The car sped down the quiet road, trees whipping past too quickly to focus on in the dark night. The bright headlights shone tirelessly on the asphalt ahead, the only source of light on the entire stretch of woodland road.

"You're sure you'll be alright if I take a nap?" the passenger in the front seat asked, hands fiddling with a string of wooden beads around one wrist as she watched her husband nervously.

The driver smiled, shooting his wife a quick grin. "I'll be fine!" he cried, making efforts to stay quiet. "It's the middle of the day for us still, right?"

"Even so," the passenger mumbled, turning to peek into the seat behind them. "It's still dark enough to trick the brain into realising otherwise."

There was a short pause, and the driver raised an eyebrow. "How is he?"

The passenger smiled at her teenage son slumped against the car window, teddy bear clutched tightly in his hands and mouth hanging open slightly, drooling on his sleeve. "Fast asleep still." She giggled softly to herself. "He'll be the only one of us awake when we arrive at the next hotel!"

"Poppycock," the driver replied with a smile. "That's the whole reason we decided to drive this last part of the way, isn't it?"

"I thought that was to get us used to driving on the 'wrong' side of the road?" the passenger shot back with a smirk.

The driver shrugged. "Same thing, isn't-," he began to say, but cut himself off as he noticed an anomaly in the silhouette of the road ahead. "What the-!?"

With a roar, a dark mass slammed into view, giving the smaller car enough time only to swerve rapidly to the left before it was upon them.

With a short squeal of tires, the woodland road was silent once more.

Phoenix Wright sighed as he collected his printout from the library printers. 'Hours of searching, and this is all I find on her?' He shot a glare at the fifteen-year-old article in his hands before shoving it into his suitcase, trying to ignore the fact that said suitcase was far more empty and lightweight than it used to be. He self-consciously pulled the blue beanie on his head down over his eyebrows as he turned and headed for the door, hoping he hadn't been recognised. But, of course, who was likely to notice the famous blue-suited, spiky-haired lawyer underneath the loose hoodie and cyan hat?

Said ex-lawyer had come here straight from the detention center, and had the strong feeling he would be going back there very soon. Valant wouldn't be held there forever, and everyone knew it. There simply wasn't nearly enough proof as to which Gramarye had ultimately done the deed, and it seemed certain Magnifi's murder would go unsolved forever... that is, unless Phoenix was able to talk a confession out of the only one that was still around. Valant had been very informative as to what had happened to Thalassa Gramarye, Trucy's mother, so he knew it was possible to coerce information out of him. If only more of it was helpful, though.

As he strode out onto the streets, Phoenix thought over the article he had found. It was a short biography on the lone daughter of the great Magnifi Gramarye, headed by a picture apparently taken by her husband, Zak... or, rather, her second husband. The article itself had little more than rumours on her first one, so Phoenix wasn't going to take it to heart without further proof first. It was a pity Trucy was so young when she'd died, and kept in the dark as to what happened for that matter, or he could ask her his remaining questions about the mysterious Thalassa. 'I just know this whole Magnifi case has something more to do with her than blackmail material... If only I had more evidence!' For now, though, he had a little girl to pick up from school. "Thank goodness for Trucy... if it weren't for her, I don't think I'd be able to continue this investigation..."

"Daddy!"

Phoenix laughed as the boisterous eight-year-old pounced on his shoulders, clinging to his neck with a tight hug. "I take it you had fun today?" he asked with a grin, hugging his daughter back.

"Uh-huh!" Trucy replied, jumping back and grabbing Phoenix's hand as they began their walk to the nearest bus-stop on their way home. "There's been another attack by the demon of Forest Road!"

"Oh really?" Phoenix asked, resisting the urge to roll his eyes. "Every story of this so-called demon sounds more and more like a Scooby-Doo episode..."

"Jinxie says it claimed two people this time," Trucy excitedly continued, tugging at her collar where her red cape usually rested, "and there was a kid who just barely escaped with their life!"

Phoenix nodded, barely listening. "Uh huh. And the police still haven't found anything on this case, I presume?"

Trucy tapped her chin in thought. "Yeah, I think so. Jinxie says they'd have to, um, 'exercise' the road to stop the disappearances."

"I think you mean 'exorcise', Truce," Phoenix corrected with a gentle smile. "It's what you call getting rid of demons."

"Right! That was it!" the eight-year-old cheered. "Jinxie's so smart about these kind of things!"

Phoenix decided not to comment, thinking on the more serious news that somewhere out there was another child now parentless. "The poor kid," he mused aloud. "It would be terrible to lose both your parents at the same time like that, no matter how old you are."
"It's okay, Daddy," Trucy assured her adoptive father, stopping him dead in his tracks as she hugged his waist tightly. "The police will exercise the demon for them, won't they?"

Unable to resist a smile, Phoenix petted his daughter's bare head, looking down on the bright brown eyes gazng back up at him. "I'm sure they will," he replied, then reached down and picked Trucy off the pavement, getting a squeal of delight from the girl in return. "Now, a change of subject!" he announced. "Daddy has another secret mission tomorrow, so you have to be a good girl and go to bed on time, okay?"

Trucy rolled her eyes with an exaggerated sigh, clinging to her father's neck and looking back the way they'd come. "Sure, Daddy," she mumbled in a monotone, adding with a whine "Why can't I go on your secret missions too?"

"Believe me, I'd let you if I could," Phoenix replied, patting the girl's back where her brand-new school blouse still bore creases. "But you have school, so I can't." 'Not to mention, it's for your own safety if my suspicions about Kristoph are correct...'

"Fiiiiiiine," Trucy sighed dramatically, and said nothing the rest of the way to the bus-stop.

Phoenix's Office

"You're sure you can't have a word with them over the phone?"

"Sorry, pal," Detective Dick Gumshoe's voice echoed through the phone line. "I could do it for you yesterday because I was there to talk 'em 'round in person, but I ain't got the time for that today!" He sighed the world-weary sigh Phoenix had heard far too many times since the incident in April. "I'm really sorry, pal. This case is really important, and it just came up yesterday...! I... really wish I could help..."

Even though it couldn't be seen through the phone, Phoenix shook his head. "No, it's fine, Detective." He felt a little guilty for playing to poor Gumshoe's lingering guilt to call in favours like this, but he couldn't see any other way to continue his investigation without his badge. "I'll find some other way to talk to Valant again." 'It's not like I have nothing but time to work on this investigation, anyway.' "Good luck on your case, by the way. Is Edgeworth working on it with you?"

