he is going to get punished. For a horrible moment he is absolutely certain that this is one of his foster parents as his confused mind isn’t able to remember that they were all long gone from his life.

The person come closer, steps up to the side of the bed to which Barry has his back to and keeps standing there, watching him quietly. It is a horrible but all too familiar sensation and a scared whimper passes his lips while he is too afraid to move. He just wants to be left alone, he feels sick, and he is tired, he doesn’t want to be punished again.

The person next to him moves then, he can hear it, and before he even realizes what he is doing, he has tightly curled up on himself. He stammers a small protest, knowing all too well how little this would help, and he just wants to be left alone so badly.

safe.”

“L-Len?” He croaks and starts to cough because his throat has gotten painfully dry by now.

Len hums in agreement, and Barry feels the mattress next to his back sift a bit as his friend sits down.
The fear that spikes through him with a sickening intensity quickly subsides again when his still drowsy mind starts to take in where he actually is and with whom.

It is a relief, at least till he realizes that he has made a complete fool out of himself again, and he buries his face in the pillow in his arms again to hide himself away. At least, till he remembers that this is Len’s pillow, that he is in Len’s room, and that he is far too old for such a behaviour.

With some effort and another soft groan, Barry rolls onto his back and blinks a couple of times as his sight is blurry in the faintly lit room. It seems that Len has joined him while he has been asleep.

“You want some water?” Len asks, and this sounds like the most wonderful idea to him. He nods groggily. “Y-yes, p-please.”

His friend hums again before he gets up and leaves the room. Barry looks after him and wonders what time it is and how long he has been asleep.

It doesn’t take Len long to come back with a bottle of water, and he accepts it with a faint smile. The water feels amazing on his dry throat, and while the feeling of sickness gets momentarily worse, his headache calms down nearly immediately.

“Th-thanks,” Barry murmurs after he has downed nearly half of it and hands the bottle back to the other man.

“You’re feeling better now?” Len eyes him with surprisingly open concern, and Barry wonders how badly he has to look to worry him that much. He smiles again tightly and nods. “Y-yes, m-much.”

Len studies him quietly, and Barry has the feeling that he wants to say something but isn’t sure how.

In a way he wishes it would stay that way, he really doesn’t want to talk about the reason why he has behaved this odd, even though Len probably does deserve an explanation.

“I think you should go back to sleep,” Len tells him then before he adds with a slight smirk. “You look pretty horrible.”

Barry chuckles and smiles tiredly despite how crappy he is currently feeling. “Th-thanks a l-l-lot.”
The other man only shrugs, but there is humour in his eyes when he speaks again. “Truth can be a bitch.”

Barry can certainly assert to that.

“W-will y-you s-stay?” he asks quietly and meets the other man’s gaze in the dim light that falls through the still slightly ajar door.

Len seems to hesitate for a moment which surprises and worries Barry a bit, at least till the other man finally speaks. “If you want me to.”

Things between them are so odd right now. At times they seem alright again, and then, out of nowhere, everything turns uneasy and uncertain.

Barry knows that Len is just as lost as he is when it comes to their relationship and to what it slowly but steadily seems to turn into, and he is also well aware that all their set-backs hurt and upset his friend just as much as they do him.

Slowly, he reaches for Len, and covers the hand that is resting on the other man’s thigh with his own. “Y-yes.”

Even in the faint light he can make out the relief that briefly flickers over his friend’s face. It causes some of the tension to ease away from him, because it helps to see that he isn’t the only one who feels mostly lost in all of this.

Len takes his shoes off, and Barry scoots over to make him room to lay down next to him.

They lay silently together for the next couple of minutes, and the other man’s presence is comforting and calming, helping his mind to settle down and not to go back again to what has happened just a couple of hours ago.

Barry has rolled onto his side, so that he is watching Len quietly as the man is looking up the ceiling with a thoughtful expression, and he wonders what he is thinking.

“You want to tell me what happened that upset you so much?” The question catches Barry off-guard, he has just been about to nod off again, and his cheeks grow uncomfortably warm when he notices that Len’s eyes are on him now.

He isn’t sure whether he wants to talk about Jay’s visit or not. A part of him just wants to forget that this ever happened, even though he knows that he would never be able to. These kind of things follow him around like his own shadow. They never let go, not really at least.

“J-Jay p-passed b-by,” he explains in a hardly audible voice and closes his eyes. “I… I d-don’t th-think h-he’ll d-do s-so ag-again.”

Len stays quiet for a long moment, and Barry prefers the silence to listening to anything that would made any of this any more real. He doesn’t want it to be real, he doesn’t want to lose another person…

“I… I c-can’t d-do th-this…” His voice sounds thin, and he bites his lower lip painfully hard to fight off the urge to cry again. He doesn’t want to be so damn weak all the time, he knows that self-pity won’t get him anywhere and only makes things worse in the end.

Barry feels Len move then, and he only startles a bit when he feels a familiar strong arm find its way around his back before he is pulled closer to him. He doesn’t resist and gladly welcomes the offered Warm lips brush against the top of his head, and Barry tries to think of nothing. He just wants to concentrate on the warmth that slowly seeps from his friend to him.

“I-I’m s-so t-tired of th-this…” he whispers quietly.

Despite his effort, he can feel warm tears leak from his closed eyes as he presses his face against his friend’s shirt.

Len stays quiet and keeps holding him as he silently cries for the life and all the people that has been taken from him.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you guys liked the chapter! I'm quite fond of Barry's relationship with Wally, and I love to write these happy moments between them. Unfortunately, it only makes their current relationship all the sadder.

Next chapter will have a rather big reveal, I'm looking forward to posting it! It's not about what caused all of this, though, I don't want to get your hopes up just yet. ;3

Thanks for reading and all your amazing and kind feedback! I'm really lucky with you as my readers. :)

End of October 3rd year

“You sure you’ll be good without my help?” Axel asks which causes Barry to give the young teen an amused look. He nods. “I th-think I’ll b-be able t-to h-handle th-the r-rest.”

It has been a very calm Monday afternoon so far, after all, and while there hasn’t been much to do, it has still been very nice to have the kid around.

“My, what a wonderful young man you are,” Mrs Ming remarks after listening to them, and it is obvious that she is completely serious about it which causes Axel to preen a bit in turn even though he tries to nonchalantly shrug it off. “Just lending a hand to a friend.”

“Still.” The old woman smiles and walks over to the boy. “You’ve been helping a lot over the last couple of months, and I know that Barry buys you food and sweets as a reward, but I want to give you a little something as a thank you as well.”

Axel, who has been munching on an apple, piques up at that and gives her a curious look. “Well, thanks, but, you know, you really don’t have to…”

The old woman smiles as she hands him ten dollars which isn’t much, but the business hasn’t been going that well, and Barry really hopes that Axel isn’t disappointed. To his relief and slight surprise, this doesn’t seem to be the case at all.

“Cool! Thanks a ton, that is really neat of you, Mrs Ming,” the boy says with a pleased expression as he accepts the money which in turn causes Mrs Ming to laugh and pat his cheek. “You’re such a good kid, Axel, and I’m really glad that you’re helping Barry out at times. You may not think so, but you are a great help, and we both enjoy having you around.”

Axel, who has tried not to pull a face when the old woman patted him, suddenly turns red and sheepishly averts his eyes to the ground while he shrugs again. “Sure, no prob, I live to help and…”

The kid glances at her and then to Barry before looking anywhere but them. “Well, you’re pretty cool as well. For old folks, I mean.”

This causes both Barry and Mrs Ming to laugh which in turn earns them an annoyed huff from Axel, even though he is obviously very pleased by the kind words he has just received.
“Then hurry along, young man. You don’t want to leave your friend waiting, do you?” Axel rolls his eye in good humour at her words, but thanks her again before he takes off.

Currently, Axel and his friends seem to be on very good terms again which means that the teen spends most of his time with them. Barry is glad that this doesn’t stop him from passing by at the store every other day, though, and while he is sure that it is at least partly due to the food he gets for helping, he also knows that Axel simply likes to spend time with him and Mrs Ming.

The boy hasn’t liked the news that he couldn’t stay at his place anymore, and while Eddy and Mary both offered him that he could stay at their places should he have nowhere else to go at nights, he has yet to take them up on it.

Axel was quite bummed when Barry asked him to understand that he could no longer come over to his flat without anybody else around. After Jay’s last visit, Barry is simply too afraid that someone could pass by to check up on him unannounced, and he dreads the notion that they could find out about Axel and the consequences this would bring with it.

The boy only kept up sulked for a couple of days, though, seeing that he did get the reason for his decision and how dangerous their former agreement really was for him. Still, Barry can’t help but feel guilty about throwing him more or less out even so.

“I think I will go upstairs and lay down a bit if you are going to be alright on your own, my dear.” Barry looks back to Mrs Ming and nods.

“Of course,” he agrees before he notices how she is currently pressing one hand against the small of her back. He frowns and asks concerned whether her back is acting up again, a problem she has had more and more trouble with over the past year.

“Don’t worry, Barry,” she assures him with a kind smile. “I have just been on my feet too much. It will be as good as new after I have been able to rest a bit.”

Despite her words, he can’t help but worry. She isn’t exactly the youngest anymore with over eighty years, and she told him a while ago that she has been having troubles with her heart for a couple of years now. The notion that something could happen to her bothers him a lot these days as she has become a very dear friend to him since he started working here.

“Y-you sh-should l-lay d-down th-then,” he advises, and really wishes he could do more. Mrs. Ming gives him a grateful smile in return. “Call me if you need some help, my dear.”

Barry agrees and watches her go upstairs with a clinging concern before he forces himself to turn his attention back to work. He keeps himself busy with taking stock and mopping the floor for the next half an hour or so as there aren’t any customers around.

Afterwards, he finds himself sketching behind the counter for a bit till finally an older couple passes by. They are both around Mrs Ming’s age and friends with the older woman, thus he is rather familiar with them as they tend to pass by every week on the same days. They exchange a few niceties with him, and he promises to give his employer their greetings before he is once again left alone in the store.

Time goes by rather slowly, and, shortly after eight, he decides to sweep the floor once more and do some dusting. Just standing behind the counter makes him feel like he is lazing around, even when there isn’t anything to do and cleaning has become rather redundant at this point.

Finally, when he has been without customers for nearly an hour again, he decides take one of the magazines and read a bit as he starts to get rather tired. Occupying himself like this, the next half an hour passes by much quicker, and he gets slightly startled by the familiar ring of the doorbell.

His gaze moves to the entrance, partly curious and partly worried who is going to turn up so shortly before their closing hour. He really hopes that it isn’t going to be trouble seeing that after half past nine they usually have hardly anybody passing by anymore these days, and when it still happens, it is mostly drunks or teens who want to buy alcohol and like to make his job a bit more difficult for him.

The memory of the group of late teenage boys from last Monday, who seemed on their way to a party and passed by to grab some cheap wine and beer, is still fresh in his mind. They didn’t break or tried to steal anything, but they have been very uncomfortable to deal with, and it has taken them forever to leave again.

“Hey, Bar,” Eddy greets him with an easy smile as he makes his way over to the counter. “Your favourite personal escort service has arrived.”

Barry feels himself relax as soon as his eyes fall upon his friend, and he returns the other man’s smile readily.

“H-hi, Eddy. You’ve b-b-been in th-the area ag-gain?” he asks jokingly.

“Yup, been busy,” his friend agrees and stops in front of him. “And I thought that you’d like some company on your way home.”

Eddy tends to do that, simply passing by around the time Barry is closing the store and taking the bus home with him. It is never something they agree upon beforehand, and it doesn’t happen regularly, but it is always a pleasantly nice thing of the other man to do.

“S-sure.”

“Great, you wanna play a game of Sixty-Six?”

It isn’t really surprising when Eddy pulls out the fitting card deck just as he asks this seeing that to his friend this game is probably the best invention since sliced bread.

“I’ve the feeling this could be your night,” his friend tells him with a wiggle of his eyebrows which causes Barry to chuckle.

“I’m n-not-toriously b-b-ad at g-games,” he reminds him, but Eddy only waves him off and starts to shuffle the cards. “Not with this one, you aren’t. Fortuna smiled at you when they spread the talent for it.”

Barry feels the urge to roll his eyes at that silly statement but doesn’t correct his friend seeing that he actually has a point. While he is still horrible at Poker and pretty much any other card game, he has an odd knack for Sixty-Six. He thinks that this is mostly due to how it helps that it is rather easy for him to remember which cards have already been dealt and which are still in the game. Thus it isn’t hard to conclude upcoming pairings.

Next to luck, memory is a big factor when it comes to Sixty-Six. This is also one of the reasons why the Rogues don’t like it particularly much. Roscoe is usually the one who wins when they actually play once in a while, and, like most of the others, he is a really horrible winner.

“You grab us two beers? I buy.” His friend shoots him a hopeful look.

“Y-you d-do r-rememb-ber th-that I’m st-still at w-work, d-don’t you?” Barry asks with a slightly exasperated sigh, but Eddy only shrugs. “So what? There is nobody around, and while I don’t want to crash your hope, it is still more or less a given that nobody will turn up till you have to close for today, anyway.”

Barry shoots the other man an annoyed frown as he picks a card and glances to the clock. Unfortunately, it seems like his friend would be right. With it not even being another half an hour till he would have to start with closing the store, it is unlikely that another customer would pass by tonight. Another look to the door shows him that it has started to rain again as well, something else that would make it more unlikely for people to find their ways here this late.

“Don’t make such a face. This place has never been a customers’ magnet, and you’ve still survived so far, so don’t fret about it,” his friend advices as he studies the card he has picked up and shows it to Barry with a smirk. “Looks like I’m starting.”

Next, Eddy shows a marriage and goes on. “And be glad that it is a slow evening, at least you don’t have to bother with drunken little shits this way.”

Well, his friend does have a point there.

After Eddy’s second turn, he puts his cards down and walks over to where they have the refrigerators with the cooled drinks. Barry doesn’t even remark on him picking up two of the beers.

“Just live a little.” The other man grins when he notices his irked expression. “One beer won’t cause you to become unable to close the store, and you have me as help.”

“I th-thought you’re t-trying t-to c-convince m-me t-to d-d-drink,” Barry snarks with a smile as he accepts the bottle. His friend shoots him a very unconvincingly hurt look. “You and your ongoing tendency to insult me really makes me start to feel unappreciated here.”

They end up playing a game before Barry decides to start closing the store. It’s a bit early for it, but he doesn’t really want to stand around any longer, and Mrs Ming told him that he could do the closing earlier should it be a slow night again.

As he has cleaned everything beforehand, there isn’t much left to do for him other than to lock everything up and turn the lights off.

“The nipper is over at his friends’ place again?” Eddy, who is sitting on the counter, watches him make a last round through the place to make sure that everything is as it should be.

“Y-yes,” Barry agrees as he locks the front door. “H-he s-said a f-friend of h-his is c-celeb-brating h-his b-b-birthday.”

“Well, let’s hope he doesn’t join the navy by accident.” Eddy snorts, and while Barry doesn’t find this particularly amusing, he doesn’t protest. He isn’t stupid and knows how likely it is that there would be alcohol at the party Axel is going to tonight.

Even though he has tried to talk with the teen about being responsible and careful regarding getting drunk, he is well aware of what little of a difference that will really make in the end. Axel is a teenager, a very young one but one who is used to a rough life and likely hasn’t had many good role-models so far.

Barry has never liked any kind of alcohol, mostly due to him learning early on how people can change for the worse when they get drunk, but it’s not the same for his younger friend who will probably want to impress his friends or just feel like he is belonging there.
“Again with that long face of yours.” Eddy quips and slides off the counter while he pulls a cigarette pack out of the pocket of his jacket. “Don’t worry so much about everything, the kid isn’t stupid, and he knows that he will disappoint you should he let it go too far.”

At his doubtful look, his friend shrugs and starts to make his way over to the door leading to the back area. Barry, who has just finished his little round, follows along.

“The kid really thinks a lot of you,” Eddy tells him when they exit into the back alley and shakes out a cigarette from the pack he is still holding. He lightens it up and inhales the smoke deeply while Barry puts the keys away.

“I’m also sure you constant nagging isn’t in vain,” Eddy adds with a smirk when he notices Barry’s doubtful expression, and they start to make their way towards the bus-stop.

“I’m n-not c-const-tantly n-nagging.” Barry’s frown deepens when the other man only chuckles, and he points out. “H-he’s th-thirteen.”

When his friend fails to response other than with a shrug, he decides to let the topic rest. It isn’t like he is surprised that Eddy wouldn’t be particularly bothered by someone as young as Axel getting drunk. In all likelihood, his friend did just that when he was the teen’s age.

They have to wait for about half an hour for the bus to turn up which means that it is nearly twenty minutes late. It doesn’t happen often that it has delay, and while Barry takes it calmly and doesn’t think too much of it, Eddy is clearly annoyed by having to spend any more time than necessary in the increasing rain.

His friend gives the driver a rather dirty look when they finally get on the bus, and Barry has to pull him along to stop him from starting some stupid argument with the older man behind the wheel who is clearly in bad mood as well.

“Y-you’re s-so ch-childish at t-times,” he mutters to Eddy when they take their seats in the back. “It w-was p-probably d-due t-to s-some t-technical d-diffic-culties th-that t-the b-bus arrived l-late.”

Eddy snorts and shoots him an incredulous look but leaves it at that, for which Barry is quite grateful. His friend can get ridiculously upset about the pettiest things at times. He really doesn’t feel like listening to him rant about the lacking of their public traffic system while trying to get him to keep it down at the same time so that he wouldn’t bother the other passengers.

The ride passes by in relative silence after that, and while they exchange a few words, neither of them feels much like talking. Eddy occupies himself with his mobile phone, and Barry keeps watching the world pass by outside the window. He doesn’t notice when he starts to nod off.

He is startled awake again by his friend shaking his shoulder lightly and pointing out the next stop is theirs.

“You look like a racoon with those dark circles under your eyes,” Eddy remarks with a crooked smile. Barry, whose exhaustion has made a leap for the worse now that he has fallen asleep for a bit, grumbles something unintelligible while he rubs his eyes.

“Don’t expect me to carry you,” his friend informs him, sounding much too amused for his liking.

After giving Eddy an unimpressed look, Barry turns back to the window to see where they actually are.

“W-we sh-should g-get u-up.” His voice sounds husky. He coughs slightly and tries again to rub the sleep out of his eyes. There is no question that he is looking forward to his bed tonight.

The air is cool and moist when they finally exit the bus at the next stop, and Barry takes a deep breath to clear his head a bit. It seems that it has stopped raining sometime while he was asleep, but the ground is still wet. He looks up to the sky and can see a thick layer of dark clouds still covering everything.

“Come on, slowpoke. I like you, but I don’t wanna freeze my nuts off just because you are half-asleep on your feet.” Barry turns his attention back to Eddy who has already climbed up the few stairs to the entrance door, and wonders whether his friend can also sense the odd feeling that sticks to the air. It is as if it’s unusually charged up.

“I th-think th-there’s g-going t-to b-be a l-lightening s-storm.” He has no idea why he points this out, and he feels rather stupid for it when he notices his friend’s amused expression a moment later. “That’s good to know, and the more reason for us to remove ourselves from out here.”

Barry nods in agreement but glances up to the sky again before he makes his way over to where Eddy is still waiting for him.

“You aren’t afraid of lightening, are you?” the other man asks as they enter the building.

“N-no.”

“Really? Because you seemed quite unsettled there for a moment.”

Barry frowns and shrugs as they start to climb the stairs to their floor. “I’m j-just t-tired.”

Eddy glances at him in a way that makes it clear that he isn’t really believing him. He doesn’t comment on it any further, though, and they walk the rest of their way in silence.

The bulbs of their floor have finally been replaced a couple of weeks ago, but neither of them bothers with turning the lights on. They are pretty used to move through the dark to get to their apartments by now, anyway.

Barry isn’t sure why but the uneasy feelings that has nestled itself into the pit of his stomach starts to grow heavier with every step he makes towards his door. He is so occupied by this odd sensation that he fails to notice that his friend has stopped at the top of the stairs and only picks up on it after a couple of steps.

Surprised, he turns back to him. “Everyth-thing alright?”

It seems to take Eddy a moment to answer, long enough that it worries Barry a bit.

“Yeah,” his friend finally agrees, and he draws the word out in an odd way, like he isn’t really paying attention to him or what he is saying but has something else on his mind. Another moment passes by in a strained silence before Eddy seems to snap out of it.

“Yeah, I’m good,” the other man repeats and sounds normal again. “Just remembered something I’ve forgotten to do.”

Barry watches as his friend makes his way over to him in a few quick steps. “Y-you s-sure y-you’re alr-right?”

Eddy waves his concern off. “Yes, I’m good. It was just a long day.”
It doesn’t sound like a lie, but it still seems a bit odd. He decides not to linger on it, though, as he too is exhausted and just wants to get off his feet. Thus he is surprised when his friend stops him as he is about to walk over to his door. “You’ve a moment to spare?”

“F-for wh-what?” he asks a bit confused.

“I need to show you something,” Eddy explains rather lamely, and Barry can’t help himself but gives his friend a slightly annoyed frown. “N-now?”

It is late, really late, and he has to get up early again tomorrow, the other man knows that.

“It won’t take long-”

“Eddy, l-let’s d-do th-this t-tomorrow, ok-kay?” he asks wearily. As far as he knows his friend, he is probably trying to lure him into his apartment so that he could get him to make him some very late snack.

Even in the dark he can make out the odd expression on his friend’s face, then, and he isn’t sure what exactly he sees there but for a moment he thinks it is… worry? Reluctance?

It is gone the next second, so quickly, that Barry thinks he must have imagined it.

“Right,” Eddy says, and he still sounds somehow off, but actually proceeds on to his own door. “Sleep tight and don’t let the bedbugs bite you.”

Barry can’t help but frown, a bit unsettled by this odd behaviour of his friend. After a brief moment, he decides to not worry about it for now and instead turns to unlock his door.

The air of his flat is surprisingly cool as he enters, and he can’t help but wonder slightly frustrated whether the landlady has turned off the heating once again. She tends to do it at times if he thinks the temperatures aren’t low enough to justify the costs of it.

“G-great.” Barry grumbles as he pulls the door close behind himself, and it is just then that he notices that something is off. Instinctively, he freezes up when he spots the open window above his kitchen sink and realizes that the low temperatures aren’t due to his landlord’s stinginess.

Something cold is suddenly pressed against his left temple, and he feels a familiar fear engulf him like a cold blanket.

“Sorry,” a deep voice says that he immediately recognizes as the one of Kenneth. “This is nothing personal, Allen. You’ve just made the wrong friends, and those stubborn fuckers were stupid enough to really upset my client.”

The sensation of the muzzle against his skin makes him oddly lightheaded, and Barry tries to protest, but his voice is failing him once again.

“Maybe this will make them realize that they shouldn’t play hard to get.” Kenneth chuckles softly at that as if he has just said something funny.

Barry realizes in that moment that there are so many things he still wants to do, so much he still wants to amend for, and there would be no possibility for him to do so anymore. He would die as a sick twisted man in the eyes of the people he once held so dear, and he would die without seeing any of his friends again.

His mind jumps to Wally, and the regret is nearly overbearing before the thought of his nephew is replaced by the notion of Axel, and how the boy would be on his own again after his death. He really doesn’t want this to happen to the kid, and he prays that Eddy and Mary would look after him, maybe even Len.

When the other man comes to his mind, Barry feels an unsettling sadness overcome him which is so intense that his eyes start to itch.

The realisation that he wants to see him again shouldn’t be as unexpected or as intimidating as it is, and he wonders what the criminal would do after he found out about this. Would he be sad about his death; would it really mean something to him?

Probably, by now he has realized that Len seems to feel similar to him, and the thought of causing him pain, of upsetting him as much as Barry himself would be upset should their roles be reversed, makes him feel so very guilty and sad…

He closes his eyes and feels a couple of warm tears run down his cheeks as he takes a shaky breath.

It doesn’t matter, none of this does. He is already a dead man.

Odd, how things sometimes work. He wouldn’t have thought that it would end like this for him-

A knock at the door behind him causes him to nearly jump out of his skin and while his mind is still jumbled, he doesn’t miss how unsettlingly calm the muzzle of the gun stays at his temple.

“Hey, Barry?” It is Eddy’s voice and his stomach makes a sickening lurch. “I don’t wanna bother you, but it seems that I was stupid enough to actually lose my keys. Can you let me crash on your couch for tonight?”

The urge to call out to the other man and tell him to run is nearly smothering, but his throat still feels like someone is choking him. He glances over to Kenneth who is mostly covered in shadows but is able to make out the annoyed way in which he has pursed his lips.

“Don’t be an ass, I know that you’re still awake, Bar. You just went in there like a minute ago.” Eddy huffs, and Barry could kick him for his outrageous bad timing.

Then, the muzzle is gone, and the other man nods to the door.

“Tell him to get lost,” he orders him in a low voice and sneers when Barry fails to comply with it. “Do it, or your buddy will die as well.”

The thought that his friend could die because of him is horrifying, and he really tries to get himself to talk and send the other man away, but he isn’t able to get a single noise out.

“You’re a fucking joke.” Kenneth grunts in annoyance, and Barry grows sick as he watches how he lifts his gun again at him with a dark smirk. “At least you’ll have some company when you bite the dust.”

A small whimper escapes him, and he makes a hurried step back with his eyes fixed on the black and incredibly intimidating muzzle that is pointed directly at his head.

The door opens then, just slightly, and Barry remembers with a dropping stomach that he hasn’t locked it after entering.

It causes Kenneth to glance over to it, and while Barry knows that he isn’t fast anymore and that he wouldn’t be able to overpower him, it doesn’t matter. He doesn’t want Eddy to die because of him.
The prospect of his own death has filled him with dread and a numbing fear, but the notion that this man could also kill his friend jerks at a part in him he has forgotten existed a long time ago.

The movement how to disarm someone come to him without thinking, it is muscle-memory from his time working at the CCPD and as a superhero. It still doesn’t work.

Kenneth is a huge guy, built like an ox, and he is strong as is his grip on the gun. Barry isn’t able to get it away from him, but he makes him lose his balance for a second, and it is enough to bring him to fall with a well-placed shove.

Unfortunately, Kenneth is a professional and his eyes never lose their aim on him, neither does the gun. Barry watches him pull the trigger, and an odd calmness settles over him as he realizes that this is the moment he is going to die.

The bullet never comes, though. Instead, Eddy is suddenly standing in front of him, like he has appeared out of nowhere.

Instinctively, Barry grabs for him and tries to pull him away from the trajectory of any possible shot that would be fired. He tries desperately to tell him to run, but his throat is still not working, and it is so upsetting that he feels new tears wet his cheek.

“-ry. Barry!” Eddy takes a hold of his upper arms in an attempt to keep him still. “Calm down, it’s alright, man. You’re alright.”

Barry shakes his head and desperately tries to get his useless vocal cords to work. The other man needs to leave, it doesn’t make any sense that he hasn’t been shot yet, but should he stay it would definitely come to it.

“For heaven’s sake, calm down! You’re alright, nobody’s going to hurt you,” the other man tries again before he stills briefly and gives him a strange look that is then replaced by one of realisation.

“I’m fine, you idiot, and I’ll stay so if you finally stop freaking out on me, alright?”

It is frustrating how Eddy doesn’t seem to get the danger he is in, and Barry feels the urge to smack him, at least till he catches up with what is actually going on.

He freezes.

There is no way that Kenneth wouldn’t have shot the other man by now, and Barry realizes that he himself should already be dead as well, seeing that killer actually pulled the trigger on him. Without thinking, he reaches for his forehead, half expecting to feel a hole and shattered bones and brain matter.

For a brief moment he is certain this can’t be real, that he is dead and this… he has no idea what this is.

“Woah there, buddy, you are growing rather pale,” Eddy remarks audibly concerned, and Barry doesn’t protest when he is pulled over to the couch next. His gaze goes to where Kenneth has been just a moment before, and his stomach makes a painful lurch when he doesn’t find him there.

His feet baulk, and he stares at the spot in a mixture of disbelief and panic. Eddy huffs in annoyance when he fails to go on, but his exasperation wanes as soon as he notices what has made him stop.

“You don’t need to worry, you are safe.” Surprised, Barry turns to the other man, and he tries to understand how he could be so sure of that. How is he still alive, and where did the hitman go?!
It is then that he notices how Eddy keeps fidgeting slightly, and the nervous way with which he is watching him now.

Something makes click in his head, and he realizes that it must have been Eddy who stopped Kenneth from killing him, and maybe he is also the reason that the man isn’t here anymore. This makes utterly no sense, though.

“Look,” his friend says and seems visibly uncomfortable all of a sudden. “Just let’s get you off your feet, and I will get you a glass of water, okay?”

There are so many questions going through Barry’s head right now, but he isn’t able to formulate a single one of them. Instead, he let Eddy urge him over to the couch.

“You want me to make you some tea?”

Barry frowns at his friend after he has sat down and can’t really decide. His head feels oddly light and heavy all at the same time.

“I can also get you a beer if you would prefer that… or something stronger,” Eddy offers with an unusually uncertain smile.

When he fails to answer again, Eddy simply makes do with snatching him a glass of water. It is as good of a choice as anything, anyway, as he doesn’t feel thirsty right now.

It is when Barry accepts the glass that their fingers touch slightly, and he suddenly feels like he is rammed into a wall. The air is pushed out of his lungs in a gasp as a sensation similar to being electrified overcomes him which is so damn familiar that it is overwhelming and horrifying all at the same time.

The accompanying sickness hits him completely unprepared, and he groans softly as his stomach seems to attempt and crawl its way out of his throat. He hears Eddy hiss when he realizes what is going to happen and quickly makes a step back just as Barry bends over and starts to retch.

Throwing up is as awful as it has ever been, and the notion that it is a good thing that he hasn’t eaten anything since earlier last afternoon briefly crosses his mind. He is really not looking forward to cleaning up this mess.

The air around him feels thick and charged, and while he digs his fingers painfully into his knees and keeps his eyes clenched shut, he still knows that the other man is close.

Thankfully, Eddy stays silent and doesn’t attempt to touch him. Barry doesn’t even want to consider how much worse this would make all of this.

It takes forever till his stomach starts to settle down again, and when it finally does, he groans miserably and just stays still for a long moment afterwards.

Barry thinks that this is a silly thing to say. Nothing is alright, not for him, it hasn’t been in a very long time.

With another soft groan, he forces himself to sits up again and let’s himself fall back against the back of the couch. His head still feels strange, like it is not really a part of him anymore, and the taste of bile is lingering his mouth which is nasty but better than the nausea itself has just been.
Tiredly, he lets his head drop onto the backrest and takes a couple of slow and deep breathes.

“Wh… wh-what d-did y-you d-do t-to h-him?” He turns his head slightly, so that his gaze can fall upon Eddy.

“K-Kenneth,” he adds and realizes that this name probably doesn’t tell his friend anything. “Th-the m-man wh-who w-want-ted t-to...”

The thought that he would have nearly died is unexpectedly unsettling, much more than he would have anticipated it to be. There have been many times he has come close to death before, and he has always been able to deal with it, knowing that it just was a part of his life.

It has been different this time, though.

“You want me to get you another glass of water?” Eddy meets his look with a calm one and gives him a small smile. “You look really pale, maybe I should get you some crackers or jelly?”

Barry notices the tightness around his friend’s eyes that belies how relaxed he tries to appear.

“Wh-what i-is g-going on, Ed-dy?” His voice is quiet, and he feels so out of place. He starts to think that it is due to the other man, due to his presence.

The sensation of their brief touch comes back to him, and he can’t help it but shudder in realization of why that feeling has been so unsettling to him.

“Y-you… y-you’re a s-speeds-ster,” he states quietly.

It isn’t a question, and he knows how ridiculous is must sound and that it is very likely that Eddy will deny it and laugh it off, but he knows what the speed force feels like. He has been connected to it for nearly a decade.

For a long moment, Eddy doesn’t replay anything but studies Barry. He doesn’t look upset or angry, but he doesn’t seem particularly happy either. He seems worried more than anything else.

Finally, Eddy takes a deep breath and exhales it slowly while rubbing a hand over his face. “You can’t tell anybody about this, okay?”

This is not the answer Barry has expected.

“Y-you’re r-really a s-speedster…” The notion is so utterly absurd that he feels the urge to laugh. Eddy, his neighbour, of whom he is pretty sure that he is involved in some shady business at times but whom he has thought of as an ordinary person, possesses super speed.

“How?”

The other man frowns and again seems to take his time to consider what to say next.

“Look,” Eddy finally answers, and the tightness around his eyes hasn’t left yet which causes him to look older than usual. “I know that this is a lot to take in and probably one of the best reasons there are to freak out but please don’t. I don’t mean you any harm.”

Again, that isn’t exactly the reply Barry has expected. Then again, Eddy can’t know that he himself has been a speedster once, and he most likely expects him to be at least a bit unsettled by discovering that his neighbour has powers.

Well, he is, but most likely not for the reason his friend has in mind.
“Wh-what d-did you d-do t-to K-Kenneth?” he asks because he can’t really think of anything else to say just then.

Eddy’s looks grim and uneasy when he shrugs once more. “I didn’t off him if you worry about that.”

“Th-that’s n-not wh-wh-what I’ve m-m-meant,” Barry protests, even though a small part of him actually has been worried about just that.

“Yeah?” the other man asks with a snort and is clearly not believing him. “Because you may not have notices, but you look like you want do nothing more than bolt.”

Before Barry can say anything to that, Eddy groans and pinches the bridge of his nose. He mutters something under his breath that sounds a lot like a curse, and for a long and tense moment an uneasy silence settles between them.

“I’m n-not g-going t-t-to t-tell anyb-body, Eddy.”

His friend turns his eyes back on him, and Barry is pretty sure that he is trying to gauge whether he can believe him or not. It suddenly occurs to him that the other man maybe doesn’t have anybody who knows about his powers, and that notion is concerning and saddening at the same time.

“I didn’t kill him.” Eddy turns his gaze to the still open window and frowns. Barry tenses up when it is closed a second later while the man in front of him seemed not to have moved at all.

This is so damn odd to see and so unsettling that he briefly feels his stomach to revolt once more.

“You are getting sick on me again?” The look his friend gives him is both worried and unhappy, and Barry feels really bad for reacting so openly negative to any of this.

Then, Eddy is gone from his side, just for a split-second, brief enough that he could have missed it should he have blinked, and reappears with a small bag of dried ginger. It is still closed, and Barry is pretty sure that he just whipped the drugstore around the corner.

“This helps,” his friend says after he has opened the small bag and picked one of the dried sliced which he is now offering to him. “Just suck on it.”

Barry hesitates a moment before he accepts it with a faint smile. His stomach feels so queasy he isn’t sure that it would be a good idea to put anything in his mouth right now. Still, this is most likely going to help with settling it, and the other man actually got it for him.

“Th-thanks.”

Eddy only grunts in response before another silence settles between them. It is awkward and uneasy, but Barry knows that it has to be much worse for his friend.

Giving such a secret away, especially if you are not doing so of your own free will, is always extremely unsettling and scary.

“Wh-where’s K-Ken-neth?” He has no idea why he is asking this instead of any of the other honestly more persisting questions he has on his mind. It is an important question, though, and the answer, should the other man give him one, would tell him a lot about his friend.

It takes Eddy a while to replay which isn’t very assuring. He may have told him that he didn’t kill Kenneth, and Barry believes him, but it is never a good sign when someone seems this reluctant about talking about something they’ve done.
“I took him outside the twins’ borders.”

Again, this isn’t what he has expected.

“Y-you…” Barry frowns, and while he is relieved about this, it is also worrying as a man like Kenneth shouldn’t just left running around freely.

“Wh-why d-didn’t y-you t-take h-him t-to th-the p-p-police?” This would have been a more sensible thing to do, at least.

Eddy snorts and shrugs. “I don’t get involved with those fuckers.”

“Y-you c-could h-have l-left h-him in f-front of th-the d-deparment,” Barry points out as he himself did so quite a few times when he started his carrier as the Flash and hadn’t yet decided to make himself known to the public. More often than not, the police had already enough on the criminals to put them away at least for a time, and a guy like Kenneth couldn’t be a dark horse to them.

“Well, believe it or not, that didn’t cross my mind.” Eddy grouses and sounds noticeably annoyed. “You know, why let us not just put down some rules for next time I’ve to save your ungrateful arse.”

His friend’s anger dims again when he notices his hurt expression, and how he has palpably tensed up.

Eddy heaves a frustrated sigh and rubs his eyes again. “Look, he isn’t going to come after you anytime soon again, alright?”

Barry wants to know what his friend means, but he feels tired and is pretty sure that he wouldn’t like what he would learn should he asks him about it again. Instead he simply nods and turns his eyes towards the slice of ginger he still has in his hand.

It looks utterly unappetizing to him, but he pushes it into his mouth, mostly due to the lack of anything else to do.

Another silence spreads between them for a bit, and while he can feel the other man’s eyes on him, he keeps his gaze on the small couch table in front of him. Barry is reminded of his earlier mishap when he picks up the unpleasant smell of his own vomit, and while it causes the nausea to spike slightly again, he decides that he really should take care of it. He slowly gets onto his feet again, carefully stepping around the mess.

“What are you doing?” There is an audible note of concern in his friend’s voice as he gets up as well.

“I n-need t-to c-clean th-this m-m-mes-”

In hindsight it should not have surprised him when his floor is suddenly clean again, but for a couple of seconds he can only stare at the spot and frown in a mixture of exasperation and unease.

“You r-really d-didn’t h-have t-to d-do th-that,” he tells Eddy with a frown.

“I know,” the other man simply agrees with a half-shrug.

They watch each other quietly, and Barry wonders whether Mary knows. He doesn’t think so.

“Th-thank y-you.” He really means it.

“Sure.” Eddy shrugs again and gives him a slight smile that doesn’t reach his eyes. “I’ve cleaned away worse that vomit before.”
This really doesn’t set Barry’s mind at ease, but he decides not to think too much about this piece of information for now.

“I also m-mean f-for… f-for s-saving m-my l-life, Eddy. I’m r-really g-gratef-ful.”

The other man looks briefly surprised before he chuckles and shrugs. “I live to serve, Bar, and you are one of the few people I actually like, so rest assured that I won’t let any crazy hitman go after you anytime soon.”

Barry smiles and just like that the mood between them becomes lighter again.

“Y-you w-want m-me t-to m-make y-you s-some c-coffee?”

“You look ready to collapse,” Eddy points out and nods to where his bedroom is. “Go get some sleep.”

The notion to lay down is very alluring, but a part of him wants to talk with his friend of what he has just learned. Eddy seems to notice what is on his mind as he adds. “You can bug me about what I’m and all that jazz after you’ve rested.”

While his friend tries to appear nonchalant about him having found out that he is a speedster, he isn’t succeeding in hiding that it is obviously bothering him.

There is probably something Barry should say to him, something to reassure him and set his nerves a bit at ease, seeing that he really doesn’t mean any harm to his friend.

His mind comes up blank, though, and while there is so much he would like to know, he is also well aware that he is too exhausted to really make sense of anything the other man would tell him.

“Ok-kay,” he finally agrees and doesn’t miss how Eddy appears noticeably relieved by this.

“Good.” His friend smiles faintly. “I’ll keep an eye out for any more potential assassins that are out for your blood.”

“N-not f-f-funny,” Barry remarks drily, which causes his friend to grin.

“I’ll catch you later, then.” Eddy gives him a nod and is about to leave when he stops him again. “Y-you r-really d-don’t n-need t-to w-worry, I w-won’t t-tell anyb-body.”

His friend frowns slightly and studies him with an expression Barry can’t interpret. Whatever he finds on his face, it causes him to relax some more and give him a somewhat more honest smile. “Thanks, Barry.”

Then Eddy is gone, like he has just turned into thin air.

Barry stares at the spot where the other man has been just a second ago and isn’t able to feel anything but a bone-deep exhaustion.

His legs start to grow weak, and he lets himself fall back onto the couch. He would rest here for a little bit and move on to his bed later.
Really hope you guys liked this chapter. :)

This is one of those that make me quite curious how people will react to it. Seeing that the cat is out of the bag regarding his secret powers, I can say that Eddy is connected to Barry and what has happened to him in a way. Can't say more, though. ;3 Also, Eddy becoming Barry's neighbor was no coincident, even if both of them are not aware of it just yet.

Much love, thanks for your wonderful feedback, and till next time, when Len returns, we meet Blacksmith in person, and the Rogues are forced to do something they really would rather not.
It is the day after his unfortunate run-in with the hitman that Barry finds himself mopping up the floor in front of the counter at work. One of his earlier customers has dropped a glass of prickles by accident, and while it means some extra work for him, he isn’t feeling particularly frustrated over it despite his growing exhaustion. Having something to do he can focus his mind on and thus helps him to stop the memory of what has happened last night try to creep back into the forefront of his mind is something he welcomes, especially with the current lack of customers.

The incident has him still very much on edge, and he has kept himself busy since his arrival a couple of hours earlier, unwilling to let himself think too much of anything that occurred or of what he has learned.

Barry knows that he probably should have told Len before leaving for work, but the notion to worry his friend didn’t and still doesn’t sit well with him. Len and the others have been under so much pressure lately. It is obvious every time he stays at the hideout these days, and it worries him to think of how the other man would react if he learned about Kenneth’s visit. He doesn’t want to upset Len and cause things between them to get rough again by accident.

Still, Barry knows that he has to tell him, but he would do so later, after work. Maybe he would even call Sam from the mirror of the store’s restroom after closing and-

Barry is pulled out of his thoughts by the ringing of the doorbell and turns to it with the friendly smile he uses to greet all of his customers. “W-welcome, c-can I h-help you?”

The dark-haired woman, who has just entered and seems to make a beeline to him, returns his smile, and he isn’t sure why, but he immediately gets a bad vibe from her. There is something off about the way she is looking at him as she comes to a halt in front of him, stopping much too close to his liking.

He shifts his weight to the other leg and makes a small step back, not missing the amused glint in the dark eyes of the woman. It is oddly unsettling. He feels stupid for it, but for some odd reason she remembers him of a cat who eyes him as the mouse. Despite never having met her before, something tells him to be careful around her. It is unsettling, as is the smile she is still giving him, one that shows too many teeth and is clearly fake.

Once again, Barry starts to feel himself tense up.

“Well, I was thinking about making a batch of brownies, you see?” she says in lieu of a greeting, and he picks up on her rather deep but not unpleasant voice and on the oddly sultry way she speaks to him now which causes his discomfort to only grow worse. He also notices her lipstick, a very intense dark purple. An unusual color but surprisingly fitting due to how pale her skin is.

As she stands in front of him, Barry can also not help but notice that she is very tall, even an inch or so taller than he himself is, and there is a confidence to her that is slightly intimidating.

“I was wondering whether you have some instant mix I could use,” she goes on and leans a bit towards him while lowering her voice as if to tell him a secret. “I’m not very good in the kitchen, and I don’t want to embarrass myself by accident.”

The way she looks at him is intense, uncomfortably so, and while she is still smiling and hasn’t done anything to validate his apprehension of her, Barry quickly makes another step back to get some additional distance between them.

“N-n-no, s-s-sorry, w-we d-don’t h-have ins-stant m-mixes.”

Her dark eyes don’t leave him, and he has to fight against the urge to shudder that tries to overcome him.

A very uncomfortable moment of silence passes by between them.

“‘I see,” the woman says and heaves an exasperated and clearly fake sigh. “That’s a pity. I would have liked to impress my friends with them.”

She lets her eyes wander through the shop as she goes on. “They’ve been rather difficult to be around lately. Very stubborn and rather mean, to be honest, and I thought I maybe could smooth things out a bit with a small present.”

Her gaze returns to him, and Barry hardly notices how his grip on the mop in his hands becomes nearly painfully firm. There is something extremely disconcerting about this strange woman, and he suddenly is very much aware that the two of them are the only ones in the store right now.

“Friends can be rather tricky at times. Wouldn’t you agree? Especially ones you’ve known for years and years,” she goes on. “You start to trust them, think that you mean to them as much as they do to you. You help them even if it isn’t in your own best interest.”

Barry tenses up even more when the woman steps closer again, and while he tries to back off once more, he quickly finds the edge of the counter pressed against the small of his back. She smiles in response as she has clearly not missed his reaction.

“And there is nothing worse, nothing more excruciatingly painful, than for them to stab you in the back. For them to make you feel like you’re nothing more than a cheap whore to be used and thrown away afterwards. Wouldn’t you agree?” she asks in that deep sultry voice of hers that holds nothing sexy anymore but only sounds threatening.

“I-I-I d-d-don’t k-know w-w-” he stammers, but she cuts him off with a chuckle.
“Oh, but you do.” Her smile is all teeth now. “You do, Barry, and I’ve to say that I’m honestly surprised about it myself. I wouldn’t have thought that Cold could grow fond of someone like you. He usually is quite firm about his moral standards, but it seems that he has made an exception for you, hasn’t he?”

Barry’s throat has closed up on him again, and he can only stare at the woman in sheer panic and fear.

This has to be like Blacksmith. He hasn’t even occurred to him at first, but now, having her this close, he doesn’t doubt that she is the woman who has caused the Rogues so much trouble.

He also doesn’t doubt that she could kill him easily should she want to, and it makes him nearly sick when he realizes that she would likely do it with a pleased smile on her lips.

“I honestly can’t see what is so special about you. You’re a pretty scrawny fellow, aren’t you? Well, not that I really care all that much,” she goes on as she lets her eyes slowly wander over his body which causes him to feel even more uneasy. “What I care about is that Lenny has been an utter ass again and really wronged me and my new friends for some ugly twisted man whore like you.” Her eyes snap up to him in this moment, and she bores her gaze into his. “I really can’t let him do that.”

The dark haired woman moves even closer then, so much so that her body is nearly touching his, and he automatically draws back when she leans forward with another one of these disturbing smiles on her lips.

“You would be a very good way to tell him so, wouldn’t you, Barry?” Her hand suddenly touches the site of his throat, nearly tentatively so before she cups it. The touch causes a shiver of disgust and fear to run through his body. “I could break your fingers, crack one after the other till you piss yourself in pain. What would you think of that? Wouldn’t you agree that this would be quite an effective way to get my message across to our dear Lenny?”

Barry opens his mouth in a vain attempt to protest, but he isn’t surprised when he isn’t able to produce anything but a very soft whine. It seems to amuse the dark haired woman as she chuckles softly again.

“I really don’t understand Lenny,” she says, and he starts to feel sick when she starts to rub small circles with her thumb across his Adam’s apple. The gesture is so disturbingly intimate, just so wrong that it causes him to shiver again. “Why would he even want to fuck suck a little sicko like you? Judging by what usually happens to people like you in prison, you’ve probably been fucked by enough guys that he’s to worry about catching himself some nasty STD from you.”

Her other hand cups one of Barry’s that are still holding onto the mop, and the grip quickly turns painful enough that he grunts in discomfort.

“Breaking your fingers would probably be an excellent choice to get my message across… but it is always such a pain till they are completely healed again,” Blacksmith goes on with an amused smirk. “If they ever do.”

Barry tries to say something again or at least move, but it is like he is paralyzed. A slight tremble starts to overcome his body, and the woman doesn’t miss it as her smile grows even sharper.

“Maybe the wrist instead?” she asks sweetly and tightens the grip on his hand enough that he whines softly in protest. “I know that you have broken one of yours not too long ago. Maybe the other one this time? Or your leg? There is so much to choose from, isn’t there? So many bones in your disgustingly scrawny little body.”
She leans closer to him them, so much so that he can feel her breath on his cheek and smell the sweet floral perfume she is wearing.

“Though, we both know that Lenny usually doesn’t react all too well when you damage his toys. He is really petty when it comes to this and holds a grudge so easily, that dummy.” She sighs softly and leans in even closer so that her lips are actually touching his skin when she speaks again.

Barry’s body is trembling badly now in response to the forced contact, and he glances over to the entrance door, hoping that anybody would enter and cause her to retreat and stop this, but he only sees the empty space in front of the store and that the sun has disappeared behind clouds again.

Her lips feel soft and warm as they move against his cheek. It is utterly disturbing.

“I don’t want things between us to get even worse. I really want Lenny and his band of misfits. They would be such a wonderful addition.” The lips are suddenly on his, and the repulsion Barry feels in that second is enough to rip him out of his stupor. He shoves her away and suddenly finds himself on the ground not even a second later, her knee painfully dug into his back and one of his arms equally painfully twisted in her grip.

“Tell Lenny that I’m not going to let him treat me like I’m one of his damn little toys!” Blacksmith hisses sharply, her voice nearly distorted in anger, before she bows down, so that she can hiss the next words directly into his ear. “Tell Cold that I’m not one of his little whores, and that I’ll destroy anything he holds dear should he not be able to come to his damn sense. I don’t know what he did to Kenneth, and I really don’t care. Tell him that Cameron send him, if he wants to be pissed at somebody for this little stunt then it is him. He should keep in mind though that, should I decide to come after you, there is nothing that will keep your miserable ass alive, you ugly cheap little cunt!”

Then the grip on his arms and the knee against his back are gone, and Barry can move again. With a suppressed groan, he rolls onto his site while he looks for the dangerous woman, who he can spot close to the entrance door. She is walking at a leisurely pace and doesn’t make the impression like she is worried at all that she could be in any kind of trouble for attacking him just now.

At the door, she pauses and turns back to him.

“You have a really cosy little store here, maybe I’ll pass by again another time.” She winks at him with an amused smile before she finally leaves.

Barry watches her go from the ground and wonders with a growing sense of dread what he has gotten himself into.

Len stops after stepping out into the hallway that lays outside his bedroom. He turns around to look back to Barry, not fighting the urge to checking up on him once more despite having hardly even left the room yet.

The blonde is still unconscious to the world, sleeping on the bed, buried under a thick blanket and hugging Len’s pillow tightly against his chest. He looks tense up and utterly exhausted even in his sleep. This isn’t new, Barry has always carried his worries to bed with him which is one of the reasons why he has such troubles to find any rest at times.

It is different now, though, as Len wonders how much of it is due to him these days.

Being friends with the Rogues seem to harm Barry more than anything else, especially lately, and Len doesn’t kid himself into believing that he isn’t bearing most of the fault for this.
He turns to face the other man fully and leans against the doorway, resting his shoulder against it as he decides that his talk with the others could wait for a couple minutes longer. Right now, he doesn’t want to leave just yet. Not after learning that he nearly lost Barry last night.

He considers him with a familiar mixture of worry and regret.

This, all of it, is mostly on him. If he wasn’t such a coward…

Len huffs a sigh and rubs his eyes while trying to forcefully dissipate these thoughts. He doesn’t have time for this-

Someone comes in his direction, he picks up on the footsteps, lighter than those of most other Rogues, and he doesn’t have to look to know who decided to join him. He honestly isn’t sure whether he is happy about the unexpected company or not.

He stirs his mind back to Barry and feels a familiar longing settle in his chest as he watches him sleep.

It is still a mystery to him how Barry got rid of Kenneth on his own. He should be dead right now considering the hitman seemed to have come to his place with the goal to kill him, and if Kenneth was anything then it is thoroughly. The killer would have never stand for his prey to get away from him. Len himself has witnessed to what length that piece of shit goes just to fulfil an order.

Barry hadn’t been very forthcoming with any explanation, and he had been upset enough already after everything that Len didn’t pressed on too much. They would have enough time to talk about it later, anyway.

In all honesty, Amunet seeking Barry out at work has him nearly more worried than the damn hitman, seeing that he knows how unpredictable that crazy woman can be.

“So,” Lisa finally breaks the silence after she has been standing next to him for about a minute, burning her disapproving gaze into the side of his head. “Judging by your pissed off expression, I get that you’re up to something.”

He stays quiet and keeps his eyes on Barry, not really wanting to have this talk with his sister. He already knows how she is going to react to the decision he made while lying next to Barry for the last hour or so.

Lisa huffs in annoyance after he’s failed to reply, and Len is certain that she is currently scowling rather impressively at him again. She hasn’t taken well to Barry being threatened either, and, like him, she wants to do something about it. Like him, she does also know that they aren’t really in any position to do so, though, and she worries about him doing something rash.

It should be insulting, really, seeing that he is probably the most level-headed of the whole bunch, but even Len can acknowledge that this isn’t always the case when it comes to something Barry is involved in. The blonde makes things so much more complicated at times by how important he is to him.

“What are you planning to do?” Lisa asks, and it is audible that she has trouble to keep her voice down. “Seek that bitch out again to tell her to fuck off?” She snorts and steps closer, boring her glare into him as he turns his head to face her. “You did so a number of times already and look how well that worked out. And if that fucker Carmon is around as well, you’ll probably end up getting shot.”

He stays quiet, annoyed at her for being so damn honest but somewhat grateful for it all the same. The person he is really angry at isn’t Lisa, anyway. It was he himself who started this whole damn thing in the first place after all.

Because he is so fucking scared of recognizing what he feels for Barry, and because he feels the damn need to hide from the fact that he has started to think of him whenever he has sex with Izzy or any other whore, or even when he gets himself off in the shower these days.

He is such a fucking joke…

“Len.” Lisa seems close to losing her patience with him judging by the growing edge in her tone. “What are you planning to do now? I don’t want you to get your idiot self killed because you lose your head over-”

“I won’t.” he cuts her off grimly. “I’ll keep it cool.”

Lisa looks taken aback for a moment. There is a slight incredulity to the way she is staring at him now, like she can’t believe that he’s just said that, before she snorts quite unladylike and gives him an amused smile.

“Really?” she asks. “Do I really have to start to put up with your dumb puns again, Lenny?”

He smiles slightly and lets his head drop against the doorway as he turns his attention back to Barry.

Barry hated his puns at first when they still fought each other in costumes. He was way too serious of a fellow to enjoy the ridiculousness they all really embraced by playing this game.

During their visit to Gael, Barry did mention that he started to enjoy his sense of humor after some time, though.

Len wonders sometimes how things would have worked out for them if they had met under different circumstances. Would they have maybe even been able to become friends without all the horrible stuff that has happened to the other man? Would he have been able to simply accept his feeling for him?

Sam has this odd theory about multiple dimensions, multiple earths he likes to go on and on about when he is sloshed enough that he can hardly walk. Len isn’t sure what he thinks of it, but he guesses that it is possible with all the other crazy shit that is going on in their world.

The notion is somehow soothing even because he likes to believe that somewhere on one of these other earths there could be a version of him and a version of Barry who actually are together and live a happy life. It is a corny thought, he would never say it out loud, but it is still nice and reassuring to imagine that there could be a place where things worked out alright for both of them...

“You know that either Blacksmith or Cameron will go after him again if we keep sitting duck.” Lisa has stepped up next to him and is now watching Barry as well.

“Yes,” he agrees quietly, and feels the familiar longing to walk back into his bedroom, crawl back into the bed next the other man, and just hold him close, listen to his slow and even breathing and make sure that he is alright.

Len is quite good at lying to himself, but even he can no longer tell himself that you feel like this for a simple friend.

“So, what do you want to do?” He looks back to Lisa and studies her for a brief moment. She would not like this. Not a single one of them would, and he knows that all of this is on him in the end, but he would take their anger anytime over Barry getting killed because he was unlucky enough that he got into the crossfire.

“I’ll tell her that we accept.” Len isn’t surprised when his sister’s eyes grow comically big for a moment before the surprised expression is replaced by a much angrier one.

“Are you serious?” She hisses, and she is now clearly fighting to keep her voice down. “Are you fucking serious?”

He finally pulls the door to the bedroom closed, as he really doesn’t want Barry to hear any of this.

“Yes,” he simply agrees and turns around to walk to their living area, where most of the others are currently as well.

“Just like that?” Lisa asks, and there is an audible and biting reproach to the way she speaks. “You decide this just like that, even though the rest of us doesn’t want to have anything to do with that fucking whore?!”

“Keep it down-”

“Damn it, Len. She is a damn psycho, she will get us killed, and if not her, it will be that sleazebag Carmon,” she cuts him off. “They want us to be their fucking dogs! Go fetch whatever they fancy. You really want us to-”

“No,” he interrupts her sharply and turns to face her, stopping shortly before the corner that would lead to the hallway connected to the living room where probably most of the others are. “I don’t want the Rogues to play to anybody’s rules but their own, Lisa, but we’ve to adjust for now.”

It is hard to keep his voice down, hard to not give into the anger he feels because none of this is what he wants for them, and it will complicate their deal with Elias.

Lisa crossing her arms in a very familiar manner in front of her chest that indicates that she is clearly not pleased with him.

“Adjust?” she asks with a deep scowl. “Adjust how? You mean like becoming her damn puppets?”

“I mean like buying us time.” He glares at her, warning her about being such a damn nuisance right now.

“God, Len, you’re such a bastard.” Lisa groans and pinches the bridge of her nose as she squeezes her eyes shut as if just looking at him is frustrating to her. “You really shot yourself in the foot by fucking that bitch, and now the rest of us can pay for it.”

It is hard to argue with her about this seeing that she is right.

“I know,” he tells her and sighs tiredly. This night couldn’t end soon enough.

A brief silence settles between them, and he can hear the sound of the television reach them from the living room as well as Sam laughing and Mick calling the other man a jackass.

They all would be understandably pissed, and it has already been difficult enough to keep them from going haywire as it is.

Even so, every single one of them knows that they can’t go on like this for much longer anyway. They hardly can move around the Twins anymore without stepping either on BV’s or Blacksmith’s territory, and in a way this could maybe even benefit them in the long run-
“I’ll so kick your ass for this later on.” Lisa meets his eyes with a grim but no longer hostile look. “That is, should this decision not get us killed before I’ve the opportunity to do so.”

“I’ve never let this happen before,” he reminds her. “And I won’t start now.”

She smirks and shakes her head in a bemused way. “True enough.” She then nods towards the direction of the living room. “They’ll go apeshit over this, you know that, right?”

“They always go apeshit over anything.” He returns her smirk and pulls his Cold glasses out of the pocket of his parka he put on before leaving his room.

Paying Amunet a visit on her own terrain means to go as his alter ego which is completely fine with him. He likes being Captain Cold, he always has, and the weight of the Cold gun on his hips is a familiar and reassuring company.

“Yes, they’ve certainly never been able to master your level of chill, Len.” Lisa’s grin grows a bit wider when he gives her an annoyed frown in return.

“Let’s bring the good news to them, then,” he says and puts the glasses on.

His sister rolls her eyes but doesn’t protest as she follows along.

Lisa has to fight the urge to flip Amunet off when that annoying tramp of a woman shoots her an amused and clearly smug expression as she is making her way over to her desk in a leisurely pace. She has just now joined them, after letting them wait for nearly half an hour in her office.

They are currently in one of her many secret trading locations below the Gems, and judging by how busy it has been outside in the big hall, business seems to go just dandy for her. Still, even with how much is going on right now, Lisa doesn’t doubt that Blacksmith has made them wait on purpose, just because she can.

Len always has had a bad taste when it comes to women, and Lisa can’t even hold it against him as he tends to have the worst kind of luck when it comes to find anybody decent for himself. Well, that was at least the case before Barry got into the picture, and should her buffoon of a brother not end up messing this up for himself as well, she really believes that the both could do each other really good.

“What a pleasant surprise.” Blacksmith nearly purrs the words after she has taken a seat behind the mahogany desk, her eyes fixed on Len who stand in front of Lisa. Nothing in the way her brother presents himself belies the anger he has to be feeling as he watches the other woman with an indifferent expression.

“I haven’t expected you to pay me a visit tonight, Lenny,” Blacksmith says, and Lisa really hates how full of shit this woman is. As if she really wouldn’t have known that Len would come over to make sure she doesn’t repeat the damn stunt she pulled today, and not to forget the fact that Carmen sent Kenneth after Barry.

“So your little boy-toy,” she goes on, and Lisa glances towards her brother who doesn’t react at all to these words, at least not outwardly. It is not hard to guess how infuriating these words have to be for him, not only because Blacksmith is calling Barry this but due to how Len is still in a crisis regarding his own sexual orientation. He is such an idiot, as if any of them would care if he is interested in guys.
Then again, the source for her brother’s troubles probably lays deeper than just not wanting to lose his face in front of his Rogues. She lived through the same horrible mess that had been their childhood, after all.

“I take it that he told you about me passing by at his store?” Blacksmith asks with an arched eyebrow and a smile that causes Lisa’s fist to itch.

Roscoe, who stand next to her, shoots her a brief look, and she shakes her head, telling him that she is alright. Well, as alright as one can be in this situation, anyway.

“Yes,” Len answers, voice low and cold.

“So he came running to you afterwards?” Blacksmith chuckles and leans back into her chair, clasping her hands in front of her on the desk as she does so. “I’m not surprised. He clearly is a scrawny little sissy-boy, after all.”

Lisa grits her teeth and glares at that bitch for insulting Barry like this.

“We had an agreement,” Len reminds her, not taking the bait. “You wouldn’t go after him if we get you the data, and we did.”

“We did,” she agrees with a shrug and considers Len with an intense look. “The data was useless, though.”

“Which doesn’t matter,” her brother cuts her off. “You wanted the data, we got it to you-”

“And then you suddenly seemed to have vanish off the fucking face of the earth!” Amunet hisses angrily, her gaze sharp and angry, and Lisa is reminded of what an instable psycho this woman can be. “You fucking disappeared and were nowhere to be found! You’ve any idea how this made me feel?!?”

Next to her other side, Lisa can feel Sam shift a bit, clearly uncomfortable to be pulled into this lover’s quarrel. She shoots him a glance before she looks over to Mick who is standing next to Len and isn’t at all surprised that the man looks mostly bored out of his mind. From all of them, their pyromaniac has had the least trouble to accept her brother’s decision to accept Blacksmith’s offer which was kind to be expected. Mick and Len may lock horns more often than not, but he usually has no problems to follow along with one of his schemes, especially when he can burn things while they are at it.

“We had a deal, Amunet,” Len reminds Blacksmith firmly, seemingly not at all unsettled by her sudden outburst. “You can’t expect us to work with someone whose word we can’t trust.”

This catches the woman off-guard as she stills for a moment, watching Len with a surprised and calculating look as if she was trying to valuate his words.

“You’ve decided to join me.” It’s not a question, and Lisa is surprised to see a deep frown appear on the other woman’s forehead. She has assumed Blacksmith would be elated about this.

Len stays quiet but gives her a slight nod.

“How did you decide that?” she asks then with a scowl and clenches her fists. “That disgusting ugly little maggot?! Are you really telling me that you’re joining me because you want to protect some paedophile who fucked his own nephew?!”

“Does it matter?” Len replies coldly, and while he doesn’t show his anger over these words, Lisa knows how much they have to irk him.

Blacksmith hisses at Len, like an actual snake, and the intensity of her glare would have set him on fire if something like this was possible.

The fury quickly vanishes from her face again, though, and a much more collected expression returns to it instead as she studies him again.

“He really means something to you,” she states quietly after a long moment of strained silence, and Lisa doesn’t miss the ugly amusement that returns to the other woman’s dark eyes. “I’ve to say, I’m surprised, Lenny. In all these years I’ve known you now, I’d never even have assumed that you could enjoy fucking other men.” Her eyes move from Len to Mick, then to Roscoe before they set briefly on Sam, making it very obvious what she is suggesting by doing so.

“It would be better for you not to try and assume anything about me, then,” Len replies coldly.

The corner of Blacksmith’s lips twitch slightly as she turns her focus back to him. “You really are in a grumpy mood today, aren’t you, Lenny?” She leans back against her chair again and studies him with a look that is both amused and angry. “You’re quite protective of your little paedophile, and I think this is a good thing to know. Very valuable information for our future collaboration.”

Lisa doesn’t like how calm she sounds, it’s never good when that fury gets this calculating, especially when any of them is involved. Blacksmith is a bitch, but she has become the head of the gems’ black-market and someone to be reckoned with for a reason.

“Barry will stay out of this from now on,” Len states calmly but firmly. “The Rogues will work for you for now, but you, your henchmen, and Kenneth will keep your distance to him. If anything happens to him that gives me the slightest indication that anybody of you is involved, I will make sure that there is hell to pay for you.”

The amused expression vanishes from the dark haired woman and is replaced by a much darker, much angrier one once more. It is then that Lisa starts to expect her to lose her shit.

“You really would try to take us on, Lenny? For a prison bitch like that?” There is something audibly hurt in the way she says this and in how she watches Len then. “You would turn on me for that disgusting thing?”

Lisa feels how Roscoe tenses up next to her. She is pretty sure that he too waits for that nutcase to flip out on them which would inevitably lead to a lot of trouble for anybody who is currently present.

Nobody of them wants a fight, they would likely be able to get out, but Blacksmith’s men are numerous and not to be underestimated. She knows so from past clashes with them. She also knows that her brother has hoped that this could go over without a fight, but she wouldn’t be surprised if Blacksmith’s temper would foil any peaceful retreat on their side.

Len stays quiet, he just returns the woman’s hurt look coolly which in itself makes it more than clear where he stands on this.

Finally, after a long tense moment, Blacksmith purses her lips and nods. “Fine. You work for me, and your little whore won’t be harmed by any of my or Carmon’s man.”

This is somewhat unexpected as Lisa has not counted on her to see reason that easily. Blacksmith is usually not someone who gives up till she has gotten what she wants, and a big part of her doesn’t believe that this is the end of it, to be honest.
Still, Lisa relaxes a bit, and as she glances over to the other Rogues, she sees that they do so too. Roscoe, who notices her gaze on him, exchanges a brief look with her, and it is easy to see that he is also somewhat surprised about how they seemingly have just dodged a most likely literal bullet.

“I take your word for it.” Len doesn’t sound particularly relieved but some of the tension that has crept into his voice is no longer there.

Amunet waves him off, looking bitter for a moment before she schools her face in a calm and collected expression once more. “It looks like we both will get what we want out from this agreement, Lenny. No reason to make things more complicated by causing unnecessary tension between us.” Her eyes are still on Len, and Lisa doesn’t miss the longing and sadness that briefly flashes through them. For a second, she nearly feels bad for that woman as she herself knows from experience how painful unrequited love is. The sympathy only last for a brief moment, though.

“I’ll let you know when I’ve a job for you,” Blacksmith says, which is a hard to miss dismissal, and Lisa nearly heaves a sigh of relief. She knows how much worse all of this could have gone everything considered.

Her brother gives Blacksmith a nod and indicates the rest of them that it is time to move.

They do, and Lisa is just about to exit the room behind Mick when the head of the black-market speaks again, causing them to halt once more.

“I won’t forget this.” Her eyes are fixed on Len when Lisa turns to look back to her, and it is a bit unsettling how cold they are or how calm she sounds just then.

This is both a promise and a threat.

Len, who is still the closest to Blacksmith, returns her gaze without a change in his demeanor or expression. It is all show, though, as Lisa knows that this is just as worrying to him as it is to the rest of them. The other woman likely knows so as well.

Without replying or reacting any other way to the obvious threat, Len turns back to them and signalizes them to get moving again.

They do, and Lisa is certain that she isn’t the only one who thinks that it is much easier to breath the moment they’ve left Blacksmith’s office behind.

We finally met Amunet, a quite psychotic badass, and poor Barry, he really has the worst luck to have a run-in with her just the morning after finding Kenneth waiting in his apartment for him.

Next chapter will have a bit more Mick in it, so anybody who likes our favorite pyromaniac will hopefully enjoy it. ;)

A huge bear-hug for all my lovely readers for taking the time to give me feedback! It really always succeeds in making my day a bit better! :D

Beginning of November 3rd year

It is cold outside, enough so that Barry can see his breath turn into mist as he steps into the cool night air, shutting the door to the deserted farmhouse the Rogues are currently using as their hideout. He leans back against it and looks up to the dark sky, briefly taking in the stars he can see through the crack in the thick blanket of clouds. The tiny sources of light seem so much brighter out here on the land than they ever do inside the cities.

Barry lets his head drop back against the wood and inhales the cool air slowly, filling his lungs with it. He enjoys the slight prickling sensation this causes.

Then he notices the faint smell of smoke and looks over to the old silo about seventy feet away from where he stands. This late at night, shrouded in darkness, it looks rather spooky. Most of the area around here actually does, and he isn’t sure whether this is due to the mostly rundown state of the farm, or because he is simply a city-boy at heart.

Whatever the reason, from all the hideouts Barry has get to know over the last two years, this is about his least favourite so far. It isn’t exactly in as bad of a shape as one would think from how it looks outside, but there is some odd sense of desolation sticking to everywhere he goes here that doesn’t sit well with him and that has lacked his friends’ other hiding places so far.

Though, maybe he is a bit unfair as it’s possible that the glumness isn’t really due to the house or the area around it, but due to the whole messed up situation his friends are currently in.

A situation he is mostly responsible for…

The thought is daunting, and Barry forces himself to ignore it while he pushes himself slowly away from the door and start to make his way over the silo.

The wind that has picked up earlier this afternoon is getting stronger, quickly causing him to shiver due to how biting cold it is, but at the same time also enable him to picks up on the sound of music that must be coming from a radio. It seems to originate from the granary and his suspicion about finding Mick in there only confirms itself when the smell of smoke gets increasingly stronger.
Barry hopes that his friend is careful enough not to burn down the place by accident and make them short of another hideout. Hartley would not take kindly to that as the deserted farm house is one of his private ones. The ginger only shared its whereabouts with the others out of necessity as he usually prefers to keep at least a number of safe places to himself.

A strong gust of wind nearly causes Barry to lose his footing and fall just as a nearly deafening cracking sound can be heard from above his head. He turns his face toward the sky again, halting for a moment to study the dark clouds that foretell the coming of another storm.

It has been windy the whole last week and there is some speculation going on in the newspaper he has read that they could possibly end up with a tornado on their hands sometime during the next few days. Fortunately, nothing has happened so far, and he really hopes that it would stay that way because with everything else going on they seriously don’t need something like this to worry about as well.

Barry shake the uneasy notion off and proceeds to make his way over to the silo.

Light comes through the slit under the entrance, and it’s not exactly reassuring when he realizes that he is grateful that it isn’t smoke. He wonders how long Mick has been out here again as he pulls the door open with some difficulties due to the still ongoing wind. Behind it, there is a huge hall that has been used to store corn or other crops what must have been quite some time ago.

The music is much louder in here as it gets amplified by the tall walls of the mostly empty silo, but Barry doubts that Mick hasn’t notices him yet. Still, he makes an effort to not be quiet when he closes the door as he doesn’t want to startle the other man and cause him to use his gun on him by accident. Being burned crispy isn’t on the top of the list of things he wants to do tonight.

Despite the cool temperatures outside, Mick is wearing a simple white wife-beater, thus making it possible for anybody who passes by to view the ugly looking burn marks that are covering most of his arms, shoulders, and neck.

Barry fights the urge to shudder at the sight of it. He knows that the other man wouldn’t be bothered by it, but he still would feel bad for displaying his discomfort so plainly.

Mick’s back is turned to him, though, as he stashed empty boxes and other inflammable things in the middle of the wide room to a growing heap.

For a while, Barry just stands there quietly as he watches the other man work. It is slightly unsettling and a bit sad how meticulously Mick is about it, as if his friend is following an accurate plan he’s keeping stashed away in his mind.

There are dark and burned spots on the ground around where Mick’s newest hearth is currently taking form and which are signs that the Rogue has been rather busy already over the last couple of weeks.

Barry has been long enough around them to know that this is also the reason for increasing animosity between Mick and Len that has started to flicker up these days again. The later has never liked or really tolerated it when Mick is indulging in his little obsession too much, and his patience seems to have only grown thinner with everything else that is going on.

Barry’s gaze moves up towards the ceiling, where two big hutchers are open and showing part of the cloudy sky. This would avoid the silo to fill up with smoke and poison Mick, but it could also easily call people’s attention to their whereabouts, even this late at night, making Len’s worry very understandable.
“Has Prince Charming scared you away again?”

Mick’s question and obvious knowledge about his presence doesn’t surprise Barry. He is pretty sure that the other man has heard him enter a couple of minutes ago, even though he isn’t sure how he knows that it is him as he has kept his gaze on his piece of work so far.

“K-kind of,” he admits with a small smile and starts to walk over to him. “H-how d-did you kn-know it w-was m-me?”

Mick pushes a couple of broken wooden staffs in between the spaces of the boxes and other stuff he has rather skilfully stacked onto each other before he shoots him a smirk. “The others don’t like to hang around when I’m in one of my moods. Clever of them.”

Barry stops next to him and surveys the heap of wood.

“Th-this is qu-quite a l-lot of b-b-burning m-material,” he observes and turns to the other man with a concerned frown. “You aren’t w-worried th-that th-this c-could g-go out of h-hand?”

The pyromaniac snorts and shoots him a bemused look before he turns to walk over to where he has a couple of other boxes and crates stashed, probably for occasions like this. There, next to them, is also a bucket with ice and beer cans in it.

Barry follows him.

“Catch.” Mick throws him one of the cans, and Barry is able to catch it but unable to keep a grip on it as the impact causes a sharp pain to go through his hands and wrists, which in turn makes him let go of it again so that it drops to the concrete ground with an audible smack.

Mick frowns but thankfully doesn’t remark on it. Barry, whose face is feeling much too hot again, is grateful for it. The Rogues have picked up on how little he likes to talk about how messed up his body is and respect it.

Instead, his friend nods to the pile of wood that would soon literally go up in flames. “This’ just a spark, nothing to worry about. I know how to handle my love.”

Barry isn’t sure how to replay to that and feels his face grow warm when Mick gives him an amused and knowing look, clearly aware of the slight unease he is feeling. “You wanna stay and watch?”

It would most likely be a good idea to decline seeing that the other man isn’t exactly the most stable person when he is like this, and Barry knows how out of it he can get around open flames.

There is a morbidly curious part of him, though, that wants to keep around and watch it. The notion to go already back inside again is not exactly alluring either.

“C-could it b-be d-dangerous f-for m-me?” he asks, and he knows what stupid of a question it really is, but he is also aware of how capable Mick is when it comes to keep fire in check even if he usually prefers not to do so. Also, he doubts that the other man would actually harm him on purpose.

Mick seems amused by the question. He takes a swig of his can and shrugs.

“Depends, if you jump into the flames it most likely won’t end well for you,” he explains and turns around to grab a canister that has been resting next to the bucket of water so far. He also takes the air filter mask that has been resting on top of it.

“T-tt-I’m not going to lit you on fire, though, if that is what you’re worried about,” Mick goes on as he makes his way back over the soon to be hearth. As he stops in front of it, he glances back to him over his shoulder. “At least as long as you don’t try to extinct my pretty flames, Allen.”

The look he gives him then it both amused and a warning, and Barry feels a shiver run down his spine which the other man doesn’t miss.

Mick barks a laugh and turns to dose the heap of wood with the fuel. “No need to wet yourself. I’m just saying, and we both know that you’re clever enough not to mess with me.”

The other man shoots him a smirk before he turns back to his task at hand. Barry is pretty sure that he is doing this just to mess with him. Well, it works.

“You wanna have the honour?” Mick asks after he has finished soaking most of the heap in fuel and walks back over to him. He stashes the now empty canister to its earlier place and pulls a box of matches out of his pants pocket which he then offers to him. He doesn’t seem surprised or annoyed when Barry takes a step back and quietly shakes his head.

“Your loss, buddy.” He shrugs as he puts the mask and nods to the boxes close to the wall. “Takes a seat and get comfy, you’re in for a rather lovely show.”

With that, Mick walks halfway towards the heap and grabs one of the matches. He turns back to him and lifts his eyebrows as if to ask him why he hasn’t taken a seat yet. Not really feeling like arguing, Barry plays along while he silently hopes that this isn’t going to turn into a disaster for either of them.

After watching him sit down, Mick finally lights the match up and snips it to the heap in one single movement. The fuel soaked wood immediately catches fire, and Barry gasps when a nearly smothering heat is suddenly exploding in front of him. He squeezes his eyes shut and lifts his arm to shield them from the bright assault.

This has been a stupid idea.

Len is going to lose it…

And Mick is much too close to the flames!

“M-Mick, c-come b-back, y-you s-stand t-too c-close!” Barry squints to where the other man is standing in front of the blazing flames. It is close enough that it has to actually hurt him. Even so, the other man doesn’t seems bothered by the head in the slightest, and while Barry can hardly make his silhouette out due to how bright it is, he is certain that Mick doesn’t react to his words at all.

Most likely, he hasn’t even heard them.

Seeing that it wouldn’t make any sense to try and get Mick to bring some more distance between him and the fire, Barry ponders the notion to leave, as it is now nearly painfully hot in here. It is also quite frightening to be so close to a small inferno like this, and he is annoyed at himself for having agreed to something as stupid at this in the first place.

Unfortunately, opening the door would cause an increase in the air circulation in this tube-like silo, especially with how windy it is, and the increasing oxygen would boost the strength of the flames enough that he can’t be sure whether this couldn’t get dangerous for the other man. Mick stands too close to the heath as it is, and Barry doubts that he be able to get himself away from it should it flare up even more with how transfixed he is on the fire.

It isn’t as if Barry isn’t aware with Mick’s obsession, but seeing him like this, so out of control, is still outright disturbing and worrying.
In any case, where Barry is right now, is too close to the fire and after another look to the other man, he gets up and walks over to the door. There the heat is palpably less strong and much more tolerable.

He turns his attention back to the flames that are going strong thanks to all the kerosene, creating a ridiculous amount of heat. It would most likely also cause the wood to burn down within the next ten to fifteen minutes, though. He hopes so, at least.

It is quite spectacular to watch such a natural force from this close, and in a way it really does have something mesmerizing and quite beautiful to it, but Barry still decides that this is will be the first and last time that he would ever stay for such a show.

His gaze moves over to Mick again who is still completely entranced, and Barry doesn’t like how angrily red his skin is starting to look. It is out of question that this isn’t only due to the fire’s glow but because his friend currently underway to get some nasty second degree burns.

At least he is wearing his googles, Barry thinks and can’t help but snort when he realizes how silly this really is. He wishes he would have some too, though, as the smoke starts to irritate his eyes.

Pulling the collar of his shirt over his mouth and nose, he sits down onto the ground and waits for the fire to burn down.

It is about ten minutes later that the heath has used about all of its fuel, and Barry nearly groans in relief as this experience has been way too intense and quite a bit too frightening for his liking. Slowly, with some difficulties as his joints feel stiff and a bit painful from crouching at the floor for so long, he gets up and looks over to where is nothing left of the former heap of wood but ashes and a few charred parts. There is still thick black smoke rising from it, though.

After waiting a bit longer to make sure that he is steady on his feet again and for Mick to get a hold of himself, he slowly walks over to him. He notices how his friend is still watching the remains of the earlier heath rather attentively and how utterly relaxed his posture seems. Something else that immediately jumps to Barry’s attention is how angrily red Mick’s skin is on every area that hasn’t been covered and protected from the heat of the fire. He frowns when he notices that there are actual blisters forming on the other man’s cheeks and below his eyes.

“M-Mick?”

His friend hums in response but doesn’t look over to him. He sounds oddly serene, which makes the whole scene so much more bizarre.

“Y-you’re alright?”

It is a redundant question, Mick is anything but alright and this has become very apparent to Barry right now.

Against his expectation that the other man is still rather spell-bound by what is left of his earlier work, Mick looks over to him and chuckles.

“Peachy keen, buddy.” His attention turns back to the blackened ground and he smiles. “What did you think of the pretty little thing? She gave us quite the show, didn’t she?”

When Mick notices his uncertain and worried expression, he snorts but doesn’t seem insulted by his lack of agreement.

“Let’s grab a beer.” Without waiting for him, Mick walks back over where the crates and the bucket with the cans are standing. Barry follows him after giving the smouldering ground another uneasy glance.

“Here.” Mick hands Barry a beer as he joins him which he returns with a nod before he takes a seat opposite to him. The metal of the can feels warm in his hand, which isn’t surprising due to how hot it has gotten in here, and he startles slightly when a sudden chuckles cuts through the otherwise quite air.

Mick meets his eyes with an amused smirk and shrugs. “Yeah, you can’t keep shit cool around fire. No matter how much ice you stuff into a bucket, it will never be enough, and the beer will always taste like piss afterwards.”

Seeing that Barry doesn’t intend to drink it anyway, it isn’t really a problem for him. He just wants something in his hands as he still feels a bit nervous by what he has just seen, and as usual when he feels like this, the urge to scratch himself is quite strong.

“Y-you’re h-hurt,” he points out.

“’m fine.” Mick huffs a laugh and takes a swig from his can which causes him to pull a face. “Shit’s nasty like this.”

“You d-do h-have a s-s-suit th-that w-withs-stands r-ridiculous h-high t-temperature,” Barry reminds him with a frown. He knows that this hasn’t been the first time that Mick burned stuff up to satisfy his own urges, but he can’t help himself but feel a bit irked by how careless the other man is. “Wh-why d-didn’t y-you p-put it on?”

Mick takes another sip of his beer and eyes him with a bemused glint in his eyes. “You know, you can be fucking annoying for such a meek person.”

“I s-still h-have a p-point.”

The other man grins and turns to look back to the still smoking area.

“Maybe,” he agrees and pulls his goggles up so that they are resting on his forehead. This way, it becomes much more apparent how upset the skin around his eyes actually is. Despite this, Mick doesn’t look like he is even feeling it.

They fall silent for a while and, without the crackle of the fire or any other source of noise, the howling of the wind, which seems to have picked up even more over the last twenty minutes, fills the otherwise quiet hall.

“Snart’s going to have a fit when he finds out that you’ve stayed for one of my little episodes,” Mick points out, still sounding calm and in a surprisingly good mood.

Barry, who is watching the sky through the open hatches in the ceiling, shrugs. “Wh-when d-does L-Len n-not g-get w-worked o-over s-someth-thing. I’m n-no ch-child, h-he d-doesn’t n-need t-to w-worry s-so m-much.”

Mick hums, whether it is in agreement or only to indicate that he is listening, Barry isn’t sure of but when he glances to the criminal, he sees that he is grinning again. “He can be such a dick.”

Barry feels a bit guilty for smiling at this as Len means well. He is under a lot of pressure with Blacksmith and everything else going on, but he still makes it difficult to be around him at times.

Len really puts an effort into not letting his frustration out on him, though, and Barry can really appreciate it. It doesn’t make it any easier to be present when he is ready to bite anybody’s else head off at any moment, especially with how tensed up and frustrated all of the Rogues currently are.

This is also the reason why he took a break from the poker game that is going on in the kitchen of the farm house right now. Having Len and Lisa spit curses at each other isn’t exactly something he wants to be around to see.

“D-does h-he kn-know th-that y-you’re p-playing f-firebug in h-here?” Barry asks and pushes the uncomfortable thoughts away as he turns his attention back to Mick.

“What do you think?” The other man shoots him a look as if Barry was being silly on purpose. Then, he shrugs and looks up with slightly pinched expression. “He hasn’t stopped bitchin’ about it, but he isn’t stupid. He prefers it when I burn down some stuff in here instead of the shack.”

Barry’s alarmed look causes Mick to bark another laugh. “We’re all getting skittish with the fuck that’s going on, and we aren’t the most stable bunch to begin with. This is damage control on my part, and Snart knows it even if he doesn’t like it.”

“Y-you’ve s-started t-to f-fighting a l-lot,” Barry remarks after a brief moment of silence.

“Yeah, well, being stuck together with those jackasses all the damn time can do that to you.” Mick snorts and leans back against the wall. “We’ve to play according to that crazy bitch’s rules for now, and every one of us hates it.” He studies the can in his hand with a surprisingly sullen look as he goes on. “We also itch for a real heist.”

“Y-you d-did one j-just a c-couple of d-days ago,” Barry reminds him, but he knows what his friend means.

“It was a fucking joke.” Mick sneers and shoots him a dark look. “We were the distraction, nothing more. Being beaten up by those fucking speedsters so that others can get some data or whatnot isn’t what the Rogues do.”

There isn’t really anything Barry can say to that.

Due to the current deal Len struck with Blacksmith and the Blue Velvet, they are more or less their henchmen, and Barry knows that he hasn’t been the only one taken aback that Len would agree to this after how he was hell-bent on not doing so in the first place. While nobody has said anything about it to him, he is pretty sure that he is the actual reason for this and that the others know so as well.

Barry jumps slightly when the other man chuckles again and looks over to him with a somewhat wary expression.

“You’re an idiot,” Mick tells him. “Stop feeling so fucking guilty about everything. You think we could have kept up that stupid hide and seeks game with that nutcase for much longer as it was? We all knew from the get-go that we have to make a treaty with that cunt.” He shrugs. “Shit like this happens, bigger fishes come around and you have to swim with them for a while and buy your time before you can get rid of them again.”

Mick take another swig and grimaces.

“Y-you’ve had th-this k-kind of t-trouble b-before?” This isn’t completely new information to Barry, but he hasn’t thought that his friends would have had to deal with such a serious threat on a more regular basis.
It isn’t uncommon for criminals to lock horns with each other when they become big in a city, but he has always believed that the Rogues never had much of a problem holding their position in the twins, mostly because they are rather lenient towards other thugs on their turf as long as they stayed out of their way.

“Yeah, couple of times,” Mick agrees and has his gaze locked on the still smouldering area in front of them. “Comes with the job, there are always others who don’t like having competition around.”

Barry wonders what they are going to do about this, about Blacksmith and the Blue Velvet, because it is out of question that Len hasn’t already some kind a plan to get rid of them. He hasn’t asked him about it and he isn’t going to as he knows that Len prefers him not knowing and, in all honestly, he does so too.

The notion of an upcoming confrontation between his friends and Blacksmith, and the Blue Velvet doesn’t sit well with him, and he tries not to think about it too much. It makes it hard not to face the truth about who the Rogues actually are, no matter how much he tries to forget about it at times, and it is always a daunting realisation that causes him to feel both guilty and miserable.

He and Mick are startled out of their thoughts when the otherwise silent room it filled with the sound of the entrance door to the silo being pulled open.

“Yo! Here you are!” Axel greets and curses when the wind causes the door to smack into his back.

“What is it with this freaking weather?! The damn shack’s whistling from every angle like a cheap wind chime, and I’ll bet good money that that sad excuse of a roof won’t survive another storm. So much to Piper’s awesome super-secret boltholes. It’s a damn death-trap!”

Axel jogs over to them and grabs one of the crates to push it closer to Barry before sitting down. He looks over to the where the left-overs of Mick’s fire-pits are and shoots the other man a wary look.

“You aren’t going to kill us in our sleep by burning down the farm, are you? Hartley would be totally pissed.”

“A-Axel,” Barry starts with a sighs, but Mick cuts him off. “Nah, I don’t wanna have to hear him bitching my ears off in hell.”

Axel snorts at that and is about to reply something when he notices Barry’s warning look, which causes him to reconsider. Barry then turns to the other man next with a grim expression. “W-watch y-your l-language around h-him.”

“For fuck’s sake, Allen, he is a street-kid. Let me tell you from experience that words like fuck, shit, piss, dick, and cunt are not new to him.” Mick grunts while Axel is audibly cracking up.

“You s-still d-don’t n-need t-to use th-them around h-him,” Barry argues. “I’ve n-no p-problem w-with any of you using th-th-them w-when you are am-mong yours-selves, b-but h-he’s s-still a k-kid.”

Mick seems more amused than annoyed by this. “You do know how unlikely it’s for him to stay over here without overhearing one of these bad words, right?”

“Y-you c-could a-at l-least t-try.”

“You’re the one who’s bringing him over.”

Barry frowns but lets it rest after that, seeing that Mick does have a point here.
“Hey, he is also here, and he is not stupid, okay?” huffs Axel and gives them both the evil eye.

“You could have fooled me there, brat?” Mick snarks.

“Shut up, lobster-face!”

“A-Axel, y-you’re n-not m-making any p-points h-here,” Barry reminds him wearily.

“He started it!”

“Did you just come here to annoy us, brat, or is there an actual reason for it?” Mick asks, but it is easily to see that he isn’t bothered by the teen’s presence.

“Well, I didn’t come for your ugly mug, that’s for sure,” Axel grumbles which causes Barry to pinch the bridge of his nose in frustration. “A-Axel-”

“Yeah, right, sorry.” The kid huffs and crosses his arms in front of his chest in a defiant manner. “The others are playing poker, and they said I could join in for the next game if you play as well.”

His expression turns from stubborn to pleading when Barry hesitates to agree. “Come on, Barry, please! I won’t swear either, I promise!”

“What a compelling bargain,” Mick remarks and outright laughs when the kid flips him off.

“This wasn’t swearing!” Axel quickly points out before Barry can berate him for it. “And I won’t do this or any of the other stuff you don’t want me to do either if you come along. I promise!”

Barry rubs his eyes and sighs softly. He knows that he can’t really hold it against the boy, and he usually is much better when it comes to his manner, at least when he isn’t around the Rogues.

“F-fine,” he finally says. “B-but n-no c-cheating, alright?”

“What are you talking about?” Axel asks with a confused expression that is clearly fake. “I’m no cheat.”

“Like hell, you little shit.” Mick scoffs and gets up. “That’s the reason why we don’t want you to join, you’re even worse than Digger and Scudder together.”

“I’m not.” Axel grins. “I’ve no idea what you’re babbling about.”

“Y-you’re c-coming a-along?” Barry asks Mick as he stands up as well.

“Sure, I don’t wanna have Snart hunt me down for staying out here too long.”

“You did produce a lot of smoke,” Axel points out, and Barry doesn’t miss how he is eyeing the bucket with the cans of beer. “D-don’t even th-think ab-bout it.”

“I wasn’t thinking about it! Whatever it is you are referring to!” The boy glares at him before he stomps over to the door.

“Yeah, I’m sure he has no fucking clue.” Mick shoots him amused glance before they follow Axel outside.

Chapter End Notes
Hey my lovelies, hope you enjoyed the chapter! :)

I initially was thinking about cutting this part due to the flow of the story, but I decided against it in the end because I love Barry and his interaction with the Rogues, and he and Mick didn’t have much of an opportunity to share the spotlight so far.

Sorry if there are more errors than usual in it. I’m really quite busy and just now went over the story once again before uploading. I will probably turn back my uploading schedule for a bit after next week due to work and study being so very time consuming right now.

I feel really bad about it because I love to put this story out there, and I don’t like to make anybody who likes it to wait. I don’t want to upload a half-assed chapter just so that I get something up once a week, though, and there are other stories I want to update also at least every couple of weeks or so. I hope you guys can understand that.

Next chapter will re-introduce someone special, and something rather nice will happen to Barry for once.

Hope you’ll all have an amazing Christmas with your family and friends!

Much love and many hugs! :)

Chapter Summary

Barry gets a surprise at work.

Chapter Notes

The lovely Obsessed helped me to edit this chapter, so many thanks for your assistance, sweetheart! :)

Mid of November 3\textsuperscript{rd} year

Barry is restocking boxes of rice when the radio over at the counter turns static again. He stops briefly to glance in its direction and ponders the notion to try and get it back to work or let it be for now. Seeing that it is on a low volume anyway, and there are no customers around, he turns back to the shelf again just as the doorbell rings. Figures.

With a friendly smile on his lips, he turns to the entrance to greet whoever has just entered and freezes when someone suddenly flings their arms around him.

“Gramps!” Bart, who seems hell-bent on squeezing all the air out of him, broadly grins up at excitedly. “It’s so great to finally see you again! It’s been forever!”

Before Barry, who is both utterly taken aback and terrified by having the kid suddenly in his presence, is able to replay, Bart starts zipping through the store, looking around with curious eyes and not paying any heed to the fact that anybody who walks in through the door or is just close to the windowed front of the store would be able to see him.

“B-B-Bart-“

“Hey, I think that is broken!” The kid has gone from the sections with the sweets over to the counter in the blink of an eye and is now frowning down at the old radio in his hands. He tries to get it to work again by turning the dial in every direction, and Barry isn’t in the least bit surprised when the boy suddenly has the knob in his hand as the old thing certainly hasn’t been made to be used by people with super speed.

“Oops…” Bart shoots him a worried glance before he quickly puts the radio back down and zips back over to him. “The sign on the door says that the store is open from Monday to Saturday. Do you work here every day?” the kid asks, but once again doesn’t give him any time to answer when he goes on with a frown as he looks around. “There are no customers around. Is it always this empty? Is it because it is still early? There haven’t been many people in this area when I’ve run over. Isn’t that boring? Do you get bored when there are no customers around? What are you doing when you are bored? I love to play video games, but Max nearly never lets me which is totally mean and unfair because it isn’t my fault I’m not good in school. Do you like video games? I definitely have to show you my collection! Maybe you could come over—"

“B-Bart,” Barry cuts him off when it becomes apparent that the kid would just go on and on should he let him. “P-please, c-could y-you c-calm d-down f-for j-just a s-s-second?”

Bart does stop but an odd expression crosses his face, a mixture of surprise, worry, anger, and so many more emotions that he isn’t quick enough to pick up on.

“Why do you stammer?”

The question catches Barry off-guard, and for a moment he can just look at the boy without being able to come up with an actual answer. Then the shame hits him, and he remembers what Jay has told him, that the kid thought that he is still a hero. Barry has to be quite different from what Bart has expected to find here. The notion of this child being his supposed grandson still is a bit uneasy in a way, which in turn makes him feel guilty all over again as it is most likely not Bart’s fault that he has been stranded in the wrong time or wrong dimension and has to deal with this wrong version of his grandfather.

“Not that it’s bad! I mean, it is cool! Well, not cool, but it’s okay!” the boy adds hastily, as he seems to have picked up that his former question has made Barry uncomfortable. “There’s nothing wrong with it, many people stammer, and I don’t have a problem with it!”

Bart is obviously trying to make him feel better, and while Barry still is afraid that his presence could have severe consequences for himself, he can’t help but feel touched by the notion that the boy really cares about him that much without actually knowing him.

Bart gives him a grateful smile in return, but Barry doesn’t miss the guilty way in which he keeps looking at him.

“Wh-what are you d-doing h-here?” A brief glance to the clock over the entrance causes Barry to frown. “D-don’t you h-have s-school t-today?”

The kid, who doesn’t seem able to stand still as it is, starts visibly to fidget even more and suddenly seems reluctant to meet his eyes.

“Kind of but, you see, I thought that I could spent the day with you instead,” Bart explains a bit reluctantly and shoots him a hopeful glance. “I haven’t really seen you at all so far, and I just want to talk to you a bit. I’ll totally go back to school tomorrow—I promise—and I’ve never skipped it before, well other than when it was for Titan business…”

He trails off and shrugs.

This is going to cause him so much trouble, just having the kid here at all, Barry is certain of it. Still, at the same time, he feels bad for Bart and wonders how hard it has to be for him, sent back into a past that isn’t even his, away from anybody he knows. It is understandable that he would want to seek him out, this shouldn’t be such a big surprise for him, but the sad truth is that Barry has spent hardly any thought on the child. After Jay told him that he is staying with Max, he had been sure that this was it for them, that they would never let him see the boy again. He didn’t consider the possibility that that Bart could take matters in his own hands.

“B-Bart, I unders-stand th-that you w-want t-to m-meet m-me b-but th-this c-could g-get b-both of us in t-trouble—”
“No! Nobody will realize that I’ve skipped school and came here! I promise, I don’t want to cause you problems, grandpa! Their doing a trip to the museum today, and Mrs Nolan won’t call Max till after it, and till then I am home again, and I will just tell him that I went to the mall!”

If Barry has ever heard a faulty plan it would be this one, and he wants to point out to Bart that there is no way of him knowing that his teacher hasn’t already contacted Max about his absence, but the boy looks up at him such pleading eyes, like this means the world to him. He knows that there probably won’t be another time for both of them to see each other, at least till Bart is of age should he stay around for that long, and even though it is painful to look at him and know that this could have been his and Iris grandson should things not have turned out so horribly, there is also a part of him who does want to get to know him a little better.

It is very unlikely that another opportunity like this would arise again anytime soon, they wouldn’t allow it and just thinking about this causes Barry to feel so damn angry and sad, and, mostly of all, helpless again.

“I’m at work, B-Bart, you c-can s-stay f-for n-now if you d-don’t c-cause any t-trouble-”

“I promise! I promise! Awesome!!!”

Barry flinches due to how loud Bart is and is glad that no customers are around right now.

“C-calm d-down p-please,” he tells him but has to smile over how happy the boy seems by this. It is unexpectedly nice to have someone react so blatantly delighted about him being around.

“You c-can s-stay f-for t-two h-hours, sh-should y-your g-guardian n-not h-have sh-shown up t-till th-then, w-we w-will c-call h-him.” He quickly lifts his hand to indicate Bart to stay quiet when it is obvious that he is about to protest, and Barry gives him a stern look. “M-Max w-will w-worry if h-he d-doesn’t k-know w-where you are and th-this w-would b-be a r-really th-thoughtl-less and m-mean th-thing t-to d-do.”

It stays unmentioned that it is unlikely that the older speedster wouldn’t choose this as one of the first locations to look for the boy.

After considering this for a second, Bart seems to have made up his mind and nods in agreement. It isn’t to miss that he isn’t all that happy about the compromise, but his dimmed mood vanishes nearly immediately again much to Barry’s relief. The kid starts to pelt him with questions instead.

The next hour flies by much quicker than Barry has expected. A couple of people passing by, but generally it is a very slow morning, so he can spend most of the time concentrating on Bart, who reminds him a little bit of the energizer bunny as he doesn’t seem to slow down at all. It is nice to have him around, though, and while the kid keeps forgetting that it isn’t a good idea to show his powers in a public place like this, he obviously tries to not do so, and Barry can appreciate that. While he has lost his connection to the speed force nearly a decade ago, he can still remember all too well how difficult it can be to stay in this slow pace that is normal for any ordinary human. The speed force is a very alluring thing, constantly calling to all of them, and it has to be even worse for someone as young as Bart, who seems to be a very energetic child as it is.

Barry smiles and looks up from his spot at the floor where he is currently retightening the screws of one of the shelves that has started to wiggle a few days ago. Bart has been a real help emptying it beforehand, even though he kept muttering that he could do so within a second without anybody noticing if he was allowed to use his speed. Still, he seems quite proud when Barry commended him
The boy’s questions have been numerous and never really followed much of an order. He asks him about one thing, waits for his answer, and tells him his own point of view on this matter before he jumps to whatever crosses his mind next. Barry’s initial fear that he would ask about Iris or what happened to him hasn’t come true so far, as Bart mostly kept to very simple things like his hobbies, things he likes and dislikes, and work. He is obviously mostly interested in getting to know him a bit.

“H-hazelnut and p-pistachio.” The disgusted face Bart pulls in response causes Barry to chuckle, and he lifts an eyebrow in question. “You d-don’t l-like p-pist-tachio?”

“It’s green,” Bart tells him as if this would explain everything, and to a kid like him it most likely does.

“I-have you ever t-tried it?” he asks and his bemused smile grows when Bart gives him a look as if he was a bit slow.

“Says you.”

Barry chuckles and turns his attention back to the shelf.

“You l-like h-hazelnut, th-though?” He isn’t surprised when the kid quickly agrees.

“Of course,” Bart says, "Everybody likes hazelnut.”

It is funny how matter of fact he states this, and Barry has to think of Hal who would have probably eaten a living larva before taking a lick of hazelnut ice-cream. The thought of the other man has come up unexpectedly, and he quickly forces it away again before he can really start to think about his past friend.

“Even Tim likes it,” Bart points out, and by how he makes it sound it is obvious that he is still quite baffled by this fact.

“Is h-he a f-friend of yours?”

“Yeah, he’s Ro-” The kid cuts himself off, and Barry doesn’t miss the alarmed and guilty expression that crosses his face which in turn causes his stomach to sink.

A brief tense silence follows before Bart start to shuffle in palpable uneasy. It’s obvious that he feels bad about what he has nearly said. Barry is pretty certain that he knows now who this Tim is, as he himself had once been part of the superhero community and also had a young sidekick who, naturally, befriended the ones of his colleagues. Somehow, it is odd how some things seem to stay the same for different generations.

“I’m g-glad th-that you’ve m-made f-friends,” he tells him honestly. Bart shoots him a surprised look that quickly turns grateful before he grins and nods. “Yes, they’re great!” His smile slips off his face again, and he frowns slightly as he adds somewhat uncertain. “But… could you not tell Max about me telling you about them?”

“Of c-course,” Barry agrees. “B-but y-you’ve t-to b-be m-more c-caref-ful a-about th-this k-kind of th-things.”
“I am, honestly!” Bart protests and turns his gaze to the ground, suddenly looking rather morosely. “It’s just different with you.” He shrugs and starts to scowl unhappily. “It’s stupid that I have to keep secrets from you.”

Barry really doesn’t want to touch upon this, not with the kid, not at all. He watches Bart quietly for a moment before he hesitantly reaches out for him and gingerly touches his lower arm. He meets the boy’s surprised look with a small smile.

“You c-can s-still sh-share a l-lot of other th-things about yours-self w-with m-me. L-like, wh-which ice c-cream f-flavour is your f-favourite one?”

Briefly, Bart considers him with another slight frown before it vanishes and replaced by a genuine smile. He seems to have come to the same conclusion, for which Barry is quite glad as he would prefer the time they are able to spend together to be on a light and happy note. It is also not fair to Bart to burden him with his own problems.

The time to call Max arrives much too early to either of their liking, and while Barry has made it clear to Bart that he would call the older speedster two hours after his arrival, he lets an additional twenty minutes pass by before he finally brings himself to do so.

Bart’s sad expression with which he is standing close to him while he is making the call starts to lift again when nobody picks up at neither the landline nor at the mobile phone number he has provided him with.

“Something has probably come up,” the kid remarks with a shrug and wide grin when Barry finally puts the phone down again after calling each numbers two times and leaving a message at both the answering machine and the mobile box for Max.

Bart is most likely right; it could be very well the case that there has some business come up for the older man to attend to whether it be superhero related or not. With Max not expecting the kid to be anywhere else but at school, it will most likely take some time till he will pass by to pick him up. Barry’s worry about this development of things is cut short when Bart remarks on it being nearly noon.

“I’m hungry, do you want to eat lunch?”

As if on a cue a young mother with three small boys enters. It isn’t to miss what Bart thinks of that, and Barry smiles when the kid huffs quietly in annoyance. “It’s f-fine, you d-don’t h-have t-to w-wait f-for m-me.”

The boy insists on it though, and, as if this has somehow jinxed them, they have a steady flow of customers over the next two hours. While it isn’t really that busy, and Barry could have eaten at the counter while keeping an eye on the people in the store, he thinks it would be something impolite to do and waits for their unexpected pick up in business to end again. He tells Bart a number of times that he could take his lunch in the small backroom he himself sometimes uses for his breaks when Mrs Ming is around to take over for him, but the kid insists on waiting, even though it is obvious that he is growing rather hungry.

“H-here.” Bart, who has stayed at the counter while Barry has helped an older woman with picking out ripe kiwi fruits, turns his gaze from the section with the sweets to look back to him and lifts his eyebrows when he spots the apple that is offered to him. The sceptical way he studies it causes Barry to chuckle as it remembers him quite a lot of Axel, and he wonders whether this dislike for anything healthy is something every teen has by default.
“You’re h-hungry, aren’t you?” he asks with a kind smile and puts the fruit down on the counter in front of the boy.

“But it’s an apple,” Bart points out and gives him a look as if he had just been insulted.

“No, it is fruit,” the kid corrects morosely, and causes Barry to laugh out loud.

“P-please t-tell m-me you are act-tually eating f-fruits and v-vegetables,” he asks amused, which causes Bart to huff and glower darkly at the apple as he nods.

“Of course, Max always cooks things with lots and lots of disgusting green in it. Like broccoli or carrots!” The face the boy makes, makes his dislike for anything edible grown by Mother Nature rather obvious, and Barry suddenly feels quite some sympathy for the older speedster and his task to get his charge to eat anything other than sweets or fast food.

Any further discussion on the topic is stopped when the old woman, whom he has helped with the kiwi fruits, turns up at the counter to pay. She is one of the talk-active ones, and Barry spends the next ten minutes listening patiently to her telling him about her two kids who are somewhere in Europe, and her little dogs at home who are most certainly worried about her not having returned yet. Seeing that there aren’t any more customers around or anything else he has to take care of, Barry doesn’t mind it, as she is a very friendly but obviously lonely person and it doesn’t hurt him to lend her an ear for a bit.

Next to him, he can feel Bart start to grow more and more restless, and is rather glad when the old woman finally takes her leave as he is worried that the kid will do something that could give him away by accident.

The apple is gone when he finally turns to Bart again, and he can’t say that he is surprised. He is pretty sure Bart would have started to gnaw on the counter should this have taken any longer. Feeling a bit guilty about it, he decides that he would let the kid pick a sweet after their lunch as a treat for his patience, something he sometimes does to reward Axel when he has been helping him or behaved especially good.

“Can we eat now, please?” Bart asks pleadingly and sighs in relief when Barry nods in agreement.

As nobody else is around to keep an eye on the store, they stay at the counter. It doesn’t seem to bother the boy at all who is already putting out his lunch in front of him, which seems to have taken up most of his backpack’s space. There are a number of nutrition bars next to one container with pasta, another one with sandwiches and another one containing mostly chopped vegetables and fruits. The last one is only acknowledged with a very brief glance before Bart pushes it the furthest away from the rest.

Barry can’t help but be amused by the childlike display, and he wonders how old the kid actually is. He hasn’t asked him so far but guesses that he would be around twelve, maybe close to thirteen, but in any case not too far behind Axel.

It is a bit unexpected when Bart goes for one of the bars at first as they don’t look all that appetizing, even to Barry.

“They are supposed to take care of the worst of my hunger when I’m starved,” Bart explains when he notices his curious expression. “They have like 4000 calories each, and I can enjoy the other food much more this way.” Bart points to the container with the pasta and grins.
“I love spaghetti with meatballs,” he tells him excitedly, and Barry doesn’t miss how he actually start to bob up and down a bit in excitement of the meal. It is quite adorable, and he has to smile. “Then enjoy your meal.”

With another bright grin, Bart does just that, and it doesn’t even take him a blink of an eye before two of the three bars are gone, and he starts with the pasta. It seems that the bars have done their trick as he does eat the dish in a much slower pace, at least for a speedster.

Bart does just that, and it doesn’t even take him a blink of an eye before two of the three bars are gone, and he starts with the pasta. It seems that the bars have done their trick as he does eat the dish in a much slower pace, at least for a speedster.

Barry gets his own backpack from below the counter and takes out his own box with his packed lunch as well as his thermos bottle with tea. He doesn’t miss the curious way in which Bart keeps watching him, or how he starts to frown slightly when there isn’t anything else added to the one single container.

When the kid actually gasps as he opens the lid to give view to a simple ham and cheese sandwich and a couple of slices of raw carrot, Barry chuckles and turns to him with a smile. “You don’t know that I don’t have to eat that much anymore, right?”

Bart doesn’t look convinced.

“Th-that’s a very generous offer from you but I’m really fine with my lunch.” It is endearing to Barry how willingly Bart seems share his food with him, but at the same time he wonders what the boy actually knows about him if he isn’t even aware that he doesn’t need that much nutrition anymore. Probably not a lot, seeing that he is probably like a sour spot nobody wants to touch upon in the superhero community, and most of Bart’s questions are most likely fall on deaf ears.

“You sure you don’t need to eat more?” Barry turns his attention back to the boy and is a bit surprised by the question. “Yes, why do you ask?”

For a long moment, Bart doesn’t answer and instead studies him with a wary expression Barry doesn’t particularly like. Finally, the kid just shrugs and turns back to his pasta while glancing uneasily at him. “It’s nothing.”

This seems very unlikely, and Barry has the uncomfortable feeling that he knows what this is about. Over the last couple of months, despite everything that is currently going on in his life, he has been able to gain a few pounds. He is quite proud of it, but he is also aware that this likely makes not much of a difference to his appearance just yet, and Bart has undoubtedly notices how thin he is.

Despite not really being all that hungry anymore thanks to this uneasy realisation, Barry picks up his sandwich and starts to eat.

“Did Max prepare the food for you?” Barry asks after another minute went by in strained silence between them. Bart immediately relaxes a bit and nod with a relieved look on his face. “Yes, he usually does, and he is really good... well aside from all the vegetables he usually uses to spoils all the food with.”

A dark look is directed upon the container with the chopped greens then, and Barry feels his mood lift a bit again as he watches the kid. It really seems like it can’t be easy to get him to eat healthy.

“Vegetables are good for you, B-Bart.”

“Yeah, I know but... they are disgusting.”
Barry chuckles at the disgruntled face Bart makes and reaches for one of the raw carrot slices in his own box. After throwing a quick glance to the door to make sure that nobody is about to enter, he adds. “Th-they also h-help you w-with b-being a b-better h-hero.”

Frowning doubtfully at the orange slice of carrot, the boy still nods morosely. “I know, Max keeps telling me that as well…”

That he doesn’t believe this claim stays unspoken.

“Wh-what if I eat an ad-ditional one of y-your s-sandw-wiches and you eat s-six p-pieces o-of y-your v-vegies?” It isn’t really a fair offer as Bart wouldn’t really gain anything for it other than losing part of his meal to him, but Barry doesn’t want the green go to waste because the boy doesn’t like them.

“Okay,” Bart agrees readily, and catches him off-guard by how he doesn’t hesitate at all. He would have expected him to either protest or decline outright.

“But you have to eat also six pieces,” the kid goes on and frowns when he looks over to the vegetables. “The paprika, okay?”

“You d-don’t l-like p-paprika?” Barry asks even though the answer is rather obvious.

“It is the most disgusting of them all,” Bart proclaims with an actual shudder.

Despite wanting to point out that paprika is one of the healthiest vegetables one could eat, Barry doesn’t, as he can still remember his own dislike for it quite well when he himself was just a child. He acquired a taste for it not before he was nearly out of his teens, and even then he preferred it cooked and in combination with something else, despite how he usually hadn’t been a picky eater at all.

“Alright,” he agrees and reaches for one slice of the red paprika. “B-but you add t-two s-slices of apple t-to yours.”

“What?! But I just ate a whole apple.” Bart whines and gives the veggies another reproachful look.

“D-did it r-really t-taste th-that b-bad?”

“... no,” Bart mutters and huffs. “It was alright, but I still prefer cookies or sweets.”

Barry chuckles and nods. “Okay, th-then, h-how is th-this, you eat all th-the v-vegetables and f-fruits other th-than th-the p-paprika and I’ll b-buy you a b-bag of c-cookies of your ch-choice in r-return?”

This causes Bart’s mood to immediately change for the better, and he doesn’t seem bothered at all by the prospect to have to eat all of the greens Max has chopped for him.

Instead, the food is suddenly gone, everything, including the pasta, most of the sandwiches expect for two, and all the sliced vegetables and fruits other than the paprika stripes. Barry knows that he should have seen this coming after offering the boy sweets in return of eating his meal, but he still feels a bit caught off-guard by it.

“Sorry,” Bart apologizes with a guilty look when he notices his frown. “I should have waited for you… Max always tells me that it’s impolite to eat so quickly, but you said I would get cookies and…”

He shrugs helplessly and gives him a sheepish grin.
Barry smiles slightly in return and is aware that this is pretty much on himself. “You can go and pick your cookies but you will eat them slowly.”

“Sure!”

It dawns on him, as he watches Bart zip over to the isle with the sweets, that he should have pointed out as well that he should keep to the ones under three dollars, but this would most likely be the only time for a long while before he could buy the boy anything again, and he decides to just let him pick the one he likes the most.

Bart returns with a bag of peanut butter cookies, and Barry cringes a bit when he realizes that those are the expensive ones. At least the kid would have a fond memory, and it is nice to see him so happy about the little present.

Barry takes another ten minutes before he is done with his food, and he feels uncomfortably stuffed afterwards, as he has eaten quite a bit more than he usually does. He declines the cookie Bart offers him and is glad when an older couple enters their shop to distract his mind from eating.

The afternoon picks up regarding their number of customers, but Bart is like a shadow, sticking to his side and using any moment they have to ask him things or tell him something about himself. Around four, business slows down again, and Barry, while knowing that this would come back and bite him later on when he has to buy food for himself, tells Bart to pick something else as a snack before they retreat behind the counter once more.

Another hour goes by with them talking and sharing the cookies the kid has chosen this time as well as the tea he has brought along from home. The feeling in his chest grows heavier and heavier the later it becomes as this means the time for them to say their goodbye is getting closer, and while he has been reluctant to let the boy stay in the morning, he knows by now that he is going to miss him very much. The notion that he wouldn’t be able to see him again is quite saddening.

It is five to five when the entrance to the store is opened and Max enters, a grim and concerned expression on his face that lifts as soon as his eyes fall upon Bart, who is currently helping Barry with labelling a box of canned fruits from the storeroom.

The other man walks over to them in a moderate pace even though he seems tensed up, and Barry doesn’t doubt that he wants to get the kid away from here as fast as possible.

“Max!” Bart looks excited when he notices the older man, at least till he remembers where he is and with whom. He becomes much more subdued after that.

Max stops in front of the counter and gives Barry a nod before turning his attention to the boy with a stern look on his face.

“Bart, we’ve talked about this. You can’t simply disappear without telling anybody. You know very well that this could mean that you are in grave danger, and if it weren’t for your grandfather’s call, I would have Jay and the others looking for you by now. Didn’t you consider what kind of trouble you would cause all of us by being so irresponsible? Let aside that you had school today as well. Your teacher was quite worried about you not turning up for your class excursion, and I had to explain to her that my charge seems to have decided to take the liberty to give himself a day off out of the blue without informing anybody about his whereabouts.”

Bart, who has started out meeting Max’s stern gaze stubbornly, seems to have more and more troubles doing so and starts to look guiltier and more crestfallen by the second. It is obvious that he hasn’t intended for causing anybody any sort of trouble, but that he has simply not thought this idea
Barry feels bad for the kid, even though he knows that Max has every right to scold him. Still, in some way it hasn’t been only Bart’s fault and while he wouldn’t point this out to the older man, he is pretty sure that he knows so as well. He tenses up when Max suddenly turns to him and immediately braces himself for any following allegation regarding his time with the boy, which he has hoped wouldn’t come but has still expected.

To his surprise, the older man doesn’t seem angry but actually grateful despite the grim expression he is still wearing.

“Thank you for the call. I probably would have feared for the worse if you haven’t told me that Bart is here. He can be quite a challenge at times, especially with how little he seems to take other people into regard of his little schemes.” Max turns back to Bart with a deep frown. “You’re under house arrest for the next month, no television and no games either-”

“What!? No!” The kid cries out clearly upset. “I’m sorry that I sneaked here without telling you, but you would just have forbidden it again!”

“Yes, and that you disregarded this doesn’t give you any points. You know why you are not supposed to see him-”

Again, Bart cuts Max off.

“This is wrong! I’ve told you already that my grandfather is a hero, he would never do such things! He is innocent! How can you believe that he would-”

“Enough, Bart!” The boy actually jumps due to how loud his guardian has momentarily gotten, but he is only taken aback for a second before he starts to glower angrily.

“No! You don’t want to hear me out! You never listen! You always tell me to be quiet and do as you say, but you are wrong! You’re supposed to be the heroes, but you are just as bad as the people we fight!”

“That is enough, we are not going to have this conversation here. We can talk about it at home-”

“You’re a liar! We aren’t going to talk! You’ll just send me up to my room again!”

Barry feels sick as he listens, sick and ashamed. It is odd, having someone defend him, especially a kid he knows next to nothing about, and it is unsettling to realize how much he really seems to mean to him, even though they have basically been nothing more than strangers until this morning.

“We will talk,” Max repeats firmly, and Barry is surprised to see actual regret in the older man’s eyes as he does so. He wonders whether anybody has ever taken the time to really listen to Bart. So far, he would have assumed so but maybe it hasn’t been the case. His alleged betrayal has been difficult for many people, he doesn’t doubt that he is still someone most of his former friends would prefer to forget about and having to deal with a child that comes from another universe where he has been a hero most likely hasn’t been easy to handle for anybody.

This notion is saddening, and seeing how Bart has grown agitated enough by now that he is actually visibly vibrating makes Barry feel even more sorry for him and guilty for actually being the cause for all of it.

“You’re a liar!” Bart cries furiously as he points an accusing finger at the other man while his eyes start to well up. “You’re all horrible people, and I hate you!”
Before Max has the opportunity to open his mouth again, the kid is gone, causing the magazines and fliers on the counter to litter the ground in front of it due to the draft of his movement.

For a brief moment, both he and Max keep staying there in a surprised and alarmed silence as neither of them has expected this kind of reaction. Barry stares after the boy, or at least in the direction he assumed he has left, and feels the urge to go look for him even though he knows that he wouldn’t be able to. His eyes move back to the older man, who has also turned back to him.

Max appears very tired all of a sudden, and he is studying him briefly with a guarded expression that causes Barry to grow increasingly nervous.

Would he accuse him of being responsible for this?

In a way he probably is.

“I’m sorry for the trouble Bart may has caused you. He’s a good child, but he has difficulties finding his spot in this time.” This is not what Barry had expected, and judging by how Max smiles faintly in amusement, it is plain on his face. The older man sighs and rubs a hand over his face before he meets his eyes again. “I have to go after him and make sure that he doesn’t get himself into any more trouble.”

Barry only nods, unsure why he actually tells him so in the first place.

“Did he break anything while he was here? I’ll compensate you for any damage in case he did.”

“N-no, h-he w-was a g-good k-kid. H-He h-help-ped m-me a l-l-lot.”

Something crosses Max’s face, a look Barry isn’t sure how to interpret, and it takes him a moment to realize that the other man hasn’t heard him speak with his stammer before now. They haven’t really been close back then, nothing like he and Jay were, but he has worked together with him a couple of times, and he has liked the older speedster well enough. Now he wishes he would just leave again because he feels like such a joke again.

Thankfully, Max doesn’t mention it and instead gives him a wry smile. “I’m glad to hear that. Thank you again for informing me about his whereabouts.”

Barry’s throat has closed up on him, and he only nods.

It is an immense relief when the speedster is gone a second later, just as quick as his young charge, and he is left behind, feeling confused and sad.

He closes his eyes and swallows around the lump in his throat while trying to take a deep and slow breaths to calm the tumult of emotions in his chest.

The ringing of the doorbell pulls him back into the presence much too soon. He puts a smile on as he opens his eyes to faces his next customer.

Chapter End Notes

I realized that I probably promised you too much by saying that this chapter would make Barry happy… at least in an outright way. I don’t know why, but in my memory it ended on a much happier note.
Maybe I’m just unable to write happy when it comes Singularity?

But despite the somewhat downer note it ended on, Bart’s re-introduction to Barry’s life is something very positive. :)

And Max returned as well! Yay, I love that older speedster so much and the sometimes wise mentor role he took up for Bart and Wally in the comics. He is coming up rather soon again, and you will learn a bit more of what happened that night when Iris died.

I’ve decided to change something in the upcoming part of the story (again) which means more re-writings, but I think this will benefit the flow and coherency of it. This will also slow down my updating-schedule in most likelihood, I don’t wanna bore you with that, it is just hard for me to estimate how quick I’m with rewriting due to everything else is going on, but I will try not to take too long. ;) The next couple of chapters are pretty much fine as they are, and thanks to my new beta Obsessed, the next one is already edited and prepared to go up. I will possibly still upload it the Sunday after next one, just to give me some more time for the one after that, but it could also be the following Sunday.

I’m really excited how the story is progressing and that we are actually reaching a more interesting part of the first half of Singularity. :3

Anyway, I rambled on for long enough!

I wish all of you a great day, and a Happy New Year in Advanced!

Cheers! <3

Barry watches Len quietly, feeling exhausted after the last day, and glad that he can be with him tonight.

Since the Rogues have started working for Blacksmith, something that still causes a heavy guilt settle in the pit of his stomach, they have been kept rather busy which in turn means that he has seen way less of Len and the others than he has grown used to over the last year.

Tonight, they don’t have another job to take care of, though, and judging by the dark circles under his eyes, Len is probably just as glad about this as he is.

They are both in the other man’s bed right now, Barry is resting on his side, the thick blanket pulled up to his shoulders, while Len is sitting with his back resting partly against a pillow, partly against the wall, reading some file he must have gotten from Blacksmith and which probably contains information about their next job.

Barry’s initial reluctance to share a bed with Len has waned over time, and by now he even finds comfort in being this close to him and in such a way that isn’t frightening to him despite its obvious intimacy.

Moments like this one are something he especially likes. They remind him of how it was when he still lived with Iris, when Iris…

He liked sharing a bed with Iris, being close to her. He was a big cuddler, he loved touching her, giving comfort and receiving it back that way. Having anybody close who loved him just as much as he did them was exciting, soothing, and just plain perfect.

It would have been, at least, if it hadn’t been for the sex. He was never any good at it, he never liked it, not really. He tried to, but he was a rather disappointing partner in this respect, he is well aware of it, and he was painfully aware even back then. Iris was kind to him about it, though. At least before everything in his life started to crumble under its own weight, and even then she was never really cruel just… frustrated.

Barry frowns and pushes that thoughts away. It makes him feel uncomfortable that his mind has suddenly decided to go down this path, someplace he tries to stay clear off as good as he can.
It is probably due to how tired he is, and due to Bart’s visit today at work.

Bart, who is the grandchild of another him and another Iris, from a world where not everything went wrong.

It is still so odd to think about it…

“What’s on your mind?”

The question comes out of nowhere, and Barry can’t help but tense up even though he knows it is just Len. He looks up to the other man who is currently studying him with a thoughtful expression.

“N-nothing,” he answers slowly, averting his eyes as he feels a familiar unease overcome him.

Len hums and keeps watching him but doesn’t press on.

Barry licks his lips nervously, pulling the blanket a bit closer around himself and wonders whether Len would understand what it has meant to him to share a day with a grandson that is supposed to be his own but isn’t.

“I… I had a v-visitor at th-the s-store t-today,” he finally explains somewhat reluctant. Len has enough to worry about as it is, he doesn’t want to burden him with this as well. He knows him, and he knows that he cares a lot about the people he holds close despite what his behaviour indicates at times.

Especially when it concerns him…

“A visitor?” There is a sharpness to Len’s tone, something aggressive and wary, and Barry quickly realizes that his wording may not have been the best considering everything is not going on right now.

“N-not s-someone b-bad,” he assures quickly and looks up at the other man again with a rather guilty expression. “B-Bart… m-my… th-the b-boy f-from th-the f-future… w-well, th-the f-future o-of an-another earth p-passed b-by at w-work.”

The tension eases away from Len’s shoulders as he relaxes again, studying him with a mixture of surprise and amusement.

“Right, your grandson from another dimension,” he agrees and smirks slightly. “I’m still not sure what to think about that, to be honest.”

“Y-yeah, m-me n-neither.” Barry nods and shifts a bit, so that he can face Len easier. He frowns. “It’s j-just s-so s-strange.”

Len lowers the folder he has still been holding and eyes him quietly for a moment.

“You want to talk about it?” he finally asks.

Barry bites his lower lip and shrugs half-heartedly.

“I’m n-not s-sure wh-what…” he breaks off and shudders, not sure why he feels so upset all of a sudden. He swallows and starts again slowly, not really meeting Len’s gaze as he speaks. “H-he s-skipped sch-school t-to v-visit m-me. H-he j-just w-wanted t-to g-get t-to kn-know m-me a b-bit b-b-better…” His eyes start to itch and he closes them, coughing slightly as his voice has started to sound a bit coarse. “He… h-he is a g-good k-kid. F-full of energ-gy and unab-ble t-to s-stand s-still f-for l-
Barry rolls onto his back and covers his eyes with a hand.

It hurts…

Thinking about Bart, about what a nice kid he is and how he really wanted to get to know him. How he went against his guardian’s order to visit him and…

“H-he j-just w-wanted t-to g-get t-to kn-know m-me a b-bit…” he whispers softly as warm tears start to run down the side of his face. “H-he w-was c-curious a-and… I…”

He breaks off again and presses his lips together, angry at the world at large for how messed up everything is.

Bart is a good kid, a really sweet one, and he would love to get to know him but today was probably the only chance he got for a long time before he would be able to see him again.

“H-he w-was ups-set b-because… wh-when M-Max, h-his g-guard-dian c-came t-to p-pick h-him u-up… h-he g-got s-so a-angry and… I… I th-think h-he f-feels l-lost and… h-he j-just w-wanted t-to g-get t-to kn-know m-me a a b-bit…” Barry squeezes his eyes shut, embarrassed for crying again, especially in front of Len.

The mattress shifts as the man next to him moves, and he shivers when he feels him lay down next to him, close enough that he can actually feel him.

Len touches his arm lightly, nearly hesitantly, and Barry nearly sobs as the pain in his chest briefly intensifies. “He sounds like a nice kid.”

Barry nods, eyes still covered by his own hand, and huffs a laugh. “H-he is… h-he sh-shared h-his l-lunch w-with m-me b-because he w-was w-worried th-that I’m s-so th-thin…”

“Smart kid,” Len remarks, and Barry has to chuckle, smiling despite himself.

The comfortable warmth that settles over him for a brief moment is gone much too soon again, though, and he sighs tiredly as he lets his hand slip from his face. He unhappily frowns up at the ceiling.

“Th-they w-won’t l-let m-me s-see h-him ag-again,” he explains quietly and talking hurts due to the lump in his throat. “I d-didn’t w-want h-him t-to s-stay at f-first b-because of th-the t-trouble th-this c-could cause me.” He still feels guilty and horrible over it. “H-he m-must b-b-e l-lonely and s-scared… and I h-hardly th-thought of h-him at all o-ove th-th-e l-last c-couple of m-months…”

“You had your fair share of things to worry about,” Len points out and gives his arm a light reassuring squeezes. “And you shouldn’t add this to the list. The kid is taken care of, and there is nothing more you can do for him right now.”

This isn’t exactly what Barry wants to hear, but even he knows that he couldn’t offer anything to Bart he wouldn’t get from Max as things stand right now. The boy has a much better life under the other speedster’s home as it is.

What could he really offer him after all?

“I d-don’t w-want h-him t-to s-start t-to h-hate m-me,” he explains quietly.
“He won’t,” Len replies, sounding so sure of it.

Barry really wishes that he is right.

The notion that there is family left for him, even if it wasn’t really his own, is so very comforting, and Bart really seemed to have liked him a lot.

“You’re a good person,” Len goes on and shifts a bit so that his head is resting on his pillow as he watches him. “Everyone who hasn’t their heads up their ass knows that as soon as they meet you. The boy is already aware of it, he worries about you, and there is no more obvious sign that you care for someone than that.”

The hand on his arm moves his shoulder before back down again, starting to caress him lightly. Barry can’t help but shiver slightly in response even though the feeling doesn’t make him uneasy but is surprisingly comforting. He meets Len’s eyes.

“Thank you,” he says quietly and reaches for the other man’s hand, covering it with his own.

Len smiles, lazily and easy, and Barry feels a familiar warmth settle in his chest, something that reminds him of home, of belonging somewhere, to someone.

This here, he thinks, is home.

“You know, I don’t wanna pest you or anything, but I haven’t eaten dinner yet, and I would give you my undying gratitude should you make me one of you amazing omelettes.”

“Now?” Barry can’t keep the incredulity out of his voice as he shoots Eddy a meaningful look. “It’s nearly one in the morning, Eddy, and I’m tired.”

His friend, who is climbing the stairs next to him, and who is just as drained to the bones as he is due to the unexpected rain shower that started shortly after they left Mrs. Ming’s store, shrugs and shoots him a broad grin. “So what? I came all the way over to your store to fetch you.”

“You told me you were in the area,” Barry points out and smiles when Eddy huffs and crosses his arms. “What’s more important to you, some stupid beauty-sleep or having your friend fed and looked after?”

This causes Barry to laugh as, even though the other man’s behaviour is ridiculous and somewhat annoying, he is mostly just joking around, and they both know it.

“I think I’ll have to live with this king of guilt, then.”

Eddy snorts reaches into his jacket pocket for his cigarettes. “Would you at least invite me in for a cup of coffee?”

Barry gives his friend a slightly exasperated glare and wonders why he has to be so difficult tonight because it has to be rather obvious how dead on his feet he feels by now.

It has been two days since Bart’s visit, and Barry hasn’t been able to catch much sleep as his mind has started to bother him again with all possible things he would preferably rather not think about the moment he was alone and has nothing left to distract himself with.

He is pretty sure that Eddy has picked up that something has happened and after failing to get him to open up in a normal way, he has now fallen back upon trying to annoy him into yielding and telling him what is going on.

Barry feels a bit bad about not wanting to tell his friend about what has happened, especially because he told Eddy already about Bart before, not all of it but something at least.

Since that night with Kenneth, their relationship has changed, though, and Barry isn’t sure what to make of it.

Or maybe change was not the right word, because Eddy insists on behaving as if nothing has happened at all, and Barry can’t bring himself to try and make his friend talk about what is obviously an uneasy topic for him. He hasn’t missed how tensed the other man has been around him for the first couple of days after he saved his life and gave his secret away, and it has only been when Eddy realized that he wasn’t going to press him on that matter, that he started to behave really like himself again.

Even so, despite both of them pretending that nothing has changed and that night never happened, there is something uncomfortable looming around in the background whenever Barry is around Eddy these days. It isn’t like he is worried or wary of his friend, but he is uncertain how to deal with all of it. He knows Eddy means him no harm, but he wonders what the other man does whenever he leaves the city for a week or just vanishes for a couple of days.

Being a speedster means that someone can do a lot of harm, much more than most other people could, and he really doesn’t want his friend to get in trouble with Jay, Wally, or any of the other heroes. The notion alone that Eddy could also end up like he has is upsetting and troubling…

“W-would i-it k-kill y-you t-to w-wait t-till t-tomorrow m-m-morning?” Barry tries to fence the gloomy thoughts off that has started to creep back into his mind and turns to Eddy with an annoyed frown that is mostly fake.

“Yes.” The other man says this in such a serious tone that Barry can’t but chuckle. “You’re s-such a d-dork, y-you kn-know?”

“That’s what my charm is based on.”

“Wh-what ch-charm?”

“Don’t be like that, you’ve become addicted to my personality months ago,” Eddy declares with a smirk which is suddenly gone and replaced by a frown when he turns back to their floor they have just stepped onto. Barry, who notices his change in demeanour, follows his gaze and feels a mixture of slight annoyance and concern overcome him when he notices the person sitting in front of his door.

It has been a while since he has seen Evan last. The other man has used his flat as a temporary shelter a handful of time but stopped passing by a while ago. Barry has actually been a bit worried about him as he was a decent enough guest whenever he had been around and never tried something stupid. Seeing him sleeping in a sitting position in front of his flat is somewhat of a relief, but at the same time it doesn’t really fill him with anything close to joy.

He hasn’t been joking to Eddy when he told him that he is tired, and he had never been able to sleep well with Evan around.

As if on a cue, Barry watches how the resting man tenses up for a second before he lifts his head and blinks his bleary eyes a couple of times.
“Another one of your friends?” He looks over to Eddy, who is still looking at Evan with a not so amiable expression on his face. Barry isn't sure how to reply and only shrugs, which causes his friend to give him a slightly exasperate glare. “What is it with you and attracting crooked fellows?”

“You of all p-people sh-should kn-know th-that I’ve a t-talent f-for th-this,” he replies with a wry smile that causes Eddy to roll his eyes and snort. “Touché.”

“Bar’?”

They turn their attention back to Evan who is currently getting up while rubbing his eyes with one hand. Barry notices that he has a rather ugly looking bruise on the right side of his face which seem to be about a week old by its colouration. Again, he wonders what the man usually does with his time but reminds himself that this is none of his business.

“Sorry fur turn’ up lik’ this again bit Ah wid need a place tae bade fur th’ night. A wullnae cause ye ony trouble, ah wull juist kip oan th’ couch lik’ usual.” Evan sounds drowsy and slightly out of it as he speaks, and Barry notices how unstable he seems on his legs, as if he was drunk. That would just be perfect.

“What the fuck did that dude just say?” Eddy asks as he scrutinizes the other man with a frown. “It sounded like gibberish with some English words thrown into it.”

“Awa’ an’ bile yer heid, bahookie , yi'll waant trauchle?” Evan grouses, and it seems that he has just now realized that there is someone else around aside Barry. He gives Eddy a dirty glare, who in turn just looks puzzled.

“What?” His friend shoots him a confused and irked look. “Did that jackass just insult me?”

Barry doesn’t feel up to any of this and sighs quietly as he tries to decide what to do.

“Evan, are y-you d-drunk?” It is a blunt question, but why beat around the bush? He is not going to let the other man stay should he be intoxicated, and he is too tired to be patient right now.

“Na! Just tired, havn' gottn a lot o’ kip th' lest tae o’ days,” the Scot explains hastily, and Barry studies him carefully as he does so. He sounds a bit slurred and seems unsteady on his legs, but both of this could be very well symptoms of exhaustion, along with his bloodshot eyes.

Insomnia is no stranger to Barry either, and he knows how ugly it can get when you are gone with hardly any sleep for more than a couple of days.

“Are you kidding me?” Eddy meets his surprised look with an angry one. “That dude is most likely a rummy or a junky! Are you seriously considering letting him staying in your flat which, by the way, lacks any locks to your freaking bedroom? He could stab you in your sleep, you moron!”

“Pick a windae, yer leavin’!”

“Screw you, arsehole! Learn English before you try to get funny with me.”

Both men glare venomously at each other, and Barry is certain that he would have a fight at his hands should he not interfere. The notion to leave them to it and simply disappear into his flat is alluring but instead of doing so, he makes his way over to where Evan is still more leaning than actually standing against his door.

“B-both of you, b-be q-quiet, it’s l-late and th-there’re p-people t-trying t-to s-sleep.”
People being noise at night isn’t unusual in their apartment complex, but he still doesn’t like to be cause for such disturbances. Aside, he would go crazy should those mules start a fight right now.

“Y-you c-can s-stay, Evan, b-but only if you m-mind t-the r-rules, alright?” He gives the other man with a stern look as he comes up to him and steps towards the door to unlock it.

“O’ coorse,” Evan agrees readily and is obviously relieved by being allowed to spend the night somewhere else than on the street.

“Barry, what the fuck!? You let that bum stay? Seriously?!” Eddy gives him an utterly incredulous look, and Barry starts to feel a bit bad for how upset he sounds. He is just worried about him, after all.

“Eddy, h-he h-has s-slept on m-m-my c-couch b-before-”

“Good,” Eddy interrupts him sarcastically,” why not just give him another chance to cut your throat while you’re asleep?”

Barry groans softly as he pushes the door open and turns back to his friend with an exasperated look. “You w-want t-to s-stay over as w-well and k-keep an eye on h-him, b-be m-my g-guest, b-but I’m n-not w-wasting any m-more t-time I c-can u-use t-to g-get s-some s-sleep.”

Eddy meets his gaze with a dark glare, and while Barry hasn’t been sure what to expect, it is certainly not him nodding curtly and walking past him into his flat.

Barry thinks about pointing out of how ridiculous this is but decides against it because he does know that his friend’s has a valid point. Since the night in which Kenneth tried to kill him, there have been no more assassination attempts on him, most likely due to Len making the deal with Black, but even then it is rather reckless to let a man stay over whom he hardly knows.

“Sae... Ah kin bade?” Evan asks, and prompts Barry to turn his attention back to him. The Scot seems uncertain about whether it is really okay for him to enter or not and, somehow, this makes him appear much less like a threat.

“Yes,” Barry agrees tiredly and adds with a small smile. “B-but you a-and Eddy d-decide on y-your own wh-who g-gets th-the c-couch.”

Eddy doesn’t miss his words as he replies quickly from the inside of the flat before Evan can even open his mouth. “Already calling dibs on it!”

Late November 3rd year

It is close to eleven at night on Saturday, five days after Bart has visited him at Mrs Ming’s store, when Wally suddenly turns up in Barry’s flat, seemingly out of nowhere. He is wearing his Flash costume, and he is so charged up that the air around him is crackling due to the raw energy he emits.

For a brief moment, both of them are simply watching each other, Barry with wide eyes and a feeling of horror and dread, and Wally with an expression that gives nothing away. There is a sense of grim anger to him, though, something that doesn’t presage anything but trouble and pain.

Then, without any warning, Barry’s throat is in a painful strong grip as he is smashed against the wall hard enough that his back sears in pain and his breath is knocked out of him momentarily. His hands automatically reach up and try to pry the fingers away that make it nearly impossible to get any air into his lungs, but it is to no avail.

Wally isn’t playing around, he is furious, despite how utterly calm he appears on the outside, Barry can feel the anger and other dark emotions circulating underneath his skin.

“Listen to me,” the other man starts in a deep voice that sounds so very different to what Barry can remember the boy and later young man sounding like he took in as a child. It is like an actual stranger is standing in front of him, and this notion is so disheartening.

The hand around his throat momentarily tightens its grip, and Barry starts to see black spot dance across his vision before Wally allows him to take a breath again.

“Listen, because this is the only warning I’ll ever give you.” His nephew speaks quietly, but it couldn’t have been any more frightening if he had been yelling at him. “You’ll keep away from that little idiot, you’ll not let him get close to you again.”

The fingers start to dig into his neck painfully enough that Barry starts to tear up. Due to the white lenses it is impossible to make Wally’s eyes out, and he is glad for it as he is sure that he doesn’t want to see how the younger man is looking at him right now.

“He may still be too young to be able to grasp what you really are, but it doesn’t matter. I know, we all know, and if you think even just for a moment that you could do to him what you did to me, I’ll make sure that there is nothing left of you to put back into a cell.” Wally pulls him closer, so that Barry can actually feel his warm breath on his face as he lets his passive mask slip and scowls at him. “You aren’t going to hurt anybody anymore.”

The grip around his throat tightens again, worse than before, and he is certain that his nephew would kill him, that he would choke him to death.

There is so much he wants to say, so much he wants to asks. He just wants to understand what happened to Wally. He wants to apologize so badly for not protecting him, and, more than anything, he wants him to understand that he would have done anything to protect him and Iris, and that he is regretting nothing more than having failed at that.

His vision grows dark and bleary, and he realizes that he would never get the possibility to say any of this.

Then, the grip is gone, and Barry slumps to the ground, coughing and choking as he desperately inhales air into his burning lungs. The area where Wally has hold him feels sour to the touch and after taking his first couple of greedy breaths he gingerly lifts his head, despite how the adrenalin that is currently circulating through his body wants him to get up and get away from the other man.

There is no other man anymore, though, as he has half expected, and while he is flooded by an immense relief over it, it causes a choked sob to escape his lips as well. He tries to calm down, to tell himself that he should be used to this by now.

The problem is, he isn’t, though.

No matter how much times passes by, he seems unable to accept that Wally really hates him, and it is such a painful realisation time and time again.

The sound of the bathroom door being pushed open reaches him, and he glances over to it.

Axel stands there, eyes big with confusion and fear, and Barry is so grateful for the boy to have stayed in there during the brief visit Wally paid him. He knows that he has been ridiculously lucky that the boy had to use the bathroom just as his nephew decided pass by. Otherwise, he most likely would not be here anymore.

It’s a daunting notion.

Barry lets his head drop, so that his forehead is resting on the cool ground, and he tries to regain just a little bit of composure because Axel really doesn’t need to see him break down right now. He is probably freaked out enough by what he has just witnessed as it is.

Slowly, he presses himself up into a sitting position and rubs his hand over his face a couple of times before he turns to the young teen, who hasn’t moved from his spot by the bathroom door yet. He gives him a wry smile.

“S-s-sor-”

Talking turns out to be not a good idea. His throat flares up in pain, and he has a coughing fit that causes some of the tears to fall, he is desperately trying to hold back.

This seems to get Axel out of his stupor, as the kid quickly comes over to him. He stops close to him but doesn’t say anything. It is palpable that he is uncertain what to do or how to help.

Barry really feels bad for him having to be in this situation in the first place. It is his rotten luck that Axel would turn up tonight in front of his door because of another fight with his friends. Still, he knows how much worse this could have turned out. In that regard, he has gotten away very easy.

When the coughs finally stop, he doesn’t try to speak again. He isn’t sure whether his windpipe is hurt or not, he hopes it is just a bit sore, but he thinks it would be better to not to take a chance.

Instead, he tries to get back onto his feet, which works out better than he has expected. Axel keeps hovering close to him and looks like he wants to step closer and help him but doesn’t dare to. Barry is glad about it, he can’t have anybody touch him right now, not even the young teen. His skin feels much too small for him again and the urge to scratch at it is nearly overwhelmingly strong.

Trying to get his mind off of it, he meets Axel’s eyes and gives him another tentative and hopefully reassuring smile before he nods to the kitchen table. The boy hesitates for a moment before he finally nods in agreement, and they both make their way over to it.

While getting up hasn’t been such a challenge, it turns out that walking actually is, as Barry feels unsteady and slightly dizzy. Thus he lets himself drop onto the closest chair he reaches and presses both of his hands flat onto the table to try and stop the world around him from rocking so much.

“Do you want some water?” Axel asks in an unusual small voice. “I could get you a glass.”

Barry smiles again but doesn’t look over to the kid that is still standing next to him. He feels a bit sick and drinking something isn’t on top of his list of things to do right now. Still, he knows that Axel is quite upset by what has just occurred, and it would help him to do something and feel useful.

Thus, Barry nods wordlessly while he tries to keep his eyes focused on the spot between his hands and stop the dizziness from growing any worse.

It is unlikely for Wally to come back, but Barry feels unsettled and frightened by the notion of what would happen should he do just that and this time discover his guest all the same. He tentatively tries to swallow again and winces when the pain in his throat immediately flares up again.

“Shit, man...” Axel puts the glass of water down on the table next to him, and while Barry is still not moving his gaze, he can hear how upset he actually is.

“Shit, that… that was the Flash,” the boy goes on, and it would be hard to miss how he seems to have difficulties to wrap his mind around this. “He attacked you.”

Barry closes his eyes which isn’t a wise thing to do as the sensation of the world spinning around him starts to intensify immensely so that he has to open them again just after a few seconds.

“Why would he do that?” The boy sounds confused and while he tries not to let it on, there is also a slight note of fear in his voice that is quickly overshadowed by a mixture of annoyance and anger as he speaks again. “Isn’t that jackass supposed to be one of the good guys?”

There isn’t anything Barry can say right now to explain to Axel that Wally is one of the good guys, but that he had something really horrible happened to him and that he thought him responsible for it. He couldn’t tell the kid that or anybody else without making himself appear even more suspicious.

“You don’t look so good,” Axel remarks, and his anger is once again replaced by worry and uncertainty. “Do you want for me to look whether Mary is home?”

Eddy is currently out of the twins for a week or so, for some private business and this would only leave Mary or the Rogues for Axel to go to for help, and while the boy likes the later ones well enough, he obviously trusts the Romanian woman more.

Barry doesn’t like the notion to bother his friend this late at night, but he is really worried about being with Axel alone right now. By getting Mary to join them, there would be at least someone else around should Wally or anybody else turn up again.

“Okay, I’ll be back in no time, so don’t drop dead on me or anything,” the teen orders after Barry has agreed to his offer with another slight nod. Despite how crappy he feels he can’t help but smiles at that.

Tiredly, he lets himself slump down onto the table. The dizziness and sickness have waned a bit, and he tries to close his eyes once more as the brightness of the room causes his head to ache.

A soft touch to his shoulder startles him up with a frightened yelp in what seems like just a second later. Judging by how bleary his vision is and how groggy he feels, he must have nodded off while Axel was gone, though. It does take him any time to remember where he is or what has happened, and thus he is able to stop himself from freaking out even before he is able to focus enough to make Mary out next to him.

“Sorry for waking you, Bar,” she speaks in a soft voice and adds with a small apologizing smile. “I’m just worries that your back would have let you known about what it thinks of you falling asleep in this position otherwise.”

She has a point, not that Barry would have been mad at her in any way. It is in the middle of the night, and she most likely has already been sleeping judging by the pajama she is wearing. If anybody has a right to be annoyed, it is her.

“Axel told me that you have been strangled?” Barry meets her eyes in surprised that is quickly replaced by embarrassment, but before he can attempt to protest she hushes him with a worried frown. “It is alright, really. I’m glad he got me.” She studies his throat for a second and a pained expression settles over her face as she makes a small sympathetic and noise. She looks worried when she meets his eyes again. “Do you have troubles breathing?”

Not wanting to provoke another coughing fit, he only shakes his head in negation and watches how his friend relaxes a bit at that.

“Good.” Mary sounds relieved and gives him a comforting smile. “I’ll make you warm milk with honey, it will help your throat. Do you think you can get up on your own? It is probably better for you to lay down in your bed before you fall asleep on the table again.”

Aside from feeling very tired right now, Barry thinks that he will be fine. Well, other than for the pain in his back, but he is not going to point this out right now. At least, the dizziness is completely gone and his stomach feels only a little bit queasy anymore, so that he is able to get up without much trouble.

Axel follows him with some distance to his bedroom but stays back at the door and watches him quietly as he walks over to his bed. Barry wants to tell him that it is alright and that he doesn’t need to be worried or frightened. He feels so drowsy, though, and before he even realizes it, he has already clumsily drop onto the bed.

It only takes a couple of seconds for him to be fast asleep again.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you liked it!

I was thinking about posting this chapter next Sunday, but I got sick after New Year and had some time to go over some of my writings while resting in bed, so why the heck not. :) I always enjoy putting new chapters up as it is!

And we got a brief glimpse of Wally again, who was clearly not in the most happiest of moods. I feel so bad for the poor guy, he is still so scarred from what happened to him during his youth, and he is reminded of it every time he has to think of Barry. It kills him to think that Barry is out of prison again, and while he doesn't like Bart all that much, he doesn't want that the boy gets hurt. Btw, just in case anybody is curious, Wally went to therapy for a long while after Iris' death, he is just not good with dealing with what happened.

Also, Barry is seemingly unable to get a break. Poor guy, he definitely needs a lot of hugs now.

Till next time! <3
“What is the fedelho doing here again?” Marco grouses as soon as he spots Axel entering the room behind Barry and Sam. The Latin turns an annoyed gaze towards the blonde. “You have to bring him over every time you pass by now?”

“Because I’m so desperate about meeting your charming personality again.” Axel scoffs with a sneer which causes Marco to get up from his spot at the table in a rather threatening manner. A couple of the other Rogues snort and chuckle at the boy’s cheekiness, and Mick tells the Latin to sit down again with a smirk. “Leave the brat alone, Mardon. It’s entertaining to have him around.”

“About as entertaining as having a rash,” the Latin grunts and gives Axel another hard look before his attention is caught by something else. His studies Barry for a second and lifts an eyebrow. “You look like crap, Allen. And what is with the scarf, you caught yourself a cold?”

“Hehe, caught yourself a cold there, Barry?” James parrots, who sits next to Mick and opposite to Marco. He shoots Barry a wide grin. The other men groan in response, and Digger tells him to shut up.

“He sounds like crap.” Sam mentions as he makes his way over to the others and takes a seat next to the Australian. “S probably some bug that is going around right now.”

Mick reaches for his beer and studies Barry with a frown. “If I catch something from you, I’ll kick your ass for it. I don’t need the fuckin’ sniffles.”

“Oh shush it.” Lisa huffs from her spot on the couch and gives her teammate a rather dirty glare. “If he’s really sick, he’s probably feeling crappy enough without you being a total ass about it.”

“So, it’s fine for me to feel like crap just so he doesn’t?” Mick asks with a smirk and takes a sip of his beer before adding his wager for the round. “Don’t understand why he bothers to come over at all if he’s sick.”

“Because he likes us, and we make him feel better, nitwit,” James points out rather gleefully which earns him a glare from the taller man. “Call me a nitwit again, and I’ll shove this bottle down your throat.”

James shrinks back a bit and seems to decide that it is probably the best to heed the warning as he stays quiet.

Barry watches them absentmindedly, wondering whether it would be better to make up an excuse about not feeling too good and ask Sam to get him back to his flat. It has been stupid to come over, and he mostly did so because Mary has to attend to a customer today and Axel insisted on staying with him. This makes his own flat not to the best choice to be right now, especially after what has happened last night.

Wally’s surprise visit still has him very much on edge and unsettled. Maybe he could get Len to agree and let Axel stay here for a bit, just until tomorrow, when Mary could keep them company again.

“Don’t mind those imbeciles, honey.” Barry glances toward Lisa and needs a moment to realize what she is talking about. Her warm smile dims a bit when she picks up on how distracted he seems. “Are you alright?”

Before he can answer, Len’s voice beats him to it. “What happened now?”

The other man enters the big room that has formerly been for storing food below the farm house and meets Barry’s uncertain gaze with a frown. “Did somebody bother you again?” Len walks the few steps from the entrance up to him and studies him with a tight expression.

“N-no,” he protests and hates how hoarse he sounds. He coughs briefly before he goes on.

“I’ve j-just a s-small c-cold.”

Axel makes a small incredulous sounding noise, something that lays between a scoff and a grunt, which causes Len to look over to him. Barry shoots the young teen an annoyed and warning look but the kid huffs and defiantly crosses his arms in front of his chest.

“You want to add something, brat?” Len asks in a calm voice that still succeeds in sounding somewhat threatening.

“Wh-what’s th-there t-to add, I’ve c-caught m-mys-self a b-b-bug.” Barry can’t help but feel annoyed. He knows that he can’t be angry at Axel, the kid is simply concerned about him, but he has thought that he understood when he explained to him why it is a bad idea to bring his little run-in with the Flash up in front of the Rogues.

“You seem quite nervous for a fellow who has nothing to hide,” Mick remarks amused, and Barry notices that all the men at the table have paused their game to watch them for entertainment. He starts to really regret his decision to come over.

“I’m f-fine,” he insists.

“You don’t look fine,” Len argues with a grim look, and Barry doesn’t like how he is eying the scarf he is wearing.

“Len, for fuck’s sake, stop being such an annoying twerp.” Lisa huffs. “He’s sick. He’s feeling bad enough without you getting all creepy interrogator on him.”

“Be quiet-”
“Oh, shut up. Don’t you be quiet me, jackass, who the hell do you think-”

“It was the Flash.”

It is like a switch has been turned and everyone pauses for second after Axel cut Lisa off. Barry closes his eyes. He really should have stayed at home.

“What?” Sam is the one to break the nearly tangible silence and actually chuckles for a moment before the amusement wanes from his voice when he notices how grim Axel looks and how pale Barry has gotten. “Shit, fucking Red came after you?”

“No, it-,” Barry tries to protest but is startled badly enough that he cries out in protest when Len suddenly reaches for the scarf around his neck and pushes it down. He deflects the other man’s hand and backs away from him.

“D-don’t t-touch m-me!” He sounds furious for a second, then his throat protests due to the misuse and he has another coughing fit.

Len doesn’t touch him again. It takes Barry a minute till he is able to breathe more or less normal again, and he really dreads to but he lifts his slightly blurred gaze to meet the other man’s.

“You didn’t tell me you have trouble with the Flash.” There is an edge to Len’s voice, he is clearly angry about this, and Barry resigns himself to them having another argument coming up.

“Yeah,” Mick interjects and puts his cards down. He, like most of the others doesn’t seem particularly interested in the game anymore. “What business does someone like you have with that fucker?”

The suspicion is hard to miss as is the sudden animosity and wariness he sees on the other men’s faces.

He is an ex-cop. Even after everything that happened to him, this will never change, and they seem to remember this as well. It shouldn’t be surprising that they are suspicious, and it isn’t. It’s still dejecting, though.

“Hey, back off, jackass!” Axel hasn’t missed how the mood towards Barry has changed and doesn’t seem to like it at all. “The Flash attacked him! They weren’t buddy-buddy, okay?”

“Why the fuck would a speedster be interested in a disgraced ex-cop?” Marco wonders out loud, and while he studies Barry now with a scowl, he does seem conflicted about what to think.

“As far as I know, Red has never been interested in the sorts like him. The speedsters likes them even less than the rest of us,” he goes on, and it is painfully plain what he means by that.

Barry starts to cough again due to the lump that has started to form in his throat and irritates it as a result. His eyes are itching, and he turns away from the other as he doesn’t want to see how they are looking at him now. Like a potential enemy, a threat to be wary of.

Something dirty.

Gone is the sympathy they have held for him just a few minutes ago.

This shouldn’t hurt so much.

Of course this had to happen. Barry couldn’t have something good like this in his life.
He is such an idiot…

“The brat’s right, Mardon, you all should back the hell off!” Lisa shoots the Latin a dirty look as she gets up from the couch and walks over to where Barry and Len are still standing. She meets Barry’s surprised gaze with a wary but not hostile look.

“It’s alright,” she says in a soft and calming voice as she steps closer to him, and he seems about to back off. Slowly she lifts her hand and reaches for his scarf, all the while holding his gaze. “I’m not going to hurt you, Bar.”

He shudders when her fingertips touch his jaw briefly before she pushes the soft garment down to uncover the nasty looking mark from last night’s run-in with his nephew.

A small unhappy noise escapes her as she watches part of the damage that has been done to him, and Barry suddenly feels uncomfortably exposed. He can’t help but make a step back, so that she has to let go, and he is out of her reach. Lisa looks back up to him with a concerned expression. “What did you do to make this fucker so damn angry at you?”

“Red thinks he killed someone close to him.” Barry isn’t the only one who turns to Len in surprise.

“What the hell, Len?” Lisa frowns at her brother. “How do you know that?”

“Who the fuck cares about that,” Marco interrupts and he doesn’t seem to like this piece of information one bit. He scowls at Len before he nods over to Barry. “You knew that he’s a potential bait for that damn fuck all along?”

“Shut up, Mardon.” Len doesn’t raise his voice. He doesn’t need to. Barry is certain that he isn’t the only one who gets that this is not something the other man is willing to start an argument about and that he would make the person pay who tries to nonetheless.

There is an odd dynamic to this group. At times they seem close like friends, like drinking buddies, even like family. They laugh, fight and get pissed at each other but generally display a closeness in a way only people who know each other for ages are able to.

Then, at moments like this, the air between them shifts, and they become a gang of criminals again, dangerous and someone to be wary of. It doesn’t happen that often, at least not when Barry is around, but he always can feel the shift, it is like something makes click, and they are again the Rogues he fought so long ago.

Marco gets up with an angry scowl on his face, and Barry just knows that the other man will start a fight with Len over this.

“You’re so full of yourself, Snart. You know that this can come back and bite us in the ass! Right now we’ve more than enough to chew on thanks to you. We don’t need to worry about that pedófilo and his fucking baggage-”

“Shut your damn trap, Mardon,” Len cuts him off, and his aggression and anger are nearly palpable as he glares at Marco. “You keep yapping and bitching about how you don’t like our current situation, but as always you fail to come up with any solution to do something about it.”

“Vai-te lixar, Snart, seu maricas cobarde! You think you are so fucking tough, don’t you?!” Marco sneers, and he looks so tensed up, so full of suppressed anger that he reminds Barry of a viper that is ready to strike. “You’re in control, aren’t you, Len? You always are in control. You always have a plan for fucking everything! At least that’s what you tell yourself while you’re just as much out of your depth as the rest of us is, but you are too fucking much of a pussy to admit it. Instead you make us run loops and do tricks for Blacksmith as if we’re her fucking lapdogs! Just so that your precious little fuck-buddy doesn’t get hurt!”

Barry feels utterly mortified by what the other man has just said, but his embarrassment is replaced by alarm when Marco suddenly draws his weather wand. A couple of startled and angry yelps come from the other Rogues at the table who scramble to their feet and try to get distance between themselves and their friend.

Len is quicker than Marco, though, and a beam of bright white light passes Barry that is so cold that it seems to solidify the air around him for a moment and causes his skin to prickle uncomfortably.

Marco cries out in pain and let loose a string of very furious sounding words that Barry doesn’t understand but are most likely Portuguese swears. He feels horrified when he notices that the Rogues hand is covered in a thick layer of ice up to his elbow, as well as the wand that is held in his firm grip. That had to hurt like hell.

He turns to Len with a startled expression and can’t help but think that he hasn’t even noticed that the other man has the weapon with him.

Len doesn’t look in his direction. Instead, he makes his way over to the table behind which Marco has now dropped to his knees and is still hissing angry curses in his native language. The others have retreated a bit back and neither of them tries to stop him. They just seem intent on watching what is going on with a nervous grimness.

Barry jumps when someone grabs hold of his elbow and stops him. It is then that he realizes that he was about to follow Len over to Marco. Lisa meets his eyes with a serious expression and tells him to stay put.

“You don’t get between us if we have a beef with each other and need to take care of it,” she explains quietly and her grip briefly firms before she lets go of him again and looks back to her brother who has reached Marco by now.

“We’re in this together,” she goes on and doesn’t look nearly as alarmed as he thinks she should, considering what is currently going on. “We may not like it, Barry, but we all know that we’ve to be patient right now. Marco just needed to get some frustration off.” She snorts softly, and Barry notices how she briefly clenches her fists. “We all do, but he has the rotten luck of owning the infamous southern temperament, and he’s never been good at biting down on his anger instead of spewing it out.”

He frowns and looks back over to the two other man. They haven’t started trading punches yet, which in Marco’s case would have been difficult anyway but likely not impossible, and he is relieved and somewhat confused to see that Len has crouched down next to the other Rogue and is now speaking to him with a grim and intense expression on his face. Barry isn’t able to make out what the other man is saying but judging by how Marco glares furiously at Len, it is not something he likes to hear.

Then, to his utter surprise, the Latin’s expression becomes less hostile and angry, and the stiff line of his shoulders start to relax a bit. He still doesn’t look anything close to calm or happy but whatever Len is telling him seems to take the worst off his anger.

“Man, I thought they would start a brawl,” Axel says, and Barry realizes with a slight panic and guilt that he has briefly forgotten about the kid. Thus it takes him a couple of seconds before he notices how disappointed Axel actually sounds. Lisa seems to notice this as well, as she snorts in amusement and shoots the teenager a smirk. “Believe me, you don’t want those wankers to go after each other. They don’t give a fuck about collateral damage when they are in these kind of moods.”

“L-Lisa,” he croaks in frustration, and she winks at him in good humor. “It’s the stress, Bar, otherwise I’d have totally minded my language.”

He doubts that very much, and while he knows that she tries to get him to relax a bit, he doesn’t feel any less tired and miserable than just a minute ago. His gaze turns back to Len and Marco. The bad aftertaste of what has just happened still lingers strongly in the air around them, and he realizes that it would be for the best if he would make himself scarce. For a while, at least.

It has been reckless and stupid of him to come by today. Marco has been right, with Wally having regained some interest in him, it would be just a matter of time till he finds out about his relationship to the Rogues, and this wouldn’t end well for either of them.

As if he can hear his thought, Len looks over to him. A guarded expression on his face.

Barry realizes then, that he needs some fresh air.

It is about twenty minutes later that Len finds him next to the half rotten wooden stairs that lead up to the old farm house, watching the cloudy sky with a sombre look on his face. The air is cold and dry, but Barry is pretty sure that a storm would be come along within the next two hours. There is this tingling sensation all over his skin he usually gets before one.

Barry glances briefly to Len when he stops next to him. He isn’t sure whether he wants to talk right now.

With a soft and tired sigh, he pulls his legs a bit closer and lowers his head, so that his forehead is resting on his knees. He is sitting at the dirt ground as crouching is something he can hardly keep up for more than a few seconds due to his knees and hips, and while the stairs may have seemed like the better solution at first, he knows from experience that the wood is made up of nothing but splinters anymore.

“You found yourself a cozy spot.” Len finally says after he has studied the sky above them for a moment.

Barry snorts and hates how he feels more like crying than laughing. He takes a deep breath and looks up to him. “Th-there’s a l-lot m-more d-d-dirt around sh-should y-you w-want t-to j-join m-me.”

Len smirks and sits down next to him with a small grunt.

They fall silent after that, and Barry reaches for the ground with a hand and starts to circle his fingers across the dirt in an absent minded gesture. It feels cool and hard under his fingers.

“Marco’s been pissed for weeks.” Barry glances to Len next to him, who is not looking at him but over to where the silo is. He notices how grim his expression is once again.

“At me,” Len adds and meets his eye with a crooked smirk. “They’re all fed up with working for Amunet and they fault me for it.” He rubs a hand over his face before he takes a deep breath and exhales it slowly. “Not that they don’t have a point there.”

Len’s brown eyes seek his out again then. “Marco’s anger has nothing to do with you. You were just unlucky enough to give him a target to get rid of some of it.”

“Y-yeah…” A cool breeze picks up and Barry shivers slightly. He knows that Len is probably right and that Marco just needed to get some steam off. Unfortunately, he also knows that the Latin has had a very valid point.

“H-he’s r-right, th-though… I’m n-not s-safe t-to b-be ar-round y-you r-right n-now…”

Maybe not ever, for either of them. He doesn’t speak this part, though. Len most likely is well aware of it as it is.

His friend watches him with one of these unreadable looks he gets when he is pondering something that bothers him and he doesn’t really want to touch upon it.

“Yeah,” Len finally says. “He is.”

Despite what Barry has said before, it is still a bit unexpected to hear Len agree like this without trying to at least partly deny it. Then again, it is Len, and if this man is anything, it is someone who doesn’t beat around the bush.

Barry frowns and nods as he tries not to feels so damn disappointed and miserable.

“It doesn’t mean that we won’t see each other again,” Len tells him seriously. He has obviously picked up on his unhappy mood.

Not really feeling like talking and not sure that he even could with how his throat is closing up on him again, Barry simply nods quietly and turns his gaze to the dirt in front of him. He can feel the other man’s eyes on him and imagines what he has to look like to him. Usually, he tries not to think about his appearance, he knows how unattractive he is, but right now he can’t help it.

There is no reason for Len to want him around, he doesn’t bring anything to the table regarding the Rogues. He is an ex-cop, he has presumably done horrible crimes, and he is a very odd fellow to begin with due to his stammer and jumpiness.

Frustrated, he pushes his fingers through his hair and grits his teeth.

Why did Len let him stay around? He knows that he has been the Flash once, he can’t be not bothered by it, can he? Why hasn’t he said anything to the others so far?

Barry swallows and takes a deep breath. He feels once again how his skin starts to itch and seemingly becomes too small for him. It is such a disturbing feeling.

“For fuck’s sake,” Len sounds both concerned and exasperated, and meets his eyes with a frown. “We’ll take care of the business with Amunet, and then we’ll see what we can do about the Flash—”

“N-no! Y-you’ll n-not d-do anyth-thing ab-bout h-him,” Barry interrupts more alarmed than angry. “Y-you w-won’t h-hurt h-him, L-Len!”

For a second, Len seem about ready to punch something again. He doesn’t, though, and instead pinches the bridge of his nose before he exhales a humorless chuckle. “You know the rules, Red, no killing any damn speedsters. So stop being such an idiot.”

Barry frowns and looks away. “D-don’t c-call m-me th-that, L-Len. P-please.”

They fall silent again after that and for the next couple of minutes they sit together quietly in the sallow light of the cloudy afternoon.

“D-do y-you… d-do y-you r-regret…” The words are out of his mouth before Barry really is sure whether he wants to speak them. He can’t bring himself to finish the question, though.

What he is feeling right now, next to the hurt and uncertainty, is hard to grasp, even for him. Barry sighs softly and covers his eyes with one hand.

Len stays quiet, even though he thinks that he probably understands what he means, what he wanted to ask.

A touch to his wrist causes Barry to jump slightly, and he looks over to the man next to him.

“No,” Len says in a low and firm voice, and while he looks grim, there is also a clear warmth to the way he is watching him now. “I don’t.” The fingers, that loosely grasp his wrist, give it a slight squeeze. “I never have.”

After they have watched it other for a long moment, Barry nods slowly and turns back to the area in front of them. “Th-thank y-you.”

Len stays quiet, and they fall back into a more relaxed silence.

Chapter End Notes

Hope you enjoyed the chapter!

It is ending on a rather down note, and I hope you won't get too upset about Barry and Len being separated again. It won't last too long, though. ;)

The next two chapters will be a bit on the lighter side, we will get to see some more Axel and James, and after that we start with a part of the story I've been looking forward for a while now. ;)

Let me know what you think!

Till next time! <3
An Unexpected Kindness and One That Is Not

Chapter Summary

Barry hates being sick, especially when his recover seems to take forever. It helps him to realize something, though.

Chapter Notes

This chapter has been edited by my lovely beta Obsessed! Thank you for taking the time to do so despite your busy schedule, sweetheart! <3

Early December 3rd year

Max Mercury visits Barry on the first Saturday in December.

It is close to half past six in the afternoon and Barry initially thinks that it would be either Eddy or Mary passing for one of their check-ups on him now that he is trying to fight off the flu. He has been bedridden for the last couple of days due to being unlucky enough to get infected at work.

It hasn’t really come as a surprise to him due to the current flu epidemic that is going around and how he usually tends to catch about anything. He probably has caught it from one of their customers or many of the other sick people he has met while travelling to or from work.

Mrs. Ming has told him to not to worry and assured him that it would be fine for him to stay home. She sounded much more concerned about him having gotten sick than having him not around for the rest of the week. When he tried to assure her that he would be certainly able to come back to work on Friday, she told him no uncertain terms that she wants him to stay at home and in bed till at least next week.

“Jamie is around right now, anyway,” she added when he was about to protest. “He will be able to help me out till you are feeling better again, my dear. It is just a pity that you aren’t around, he actually told me that he was looking forward to seeing you again. You seem to have left a very good impression on him.”

The warmth was audible in her voice, and he remembered the Asian man whom he hadn’t really thought of a lot over the last couple of months.

Briefly, as he opens the door, he wonders whether he would maybe have the possibility to see his employer’s grandson sometime before he once again has to go for one of his many business trips. James seems to be a really nice guy as it is, and he doesn’t give off any vibes that cause him to feel wary around him, which hardly ever happens with other men.

All the thoughts of Mrs. Ming’s grandson are gone when his look falls upon his late afternoon visitor. A heavy feeling sets into his stomach, and he can’t fight off a slight panic that briefly grabs hold of him.

Wally’s visit comes to his mind, and he wonders whether Max has passed by to give him another reminder that he had no business to be around Bart, no matter that he didn’t chose so to begin with.

“Hallo, Barry,” the older man finally says after a rather tense moment of silence has passed between both of them during which Barry has just stared at his unexpected visitor with visible alarm. “I’m sorry for bothering you at this time, but I was hoping that we could talk?”

Max’s smile is clearly meant to be reassuring, as if he was trying to tell him that he is no threat. He wonders what the other man thinks, whether he has picked up on how nervous he is. It’s likely, he can feel how his palms become clammy as he starts to grow a bit sick again. “S-sure,” he answers quietly in a raspy voice and steps aside to make Max some room. He notices the frown with which the other man is studying him now and tries to ignore it.

Max walks into his living area far enough for Barry to close the door before he turns to him again. “I don’t want to bother you if you don’t feel well. I can come back another time.”

It is a bid odd, to think that the other man would care about this. Barry only shrugs and tells him that it is fine. “I-I j-just c-caught m-myself a b-bug.”

He smiles faintly before he makes his way back over to the table. Max follows him after a moment.

“Y-you w-want a c-cup of c-coffee or t-tea?” There is already a can of freshly prepared tea but it is mucolytic and rather bad tasting. He doesn’t think his guest would appreciate it.

“Thank you but you don’t need to bother,” Max tells him and nods to the tap. “A glass of water is fine.”

Barry nods, silently happy about his choice as it likely means that he doesn’t intend to stay long. He tells him to take a seat while he goes to fetch him his drink.

“Thanks.” Max accepts the water a minute later, and Barry takes a seat opposite to him. “Since when have you been sick?”

“C-couple o-of d-days.” It is a strange thing for the other man to ask, and Barry wonders whether this somehow could get him in trouble. “You’ve been staying home from work?”

This causes him to bristle slightly, and he shoots Max a wary look.

What is it to him? Why would he ask him about this?

Not knowing the other man’s motives makes him nervous, but he knows that he has Eddy and Mary who can attest to him having been home during the days he kept from work. The notion is a bit comforting, at least.

“Y-yes b-but I’ll b-be b-back on M-Mond-day.”

Max smiles at him, a strangely sad smile that fits the strangely sad expression in his eyes, and Barry realizes that he wants the other man gone. He doesn’t need his pity. His or anybody else’s. As if they have any right to pity him.

“I wasn’t trying to imply that I thought you are up to something,” Max explains. “I was just curious.”

Feeling angry and very uncomfortable all of a sudden, he only nods quietly and turns his gaze to the mug in front of him that holds his tea. As if on cue, a coughing fit overcomes him out of nowhere, and it takes the next minute to get his breathing under control again. He hates how his lungs are still burning, and while they are doing much better already, he knows that the persisting pain means that he should not go back to work in just another two days. He hopes that his health will make an unexpected leap of improvement when he stays in bed the whole day tomorrow and keeps drinking a lot of this disgusting tea.

When he looks over to Max again, he doesn’t like who the other man is studying him right now.

“That sounds rather bad. Have you seen a doctor?”

Barry fights down the urge to snort. It would be mean and uncalled for, and Max is obviously concerned about him. Why he would be is unclear to him, but he can appreciate the sentiment.

“I’m d-doing f-fine,” he insists even though his raspy voice betrays him.

Max frowns at him in a way he is sure is similar to how the older man looks at Bart when the boy is especially stubborn again and insisting on something that is obviously not true. The thought is somehow amusing despite everything.

“Is it because of the money?” Max makes it sound like a question, but Barry doesn’t doubt that he already knows the answer. All the faint humour he felt just a second ago is gone again without a trace.

“I’m d-d-doing f-fine,” he repeats curtly and tries to keep another coughing fit at bay.

“Barry,” starts Max. “If you need financial help you just need to say something.”

Barry realizes that he has started to grit his teeth when a sharp pain flashes through his jaw joints. He shoots the other man an angry glare and can’t help but hate him a little bit for telling him this to his face.

“T-t-to wh-whom?” He starts to cough again but is able to get it under control again before it can turn into another fit. His skin starts to itch due to how the other man is now watching him now. Like he is a sad excuse of a person you have to feel sorry for.

“To Jay or me,” Max replies. “I know that you probably think that you are on your own but-”

“I’m on m-my own,” he hisses and another cough overcomes him. He tries to fight it down again but fails and the burning sensation in his lungs causes his eyes to tear up.

It takes the urge to cough about a minute to subside again, and it leaves his chest and throat hurting and his temples throbbing. The lukewarm tea helps to relieve the pain a bit and, after taking a couple of small sips, he turns his gaze to his couch, as he doesn’t want to meet the other man’s eyes anymore.

Barry doesn’t understand why he is so angry all of a sudden, or why Max’s intent to help him bothers him so much. He really doesn’t care, to be honest, he just wants to lay down. It isn’t as if the other man meant anything but trouble, and now, once again unable to contact Len or any of the other Rogues, he is left unexpectedly vulnerable and lonely. Not that his friends would have been a particularly big help in this matter.

“I’m really sorry that you believe that,” Max says after another minute of tense silence has gone by between them. He sounds honest, and Barry has to stomp down on the urge to smile grimly because it would be disrespectful.
“It isn’t the case, though,” the older man goes on, and Barry closes his eyes tiredly, before he leans back against his chair. “You aren’t.”

“W-why h-have y-you c-come h-here, M-Max?” Barry cuts him off without looking at him, and he can feel the itching and burning sensation start at the back of his throat again. He isn’t patient enough right now to be polite. In a way, he thinks bitterly, politeness is worth a damn where he is right now, not with these people.

There isn’t a replay for a couple of moments, and he wonders whether Max is growing angry with him. It is then that he notices how little he is actually bothered by it. The exhaustion he feels right now has latched onto his bones, and he doesn’t care what the other man thinks of him, he just doesn’t want to listen to this nonsense anymore.

It hurts.

“You look tired,” Max remarks, and Barry once again doesn’t understand why he sounds so calm. He tries not to think about Wally’s last visit, but the memory is like a cold shadow that follows him around in the back of his mind.

“I think, it will be better for me to pass by another time, when you are feeling better.”

Barry swallows around the lump in his throat and nods. His eyes have started to itch, and he can’t bring himself to look over to Max. He suddenly feels so close to losing it again, and he really doesn’t want to embarrass himself in front of the older man.

Max hesitates briefly before he gets up. “Thank you for the water.” He sounds sincere as he thanks him, and there is still this note of concern in his voice that confuses and upsets Barry all the same.

“Y-you’re w-welc-come,” he says quietly and gets up to bring his guest to the door. He wishes he never came to begin with. The throbbing behind his temples has spread to his forehead, and he just wants to lay down again.

“Get some rest,” Max advices, and while Barry is still not meeting his eyes, he has the uncomfortable feeling that he is watching him now with a sombre and concerned expression.

“I-I w-will,” he croaks, and it is like a weight is lifted from him when the other man is finally gone again.

With a growing headache and a queasy feeling stomach, Barry decides that it is time to go to bed and lock the rest of the world out for tonight.

He goes to quickly brush his teeth, as he has been having a rather bad taste in his mouth due to his coughing for the whole afternoon already, and washes his face. The cool water feels good on his skin, and he scoops another handful of water onto his once again too warm forehead before he moves the still wet but cool hand to the back of his neck to cup it. A soft groan escapes him, and he feels his stomach sink due to the realization that he is running a fever again.

Barry is pretty sure that he can his former guest thank for it. The brief anger he feels over this quickly subsides again, and he is left feeling exhausted and pretty much embarrassed for how hostile he has been before. Max obviously hasn’t meant to make him feel uncomfortable but his concern has rubbed him the wrong way, similar to how it has been with Jay. Maybe more so, now that he is feeling like crap anyway.

The notion that these men could now bother to worry about him while they let him rot in the Heights is upsetting, and while he knows that it is stupid, on a level he cannot afford to indulge in, he doesn’t want to accept this sudden kindness either.

Why now?

With another soft groan, he rubs his still cool and moist hand over his face once more and straightens up to leave the bathroom.

Barry has just walked over to the kitchen table to pick up his mug of tea when there is another knocking at the door.

He isn’t sure why, but he isn’t all that surprised when he finds Max standing in front of it once more when he opens it a moment later. Briefly, he wonders whether he could have forgotten anything but seeing that the other man hasn’t brought anything with him other than his jacket, it is rather unlikely.

Then, he notices the white plastic bag in Max’s right hand and his stomach drops.

“Th-th-that’s n-not n-nec-c-” His voice breaks off when it grows too coarse, and he starts to cough again. His lungs hurt significantly worse than they have just about twenty minutes ago, and he can’t get rid of the feeling that he isn’t able to take deep enough breaths. It is like yesterday all over again, and he feels the sheer frustration that comes with this realisation nearly smothering him for a second.

“The epidemic that is going around right now has already gotten people in the hospital,” Max points out as soon as his coughing has subsided again. “Do you really want to take a chance on this turning into an outright pneumonia?”

Barry knows that he is right and rubs his forehead while he studies the half-visible drugstore logo on the white bag that is complete unfamiliar to him. He wonders where the other man has picked this up, and his skin starts to itch again at the notion that he could have zipped over to the other site of the twins with still enough time to spare to come back in the time he has been gone.

“I’ll p-pay y-you b-back,” he insists and meets Max’s eyes stubbornly. He knows that it would be idiotic to refuse the medicine, not just because he is worried about not being able to go back to work on Monday, but because he fears that this really could turn into something worse and more serious. Still, he is not going to be a freeloader, and he doesn’t want him to think so either.

“I know.”

This catches him off-guard, and his unhappy frown turns into an expression of surprise and uncertainty.

“You can pay me back when you have the money together,” Max goes on with a slight smile, and hands Barry the bag who accepts it somewhat gingerly. “I’ve got you a coughing syrup and something against the fever and your sinusitis as well as some vitamin pills. They can’t hurt around this time of the year, but the best medicine against the flu is still a lot of rest and hot liquids.”

Barry, still feeling somewhat dumbfounded, not sure how to repay this display of kindness.

The other man didn’t need to do this.

“Th-thank y-you,” he rasps quietly after a tense and somewhat uneasy moment passed between them. He glances down to the bag in his hands and tries to not feel so damn unsettled and touched by this.

“Of course.” There is this sadness again the way Max is looking at him, but Barry is no longer sure whether there is really also the pity present he thought he could make out so clearly before.
“Just catch some sleep and get better. I’ll pass by in a couple of days again.”

Again, Barry only nods quietly and watches Max leave. He stays there, at the open door for a bit longer before he closes it again and decides to make use of the medicine he has just received.

Barry finds out that trying to will yourself healthy is an entirely hopeless endeavor.

Monday comes and goes, and he is still sick. At least, his lungs start to stop hurting on Tuesday, and he is able to breathe without pain again and thus finally really catch up on some sleep.

Mrs. Ming is as understanding as before and tells him to just rest and get better. He is so damn glad to have her as an employer but can’t help but feel bad for forcing her grandson to give up his holiday to take care of his work.

“You keep making such an unhappy face and it will get stuck,” Eddy remarks as he inspects the soup that is currently cooking on the small stove in Barry’s kitchen.

The smell of it is nice and spicy, and he is curious about how it will taste even though he doesn’t feel particularly hungry.

“You are still looking like a sad clown, dude,” his friend points out after he has glanced over to him. “You sure that is the set of mood you wanna be in? You do know that it will speed up your recovery if you at least try not to be Johnny Rain Cloud, right?”

“I’m f-fine,” Barry grumbles and takes a sip from the cup of tea he has made himself before Eddy has come over a bit ago.

“Yeah, you look like life itself.”

Barry smiles slightly and decides that, while his friend can be quite a pain at times, it is good to have him around.

“Well, look at that, there seems to be still hope for you.” Eddy hits the spoon he has used to stir the soup against the edge of the pot with a soft cling and lays it down next to the heating plate. He turns down the heat a bit and walks over to the table to take a sit opposite to Barry.

“How is your head doing? Still feeling like something tries to burst its way out of it?” The other man only chuckles when he receives a clearly not amused glare in response.

“Come on, you’ve been miserable for days now. You’re already doing better, appreciate that,” Eddy advises with a smirk and takes a sip of his beer.

“I’m ap-preciating it,” Barry mutters before another light coughing fit suddenly takes hold of him and leaves him pretty much gasping for air afterwards. He notices the concerned way his friend is studying now.

“It’s f-f-fine,” he assures him, still somewhat out of breath and gets up to get the medicine Max brought over a couple of days ago.

“Stay put,” Eddy says as he gets up as well. “I’ll get it.”

Barry thinks about protesting but decides against it. He feels a bit lightheaded and weak on his legs, and actually appreciates his friend’s help.
“You know,” his friend starts as he comes back with the medicine. “You would likely be on your feet again and not in debt to that guy if you’d told me that you were not doing better. I would have grabbed you this stuff days ago.”

“I w-was d-doing b-better.”

“Like hell you were.” Eddy looks seriously annoyed for a second before he huffs and chuckles again. “Stubborn idiot.” He puts the bottles in front of Barry on the table.

“I get it,” he says and meets his eyes with a crooked smile that doesn’t seem all that happy. “I do, really. You don’t want those fucks to get involved with your life and cause you any more pain. It’s the smart thing to do, surprisingly so for you.”

His friend barks a laugh at his slight scowl and bumps his knuckles lightly against his shoulder. “I’m just speaking out of experience, Bar, and you know it.” His expression becomes more serious then. “Me and Mary are a completely different story, though, okay?”

“Y-yeah,” Barry agrees quietly and turns his gaze back to the mug in front of him. Meeting Eddy’s eyes is difficult, he doesn’t want the other man to think that he doesn’t believe him.

He does. Really.

The problem is just that he has to think of Len and the others, and how they are once again gone. They have hardly been good people or people it is healthy for him to be around, but they have allowed him to stay, similar to how Eddy and Mary allow him to stick around in their lives despite how messed up he is.

Now they are gone and while Len told him that he would see them again, it is hard for him to really believe it.

People usually leave, for one reason or another. He knows this, and it is a daunting thing to take place because it hurts every single time, no matter how much he tries to tell himself that it is to be expected.

“Hey,” Eddy interrupts his thoughts, and Barry looks up when he cups his shoulder, an unusual gesture for his friend to do, who usually isn’t much for touching either. “Enough with these long faces. My amazing soup will be done in about ten minutes, and I expect you to appreciate and enjoy it.”

Despite the heavy feeling in his chest, Barry smiles. “S-sure.”

“It will also help you with your flu. It is spicy enough to get your temperature up, makes you sweat all the nasty stuff right out of your body,” Eddy explains before he grins rather obnoxiously and adds. “Only drawback is that it burns both ways like a bitch.”

Barry pulls a face which causes his friend to laugh outright.

After a slight squeeze to his shoulder, Eddy pulls his hand back and makes his way over to the stove again to look after the soup. He grabs a spoon out of the drawer and tells Barry to catch it before he throws it to him.

“For your coughing syrup,” he says with a nod to one of the bottles in front of him.

“Th-thanks.” Barry smiles when Eddy winks at him and thinks about telling that his presence is probably helping a lot more than any the medicine in front of him ever could. It does sound rather cheesy even in his own head, though, and he fears that his friend wouldn’t appreciate the words, so he keeps quiet.

Later, after they ate, and Barry is sipping a glass of milk because the soup has been ridiculously hot, which amuses Eddy even though he doesn’t comment on it, they sit down on the couch.

With a full stomach, Barry can feel how the drowsiness catches up on him again, and he appreciates it when his friend makes him enough space that he can lay down with his knees tucked up. The spices of the soup are already doing their work as he feels uncomfortably hot and can feel how he breaks out in a light sweat once more.

“The magic of ginger and lots of pepper.” Eddy grins as he pulls out the familiar worn out package that holds his deck of cards they usually use to play Sixty-Six. He gets the cards out and starts to shuffle them. It is either that or smoking for the other man when he wants to have something to do with his hands during calm times like this one.

They fall in a companionable silence after that. It is nice having his friend around, and Barry feels how he starts to grow drowsy again. He is just about to nod off when he hears Eddy start to hum a low melody, and he forces his eyes open again, slightly frowning.

For the next few minutes he listens to the noise of the cards being shuffled around and watches his friend who keeps making small tricks with his deck. He starts to drift off in his own mind, and it takes him a moment to notice when Eddy starts to hum to himself.

An odd sensation starts to spread in Barry’s belly, and he feels how the back of his throat seems to swell up a bit while the familiar itching sensation of his eyes returns. It isn’t exact sadness that overcomes him, more like nostalgia and a nearly forgotten believed longing.

“Hey, you’re alright?” Barry blinks and turns back to Eddy, who has stopped to play with the cards and is now watching him with a concerned frown. “Is your head bothering you again?”

“No.” He coughs lights as his voice sound close to giving out again and quickly brushes his fingers over his eyes before he averts his gaze to the ceiling above them. “N-no… th-the m-melody y-you hum-med, d-do y-you kn-know it’s n-name?”

This question seems to catch Eddy off-guard, and he gives him an odd look before seems to consider it. After a moment, he shrugs and shakes his head.

“No, it is just something...” He breaks off and frowns again. Barry hesitates a bit before he slowly nods. “M-my m-mom used t-to h-hum it t-to m-me wh-when I g-got ups-set... I th-think.”

Eddy gives him a funny look and snorts. “You think?”

“I w-was v-very s-small, b-back th-then,” he explains and can’t help but sound defensive as he does so. He can’t even remember the face of his own mother, nor does he know her real name, and it unsettles him to this day.