Gumshoe huffed. "You know I can't tell you that, pal! Even if you were still a lawyer!" He suddenly paused, sounding nervous. "Er, not that I'm rubbing that in or anything..."

"Please, it's fine," Phoenix insisted, unconsciously reaching for the spot on his chest where his badge used to sit as he leaned back in the chair behind his desk. "Oh yeah, Edgeworth isn't even in the country at the moment, is he? Of course he's not working with you. And von Karma is probably still working with Interpol, huh?"

Gumshoe chuckled, and Phoenix could imagine the trenchcoated detective shrugging with that wide grin of his. "We don't have a prosecutor assigned yet anyways! This one's been going on so long, I actually replaced the previous detective on it. Something about fresh looks finding new evidence."
'And there is Gumshoe's classic running of the mouth... too bad it's not helpful to me anymore. At least I know he's not working with Gavin the Younger.' "I'll let you get back to work. Say hi to Maggey for me, will you?"

"Sure thing, pal!" Gumshoe replied cheerily. "You give your kid a hug from Uncle Gumshoe!"

'I might if she'd ever met you properly,' Phoenix wryly thought to himself as he hung up the phone, pushing himself off his chair as he began to pace his small office. 'Dammit. No trip to the detention center today after all.' He dropped his cell phone on the coffee table next to Mia's old office phone, something he still resisted using due to the lingering memory of the time it had been tapped, and its owner found dead not far away. 'What should I do now, Chief? What did you do when your investigation into Bluecorp stalled?' Very little about this room had changed since Mia's death, from the desk and bookcase of legal books to the movie poster on the wall. Perhaps the most dramatic was when Trucy had determinedly dragged Charley the plant out into the front room to provide a 'cheerful atmosphere' for their customers. Said front room was already drastically different from the days when Phoenix had used it himself as Mia's junior partner, or even when Maya claimed it as hers in the years inbetween (The piano she'd added was certainly proving useful, however). Not that Phoenix was going to stop his eight-year-old self-proclaimed 'professional' from trying to attract new clients; On the contrary, he was finding the rapid changes to their small apartment upstairs and the reception area he'd once worked in were helping ease the transition from 'lawyer' to 'pianist/professional poker player'. 'If only I could bring myself to do something about this room, too.'

Phoenix was startled out of his thoughts by a ringing phone, which he quickly identified as the office phone. 'Please don't be a reporter. I don't want to have to unplug this thing again!' He grabbed the handset off the hook in one smooth motion and brought it to his ear. "Wright Talent Agency, can we help you?"

'Please don't ask for "the Forgin' Attorney". I will hurt someone.'

"Mister Wright?" said a smooth voice with a distinct English accent. "I hope I have not called at an inconvenient time for you."

Giving a sigh of relief as he recognised his caller, Phoenix shook his head. "No, now's perfect. I'm literally doing nothing important." He frowned in thought. "Actually, why are you calling, Professor Layton?"

Hershel Layton gave a rare sigh of his own. "I'm not sure if my last letter to you has arrived yet. Are you aware of the Tritons' plans to leave England?"

"Oh, it arrived just the other day," Phoenix replied, rubbing his chin in thought. "I haven't written a reply yet. They're moving to America, right? You said soon-ish?"

"I watched them sail off just last week," the Professor explained. "Luke was rather hurried packing his things, but he promised to mail me their new address once he got off the boat, and I thought it rather prudent to pass it on to you."

At this, Phoenix had to scratch his head. "Um, not to be rude Professor, but shouldn't Luke do that himself?"

There was a pause. "I'm afraid I must ask a favour of you, Mister Wright."

'Wait... what?"

"The Tritons are scheduled to be moving in around now. I looked up a map from the library, and their new home doesn't appear to be too far from Los Angeles."
Phoenix raised an eyebrow in surprise. "Wow, there's a co-incidence."

There was another short pause before the Professor continued. "I admit, I worry about Luke, especially in these first few weeks while he will be settling in to his new home. I trust his parents to look out for him - his father is a good friend of mine - but, and I tell you this in the strictest of confidence, Luke and Clark have not been getting on very well as of late."

'Clark being Luke's father, I presume,' Phoenix thought, and couldn't resist a smile as an image came to mind from only last year, of young Luke running to his beloved mentor, tears in his eyes of pure relief to see him made of flesh and not gold. Not that they would realise until a little later that he had never been made of gold, but that was neither here nor there. "You want me to drop in on them?" he asked. "Check Luke's okay?"

"If you could," Professor Layton asked, sounding slightly relieved. "I'm sure Luke has told his parents about our adventure together in Labyrinthia, and I have informed Clark myself that I have friends in America I might ask to offer help should they need it."

Phoenix chuckled. "Glad to be of assistance." He thought for a moment. "I should bring Trucy 'round with me; I'm sure she'd love to meet him."

"Indeed," the Professor replied, a smile in his voice. "I don't believe Luke has read your last letter to us, so you may have to explain to him your new circumstances."

"Right," Phoenix muttered, resisting a wince. 'I knew I shouldn't have waited so long to write...' It was difficult enough explaining things to himself, let alone a twelve-year-old friend. Or, would Luke be thirteen by now? "I'll grab my notepad and get that address off you."

Professor Layton softly laughed. "Much obliged, Mister Wright."

"So your friend might be going to my school?" Trucy asked, bouncing along the pavement at just the right pace to make her tiny cape flap behind her like open wings.

"Possibly," Phoenix replied, smiling down at his daughter and patting her red silk hat, which was jammed tightly on her head so it didn't fly off. "They might not even be there yet. We'll have to see when we get there."

Trucy grinned. "That's okay! I can always hand out flyers for the Wonder Bar while we're here!" She patted the small satchel at her waist, full of home-designed flyers for her regular weekly performances. "Then this won't be a wasted trip!"

Phoenix chuckled, once again marvelling to himself how business-savvy his little magician was at such a young age.

"What was his name again?" Trucy added.

"Unless he's had a growth spurt in the past ten months," Phoenix said with an amused smile, "he shouldn't be. He's short, but he is about four or five years older than you, after all."