Still, he can remember other things that nearly make up for it. The color and texture of her hair, how it felt under his fingers, her laugh and the sound of her humming this melody to him when he got upset. Most of all, he remembers her smell. Sometimes, not often, he smells it in his dreams, in the good ones. It is always calming and makes him feel safe.

“You lost your mother early?” This question causes Barry to freeze, and he keeps staring at the ceiling above him without answering. Eddy studies him now, he can feel it, and he regrets that he had to start this topic to begin with. He should have kept his mouth shut.
Now there are just going to be uncomfortable questions about things he doesn’t want to think of.

“I lost them early.” Surprised, Barry looks over to his friend who is watching him now with an unusual somber expression. “I don’t know the name of the melody, but it was hummed to me when I was also very small. I can’t remember by whom anymore, though.” Eddy gives him a faint smile that doesn’t reach his eyes and turns back to shuffle his cards. Barry lets his gaze move back to the ceiling, and he takes a deep breath before he exhales it slowly.

“I d-don’t kn-know m-my p-par-rents, n-not r-really… th-there are j-just b-bits and p-pieces of a m-man and a w-woman, b-but I’ve b-been v-very y-young w-when th-they… l-left.”

The shuffling of the cards stops and for a long moment they are both quiet.

“They left?”

Barry hums in agreement and closes his eyes. “I th-think s-so, at l-least everyb-b-body s-said s-so. Th-that d-day is k-k-kind of h-hazy in m-m-my m-mind.”

It has been raining, a lot, but it wasn’t cold. Cars has been driving by and a dog has been barking somewhere close. He has been confused and afraid, and then the old lady in the blue gown and the big glasses came and started to ask him questions he didn’t know any answers to. She called the police then and after that the memories become hazier and hazier.

“They abandoned you?” There is a mixture of disbelief and horror in Eddy’s voice as he asks that. Barry can’t help but think that that a man like his friend really shouldn’t be surprised by how life works at time. He shrugs and swallows around the lump in his throat.

“D-don’t kn-know f-for s-sure, I w-would r-rather th-think th-that it w-wasn’t l-like th-that bb-but… r-realit-ty c-can b-be r-rather h-harsh at t-times.”

It doesn’t surprise him that his eyelashes are wet when he brushes over them again. He doesn’t like to think about his parents or anything related to his childhood. He has been an idiot to touching upon this at all.

“Sorry, man,” Eddy says quietly, and he does really sound it. Barry feels how his throat closes up for a second, and he has to take a couple of deep breaths while he presses his palm over his eyes. Thankfully, the urge to cry passes just after a couple of moments.

“You should try to catch some shuteye,” his friend suggests somewhat hesitantly, and Barry can’t bring himself to look at him again.

“Y-yeah.” He agrees quietly and tries to think of nothing.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you enjoyed it!

I’ve to correct something I wrote after the last chapter, there will be another three chapters before the part of the story will start that I’ve been mentioning before. I kind of forgot two of the upcoming chapters the last time around.

The next one will have Mrs. Ming’s grandson James in it again, the one after that is another one with Max that will go a bit more into what happened the night Iris died, and the one after that is sorta about a family (?) dinner (and a bratty Axel :).

Till next time! <3

Chapter Notes

This chapter is now edited by the lovely Obsessed! Thanks for finding the time to go over it, sweetheart! <3

December 3rd year

“H-here’s y-your ch-change, M-Mrs. Donovan.”

“Thank you, Barry.” The old woman gives him a kind smile as she accepts the money. She is one of their regulars, a friend of Mrs. Ming, who is always friendly and polite towards him. “You have a nice day, my boy.”

“Y-you t-too, m-mam.”

She turns to the little dog next to her. “Come, Jake, let’s go home and make you a special treat for your birthday.”

The little pet that is most likely a senior in its own regard, has obviously no idea what she is talking about but still happily wags its tail and follows her out of the store.

Barry watches them go with a faint smile before he turns his attention to the other two customers that are currently present. Two teenager boys, a bit older than Axel, and he knows from experience that it is better to keep a close eye on them when they stick around as long as these two have so far.

It also isn’t a good sign that they keep glancing in his direction every other second as if to catch the right moment when he has his attention on something else.

“Hey.” The voice catches Barry completely off-guard, mostly because he has totally forgotten about James being around today.

He feels his face grow hot as soon as the yelp of surprise has left his mouth and his embarrassment only grows worse when he notices the amused looks of the teens who haven’t missed his reaction.

“Sorry, I didn’t mean to scare you.” James comes over from the doorway that leads to the back area of the store. He has been upstairs, visiting his grandmother for the last couple of hours as she is currently having another cold and is not feeling too well.
“It’s f-fine, I’m j-just w-way t-too j-jumpy.” Barry gives the other man a wry smile before he turns his attention back to the teenagers. Both don’t seem all too happy with him keeping supervising them so attentively, and one of them actually scowls at him.

The static of the radio, which has hardly been working at all today, gives way to the news and Barry picks up something about Lex Luthor’s president candidacy but doesn’t pay too much attention to it as he watches one of the teen’s pick up a pack of batteries for the third time within the last minute.

“Well!” This time it isn’t only Barry who is startled by James’ voice. “If you two decide to steal anything, you can be sure that you’ll spent the rest of today at the KCPD.”

Both teenagers eye James up for a moment. They seem to consider whether it is worth to try their luck or not but, other than Barry, James is obviously in good physical shape and most likely would be able to catch up with them should they try something stupid. James is also quite tall, nearly six feet by what Barry can tell, and while he doesn’t look outright threatening in any kind, he certainly isn’t someone people would want to pick fights with.

The teens seem to come to the same conclusions. After exchanging a brief look with each other, the one with the batteries, throws them back into the basket with the rest and shoots both of the adults a dirty glare before he and his friend leave.

“Nice fellows,” James remarks drily before he shoots him a grin and puts a bag onto the counter Barry hasn’t noticed him holding so far.

“Th-thank y-you.”

“No problem.” The other man takes out two elegant looking boxes. “I’ve been helping out at the store quite a lot when I was younger. I know what kind of problem those brats can be.”

He pushes one box over to Barry and hands him two chop sticks that look nothing like the cheap wooden ones he usually gets along with his food when he buys take-out. They are elegant looking, of a dark wood and with some delicate engravings at the top.

Before Barry has the chance to ask him what this is about, James explains with a slightly sheepish smile. “We still haven’t had the dinner I promised you.”

At his surprised and slightly alarmed look, the other man quickly goes on. “I mean, for helping me with laying the parquet floor in my apartment. I promised you dinner, remember?”

Not sure what else to do, as Barry does indeed remember, he only nods and turns his gaze to the two boxes which he recognizes now as Japanese bento boxes. “S-so y-you b-brought me l-lunch instead?”

Another sheepish smile crosses James’ lips, and he nods. “Yeah, I hope you don’t mind. I know that this comes kind of as a surprise, but I still can take you out for lunch or dinner.”

“N-no, th-that’s f-fine. Th-this is m-more th-than enough,” Barry assures him and can’t help but feel a bit uneasy by the notion that James could take him out to dinner to some probably rather fancy restaurant.

The idea of a homemade lunch is much more appealing to him, anyway, and it is nice to think that the other man actually put the effort into making something to eat for him.

James nods to the bento box in front of Barry. “I prepared it this morning, and while I’m no chef, I think that it turned out pretty nicely.” He gives him a rather pleased smile then, and Barry can help
It is made of a matt black material with red Chinese characters at its side and has smooth round edges. It is about eight inches long, four inches wide, and four inches in height, with a two-inch-wide band of red cloth wrapped around it, which also has a couple of characters stitched on. Barry tentatively touches it and shoots a questioning look to James.

“Open it,” the other man encourages as he pulls his own lunch closer but doesn’t open it yet as as he seemed much more interested in watching him.

After hesitating briefly, Barry does slips the red band off the lunch box before pulling the top part off which feels surprisingly smooth under to his touch.

Barry laughs in surprise when he sees what the other man has prepared and can’t but stare in wonder at the dish for a long moment.

The bottom of the box, or at least the first section as he assumes there is another one below, is covered by fresh green lettuce leaves on which a number of cute Onigiri has been put. They are mostly shaped in form of cat and bear heads, and are all smiling up at him, partly winking, partly making other funny faces, and Barry doesn’t miss the eye for detail the other man put into every single one of these little creations. In between the rice balls, there are small octopuses made of cut and fried sausages which also got funny and happy expressions, along with a number of vegetables, some boiled like broccoli and some raw like tomatoes and carrots.

It looks incredible, and he makes a small appreciating noise after he has taken everything in.

“Th-that l-looks amazing.” Barry shoots James an impressed look and chuckles when he notices that the other man seems to actually preen in pride for a moment at his praise. “D-did you p-prepare th-this all b-by y-yourself? Th-this h-had t-to t-take f-forever, n-not th-that it d-didn’t t-totally p-pay off.”

James shrugs but doesn’t seem able to get rid of the grin on his face. “Preparing this kind of Bento lunches is actually a hobby of mine. It helps me to relax.”

Barry hums in understanding. He imagines that, in a way, this is probably quite similar to him sketching when he wants to get his head free. Something you can do with your hands and, at the same time, be able to stop thinking and just let your mind calm down.

“There is actually a section below it as well,” James remarks. “You can just pull this one out.”

He does so and hums in appreciation once more when he sees that it holds a very appealing looking salad with shrimps, avocado, cocktail tomatoes, and cut cucumber. It looks delicious, and his stomach agrees with a low rumble that causes his cheeks flush in embarrassment.

James seems quite pleased by his reaction, though.

They stay behind the counter while eating lunch so that he can keep an eye on the store and take care of any customers passing by. Other than for a small group of construction workers that are currently redeveloping one of the older buildings close to the bus station that Barry uses every day, they are left to themselves for the next half an hour.

“Did you make onigiri yourself before?” James asks after they’ve talked a bit about how he created all the cutely shaped rice animals.

Barry, who is nibbling on one of the rice balls that look like the head of a Teddy bear, nods with a faint smile as he thinks back to his early adventures with Japanese cuisine. “Y-yes, b-but j-just s-simple ones, you know, the ones in form of triangles.”

Asian food has always been his favourite. He is by no mean a picky eater, as long as there is food on his plate, he will eat it, but if he had the choice, he would probably choose it over other cuisines more often than not.

“Did you prepare them with fillings?”

“No… well, once with smashed avocado but it didn’t turn out so well and…” Barry swallows and shrugs. He shoots the other man a nervous glance.

Prison has come more or less between him and trying to improve his skills to prepare onigiri with fillings, and while Iris always found them interesting and handy as she could simply pick the rice up without any extra utensils, she had been hardly around towards the end, and he just couldn’t bother to prepare them for himself.

“I like the sweet filling,” James says after an uncomfortable silence has settled between them for too long. “Like red bean-paste and such.” He is leaning against the counter with his hip while he holds the box in one hand and uses his chopsticks with the other. He is now watching him with a thoughtful gaze, and Barry wonders what he is thinking about.

“You ever tried some of those?” James asks.

“No.” He did try different kind of Japanese sweets when he was over there a couple of times for some superhero business, but he never had the opportunity to try this sweet. “I tried mochi, though.”

The twinkle is back in the other man’s eyes, and he smiles. “I love mochis. You’ve no idea how much I adore to have them for dessert.” He chuckles and eats another piece of avocado before he goes on. “If I had the possibility to choose, I would definitively want to be reincarnated as one.” He sounds so earnest when he says this that Barry has to snort in amusement, for which he gets a mock-glare in return. “You doubt the amazingness of mochi?”

Barry chuckles and rolls his eyes. “I wouldn’t dare.”

“You better not.” James nods with fake seriousness. “Mochis deserve their own religion, like the flying spaghetti-monster.”

Barry lifts an eyebrow at that but doesn’t disagree. He himself likes the idea of the flying spaghetti-monster and what it stands for. It came up shortly after he had gone to prison, and he just learned about it after his release. He briefly wonders what James’ stance on this point it but he decides against asking. Politics and religions are two topics he doesn’t like to discuss in general and especially not during a meal with someone he hardly knows.

“How’s your art coming along?”

Surprised, he turns his attention back to James. “You mean my sketching?”

“Yeah.”

Barry shrugs and picks up some of his salad. “Fine, I guess.”

He can feel the other man’s gaze on him now and keeps his own at the bento box on the counter. He hasn’t been aware that James knew of his little hobby. His grandmother probably told him about.
“You’re pretty good.” Barry shoots his current companion a wary look and isn’t sure how to respond. He settles on another shrug.

James is frowning, Barry doesn’t have to look over to him to know so. People generally react to him that way when he tries to block them from starting a conversation on a topic he doesn’t feel comfortable about and they don’t get why.

“Do you take commissions?” James asks out of the blue, which is another question that catches him off-guard.

“Wh-what?” Barry looks back to James with a frown. He starts to get a bit irked that the other man doesn’t let the topic rest and is uncertain whether he is making fun of him or not.

“You see,” James explains and puts his lunch box down on the counter before he pulls his wallet out. “Lao lao’s birthday is in a month, and I’d love to get her something special.”

Confused and curious, Barry watches how the other man picks a small photo out of his wallet. He studies it fondly for a moment before he hands it over to him. Barry accepts it and sees that it is a seemingly very old black and white picture of a woman in traditional looking Chinese dress with a man next to her, wearing a Chinese suit. They both look very young, maybe late teens or early twenties, and while the young man looks very serious, the woman doesn’t seem able to stop smiling.

“Th-this is y-your g-grandmother and… g-grandf-father?”

This is quite an unusual request.

“Wh-why d-don’t you s-scan it and increase it in s-size. I’m p-pretty s-sure th-that w-would l-l-look m-much b-better, J-James. I’m n-not a p-professional, and I f-fear th-that y-you th-think I’m m-much more t-talented th-than I r-really am.” Barry really doesn’t want to disappoint the other man or his grandmother. The thought alone makes him feel uncomfortable as both of them have been so nice to him.

“I’ve seen you sketch before,” James points out, seemingly undeterred. “You may not be a professional, but you’re very good, and if I really wanted to get it done by someone who does this for a living, I’d have gone to them in the first place. My grandmother likes you, though, she thinks a lot of you, and I’m sure it would mean much more to her should it come from you. No matter whether it is perfect or not.”

The notion that he really could mean so much to Mrs. Ming is touching. Barry knows that she likes him, and that he, in a way, probably is kind of a surrogate grandson as James isn’t around very often. Still, he sometimes has a hard time to really believe it.

“So,” James asks somewhat hesitant after Barry has studied the photo quietly for a long moment. “Are you interested in doing it? I’ll definitely pay you for your time-”

“N-no,” Barry interrupts him, and when he notices how his face falls, he quickly explains. “I m-mean, I’ll d-do th-the d-drawing b-but you d-don’t n-need to p-pay m-me. It w-will j-just b-be p-pencil, th-though, I’m n-not r-really g-good w-with anyth-thing else.”
There are a couple of pictures he did with acryl so far, and he likes them well enough, but he isn’t really used to that medium and for a black and white picture pencil would be a better choice, anyway.

“Barry, I want to pay you for the effort you’ll put into this picture. I may not draw or paint, but I can imagine that it’s quite a time-consuming process, and I don’t want you to invest your free time into this and get nothing in return.”

The frown is back on James’ face as he tells him so, it doesn’t seem to be due to annoyance, though. He seems concerned instead, and Barry doesn’t like this much either.

“Y-your g-grandmother h-has b-been v-very k-kind t-to m-me f-for th-the l-last e-couple of years, l-long b-before I f-found anyb-body else, and I’ll n-never f-forget th-that,” he explains. “If th-this p-picture m-makes h-her h-happy th-then th-that’s all th-the r-reward I n-need, th-there isn’t m-much else I c-can d-do f-for h-her, anyw-way.”

Barry doesn’t miss how the other man seems about to protest for a moment but, thankfully, he decided against it. Instead, he rubs his forehead and briefly studies him with a rather sombre expression before he smiles. “Then, the present will be from both of us, and I’ll bring over some more bentos, just to make sure that you are up to the task.”

“Y-yes, b-because d-drawing is s-such an exhausting end-deavour.” Barry smiles.

“Of course it is,” James agrees readily and nods to the photo. “You can keep it while you do the picture.”

“I’ll t-take g-good c-care of it.”

The other man returns Barry’s serious expression with a smile of his own.

“I know you will. Thank you.”

Chapter End Notes

Hope you guys liked it!

This is a comparably short chapter, I was thinking about putting this and the next one together, but it would have been over 10k words as the next chapter will be rather long, and I wanted to post you something this Sunday.

It is kind of an in-between chapter as it is on the shorter side and just focuses on James interacting with Barry, but James will get a bigger role as another supportive character in future, and I wanted to keep this part because it shows the beginning of it.

Next week will have Max return, and you’ll learn a bit more about what happened the night Iris died (and how the JLA handled the whole thing).

Till next Sunday! <3
Looking Back at It, I Would Much Rather Forget

Chapter Summary

Barry knows that the past is set in stone and that some things can’t be undone.

Chapter Notes

This chapter has been edited by my the amazing Obsessed! Thank you, sweetie, I know that you’re super busy right now, and you still found the time to help me with this! <3

It is really due to her that I was able to upload today. I got super sick this Wednesday (sinusitis, my eternal enemy) and while I’m much better again, I don’t think that I would have been able to get this chapter up without her help.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Max Mercury passes by at work one late evening in early December. It is just a couple of minutes before Barry generally starts to close the shop, and there are just two customers around, two elder sisters who are regulars of them.

Barry’s mood takes a dive for the worse as soon as he notices the other man, and he can’t help but start to feel nervous about his unexpected visit, as it seems rather unlikely that he would pass by to do some of his shopping.

Max nods when their eyes meet, a calm but slightly guarded expression on his face, and makes his way over to him.

“Is that a friend of yours?” Marina, the older of the two sisters, asks and adjusts her glasses as she watches Max come closer. She has picked up on his worried expression.

“An acquaintance,” Barry explains and quickly puts the rest of the older women’s shopping into the grocery bag for them.

“He looks good,” the other woman says with an appreciative small smirk.

“We are old but that doesn’t mean that we can’t still enjoy looking,” Edith counters, clearly amused by her sister’s discomfort.

“You’re impossible,” the older woman huffs before she accepts the shopping bag from Barry with a kind smile. “Thank you, dear.”

“You’re v-very w-welc-come, M-Mrs. Asiemo.”

“Don’t worry, Barry, you’re still our favorite,” Edith assures him with a wink just as Max joins them. The annoyed glare she receives from her sister doesn’t seem to bother her in the least.

“Good evening, then,” Marina says, and Barry isn’t sure how to feel about the dark look she gives Max in passing.

“Don’t overwork yourself, Barry,” Edith adds but has her eyes on Max, whom she gives a sugar-sweet smile and a gallivanting wink before following her sister. They are hardly three feet away when Marina starts to berate Edith for her ridiculous behavior.

Max watches the women leave with a mixture of surprise and amusement.

“You’ve quite interesting customers,” he remarks with a chuckle as he turns back to him.

“Yes, Edith can be quite unorthodox for her age,” Barry explains with an awkward smile. “But I think she’s mainly flirting with any man they come across to annoy her sister…”

His expression turns more serious then. “You came by to talk?”

Max’s grin dims and he nods. “Yeah, I was hoping that you’d have time after work.”

“You could have met up with me at my apartment,” points Barry out. The notion to talk with the other man anywhere other than his own flat doesn’t sit well with him. Neither does the thought that he would have to spend an awkward bus ride home with him.

“Your closing at nine tonight, and it will take you likely another half an hour till you are home,” Max gives him a tight smile, and he is obviously not sure whether it has been a good idea to come here either. “I thought I could quicken this a bit up for you by taking you back to your apartment after you’ve finished here.”

Barry’s heart nearly jumps up his throat as he hears this. The notion of Max using the speed force around him is unsettling enough on its own, but his offer of taking them back to his flat is just outright upsetting. He quickly shakes his head. “No, that’s fine!”

Even though there is a counter between them, he makes an alarmed step back, feeling crowded all of a sudden in the nearly empty store.

Max looks taken aback by his reaction and both stare at each other in a tense silence for a couple of seconds.

“Okay, no super-quick trip to your flat, then.”

Barry frowns in confusion. He hasn’t expected the other man to just let go of his plan like this.

“Can I at least give you a hand?” Max asks. He looks around the store meaningfully before he lifts an eyebrow.

“You don’t have to do that,” Barry argues while he makes his way around the counter to lock the store and change the sign. He feels like an ass for how anxious he is about not coming too close to the speedster as he does this. Max clearly picks up on it as well judging by his concerned expression.

“You can go to my apartment and wait there, I’ll hurry… or you could p-pass b-by t-tomorrow.” Tomorrow, he has initially planned to spend most of the day at Mary’s place, but he is sure she would understand. If he could choose, though, he would prefer for Max not to pass by at all.

“It would be no trouble for me to wait.” Max sounds sincere as he says so, and Barry, who is still standing at the now locked entrance, glances outside and wonders why nobody could pass by just as he closes the shop to get some last minute shopping done as it is usually so often the case. He doesn’t want to be alone with the other man. He doesn’t want to have him around in the first place. With a quiet sigh, he reluctantly turns back to Max.

“L-look, I k-know, b-but you d-don’t h-have t-to. I’l-l f-fish up h-here, a-and th-then I’l-l m-meet you at m-my f-flat.” Somewhat hopeful, he adds. “B-but you c-can p-pass b-by another t-time if you d-don’t h-have m-much t-time t-tonight.”

Max hesitates for a moment. “No, I’ve got time, but it is alright if you prefer for us to talk tomorrow.”

It is tempting to agree, but Barry knows that he would want to talk about this tomorrow as little as he does today. He would have some time to prepare and collect himself but, to be honest, he would rather like to simply get it over with if he had to have this conversation.

“N-no, it’s f-fine… j-just l-let m-me f-finish here,” he says quietly, tiredly, and glances back to the window. It seems so much more appealing to just keep standing at the closed door like this and look outside into the dark streets. Maybe, if he ignores Max, he would leave. Then again, he would need to use the door he is currently blocking to do so.

Barry smiles wryly at himself. He’s being ridiculous.

Finally, he turns reluctantly around to meet the other man’s gaze once more. He isn’t surprised by the thoughtful and concerned way with which he is currently studied.

“You c-can g-go o-ver t-to m-my p-place, a-and I’l-l f-follow in a b-bit,” he tells him again.

“Or I could wait, and we take a taxi,” Max suggests and quickly adds, before Barry has the possibility to protest. “This way we both would be able to finish this earlier, and I know that you don’t want this to take any more time that it has to.”

There is no accusation in his voice as he says this. He doesn’t make it sound as if Barry should be grateful that he actually took the time to come and listen. He just states the obvious.

Barry swallows nervously. His throat feels uncomfortably dry. “I’ll t-take th-the b-bus. I ddon’t h-have t-the m-money f-for a t-taxi.”

Why lie about something that is so plainly obvious? He knows that Max is aware of his financial situation. Why lie to try and save face? He is long past that point.

Max frowns, and Barry knows what he is about to say. He wishes he wouldn’t. He doesn’t need nor want charity.

“I’ll pay for the taxi, I’m the one who has suggested it, after all.”

“Y-you d-don’t n-need t-to.” Barry rubs his forehead. He feels exhausted again. It occurs to him how strange it is that some people seem to be like leeches, sucking his energy right out of him, just by being there. A feeling of guilt overrides him just a second later when he realizes what an awful thought that really is, especially due to Max having done nothing to earn it in the first place so far.
“I don’t mind,” the other man assures him and probably really doesn’t. To Max, the thirtysomething bucks to Barry’s rundown neighborhood are most likely next to nothing. He remembers a time when he wouldn’t have hesitated to spend such an amount either. He also remembers a time, when he was still not of age, when it was for him just as it is now. When five dollars made the difference between going to bed hungry or not.

Odd, how some things work.

“You can pay me back your share of the money later,” Max offers when Barry fails to response.

He chuckles humorlessly. “L-like f-for th-the m-medicine?”

Max doesn’t reply. They both know that it probably would take a long time before he would be able to do so. He is trying to safe, he really does, but at the end of each month there is still hardly anything left to put aside.

“Y-you’re r-right. L-Let’s t-take a t-t-taxi.” There is really no point of arguing about this. If he wants them to take a taxi, why not?

This seems to surprise Max. He has clearly not expected him to suddenly give in like this. Barry frowns and looks away. His eyes fall upon the security mirror that is fixed at the upper corner close to the counter, and he feels a heaviness set into the pit of his stomach.

“C-come,” Barry says after he has turned his attention back to the other man. “I’ll s-show you w-where you c-can w-wait w-while I f-finish up h-here.”

The notion of Max standing around and watching him while he works is uncomfortable, and while he would much rather tell him to wait outside, he knows that it would be rude. The weather has been cool und rainy for days, and while he may not particularly want the man around him, there is no reason for him to be mean about it.

Still, Barry really doesn’t want him in the rather small back room either, in which he counts the cashier money every day after work, and which he sometimes uses during his breaks.

Having Max around in general fills him with unease, but he tries not to think about it.

To his surprise and relief, Max follows him without trying to insist that they could speed all of this up if he would just let him help.

It is about half an hour later that they leave the store through the backdoor. The taxi is already waiting close to the bus-stop, and Barry pulls his coat closer around himself as they make their way over to it. The rain has started to pick up again.

The drive home is quiet, neither of them speaks other than for giving the taxi-driver the address.
Barry watches the streets pass by, the people in them, who are going about their business on a Saturday night. He feels sick.

It is a twenty-five-minute drive to his apartment building as the traffic runs surprisingly smooth tonight, and they have luck with the traffic lights. Barry watches the city through the window as they drive, trying to ignore that Max is next to him, all the while the dread he feels is steadily growing the closer they get to his home.

When they finally arrive, he watches Max pay the man before he leads him inside.

“You w-want s-some c-coffee or tea?” Barry asks as he flips the lights of his living area on.
He takes his coat off and makes his way over to the kitchenette.

“Coffee would be nice.”

Barry nods and starts to prepare the hot beverage. He doesn’t look back to Max but tells him to take a seat at the table. His stomach feels uncomfortably queasy again.

The familiar and soothing aroma of coffee soon starts to fill the room. Usually, this late, Barry doesn’t drink any caffeinated drinks anymore, seeing that he has enough troubles falling asleep as it is. He is quite certain that he would get no sleep tonight anyway, regardless one or two cups of coffee, though, and he is just glad that he doesn’t have to go to work tomorrow.

“Thank you.” Max accepts his cup with a nod, and Barry takes a seat opposite to him.

“S-so, wh-what d-do y-you w-want t-to kn-know?” There isn’t really a point to beating around the bush, and while he knows that the other man wants to talk to him, he isn’t sure about what exactly. Part of him fears that it would be about Bart. About the day the boy spent with him at work. He knows that Max has to be at least a bit worried, so far he has been surprisingly friendly towards him, but he is still waiting for the second shoe to drop.

“How are you doing?”

This is such an odd and unexpected question, and Barry can’t help but frown. For a second he feels the urge to ask Mas how he thinks he is doing. It is a stupid question, it really is.

“I don’t mean to offend you, Barry.” Max sounds honest and worried, and it makes Barry’s skin itch. Maybe agreeing to talk to him tonight has been a bad idea. He doesn’t feel like he is in the best mood for it.

With a soft and exasperated huff, Barry rubs his right hand over his face. “N-no, I kn-know, I’m s-sorry.”

He frowns down at the cup in front of him and picks it up to take a sip.

“Wh-what d-do you w-want t-to t-talk about, th-though?” He meets Max eyes, and while he knows that the other man could lead this conversation whatever way he deems fit, he hopes that he would humor him and let his last question drop. There is really not much to say, after all.

He feels lonely and stupid. He is missing the Rogues, he is missing Len. Ridiculously much so, and there is no way in hell that he would tell him about this.

Max studies him for a long moment. It makes him feel uneasy, but he doesn’t avert his gaze.

“Can you tell me about that night?”

It has to show on Barry’s face that he has no idea what he is talking about as the older man goes on.

“About-,” Max hesitates and briefly looks like he is considering whether he really wants to say it or not. “About what happened the night Iris was killed.”

For a second Barry is pretty sure that this can’t be happening. He stares at the other man in disbelief and confusion before such an intense sensation of nausea overcomes him that he nearly groans. He promptly stands up.
“Barry-“

“I n-need t-to use h-the b-bathr-r-“ Barry breaks off. It doesn’t really matter; Max will get it. With that, he turns around and hurries into the only room in his flat that has an actual lock and makes sure to use it.

Against his fear, he doesn’t need to throw up, but he still lands heavy on his knees in front of the ceramic basin. His stomach feels like it is cramping up into a painful ball for a couple of seconds, but he tries to breathe through the worst of it. He just feels so damn light-headed and the ringing in his ears momentarily blocks out anything else.

He bows his head, lets his forehead rest on his arm he has on the toilet and tries to get these awful emotions let go of him. This is the beginning of a panic attack, he isn’t there yet, but he is familiar to how it feels and breathing threatens to become difficult despite his effort to keep calm.

God, he really doesn’t want to have one of these with Max next door. It is embarrassing and frustrating. He forces himself to push that thought away. His mind feels too agitated, and he turns his attention to the cool ceramic under his hands, to the hard ground under his knees and to how his chest is moving with every single breath. Keep everything away, just concentrate on what is there, nothing else. He knows how this works. He can do this. He is good at it, if he was good at anything, it is this. Just breathing, slow and deep.

The panic starts to retreat.

It is when the ringing in his ears starts to subside and he is able to get a real grasp of where he is, that he picks up that he is crying and shaking. He opens his eyes slowly. He feels mostly exhausted- Max is right there next to him. Barry freezes. It is then that he realizes that the other man is talking to him. How did he get in here? He locked…

“G-get th-the f-fuck aw-way f-from m-me.” He hisses and pushes himself away from the toilet to get some additional distance between them. This catches Max clearly off-guard.

“Barry, it’s alright, I-”

“G-get out! G-get out and w-wait th-there! I l-locked th-that d-damn d-d-door f-for a r-reason!” The anger is nearly smothering him. Why couldn’t he have control over anything in his life?

Max seems about to argue but thinks the better of it then and instead nods.

“Alright,” he gets up but doesn’t move his concerned gaze from him. “If you need any help, just call.”

Barry just glares back at the other man till he starts to move. His stomach makes a sickening lurch when he watches him walk through the door, as if there was nothing in his way. Wally comes to his mind, and he squeezes his eyes shut again.

The kitchen is quiet when he leaves the bathroom about fifteen minutes later. Max is sitting at the table and looks nearly painfully concerned. Barry doesn’t understand the man. Why does he care? Why now?

“S-sorry ab-bout th-that,” he says quietly as he sits down. “I d-didn’t expect you t-to b-bring th-this up and… I’m s-sorry f-for h-how I r-reacted.” Max shakes his head.

“It is alright, I’m the one who needs to apologize. I shouldn’t have intruded like that,” he gives him a faint smile before his expression turns somber again. “You are feeling alright?”

No, he isn’t. There’s nothing he can do about it, though.

Barry nods and picks his cup up again. The coffee has turned cold by now. He studies the dark beverage quietly for a couple of minutes. Max doesn’t interrupt the silence.

“You w-want t-to t-talk about…” he frowns and looks up. “Wh-why?”

Max doesn’t answer immediately. He seems to think about what to say, and Barry can’t help but wonder what all of this is about. Iris died nearly a decade ago…

The other man sighs and closes his eyes for a moment. He lifts his hand rubs the bridge of his nose before he focuses on him again. His gaze is hard but not hostile.

“I want you to tell me what happened back then.”

“I haven’t been there, Barry,” Max points out.

“I’m s-sure B-Bruce m-made s-sure t-to r-record th-the es-sential outline o-of it all.”

Max frowns but doesn’t say anything to that. The way he looks at him makes it obvious that he thinks he is behaving a bit like a brat. Barry thinks so too, but he doesn’t care. He is angry and tired and not in the mood to be played with.

“Please, Barry, just humor me, then.”

“You th-think I enjoy th-thinking b-back t-to… t-to th-that n-night?” It hurts, how everybody assumes that this doesn’t affect him. Barry bits his lower lip and turns his gaze to his hands around the cup.

Then, he scoffs.

“Of c-couse you d-do, d-don’t you? B-bec-cause I k-killed h-her… I h-had t-to e-enjoy…” His voice gives out and rubs a hand over his eyes.

“That’s not true.” Max doesn’t sound frustrated or annoyed but sad. Barry is a bit disappointed, and he doesn’t understand what is wrong with him, why he is behaving so damn childish tonight.

“Barry, I know that this isn’t easy for you, but I really would appreciate it.” The other man sounds so honest, and he wants to ask about the reason again but decides against it. The faster he would get this over with, the faster Max would leave again, and, right now, Barry just wants to be left alone.

His mouth feels dry, and he takes a sip of his coffee.

“Okay.” Barry gives Max a humorless smile. “L-let’s t-talk about th-that night.”

He looks back down and considers how to start. It takes him a bit, and he is glad that Max doesn’t urge him.

“I… I c-came h-home f-from w-work…”
It was a Friday. Iris and he had another fight two days prior, and they hadn’t talked to each other since then. The day at work had been tiring. All of them were towards the end back then. He had hoped that he could cook something, maybe together with Iris or for her if she still was too mad. He had hoped that they could talk.

“Th-the d-door w-was open… th-there w-were n-no s-signs o-of s-someone f-forcibly g-got in… it w-was j-just o-open…”

It hadn’t been all the way open, just ajar. The lights were on, and he had wondered whether Iris had left it open for some reason. Part of him knew that this wasn’t it, though. He just didn’t want to acknowledge it.

“I-I c-called f-for h-her…” Barry’s v-voice gives out and he coughs slightly. “S-someththing w-was w-wrong… I-I kn-knew… I-I…”

Iris and he had drifted apart for a while then. Still, he somehow had always a sense of her being there, somewhere in the back of his mind. It had grown weaker over the months, and he hardly noticed it anymore at that time, but it still was there. Or, it had been there. He grew nearly sick when he later realized that he hadn’t even noticed when it had vanished.

The moment he pushed the door open, he already knew what he would find. It was horrifying, and he just couldn’t bring himself to run, to make a quick sweep of the house.

“I-I d-didn’t w-want t-to g-go ins-side.” Barry swallows and chuckles even though there is nothing funny about any of this. He takes another sip of his coffee and tries to concentrate on how bitter it tastes. He licks his lips before he goes on. “I-I p-probably s-stood th-there f-for a m-m-minute or t-two b-b-but… it f-f-felt l-l-like f-f-forever… I-I kn-knew I d-didn’t w-want t-to… t-t-o g-go i-inside and f-find… I w-was s-s-scared…”

The air inside the house has felt odd. Humid, charged, and thick. He doesn’t remember the part where he crossed the living room to get to the kitchen anymore. It doesn’t really matter anyway.

The next thing he remembers is clear and sharp in his mind, and he wishes he it wasn’t. Thinking back to it, he still can taste the sickening metallic taste of blood in the back of his throat. It has been nearly overwhelming.

“I-I f-found h-her i-in th-the k-kitchen…” His voice grows thin, and he has to clear his throat again before he looks up to meet Max’s eyes. “Sh-sh-she w-was d-dead.”

This is much too inaccurate to describe what he has really found there, though, or to explain the horror and the unbelievable sadness he felt the moment he saw her on the once white tiled floor, on her back and in a sea of blood. Iris abdomen had been wide open, her guts spilled out around here, and he hadn’t been able to do anything but stare at this grotesque picture in front of him.

Barry clenches his eyes shut and takes a couple of deep breaths. He feels sick again, much worse than before, and he realizes that he has actually forgotten how awful it is to actually allow himself to think back to it.

“You found her?”

It is a redundant question, one he has expected, and he can’t even find it in himself to really grow angry over it. He just nods quietly.

“Hal said that he found you with her blood all over you.” Max doesn’t sound accusing, but calm and oddly neutral. Like he is stating something about the weather. Barry isn’t sure how to feel about it but can’t really bring himself to worry. He just shrugs.

“I-d-don’t r-really kn-know wh-what… I s-stood at th-the e-entrance t-to th-the k-kitchen one s-second a-and th-then I h-had h-her i-in m-my arms…”

His eyes have started to itch, and he brushes over them with his fingers. “I-I r-remember H-Hal b-being th-there…”

His former friend was the first to arrive. Barry can’t really remember what he had said, most of what followed is oddly distorted in his mind, but he knows that Hal had tried to talk to him and give him some comfort. He had hardly been able to make sense of what he said, though.

Later, most likely not more than ten minutes, the police and an ambulance arrived, and he didn’t want to let go of her. He remembers the panic he felt when they wanted him to let them take Iris. Somehow he knew that he wouldn’t see her again after this.

“Hal stated that you were very upset,” Max says, and Barry can’t help but glare at him for it.

“M-my w-wife h-had b-been m-murd-dered, o-of c-course I-I w-was u-upset!”

The older man doesn’t say anything to that. He doesn’t have to. Barry knows what he is thinking.

“I-I d-didn’t k-kill h-her.”

“You were having difficulties in your marriage back then.”

“Y-yes b-but th-that d-doesn’t m-mean th-that I-I w-would… I-I n-never h-hurt h-her, I-I w-would h-have n-never d-done th-this…” He huffs in frustration and presses a fist against his forehead. His skin feels too tight again.

“You stated something else when you were under the influence of Diana’s lasso.”

Barry feels like the air is taken out of his sails. The anger leaves him, and he is left feeling groggy and sick.

The problem is that he should have seen this coming and that he somehow still hasn’t. He averts his eyes from Max and looks back down to the table.

“Barry, I’m just stating the facts.” Max seems about as unhappy about this as Barry, and he wonders why the other man has even bothered to come here.

“Y-yes,” he agrees bitterly.

“J’onn also confirmed what Wally said.”

This actually is new to Barry, and he looks up to him in surprise. “Wh-what?”

Max gives him an odd look. “The Justice League confirmed what Wally said, Barry. Do you think they would charge you with this crime if they hadn’t any proof?”

Briefly, Barry feels another surge of anger flash through him. Nobody told him anything about what was done or not done after they picked him up from the hospital and took him straight to the Watchtower. He has no idea how they tried to evaluate any of this, other than for the accusations the made to his face, and stating his guilt via Wonder Woman’s lasso.
They didn’t listen to anything he said otherwise, and while Hal came to him a couple of times to talk while he has been kept in one of the holding cells, there was very little his friend could tell him.

“I-d-didn’t kn-know th-that.” He can’t help himself if he sounds bitter and watches the other man start to frown.

“Nobody told you about it?” Max sounds honestly surprised.

No, nobody told him about anything. He thinks about pointing this out and how everything about this is messed up. Unfortunately, this doesn’t change anything about the fact that he confessed to a crime he didn’t commit under the influence of Diana’s lasso of truth. There is no way that anybody would believe him, no matter how much he insists on his innocence.

“Wh-why a-are y-you d-doing h-here?” Barry asks quietly. “Y-you b-believe I’m g-guilty, sso wh-why w-waste t-time g-going th-through th-that w-with m-me a-again.”

“I’m here to hear your side of the story.” Max meets his incredulous look firmly. “I know what the facts say, and you can’t hold this against me or any of the others.”

“Wh-why b-bother, th-then?” Barry is aware that he should be relieved and grateful that there is finally someone willing to listen, but he is just tired. It has been years and what would this change? Talking about this is only painful, and Iris would still be dead afterward, Wally would still hate him, and his life…

Barry stomps down on that notion when he realizes what he is doing. With a sigh he rubs his eyes and tries to remind himself that self-pity is never helping anybody.

“What could it hurt?” Max doesn’t seem annoyed, his grim expression from before has eased away to one of empathy, and he gives him a tight smile as he goes on. “I understand that it isn’t something that is easy for you, but maybe it will help you to speak about it.”

“I already t-told y-you wh-what h-happened,” Barry points out tiredly and takes another sip from his coffee. He shudders slightly as it has started to taste really bad by now.

“We could go over it once more.”

There is hardly anything Barry would want to do less right now, and he knows that it is most likely futile to expect anything from it. Still, there is someone who actually knew him back then and offers him to listen. It is likely that he wouldn’t get such a chance another time.

Barry swallows, his mouth feels uncomfortably dry, and he takes another sip of the nasty tasting coffee. He nods somewhat reluctantly and meets Max’s eyes with a tired expression.

“O-okay.”

He has no idea what the other man promises himself from this but why not humor him? In the best case it helps him to share what has happened back then, if not…

Well, life always goes on.

Chapter End Notes
This chapter gave a small glimpse into what happened that night when Iris was killed. It also touched upon why the JLA was so willing to believe Barry to be guilty as the evidence is really not in his favor.

I hope I was able to make it understandable why Max is still uncertain about whether he should believe Barry or not. Seeing that we experience the main part of this story through Barry’s POV it makes it easy for us to not sympathize with him, but Max (and many others) have experienced everything from another point so far, and act out on their belief of doing the right thing.

I’ve really started to feel bad for the JLA and how most readers really dislike them for how they’ve handled the whole situation with Barry. It’s understandable due to how we all see how much this has messed Barry’s life up, but it is not my intent to portray them as the bad guys, similar to how Wally has never been intended to be perceived as anything but another victim (like Barry).

While I was sick and bedridden for the most part of this week, I read over a lot of what is going to happen later on, and I’m really looking forward to how Barry’s relationship with many of the characters is going to develop over time. I wish I was already done with all of it and could post you the whole thing outright, I’m so excited about where things are heading, the only thing that is still giving me a headache is the pacing. I’ll probably cut a lot away because I wrote so much that is just about establishing the relationship between Barry and other characters, and while it is so much fun to write, I think it does weigh down on the reading experience for you.

Next chapter will have Axel turn up again, as well as James and Mrs. Ming! And there will be dumplings filled with (not so) actual heads! :3
Dinner with A Side Dish of Friction

“Finally” Axel huffs as he enters the small backroom, where Barry is currently finishing with the money counting of today’s business. He shoots a disgruntled look back to where he has just come from. “Who knew that a bit of snow could cause such a mess?”

“You’re f-finished already?” It is a bit surprising that Axel is already done with the task as it hasn’t even been ten minutes since Barry has left him to it. The teen smirks and nods, though, which causes him to eye him slightly suspiciously. “You d-did m-mop it, r-right?”

“Yes” Axel says as he rolls his eyes and makes his way over to the table where Barry is sitting at, eying the money with fleeting interest. “The ground’s so clean, you could eat off it.”

Barry puts the last of today’s intakes in a small portable safe and chuckles. “G-good t-to kn-know.”

He quickly scribbles down a couple of notes regarding the money before he adds the small booklet to the cash and locks the box. As he gets up with it, he gives Axel a pleased smile. “Th-thank you, A-Axel, y-you h-helped m-me a l-lot w-with th-that.”

The teen shrugs, and Barry doesn’t miss that he is still smirking. He gets the feeling that he is missing something. It is then that, he notices that the kid hasn’t brought the mop nor the bucket back with him. Before Barry has the opportunity to ask about it, he is cut off by another voice.

“Hey, you two are all done here?” James enters the room; the missed cleaning tools in his hands.

“Axel” Barry gives the boy a disapproving look.

“What? The floor has been mopped, and I actually did do the main part of it. He just offered to finish.” Axel defends himself which causes James to snort in amusement.

“If you mean the small area in front of the entrance by that, then you did do an impressive job indeed. I just had to go over it one more time to get rid of any remaining stains.” The other man remarks and ignores the glare he receives from Axel for it.

“You offered to do the mopping,” the teen points out with a shrug before he frowns. “You’re already done with it, though? You sure you did it any better than I did?”
“Please, don’t insult me, young padawan. I’ve been doing this since I was old enough to hold a mop.” James grins as he carries the cleaning tools to the cupboard to stash them away for the time being. “I would be worried should I need more than five minutes for it.”

“Wow, careful,” Axel says in a fake worried voice. “Your head got alarmingly huge for a moment there.”

“Smartass.”

Barry watches both of them with a fond smile. It is good to see that they are getting along, even though he isn’t really surprised. James is a very easy-going and funny man. There are probably not many who don’t like having him around.

“Y-you sh-should h-have l-let h-him d-do h-his w-work,” he still points out a bit sternly.

James grindims somewhat at that, and turns back to him. When he notices the absence of any actual annoyance on Barry’s face, his expression becomes playful again.

“You should have heard him moan and groan,” James says. “I just had to take pity on this poor soul.”

“I didn’t moan and groan,” Axel protests with an indignant frown before he looks to Barry. “Don’t listen to him, he tries to badmouth me because he knows you like me better.”

This causes James to laugh outright. Barry ignores them and brings the portable safe over to the small safe that is let into the wall opposite to the entrance of the room.

“So, did Axel tell you about the dinner?”

Barry’s surprised look makes it clear to James that the boy hasn’t so far.

“Lao lao would like you both to join us for dinner if you’ve time,” he explains and adds when Barry hesitates. “Axel would like to.”

This doesn’t surprise Barry at all, as the growing teen likes anything connected with food.

“Hey, you offer (offered?) a free meal,” Axel reminds him as if this in itself made his decision self-explanatory, and even gives James a look like he is crazy for even considering the possibility that he could have declined.

“Of course,” the other man agrees earnestly and chuckles when he receives an eye-roll in return. He then turns looks back to Barry and asks with a rather winning smile. “So, are you in for some amazing Mantou?”

“Who cares,” Axel stretches himself like a cat before he goes on. “You haven’t eaten yet. I know, I’ve been around for the last couple of hours, and I’m famished.”

“I can drive you home afterwards,” James adds, and it is then, when it occurs to Barry that both of them seem to want him around.

It is a nice thought.

“You r-really d-don’t h-have t-to. I c-can t-take the b-bus.”
“Does this mean that you’ll eat with us?” James asks, and it is hard to miss how pleased he looks by this. It worries Barry for a moment, a feeling of unexpected discomfort settles into his stomach, and he can’t help but wonder why the other man would actually want to have him around.

He is being stupid again, and he wishes he wouldn’t be so absurdly paranoid, because James is Mrs. Ming’s grandson, who has been nothing but nice and decent to him so far.

Barry pushes the concerned voice that has piped up in his mind away and nods.

It would be a nice change to not spend the next couple of hours, lying awake in his bed and trying to keep himself from thinking of Len and the others.

A familiar heaviness replaces the discomfort when Barry’s thoughts touch upon Len, and for a second he feels the exhaustion overcome him, based on the too little sleep he has gotten over the last couple of weeks.

He knows that Len is keeping an eye on him which means that he still cares but…

“Great.” James’ smile causes the corners of his eyes to crinkle, and while the sombre mood hasn’t completely let go of Barry yet, he returns it faintly as it is still a new and welcome change to be so openly liked.

They follow up James to the little apartment above the store. It is as warm and welcoming as usual, and the food turns out to be everyone’s liking. Not that Barry has expected anything else as he has learned so far that both, the old woman and her nephew, are really adept (skilled?) in the kitchen.

“So these are Manitus,” Axel remarks after he ate the first Chinese bun in two bites and is now studying the second one in his hand. “They look funny.”

“M-Mantous,” Barry corrects as he is nibbling on his own in a much slower pace.

“They are a traditional Chinese dish,” Mrs. Ming explains amused.

The boy hums and is obviously not too interested in any history regarding their food.

“Did you know that Mantou actually means barbarian head?” Axel, who has shoved the last of his second bun into his mouth, lifts his eyebrows in surprise and gives James a curious look. “Weawy?”

“Axel,” Barry chides but can’t help, to be a bit amused by the kid’s antics. Their hosts don’t seem to be put out by his lack of table manners either, and James nods in agreement instead.

“Yes, a long time ago a clever man named Zhuge, led an army to a war against the barbarian king Meng Huo and was able to defeat him. Afterwards, when his men and him wanted to return home, they came across a swift-flowing river but, they weren’t able to cross it, due to the strength of its current. One of the barbarian lords the soldiers captured, informed Zhuge that he would need to sacrifice 49 men and throw their heads into the river in order to appease the river spirit enough to allow them to cross.”

“Dude! Those Chinese and their spirits were really badass, weren’t they?” remarks Axel, clearly impressed by this little history lesson.

Barry thinks about pointing out that cutting someone’s head off really shouldn’t categorize as something to be impressed by, but decides against it. The boy is just a teen after all, and he still knows from experience what can seem cool to you at such an age.
“We certainly were and still are,” James agrees with a nod and winks at Barry when he notices his slight frown. “Zhuge was certainly a good example of it as he didn’t want to spill more blood and instead of beheading 49 of his men or prisoners, he sacrificed the cows and horses they brought along with them and filled their meat into buns that were then shaped roughly like human heads.”

“Seriously?” Axel asks incredulously. “And that river spirit bought that?”

“He certainly did,” Mrs. Ming confirms with a chuckle. “And after Zhuge Liang was able to cross the river, he named the buns mántóu which translates into barbarian’s head.”

“Well that’s gross,” the teen muttered and after eyeing the dwindling heap of buns on the plate in the middle of the table, he seems to decide that he has had enough of them for now.

“Th-that’s n-not a p-polite th-thing t-to s-say,” Barry scolds and shoots the old woman an apologetic look. Mrs. Ming only waves it off with a kind smile and tells him not to worry.

“James refused to eat Mantous for exactly the same reason when he was little. I made the mistake to tell him the story when he was eight, and he wouldn’t touch such a bun again till he was nearly twenty.”

“Lao lao,” her nephew groans a bit embarrassed. “I just didn’t like them. It wasn’t because I thought you put actual heads in them.”

“You were convinced for a while that the mincemeat came from barbarians,” Mrs. Ming reminds him with an amused twinkle in her eyes. “I had to ask dear Mr. Sheppard to vouch for it being just simply pork meat.”

Axel guffaws at that and asks who this M. Sheppard is. The old woman explains that it was the butcher who had his shop just down the street from them.

“He died about ten years ago,” she explains with a sad little smile. “He was such a good man.”

Not sure what to say, Axel turns his attention back to the buns that are still left, to eye them with a mixture of distaste and interest.

“He was,” James agrees with a fond smile. “He had fun assuring me every single time I passed by at his shop, that all of his products were solely animal based, even long after I passed my teens.”

Again, Barry wonders whether James had been brought up solely by his grandmother. He hardly mentions his parents and neither does Mrs. Ming.

“I know a guy who knows a guy whose brother has a friend who pulled a couple of jobs for the mob in Gotham, and he told me that they actually have a butcher shop there which sells the meat of people they’ve gotten rid of.”

James, who has just taken a sip of his water, nearly chokes on it in response to Axel’s words.

“Axel.” Barry groans and glances to Mrs. Ming in concern who seemed quite alarmed by this piece of information. Thanks to his former friendship to Bruce, he is well aware that Axel’s friend could very well have said the truth, but that doesn’t make it anymore to a passable dinner conversation topic. It also makes him worry once again with what kind of people the boy is spending his time.

“What?” Axel huffs and gives him an annoyed look. “We just talked about stuffing a guy’s head into a bun, how is this any worse.”
Next to Barry, James makes a noise that lays somewhere between coughing and laughing.

“The people of Gotham are crazy, it’s not my fault.” Axel shrugs.

It doesn’t do much to settle Barry’s worries that the teen sounds utterly unconcerned by what he has just brought up.

“You d-do kn-know h-how d-dangerous th-those p-people are, d-don’t you?”

“Yes, Barry.” Axel rolls his eyes and gives him a look as if he is being a bit slow. “Psychopaths and murderers are dangerous. I know that, okay?”

“For that you do have quite interesting friends,” James adds as he wipes his mouth with a napkin and most likely tries to hide his grin. He gives Barry an apologetic look when he notices his disapproving frown.

“He, just because they know guys who do such stuff doesn’t mean that they are like them as well,” Axel protests with a scowl.

“Are they friends from school?” Mrs. Ming, who looks far more concerned than her nephew, seems surprised when the boy snorts in response.

“W-watch it, Axel, th-there’s n-no reason t-to b-be imp-polite.” Axel glowers briefly at Barry for the reprimand before he glances to the older woman and actually looks a bit guilty.

“Nah, they’re just people I hang out with.” He shrugs again and doesn’t elaborate on the fact that he isn’t enrolled in any school at the moment.

“Do your guardians know that you are spending your time with them?” It is interesting how Mrs. Ming words this question. Not parents but guardians, and Barry can’t say he is surprised that she would have picked up on the fact that, Axel is most likely not having an ordinary living conditions like other teenagers of his age do.

“Sure,” the kid agrees readily and glances at him as he does so. This catches Barry off-guard, and he is not sure how to response to it or whether he should at all.

Mrs. Ming looks surprised as well, and she wonders whether she has expected to learn that Axel doesn’t have any legal guardians, which he most likely doesn’t as far as Barry knows, or that she simply can’t understand how anybody would allow their charge to spend time with such people.

“Did you tell them where you are this late at night? You did ask them for their permission, didn’t you?” She asks a bit concerned.

“Yeah, they know, and they are fine with it. Don’t worry, Mrs. Ming,” Axel assures her, and Barry find him glancing towards him again.

“Well, that is good.” The older woman seems a bit reassured by this and gives the young teen a kind smile. “I wouldn’t want them to worry about you. I can still remember how it was for me when James was still your age and started to stay over at his friends’ places. He was such a good boy, but this isn’t exactly the safest area for children to grow up in.”

“It wasn’t that bad, Lao lao, you just worried way too much.” James chuckles and turns to Barry and Axel. “There were a lot of gang stuff going on even back then, but my best friend’s dad was a cop, and he was probably the most paranoid man you can imagine. He always picked us up from school when I stayed over, and he always drove me home in the evenings. Neither Nick nor I ever dreamed
James laughs and rubs his chin as he seems to think back to his own youth. “God, Mr. Hanson… he was a huge man, like a bear, especially with his bushy beard and gruff voice, but he was one of the kindest and most patient men I’ve ever met. He never raised his voice when we caused some trouble, he didn’t need to. He just looked at us with those disapproving and disappointing eyes, and we felt like the worst kids on the whole planet.”

He turns to his grandmother with a smirk. “You remember when Nick, Amber, and I were caught spraying the walls behind McKinley’s shop, and the old man caught us? We were convinced that we would go to jail for it when Mr. Hanson picked us up in his police car.”

“Well, you certainly deserved that little scare after what you had done.” Mrs. Ming gives her grandson a stern look. “I still don’t understand why you would do such a thing.”

“It was a bet, and we were stupid kids, Lao lao.” James chuckles but has the decency to look guilty under the blaming eyes of his grandmother.

“You did that during the day?” Axel looks both incredulous and amused. “Why didn’t you wait till it got dark and the dude closed his shop? That way you probably would have gotten away with it.”

“It’s a g-good th-thing th-they d-didn’t,” Barry points out a bit sharply before either Mrs. Ming or James can who both seem unsure of how to take the boy’s advice. “Th-they c-caused d-damage t-to another p-person’s p-property. Th-they sh-shouldn’t h-have g-gotten away w-with it, n-nobody wh-who d-does s-such a th-thing s-should. C-causing other p-people t-trouble out of b-boredom or m-m-mindlessn-ness isn’t s-someth-thing f-funny and d-definitely n-not s-something t-to b-be p-proud of. It’s a p-petty th-thing t-to d-do, and sh-shows h-how l-little you underst-stand h-how w-wrong it’s t-to h-hurt s-someone e-e else f-for y-your own entertainm-ment.”

Nobody says anything for a long moment after that, and Barry immediately realizes that he has spoken too harshly. He feels sorry for it but, he doesn’t want Axel to become one of those people, who are part of the reason, why the Keys are such a miserable place when he grows older. The boy is a good kid, he is clever and doesn’t intentionally want to hurt others, he just doesn’t think his actions through at times, and sometimes he just doesn’t know any better.

“You don’t know shit, okay!?! You and your stupid rules! Do your really believe anybody gives a fuck about them?” Axel scoffs angrily and point a finger at him as he sneers. “You of all people should know better! People aren’t nice, and they aren’t good! They can turn on you any moment, and more often than not they will! Do you really think I’m not getting what happened to you?! And where did your stupid sentiment about being good get you?! People think you’re twisted and sick, and you have to take the shit they dish out, because you can’t do anything about it! That is how reality works!”

“I think that is enough.” James gets up as well and returns Axel’s dark glare with a stern expression.
“Yeah?! You can go screw yourself! I’m outa here anyways!” The teenager spits before he storms out of the room. James looks about to follow, but Barry stops him. “I’ll t-talk t-to h-him.”

He turns to Mrs. Ming and gives her an apologetic smile before he hurries after the boy, ignoring the other man’s protest on his way out. He is able to catch up with him on his way out the backdoor.

“Axel, w-wait-“

“Fuck off!”

Barry grimaces slightly. “J-just w-wait f-for a s-second, p-please-“

He stops abruptly when Axel whirls around and snarls at him. “Why!? So you can tell me what a jackass I am!?“

“I d-didn’t s-say th-that,” he states firmly and tries to relax which is quite hard in thus tensed up situation.

“No but you could just as well have! I’m not stupid, you don’t need to spell things out for me!” Despite all of Axel’s angry bravado, Barry doesn’t miss the hurt that lies beneath it, and he really starts to regret his words from earlier on.

“N-no, you aren’t, and I n-never m-meant t-to insinuate s-such a th-thing,” he says quietly can’t help but wonder why the boy would react this vehemently. He honestly hasn’t expected him to get this angry over a rebuke.

“Yeah? Great, what did you try to insinuate then?”

It has become cold towards the middle of December, and their breaths turn white in the cool air as they speak. Barry shivers a bit and is glad that at least Axel had the presence of mind to grab his jacket on his way out.

“You’re n-not s-stupid, Axel,” he tells him earnestly, “and y-you’re n-not a b-bad k-kid, b-but I’m w-worried th-that th-the p-people you s-spend your t-time w-with c-could eventually c-cause y-you t-to d-do s-someth-thing y-you’ll r-regret l-later on.”

“You don’t need to worry about me! I’m not your fucking responsibility!” Axel spits. He has his fist clenched tightly enough that they’re slightly shaking, and Barry doesn’t understand why he is so upset all of a sudden.

“You’re m-my f-friend,” he says softly after a tensed silence has lingered for a couple of seconds. The neighbourhood has quiet down somewhat this late at night, and Barry can pick up on the teen gritting his teeth in response to his words. “You m-may n-not b-be m-my r-respons-i-bility b-but th-that d-doesn’t m-mean th-that I d-don’t w-want you t-to b-be s-safe and s-sound, A-Axel.”

“You think I’m an idiotic troublemaker,” the boy responses stubbornly. “That I can’t look after myself and that is bull. I’ve been doing so for over two years.”

It is a daunting realization that Axel could have hardly been older than eleven when he started to live on the streets. The concept of someone so young doing this isn’t hard to grasp, though. Barry has known many kids who did the same during his childhood. He himself, ran away a couple of times, but he always went back to the abuse in the end.

“You’re n-not a-a t-troublemaker.”
Axel gives him a very incredulous look at that.

“You aren’t,” he insists.

“I’ve stolen from you,” the boy corrects as he crosses his arms in front of his chest.

“You t-ried,” Barry reminds him with a small smile, “and d-didn’t s-succeed.”

“That one time I didn’t.” At Barry surprised frown, Axel rolls his eyes and snorts. “You know, it becomes ridiculously easy to let something slip into my pockets when you aren’t paying attention to such a thing anymore.”

The taunting expression only last briefly on the teens face. He seems to pick up on Barry’s disappointment but stubbornly refuses to show regret or guilt.

“Maybe I fit just fine with my friends, Barry,” he states instead a bit bitter. “They aren’t good people and neither am I.” He averts his eyes to glower darkly at the ground in front of him.

Barry watches the morose looking kid in front of him. By now he really regrets having said anything at all before. It is obvious that Axel feels bad and shunned, and he still isn’t sure what has caused him to react so badly to his words.

Slowly, as not to alarm the boy, he walks closer to him till; there is about an arm’s length between them. Axel tenses up, when he notices it and frowns up at him with a mixture of surprise and wariness.

“I’m s-sorry f-for ups-s-setting you l-like th-this. I kn-know th-that you are b-bright and m-much m-more indep-pendent th-than m-most b-boys y-your age, b-but you’re s-still y-young. I d-don’t w-want you t-to g-get in t-trouble b-because you d-don’t under-stand wh-what c-consequ-ences y-your d-doing c-could h-have.”

“I’m not stupid,” Axel repeats audible annoyed, but Barry cuts him off before he can go on.

“And I’m n-not s-saying th-that y-you are, b-but you d-did n-not s-seem t-to b-be t-troubled b-by th-the p-prospect o-o-of d-damaging another p-person’s g-goods, and you s-seem f-fine w-with t-taking th-things th-that aren’t y-yours.”

The boy scowls at him stubbornly before averting his gaze. He still looks pissed, but Barry can sense that his anger has started to decrease and that he gets his point.

“You’re n-not a b-bad k-kid,” Barry goes on, and he hates how Axel scoffs and shoots him an incredulous look at this. It is unfair to expect the boy to see himself in a better light, though. He never really made it outright clear that he doesn’t see Axel as a scallywag or anything else of that kind, mostly because he hasn’t realized how important it would be. He regrets this now.

“You aren’t,” he insists firmly. “You’re j-just y-young and m-mostly on your own, wh-which is utterly unf-fair and w-wrong, b-but w-we c-can’t p-pick and ch-choose h-how our l-lives t-turn out. I unde-rstand th-that, and I d-don’t th-think any l-less of you b-bec-cause of h-how y-you’ve s-s-survive in th-this w-world s-so f-far.”

The intense way Axel looks at him now, makes him feel a bit uncomfortable. There is surprise and disbelief in his eyes but also understanding. Barry coughs a bit awkwardly before he goes on with a faint but kind smile.

“I’m j-just w-worried about you. I d-don’t w-want you t-to h-have t-to s-stick t-to th-this k-kind o-of life, and it’s d-difficult t-to n-not m-make s-some w-wrong t-turn wh-when you’re y-young and on your own th-that c-can m-make it h-hard t-to l-leave th-this p-path again.”

A cool breeze picks up, and he shudders slightly.

“You were an arse,” Axel points out after a brief silence has passed between them again, and Barry has to chuckle despite the insult. “Th-that isn’t a n-nice th-thing t-to s-say.”

The boy snorts but doesn’t look like he is about break something any second now. His shoulders have relaxed and his scowl has been replaced by a small smirk.

“But it’s still true,” he says which causes Barry to ache an eyebrow. “Is it?”

“Totally.” Axel confirms with a nod and pushes his hands into the pockets of his jacket. “But it’s fine, I don’t hold it against you. You’re an adult, after all, and an old one at that.”

The tension in his chest loosens, and Barry has a hard time to stop himself from smiling in relief as he feigns annoyance. “I’m f-forty-one.”

Barry can’t help but chuckle this time and doesn’t miss how the cold air has started to smell like rain. He also is pretty sure that they’ve Mrs. Ming quite worried, which is why he nods back to the backdoor. “W-we sh-should g-go b-back inside.”

The humor leaves the boy’s expression and a frown replaces it instead. He suddenly seems rather uncomfortable.

“You think Mrs. Ming’s pissed at me?” Axel asks in an unusual quiet and worried voice; it is nice to know that he has really taken a liking to the kind old lady.

Barry smiles and steps a bit closer as he cups his shoulder gingerly. “I’m s-sure sh-she isn’t. Sh-she’s m-most l-likely j-just w-worried about you.” He meets Axel’s embarrassed and hopeful expression and slightly squeezes his shoulder in reassurance, before he adds as if on an afterthought. “B-but I w-would s-still apolog-gize f-for h-having b-been r-rather r-rude.”

“I’m a teen, people expect me to be rude,” Axel argues with a small smile.

“Of c-course w-we d-do,” Barry agrees solemnly before he smiles too and nods towards the closed door. “L-lets h-head b-back in, it’s g-getting r-rather ch-chilly out h-here.”

“I’ll i-ignore any f-further qu-quips t-toward m-my age f-from n-now on,” Barry remarks drily, which causes Axel to grin. “You know, everybody is getting old. There’s no shame in it.”

Barry smiles and follows the kid inside, not surprised at all to see James waiting for them at the foot of the stairs. His concerned expression relaxes, as soon as it looks like they have worked things out.

“You’re badmouthing old people now, grasshopper?” the other man asks with a fake frown.

“Despite what you may think, you’ll turn into one of us one day as well, and this day will probably come much earlier than you think.”

“So you’re saying you are old?” Axel quips as they make their way back upstairs.

“I’m nearly forty, of course I’m old.”
The teen laughs in triumph when this reply causes Barry to groan slightly in annoyance, and he turns to him with a pleased grin. “Told you so.”

“Th-thanks, J-James, you’re d-definitely th-the p-person I’ll t-turn t-to once I r-reach m-my m-mid-l-life-c-crisis.”

His friend feigns innocence. “Aren’t you long past your midlife crisis?”

Axel roars with laughter at that, and Barry decides it would be best for his self-esteem, to ignore both oafs for the rest of his stay, which wouldn’t be all that long anymore, anyway.

It is already close to midnight, and while Axel doesn’t have to worry about a curfew, as he is currently staying with some friends again, and he himself would take James up on his offer to drive him home; he still has to get up in about five hours again. Even so, he doesn’t regret having accepted the invitation.

It is about forty minutes later when Barry exits James’ car in front of his apartment building. The air is still chilly, and it has started to drizzle a bit by now. He leans down after getting out of the car, and thanks the other man again for bringing him home.

“No problem, I’m glad that you joined us for dinner,” James replies easily before frowns slightly. “Even though, it probably cost you a couple hours of sleep.”

“It’s f-fine.” Barry doesn’t mention that he usually isn’t able to fall asleep before half past two in the morning these days, anyway. One of the reasons why he is looking more and more like a raccoon every passing day, with how dark the circles under his eyes are getting.

“It w-was f-fun and th-thanks again f-for th-the g-good m-meal.” Barry straightens up before quickly ducking down again to add. “And p-please t-tell y-your g-grandmother m-my th-thanks a-again f-for l-letting Axel s-s-stay t-tonight. It’s v-very k-kind of h-her, and it’s g-good t-to kn-know th-that h-he’s s-somewh-where s-safe.”

Mrs. Ming hadn’t hold Axel’s outburst against the boy and rather offered him to stay on her couch for the night, as it had been already quite late. She didn’t tell him to ask his parents for permission and in fact took Barry aside to inquire whether the boy had a place to stay or not. Her sad expression is still clear in his mind when he explained her that Axel is more or less, a street kid.

“I will, but I’m pretty sure the boy is really no bother to her. She’s already very fond of him, and it will give her some peace of mind to know, he’s not somewhere on the streets tonight,” James explains before he wishes him a good night.

Barry watches his friend drive off in the cool drizzle. He feels exhausted but in a good kind of way and decides to head in for bed.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you guys enjoyed this chapter. It's been another one that dealt with Barry and the relationship he has with the people in his life. I know that Len and the others have been gone for a while now, but I still wanted to keep this piece in because I really enjoyed writing it, and I like the notion of Barry sharing a meal with these three people, and put a bit more focus on him and Axel.
This has been the last filler-ish chapter before the plot moves on and some familiar faces are about to return. Have I mentioned before that we're also about to reach a part I'm so looking forward to? X).

I'm saying this not enough, but I'm really thankful for all of you lovely and kind people who are reading and enjoying this story! You all brighten my day! <3

This chapter has been edited by the wonderful Katzerover! Thanks so much, my dear! :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

“That’s a lovely train painting.” Barry glances over his shoulder to where Mary is currently standing behind him, while studying the sketch he is working on. He smiles. “Th-thanks, it isn’t r-really a p-painting y-yet, th-though.”

“But it is going to be?” she asks curiously.

He nods and turns back to the thick sheet of paper, on which he is trying to outline a background that goes along nicely with said train in the front.

“Is it a gift?” Mary takes a seat next to him and studies his sketch attentively, seemingly liking what she is seeing there. Barry looks at her in surprise at this, and she meets his eyes with a fond smile.

“You like to pencil, yet only do sketches; nothing that would consume too much time and never anything for which you would spend money on such a good paper. So, I guess, this is going to be a present for someone.”

“Y-your d-deduction s-skills are qu-quite impressive.” He smiles. “You’re r-right, it’s f-for a f-friend.”

“Is it for your employer’s nephew?” His astonished expression causes an amused glint to settle in her eyes, and she shrugs lightly. “You’re working on a picture for his grandmother, so this possibility probably isn’t too farfetched.”

Barry isn’t sure why, but he gets a bit uncomfortable due to Mary having immediately guessed for whom the painting is supposed to be. It isn’t that he wouldn’t have told her, but he wonders why she thought of James so swiftly.

Then, he tells himself to not be silly. She hasn’t even met James so far.

“Hey, what’s with that frown again, Bar?” Her fingers are soft and warm when she touches his wrist lightly. She studies him with concern. “Did I say something wrong?”

“N-no… I’m j-just b-being s-stupid.”

“That’s something I’ve difficulties to believe,” she argues kindly. Barry gives a small smile for it, before he turns back to the sketch in front of him and studies it quietly for a moment. “I’m w-worried you th-think t-too highly of m-me. I- c-can b-be qu-quite d-dumb at t-times.”
Mary rolls her eyes and gives his wrist a light squeeze before she lets go again. “Of course you can, but you have to admit that it isn’t far-fetched for me put you on a bit of a pedestal, compared to the people I usually spend my time with.”

“Eddy w-wouldn’t f-find th-this v-very f-f-flattering,” Barry points out amused.

His friend stays unimpressed. “Eddy knows very well that he’s an annoying brat most of the time, and he is actually aiming for it. I’m pretty sure that he wouldn’t be surprised at all that I hold you in higher regard when it comes to character and manners.”

“He isn’t that bad.” Barry laughs as he tries to defend the other man but knows very well, that Mary does have a point.

“He is, and it is part of his charm actually,” She disagrees amused before she glances back to his sketch. “So, this is for…. she gives him a questioning look. “James, right?”

Barry nods. “Y-yes, h-he l-likes t-trains.”

“In that case he will love it.” Mary smiles and studies the sketching again. “It looks really nice. Is it for Christmas?”

“No, h-his b-birthd-day is next week, and th-this is j-just a s-small p-present.” He shrugs and turns back to sketching some more.

The following twenty minutes are shared in a comfortable silence, and Barry is quite pleased with how nicely he proceeds with the background sketch.

“Huh”

He looks over to his friend who is studying a page in today’s Keystone’s Quickest and already slides it slightly towards him before he even has the chance to ask what has caught her attention.

“Look.” Mary shows him an article above which he notices the photo of a very rather facility. “There was a break in the CC’s S.T.A.R. labs last night.”

Barry hums and tries to ignore the sinking feeling in his stomach. “D-do th-they kn-know wh-who b-broke in?”

Mary looks back at him and a guilty expression crosses her face. “No, Bear, they don’t know who did it and… I’m sorry, I didn’t want to bring them up, I wasn’t thinking.”

His throat feels uncomfortably dry all of a sudden, and so he swallows before he shrugs and pretends to study the article. “It’s f-fine, r-really.”

Her silence makes it clear that she doesn’t believe him, but he couldn’t care less. He is not going to talk nor think about Len and the others, not now. He would likely have more than enough of this later on when he goes to bed.

“What d-did you w-want t-to sh-show m-me?”

She hesitates for a moment, eying him with a familiar concern, before she finally explains. “It’s just that I know someone who works there, one of my clients, and he’s mentioned in the text. I just found it curious, I guess…”

Barry glances at her and isn’t surprised that she looks a bit dejected as she studies the picture of the S.T.A.R. labs building above the actual article. He can’t help it but feel bad about it. Len and the Rogues keeping about from him isn’t her fault, he shouldn’t pull her down with him for it.

“Wh-what d-did h-he s-say?” he asks.

Mary meets his eyes and seems a bit surprised about his question before she gives him a small smile.

“He’s mostly just badmouthing some colleague of his and indicates that it is due to this man’s lack in following the standard security protocol that this coupe was successful,” she explains. “It just seemed a bit funny to me because he’s always going on and on about this Dr Elias when I’m over.”

“Is h-he h-his b-boss?”

“No, just a colleague, but he seems to be a really smart guy who is quite popular with the people who lead the facility and thus gets a lot of leeway.”

For some reason, even though he knows nothing about Dr. Elias, Barry feels a bit bad for him. He knows what it is to be disliked by your colleagues for being the golden boy.

Barry decides not to linger on this uneasy memory, and asks about what was stolen instead.

“They don’t really go into that, but I guess is some invention,” Mary suggests. She studies the article with a thoughtful expression, then she gives him a curious look. “Have you ever been there? At S.T.A.R. labs I mean.”

“Yes, a-a c-couple o-of t-times,” he confirms and picks his mug of tea up, which he has hardly touched so far.

“For work?”

He hums in agreement. He doesn’t mention that he had been there quite often as the Flash as well.

“You know a doctor named Carlson? He is about fifty now, and specializes in biomechanics.”

“Y-your c-client?”

She nods. “He’s quite the shy fellow but very nice, despite the fact that I hardly understand every third word he says when he tells me something about his work.”

Barry tries to think whether the name Carlson rings any bells for him. It doesn’t. “N-no, I d-don’t th-think I’ve m-met him b-before, b-but th-the C-C S-S.T.A.R. l-labs are qu-quite b-big, and th-they already h-held over t-two h-hundred s-scientists even b-back th-then.”

Mary whistles at that.

“Colour me impressed,” she chuckles. “Then you probably don’t know Dr. Elias either, do you?”

“N-no, s-sorry.”

“There goes my chance on gettingsome inside information.” Mary heaves an exaggerated sigh, and both of them share an amused smile. “You hungry?”

“I g-guess, are you?”

“A bit,” she agrees and glances over to his fridge. “You’ve any eggs around?”
It is the middle of December, and his fridge is still quite nicely stocked so Mary is lucky.

“Y-yes, a c-couple. Y-you w-want t-to m-make s-some s-s-scrambled?”

“What do you think of pancakes?” she suggests. “I’ve all of the ingredient other than for the eggs, and I feel too lazy to walk to the store around the corner.”

Barry likes the idea, especially because Mary makes the best pancakes. He knows that Sam and the other Rogues praise his cooking skills but, in his own opinion he has nothing on her.

About forty minutes later, they are sitting on the couch, each of them with plate in hand, and enjoying the still warm and sweet goodness.

It doesn’t come as a surprise at all when Eddy finds his way over to them, within the next five minutes. The man has unbelievable good timing when it comes to meals.

“Don’t be so greedy,” Mary chides when Eddy ends up with more than half of the still remaining pancakes on his plate.

“I’m not, I’m just a grown man,” he explains matter of fact. “We need calories.”

“For what? Lazing around the whole day?”

“Always you and your criticising, Mary.” Eddy huffs. “I’m really starting to get self-esteem issues thanks to you.”

Barry leans back and enjoys listening to his friends’ bicker. Having them both around is comforting, and he is glad that Eddy has passed by as well, albeit his friend told him he would not be around at all today. Barry concludes that whatever business the other man had to take care of, he must have been able to finish quicker than expected.

He jumps slightly when Eddy puts two of his pancakes onto his plate all of a sudden.

“So, here, now he and I have exactly the same amount, no reason to nag my ear off any further,” Eddy points out to Mary who rolls her eyes and shoots Barry an apologizing smile.

“I’m n-not th-that h-hungry,” Barry tries to protest, but Eddy cuts him off. “You never are, but you’re still always complaining about being too skinny.”

“Don’t be mean.” Mary slaps their friend’s shoulder lightly in warning.

“I’m not,” Eddy chuckles. “And don’t hit me. You’re too violent for such a tiny person.”

This earns him another slap, an audibly harder one.

Barry watches them for a moment longer, before he frowns down on his plate and starts eating again. It isn’t as if his friend hasn’t a point. He has just hoped that he could save some of them for the next morning.

“I want whipped cream,” Eddy announces all of a sudden. “Why do you eat pancakes without whipped cream, anyway?”

Mary gives him an exasperated look, and Barry pretends to not have heard him.

“You two have no idea what’s actually good food,” Eddy snarks.
“You want whipped cream? Then get up and buy some,” Mary tells him slightly annoyed.

“Why don’t you do it?”

“… seriously?”

Listening to them bicker, Barry decides it would be a good idea to ignore them for now and instead concentrate on his food. Having them around is nice even when he isn’t really listening to what they are talking about, after all.

“It’s like the damn monsoon out there.” James joins Barry behind the counter after having taken the trash out and judging by his drenched state, he doesn’t seem to exaggerate that much.

“I hate this kind of weather,” he grumbles as he uses a paper towel to wipe his face off. Barry looks outside the storefront windows and notices that it is bucketing down. He had gone through the order list he would have to send out tomorrow for the goods required to be restock so he completely missed how the weather has taken a turn for worse over the last ten minutes. At least he brought his umbrella to work.

“It isn’t s-snowing, th-though,” Barry points out and chuckles when his friend deadpans. “Yes, because snow would be so much worse than this downpour.”

“W-well, s-some p-people w-would t-think s-so.” His smile dies down the moment he realizes what he’s just said, and he could kick himself for unintentionally bringing Len up in his mind again. He swallows and turns back to the list he is rechecking.

“Yes, crazy people,” James agrees sourly, and Barry is relieved that he hasn’t picked up on his mood change.

“Oh, would you look at that ghastly weather.” Mrs. Ming enters the shop with a concerned frown. She most likely came downstairs to check up on them.

“Well, at least it isn’t snow,” James says in cheerful mocking impression of Barry before he winks at him.

“Not yet,” the older woman points out. “But according to the forecast this will change into the weekend.”

“Great…” Her grandson sighs and rubs his face in irritated frustration. “Cause’ driving in a city could get any worse than that.”

Barry considers mentioning that using the public transport system when it’s snowing, isn’t exactly fun either, but holds his tongue.

“You definitely must drive more carefully then, James,” Mrs. Ming tells him in concern and causes James to chuckle fondly. “Of course, lao lao.”

“And would you be so sweet and drive Barry home tonight once you are finished with the closing up. I don’t want the poor dear to catch himself something in this weather, while he is waiting for the bus.”

Somehow, Barry should have seen this coming, he is certain of it.
“N-no, it’s f-f-fine. I’ll t-take th-the b-bus,” he assures her. “J-James r-really d-doesn’t n-need t-to b-bother.”

“It wouldn’t be a bother,” James disagrees and nods toward the window behind him where hardly anything is visible, as a result of the rain. “I honestly wouldn’t want to have stay around out there and wait for the bus either, in this weather.”

“I’m s-sure it w-will l-lighten u-up a b-b-bit t-till w-we’re f-finished.”

He hopes so at least.

“Nonsense. Nobody should have to use the public transport when we have around such a rainstorm,” Mrs. Ming argues and gives him a reassuring smile when she notices that he is about to protest again. “And don’t worry about being a burden, I’m sure it is really no trouble to James. Isn’t it, dear?”

James shakes his head in agreement, and Barry has to bite down on the urge to sigh. A loud crack cuts through the air, and he can see out of the corners of his eyes how the night briefly lights up through the store window. It seems, that the storm isn’t even considering easing off a bit.

While he still feels bad about James having to drive him all the way over to his place, the notion to wait out there for his bus becomes less appealing with every passing second.

“Take it as a small thank you for the amazing painting you made for me,” the other man suggests when Barry keeps evaluating the rain with an unhappy frown.

“It’s a-a p-present,” he points out. “You d-don’t n-need t-to g-give m-me anything b-back f-for it.”

His friend rolls his eyes and sighs in mock exasperation. “I know, I still want to drive you home, though.”

Seeing that arguing about this would get him nowhere and that the notion of standing out there and waiting for his bus is not a very comfortable one, he finally relents and nods in agreement.

“Alright b-but only if it’s r-really n-not t-trouble t-to you.”

James smiles clearly pleased by his decision and assures him that this isn’t the case.

Mrs. Ming is also obviously relieved that he agrees to her grandson’s help and with that wishes them a good night and a safe journey home before she goes back upstairs to go to bed.

The rain is icy and pours down like out of buckets when they leave the store about fifteen minutes later. They hurry over to the car James as parked about thirty feet away from the entrance and while both of them have umbrellas, they are mostly soaked by the time they reach it, just a few seconds later.

Barry, who goes straight to the passenger side, looks up with a frown when he hears the other man exclaim something in another language, most likely Chinese, and it sounds a lot like a swear.

“Everyth-thing alright?” he asks worriedly and ducks down to see through his window side. It is difficult to make anything out due to the poor light and hard rain, but he can see that the opposite window has been smashed.

A sense of dread overcomes him all of a sudden, and just as he wants to suggest to James to go back inside, he hears a wet sounding smack and watches how the other man’s body grows stiff for a second before he slumps to ground. He freezes in fear when he notices that another person is standing behind where his friend has just been, but he can’t make out much other than that he or she is wearing dark clothes.

Barry feels how the adrenaline starts rushing through his body, and to his horror, he can hear someone moving behind him.

He has no time to turn around before something hard and heavy hits the back of his head and everything goes dark.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter is shorter than it’s usually the case, mostly because this part neither did fit well with the last one nor with the following one, thus you’re stuck with what I’ve dubbed the ‘cliffhanger’ chapter. It really mostly exists to advance the plot (and because of Mary ;), and I hope you don’t mind too much. The next ones will be longer again, and we’ll finally start with the part of the story I’ve been going on and on about. :)

I’ve gotten such lovely and kind feedback from you guys for my last chapter, and I don’t even know how to tell you how much this means to me, or how happy and blessed I am to have such wonderful readers like you! You’re just plain amazing! Thank you so much, my dears! <3
Chapter Summary

Barry and James find themselves in the hands of a very dangerous man.

Chapter Notes

Warning: This chapter contains explicit violence and mild sexual assault.

This chapter has been edited by my lovely beta Katzerover, and as always she has done an amazing job with it. <3

The first thing Barry becomes aware of when he wakes up is the horrible pain that threatens to crack his head open. It is so bad that he actually feels nauseated for a moment which doesn’t help in the least with the confusion and disorientation he experiences.

The queasiness passes, fortunately, and he groans in a mixture of relief and hurt.

“Ah, good. You’re awake.” The voice sounds muffled over the ringing in Barry’s ears, and it is utterly unfamiliar to him. A rush of fear overcomes him and he instinctively tries to curl up just to discover that neither his arms nor his legs are free. He whimpers miserably and tenses up when he hears the stranger once more, this time chuckling and obviously amused by his reaction.

Opening his eyes turns out to be more difficult than it should be, at least till a sharp slap lets the right side of his face erupt in pain for a couple of seconds.

“Don’t! You bastards, don’t touch him!”

This voice he recognizes. It is James’, and he sounds furious.

“Shut him up,” the stranger orders sharply towards someone behind Barry before he meets his wide confused eyes with an amused smirk. “Hello, Barry. May I call you Barry?”

The man is Caucasian, lean and very tall, at least 6’ 2″, with short dark brown hair and a handsome enough face that borders a bit on the plain site, as well as very intense green eyes. He is wearing a dark blue suit with a white dress shirt but no suit coat, and at first glance he doesn’t look really all that threatening, more like someone who is just on the way to grab a drink after a day in the office.
Definitely not what one would imagine an everyday kidnapper or criminal to look like, which means that he is probably higher up in the food chain of whatever gang or organization he belongs to.

“Your head is probably still a bit sore,” the stranger remarks without giving him any time to reply.
“Your took quite the bump. I’m impressed you’ve come around already.” The stranger chuckles at this, and while he doesn’t say so outright, Barry knows that his kidnapper doesn’t think that he looks particularly tough.
An unsettling and intimidating smile spreads over his lips, then, as he steps a bit closer.

Barry tries to move again, without success. He glances down on himself and realizes with a jolt of panic, that his arms and legs are bound to a chair. A small frightened whimper escapes him in response, earning another chuckle from the man.

“It’s alright, really.” His voice is deep and soft, and Barry tenses up when he gets so close, he nearly touches the edge of the chair between his knees. “No reason to be afraid, Barry. Nothing will happen to you if you play along.”

His kidnapper crouches down in front of him and rests his fingers on the wooden edge, close to his crotch. Barry feels how his heart nearly lurches up to his throat, and he starts shaking in response to this unwanted closeness.

“Hey there,” the stranger coos in a bizarrely soothing voice. “I just told you that you don’t need to be scared. Don’t you trust me?”

Another small noise escapes Barry, he sounds alarmed and afraid, and judging by how the man’s smile grows it is quite pleasing to him.

The stranger’s hands, which look big and strong despite having obviously been manicured not too long ago, move from their spot on the chair to his thighs, where they rest a bit above his knees. It is such an intrusive thing that Barry actually chokes out a small sob and once more tries to get away from him.

“Shhh,” the man hushes and starts to rub his thighs lightly as if to calm him down, while the unsettling smile still rests on his lips. “There, there, Barry. Just calm down. Nothing’s going to happen to you”

James starts yelling again, or tries to, at least. Barry doesn’t have to look around to know that they have gagged him. Still, his friend manages to sound furious and threatening nonetheless. Barry envies him for it. Any reaction other than being paralyzed by fear would be welcome to him.

“Your friend seems quite worried about you,” the stranger remarks as he glances past Barry to where James is. He seems amused by this fact.

“It is a bit surprising, to be honest,” he goes on and fixes Barry with his eyes again. “Doesn’t he know that you like to fuck little boys? Haven’t you told him?”

The look he’s giving Barry turns into one of feign reproach as he digs his thumbs painfully into the muscles of his thighs for a second.

“It isn’t good to keep such a secret from your friends, Barry,” he goes on and visibly enjoys how distressed Barry grows with each passing second. “How is he supposed to trust you if you aren’t honest to him?”

Bile is rising up Barry’s oesophagus, and he feels so terrified by what is happening to him that he can’t utter a single word. The stranger replies by smiling like a cat who caught the canary.

“Does Lenny know about it, then?” It takes Barry a moment to realize whom the other man is talking about. His eyes grow wide which in turn causes his capturer to chuckle.

“You look surprised, Barry. Have you really thought that people in the right circles don’t know about your little tête-à-tête?”
The hands start to rub his thighs again in a mock-soothing way, and it feels like he is being burned.

“I’m disappointed, Barry. After Kenneth, I’ve assumed that it became clear to you that you’re quite popular with us,” he explains. “Or you thought we would forget about you just like that? Especially after the odd stunt you pulled on him.”

Blacksmith, Barry thinks, this man has to work for Blacksmith. This notion confuses him; he doesn’t understand why they waited for so long if they were able to fetch him any given moment. And why now? It would only cause trouble with Len and the others, should they find out about this.

His thoughts come to a sudden stop when he notices the stranger moving his hands slowly up his tights closer to his crotch. An involuntary shudder overcomes him.

“D-d-don’t,” he pleads and feels a mixture of mortification and fear causing his skin to itch and tingle in a very familiar and uncomfortable way. Unwantedly, Michael and Puckett come to his mind.

“Shhh,” the man murmurs, and Barry feels like throwing up when he notices the nasty gleam in his eyes. “Maybe this will help you to relax a bit and show you that you don’t have anything to fear from us.”

A frightened groan escapes him, and he hardly picks up on James yelling furiously behind him, most likely cursing those guys to hell.

“We want you to cooperate with us after all, Barry. You see, you have to be our middle-man here,” his tormentor goes on, and he shudders when he can feel his fingertips reach the end of the inside of his upper thighs.

“Lenny and his little band of misfits seem to have become confused over who their real friends are, and I need you to make them understand that the Blue Velvet can offer them much, much more than this bitch ever will.”

What Barry hears causes his stomach to drop in an agonizing way; he could kick himself for being stupid enough to believe that the Rogues’ business with those people would not come back to haunt him. It seems that the BV and Blacksmith had some kind of disagreement and are no longer on the same page, and as a result his friends and by extension Barry himself have been caught in the middle of it. He briefly wonders why the Blue Velvet would be interested in the Rogues, but the man in front of him answers this next.

“They’re not the brightest, are they?” he asks in a condescending manner; his shark grin growing wider. “They’re tough, I give them that, but there are many tough people out there, and your fuckbuddy is under the wrong assumption that they differ somehow from them. It’s funny how thugs like them always think they are somehow special and more useful than the rest of their bread.”

Barry winces when the other man’s thumbs painfully dig into his thighs again.

“Do you think they are special, Barry? I’m pretty sure they can give you quite the ride worth your money, hm?” The way he leers at him causes him to whimper softly. “Oh, don’t be like that. I’m just asking, I don’t want to insinuate anything. I couldn’t give a rat’s ass who is pounding you into the mattress, to be honest.”

The criminal gives him a slow once over.

“Don’t understand why anybody would wanna fuck you anyway,” he says thoughtfully before he turns his gaze back to him with an easy smile. “Doesn’t matter, though, does it? What matters is that I need to talk to your little friends, and you are going to make this happen, aren’t you, Barry?”
When he just looks at his kidnapper, who’s crouching in front of him in confusion and fear, the still smiling man replies by intensifying his grip. Barry winces in pain and unsuccessfully tries to move away once again.

“Listen, Barry, I may look like I’m a nice guy and, don’t misunderstand me, I can be, if I choose to, but right now I’m really pissed and under a lot of pressure. I don’t give a fuck about you or the Rogues, but I need both of you, so please, for both our sakes, don’t make me hurt you.”

An oddly earnest expression crosses the man’s face, and Barry realizes that he is getting utterly overwhelmed by all of this.

“Come now, there’s no reason to cry. Do you really want to look like a baby in front of you friend?” the criminal murmurs and relaxes the vice like grip of his hands. He goes back to rub them in a calming manner over Barry’s trembling thighs.

“This will be over as soon as you agree to contact the Rogues for me, Barry. You just need to tell them that I want to meet them, nothing more.”

The man leans closer, so much so that there are just a couple of inches between their faces. His breath is warm and dry against Barry’s face, and he picks up on its faint minty smell as well as on the after shave the criminal is wearing. It causes something in him to stir in his lower belly, and the horrible realization that is body is acting against his will once again is nearly smothering.

“You will do that for me, won’t you?” his kidnapper asks in a calm and sweet voice. “It’s just to help me to clear up a misunderstanding. I even promise you, I won’t hurt your friends. I just need to talk to them.”

Barry, who is still crying quietly and shaking like a leaf in the wind, knows that the guy is lying. Of course he is lying. He has no intent to set him free and the notion that he has gotten James involved in this, makes him furious at himself and how stupid he has been.

“I-I d-d-don’t kn-kn-know wh-wher-re th-th-they a-a-are.”

It is the truth. He hasn’t spoken a word to Len or any of the others in weeks.

The criminal watches him quietly for a long moment, his face suddenly void of any expression. It scares him.

Then, he gets up, look back to the area behind Barry and purses his lips annoyed.

The backhand is expected. Barry has been in similar situations like this too many times before for it not to be. He instinctively tries to relax his neck and don’t offer too much resistance. It still is strong enough to cause the left side of his face to sear in pain for a couple of seconds, as a ringing fills his ears and a warm wetness run down his chin, most likely blood from a split lip.

The man lowers himself down, to be face to face with Barry anew and sneer. “You don’t seem to understand the position you are in, Barry. This is not a game, you will contact the Rogues for me, and don’t try to tell me you can’t, we both know this is bullshit. For whatever reason, Len is fond of your scrawny ass, and I know he’ll have left you with some means to get in contact with him. You know, just in case, because while that man is a fucking nuisance, he’s also smart.”

He grabs Barry on both sides on his head, as if to hold him in place, and digs his right thumb painfully in the wound of his split lip. Barry is too scared to let out a noise, though.

“Listen, I’ll do horrible, horrible things to you if you don’t get those fuckers to meet up with me. I know you are no stranger to torture but, believe me, nothing what has been done to you will even come close to what I’ve in store for you, you dumb little bitch.”

Barry cries out in pain when the criminal digs his nails into his skin and gives his head a painful shake. Then, the hands are gone from his face and instead his shoulders are grabbed. With a jolt, the chair he is sitting on is turned around and his stomach makes a painful lurch up towards his throat when he spots James, also bound to a chair with two big buff and mean looking guys on either of his side.

“But you know, it will be nothing to what it will do to your little friend there. I will make sure that he becomes familiar with what it is like to have another man’s fist up his ass while others fuck his pretty little mouth. Wouldn’t that be fun?”

A hand grasps his hair and gives it a painful tug as if to emphasize his words.

“He doesn’t seem averse to the idea of cocks in his mouth anyway,” the criminal adds nastily. Barry whimpers when the grip in his hairs tightens so much, he is sure he is going to rip part of his scalp off any moment now. “Maybe he’ll like what I’ve in store for him? He seems to be very fond of you. Do you think he would enjoy fucking you while he has another cock up his own ass?”

To James’ credit, he doesn’t look frightened at all, but really pissed off. He makes the impression as if he would lunge at any of the guys around him weren’t he bound to the chair, and it goes totally over Barry’s head because he himself is terrified and just wants to leave so very badly.

“Do you want us to try and see whether he could get it up for you?”

Barry shudders and can’t bring himself to speak.

“Well, maybe that isn’t the right kind motivation for you,” concedes the other man with a frown. “You would probably snap, and I really don’t have the patience for this.”

The fingers in his hair are gone a moment later, and he watches confused and partly numb due to the pain how the criminal makes a step towards James and pulls a gun Barry hasn’t noticed on him so far.

“What if I tell you that I’ll blow his handsome face off instead? Does that make you feel more cooperative?”

“N-no! D-d-don’t! P-please!”

“No? You don’t want to see what the insides of his head look like?” the man asks innocently as he points the gun straight at James’ head. “You sure? Most people really can’t imagine how messy such a shot to the head is. You really don’t wanna see?”

“N-no! P-Please, d-d-don’t h-h-hu-”

“Oh, for fuck’s sake, do you even know how fucking annoying you sound?” The criminal gives him a glare. “I really get the feeling I’m wasting my time here, and I hate wasting my time, Barry. I get really upset, when I do that.”

The man turns away from him and makes another step towards James. The grip on the gun tightens as he takes aim on the other man’s head, who is still scowling at their kidnapper but does actually looks a bit scared now.

“You want to tell me you agree to contact the Rogues, or you want me to give him a new look,
Barry? I’m not waiting any longer, tell me now!”

“Y-yes! O-ok-kay!” Barry gives the man a pleading look and prays he will put the damn gun away. This has nothing to do with James, it is his fault his friend got involved in this mess, he would never be able to forgive himself, should anything happen to him.

“Yes?” The criminal suddenly flashes him a dazzling smile. “Good, very good, Barry. For a moment there, I was worried you would be stubborn enough to make this really painful for both of you.”

The gun is lowered, and Barry lets out a breath he didn’t know he was holding, exhaling in relief. His body’s still shaking so bad that he is certain he would have fallen to the ground by now if it weren’t for the bonds that are immobilizing him. He feels sick again and notices that he has started to sweat like crazy.

“I’m relieved, really. I don’t want this to turn into something we all would regret in the end.” His kidnapper chuckles, and Barry thinks that, of all the things he sometimes misses from back then when he still had his powers, it certainly isn’t to have to deal with people who are so obviously crazy and full of themselves like this one in front of him. He glances over to James, who looks a bit shaken but clearly alleviated by not having been shot.

“So, how are we doing this?” The criminal sounds much calmer right now and steps back closer to Barry. “I don’t presume you simply have a number to call them on?”

Shivering, he shakes his head and closes his eyes for a moment.

“Hey there, now, everything is alright again,” the man says in a cheerful voice. “I’m sorry that I went a bit rough on you, but the clock is ticking and I’m really under a lot of time pressure right now, so please, if you could try to get it together and tell me how you’ll contact your friends.”

A note of steely impatience creeps back into his voice, and Barry shudders in response. He opens his eyes and slowly looks up to him.

“Th-th-there’s a-a m-mir-r-ror.”

“A mirror?” his kidnapper repeats with an arched eyebrow, before he snorts. “Of course, with Scudder that is probably the most convenient and safest way for them to communicate, isn’t it?”

Barry keeps his mouth shut and doesn’t respond, and the criminal doesn’t seem to expect him to, anyway.

“So, any mirror can do the job or just one in particular?”

“I-I… a-a c-c-e-r-t-t-a in o-one…” He feels like such a backstabbing asshole. Len gave him this in case he needed help. His friend was worried about him, and now he pays him back like this. His eyes start to itch even worse, and takes a shuddering breath.

“Come on now, there is really no reason for tears. You’re doing great, and it won’t take long before you and your friend are safe at home again, okay? You have my word for it.”

Barry doesn’t say that the word of a person like him, worths less than dust, and averts his eyes to the ground.

“You wouldn’t have this mirror on you by any chance, would you?”

He shakes his head in no, swallows, and explains to his tormentor that the artifact is in his flat.
“I-in th-the b-b-bot-tom d-d-drawer o-of th-the c-c-c… c-cupb-board i-in m-my b-b-bedroom.”

“Let me guess, the sock drawer,” the criminal chuckles, and doesn’t care that Barry doesn’t response. “Good, that’s something we can work with.”

The man turns to his two thugs. “Cut them loose and keep an eye on them. They’re not to leave the room, but they are our guests, so threaten them accordingly.”

Barry notices how both men, who are at least a head taller than their boss, tense up, as soon as he focuses on them. If not scared, they seem at least intimidated by the other criminal; not a very reassuring situation at all, and he feels his stomach drop when their kidnapper zeroes in on him once again to address him with another one of that absurdly nice smiles.

“Well, I’ll make sure that you get the mirror asap, so we can get over with all of this, and you don’t have to stay here any longer than necessary. Just try to relax while you are here, nothing will happen to you, as long as you don’t try to mess with me, at least.” Something shifts in his expression, it turns from friendly to cold and threatening in a second, causing Barry to get goose bumps.

“Should it turn out that, you try to play me for a sucker, I’ll skin your little friend over their alive in front of you pretty blue eyes.” He states that in such a calm and sober way that is just disturbing. Barry wishes he would finally leave, his presence becomes more and more unsettling with every passing minute.

“Tell these two gentlemen if you need anything, they’ll take care of it. I’ll have to leave for now seeing that I’m quite a-” As if on cue, his cell phone starts ringing, and he throws an amused look with Barry, not bothered at all that he just keeps watching him like a mouse would eye a cat. Without another word to them, the man behind their kidnapping answers his phone, vanishing out of his field of vision. A door is opened and shut again, and he is gone.

Their newly assigned guards, cut them loose from the chairs and warn them not to try anything in a gruff tone before they leave the room, locking it behind them.

Barry had slid off the chair and dropped to his knees as soon as the bonds were gone. He feels shaken and sick and decides that, it is probably a good idea to not try and get up again for at least a while. His body is trembling so roughly by now that his teeth are actually clattering.

“Hey, are you alright?” James is kneeling next to him, thoughtful enough not to touch him; he sounds very worried. Barry doesn’t understand why he still cares or why he isn’t totally livid with him right now, instead. His friend is in this horrible kind of a mess because of him, and he has to know this, after what has just happened.

“S-s-sorry… I-I… th-th-this… I-I a-am s-s-s… s-so s-s-sorry…”

A shudders goes through his body and he presses a hand against his eyes. He becomes aware of just now that he is still crying.

“Barry, are you hurt?” James urges him, and Barry feels even worse for it.

“N-no,” he shakes his head and takes a deep breath to calm himself a bit. There is his split lip but, this is hardly worth mentioning, and he knows James is not talking about it, as he saw Barry getting it. He is most likely talking about more severe injuries.

“Good.” James nods, but sounds wary, like he isn’t really believing him. “That’s good.”

They fall silent after the exchange and remain like that for the next couple of minutes, what gives Barry some time to collect himself again.

“I-I’m s-sorry, J-James,” he utters quietly and hates how badly his voice is trembling, so much, it must be difficult to his friend to understand him. “F-f-for g-get-t-ing y-you i-int-to th-this m-mess.”

James meets his pleading eyes with an earnest, worried look. He seems to ponder for a moment, before inquiring in a very grave and concerned voice. “Barry, what is going on?”

The fact that he still doesn’t sound aggravated or even just a bit angry, is hard to fathom for Barry, but he knows he should be grateful for it, even though he doesn’t deserve it. He swallows nervously as he glances to the concrete floor beneath him.

Briefly, he wonders if it would endanger James even more, should he tell him about his connection to the Rogues, but decides that it is most likely not the case and probably could even aid him in getting out of this alive. If they, by some miracle, were able to do just that, it would also make it clear to James that it is much safer for him to stay away.

The notion of losing James is painful to Barry, even though they have become friends just recently. Still, he owes James the truth, no matter how little Barry wants him to know about it.

Taking another shuddering breath, Barry turns back to him and starts to explain what landed both of them into this mess.

Chapter End Notes

After last week’s cliffhanger we finally know what is going on (somewhat, at least ;), and I’m quite excited that we’ve finally reached this little mini-arc. Barry is really in a touch spot right now, and Cameron… what can I say, he is awful, just a plain awful fellow you don’t want to be around, but still so much fin to write! XD

I really hope you guys enjoyed this chapter! There will be two more part of In The Lion’s Den before we deal with the aftermath of it.

Unfortunately, I've only about 8 chapters left I just need to make smaller changes before a I'm going to write a rather large part of the story from scrap again because I'm not really satisfied with how it turned out before. This will probably mean that my updates will slow down considerably (the new semester is starting as well soon and work is keeping me busy), but I'll try to stay regularly with them at least. This is just meant as a little heads-up, so that you’re not caught off-guard when my uploading schedule changes.

Next week will have Len return (in a way ;), and we will learn more about what kind of a guy Cameron really is. We will also be introduced to someone people who read the comics may recognize.
In the Lion’s Den Part II

Chapter Summary

The Rogues get involved, Len is not pleased, and Cameron turns out to be an even bigger dick than expected.

It is difficult, but Barry is able to his hand steady when he reaches for the mirror from the man who interrogated him before, and whose name he still doesn’t know.

Getting the shiny gadget from his apartment took hardly no time, maybe one hour tops if at all, and Barry notices that they still must be somewhere within the twins, most likely even within Keystone, given that James watch shows it is just around half past six in the morning by now, and the traffic is usually quite horrible this early in the day.

“So, here you have it,” their kidnapper says in a light and clearly pleased voice, and Barry has to fight a shudder when their fingers touch briefly which causes the other man’s smile to grow a bit as he hasn’t missed his reaction.

“You really have no reason to fear me, Barry. I told you already, nothing’s gonna happen to you as long as you play along.” It sounds a bit like he is being scolded, as if he is behaving unreasonable here, and he wouldn’t have thought it possible, but his dislike for the stranger actually grows.

“Come on, now, call your friends. We’ve wasted enough time already,” the man urges and his taunting smile is replaced by a much more somber expression. “I’ve other things to do, mind you.”

Barry nods, but glances briefly over his shoulder to where James is standing a few feet away. Their gazes meet, and his friend gives him a faint, but reassuring smile. His friend still looks tensed up and worried, though, and Barry wishes he knew what he is thinking. James hasn’t said all that much on what Barry told him about his relationship with the infamous group of criminals before. Not that Barry holds it against him, it is much to take in after all.

Frowning dejected, he eyes the small mirror in his hand and takes a deep breath, glancing briefly up to the criminal in front of him, who is staring at him fixedly, before he looks into the round reflective surface, and hesitatingly calls out for Sam.

A few seconds go by, after which nothing happens; Barry is quickly and without warning, overcome with the horrifying realization that, of course, nobody is going to answer. They pretty much decided on mutual terms, it would be unfavorable for both parties if Barry kept in contact with them, and even though he is sure that Len, had Sam check up on him over the last couple of weeks, and assured him this is just a temporary thing when all of this started. His friend must have realized by now that it may a much more sensible and clever thing for them to cut him off permanently.

In this case, the little mirror in his hand, has become pretty much useless and into a certain death sentences for both him and James.

This notion drained the color from Barry’s face, and the criminal in front of him has to have picked up on it as Barry can feel his gaze turn angry and unsettled without having to look up. The other man steps closer and grabs his wrist painfully rough to pull it a bit over so that he could also gaze in the mirror.

“What is the problem? Why is nobody-” He stops when Sam appears on the small round surface, and Barry immediately notices on how spent his friend looks. He is wearing his costume, mask pulled back, making way to a mop of unkempt hair, that is in dire need of a cut.

Sam holds a hostile expression and looks tense. Both of which catches Barry off-guard, and is glad his friend’s eyes only glance over to him briefly, before he spots the man next to him, which causes a rather impressive looking scowl to show up appear on his face.

“You have some fucking nerves,” Sam grunts, and it takes Barry a moment to understand that his friend is not surprised to see the other criminal, at least not that much.

“Good to see you too, Sammy, really. I was worried that your current mistress had gotten you killed already. We both know that our lovely Amunet isn’t really the safest person to be around, these days.”

“Screw you, Cameron.” Sam hisses angrily. “Your fucking feud is none of our business-”

“Well it is now, isn’t it?” the other criminal - Cameron apparently - cuts him off with a smirk, increasing his grip on Barry’s wrist, enough to make him flinch. Sam’s eyes immediately move over to him and, for a second, a concerned frown appears on his face before he schools his features again. He turns back to the other man and sneers.

“Is it? Do you really think you can blackmail us into working with you that way?”

“Why not?” Cameron shrugs and chuckles. “The cunt did the same, didn’t she? And it worked as we both know? Don’t waste my time, Scudder, get Snart on the line.”

Sam scowls at the other criminal darkly.

“He isn’t here.”

“You should better get him quick, in that case,” Cameron replies calmly. “Because for every minute that passes by, without me being able to talk to him, I’m going to break one of our dear Barry’s fingers here.”

Sam bares his teeth like a dog, snarling at him not to dare to while, behind them, James cries out in protest as well. Barry just stays quiet and closes his eyes for a moment. He knows he should have seen this coming.

“If you don’t want this to happen to him, you should better get your ass moving and get Snart for me,” Cameron says calmly. “Clock’s ticking, Scudder, so move it.”
Sam hesitates for a couple of seconds and glares at the other man. Then, he glances over to Barry and a more worried expression takes place on his features once more. He mutters something under his breath that sounds a lot like fuck, and the surface of the mirror shows suddenly their own reflection again.

“They really don’t want anything to happen to you,” Cameron remarks, and he sounds amused by this in a nearly incredulous kind of way. He turns his attention back to Barry and gives him another once over before he chuckles. Barry stays quiet.

It feels like they are waiting forever for Len, and Cameron doesn’t lessen the painfully strong hold on his wrist at all as the seconds pass by. His hand is like a claw to Barry, he is pretty sure that the other man knows how disturbing it is having him standing this close. He likely is doing it for just that reason.

While he keeps his eyes on the small mirror on his now slightly shaking hand, he is aware that James is watching him intently. Barry can’t bring himself to glance back to him, though. Finally, the mirror surface changes again, and Len’s face appears on it, his face sullen and exhausted, yet it’s still such a relief to see him again.

Len’s gaze struck and locked on to Barry’s, waking up a ridiculous sudden feeling in him to crawl through the small glass in his hand and hide away there till everything is over. It is so stupid, he knows, but on a subconscious level he is certain that his friend could protect him from getting harmed again. This notion nearly has him scoffing in anger and sadness. He knows things don’t work like this in reality.

“You’re looking good, Lenny,” Cameron greets in a calm, pleased tone. “Very much alive.”

Len doesn’t answer. He holds Barry’s gaze for a moment longer with his expression, not giving away much, only his clear unhappiness about finding him here. Then, he turns his attention to the other criminal.

“You hurt him, and I’ll break your neck.” It is unsettling how Len states this threat. He sounds utterly calm and serious.

Cameron smiles in response. “I don’t think so, Lenny. I think, instead, you’ll get me the info that bitch of yours took from us. And do so quickly, or I’m gonna hurt your little boy-toy here. Very much so, let me assure you.”

Both of them keep staring at each other for a long moment after that exchange. Barry is pretty sure Len knows as much as he does that this man is not joking. He’d probably known so already, before facing him here.

“You’re an arrogant asshole, Cameron, but you ain’t stupid. If we get this data to you, we are as good as dead,” Len states matter-of-factly and does not look over to Barry who winces, when Cameron’s grip tightens up, like a vice.

“It would be suicide for us but puttin’ that aside, you really know none of the data is worth shit. You saw it, you bitched about it to no end,” Len reminds him, and Barry can sense the criminal next to him, shifting almost imperceptible as if he was growing impatient again. “I’m not even sure whether Blacksmith still has it or not. We took it weeks ago and that woman doesn’t like to hold onto things for too long.”

“That isn’t entirely true, is it?” Cameron interjects with a smile that is sheer malevolence. “She likes to keep on to you, Lenny, doesn’t she? That stupid little bitch is fond of you, and I’m certain you can get her to give you the data or learn from her where it is.”

Barry whines softly when the other man digs his fingers painfully into Barry’s wrist, he is certain it is going to break should he not relax his hold a bit. He glances at Cameron, noticing that his mood has turned bad once again.

“I don’t care how you get it from her. Fuck her, torture her, whatever. I’ll leave this in your capable hands,” the criminal goes on. “You’ve till tomorrow 9 pm. Bring it to me, to the east side of the southern hall, at the docks, where the cunt likes to stash her goods. Oh, and don’t think for a second that you can take me for an idiot. I’ll check the data before you get your little honey-bun back and, should it turn out to be fake, I can guarantee you that I’m not the only one who will not walk away happy from there.” Cameron’s tightens his grip on Barry’s hand at this, causing him to whimper in response.

Len scowls and is about to protest when Cameron cuts him off.

“I’ve wasted enough time already,” he glances at his watch in exasperation as if to make a point before he stares back at Len. “You will bring it to me, or I’ll kill our sweet little Barry here.” Cameron chuckles softly and adds. “After having him fucked raw by my men, that is.”

“Lay a fucking finger on him, and I will gut you, Cameron,” Len threatens in a low, belligerent voice, but the other criminal laughs at his face in response. “I thought you were going to break my neck, Lenny? Haven’t really decided on that one yet, have you?”

Without a warning, he snatches the mirror out of Barry’s hand and throws it over to one of the thugs who is standing close to James. The guy seems taken aback but catches it nonetheless. “Hold it, so that our friend can see that my warnings mustn’t be taken lightly,” Cameron orders before he changes his grip on Barry’s hand and forces him violently on his knees, his arm pulled back away from his body twisted in such a way that makes it impossible for him to move at all without it hurting.

“What the hell are you doing?” Len snarls; Barry glances up to the mirror in the thug’s grasp to look at him. He feels absolutely terrified because he knows what follows now. Len doesn’t have his eyes on him, though, and it gets hard to breathe all at once.

James is yelling, when Barry looks at him over his shoulder. Two of Cameron’s men have him on the ground now, holding him down, his arms painfully twisted behind his back, while he is furiously trying to get up again. Barry wishes his friend wouldn’t have to see this. He wants to call out to him. He wants to call out to him, tell him to -please- look away, but his throat closed up on him again, and it is already difficult to get enough air in his lungs.

“I told Scudder before, I’m gonna break one of his fingers for each minute that ticks by” Cameron explains and sounds so damn pleased by the prospect of making his threat come true. It is disgusting, unsettling, and Barry has to bite down a sob at the notion of what is about to happen. The other man takes hold of the ring finger of his right hand.

“He doesn’t seem to have taken me very seriously, and I don’t want you to make the same mistake,” the criminal goes on, and Barry can’t bring himself to look up at him.

Len doesn’t reply. Barry isn’t sure how he feels about it. He glances up to the mirror, where he can hardly make out the other man’s face on the small surface, tries to tell himself that he should not feel so damn betrayed by it.

The pain is mind-numbing; Cameron breaks his finger at the base, with one quick jerk and the crack it makes is just plain horrible and sickening. Barry doesn’t cry out, he throws up. He is glad he has enough self-control left to prevent his bladder to give out but, this relief is a fleeting flame of comfort, before the hot, throbbing pain smothers everything and he starts to sob.

“You fucking bastard!”

It is James, he sounds still infuriated but, there is something else in his voice as well, a note of pain, however Barry can hardly concentrate on anything right now.

“He has pretty weak bones,” Cameron comments in a disgustingly amused way, and Barry wails up when he tugs at his broken finger playfully.

“I will kill you for this.” Len sounds cold and emotionless.

“Yes, you’ve stated so a couple of times so far.”

Cameron is clearly not impressed and chuckles softly.

Barry feels dizzy, he is sure he would fall face forward into his own vomit if it wasn’t for the other man holding him up. He winces when he lets go of his finger and briefly is flooded by relief before he grabs his little one. The sheer panicked horror that that overcoming him at that, is nearly overwhelming.

“N-no…” he rasps and tries to tug his hand away. “P-p-ple-ease…”

“God, he sounds awful, doesn’t he?” Cameron asks, and it is obviously directed towards Len. “How the hell can you stand him talking? He sounds like a broken record.”

“What are you doing?” This time, Len does sound upset, but Barry doesn’t really pay too much attention. He just wants to get away from this awful man.

“I told you, for each minute one finger, and it took your friend two minutes,” Cameron explains with a shrug. “Nearly three, to be honest.”

“Take your fucking fingers off him, you damn bastard!” James bellows yet again to no avail. Still, having him here, is actually the only source of comfort Barry has, so he tries to remember that he isn’t alone.

Again, the criminal gives him no warning before he breaks his next finger, which is actually a small mercy in itself. The pain is even worse the second time around, and, this time, Barry does scream.

He hardly picks up on anything afterwards. Moreover, there is just this horrible hideous, sickening pain and the feeling of being totally helpless again, which is even worse. He gets pulled back, so he falls backwards when Cameron lets go of his hand; he doesn’t pick up on it, till later but it must have been an unexpected act of kindness from his tormentor, to not let him fall into his own vomit.

Everything turns dark promptly after that.

Barry comes to himself, lying on a hard, cool surface in a brightly lit room. In the first instance, he is confused, his vision is blurry and clouded, and he doesn’t recognize his surroundings. Then, he notices the throbbing pain in his left hand, and the fog that has settled over his mind starts to lift. The memories of what transpired comes rushing back, and they are like glass shards under bare feet.
A small, distressed noise escapes him; he instinctively tries to curl up on his side, and make himself as small as possible. Unfortunately, his body feels heavy and sluggish, though, and he can hardly move. Briefly, he thinks that this must be due to him having been bound again, but he quickly realizes that this isn’t the case, when he can’t pick up on the feeling of restraints against his limbs.

Someone turns up at his side, he or she is hardly more than a dark blurry silhouette to Barry, and he immediately tenses up. This causes the ache in his hand to grow worse, and he cringes as a consequence.

“There is no reason to be afraid of me, Mr. Allen,” an unfamiliar male says. “I’m not here to hurt you.”

Barry doesn’t try to reply. He just nervously squints at the stranger and tries to get his eyes to finally focus again. He really wishes he had more control over his body; he wouldn’t feel so damn helpless then.

“You’re safe, at least for now,” the stranger goes on. “I’ve set your fingers back and given you something for the pain. You don’t look like the drugs are really doing their job, though.”

The stranger, almost certainly a doctor, doesn’t get angry or impatient when he fails to answer and in lieu he sighs softly before turning around and trails off from his visual field.

“I’ve given you some diluted buprenorphine, you should feel better by now,” the other man says from somewhere next to him. “I’ll give you another shot and let’s hope that this one does its job better. There isn’t much else I can work with in here.”

He actually sounds apologetic, and Barry wonders who he is and, whether he is one of Cameron’s men or another prisoner.

“I-it’s f-fine,” he says and has a coughing fit as his throat feels dry like a wasteland. This causes the pain in his hand to flare up again; a small whine passes his lips before he can bite down on it.

“Don’t be alarmed, I’m just going to help you to drink some water, okay?”

Barry tries to brace himself, out of instinct, waiting for the invading touch after those words. It doesn’t come, and he looks over to examine the man, who is standing at his side again, in confusion. He squints at him again through his blurred vision which only grew worse since his eyes have teared up thanks to the pain in his fingers.

“I’ll just lay my hand under your neck to lift your head a bit. Is that alright for you?” It feels like a balm to Barry when he realizes that the stranger is actually waiting for his agreement, before making any move. His tongue feels like sandpaper as he attempts to wet his lips. He wonders whether this is due to how long he has been out or maybe owing to the fact that he took that medication. In any case, he would give a lot for something to drink.

“O-ok-kay.”

“Good.” The other man nods. “I’ll slide my hand under your neck now.”

The touch is disturbing but not as bad as it could have been, and while Barry groans softly due to the unwelcome contact, he is glad that he doesn’t get sick or start to really lose his nerves over it. His head is lifted and a plastic cup is pressed against his chapped bottom chapped lip.

The water is cool and simply magnificent, and he is aware that he would drink it too quickly weren’t it for his current care-taker, who makes sure that he keeps a slow pace.
Once the cup is empty, his head laid back down onto the cool surface, which must belong to some kind of examination table, he sighs softly in relief.

“I can imagine you were thirsty, that is usually a side-effect with these sort of painkillers,” the stranger remarks.

Barry looks at him drowsily and mumbles a small, still raspy thanks. Before the other man can answer, the sound of a door being opened somewhere near him cuts through the room. Barry tenses immediately causing a white-hot pain to flare through his left hand and fresh tear flood his eyes.

“Doctor Elias!”

It’s Cameron.

Of course it would be that horrible man.

He sounds like he is in a very good mood, and Barry suddenly wishes for a cover he could pull over his head and hide underneath.

“How is our patient doing?” The man comes up to his other side, standing opposite Doctor Elias, and albeit Barry can’t make out his facial features, he knows he is beaming down on him.

“You broke two of his fingers,” the doctor deadpans.

“Yes, well,” Cameron actually sounds both amused and a bit sheepish. “I had to make clear how serious I was, and breaking his fingers was one of the least permanently damaging things I could have done, believe me.”

“I’m sure,” Dr. Elias agrees curtly and, despite the fact that he keeps his voice even, it is hard to miss that he doesn’t really think much of the damage inflicted upon Barry. “Then again, you also could have broken his nose, it would had brought your point over as well and it would be much easier and quicker to fix than this.”

“Don’t be like this, Darwin-”

“Doctor Elias,” the doctor corrects sharply and for a brief moment a palpable tension creeps up between them.

“Doctor,” Cameron grants calmly, and Barry feels himself getting sick? with apprehension when said man actually turns to him next and smiles. “It seems I’ve upset our resident physician.”

“I may be a doctor, but I’m not a physician” Dr. Elias interject, and he sounds audible miffed about this mix-up of his occupation. “And while I’m able to set broken bones, I would really rather not.”

“I know, and I am sorry for causing you so much trouble but, you’re here on your own free accord so, stop bitching.” It seems that the Cameron’s patience grows thin again, thereafter he is not in the mood for bickering. In fact, he turns to face Barry back, and even though his face is mostly just a nebulous mess to him, he still can discern a wide grin which holds holds too much white.

“How are you doing, Barry? I hope the doctor took good care of you.”

Barry only stares at him, he feels a bit like a deer caught in the headlights of a car that’s about to run him over any second now.

“Hey, now, there is no reason for that,” Cameron says in a surprisingly earnest tone. “I didn’t lie to the good doctor, I hurt you because I had to. You did well, and I’m seriously sorry for breaking your fingers, but I had to get Snart to understand that I’m not joking around. That man can be so fucking stubborn.”

Following that, Barry still stays quiet, watching the criminal warily. He is startled when the other man barks a laugh, and winces in pain.

“You really are terrified of me, aren’t you?” This is a clearly an amusing realization to him. Barry shuts his eyes and turns his head to face away from the man.

“Is he alright?” There isn’t real concern in Cameron’s voice, but he sounds curious.

“He is in pain, and his abuser is standing over him gloating, do you really need me to answer that question for you?” Dr. Elias says matter-of-factly, but the annoyance he must feel is coming comes off him in waves.

“You didn’t give him any painkillers?”

“Of course I did” the doctor grouses and actually looks insulted by the insinuation that he wouldn’t do something as primal as that. “They aren’t really working on him, though.”

“Really? Why?”

“I don’t know.”

By the icy way Dr. Elias is saying that, it is pretty obvious that he dislikes said circumstance very much.

“Aren’t you some kind of genius?” Cameron quips amused.

“Are you here for a reason or, just to distract me to take care of the man you’ve brought here, in the first place?”

“You’re such an uptight asshole, Elias, you know that?”

“Just leave, and let me do my work in peace. You are always going on about how busy you are anyway, so don’t waste your time here.”

Barry tries to make himself as unobtrusive and little of a target as possible as the animosity thickening once more between both men is not lost on him. It is terrifying, and the tension seems to make the pain in his hand grow even worse.

“Very well then, you’re right. I do have more urgent things to attend to,” Cameron agrees way too cheerfully, and Barry is flooded by relief when he can hear him walk away. It is as if a weight has been lifted off his chest, and breathing becomes more bearable again.

“By the way, doctor,” Cameron stops at the door and faces them again, yet Barry is still not able to distinguish anything more than a smudged shape of a person.

“You should keep in mind that, you may be all tight with my employers but, they are far away from here, and accidents can happen much quicker than one would think.” The threat is so painfully obvious; it could have hung in big bold letters above the man’s head. “Your fingers are more important to your work than they are for a salesclerk, aren’t they?”

The doctor stays quiet, but Cameron seems satisfied, nonetheless.
“I will come around to check on you later again, Barry. Try to get better quick, would ya’?” With that, he opens the door and leaves.

The room is so silent, you can hear a pin drop, before Dr. Elias ends it with a softly exhaled sigh. Barry turns his attention back to the aforementioned man, who is also looking at him, and can’t help but to feel a bit worried by the fact that his eyesight is still deteriorated, and he’s not able to see clearly, no matter how hard he tries to focus.

“You have problems with your vision?” the doctor asks and studies him with a frown as if he had picked up on the troubles. Barry only nods slightly as he feels extremely groggy once more. It seems that Cameron’s visit has cost him quite a lot of energy.

“That’s odd” the doctor mutters under his breath, before he addresses Barry again. “Are there any other symptoms that are not connected to your injury? Like dizziness, sickness, for instance?”

Barry frowns and debates if he should point out that dizziness and sickness aren’t exactly something uncommon to experience, after having some of your bones forcefully broken. Then again, he doubts the doctor has that much experience with these kind of things.

“T-t-tired a-and w-w-weak,” he croaks and unsuccessfully tries to lift his right hand to show what he means.

“Exhaustion can be a side-effect… Maybe an allergic reaction to the opioid?”

Again, the doctor speaks more to himself than Barry and keeps studying him an instants longer before he vanishes from his visual field.

When he returns, he’s holding something that looks like a syringe in his hand.

“I will give you something for your circulation. Your present state is most likely of a psychological nature, and the buprenorphine is only adding to it,” Elias speaks calmly, and while Barry keeps eying him warily, he can’t but be grateful for his attempt to make this a bit easier on him.

“I’ll touch your arm now, to give you the shot.” Dr. Elias warns him. “There’s no reason to be alarmed.”

Barry shudders slightly at the contact but tries to hold still. Something cool and wet is swiped over a patch of his skin and the sharp alcoholic smell of disinfectant reaches his nose.

“You’re doing very well, Mr. Allen” Dr. Elias works very swiftly and the sting of the injection last for a few seconds only, before he has the needle pulled out again. A small cotton pad is pressed against where he has just been injected with the drug, and the doctor orders him to relax when he tenses up again.

“I’ll administer you some morphine in a bit. It will probably work better with the pain than the buprenorphine has” he tells him, and while he tries to appear confident about it, Barry has the feeling that he really isn’t. It is just his luck that his spoiled body would cause him trouble with this now, as well.

“Wh-where’s J-Jam-mes?”

Despite being so tired that he has trouble keeping his eyes open, he wants to know that his friend is safe. Or at least as safe as he can be under these circumstances.

“Mr. Lai?” Dr. Elias inquires and sounds surprised. “The man who came in with you? Is he your Barry frowns and wishes for a straight answer from the man, but he still nods.

“I don’t know exactly, but I’m sure he is safe.” This doesn’t set any of his worries, and Dr. Elias seems to pick up on it. “If it helps to calm your nerves, I can go and check on his whereabouts.”

This is an unexpectedly kind offer, and Barry’s disbelief about it must be evident on his face as the other man chuckles curtly. “It’s no problem, I’ll just do a quick check up on him and make sure that he’s alright.”

They say not to look a gifted horse into the mouth, but Barry knows it is very unlikely that this stranger would display this random act of kindness to him out of the blue just like that. There is always a catch, especially with people like this doctor who is working for men like Cameron.

“You don’t trust me.” The statement catches Barry off-guard, but he doesn’t try to correct him. “Well, you seem like a smart person, so I’m not surprised,” Dr. Elias goes on, and while Barry still isn’t able to focus very well, he is pretty sure that the man is giving him a rueful smile.

“Y-you w-work w-with th-them,” Barry points out quietly, trying not to sound accusing. It probably isn’t a good idea to upset the man who is actually helping him right now.

“I do,” the doctor admits, “but that doesn’t mean that I agree with them or particularly like what they’re doing.”

“Th-that d-d-does-n’t r-real-ly m-m-make i-it a-anything b-b-better,” he remarks sluggishly which causes the other man to hum in agreement. “No, it doesn’t.”

They both fall silent after that, and Barry turns to face away from him. He admits to himself that he isn’t really angry at the doctor, and, though he may dislike the situation he is in, he knows that this is clearly not the other man’s fault. At any rate, he feels powerless and scared, and it is just so damn much to deal with when he can’t even be sure that he isn’t going to get James and himself killed, within the next twenty-four hours.

… or the Rogues.

“You should try and rest a bit, Mr. Allen.” Dr. Elias doesn’t sound upset, which is a good thing, whereas Barry isn’t sure he would dare to face him again otherwise.

“C-c-can y-y-you ch-check u-up o-o-o-on J-J-Jam-m-mes p-p-please?”

“Of course,” the doctor agrees. “I told you I would, didn’t I?”

He doesn’t seem bothered by his request, which is odd, but also both a relief and a bit unsettling, as Barry doesn’t have the faintest no idea why this stranger would agree to help him in any way.

“Just rest. I’ll look for your friend, and after that I’ll come back and give you some morphine for your hand.”

There isn’t really anything else Barry can do but comply. He is exhausted to the core, nevertheless the knowledge that the doctor might would go and check up on James, eases a bit some of his tension.

Barry doesn’t notice when his eyes shut. He thinks he mumbles a ‘thank you’ before everything fades away, including the throbbing pain in his left hand.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter is one I’ve looked really forward to. I was missing Len a lot, I didn’t really notice his absence so much when I first wrote this part of the story but going over it again, and posting it, actually made me realize that he and the other Rogues have been gone for a while now.

I love Cameron, well, I hate him, really, but at the same time he is so unbelievable fun to write, such a horrible character who offers so much riches when it comes to exploring his character and working with this resources of evil. ;)

Barry, on the other hand (and certainly Len as well) is probably cursing me for introducing him. Barry had to go through a lot again in this chapter, and the abuse he experiences is awful, and I’m aware that this upsets some of my readers who want for Barry’s life to finally pick up, and I’m really sorry about this. Things will eventually look up for him, but Singularity is just the first part of a two (maybe three?) part story arc, and it is probably the most daunting one of them when it comes to what Barry has to deal with. It won’t go on like this forever, though, I promise. :)

I really hope you enjoyed this chapter, I loved writing it, and it was a joy looking over it once more (especially after my beta did such a magnificent job editing it) even despite how dark it turned out to be in the end.

Thank you for bearing with me, and sticking with Barry through all the trauma he has to go through right now. <3
In the Lion's Den Part III

Chapter Summary

Barry and James are brought to the venue where Cameron has agreed to meet with the Rogues. Things turn ugly rather quickly.

Chapter Notes

This chapter was edited by my dear friend Katzerover. :)

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

It rains when Barry and James are finally ushered outside from wherever they were kept for the last day. Both of them have bags shoved over their heads and are pretty much blind to the world around them as they stumble their ways where the thugs are directing them with not so tender pushes.

Cameron walks in front of them, and Barry can hear him talk into his cell phone. The man isn’t speaking English, and while Barry isn’t really sure, he thinks it could be Spanish or Portuguese. There are bits he believes he recognizes from when he heard Marco speak it before, and even despite how worried he is right now, he can’t help but wonder what the man is currently talking about.

He wonders whether it has something to do with the Rogues…

This is probably a trap for his friends, he knows that, and he hates how helpless he feels that he can’t do anything to help them. He hasn’t hated his lack of powers this much in a long while.

As they walk, or stumble their way towards wherever they are lead to right now, Barry tries not to ignore the guilt that rests as a tight knot in the pit of his stomach. Any of this, everything that is going to happen, lays outside his reach of influence. It is a daunting realization.

Another push in his back nearly causes him to stumble, and he hisses when a sharp pain flashes through his broken fingers. He tries not to move his hurt hand too much, Dr. Elias immobilized his fingers with a splint to fix them, but even so it is nothing more than a temporary solution to keep the broken bones in their right position before he can get a real cast.

One of the last things he wants to do right now is to upset the injury by accident; it still hurts, but the sharp, nearly sickening pain has dulled down considerably by now, as the morphine has done a better job than the buprenorphine previously. It’s not enough to get the pain to vanish completely, but it helps, for which he is more than grateful.

He is also glad that Cameron told his men to cuff his hands in front of him and not behind his back like they did with James. Again, this is an unexpected and odd display of kindness from the dangerous man as it is most likely to spare him the extra discomfort and pain during the coming ride. It sets Barry off as it makes it harder to understand the criminal or to predict his reactions. Just the memory of how he touched him…
Barry grits his teeth and forces his mind towards another direction, unwilling to think about that awful experience.

He feels scared and really wants to get this over with. It is silly, but a part of him tries to assure him that things would be alright again the moment Len is around. He knows better, though, or should, at least.

Again, he is pushed and stumbles briefly before he gets his equilibrium back, causing him to yelp in pain as he moves his injured hand once again in response.

The notion to accidentally trip and worsen his injury in this way, is constantly on Barry’s mind, as it is a ridiculously difficult task to keep a proper footing and balance even without that jerk behind him.

He is still somewhat dizzy from the drugs, drained both physically and emotionally, unsettled, worried, and scared. It also certainly doesn’t help that he is as good as blind with the sack over his head.

When they are finally stop, Barry feels relief washing over him, and he wouldn’t have thought it could be possible to feel so glad about being finally ushered inside a car that belonged to his kidnapper. He follows Cameron’s lackey’s orders meekly, still worried about worsening his injury, till he is in the car seat at last.

“You’re alright there, Barry?” James flops next to him, his voice is low and a bit muffled by the layers of cloth between them, and he too sounds exhausted and tense. Barry feels another by now very familiar pang of guilt flood him as he is reminded once again that he is responsible for his friend’s presence, that he is the reason he has been dragged into this situation in the first place.

“Y-yes,” he utters and hates how his teeth are still chattering. He has been trembling like a leaf for the past two hours now, and he isn’t sure whether it is just his mind finally succumbed to this awful situation or whether it’s the drugs in his system.

Dr. Elias gave him a much higher dose than what be usual recommended for a man of his statue, but his body is obviously not reacting like it should to the medications, and this thought alone is quite disconcerting, so, once again, he shoves it forcefully away. He just can’t bring himself to be bothered by this as well right now, there is too much going on as it is, and being reminded how messed up his body has become is not helping.

“Come one, poppet, let’s get you buckled up,” a gruff voice says. Its owner must be one of Cameron’s henchmen, and Barry cringes away in a knee-jerk reaction to the unexpected contact when his shoulder is grabbed, but he is quickly, roughly pulled back and pushed in place for the man to fasten his seat belt. It leaves him shaken, his hand screams in pain as the thug is not really careful while adjusting it. Sickness and lightheadedness start to take over Barry one more time, then.

He hates being touched by strangers even if it is just a fleeting one, but this is so much worse. Unwanted memories flood his mind for a moment.

The feeling of hand on his body, hurting, forcing him to-

Barry shudders involuntarily, and squeezes his eyes shut even despite the fact that he is as good as blind. The pulse of his heart is throbbing loudly in his ears, and for a horrible instance he feels cut off from the world around him, pushed back into the past of when Michael and the others had their fun with him.

Then, he picks up on the noise next to him when, by the sound of it, James undergoes the same treatment as he just did before the doors are slammed shut, and the car is finally started.

The ride to the docks goes by in relative silence save for Cameron, who stays on his phone for the whole duration of their drip, sounding calm, nearly amused as he talks to whoever is on the other end.

It takes them probably no more than ten to fifteen minutes to reach their destination, but it’s still a relief when the car finally stops, and they are ushered out of it again. The sense of moving with a nonexistent visual feedback has caused Barry to grow even more nauseated, and the smell of the nearby river isn’t exactly doing much to soothe his stomach either. The mere thought of throwing up while having this damn bag still over his head is disconcerting, and he tries to concentrate on the sound of the men around him instead.

A rather forceful push against his back indicates him to get moving again, and he does so reluctantly. He doesn’t want for Len and the others to be hurt, especially not because of him, but, like a good bait, he is luring them in all the same.

It has started to rain during their ride, and Barry’s shivering grows worse due to the temperature drop that came with the weather change.

The knot in his stomach tightens up as he breathes in the mixture of humidity and the stench of the docks surrounding them, and it is honestly a relief to him when they are finally reach a building and are lead inside. It has only been a short trip from the car to wherever they are now, but the experience of blindly tripping and stumbling across the concrete floor has been dreadful and exhausting all the same, even though he's unfortunate enough to have already become somewhat familiar with.

Judging by the sound of the rain drumming onto the roof above them, and the subtle echo of their footsteps, it is most likely the warehouse where Cameron told Len to meet up in.

The air is less moist and easier to breathe in here; it helps to settle his upset stomach a bit. His shoulder is grabbed then once again, and he is forced to stop.

“You’re early,” Cameron sounds nearly excited as he says so, still somewhere close by in front of him, and those words cause Barry to tense up once more in hope and worry. He would have given a lot to just get rid of that damn bag blocking his vision to see what is going on-

“Save the small-talk and let’s get this over with.” It’s Len, and he sounds harsh, vexed, and Barry bites onto his lower lip, fighting the urge to call for him, feeling immediately silly for it.

“That’s one of the very few reasons I’ve actually appreciated working with you, Lenny.” Cameron chuckles as he goes on, obviously not disheartened by the hostile tone of the other man. “You always cut directly to the point. You never fool around, going straight for the guts.”

“You chose the wrong day to waste my time with your damn chitchatting, Cameron, so cut the crap.” Barry notices how strained Len’s calm is. He is obviously fighting to keep his temper in check, and it is odd to hear him so close to lose the grip on his emotions, as this is Rogue business.

Or maybe not. Not entirely, at least.

Barry swallows around the lump that has formed in his throat and tries to ignore how his eyes have started to itch.

“Of course, we’re here for a reason, after all.” It doesn’t sit well with him how cheerful Cameron sounds, not at all like he is currently in a stand-off with a group of the Gems’ most notorious criminals. It causes a heavy, dreadful feeling to settle over him, and he wonders if Len is maybe so wrought up because he, too, can sense how off the other criminal’s behavior is.

“Come on, then,” Cameron says with an audible smile. “Give me the data, and let me check whether I’m getting my portion of the deal, Lenny.”

“No,” Len sounds cold, angry, like he has not an ounce of patience left for any sort of the other man’s nonsense. “You send him over here, and afterward you get the data.”

Barry’s heart drops as these words sink in because it seems that Len hasn’t taken James in consideration as well. Before he can protest, Cameron cuts him off by barking a laugh, and it seems that the criminal has also picked up on this detail as well.

“I see.” Cameron chuckles. “So I’ve been dragging dead meat along this whole damn time? Pity, had I known you just want your little boy-toy, I wouldn’t have bothered keeping the Chink around. Well, I can take care of the little mistake right now.”

Cameron steps closer to them again, his footfalls are easy to follow, before the sound of what could only be the criminal’s gun being pulled out of its holster causes Barry’s heart lurch up to his throat.

“N-no!!! D-don’t! L-Len, p-please!”

Someone grabs his arm, presumably the thug who pushed him along before, and gives him a harsh tug making his broken fingers flair up pain. He whimpers in return.

“Shut up,” the criminal grunts sharply.

“Oh, for fuck’s sake, Barry.” Lisa huffs from somewhere in front of him. She doesn’t seem angered by his reaction, though, but more exasperated and even slightly amused. He envies her for finding anything funny in this situation.

“And you,” Lisa goes on with an audible sneer in her voice. “You ugly piece of shit, take your hands off him before you lose them.”

The crook’s grip on his arms only tightens in response, painfully viciously hard, and he growls at the woman. “Fuck you, you bottle-blond cunt-”

“Enough now! We don’t want to start insulting each other here, do we?” Cameron chuckles, and Barry exhales in relief when the grip on his upper arm finally loosens a bit again. He is pretty sure that he will bruise there.

Well, unless he dies in the next couple of minutes which would mean that bruising would become a rather obsolete thing to worry about.

“Now then.” Cameron is undoubtedly talking to Len again. “Bring me the data and let’s get this over with. I’m starting to grow a bit impatient here, and it’s never good for me to have a loaded gun in my hand when I’m in such a mood.”

“No,” Len refusescoldly. “You send them over first, then you get the data.”

“God, do you really have to be such a damn pain in the ass about everything?” Cameron’s voice is still light, but Barry can pick up on the edge that wasn’t there just a moment ago. He knows that Len is trying to make sure both James and him are getting out of here alive, however their kidnapper doesn’t seem inclined to compromise whatsoever.

Barry jumps slightly, breathing in sharply when suddenly something cold and hard is pressed against his forehead.

It is the muzzle of the gun.

Instinctively, he tries to step back and get himself out of harm’s distance, but the thug behind him firms his grip on his arm once again and also grabs his neck tightly, making it unable for him to get away or even really move at all.

Barry freezes, the feeling of being held in place, forced to keep still, causes him to whimper softly, a mixture of fear and dread bites into him, making it difficult to breath.

He can hear James call out his name, alarmed. While his friend can’t see him due to the bag over his head, he probably has a considerable good idea of what’s transpiring with Barry right now.

The tension in the air is thick enough to cut through it, and Barry’s skin starts to itch again in such a horrible way that he wishes his hand were free. It feels like his skin is shrinking, like it is getting too tight for him, and it is such an upsetting feeling that he is hardly able to stop a sob. It is like ants are crawling all over him.

He hardly picks up on how his trembling has grown worse or how his teeth are chattering so loud now that it has to be audible to the people around him.

“See what you’re doing here, Lenny?” Cameron gives the muzzle a painfully hard shove. “You’re messing things up again! Your little sweetie isn’t doing so great, is he? Because you stupid arrogant fuck think you can mess with me!!!”

The man bellows the last words with such fury that Barry actually whimpers in fear. The criminal chuckles at that. “Look, he gets it. Your little fuck-boy gets it, but not you?! Really?! What the fuck, Snart?! Aren’t you supposed to be smart?! Aren’t you supposed to know that you don’t mess with the big boys?!”

Barry’s right side of his temple explodes in pain, and it takes him a second before he realizes that Carmon must have smashed to gun into it. His knees give in, he sacked to the ground, feeling dizzy and lightheaded. He can hear people crying his name, James again, but this time Lisa and Len as well. They sound so very angry...

It is strange how something like this can hold so much familiarity. Pain, dread, helplessness, and bone chilling fear, emotions that were his constant companions for years-

“You know what, Snart? Why don’t we change our little agreement?” Something nasty creeps into Cameron’s tone then. “Why don’t I simply shoot your little bitch before my men shoot you, and then, finally I’ll have the fucking data!”

“You touch him one more time, and I’ll strangle you with my bare hands!” Len snarls at the other criminal, and Barry whimpers softly when he realizes that he doesn’t doubt that his friend really means it. The notion is unsettling, and he wishes he could protest, tell him and the others that he doesn’t want them to kill anybody. He wants them to leave, he wants them to stay safe, but his head feels like it is about to split open and he can’t formulate a single word.

“What do you think of this idea,” Lisa joins in with a hiss. “We shoot your men, we get Barry, and keep the data. Then we show you what wonderful hosts we can be to pompous little fucks like you?”

“Why take him hostage.” Mick grunts, and Barry suddenly wonders whether all of the Rogues are currently present. “I can burn his skin off just as well.”
“Could we please not talk about burning people alive,” Hartley pipes up, and he sounds awful, like he is really fighting not to grow sick.

“You didn’t need to come along, the only thing you are good at right now is getting the rest of us sick as well,” Sam adds which in turn causes the ginger to huff in annoyance.

“Shut up.” Len obviously doesn’t find his colleague’s banter particularly amusing right now, and Barry can imagine the storming glare he shoots at them. He agrees with him, this is really not the time nor the place to joke around, but, even so, listening to his friends behaving as if they weren’t about to die, still helps to ease a bit of his apprehension and fear away.

Undeterred by the pain, Barry is glad to know that they’re still okay.

He has worried about them a lot over the last couple of weeks, he just wishes that he would have met them again under better circumstances.

“I appreciate your humor.” A shudder goes through Barry when he hears Cameron speak then, stepping closer to him again. His temple still hurts so much that it is overshadowing the pain from his fingers, and he picks up on the feeling of warm wetness running down the side of his face, blood.

“I really do.” Cameron sounds much calmer again, and it is nearly more frightening than having him screaming and yelling.

A hissing noise Barry hasn’t heard in a very long time cuts through the air, the sound of Len’s Cold gun powering up, and the men around him start to fan out, doubtlessly targeting the Rogues in return, as the tension in the air thickens.

“Step away from him.” Len seems to have gotten his grip back over his temper. He speaks in a low and nearly eerily calm voice, which is so much more reassuring that the previous agitation and anger he displayed mere minutes ago.

Barry relaxes a bit in response, feeling once again that silly certainty that his friend would make this awful situation okay again.

“Or you turn me into a popsicle?” Cameron sounds as if he wasn’t concerned at all about the direction things have started to head into. He seems actually amused by it, which can’t mean anything good, and while Barry doesn’t understand much of what is going on right now, he still knows things are about to get very ugly.

For a split-second, he feels an odd kind of deja vu overcome him, and it is as if he was back when he still wore the red costume, facing off one of so many unhinged individuals he was confronted with so many time. Just that this time, he is not in control of the situation, not able to do anything but wait and let the others handle it.

He feels helpless, he has been feeling helpless for a very long time now.

“I don’t think so, Lenny.” Cameron chuckles with an audible smile in his voice.

Barry closes his eyes and wishes James wouldn’t have to witness this. He wishes Len wouldn’t have to either-

“No!” Len outcry is one of surprise, fury, and terror, and Barry knows what is going to happen before he hears the gunshot pierce the air. The pain in his abdomen is immediate. It is a dozen times worse than the one from his temples or his hand. It is deafening, it blocks out anything else and for a long moment there is just the white-hot fire in his lower body, so intense, even breathing seems like an impossible action.

Barry had been shot before, not that often thanks to his powers, but each time was an awful experience. The difference between his current situation and back then, is that he was able to heal ridiculously fast in the past, and the pain generally started to fade away after a few minutes even when the bullet didn’t go through.

This is no longer the case, though. He was never shot like this before, not as a normal human, not in his abdomen, and to make matters worse, it is probably the most excruciating pain he’s ever experienced.

Someone grabs his shoulders, and he is pulled away. The pain that seems to be about to swallow him whole, flares up in return, and he just wants to scream, till he realizes that he already is.

Then a hand is pressed against his stomach, applying pressure to the gunshot wound, and Barry thinks he’s about to throw up due to nauseating amount of pain this causes him in return. His attempts to get the person to release him are feeble, weak, and he breaks out in a cold sweat.

The bag is pulled away from his face and the air that hits his clammy skin, is soothingly cool and clear.

“-ry. Barry, look at me.”

It takes Barry a moment to focus on who is kneeling next to him, with both his hands pressed on his abdomen again.

“It’s okay, Barry,” James says, and while he looks like a mess, livid, pale, and with dark rings under his eyes, he speaks in a composed and soothing tone to him.

“You’ll be alright,” he assures Barry and gives him a comforting smile. “Don’t worry, you’ll be okay, we’ll get you out of here. You just have to stay with me, okay? Can you do that for me, Barry?”

Barry nods slightly and just tries to keep focused on his friend despite the seething pain. His mind feels sluggish, as if his thoughts have become thick and slow like actual molasses, and he has trouble thinking straight.

A loud crash can be heard next to them, and Barry realizes that James must have dragged him behind one of the nearby containers that are filling the warehouse. The fight between the Rogues and Cameron’s people seems to take place on the opposite side of their current hiding spot.

There are people shouting, and yelling, and Barry picks up on a vaguely familiar female voice. He tries to match it with a face or name but gives up as he starts to grow dizzier and more tired by the second.

“Barry, you must stay awake,” James tells him again, looking surprisingly panicked all of a sudden.

Barry wants to protest that, yes, he is awake, but can’t get his mouth to work other than the permanent chatter of his teeth.

It’s getting so cold…

There is another loud crashing noise close-by, and out of the corner of his eye he believes he can see the ominous massive wall of containers shake menacingly. He really hopes that nobody is able to make it fall as neither James nor him are in a safe position should this happen, and he really doesn’t want to be squeezed in addition to being shot.

“I offered you a place at my side!” The woman who was screaming before, bellows again. She sounds both furious and hurt, and Barry shudders when he now recognizes the voice. It’s Blacksmith which is confusing, as he doesn’t understand why she would be here. The Blue Velvet and Blacksmith gave the impression to have split from what he grasped before.

Could Len have brought her along?

Barry tries to move his head a bit to look towards the direction of her voice but feels too weak to do so.

“I let you in my bed, you damn jackass!” Barry frowns and trembles. Is she talking to Len? Are they fighting? This is a worrying thought as his friends have their hands full with Cameron and his men as it is.

“Shhh, it’s fine. Everything’s fine, Barry.” James looks him straight into his eyes and gives him a tight smile. “Just hold on, you’re doing great.”

He tries to return it, not really sure what his friend is talking about anymore, before he hears Blacksmith again, sounding just as furious and closer this time. She isn’t the only one shouting, though, it looks like there are more people around than the initial handful of goons that showed up with them.

The air is filled with gunfire and yelling but even so, Blacksmith’s voice somehow gives the impression to raise above all of it as she screeches. “I’ll cut your chest open and rip you heart out for this, you damn bastard!!!”

“Don’t! Damn it, Amunet!” This is Len. Barry feels something in his chest tighten as he realizes once again that his friend’s life is currently in danger, and he can’t do anything.

“I’ll start with your little lover-boy first, though! I’ll cut his heart out and let’s see how you’re going to like it!” Something really nasty has creeped into her voice before she calls to her men. “Keep him busy!”

They have already sounded close enough that Barry assumed that they were just on the other side of the container James and he are hiding behind, and he hopes, despite knowing better, that she won’t be able find them.

Barry is terrified, hurt, and plain down exhausted, on top of his increasing dizziness, and he doesn’t like it when people fight, especially when they are this angry and screaming…

There are footsteps coming closer, running, and he can feel James grow stiff next to him and hiss a curse under his breath. Barry frowns in concern, worried about his friend, and with much more effort than should have been necessary, he is able to move his head a bit back at last, so he can see what has the other man so worried.

“There you are, pretty boy.” A familiar woman with long dark blue hair and dark skin grins down at him from where she just appeared around the corner of the container.

Blacksmith.

There is so much malice and hate in her gaze, it is frightening, and due to the increasing feeling of disorientation and confusion, it takes Barry a moment to remember why she is so angry at him.
“Let’s see if he still wants you when you’re nothing more than a corpse.” She hisses, and he can’t help but frown at her.

Right, she has quite a temper, she hasn’t been very nice when she visited him at work, either.

“Don’t!” James pleads abruptly, and Barry has the feeling that someone tries to rip his intestines out through the bullet wound. He can’t breathe, and for a horrible moment he is certain that he is going to die.

Then, the world around him comes back into focus and the pain subsides into the background once more, replaced by a feeling of utter disorientation and exhaustion.

Briefly, there is nothing but stunned silence around him. The lights above are too bright for him to make anything out from his whereabouts. His chest feels too tight all of a sudden, and he has to cough. Hot moist liquid gushes over his lips as he does so and the metallic taste of blood in his mouth is nearly overwhelming.

“Please, he needs help! He has been shot!” James sounds close to panicking now, his former calm is nearly completely gone, and Barry tries to glance over to his side, where his friend’s voice came from but he’s not able to get his head to move at all. His limbs feel like they are made of lead, like he is stuck in place.

Then, in a blink of an eye, hell breaks loose around him, and he notices how James and him get engulfed by other people, as they start to speak over each other in agitation. Somebody yells about hurrying up and getting him into the ER.

It is the last thing Barry hears before he passes out.

Chapter End Notes

So, and this the last part of the mini arch about the first confrontation between the Rogues and the BV. Well, technically not first, but probably their most violent so far.

I hope you guys enjoyed it, this is like the tenth version of it that I’ve written over time, and I really have to thank Katzerover for her imput and suggestions she had for it.

The screen of my laptop is dying (after having it for about 5 months... -_-* ), I'll send it in to get it fixed, which means that I'll probably be without my beloved companion for about two weeks. I'm not sure whether I'll update because of this next week or not, but I'll try. :)

And, before I leave you to it, thanks again to all you wonderful people who take the time to leave me a comment. I'm really lucky to have such amazing readers as you. <3
Hospital Stay Part I

Chapter Summary

Barry has to give his statement about what happened at the docks to two officers. He wishes he could have had another day or two to recover a bit more from his surgery, but at least James sticks around for support.

Chapter Notes

This chapter is now edited by the lovely Katzerover, all the remaining errors are on me. ;)) Thanks a lot, my dear! <3

The italic parts take place in the past, I try to make things a bit clearer this way because it probably can get a bit confusing otherwise with how I've embedded these section on the text.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Barry is glad that James decides to stay when the two officers from the KCPD arrive to take his statement about the incident at the docks. His friend had already given his own while Barry was still in surgery, and he probably has better things to do than stick around for this, especially after everything that happened, but even so he assured him that it was fine.

“It’s really no problem,” James told him for like the fifth time shortly before the two officers arrived, obviously not missing how apprehensive he was about the upcoming chat. “And you’ve nothing to worry about. You didn’t do anything they could hold against you, Barry.”

It goes over Barry’s head why James would show him this kind of support after everything he went through because of him. The guilt about what trouble he causes him has been sitting like heavy lump in the pit of his stomach since he was lucid enough after his surgery to remember what had occurred, and he thought about pointing out that he is the very reason they were kidnapped in the first place…

He decided to hold his tongue in the end, though. The notion to talk to the two cops on his own scared him enough to just be grateful for his friend’s decision to be there during the interview.

Being hurt in a hospital while being interrogated about what exactly got him there is something he is all too familiar with, and it causes memories to rear their heads of which he would have preferred that they stayed forgotten.

It doesn’t help that he is as good as immobile, or that he has troubles to concentrate on what the young officer sitting next to his bed is saying, and he tries not to show how dreadful the experience is and how intimidated he feels just by the cops’ mere presence. This could make him looks suspicious, guilty, and he is away that getting back to the Heights is ridiculous easy for someone like him.

He swallows nervously, his mouth feels dry and raw, and he wishes once again that his doctor hadn’t deemed him lucid enough be questioned about the kidnapping despite the fact that he is still on quite heavy pain medications.

It is his second day in the hospital, and after spending the majority of yesterday in a drug induced sleep, it seems that his period of grace was over. At least, James had the opportunity to inform his statement to the police before the officers’ arrival.

“These people were after some information about a contract my employers are currently working out with another company in Taiwan. I told the police that they wanted me, and that you were just an unlucky by-stander who got involved by accident,” his friend explained to him shortly after Barry finished eating the tasteless broth he had for breakfast.

Finding out that James had lied for him, and gotten himself and his occupation in possible danger to cover for him, has left Barry pretty much speechless. A part of him is obviously grateful for his help, another one only adds to the guilt he is already feeling over causing this man so much trouble.

If it hadn’t been for Barry, James wouldn’t have been kidnapped and hurt in the first place, and against all reason his friend has still decided to help him instead of kicking him out of his life like most people would have done in his stead.

James made sure that he would not get in troubles for what happened to them.

After all the turmoil they went through because of him, the other man is still willing to help him.

“Y-y-you d-didn’t h-have t-to l-lie,” he told him in a faint, groggy voice after James informed him about what he had told the police. It had been difficult to speak at all, as the drugs they are giving him against the pain have the side-effect of making him feel quite tired, ever after he slept through the majority of the last one and a half days.

“I know.” James met his eyes with an earnest look, and for a couple of seconds he studied him with a thoughtful look and seemed as if he wanted to say something else to that matter but settled on changing the topic in the end-

“You can’t recall anything after you were shot?” Barry flushes slightly when he realizes that he briefly zoned out and turns back to the officer with a guilty expression. His head feels like it is stuffed with cotton, and staying focused on something is hard enough without him letting his mind drift off.

“N-no,” he affirms meekly.

“You couldn’t make out anybody?” the officer in charge of his interrogation asks again, and judging by the way he is frowning at his answer, he is clearly not satisfied with how little information Barry seemed able to give them.

Barry swallows, nervous, and tries not to feel so damn skittish of this man. His behavior gives away the wrong impression, like a guilty man, secretive, uneasy... a one-way ticket to Iron Heights, and the notion alone that he could be put there once again is terrifying enough that it makes it difficult to talk or think straight at all.

Barry shivers and winces, causing the pain in his abdomen to briefly flare up. He really wished the doctor may have given him another day to recover a bit more before he allowed the questioning to take place. The mixture of dizziness and pain makes it only harder to try and appear collected and not like he is trying to hide something.

Despite the apprehension of having to deal with the police, the officers haven’t been hostile towards him so far, though. They introduced themselves and explained to him why they were there, the usual procedure Barry is still familiar enough with, and it actually helped to ease his worry a bit.

There is no palpable dislike involved in the way they treat him, but he doesn’t miss how they keep looking at him when he takes too long to respond due to his stammer, or when he isn’t able to remember some pieces of information James told them.

It isn’t that his friend came up with an especially elaborate story, he stuck as close to what took place as he could. The problem is that Barry really has issues putting his memory in order. His mind isn’t just feeling heavy and thick, but his thoughts just don’t make much sense at times when he tries to look back to some particular event from that two days, especially from right after he was shot.

Now, both officers exchange one of those looks again, like he is difficult on purpose, or like he is being difficult on purpose or like he is hiding something, and while they don’t really let it on, he is pretty sure that they know who he is.

Former cops with a history like Barry’s usually stay in the memory of their colleagues for a very long time, and seeing that the Keystone City police department works rather close with the one in Central City, he has no doubt whatsoever that the rumour mill did its work.

The train of thought is daunting and embarrassing, and Barry can’t stop himself, he glances over to James who is sitting opposite to the officer who is questioning him. It is mostly because the presence of these two policemen makes him uneasy, but he still knows that they could easily get the wrong idea from it.

“They put bags over our heads. Is it really that difficult to believe that he isn’t able to describe what the place they brought us to looked like?” James hasn’t missed the cops’ behaviour either, and Barry furrows his brows. His friend getting himself in trouble once more by trying to aid him is about the last thing he wants to happen.

“You were able to give us a layout of the place, Mr. Lai,” the officers who is doing the questioning steadies his gaze as he points this out. He has introduced himself as Officer Kimber, a man around Barry’s age with a soft, round face which holds a very sombre expression.

“Because I managed to pull the bag off while these people started to shoot each other.” His friend spat, clearly annoyed and displeased by the cop’s behaviour.

“But you couldn’t make out the face of the guy who brought you to this very hospital,” the other officer interrupts him notably incredulous. He is leaning against the wall next to the observation window that shows part of the pastel green hallway wall outside the room.

James’ face hardens at this statement, and he straightens up a bit, his patience paper thin by now.

“No, I told you I couldn’t. I already explained to one of your colleagues that, whoever helped us, was too fast,” he admonishes, and Barry nearly cringes, James makes a perfect teaches impersonation, who’s trying to make an especially slow student understand a hard task. The other man, Officer Miller, scowls in response, clearly not amused by being addressed in such a tone.

“One of our colleagues had the opportunity to talk to Jay Garrick about this, and he later told him that none of the twins’ speedsters were involved in your rescue,” Officer Kimber adds before his partner could response. He meets James’ gaze with a slight frown. “You’ve to agree that it is rather odd that you’re saved by a mystery person who seems to be as fast as one of them.”

“I do,” James agrees calmly as he leans back into his chair crossing his arms across his chest. “I also found it a rather odd experience to be kidnapped, honestly, or to have a friend of mine being tortured I’d spill some information, which I didn’t have, by the way. I found it odd to learn what it sounds like when someone’s fingers are broken, or what it feels like to be hit over my head with enough force to lose consciousness.”

Barry watches how his friend hold the officers gaze coldly before a humourless smile spreads over his lips.

“Or maybe odd isn’t really the right word,” James concedes and for a moment an uncomfortable silence follows.

“I think we’re done here.” Officer Kimber says after clearing his throat, turning to Barry. His expression is mostly neutral, but Barry can still pick up on the slight discontent in the other man’s eyes as he regards him. “We’ll come back to you if some more questions turn up.”

Barry nods quietly and doesn’t miss how the officer doesn’t give the “Here’s my number, in case you remember anything else” speech. They obviously don’t believe that he would be of any help in any case.

Officer Kimber gets up and turns to James who is also on his feet again. “Thank you for your cooperation. You’ve my number in case you should remember something you haven’t so far. At any rate, my colleagues are currently talking to your employers and, should nothing else turn up, this should have been it for you. At least, till we get the guys who are responsible for the kidnapping.”

It remains unsaid that it is a very unlikely outcome for the police to apprehend anybody involved in what happened at the docks. The twins’ police departments weren’t even aware that the Blue Velvet had found footing in the twin cities before yesterday, and they also know next to nothing about a criminal with the alter ego of Blacksmith.

Barry watches how Officer Kimber gives James a faint but somewhat apologetic smile. “I’m sorry for what has happened to you.”

James purses his lips rather grimly but nods anyway. The officer seems a bit taken aback by his reaction but leaves it there and instead signs to his partner that it is time for them to take their leave. Officer Miller gives them a watered down version of an evil eye on his way out as he pulls the door shut behind them.

“What a joke,” James mutters, visibly annoyed as he watches the cops leave through the window for a moment longer. Then he turns to Barry, and his frown deepens when he notices how pale he got once again.

“Don’t mind them, they may be insensitive and tactless idiots, but I doubt that they’ll trouble either of us again, not anytime soon at least,” James assures him as he sits back down.

Barry swallows around the lump in his throat as he regards his friends for a moment before he turns his gaze to the whit hospital blanket that is covering him up to the chest. He tries to calm the tumult of emotions in his chest, and to not get overwhelmed by the gratefulness and relief he feels right then. He won’t start crying, not in front of James, not after what he has done for him so far. This would be the worst way possible to pay him back for his help.

“Th-th-thank y-y-you,” he says quietly. It is frustrating how he isn’t able to come up with a more adequate way of telling the other man how much his support means to him. “Th-thank y-y-you.”

His eyes start to itch; he huffs a dry chuckle, more due to how wired up he feels than due to really finding anything amusing about this situation.
James acknowledges it with a not, but otherwise stays quiet as he studies him quietly for a long moment.

This causes Barry to grow nervous again, and he bits his lower lip as he keeps his gaze fixed on the blanket in front of him.

“I trust you,” James finally says after what felt like a small and unnerving eternity but probably was no more than a minute or so. He doesn’t sound harsh, but there is an edge to his voice, a hardness that usually isn’t present when he talks to him. “I know that you’re a good person, Barry. I really do, and I get that you didn’t have it easy and a lot of bad stuff happened to you.”

Not sure how to answer to that, Barry remains in silence, feeling a leaden weight settle in the pit of his stomach as he waits for the other man to go on.

He knows what this is. He knows where this would lead to, and…

Barry tries to blink the tears away, and he is angry at himself for being such a jerk. It would be better for James to cut him out of his life, to leave him behind.

There is nothing he can offer but trouble.

Trouble and the misery that follows him around like his own damn shadow.

In the end, they all realizes that it is better to leave him behind. It is better for them, it really is, and even Barry himself knows so, despite what Mary, Eddie, and Mrs. Ming tell him, he knows from experience that there is just something off with him, and sooner or later this will catch up with anybody who is silly enough to stick around…

Barry thinks of Len, of the Rogues, and he the chilling, biting pain in his chest gets even worse.

It is only a question of time.

“I don’t trust your friends, though,” James goes on after a rather uncomfortably long pause, and he holds a hand up when Barry turns to him in protest. “That doesn’t mean that I’ll demand from you to cut them off, Barry. It’s really not my place to tell you what to do or not, and, as I’ve said before, I do trust you, and I’m sure you’ve your reason for being friends with those people.”

James briefly averts his eyes, glancing to the window that faces the hallway, and deep frown settles over his face as he seems to consider what to say next.

Barry wishes he would leave it at this, he doesn’t want him to keep talking. Despite knowing better, he doesn’t want his friend telling him that is probably better for both to not see each other again, or asking Barry to quit his job back at the store, to avoid endangering Mrs. Ming.

The mere thought notion of the dear old lady getting hurt because of his actions causes the nauseating feeling, that has been clinging to him since he woke up today in the morning, to spike once more, and he has to close his eyes for a moment due to its intensity.

He is a selfish bastard. This shouldn’t be so hard.

He would only end up rubbing part of his misery off at them, letting it infect their lives like he did with Iris and Wally…

“Barry.” James’ sounds worried, then, and when Barry opens them again, he notices that other man has fixed his attention back to him, and that there is still neither reproach nor anger in his eyes but a palpable sadness.

“I know that you’re a good man,” his friend says, and it is strange to hear how certain he sounds of this, like he really believes it. The situation is strange and touching. Barry flushes when he feels a couple of tears finally run down his cheeks in response to these kind words while his friend carries on. “And I know that you don’t want to cause anybody any trouble, but I really want you to think about whom you put your trust in.”

It is palpable that James feels bad about bringing this up now, but he clearly still deems it necessary to be a point that has to be touched upon, and Barry doesn’t hold it against him. After all, for some reason he can’t grasp, James is just trying to look out for him.

“I don’t know what you did that caused you to end up in prison.” The other man meets his eyes firmly, nearly pleadingly. “But I don’t want to see you get back there again because you stick around the wrong sort of people.”

The hospital room falls back into a strained silent, and Barry forces himself to look away as he tries to understand why this man would care so much about him. Why anybody would, really.

He listens into the quietness around them and can’t help but wonder whether the woman who is also stationed in this room is listening in.

On of his temporary roommates, a young man who is currently getting an x-ray and had left shortly before the officers arrived to question Barry, leaving only the older woman who made no sound since the nurse picked their breakfast trays up about an hour ago. It is more likely that she has simply fallen asleep, but talking about any of this in the presence of some stranger, conscious or not, worries him.

“I-I d-didn’t w-w-want y-you t-t-to g-get i-in t-trouble b-because o-of m-me.” Barry finally says quietly as he keeps his eyes at his splinted hand resting next to him. He can’t bring himself to meet James’ eyes right now.

“I know,” James agrees calmly. “And I’m not angry at you for what has happened. None of this was your fault.”

Barry chews his lower lip once more and thinks about pointing out that this is not really true. The itching of his eyes has gotten worse again, and he lifts his right hand to brush the tears away, ashamed at himself for not being able to keep it together around the other man who had to put up with enough of his baggage as it is.

It is difficult to make sense of anything right now with the pain meds circulating through his body, especially of why he is feeling so miserable. He knows that it could have turned out so much worse, they could have been killed or worse.

It is thanks to James that Barry wasn’t interrogated like a criminal or sent straight back to Iron Heights’ infirmary instead being put into a public hospital. The image alone that he could just as well be within such a nightmarish place causes him to quiver. He grits his teeth in discomfort, as another sharp pang flashes unforgivingly through his abdomen in response.

“I think you should try to rest some more, Barry, you look exhausted.” James meets his worried look with a tired but warm smile, and it is then that Barry picks up on how exhausted his friend really looks.

Even so, he can’t help himself but ask. “C-c-can y-you s-stay?”
It should be embarrassing, asking James to wait around as if he is still a small and scared child, afraid of going to sleep without another person around. Maybe it is due to the drugs or his emotional state, but Barry can’t really get himself to care too much about it. He just doesn’t want to be left alone.

A surprised look crosses his friend’s face before it softens a bit and he nods. “Of course.”

Knowing that his friend would stay seems to show Barry’s body that it is okay to rest as his eyelids start to feel increasingly heavy all of a sudden, and he has difficulties to even just keep them open as he utters his thanks to the other man.

He relents to the exhaustion just a few seconds later and slips off into a dreamless sleep.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter ended up being shorter than it initially was, tbh. I decided to split it into two because I wanted to leave you with something today (and writing on my ebook is something I can do but do not particularly like because I just can't get used to the smaller keyboard).

After the amount of feedback I recieved for the last one I just couldn't skip today's update. You, my dear readers, are just amazing people, and thank you so much for your support (you're my James in this case ;).

Next chapter will have Mary and Eddy visit Barry, the one after that well re-introduce someone we haven't seen for a while, and then we finally get some Len-Barry alone time again. :)
Hospital Stay Part II

Chapter Summary

Eddy and Mary visit, and Barry learns a bit more about what exactly happened after he was shot at the docks.

Chapter Notes

This story has been edited by Katzerover! Thanks a lot for the marvellous job my dear! <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

“Your poor sod, you’ve to stay in here for two weeks?” Eddy pulls a face and shoots him an exaggeratedly pitying look. “That sucks, hospital food is the worst.”

“Could you try not being so insufferable?” Mary chides their friend. “He was shot, Eddy. Do you really lament on him having to stay in hospital for a few weeks considering what else could have happened?”

“Jeez, just trying to lift the mood.”

“You could try and be a bit more sensitive.”

Barry watches his friends argue quietly with a tired, little smile. It is good to have them around again; he missed them, even though they’d visited him just yesterday, he has been feeling a bit lonely today with having nothing else to do but rest and try to move as little as possible, so he doesn’t agitate his abdomen again by accident.

“You know, making him feel like an invalid isn’t going to help him either;” Eddy points out rather tersely, causing the likely desired effect of Mary shooting him an admonishing look. She huffs and protests indignantly. “I don’t do that!”

Both of them arrived about an hour ago, shortly after Barry had finished the same tasteless soup for breakfast that the hospital feeds him for every meal. Not that it really bothers him, he is mostly just tired and not particularly hungry.

James would pass by later on today, as well. His friend didn’t have time to visit yesterday, but he assured him that he’d be stopping by this late afternoon. Barry still feels a bit overwhelmed when the other man is around, the fact that he kept him out of prison is something he would never forget, but it has also caused an uneasy worry to stick, whenever his friend is visiting.

Having James around is both soothing and conflicting at the same time. Barry is well aware that this feeling stems from the guilt of knowing what he put his friend through. It would probably be a long time before he can look the other man in the face, without having vividly in his mind how close he was to being killed due to him.
Barry frowns down at his lap and tries not to let his mind wander back to the other people he put in danger that day. He has company right now, there are people to concentrate on, and he forces himself to turn his attention back to Mary and Eddy who are still bickering among each other.

Having too much free time on his hand and nothing to fill it with, as he is really only allowed to sleep and rest, has quickly turned into one of the most dreaded aspects of his hospital stay; his thoughts don’t really care that he would rather not worry himself sick over his friends.

He has no news about Len’s and the other Rogues’ whereabouts, or at least how they are doing. It’s total radio silence.

As far as he knows they could be-

Barry plunges the notion away forcefully, angry at himself for being so damn pessimistic all the time and not having more trust in his friends. Len knows how to keep himself and the others safe; they probably got away with just some bumps and bruises. They are alright.

… they have to be.

He licks his lips that feel quite chapped all of a sudden, and closes his eyes.

Len and the others aren’t the only issue making him anxious right now. Both Jay and Wally know about what happened, and while Barry isn’t surprised by that, considering Blacksmith, the BV, and his friends weren’t exactly quiet about their confrontation in the docks, it is still upsetting because he is sure they find his involvement in that situation suspicious.

He knows that they keep a close eye on him, despite not showing up to interrogate him, yet. The chance that, this whole mess might still have even far direr consequences than what he already went through so far, is quite unnerving, is quite unnerving. Especially because nobody from his past life has turned up since his admission.

No one to ask questions and find out that all of this has been his fault all along.

He feels a bit like someone who is waiting for the second shoe to drop, and the uncertainty of what could be scares him; it is nearly worse than the persistent pain in his abdomen and hand.

“Bear, are you feeling alright?” Mary looks concerned. Barry feels his mind drifting off again, like a lazy bird and tries to keep himself focused on his friends. He gives her a weary smile. “Y-yes, I-I’m j-just a-a b-bit e-ex-x… t-tired.”

“You definitely look the part,” Eddy agrees and ignores Mary’s disapproving look.

“Should we leave? You probably want to rest, and we are keeping you up.” Mary is clearly feeling guilty about the prospect of causing him even more discomfort, while Eddy only rolls his eyes in fake exasperation, but stays put for once.

“N-no, p-please, s-s-stay! I-I-” Barry stops himself. It is embarrassing how much he sounds like a scared kid; he can feel his cheeks growing warm.

He averts his eyes and looks back to the butterfly needle in the back of his right hand, then he glances over to his left one, currently in a splint to immobilize his broken fingers. The dull pulsating pain is annoying, flaring up whenever he accidently moves them. Still, Barry is able to forget about it for the most part.

“We would like to stay.” Mary’s voice is soft. Barry tenses up a little when she puts a hand next to his onto the cover, not touching but close enough for him to be aware of her presence, even without looking. A hot pain rushes through his abdomen, and he tries to stay relaxed and bite down on a groan. He fails on both.

She gasps softly, pulling her hand back. “Sorry, I didn’t mean to startle you.”

Barry feels a well-known guilt settle over him as he can’t help but notice how worried his friend is because of him once again.

“I-it’s f-f-fine,” Barry assures her, and he means it. The pain is already subsiding again. He gives her a weary smile. “Y-you m-make a-all o-of th-this s-so m-much e-easier f-for m-me.” He looks over to Eddy then and adds. “B-both o-of y-you.”

“What else do you have us for? Other than hears us bickering, I mean?” The other man shrugs. Mary smiles amused and points out in a dry tone. “I think he wouldn’t mind the bickering part not to be included.”

“Says you,” Eddy disagrees with a smirk.

“You’re impossible.” Mary chuckles and regards Eddy with smiling eyes, before she looks at the digital clock above the entrance and briefly freezes.

“I have to make a call,” she explains and quickly gets up, reaching for her purse. She gives Barry an apologetic smile. “I’ll be back in a bit, it won’t take long, I promise.”

Then, she is out of the door, and both men are left watching her scurry past the window.

“Like a gerbil,” Eddy mutters under his breath and chuckles. His amusement dims like an agonizing candle when he turns back to Barry and finds him watching him with an unreadable expression.

The air between them become denser, heavier, in a matter of seconds; both of them fall into a rather uncomfortable silence as neither is really sure how to deal with the elephant in the room.

They haven’t been left alone, until now. The last two times Mary and James visited, Barry wasn’t feeling like himself enough to really put two and two together. However, his mind started to clear up from the medications, as a result, his thoughts had been boiling since last night, about the identity of the person that saved James and him.

Barry glances the curtains around his bed that give him at least some illusion of privacy. He makes sure the ones on his right side are still shut. He hears low voices from the other two patients and their visitors, right behind the thin layer of fabric.

Barry can’t help but worry whether any of them would pay Eddy and him any heed or not. Would it be dangerous to bring up what happened two nights ago...

“You think too loud.” Barry is startled out of his thoughts by Eddy’s voice. He really wants his body to stop reacting that way each time he gets surprised, especially now that he is feels like his stomach is only held together by stitches.

“Shit, sorry.” Like Mary, Eddy’s face contorts with guilt. He obviously doesn’t want to cause Barry more pain, even by accident.

“I-it’s f-fine,” he assures in a rather strained voice trying to breathe the pain away like he read in a book he borrowed from Mary a while ago.
“You don’t look fine,” Eddy points out rather grimly. “Not at all.”

“I a-am r-really, a-at l-l-least as f-far a-as I c-can b-be after b-being sh-shot.” It is not a very funny joke, Barry knows that, but he wants to lighten the mood his friend is in, the other man’s expression only grows darker in response.

Eddy studies him with a deep frown for a long moment before he looks elsewhere. “This wouldn’t have happened if I’d gotten there earlier.”

The words are quiet, they sound so bitter, that it actually makes Barry more concerned than surprised, about Eddy touching upon his own involvement in the first place.

“Y-you s-saved m-me…” He keeps his voice very low as he speaks, but he still sounds earnest as he meets Eddy’s bashful gaze and tries to make him understand what he did for James and him. “U-us,” he corrects himself and repeats it when his friend turns away with an incredulous frown. “Y-you s-s-saved b-both o-of u-us, E-Eddy.”

Barry is well aware this isn’t the place nor the time to have this conversation, not with the prospect of being overheard by someone. Still, he wants Eddy to understand that his intervention was something to be proud of, and Barry will never forget it.

Eddy looks rather ill and tenses up all at once, fighting the urge to fidget. Barry still remembers how it felt, having the speed force run through him and the unrest that follows along with it. What it was like to be a speedster; being worried, angry, or sad, and how those feelings caused the urge to run, to vibrate, to just move, so much so that it nearly became painful not to follow along.

It is also still vivid in his mind how he had to force himself to sit still instead, in a world he felt so alien at times with its slow pace...

“How d-did you kn-know wh-where w-we w-were?” Barry focuses his attention back back to Eddy, who bites his bottom lip, edgy. It is the first time that Barry sees him do that, it is a bit unsettling to watch, considering that his friend usually doesn’t seem to let anything affect his calm. Not like Len, who is really rather easy to rile up, but hides his emotions behind a mask of fake indifference and coldness.

“There was a doc around where the kept you, about 5’ 11”, brown curly hair, brown eyes?”

“D-doctor E-Elias?” Barry is kind of taken aback by Eddy knowing of the scientist.

Eddy’s smirk comes closer to a sour grimace; he looks like someone who has just bitten into a lemon. “Yes, the one and only.”

Confused, Barry frowns. “Y-you kn-know h-him?”

His friend shrugs and looks out of the window, where two nurses pass by the aisle. Again, he gnaws on his lower lip for a moment before he turns back to him with some reluctance.

“How d-did you kn-know wh-where w-we w-were?” Barry focuses his attention back back to Eddy, who bites his bottom lip, edgy. It is the first time that Barry sees him do that, it is a bit unsettling to watch, considering that his friend usually doesn’t seem to let anything affect his calm. Not like Len, who is really rather easy to rile up, but hides his emotions behind a mask of fake indifference and coldness.

“He helped me with… you know.” Eddy makes a vague gesture with his hand that could pretty much mean anything, but Barry still gets it. “H-he kn-knows a-about y-you?”

“Sort of,” the other man agrees hesitantly and sighs. “After… for a while I wasn’t able to… to connect correctly to…” Eddy makes an unhappy face and shrugs again. “You know, how my…” He lowers his voice a bit more.

“Powers work is rather hard to understand, even for me, and he helped me to get a better grasp on... them…,” Eddy explains and gives him a small apologetic smile. “I know that I’ve been rather meagre when it comes to information about this part of me, and I’m really grateful that you’ve respected this, Barry. It’s just not something I feel all that… comfortable about.”

He doesn’t elaborate whether he means that he feels uncomfortable discussing his powers or about them in general. Barry is pretty sure it is the later, though, and while he assumed as much after Eddy more or less behaved like nothing happened the morning after Kenneth tried to kill him, it is still sad to be proven right in this point.

“Th-thank y-you,” he says in a thin voice, earnestly.

“For letting you get shot?” Eddy tries to make light of this question, but it is hard to miss, he feels guilty about it.

“F-for s-saving J-James’ a-and m-my l-life,” Barry corrects him, adding. “Y-you’re an a-amazing f-friend, y-your p-powers d-don’t ch-change th-that, th-they j-just m-m-make it all th-that m-more obv-vious.”

An odd expression crosses the other man’s face, a mixture of panic and shame. For a split-second Barry is certain he would bolt. His friend’s opportunity to do so is cut short when Mary chooses this moment to re-enter the room.

Her eyes seek them out, and she frowns after she’s briefly taken them in. She turns to Eddy with suspicious look. “Did you put your foot in your mouth again?”

“What? Why me?” Eddy asks with a fake scoff. Barry is glad Eddy is relaxing again, even though his obvious tension abides.

“Because Barry is a sensible and thoughtful person, and you’re definitely none of these things,” Mary reminds him, but her stern expression cracks and is replaced by a more playful one as she concedes. “Well, you aren’t usually, but you’ve done alright so far for today, and who says that a blind squirrel can’t sometimes find a nut.”

“I’m touched by your faith in my ability to function like a normal human being,” Eddy replies tersely, but Barry knows that he is enjoying the banter with their friend, as he doesn’t miss how most of the tension has left him by now.

“Don’t pout, you do have your charms,” Mary admits and takes her seat again while putting her handbag onto the ground next to it.

“So you think I’m sexy?” Eddy inquires with a smirk, and Mary chuckles when he wiggles his eyebrows at her. She turns to Barry with an amused glint in her eyes and shakes her head. “Can you believe that man? How did we end up with him?”

“Because you’re obscenely lucky?” Eddy suggests, grinning when Mary gives him an incredulous look. “More like you are the lucky one, Mister.”

“For having a five-foot-tall European woman constantly nagging my ears off?”

“Because you’re so much better in that regard?” Mary asks before she reminds him that they are there to spend time with Barry.

“I would, but it is difficult to hear him over your ongoing nagging,” Eddy deadpans. Mary, unimpressed, turns her attention to Barry.
“I’ll bring you something to read when we pass by tomorrow, so you don’t get bored while you’re alone” she promises, and Eddy adds that he would throw in a Playboy or some other saucy magazine as well. “You’re probably not up to it right now, but it still offers something nice to look at.”

Barry wishes he would be able to move enough to pull his blanket over his face, without causing himself severe pain. Sometimes his friend’s tendency to be crude is just embarrassing, especially with Mary around. He is grateful when she simply ignores Eddy.

“I’ve just finished a really great crime novel, and I’m sure you’ll like it. The author seems to be a huge nerd when it comes to scientific settings. Like the chemistry stuff you enjoy so much.”

“You do realize that you’ve just called him a nerd, don’t you?” Mary gives Eddy, who seems rather pleased with himself by pointing this out, a disapproving look. “I didn’t, but I don’t see what is bad about being a nerd, anyway.”

“You were clearly never a boy in high-school, then.”

Again, Mary decides that ignoring Eddy is likely the most sensible thing to do. She faces Barry. “Do you want me to fetch anything else for you?”

“N-no, th-the b-book i-is f-fine. Th-thank y-y-you.” Barry yawns and carefully lifts his right hand up to rub his eyes. Sleeps creeps up on him again.

“Maybe some clothes? Something comfortable you can wear instead of the gown?” Mary suggests. “Because they’ll allow him to wear anything else than that ugly thingy during the rest of his stay?”

Eddy asks and does have a point.

Barry knows the nurses won’t be happy with him putting anything on that could make the access to the bandages difficult. Not that he feels like moving to change his garments, anyway.

“Well, I’ll think of something,” Mary assures him and adds. “And as soon as you’re back home again and allowed to eat normal food, I’ll make you the most delicious lasagne you can imagine.”

“Th-thank y-you, M-Mary, I-I’m l-l-look-king f-forward t-to i-it.” Barry smiles with little intensity faintly and accepts Eddy’s offer with a slight nod. He isn’t sure when he would be up to anything other than sleeping or talking, but he tries to stay optimistic.

His doctor explained him, after he woke up the first morning here, that he was extremely lucky, the bullet just grazed his liver and stomach. Unfortunately, the projectile also went through part of his colon, which in itself is a much more unpleasant injury to recover from. The notion that someone in a future is going to keep check on his bowel movement, may any complication arise, is something he prefers not to think about too much.

Considering how much worse it could have been, like an injured spine, Barry tries not to feel too bad about it, though. If everything went well, he would be able to recover completely within the next five to seven weeks.

“Do you want to rest?” Mary’s soft voice startles Barry. He realizes he was about to drift off. He looks over to her, noticing how she studies him with a slight worried look again.

“N-no, I-I’m f-fine,” he assures her before a rather big yawn debunks his claim.

“Sleep’s important for people who recover from being shot,” James points out wisely and winks when Barry frowns at him.

“Y-you’ve t-to l-leave i-in a-about an h-hour anyw-way.” After that he would probably spend the rest of today asleep as it is. Or, at least, till James passed by later afternoon.

“We’ll be coming back tomorrow, though,” Mary reminds him tentatively and adds. “We don’t have to leave just yet, Barry, it really doesn’t bother Eddy or me if you want to rest for a bit while we are here.”

“I d-don’t w-want y-you t-to w-waste y-your t-t-time.” Another yawn forces his mouth open, and Barry thinks he really shouldn’t be surprised that his own body is stabbing him in the back like this again.

“We don’t. They’ve some very interesting looking magazines laying around in the waiting room, and we’ll wake you up to say good-bye when we leave if you are asleep,” Mary assures him.

“She’s right, I’ve wanted to read up on the latest knitting-trend in Interweave for the last week.” Eddy deadpans but doesn’t seem really bothered by the prospect to wait around.

“Oh, shush!”

“What? I’m serious,” the other man protests, but his wide grin makes it obvious that he is messing around.

“Y-you d-don’t h-have t-to s-stay,” Barry reminds them once more, growing increasingly drowsier.

“We know that, Bar, but that doesn’t mean that we don’t want to.” Eddy leans back into his chair and pulls out his smartphone from his jeans pocket. He shows it to Barry with a smirk. “And don’t expect that everybody is such a technological recluse like yourself. I have my own video store on this little technological masterpiece.”

“We’re fine,” Mary agrees, and it really is a tempting offer. With how difficult is for him to keep his eyes open, it doesn’t take Barry much more to be convinced.

“Y-you c-c-can l-leave i-if y-you g-grow b-bored,” he mumbles while his body grows heavier by the second.

“Fat chance,” Eddy chuckles, and it is the last thing Barry hears before he nods off.

Chapter End Notes

So, we learned who the speedster was that saved Barry and James, and that Eddy knows Dr. Elias... that's certainly not going to be important later on. ;3

I hope you guys enjoyed the chapter, it is a bit shorter again as I initially intended to post this and the one from last week (which has been edited by now, btw) as one. The one for next week will be back to normal.
My laptop is still not back... :C But I'm hopeful that I'll get it next week, writing will be so much more comfortable again, then.

Next week welcomes James back as well as a secret visitor, and before long we'll finally have Barry and Len being together in a chapter again... I really miss those two directly interacting with each other.