The numbers on the houses they passed were getting closer to their target, and Trucy began to read them aloud. "Eighteen-thirty-eight... eighteen-forty... eighteen-forty-two... Are we close yet?"

"Eighteen-forty-six," Phoenix muttered, pointing to a blue house just up ahead, in front of which was a policeman and two civilians, loudly arguing. "That must be it. The policeman isn't a good sign, though..."

As the Wrights got closer, the raised voices of the trio ahead slowly became legible. "I sold this house to them, and I am handing the keys only to them, not to some namby-pamby moron dressed up as a cop!"

"Whether they had the keys yet or not," the policeman argued with an amazing calm, "this house was their legal property and thus now belongs to the state! You are obstructing justice, ma'am!"

"Obstructing justice my behind!" an angry woman in red shouted. "This house ain't got nothing to do with the police! How can I trust anything some rando waiting for me on the street says!?"

The woman's friend, a balding man in a green jogging suit, nodded firmly. "We need more proof than just your word. We're not leaving until the appointed time for the handover is up."

Phoenix patted Trucy in a silent instruction to stay put, and stepped towards the trio, clearing his "throat. "Excuse me? Can I help?"

"Unless you're Clark Triton," the woman angrily spat, "then no."

'Triton... So this is Luke's house. I was afraid of that.' "I'm not Mister Triton, true, but I am a... friend of the family," Phoenix explained. "Has... something happened to them?"

The man and woman stalked off to a nearby car while the policeman sighed. "I apologise you had to find out this way, sir," he said. "Have you heard of the recent accident on Forest Road?"

Phoenix's eyes widened in shock, and he heard Trucy gasping behind him. "That was the Tritons?" he breathed.

The policeman nodded, grimacing in sympathy. "Mister and Missus Triton are officially considered dead." He shot an angry glare at the couple sitting in their car nearby and added, "My job was to follow the schedule we found in their belongings and add up their possessions for processing."

'Frankly, I couldn't care less about their stuff!' "What about Luke?" Phoenix asked, trying not to sound frantic. "How is he? Where is he?"

"The boy is alive," the policeman assured the ex-lawyer. "I'm afraid I don't know where he is, though. You'd have to talk to the detective in charge, I think."

Phoenix nodded. "And who's that? I might have to call in another favour with Gumshoe after all...'

Shaking his head, the policeman only said, "Can't tell you that, sir. This case is a matter of total secrecy!"

"But that's not fair!" Trucy piped up, charging to Phoenix's side and holding her hands on her hips with a pout on her lips. "You tell us to talk to someone, but won't say who they are!? How are we supposed to find him?"

"Sorry, miss," the man said, not sounding sorry at all. "Not my job."

Trucy growled in frustration, but Phoenix calmly turned and guided her back down the road with a hand on her shoulder. "No use arguing with him," he told her.

"But what do we do?" the eight-year-old asked. "Your friend is missing! How are we supposed to find him?"

Phoenix grinned. "Never underestimate your Daddy, Truce. I'll find him. You can count on that."

August 27, 9:24AM

LA General Hospital

Ward 278

"Ah, you're awake! Welcome back to the world of the living! We were worried about you!"

"W... Where am I? What happened!?”
"A hospital, kiddo. Los Angeles. Do you know where that is?"

"Y-yeah, of course... Where's my mum and dad?"

"..."

"Miss? What... what happened to my parents!?"

"... There'll be a detective along to speak with you in a moment, kiddo. He'll explain everything."

Luke Triton fidgeted nervously in his hospital bed, alone in the quiet room. His left arm itched under the thick plaster cast that had been set on it, and his head felt cold without the familiar weight of his blue cap. None of this was enough to distract him from the dark feeling of dread that had been building in his stomach since he woke up only minutes earlier. This is not how I imagined my first day in my new hometown going...'

The door on his left creaked open, and Luke looked up to see a tall, dark-haired man with wide shoulders peeking his head in, grinning widely in the boy's direction. "Hey there!" he said, and sidled into the room, tugging his dirty brown-green coat away from the door as he carefully closed it behind him. "I guess I've been left with the job of explainin' what's going on to you, pal."

Luke frowned and looked away, then mentally admonished himself for his terrible manners and forcibly softened his glare. "I guess," he mumbled.

The man pulled a chair up to Luke's bedside and sat himself down, looking a little more nervous now than cheery. "My name's Dick Gumshoe. I'm a detective," he said, holding out his right hand to shake.

Forcing a small smile, Luke returned the gesture. "Luke Triton," he replied. He found himself mentally comparing this American detective to the ones he'd met back home, and decided he was about as openly friendly as Grosky but much less energetic about it, like Chelmey. Not that I can say anything for sure after less than a minute knowing him, of course.

"Yeah, I know who you are, pal," the detective replied, looking sad. "Listen, the nurse said you don't remember what happened. Could you tell me what you do remember?"

Luke frowned to himself in thought. "We were driving to our new home... Mum said we were going to stay in a hotel until our furniture arrived. We were driving through the night. I went to sleep in the car..." He paused, his hand going to his face as he felt tears burning at the corners of his eyes. "I... I don't..."

"Hey, hey, it's okay, pal!" Gumshoe interrupted, patting Luke's shoulder in a comforting gesture. "I figured you might not remember anyway, but I had to ask, y'know?" When this apparently failed to comfort the now-sobbing teen, he began to visibly panic, clutching his hands together in his lap. "Uh, kid, I'm really sorry about this..."

"They're dead, aren't they?" Luke managed to ask in shaky breaths, face hidden in his one free hand.

Gumshoe froze in shock, and took a few moments to recover, returning to patting Luke's shoulder above his cast. "I really am sorry, pal."

Luke just nodded. After a moment to compose himself, he took a deep breath and asked, "What happened to them?"
"Car accident," Gumshoe replied softly. "We're still working out the details, though."

'That makes sense,' Luke thought. 'I can't think of anything else it could have been.'

"The other car disappeared from the scene long before we arrived," Gumshoe continued, his hand moving to rest on Luke's right hand. "We got you and your stuff out of there, but there wasn't any sign of your mom and dad, pal."

At that, Luke paused. "No sign...?" he repeated.

"It doesn't look likely we'll find 'em, either," Gumshoe sadly added with a shrug. "There's been loads of accidents a lot like this one on that road, all in the past year. Not one's been solved yet."

"How many?" Luke asked, snapping his determined gaze up to meet the detective's. "How many are missing?"

Gumshoe shook his head, giving Luke a suddenly stern look. "Hey, pal, this is an ongoing police investigation! I can't tell you that kind of stuff!"

"Just 'cause you didn't find 'em," the boy insisted, gesturing wildly with his right arm, "doesn't mean they're dead! My mum and dad might still be out there!"

The detective shook his head, standing up from his chair. "I'm sorry, pal. I didn't want to share the gory details cuz these are your parents 'n all," he said, "but we found a lot of blood at the scene, more than enough for two adults to have bled out. We aren't gonna find them alive."

Luke's determination faded, and he returned to staring at his lap sadly.

"I won't bug you anymore, since you don't remember anything," Gumshoe continued in a sadder tone. "Good luck, pal." With that, he turned and left the room.

Thirteen-year-old Luke Triton curled up into a ball and wished desperately he was back in England. 'If this is a nightmare... I want to wake up now... Please...’

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
Luke never saw the friendly detective after that first terrible day in the hospital. The nurses, as nice as they were, tried to keep him company between all their other duties, and a series of social workers came by to ask him questions and fill out paperwork and tests while they decided what to do with him. As it turned out, their eventual answer was a local boarding school, which Luke had more than passed the test for applying to. He wasn't sure what exactly that would mean, since this would be his first time in a public school after being home-schooled since nursery.

A short woman came by at the end of Luke's week in hospital to take him to his new, albeit temporary, 'home', packing up Luke's massive suitcase with his clothes and scarce personal items that had been recovered from the car, including two much smaller suitcases with small paper tags labelled "Clark Triton" and "Brenda Triton" respectively.

"You can call me Nanny K, dear," she said. "Or if you're uncomfortable with that, Nancy, since that's my name."

"Um, alright Miss Nancy," Luke had replied as he struggled to pull on his shirt over his cast.

Nancy laughed. "Oh, dear, no-one calls me that! Just Nancy is fine!"

With one of Luke's arms out of action, Nancy carried the bags herself on their way out of the hospital (Luke insisted on carrying his teddy however), and piled them into a small, yellow car. Once she had ensured her young charge was buckled into the passenger seat, she set off down the road.

Twenty minutes later, Luke found himself staring up at an iron gate, adorned with the words "TURNER BOARDING SCHOOL". Beyond, a rectangular building three stories tall, resembling a block of flats except for its lack of balconies. He found himself gulping in trepidation.

A bell rang from somewhere in the distance, and Nancy looked at her watch as she came up beside Luke with his larger trunk. "Oop, ten o'clock," she narrated. "That'll be third period starting over in the classrooms." She reached over to a small speaker box on the brick wall surrounding the gate and pressed the button. "Hugo, I'm back with our new student!"

"Gotcha, Ms. K!" came the voice of a young man through the scratchy speaker, followed by a loud buzzing noise. Nancy pushed the gate open and gestured for Luke to follow her, the buzzing sound quitting as the gate began to swing closed again behind them.

"You did very well on your entrance exam, young Mister Triton," Nancy said as they walked towards the large building before them.

Luke hugged his teddy tighter. "Um, thank you."

"The Principal decided, instead of putting you in Eighth Grade with your age group," Nancy explained with a cheery smile, "you're going to be going in with the Sophomores! You're a surprisingly intelligent lad, aren't you? Skipping two grades at once!"

"Uh..." Luke mumbled. 'Eighth grade would be Year 8, I suppose. That was the year Mum thought I might go into, right?' "Mi-, um, Nancy, what's a 'sophomore'?'"

Nancy laughed. "Tenth Grade, dear!" she answered. "I forgot those are terms we only use here in America!"

Luke blinked in surprise. 'Tenth...!? The headmaster thinks I'm that good?'

Nancy led Luke into an elevator, and they travelled in silence up to the third floor. Luke looked around in wonder as they exited into a long hallway, polished black doors lining the walls at regular intervals for almost the entire length of the building. Below his tattered brown shoes was a soft yellow carpet, and fluorescent lights dotted the white ceiling. The doors were labelled with plaques, each displaying a three-digit number, and Luke quickly noticed they all began with 3. Every sixth room on his left was instead labelled with a shower-head symbol, with the door next to it displaying a stick figure indicating a toilet. His mind already wandering back to London, Luke found he had to restrain himself from thinking up a puzzle about the door numbers to send back home.

To their right, almost at the end of the hallway, Nancy stopped in front of a door and pulled out a key from a pocket, which she used to open the door. "Here we are, dear," she announced. "Your new room!" She stepped back and gestured for Luke to go in ahead.

Stepping into the room, Luke was first struck by how similar it was at first glance to his old room back in Misthallery. The entire room was decorated in shades of pastel blue, with a medium-sized window on the opposite wall and a single, small bed taking up about a third of the room's total width. Opposite the bed was a small desk and accompanying chair, a set of wooden drawers, and a plastic rail with a handful of wire coathangers dangling from it. Luke walked to the middle of the empty space, clutching his teddy tightly. 'My new home, I guess. Better get used to it.'

Nancy set Luke's suitcase down by the drawers. "Why don't you start getting settled in, and I'll bring up the rest of your bags, dear." Smiling at the boy, she plucked a small key off the top of the drawers and held it out for him to take. "And by the way, this is your room key. If you lose it, you come talk to me."

Luke watched the kind lady leave, then sat down on the bed, clutching the key in his fist and his teddy in his arms. 'I should probably start unpacking my clothes,' he told himself. Even so, he didn't move from his perch.

Sirius Turner Boarding School for Boys

Cafeteria

The hallways were busy and loud, full of boys anywhere between the ages of eleven and eighteen all hanging out and chatting with each other. Lockers lining the walls clanged as their owners opened and closed them, and the crowds slowly but surely emptied in the direction of the second-largest room in the entire school building.
Fresh off a busy morning deciding on his class schedule, Luke warily picked his way through the queues for food that circled the cafeteria. He couldn't help but feel out of place in his blue cap and jacket when everyone else was in black uniforms, but Nancy had said they'd find him a uniform from their storeroom after lunch, so he was still in his old clothes for now. As he grabbed a tray and picked a line, he could feel the stares he attracted as an out-of-uniform stranger with a broken left arm, especially one towards the younger end of the age range.