Thank you for reading and till next Sunday! :)
“I-it i-isn’t th-that b-bad,” Barry assures James with an amused smile. His friend is eying the pale mush Barry is currently eating with a quite disgusted expression, an unconscious one, probably. It really isn’t the most appealing food, but he is still glad to have something besides the tasteless broth, he got for the first couple days of his stay here. Since yesterday, they’ve started to change his diet from an entirely fluid-restricted diet to paste-like food that still has no real flavor and certainly doesn’t help with his lack of appetite but must be a sign that his healing is coming along nicely, and he takes it as a good sign. Nurse Andrea, who usually brings him his breakfast and seems to have taken a liking to him, even promised him, she would make sure that the infamous hospital Jell-O is going to be added to his meal tonight. While Barry doesn’t really care about sweets, it would please Eddy at least, as his friend has started to complain about the ongoing lack of it by now. “No, of course not. It looks very… interesting?” James frowns down at the white bowl in front of Barry before he turns to him with an apologizing expression. “I don’t mean to spoil your appetite. I’ve just always been a picky eater, don’t mind me.” “I-it’s f-fine,” Barry assures him easily and takes another spoonful of the tasteless food before going on with a wry smile. “I’ve n-never b-been a p-picky eater, s-so d-don’t w-worry ab-bout it.” “Well, I hope this won’t change after I’ve taken you to my favourite Japanese restaurant in Central and spoil your taste buds,” the other man says as he frowns down at Barry’s meal. “This really is a poor excuse for a Christmas dinner, and I still owe you one, after all.” It takes Barry a moment to recall what his friend is talking about, and when he does, his stomach sinks. “Y-you d-don’t h-have t-to r-rep-pay m-me,” he reminds James. “I l-liked h-helping y-you out.” By now, he thought James would have forgotten all about his help with laying out the new parquet. He hoped so, at least, but it is kind of predictable that the other man still wants to take him somewhere high-brow and expensive. James mentioned a couple of places he had been to for business meetings or just with friends before, and they always sound worlds apart from what Barry tends to visit when he wants to get himself an already prepared meal.

He has never really been a friend of expensive restaurants, even back then when he still worked as a forensic scientist. Being in places like those, usually made him feel rather uncomfortable; he generally went there when he had something to celebrate with Iris and Wally…

Barry lowers his face a bit, he doesn’t want James picking up on the pained expression that crosses his face at the notion of his former family.

Iris liked it when they went out for dinner, she never understood his reluctance but, she was able to tell his uneasiness, despite his attempts to hide it. They never went out eating in many occasions, particularly, especially after Wally joined them, as his nephew has a similar distaste for fancy restaurants like Barry did, but Barry always made sure to get a reservation in one of Iris’ favourite locations when they celebrated an anniversary or one of her published stories got noted. He can still remember those times clearly, how she was beaming with pride and excitement, how she kept smiling for days on end, being his sun, brightening his everyday life…

Her memory sits like a heavy cold stone in the pit of his stomach, and he forces himself to let go of it. Iris is gone. She has been for a long time. Barry has no right trying to find comfort from her at all.

Barry coughs lightly and flushes when he notices James is watching him with a thoughtful and rather sad expression.

“And I d-don’t n-need a-anyth-thign s-special f-for Ch-Christmas,” he forces himself to go on, stirring them back to their conversation. “I’ve ev-verything I n-need.”

He puts his spoon back down in tasteless mush left from his breakfast, and leans back into the pillow that the nurse pushed behind him to help him sit more comfortably during his meal.

This doesn’t mean he is oblivious to the fact that James and the others just mean well, but he feels ill at ease with the amount of money they’re willing to spend on him. He is most certain he can’t pay them back, and the idea of being a freeloading is daunting. It causes him to feels uneasy and rather disgusting.

Barry had been forced to live off people who never wanted him around for most of his childhood and youth; he despises the notion that he is being forced to do so, once again.

Though, it is unfair to compare his friends with his past foster parents. Unfair and insulting. And the notion that he would compare them to those people leaves a sour taste in his mouth.

Still, he doesn’t want to be a burden, he doesn’t want to give them any reason to leave him-

His cheeks flush bright red when he realizes what he has just been thinking and, he wishes, not for the first time, he could just forget how messed up he is, himself and his whole life.

“I think one can never have enough friends and good food” James says, meeting Barry’s reluctant glance with warm eyes. Those words bring to his mind how Mary and Eddy have already settled on postponing their Christmas celebration with him due to his current situation. Eddy insists that one can’t let these holidays pass without gorging oneself on a ridiculous amount of turkey, mashed potatoes, cranberry sauce, and pie, and, much to Barry’s exasperation, Mary sides with the other man for once.

They mean well, he knows that, but he really couldn’t care less about these kind of things right now if he was completely honest. It just seems so bland and silly, everything else considered.

Len crosses his mind for a second, and Barry pushes the thought away, glad when James keeps talking so that he can concentrate on him.

“Christmas is only once a year,” his friend points out, “and do I have to remind you that you ached for days after crawling around my floor for nearly nine hours straight.”

“It w-wasn’t th-that b-bad,” Barry protests half-heartedly. His friend is not going to back down from this one, and it doesn’t sit well with him that James has picked up on how damaged his body is. It probably hadn’t been exactly hard to miss the stiffness of his movements after they’d finished laying out the new parquet, but he still feels like this is something private, not to be shared with anyone.

A familiar aversion settles over him at the thought of his own body and how broken it is. He fights the urge to scratch his arms that suddenly start to feel awfully itchy again.

Not willing to linger on this uncomfortable topic, Barry shoves the thought away and tries to suggest something else. “I c-could c-cook u-us s-someth-thing inst-stead. Y-you m-made me th-this amazing b-bento as it is alr-ready, anyw-way.”

James smiles and gives him a fond look. “I’m glad you enjoyed the bento, and I’d like you to cook us something, but that doesn’t mean we can’t-”

A knock causes the other man to stop momentarily, and they both turn their attention to the door. Barry hopes that it isn’t one of the nurses, he is not finished yet; he would definitively get one of those scolding looks for it and be reminded that he can’t take an hour to finish his meal.

His lack of appetite might very well cause an even longer stay, more than the already established following five days. He really wants to avoid that. Barry has no real quarrels with his hospital admittance, but it already costs a fortune; he doesn’t have the slightest idea of how he is going to afford any of that as it is. It is honestly a mystery to him how they haven’t kicked him out by now, seeing that he can digest something akin to actual food again.

While Central City’s nor Keystone City’s hospitals aren’t that notorious for being this shady toward patients, he knows they don’t like to fill their beds with people who can’t pay for them either-

Barry’s financial worries are brought to a sharp halt, when Jay opens the door and enters the room. He can feel the colour draining from his face, his throat closes up in response to the other man’s unexpected appearance. A heavy dread settles over Barry, wondering what is Jay doing here after he kept his distance for months.

Jay’s worried expression changes into a frown when their eyes meet, and something that looks a lot like resignation and like regret crosses his gaze. Despite everything that transpired, Barry can’t help himself but feel a bit bad for how he has just reacted to the other man’s arrival.

His attention is pulled away from Jay when James gets up from his seat next to him with a surprisingly grim look on his face, and Barry isn’t sure what to make of how tensed up his friend suddenly seems.

This odd behaviour doesn’t go by unnoticed by Jay either, who turns his attention towards James, stern look on his face. It is obvious that he doesn’t like to be scowled at, especially by a complete stranger.

“Who are you?” Barry flushes slightly in confusion and embarrassment over James brash voice that is so unlike him. Then, he realizes what his own reaction toward Jay must have looked like to his friend, and he has to bite down on a groan.

This is definitely not how Barry wanted them to meet; not that he really thought that this occasion would ever take place after how Jay and he parted ways last time.

But, while it is undeniably frustrating that the situation is turning much more uncomfortable than it should be, it is also oddly reassuring to see how James is willing to stand up for him. Especially with how helpless Barry is with such limited movements. Not that James really can do much, considering who he is currently watching in this unusual hostile manner.

“I could ask you the same question, young man,” Jay replies in this no-nonsense voice, he likes to use on people who act out of line.

An odd expression crosses James, and Barry knows that his friend has just figured out, who the newcomer is.

“You’re Jay Garrick.” The realisation in James voice is more curiosity than the previous angry one, much to Barry’s relief.

Jay nods curtly, glancing briefly to Barry before he turns back to James. “And you are?”

“James.”

The older man’s irritation is nearly palpable when James fails to mention his last name. Eddy’s introduction to Jay, flares up in Barry’s mind, and his stomach sinks. He really doesn’t want Jay to get the wrong idea about James.

“James Lao,” his friend adds, taking notice of the other’s grim look and immediately gets what the problem is. “I’m Barry’s friend.”

“You’re the man the kidnappers initially were after,” Jay remarks. Barry knows he should not feel unsettled by his former friend already being aware of all the details of what occurred, but it still makes him nervous. At least he doesn’t seem to consider James as another troublemaker anymore, judging by the loss of hardness on his face.

“Well, yes.” James casts a wary glance at the older man. “You’re interested in that case?”

“In a way,” Jay agrees before he turns to Barry and gives him a faint smile. “Hello, Barry.”

As his voice is still deserting him, Barry only nods quietly in response.

“I hope I’m not bothering you? I don’t want to disrupt your visit from your friend here, I just wanted to see how you are doing and wish you a Merry Christmas.” It is quite saddening when it dawns on Barry how Jay seems uncertain about whether he is actually welcome or not. After what transpired the last time they saw each other, it isn’t really surprising, though. Being honest with himself, Barry is not even sure whether he is glad to have him turn up here or not.

Then again, Jay is the first and probably only person from his former life who cares enough to check up on him. This is something he is grateful for, despite the how painfully clear the memory of their last encounter is still in his mind.

“Th-thank y-you and it’s f-f-fine,” he tells him in a coarse voice and gives James an unsure, apologetic look. “H-he’s s-someone I kn-know f-from… f-from b-bef before m-my s-stay in p-prison. Y-you d-don’t m-mind h-him j-joining us b-briefly?”
“Of course not,” James assures him quickly and smiles. When he faces Jay, though, his amiable mask slips somewhat and his friendly demeanour seems at least somewhat forced. Barry can’t hold it against his friend, after he witnessed his own reaction toward older man’s presence before.

Jay grabs one of the chairs placed rightward the door and takes a sit next to James.

“How are you doing?” Jay asks. A palpable concern coats his voice when he scrutinizes Barry, and the latter can’t help but think how hurtful and confusing it is to have Jay believing the worst of him, and yet, caring about him at the same time. It is unfair, in a very painful way, and Barry has to swallow around the forming lump in his throat before he can answer. “B-better, I’ll p-prob-bably b-be able t-to l-leave in l-less th-than a w-week.”

This takes some of Jay’s worries, and he relaxes a bit. “That’s good to hear. I’m glad you’re healing is coming along nicely.”

Barry nods tiredly and expects the rather awkward silence that follows when neither of them is really sure how to proceed. He feels bad for James, who has been more or less forced into this, and wonders whether he should suggest for his friend to go and grab something to eat as he most likely hasn’t had lunch yet.

“You’ve someone to look after you for the first couple of days after staying at home again?” The question catches Barry off-guard as he hasn’t really thought about that too much, to be honest. So far, the most important thing was to finally get released from there, and he didn’t bother too much with worrying about what would come afterwards. He mostly just intends to stay a lot on his couch or in bed for the next week or two and sleep for the most part, so he would be able to go back to work, as quickly as possible.

Eddy and Mary would likely take over the part of checking on him, as would James probably do too, till he has to leave for his next business trip to Canada in about three weeks.

“I-I th-think s-so,” he answers a bit hesitantly.

“Of course you have.” James gives him one of this fondly exasperated looks, like he can’t believe how dense he can be at times. “I’ve talked with Mary about it, and we’ll rotate on staying at home with you.”

This is a piece of information Barry has been utterly unaware of so far. James met Mary and Eddy just a couple of days ago, and while they seemed to like each other well enough, he can’t recall them talking about anything like that while they were around. “Wh-what? Wh-when d-did y-you t-talk about th-that?”

“Just yesterday,” James quickly explains giving him a slightly apologetic look. “Mary called me after I left the hospital and asked me if I could meet up with Eddy and her to have dinner. She inquired whether I wanted to join in on looking after you as well, and I agreed, of course. I’m sorry I haven’t told you about this yet, but I was going to bring it up before…”

James trails off and glances over to Jay, who has been listening to them attentively, so far. Barry understands, and he certainly isn’t angry that all his friends get along so well as he has been a bit worried that James and Eddy could clash due to their different personalities. He is just a bit surprised that they seem to do so, even better than he hoped for.

“Th-there’s n-no r-reason t-to ap-pologize,” Barry assures him and smiles. “B-but y-you r-really d-don’t n-need t-to t-troub-ble y-yours-self s-so m-much. I’ll b-be f-fine on m-my own.”
“I don’t think that is a good idea.” Jay interjects then, sounding rather concerned by his words. “You’ve been severely injured, and you should have someone constantly around, at least for the first weak in case something happens.”

“I’ll b-be f-fine,” Barry disagrees, trying not to feel annoyed. The older man means well, so does James, and it isn’t their fault he doesn’t like the notion of being a burden to anybody, but it still rubs him the wrong way when Jay believes that he isn’t able to look after himself.

“It’s no trouble for us. None at all. I still have way too much overtime at work I need to get rid of, and after everything that happened over the last two weeks, my employers will be glad when I’m finally taking a break.”

“Y-you w-want t-to d-do s-so b-by b-being s-stuck in m-my a-ap-partm-ment?” Barry gives James an incredulous look and adds. “I’ll p-probably b-be a-asleep f-for m-most o-of th-the t-time.”

“That is fine with me, I’ve my pad and will be able to finally catch up on a couple of movies and books I intended to dig in for a while now.”

It is obvious that James means it and doesn’t seem to find the idea of spending his free time in Barry’s dingy old flat all that bad.

“Y-you c-could… y-you kn-know, y-you c-could d-do s-someth-thing f-fun,” he tries to protest once more, only to have James chuckle in response. “Believe it or not, I’m actually really looking forward to it.”

At his doubtful look, his friend sighs quietly and explains that either Eddy or Mary are most likely to pass by anyway during the day. “Eddy already made me agree that I’d let him teach me poker, so I’m pretty sure I’m not going to be bored.”

Despite still not really liking the idea of his friends having to bother with this, the thought of Eddy trying to tutor James in how to play poker is amusing. He doubts James is aware of what a cheat the other man is, and that he likely intends to clean him out as much as possible. He definitely would have to talk with Eddy about it when he visits tomorrow.

“Y-you r-really d-don’t h-have t-to,” Barry tries again.

“I know, Bar, we all do, but we still want to.” There is a slight sadness in James’ smile, and Barry decides to leave it at that as he doesn’t like his friends feeling bad for him.

Instead, he turns to Jay, who is watching them with a thoughtful expression and the familiar feeling of uneasy rears its ugly head again. He tries to ignore it and instead, asks the older man how he is doing. It has been a while since they talked the last time, after all.

“I’m doing fine, Barry,” Jay answers and his expression softens a bit as he does so. “Mostly busy, but otherwise everything is as usual.”

“A-and J-Joan? I h-hope s-she’s d-doing alright as w-well.” It has been an eternity since he has seen the dear older woman, and she must be in her mid-eighties by now. Not that this is all that much, due to her being a spouse of someone who is connected to the speed-force, but he still worries about her at times, and he can’t help but wonder whether he’d ever have the opportunity to see her again.

Then again, he knows he should be grateful that he never saw her look at him like he is some kind of monster, and he would rather keep it that way.

“Joan’s doing great.” Jay smiles and there is a fondness to it that only appears when he talks about his wife. It dims just as quickly as it appeared, when he studies Barry for a moment, before he goes on more quietly. “She’s been worried about you after she learned that you were shot.”

Barry looks away. He doesn’t understand why Jay would bring this up. He has to know that this isn’t anything but painful to him. Well, maybe he does so because of it…

Jay is not a spiteful or mean person, though, and Barry, despite everything that happened between them, is well aware it.

It still doesn’t make it any easier.

“Barry,” Jay goes on in an unexpectedly soft-spoken tone. “Joan and I would like to invite you over for dinner when you’ve recovered again.”

Barry turns back and stares at the other man, wide eyes and utterly taken aback. If he had a list of things he would have never expected to hear from Jay, this would be somewhere within the top five.

“You don’t have to decide just yet,” the older keeps going when Barry fails to answer. “Get better first, and we’ll can talk about it afterwards, okay?”

Not trusting his voice to work, he simply nods silently. He has absolutely no idea, why Jay would want to invite him over to his home. Why he would ever agree to let him close to Joan. He knows Jay made clear that, he still cares about him, but, despite that fact, he continues to believe that he did commit those horrible crimes.

It doesn’t make any sense…

“I’m really glad this didn’t turn out any worse for you, Barry, and that you’ve such good friends to help you through your recovery,” Jay finally goes on, ending the uneasy silence that settled between them once again.

Barry swallows around the lump in his throat and averts his eyes. It does feel good to hear him say that, surprisingly so, as he didn’t realize how much it still means to him that Jay doesn’t hate him. Barry really thought he lost Jay as well. He tried to convince himself that it doesn’t matter, but-

“Barry, I know that we haven’t parted ways on the best terms the last time around, and I want you to know that I’m sorry for how our conversation escalated. I should not have lost my temper like that. I know that we often disregard how hard all of this is on you as well and that you also just try to cope with everything that happened.” Jay sounds regretful, truly so, and Barry squeezes his eyes shut because he doesn’t want to be remembered of what he actually thinks of him.

“You probably won’t take me up on it, and I don’t hold it against you, but you can turn to me anytime you need help with something, okay?” The dull pain in Barry’s chest grows enough to overshadow the one in his abdomen at Jay’s words. It is difficult to not let himself crumble under the assault of emotions that seem to try and hack away on him, and he nods briefly, but can’t bring himself to open his eyes again.

Another brief and heavy silence follows and he knows that Jay is watching him. Suddenly, he just wants him to leave, as this is simply too much to deal with right now.

“I think I’ll leave you to your rest.” It is such a relief to hear the older man say that. Barry really doesn’t want to appear ungrateful or hostile, but he is not able to look at him yet.

“Is it alright if I borrow James for a moment?” The request is unexpected and a bit worrisome, but Barry doesn’t really mind in the end. He simply nods and tries to take deep and slow breaths while Jay asks James if he could briefly follow him outside. After hesitating for a moment, the other man agrees.

“Take care, Barry.” Barry doesn’t replay, but he doubts that Jay expects him to do so. He hears them leaving the room.

Barry briefly thinks that he may get in trouble with the nurses, because he didn’t his meal, it doesn’t really seem important to him right now, though.

Instead, he reaches for the bed remote control and lowers his head down again. With some difficulty, he is able to pull the white blanket over his head with his right hand before trying to muffle his sobs. The other patients have visitors as well and they would most likely not pick up on him, which is at least a bit of a comfort.

Thankfully, it doesn’t take long for Barry’s exhausted mind to dull the pain enough that he is able to relax under his cover, which makes him feel a bit like a kid again. Back then, he also tried to hide like this, shielding himself from the world and its harshness. He is asleep when James returns about ten minutes later.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you enjoyed the chapter! :)

I'm sorry for the later than usual upload, but I've spent this weekend with my family, and my mini-laptop isn't able to establish a wlan connection in my childhood home for whatever reason... -_-*

Jay is back, and Barry is left feeling utterly confused and overwhelmed once again... somehow Jay seems to has this effect on the poor guy. But James was there as well at least, and he did seem ready to butt head with the older speedster if necessary. :3

I hope you all had great Easter with your loved ones, and if you don’t celebrate it, I hope you’d a wonderful Sunday! <3
The heart monitor’s beeping is the first thing Barry’s drowsy mind picks up on, when he wakes up in the dim hospital room.

It seems he fell asleep after eating dinner, and he can’t really say he’s surprised as he has been feeling hardly anything, but tired lately.

Barry yawns, opening his mouth wide enough that his jaw pops, and rubs his eyes with his good hand while he wonders how late it may be.

It isn’t exactly dark due to the night light they’ve in the room, but he has troubles focusing on the clock above the door as he tries to read the time. His head hurts a little, something he picks up on just now, a slight throbbing sensation behind his temples, that is more an annoyance than pain.

He swallows and finds out what exactly must have woken him.

The medication they give him for his pain was changed again after the last one didn’t do a much better job than the first one. One of its side effects is that he is constantly thirsty, and it is generally uncomfortably enough to interrupt his sleep. Like it has done now, the third night in a row.

Tiredly, he looks over to his bed stand and is relieved to see that, either Mary or one of the nurses left him a full glass of water there. He reaches for it and flinches when the pain in his lower stomach area flare up in protest. It isn’t really that bad, but it tends to grow worse during the night time, likely because it is so much quieter and darker around him which makes it hard for him to distract his mind with anything else.

The water feels wonderful in his dry mouth and throat; he drains nearly all of it in a matter of seconds. His hand is shaking slightly as he puts the glass back onto the table with a soft clang, and he tries not to notice the butterfly needle that is still embedded in its back. It always causes his stomach to grow somewhat queasy, and he doesn’t want to get sick again.

The nurses are very nice and weren’t annoyed when he messed the bedding up the last couple of nights, after waking up from nightmares, but it still leaves him feeling unsettled and embarrassed.

He knows that people in hospitals tend to get sick, it is nothing he should worry about, but even so, he is afraid of some dire consequences that would likely never come. Life in Iron Heights has imprinted some fears deep into his mind, and he doubts he would ever get rid of them again, no matter how much time has passed…

Letting his head drop back onto the pillow, he closes his eyes and takes a slow, deep breath.

The vaguely lit room is quiet, at least as quiet as it can be in a hospital at night. There is a cacophony of noises, but it has a calmer, more serene quality to it than during the day.

Barry listens to it for a short while. The soft snoring of his two roommates, how the old woman groans every once in a while, the beeping and hissing of the medical devices surrounding them…

There are also, the low sounds that reach him from the hallway, where two nurses are occupied with something close by the door. He can’t understand what they are saying, but their soft murmuring is relaxing and he tries to focus on them to distract himself from the still persisting pain in his lower abdomen.

It is when his eyes catch the thin hose that starts in the back of his hand, and he follows it up to the infusion bag, when he discovers that he is on a new drip. Apparently he missed one of the nurses exchanging it while he was asleep. He is somewhat glad for that; he hates it when they have to do it. The sensation of the needle in his hand being pushed around, even in the slightest, is extremely unsettling.

There, on the top of the IV, he can see the small butterfly Mary brought with her this morning, smiling slightly as he studies it. In the dim light its bright colours are hardly to make out, but they are still vivid in his mind. It was one of many nice gestures from his friends, that made his stay more bearable over the last week.

Barry looks for the clock above the entrance again and is able to make out it is already half past one in the morning. He slept nearly seven hours, which doesn’t really surprise him, due to how he hardly does anything else, other than resting, when nobody is around to keep him company.

Carefully, as not to disturb his wound, he adjusts his position when another familiar pain, flashes through his back. The mattress he is resting on right now, is undoubtedly in a much better condition than the one in his apartment, but he is a man of habit, and so is his back, as it is unable to warm up to it.

A pang through his abdomen makes him freeze. He decides he will make do with the discomfort, before accidently causing his stiches to reopen, even though he is aware that they most likely won’t. Still, he is kind of a wimp when it comes to sutures, he has always been, and the notion of having them in his body simply causes him a ridiculous amount of distress.

With a soft groan, he lets himself relax back into the mattress and tires to go back to sleep or to rest quietly at least. He really doesn’t want to disturb his roommates by accident.

Thus, Barry ends up listening to the nurses outside one more time, before they start to move away again, one of them laughing rather loudly for a moment, until she is able to catch herself and the faint sound of the other one chuckling, fades away with them.

The hallway is quiet once more.

The older woman, Susan, as he learned by now, groans softly and turns in her sleep. Barry looks over to her, remembering that her family visited her earlier that day. None of them said anything about it, but he picked up on the air of sadness surrounded the group. It was obvious that they don’t expect her to leave the hospital alive. An old small man, who hardly speaks a word in English, probably the husband, cried when the others left.

The notion of her impending death is upsetting to Barry. He doesn’t really know her at all, just the few pieces of information the nurses slipped to him over the past week. As Susan’s English skills aren’t that great, and she seemed to prefer to stay to herself, Barry hadn’t spoken to her more than a couple of words so far; yet it is still a saddening thought that she would leave people behind, who will mourn her loss. He wonders what her husband will do. How he will cope with the sudden empty spot in his life which was once filled by his spouse…

Barry, carefully reaches up with his right hand and rubs his eyes.

This has been his ninth day in the hospital after being shot. He briefly wonders what that experience would have been like for him, if that happened just after his release from prison. Barry wouldn’t have expected anybody to visit him; it is humbling to think how much things have changed for the better.

Mary and Eddy have hardly missed a day so far, and they even brought Axel along that day. The kid was oddly quiet and tense. Barry was unsure whether he was angry at him or simply put off by being in a hospital.

When the visiting hours came to an end, Axel didn’t want to leave, though. He actually started to cuss one of the nurses, when she tried to help Mary to coax him into leaving. It was certainly not one of the kid’s finest moments, but he let himself be calmed somewhat when Eddy promised him that they would pass by again the following day.

The memory of that incident, still fills Barry with guilt for worrying the young teenager so much and he tries to force his thought towards a different direction.

The day before yesterday, James came by with his grandmother as well. It was good to see Mrs. Ming again and talk with her. She was worried, but didn’t make a fuss over it, something Barry was grateful for. It could get a little bit grating with Mary and even Eddy at times. Instead, she mostly told him stories about her childhood in China, from what her life was like in the small rice farmer village she grew up in, as one of six children.

Barry listened, thankful, as he didn’t feel well and thus hadn’t been up much to talking. James and her would pass by on Sunday again, which was only two days from then, and he is very much looking forward to it.

It still is hard for him to believe, that he has such nice people in his life. After everything that happened, he is no longer alone, and he tries to cling to that, instead of thinking about what he lost. It isn’t surprising that no one else has turned up, well other than Jay, that is. He didn’t expect it any other way.

It still leaves a bitter taste in his mouth, though.

“S-stupid…” He sighs quietly, trying to clear his mind of the memory of his former friends.

They do not longer consider him as anything, but a traitor and sick criminal, and no matter how much that thought hurts him, he must come to terms with it. None of them cares that he was shot; some would probably have preferred it for him to not…

Barry grits his teeth and forces himself to stay relaxed, unwilling to cause himself any additional pain, because he can’t keep his own mind in check.

It is late, he really should try to sleep some more instead of-
The sound of the door being quietly opened, causes him to let go of that string of thoughts and look at it instead.

A slit of the bright hallway light pierces the dark room. The first thing that comes to his mind is that it has to be one of the nurses, checking up on them.

That idea is quickly dismissed, though, when he notices that the person at the door has definitely, not the frame of any of the three female night nurses he has gotten to know, so far.

His body tenses up, causing his abdomen to burst out in pain, and him to hiss in response. He reaches for the remote that is resting next to his right hand, to call a nurse, but stops when the late visitor suddenly speaks.

“Don’t,” Len whispers sharply. The relief Barry feels at the realisation who came to see him, is nearly overwhelming. That last only for a second, though, before he really grasps what it means his friend being there. Instantly, his happiness is replaced by a nauseating worry.

“W-what are y-you d-doing h-here?” Barry asks agitatedly, trying to keep his voice down. He is aware that getting unwanted attention is the last thing either of them needs. Should the other patients or the nurses notice Len’s presence, both his friend and him, would be in a world of trouble. Not just because of the police, but due to the possibility that, the Blue Velvet and Blacksmith may also have people keeping an eye on him in case one of the Rogues turn up to visit him.

Barry watches Len with weary eyes, as he steps into the room, closing the door softly behind him, before making his way over to him, quietly. The other man is wearing dark blue jeans, a plain black shirt, and a dark brown bomber jacket, as well as a baseball cap, pulled low over his face. A simple outfit, one that would make it hard for anybody to recognize him at first glance, as Len’s criminal alter ego is generally much more well known.

“Hey.” Len’s voice sounds low and calm as he meets his eyes in the faint light. Barry wonders whether he should bother to ask him again about why he would be crazy enough to come here, but chooses not to. He is tired, in pain, yet it is just so damn good to see his friend again, alive and obviously not too badly hurt.

Warm fingers touch his, the ones from his hand with the needle embedded into it, and Barry reacts with an imperceptible shudder.

“How are you holding up?” Len asks quietly, brushing Barry’s knuckles with his own.

Barry chuckles and closes his eyes for a second. “I’m d-doing alr-right…”

He feels exhausted again, much more than a mere moment ago, and close to tears. He is smiling, though, as he had been worried sick about his friend, and it good to see Len again in person, and not on a picture attached to a newspaper’s article telling him of his demi se.

The other man slips his fingers under his hand, so he can hold it. He is careful not to touch the needle.

“I’m s-sor-ry…” The words have been itching to come out. Barry has tried them out in his mind time and time again, and he is glad that he can finally say them.

Len considers him with a frown, causing his features to harden in the sparse lighting of the room. “What for?”
Barry licks his lips. His mouth feels dry, causing his throat hurts when he tries to swallow.

“I called you…” Barry starts with a small voice before he abruptly breaks off and closes his eyes. He still feels so guilty about leading the Rogues to Carmen.

He has for days now.

Reluctantly, Barry proceeds. “You stumbled into their trap because of me…”

His words are met with silence. Barry knows it is just his mind messing with him, but the pain in his abdomen seems to grow more intense again, then.

“Oh for Christ’s sake.” Len nearly hisses, causing Barry to freeze, surprised and afraid. He has to bite down a yelp, as a warm hand cups his cheek, and it is when Len brushes the tears away with his thumb, that he realizes he has started to cry.

His face flushes in embarrassment, and keeping his eyes shut definitely seems like the more preferable thing to do right now.

“You’re such a damn moron for someone with an academic degree,” Len mutters exasperated, and even though Barry feels miserable, both emotionally and physically, and would like nothing more than hide under his blanket like a child, he stifles a chuckle in return. The amusement leaves him again and gets replaced by sombre regret, though. He opens his eyes again with a certain reluctance and meets the other man’s gaze with an unhappy frown.

“I called you-”

“Yes, and I gave you the mirror for exactly that reason.” Even in the darkness the other man’s frustration is plain on his face.

“I didn’t have it with me…”

Len frowns. “What?”

Barry chews on his bottom lip, averting his eyes. “I didn’t take it with me… I thought you… I thought it wouldn’t be a good idea because of… everything…”

A strained silence follows. Barry wouldn’t have thought it to be possible, but he begins to feel even worse than before.

It takes hardly no time for Len’s confusion to become frustration; he groans softly and reaches up with his free hand to pinch the bridge of his nose.

“You left it at home,” he states. “In your fucking drawer or someplace as useless.”

Barry doesn’t reply, it would be rather redundant as it is.

“Look,” Len sighs. “It doesn’t matter-”

“It does,” Barry disagrees and hates how frustrated and helpless he feels right then. He can’t even sit up to have that conversation.

“I didn’t have to get you involved… I… they nearly killed you because of me.”

“No.” There is a low seething anger in Len’s voice. His friend neither stiffen, nor glares at him, but Barry can see how very upset he got in an instant. He knows Len wouldn’t hurt him, despite this sudden change in his demeanour. It still scares him, though, and he doesn’t move a muscle. Len, of course, doesn’t miss it and huffs a sigh filled with frustration, before he gives Barry’s hand a light squeeze.

“None of this is on you. What happened was that you were kidnapped, had two of your fucking fingers broken and were shot because I was a stupid idiot. None of this is on you so stop guilt tripping yourself over a damn mistake I’ve made.” Len’s anger dissipates just as quickly as it came. He scowls again, noticing how pale Barry has turned and grimaces. “Relax.”

Barry trembles when Len moves his hand to close it with almost no pressure around his wrist, carefully avoiding the butterfly needle. It isn’t a threatening touch.

“Just concentrate on getting better, okay?” He seems calmer once more. Barry swallows and closes his eyes and another couple of hot tears to run down his face. The lump in his throat is now so big and uncomfortable, that he can’t bring himself to speak. The next couple of minutes he just concentrates on Len’s presence as they stay silent.

“I gotta go now.” Len tightens his hold on his wrist, and it is quite apparent he doesn’t like the idea.

“Are y-you s-safe?” Barry asks feebly, as he finally looks back to Len. “All of y-you?”

“Yeah, we’re fine,” Len assures him, and the right corner of his lips lifts slightly. He looks both amused and a bit exasperated. “It seems Amunet has other things to worry about, other than us.”

Barry isn’t sure what to think, or how he is supposed to understand that.

“Th-the B-Blue V-Velvet?”

There is a brief pause and even in the faint light he can make out how a disgruntled expression crosses Len’s face for a second, before he schools his face again.

“Something like that,” he answers simply and there is something to way he says it, that worries him.

“You should go back to rest.” The fingers leave his wrist. Barry can’t help, but make a small unhappy noise over the loss of contact.

“L-Len,” he protests weakly. He knows how stupid it is to try and get the other man to stay, seeing that, every minute he is there makes it more likely for him to be caught. Nonetheless, he doesn’t want him to leave, not so soon. It is just then, when he registers how much he has actually missed Len over the previous week.

For the last months, really.

A warm, calloused hand cups the left side of his face once more, and Barry holds his breath in surprise and confusion. The mild apprehension he feels due to the unexpected contact, quickly wanes again. Len makes a small calming noise, stroking his thumb over his cheekbone, in a display of tenderness.

Barry’s eyes close on their own accord, and he concentrates on the touch. It is so nice and soothing, it reaches something deep inside his chest, a sore and hurting spot that has been there for so long, that he has just got used to the discomfort.

Len moves his hand lower, and Barry quivers, opening his eyes again to look at him alarmed, when the other man’s thumb caresses his lower lip with a feather-like touch. He is barely aware of the renewed pain in his middle region as he watches his friend intently, warily.

Again, Len makes a low soothing noise. His eyes are just a slim rim of blue against the dark pools of his pupils. There is also an emotion, which Barry only saw traces of it before. It scares him, but he relaxes again when nothing else happens, other than Len studying him quietly.

This is such an intimate touch, so different to how Len usually…

Barry isn’t sure how to take that, and while a part of him warns and orders him to turn his head to break the contact, another one can’t deny he enjoys the tentative display of affection, which speaks of the bond that has been developing between them for nearly two years.

Barry likes tenderness like that, it is something he hasn’t experienced in a long time, and even though he knows it can lead to pain, the sensation is very similar to the one he had with Iris in the past, calming, reassuring. The touch doesn’t hold that sharp threatening edge, like he has gradually connected to intimacy all over again…

“I won’t let them hurt you again.” The thumb on his lip stops, and Len holds his gaze. “I was an idiot to believe she would keep her end of the bargain.”

The other man sounds exhausted and spent. Guilt starts to spread in Barry, when he thinks of how much trouble he really caused Len and the others.

“I’m s-sorry,” he whispers quietly.

“Of course you are,” Len agrees drily, but he doesn’t seem annoyed. Instead his eyes soften, and he moves his hand to cup the back of Barry’s neck. “Just get better, okay?”

“C-can I s-see y-you again?” The idea that they may have to go on like before, and Barry having to keep his distance from them is disturbing to him. He doesn’t miss how Len relaxes somewhat with a fond expression that settles over his face, as he nods.

“Yeah,” Len agrees and strokes Barry’s cheekbone gently, one more time. A familiar heat spreads on his face in response to the intimate touch.

“Of course. We’ve to be more careful, though. Your friend…” He pauses for a moment and frowns as if remembering something. “He scared them off for now, but I’m not sure if they won’t come back for you, to get to us.”

Len gives Barry’s neck a subtle squeeze, when he notices his worried expression. “I won’t let her get you again. Not her nor, anyone else.”

Barry knows his friend means it, but also knows from experience, that things like those just tend to happen to him. He still nods wordlessly, meeting Len’s eyes, though.

They stay together like that for a little longer, both of them enjoying having the other close again, before Len finally speaks. “I’ve to go.”

“Y-yeah,” Barry agrees quietly and tries not to show how much he hates it, when the other man moves back.

“Just rest,” Len tells him once more before he turns. Barry watches him leave. Though it causes a lingering sadness in his chest, he also feels better and calmer than he has in a long time.
Finally, Len is back! cheer

I hope you guys enjoyed the chapter. It is a little stepping stone when it comes to their relationship, the first part of two, tbh, the next one will follow in two chapters. :3

Thanks for reading, and thanks for leaving me your wonderful feedback! <3

The man-sized mirror definitely wasn’t there when Barry slept in his bedroom the last time around. Its presence is confusing enough, that he stops, blinking at the foreign object as he tries to come up with an explanation of what it could possibly be doing there or where it could come from.

“Everything alright?” James asks. He has been assisting Barry to make his way to the bedroom and shoots him a concerned look, due to his sudden pause.

“Th-the m-mirror” he utters confused. His mind is so nicely wrapped up in the drugs he got before he left the hospital, about forty minutes ago, that he isn’t sure how to formulate what exactly is troubling him about it.

He didn’t own a mirror before… did he?

Barry frowns, squinting at the mirror, not sure what to make of it. He likes mirrors well enough; they come in handy to get to the Rogues’ hideouts, after all, so he has no problem with it per se, but it is odd-

“Yeah, I moved it from the bathroom in here” Eddy explains easily. Barry turns to him, both surprised and even more confused about what his friend says. The other man was following close behind James and him, and came to a stop next to them. When he notices Barry’s uncertain look, he winks at him with an amused little smile before he elaborates. “You know, because your bathroom is about the size of a matchbox, and that thing is really just taking unnecessary space up in there. It’ll probably be much more useful in here anyway, right?”

Not sure how else to respond, Barry only nods and turns back to the new bedroom addition, still pretty sure he never owned a mirror like that, especially not in his bathroom.

“Come on, Barry, let’s get you to the bed,” James urges him tentatively on. He smiles once again, looking a tiny bit worried. “I’m sure things will clear up after you’ve rested a little”

“I-I’m t-tired” Barry agrees and let himself be lead to his bed.

The prospect of sleep is a welcome one, he has been drowsy since the nurse gave him the painkillers that morning; his body feels unusually heavy. Heavy but mostly painless, which is a nice change…
The bedding is fresh and cool. He groans softly when he lies down on it. He really missed his mattress, it may be crappy and old, but he got used to it over the years, and it almost feels like coming home all over again.

“Do you want me to get you some water?” James asks. He pulled the covers over him and is cupping his shoulder lightly. “Or tea?”

Barry undergoes another bout of drowsiness, so he is not really feel up to decide on anything right then. He makes a small noise and yawns.

“I think he doesn’t really care right now,” Eddy points out, audibly amused. Barry glances over to him and smiles. His friend snorts and shakes his head. “Man, I wanna have some of the shit they gave you.”

“Just rest, Barry, I’ll bring you something to drink in a moment, okay?” James squeezes his shoulder carefully, ignoring Eddy, and stands up again.

“Sleep tight, Rosebud.” Eddy winks at him. Barry watches both of them leave the room and close the door.

The window blinds dim the light in there, despite it being shortly after midday, and Barry lets his eyes move around his bedroom, feeling lethargic and lightheaded at the same time. After a couple of seconds his gaze lands on the mirror again, and he furrows his brow. He wonders if he could ask James or Eddy to cover it with something for him, when they come back. Having it around is kind of unsettling to him.

His drugged-induced exhaustion wins out in the end, before either of his friends returns though.

Barry wakes up to a man standing over him.

It is dark in the room, nearly pitch-black, which signalizes that night has come by, then. He must have slept at least a handful of hours.

Everything is silent around him. He can only hear the beating of his own heart in his ears, as he looks up to the tall shape next to his bed.

There is something threatening about the looming presence; something so painfully frightening that Barry isn’t sure whether he is still dreaming or not, as it could easily be another nightmare. He has them often enough, after all.

Barry tentatively tries to move his right hand and notices with surprise, that he can. Usually he is paralyzed in dreams like those, but the realisation that he isn’t, sends white-hot fear flashing through him. He gets completely still.

Whoever that is, doesn’t move an inch, not at all. He just stands there, looking down, watching Barry watch him.

The air feels charged, thick and static, just like before a storm.

It is the oddest, most bizarre sensation, as if he knew who that ominous being was, like he should recognize him at least. Barry freezes up, pain ravaging his inner organs, when he catches the slight crimson glimmer where the other man’s – thing’s? – eyes must be.
Then, the stranger is gone.

All happens so quickly that Barry needs a moment to grasp the fact that he is alone again. An uneasy feeling stays behind settled in the pit of his stomach, despite Barry’s efforts to rationalize with himself that it was just another nightmare. A jab of pain pierces his trail of thought, forcing his attention away from the now empty spot where his mind played a trick on him, a moment ago. Exhaling, he tries to lie down and loosen up again.

The unexpected sound of someone opening the bedroom door cuts through the silence.

Barry’s eyes need a moment to adjust to the sharp light coming from the floor. He grunts in discomfort, as he squints at the person’s silhouette assessing it.

“Hey, you’re awake.” His worry dissipates as soon as he recognizes Eddy’s voice. “Can I turn on the lights without your head exploding?”

Barry chuckles but scowls when his abdominal pain worsens again.

“Sure.”

The darkness is suddenly replaced with an unforgiving artificial luminosity, which shows Barry that it wasn’t a good idea after all.

“Good to see you finally awake, Bar.” His friend chuckles, as he makes his way over to him. “You really went out like a light.”

He sounds far too amused by his discomfort, and Barry gives him a disgruntled look for it.

“How are you doing, buddy?” The mattress moves slightly when Eddy sits down at its edge, next to Barry. His smirk wanes as soon as he gets a better look on him. “You alright? You’re looking a bit pale as death.”

Barry frowns and glances to the other side of his bed, where he thought he saw the figure. He turns back to Eddy and hesitates for an instant, before he somewhat reluctant, asks him if he was in there just a moment ago.

“No?” Eddy answers, rising an eyebrow. “You were probably still half asleep, Bar.” He chuckles.

“Right…”

It really seems like it was the afterglow of some nightmare, he can’t remember anymore, now lost, deep in his subconscious. He knows he should be glad about it, but there is an unnerving feeling holding onto him, refusing to let go.

A light touch on his arm snaps his attention back to Eddy, who is now watching him with a more serious expression. “Hey, you are completely safe here. Nobody will get to you with me around, okay?”

It is a comforting sensation, that Eddy could be there in a split of a second. Barry is glad he agreed to his friends’ little scheme of babysitting him around the clock, for at least the first couple of days. The idea of bothering them still doesn’t sit well with him, but he knows how much worse he would feel, without anybody else keeping him company, after another dream like that one.

“Thanks, E-Eddy.” Barry answers. He gives to the other man a faint smile, before the urge to yawn overcomes him, so he rubs his eyes.
“Wh-what t-time is it?” Barry mutters tiredly. He looks at his clock, on his bedside table.

“Half past three in the morning,” Eddy answers just as Barry reads the numbers.

“Th-that l-late?”

He really must have been out; he slept for more than twelve hours straight, without waking up once. It would at least, explain how bone-dry his mouth is and how uncomfortably full his bladder feels.

“Or early, depending on how you look at it.” Eddy points out.

“Y-you’re w-way t-too ch-cheerf-ful f-for h-how early i-it is.” Barry wipes his eyes once more and sighs. “C-can y-you h-help m-me u-up? I n-need t-to use th-the b-b-bathr-room.”

“Of course.”

Eddy is surprisingly gentle in getting him out of bed, and Barry is really grateful for it, because he hurts much more than he initially noticed, now that the medication wore off. He also doesn’t feel all that steady on his legs, so he leans heavily on his friend. Eddy walks away from the bathroom while he is using it, and helps him back to bed afterwards.

Just this small journey leaves Barry sore all over, and he groans softly when he is finally lying down again.

“I’ll make you some tea, okay?”

Barry hums in response and concentrates on his breathing. He tried to ease his pain a number of times over the last two weeks, with what he read in the book he got from Mary. It never really helped that much, but he always ended up more relaxed, which made it easier to deal with the throbbing in his abdomen, in a way.

He is dozing when he hears Eddy enter again. He slowly looks over to his friend, who is studying him with a frown. “Don’t take it the wrong way, Bar, but you look awful”

That certainly doesn’t deserve an answer. Barry stays quiet as he watches Eddy come over and put the cup of tea onto his bedside table.

“You want me to help you sit up?” Eddy asks.

The thought alone causes him to grimace, and Eddy makes a sympathetic noise.

“We can also wait for it to cool down more, and you can drink it without having to move that much?” he suggests, and Barry gives him a thankful look.

“C-can I’ve s-some w-water inst-stead?”

“Sure.” Eddy agrees readily. Suddenly, there is a glass of water in his hand. Just like that.

Barry’s eyes grow wide. He just stares at his friend for a long moment in disbelief. Eddy usually doesn’t use his powers around him like that; he has always seemed very reluctant to even just acknowledge them so far.

Aside from the night Barry learned about them and when the other man saved James’ and his lives, he hadn’t displayed them at all so far.

“Careful or your face will stay stuck like that.” Eddy says. Barry blinks and blushes, embarrassed about his own reaction. “S-sorry.”

“It’s fine.” Eddy gives him a tight smile that is clearly fake and doesn’t reach his eyes. “I hope you don’t mind. I mean, me speeding around in your flat.”

It is such an odd thing to say that Barry can’t help but be amused by it. He chuckles softly. “Of course n-not, wh-why w-would I?”

Eddy studies him in silence, for a long moment. His expression is guarded, and Barry doesn’t like how obviously troubled his friend is by his own powers.

“I don’t know.” Eddy finally concedes with a shrug and averts his gaze to the still steaming tea cup in his hands. “I don’t wanna freak you out or anything.”

“Y-you d-don’t,” he assures him in a quiet voice. Barry wishes he could move better, or at least be able to use his left hand, because he wants to touch his friend, just as a small gesture of comfort.

“Y-you m-make m-me f-feels s-safe,” Barry says. It is a bit of a corny thing to say, but he means it, and he wants Eddy to understand that. He is really not bothered by what his friend can do. He would be quite a hypocrite in that regard, after all.

“Like your personal superhero?” Eddy asks and bats his eyes at him in an overdone manner. Barry smiles and nods. “J-just l-like th-that.”

The other man laughs in a soft manner, and his noticeable tension, fortunately, ebbs away.

“You could be the Lois Lane to my Superman.”

“A-and I th-thought I’m th-the s-sappy one.”

Eddy beams, obviously not insulted in the least. “A real man can stand to his emotions, may they be of anger, sadness, or eternal love.”

“Y-you’re awf-ful at th-this, y-you kn-know th-that?”

“You just don’t wanna admit how smitten you really are.”

Thankfully, his initial pain and discomfort are no longer borderline intolerable, what allows Barry to notice how at ease he feels in his bed, with a friend around to keep him company.

“Y-you’re r-right, I’m h-head o-ver h-heels f-for you.”

“Aha! I knew it! Nobody can withstand my charm.”

Barry laughs softly and closes his eyes. “Wh-when d-did J-James l-leave?”

“Around ten.”

“H-he s-stayed th-that l-long?”

James has to work tomorrow, or this day, by then. He has a short meeting of sorts, and some preparations for his trip to Canada, as far as Barry knows.

“We played a few rounds of poker,” Eddy explains with a smirk, that reminds Barry of a cat who caught the proverbial canary. He groans exasperated. “Y-you c-cleaned h-him o-out, d-didn’t y-you?”
Of course not,” his friend denies, but he seems much too pleased with himself, for it to be true.

“I asked y-you n-not t-to, h-he’s n-new t-to it. Y-you offered t-to t-teach h-him.”

While Eddy can be a really nice guy, he also is really amazing at being a jackass at times.

“And what better motivation to improve, than playing for actual money?” Eddy asks. At Barry’s dark look, Eddy sighs and at least tries to look a bit guilty, although he doesn’t wear it that well.

“Right, I won’t do it again,” Eddy offers and adds with a slight frown. “And you do know that the guy has money like hay, right?”

“D-does th-that r-really m-matter?”

“Of course, it isn’t as if two hundred bucks less will hurt him, but they can make all the difference for a poor fellow like me.”

That is more than half of his rent!

“What? No, of course not, I’ve just said some random number as an example” Eddy protests. Barry wonders whether his friend actually does it on purpose or just doesn’t know how fake his innocent expression looks.

“Y-you’re unbel-liveable”

He will have to apologize to James and tell him to stay away from Eddy when it comes to anything regarding money or bets.

“I’m not that bad,” Eddy disagrees before he lifts the glass of water. “You want to drink some?”

The cool water feels amazing; he lets Eddy assist him with lifting his upper body, so he doesn’t spill half of it all over himself. Barry empties it in one go, and sighs softly when he gets lowered back down again. He is so much better just by no longer being so thirsty.

“You want me to get you another one?”

“I’m f-fine, th-thanks”

Eddy puts the empty glass back on the bedside table. “How’s your belly doing?”

“H-hurts,” Barry answers truthfully. He rubs his eyes with his good hand. “B-but n-not a-as b-bad as before.”

“You missed your afternoon dose yesterday, so if you want, you can have some of your pain meds now.”

“Y-you w-would n-need t-to m-make m-me p-porridge, th-though” he points out. The pills he got for the pain are the strong kind, stronger than the doctors usually prescribe, yet they seem to be the only ones that are really working on him. To not get sick or hurt his stomach, Barry couldn’t take them without having eaten something in advance; and right then, that meant porridge or semolina pudding.

“That would be the case if I hadn’t been clever enough to already prepare it beforehand.” Eddy grins and gets up. “I’ll get you some”
“Thank you,” Barry says. He watches his friend leave the room, then he turns his gaze back to the ceiling. He feels tired again, which really shouldn’t be possible after how long he slept. Still, his eyelids get heavier by the second, and he only fights the urge to close them for about a minute before he gives in.

A tentative shake of his shoulder wakes him up again just a moment later, when Eddy returns with a bowl of porridge.

“If you go on like this you will fall into hibernation,” Eddy says. His friend puts his meal aside and grabs a second pillow out of his closet. Barry grimaces when Eddy helps him to sit up, in order to push it behind his back for support.

“You’ll feel less crappy as soon as you have some food and the pain killers in your system,” Eddy assures him, handing him the light blue ceramic bowl.

“I think I’d like to hibernate better.”

The food doesn’t hold any charm for him, but Barry still picks up the spoon and wills himself to eat, knowing that he needs the energy, if he wants to get better.

Eddy keeps talking for the most part, while Barry is finishing the small portion of the rather bland, but not bad porridge. It is nice to listen to him as he eats, which takes him about ten minutes. He lets Eddy help him lie back again, after receiving the pain killers that hopefully, would help with the renewed pain.

“You want to sleep a bit more?” Eddy asks.

Barry knits his brow, as he thinks about it.

“Not yet,” he tells Eddy. He looks back towards the mirror that stands in the left corner, opposite to his bed. “Can you tell me where the mirror comes from?”

“Do I really need to?” His friend is also looking at the reflective surface, that is about his size, what makes it a bit bigger than Barry. Eddy’s expression is a little bemused, when he looks back at Barry. “They really used the small mirror in your bathroom before? How did some of them fit even through that? I mean, Rory is a fucking beast. Does it even offer enough space for his shoulders?”

It doesn’t catch Barry off-guard to learn that, the new addition to his rather sparse furniture, comes from the Rogues; taking into consideration that Eddy clearly knew about its sudden appearance in his bedroom, he guessed he was somehow involved in getting it there.

“You’ve talked to them?”

“Yeah,” Eddy shrugs. He takes his seat next to him once again. “Somewhat. Mostly Snart, and, wow, isn’t that one tense fellow.”

That brings a faint smile upon Barry’s face, and he can’t say he is surprised. He knows Len and how uncommunicative he can get, especially when he is under a lot of pressure and edgy to begin with.

That night from about a week ago, comes to his mind, how the other man passed by in the early morning hours. It was such a relief to see him alive and well, even if it was just for a short time.

“Are they okay?” Barry asks. He tries not to let the heavy concern for his friends take a hold of him again. Len told him that the Rogues are fine, but he knew his friend would also say so if it wasn’t true, just to spare him the worry while he is hurt. They hardly had time to speak about anything, as long as his brief secret visit lasted. Also, he still doesn’t know what exactly happened back at the docks, after James and him were taken to the hospital.

“I guess so. I haven’t really spent that much time with them. They seemed to do fine,” Eddy says.

“Are th-they s-safe?”

Despite Len telling him that they may have settled their problems with Blacksmith and the Blue Velvet, Barry isn’t sure if he really believes so. Both parties seemed rather hell-bent on getting to his friends, partly for some kind of information, partly out of personal grudge. Somehow, it is hard to buy they would simply let bygone be bygone. Things don’t work like that.

“They’re currently lying low in some bolthole of theirs,” Eddy tells him with a shrug. “I don’t think that this crazy bitch and the mob have the slightest idea where it is, so they are probably as safe as they can be right now.”

“Y-you’ve b-been th-there?” he asks surprised. He knows that Len generally doesn’t trust any outsiders with the locations the Rogues tend to frequent, when they have to lie low.

“No.” Eddy snorts. “They bolted through some reflective surface of an ice-wall Snart created with his gun, and didn’t invite me along.” His friend smiles in a troubled way. “It sounds freaky to read about this shit in the newspaper, but to actually see it makes all the difference.”

“Y-you w-went b-back th-there?” Barry asks. He hasn’t really thought about that being a possibility. He assumed that Eddy simply went home or maybe to a bar, or somewhere else, but not back to the docks. Why would he?

“Well, if I hadn’t been there, there probably wouldn’t be all that much left of the infamous Rogues. Don’t get me wrong, they are crazy, seriously, I really don’t wanna fight them.” Eddy frowns and pauses briefly.

Barry knows he won’t like what comes next.

“They were up against a fucking huge number, and that crazy nut of a woman actually had a few guys at hand that were not only lookalikes of a few of your friends but had similar gimmicks to them as well.”

“L-like th-the R-Rogues?” Barry frowns. This is quite a surprising and concerning piece of news. He has no doubt that a group of copycats could mean a world of trouble for the twins and his friends, especially if they work for someone like Blacksmith.

Eddy agrees with a hum.

“Some other guy in a Mirror Master outfit, a bald chick with a weather wand, and a guy with a heat gun,” he explains. “There were also two other freaks, some we actually know. Tar Pit and Double Down, really disgusting fellows, both of them”

Barry shudders at the mentioning of the last two, as he had more than one unwelcome run-in with them during his time in Iron Heights...

He pushes the memory away, not willing to let his mind wander there, and instead focuses on the rest of what Eddy has just told him. None of the other criminals he talked about ring a bell; he never heard of a second Mirror Master, a female Weather Wizard, or another Heat Wave. Neither Len nor any of the others ever mentioned anything of that sort, but it could also be that they simply didn’t tell him.
"Y-you w-went b-back t-to h-help th-them?"

While Eddy is a good friend, Barry has realized by then, that he most likely is so only to Mary and him. He generally doesn’t seem to care too much about anyone else, and though this doesn’t make him an actively bad person, he certainly is not an altruistic man. It makes no sense for Eddy to go back in the heat of a fight, for a couple of guys he hardly knows.

His friend seems to guess his line of thought as he chuckles and shrugs.

"Couldn’t let them die, could I now?" he asks with a smirk. “You’d have become all mopey again, and Mary would have totally given me the fault for it. You know how scary that woman can be”

The humour vanishes like a shadow and is replaced by a much colder and hard look when he goes on. “I also couldn’t let those fuckers get the stupid idea to come after you again.”

Barry feels his stomach drop. “Wh-what d-did y-you d-do?”

For a long moment, Eddy remains silent. He keeps looking at his hands, flat on his thighs instead, with a dark expression on his face.

The air in the room got heavier and harder to breathe, and Barry knows it is probably just his imagination, as he has just taken the pain medication, but once again, his pain is showing its ugly presence.

“I scared them.” Eddy finally concedes. He is to a moderate extent reluctant and glances at Barry, before looking at their reflection in the mirror. “I didn’t kill them, but I hurt a couple of them, just to show that I mean business.”

He snorts humourless, screwing his face. “I think I freaked your friends out pretty much as well by doing so. Snart looked ready to blast me with his gun, when I came close to them after…”

Eddy gnaws his bottom lip, in that still so unfamiliar, troubled way. Barry isn’t sure whether he really wants to know what happened after he was taken to the hospital, anymore. He believes that Eddy didn’t murder anybody, but he knows there are a number of other horrible things someone can do to a man, particularly when you have the abilities of a speedster.

Eddy glances at him again, an uneasy frown on his face, before he stares at his hands. “I can be pretty… horrifying, you know? I mean, I’m a rather chill guy but…”

Barry watches his friend pausing and nervously licking his lower lip.

Again, Eddy glances to him. “I’ve a really nasty streak, when someone actually is able to provoke me, like, a really nasty streak. It is as if my brain isn’t working right anymore, I feel calm and all, but I am not. I’ve done some really messed up things so far, not murder or shit like that but…”

It must be hurtful the way Eddy is digging his fingers in his thighs. The rest of his body appears surprisingly relaxed, just his hands look more like claws than anything else. Barry wants to tell him to relax, that he is hurting himself. He has been in the other man’s place before, though, and he knows how sometimes you just need the chance to talk and explain yourself.

He stays quiet and listens.

“Y-you can do some pretty sick things when you’re fast, not just running around but… I mean, you probably have seen the Flashes and the other speedsters move through stuff, like walls and shit, right?” Eddy gives him an uncertain look. He looks scared.
Barry feels sick as he thinks that he already knows where this is going, but he still nods.

“I don’t know if my powers work exactly like theirs,” Eddy proceeds and frowns “I can move through stuff as well, though, like walls, cars, trees, nearly anything, to be honest. Even other humans and... if I’m not careful I hurt them when I do so, I mess them up a little. Dr Elias said that I overload their cells with energy... that they kind of... pop.”

Eddy shudders. Barry feels a familiar dread settle over him as he listens to his friend.

“I also can simply destroy their tissue if I solidify when I haven’t completely passed through them. Believe me, that hurts like a bitch and not just to the other person. I found that out the hard way by accident.”

The image alone is disturbing, and Barry wonders again how long has the other man had this powers by then and how he got them. He can still remember when he himself got connected to the speed force, how overwhelming, confusing, and frightening that was at first, before he was able to learn to control his new abilities. It is also not lost on him, that this Dr Elias seems to know his friend quite well. Barry wonders who this man actually is.

“I’ve got the handle on it by now, though. I can move around without anybody noticing me; without me killing or crippling others by accident while I do so.” The smile Eddy gives him is not a particularly happy one. It is strained, and Eddy looks pale. “I’ve also learned a few neat tricks over time. I wonder if the other speedsters can do them as well. I used one of them on a couple of those guys in the warehouse, to make it apparent, that there would be someone around to make them hell to pay if they come after you again.”

When Eddy meets his eyes, Barry doesn’t look away. The grim, nearly stubborn way in which he is looking at Barry then, is like his friend daring him to tell him off for what he did. At the same time, Barry doesn’t miss his silent plea for him to understand, though. “I don’t want you to freak out and think that I’m some psycho or anything. I... I’m really not. I was just so angry after seeing what they did to you.”

“E-Eddy, I kn-know y-you aren’t a p-psychop-path.” Barry says. He wishes he could sit upright while having this conversation. He thinks it would make it easier. “I also kn-know th-that you’re n-not a b-bad p-person. Y-you s-saved our l-lives, J-James and I would never have been able to get out of th-there w-without y-your h-help. Th-that is s-someth-thing a g-good m-man d-does, s-someone wh-who c-cares f-for h-his f-friends.”

He really means it. Eddy may possess a lot of faults, probably way more than Barry is even aware of, but he has been nothing but a good, supportive friend towards him since they’ve met. That is something he would never forget.

“I’m n-not s-scared o-of y-you,” he goes on when Eddy is about to protest. “And I’m n-not g-going t-to j-judge y-you f-for wh-what y-you’ve d-done. I-I’m n-not h-happy about y-you h-hurting others, b-but i-it d-doesn’t m-mean I’m n-not g-gratef-ful f-for your h-help or th-that y-you’re l-looking out f-for m-me. J-just t-try t-to b-bring y-your p-point over w-without h-h-harming anyb-body f-from n-now on, okay?”

The slight incredulous, nearly wary way Eddy is looking at him, tugs at Barry’s heart. He is sure that his friend expected quite a different reaction from him. Again, he wonders about the other man, about his past. It is hard to miss he couldn’t have had the easiest one.

“Okay,” Eddy agrees finally after a moment. He still looks uncertain, but, at the same time, he also appears visibly relieved.
“I’m g-glad th-that w-we’ve m-met,” Barry isn’t sure why he has added that. It just seems important to him that his friend gets what he means to him.

“Me too, Bar,” Eddy agrees with a much more relaxed smile.

They fall silent after they are done talking, as they go after their own thoughts.

Suddenly, a rather worrying thing occurs to Barry, when he thinks back to that evening in the warehouse.

“D-did th-they s-see your f-face?” he asks concerned. Eddy meets his concerned expression with a smirk. “I may not be an expert on my powers, but I’m not a novice either. I didn’t give my identity away.”

“Y-you d-didn’t w-wear a-a c-costume, d-did y-you?” Barry asks and smiles in amusement at that thought. Eddy gives him a rather miffed glare at that. “Nah, I just vibrated my body to appear like an actual blur. I’m not a big fan of those garish skin-tight jumpsuits.”

“Y-you d-don’t l-like th-the F-Flash’s c-costume?”

They’ve never really touched upon the twin city’s most famous protector, as neither of them are all that jazzed breaching that particular topic for various reasons.

Still, Barry is curious.

“Well, there are definitely worse ones around,” Eddy admits and makes a face. “But you wouldn’t catch me in one of that stupid getups for any money in the world. I don’t understand how anybody with any sense of self-awareness can wear that without feeling like a complete moron.”

Barry can’t help but be a little insulted by that. Nevertheless, he doesn’t disagree with his friend. He always felt uncomfortable in his Flash costume. He liked the look of it, just not wearing it.

“Though I’ve read somewhere that it’s made up of actual energy,” Eddy adds grinning. “Which sounds totally badass. I think in that case I probably would put my vanity aside.”

“Wh-where’ve y-you r-read th-that?” In Barry’s time as the Flash, that little fact wasn’t really a common knowledge. He knows Wally does not have the same connection to the speed force like he once had. In this regard, he was quite similar to Hal, whose Green Lantern powers provide with a fitting costume.

In his case, it came from the speed force itself. Maybe Wally’s connection to it has changed, and he is able to perform that neat little trick then, as well. It is possible; Barry knows next to nothing about his nephew anymore, after all.

“No sure.” Eddy shrugs. “Probably in one of those gossip magazines Mary likes to hoard.”

Barry chuckles and reaches with his good hand up to rub his eyes. He still feels drowsy from sleeping so long, and being unable to do anything else but lying down in bed isn’t helping with that.

“Hey, sleeping beauty,” Eddy’s grin is audible in his voice. “You’re feeling up for a game?”

Barry smiles.

Chapter End Notes
I hope you guys enjoyed the chapter.

It reveals a bit more about Eddie and his powers, and what happened after Barry and James got away from the warehouse.

Thank you for reading and your feedback, it always brightens my day. <3
Barry is dozing when a soft noise catches his attention. It sounds like someone is tapping on glass, which is rather odd and unexpected, considering he is currently in his bedroom.

Confused and still quite drowsy, he opens his eyes and looks to the window above his bed. The blinds are shut, and it takes him a moment to recall that he lives on the second floor and someone would actually have to climb up the fire escape to come up here. He frowns.

A soft and slightly muffled chuckle reaches him from the other side of the room. He freezes.

Kenneth comes to his mind, closely followed by Cameron and the dread that comes after that memory of both men is nearly sickening.

Then, he realizes that James is there, outside in his living room, and the notion that something could have happened to his friend is even worse.

“It’s just us, Barry” a distorted, yet familiar voice says. The terror that clawed into him, fades away. His sleep-drunken mind feels sluggish; his abdomen hurts from the startle he got, but he pushes himself up a bit, so he can look over to the mirror, that is in his possession now. Moving continues to be an arduous task, and he grimaces, trying to ignore the pain.

It is rather obvious now that he is half awake, who decided to pay him such a late visit; despite the initial scare, he can’t help but smile as he turns his attention to the mirror.

“Hey, Allen,” Sam greets him. Barry can hardly make out the man or his features in the dim streetlight, that bathes the room through his window. He is pretty sure his friend is smirking, though. “I don’t understand what Len has been getting on about; you don’t look that bad.”

Sam seems to be well enough; his lacklustre humour is still intact, at least.

Barry watches how Sam’s amused grin wanes, when he notices Len’s irked expression, who is standing next to the other Rogue, both still in the mirror verse.
“Right,” the brunette goes on and steps off to the side, so Len can take his place. “I’ll just shut up.”

“I-it’s g-good t-to s-see y-you, S-Sam,” Barry tells him and means it. It is a relief to see his friend up and well. He was worried about all of them, in spite of Len’s and Eddy’s words of reassurance that the Rogues are doing well, everything considered.

Sam looks back to him with a grin in place once again, as he agrees. “Yeah, damn good to still be breathing, that’s for sure.” He then nods towards him. “And likewise, Allen.”

Barry is about to reply, when Len finally speaks up, cutting him off. “You’ve a babysitter around.”

His good mood falters somehow at the other man’s tone. He turns his attention to Len, frowning slightly, before he looks at to the door. James is out there, either working on something on his laptop or maybe sleeping, as it is already quite late.

“H-he’s h-helping m-me” Barry states simply. He lowers his voice now that he remembers James’ presence. Len’s dislike over that little fact is plain on his face, even in the dusky room. Barry really doesn’t feel up to an argument with him right then, especially about his friend.

“Yeah” Len agrees. The tense, subsequent moment of silence, makes it very clear what he really thinks of James being around.

It is disconcerting for Barry, that Len is in such a grim mood already; he has been looking forward to see him again…

Keeping himself up on his elbows for that long, turns out to be a very effective way to upset his abdomen again, as the pain intensifies, and Barry lowers himself back down. It is not a position he likes to have this conversation in, but he has hardly been out of the hospital for two days, and his body is still very much recovering.

He groans in a quiet manner, pressing his eyes shut while taking a couple of slow and deep breaths, trying to calm the sharp biting pain.

“Can I come through?” The quiet anger is gone from Len’s voice, he sounds calmer once again, which is both a surprising but also, welcomed change.

Barry hesitates for an instant and glances over to the door. There is no noise coming from the other side, which could mean that James has fallen asleep, but with the absence of a TV in his flat, it is hard to tell whether the other man isn’t doing something else.

“Don’t worry about your pal,” Sam tells him. “He’s snoozing.”

Upon hearing that, Barry relaxes.

“G-good, okay,” he agrees quietly and watches how Len steps out of the mirror. Before he makes his way over to Barry, though, he turns back to Sam. “You can return to the hideout, but keep an eye on that guy for me.”

“What?” Sam asks in faked surprise. “You don’t want me to stick around for your sappy reunion? You wouldn’t notice-”

“If you don’t want to end up with a frozen head, you zip off right now.”

“Always so damn pissy…”
Barry watches how Len keeps scowling at the mirror as Sam takes his leave before his friend turns back to him. Their eyes meet, and they study each other quietly for a long moment, across the dimly lit room.

It is good to see Len again, well and in one piece, even though his friend visited him already in the hospital. With everything that happened, Barry was worried that something else could go wrong for his friends, though, as he is still not sure what exactly is taking place with the Blue Velvet nor Blacksmith.

“H-hey.” Barry says quietly, smiling. He still feels tired, ridiculously so, for how much he has been sleeping the last couple of days, despite his nightmares, which had gotten worse again since his kidnapping.

For a second, the memory of Cameron kneeing before him, his hands on his thighs, leering up to him with those intense green eyes, with an unspoken promise of pain and something far worse in them, crosses his minds, and he shudders.

“Hey.” Len replies. He is still studying him with a somewhat somber look, before another silence settles between them.

Barry can’t help but wonder whether his friend is angry with him, and the notion is unexpectedly unsettling, dauntingly so.

“You look pale.” Len finally observes. While the frown stays on his face, his expression turns a little lighter as he makes his way over to him.

“And y-you’re a-a r-real ch-charmer.” Barry mutters and smiles when Len chuckles in response.

“No, not exactly my forte.” His friend points out before he nods to the edge of the mattress, next to Barry. “Mind if I sit?”

“G-go on.”

With most of the tension between them suddenly gone again, it hits Barry how nice it is to have him there. He has been worried about when exactly, he would have the possibility to see him or any of the others again, now that he is more or less under supervision around the clock. Of course, he should have expected that it wouldn’t exactly be something to stop Len, should his friend really want to visit.

Now, with the mirror in his possession, it will be much easier for the Rogues and Barry to pass between each other’s homes; that doesn’t mean, that he wouldn’t cover it as soon as he was mobile again, though.

Having something equal to an open door in his bedroom, is a little bit unsettling. Barry knows that only Sam can turn the mirror into a means of transportation, but he is also very much aware of the fact that some of the other Rogues have a rather particular kind of humour, and he really doesn’t want to end up on the receiving end of it.

“Y-you kn-know th-that I w-won’t l-let th-that th-thing s-stand ar-round l-like th-that in f-future, r-right?” Barry asks carefully. He is surprised to see that Len doesn’t seem bothered by him pointing that out.

“Put a sheet over it,” his friend suggests with a half-shrug. “That should do the job.”

Barry nods, still not quite sure and kind of wary about why Len doesn’t put up more of a fight upon it. He honestly expected him to. “Ok-kay.”

Len hums in agreement, and Barry suddenly notices how close he is. Enough so, that he could touch him by moving his arm just a few inches. It is overwhelming, when it hits him, that he is lying in bed with another man so close by; although Len and him shared a bed on a number of times before.

He becomes painfully aware of how little he is still able to move on his own; for a second a familiar fear starts to creep its way up his mind as he realizes that he is pretty much helpless right now.

Barry tries to ignore it. Len wouldn’t hurt him, he knows that, and James is in the other room…

He is just being stupid again.

“Hey, you’re safe here.” Len says. He meets his eyes, and Barry feels immediately bad for the open concern he can see on the other man’s face.

“S-sorry, I’m j-just… I-I d-don’t kn-know w-why I alw-ways h-have t-to b-be s-so d-damn af-fraid…”

“You’ve been through a lot. I think you’ve every right to feel upset.” There is a tenderness to Len’s voice as he says this, something Barry picked up on before, and he has realized by now that his friend only uses it with him. Usually, he enjoys to be addressed with it, knowing that Len cares about him so much, but right now he feels horrible for how he isn’t able not to be scared of his friend, even if it is just a little.

“It’s n-not y-you. I-I’m n-n-not… I-I c-can’t h-help it, even ar-round M-Mary.” He doesn’t want Len to believe, he thinks of him like that. He knows the other man wouldn’t hurt him. It is hard for him to make sense of his emotions right then, though.

“It’s fine.” Len studies him thoughtfully but with calm as he says that. “I understand.”

Barry doesn’t. Sometimes, he is certain he is more trouble than it's worth, especially with how he is unable to function like any normal person.

“Are you recovering alright?” Len asks. The change of topic is gratefully accepted, and Barry nods. “F-fine, I’ll b-be up and g-going in a-about a w-week or t-two.”

Len’s expression makes it obvious that he thinks that to be a very doubtful prediction, and Barry has to avert his eyes as he cheeks grow warm.

“Or t-two t-to th-three,” he admits reluctantly.

The other man snorts, and Barry can feel him move the hand he has resting on the blanket next to his arm; enough so, that he can feel the tip of Len’s fingers brush against him. A fluttering sensation fills his belly, and his cheeks grow warm.

“You still seem in pain.” Len eyes him with a frown, seemingly unaware or ignoring Barry’s blush. “Didn’t they give you something for it?”

“Of c-course th-they d-did.” Barry licks his dry lips and bites the lower one, nervous.

“But it isn’t working?”

Barry shrugs. He can’t bring himself to meet his friend’s eyes.

They fall quiet for a moment, and while he isn’t looking, he still knows that he is being studied right “You’ve always trouble with healing after getting injured.” Len remarks, sounding rather grim.

Barry doesn’t reply.

“Is it because of how they got rid of your powers?”

The question is like a slap. Barry closes his eyes, wishing that Len would not do that. Neither of them wanted to touch upon that mess of a topic so far; it is something they should not even acknowledge...

“Do they know?” Len asks. Although Barry fails to answer, and despite how miserable and tired he feels, he manages to chuckle. It comes out more pained than anything else.

Again, they become quiet for a minute, and when Len finally speaks again he sounds both harsh and worried. “Have they ever checked up on you? There’s clearly something not alright with you. Injuries aside, you seem to be constantly in pain—”

They hold each other’s eyes; Barry can plainly see what Len thinks of his reluctance to talk about that. It is understandable, Barry would feel the same way if their roles were reversed, but that is something he doesn’t want to discuss or even think about. Ever.

“Why the hell would they do such a messed up thing to you?”

Barry averts his gaze again and looks up to the ceiling. “Wh-what d-d-do y-you th-think?”

“Aren’t they supposed to be the good guys?” Len returns angry.

“Th-they th-th-think I-I k-k-kil-led I-I r-r-raped W-Wally…” Barry reminds him with some difficulty, as talking has become painful once again due to the growing lump in this throat.

Tears start to roll down the side of his face, and he huffs frustrated when he notices it. Barry didn’t even realized he was so close to crying again.

He reaches up with his good hand and roughly rubs his eyes. Upset with himself, with Len, and the world in general.

“Th-they… th-they th-think I-I r-r-raped W-Wally…” A sob escapes him, forcing its way out, despite his attempts to stop it, and he hates it. He hates all of it so much.

His abdomen hurts, the pain is sharp and intense. He wishes that Len would just leave him and his messed up life be…

“They’ve dealt with murderers and rapists before, they do it on a daily basis.” Len clearly doesn’t get it.

“Y-yeah b-b-but n-neither o-of th-them h-h-has b-been th-their f-f-friend—”

“So they are behaving like scum because they believe that one of their own betrayed them and that makes this shit alright?” For how angry Len sounds, he is surprisingly good at keeping his voice low. “Are you serious? That is utter bullshit.”

Barry doesn’t replay. It isn’t just that he doesn’t want to, but he can’t. His throat has closed up on him once again, and he tries desperately to keep it together. He isn’t very successful as another sob starts to force its way over his lips, followed by another one, and then he is pressing his hand on his mouth to try and muffle them, while he squeezes his eyes shut.

“Barry…” The agitation is gone from Len’s voice. He sounds uncertain and sorry. He curses softly under his breath, and Barry wants him gone so badly right then. He doesn’t want Len to see him like that again.

At the same time the notion of Len leaving is terrifying, utterly, horribly terrifying-

“I’m going to touch your shoulder.” Len tells him calmly. “No need to freak out.”

Barry wants to protest, but he is only able to get out a muffled whimper. He can’t even bring himself to look at Len, and he tries to brace himself for the touch he knows is going to come. It still startles him nonetheless.

Len makes a soothing noise when he cups Barry’s shoulder and tells him that he is alright.

A white-hot anger flashes through him over those words. Barry wants to tell him that he can go to hell. He wouldn’t feel so miserable if it weren’t for him, which is a big fat lie, and he knows so. But his inside feels raw, like it has been cut open, and he hates how helpless he always is.

“Calm down, Barry.” Len’s voice is low and softly, and he starts to rub Barry’s shoulder tentatively.
“You’re going to hurt yourself if you keep this up.”

The other man’s hand moves up to Barry’s neck, and he holds it in that way of his that threatens to break and hold Barry together at the same time.

“I-I-I…” It is difficult to speak with how he just can’t stop sobbing, and breathing becomes like a chore. He feels like such an idiot. “I-I d-did-dn’t d-d-do i-it…”

“I know.” Len sounds so honest, so certain, and it hurts so much.

How can he believe him?

Nobody else did! Why would Len believe him? A criminal who hated him back then…

Barry squeezes his eyes shut as a pained noise escapes him, and he presses his neck into the other man’s hand, seeking out the warmth and comfort his friend is able and willing to offer.

He knows, if he isn’t able to calm down soon, James will definitely hear him and things will go from bad to worse...

Len squeezes his neck tentatively. “I know, baby.”

The endearment is unexpected, alien even; Barry actually freezes for a moment before looking at Len with wide eyes.

Judging by how uncomfortable the other man looks in his own skin right now, it has been a slip of the tongue. Still, Len doesn’t correct or try to defend himself. Instead, he just meets his gaze.

The thumb that rests below Barry’s earlobe starts to draw small circles there. It is an oddly intimate but also soothing gesture, and Barry responds with a faint shudder.

“I didn’t mean to upset you.” Len finally says.
Barry swallows with some difficulty, the lump in his throat still very much present. Hesitantly, he moves his left hand that has been resting on his chest to the one in contact with his neck. He touches Len’s gingerly, making the other man smile slightly in return.

“You look tired.” Len points out after they’ve stayed like that for a few moments, just enjoying each other’s closeness. “Do you want me to leave, so you can go back to sleep?”

“N-no.” Right then, having Len gone is probably the last thing Barry wants. “C-c-can y-you s-stay a b-bit l-longer?”

Len nods. “Sure.”

He gives Barry’s neck another light squeeze. “You look close to passing out, though.”

“Wh-when d-do I n-not?” Barry asks rather tersely, but his mood lightens when Len chuckles. “You still look gorgeous.”

The unimpressed look Barry gives him at that, earns him an amused smirk. “You do, baby.”

Barry frowns. “Is th-th-this g-going t-to b-be a th-thing n-now?”

“What do you mean?” Len is horrible at playing innocent, and Barry nearly rolls his eyes. “Y-you c-calling m-me s-stupid p-pet-n-names,” he clarifies.

“You don’t like it?” The hand on his neck moves slightly, so its thumb is just under his Adam’s apple, and Len rubs the area. Another shudder runs through Barry, and he closes his eyes close for a moment, caught off-guard by how intense and pleasant the sensation is. He makes a small pleased noise and flushes in embarrassment, as soon as he realizes what he is doing.

“I like it.” Len adds. He meets Barry’s uncertain look, with a surprisingly honest and open one. “It fits you.”

“B-baby? R-really?” Barry isn’t sure whether he is insulted by it or not. It isn’t as if he hasn’t been called that one before. Iris used to say that to him at times, but it had a completely different meaning with her. A pain shoots through his chest at the thought of his former wife, and he quickly pushes it away.

“I’m n-not a w-woman.” He points out, somewhat tersely.

The tentative caress on his throat stops, and Len lifts an eyebrow. Barry bites his lower lip and studies him with a frown. Len stays quiet and lets him.

“I-I’m… I kn-know th-that I’m n-not th-that…” His face grows uncomfortably warm, and he looks away. “I’m n-not r-really th-that m-m-mascul-line l-looking… b-but…”

He breaks off. To his absolute surprise, Len doesn’t laugh in his face, though. Instead, he pulls his hand back. Barry can’t help but feel the loss over the touch, and he wonders whether he has upset the other man. He glances over to him hesitantly.

Len is watching him with a rather serious expression that causes his stomach to sink.

“Barry, I don’t get why you’d think that anybody could mistake you for a woman, and I certainly don’t.” He sounds angry again, and Barry regrets having touched upon this at all.

A tense minute passes between them, and Barry is not able to look at Len. It isn’t as if he wasn’t already odd enough, he has to make it worse, of course.

The touch on his arm startles him enough that he actually winces back, which causes a sharp pain to flash through his lower abdomen again.

“Relax.” Len grunts, but when Barry glances over to him he appears more concerned than angry. “I’m not going to hurt you.”

“I kn-know. Y-you j-just s-start-tled m-me.” Barry hates the idea of Len thinking that he is scared of him, even though a small part of him keeps urging him to be wary.

He watches how his friend’s frown deepen. “Sorry ‘bout that.”

“It’s f-fine, I’m th-the one wh-who’s s-scared of h-his own sh-shadow.” It is meant to be a joke, but Len’s face only darkens again for a second, and Barry wishes he could take back what he said earlier. He shouldn’t have touched upon his doubts, it only turned that into another awkward situation, and those are following him around like a lost puppy, as it is.

“I’m pretty sure nobody mistook the Flash to be a woman before.” Len finally points out. Barry glares at him but is caught off-guard when he notices his friend is actually teasing him. He seems calmer again.

“I-I… I h-hardly l-look l-like th-that any m-more.” Barry points out, and his cheeks flush once again. He has no idea why they suddenly crossed the line of acknowledging his past as a speedster. He has always assumed that Len wants to be reminded about that as little as he does.

“You were always lean.” Len shrugs.

“Th-thanks?” Barry asks doubtfully but feels his mood lift when his friend smirks.

Len’s expression quickly turns serious again, though. “Nobody with eyes in their heads would think that you aren’t a guy. I certainly don’t.”

It is odd and frightening to have Len watching him with such intensity, all of a sudden, and Barry can’t stop himself before he blurts out. “Y-you… I-I’m n-not g-gay.”

As soon as those words leave his mouth, he wishes he could take them back.

Barry doesn’t understand why he has just said what he did because, while it’s true, his relationship with Len is different and…

Still, he really meant what he said to Sam all those months ago. He is not gay.

To be honest, though, he never really felt like he belongs to any kind of sexual orientation.

He just never liked sex. At all.

He likes people, and some of them he even trusts. Not many, though. He has never been a people person, as most scared him on a level he doesn’t even want to understand. It has been like that for all of his life, as far as he can remember. Even before his stay in Iron Heights, and the ones he wanted in his life the most back then were Iris and, later, Wally.

And didn’t that turn out well for them?
Barry doesn’t want Len to think he doesn’t mean a lot to him, though. He does. There is something in the other man he can’t explain, something that pulls Barry to him.

“I-I l-l-like y-you. V-very m-much,” he proceeds quickly when the other man’s face closed off again.

Barry knows he hurt him, and he feels awful for it.

“Y-you’re… I w-w-want y-you t-to b-be c-c-close, all th-the t-time, y-you s-see?” He chuckles awkwardly and wishes Len wouldn’t watch him with those cold eyes.

“I-I… b-but I’m n-not… r-right. I-I’m… d-damaged.” Barry grimaces unhappily over how stupid that must sound, but there isn’t really any better or more fitting way to describe it.

A slight frown appears on the other man, and Barry hesitates, uncertain whether he really should go there or not. He swallows and wets his lips nervously once more.

“I d-don’t l-like g-get-ting int-timate w-with others, I n-never d-did. I f-feel… it m-makes m-me f-feel r-really b-bad a-and d-dirty…” He looks away, suddenly unable to meet Len’s eyes any longer.

“I kn-know th-that y-you d-d-do, th-though. L-like h-having s-sex, I m-m-mean, a-and… I-I… I c-couldn’t… y-you w-would j-just g-grow a-a-a-angry a-and f-frust-trated b-because I’m s-so… s-strange… and I-I d-don’t w-want y-you t-t-o… I-I w-want y-you t-t-o s-stay, L-Len, I r-really l-like y-y-you, and I d-don’t w-want t-t-o… ch-chase y-y-you away b-by h-how d-d-damaged I am.”

His eyes are itching again, but he can’t really be bothered by it right then. Len has already seen him cry once tonight. At least he isn’t sobbing this time.

A tension settles between them, and Barry expects the other man to get up and leave. He has clearly hurt and likely insulted him, and maybe it would be better for both of them if his visit ended here-

A low, somewhat exasperated sounding sigh causes Barry to look back at Len.

It is a relief to see that his friend is no longer watching him in a cold distant way. He looks tired and grim instead.

“I’m not blind, Barry, and I’m not stupid,” Len says, breaking the uneasy silence. “Believe it or not, you make it rather obvious that you aren’t that keen on the idea of having sex… and I haven’t expected you to be. After that shit those bastards put you through in the Heights, do you really think I don’t get how that has to have messed with you?”

Barry doesn’t like to be reminded that Len and the others do know what he went through in the penitentiary. He tries to forget it most of the time, otherwise he’d probably be unable to be around them.

“I d-don’t e-expect anything in this regard from you.” Len laughs humourlessly, before he pinches the bridge of his nose and huffs softly. He looks tense, unhappy, and very much like Barry feels. Then, he turns back to him and their eyes meet once more.

“Shit, I d-don’t e-expect anything in this regard from you,” his friend goes on and makes a vague gesture between both of them. He appears both frustrated and annoyed.

Len seems rather uncomfortable in his own skin for a second, nearly too quickly for Barry to pick up on it, before he schools his features again and snorts. “I’m n-not interested in guys; they’ve never done anything for me.”
Len studies him with a frown, but some of the wariness leaves his gaze as he does so. Barry isn’t surprised when a familiar conflicted expression appears on his friend’s face instead. He appears like he wants to say something but either isn’t sure how or feels like it gives too much away.

It is usually like that with Len, when they touch upon anything that would need him to acknowledge his feelings. He usually likes discussing what he feels about as much as a cat does taking a bath. Even less, maybe.

Barry understands, but it is still frustrating.

Finally, Len takes a deep breath and closes his eyes for a second before he focuses on him again. An unhappy, grim smile is on his lips. “It is different with you, though, and… I have no idea what to make of it.”

Barry doesn’t know how to respond to that.

He is pretty much on the same boat, after all-

The sound of somebody opening the bathroom door, causes them to freeze them for a second.

“I think I’m better get going,” Len says as he glances to the door with a rather sour look. “He’ll probably come and check up on you.”

“Y-yes,” Barry agrees quietly and can’t help but feel disappointed and hurt by how relieved the other man actually seems about that interruption.

Len doesn’t miss his change in mood and stops as he is about to get up. He reaches for Barry’s hand instead, which he has let go when noticing that James is awake outside the room, and gives it a slight squeeze.

“I’ll check up on you in the coming days again.”

“O-okay.”

The urge to cry hits Barry suddenly with full force, and he feels so stupid for it. He doesn’t know what he has expected to come from that conversation, but he is left raw and open with having given so much away from himself and now that they can’t finish it, it is a bit like he has been cheated. It also doesn’t help that he wants Len to stay.

“Hey.” Len reaches for his face with his other hand and cups his cheek. “It’s fine, nothing of this… we are fine, okay?”

Barry nods and squeezes his eyes shut and presses his cheek into the warm big palm. His breathe catches in his throat, and he freezes when he feels surprisingly soft lips briefly presses against his forehead.

“Get better.” Len murmurs, and his hot breath on Barry’s skin causes him to shudder slightly.

Barry opens his eyes again when the other man sits back. He gives him an astonished look, and Len smirks a little smugly.

Then, after squeezing his hand one last time, his friend gets up and walks back to the mirror. Sam appears within the minute after Len called him, which turns out to be a good thing because he has hardly re-entered the mirror when a soft knock cuts through the now returned silence.
“Barry? Are you awake?”

Barry can’t bring himself to look away from his own reflection when he answers James.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you enjoyed the chapter, it has both Len and Barry finally touch upon their feelings for each other, and is one I was really looking forward for a while now. Things between them will finally be able to move along now, it still will be in a slow pace, but they will be more open about it.

Btw, I hope nobody took it the wrong way that Barry blurted out that he isn’t gay. In his own mind he just isn’t, not gay, not straight, not anything. The notion of sex still terrifies him, but he is aware that he does has feelings for Len that go past simple friendship. He is simply not able nor really willing to label them just yet.

I mentioned before that I’m doing a rewrite of a rather large section of this story that is coming up and that the chapters that are already done are diminishing in number. I already finished the first two chapters of the rewrite (Yay!), but I’ve still decided to change my updating schedule to once every two weeks beginning with the next chapter.

Things happened in my life that lead to me being ridiculously busy right now, and it will stay like this for a long while. I just don’t have enough time to keep up a weekly schedule right now, and I want to give me enough leeway to go over the chapters I already have again and finish new ones so that it won’t come to me not posting for a couple of months at a time or something like that.

Singularity is unbelievably important to me, even though it is only a fanfiction, and I wanna see it done in the best way possible.

Thanks to all of you who stick with Singularity and me, I honestly appreciate every single one of you guys. <3
Chapter Summary

Barry’s friends insist on making up for the Christmas dinner he missed due to his stay in the hospital.

Chapter Notes

The story has been edited by my wonderful friend Katzerover. <3

“What a cute dog.”

Simultaneously, both Barry and Axel lift their gazes to where Mrs. Ming has appeared next to Barry’s old couch. She is studying the sheet of paper the teenager is currently working on with an appreciative expression, and Barry has to bite down on a chuckle when he realizes what she is talking about.

A deep red flush appears on Axel’s unusual pale cheeks, and he glares briefly at Barry, as if he knew exactly what he was thinking, before he turns back to the older woman.

“It isn’t a dog,” the teenager clarifies in a rather terse and craggy voice from his spot on the ground in front of the couch, which Barry is currently occupying. He gives Barry another dirty look when he notices his amused grin and pulls the blanket around his shoulders a bit tighter. Mary wrapped the boy in it before when he insisted on staying in that spot.

“Oh?” This seems to surprise Mrs. Ming, and she squints at the drawing. “Is it a horse, then?”

The flush on the boy's face intensifies, and he is about to explain that it isn’t that either when Eddy joins the old Chinese woman’s side. Barry doesn’t miss who Axel’s expression immediately turns sour, and he hides the drawing against his chest.

“What? We’ve a second Rembrandt in our midst?” Eddy smirks.

“Shut up.” The teen hisses, which turns out to be not such a good idea as it causes him to have another coughing fit. This saves him from reprimanded by both Barry and Mrs. Ming as he looks miserable enough that they take pity on him.

“Aw, don’t be shy, I’m sure your horsey looks really cute.”

“E-Eddy, s-stop b-being m-mean.” Barry gives his friend a chiding look which has next to no effect on him, of course.

“What are you talking about?” his friend asks in fake indignation. “I’m trying to morally support an up and coming artist. Don’t tell me you’re envious because you’re not the special one in our round, anymore?”

Barry rolls his eyes and exchanges a clearly unimpressed look with Axel.

“I think you both draw very well.” Mrs. Ming proceeds diplomatically. “Barry just does so a while longer than you, Axel, so don’t feel discouraged because you aren’t as good as he is just yet. If you stay with it and do a lot of practicing, I am certain that you will becomes just as wonderful.”

This time, it is Barry who feels his cheeks turns warm and wishes she wouldn’t always praise him like that. Since she got the drawing he made for her birthday a few weeks ago, she is convinced that he belongs to the same circle of artists like Vermeer or Da Vinci, and it embarrasses him to no end. Not that he isn’t glad that she likes it, it is just a little uncomfortable when she tells all their customers, that he is certainly the next big artist in coming.

“And you, young man.” Mrs. Ming turns to Eddy, whose grin immediately wanes a bit. “Aren’t you supposed to work on the stuffing?”

“I was just taking a break,” his friend mutters, and Barry smiles when he notices the slightly uneasy way with which he eyes the older woman. For whatever reason, he seems to have problems to be his usual snarky self around her.

“Well, that is fine and good, but you should go back to work now.”

Eddy’s uneasiness around Mrs. Ming could also easily come from the fact that she doesn’t take any nonsense from him, and it is quite amusing to watch.

“Yes, Eddy, stop being such a slug,” Mary agrees from her spot at the table, where she is currently preparing the turkey. Seeing that Barry has no oven, they would take it over to Mary’s place and roast it in hers. They still insisted on preparing it here, though, so that he wouldn’t feel left out. Barry’s assurance that this really isn’t necessary fell on deaf ears.

“We can’t finish the turkey without the fillings, and it will probably need to roast around four hours,” Mary reminds their friend as she stuffs herbs under the bird’s skin.

“Well, if the boy would help, we probably would be quicker,” Eddy points out but is immediately shut down by Mrs. Ming.

“The poor kid has the flu, he is supposed to be resting and do nothing else. Contrary to you. You have a task that is waiting to be finished.” She gives him a meaningful look, and Eddy decides to accept defeat with a heavy sigh.

“You want some more tea, my dears?” Mrs. Ming asks after she turned back to Barry and Axel.

“Urgh, no, no more tea, please,” Axel protests with a disgusted look, and Barry isn’t sure whether the young teen is really that appalled by it or just exaggerating. He himself is quite familiar with Mrs. Ming’s herbal teas for colds, and while they do help, he has to agree with Axel that they don’t taste particularly good.

“You are sick,” the older woman reminds him kindly. “I know that it tastes bitter, but it will help you with your coughing, my boy.”

“But they taste disgusting, even with sugar.” Axel whines unhappily.

“I’ll d-drink one as w-well,” Barry offers and ignores the betrayed look Axel gives him for it.
A knock at the door interrupts their little discussion.

“Ah, James is finally back with the cranberries.” Mrs. Ming opens the door for her grandson, who is still partly covered in snow and has both of his hands full with brown grocery bags. It started to snow just a couple of days ago, and while the month of December has been unusually warm for the most part, the cold weather has hit this part of the country with a vengeance with the beginning of January.

This is one of the few reasons Barry is glad that he isn’t allowed to leave the house or work just yet. Using public trafficking service during this time of the year is a real nightmare.

“Some polar bears crossed your way outside?” Eddy jokes as the other man joins him at the table.

James nods in fake seriousness. “And penguins, which worries me even more. Those little guys seem to have been scheming.”

“Enough you two, talking is fine but just as long as you are working as well,” Marry interjects and puts a tray of cooled down roasted chestnuts in front of James. “Keep the time in mind, it’s already nearly noon.”

“You’re such a slave-driver, girly.” Eddy huffs, but Barry doesn’t miss that he exchanges an amused look with James.

“I-I c-can h-help t-too," he points out for probably the tenth time, but he is once again reminded that he should focus his energy on recovering.

“Dude, just enjoy it,” Eddy advises. “I’d immediately swap places with you if I could.”

“No surprise there.” Mary chuckles and he gives her a fake glare. “Hey, keep your eyes on the duck, little lady, and don’t eavesdrop on other people’s conversation.”

“You do realize that we are all in the same room, Eddy, don’t you?”

“Excuses, excuses.”

They are able to finish the turkey within the next twenty minutes, and James offers to help Mary and his grandmother to carry it to her apartment. Axel wants to tag along as well, probably bored by just being confided to sit all the time, and Mrs. Ming let him do so reluctantly.

Eddy joins Barry at the couch and they decide to play a game of Sixty-six.

“This better turns out to be the damn best stuffing any of you has ever tasted,” his friend says as he starts to shuffle the cards. “I put my heart’s blood into it.”

“I’m j-just g-glad wh-when I d-don’t g-get f-f-food’s p-poisoning f-from it.”

“Seriously, why am I even friends with such an ungrateful bunch like you,” Eddy laments. Barry accepts his cards with a chuckle. “F-free f-food?”

The other man makes a show of considering that. “Yeah, that is a good point.”

They play for about five minutes before there is another knock at the door.

“Seriously, guys? It’s open, do you really expect me to get up and move the damn door-handle for you?!?” Eddy calls out exasperatedly.
There is a slight pause, and Barry turns his head to look what is taking them. His stomach makes a small jump when Jay enters his flat somewhat hesitantly a moment later.

“Of course.” Eddy mutters under his breath, but stays quiet when Barry throws him a warning look.

“Hello, Barry, I hope I’m not disturbing anything?” Jay greets him after he stopped a step into the apartment, still looking uncertain whether he is welcome or not.

“No, it’s fine, just come in.” Barry gives the older man a friendly smile and doesn’t miss how Jay studies Eddy briefly with a not too amiable look, before he accepts his offer.

“You’re having friends over,” Jay remarks, after he closed the door and makes his way over to them. Barry notices the white bag in his hand.

“Is that a surprise?” Eddy sneers. “Seeing what a sicko he is, right?”

“Eddy!”

He kicks the other man’s thigh slightly and grimaces when this action causes a pain to flash through his own abdomen again.

“Hey, watch it, stupid.” Eddy sounds worried. “You don’t wanna end up in the ER again, do you?”

“Then try to be civil, at least,” he groused back before his gaze softens. “Please.”

A rather sullen expression crosses his friend’s face.

“I’m not here to cause any trouble.” Both of them look back to Jay, who joined then and stands now about a foot from the couch.

Eddy mumbles something under his breath, but too low for Barry to catch it. His friend lifts his hands in a placating manner, when he notices his wary expression and assures him that he would stay quiet from here on.

“It’s really no problem,” Barry says after he turned back to Jay. “What brings you here?”

The older man’s expression relaxes.

“Your friend, Mary asked me to pass by, she told me that you’re having a belated Christmas party.” Jay explains before he looks down to the bag in his hand and lifts it a bit. “Joan sends some of her Christmas Cake.”

It is a very nice gesture for his former friend to do, both to agree to pass by and to bring him something Joan made probably just for this occasion, as Christmas lays already a couple of weeks back. Barry’s throat starts to close up as he feels a deep gratitude towards the older man and greatly appreciates that kindness.

“That’s very kind of you,” he tells Jay with some difficulty and a probably somewhat wobbly smile. “And please tell Joan my thanks.”

“Of course.” Jay nods and relaxes visibly as he returns his smile. He then glances over to the table and kitchenette where still the used utensils as well as most of the food that is going to be cooked here can be seen. “You’re preparing a turkey?”

“Yes, Mary insisted on it. James and Mrs. Ming are also here… and Axel.” As he says that, he glances towards Eddy with a warning glance, sensing that his friend seemed about ready to add his two cents to it.

“James?” Jay asks, and Barry is a bit surprised by how he doesn’t start to immediately reprimand him about having Axel around again. Maybe because there are enough other people around that it settles Jay’s nerves? Or maybe he takes pity on him as he is still recovering…

“You two seemed rather close at the hospital.” Jay explains when he notices his wary expression. “Isn’t his grandmother your employer?”

“Y-yes, M-Mrs. M-Ming-”

As if on a cue, the entrance to the apartment is opened, and Mrs. Ming and Axel get back in. The boy stops mid-sentence when he noticed Jay and scowl appears on his face, probably remembering what happened the last time around when Jay was here.

“Oh, do you have another guest, Barry?” the older woman asks as she gives Jay a friendly and welcoming smile.

“Th-this is J-Jay G-Garrick, an acquaint-tance of m-mine,” Barry introduces. “And th-this is B-Bo M-Ming, m-my emp-ployer and a v-very d-dear f-friend.”

It catches him off-guard then, when he sees something similar to hurt and regret cross Jay’s face for a brief moment, and he isn’t sure what to make of it.

“It is very nice to meet you, Mr. Garrick.” Mrs. Ming offers the older man a hand, which he readily accepts and bows slightly as she adds with a chuckle. “I haven’t recognized you without the helmet.”

“I hear that all the time,” Jay remarks with an amused smile. “And it is also very nice to finally meet you as well.”

Axel’s cough causes them to look over to the boy, and Barry notices that he is looking paler once again.

“You poor thing.” Mrs. Ming steps closer to the teenager and touches his forehead, which causes him to make an unhappy face. “Your temperature has risen. You should have stayed here while we brought the turkey to Mary’s place.”

Again, Barry shoots Eddy a warning glare just as the man is about to open his mouth.

“D-don’t.” He hisses lowly, really not interested in a repetition of the last time Jay was around as the same time as his friend. Eddy frowns but, thankfully, keeps quiet.

Barry turns back to the others, and tenses when he notices that Jay has been watching their brief exchange. He tries to ignore it and turns his attention back to the young teen.

“Axel, I’m s-sure th-that Eddy w-wouldn’t m-mind t-to b-bring you over t-to y-your ap-p-arment, s-so th-that y-you c-can l-lay d-down f-for a b-bit.”

“But I don’t want to,” the kid refuses stubbornly. Barry notices the slight flush that spread over his cheeks, which is likely the best indication that he was running a fever again.

“I’ll be bored, and I've hardly seen you at all the last month as it is.”

A panic rises in Barry’s chest, and he can’t help but gives Axel an exasperated look, who doesn’t seem to have picked up on his mistake yet.

“Barry is right,” Mrs. Ming agrees and gives the boy a comforting look. “You need to rest, and it will take about four hours before the food is ready, anyway.”

“But I’ll be bored,” the teenager insists upset. “And I don’t wanna be the odd one out just because I’ve caught some stupid cold.”

“Stop being such a brat.” Eddy huffs and gets up. “You can nap on my couch for an hour or so. That still leaves you enough time to enjoy the rest of ours’ company and probably be less moody as it is.”

“I’m not moody!”

“Eddy, you’re not helping.” Barry gives his friend an exasperated look before he turns back to Axel who doesn’t seem all that steady on his feet.

“You can stay here and use the couch. I’ll lay down in the bedroom for a bit. I’m a bit exh-hausted, as it is.”

“I’m not tired,” Axel insists, and Barry doesn’t understand why he suddenly has to be so difficult. He sounds much more like a child again than an actual teenager.

“For Pete’s sake, then just sit down on the couch. That way you can rest and share your germs with Barry at the same time.”

Eddy nods to the spot where he has just sat next to Barry. This seems to be a suggestion Axel actually deems worthy to consider. He doesn’t notice the angry glare Barry gives Eddy and instead agrees after a moment.

“Fine, but I’m not tired,” he clarifies again and makes his way over to them.

Barry could hit his friend right now, and he would if he was in any state to do so. Instead, he gets up with some difficulties and pushes Eddy’s hand away when he is about to help him.

“Wh-why d-do y-you alw-ways h-have t-to b-be l-like th-this?” he hisses at him angrily. “Y-you th-think th-that’s f-funny?”

Eddy seems honestly taken aback before an annoyed frown crosses his face.

“No, I just wanted the kid to stop being a stubborn brat. What the hell are you worried about? There are three grown up here to ‘supervise’ you right now. There’s no way he can cause you any trouble over this.”

“Th-this isn’t a g-game, Eddy!”

“I know! How stupid do you think I am?!?” his friend asks exasperatedly and turns to Jay with a glare. “This is exactly the reason why I can’t stand him. He’s always making you miserable over some shit you haven’t even done!”

“Eddy, enough, y-you either sh-shut u-up r-right n-now or y-you c-can l-leave!”

Barry abdomen flares in pain so badly all of a sudden that he is certain he is going to be sick. Eddy grabs his upper arm just as Barry’s knees start to grow weak and helps him back down onto the couch.

“Because you have to be dramatic about everything,” his friend mutters under his breath, but when Barry glances at him, he doesn’t appear angry anymore. Instead he meets his look with a rueful smile.

“You really should be more mindful around him.” Mrs. Ming has come over to them and is now giving Eddy a chiding look. “Getting him upset like this, really, Edward.”

The disgusted face the other man makes at being addressed with his full name, actually causes Barry to chuckle despite the throbbing pain that is currently spreading through his whole abdomen.

“And you shouldn’t be laughing, Barry.” she tells him sternly, while she tentatively urges him to lay back down. “Try to relax, and I’ll bring you a fresh cup of tea.”

“S-sorry,” he apologizes, feeling bad for causing them trouble again. Mrs. Ming squeezes his shoulder and gives him a warm smile. “It’s fine, Edward here can be quite good at riling up other people it seems.”

Eddy gives the older woman only a gloomy look and keeps quiet as she gets up and makes her way over to the small kitchenette. When he meets Barry’s gaze, he frowns again.

“You’re a jackass.” Axel grumbles, who is standing behind the backrest of the couch and is currently glaring daggers at Eddy. “Why do you wanna get him in trouble?”

“I don’t, brat,” Eddy replies without any bite and briefly glances towards Jay, which causes his expression to grow grimmer again. He makes a step closer so that he is next to Barry and crouches down.

“Look, I was being a dick, and I am sorry for that,” Eddy tells him in a low tone so only Barry can hear him. “But while you seem to forget about it, I can remember just too well how you end up every time he appears. You really don’t need to take this shit, Barry. If he really thinks so little of you then you don’t own him anything, no matter who he was to you once.”

Sometimes Barry still has a hard time to believe that Eddy could care so much to get this protective over him. Unfortunately, while his friend means well and probably even has a point, it isn’t that easy for Barry to follow his advice.

Jay has been one of his oldest friends, and while the friendship no longer exists, and he himself tried to get the other man to leave him be, there is still a small part of him left that hopes they could re-establish it one day, no matter how unlikely it is. It is probably not a very wise thing to do, and he is aware of it, which is also the reason why he can’t really bring himself to stay angry with Eddy.

“Y-you’re a g-good f-friend, Eddy,” Barry tells him honestly and watches how some of the tension leaves his friend at that.

Eddy studies him with a thoughtful look for a moment longer before he frowns. “But you won’t listen to me, right?”

“H-He m-meant a l-lot t-to m-me once, and h-he’s th-the only one wh-who s-still g-gives a d-d-damn about m-me f-from b-back th-then.”

“You’re so dumb for such a clever person,” his friend mutters before he shoots him a slight smile and gets up. His eyes briefly turn to Jay, and his face darkens again.

“I think I will help Bo with her tea.” That said, Eddy makes his way over to the older lady and signalizes for Axel to follow him.
“What? Why? I don’t want any more of that fricking tea,” the kid complains but is cut off from saying anything else as the entrance door opens again to let James and Mary in. Both of them are surprised to see Jay.

“Oh, hi,” James greets in his usual friendly manner and walks over to them to shake the older man’s hand. “This is a surprise to meet you here again today, Mr. Garrick.”

Jay accepts the hand, and Barry doesn’t miss how strained the smile is he gives James in return.

“I’m just passing by,” the older speedster explains before he glances at Barry. “I probably should get going again, anyway.”

“Y-you d-don’t h-have t-to l-leave.” Barry interjects and meets the other man’s doubtful gaze. “C- Could y-you m-maybe c-come h-here and t-take a s-seat?”

Barry pushes himself in a half sitting position with some effort and nods at the now free spot on the couch. “P-Please, you c-came all th-the w-way h-here, and w-we’ve h-hardly even ex-xchanged any w-words,” he adds when Jay hesitates.

“I can take this,” Mary offers who has stepped to James’ side and gives the older man a friendly but somewhat cautious smile. It probably isn’t lost on her that something happened before James’ and her return. “It is nice that you were able to make it, Mr.Garrick.”

“It is, Ms Nicolescu.”

“Just Mary, please.”

Jay nods and hands the white plastic bag over to the young woman. “Thank you, Mary.”

She gives him another smile before she urges James along to the kitchenette, where Eddy and Axel have found their way over to Mrs. Ming by now as well.

Jay watches them for a moment before he turns back to Barry and joins him on the couch.

“You have quite a full apartment today,” he remarks as he takes a seat next to him. “It’s good to see that you’ve people like them.”

“Y-yes, I’m r-really g-glad,” Barry agrees and glances over to his friends. “B-but I f-feel a b-bit b-bad f-for th-them h-hav-ving t-to s-spend th-their f-free t-time h-here and g-go th-through all th-that h-hassle.”

“To me it doesn’t seem as if they mind to be here,” Jay points out and when he notices Barry’s doubtful look, he asks. “What makes you think they don’t want to be here?”

“It’s n-not th-that, it’s j-just th-that th-they c-could sp-spend t-today at h-home, ins-instead of h-having t-to b-be in th-this d-dingy l-little p-place.”

Even Eddy’s flat looks much better than his one, and he is his next door neighbour. Barry realized a while ago that he probably got the short end of the stick when it comes to the apartments of this building.

“I doubt that this really matters to them. They want to be here because of you, Barry, not because of your apartment,” Jay reminds him, and it is nice for the older man to say so.

Barry hopes he is right; he really doesn’t want Mrs. Ming or James to be put off by where he lives.
They both have such nice places, after all.

“I j-just f-feel a b-bit. . . ” He breaks off when he realizes what he is actually doing. His stomach drops, he isn’t even sure why, but it just hits him that he is currently talking to Jay in a way he hasn’t in nearly a decade.

It is nice in a nostalgic kind of way, but he also feels worried about letting his guards down like this without even realizing it.

“It’s r-really n-nothing, I’m j-just b-being s-stupid.” Barry finishes lamely. He can’t meet the other man’s gaze.

Jay is watching him, he can feel it, and it causes his skin to crawl uncomfortably.

“Th-thank y-you again f-for… f-for p-passing b-by and th-the c-cake,” he says once more, unable to come up with something else, and ducks his head a bit when he can fell a blush creep over his face. “I r-really ap-preciate it.”

“You’re welcome, Barry.” Barry doesn’t miss the heaviness of the other man’s voice, and he forces himself to look up at him again. There is regret and hurt in Jay’s eyes, and it is so frustrating because Barry doesn’t understand what any of these means.

“How w-was y-your Ch-christm-mas? D-did M-Max and B-Bart s-spend it w-with y-you?” he asks just to break the uneasy moment, but he regrets it the moment the question left his mouth. He hopes that Jay doesn’t misunderstand him asking about Bart and get the wrong idea. It is already a miracle that he hasn’t remarked on Axel being here again, although Eddy has probably a point with too many adults being around for it to be possibly be dangerous for the teen.

His concern has to be plain on his face as Jay gives him a tight smile and asks him to relax before he proceeds. “Yes, both of them stayed with us for the day. It was the first Christmas for the boy around here, and we wanted it to be a nice experience for.”

“Th-that’s g-good,” Barry agrees. He knows how important it is for a kid to spend this time of the year in a warm and loving environment, and he is glad that Bart was able to have this experience. The Garricks have always been able to make anybody feel welcome in their home, and Iris, Wally, and he enjoyed every single one of the Christmas dinner they had over at their place.

Barry’s memories of past Christmases come to an end when notices that Jay’s expression has turned slightly troubled.

“Is everyth-thing all r-right?” he asks carefully, unsure how to take the other man’s sudden turn in mood. His question seems to snap Jay out of it, and he quickly agrees that everything is fine. Then, he pauses and studies Barry.

“Bart didn’t really like it very much, unfortunately.” Jay finally explains and sighs.

“What-what? Wh-why?” The notion is surprising to Barry, seeing that there had to be free food en masse, and he doubts there is anything that could spoil a young teenage speedster’s day that involves this.

Jay hesitates, and it takes Barry a second to realize that the other man is considering whether he should tell him or not. It looks like he is not the only one who let his guard down today, though Jay seems to do so on purpose.

“W-Wally and Bart don’t get along too well,” Jay finally explains. “They haven’t from the beginning and putting both of them together in the same house for that day didn’t turn out to be such a wise decision.”

“Th-they f-fought?” The idea that Wally and Bart could dislike each other is both unsettling and painful, and Barry doesn’t need to ask what the reason for the animosity between Wally and Bart. It was undoubtedly him they have fought over.

“Yes,” Jay agrees. “And if it hadn’t been for Max threatening Bart with house arrest for the next month, the boy would probably have locked in the guestroom for the entire duration of the day.”

“I’m s-sorry.” Barry feels bad for the other man and everybody else involved as he can imagine what a damper this can put on one’s mood, especially on Christmas.

“We knew that this could happen,” Jay points out with an unhappy frown. “We just hoped that this would get them to find some common ground, but they are both stubborn to a fault.”

The older man chuckles at that, and Barry has to smile as well. He doesn’t doubt it, Wally could be like a mule when he thought he was in the right, and it seems that Bart is also quite strong-minded from what he has seen so far.

“Th-they p-prob-bably j-just n-need t-time t-to adjust,” Barry suggests, knowing that it can’t be easy for his nephew to have the grandson of the man around he holds responsible for most of the misery in his life.

Jay nods quietly but doesn’t seem very convinced, not that Barry can hold it against him. He doubts that this would change any time soon, either.

They sit together in silence for a minutes before Jay once again looks at his watch.

“I really should get going,” Jay says and turns to him with a faint smile. “I just wanted to pass by to say hello and give you the cake.”

“Ok-kay.” Barry nods and can’t help but feel disappointed. He wants for the older man to stay longer even though a part of him is glad that he is leaving already as he doesn’t want to take a chance for this visit to turn painful and disappointing again.

Somewhat hesitantly, he adds. “P-please, c-can y-you t-tell B-Bart I s-said h-hi th-the n-next t-time y-you s-see h-him?”

“Of course.” Jay, much to Barry’s surprise, doesn’t appear wary about his request as he agrees. Instead, he gets up and looks down at Barry with an unusually warm gaze. “I’m glad you’re doing alright, Barry.”

Barry nods quietly, unsure how to take the other man’s behaviour.

“You are leaving already, Mr. Garrick?” Mrs. Ming asks from her spot at the table.

“I fear I do have to, Mam. I have another appointment to take care of.”

Mrs. Ming chuckles smiles. “It was very nice to meet you.”

“Likewise.” Jay nods and wishes them all a nice afternoon before he finally leaves.

“What a nice man,” the older woman remarks afterwards, and Barry doesn’t have to look over to them to know that Eddy is rolling his eyes at her comment. Axel scoffs but doesn’t elaborate on it when Mrs. Ming gives him a curious look.

“So, can I join you at the couch now?” the boy asks instead, causing Barry to smile.

“S-sure, j-join a-away.”

Chapter End Notes

And Jay is back… again. :3
I hope all of you who wished the worst kind of mishap on the older speedster are able to slowly warming up to him again. Though, I do also understand if it should take you a while.

And we got a belated Christmas dinner… the best kind of dinners. I really love the interactions of Barry and his friends in this one, it was just fun to write, and Axel seems to have picked up some interest in drawing himself. <3

I hope you enjoyed the chapter, and thanks to all of you who took the time to leave me feedback, it really means a lot to me. :)
“Why was I not aware that you can make crazy awesome stuff like this?” Axel shoves the last bit of the peanut-butter brownie in his mouth and washes it down with another gulp of milk. He sighs in satisfaction and slides lower on his chair. “That was fricking delicious.”

“It’s just a brownie,” Barry points out but can’t deny that he is quite pleased with all the praise he got for it so far.

“For you maybe.” Sam, who studies his cards without any real interest, glances over to him with a smirk. “For guys like us, who live mostly off canned stuff, this is like the second coming of the lord.”

“You really like to exaggerate, don’t you?” Barry snorts and shoots the other man an amused look.

“Nah, I can just appreciate eating something other than canned beans or tuna, for once in a while.” Sam shrugs.

Barry frowns, not really liking what he hears, and looks up from the sketch he is currently working on that started out as a simply doodle, but is currently on the way to become an actual piece.

“You do eat other things than just beans…” He looks over to Lisa who is sitting next to Roscoe and opposite to him and is currently filing her nails. “R-right?”

She gives him a bemused smiles and nods. “Yes, we get our vitamins and everything, don’t worry so much, Bar.”

“You know that I could get you fresh—”

“You aren’t supposed to lift or carry anything heavier than a towel,” Len cuts him off with a frown. “We can look after ourselves, don’t worry your head off.”

“And why would they want to eat that disgusting stuff anyway, when they don’t have to? I wouldn’t let any broccoli or lettuce, or stuff like that close to me either if I were them,” Axel declares, as he keeps eying another piece of brownie from the small stack that is still left on the plate Barry brought over.
“Greens are good for you,” Lisa remarks and glances at the teen. “Otherwise, you’ll always stay such a squirt.”

“I’m no squirt!”

“Right, you’re just not very tall,” Sam agrees and snorts when Axel flips him off.

“He started it,” the kid groused and defiantly crosses his arms in front of his chest, when Barry gives him a disapproving frown. “Y-you s-still d-don’t h-have t-to b-behave l-like th-this.”

Axel only grunts and keeps glaring dagger at Sam before he notices Mick entering the room again with a couple of beers he picked up from the fridge.

“Hey, can I have one?” the teen asks, perking up.

Mick snorts and aches an eyebrow. “So that you could turn into even more of a brat?”

“I’m not a brat!”

“He also isn’t a squirt,” Sam adds grinning, and Mick chuckles as he hands two of the three beers to Len and Dillon.

“What the hell!” Axel huffs in annoyance. “I’m just as tall as any other fourteen-year-old, you ugly-”

“A-Axel,” Barry warns the kid and really wishes his friends would stop teasing the teen like this. Unfortunately, most of them are still big kids in their own regard, despite their age, and Axel’s strong reaction seems to be quite entertaining to them.

“They are making fun of me!” Axel whines, glaring daggers in the round.

“We would never,” Sam denies in fake innocence.

“S-stop g-goading h-him on, w-would y-you’ve w-wanted p-people t-t-to t-treat y-you l-like th-this wh-when y-you w-were h-his age?”

“It’s just a joke, Allen.” Mick takes the seat next to Barry again and smirks. “They took your funny bone while you were at the hospital?”

“That would mean he had one in the first place,” Sam remarks. Barry glares, but his friend only chuckles. “Don’t give me that look, you established yourself as Mr. Sourpuss.”

“I’m n-no s-such th-thing.”

“No you aren’t,” Lisa agrees before she glances to the other two criminals. “These two have just troubles acting their age.”

“If your mind stays young, so does the rest of you,” Sam points out as he throws his wager to the heap in the middle of the table.

“Is that Snart?”

Barry is startled and turns warily to Mick, who noticed the sketch he is working on. The other man sounds both incredulous and very much amused by what he spots on the paper, and Barry’s face grow uncomfortably warm in turn.
Without thinking, he puts an arm over the sketch, before realizing that this is more or less a giveaway on its own. He half-heartedly glares at Mick, who grins in return and shrugs. “Whatever floats your boat.”

“Don’t be an ass,” Lisa warns the other Rogue, while Sam snickers and tries to get a look at the sketching as well. “Is he naked?”

“Shut up, Sam, for fuck’s sake!” The blond woman hisses and elbows the other man.

“What?” the brunette asks still chuckling while he rubs his side. “It’s just a question.”

“Urgh, thanks for that mental image,” Axel mutters and shrinks back when Len gives him a warning look.

“It’s just a s-s-sketch.” Barry frowns and is well aware that this is completely on his own. He really should have known better before sketching Len while being among his friends.

“You’re all kids.” Roscoe gives the round a disdainful look as he picks up another card to his hand.

“Shut up, Dillon.” Mick grunts, which results in both men menacingly glaring at each other.

“You’re all hopeless.” Lisa shakes her head. “Stop being such brats. Contrary to what you seem to think, you’re no teenagers anymore.”

“No need to get insulting. I was just wondering whether Barry was finally showing a bolder side of himself.”

“No, Scudder, you’re just being an ass again,” Lisa corrects him drily.

“Bite me, princess.”

“Not for all the money on the planet.”

“It isn’t bad.” Barry turns his attention from his bickering friends back to Mick with a wary expression.

“Seriously,” the taller man proceeds and points with the bottle in his hand, towards the sheet of paper. “I can make out Snart’s ugly mug and the stupid parka of his.”

He is pretty sure that Mick is both trying to be nice and pulling his leg at the same time.

“Th-thanks,” he mumbles and turns the sheet around, so the sketching is facing down.

“Come now, Barry, don’t let those idiots drag you down.” Lisa gives him an encouraging smile. “They are just being stupid.”

Barry nods but leaves the pencil and paper where they are. Instead, he picks up is glass of coke and sips on it while trying to ignore her exasperated gaze.

“Can I see the sketch?” Axel asks curiously and leans over the table to reach it, but doesn’t actually take it. “Can I? I won’t make fun of you, either.”

Sometimes Barry really wishes he would think more before putting himself in such uncomfortable situations like this. He sighs softly and nods.

“S-sure,” he agrees with a wane attempt of a smile and pushes the sheet over to the teen.
After studying it for a moment, Axel shoots him an impressed look.

“Looks cool, like the old guy,” Axel states, which amuses the Rogues quite a bit. Len ignores the quip.

“Let me see, kiddo,” Sam says and grabs the paper from Axel’s hands without waiting for him to agree.

“Hey! You stupid, ugly fart, I haven’t finished looking, yet.”

“Not my problem, squirt.”

“Fuck you!”

“Axel, w-watch y-you l-language.”

“Barry, he started it!”

“I did, but I’m too old to be scolded.” Sam grins diminishes somewhat, when he notices Barry’s warning look.

“I’ll shave your head when you’re asleep,” Axel promises darkly.

“You do that, and I’ll give you the favour right back.”

“S-Sam, s-stop g-goading h-him on.” Barry feels a headache creep up on him, and turns to the teen with a stern expression. “And n-no h-head sh-shaving anyb-body.”

“Oh, come on.” Axel whines and once again crosses his arms in a sullen manner.

“It is your turn, Scudder. You wanna stay in the damn game or not?” Len sounds irritated enough that it worries Barry. He is clearly growing impatient due the other men’s antics.

“Yeah, yeah, I’m on it.” While Sam sets his bet, Lisa uses the chance to grab the drawing and take a look for herself.

“Hey, I didn’t even get a real peak yet,” Sam complains while Axel snickers gleefully.

“That’s karma for you,” the teen points out, not intimidated in the least by his neighbour’s glare.

“Wow,” Lisa says after she studied the sketch for a long minute, looking quite impressed. She turns back to Barry and chuckles. “I didn’t know you are that good, honey.”

“I-I’m n-not,” Barry protests weakly and wishes they would finally just drop this stupid topic.

“Take a look, Len, he did an amazing job. It actually looks like you.”

Len, who hasn’t shown any kind of interest in his colleagues’ antics so far, turns his attention to his sister with an annoyed frown. “Are we playing this fucking game or what?”

“Oh, shush, just take a glimpse, Lenny.” Lisa huffs and waves the drawing in front of her brother’s face. He glares at her for another moment, before he sighs and takes the offered paper.

Barry, whose stomach made a flip as soon as he realized what was about to happen, feels utterly mortified as the other man studies the sketch with a face that doesn’t give anything away.
“I-it’s j-just a s-s-sketch,” he explains nervously. “I w-was b-bored, I d-didn’t r-real-lize wh-what I w-was d-drawing, and it t-turned o-o out r-really b-badly-”

“For fuck’s sake, man, take a breather.” Mick snorts but eyes him with slight concern. “Or you gonna start hyperventilating.”

Barry glares at him unhappily before he turns back to Len. “I’m s-sorry, I-

“Stop freaking out.” Len grunts. “This is no big deal.”

The other man is looking at him, exasperated, before his expression softens. “It’s a good sketch.”

Barry feels his face grow uncomfortably warm again and nods wordlessly, not trusting his voice right now.

“Just good?” Lisa scoffs and glares at her brother as if he were an idiot. “You can’t draw fucking stick-figures, Len. You don’t have anything else to say to that? Good? Really?”

Len ignores the blond woman and hands the paper back to Barry, who swiftly folds it and keeps it close. He ignores Sam’s complain about not having had the chance to actually look at it yet.

The game proceeds for the next half an hour, without any further incident, and Hartley joins them after the second round, taking over for Mick who wants to sit this one out.

Barry, who doesn’t feel like playing poker, continues to read a book about Chinese medicine James lent him about a week prior to his latest business trip. Mrs. Ming helped him with his recovery by giving him a number of herbs and teas that actually worked better than the drugs the hospital prescribed him at times. This woke his curiosity, and after James picked up on his interest, he provided him with some literature about this topic, so he could read while he still had to stay in bed.

Thus, Barry zooms the people around him out for the most part while he concentrates on the text. At least till something catches his attention.

“- another Flash?”

The sentence he has been reading is lost on him, and Barry looks up to Axel, who is frowning sceptically at Sam.

“Yeah, there have been three so far,” the criminal agrees with a shrug.

“It’s a theory,” Hartley throws in without sounding particularly interested.

“Theory my ass.” Sam takes a swig of his bottle and leans back in his chair. “There were three so far.”

“You can’t be sure of that.”

“Piper, every idiot with eyes in his or her head ‘s aware of that.”

The redhead shoots his colleague an unimpressed look, but stays quiet as he turns back to his hand.

“Wait, why three? There has been Jay Garrick and the Flash,” Axel points out and sits up straighter, his interest clearly piqued as he watches them expectantly.

“You forget the mini-version of him.” Mick, who has just been listening so far, glances to Sam. “Who suddenly vanished from one week to the next.”
The other Rogue nods in agreement. “And the temper of our dear red speedy has gotten so much worse ever since.”

“You’re talking about Kid-Flash?” Axel asks. “I thought he died or stuff.”

Mick shrugs. “Possible, but there is just something fishy about it.”

“Like that red fuck suddenly not pulling any punches anymore?” Roscoe asks with a sneer.

“That, and his entire behaviour in general changing suddenly from one day to the next. Didn’t it, Len?” Lisa looks over to her brother and frowns when he simply grunts non-commentarial.

“Yeah, some bug had to have crawled up his ass and died there,” Sam agrees as he throws a fiver to the pool. “Raise.”

“A swarm of them would be more like it,” Mick adds with a grim frown. “That guy isn’t the same one.”

“Maybe something did happen to the kid, and he just didn’t take it too well?” Hartley, who is putting his wager to the growing heap in the centre of the table, seems to consider something before he adds. “They seemed to have a rather estranged relationship towards the end, didn’t they?”

“Being forced to run around in this gaudy outfit at such a young age would probably make anybody hate that dude,” Sam suggests with a nasty chuckle. “Maybe the infallible Flash even had a preference for kids in thight-”

“Shut your fucking trap, Scudder.”

The room becomes quiet for a second, and everybody turn their attention to Len, who looks to be about ready to go after the other man.

“What the hell is your problem, Snart-”

“Sam.” Hartley stops him in a sharp tone, and when the brunette turns to him in annoyance, he nods towards Barry, who is watching them quietly.

Again, the room falls quiet, and an uncomfortable tension spreads among them.

Barry knows that they are all looking at him now, but his mind feels sluggish, and he isn’t sure what to do.

“Hey.” Lisa meets his gaze with a smile and he watches her get up and walk over to him. “What do you think of us getting some tea from the kitchen, honey?”

It takes him a moment to realize what she has just said.

“O-ok-kay,” Barry agrees, surprised at how craggy his voice sounds.

“Good.” Lisa gives him another smile, and Barry gets up as well, his head feeling oddly heavy and light at the same time.

“I want some tea, too.” Axel jumps up and joins them, keeping a worried gaze at him, which Barry isn’t sure what to make of.

The others stay quiet as they leave the room, and Barry wonders if they are angry at him for making everything awkward once again.
The kitchen is just a few rooms further down the hallway, and Barry is tentatively urged to take a seat at the small camping table the Rogues put there.

“Here.” Lisa hands him a paper handkerchief, and he stares at it in confusion.

“To wipe your face,” Lisa explains in a gentle voice, and it still takes Barry another moment to realize that he has started crying again. He immediately wishes the ground would open up and swallow him whole.

“It’s fine,” Lisa assures him as his reaction isn’t lost on her. She then asks whether camomile tea would be fine with him.

He nods and tenses up when his friend cups his shoulder briefly, before she walks over to the small area where they put most of their cooking utensils, as well as the transportable heating plates, microwave, and the water cooker.

Barry wipes the tears away and blows his nose. It is so very embarrassing how he’s reacted again, especially with Len around, as he hates how weak he has to appear all the damn time. The only comfort is that he didn’t react worse…

“You alright, Barry?” Axel asks, sounding uncertain and surprisingly young, and it is obvious that he isn’t even trying to hide his concern. The boy is sitting opposite to him, watching him with wary eyes, and Barry gives him a forced, yet hopefully reassuring smile. “Y-Yes, j-just… I j-just over-r-react-ted.”

Another embarrassed flush heats his face up, and he directs his gaze to his hands that rest in front of him on the table.

“Nah, Scudders is a jackass,” Axel points out, and Barry can’t help but chuckle because the teen does have a point there.

“That he definitely is,” Lisa agrees wholeheartedly from her spot at the small counter, just a couple of feet away from them.

“H-he isn’t th-that b-bad, j-just… inc-considerate.”

“Says you.” Lisa sighs and makes a face. “Try to live with that guy. That will change your opinion quickly enough, believe me.”

Barry gives her a small tired smile, despite how drained he feels and how his head is starting to hurt again.

Maybe it would be a good idea for him and Axel to leave, it is already getting late, after all…

“You want to lay down for a minute?” Lisa asks and turns back to him after putting a mug of milk into the microwave. Despite her lighter tone, she is still watching him with a very much concerned expression. “You look rather pale.”

He thinks about it for a moment, something that seems to require a ridiculous amount of effort, and he can’t deny that resting sound quite alluring right now. It isn’t like he wants to go back to the others right now anyway, not after he made a complete fool out of himself, once again.

The thought is bitter.

“Ok-kay,” he eventually agrees quietly.
Lisa finishes preparing his cup of tea before he leaves for Len’s room to lie down. Axel looks like he wants to tag along, and Barry feels a familiar fondness for the boy as it is clear that he is really quite worried about him.

“Y-you w-wanna t-tag a-along a-and t-take a-a n-nap?” Barry offers, knowing quite well what the teen thinks of napping-time and isn’t surprised in the least when his young friend makes a face and declines.

They part their ways in front of the kitchen as Len’s and the other’s sleeping quarters are in the opposite direction to where the living area is.

There is music coming through the door of James’ room, and Barry can hear the younger blond enthusiastically singing along with the son that is playing as he passes his door. Marco’s room, on the other hand, is quiet, and the other man seems to be resting as his lights aren’t on. It is the same for Digger’s.

The first thing Barry does when he enters Len’s room, is tilting the small window to let some fresh air in. He never understood how the other man can stand it this stuffy.

The bed is undone, as usual, and while Barry prefers to keep his own neat, he isn’t bothered by it in the least. It remembers him of Len, and he wonders whether he has always been this sappy as he lies down. The covers are cool and everything smells like the other man, which is comforting and able to lull him to sleep within seconds.

The soft noise of the door being closed startles Barry awake some time later, and a well-known fear surges through him until he remembers where he is.

“It’s just me,” Len tells him quietly as he makes his way over to him. He didn’t bother to turn the lights on, but Barry is still able to make him out in the near pitch-black darkness as his eyes have adjusted to it by now.

Len stop next to his own side of the bed, and Barry watches him quietly as he takes his shoes off as well as his jeans and the sweatshirt he is wearing before he climbs in next to him.

It is a bit of a miracle to Barry how the other man isn’t freezing with only his boxer shorts and undershirt on. They aren’t heating the basement other than for the transportable heathers they put in the living room and their quarters, and even with the one currently running in here, it is still quite cold.

Len doesn’t seem to mind this, though, despite how he has been complaining about the excessive snowfall for weeks now, and it is oddly amusing to Barry how the other man is a bit of walking contradiction when it comes to the cold.

“Y-you f-finished p-playing?”

Len turns to his side, so they are facing each other. There is still nearly an arm’s length of space between them, something his friend is mindful enough to make sure of whenever they share a bed.

“Yes, ‘ve lost enough money for one night.”

“Y-you d-did r-rather w-w-well b-bef-fore.”

Len hums quietly, and Barry isn’t sure whether this is meant as an agreement or not. They fall quiet for a short while, then, the silence between them relaxed and comfortable.
“S-sorry f-for h-how I’ve r-reac-cted b-before,” Barry says quietly, somewhat reluctant to break the calm between them. He wants to apologize for how awkward he made the situation for the others again, though, and he more senses than sees how the other man turns his eyes on him, then.

He wonders whether Len is angry because of it…

“You’re feeling better?”

“Y-yes.”

Lisa can be heard outside the room, threatening James with eternal pain should he not hand her brush back right this moment. Barry listens to it without paying any real attention. His eyes are on Len, who is studying him right back.

“Th-they kn-know th-that W-Wally i-isn’t th-the s-second F-Flash?” That question has been bothering him since he left the others.

“There are rumours,” Len agrees.

“R-rumours?”

It is frightening to think that anybody could find out about this, especially the Rogues.

“Sam and the others have a point,” his friend remarks, and his frown is audible in his voice. “The new Flash is noticeable different from you in how he deals with the likes of us.”

He doesn’t speak it out, but Barry knows what he means is that Wally is more violent. It is a daunting change in his nephew’s behaviour, one that is most likely solely on him.

“D-do th-they s-s-susp-pect m-m-me?”

“No.” Len sounds certain, which is a relief and eases some of the tension away that has settled over Barry again.

“M-Maybe I-I sh-shouldn’t p-pass b-by f-for a-a wh-while?”

The suggestion alone is upsetting in a way, but Barry likes the notion of them finding out about his past as the Flash even less. It would end things between them, and the realisation how quickly this actually could happen is unsettling.

So far, he has hardly worried about it, he has been certain that nobody picked up on another person wearing the Flash costume, but now…

Now, he realizes, that it has been stupid to assume that this could go by unnoticed.

“Don’t be an idiot.” Len scoffs, and, suddenly, he does sound angry. “That would have no purpose. They would probably just get suspicious in the first place.”

Barry knows that the other man has a point there, but suddenly he is really afraid that he could give himself away by something he says or does.

“Th-they kn-know th-that I kn-know th-the F-Flash-es. H-how c-can th-they n-not e-exp-pect s-someth-thing t-to b-be g-g-going o-on?” he asks quietly and hates how coarse he is sounding once again.

Marco’s reaction when he learned that Barry has a connection to the Flash, is still fresh in his mind. It scares him to think how badly the rest of them would take it.

“You worry too much—”

“How can I worry too much about this?” Barry demands upset, and can’t help but huff in frustration when speaking becomes more difficult for him again. He hates how stupid it makes him sound.

“Barry, they don’t know anything, and they don’t suspect anything, so stop panicking over damn what ifs.” Len sounds calmer once more, much calmer than Barry feels.

“But what if they find out?”

It isn’t hard to answer this for himself.

“I… I can’t change who I was, Len,” he reminds him bitterly and averts his eyes. “And I don’t want to, but I… you’re my friends.”

The other man stays quiet, and Barry can’t bring himself to look at him.

“Should it come to them finding out,” Len finally says smoothly. “We’re going to deal with it. But there is no reason for you to worry yourself sick over something that hasn’t even happened yet.”

Barry tenses up when he feels a light touch to his upper arm, and he shoots Len a wary look.

“Nothing will happen to you.” His friend’s hand moves to his back, and Barry lets himself tentatively be urged closer till their bodies are just a couple of inches apart.

“You give them too little credit,” Len goes on quietly, and Barry shudders when he cups the back of his neck in this tender way of his, that seems so unlike the other man. “They would probably be angry, but they would get over it in the end.”

Len’s thumb caresses the spot beneath his earlobe, causing Barry to shudder in response.

“I… I don’t…” There is familiar lump in his throat, making it difficult to speak. “They won’t hate me…”

“Maybe,” Len agrees. “But I doubt it. They’ve grown fond of your cooking. I don’t think they would jeopardize that just to harbor a grudge.”

Despite himself, Barry huffs a laugh at that.

“Lisa told me that your hideouts have become cleaner since I’m around.”

“Yeah, I wouldn’t count on that bringing you any favor by the rest of them, though.”

“Hartley likes it,” Barry points out.

“Hartley also likes rats, he doesn’t count.” Len makes a disgusted face that reminds Barry again that he isn’t a friend of the other Rogue’s pets. “That’s mean.”

“I’m supposed to be mean.” Len scratches the base of the back of Barry’s head lightly with his fingernails and smirks when his eyes close briefly in response. “I’m not a nice man.”

Barry hums quietly and reaches for Len’s arm.
“Y-you a-aren’t a-a b-bad o-one e-either,” Barry points out and opens his eyes to meet Len’s gaze.

His friend scoffs at that but looks amused. “I can be.”

They hold each other’s gazes as he goes on. “I’m not all the time, though, but this certainly isn’t making me to one of the good guys, either.”

“Y-you’re f-for m-me.”

“You’re an idiot.”

Barry frowns but can’t find it in himself to feel insulted. He knows that Len doesn’t get what he means. “I d-don’t n-need you t-to ch-change.”

Len lifts an eyebrow. “But you would like me to?”

“A b-bit,” Barry agrees somewhat hesitantly. “B-but w-we are wh-who w-we are, and I s-still… I-I d-don’t w-want you t-to b-be s-someone else.”

The fingers at the back of his neck stop, and he briefly worries that he has upset the other man somehow.

Len is studying him now, with an expression that is hard for Barry to interpret in the dark.

“It doesn’t bother me,” Len finally says and squeezes his neck lightly. “Your stammer, it never has.”

Barry’s eyes are itching again as he swallows around the growing lump in his throat. He didn’t expect this, and he isn’t sure why it means as much to him as it does, but it is such an absurdly reassuring thing to know.

“Th-thank y-you,” Barry utters and squeezes his eyes shut.

When Len moves closer, he let him.

The hand on his neck moves lower and starts to caress his back in slow strokes, while he can feel Len’ warm breath on the bridge of his nose.

“You should rest.”

Barry shudders lightly and nods. Hesitantly, he moves the hand he had resting on his friend’s arm around his back. It is scary and exhilarating at the same time, and he waits for Len to react. When he doesn’t, Barry relaxes and slowly let go of the breath he hasn’t even been aware of holding.

“Go to sleep, baby.”

The feeling of Len touching him, and the warmth of his body so close to his own, follows Barry into his dreams.

Chapter End Notes

This, my dear readers, was the last chapter before the rewritten part starts, and even though I was quite apprehensive about reaching this point, I’ve to say I’ve actually gotten really excited about it as well by now. :)
So far, I’ve five chapters for the rewritten part done, which means that I can keep my regular schedule for at least a while longer, and I hope you guys are as happy about this as I am (and, boy, am I happy about it X).

Regarding this chapter in particular, I’m honestly not as happy with the flow of it as I would like to be. For some reason, it was a bit difficult for me to edit and smooth it out. Even so, I like what we touched upon here as Barry finally found out that the Rogues aren’t as oblivious to another man having taken over the mantle of the Flash as he hoped they would be, and I’m really looking forward to where this goes.

The next chapter will introduce a skip in time from about seven months, and we will meet someone again we haven’t seen in a long while (much to Barry’s grief).

Thank you lovelies for all your feedback, you’re making this to an even more enjoyable ride for me, and I’m glad many of you decided to hop on and join me for it! <3
I Wish You’d Be Mine/ I Wish I Could Be Whole

Chapter Summary

Barry is reminded of how powerless he really is, and Len caught himself the flue.

Chapter Notes

This chapter has been edited by my dear Katzerover. Thanks for being such a wonderful help, my dear! <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

It is early September, just a couple of days till Barry’s fourth year out of prison begins, when the news on the radio talks about some kind of crisis taking place in the East.

He stops moping the floor and walks over to the counter to listen, as uneasiness settles in the bottom of his stomach.

The newscaster hardly knows any details, just that Washington seems to be under some kind of attack and the JLA arrived there mere minutes ago. They don’t mention anyone in particular, and while there are speculations on who could be responsible for what is happening, those are just that, speculations.

It is a daunting experience to be unable to do anything, to just stand by and listen. Barry recalls the previous times when something big enough happened that it justified an emergency broadcast, and, as if in response to that news, the aches in his body, in his limbs and joints, become so much more intense all of a sudden.

He lifts his right hand and studies it, noticing the way most of the joints feel too warm and are slightly pulsing.

Dr. Elias comes to his mind, and Eddie, trying to assure him that he can trust the scientist…

The memory slips from Barry’s grasp, and he turns to the radio with an uneasy frown when the newscaster mentions the Teen Titans have just arrived on the scene of the fight.

Bart come to his mind, and it is as if his heart is suddenly up his throat-

The entrance bell chimes, cutting through the tense moment, and Barry turns automatically, still unable to completely shake the thought off that Bart is somewhere out there fighting, putting himself in serious danger.

“Hey, Barry,” James greets him as he makes his way over to him, a friendly smile on his lips that quickly wanes and is replaced by a much more serious and slightly concerned expression as he takes note that something must be wrong. “Is everything alright?”

“Yes.” Barry utters, voice faint and trembling as his vocal cords seems to be very much against the idea of doing their job once again. He swallows and glances back to the radio but reconsiders and shoots his friend an unhappy look. “W-well, n-no, th-there’s b-been an at-tack.”

“An attack?” James frowns, and studies him with concern before he turns to the radio and pauses to listen

“Ah, I see,” he says and grimaces slightly. “Damn it. Where’s it happening?”

“W-Washingt-ton.”

“You know someone there?”

Barry smiles faintly, and nods because it isn’t entirely a lie and it would explain why he appears to be so shaken by this. “A f-friend.”

“I’m sure they’ll be alright.” James assures him with a comforting smile. “The JLA is already there, which usually includes the Flash, and he’s probably gotten all the people out of the fighting zone already.”

Wally probably has. The problem is only that the people Barry is mostly worried about are the ones who try to keep whoever is attacking away from the citizens.

“Y-yeah,” he agrees quietly as he turns back to the radio, biting his lower lip.

If he just wasn’t so useless-

“Does your hand hurt?” Barry turns to James in confusion and freezes when he realizes that he is rubbing his right wrist.

“N-no.” He forces his arms down and feels an uncomfortable heat spread over his cheeks. “I’m j-just w-worried, th-that’s all.”

James looks at him with sympathy, but Barry doesn’t miss the doubt that is still persisting in his friend’s eyes. Yet, he doesn’t try to probe, for which Barry is grateful.

“W-welcome b-back b-by th-the w-way,” Barry says with a genuine smile. It is good to see his friend again after nearly a month of him being abroad.

“Thank you.” James grins. “Believe me, it’s good to be back. Staying in a hotel room for weeks on end isn’t as fun as it may sound, even if it’s upper class.”

Barry chuckles, well aware that the actual reason why his friend missed the US so much is likely due to the lack of Dunkin Donuts in Sydney. His friends love for the fried sweet is nearly obsessive at times.

“How’s lao lao?” James’ expression becomes more somber at the mentioning of his grandmother. “Is she doing better today?”

Mrs. Ming has gotten sick a couple of days ago, the third time in just as many months, and due to his grandson’s absence, it has been mostly on Barry to look after her, though Mary and Axel helped as well at times.

“Yes, sh-she’s s-sleeping,” Barry explains and feels an all too familiar worry creep up again. The emotion is persistent and a near-constant companion to him these days whenever he thinks about his employer.
“Good.” James gives him a tight smile and glances to the doorway behind the counter that leads to the stairs, worry still plain to see in his eyes. “I’m glad that I won’t have to leave the country for more than a couple of days till the rest of the year.”

Barry is glad to hear that, for both James and Mrs. Ming. He knows that his friend feels guilty for how much time he had to spend out of the US this year due to his job while his grandmother’s health is getting worse.

“That’s great,” he agrees warmly. “She’ll be happy to hear that.”

While Mrs. Ming never outright says anything as she knows that her grandson has to travel a lot for work, it is still obvious how much she misses him at times, and Barry is sure that having him around more often again will be good for her.

“By the way, I’ve something for you,” James tells him, sounding less glum and more excited again.

Barry lifts his eyebrows in played surprise, as it has become kind of a ritual between them that James would get him something whenever he has to travel abroad, and he has also picked up on the two bags in his friend’s hands by now.

Though, he really hopes that only the smaller one is meant for him. Getting presents is a bit of a sore topic for him, but he has made his peace by now with the fact that it just seems to be in James’ nature to get something from his trips for people he likes.

Thankfully, so far it has been limited to rather inexpensive souvenirs one usually gets in tourist shops or on the airport. Not that this makes them any less special to Barry, and he has actually grown quite fond of those little knick-knacks.

It is also good to see that the prospect of giving him something, seems to have lifted his friend’s mood considerably again, as his eyes are twinkling with badly hidden anticipation.

“You do?” Barry asks in fake curiosity and watches how James takes the white and smaller bag of the two he has in his right hand to present it to him.

“Indeed.” His friend grins. “Souvenirs.”

Barry chuckles and accept the bag but can’t help but point out once again, “Y-you d-didn’t have t-to g-get me anything.”

“And I still did.” James returns fondly. “So deal with it.”

There is a mug in the bag, a big white one with the print *I HEART Sydney* in big bold letters on it.

“A mug?” Barry asks in feign surprise. “Wh-who w-would have th-thought.”

James seems to have a preference for mugs when it comes to getting him something while on his business trips. By now Barry has a quite impressive little collection of six pieces, seven with this one. Most of them were from somewhere inside the country, but he had also one from Canada, England and now Australia.

“Indeed.” James looks quite pleased with himself. “But this one is special.”

Barry arches an eyebrow and turns back to the mug, studying it curiously. “H-how?”

“It glows in the dark!”
Barry snorts and shoots his friend an amused look. “You r-really w-went all out f-for me th-this time, d-didn’t you?”

“Of course,” James agrees. “Just the best for my friends.”

The radio starts to play music again, then, which means that the emergency newscast is over for now, and Barry tries to push the persisting worry about Bart, Wally, and the others away, as he thanks his friend again for the nice little gift.

“I’ve something else for you as well, though,” James points out and lifts the other bag he has been still holding, a much bigger one.

Barry frowns and studies it, feeling reluctant to accept something else especially because he’s pretty sure that this present probably cost quite a bit more than some cheesy souvenir mug.

“Y-you d-didn’t n-need t-to g-get m-me a-anything else,” he reminds James who is still offering the bag to him.

“I know,” James agrees. “But from this Friday on you’ve only two more years to go until your parole is finally over. That’s something to celebrate, isn’t it?”

A cold and heavy feeling settles into the pit of Barry’s stomach as he is reminded of that, and he tries to keep the ugly emotion from showing on his face.

No, he wants to say, it’s really not.

Nothing of this part of his life is worth celebrating. If he could, he would forget that this even exists…

He stays quiet, though, and accepts the offered bag with a smile he hopes doesn’t look as forced as it feels. “Th-thank y-you.”

James frowns, but Barry turns to examine his present, hoping his friend would get that he doesn’t want to talk about this.

A small startled noise escapes him as he finds a thick hardcover book inside. It explains the weight of the bag, and as he pulls it out, he can’t help but notice how smooth and expensive the cover feels.

It’s a book about traditional oil painting, about advanced techniques by an artist named Virgil Elliot, someone Barry has read about in the past, and just by the look of it he can tell that it has to have cost quite a lot of money.

“I c-can’t ac-cept it.” He glances to the other man nervously, a bit worried that he would upset him. “It’s t-too m-much.”

James studies him for a second, and Barry braces himself for him trying to convince him otherwise.

Okay,” His friend says instead and smiles when he notices his surprised expression. “It’s fine, Barry, really. I suspected you wouldn’t accept it, and I understand why, but thanks to you my interest in the finer arts has been woken as well, so why not leave it here in the store, so you can look through it whenever there isn’t anything else to do or when you take your break, and I’ll borrow it from time to time?”

“S-sure,” Barry agrees, relieved about the offer. He really would like to read the book, and this way it is like he is just borrowing it from James. “Thank you.”
The other man smiles warmly and tells him that he is going to head up to see his grandmother.

Due to the current low on customers, Barry uses the time to look through the art book, studying the different exhibited pieces with interest.

It is the ring of the entrance bell that finally pulls his focus away from the book, and a smile spreads over his lips when he looks up and spots Axel entering the store. Behind the young teen, another boy is tagging along, Sam, one of Axel’s friends he sometimes brings along when he just passes by to get a coke or something.

“Hey, Barry,” Axel greets him and returns his smile with a wide grin as he walks over to him.
“Thought I’d pass by and save you from being bored to death.”

Sam who has accompanied Axel a couple of times so far, nods slightly at Barry, shoulders slouched and hands buried deep in the pockets of his jacket. “Mr. A.”

Barry can’t help but find it amusing to be addressed as Mr. A and returns the young teens greeting with a friendly. “H-hello, S-Sam.” He turns to Axel, then, smiling amused. “Y-you t-two are b-bored?”

“Why?” Axel shoots him a fake frown. “What’s that supposed to mean? You think we’d only pass by when we’ve nothing better to do?”

“Or y-you w-want s-something,” Barry agrees without missing a beat. Sam snorts and Axel grins.

“You know me too well,” the boy agrees, sounding quite pleased by the fact. He then turns to his Sam and tells him to pick two cokes for them.

As Axel tends to help out every other day by now, Mrs. Ming has told him that he could take himself snacks for free whenever he wants in return. She doesn’t seem to mind when he brings a friend along at times, and Axel has never brought more than one along so far, knowing that the business of the store isn’t going too well right now.

“Y-you’re h-having a g-good d-day?”

“Sure thing,” the teen agrees and glances down at the bar when he notices the open book in front of Barry. He aches an eyebrow. “You’re carrying artsy books now as well?”

“N-no, it’s J-James’.”

“He bought you a book?” Axel frowns, looking clearly unimpressed. “Couldn’t he have gotten you something cool instead? Like a smart phone or stuff?”

Barry feels a bit annoyed that Axel’s first conclusion is that it is a present from James, even though he’s pretty much spot on.

“It’s J-James’,” Barry insists. “H-he j-just leaves it here f-for me t-to t-take a l-look wh-when I’ve th-the t-time.”

“Uhu.” Axel clearly doesn’t buy it but leaves it at that, even though Barry would have preferred that the kid would stop grinning at him as if he knew that something else is going on here. Which it isn’t.

As if on cue, James appears at the doorway behind the counter.

“You’re having troubles with underage delinquents again?” he asks Barry, not at all surprised to see
Axel there whom he is eying in amusement.

“Hardy-harr.” Axel rolls his eyes and nods to the art book at the counter. “You got me something as well?”

“You told me you don’t like mugs.” James reminds him as he comes to stand next to Barry.

“Yeah, because mugs suck.”

“Axel.” Barry warns him, and the teen huffs, crossing his arms in front of chest. “Yeah, yeah, mugs don’t suck, they’re the greatest invention since sliced bread. I know.”

James chuckles at this but quickly stops when Barry shoots him a look.

“What sucks?” Sam asks as he joins them with two cokes and a bag of chips in his hands. His expression looks as bored as ever, and he only nods at James after eying him for a moment, apparently not deeming him worthy enough to get a verbal greeting.

“Your face,” Axel chimes up and quickly evades a punch to his shoulder.

“Boys, no fighting within the store,” James reminds them and nods to the door. “Outside is fine, though.”

Both boys snort and chuckle while Barry makes do with a soft huff but has to smile as well as they are really just monkeying around, and Axel has generally gotten much better when it comes to his manners and the language he usually uses.

“You’re here to offer some free help? The storage room would need a good cleaning, and you two could earn—” James question is cut off when both boys quickly come up with some urgent reasons why they have to leave again right away.

“It’s a pity,” Axel tells them, already on his way towards the exit with Sam following close behind. “We’d have loved to slave away for you otherwise.” He then turns to Barry. “Bye Barry!”

“See ya, Mr. A,” Sam adds just as the entrance door swings shut again and both boys are out the store.

“Mr. A?” James shoots him a bemused look.

Barry shrugs but smiles. “Axel’s f-friends c-call m-me t-that for wh-whatever r-reason. Th-they p-probably th-think it’s c-cool.”

“They should call you B.A. if they really wanted to sound cool,” James suggests as he turns to him and rests with his hip against the counter.

“M-most of th-them p-probably h-have n-no id-dea wh-who the A t-team even is,” Barry points out amused and watches how his friend makes a face at that.

“We are getting old, aren’t we?” James asks him with such a morose look that Barry has to laugh outright.

“Sp-speak for yours-self.” The grin he shoots his friend slips away again, and his expression dims as he looks back to the radio.

“Any news on the situation in Washington?” James inquires and eyes Barry with a concerned frown as his reaction was obviously not lost on him.
Barry forcefully pushes the feeling of dread away that tries to regain a hold of him, and gives his friend a small smile as he shakes his head. “N-no, th-they j-just s-said th-that th-the c-center h-has b-been evac-cuated by now.”

“That’s good,” James says and gives him an encouraging look. “I’m sure your friend made it out there in time.”

“Y-yeah.” Barry agrees quietly, even though he knows that Wally, Jay, and the rest are probably still currently trying to get rid of whatever threat has decided to attack the capital city. James can’t know that, though, and Barry appreciates his words. “I kn-know. Th-thanks”

He should have gotten used to this by now, to the helplessness that settles over him like a smothering blanket every time he learns that his former colleagues are out there fighting some threat to humanity, but the reality is that it hasn’t gotten any easier so far. Especially when any of the speedsters are involved…

Barry can only hope that James is right.

The staircase to Len’s building is still alien to Barry. He knows that Len doesn’t like it when he turns up here, and by now he has realized that it is mostly for his own safety, but…

After work he felt restless, and he knows that Len is staying in his apartment right now because he has caught himself a bug and prefers to hole himself up in his own four walls, away from the other Rogues.

Len not feeling well worries him, has since he learned of it two days ago from Sam when the other man checked up on him, and he thinks that his intent to cook his friend some chicken soup with noodles would be a good excuse to pass by.

The plastic bag with the ingredients feels heavy in his right hand, causing a slight ache in his wrist, but he hardly picks up on it as he makes his way up the stairs.

James actually suggested to him that he could cook Len something when Barry mentioned that the other man is sick. They both still walk around the topic of the Rogues being his friends like on eggshells, but James clearly noticed that Len being sick has him worried, and insisted on giving him a 50% employee discount when he wanted to pay for everything after finishing the closing.

“W-we d-don’t h-have emp-ployee d-discount,” Barry pointed out with a frown, but James waved him off and winked. “We do for our best employees.”

It has been nice, even though Barry still feels a bit guilty about having hardly paid eight bucks for the chicken, mirepoix, ginger, and noodles.

After worrying for the most day about the crisis in Washington, Barry is glad he has something he can look forward to and focus on. He learned in the news that the fight is still going on and that most of Washington DC has been evacuated by now. They still aren’t sure who exactly is behind this attack, but some reports said that it has something to do with aliens that seem to belong to an organization similar to the Green Lanterns. They also wield rings as weapons but wearing yellow costumes…

Barry has no idea who these guys could be, and he doesn’t really want to think too much about it either, as any Green Lantern business usually reminds him of Hal…
He generally tries to avoid being reminded of his dead former best friend.

The building is quiet around him; the only noise are his steps as he proceeds up to Len’s floor.

There is fresh coating of paint on the wall, its smell still lingers in the air, and Barry can’t help but notice that the walls of the staircase look nicer than the last time he has been around. It gives the inside of the building something welcoming, and he wishes that the owner of his apartment complex would decide to invest some money in something like a fresh paintjob for their staircase as well.

… not that this is likely to happen considering what a stingy person she is.

His stomach feels fluttery as he stops in front of Len’s door, and he awkwardly shifts his weight from one foot to the other as he tries to prep talk himself into not being so nervous.

The last time he decided to pass by, Len shut the door into his face, and they ended up not talking for over a month…

That was over a year ago by now, though, and Len and him… their relationship has changed, and it is really dumb of him getting so worried about simply passing by to see how his sick friend is doing.

Barry takes a deep breath, lifts his hand, and knocks.

He doesn’t have to wait long before he picks up on movement inside the flat, but his stomach drops the moment he notices that these footsteps can’t belong to Len.

Maybe Lisa-

The door opens and the familiar face of Izzy greets him, looking just the same as the last time he met the prostitute which lays also already over a year back.

She still looks beautiful, and Barry suddenly feels like a scarecrow next to her.

Her big brown eyes narrow when she spots him, and an annoyed frown settles over her face as she eyes him wordlessly for a long minute. The way she looks at him makes Barry feel like an unwelcome intruder, and to her he probably is.

He should have considered that Izzy could be here…

He just though…

He’s an idiot.

Of course Len would still see her. Why wouldn’t he?

God, he is so stupid! He has no right to feel hurt…

The pang in his jaw joints startles him slightly, and he realizes how tensed up he has grown in response to Izzy’s presence.

“S-sor-ry.” Barry utters, and all of a sudden being there is just too much.

At least Len isn’t around to grow angry this time-

“Wait!” Izzy’s tells him sharply, the irritation plain in her voice, and Barry, who has turned around and just made a step towards the stairs again, stops.
Reluctantly, Barry turns back to her and shoots her an uneasy, questioning look.

“You don’t need to run off like a frightened puppy,” Izzy grouses with an irked huff, crossing her arms under her ample bosom. “I’m not going to bite you, you know?”

This is certainly not what Barry has expected to hear from her considering how she was more than eager to get rid of him the last couple of times they’d met. He shifts awkwardly as he tries to make sense of her and watches how her frown forms into a scowl, her eyes boring into his in a nearly angry manner. The plain display of hostility only last for a second, though, then she forces her features to relax again, and her eyes drop to his hands instead.

She arches an elegant eyebrow. “You’ve food with you?"

Barry glances down to the white shopping bag in his hand and nods. “Y-yes, I-I w-wanted t-to m-make L-Len a s-soup.” He shrugs a bit helplessly.

Izzy keeps studying the bag in Barry’s hand with such an intense look that he is surprised it hasn’t burst up in flames yet.

“You’re a decent cook, aren’t you?” Izzy meets his eyes with slightly pinched lips and steps back, opening the door wider. “I was thinking about ordering food, but it seems I can save some bucks.”

He just stares at her for a couple of seconds, taken aback by the fact that she is actually inviting him in. A flash of annoyance replaces the surprise rather quickly again, though, as he realizes that she seems to just assume that he is going to cook for her as well.

Seeing that he did come here to prepare Len some soup, and it looks as if his friend hasn’t eaten yet, Barry ignores his irritation he feels for that woman and only nods curtly before he enters wordlessly.

It is not hard to find his way to the kitchen due to the apartment not being that big, but he stops briefly in the living room when he spots Len on the couch, asleep.

“He’s the flu,” Izzy informs him. She meets his surprised look evenly. “You probably knew that already, though.”

Barry hums in agreement, not sure what to say, and turns back to Len.

His friend looks pale, with dark rings under his eyes, but his face is relaxed, and it occurs on Barry that Len hasn’t picked up on him entering the apartment, which is a bit unsettling as the other man is usually very aware of his surroundings, even when he rests. This in itself is probably the clearest sign that he really can’t be feeling well.

The urge to walk over to Len and touch him overcomes Barry out of the blue, and it is so intense that he nearly gives in.

Instead, after a glance back to Izzy, he makes his way over to the kitchen, and puts the items on the counter.

Len’s kitchen is small, and it is not hard to find the cabinet with the pots, or where he has the salt and pepper stashed away. Concerning any other spices, it doesn’t look very promising, though, not that Barry is surprised by that, as Len and most of the other Rogues usually live on takeout when Lisa or him don’t provide them with an alternative to it.

Barry cleans the chicken and puts it into the waiting pot with water as a whole. He adds pepper, salt, and the vegetables, closes the lid and let it start to cook on a small flame, all the while ignoring Izzy’s gaze that keeps lingering on him as he works.

“You’d make a great housewife,” The woman remarks, but without the usual bite as she watches him from the kitchen entrance. It is still clearly intended to be an insult, and Barry decides to ignore her.

Then, just as he washes his hands, she adds. “He likes your cooking.”

Surprised, Barry turns to her. Izzy snorts rather unladylike and walks over to the counter next to the cooking plates. She pushes herself up on it to take a seat.

Izzy’s eyes are not exactly hostile when she meets his, but they aren’t friendly either. “I can’t cook worth shit. The couple of times I tried to make him something… well, it turned out rather disastrous.” She huffs a humorless chuckle and leans against the fridge next to her, studying him for a minute or so with a slowly growing frown.

“You’re not even good looking.” Barry can’t help but bristle at these words, unconsciously crossing his hands in front of his chest, which causes Izzy to smirk. “And you’re so damn self-conscious, it’s sad.”

“Y-you kn-know.” Barry starts and tries to ignore how humiliated he is feeling again thanks to her. “I-I r-really c-couldn’t c-care l-less wh-what y-you th-think of m-me.”

“Good.” Her smile is wide and hostile. “Because you wouldn’t like it.”

Barry presses his lips together tightly. He hates how riled up he feels, how these woman’s words sting, though he knows they really shouldn’t mean anything to him.

“Cat got your tongue?” Izzy chuckles, eyes sharp and angry, and Barry meets them, despite how uneasy her gaze makes him feel. Her next words are cut off by coughing, though, and both of them turn to the couch.

“Izzy?” Len sounds hoarse, groggy. Barry feels once again the flutter in his stomach, as well as the silly need to walk over to him.

“I’m here,” Izzy replies and meets Barry’s eyes, glaring at him like he has somehow wronged her. She adds. “You’ve a visitor.”

Len grunts. “I’m fine, Liz. It’s just the flu, I told you so yester-” The word is cut off by another coughing fit, and Barry grimaces slightly, feeling bad for his friend.

“’S not your sister,” Izzy clarifies when the coughing stops, and Barry doesn’t miss how her fingers dig into the edge of the counter she is sitting on as she proceeds. “Your sweetheart decided to pass by and make you soup.”

A brief pause.

“Barry?” Len pushes himself up, looking nearly as white as a ghost, when he looks over to them.

A flush creeps over Barry’s cheeks, a nearly painfully intense one. He shouldn’t react like this as Len probably didn’t pick up on Izzy’s choice of words due to him being sick, but he can’t help it.

“Y-yeah,” Barry answers but stops and coughs lightly as his voice sounds embarrassingly thin. “I… I th-though I’d p-pass b-by…” He shrugs helpless and isn’t surprised when Len doesn’t look particularly happy about his idea to visit.
“Did you let one of the others know that you’re coming here?” Len asks gruffly.

“Y-yes, S-Sam,” Barry replies somewhat annoyed by the other man treating him like a child. “A-and I’ve th-the m-mirror w-with m-me. D-don’t t-treat m-me l-like I’m unab-ble t-to t-take c-care of m-myself, L-Len.”

The other man glares at him, and Barry forces himself not to glance to Izzy when she snorts incredulously.

Instead, Barry goes back to quickly check up on the soup. Then, he makes his way over to Len, who still looks irked and like he is generally in a rather bad mood right now. Not that Barry is surprised, his friend probably feels like crap.

Len studies Barry, as he crouches down next to him. “You shouldn’t have come.”

Barry hesitates but replies softly. “I was worried about you.”

The grimness in Len’s expression wanes and is replaced by surprises, before his eyes soften, and he studies Barry with a much warmer, fonder look again.

Hesitantly, Barry lays his hand on Len’s arm, still a bit apprehensive about initiating contact like this one between them, but no longer scared of it. Len’s eyes flicker down to where Barry is touching him, and his body seems to relax some more in response to it.

“I’m fine,” Len tells him as he lays back, exhaling a sigh, without breaking eye contact. “It’s just the flu.”

“I kn-know,” Barry agrees quietly.

They look at each other for a long moment.

It is nice, calming, and intimate in a harmless way, and Barry wants to tell Len…

He isn’t sure.

That he still worries about him even though it is just the flu? That he just doesn’t want Len to be sick and feel awful?

Barry gets startled out of his musing when Len moves his arm and grasp his hand, loosely but securely.

“You’ve work tomorrow,” Len reminds Barry, and considering that it is already eleven pm, he has a point. Len doesn’t sound gruff anymore, though, and he starts to draw small circles with his thumb on the back of Barry’s hand.

“I…” Barry swallows and carefully squeeze Len’s hand back. “I j-just w-wanted t-to s-see you.”

They haven’t seen much from each other the past month. Len usually only passes by on the weekends as Barry tends to be the one who comes over to the hideout most of the time as it is. With the Rogues having been rather busy the last couple of weeks in preparation of an upcoming heist, Barry preferred to make his presence around them rather scarce, though.

At least till he learned that Len is sick.

“He also makes you dinner,” Izzy remarks as she leans over the back of the couch, meeting Barry’s eyes briefly before her gaze moves on to their connected hands and lingers there.
Len notices this too as he let go and pulls his back, resting it on his stomach while he meets Izzy’s amused and slightly taunting smirk with a cool expression.

Barry tries not to show the hurt he feels by this, instead he gets up again, and mutters that he is going to look after the soup.

The quiet voices of Len and Izzy reach him in the kitchen as he busies himself with cleaning so he wouldn’t have to return to them after checking up on the progress of Len’s meal. He tries not to be hurt by how Len still is ashamed about his feels for him, not that he really has any right to be so in the first place as they aren’t… they’ve never…

Barry frowns down at the sink he is currently scrubbing, angry at himself for his feeling towards the other man when he is still so broken at the same time.

He has no right to be upset about Izzy, he has no right to hold it against Len that he needs someone else. Len is a grown man with a normal libido, if Barry wasn’t so messed up and terrified of the notion of getting intimate himself, the other man wouldn’t need to find his relief somewhere else.

“If you keep that up, you’re going to scrub a hole in the sink.” Barry freezes while his cheeks flushing in response. He shoots a glance over his shoulder to see Izzy watch him with an amused glint in her eyes.

He straightens up, lips pursed.

Izzy chuckles, arms once again crossed below her bosom, and tilts her head slightly. “You’re always so tense, you know that.” When he fails to answer, her grin grows and she shrugs. “Then again, if I could never get it up—”

“Izzy!” Len pushes himself again into an upright position, visibly angry. “I told you to—”

“Yes, I heard you the fucking first time!” She yells back, glaring. “I’ll piss off like the good little whore I’m now that your girlfriend has arrived! It’s a real pity he can’t get it up for you, otherwise you wouldn’t need to put up with me every other night, is it!?—”

“Leave.” Len orders her, coldly. “Or you can worry about finding another john who keeps up with your fucking temper.”

The auburn haired woman actually bares her teeth at Len, looking furious. “Fine! Fuck you too, you miserable bastard! See if I play nurse for you again!”

After another withering look in Barry’s direction, she whirls around, grabs her coat that rested over the back of the couch, and storms off. She shuts the door with enough force that the whole building must have heard it.

The silence that follows Izzy’s departure quickly turns uncomfortable, and Barry knows that he wasn’t meant to see any of this.

Awkwardly, he shifts and glances to Len.

His friend is glaring at the door, and it isn’t lost on Barry how exhausted he looks. Then, Len turns his attention to him, and his irked expression eases away a bit. “Ignore her, she’s been moody for a while now.”

Barry wonders whether Izzy’s bad mood could be connected to him, and quickly decides that he really doesn’t want to know. If he could have helped it, he would have preferred not to learn about Izzy and her obviously still existing part in Len’s life in the first place.

He nods and turns back to the kitchen, checking up on the soup once more.

They don’t talk for the next fifteen minutes it takes till the soup and the noodles are done. Barry keeps himself busy by going back to cleaning while Len turns the TV on and zaps around for a while but eventually settles on some baseball game.

When the meal is finally ready, Barry fills two bowls with soup and noodles, adds a carrot to each, and makes his way back into the living room.

Len rubs his eyes when he notices him and turns slightly as he pushes himself up in a sitting position. He accepts the bowl with a nod. “Thanks.”

Barry smiles and takes a seat on the spot Len cleared for him.

They watch the game for the next couple minutes, neither speaking while they eat, and Barry can’t say that he is particularly hungry, even though he hasn’t eaten anything since lunch more than ten hours ago. He still eats, though, because he has been able to gain some weight again over the past seven months, and he really wants to keep it like that as he prefers not to look like a walking skeleton.

“You should be a chef.”

Barry pauses for a second. He turns his head to face Len, an eyebrow ached incredulously.

The other man smiles slightly, and Barry doesn’t miss that he doesn’t look as sickly pale anymore.

“All you make tastes delicious, even just some soup with noodles,” Len explains, watching with visible amusement how Barry flushes and ducks his head a little.

“It’s really nothing special,” Barry murmurs, feeling embarrassed but also happy about the praise.

“It is,” Len disagrees with a surprising earnestness that catches Barry off-guard. He is saved from trying to come up with something to reply to his friend’s words, when the baseball game is interrupted by another special newscast about the still ongoing fight in Washington DC.

The dread that has been following Barry around since this morning, eases away when he learns that the fighting there has finally come to an end. He relaxes even more when he hears that there seem to be no casualties among the heroes that were involved.

“Yellow Lantern?” Len asks incredulously, causing Barry to look back to him.

Apparently, Len hasn’t been aware of what was going on in Washington DC, not that it surprises Barry considering that his friend probably hasn’t put a priority on keeping up with the news today.

“Because having a bunch of green interstellar meddlers hasn’t been bad enough.” Len snorts but the frown on his face tells Barry that he isn’t finding this especially funny.

Barry hums quietly, and lowers his gaze down on his lap.

He tries not to ponder over any kind of Lantern or superhero business in general. Now that he knows that Wally, Jay, and the rest is doing fine, he would rather forget that topic again…

“The Flashes were there as well,” Len states, and Barry shoots him a look, meeting his eyes briefly.
He turns back to his meal and nods.

They fall quiet again and the program soon returns to the baseball game.

After finishing their late dinner, Barry takes the bowls back to the kitchen, does the couple of dishes, and puts the pot with the leftover soup into the fridge, while Len lays down once again.

It is already past midnight when he checks the clock the next time, which means that it would take him at least two hours to get home, and it would be a good idea to get going if he wanted to get any sleep at all tonight. As he listens to Len, who is on the best way to cough his lungs up by the sound of it, he decides that he would stay a bit longer, so that he can make him a remedy that would hopefully help his bronchi to calm down and enable him to get some more rest.

Having brought ginger powder and grinded black pepper with himself, he starts to prepare a tea while listening to the TV program that changed from the baseball game to some action flick a while ago.

Len nodded off again when Barry walks back to him about five minutes later. He is snoring softly, and Barry pauses to watch him as a familiar fondness settles over him. He takes the TV control and turns it off. Then, he carefully crouches down next to the other man, ignoring the pang in his knees as he does so.

“What time ‘s it?” Len asks drowsy just when Barry is about to wake him. He opens his eyes slowly, blinks a couple of times as he seems to have troubles to focus on him.

“A b-bit after m-midnight,” Barry answers with a soft smile and watches how Len pushes himself up.

“You’ve to work tomorrow,” Len reminds him once again, frowning, and Barry shrugs lightly. “It’s f-fine, I’m ab-bout t-to leave.”

Len studies him, only briefly glancing down at the glass of tea in his hand.

“You can use my bed,” Len decides and cuts Barry off as he is about to protest. “I’m staying on the couch, anyway. For some reason it’s easier for me to sleep here, and I don’t need you to catch this bug from me as well.”

“Y-you sh-should s-sleep in your b-bed.” Barry objects. “You’re s-sick, th-the c-couch-”

“I’m more comfortable here,” Len assures him. He reaches out for Barry, grasping his wrist lightly that is holding the tea. Barry tenses up for a second but relaxes again. “You need rest as well. You’ve had a long day, and you’ve to get up again in not even five hours.”

“Y-your b-back w-won’t l-like th-this,” Barry remarks but doesn’t really try to refuse again. He knows that Len is right, and he is actually getting pretty tired now.

“I’m not that old yet.” Len smirks and gives his hand a slight squeeze. “I think I can take a couple more years sleeping on a crappy couch till I really have to worry about this.”

“Y-you’re n-nearly f-fifty,” Barry points out and smiles amused when he gets a dark glare in return.

“H-here,” Barry offers the glass with the remedy to Len. “Th-this sh-should h-help w-with y-your c-cough.”

“That looks repulsing.” Len eyes the glass with a disgusted look but reaches for it nonetheless.
“It is,” Barry agrees and can’t keep from grinning as his friend huffs a sigh. “It w-will h-help y-you, th-though.”

“So you say,” Len mutters and takes a sip which causes him to make a face as if he has just tasted something rotten.

“C-come n-now, it’s n-not th-that b-bad.”

“You wanna take try?” His friend offers, but Barry declines with a wave. “I’m n-not s-sick.”

“The comment about everything you touch turning out good?” Len studies the drink with a pinched expression and shoots him a frown. “I take it back.”

Barry chuckles and reaches for Len’s wrist, squeezing it fondly. “Y-you’ll l-live, and it w-will h-help y-you.”

“Or I die of food-poisoning,” Len grumbles but takes another reluctant sip.

“I’ll t-take a qu-quick sh-shower,” Barry says, still smiling. As he tries to get up, though, Len’s free hand grabs his wrist, keeping him in place and causing him to tense up involuntarily.

“It’s fine,” Len tells him calmly and loosens his grasp enough that it would be easy for Barry to break free. “I just…”

He breaks off and purses his lips, looking both annoyed and helpless as he seems to try and come up with the right words. His expression becomes more certain again as he finally proceeds. “Don’t let yourself be bothered by Izzy, she knows nothing.”

“Y-you m-mean a l-lot t-to h-her,” Barry returns quietly with a sad smile and takes hold of Len’s wrist in return. “And sh-she c-can… sh-she c-can g-give y-you wh-wha-what y-you n-need.”

Saying this hurts. Just thinking about this is painful, like a coiled up pulsing knot in his chest, and he averts his eyes to the ground.

Len studies him, he can feel it, but he can’t bring himself to meet his eyes.

“She’s aware of how I feel,” Len says rather gruff. His voice gets a bit softer again. “And she’ll never be you.”

Barry’s eyes widen briefly, and he looks back to the other man, his lips slightly parted but unable to come up with something to say in return.

“Thank you.” Len squeezes his wrist and gives him a tried but honest smile. “For passing by.”

He then let go of him, and Barry doesn’t move for another moment before he slowly gets up again.

“R-rest,” Barry tells him and tries not to notice how coarse his voice sound.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you guys enjoyed the chapter!

It was rather difficult to write, but I hope it turned out well enough. I takes place between six and seven months after the last one, as I decided to skip stuff that didn’t really add something new and would only drag the pacing down.

In this chapter, it turned out that Len is actually still seeing Izzy, and I hope he isn’t too much in the dog house for it now, though it is a pretty shitty thing to so. The reason for it are many, and it will be touched upon this in upcoming chapters and have repercussions later on.

We also learned about yellow Lanterns, wonder who that could be... ;)

Btw, I love mugs you get in tourist shops, so I’m really happy I could push my mug enthusiasm onto James. <3

Next chapter will be in two weeks and thank you for reading!
“Thanks.” Jay accepts the cup of coffee with a nod, and Barry takes a seat opposite to him.

It is late Friday night, close to quarter to eleven, and Barry just got home from work. He feels a bit exhausted, but even so he is glad that Jay decided to pass by. The fight with the now dubbed Yellow Lanterns lays already two days back, and while Barry learned from the media that his former friends and colleagues were able to defeat them without any losses on their sides, it is still good to have the opportunity to ask Jay himself how everybody is doing.

“Y-you’re ok-kay?” he inquires after he took a sip of his tea, noticing that Jay is studying his own cup with a rather grim expression. The older man looks up, the frown gone, and gives him a faint but honest smile. “I’m good, Barry. The last couple of days have just been rather stressful.”

Barry remembers all too well how exhausting those kind of confrontations can be, especially with opponents as strong as the Lanterns. He doesn’t understand what is going on with the Yellow Lanterns, who they are, or whether their powers work like the ones of their green counterparts, but he doesn’t doubt that it must have been a hard fight to get them to back off and recede.

“E-everyb-body else is d-doing alr-right as w-well?” He nervously turns the warm cup in his hands, wishing he could ask more directly about Wally and Bart, but… it probably would make him look suspicious. Neither of them is supposed to be any of his concern, and even though Jay tends to inform him about how Bart is doing, he is worried that he would look suspicious should he want to know about the boy on his own.

“They’re all fine,” Jay answers as he leans back into his chair, his smile a bit strained. “We’re still a bit rattled up but things are under control again and nobody got too badly hurt.”

“G-good.” It is a relief to hear that. The JLA hasn’t given any official statement yet about what exactly happened, but Barry knows that some of the Teen Titans had also been involved in the fight, including Bart, which made him worry about the boy’s well-being.

Learning first hand from Jay that everybody is ceasing a worry he has carried around with him since he learned about the attack.
“Bart did very well,” Jay says out of the blue, and Barry freezes. “He’s improved quite a lot over the last couple of months, especially when it comes to him working with the team.”

It is odd, hearing Jay tell him about this. Not about Bart per se, the other man did so on occasion before just to keep him in the loop when it comes to the child…

This is touching hero business, though. Hero business he is no longer any part of and has no right to know about. Most of his former colleagues would probably be quite unhappy to learn that Jay mentioned any of this to him.

“He wants to impress Max,” the older man goes on. “And you.”

Jay meets Barry’s surprised and wary eyes with a calm, considering look. “He knows that he can’t tell you in person about how he is doing, so he hopes that you’d picked up on the whole business in DC via the news.”

Unsure how to reply, and a bit afraid that this could get him in trouble, Barry only nods and gazes back to the white mug in his hands.

A brief silence follows, and Barry knows that Jay is watching him. It makes him nervous. Nervous and a bit nauseous.

“Do you’ve anything planned next week on Sunday?” The question catches him off-guard, and Barry glances back up to Jay, meeting his eyes with a confused frown.

“N-no,” he stammers, suddenly worried that the other man could be on to his friendship with the Rogues, seeing that he often spends the majority of his Sundays over at whatever hideout they are currently using.

Jay frowns briefly, probably noticing his increasing nervousness. He must have gotten used to Barry reacting rather badly to the most unobtrusive seeming things, though, as he doesn’t ask him about it, and instead smiles. “Good, because if you’ve time, I’d like to make true on my offer to invite you over for dinner.”

It would be an understatement to say that this is unexpected, and it must be plain on Barry’s face as Jay gives him a sympathetic look as he goes on. “Just if you’ve time of course, Barry, and if you want to. Bart would be there too, the boy’s birthday is coming up, and we thought we’d celebrate it with his favorite food and a cake.”

Barry didn’t know that Bart’s birthday is coming up. Not that he knows much about the kid, and even though there isn’t much he can do about it, considering his situation, he still feels bad when he realizes once again how little he is aware of when it comes to the boy.

“He would love to have you there,” Jay proceeds, and judging by the somewhat saddened way he is studying Barry now, he knows what is going through his head. “He’s asking about you a lot.”

Barry feels his face heat up and lowers his eyes back to the table, fighting the urge to fidget. There is no way that Jay nor anybody else could hold it against Barry when Bart wanted to know about him, but it still makes him feel a bit uneasy. Not that he really believes anymore that Jay would use Bart’s curiosity against him.

Over the last couple of months, Jay started to pass by again every once in a while, and their conversations usually stay off anything connected to Barry’s allegedly shady past.

It still is a mystery to him why Jay would let this topic suddenly drop like this, but he can’t say that he minds. It is nice to have his former friend visit him again without feeling like he is constantly expecting the worst of him.

“Max will also be there,” Jay goes on when Barry stays quiet. “He and Bart could pick you up on their way over to us, he already told me that it wouldn’t be a problem.”

“Y-you…” Barry bites his lower lips and meets Jay’s gaze somewhat uncertainly. “It’s p-probab-bly b-better if I’m n-not ar-round, I d-don’t w-want t-to m-make th-things… awk-kward.”

And there is probably nothing more awkward on a child’s birthday party than an alleged pedophilic relative among the guests.

Not to mention that it wouldn’t end well for him if Wally…

“It would be just the five of us,” Jay explains with a slight frown, though he appears to be more concerned than annoyed. “And Bart would love to have you there.”

Barry is surprised hearing that. “I-it’s j-just…”

He shifts nervously on his chair, unsure what to make of that. “Wh-why w-would y-you w-want t-to h-have m-me th-there as w-well?” It is a rather blunt question, but the invitation to Bart’s birthday dinner causes some alarm bells to ring in his mind.

Jay studies him with a grim expression for a moment, and even though part of Barry is worried that the other man could be annoyed with him, he somehow senses that this anger is not directed towards him.

“Because Bart has been asking about you a lot, and he would like to have you there.” The older speedster gives him a tight smile. “As would Joan and I. It has been a while since we’ve had a dinner together.”

Because you believe I’m a pedophilic rapist and murderer, Barry thinks bitterly but doesn’t say it out loud.

It isn’t like he is really angry at Jay anymore. He never really was. The other man has a good reason to think the worst of him, as do the others…

Barry swallows around the lump in his throat and averts his eyes back to the tea cup in his hands.

The thought of having dinner with Jay and Joan holds something oddly comforting, though. Barry always loved it when Iris, Wally, and he went over there, or the nice elderly couple came to them to spend an evening together.

Jay and he had a close relationship back then, and the older hero liked him pretty much from the very beginning. It probably was due to how polite Barry was, how careful about using his powers during a fight, and how he just wanted to help and didn’t expect anything in return. Jay always acts out of selflessness as he sees his powers more as a kind of responsibility than a privilege, and Barry was pretty much felt the same when he still had his own.

It took no time for them to become friends, and just a bit more till he got to know Joan, and he introduced Jay to Iris. Wally was added a couple years later, and… they’ve been his family…

“You don’t have to, Barry,” Jay goes on. He sounds tired all of a sudden and a little disappointed. “It is just an invitation; nobody will hold it against you if you decline.”
“N-no,” Barry says as he starts to nervously turn the cup in his hands. “I’d l-like t-to c-come… i-if y-you th-think th-that’s ok-kay.”

It is odd to watch Jay relax as he hears his answer, or how his expression lightens again.

As if the other man really wants him to be there.

And it makes no sense.

“Good.” Jay smiles. “Bart will be happy to hear that you’re coming.” He seems to hesitate but eventually adds. “As will Joan and I.”

Barry shoots the other man a wary look and stays quiet, not sure what to do or say as he is still pretty much confused by any of them wanting him to join in the first place.

Their conversation turns into a different direction when Jay asks him how he is doing, much to Barry’s relief. His suspicion about the invitation to Bart’s birthday dinner sticks around in the back of his mind, but he is able to start to relax somewhat at the change of topic.

“We have to take you to the Saloon the next time we go,” Hartley tells him with a very determined expression as he puts his wager down.

Like so many times before when Barry passed by at the hideout in the past, he found the others involved in another game of poker. Not really feeling like playing tonight, he took the seat next to Len, and has made do with watching them for the last hour or so.

“I th-think I’ll p-pass,” Barry says, not really liking the idea of visiting the infamous bar in the Keys. “I’m n-not b-big on b-bars.”

“Or having fun,” Sam adds with a smirk and skillfully ignores the glare he gets in return.

“You’ll love it!” James, who is currently balancing on the two back legs of his chair, shoots him a wider grin, obviously liking the idea of Barry joining them at their favorite bar. “The beer is cheap and not too bad, and you’ll always find something entertaining there like bar fights, lots and lots of bar fights!”

Frowning, Barry is about to reply that he really would rather not visit such a place when Mick cuts him off. “Yeah, gettin’ out will do you some good. You could use some fun.”

“Yeah,” Digger agrees, frowning at Barry. “I’ve known ye for bloody years now, mate, and never seen ye shitfaced.”

Lisa snorts, lowering her can of beer again she picked up without taking a sip as she addresses her colleagues in general. “Your definition of fun is questionable at best. Leave him be, if he doesn’t wanna go to that sordid place it’s because he has still enough brain cells left to realize what a shithole it really is.”

“Funny, you never seem to have no problem with how sordid that place is when you join us there,” Sam points out, snacking on a handful of chips.

“I’m used to that kind of environment.” Lisa shrugs, shifting her cards around as she studies them without much interest.
“He’s never been there,” Hartley points out, smiling at Barry. “And it really isn’t that bad.”

“Yeah it is.” Sam snorts, and Barry doesn’t miss how the other man briefly focuses on the glass of water in front of him before looking back to his hand. Barry really hopes nobody else picks up on it, otherwise they would get their own version of a bar fight here if it becomes known that Sam is cheating.

Again.

Biting down on a sigh, he only half listens to how Hartley and Sam start to debate about the Saloon and whether it is really as seedy of a place as everybody seems to say.

Len’s eyes meet his when Barry glances over to him, and the dizzyingly, fluttery feeling settles back into his stomach as he realizes that the other man is watching him. Barry’s cheeks grow warm, and he ducks his head, before he shoots his friend a shy smile. It is probably ridiculous how pleased he is when Len returns it, amused and fond-

“You two are so sugary sweet, my teeth are starting to ache!” James’ voice is loud and boisterous enough to cut through the tender moment. Barry tries not to crawl under the table in embarrassment, whereas Len shoots an icy glare at the other Rogue in response.

Lisa actually groans in exasperation and tells James to shut up. “Keep your stupid comments to yourself, Tricks, they aren’t funny!”

James gasps, sounding honestly aghast by what his friend has just said, and points an accusing finger at her. “You don’t find it funny because you’re a humorless chicken!”

Mick, who just took a pull on his bottle, spits a mouthful out as he snorts in response, and Digger joins right in. Sam also chuckles, but seeing that he actually sits within hitting range of Lisa, he tries to keep it down.

It’s not really a funny joke, it’s more the bizarreness of the whole situation that is amusing, and even Barry can’t help but smile.