It was difficult to find a place to sit among the crowded tables, especially while holding his tray one-handed, but Luke eventually found an empty corner to sit at. While normally he would have been trying to make friends and allies, he found he didn't want to deal with any more social interaction than he had to today, so he ate alone, doing his best to ignore the stares burning into him from all sides.

A body dropped into the chair opposite Luke, and he looked up to see an older teenager, arms crossed and resting on the table as he leered down at the boy through a thick fringe of black hair. "You new, kid?" he said, more of an observation than a question. "You can't be local, you gotta be a dormer. What happened to your arm?"

Luke instinctively held his broken arm closer to his body, but tried to keep up the gentlemanly demeanour the Professor had taught him. "I broke it," he said simply, returning as quickly as he could to his food.

The older teen scoffed. "I can see that," he cried. "What'd you do? Some colossal accident that pissed off your parents so hard they packed you off to boarding school?" He laughed, unnoticing of Luke's wince at the fictional scenario. "We've had that happen here before! Was it crashing a car? It's usually crashing a car."

"Y'see," Fringe continued, "I saw you haven't got a uniform yet, so I figured you were put here in a hurry, and the school year's only just started too, so there had to be a good reason you were moved here of all places! And you're a rich kid, right? Only rich kids get transferred to boarding school!" He laughed again, leaning back in his chair with his arms behind his head, grinning smugly. "The broken arm gave the whole story away, though. Yep, I am a genius at figuring these things out! C'mon, tell me how right I am!"

Luke was still frozen with his fork resting on his plate, too focussed on keeping outwardly calm and above all tear-free to react.

"Hey, ignoramus!"

The older teen quickly stood, chair scraping across the floor loudly, and Luke looked up to see two other boys about the same age as Fringe rapidly approaching.

"Can't you see the new kid wants to be alone right now?" one of the approaching boys cried, pointing fiercely at Fringe as he stepped up to the table end between the other teen and Luke.

"This ain't got nothing to do with you, Space Cadet!" Fringe retaliated, waving the two boys off. "We're just talking!"

The second boy, brown hair sticking up at the front like a pair of antennae, crossed his arms. "Didn't look like it from where we were sitting."
Space Cadet nodded, adjusting the visor sticking out of his mop of black hair. "Looked more like you making hurtful assumptions again. Sherlock Holmes you are not, Ernest."

"You can both can it!" Fringe cried with a snort. "You're just jealous I'm descended from the greatest detective of all time!" Even so, he stepped away from the table and stalked off, throwing a hand at them dismissively. "Ah, screw you guys!"

Immediately, Antenna Hair turned to face Luke, concern in his eyes. "Are you okay?"

Luke nodded, steadying his breathing as he noticed how rapid it had become in the tense moment.

Space Cadet looked around, frowning in thought, then leaned on the table where Fringe had been sitting. "Hey, is it alright if my friend and I sit here? We won't talk if you don't want to."

"Yeah, no-one talks to us," Antenna Hair added with a chuckle. "You won't have to worry about people approaching you anymore."

"Mm-hmm," Luke muttered, before taking a deep breath and nodding more energetically. "I would appreciate that. Thank you."

Space Cadet grinned, giving Luke a thumbs up. "Cool!" He plopped down in his seat and waved at his friend, leaning back in the chair. "Apollo, go get my tray, will you?"

"Why do I have to go get the trays?" Antenna Hair protested with a frown. "'Cause you're standing up," Space Cadet explained, holding his arms behind his head cockily.

Rolling his eyes, Antenna Hair, or rather Apollo, walked off. "Be back in a bit."

There was silence for a few moments as Luke returned to his food. Space Cadet shifted in his seat to lean on the table, staring off after his friend with amusement, and Luke supposed Apollo was having as much trouble carrying two trays as Luke had with just his one. 'I suppose that would be an amusing sight,' he thought, but stuck to his own lunch rather than turn to watch.

Eventually Apollo returned, dropping a tray with a half-eaten lunch in front of his friend with no small amount of resentment. Space Cadet grinned and gave a mock bow. "Why, thank you Jeeves!" he said in an exaggerated Queen's English accent, which Apollo muttered darkly at as he took his seat beside his friend. Luke restrained a giggle.

"You just did that to watch me struggle, didn't you?" Apollo said to his friend. "You can be such a jerk, Clay."

Space Cadet, Clay, scoffed, saying "You know you love me!" before shoving a piece of toast into his mouth.

Luke smiled. I like these two, he decided. They seem trustworthy, and they aren't treating me differently... They helped even though they know nothing about me.' Having enough of his food, he placed his fork down on his plate and looked across at the pair, hands in his lap. "Are you two always like this?"

"As in, Clay annoying the ever-loving hell out of me?" Apollo asked dryly.

"Ha!" his friend cried. "You take everything so seriously, Apollo! You're just asking to be made fun of!"
Luke restrained another giggle, then held out his hand. "I should introduce myself. My name is Luke Triton!"

Clay didn't hesitate to reach out and shake the offered hand, grinning widely. "Clay Terran!" he replied, then gestured to his friend. "This is Apollo Justice. He's a bit stuck-up, but I like him."

"I'm not stuck up!" Apollo protested.

"Where are you from, by the way?" Clay continued, ignoring Apollo as he gazed curiously at Luke. "You sound English."

Both Clay and Apollo reacted with surprise, Apollo's eyes bugging out while Clay's eyebrows shot up. "Huh," Clay muttered.

"If you're English," Apollo asked in confusion, "what are you doing in California!?"

"Ah!" Clay cried, his smile returning to his face. "That explains Einstein's terrible trainwreck of assumptions earlier!" He laughed heartily.

"So which grade are you in?" Apollo asked, attention still on Luke. "Sixth? Seventh?"

Luke had to think a moment to translate the question in his head and retrieve the answer. "Um, tenth, actually."

Apollo sputtered, almost jumping out of his chair in surprise. "You're a-!?"

Clay gave a more subdued, thoughtful tap on his chin. "You don't look our age," he mused.

"I'll be fourteen in November," Luke boasted, puffing out his tiny chest. "But I took a test, and the headmaster thinks I belong in Yea-, I mean, Tenth Grade."

Clay grinned. "Thought so. You're one of them smart cookies."

Luke smiled in silent thanks. "I'm still moving in to the dormitory," he said. "Do you two also stay there?"