While Hartley tries to calm James down who grew even more upset after Lisa threw her empty can of beer at him, Barry gets up to make himself some tea in the small makeshift kitchen this hideout has to offer.

Marco is there when he enters, rummaging through the fridge, probably looking for some kind of snack.

“You’re going to cook?” The Latin asks hopefully as he spots him, and Barry shoots him an amused look, aching an eyebrow. “No?”

Marco heaves a sigh and turns back to the interior of the fridge, which is mostly filled with left over fast-food.

Barry decides that he really needs to stock them up on fresh food again. Since their fight with Blacksmith and the Blue Velvet, they’ve all be more careful with their outings, which is the clever thing to do, but also made itself know by an increase in aggression and a decrease on anything edible that isn’t canned.

“Who’s winning?” Marco asks as he closes the fridge again, a bottle of beer in hand, and Barry can’t help but frown when he notices this. He’s pretty sure that this is what his friend just choose as a substitute for an actual meal, and that doesn’t sit well with him as the Rogues are drinking too much beer right now as it is.

“S-Sam,” he answers and starts to look through the cabinets for something he could use to prepare a quick dish meanwhile his tea is steeping.

“Fucking cheat.” Marco snorts and opens his bottle with the back of a lightener as he leans back against the fridge door. “I’ve told Cold a thousand times already that we should ban him from playing poker with the rest of us.”

“B-because you’re s-such an innoc-cent s-soul,” Barry asks amused as he pulls out a box of still unopened rice and two big cans of peas.

“I’m not trying to cheat every time we play,” the other man points out and nods to him. “I thought you’re not cooking, Allen.”

“I c-can’t l-let y-you l-live on b-beer and ch-chips alone, c-can I?” he asks and grabs one of the bigger pots.

“I’d say you’re such a mom,” Marco snarks. “But I do want you to prepare something so I’ll stay quiet.”

“As if anybody of y-you even kn-knew h-how t-to d-do s-so,” Barry retorts as he starts to fill the pot with water. He glances to the other man. “Y-you’ve s-seen s-some ch-cheese ar-round?”

“Not in a long while.” Marco walks over to him, looking over the couple of ingredients Barry got out. “Watcha making?”

“P-pea r-risotto,” he explains and nods to the cupboard next to the fridge. “C-can y-you g-get m-me th-the f-flour? A-and b-butter?”

Marco does, and he also helps him with opening the cans when he picks up on how Barry has trouble to do so himself.

“Th-thanks,” Barry mutters, flushed, and accepts the can without meeting the other man’s eyes. Things like opening canned food is something that becomes more and more painful for him these days, and he hates how much this makes him feel like an invalid.

“You really should have your hands looked at,” Marco tells him as Barry accepts the second can, a slight frown on the Latin’s face as he studies him.

Barry hums as he stirs the cooking rice and tries not to think of how mucked up his body has become.

A brief silence settles over them which is not tense or uncomfortable, and Barry is grateful once again for how easily the Rogues generally back off from topics he doesn’t want to talk about.

“You want me to help?” Marco asks. The offer is unexpected, and Barry shoots the other man a surprised look which earns him a shrug in response. “I can’t cook worth shit, but I can assist.”

“Ok-kay,” Barry agrees, and points to the flour and the butter he left at the counter next to the fridge. “T-take a f-fourth c-cup of f-flour, and add a sp-spoonful of b-butter. Th-then m-mix it t-till it’s p-paste l-like.”

“That doesn’t sound appetizing,” Marco remarks but does as he is told. “What’s that supposed to be?”
“W-we’ll use th-this as a th-thickener ins stead of ch-cheese.”

“I see…” His friend sounds audibly skeptical, and Barry can’t help but smile, a bit bemused that Marco would want to help him in the first place.

The other man sticks around while the food cooks, and Barry picks up once more how comfortable he feels by the criminal’s presence these days. It’s not only with Marco like this, but all of the Rogues as well, and even though a part of him still feels guilty about it, he generally tries to focus on how nice it is to be accepted into this group of misfits.

What Digger said before crosses Barry’s mind as he stirs the risotto, and it is then that he really thinks about how he has known these people for years now. Not as the Flash, not as a criminal investigator, but just as Barry… another criminal like them.

Barry watches the cooking rice absentmindedly and can’t help but think how odd life can be at times. He wouldn’t have thought that he would end up here a decade ago.

“You’re a loud thinker.” Marco’s voice startles him momentarily. Barry frowns lightly at the other man and doesn’t need to ask what he means as some of the Rogues can be surprisingly observant if they chose to be.

“You fourth year out of prison starts in a week, doesn’t it?” the Latin asks and eyes him attentively. “That means two more to go till you’re done with your parole.”

Barry inklings his head wordlessly and turns back to the risotto, not feeling like touching upon this topic at all.

It is then than he realizes that his invitation to Bart’s birthday dinner falls onto the very same day his third year of parole ends. An uneasy apprehension settle over him, and he really hopes that nobody would remember that little fact during the dinner and bring it up.

“You’ve ever thought about what you’re going to do afterwards?” Marco proceeds.

“No,” Barry answers truthfully and shrugs. “It’s s-still f-far off.”

In three years a lot can happen, and he doesn’t want to try and picture himself someplace he wouldn’t end up anyway because something is going to get wrong again in his life.

“Time flies by ridiculously fast when you’re our age,” Marco points out sagely. Barry snorts as he shoots his friend an amused look. “Y-you’re a y-year y-younger th-than m-me.”

“So?” The criminal shrugs, but his smirk belies his serious tone. “We’re getting old, and it’s better to face it how it is.”

“Aren’t y-you upl-lifting?” Barry grins, turns the hot plate off and asks Marco for the cheese substitute.

“Just facing the cold, hard facts,” the other man argues as he hands him the bowl. “And we’re rather lucky as we are that we’ve gotten this old, considering our occupations.”

“I w-wouldn’t c-call it an oc-upation p-per se.” Barry shoots Marco discontent look as he stirs the risotto. “And y-you w-wouldn’t h-have t-to w-worry ab-bout n-not g-getting older if you w-would n-not g-get y-yourself in l-life r-risking s-situations t-to b-begin w-with.”
“True,” Marco agrees easily, and Barry tries not to be annoyed by how his friends tend to put themselves well-knowingly in harm’s way every time they pull a heist.

At times he feels as if they don’t even care about the possible repercussions, and even though he knows that this isn’t really the case, he is also very much aware of how his friends do enjoy the thrill of the dangerous situations they get themselves in on a regular basis.

“Don’t make such a long face, Allen.” Marco meets his eyes with an amused expression. “We know what we’re doing, we’ve been in this business for more than two decades by now.”

Sometimes it isn’t the lack of experience that gets people killed, Barry wants to say but doesn’t. He doesn’t want to discuss any of this. It really isn’t his place to complain, and despite how comfortable he started to feel around Marco and the others over the years, he would only really touch upon these kind of things with Len, and even then only reluctantly.

“Y-yeah,” he agrees quietly instead, and gives the other man a tight but not unkind smile. “G-get me a p-plate if you w-want s-some r-ris-sotto.”

Barry is about to leave the store when James turns up at the entrance to the small floor that leads to the backdoor exit.

“Hey,” James greets him, smiling. “You’re heading home?”

“Y-yeah.” Barry slings his backpack over his right shoulder, and turns to the other man. “Y-you n-need s-someth-thing?”

“No,” James starts but seems to reconsider for a split second before he proceeds. “Well, yes, but it’s nothing work related,” he explains. “You see, a friend of mine got us tickets for the opening night of a new exhibition in the Gilbert’s art gallery next month. Yesterday, she learned that she’s to make a trip to England around that time, though, and gave me her ticket to find someone else who’d like to join me there, so…”

Barry feels his eyebrow rise hearing that. “Y-you w-want m-me t-to j-join y-you th-there?”

“Yes,” James agrees but looks a bit uncertain now. “I thought, because you like art so much, that this would be something you would enjoy.”

A visit to an art gallery is definitely something Barry would like, but the offer is unexpected, especially because the tickets for the opening nights of a new exhibition at Gilbert’s aren’t exactly cheap. James must know that he wouldn’t be able to pay him the price of the ticket back.

“I w-would,” Barry agrees, shifting a bit awkwardly as he studies the other man with a slight frown. “B-but y-your s-sure y-you w-want m-me t-to c-come along? I m-mean, I’d l-love t-to b-but… y-you d-don’t w-want t-to ask one of y-your other f-friends?”

The slightly concerned expression on James’ face is replaced by one of understanding, and he looks at Barry with a familiar fondness. “I’m sure.” He smiles. “I’d enjoy having you there.”

A faint heat rises to Barry’s cheeks, and he is glad that the small room is only lit by the lights outside. He tells himself once again that he is being silly, that he misunderstands the other man’s words, but over the last couple of months he has started to pick up on how James looks at him at times, how his eyes last on him longer than is normal for friends, or how he goes out of his way to do something nice for him, like getting him small presents, offer him a ride home, pass by with a bento at work…
Barry tries not to think too much of it, he is probably being paranoid again, but despite telling himself that there is nothing to worry about, he can’t help but notice that James seems to be interested in him.

… and he isn’t sure what to think of or how to react to it.

The idea that another man could find him attractive is as off-putting as ever. Not because he thinks that there is something wrong with James’ possibly being gay, but because it would mean that Barry somehow gave off the signs that he…

Barry shivers involuntarily and adjusts the sling of his backpack nervously.

Why is he making men want him like that? He isn’t… not really…

Unwilling to let his mind wander off in that nasty direction, he stomps down on that thought hard, and forces himself to turn his attention back to James. His friend is now studying him with slight concern once again.

“You don’t have to accept,” James repeats, and while he tries to keep his tone light, Barry doesn’t miss either the disappointment nor the worry in his friend’s voice. “It’s just an offer, Barry, not something that could get you in trouble.”

“N-no, I’d l-like t-to,” he quickly objects. “I-I… it’s j-just th-that I w-won’t… I w-won’t b-be able t-to p-pay y-you b-back.”

Well, it is a half-truth, at least.

The notion that James would offer him a ticket for free that usually costs at least fifty bucks doesn’t sit well with him, but when the troubled frown lifts off his friend’s face, Barry can’t hold it against him. James is just a kind and generous person by nature.

“You don’t need to pay me back,” James reminds him but quickly goes on when Barry is about to protest. “But you can if you want to, and you know that you don’t have to right away. Just give me be money when you have it at hand.”

Barry feels his stomach drop at these words.

Everybody tells him to just pay them back whenever he has the money together, and even though nobody says so outright, he knows that not a single one of them, not James, not Len, not Max, not anybody who knows him, really expects him to ever be able to do so in the end. It is a daunting thought, and how the icy feeling of disgust starts to nestle into his chest. It is a familiar sensation, one that is directed towards himself and he has experienced many times before, and it makes it harder to breath.

“Alr-right,” he agrees, forcing himself to smile. “Th-thank y-you.”

James furrows his brows again, but before he can say something else, Barry gives him a curt nod. “I’ve t-to g-go if I w-want t-to e-catch m-my b-bus. H-have a g-good n-night.”

He turns around rather briskly and leaves the store in a manner he hopes isn’t too rude but can’t really bring himself to care too much just then.

It’s not James, it’s not anybody. It’s just him, and his messed up life, and how tired he is of being poor and such a failure.

Barry feels exhausted all of a sudden, and the bus can’t come soon enough tonight for him to finally “Is something on your mind?” Mary asks and is watching him with warm, calm eyes as Barry looks over to her.

They are in her flat, watching High Noon, or Mary is, at least. Barry watched the screen as well but had zoned out some time ago.

“No,” Barry assures her, feeling bad for not paying attention to the western as he knows that it is one of his friend’s favorite movies. “Just t-tired.”

“Okay.” She gives him a small, kind smile. “If you’re sure.”

They turn back to the television, and Barry tries to concentrate on the movie. He can’t really bring himself to pay attention as his mind starts to wander off again, though.

He has been in a glum mood since his talk with James last night and still doesn’t understand why his friend’s words upset him so much. It isn’t as if James’s leniency regarding the money Barry is once again going to own him, causes his situation to suddenly change and gives him any more reason to feel down about the fact that he is living off other people once more.

“D-do y-you th-think I’m a f-freeloader?” Barry asks quietly, keeping his gaze fixed on the TV-screen. He can feel Mary’s eyes on him but can’t bring himself to meet them.

Mary shifts, probably reaching for the controller, and pauses the movie.

A brief moment of silence follows, and he lowers his gaze to the little couch table in front of them, not really looking at anything as he feels heat rise in his cheeks.

“No,” Mary answers. “I don’t, Barry.”

He swallows and shifts his gaze to briefly glance at her, noticing how she is studying him with a sad look he has grown custom to by now.

“I…” He averts his eyes again, rubbing his thighs nervously. “I n-never p-pay… y-you… e-everyb-body g-gives m-me th-things, f-food a-and s-such, a-and I… I c-can n-never p-pay f-for any of it.”

“The people who do that are your friends,” Mary reminds him kindly. “We don’t expect you to repay us, and you’ve never expect Eddy or me to repay you either when you make us dinner. Or when you give me those beautiful sketches of yours.”

Barry purses his lips and shifts uneasily, forcing himself to meet his friend’s gaze. “Th-that’s n-not th-the s-same, M-Mary. I’m n-not t-talking ab-bout… and y-you usually b-buy m-most of th-th-e f-food I’m p-preparing anyw-way. I j-just d-do th-the c-cooking.”

“Which in itself is already making up for the food,” she points out. “Your putting your effort into cooking for us, and we get great meals out of it, I think it is quite a fair exchange, wouldn’t you say?”

“I… It’s n-not j-just th-the f-food,” he insists unhappily. “Y-you g-give m-me b-books.”

He quickly proceeds when his friend seems about to object. “And I kn-know y-your b-borrowing th-them t-to me, b-but… I’ve had a c-couple of th-them f-for m-more th-than a y-year n-now, and y-you n-never asked b-back f-for th-them.”

“Because you’re my friend, Barry,” Mary explains with a slight furrow of her brows. “And we practically live next to each other.”

“I kn-know, b-but th-they’re y-yours, and….” He bites his lower lip, not sure how he can express the reason for the ugly shame that is holding onto him. “It’s n-not only th-the b-books… I own L-Len and M-Max a l-lot of m-money, and it’s n-not f-for f-food, b-but I w-won’t b-be able t-to p-pay th-them b-back… th-they d-don’t exp-pect m-me t-to…” He grits his teeth for a moment and looks away as the heavy knot in his stomach tightens some more. “I-I… I c-can’t p-pay th-them b-back, I d-don’t… I d-don’t h-have th-the m-money, and th-they kn-know th-that… th-they s-say I c-can wh-when I’ve it t-together b-but… th-they kn-know th-that th-this w-won’t h-happen…”

Living off other people is something he has always hated. The humiliation and guilt that comes hand in hand with it had been a constant companion in his youth, and he can still remember all too well what it felt like when the people threw the inability to live on his own back into his face.

Barry’s fingers dig painfully in his knees, and a familiar desperation starts to rise in his chest, intense enough that it nearly causes him to choke.

“Barry.” Mary says softly, worried and sad. Barry flinches when she touches his lower arm lightly but doesn’t pull back. “Nobody of us thinks of you as a freeloader. I know that you would pay me the money back if I wanted you to and you could, and so do Eddie and the others. You’re just in a situation right now where you can’t afford a lot of things, but that isn’t the same as if you were living off of others. You don’t ask for anything from anybody, and when Eddy, me, or anybody else gives you something, it is because we want to. Not because we think you can’t provide for yourself, or because you somehow force us to, but because you are a dear friend to us, and we care about you.”

His eyes are itching, and Barry squeezes them shut, annoyed at himself for getting this worked up over something that has been part of his life once more for years by now.

“I w-would p-pay y-you b-back, if I c-could…”

“I know,” Mary assures him and gives his arm a tentative squeeze. “But even if you could, you wouldn’t have to. We are friends, Barry, we look out for and take care of each other, and I know what you would do the same thing if our roles were reversed.”

She is right, Barry knows that, he doesn’t need to ask himself whether he would do the same for Mary or any of his other friends. It eases the guilt somewhat, but he can’t help but still feel awful about his inability to live on his own.

No matter how hard he works, he will still be poor. This usually doesn’t really bother him that much as he grew up this way, but he can’t help but wonder what other people see when they look at him… How Jay, Max, Bart, and Joan see him.

He can’t even get Bart a really decent present for his birthday…

“I’m s-sorry,” he utters and wipes his eyes with his free hand. Mary makes a soothing sound and starts to rub his arm, and it is hard not to give into the pain and break down then and there.

Faintly, he picks up on the pain in his lower abdomen again, something that follows him around nearly constantly nowadays, like the ache in his joints, but his attention doesn’t linger on it. Instead, he focuses on his breathing, on calming himself down while keeping in mind that he isn’t as bad off as he feels at times.
“You’re a wonderful person,” Mary tells him, and he doesn’t protest when she pulls him into a hug so that his forehead is resting on her shoulder. “You’re someone a lot of people care about, Barry. You’re a kind and good man, and you make our lives richer by just being there, please don’t underestimate how valuable that is. It doesn’t matter whether you’ve money or not. Money can’t buy character, and having someone like you as a friend is worth much more than anything with a price tag on it.”

Mary rubs his back lightly, soothingly, as she speaks, and Barry is reminded how lucky he really is as he listens to her.

He swallows, eyes still shut tightly, and whispers. “Th-thank y-you.”

Chapter End Notes

Barry does appear pretty down in the last part of this chapter, and my beta pointed out to me that it could be hard to grasp why he has such troubles dealing with his dependency on his friends’ kindness at times. It isn’t exactly because Barry is an especially proud person – though he would prefer to be able to provide for himself – but due to his experiences during his childhood and youth.

The people who took care of him (if you can call it that) after his parents vanished were not the nicest folks, and they generally didn’t want him around and let him know so. He was told a lot that he is a burden and a freeloader, and that he has to be ashamed that he is living by ‘leaching off’ of them. He never forgot that, and it is something that still haunts him to this day, even though he is a grown up and really does know better. Knowing and believing don’t always come hand in hand, though.

I only wrote a couple of lines in this one regarding Barry’s and Len’s relationship, but I really enjoyed them. It is nice to see that they actually start to display their feelings towards each other in a more open way even if it is just by simple looks. This doesn’t mean that Len isn’t still carrying a chip on his shoulder around with himself, but they are getting there… slloooowly.

Jay’s invitation is something I alluded to some time ago, and we’re finally getting there with the next chapter. I won’t lie, I’ve been looking forward to this for a while now. It shows Barry interact with people he considered his friends and family once and maybe will start to do so again in future. We also get to meet Joan, and see Bart again (yay!), both characters I love dearly in the comics. :)

I hope you guys enjoyed this chapter, and as always thanks to all of you who were kind enough to leave me feedback so far. <3

A knocking at the door cuts through the otherwise tense silence that fills the living room. It causes Barry to freeze momentarily.

For a second, Barry is certain that he is going to be sick; his hand tightens around the cup of tea he made a moment ago, as he looks over to the entrance of his apartment, not moving from his spot at the kitchen table.

Barry has been sitting there for about half an hour, since he finished getting ready for Bart’s birthday dinner, and the apprehension that followed him around for the last couple of days, suddenly intensifies tenfold.

His eyes turn to the clock above the entrance to his living room, which shows it is half past eleven and makes it pretty certain the person in front of his door has to be Max, who is exactly on time.

Something that is likewise surprising and not.

Barry knew Max would likely be punctual should he turn up, but he was uncertain whether this would really be the case or not.

It is still hard for Barry to comprehend he is invited to Bart’s birthday dinner in the first place, despite Max passing by at work a couple days ago to fix a time on which he would pass by his apartment to pick him up.

Barry rubs his clammy palms on his pants and gets up, but pauses a second when the sensation of light-headedness nearly becomes overwhelming.

Another knock follows.

“Grandpa?” Bart’s muffled voice reaches through the entrance door of Barry’s apartment, halting him once more in surprise. This feeling is accompanied with this strange but by now familiar notion of disbelief.

Bart being here should not catch him this off-guard, as he knew that the kid would likely join Max in the car to get here…
Even so, the notion that Max would let Bart follow along up here to fetch him is alarming, something that makes him feel nervous and uneasy at the same time...

Shaking the stupor off, Barry reaches for the bag with the present he got Bart and makes his way over to the door. All the while his legs feel like they would give out under him any second, and he tries to tell himself to stop being so damn apprehensive. If Max had really a problem with Barry being around Bart, he would certainly not have agreed to any of this in the first place.

Barry grabs his coat, and stops in front of the door, taking a deep breath to steady himself before he opens it.

Both Max and Bart are standing outside in the dingy floor, and the surreality of the whole situation hits Barry once more, making it difficult for him to say or react any other way to them.

Which doesn’t turn out to be necessary anyway, because Bart is suddenly on him, seemingly intend on squeezing the life out of him.

“Grandpa!” The young boy sounds utterly excited to see him, and Barry can just stand there petrified as the kid hugs him. Max is right there, and this could get him into so much trouble-

“Bart,” the other man chides Bart in an exasperated tone but meets Barry’s eyes with an amused look that quickly wanes and is replaced by a concerned one when he notices his expression.

“It’s so good to see you again,” Bart tells him, ignoring his guardian and utterly missing how tensed up Barry actually is. Thus, the boy keeps hugging him for another long moment and beams up at him when he pulls back. “And you’re coming to my birthday party! How neat is that!?”

Barry is able to get enough control over his face back that he is able to give the young boy a smile he hopes doesn’t look too forced.

“Y-y-yes,” he croaks but shoots Max a haunted look.

This shouldn’t scare him this much, Barry knows that. He didn’t do anything, he didn’t initiate the contact, but…

Barry swallows and averts his eyes, not able to meet Max’ now grim expression for longer than a couple of seconds.

“Is that for me!?” Bart asks delighted, and it takes Barry a second to realizes that he is talking about the bag with the present in his hand.

“Bart, no presents before the dinner,” Max reminds the kid sternly but doesn’t avert his eyes from Barry, a frown still in place. When he speaks, he doesn’t sound harsh or accusing, though. “Hello, Barry, it’s good to see you again.”

A strained smile appears on Barry’s face, and he can’t help but questions the honesty of this statement. Though, even if Max is only polite, he still can appreciate it. In the very least, it sets his nerves a bit at ease.

“Joan’s making burgers!” Bart blurts out, still oblivious to the awkward tension between both grown-ups, and starts to bob up and down on the balls of his feet, visibly excited. “And we’re going to have cake and ice-cream!”

Barry chuckles, both amused and endeared by the kid’s behavior.
“Th-that’s g-great,” he agrees, causing Bart to beam up at him once again. Then, the boys gaze seems to drift past him, and suddenly he is gone.

Barry’s heart lurches up his throat, both because he didn’t expect Bart to display his speed this openly in a public place, and because he already knows where he went to.

“Bart!” Max sounds angry now but gives Barry an apologetic look. Then, he tells the teen to come back at once.

The notion that Bart could see his crappy apartment ashamed Barry. This is what he wanted to avoid to begin with…

“I’m just looking around,” Bart protests from his living room with a confused and annoyed frown. “I’m not touching anything.”

“It doesn’t matter,” Max tells him sternly. “You can’t just invade another person’s home without asking.”

“But it’s grandpa’s-”

“You will come back out of there this instant,” Max cuts him off, and Bart’s face falls for a second before he crosses his arms sullenly but does as he is told.

“I’m was just looking…” Bart repeats morosely but turns to Barry with an uncertain look. “I really didn’t touch anything.”

“Bart.” Max sighs. He sounds more exasperated than really angry as he proceeds, though. “You cannot simply run off like this, we’ve talked about this. And you can’t just storm into someone’s home without asking for permission fist. Even if it’s your grandfather’s.”

It is still an odd experience to be called someone’s grandfather, especially by the other man. Barry has grown somewhat accustomed for Bart to do so by now, but hearing Max using this term for him is different.

Time travelling is something he’s never going to get used to…

“I was just curious,” Bart points out in a subdued tone and frowns down at the ground in front of his feet. “I’m sorry.”

“It’s alr-right,” Barry tells him and meets his eyes with a small but fond smile. “B-but M-Max is r-right. Th-the n-next t-time y-you w-want t-to s-see s-someone’s h-home, y-you’ve t-to ask f-first, ok-kay?”

“Sure!” Bart agrees readily, clearly relieved that Barry isn’t angry at him.

They proceed down to Max’ car after Barry locked his apartment, and while the uneasy nervousness keeps sticking to him, it decreases a bit in its intensity when he realizes how honestly happy Bart seems about having him there.

The drive also turns out to be much less of an awkward situation than Barry feared it would be as Bart keeps telling him all about the presents he got for his birthday so far. He listens attentively, and the child seems to enjoy all the attention he gets from him which in turn is a really nice experience for him.

The traffic is moderate today, a bit busy for a late Sunday afternoon but not badly so, and the drive to the Garrick’s home takes hardly more than twenty minutes, which turns out to be a good thing, as Bart seems to become stir-crazy towards the end and starts to fidget enough that Barry is certain it has to be physically painful for the kid to keep still any longer.

It is quite the opposite for him. If Barry could, he would have prolonged the drive. The notion of meeting Joan again is an odd mixture of hopeful and upsetting as he misses the older woman who was never anything but kind to him, and he was lucky enough to never experience her reaction to his alleged crimes. A part of him would prefer to keep it that way. He doesn’t want to see accusation or disgust in her eyes when they finally meet again, and while he tries to convince himself that Jay wouldn’t have invited him in the first place if Joan had been against it, the voice of doubt is still strong in his own mind.

Like Jay, Joan was someone he held very dear… still does, even with everything that happened, and it is outright upsetting to think that she could see him as someone who is able to commit these horrible crimes.

He still remembers how tense his last visit to the old couple was just a few days prior to Iris’ death… Jay seemed oddly distant, nearly harsh, and Joan just looked saddened…

Barry never asked Jay what this was about, whether the other man and the rest of the heroes had some suspicion about him back then already, or whether it was for another reason.

The months that lead up to Iris’ death and his imprisonment are a time he doesn’t like to think back to, and even when he does, it is oddly difficult for him to remember. There are mostly bits and pieces, moments of confrontations, of hostility towards him, of alienation, and remembering it only hurts.

“Barry?”

Barry jumps slightly, and he turns to Max, who is watching him once again with a concerned frown. Before the other man can open his mouth to proceed, Bart sticks his head between the front seats of the car and grins at Barry widely.

“We’re here!” the boy tells him excitedly, and Barry feels his stomach drop when he turns to the window and realizes that they’ve indeed arrived in front of the Garricks’ home.

A feeling of nostalgia overcomes him when he sees the familiar looking house again, and he notices that it has hardly changed since he visited the last time.

Barry can make out that it has a new paint job, that the rose bushes on the front lawn were replaced by tulips, and that the walkway leading up to the entrance has also been renewed some time ago, but even so it still looks pretty much the same to him.

The car door behind him is opened, and he hears Bart’s excited voice. “Come, grandpa! I’m sure Joan has the burgers already done by now!”

The boy runs up halfway to the entrance door, stops, and turns around to them to tells them again to hurry up.

Even despite the apprehension that settled over him, Barry can’t help but smile, as he watches Bart’s excited behavior.

“It means a lot to him that you’re coming.” Barry turns back to Max in surprise, who meets his look with a calm and earnest expression. “He keeps asking about you.”
A flash of panic runs through his body, and Barry freezes up in response to these words. The car suddenly seems much too small, stuffy, like a cage, and the other man’s presence becomes nearly oppressive, frighteningly so.

“I-I’m s-sorry,” he utters, not sure what else to offer. He knows that Bart seem to be fond of him, probably partly due to them being related in this other reality of his, and partly due to some wrongly placed hero worshipping, and he is also very much aware of how suspicious it has to look to the others-

“I’m not accusing you of anything.” Max’s voice cuts through the mess of fear and dread that is settling over him, and when Barry focuses back on the other man, he notices the concern in his eyes.

Concern and grimness.

“I just want to thank you for coming,” Max goes on. “Bart has been really looking forward to seeing you today.”

Barry shifts nervously and averts his gaze to his lap. He feels very vulnerable all of a sudden, and while he wants to get out of the car, he can’t bring himself to move.

A tense silence follows, and-“Hey!” Barry flinches when Bart suddenly appears seemingly out of nowhere next to him, frowning at them through the side window of the car. “What is keeping you so long? We’re going to have burgers!” He says the last part with such emphasis that Barry burst out chuckling, despite how tense and slightly frightened he feels. It sounds too loud and nervous, causing his cheeks to grow hot, and he doesn’t glance back to Max as he finally undoes his belt or when he gets out of the car.

He just needs some fresh air, and more space around himself. can’t bring

“S-sorry f-for l-letting y-you w-wait,” he tells Bart, who is eying him now a bit worriedly as he seems to have picked up that something is awry. Barry doesn’t give Bart the opportunity to asks him about it, though, as he quickly proceeds. “Y-you th-think J-Joan m-made f-fries t-to th-the b-burgers?”

Bart’s face lightens up again at that, and he grins excitedly. “Of course, loads and loads of them! She knows I love her fries! And we also have onion rings! And Mozzarella sticks!”

“R-really?” Barry asks, feeling already a bit better, even though he still can’t look back to Max. “Y-you l-like M-Mozzarella s-sticks?”

“Uhu.” Bart nods in agreement and starts to usher Barry towards the door while going on about how Joan’s Mozzarella sticks are even better than her fries.

The apprehension that settles into the pit of his stomach the closer the come the door makes Barry want to balk, to turn around and just leave before he could get in trouble again.

This is a stupid idea, what is he doing?

They think he is a horrendous person, a murderer, a rapist, and even if this should start out alright, Barry knows himself, he knows his life, and he knows that this only would end up with him feeling miserable at best, or back in prison at worst.

The idea of having to go back to Iron Heights nearly makes him sick, and this time he does stop, but he realizes just a second later that they’ve already arrived in front of the entrance as it is.
Bart rings the bell and shoots him a grin that quickly dies away when the kid seems to pick up on his expression.

Barry forces a smile onto his lips, unwilling to worry Bart even though he feels trapped, like a mouse in a corner with the only way out blocked by a cat.

The door opens a moment later, and Jay appears in front of them. The warm expression on the older man’s face doesn’t wane, but he too seems to immediately pick up on Barry’s apprehension as he studies him for a second. Then, he turns to Bart and smiles. “You’re just on time, Joan just finished up.”

The boy’s expression briefly turns excited again, then he recalls that Barry doesn’t seem to feel alright as he looks back to him in concern. “Are you okay, grandpa?”

“Y-yes,” Barry lies, giving Bart a warm smile and hopes it doesn’t look too fake. “J-just a l-little b-bit h-hungry.”

That seems the right thing to say as the worry leaves Bart’s face again and is replaced by an understanding expression instead. “I know what you mean,” the kid tells him empathetically.

“Maybe you want to go inside and see whether Joan lets you have one of the Mozzarella sticks as a snack before the meal starts?” Max suggests as he joins them, and it is really no surprise to anybody when Bart looks quite excited by that suggestion and quickly proceeds to do just that.

Jay lets the boy pass with a fond expression that quickly morphs into a concerned one, once he turns back to Barry.

“Hello, Barry,” he greets him and steps back to let Max and him in.

“H-hello,” Barry replies, voice craggy and faint, making him flush when he realizes how silly and nervous he sounds. He turns his attention to his surrounding instead of meeting Jay’s gaze, and feels another pang in his chest when he notices once again how familiar everything around him looks.

There are changes of course, after a decade it is to be expected, but even so Barry feels nearly smothered by the nostalgia that overcomes him once more as he studies the entrance area around them.

He has been here so many times in the past, and he is flooded by memories of those visits, of being invited over to dinner with Iris and Wally, or just passing by on a whim for coffee and a chat…

It hits him out of nowhere how much he missed this, which is stupid, because it is just a house, but he knows that this isn’t really true. With Jay’s and Joan’s home he connects some of the nicest memories he has, of a time during which he was happy.

His fingers feel a bit numb as he undoes his coat, and he doesn’t dare to look back to the other men whose eyes he can still feel on himself.

“I’m glad you were able to make it.” Jay sounds sincerely as he says this.

“Y-yes,” Barry agrees, and shoots him a brief look, shifting nervously with his coat now in his hands. “Th-thanks f-for h-having m-me.”

It is probably one of the most awkward moments they’ve ever had between them, and Barry has no idea how he’ll be able to eat just a bite with how anxious he is right now.
Then, he hears someone appear at the doorway that leads from the entrance area to a small hallway, and his heart nearly leaps up his throat as he knows who it is without needing to look.

“Barry?” Joan asks, and Barry feels ridiculously apprehensive as he turns to the older woman who meets his eyes warmly. It catches him off-guard how honestly pleased she seems about seeing him, and he watches her with a dumbfounded and wary expression as she steps closer to him, stopping just an arm’s length away.

There, she seems suddenly uncertain how to proceed, and the warmth in her eyes is joined by concern, probably because of how tensed up and pale he looks.

“Hello, Barry,” she finally says again, and while she gives him another kind smile, a rather doleful expression settles over her face. “It is good to see you.”

His throat suddenly feels raw and too tight, and Barry just inclines his head in agreement as he tries to keep his emotions in check. Joan sounded like she really means it, and it eases some of the worry in his chest away, but replaces it with confusion at the same time.

She looks just like a decade ago, hardly any older than sixty, even though she is in her mid-eighties by now. Something she can thank the speed force for undoubtedly, as prolonged life is an additional bonus to any spouse of a speedster… but it is nearly uncanny right now. To Barry, it seems like no time has passed since the last time he saw her, certainly not like a decade lays between their last meeting and now.

Another pair of footsteps reaches them from the hallway, and Bart appears at the doorway a second later, munching away on a Mozzarella stick while two more are in his other hand.

“You guys are coming?” he asks a bit exasperated. “I’m starving.”

Barry smiles at that, both amused about the kid’s antics and relieved that the stifling uneasiness that settled over them seems to dissipate once again, making it easier for him to breathe.

“You certainly look like it,” Max replies drily, which causes Joan to chuckle even though she then assures Bart that they would eat soon. When she turns back to Barry, her eyes seem to brim with warmth one more even though some of the sadness still lingers in them.

“I hope you brought an appetite with you,” she tells him. “Bart was quite insisting in what he wanted to have for dinner, and you can imagine what the meal wish-list of a growing speedster looks like.”

“Y-yeah,” he agrees with a chuckle and tries not to show how confused he still is by her welcoming demeanor towards him.

Jay takes his coat, and Barry tenses up again. He doesn’t protest, though, and instead lets him as he chooses to follow Joan to the dining room.

The dining table is already set and clearly new, as are the set of chairs, but he notices that the rest of the room looks pretty much the same as before when he lets his gaze briefly move around.

“Take a seat, Barry, and feel free to grab whatever you want to drink,” Joan tells him kindly and turns to her husband. “Jay, could you help me with the food.”

“Of course, dear,” Jay agrees readily, and Joan and he are gone just a moment later, leaving Max, Barry, and Bart behind.

“Come,” Bart says and grabs his hand. Barry freezes again for another second while the boy tries to get him to move along. “I’ll show you where to sit.”

Barry’s eyes dart over to where Max stands, and he suddenly feels like a deer in headlights.

To his relief, Max doesn’t seem alarmed or angry but explains calmly. “Bart insisted on you being sat next to him—”

“It’s my birthday dinner,” Bart cuts him off, frowning at his guardian but then turns to Barry with pleading eyes. “You want to sit next to me, right, grandpa?”

Barry swallows nervously, still very much aware of Bart’s hand holding his, and darts another brief, apprehensive look over to Max, trying to judge his reaction as he nods. “S-sure.”

“Ha!” The boy grins in triumph and turns back to Max, smirking. “You see, I told you he wants to sit next to me.”

That said, Bart proceeds to lead him to the table, showing him his seat, and takes his own next to him, beaming once again as if it was the greatest thing ever to have Barry around.

It is quite touching, and Barry returns the kid’s smile with one of his own, one that is much more honest and comes much easier to him this time.

“You want coke?” Bart asks him as he fills his glass with the soda he just grabbed.

“Y-yes.”

“What’s your favorite soda?” the kid asks curiously as he proceed to fill Barry’s glass next.

Barry smiles, being reminded of the time Bart passed by at his work which was also the first time they really had any possibility to get to know each other a little bit.

He considers the question for a second and replies. “R-root beer.”

“Really?” Bart seems surprised. Then he grins. “I like root beer too!” He looks to Max for validation.

“Right, Max?”

The older speedster nods, obviously amused by his charge’s behavior. “Indeed.”

“What about Mountain Dew?” Bart wants to know next, all his attention back on Barry.

“I-it’s a b-bit t-too s-sweet f-for m-my t-taste.”

“Really?” The kid eyes him like he just told him that the moon is made of cheese. “But it’s Mountain Dew…”

“I t-take it, y-you l-l-like it?” he inquires amused and isn’t in the least bit surprised when Bart agrees immediately. “Of course, it’s Mountain Dew.”

Well, it seems that Barry now knows his grandson’s favorite soda as well.

It doesn’t take long for Jay and Joan to return with the burgers and side dishes, and as the former returns to the kitchen once more to grab the rest, it suddenly occurs to Barry, that the older man could have used his speed force to do so. In all actuality, Jay could have gotten all the food out in the blink of an eye if he wanted to, it is something he always tended to do when Barry, Iris, and Wally were over for dinner. Joan cooked and Jay set the table and did the rest.
The older speedster never shied away from using his powers around them…

Barry is no longer a speedster, though. He is no longer family… or even just a friend.

It is not a realization, not something he didn’t already know, but it still hurts, and he can fault nobody but himself for it, because he should really know better by now.

… and maybe he is just thinking too much into it. Maybe Jay just preferred to help Joan without his speed today. The world is not rotating around him, after all.

Barry notices Joan’s look, then. The sombre expression that overcame her face as she watches him, and he is pretty sure that she probably picked up on his mood. She has always been really good at that. Jay found an incredibly strong and kind wife in her.

“Look at all that food!” Bart awed voice causes Barry to shift his attention to him, and he notices amused that the boy actually started to vibrate slightly, obviously excited by the prospect of being able to eat soon.

When he turns back to the table, he has to agree that the amount of food is quite impressive, but he still remembers all too well how much speedster can eat, especially growing ones. Still, the burgers turned out big enough that he is certain he won’t be able to eat even one, let alone together with any of the numerous side dishes that come along with them.

“It looks delicious, Joan,” Max says after Joan and Jay took their seat as well.

“Thank you,” she tells him with a pleased smile and gives her husband a fond look. “Jay did help me quite a lot, though, so half of your praise belongs to him.”

“I just peeled the potatoes and cut the onions,” Jay points out with a chuckle and reaches for his wife’s hand, giving it a brief squeeze. “You outdid yourself once again, my dear.”

“It is Bart’s birthday,” Joan points out and turns to the young boy in question with a warm look. “And you only get twelve once, isn’t that true, Bart?”

“Right,” the kid agrees readily, grinning from ear to ear. “And I’m also super sure that it will taste awesome!”

Barry watches them quietly, feeling a bit out of place, but is glad to see that Bart is clearly happy and enjoys to be here. He was a bit worried about the boy when Jay told him about the troubles he has with Wally, but it seems that he is doing okay all in all.

They start their meal, and, for once, Bart isn’t chided for eating to quickly as it is his birthday dinner. Even so, he begins to slow down after what must have been his fifth burger, and takes the time to tell Joan how great the food is.

Barry has to agree, it tastes wonderful, and he can’t believe that he really forgot how good Joan’s cooking is. He eats slowly, more nibbling than anything else because his stomach is still a bit queasy due to his nerves, but even so he can savor the flavor.

To his relief, they don’t seem to expect him to partake in the conversation after both Jay and Joan tried to talk to him a bit and it became obvious how rather ill at ease this makes him to feel. Thus, he ends up mostly listening to them, and against his worries, he is able to relax somewhat after a while.

He is currently nibbling on another fry when Bart, who just told Joan about what the console game is about he wants for his his birthday, glances towards his direction and shifts his whole attention to “You don’t like the burger?” It isn’t lost on Barry how the boy eyes his still hardly touched plate critically. To him it probably looks like he doesn’t enjoy the food all that much.

“I do,” he assures him. “It’s really good.”

His words don’t seem to convince Bart as the boy keeps eying his plate with a frown. He then glances up to him again, looking uncertain before he turns with a help seeking look to Max, as if to ask for his guardian’s aid.

The others’ attentions are on him again, and Barry can feel their eyes on himself, triggering him to tense up in response.

“You can have something else if you don’t like it,” Joan tells him kindly, and he glances at her with an unhappy frown. He averts his gaze again, shaking his head. “No, it’s really not necessary.”

It probably isn’t lost on her that he lost quite some weight since the last time they’ve seen each other, and Barry can’t help it but feels rather self-conscious all of a sudden.

An uneasy silence settles between them, and, just like that, his appetite is utterly gone. It is frustrating, he didn’t eat anything for lunch today so he would be able to each more, because he knows he would stick out like a sour thumb next to the three speedsters, even with Joan around…

“It’s okay, grandpa,” Bart assures him out of the blue. Barry looks over to the child, who is studying him with a concerned look. “There are enough burgers that you can take some home with you, if you aren’t hungry now.” Bart assures him before he then turns to Joan. “Right?”

“Of course,” the older woman agrees with an affectionate smile. She turns to Barry, her expression gentle as she points out. “You don’t have to feel like you’ve to eat if you’re not hungry, Barry. I can get you a cup of tea instead if you want.”

“N-no,” he declines quickly and wonders whether he is looking as sick as he feels. He doesn’t want to cause Joan or anybody present any extra trouble because of his easily upset stomach. “I-I’m good.”

“Do you want paprika instead?” Bart asks and Barry is not the only one who gives the boy a surprised look at that.

“He likes paprika,” Bart explains and clearly tries not to make a disgusted face as he does so which amuses Barry despite the discomfort he is feeling right then.

“Really?” Joan asks, both amused and honestly curious.

“Yes,” Bart agrees gravely, as if this was a serious matter to discuss. “And carrots. He traded them against a bag of peanut butter cookies when I…” There the kid hesitates and suddenly looks a bit ill at ease, guilty nearly, as he glances to Max. “Uhhh… when I visited him.”

“He bought you a bag of peanut butter cookies?” Max aches an eyebrow at that, and Barry feels a familiar fear rise in him, suddenly worried that the older man could misunderstand it and think…

Max doesn’t look concerned, though, nor upset.

“Yes,” Bart agrees. “So that I’d eat the vegies-” At that the boy shudders visibly in a display of open disgust. “You packed me.” The disgust is replaced by a reproachful look he aims at his guardian, as he seems to still not be any happier about the greens he got for lunch back then.

It surprises Barry a bit that Max didn’t know about this, but, then again, he doubts that the older man really asked about that kind of stuff after he returned home with the boy.

“So,” Joan starts, laughter in her eyes. “He got you cookies for eating your vegetables, but he was nice enough to still eat the paprika and carrots for you?”

“No,” Bart argues with a frown. “The carrots were his and…” A slightly guilty expression comes over the boy’s face as he briefly glances at Barry. “Well, he said he does like paprika…”

“That was very kind of him, wasn’t it?” Joan asks, shooting Barry an amused look.

“He’s awesome,” Bart agrees wholeheartedly, catching Barry off-guard by how heartfelt he sounds.

His surprise is quickly replaced by another bout of apprehension as he glances at the others. He doubts that anybody would like for the kid to see him in such a light, considering what they think he is.

“I shared the cookies with him, though,” Bart adds, clearly unaware of Barry’s worries as he shoots him a wide grin. “He likes peanut butter as well!”

“Yes,” Joan agrees, and it isn’t lost on Barry that her smile looks a bit somberly now.

“We should have gotten peanut butter cookies as well,” Bart laments and takes another bite of what is his seventh burger as he turns to Barry. “Maybe you’d like them better than the burgers?”

Barry gives him a small smile, feeling somewhat unsettled by the mood and how the hostility he expected is utterly lacking from this dinner. “C-cookies aren’t s-someth-thing y-you sh-should e-eat as a m-main d-dish,” he points out rather lamely, not really sure what else to say, and picks up one of his fries. “A-and I l-like th-the f-f-food.”

“Maybe we could make peanut butter cookie burgers the next time?” Bart suggests, and Barry chuckles, both amused and a bit disgusted by the idea. He gives Bart a fond look. “M-maybe.”

The conversation turns back to other topics, mostly related to some of Bart’s most favorite video games, and the boy proceeds to tell him all about them, for which Barry is grateful, as it turns the others’ attention away from him again. At least for the most part.

Barry is able to eat more than half of his burger and fries despite how queasy his stomach feels, and he is glad that nobody comments on it when they are finally done with the food and he is the only one who wasn’t able to finish his plate.

Max helps Jay and Joan to clean the table, while Barry’s offer to help is declined much to Bart’s delight as the kid uses the opportunity to tell him more about the latest racer game he seems to be in love with judging by how he is gushing over it.

It makes Barry nervous when he notices that the others briefly leave him alone with Bart, and he feels the urge to get up and get some additional distance between himself and the boy when he realizes how close they actually are sitting.

Jay, who is the first to return with a plate of cupcakes, doesn’t seem worried, though, and doesn’t comment on how anxious and guilty Barry has to be looking right then.
Thankfully, Bart is oblivious to any of this, and instead focuses his attention on the sweets, even though he isn’t allowed to grab one just yet.

“You want coffee?” Jay asks Barry, sounding calm and friendly. “Or tea?”

“T-t-tea,” Barry stammers, sliding a bit away from Bart, unable to meet the other man’s eyes.

To his relief, Max returns to the dining room before Jay leaves it once more, a plate with a number of nicely decorated iced cookies and something that looks like marshmallow squares with little green, squared faces on them in hand. At the sight of the last, funny looking treat, Bart actually begins cheer in delight.

Jay and Joan rejoin them just a minute later again, she’s holding a tray with drinks and him one with a really delicious looking layered chocolate cake with white frosting on top.

Bart is fidgeting next to Barry, clearly excited about the prospect of eating all these sweets, and gives him a huge grin when he notices his look. “This is going to taste awesome!”

Barry smiles and agrees, not doubting the truth of that statement.

“First, though,” the kid says nearly reverently when the cake and drinks are put down. “Presents.”

“Who said anything about anymore presents?” Max asks with a fake frown. “Isn’t all that food enough for you?”

“Indeed,” Jay agrees, hardly able keep his face straight as Bart shoots them an alarmed look. “I think the lovely meal is present enough—”

“Nooo!” Bart seems honestly indignant for a second and turns to Joan with a pleading look. “Tell them that that’s not true! You have to get food and presents on your birthday! That’s a rule! Tim and the others told me so!”

“Really?” Max studies the young speedster with feign thoughtfulness. “I’ve never heard of that rule.”

Bart eyes him suspiciously and looks over to Jay to do the same. Then, he turns to Barry with a frown and sullenly crosses his arms in front of his chest as he grumbles. “They always make fun of me.”

Both Max and Jay laugh at that while Joan chuckles, and also Barry can’t stop an amused smile from spreading over his lips.

“You two are supposed to be a role model for Bart,” Joan chides Jay and Max good-naturedly.

“Yes,” Bart agrees quickly, glaring daggers at the two older speedster. “You’re not supposed to be mean to me, especially when it’s my birthday party.”

“Now, now, Bart,” Jay chuckles. “We didn’t mean to be mean.”

“And I think you’ll forgive us after you’ve gotten your presents,” Max adds, and, as if on a cue, Bart starts to fidget in excitement once again.

“Presents!” the boy cheers, and grins widely at as he begins to bob on the chair in anticipation.

It is amusing to see such a small bundle of energy, and Barry is briefly reminded of Wally and how similar the otherwise shy boy behaved when it was his birthday…
The memory is pushed back into the depth of his mind, and Barry forces himself to keep his attention on Bart instead. He tries not to notice how a slight pain blooms in his chest when he watches the kid now, or how a familiar guilt nestles back into his guts.

They sing Bart Happy Birthday, the candles on the cake lit up and waiting for the boy to blow them out, before he gets his presents, and Barry doesn’t miss how honestly awed and elated the boy seems about this, enough so that he wonders whether they ever celebrated his birthday in the time he came from.

It is not the first time that Barry wondered about Bart’s upbringing as it is hard for him to understand how anybody could let their child travel back in time alone. He doesn’t really know anything about the kid’s past and the circumstances under which he came here, and he never asked as his intention for it could easily be misunderstood.

Singing, contrary to talking, decreases his stammer quite a lot, but even so Barry keeps his voice down, and tries to concentrate on Bart’s excitement as the kid waits to be allowed to blow out the candles so that he could finally receive his gifts.

Barry’s present for Bart, along with the other ones, is resting at the end of the table next to him and Max who is sitting across from him. There are two big boxes that are neatly wrapped in colorful birthday paper, along with three smaller ones, of which one is from him.

Bart beams as he gets an applause for blowing out all the candles at once and happily accepts the first present that is handed to him by Max.

It is one of the big ones, and Bart hardly got a grip on it when the paper is already gone and he makes an excited noise as he holds a box in his hands that show one of these steering wheels that are used for driving games.

“Thank you, Max!” Bart is clearly delighted over the present, and Max seems quite pleased with the reaction.

The next one is from Jay and Joan, the second big present, and Bart seems just as excited about this one as he was with Max’.

It is a chemistry set for kids, and Barry feels immensely relieved when the boy seems just a taken by it as he was by the racing wheel. Barry got him something similar in kind, and his worry that Bart could not like it ceases a bit, even though his present was much cheaper than the chemistry set.

The next two smaller presents contain a racing game from Max that nicely goes along with the steering wheel he got, and an animated adventure movie Jay and Joan got him, which once again is met with much appreciation by the preteen.

Then, it is Barry’s turn, he feels a familiar mix of nervousness and embarrassment rise in him as he picks up the present he got for Bart.

“I-it’s r-really n-not m-much,” he tells the kid and hopes he wouldn’t be disappointed by the gift or, at least, not too disappointed.

Bart accepts the wrapped gift with shining eyes, clearly excited about it without even having unwrapped it yet, and Barry’s fondness for the kid only grow as he watches in surprise how he unwraps the gift with much more care than he did with the other ones.

Again, guilt over not having been able to get him anything better hits Barry, and he regrets not having asked Len or Eddy for money so that he could have gotten the kid something really nice instead of the chemistry book for children he finally settled on.

“I-I c-can g-get y-you s-someth-thing e-els-se i-if y-you d-don’t l-like it,” he offers quickly, but to his surprise, Bart grins like crazy when he finally finished unwrapping his gift.

“How cool! Thanks grandpa!” The boy exclaims before he is suddenly hugging Barry with enough vigor that he seems hellbent on breaking his ribs. “I love it!”

The relief that his present is well-received is mostly drowned by the panic about his current position, and Barry shoots Jay and Max a slightly horrified look. He knows they’ve seen that he didn’t initiate the contact, but he knows that it doesn’t matter if his parole officer should learn of it.

Thankfully, Bart pulls back just a moment later, still visibly excited. “I love chemistry! I’m going to be a criminal investigator like you one day!”

This piece of information catches Barry quite off-guard, and he isn’t sure how to respond. He doubts it would be good for the kid to try and be anything like him, and it doesn’t sit well with him that he would want to do so in the first place.

“Jay promised me to do some experiments with me,” Bart goes on happily and turns to the man in question, showing him the book he just got. “Now we can do even more!”

“That’s great,” Jay agrees, but Barry doesn’t miss how tight his expression seems. His stomach sinks in response as he worries that the older man is upset with him for letting Bart this close to him.

“What if Barry join us?” Bart inquires and gives Jay a pleading look. “I’m sure he’d like it, he is super smart as well, and he could help us.”

“B-Bart,” Barry starts, feeling increasingly alarmed but unsure how to tell the boy that he can’t do so, and that Jay would certainly be less than thrilled to have him around to do some chemistry experiments.

“Bart,” Joan speaks up, her tone gentle. “We can talk about this later, okay, dear?”

Bart falls quiet then, and for a second he seems upset, like he is about to protest, but instead he turns his look to the book he is still holding in his hands and nods with an unhappy and sullen expression. Barry is pretty sure he is missing something there, and when he glances over to the other grownups, he notices that neither of them look particularly happy either.

It occurs to him then, judging by how highly the young boy seems to think of him, that this was probably not the first time that he asked about Barry to join them for some activity.

The notion is unexpectedly warming but also painful at the same time, and he doesn’t feel like cake anymore, or like being here in the first place.

He is an intruder, no matter how welcoming Jay and the others try to be, he will always be just that. He has no place here anymore. He didn’t have for nearly a decade now…

“I think it’s time for the cake,” Joan says, and Barry is surprised when Bart only mumbles his agreement, a stark contrast to his earlier excitement.

“Y-you l-like ch-chocol-late c-cake?” he asks, hoping to coax Bart’s good mood back out.

Bart nods somewhat reluctantly, eyes still on the book Barry got him and he hasn’t put away so far.
“M-me t-too.” He smiles when Bart glances at him. “B-but c-can y-you g-guess wh-what m-my f-favorite c-cake is?”

Bart seems to consider this for a moment before his expression lightens, and he grins. “Paprika cake?”

Barry snorts and makes a face. “R-really? Y-you b-blow m-my l-like l-for p-paprika w-way out of p-prop-portions.”

The boy snickers. “You said you like paprika.”

“Y-yes, b-but n-not on m-my c-cake,” Barry replies drily which causes Bart to laugh outright. “Or m-maybe I sh-should ask J-Joan t-to m-make y-you a p-paprik-ka c-cake f-for y-your n-next b-birthday, it s-sounds h-healthy-”

“No way!” the boy protests loudly but is still grinning and turns to Joan. “Don’t listen to him ever about my birthday cakes, okay?”

“I would never,” Joan agrees, laughter in her eyes, and she shoots Barry a grateful look that catches him by surprise.

“There are vegetable cakes,” Max joins in thoughtfully. “I’ve seen some on Pinterest. I think the broccoli one was the nicest-”

“No! No vegetable cakes! That’s just…” Bart makes a face as if he was tasting something particularly nasty and shudders. “Just no.”

“You started it,” Jay points out, audibly amused, and smiles when Bart huffs in frustration in response.

“There will never be a vegetable cake on my birthday,” the boy declares firmly, glaring at all of them menacingly. “Never.”

“Right,” Max agrees easily. “Now that the ban of any vegetable cakes is established, what do you think of having some of Joan’s chocolate cake instead?”

Bart likes this suggestion, and no five minutes later, they all have a piece of chocolate cake with white frosting on their plates that turns out just as good as it looks.

Barry, who has thankfully been handed a smaller piece than the rest by Jay, is able to eat all of it even though he feels uncomfortably stuffed after it and declines a second helping when Bart asks him about it.

The mood turns much more relaxed again, and Barry even ends up taking part in the conversation for a while when Jay and Bart start to talk about how chemistry can also be found in anything, even something as mundane as cake.

It is after most of the desserts on the table vanished, which was a task that was mostly accomplished by Bart alone, that Barry begins to get rather drowsy.

“Would you like to lay down for a bit in the guest room, Barry?” Joan asks out of the blue, startling Barry slightly as he turns to her in surprise. It takes him a moment to really grasp what she is talking about, and when he does a familiar unease replaces the comfortable drowsiness that settled over him.

“No, th-thanks,” he declines and gives a rather forced smile. “I’m g-good.”
Falling asleep anywhere else but inside his own four walls is something that is generally not really appealing to him, and the Rogues’ hideouts are about the only exception, and then really just when Len is around.

“I think it’s about time to leave, anyway,” Max speaks up, and meets his worried gaze with a smile as he inclines his head towards Bart. It is then that Barry noticed that Bart looks close to nodding off as well, probably due to all the food he just ingested.

Barry tries to offer to help Joan with clearing the table, wishing to repay her somehow for the good food and general kind attitude towards him, but she declines amused. “You don’t need to worry, Barry, with Jay around it won’t be any trouble at all for me.”

She has a point there, and feels a bit stupid then for bothering to offer in the first place, but she thanks him nonetheless.

Bart is as good as asleep on his feet when they finally leave the Garricks’ home, and only murmurs his goodbyes to the nice older couple before Max stirs him back towards the car. Barry stays behind a moment longer.

“Th-thank y-you,” he says to both Joan and Jay, and while he really means it, as it has been a nice afternoon and evening despite his initial worries, he still feels somewhat nervous. He has troubles meeting their eyes as he proceeds. “It w-was a l-lovely d-dinner.”

“Thank you for coming, Barry,” Joan replies, voice gentle and sad, and Barry suddenly feels the urge to just turn around and leave.

He hates the notion how much he hurt the people that were once a part of his life, no matter whether he did actually commit the crimes or not. In the end he is still be the reason for their pain.

“It was really nice to have you over again,” Joan goes on, and Barry presses his lips together tightly, eyes itching all of a sudden, as he nods.

This had been part of his everyday life once…

It hurts to realize all over again what he really lost back then. He utters another broken thanks and goodbye and turns around to swiftly makes his way over to where Max and Bart are already waiting for him.

The air inside the car is hardly warmer than outside in the early October night, and he shudders as he pulls the door close after himself.

Max studies him briefly after Barry put his belt on. Thankfully, he doesn’t say anything but starts the car instead, allowing Barry to keep his attention on the street in front of them.

The drive to his apartment passes by in silence other than for the faint radio music in the background as Bart dozes off shortly after they left.

Barry watches the streets of Keystone pass by, feeling mostly just tired, and he is grateful that Max leaves him be even though he can feel the other man’s gaze on him every once in a while.

The drive back to his apartment takes less time than before as the traffic is rather sparse at this hour on a Sunday, but Barry still feels bone tired when they finally arrive in front of his apartment building.

The interior lights turn on when Max turns off the car, and Barry gives him a faint, weary smile. “Th-thanks f-for p-picking m-me up a-and…” He shrugs, not really sure what he wants to say. He mostly just wants to get inside and go to bed, and preferably sleep for the next month or so.

“Of course,” Max tells him, and there is this slight concern back to the way he watches him now that makes Barry feel somewhat uneasy again. “And thank you for agreeing to come by. It really meant a lot for Bart that you did.”

Barry’s eyes travel to the backseat where the boy is currently sleeping. “Y-yes… I… I’m g-glad I c-could sh-share t-today w-with h-him.” He turns to Max then and meets his gaze with an earnestly look. “Th-thank y-you f-for t-taking c-care of h-him.”

Max nods. “He is a good kid, and I’m glad to have him around.”

Barry smiles slightly, not doubting that Bart could be quite an enrichment to one’s life. He looks back to where the young boy hasn’t moved at all, which is nearly a bit uncanny, considering how he usually never seems able to really hold still. The fondness he feels for Bart is strong, warming, and he really wishes he could offer the kid more than just a visit every couple of months.

“C-can y-you t-tell h-him th-that I r-really enj-joyed t-talking t-to h-him t-today?” he asks quietly and turns back to Max.

“Of course,” Max agrees, and Barry thanks him in return with a small smile as he unbuckles and proceeds to get out of the car.

“Barry?”

Barry stops, and looks back to the other man. Max seems hesitant, indecisive about whether he should go on or not, but eventually he settles on a smile that is not much more convincing that Barry’s was before.

“Thanks again, and have a good night.”

Somewhat worried now, Barry only utters a quick response and proceeds in getting out of the car. He walks up the stairs to the entrance door of the building where he pauses again and turns around to watch how Max pulls back out and drives off.

He looks after the car for a while longer, till its taillights vanish around a corner far down the street, and even then he keeps standing there in the cool night air, watching nothing in particular.

He is left feeling tired and lost, but even so he doesn’t miss how the memory of the birthday party he was allowed to attend is like a warm, comforting blanket.

Barry closes his eyes for a brief moment and turns around to finally enter the building.

Chapter End Notes

Barry survived his visit at the Garricks’ home, and he didn’t end up worse off for it! Yay!

I hope you guys enjoyed this chapter, it was a blast to write, though I’m sure that, emotionally, it probably was a very mixed bag for Barry himself.
I’ve been really looking forward for a while now to introduce Joan in this story as she is Jay’s better half and also a very important person to Barry. I always loved the Garricks and their relationship in the comics, and what good people they are.

Bart is twelve now, nearly a teen, though, like in the comics, his age is a rather odd story. Barry’s observation about how Bart doesn’t seem very familiar to birthday parties has been a sharp one, and he was right. If you guys know about Bart’s initial story in the comics, you probably understand what it means. For you, who don’t know a lot about the character and his origins, he was born in the future, and suffered under hyper-accelerated metabolism, which led to him aging much more rapidly than a normal person. In all actuality, he is a little bit over four right now, but due to his rapid aging, he is closer to twelve. There is a difference in how things turned out here and in the comics in regard of when Bart was sent back and how he got rid of his metabolism problem (in the comics it was with Wally’s help), which we will discover later on. I though it’s maybe interesting to know, that the boy is quite younger than his peers, despite his looks, and that this is also the cause why he sometime doesn’t behave like other boys his apparent age.

... also, Bart loves Minecraft.

This dinner left Barry with a bunch of mixed feelings, and I really wanted to show how much the last ten years scarred him. He is in a constant state of paranoia around the people who were once his friends/family, and he wants to relax and enjoy the evening with them, but the fear of what could happen if he makes one wrong step is just omnipresent in his mind. It will take a long while for him to recover from this and be able to regain his trust for them, and while Jay and the others were aware of that before, it probably was still like a slap for them to see Barry act that wary and, at times, outright afraid around them.

The next chapter will have us visit another gallery! :D

Initially, the next two chapter were one but it got way, way too long, so I split it. I’m kind of annoyed about it, but I hope its flow doesn’t suffer for it. We also get a super-special special guest in the next one, and I’m silly excited about it. XD

Thanks again for all the lovely feedback you left me, I absolutely love to read your comments, they make my day so much brighter! <3

I’ll see you in two weeks!
At Gilbert’s Part I

Chapter Summary

Barry accompanies James to the opening of a new exhibition at Gilbert’s, one of the Twin’s classiest art gallery.

This chapter has been edited by my wonderful friend Katzerover! :) Thank you for your great work, sweetie! <3

“It sure is busy tonight,” James remarks. His words are a sudden interruption of the mellow song that is currently playing on the radio in the background and startle Barry slightly.

Their eyes meet when James glances over to him, and even though his tone was light, the concern with which his friend is studying him briefly before he turns his attention back to the street isn’t lost on him.

“Y-yes,” Barry agrees, shifting in his seat as he looks through his window, where they currently pass the very crowded looking Gilbert’s art gallery on their search for a parking spot.

It is late evening on the first Friday in October, and Barry wouldn’t initially have assumed that this many people would show up for the opening of a new exhibition, even in a prestigious gallery as Gilbert’s.

And although now he is aware of why this is the case, there are still more people crowding the area in front of the gallery than he has expected.

“I d-didn’t th-think th-that th-this m-many w-would c-come, es-specially w-with h-how b-bad th-the w-weather is,” Barry murmurs, more to himself than to James.

Seeing how busy it is just outside the building makes him uneasy, as he watches some people who are currently trying to get past the crowd and inside the gallery.

James looks at Barry with sympathy. “I think it is because of the rumor that Lex Luthor and Bruce Wayne would pass by tonight.”

A sharp pain flashes through Barry’s fingers as he clenches his fists unconsciously in response to what his friend just said.

The rumor that one of the current presidential candidates could turn up at Gilbert’s tonight has been making its rounds for a while now and had Barry nearly cancel tonight if it weren’t for James. The other man told him that he knows for sure that Luthor would in fact not turn up as he was already on his way to Gotham because of a business meeting with Wayne Enterprises. Apparently, one of James’ co-workers actually knows someone on Luthor’s payroll who works close enough with the man to know his schedule, and he debunked this rumor already a couple of weeks ago.

Luthor spent the last two days in the Gems as part of his election program. Bruce and a couple of other business men from all over the country joined him that day for lunch at the CCST. It had set Barry’s teeth on edge even though neither of them did come anywhere near the Keys.

Slowly, Barry takes a deep breath and forces himself to relax and uncurl his hands again. He tries not to show how unsettled he feels.

“I hope you don’t mind if we’ve to walk a little,” James asks and gets him out of his own mind.

Looking back out the window, Barry realizes that James spotted a place to park in one of the side streets close to the museum and is currently pulling in.

“N-no, th-that’s fine,” Barry says and tries to ignore the dread that settled into the pit of his stomach.

The air is cold when they get out of the car, a moment later. The smell of rain surrounds them, a leftover of the storm that went on earlier today, and Barry wraps his coat tighter around himself, shivering slightly.

“What a lovely weather,” James remarks drily as he shuts his car door, glancing up the dark sky that still is covered by a column of thick clouds. He grimaces. “Let’s hope it won’t rain, I was clever enough to forget my umbrella, and I don’t wanna have to walk back to the car in a downpour later on.”

“I’ve brought mine,” Barry points out, nodding to the backpack he has slung over his shoulder, and smiles. “W-we c-can sh-share.”

James chuckles. “You’re my knight in shining amour, then.” He glances up towards the clouds once more. “Still would hate for the storm to come back. This weather really sucks.” He sighs and joins Barry at the sidewalk, shooting him a morose look that is obviously not real. “I hate October.”

“Y-you d-don’t,” Barry disagrees as they start to make their way to the gallery, and even though the reluctance he feels at the thought of visiting such a crowded space isn’t exactly easing off, he still feels amused by his friend’s words. “It’s th-th-the m-month of H-Hallow-ween, and y-you’re w-worse th-than Axel w-when it c-come t-to t-trick or t-treating.”

“I’m not,” James denies, grinning. “I’m a serious grown-up man who left his time of these childish antics behind himself a long time ago.”

“Y-you asked m-me w-whether I’d l-like t-to g-go t-trick and t-treating w-with you,” Barry reminds him, glancing at his friend in amusement.

“No.” James sniffs at that, and gives Barry a clearly fake-insulted look. “I didn’t. I was just suggesting that we could join Axel when he’s going to trick or treat so that nothing happens to him.”

“R-really?” Barry arches an eyebrow. “Are y-you s-sure we’re t-talking ab-bout th-the s-same b-boy h-here?”

James actually ducks his head and cracks an embarrassed smile.

“Halloween night isn’t like it was when we were still at the age at which we could wander around in costumes without getting odd looks for it,” James says but admits. “Though Axel is probably better in staying out of that kind of trouble than I’d have been his age.”
Barry nods in agreement, knowing that James is likely right, which isn’t exactly something he is happy about. The idea that Axel still has nowhere really steady to live and nobody who really looks after him, has him very much worried, even though he knows that the boy is good at staying out of trouble for the most part.

The crowd in front of the gallery doesn’t seem to have gotten any smaller when they finally arrive at Gilbert’s, and Barry unconsciously steps closer to James as he tries not to show how uncomfortable this situation really makes him feel.

It is a bit of a relief when he picks up on the fact that most of these people are actually not going to be inside the museum, as the majority of them seems to consist of onlookers that are waiting to see whether Luthor would actually show up or not.

The thought that Luthor could be this popular with people for them to actually spend their Friday night waiting in the cold in front of an art gallery just to get a glimpse of him is quite disconcerting, especially when Barry spots a number of “Luthor for President” and “In Luthor we believe” buttons.

He tries not to think too much about it, though, not while he is in a small sea of strangers and has no real way to avoid physical contact as they make their way past them. Instead focuses on James as he follows him to the entrance, and having his friend walk in front of him, acting like a shield, helps to take some of the edge off his fear.

And Barry knows that it’s irrational, but big crowds of people are upsetting to him nonetheless. They make him feel helpless and like he expects some kind of an attack in any given second. That he keeps bumping into complete stranger as James and he make their way towards the entrance only makes it worse.

As soon as they are past the security check and inside the actual gallery, people begin to scatter, and the panic that started to take a hold of Barry beings to back off which lets breathing become easier for him.

He hardly notices it when James ushers him towards a more private spot. It is just when the other man actually touches his shoulder, that Barry really snaps out of his own mind and focuses back on him.

“Is everything alright?” James searches his face with a concerned expression, and it is obvious that he knows that something is off.

“Y-yeah.” Barry nods and is grateful when James pulls his hand back again. He meets his friend’s eyes and tries to give him a reassuring look, chuckling awkward when he goes on. “J-just… I’m n-not s-so g-good w-with c-crowds.” He fights the sudden urge to shudder, and feels his cheeks heat up in embarrassment over how badly he reacted to such a non-threatening situation.

“We can leave if this is too much for you,” James tells him earnestly, seemingly more worried about him than disappointed about the prospect of missing out on the exhibition after all.

“N-no,” Barry assures him. “I’m ok-kay.”

He really is. Or he would be in a moment or so. Situations like this are just a little overwhelming to him, and he should have told James so beforehand.

“Barry.” James studies him, unconvinced. “You can tell me when you want to leave. It’s no problem, this evening is supposed to be fun for us both, and I don’t want you to force yourself in an uncomfortable situation because you feel like you’d ruin something for me if you didn’t.”
“I’m r-really ok-kay.” Barry gives his friend a small but honest smile. “B-but I’ll t-tell y-you if it s-should ch-change.”

“Good.” James relaxes with a smile of his own. He nods towards the general direction of the gallery. “In that’s the case we’ve a night of exploration ahead of us.”

“Still more than enough time to enjoy what this place has to offer.” James grins, and Barry, feeling better again, is not about to disagree with him there.

They make their way further inside, after James got them a plan of the gallery which shows its different sections, and they decided that they’d start their tour with the exhibition on their left side that offers quite a couple of pieces from the Romantic era.

Barry’s initial unease quickly wanes off when they get to the first paintings, and he is quite excited to see that one of the Romantic pieces is Friedrich’s Wanderer above the sea of fog, a piece he really likes, and whom Gilbert’s gallery has temporary borrowed from the Kunsthalle Hamburg from Germany.

The urge to draw grabs him as he stands in front of the canvas, and he regrets that he didn’t bring something with him he could use to sketch, even though it is a silly idea, seeing that James didn’t bring him here to spend the next couple of hours in this spot.

“You like it?” James asks, looking both curious and pleased.

“Y-yes.” Barry smiles. “I’ve alw-ways l-liked th-his one, e-even b-before a-aart b-became a h-hobby of m-mine.”

“Wanderer über dem Nebelmeer,” James reads the original title from the small plate next to the art piece, and he sounds like he actually understands what he is saying which causes Barry to give him a surprised look.

Before he can ask, though, the other man already shakes his head in bemusement. “I can’t speak German, but I’ve been here a couple of times in the past, and I know one of the art historians that work for the gallery. She loves this piece and taught me how to pronounce its title correctly.” He seems to consider Barry for a moment and adds. “I really have to introduce you to her, you two would get along splendidly, and she can go on about the different artists and their works here for hours if you let her, especially this one.”

“Th-there’s p-probably a l-lot t-to s-say ab-bout th-this p-piece,” Barry points out and turns back to the popular piece of art. He lets his gaze wander over it once more. “It h-has s-someth-thing v-very s-serene t-to it.”

“It does,” James agrees.

Over the next twenty minutes they move on from painting to painting this part of the exhibition has to offer. Barry is pleasantly surprised when James seems honestly interested in what he knows about the artworks and the painters. In return, James starts to tell him more about the historical era depicted in many of the painted scenes, and Barry is surprised to learn that the other man actually minored in history.

“I’ve always been interested in the past,” James tells him as he studies one of the pieces with a fond expression. “It is where we’re all coming from and upon what we’re building our lives today.”
James turns to him, eyes warm, and Barry thinks he can understand where the man is coming from.

They move on to the part with the Neoclassicism, where they spent about as much time as they did with the one about Romanticism, and when Barry proceeds to the section that displays a mixed collection of Baroque and Rocco pieces, James departs momentarily as he got a call from work and needed to duck out for a minute.

Barry, on his own now, decides to keep close to the entrance of the big room even though James told him that he doesn’t need to slow down for him.

Judging by what his friend said before, he probably has seen the gallery as a whole a couple of times, and probably wouldn’t miss much, but Barry doesn’t like the idea of moving around amid the other visitors too much on his own, and sticks to one of Boucher’s paintings, busying himself with studying the detail of the artist’s brushwork as he keeps waiting for James to return.

He notices when someone steps up next to him a couple of minutes later, briefly thinking that it is James, but when he looks over to his side, he realizes that this isn’t the case.

The stranger, who is studying the painting with seemingly keen interest, is a bit taller than Barry, with short brown hair, and is smartly dressed in dark grey suit combined with a light blue dress shirt. The tie is missing, and he has the first two buttons of his shirt undone, giving him a sophisticated but relaxed look.

“You’ve quite a good taste.” Barry snaps out of studying the stranger, when the man suddenly addresses him, and he feels quite mortified when he realizes that he must have been staring. The stranger seems to have picked up on it as well, as he meets his eyes with a clearly bemused look. Barry’s cheeks to burn, making him probably rival a tomato in how crimson he is just then.

“S-sorry,” Barry utters and averts his eyes back to the depiction, stepping away from the other man who stopped rather close next to him. Too close for Barry’s comfort, in any case.

“No need to,” the stranger says, his voice low and warm. “And what I meant is that you’ve a good taste regarding art.” He chuckles, and it sounds like the man himself is now a little embarrassed now instead of him being amused on Barry’s costs. “I didn’t intend for it to come out like I’m full of myself.”

Barry looks at the other visitor, noticing with some relief that the stranger kept his distance. The man turns his attention back to the piece of art after he meets his wary eyes with a friendly smile.

“I’m very fond of Boucher myself,” he goes on, his eyes moving over the artwork as he studies it. “His hand for color and shading is magnificent, and he is a genius in catching very serene looking moments.”

Barry looks back to the composition as well and hums in agreement as he has a very similar opinion of the artist.

“He was v-very d-diverse art-tist,” Barry agrees quietly, lowering his voice even though he knows that this won’t make his stammer any less audible. “He inf-fluenced th-the R-Rococo s-style in n-nearly any m-medium.”

“He did,” the stranger agrees, and Barry feels his gaze upon himself but keeps his own eyes on the canvas. “I’m very impressed by people like him who are able to wield this much influence over history even though they aren’t born into power.”

Again, Barry hums, unsure how to reply to this otherwise and goes back to study Boucher’s work, feeling more at ease now that he exchanged a couple of words with the man who doesn’t seem to mean him any harm.

“You’re an artist yourself?” the stranger asks curios, and Barry turns back him, surprised as he thought their brief conversation had come to an end.

“No,” Barry shakes his head. “I like to sketch but…” He flushes and shrugs. “I’m not really that good. It’s just a hobby.”

The other man is watching him, clearly paying mind to what he is saying, but even despite how focused he seems on him, Barry doesn’t feel exactly threatened, which is very unexpected. Just being here has him far outside his comfort zone, and having another man he doesn’t know at all paying attention to him usually causes the alarm bells in his head to go off.

The man’s body language signifies him how calm and relaxed he is, though, and Barry has always been good at reading others in that way, something he learned early on as it gave him an advantage in not getting himself beaten up.

It is still hard for Barry to understand why someone here would want to start up a conversation with him, though. He is wearing his working clothes, and while he put his best pants and button down shirt on today, he knows he is probably quite a contrast compared to most of the other visitors in the opening of the new exhibition tonight.

“It’s a good hobby to pick,” the other man remarks kindly. “Very relaxing.” He looks back to the painting as he proceeds. “I tried it out as well for a short time, but I’m more of a sculpturing type of person myself.”

This catches Barry’s interest, and he turns curiously towards his temporary companion. “You sculpt?”

Barry became fond of sculpturing at a young age on a visit to the Central City’s History Museum with his class during Junior High. He is not really any good at it, though, and getting all the materials you need, are generally too expensive for it to be something he could keep up as a hobby. This still doesn’t minder his fascination with the craftsmanship.

“I try to.” The other man chuckles and actually looks a little embarrassed again. “It is quite a tricky medium to pick up.” His eyes seem to glow with excitement as he goes on. “I’m currently working on a few projects for a friend of mine. Something to help him focus, but it will probably a while till I’m done with them.” He chuckles and shrugs. “I think I’ll consider myself a man of this craft when they’re finally finished.”

For the first time, as Barry watches a very pleased expression over the other man’s face, he wonders how old the person next to him actually is. At first he thought he is about his own age, but there is something to the stranger that makes him reconsider.

“Have you ever tried sculpturing?” the man inquires, watching him attentively once more.

Barry smiles a bit uncertain. “Yes, but I think sketching is more along my forte.”

“Every person is unique when it comes to art.” His companion shrugs. “In the end it only matters that it is just another opportunity for us to express ourselves in a way we can’t do with words.” His expression becomes both softer and bemused as he proceeds. “And it also offers an outlet for our need to create and give our yearnings an actual form.”

This is quite true, even though Barry himself never looked at art from this perspective before.
Nonetheless, he can appreciate how the other man put it, expressing it in a way that feels very right to him.

“Th-this w-world is b-but a c-canvas t-to our im-magination,” Barry says quietly and feels a bit silly for quoting a poet, though it just seems fitting.

The man next to him aches an eyebrow in return but seems quite pleased by his words. “Indeed, and I completely agree with Thoreau there. We’re the painters of our own life.”

Barry feels his mood dim at these words and swallows. He turns back to Boucher’s work.

A brief silence passes between them, and he listens to the people around them move, talk about the different pieces that this section has to offer, filling the air with a buzz of enjoyment and excitement.

If it was true that every person holds the brush to draw their lives in their own hands, he has to be one of the most miserable artists there are…

The idea is both unsettling and painful-

“I’m sorry if my remark struck a nerve.” The other man sounds honest and meets Barry’s eyes with a frown. “It’s like with everything else, you shouldn’t generalize when it comes to quotes of long gone authors. Things that hold true for you doesn’t necessary have to hold true for others.”

“N-no, it’s f-fine,” Barry objects and smiles tightly. He finds himself agreeing with the stranger like before. “Y-you d-didn’t s-say anyth-thing w-wrong.”

His companion nods. “Good, because it really wasn’t my intent.” He studies Barry then for a moment, and an odd expression crosses his face, a mixture of what seems to be pity and indecisiveness as he opens his mouth-

“Hey.” James’ voice cuts the other man off as he joins them, and Barry, who is glad to see his friend again, doesn’t miss the slightly wary look he gives the stranger. He then turns to Barry. “Everything alright?”

“Y-yes,” Barry agrees. “I j-just h-had a c-convers-sation w-with…” He turns to the other man, giving him a curious look.

The stranger chuckles and provides. “Hunter Zolomon.”

Barry smiles. “N-nice t-to m-meet y-you, M-Mr. Z-Zolomon. I’m B-Barry Allen, and th-this is m-my f-friend, J-James L-Lai.”

“Nice to meet you,” James agrees, more relaxed.

“Likewise.” Hunter returns. He looks down at a rather expensive looking watch on his wrist and frowns slightly. Sighing softly, he shoots Barry an apologetic look. “It seems I’ve to bid my farewell already, Mr. Allen. I’m not really supposed to be here, you know, I actually need to catch up with an acquaintance of mine, and the man is really hard to get a hold of if you mess your timing up.”

“Of c-cOURSE.” Barry nods in understanding, though he finds the way the other man formulated the last part a bit funny. “It w-was n-nice t-to t-talk t-to you.”

“The pleasure was all mine. I hope you’ve an enjoyable evening.” Hunter smiles and turns to James. “Mr. Lai.”
“Mr. Zolomon,” James replies unusually curtly, surprising Barry.

Hunter leaves then, heading straight for the exit of this section, and Barry, who watched him for a moment, turns back to James with a slight frown.

“Is everyth-thing alright?” Barry asks somewhat concerned, not sure what to make of his friend’s change in mood.

To his relief, James looks more at ease again when he meets his eyes, and smiles a little sheepishly. “Sure, I just…” He purses his lips and turns back to where Hunter has vanished by now. “I don’t know. That guy…” He looks at Barry, uncertain. “Didn’t he seem a bit off to you?”

Barry frowns and also turns towards where the other man went. He can’t say he got that vibe off the man, not at all.

There was something oddly familiar to him in a way, maybe even something reassuring…

It is strange, Barry shifts uneasily as he realizes that he felt comfortable around the man even though he knows next to nothing about him, and if James hadn’t pointed that out to him, he probably wouldn’t have picked up on it at all.

“Well,” James says, tone light once more, and he meets Barry’s concerned eyes with a reassuring look, stepping closer to him. “I’m probably being paranoid and make an ass out of myself, so don’t mind me. We’ve more important things to concentrate on now anyway.” He signs towards the painting next to them, the one Barry and Hunter studied earlier. “You explaining to me how this artist was able to infuse this much atmosphere into his work, for example.”

His friend smiles at him and Barry returns it, even though the sense of worry persists in the back of his mind.

They spend about the next two hours roaming around the gallery, visiting the different stations in the history of art, and Barry is able to relax and take his mind off that odd meeting.

After finishing about half of the section, James invites him to a late dinner in the museum’s cafeteria.

“All that walking and study the work of all these masters made me quite hungry,” James explains. “And the cafeteria here is really good, they actually are having a buffet there for the visitors tonight.”

“I’m n-not h-hungry,” Barry declines, not wanting for his friend to spend any more money on him after paying already for the tickets. He has no problem to join him while he is getting himself something to eat, though.

“You don’t have to pay anything extra for it,” James explains, obviously already aware of Barry’s line of thoughts and stirs them towards the direction of the cafeteria. “It’s included in the ticket price.”

There are additional standing tables put in the area for the visitors to eat. They’re all covered by white table clothes as well as small vases with flowers and small decoration glass bowls that hold burning candle. There are actual waiters wandering around, offering glasses of champagne to people, and classical music is playing quietly in the background.

Everything seems a little posh, and going along nicely with most of the visitors who are wearing expensive looking suits or dresses, and Barry tries not to think about how badly he must be sticking out from the rest of them. James doesn’t appear bothered by his clothes, though, and is clearly not worried about being seen with him, as he keeps close to Barry when they make their way over to one of the long buffet tables that offer a variation of delicacies.

James chooses some of the steak, mashed potatoes, green beans wrapped in bacon, and a simple green salad. Barry, on the other hand, takes some of the salmon, a fish he loves and hasn’t eaten in forever, boiled potatoes, some steamed veggies, and a small mixed salad.

Even though the cafeteria is very crowded, they don’t have any trouble to get a place, picking one of tables they can sit at.

James waves one of the waiters over as soon as they are in their seats and picks two glasses of sect for them, thanking the man, before he hands Barry one.

“I’m sure you’ll love the food, I know the company who does tonight’s catering, and their cooks are amazing,” James informs him.

“It looks delicious,” Barry agrees and tries the salmon. He nearly purrs in appreciation, closing his eyes briefly as he enjoys the wonderful taste of the fish, how it nearly seems to melt on his tongue, and decides that he has probably never eaten a better salmon filet so far in his life.

His friend chuckles and meets his eyes with a pleased expression. “I’m glad you like it.”

“It’s amazing,” he replies honestly and tries one of the potatoes that turns out to be just as perfectly done and seasoned.

As they eat, they talk about a few of James’ business trips, and his last visit to New York during which he and some of his business colleagues had quite some amusing adventures.

Barry listens attentively, enjoying his friend’s recollection of his time in the metropolis.

James is a good storyteller, knowing how to keep his tale interesting and peppering it up with a good amount of humor. He tells Barry about especially funny incident during a sightseeing tour he did with a couple of his colleagues and friends during their last night there, that ended in a dare between two of them.

“Rene is a great guy, someone completely levelheaded under normal circumstances, maybe even someone you’d call a stick in the mud at times,” James tells him, chuckling in bemusement as he seems to remember that night. “But he can’t hold his liquor at all, and John and I ended up trying to keep him from opening one of the sewer covers to get down there just so he could prove to Steve that the whole things about crocodiles in the sewage is just some urban legend.”

“You didn’t get in trouble, did you?” Barry asks after swallowing another bite, enjoying both the taste of the warm food and the other man’s story.

“No.” James shakes his head, and he seems to try not to grin as he proceeds. “But Rene was able to dislocate his right index after he sneaked off on our way back to the hotel and attempted to finally lift one of the covers. He screamed up quite the ruckus afterwards and kept cursing Steve and his damn crocodiles. The people in the hospital took it in stride, though. It seems they’ve to deal with this kind of stuff on a rather regular basis.”

Barry laughs outright at that, and immediately feels somewhat bad for it because getting anything dislocated is no fun. The notion of someone hurting himself on an endeavor to prove that there is nothing to sewage crocodiles while intoxicated is just funny in its own bizarre right, though.

They topic changes to the art book James brought back for him, and they somehow end up talking about what generally inspires Barry to sketch.
“Has drawing always been a hobby of yours?” James inquires and takes a sip of his coke.

“No.” Barry shoves some of the curry that is still left around with his spoon, eyes on the plate. “I picked it up after…” He shrugs and huffs an unhappy chuckle, his eyes fixed on the plate in front of him.

“It’s sort of something I… it’s just something that helps me relax…” Barry lifts a spoonful of curry but halts an inch from his mouth and lowers it again, shifting uneasily in his spot. “I-I liked to draw as a kid, but I stopped when I was twelve.”

His throat feels dry as he swallows, and he hates the awkward silence that settles between them.

He shouldn’t get this upset over such a simple question; he knows that he is behaving ridiculous. Nervously, Barry licks his lips and shoots James a guilty look. “Sorry, I’m…”

“There’s no reason for you to apologize.” James watches him, a slight frown on his face, but he doesn’t look annoyed or frustrated. “I didn’t realize that this could be a topic that upsets you. I’m sorry I made you feel uncomfortable.”

“No.” Barry shakes his head, the corner of his mouth dropping a bit. “It’s not your fault, I’m just…” He breaks off with a frustrated huff and unhappily glares at his plate.

“It’s okay,” James assures him and lowers his voice as he goes on. “This really isn’t the place to talk about this, and you really don’t need to worry about reacting badly to this question. I can try but I know that I’m not able to put myself into your shoes, Barry, but even so I get that this part of your life has been hard on you, and I’m not going to hold it against you if you react badly to something I say.”

Barry swallows and closes his eyes for a moment. James’ words are unexpected in their kindness, even though he knows that they really shouldn’t be as the other man is nothing but kind to him and people in general. It is still odd to him how understanding he is of all the baggage he is carrying at times, of his situation in general… of his friendship with the Rogues.

There is nothing Barry can really offer James in return for it, and it worries him at times. The gratitude he feels for his friend just then causes him to gaze back to him. “You’re a really good friend, you know that?”

James chuckles and gives him a warm smile. “So are you.”

“A-am I?” The question is over his lips before Barry can stop himself, and at James surprised expression, he elaborates. “I mean, there’s nothing I can…” He lowers his gaze. “I can’t offer you nothing in return.” He frowns unhappily and puts his spoon down, pulling his hands back so that they can rest on his thighs.

“You…” Barry licks his lips nervously and keeps his eyes on the table. “I can’t… I…” He huffs in frustration over his inability to say what he means and lowers his head enough for his chin to rest on his collarbone. “Maybe I’m not wrong but I-I… I-I… you seem to…” th-the w-way y-you l-look a-at m-me-

“Barry.” James’ voice is calm, low, and Barry stops immediately.

Another silence settles between them, and Barry can hardly hear the people around them through the throbbing of his own pulse in his ears.
“I’m sorry if I made you uncomfortable,” James finally says quietly. “I didn’t mean to.”

Barry frowns unhappily and hunches over some more, feeling very vulnerable all of a sudden. “I-I’m n-not a-angle-gry… I-I j-just c-c-can’t…”

“I know, Barry,” James agrees. “And I don’t expect you to. I don’t want to spend time with you so I can force you into some kind of relationship you won’t be comfortable with. I consider you my friend because you’re one of the kindest people I’ve ever met, someone who cares for others, even if they aren’t his responsibility, and someone I can talk to and who takes time to really listen to what I say.”

James shifts a little and leans closer to him. “I don’t know what exactly happened that lead you to be put into jail, but I know that you’re a good man, Barry, someone I can trust to look after my grandmother and her store when I’m not around. I haven’t looked your past up, and I’m not going to, this is not my place, but I’m here if you want to talk about it.”

The lump in Barry’s throat is hurting as he swallows, and he tries to concentrate on breathing, on anything but the awful pain in his chest. He thought that James knew about his past and the crimes he is supposed to have done…

“Wh-what… wh-what if I-I d-did s-someth-thing r-really h-horrible?” Barry croaks.

There is a long pause, one that weighs heavily on Barry, like a block of lead pushing down on him, before James finally responses. “I would still be here.”

The answer catches him off-guard, and he lifts his gaze to fix his friend with an incredulous but also hopeful look.

“I would have trouble to believe it,” James goes on as he meets his eyes calmly. “But people change, and if you really committed some horrible crime, you’ve clearly changed since them. I think both my grandmother and I have a good sense when it comes to people, and I doubt that we both could have been deceived by anybody for so long.”

“I-I d-didn’t…” Barry breaks off after briefly giving in to the urge to try and convince his friend of his innocence. Here really isn’t the place nor the time for it.

Not that he really wasn’t to talk about this at all.

James clearly shares this opinion, as he proceeds. “I think we should postpone this conversation till after this visit is over.” He hesitates but adds. “Except you want to leave now.”

“N-no,” Barry shakes his head and lifts a hand to brush the tears away from his eyes. “I-I’m f-fine.”

There is a brief pause in which James is probably thinking about whether it is really a good idea to stay or not, but he settles on trusting him on his word in the end.

“Oh-Okay,” James agrees quietly and adds a bit hesitantly. “I’m glad I’ve met you, Barry, and that we’ve become friends. I’m really sorry if I made you feel uncomfortable, I know you aren’t interested in anything along that line, and I will respect that. Nothing has to change if we don’t want it to. We’re both grown-ups, and we can deal with this accordingly.”

It is incredibly reassuring to hear James say so, and some of the gnawing worry starts to ease off Barry, making it easier to breath and relax.

“Th-thank y-you,” Barry utters quietly.
“Of course,” James replies warmly, but Barry doesn’t miss the sadness that resonates with the words.

They fall quiet once more, though this time it feels more comfortable, as they go back to finish their meals.

Chapter End Notes

I’m pretty sure most of you are now wondering whether Hunter is somehow connected to what is happening to Barry. Before you start to come up with theories, I can tell you that this is not the case. This Hunter comes from another earth in another universe, and the reason why he is here, is because there is a problem with the barriers of time and space, which is connected to the current state of the speed force. This is something that will come up later on again, but for now it’s not urgent enough for the JL or anybody else to have picked up on.

Hunter didn’t strand by accident on this earth, though. As he said, he needs to catch up with someone. He isn’t at the art gallery purely by accident, either, though. He did come there with the intent to meet Barry, just so he could satisfy his curiosity.

And about his ominous words regarding sculpting, he is talking about the Wally of his world as he is a Hunter from an universe that is very similar to the one in the comics.

James’ feelings for Barry finally came up as well, and I’m really happy we did eventually have the opportunity to touch upon it. Barry is definitely relieved that James is not intending on trying to woo him. ;)

Friedrich’s Wanderer above the sea of fog is a painting I really like, and I saw in real once, so I thought it would be fun to give Barry and James the same opportunity. It was a tie between this or Munch’s Self Portrait with A Cigarette, which I really adore, but I just felt that the first one fit better in this instant. Well, enough of my art babbling.

The next chapter will let things take an unexpected turn, and the Flash decides to pass by… which probably won’t bode well.

I’m finally on holiday, and I can still hardly believe it! XD I had a big work related meeting last Thursday, thus a crazy last two weeks to make sure that everything would get finished till then, and now it’s over and I can rejoice with having time to do stuff again (and to sleep!!)!)

Summer is awesome! I hope you all have a great time as well! <3
Chapter Summary

Barry meets an old acquaintance of his, there is a ruckus in the gallery, and the Flash’s timing is both amazing and outright horrible at the same time.

This chapter has been edited by my dear friend Katzerover, who is doing an amazing job by helping me to turn this story into a much more pleasant! <3

Chapter warning: Physical violence

The restroom of Gilbert’s gallery is very clean and tasteful looking. It really fits the noble appearance of the rest of the establishment very well. Barry only notices this in passing, though, as he is more focused on the couple of other visitors that are already in there. Their presence causes his heart rate to rise in a bout of anxiety despite him knowing that they mean no harm to him.

The two men who are washing their hands are talking in what sounds like Swedish to him, and don’t pay him any mind. Another guy is leaving one of the stalls, eyes fixed on the screen of his rather expensive looking smart phone, and probably not even noticing Barry either.

Barry swiftly makes his way into one of the four stalls that are now unoccupied. There are urinals available as well, but using them somewhere with other men around isn’t an option for him. The uneasiness that usually takes hold of him whenever he has to use a public bathroom, dims a little the instant the last of the three men is gone, and a welcome silence is left behind, which is only interrupted by the faint classical music playing in the background.

The next minute passes by in peace, Barry is just exiting the stall when the door to the bathroom is opened once more, allowing the busy noise from the outside, that was nothing more than a faint murmur so far, to re-enter as well.

Absentmindedly, Barry glances over to the entrance as he is on his way to the sinks, feeling tired after spending the last couple of hours wandering the gallery with James. He freezes instantly when his eyes fall upon the familiar face of a man he met nearly a year ago.

Dr. Elias also looks honestly surprised to see him and halts for a second after entering the room. The door swinging shut behind him, engulfing them in near silence, making it appear like they are cut off from the rest of the crowd outside.

Goosebumps spread over Barry’s body in response to seeing this man again, and his heart beats nearly painfully hard against his chest.

The thought of what this unexpected meeting could mean for him, is nearly sickening, and he can’t help but wonder whether Cameron or someone else from the Blue Velvet is around as well…

A tense moment passes between them, both staring at each other, before the doctor relaxes and gives him a small but friendly smile.

“Mr. Allen,” Dr. Elias says, sounding oddly amused. “I wouldn’t have thought that I’d meet you here tonight.”

Barry, still feeling like a deer in the headlights of an oncoming car, stays quiet, which doesn’t seem to surprise his current companion.

Dr. Elias makes a face and shoots him a sympathetic look. Then, he makes another two steps into the room but appears mindful of not coming too close to Barry.

“You don’t need to worry about me meaning any trouble for you,” the doctor goes on. “I’m here solely because an acquaintance of mine is quite fond of art.” At the alarmed expression that crosses Barry’s face, he quickly adds. “Nobody you know, and nobody you’d need to worry about.”

This words don’t exactly ease Barry’s worries, and he shifts slightly, nervously, as he looks at the door behind the other man, wanting nothing more than to leave. It is not lost on his current companion, who frowns slightly in return. He doesn’t seem to be annoyed or angry, though.

“I mean no danger to you, Mr. Allen,” Dr. Elias repeats quietly, firmly, and Barry is reminded of Eddy’s words, of how his friend tried to get him to meet up with this man so that he could help him with his rheumatism. Or what Eddy thought is rheumatism. Apparently, Dr. Elias told the speedster that he could take a look at it.

The notion that this doctor could be interested in him is unsettling. The knowledge that he probably still got a blood sample of him is even more so.

Barry knows how dangerous this can be and what this can mean for him.

He didn’t report the doctor to the police, and he still isn’t sure whether this was the right thing to do or not. Eddy likes this man, and it isn’t lost on Barry that his friend trusts him, but he knows from personal experience how dangerous scientists like Dr. Darwin Elias can be when they lack a conscious to prevent them to work with people like the Blue Velvet or Blacksmith.

“How are you doing?” the doctor asks, causing Barry to tense up. The other man’s frown deepens, and he lifts his hands in a placating manner, as if to show him that he means no harm.

“I’m mean you really no harm.” Dr. Elias watches him carefully and briefly hesitate before he proceeds. “Edward told me that your rheumatism is getting worse. I’m sure he let you know already, but I could take a look at it if you want me to.”

Barry shivers involuntarily, his throat is tight enough that he can hardly swallows, and he tries to urge himself to move, to just pass the man, to leave the restroom, but it is as if he is frozen to the spot.

“Maybe we could also take a look at your other problem,” Dr. Elias goes on, and while there is nothing threatening to how he is observing him now, there is an intensity to it, that makes it clear that he knows there is more going on that Barry would like him to know. “Your bloodwork did show-”

The restroom door is pushed open, and an elderly man enters, glancing only briefly at both Barry and Dr. Elias as he makes his way over to one of the urinals.

Barry’s stupor is broken, and he quickly makes his way past the doctor, keeping his eyes straight at His heart is beating in his chest like crazy as he breaks out in a cold sweat, feeling utterly terrified, and it is both a surprise and an incredibly relief when the doctor let him pass without another word.

Barry’s hands are clammy, and he hardly notices the people around him as he walks, the throbbing of his pulse is just too loud in his ears, nearly deafening. It is only as he steps out into the night, when the cool air hits him on his face, that he snaps out of his panic, and realizes that he actually walked out of the gallery.

Shivering, he turns around, and notices that he is at the foot of the stone steps that lead up to the entrance. The place in front of the gallery is nearly empty, all the onlookers from earlier, who waited to see Luthor, have left by now, and only a couple of gallery visitors are around, probably to get some fresh air or to have a smoke.

Barry bites his lower lip, and the urge to just walk on, to get himself away from here is nearly oppressive, but James is still in there, and he would be worried when he notices that Barry seemingly just vanished.

His feet feel as if they are made of lead as he reluctantly makes his way back up the stairs towards the entrance, and he hopes James wouldn’t be too disappointed if he asked him whether they could leave. It is already late, nearly midnight, but the still have to actually see the new exhibition that would have been the next and last section on their visit, and Barry knows his friend is looking forward to it.

Walking amid the visitors whose number has thinned out by now but is still more than one would expect to meet this late at night, is taxing on him. Much more so than it has been previously, and he is relieved when he finally reaches the center room of the gallery, where the newest exposition is taking place.

It is a show dedicated to a modern jeweler artist from China whose creations are a blend of traditional jewels design and exotic, animalistic looking elements. Barry actually saw quite a few posters advertising this guy’s work on the bus and as ads in magazines.

The works are beautiful, and Barry did look forward to study the fascinating and exotic designs the jewels are worked into, but right now he really couldn’t care less about it. The only thing he wants to do is leave, and he is relieved when he spots James next to one of the showcases not too far away from to the entrance of the big room.

His friend is talking to another visitor, possibly a friend or acquaintance of his, but quickly notices Barry as he comes closer.

The bright smile James gives him slips from his lips when their eyes meet. He quickly excuses him from the other man and makes his way over to him, meeting him halfway.

“Is everything alright?” There is audible worry in James’ voice, and Barry swallows with some difficulty as he tries to smile. “C-can w-w-we l-leave?”

James is clearly concerned now, and he is likely thinking about asking what happened, but eventually decides against it and nods instead. “Of course.”

Barry gives him a grateful smile that feels less forced this time-

It is then that a commotion starts up in the other rooms around them, causing both James and him to turn to the entrance in surprise.
Then, suddenly, the lights go out and plunges everything in darkness. A couple of visitors gasps in shock and fear, and Barry grows nearly painfully tense in response.

This only lasts for a second, though, as the emergency lightening quickly kicks in and allows them to see their surroundings again.

There is a sharp, rattling noise, and Barry’s heart lurches up his throat as he watches the safety bars sliding down at the three entries to the room they are currently in. This is followed by the sound of rather heavy looking safety doors closing, cutting them effectively off from the rest of the gallery.

There is no alarm, and for a moment everything is deathly quiet.

Then a murmur rises around them as the people that are trapped in with them are getting anxious, asking about what is happening, whether they are in danger or if this is just a mistake, a malfunction of the security system. Some speak in hushed tones while others grow outright frantic, and it hardly takes any time at all till the first person tries to find a way to open one of the doors manually.

Barry startles when he suddenly feels someone grab his arm, but he relaxes somewhat when he notices that it is only James, who is pulling him a bit closer as he looks around, trying to assess the situation they are in now.

The commotion around them comes to a sudden stop when a booming voice cuts through the big room.

“There is no need to get distressed over this little intermission, ladies and gents.”

Barry’s stomach drops as dread settles around him like arms that hold him too tight. He turns to the center of the room, where a small plateau has been established to show off an about 12 feet tall female statue that is decorated with some lovely and very expensive looking ornaments. It is circles by a number of roughly seven feet tall, polished plates, probably made out of aluminum, that are reflective enough to pass as big, somewhat deformed mirrors.

A soft groan passes his lips as he spots Len standing there. Or Captain Cold is more like it as his friend is wearing the get-up of his criminal alter ego, with parka and glasses in place, and his infamous Cold gun clearly visible in his right hand.

Lisa, Roscoe, Mick and Hartley are also there, standing around Len, and Barry is suddenly hit by the strongest sensation of déjà vu that makes his knee nearly go weak.

It has been over a decade since he was last present when his friends pulled a heist, and unexpectedly being pushed into such a situation again leaves him shaken and unsure what to do.

The regret of not telling Len about his plans with James hit is like a slap, then, but at the same time he can’t believe his rotten luck, or how stupid he is. He knew his friends planned something, Len told him that they were going to do another heist this weekend, but, as usual, they didn’t really talk about anything specific, as it still made him feel uneasy and guilty.

This is now coming back to bite him badly because Len is going to be furious…

Barry feels nauseated as he lets his gaze briefly wander to the others, noticing how Mick has his heat gun drawn as well, while Hartley has his trademark flute hovering near his lips. Lisa holds a mean looking automatic pistol while Roscoe hasn’t even bothered to bring any weapon with him at all.

They look threatening, dangerous, and Barry isn’t surprised when he glances around and notices scared and even slightly terrified expressions on the other visitor’s faces.
“Get down onto the floor,” Len goes on, voice deeper than usual, a commanding and slightly threatening quality to it that makes Barry shiver. “I can promise you good people that nothing will happen to you, and you can leave tonight safe and healthy to tell of this little adventure if every one of you keeps a levelled head and stays calm. If you play along, this won’t take longer than maybe ten minutes. If not…” Len let the threat stay unspoken but everybody gets the gist of it, and every single one of the visitors complies with the order to get down after only a short pause of uncertain hesitation.

Barry does so too, of course, gritting his teeth when his knees and hips cry up in protest as he moves too quickly and without enough caution. James next to him does the same.

As he is on the ground, he lifts his gaze once more, noticing how the other rogues let their eyes wander around the room, trying to get an overview of everything.

While both Mick and Roscoe are on the lookout for the positions of the most lucrative showcases, Lisa and Hartley are swiftly outlining how many people are present and probably whether they can detect some potential troublemakers in the mass of visitors.

Hartley stops momentarily when his eyes fall upon Barry. He purses his lips, and while Barry cannot see the other man’s eyes through his shaded glasses, he knows that his friend is staring at him.

The Pied Piper hesitates and frowns at Len, while the other man finally a sign to fan out. While Roscoe and Mick make their way off the platform and Lisa stays behind next to her brother to keep an eye on the crowd, Hartley calmly makes his way over to Len.

Barry watches from his position at the ground how the later grows utterly still for a second after Hartley whispered something to him. The criminal’s expression grows cold, emotionless, even though the way he clenches his fists betrays the anger he feels. Barry shudders at the sight as dread tightens around him.

He can’t make out what Len says in return, but it quickly becomes clear that he wants Hartley to proceed as planned when the younger criminal makes his way to the frightened crowd to join Roscoe and Mick.

“Keep your heads down,” Len orders, voice low and grim. Barry is pretty sure he is not the only one who can hear the anger beneath the apparent calm. “There is no reason for anybody to worry, as long as you do as I say, the only thing you’ll take away from tonight’s event is a small scare. Should you try to play the hero, I can assure you that this will end up to be your last night, instead.”

Captain cold remains at the plateau like his sister, keeping track of everything while the other Rogues are busy with grabbing valuables.

Barry follows his order, his head is down and his eyes are closed as he hopes that this will be over soon and nobody will do something that would get them hurt. He listens to the glass of the showcases getting smashed, to his friends move around them to collect their loot, and tries to focus on his breathing, on staying calm.

“It’s okay, Barry,” James tells him quietly from next to him, sounding more concerned than scared as he must have picked up on his nervousness. “You’ll be fine.”

The words cause a pang in Barry’s chest as he thinks that it is partly his fault that his friend is here right now. He meets James’ worried eyes and gives him what he hopes is an at least somewhat reassuring smile.
In the end, it hardly takes the Rogues more than five minutes to get everything, and Barry probably should have expected this, as they are clearly seasoned in this business.

It is just when Barry starts to hope that everything would pass over quickly now, that Mirror Master appears in one of the quasi mirrors, with a split lip and a visibly pissed-off look on his face.

“We’ve company, Cold,” Sam informs Len. “Get your asses moving, the others won’t be able to keep the jackass off your backs for much longer.”

As if on a cue, the Flash vibrating through one of the security doors, a grim look on his face, the speed force cracking around him, and it is only due to Hartley’s quick thinking that the Rogues get any time at all to react to the speedster’s arrival, as the Piper starts to play a melody the very instant the hero entered the room, paralyzing him temporarily.

Barry watches how Mick and Roscoe, who were already on their way back to the mirrors as it is, hurry up to get out of here.

Roscoe is the quicker of the two and enters the mirror verse alongside Lisa just as the Flash succeeds in shaking the hypnotization off, which leaves Hartley, Mick, and Len with being confronted by a very angry speedster. The Flash immediately zooms in on Hartley, punching him with enough force that it sends him flying back a few feet, where he crashes into one of the already broken showcases. It is painful to watch, and Barry bites his lower lip hard to prevent from making any sound by accident

Len and Mick, who were already close to one of the makeshift mirrors, are able to keep the speedster at distance with their guns long enough to make their escape. Both look pissed, clearly neither liking the turn their heist has taken towards its end. Len vanishes into the mirror verse with only a scowl, Mick audible cursing the hero.

Afterwards, the whole room is utterly quiet, other than for Hartley’s pained groan, and, for another moment, the tension in the air is thick enough that it could have been cut by a knife. Then, the people on the ground start to get up and cheer, visible relieved for the whole thing to be over.

Some call out for the Flash, wanting to congratulate him, while the place fills with an increasingly excited chatter.

“Are you alright?” James asks. Barry focuses back on him, and he sees his friend is now kneeing next to him, looking worried.

“Y-yes,” he utters, but flinches when the other man touches his arm. James pulls his hand back, the concern in his eyes intensifies as he says. “We’ll leave as soon as-”

The world around Barry seems to distort before he is pushed up against a wall, and his vision grows blurry due to force with which his head hits the hard surface, causing him to get completely disorientated which quickly mingles with terror, as he has no idea what is going on.

It happens so fast that his mind needs a second to catch up, and as his vision clears, and he is able to focus on the man in front of him, a bone chilling fear overcomes him.

The Flash angry gaze meets his eyes, and he looks utterly livid, teeth grit and bared, like a snarl. Barry has hardly time to protest as the other man changes his grip from his shoulder to his throat, keeping him in place with a painfully tight grip.

“What are you doing here?” Wally demands, his voice slightly distorted due to the intensity of the emotions he must be experiencing right now. His eyes are glowing, the speed force is cracking around him, a display of raw energy, and even if Barry would have been able to get a word out around the hand on his throat, he is much too caught off-guard and scared by the sudden confrontation to even try.

Wally’s grip tightens in response to his lack of an answer, and Barry reaches up, taking hold of his nephew’s wrist and pulls at it in a vain attempt to get him to let go.

There is so much anger in the younger man’s eyes, so much hate...

Seeing these emotions directed at him hurts, and Barry just want to be back home, back in his bed where he can shut the rest of the world out.

“What are you doing!?” James is suddenly at their side, sounding aghast. “Let go of him! Are you mad?! He is just another visitor! You’re hurting him!”

Wally ignores the other man, and Barry briefly wonders whether his nephew can even hear him.

Spots start to dance in front of his eyes, and the realization that this could be where he is going to die, by Wally’s hands, is nearly sickening.

“You think you can make a fool of me? Of all of us?! ” Wally hisses, his voice hardly recognizable anymore. “Is this a game to you?! Do you really think I don’t know what’s going on?!”

Wally lifts him off the ground with a surprising display of strength, enough so that Barry is no longer able to support his own weight, making him to grow lightheaded.

“I know what you’re up to,” Wally goes on, more quiet now, but no less angry. “You think I don’t see what you’re doing with Jay or Max?”

Barry opens his mouth, tries to speak but is unable to get even just a tone out. His hand on the Flash’s wrist starts to loosen up, and he hardly picks up on the muffled noises of the horrified crowned around them, or on James who turns more and more frantic by the minute.

He should not have come here… He didn’t mean for any of this to happen, he doesn’t want James to be here when-

Then, the grip is suddenly gone from his throat, and Barry slumps to the ground, coughing, gasping for air, and feeling horrible dizzy.

“Barry!” James is next to him nearly immediately, sounding worried and upset. “Are you alright?”

Barry nods automatically, still unable to get enough air in his lungs, and tries to understand what just happened.

When he lifts his gaze, he is taken aback by finding the Flash kneeling at the ground a few feet away from them, holding his head in pain with gritted teeth.

It is then that Barry picks up on a very light tune that is filling the room, and when he moves his gaze to see over the Flash’s shoulder, he spots Hartley playing his flute once more, looking the worse for wear.

He meets his friend’s eye, both surprised and deeply grateful by the unexpected help. Hartley gives him a weak smile-

The tune stops as the Piper is knocked out by a punch from Jay who arrived just then.
The older speedster is at Wally’s side in the blink of an eye, but before he is able to ask if everything is alright with his friend, the younger man already moves.

Barry’s yelp is cut off when a hand closes back around his throat, and it quickly becomes apparent that Wally is not playing around this time, as he is really cutting his air supply entirely off, effectively suffocating him.

The hands are just as quickly gone again this time around as they appeared, and Barry slumps back to the ground, wheezing and coughing, feeling weak and dizzy.

“Back off, Flash.” Jay’s commanding voice sounds faint to him, and Barry isn’t surprised that it was the older speedster who came to his aid this time and got Wally off him.

James is at his side again, but Barry doesn’t pay him any mind as he watches the speedsters in front of him, how both have a seemingly short but angry confrontation to the eye of the surrounding crowd, talking way too fast for anybody to understand anything that is said.

Eventually, the Flash relents and backs off, though his clenched hands are shaking with suppressed rage as he meets Barry’s gaze briefly, eyes cold and sharp. The look only last for a heartbeat, then Wally turns around to grab the still unconscious Piper with whom he vanishes back out through the closed security door a second later.

The loathing Barry was able to make out in his nephew’s eyes is both painful and frightening, and leaves him feel shaken and upset.

He hardly notices it that James is talking to him, or how Jay tells the clearly confused and upset crowd than everything is fine, and that they would be able to get out of here in just a few minutes.

Afterwards, Jay joins James and him. The older speedster has a fleeting exchange with Barry’s friend which goes over his head once more as he isn’t really able to focus on anything that is said.

He feels sick and exhausted, and he just wants to get home.

“‘It’s okay,’” James reassures him as he takes hold of elbow and carefully helps him to get up. Barry hates the contact, whimpers softly in response, and tries to pulls away but quickly stops when he realizes how unsteady he is on his feet.

“There’re paramedics waiting outside,” Jay tells him, and Barry nods, not really grasping what his friend is saying, but not sure what else to do.

He feels so cold, and he can’t stop shaking.

Afterwards, Barry has no idea how he got to the paramedic that ended up making sure that he is alright, but after he got something to help to settle his nerves and stabilize his circularization, he vehemently refuses to go to the hospital.

Thankfully, Jay is no longer around, and James relents to his wish rather quickly and instead suggesting to drive Barry home.

“O-ok-kay,” Barry agrees tiredly, and reluctantly let James assist him on their way back to his friend’s car.

“You could stay at my apartment tonight, if you-” James offers after they pulled out of their parking spot, but Barry quickly cuts him off before he can finish. “N-no, I-I j-just w-want t-to g-g-get h-home.” His throat is still raw and his voice sounds raspy, like he is fighting off a cold.
It is obvious that James doesn’t like the idea of him being alone now, but he understands that he would upset Barry only more by trying on changing his mind on this.

The rest of the ride goes by in silence, and Barry is so exhausted that he actually falls asleep despite how tensed up and shaken he still feels.

James wakes him, touching his shoulder lightly and only for a moment, which is still enough to startle Barry.

“We’re here,” his friend explains, and Barry realizes that they’re parking next to his apartment building.

The concern is still plain on James’ face, and Barry wishes he could tell him something to calm his nerves, but his own mind feels thick and slow, and he only ends up nodding.

“I’ll pass by tomorrow.” James’ words cause Barry to halt again after he opened the door. He turns back to the other man who meets his eyes firmly, determined, and adds quickly to not give him any opportunity to protest. “Just briefly. Just to check up on you.”

“I-I’m f-f-fine,” Barry insists, and it is quite upsetting to him that he himself is aware of what a lie that actually is.

“Even so,” James insists quietly.

Too tired to put up any more of a fight, Barry finally relents and accepts wearily.

James stays parked till Barry reach the entrance of the building before he starts his car and pulls out. Barry watches his friend drive off, and it is just when the backlights vanish around a corner further down the street that he turns to makes his way inside and upstairs to his floor.

His legs feel close to giving out under him when he finally reaches his apartment minutes later. He doesn’t bother to turn on the lights, he only locks his door and goes straight to bed.

Barry lays down without taking his shoes or coat off, he doesn’t even think about it, and his head has hardly touched his pillow when he out like a light.

Later, he doesn’t know how long, something wakes him. It takes him a second to comprehend that it was the movement of the mattress, that it dipped slightly under the weight of another person. The realization startles Barry’s exhausted mind back awake like a splash of cold water.

“It’s alright.” Len’s voice is low and soothing, it quenches the terror in him, giving him no opportunity to act on it, and the relief to have his friend here with him is nearly painful in its intensity.

“L-Lenny.” Barry whimpers, who lays on his stomach and feels too tired to move. It is just then that he picks up on how his throat and head hurt, enough so that he wishes he hadn’t been woken up. He squeezes his eyes shut and snifflles when the other man cups his neck lightly, reassuringly.

“I’m here,” Len assures him quietly, and Barry thinks he sounds a bit odd, but he is too tired to be able to really make out what it is.

Instead, he reaches for the other man, takes hold of the parka he is wearing, and it is then when he notices Len is still in his Captain Cold get-up.

“L-Len-ny,” Barry repeats, tired and hurting, and he clenches his eyes shut when Len moves the hand that has been cupping his neck and starts to rub his back soothingly.
“I’m here, Barry,” Len repeats, and it sounds like a promise, like he is saying something else that Barry isn’t able to grasp right now.

Then, he remembers what happened earlier, the gallery, the heist… Wally…

“I-I’m s-sorry…” Barry utters brokenly while hot tears wet his pillow and his throat feels raw and painful, like sandpaper. “I-I-”

Barry presses his face into his pillow and tries to fight off the urge to sob, but fails miserably. Everything hurts, his body, his mind, everything…

But Len is there...

And Len stays with him, even as Barry breaks into a thousand pieces once more. He is a quiet, reassuring presence next to him, rubbing soothing circles between his shoulder blades and making all of this somehow less awful.

Due to the exhaustion that is still clinging to him, Barry soon calms down and dozes off again. He hardly notices how Len gets up and takes off his shoes or how he spreads his blanket over him, tugging him in.

The sensation of warmth follows Barry into his sleep, though, and he dreams of someone holding him, of being safe.

Chapter End Notes

Look at that, we finally met Wally again in this chapter. Though, I’m pretty sure Barry would have preferred not to, and considering how this meeting turned out, it is understandable even if not unexpected.

I hope you guys enjoyed the chapter, it is one that is really dear to me. I think I changed it like seven times or more since I wrote it the first time down a couple years ago, and for a while I was considering taking it out completely, but I’m glad I decided against it. We never had Barry in the middle of a heist before, and I just liked the idea of him experiencing it firsthand. You can believe me if I tell you that Len is really pissed about it, and seeing that he is pretty good at reflecting his anger on others, we can be rather proud of him that he didn’t try to bite Barry’s head off first chance he got. Why that is, you will learn in the next chapter. ;)

It is probably silly, but I’m also very excited that Barry called Len ‘Lenny’ for the first time. It is just a nickname, but it does have a deeper meaning here, and shows how Barry and Len grow closer, similar to when Len calling Barry ‘baby’ the first time around.

I want to thank you all who took the time to leave me feedback over the last couple of chapters (and in general). I really appreciate it and love to read your comments about what you take away from a chapter and what your thoughts on it are. Being able to share this story with you means a lot to me, and I’m happy that I found people who enjoy it. :)

Next chapter will be from Len’s POV, and it will be up on Sunday in two weeks!

At Gilbert’s – Aftermath Part I

Chapter Summary

Len has a talk with Lisa. He would much rather not, though.

Chapter Notes

This story has been edited by my lovely friend Katzerover, who did as much of a splendid job as usual. Thank you, sweetheart! :)

Len listens to how Barry’s breathing slows down and evens out after he sat back down next to him. His hand is once again between the other man’s shoulders, rubbing soothing circles, but eventually stops when he is certain that Barry is deep asleep.

He sits back up, the quiet, dark room around him, and heaves a tired sigh.

What a fucking night.

The heist went well enough everything considered. They got away with most of the loot, after all. Though, he would have preferred if Sam and the others could have kept the Flash off their backs for a little longer. Seeing in what kind of a pissed off mood that fucker has been in for the last couple of months, he isn’t really too surprised they couldn’t keep him busy for too long, though.

They will have to break the others out, over the next couple of weeks, but that is hardly news these days, especially after a job like the last one. It still annoys him that he is going to be four men short for the time being.

He initially hoped that, at worst, no more than a maximum of two would be put back into prison. With the old Flash turning up as well and Hartley being preoccupied with keeping the younger speedster from strangling Barry, it was probably the best outcome the situation could have had.

Len turns his eyes back to the sleeping man next to him and hesitates briefly. Somewhat reluctantly, he reaches for the collars of Barry’s coat and shirt and pulls them down, giving away the view of his neck.

Even in the dim light that falls through the curtain from the streetlamps below, the bruises around Barry’s throat look dark and angry, resembling a very twisted version of a choker necklace.

An all too familiar anger starts to stir in Len’s guts at the sight. He let go of Barry’s clothes again and pulls his hand back, clenching it into a fist, tightly enough that his knuckles turn white.

If the Flash had attacked Barry while Len was still around, he would have tried to strangle that bastard himself, and while he doesn’t possess no superpowers like the speedster, he has been long enough in the game to know how to seriously injury him if he had to.
Len takes a deep breath in and forces himself to relax as he exhales slowly.

Not that him getting into the fight would have been a good idea with how closely Garrick had followed after the younger hero. Still, Len would have considered another sit out in the Heights worth it just to hurt that miserable speedster for what he did to Barry.

He had already been back in the hideout with the rest, though, and just learned of what was going on when Sam told them about the situation back at Gilbert’s. Hartley had the Flash already paralyzed when they got back there, and leaving the mirror would have been idiotic after Garrick had turned up as well. The older speedster made their interference unnecessary, after all, and trying to get a hit on the younger hero would have been reckless for Len, no matter the satisfaction it would have gotten him. Not that his urge to fire his gun at the red fuck has gotten any less intense since then.

Len closes his eyes for a moment, taking another slow and deep breath to calm the fury that is currently pulsing hot in the pit of his stomach and remembers he needs to stay calm. He was fuming when they returned to the others afterwards, angry enough that Lisa intervened when he told Sam he should take him over to Barry’s apartment.

“You want to go over there like this?” Lisa asked him with an incredulous frown when she stepped in his way back to the mirror after they briefly discussed the current situation. “Furious and close to ripping his head off again?”

“Shut up, and get out of my way, Lisa.” He had hardly been able to keep his voice down, angry at Lisa, at the Flash, and especially at Barry.

Thinking back to it now, Len dreads to imagine what he would have done if he actually came across Barry like that.

“No, not before you don’t calm the hell down, you idiot!” Lisa made no sign to move even just an inch, stubborn like only his little sister was. “You’ll end up being an utter bastard again if you go over in such a miserable mood, and Barry really doesn’t need a temper tantrum throwing jackass on top of what just happened to him.”

“He shouldn’t have been there!” Len finally snapped, not only livid because Barry was there to begin with, but because he was there with his employee’s grandson. That schmuck has become a too big part of Barry’s life as it is.

A small part of Len knew even back then that it was hypocritical of him to make a fuss over this, seeing he wasn’t exactly what one would call faithful either, no matter that neither Barry nor him established any rules or even just what this relationship of theirs really is.

Len puts his hand back down on Barry’s back and rubs it absentmindedly, a silent apology for what he nearly did again if it hadn’t been for Lisa.

Barry sees that Lai jackass only as a friend, Len is more than aware of that, but he is a very territorial person, and he doesn’t react well to guys he considers rivals in any area of his life. Especially when it comes to someone he is attracted to. This is probably also the reason why he wasn’t aware of Barry’s plans tonight.

Barry knows him and his bad temper when his jealousy rears its ugly head, and Len probably made sure that he doesn’t want to talk with him about anything regarding James if it can be avoided.

Regret settles over Len’s shoulders as he remembers how Barry touched upon his hunch about Lai’s attraction towards him, and how badly he took that piece of information, reacting with anger and jealously, and keeping the blonde at a distance for the following couple of days until he snapped out of it again.

Barry hadn’t brought James up again afterwards, and Len was kind of glad for it… until now at least.

Exhaling a soft and tired sounding sigh, Len tries to ignore the irritation as he thinks back to how Lai reacted to Barry being attacked by the Flash. It irks him how upset and worried that man seemed, and how his whole body language and expression made his interest in Barry so very obvious.

Len’s mind trails back to the conversation he had with his sister prior to coming over. She was really pissed off by his temper, and now, in hindsight, he is grateful that she never coats her words when it comes to pointing out that he is making an ass out of himself.

“We was all right with that?” Lisa hissed and looked every bit as agitated as Len. “How could he have known we’re going to be there? We’re not talking with him about this stuff. This, by the way, is something I was against from the very beginning if you remember, and exactly for this very reason!”

“He didn’t tell me he was going to visit that damn gallery!” Len gritted out, feeling upset and ridiculously betrayed by the mere notion that Barry could go behind his back like this.

“So what!” Lisa laughed and shot him another incredulous look. “He has to tell you what he’s doing in his free time now? What the hell, Len?! You’re being a jackass, you’re not his fucking pimp—”

“Shut up—”

“He can do whatever he wants, and it is a good thing when he decides to get out every once in a while!” Lisa went on, ignoring him. “Most of his life exists of work, sitting at home, or being over here! He hardly ever does anything fun in his free time that doesn’t involve poker or sketching.”

“I’ve no problem with that,” Len argues, his fists itched for something to hit, and he wished his sister would just shut up. “I’ve a problem with him turning up at one of our heists because he fails to mention to me that he has a fucking date with that schmuck!”

The moment the words were over his lips, he already regretted them.

A surprised silence fell over the room, and Lisa seemed honestly taken aback, staring at him like she couldn’t believe what he’d just said.

Then, Mick, who leaned against the wall next to them with a beer in his hands, snorted and shook his head. “You’re so full of shit, Snart.”

“Yeah,” Sam agreed from his spot still inside the mirror behind Lisa, while Roscoe added with a scoff. “And this is unexpected how exactly?”

Lisa gave her partner a warning look and turned her attention back to Len, suddenly looking just as livid as her brother had felt not even a minute ago.

“You’re still fucking whores on a nearly daily basis, Len,” she reminded him angrily, pushing her index finger against his chest emphatically. “You’re the one who is not faithful in whatever this not-relationship-thing is that is going on between you two!”

“Nothing is going on between us.” Len grunted and returned Lisa’s glare with just as much vigor.

“Bullshit.” Lisa rolled her eyes and sighed in annoyance. She cut him off as he was about to protest.
“But that aside, you’ve no right to be all pissed at Barry for him spending an evening with a friend just because you can’t keep your damn jealousy under control. Remember what happened last time to him when you lost your temper like this.”

Len did remember, of course, and now as he sits next to Barry, watching him, he can’t help but also remember how close to breaking apart the younger man looked when he woke up to his presence. No harsh words from his side were necessary for that, and he is grateful that Lisa stepped in and kept him from getting ballistic on him.

It is more than obvious to Len now that this would have done a ton of damage, not only to their relationship but also Barry himself.

Barry was utterly distraught when he woke up earlier. He was visibly close to falling apart, and Len hates the notion he could have hurt him even more, because he felt betrayed by Barry going out to have a nice evening with a friend.

Len takes another deep breath in, closes his eyes, and exhales slowly through his nose. He tries to push the rage still coiled up tightly inside him far away from himself.

The sound of someone stepping out of the mirror cuts through the otherwise silent room, and Len looks over his shoulder, only slightly on alert as he kind of expected Lisa to check up on him and see whether he messed things up again. She is a rather protective person by nature, and she has grown very fond of Barry over time. Enough so, that she would want to make sure her dear brother’s temper doesn’t cause everything between them to go to hell.

Len watches his sister step out the mirror while Sam stays behind. The other man only gives him a brief nod and vanishes again.

Lisa’s eyes meet his briefly as her gaze moves to study Barry. Her brows knit together, and her expression becomes slightly pinched as she takes his exhausted form in. She turns back to Len and signs to the bedroom door.

Len gets the suggestion, but he doesn’t know whether it would be a good idea to move away from the mirror after what happened not even two hours ago.

He doubts Garrick would just intrude into Barry’s home without warning, but he isn’t so sure about the younger Flash. The man looked absolutely mad with anger, which is also one of the reasons why Len actually wants to be here now, just in case he should decide to pay his uncle a visit. Though, he is pretty sure Garrick would probably keep tabs on the Flash for the rest of the night after what happened in the art gallery.

The speedster attacking some guy seemingly without any reason will definitely end in bad publicity for the superhero community, should the public gets news of it. Len doesn’t believe that Barry would try and press charges against the speedster, but the notion itself triggers a grim smile over his lips. Then he turns back to the sleeping man next to him.

Alvares would love that. That’s just what he has been waiting for, something else he could use in his campaign against the Twin’s protectors. Len generally wouldn’t have a problem with the Flash getting into some nasty sort of trouble with the public, especially after what happened tonight, but he knows that Barry would take it badly, and any kind of media attention would have consequences for him personally as well.

The sound of his sister’s soft steps prompt him to let go of this thought, and he looks back to her as she come up next to him.
“He looks exhausted,” Lisa remarks quietly and glances to Len. “You kept it together?”

He frowns in response, annoyed she keeps beating that particular horse, even though she probably has a right to do so.

Lisa chuckles and shrugs. “Just asking. We both know how mild-mannered you can be, Lenny.”

“You already laid into me about this,” Len points out tersely and gets up, careful not to wake Barry by doing so while his eyes linger a second longer on the sleeping man. He turns back to his sister.

“I know,” Lisa agrees but smirks. “You just suck at keeping it cool.”

Len shoots her a dirty look, causing her to appear rather pleased with herself, and they both make their way towards the door.

The living room is dark, and they leave it that way, keeping the light turned off. Len walks over to pull the curtains of the kitchen window closed as well just in case. Lisa gets them two beers from the fridge and they both take a seat at the kitchen table, the room only dimly lit by the light of the street lamps outside.

Len use a lightener to open his bottle and hands it on to Lisa afterwards, taking a long pull that floods his mouth with the welcome bitter taste of the cold beverage. He puts the bottle down and closes his eyes, sighing wearily.

“What a heist,” Lisa agrees and takes a pull of her beer. She chuckles and meets Len’s eyes with a rather mirthless smile when he looks over to her. “Red was in a miserable mood tonight. Worse than usual, and doesn’t that mean something?”

Not really wanting to discuss what happened before but knowing he wouldn’t come around it, Len grunts nonverbally and turns his gaze back to the bottle in his hand.

“I mean,” Lisa goes on, either not getting the hint or outright ignoring it, which is more likely. “I wasn’t yet in this business back when he was supposed to be a more mellow fellow, but even for what a bastard he usually is these days, he generally doesn’t attack random bystanders.”

Len purses his lips, tightening his grip around the cool bottle in his hand, and stays quiet.

His sister’s eyes are on him, she is watching him, he can feel them, like they are burning the side of his face.

“Len,” Lisa finally proceeds when a minute or so ticked by between them in silence. “Do we have to worry about Barry?”

It is a question that can be taken two ways, and Len knows she probably put it like this on purpose. It nearly causes him to smirk. She is a clever girl, his little sister, has always been… Much too clever to end up with a life like this.

Len pushes the thought away, not wanting to go down there right now, and focuses on what Lisa asked.

Do they have to worry about Barry? About him staying safe, or about him being trouble for them that could potentially cost them their necks.

He has wondered for a while now whether the others know something, suspect something, but he doesn’t really want to find out. They have currently enough to deal with as it is, and Barry…
Barry is good for them, good in a way Len would have never expected. A calming, caring person that helps to keep the Rogues grounded and their temper in check better than any booze or threat ever was able to.

Len snorts and reaches up to rub his eyes.

It didn’t start with him intending for Barry to become a part of them, as Len generally doesn’t like to bring outsiders in.

They just tend to complicate things.

It’s something he learned the hard way early on and that eventually lead to the Rogues being able to work so well together. They’ve gotten used to depend on each other and watching each other’s back during a heist. Keeping the same members for the group was essential for that, something Len realized soon after they started to do collaborations.

There are many people with gadgets around, many even with powers that would offer their service to them if the price was right, thus it would be easy to exchange members, keep the blood fresh, so to speak, and make sure their numbers stayed constantly the same.

But the group of thugs the Rogues are made up of these days fit together surprisingly well from the very beginning. Just by sheer coincidence it seems, and while they tried their luck with new guys a couple of times, Len realized eventually that it was safer for them to stick to themselves seeing how trust under criminals is rather hard to come by.

Barry was already in prison when the Rogues really became the Rogues, despite what the media called them back then. In a way, Len knows it is thanks to the current Flash they’ve reached the point where they’re able to utterly relay on each other.

Thanks to the new Flash, it has become ridiculous hard to pull a successful heist within the Twins’ borders and stay out of the Heights over the years. Working on your own or with someone unreliable only elevates the risks and the chances to fail.

“Len…” Lisa’s voice makes him glance over to her, directing his attention back to the matter at hand.

“There’s nothing to worry about,” Len tells her curtly and takes another pull of his beer. His gaze turns back to the table in front of him.

“So you know why exactly the Flash nurses such a grudge against Barry that he would actually choke him to death in front of dozens of onlookers?” Lisa presses on, and really, it is a fair question. It is also one that prompts the anger that slowly but surely started to dim down inside Len to spike up once more, and he shoots her a warning glare. “It’s none of your business, Lisa.”

“Bullshit.” Lisa snorts, her face surprisingly grim and concerned. “The Flash being after Barry is damn well our business.”

“That worry comes a bit late, doesn’t it?” Len replies sharply, annoyed and tired, and not in the mood to have this conversation. Now or ever.

“We didn’t know that he had business with that red fuck-”

“You learned about it a year ago, so give me a break,” he points out angrily, but Lisa presses on despite his clearly withering mood. “And you conveniently forgot to clear us up about what this whole thing is about since then.”
“He doesn’t mean any trouble.” Len bores his eyes in hers as he speaks, in a low tone and with a forced calm. “Not to us, and we’re not going to cause him any trouble over this.”

Lisa grits her teeth for a second, looking visibly pissed off, as she returns his icy glare with just as much fierce. “Of course we’re not causing him any trouble, you damn moron. We’d just like to know what is going on for a change.”

“Because I leave you out of the loop when it comes to business.” Len scoffs, annoyed, but Lisa isn’t having any of it and interrupts him with a huff of frustration. “Don’t play dumb, Lenny, it doesn’t become you.”

She doesn’t even blink when he scowls at her and instead nods to the direction of the bedroom where Barry is still resting.

“There’s more to Barry’s whole story, isn’t there? I mean, he’s a former cop, and for some odd reason you of all people took him under your wings while in prison-”

“I did no such thing,” Len denies angrily, and he hates to be reminded of that time, of what Barry had to go through and of how little he really did to help him.

Next to bringing Lisa into a life of crime, Len regrets that the most of all the things he has done so far.

“Really?” His sister arches an eyebrow and picks her bottle up but doesn’t drink. “Because the others-”

“The others don’t know shit,” Len cuts her off. “They’d do good to focus on our jobs instead of running their mouths about something that is none of their concern.”

“Barry is none of our concern?” The bottle in Lisa’s hand is slammed down on the table with enough force that the bang cuts through the silent apartment like a sharp knife, making both siblings to momentarily pause. Lisa grimaces slightly, and shoots him a somewhat apologetic look after they waited for a minute to see whether the sudden noise would cause Barry to stir.

“Barry’s past is his business,” Len finally proceeds, quieter, and reaches up to rub his eyes. “I get that you’re spooked about the Flash, but we’ve been on that bastard’s shit list for much longer than Barry has been hanging out with us.”

It doesn’t come unexpectedly that Lisa and the others don’t like this. Len is honestly surprised that they’ve been so quiet about it after they learned that Barry could mean even more trouble for them when it comes to the Twins’ protector. Even so, he really doesn’t want to discuss this if he can help it. It would inevitably change things if the rest of the Rogues found out about Barry’s past, it is just a question of how, and Len really would rather no add this to his already full plate of stuff he has to worry about.

“You ever thought that we could possibly care about him?” Lisa asks. “You know, it’s really starting to piss me off that you think you’ve to protect him from us, considering what a magnificent job you usually do when it comes to messing him up.”

The words are like a punch, and seeing how well Lisa knows him, it isn’t a surprise she is good at hitting him just where it hurts.

Len grits his teeth and looks away, towards the couch, as he tries to keep his hand from gripping the bottle hard enough for it to break.
“Len.” His sister’s voice softens, the audible irritation from earlier once more gone, and he nearly shakes her hand off when she touches his wrist lightly. He doesn’t, though, because, like for him, this is a way for her to apologize without needing to say so out loud, and he knows that she didn’t really mean to hurt him. They both just inherited the crappy temper of their deadbeat father.

“I know you care about him,” Lisa tells him and gives his wrist a squeeze. “And I’m not trying to suggest that we should cut him off or anything, Len. I’d just like to know what is going on, as would the others.”

Her gaze is no longer harsh when Len meets it again, and he notices with some relief that his own rage has dimmed significantly as well.

It is difficult for him to hold onto the ire he feels for his sister when he knows she is right.

Well, other than when it comes to Roscoe. Not that he would ever acknowledge this out loud…

“It’s Barry’s secret to tell.” Len sighs and reaches for his neck to rub the taut muscles there that are starting to give him a headache.

Lisa lets go of his wrist and leans back again, studying him quietly.

A car passes by down in the streets, briefly breaking the silence of the very early morning. Len takes another pull of his bottle and waits for his sister to speak. He knows she wants to say something else but is hesitating, and this probably means it won’t be something he likes.

“Barry knew the Flash before he was put into prison, didn’t he?” Lisa finally asks. “I mean on a personal level.”

“Yeah.” Len agrees with a frown. He has his eyes on the bottle in his hand, studying it without really taking it in.

“Was it because he was a cop? Did they work together?” Lisa proceeds, sounding more curious than worried by that prospect.

“Barry’s past,” Len starts and seeks her eyes out, “is irrelevant now, isn’t it? Whatever he did or who he was back then lost its meaning the day he was locked into the Heights.”

Lisa doesn’t appear satisfied with his answer, but she likely makes her own conclusion from it all the same.

“He was set up, wasn’t he?”

“Yeah.”

It is something none of them ever really talks about, but everybody thinks so anyway.

Barry doesn’t mention his past very often, hardly ever, really. He is as tightlipped as it gets when it comes to his former wife and nephew, or what he allegedly did to them. Except with Len, that is, and even then he brings it up only on very limited occasions.

Barry is an extremely private person in that regard, probably has always been considering that he learned to carry ugly secrets around with himself from a very early age on.

They still knew early on what happened to the blonde, of course, as news travel fast in a place like the Heights, and pedophiles are always just what other prisoners are waiting for to take some of their pent up aggression out on.

Len hates thinking back to that time, to how he did nothing in the beginning to help Barry who was damned to be at the bottom of the pecking order, the doormat of the lowlife that was forced to reside there as well.

“Why?” Lisa moves, adjust herself so she is facing him. “He wasn’t even a real cop, only a CSI. What did he do that someone would want a retaliation like that?”

This time, at least, Len doesn’t have to hide some of the truth as he answers. “I don’t know.”

It is something, he has pondered over many times himself in the past. Not that someone like the Flash lacks enemies who would want him to wither away in prison, something that would be an awful and ironic revenge on any superhero.

What really bothers Len, though, is the question how the person or people were able to pull this off.

Barry was incredibly powerful as the Flash. He fought among the kind of Superman, Wonder Woman, and the Green Lanterns, and it certainly wasn’t easy to take his powers away.

Or force them to stay dormant, as Len now thinks is actually the case.

Whoever did mess Barry’s life up, did make the Justice League do the dirty work for them by getting them to take care of the former Flash’s powers.

… which is something that is hard to believe and likely even harder to accomplish.

What else gives Len a headache is that he doesn’t understand how Barry’s former colleagues could actually do this to him. Len knows enough people who would turn on their so-called friends in no time if it was advantageous for them, but seeing that the lot of the Justice League is mostly made up of a bunch of idealistic and self-righteous goody two shoes, it is a bit harder to swallow that they would turn on one of their founding members like that.

“The Flash acts like Barry personally wronged him,” Lisa remarks, and Len shoots her an impatient glare, really no longer in the mood to discuss this any further.

“Don’t give me that look.” Lisa huffs. “You can’t tell me this doesn’t bother you.”

“Barry tries to stay as far away from the Flash or anybody else from his former life as he can. Him meeting that jackass tonight was purely bad luck-”

“And a lack of communication between both of you,” Lisa cuts him off and smirks slightly. “I told you already, this is why I think it is an idiotic idea to not inform him about the whereabouts of our heists. You should have at least checked up with him whether he had plans last night.”

“He didn’t mention to me that he intended to visit Gilbert’s,” Len reminds her, shaper than he intended to, but Lisa only snorts and arches an eyebrow again. “Wonder why that’s the case.”

“Will you shut up?” Len grumbles and rubs his eyes. “I told you already that I’ll talk with him about it.”

“And that you’ll try to be less of a jealous and hypocritical asshole,” she agrees and grins when he shoots her another glare. “I’m just looking out for you, Lenny, so don’t get all pissy on me.”

“It’s none of your business,” Len points out grimly. “I’m not intermeddling with Dillon’s and your relationship, am I?"

“Because you wouldn’t castrate Roscoe if he ever dared to have a fling with another woman?” Lisa snorts in a rather unladylike way and takes a pull of her beer.

“I actually hope you’d do that on your own,” Len remarks with a small, lopsided smirk but his expression quickly becomes serious again, “and what is going on between Barry and me is between the two of us.”

“Oh shut it.” Lisa shoots him a dirty look. “You can tell me that the day you start to not laying into me about Roscoe.”

Len doesn’t reply, knowing that Lisa has a point there.

“You’re hurting him.” Lisa meets his eyes with a sombre look. It isn’t hard to guess what she is talking about, and Len nearly scowls at her for it.

“He knows that I’m not feeling the same for Izzy I feel for him.” It really starts to annoy him how his sister seems unable to keep her damn nose out of this business. “There’s nothing between Izzy and me.”

The incredulous way Lisa studies him in response, irks him, but before he can say something, she cuts him off. “You’re such a bastard at times that it isn’t even funny anymore.” She huffs a laughs and points with her bottle to him. “Izzy is head over heels into you, and you know that.”

“Lisa-,” Len starts, the warning audible in his voice, but his sister, as usual, ignores him and presses on. “And Barry probably feels horrible about you insisting on fucking some prostitute because he can’t give you that.”

Len’s fist slams into the table, cutting Lisa off, and he bores his eyes into hers as a nearly choking rage overcomes him.

“Shut up! This is none of your damn business, Lisa!”

The taken aback silence that follows is nearly deafening, but it takes his sister only a second to recover until her anger returns.

Instead of biting his head off, she turns towards the direction of Barry’s bedroom, and Len, who also remembered by now that the other man is actually sleeping next-door, does the same, already regretting how he lost hold of his temper once again.

They both listen for a minute. Lisa gets up. “I’ll check on him.”

“Let him rest,” Len tells her. It is unlikely that Barry overheard really anything from their conversation, but the notion to face him right now still doesn’t sit well with Len.
Lisa turns back to him, giving him a dirty look. “If your little stunt woke him up, he is probably confused and scared right now.”

Len purses his lips but nods. He watches her leave the living room and listens to her footsteps as she makes her way to the bedroom door. There she hesitates for a second before she opens it.

Another pause.

“She’s just me, Barry.” Lisa’s faint voice reaches him easily a moment later in the otherwise quiet apartment.

Putting his bottle back on the table, Len gets up to join his sister. He could kick himself for waking Barry up who clearly needs his rest after what happened last night.

“You should go back to sleep,” Lisa says and Len doesn’t miss the soothing quality her voice has now, calming, all the traces of anger gone.

“I-I c-could m-m-make y-you c-coffee.” Len hears Barry suggest, sounding still half asleep and confused. He steps into the bedroom and comes to a halt next to his sister. It isn’t lost on him how Barry, who got up from his bed, immediately turns to him and how some of the tension leaves him in response.

“Sorry we woke you.” Len gives the other man a faint smile and wishes Lisa wasn’t here. The urge to touch Barry is like an itch he can’t reach due to her being present.

“It’s ok-kay.” Barry returns his smile but still looks pretty much out of it. “I-I c-can m-make y-you a s-snack if y-you w-want… or c-cof-fe.”

“Barry,” Lisa interjects before Len can say something. “You should rest, you’d a long day.”

A shiver runs through Barry, and he hugs himself, something he tends to do when he is upset, making it clear that he doesn’t like Lisa’s advice very much. It maybe even scares him.

“Lisa’s going to leave now anyway,” Len states and steps closer to Barry. “We can have some coffee tomorrow, okay?”

“Y-you’re g-going as w-well?” Barry asks, and it nearly painfully obvious how much he wants Len to stay with him.

“No.” Len cups the blonde’s shoulder, and notices with concern that the blonde is actually trembling. “I’ll spend the night here, if that’s okay with you.”

Some more of the tension eases away from Barry as he says this, and the younger man leans into the contact as he gives him a tired smile. “Y-yes.”

“Try to get some rest, blondie,” Lisa tells Barry affectionately with a reassuring smile. Then, she turns to Len and the warmth is replaced by a more serious, slightly irked expression, as she is probably not happy about their former conversation having come to such an abrupt end.

“Think about what I’ve said,” she reminds him, and Len agrees with a curt nod.

Even though he knows that his sister means well, he can’t help but feel relieved when he finally watches her call for Sam. The other Rogue looks less than happy when he turns up about two minutes later, wearing only a pair of loose grey pants. He was probably about to go to bed.
“You told me you’d stay here overnight!” Sam complains and glares daggers at both Len and Lisa.

“Sorry, change of plans,” Lisa points out and sounds anything but sorry as she steps closer to the mirror.

“You know, despite what people believe, I actually do not only live off love and cheap beer,” Sam grouses as he lets Lisa in. “I do need at least a couple of hours sleep a day as well.”

Len ignores Sam’s complaining and instead turns to Barry, who stepped closer to him and looks like he is about to fall asleep on his feet.

“Let’s go to bed,” Len suggests quietly, and a fond smile spreads over his lips when the other man murmurs his agreement but only leans into him instead of moving.

“Yes, get some sleep, you look like you’re about to keel over,” Sam agrees grumpy.

“Shut up, Sam,” Lisa tells her friend with a sigh. “Let’s get moving so that you can get some more of your beauty sleep. You clearly need it.”

“Bite me, princess.”

Lisa and Sam disappear, leaving back only the reflection of Len and Barry, and the room around them.

“Come.” Len brushes his lips against the warm temple of the other man and starts to steer him towards the bed. Barry lets him, only humming in agreement as he seems to lose the battle against his exhaustion.

After they both laid down, Len keeps watching Barry sleep in the faint, warm light of the streetlamps from below for a long while.

Chapter End Notes

So, I hope you guys enjoyed this chapter!

It was fun writing Lisa and Len interact with each other again! They are typical siblings, similar bad when it comes to their tempers and taking no nonsense from each other, and, right now, Len is more than grateful for that.

Initially, in my earlier drafts of this story Len was supposed to go ballistic on Barry after the events at Gilbert’s, and it would have had caused a deep cut in their relationship that would have taken quite a while to mend again. Due to me having changed a lot of the story, especially when it comes to the progress of Barry’s and Len’s relationship, it would not have fit anymore.

In this version, Len already did hurt Barry badly once when he got overpowered by his anger, back when the security guard got hurt, and while he could have lashed out like that now as well, I really didn’t want to put another obstacle like that in their way. Especially because I’m not sure how their relationship would have turned out after another incident of that kind as it would have left scars that possibly would have made things between them impossible to progress past a certain point.
At the same time, Len is still having problems with his temper, so I didn’t want to cut his reaction out. Thankfully, we have Lisa, and she did quite a marvelous job at keeping Len from flipping his shit again and regretting it dearly afterwards. :)

Next chapter we will have Barry and Len have a heart to heart and both will open up more about their feelings to each other.

Enough of my babbling now! Thanks for the wonderful feedback you left me for the last chapter, I enjoyed your comments like you wouldn’t believe! :D

Next chapter will be up in two weeks’ time as usual!
The first thing Barry notices when he wakes up is the slight throbbing behind his temples. It is a persistent ache that spikes when he tries to roll onto his back, causing him to freeze again and groan softly. He grimaces and decides to stay still for now.

His mouth feels dry, and the all too familiar taste that follows when he cries himself to sleep coats his tongue.

Slowly, Barry opens his eyes, a feeling of disorientation engulfing him that is accompanied by a nagging fear as he can’t remember where he is or what happened.

Relief floods him when he recognizes his bedroom after his eyes adjust to the dim light, and he tentatively tries to turn his head to look to the bedside next to him.

It’s empty.

Barry frowns, wondering why he assumed that this wouldn’t be the case.

His confusion is once again replaced by concern when he notices that he isn’t wearing the loose shirt and pants he usually prefers to sleep in but his coat, and from there it takes his mind only another second to catch up with last night’s events.

Heavy dread settles over him as he remembers Len and the others turning up at Gilbert’s to pull a heist. Then, the Flash showing up there to stop them…

Wally…

Barry squeezes his eyes shut and takes a shuddering breath, as he does his best to push those memories away.

He is such an idiot; he shouldn’t have accepted James’ invitation. If he had stayed at home, this wouldn’t have happened!

A shudder runs through him, and he presses his face into his pillow as he forces himself to concentrate on nothing but his breathing.

It takes him a couple of minutes till the pain in his chest and the burning of his eyes start to ease off, leaving him slightly shaken and nauseous.

The noise from down the street, where cars and people pass by his apartment building, fill the otherwise quiet room, and he listens to it absentmindedly. He wonders how late it is, but feels too lethargic to bring himself to get up and look.

Slowly, Barry reaches for the other pillow, the one Len rested on last night, and pulls it close so that he ends up hugging it to his chest. The faint scent of the other man still clings to it, which is familiar and comforting, and helps him to relax somewhat in response.

Burying his face in the soft material of the pillowcase, Barry’s grip on his mind slips, and he can’t stop it from going over everything that happened last night once more. He starts to tremble when he thinks back to how angry Wally was, how his nephew had tried to strangle him…

It is then that he picks up on the pain in his throat, causing his eyes to itch again as he is filled with a chilling sensation of misery.

Frustrated and angry at himself for not being able to stop himself from recalling that, Barry hisses and grits his teeth hard enough that a sharp pain erupts in his jaw joints. He welcomes it and tries to focus on it, pushing the memory of last night far back, in the secluded area of his mind he hardly ever dares to visit.

It doesn’t really work, he is just too upset, but the pain still helps him to divert his focus a little, as his awareness once again picks up on Len’s smell.

Vaguely, he can remember that his friend had come over sometime after he fell asleep last night, and that he sat by his side, comforting him after he had awoken to his presence.

A calming sensation accompanies the memory of Len’s soothing voice and helps Barry to relax somewhat. He exhales a shuddering breath, and his mind seems to finally take pity on him as it stops clinging to what occurred in the art gallery and instead moves on to what happened later that night.

Barry believes that Lisa had been there as well, but he isn’t entirely sure. What he does still know clearly, though, is that Len didn’t lose his temper, something he didn’t expect but still is immensely grateful for.

Everything part of Barry felt raw when he finally arrived home after the disaster at the gallery. His insides were like an open wound, and he isn’t sure what he would have done if Len had gone ballistic on him. That never happened, and instead he recalls how the other man had been there for him, a quiet and soothing presence when he succumbed the need to cry for everything he lost.

Eventually, Len’s presence lulled him back to sleep, but Barry is pretty sure that he was woken again later on by something.

A noise?

No, it was an angry voice, and it scared and confused him. That is, until Lisa knocked on his bedroom door and told him that it was just Len and her out there in his living room.
She left soon afterwards, or, at least, Barry thinks she did. He isn’t too sure as his memories of her being around are fogged up and are difficult for him to recollect.

Something he has no problem recalling is how Len pulled him close after they went to bed and how safe he felt in his arms.

Barry tightens his embrace around the pillow in his arms and wonders whether Len is still around.
He glances over to the mirror.

It would be better if he wasn’t, Barry is well aware of how much trouble he would be in if someone found his friend here.

After last night, it’s probably a good idea if Len doesn’t come over for a while, especially if Wally really suspects something.

They got careless.

He got careless.

In the beginning, the notion that Wally or another hero could find out about his friendship with the Rogues outright terrified him, enough so that he pulled his curtains closed whenever Len or one of the others were around. He always feared the worst and jumped at any unexpected noise…

But, eventually, things changed, and his paranoia eased away, replaced by a false sense of security whenever one of them was around.

Barry just couldn’t help but grow comfortable with his relationship to the Rogues over time. He started to enjoy having them around him and eventually stopped checking over his shoulder every other minute when they visited or he travelled to one of their hideouts.

When nothing happened for such a long time, he just wanted to believe that he didn't have to worry about someone possibly being there, watching him, anymore.

He doesn’t even want to imagine what would happen if the wrong people found out about their friendship. It would get him back into Iron Heights within hours, and the mere idea is just plain sickening.

A frown settles over Barry’s face as he absentmindedly studies the plain wall he is currently facing.

He wonders whether Wally found it suspicious that he was present at one of the Rogues’ heists. It is ironic that it really was nothing but pure bad luck for him to be there, and it certainly doesn’t help his case that his nephew already seems convinced that he is up to something.

Could Wally really know of his friendship to Len and the others? And if so, why hasn’t he taken him in yet?

The events happening towards the end of his visit to the gallery are hard to recall. There are mostly only emotions that overcome Barry when he thinks back to it now. It allows him to hope that he is wrong, and that Wally isn’t aware of what is going on between him and the Rogues.

The more he thinks about it, the more this seems to be the case as he doubts that his nephew wouldn’t already have taken him in if he even just suspected something like that.

The sound of his bedroom door being opened startles Barry out of his thoughts, and he looks over to it with his heart beating like crazy against his chest.
The fear subsides when his eyes fall upon who is joining him, and he relaxes.

It is Len.

Of course it is Len.

Barry nearly huffs a nervous chuckle, feeling stupid for how he immediately expected the worst again. He should have known that it’s just his friend...

A part of him tries to remind himself that there is a reason why he usually expects the worst in situations like this, but Barry ignores it and focuses on the other man instead.

“You’re up.” Len observes unnecessarily after he studied Barry for a moment. His voice is low and calm, and there is still no trace of anger in it. He closes the door behind himself and walks the couple of steps around the bed to Barry’s side.

Barry rolls onto his back, wincing slightly as his shoulders and neck still protest the movement, but is able to produce a small smile for the other man who takes a seat next to him.

Len is missing his parka now, wearing only a plain black shirt, but, Barry notices he is still wearing the pants that are part of his Captain Cold outfit.

“How are you feeling?” Len puts a hand onto Barry’s stomach, starting to rub it slightly through the thin layer of the dress he put on for last night’s visit to Gilbert’s.

“Ok-kay,” Barry replies quietly, tiredly.

It is obviously a lie, but Len is kind enough not to point that out. Instead, he only nods and a silence settles between them.

The thoughtful way Len watches him makes Barry a bit nervous as he can’t help but wonder whether his friend is secretly angry at him for not letting him know beforehand about the James’ and his visit to the art gallery.

He should have told him. If he had, Len would have informed him about their planned heist and the whole thing could have been avoided.

For the most part, at least, seeing that Barry wouldn’t have been able to warn James without giving the Rogues’ plan away, and he doubts that Len would have been willing to postpone the job for him.

The thought is sobering, and Barry averts his eyes, feeling guilt and helplessness engulf him once more.

This is nobody’s but his own fault. He has known from the very beginning who Len and the others are, and he sought them out anyway.

“Hey.” Len touches his chin and lightly urges him to look back to him. His eyes are sombre but not angry or reproachful when their gazes lock. “I’m not angry, Barry, and last night could have gone much worse, everything considered.”

“I sh-should h-have t-told y-you.” Barry utters unhappily and swallows around the lump in his throat. He shivers when Len let go of his chin and rests his hand on his chest, close to his collarbone.

“You should have,” Len agrees, though he still doesn’t sound accusing or upset. “But I understand why you didn’t.”
“I’m s-sorry…” Barry reaches for Len’s arm and holds onto it. He is really sorry, not only for not telling him, but for the trouble he means for Len and the others in general.

… and to Wally.

“Don’t be.” Len gives him a faint smile and starts to draw small circles with his thumb just below Barry’s collarbone, causing him to shudder in response. “I didn’t exactly make it easy for you to come to me with that kind of stuff, did I?”

Barry doesn’t reply immediately but studies the other man with sad eyes.

“Y-you d-didn’t,” he finally agrees softly. “B-but… it w-was s-stupid o-of m-me th-that I d-didn’t c-c-consider th-that th-this c-could h-happen.”

“And it was stupid of me that I didn’t consider that keeping you out of the loop wouldn’t work forever,” Len points out.

“I-I…” Barry grimaces unhappily and glances back to him. “I d-don’t w-want t-to knknow…” He pauses briefly but eventually proceeds. “B-but I th-think I-I c-can’t r-r-ally h-have th-that l-luxa-r-ry an-anym-more.”

Not knowing what the Rogues are up to makes it easier for him to ignore the guilt that comes with the fact that they are criminals.

Being ignorant about those things allows him to just pretend that Len and the others… “You won’t have to join us when we plan something,” Len reminds him, obviously not missing how upsetting this is to him. “I’ll just give you a heads-up about where not to be when we’re doing any future jobs.”

It doesn’t really help, but Barry can appreciate his mindfulness. Len means well; he is trying to make him feel better even after last night’s fiasco. This is unexpected but comforting, and Barry gives his arm a light squeeze. “Ok-kay.”

He tenses up when Len moves his hand that was resting on his chest to touch his chin once more, lightly urging him to move his head back so that it allows him a better view of his throat. It takes Barry a second to realize why he does so, and when he remembers the ugly bruising that has to be visible there, he shudders.

The thought of Wally strangling him is still unsettling and painful.

“How’s your throat?” Len studies him with a rather void expression, clearly careful to school his features to not give away what he really feels just then. For the most part he is successful, other than for his eyes, where his anger is plainly visible beneath the layer of fake calm.

“I-I’m f-fine,” Barry murmurs and looks away, biting his lower lip. He shudders once more when Len starts to lightly trace the ugly bruises Wally’s hands left behind.

“Does it hurt?” The concern is audible in Len’s voice and nearly overshadows the anger. Barry reaches for his hand, grasping it in a loose hold to keep it in place, and swallows nervously. He tries to ignore the pain this causes and how much more pronounced it feels all of a sudden. It is as if his own body somehow hadn’t really been aware of the bruises until now.

“A l-little,” Barry admits and keeps his eyes on the wall next to him.
Another silence settles over them, and Barry can feel Len watching him. It makes him somewhat uneasy, nervous even, because he very aware of how his friend must be silently seething on the inside, no matter what his outward demeanour tries to portray. He doesn’t want Len to be angry, it worries him what this could cause the other man to do during his next clash with Wally.

It also makes it harder not to think about what occurred at Gilbert’s...

He takes a shuddering breath and chuckles.

“I-it’s f-funny,” Barry says before he can stop himself. “I w-was h-hoping th-that… ththat h-het w-wouldn’t h-hate m-me… d-despit-te ever-ryth-thing I w-was h-hop- ping wwe…” He breaks off and chuckles, a miserable sound that has nothing cheerful or warm to it. “I th-thought th-things w-would m-maybe h-have ch-change a-aeter s-so m-much time.”

Deep down, Barry has known from the very beginning that this will never be the case, that Wally will never want to reconcile with him.

The longing for his life to go back to how it was before everything went downhill, is still there, though. It is a persistent ache in his chest he got used to over time and hardly ever notices these days.

Right now though, it feels like something in him is on fire. Like a part of him is shrivelling away in flames, and it hurts so much.

He swallows again and tries to keep his voice from breaking as he goes on.

“I w-want-ted us t-to… I-I th-thought m-maybe, aft-ter en-nough t-time, w-we c-could bbec-come a f-family ag-gain…” Barry speaks quietly, no more than a whisper. “H-he hhat tes m-me…”

It is an ugly realization about something he should have never had any doubt about to begin with.

Barry shudders when Len slightly tightens his hold on his wrist, reassuringly so.

“I l-love h-him…” The white of the wall he is starring at is blotchy, partly grey, with some cracks, but Barry can hardly make any of that out due to how smudged his vision is as he proceeds to explain. “I c-couldn’t p-prot-tec h-him-”

“Barry.” Len, who has kept quiet so far, interrupts him in a low but firm tone. He doesn’t sound irritated, thankfully, but the concern in his voice causes the itching of Barry’s eyes to get even worse. “You aren’t responsible for what happened to your nephew.”

They are moving dangerously close to a line Barry never wanted to cross, but he knows that it became pretend a long time ago.

Len knows that Wally is the Flash, he probably knew already back when Barry was still an inmate in the Heights. They’ve touched upon it a number of times in the past, but Barry has always been tight-lipped about anything regarding the current Flash. Even so, it eventually occurred to him that his nephew’s secret identity wasn’t so secret anymore, at least not when it comes to Len.

It should worry him more than it does. He is afraid of Len trying to hurt Wally during their next clash, but he knows that Len wouldn’t use the knowledge of the younger hero’s identity against him or his family.

Len just isn’t that kind of person.

“I l-love h-him,” Barry replies tiredly and slowly turns to face his friend. “I alw-ways ddid. H-he is m-my ch-child.”

It doesn’t matter that Wally doesn’t want to have anything to do with him anymore. Barry will always see his nephew as his son, someone he loved and still loves with all his heart, and someone whom he utterly failed…

“I know,” Len agrees, and the grimness on his face makes it hard to miss that he doesn’t think too much of it.

“H-he w-was s-so ang-gry…” Barry breaks off and squeezes his eyes shut. He takes a couple of shuddering breathes and tries to beat the pain down that threatens to overwhelm him again.

Wally still hates him.

He always will.

Barry opens his eyes slowly, and it helps a little that his gaze falls on Len, that the other man is here. He is grateful that he doesn’t have to be alone with his own thoughts right now.

Len is watching him silently as he keeps holding on to his hand, and Barry wonders what exactly he is thinking. Whether it is about Wally, the heist, or James.

“I’m r-really s-sorry f-for n-not t-telling y-you ab-bout g-going t-to th-the g-galler-ry w-with J-James,” Barry tells Len once more and gives him a faint, apologetic smile. “I rreally sh-should h-have.”

This whole mess wouldn’t have happened, if he had.

“Yes,” Len agrees like before. The way he is watching him makes it clear that he still doesn’t hold it against him, though. “But I understand why you didn’t, and… I’m sorry I made you feel like you have to hide this from me.”

Barry nods and appreciates the apology, even though he wishes it wouldn’t be necessary in the first place.

Unfortunately, Len’s temper can be a beast of its own, and they both suffer whenever it rears its head.

Even so, last night’s fiasco isn’t the other man’s fault, as Barry is more than aware that, if he wasn’t such a coward, he would have mentioned his plans with James.

“J-James is j-just a f-friend,” Barry reminds Len somewhat reluctantly and his heart sinks when the other man presses his lips into a thin line in annoyance.

“He’s interested in you.” Len doesn’t sound angry but there is a slight edge to his voice that makes it clear that this is a sore topic for him.

“H-he kn-knows h-how I f-feel.” Barry frowns and tries to push the slight irritation away that rises in him at the other man’s hypocrisy. He averts his eyes and adds quietly, bitterly. “And y-you kn-know m-me… it i-isn’t as if anyth-thing c-could ever h-happen bbetw-ween J-James and m-me anyw- way.”

Len tenses up next to him, he can feel it, and briefly he worries that the other man could have understood his words wrong, taken them as a slight against him despite how Barry really directed them only towards himself.
Seconds tick by, causing Barry’s stomach to knot up in apprehension, and he can’t bring himself to glance back to Len for fear of the anger he would find in his eyes.

Then, Len’s hand returns to Barry’s abdomen, and he starts to rub it once more. It is a purely soothing gesture, no trace of aggression in it, and takes the edge off the apprehension Barry experiences. “I know I’m a hypocrite,” Len admits, causing Barry to look back at him in surprise. “And that I’m making an ass out of myself by laying into you about that schmuck.” His frown deepens as he proceeds. “But I hate how he keeps giving you stuff and keeps hanging out with you even though he knows you’re not interested.”

“Th-that’s w-what f-friends d-do,” Barry points out drily but clasps Len’s hand on his stomach. “And y-you…” He falters briefly. “Y-you d-don’t n-need t-to w-worry ab-bout h-him, L-Len… I d-don’t… h-he’s j-just a f-friend.” Then, he gives the other man a chiding look and adds. “And J-James is n-no sch-schmuck.”

Len smirks, bemused. “You’ve always been a horrible judge of character, Barry.”

Barry smiles, arching an eyebrow. “S-so y-you’re s-saying I’m w-wrong ab-bout y-you nnot b-being a sch-schmuck?”

The other man snorts and grins. “I’d like to think you’re just proving to have good taste in this particular case.”

Barry huffs a laugh and smiles. “Y-you w-would, w-wouldn’t you?”

They watch each other quietly for a long minute, the air between them relaxed and much more comfortable than before.

Then, Len’s expression loses its warmth and turns grim again, causing Barry to tense up, surprised and worried by the sudden change in his demeanour.

“You aren’t broken because you can’t have sex with me,” Len tells him, and the statement is so out of the blue, that Barry can only stare at him with wide eyes. “I told you already that it doesn’t matter.”

Barry looks away as the corner of his lips pull downwards.

“I’m not seeing Izzy because I want to hurt you,” Len reminds him with a slight note of frustration clinging to his words.

“I-I kn-know…” Barry agrees quietly, unhappily. He knows why Len seeks out that woman’s company, and he knows he is an idiot for actually being hurt by it.

“Barry, this doesn’t mean you’re lacking anything,” Len urges, causing Barry to utter a bitter laugh before he realizes what he is doing. It sounds as hurt as he feels, and he can’t help but shoot Len an angry look.

“I-I a-am l-lack-cking…” He shivers and grits his teeth, causing his jaw to ache again. “I-I’m d-dam-maged.”

“That’s-”

Barry ignores Len and presses on. “I’m n-not en-nough, I c-c-can’t g-give y-y-you whwhat y-you n-n-need…” He hisses and hates how his eyes start to itch once more.
“Izzy is not you, Barry,” Len reminds him, and it is frustrating, because Barry knows that Len doesn’t mean it as a slight, but it still feels like one.

Of course that woman isn’t him! She is normal!

He reaches up to press his free hand against his eyes, feeling the sudden urge to hide from Len. If he could, he would just crawl into a hole and disappear…

The hand holding his lets go, and it is like a stab as he expects Len to finally be fed up with him and just leave. Instead, he shudders when his cheeks are cupped, and Len starts to brush the tears away that start to fall despite Barry’s best effort to hold them back.

“I don’t feel for Izzy what I feel for you,” Len repeats, softly. “I never have, and I never will. It is purely physical between us.”

“B-bec-cause I c-can’t-”

“You don’t have to,” Len interrupts him, sounding exasperated now. “I’m not going to pressure you into something like this, Barry. I’d never do that, and I don’t hold this against you in the slightest.” He huffs, and Barry can feel him shift.

The feeling of warm lips on his forehead cause Barry to shiver as the contact is both frightening and comforting.

“It’s not your fault, and it’s not because you’re broken,” Len goes on, his breath hot against Barry’s hairline, he shivers in response. “There are people who don’t do sex. Some just because they don’t want to even though they’ve led a good life. There’s nothing wrong with that.”

Len then pulls back to meet his eyes as he goes on. “And me hooking up with Izzy for sex doesn’t mean anything. It’s just that — sex.”

Slowly, reluctantly, Barry pulls his hand away from his eyes that feel puffy and red, frowning sadly as he meets Len’s gaze.

“I-I c-can’t g-give y-you a-anyth-thing…” he utters miserably.

“Bullshit.” Len grunts and looks seriously annoyed. “You’re not a prostitute I keep around for sex, Barry, stop comparing yourself to Izzy.” When Barry flinches in response to the sharp words, Len grimaces and adds in a more soothing, apologetic voice. “I told you already that I feel… different about you.”

This can mean a lot of things, and Barry wishes Len would be a little more specific, but he is aware of how confusing his own feelings for the other man are, and that he isn’t really ready to open up this particular can of worms just now either.

Even though they’ve briefly touched briefly this bond between them in the past, they have yet to really talk about it and what it means.

… and whether it will change things.

Because the notion that it could do so, irreversibly, is frightening.

Barry reaches up and cups Len’s face in return. He is not happy with Len seeing Izzy, but he can understand why he does so, and his words are comforting and reassuring. They calm a fear in him he usually tries not to face because a part of him is certain that he would end up being left behind once more.

“Y-you m-mean s-so m-much t-to m-me,” Barry states quietly and watches how Len’s expression becomes fonder as the tension eases from his shoulders. “I d-don’t w-want yyou t-to...” He swallows, and it is ridiculous how hard it is for him to get that simple word out. “… l-l-leave.”

“I won’t,” Len replies, and he sounds so certain about it that it causes something in Barry’s chest to constrict painfully. He knows how unlikely such an outcome really is, he has had so many people walk away from him in the past even the ones he was certain would stay with him.

Len doesn’t notice his reaction, though. Instead, he leans down and kisses Barry’s forehead once more, over his right brow, causing him to shudder.

His lips ghost lightly over Barry’s skin as he adds. “You’re stuck with us, Allen.”

Barry swallows and closes his eyes as he puts his arms around Len’s back, holding onto him. He hardly tenses up when his friend does the same before pulling him closer into a firm embrace.

It is odd how relationships change. Barry thinks back to how the Rogues were once his enemies and he theirs, and how different things are now. How close these people are to him and how much they mean to him.

Len and he stay like that for a long moment, holding each other, creating their own bubble of comfort and security while the world around them moves on.

Chapter End Notes

I hope you guys enjoyed this chapter! It is a little shorter than usual, but I promise that the next one will be longer again! :)

Len and Barry talked about what happened at Gilberts and it didn’t turn into a miserable experience for either of them, so YAY! You go, boys!

I know that despite Len’s reasoning for keeping Izzy around, and Barry’s acceptance of it, it is still an awful thing for Len to do, but I hope this chapter gave him some brownie points at least. Something is coming up very soon that will cause a shake-up and make Len rethink his actions, though.

Next chapter will see Jay turning up again with very sad news, and the Rogues will be around again as well, discussing their suspicions about what is really going on with Barry and the Flash. :)

A huge thanks you to all my readers and especially so to everybody who left me a kudos or a comment! You make this whole journey so much more fun for me! :D

I’ll see you in two weeks! <3
“Thanks,” Jay accepts the cup of coffee Barry hands him with a tight smile.

Barry returns it, probably looking just as tense. He feels bad about it, but he can’t help the anxiety that has settled over him with the other man’s visit.

After yesterday had come and gone without Jay turning up to talk, he had started to hope that it would stay that way as he would much rather forget that the night at the gallery had ever happened.

Things don’t work like that, of course, and he can’t say that he is really surprised that Jay does eventually turn up. Even so, he wishes that his apprehension about the upcoming conversation isn’t so plain to see on his face. He doesn’t want to make himself look suspicious by accident, and it is hard to miss that something is bothering Jay — most likely the fiasco that took place at the Gilbert.

“How are you feeling?”

The question causes Barry to turn his attention back to Jay. He tries to smile but is pretty sure that he fails miserably.

“F-fine,” Barry replies and doesn’t miss the doubt in the other man’s eyes, so he adds. “R-really, th-the m-medics l-looked at m-me and g-gave m-me th-their okay t-to g-go hhome. Everyth-thing’s alr-right.”

“You still sound a bit hoarse.”

Barry frowns and looks down in to the cup in front of him, giving a small reluctant shrug. “I’ve p-probably c-caught s-something.”

Jay’s incredulous look makes it clear what he thinks of that, and while Barry knows that he just means well, it is still frustrating to be forced to talk about this.

What does Jay want him to say? That it was Barry’s own fault that he went there in the first place, and if Jay thinks he is holding this incident against Wally, he really doesn’t need to worry. He doesn’t.
Absentmindedly, Barry bites his lower lip but catches himself just a second later, realizing that he is probably making himself look guilty that way which is exactly what he wants to avoid. The thing that worries him the most and that makes him feel wary about Jay stopping by today is the nagging fear that the other man could suspect something about his friendships to the Rogues. He presses his lips into a thin line and lowers his head some more, fixing his gaze on the tea in front of him as he tries to force himself to relax.

“I’m just worried,” Jay explains as he seems to notice Barry’s uneasiness and adds quietly. “Wally’s a strong young man.”

The cup of tea is pleasantly warm when Barry picks it up. He keeps his eyes on the amber liquid it holds and marvels over how quickly his mood can turn from alright to outright depressed. He just wanted to have a small snack and go to bed after returning home from work. Jay, who turned up not even five minutes after Barry himself had arrived at his apartment, clearly has other plans, though, and Barry wishes he had the option to just turn him away. He feels too tired for this.

“I-didn’t hurt me,” Barry repeats but amends when he sees that Jay is about to object again. “N-not m-much, aside f-from m-my th-throat I’m f-fine.”

He takes a sip from the warm liquid and glances briefly to Jay, who is now studying his own cup with a thoughtful and slightly grim expression.

“I-it’s alr-right, J-Jay, r-really,” Barry assures him again.

It is still hard for him to understand why the other man is so obviously troubled by this. Wally didn’t really hurt him, and it was more than likely an incident which wouldn’t occur again. His nephew probably just had a rough day, and seeing his uncle at the scene of the crime could not have made it any easier for him.

Jay lifts his gaze to meet his then, and Barry doesn’t like the slight anger he can spot there.

“You were attacked, that is hardly alright.” Jay doesn’t sound upset per se which is somewhat of a relief, but it is still an odd statement. Not that Barry doesn’t understand where the other man is coming from, but why he would deem this to be something to be troubled over is still beyond him. Wally didn’t seriously injure him, he just lost his temper, and considering what Barry means to the younger speedster, this shouldn’t have come as a surprise to Jay.

“M-maybe,” Barry finally agrees reluctantly, “b-but h-he w-was up-pset. It w-was j-just b-bad l-luck th-that w-w-e m-met th-there.” He shrugs half-heartedly and averts his eyes as he takes another sip of his tea.

“He’s a good man and a good Flash.” Jay’s expression holds something sad as he says this, and Barry nods quietly in agreement. There is no doubt in him that Wally is.

A slight pause settles over them before Jay proceeds, sounding worn-out all of a sudden. “There’s just this anger in him.” Barry purses his lips and tries to ignore the guilt that starts to gnaw at his inside as the older man points this out to him. “He tries to keep it in check, and he succeeds most of the time, but there are situations which cause him to react very rashly and without thinking his actions through at first.”

“You d-don’t n-need t-to d-defend or exp-plain h-his actions.” Barry would give a lot to be able to forget what he let happen to his nephew, what the consequences the young man has to carry around with himself for the rest of his life because of Barry’s failure, but his guilt keeps this knowledge fresh in his mind.

Jay doesn’t know this, of course, or maybe he assumes that Barry could hold Wally’s attack against the younger man, which is utter nonsense. The only person he holds responsible for how much is nephew hates him, is himself.

“I und-derstand wh-why h-he r-reacted t-to m-me th-the w-way h-he d-did.”

Jay nods, but Barry’s assurance doesn’t seem to appease his concern, and his frown stays as he studies him quietly.

“It still wasn’t right of him to attack you,” Jay finally says, and he makes it sound as if he actually has to remind him of this fact. Barry grits his teeth and shrugs, trying to push away the conflicting emotions these words cause in him. “I k-know th-that.”

For some reason, Jay’s words are upsetting to him. They feel more like a stab than the comfort they were meant to be. Barry doesn’t understand why this upsets him so much, but he hates the notion that Jay could think he condones Wally attacking him. He doesn’t, not really…

Wally is a good man and imagining that he would actively hurt someone helpless because he isn’t able to control his anger doesn’t sit well with Barry. It causes remorse to engulf him firmly enough that it becomes hard to breathe.

“The Justice League isn’t very happy about this incident,” Jay goes on, causing Barry to look back at him in alarm. “Especially because it happened in such a public location.”

“H-he isn’t in t-trouble, is h-he?” Barry asks concerned, and the notion that Wally has to face repercussions because of him is as daunting as imagining that the League could have been talking about him.

“No.” Jay shakes his head and leans back into his seat, exhaling a soft sigh. “They’re also aware of the circumstances that lead to his actions.”

This is a relief, and Barry relaxes somewhat, at least until he notices that Jay doesn’t seem to share his sentiment. He isn’t sure what to make of the other man’s grim expression. Jay takes another sip from his cup and looks over to the window above Barry’s kitchen sink, lips slightly pursed.

Barry glances towards it as well, and absentmindedly notices that he can see both of their reflections in the dark glass. “Y-you s-seem b-bothered b-by it,” he remarks tentatively, and Jay gives him a small, humourless smile as he turns back to him.

“I’m bothered by the situation as a whole, Barry,” Jay explains. “I’m worried about Wally.” His eyes meet Barry’s firmly as he proceeds. “About you as well.” He pauses briefly but doesn’t seem intend to wait for Barry to reply, which is good, because Barry wouldn’t have known how to respond anyway. “And there’s just a lot going on right now in general.”

The older man heaves another sigh, a very weary sounding one this time, and reaches up to rub his eyes.

“Wally attacking you is probably going to create a stir none of us need right now,” Jay points out and turns to the kitchen window again, his frown deepening, looking nearly annoyed for a moment.

Barry picks his cup up and presses his fingers hard into the smooth ceramic, enough so that his joints start to complain, as he hesitantly asks. “Is it b-because o-of Alv-vares?”
Surprise flickers over Jay’s expression as he looks back to him.

“I-I r-read ab-bout h-him,” Barry explains quietly and grimaces. “N-not th-the m-most am-miable f-fellow.”

Jay huffs a chuckle and nods. “At least if you’re in our business.”

An uneasy silence settles between them, and it is obvious that Jay didn’t mean anything by it, but Barry is pretty certain that he is not the only one of them who finds the wording of his last statement a little uncomfortable.

Our business…

It’s ironic, and Barry tries to tell himself that he is an idiot for picking up on it, for feeling uneasy about it in the first place. Jay seems to have done the same thing, though, as he looks rather ill at ease for a minute.

“Th-there’ve b-been p-people l-like h-him b-before,” Barry reminds Jay after the silence becomes too tense. “T-the T-twins’ r-resid-dents kn-know wh-what y-you’re d-doing f-for th-them. Y-you d-don’t n-need t-to w-worry ab-bout s-someone l-like him, p-people knknow th-that h-he is j-just using h-his s-smear c-campaign ag-against y-you as a w-way tto g-get at-tention.”

Politicians like Alvares are not uncommon. They’ve been there all along, since the early dawn of superheroes, and while some of them certainly have valid points with how they speak out against the destruction most hero-villain fights bring along, and the possibility of such powerful beings abusing their abilities, it is more often than not only a certain type of person who really tries to rally up animosity against heroes and certainly not for the greater good of their fellow citizens.

Barry himself had been rather lucky when it came to the public’s attitude toward heroes while he was still the Flash. During his years as the Scarlet Speedster both the government and civilians have been very pro superheroes, but it was only a couple of years prior to that that Jay had had to deal with quite the contrary attitude towards him. It seems that that kind of public disfavour is currently returning again, and while it does worry Barry somewhat, he is certain that it is going to wane again, just as it has in the past.

While the public’s goodwill is a fickle thing that can change within weeks, people aren’t stupid, and they do want to do the right thing in the end, after all.

Jay seems surprised by his words, and Barry isn’t sure what to make of the thoughtful, but guarded expression with which the older man is considering him now. It causes the urge to fidget to rise in Barry, and he briefly wonders whether his words could have been taken the wrong way by accident.

Then, the intensity leaves Jay’s gaze, and a softer, warmer expression settles over the other man’s face. He still looks troubled, but a little less so, and when he speaks, he actually smiles slightly. “You’ve always had faith in people.” It is an odd statement, and Barry stays quiet, not sure how to take it or how to respond to it.

“I hope you’re right.” Jay nods and picks up his cup but doesn’t take a sip. Instead he keeps his eyes on Barry, looking rather sombre all of a sudden. “I sometimes think that times were easier when I was younger.” He chuckles in a self-deprecating manner that catches Barry off-guard and causes him to wonder again whether everything is alright with Jay.

Another brief silence settles between them then, and Barry notices once more how exhausted Jay actually looks tonight. As if something was bearing down on him, and he is pretty sure that the situation with Alvares is only part of it.

“No, I am not going to move to Denver for a while,” Jay informs him out of the blue and meets his surprised eyes with a rather grim and worried expression. “She didn’t feel too well over the last month, and suffered dizzy spells which caused us to seek out a doctor a week ago.” Pain and sorrow flickers across the older man’s face before he reaches up and rubs his eyes, exhaling a tired sigh.

Barry starts to feel ill, and even without having Jay tell him so, he already knows that something has to be seriously wrong with Joan. The notion is upsetting, and he feels his stomach knot in response, causing a familiar nausea to join the worry that digs its claws into him.

“They found an abnormally high number of white blood cells in her bloodwork and did some more testing,” Jay proceeds, sounding nearly reluctant as he does so. “It’s leukaemia.”

Slowly, nearly painfully so, he lowers his hands and meets Barry’s taken aback expression. “Denver offers the best treatment possibilities for her type of cancer, and the doctors we spoke with assume that her treatment should take between five to nine weeks. We’re planning to return after that if the cancer goes into remission.” Jay gives him a tight smile, clearly trying to put on a brave face, but Barry doesn’t miss how much this hurts him or how afraid he looks.

It is daunting to think that Joan could die, even with how old she actually is, it seems absurd to imagine her gone. She has always been such a strong woman, so full of life and energy, and kindness… She’s always been there since he met Jay. The notion of Joan suddenly being absent is daunting, painfully so, and he feels nothing but sympathy for the other man, knowing how horrible it is to lose your spouse.

“I’m so sorry,” Barry utters, sounding coarse, and he really wishes he could do something, help somehow.

“Thank you.” Jay nods and gives him another tight but honest smile. “Joan is already on her way to the hospital, she wanted to say goodbye to you herself but we got her a spot in one of the new treatment programs at the DHMC, and they told us it is better if she starts with it as soon as possible.”

“Of course.” Barry nods, touched by the fact that Joan actually wanted to say goodbye to him at all, or that Jay would bring it up. “I’m sure she’s going to be fine, Jay. She’s one of the strongest people I know.”

It hits Barry how unfair life can really be. How stuff like this can happen to good people like the Garricks after they’ve helped others so much.

A cynical little voice in his head reminds him that there’s nothing fair or unfair about life, that everything is just a series of coincidences, and Barry, while not completely agreeing with it, feels slightly comforted by that notion. He pushes that line of thinking away, seeing that this is not the time to split his focus.

“Yes,” Jay agrees, clearly grateful for his kind words. “She really is.”

Jay stays for about another fifteen minutes during which they talk some more about Joan before he has to leave. He tells Barry that he’s going to run over to Denver to stay there the rest of the night, and that he would stop by towards the end of the week again when the whole moving business is hopefully finished.

“Please tell Joan that I wish she gets well soon,” Barry tells Jay after he opens the door for him.
“Of course,” Jay agrees with a faint smile, and while he still looks tired, he doesn’t look as burdened as he did at the start of his visit.

Instead of turning and heading out as Barry expects him to, the older man hesitates and considers him with another thoughtful and concerned expression.

“You can still call me if you need help with anything, Barry,” Jay reminds him. “Or Max. We’re both here for you.”

It is a kind offer, but it sets Barry’s nerves on edge, and a part of him wonders what the other man thinks he could need help with. The Rogues? Could he know about them? Or is it meant in a more general sense?

… or could he be talking about Wally? And isn’t that an upsetting thought?

Jay doesn’t elaborate, and Barry doesn’t ask him to.

“Take care.” Jay gives him a nod and another smile. Then he is gone, and the faintly lit hallway is empty again.

Barry steps back into his apartment, about ready to close the door when he pauses and thinks the better of it. He grabs his keys, turns off the lights, and locks his door behind himself after he entered the hallway.

Eddy doesn’t need any time at all to answer his knocking. The man looks a bit surprised about seeing him, but as usual, he seems to welcome Barry's visit, since a wide grin spreads over his lips as he steps aside to let him in.

“Is this going to be a slumber party?” Eddy asks, eyes glinting. “Because I’m all for that. We can make popcorn, stay up till the early morning hours, and read creepypastas to each other. I can even try and get Mary to join us.”

Barry chuckles tiredly, and lets his friend urge him over to the couch. “I’d p-prefer j-just th-the s-slu

“Of course you would,” Eddy remarks with a snort but doesn’t protest and instead vanishes in the direction of his bedroom for a moment. He comes back with a spare pillow and blanket, both of which Barry accepts gratefully.

“You c-can t-tell m-me i-if I’m b-bothering y-you,” Barry points out but knows that it is pretty much unnecessary.

“I know, and I totally would if this were the case,” Eddy agrees amused and picks the remote off his coffee table. Before he can turn the television off, Barry stops him. “C-can w-we w-watch T-TV f-for a b-bit?”

“Of course.” His friend takes a seat at the other end of the couch after Barry pulls his legs back to make space, and nods to the screen that is currently showing some commercials. “Miami Vice alright with you?”

“S-sure.” Barry moves so that he rests on his side, pulling his legs up closer to his chest and the blanket up to his chin. His friend’s presence is soothing, and he starts to relax just a few minutes into the movie after it starts again, grateful that Eddy doesn’t enquire why he came over. He probably picked up that something had upset him, anyway.
It has been a long couple of days, and Barry really just wants to forget about them for now.

“I really don’t understand why we can’t get one of those.”

“Because it is stupid?”

James glares at Sam and retorts. “It’s not! They’re totally wicked! You’re stupid!”

Sam snorts and rolls his eyes, amused by his friend’s antics. “If you say so Tricks.” He returns his attention back to the cards in his hand.

“They could be worth a lot of money in a couple of years,” James tries again. “Because of collector’s value, you know?”