Apollo looked confused, but obviously elected not to say anything. Clay nodded. "Yep, we're dormers. If you're a sophomore, you'll be on the same level as us, too." He snorted in laughter through his cocky grin, then added "Actually, come drop by my dorm after school's finished! Room three-twelve! Apollo and I can show you around!"

"Sure," Apollo agreed. "That sounds like fun."

Luke nodded. "Alright, it's a deal!"
The colour scheme of Clay Terran's room was almost impossible to see past the multiple space-themed posters placed on every flat vertical space within reach (Luke was beginning to suspect this was the origin of the 'Space Cadet' nickname). Although his room, layout identical to Luke's, had a window on the wall opposite the door, it looked out onto the school building itself, the open square full of students and parents on their way home at the end of the day. A fold-up stool sat in the middle of a sea of books and papers, and the space on top of the drawers was full of handmade models of various types of spacecraft, both fictional and non-fictional. It was almost impressive how quickly it had become so messy, given school had been back from summer break for only a week or two.

Apollo was the first to sit down as Clay gestured them in, claiming the stool and kicking away the papers under his feet to make room for himself, clearly at home in his friend's room. Luke followed more gingerly, trying to find spots where he could see glimpses of carpet to put down his feet, while Clay just bounced over to his bed and flopped down on the unmade sheets, laughing as his door closed itself with a thud. "Don't worry about the floor!" he cried, patting the space next to him. "Come sit down, Luke!"

"Seriously," Apollo added with a wry smirk. "It's his own fault he leaves stuff everywhere, so if you ruin something by stepping on it, nobody will blame you."

Luke considered this for a moment before carefully stepping over the crowded floor and sitting on the bed next to the grinning Clay.

"So," Apollo said with a clap of his hands, "has Nanny K given you a tour? It didn't occur to us until later that she might do that."

"A bit," Luke admitted, not wanting to hurt their feelings by admitting Nancy had given him a full tour. "She took me all over getting my classes and uniform sorted out, of course."

Clay shrugged. " Eh, that's fine," he said with a smile, leaning back on his arms. "It's real busy right now anyway, what with the local kids heading home."

"But 'boarding school' is in the name," Luke pointed out with some confusion, looking out the window. "Why are there local kids coming here?"

"It got opened up to them a few years back," Apollo explained, kicking at the papers at his feet. "Apparently they don't get as many dormers as they used to."

Nodding sagely, Clay added "Most of us are either orphans or don't get on with our parents or guardians. Apollo here's one of the former."

Luke blinked in surprise. "Really?"

Apollo sighed. "I have a foster home I go to over breaks, but otherwise I pretty much live here."

"I see," Luke quietly muttered to himself, not noticing the suspicious look Apollo gave him in return.
"Lucky me," Clay laughed, "I get to spend my weekends and breaks back at home, while my Dad asks me questions and tries to be 'hip'." He rolled his eyes exaggeratedly, and Luke giggled. "Not that I go home every weekend, though. Someone needs to entertain Apollo, or he gets lonely." He winked at his friend, who just shook his head in amused exasperation.

"You two must be really close," Luke mused aloud. "How long have you been friends?"

Apollo smiled. "A few years now," he explained. "Clay drags me to the Space Center every so often, and I drag him to the courthouse occasionally, but somehow we're still friends despite all that."

Clay nodded, then turned to Luke. "By the way, you're still moving in, right? We could help you out."

"Thank you," Luke replied with a grateful smile, "but I didn't have much with me. I'm already done." It had been a bittersweet hour or two emptying his few bags and placing his meagre belongings around the small room. Most of what he had was clothes, and the mindless task had given him a lot of time to think, which was the absolute last thing he'd wanted to have to do.

"What about your classes?" Apollo cut in. "You're in our grade. Maybe we share some?"

"That's a good point," Clay agreed.

Luke thought. "I'd have to get my schedule." He slid off Clay's bed and stood on the messy floor. "Would you like to accompany me to my room?"

Apollo smirked in amusement at the phrasing, but restrained himself from outright laughing. "Um, sure," he said.

The sound from outside had died down to only the occasional passing car. After a long discussion working out which classes they shared ("Looks like we share Chemistry." "Yep, you may need to tutor Apollo in that one. He's terrible at it!") and which teachers to be extra careful with ("Hey, isn't that the same English class as you, Clay?" "Uh-oh, you're stuck with the Major! She's ultra strict; Ex-army, they say!"), the three teens had turned conversation again to themselves. To Luke's relief, apart from a quick comment by Clay on the cuteness of the teddy bear on Luke's pillow, his new friends were happy to continue not asking questions about Luke himself, although it was clear to the younger boy that they were quickly growing more and more curious about their new friend.

"Apollo here may be loud," Clay was saying as they discussed an incident during which the two were kicked out of school choir for overuse of their 'Chords of Steel', "but it's really because of his loudness that we even became friends."

"Really?" Luke asked with surprise, seeing Apollo nodding sagely despite the dig at his voice.

"Here's something you won't know:" Clay explained, and Luke noticed his jovial exterior seemed to have vanished for the time being. "A few years back, my mom suddenly got really sick and died."

Luke gasped. "Oh, I'm so sorry!" he cried instinctively.

"I'm fine," Clay insisted, shaking his head. "I was still here when I found out. I got the day off class, but I had to wait for my dad to come get me before I could leave, so I was stuck." He stood up from his seat on Luke's bed and looked out the window over the front gate below. "That night, I went outside for some air... and Apollo came to check up on me."

Apollo shrugged from the desk chair, blushing in embarrassment as he rubbed the back of his neck. "There were stories all over school of what had happened, and when I saw Clay all on his own, I had to see if he was alright."

Clay turned from the window, giving his friend a sincere smile of thanks. "That was our first ever Chords of Steel workout!"

"Yeah," Apollo mumbled, crossing his arms. "Since we both knew what it was like to lose a parent."

Luke's gaze turned to his violin case, propped up against the wall below the window. "So, um," he said as he turned his attention back to the conversation, "your 'Chords of Steel'... I don't mean to be rude, but isn't it just shouting?"

"Guess so," Apollo admitted, "but it really helps with motivation and getting yourself pumped up for something."

"Mostly we just shout 'I'm fine' until we believe it," Clay added with a smile. "Apollo here plans to use it in his future career, though."

Apollo grinned. "Gotta shout to be heard in a noisy courtroom!"

Luke nodded, remembering the loud and very messy witch trials he'd sat in on back in Labyrinthia. No doubt trials in a more modern-day courtroom were nowhere near as bad as those. They were lucky Mister Wright had been talented enough to make it all work out their way in the end regardless. 'Wait a second...' "Apollo?" he asked. "You want to work in a courtroom?"

"Uh-huh!" Apollo replied, grinning widely. "I'm gonna be a defence lawyer!"

Luke felt his jaw drop open in surprise.

Clay laughed. "Just don't do as badly as your hero did, huh?"

Apollo frowned. "Yeah, yeah, hilarious." He looked back at Luke with a deadly serious look. "One day, I'm gonna be famous and have my picture in all the papers... Then my family's gonna see me and regret letting me go."

Luke cocked his head to one side. "Your family?"

"They abandoned me," Apollo explained, nose crinkling in disgust, then reached into an inside pocket in his uniform's jacket and pulled out a golden bracelet, decorated with an intricate pattern that seemed to resemble repeated eyes. "This is all I have left from them. I'm gonna wear it in court when I grow up and show them what they sent away."

Luke leaned forward in his seat to inspect the bracelet closely, making sure not to reach out to touch it without express permission. "It looks pretty."

"Yeah," Apollo agreed, looking at it fondly before placing it back in his pocket. "They don't let me wear it in class, though."

"As for me," Clay interrupted, "I'm gonna be an astronaut!" He bounced over to Luke, sitting back down on the bed next to him. "My mentor works at the Cosmos Space Center, but they're still working on their first space mission." He puffed out his chest proudly. "When that happens, everyone will know Mister Starbuck's name!" He looked down at Luke. "What about you? What do you want to be when you grow up?"

Luke thought for a long moment, staring into the distance. "I... haven't really decided," he admitted. "I always thought I'd get to stay in London, solving puzzles and mysteries with the Professor, even once I'd grown up, but..." He shook his head. "I never worked out what I'd be doing outside of that." He sighed. "I don't even get to solve mysteries with the Professor anymore."

"Who's the Professor?" Apollo asked.

Immediately Luke cheered up, fixing his new friends with an excited smile. "Professor Hershel Layton!" he exclaimed. "He's famous back home! He teaches archaeology at a university, but he's the world's best at working out puzzles and mysteries!" He chuckled. "We helped out Scotland Yard with loads of difficult cases! There was the Masked Gentleman of Monte D'Or, and the mystery of the Elysian Box, and most recently the kidnapping of the Prime Minister!"

"Hey, I heard about that one!" Clay cried in astonishment. "You mean to say you were one of the people who found him?"

"Yep!" Luke proudly proclaimed. "I also helped the Professor when he discovered the Golden Garden of Misthallery, and the lost Kingdom of Ambrosia, and the ruins of Akbadain!"

Apollo laughed. "I've never heard of any of those, but it sounds really impressive!"

"It's very impressive!" Luke insisted, arms crossed. "Professor Layton is the best archaeologist in the world!"

"I didn't know you could be this animated!" Clay said with an amused smile. "You must have loved working with this Professor of yours!"

Luke nodded. "Naturally!"

"How did you end up working with this guy, anyway?" Apollo asked.

"He's a-!" Luke began to explain, only to stop and suddenly deflate, all his excitement gone as he stared at the floor. "He... was... a friend of my dad's..."

There was a short silence, Clay and Apollo watching their friend sympathetically. Eventually, Apollo moved from his chair to sit next to Luke, opposite Clay, and rested his hand on Luke's shoulder. "You lost both of them, right?" he asked. "Your mom and dad?"

Luke sniffed and nodded. "Car accident. You worked it out, huh?"

Apollo smiled. "You looked like you were going to have a breakdown the way Ernest was carrying on back in the cafeteria," he explained, "and I keep seeing you look at me since you learned I was an orphan, like you wanted to say or ask something."

"I was?" Luke asked in surprise. "Sorry, I didn't mean to-"

"Don't apologise," Apollo interrupted, sounding slightly exasperated. "I know, it's weird that I notice people's habits. That's just me."

Clay stood up off the bed. "You know what this calls for?" he announced, turning to his friends, with arms held wide. "A Chords of Steel workout session!" He grabbed Luke's upper arms (taking care with the left arm in its cast) and pulled him off the bed, grinning. "Here's what you say: 'I'm Luke Triton and I'm fine!' At the top of your lungs! You got that?"

"It's not very healthy to keep everything bottled up either," Apollo pointed out, standing to join his friends, and Luke had to admit he had a point. "Clay and I can go first to show you how it's done."

Grinning, Clay released Luke and stood back, clenching his hands into fists. "Let's go!" He pointed his face at the ceiling and, at an impressive volume for an unassisted voice, shouted "I'M CLAY TERRAN AND I'M FINE!"

Luke winced at the loud noise, but couldn't resist a smile when he saw Clay laughing, almost bouncing on the spot in excitement.

Apollo also smiled, spreading his feet apart in a pose similar to Clay's, then also turned his face upwards. "I'M APOLLO JUSTICE AND I'M FINE!" As he also began to laugh, he turned to Luke. "Your turn," he prompted.

Luke thought for a few moments, then smiled. "I'M LUKE TRITON AND I'M FINE!"

Dear Professor Layton,

It's been a while since we said goodbye. How have you been? I've arrived in California and my new home safely. This is my first night in my new room actually, so I thought I would take the time to write before I start school tomorrow.

A lot has happened since I sent you my new address. For a start, it looks like I won't be living there after all. Mum and Dad decided to drive the last part of our journey, and we had an accident. I was rescued with a broken arm, but the police didn't find my parents. They've declared them deceased, but since their bodies were never found, I've decided I don't believe the official word. The detective claims there was enough blood to prove they were dead without any bodies, but he wouldn't tell me anything else, and I don't know where the accident even happened, since I was asleep at the time and I don't know the area yet. I want to look up what the newspapers are saying about it, or any other information, but it doesn't look like the school library keeps stores of papers, so I don't know where to start.

I've made some new friends at least. Their names are Clay and Apollo, and they're very nice. I'd even say they're gentlemanly in their own way, although they don't look it at first. They're a little older than me, but since I've been skipped ahead a few years, we're taking the same classes. Clay wants to be an astronaut, and has promised to take me to a local space centre where his mentor works. Apollo wants to be a lawyer (like Mr. Wright!), but every time he brings it up, Clay teases him about something that apparently happened to his 'hero', so he doesn't talk about it. I wonder if I should ask if he knows of Mr.Wright, or if we're too far away from where he works for Apollo to have heard of him.

Attached is my new address. According to Apollo, we spend school terms in the dormitory, but go to a foster home over the holidays. I expect that may cause some issues in communication around summertime.

Tell Flora I'm fine, and I miss her already.

Please write back soon.

Your friend and apprentice,

Luke Triton

Cosmos Space Center

Luke marvelled at the large, round building as it came into view from behind the trees. 'No wonder Clay was so eager to take me here!' It was taller than Luke had any ability to estimate, with two towers off to either side connected to the main building via walkways high off the ground. The road the trio were riding down on their bicycles curved down a gentle slope to meet a pair of out-buildings not far from the cylindrical base in the middle of the gigantic expanse of grass in the valley. Luke was finding it hard to believe a place as seemingly isolated as this one was only a forty minute bike ride from a city as big as Los Angeles.

"Amazing, isn't it?" Clay called from his position at the head of their group. "Just wait 'til I introduce you to Mister Starbuck!"

With Clay and Apollo to support him, Luke's first week at Turner Boarding School had turned out great. The teachers did little to advertise his arrival outside of catching him up on the week he'd unintentionally skipped of the beginning of the school year, and anyone who tried to ask prying questions was chased off by Clay and Apollo, one of whom was (almost) always in Luke's classes alongside him (although he shared more with Apollo than Clay). Outside of school, the trio of boys would hang out together, doing homework, talking, and assuring each other they were fine if one of them felt down for some reason. Luke particularly had to be reminded he was fine on a regular basis, and had firmly decided 'Chords of Steel' was the lone exception to his mental guideline of gentlemanly behaviours he strove to follow.

All week, Clay had been excited for Saturday to come, and ran to check on Apollo and Luke the moment he woke up to make sure they'd be ready to head out with him. It had taken some convincing to let Nancy lend Luke one of her bikes, what with his broken arm and all, but once Luke had ridden in circles around the courtyard a few times to demonstrate his unhindered ability to grasp the handles (even if he couldn't use the handbrake on that side), she'd allowed it. Clay had once again boasted how there'd be regular buses they could take once the Center launched their first mission into space, Apollo had rolled up his uniform sleeves (he didn't have any other clothes he could wear) to wear his bracelet, and then the trio had taken off on their short journey.

As they approached the twin outbuildings, Luke noticed they housed between them a large metal gate, left slightly open. Above, on the connected roof, the words "Cosmos Space Center" were proudly displayed in green, with a circular GYAXA logo sitting in the middle, and the massive centre itself towered just beyond. Clay and Apollo pulled their bicycles to a halt and immediately propped them against the gate.

Luke slowly ground to a halt and hopped off his bike. "Are we allowed to do that?" he asked.

"Sure we are!" Clay cried, walking over to take Luke's bike from him and walking it over to the gate himself. "Apollo and I come here all the time, and no one's told us off for this yet!"

"In other words," Apollo cut in with an amused smile, "we haven't gotten permission perse, but no one's exactly complained about it."

As the pair led Luke through the gap in the gate and down the open path to the Center's main building, they decided to give Luke some advice.

"First of all," Clay explained, "we're not allowed on the fourth floor or higher. The robotics lab is up there, and people's living quarters, and they apparently don't trust us around those."

"Yup," Apollo agreed with a sage nod. "We try going up there, the scientists who work in the lab chase us off." He frowned. "They always seem to know the moment we try heading up the stairs on the third floor. I think they've got a camera hooked up or something."

Luke thought back to his last adventure with the Professor in London. "Or maybe an infrared sensor," he mused aloud.

Clay suddenly charged ahead, dashing to the glass double doors that served as the entrance to the Space Center's main building. He spun around, hands behind his back on the door handles, and grinned at Luke. "Luke Triton," he announced, "welcome to the Cosmos Space Center!" With one swift move, he swung the doors open and ushered Luke and Apollo inside.

The foyer of the Cosmos Space Center was very impressive, Luke had to admit. The large windows all around, coupled with the high ceiling and glass walls, meant the sunlight streamed in from every direction, glistening off the glass panels and the white tiled floors. To either side of the doors, curving up the rounded walls, were metal stairs leading to the floor above, and Luke could see them extending up a few more floors if he craned his neck back. A curved white desk sat directly in front of them, but it was unmanned, leaving the Center open for anyone to enter. Behind it was an elevator, but it appeared to be out-of-order.

"Huh," Apollo muttered. "I wonder where Missus Racer is?"

"Aha!" came a cry from above, and Luke looked up just in time to catch a glimpse of red hair before he heard the metal ringing as an adult began walking down from the third floor. "I thought I heard you two coming in!"

Clay ran to the bottom of the staircase on their left, waving at the floor above as the man came into view on the level directly above. "Mister Starbuck! We brought a new friend today!"

"Oh?" the man replied, coming down the last segment of stairs and fixing a curious gaze on Luke. "He a brother?"

"He's in our grade at school," Apollo explained, putting a hand on Luke's shoulder. "Transferred in this week."

Clay smirked. "Skipped a few grades, though," he added.

Starbuck nodded as he reached the ground floor, then held out his hand to Luke. "Nice to meet you," he said. "I'm Solomon Starbuck. You can just call me Sol if you want."

"C'mon, Mister Starbuck!" Clay cried as he bounced at his mentor's side. "Let's show Luke around the Space Center!"

Sol grinned. "Sounds good to me!" He gave a 'follow me' gesture to Luke, adding "Come on, then," before heading back up the stairs.

Luke quickly learned that there was a lot of similarities between Sol and Clay, aside their passion for space. Although more calm and mature about his love for his job, Sol couldn't resist bragging about the Space Center's grand plans for the future at every opportunity, and even snuck the three boys into the restricted access area of one of the boarding lounges to the twin launch pads to give Luke an impassioned lecture about how amazing space travel was. It wasn't until Sol and Clay had left to fetch something to illustrate their point of just how big space was that Apollo told Luke the 'restricted access' areas had long been open to the two friends... with the previously mentioned exceptions of everything on the fourth floor and above.

As Sol and Clay enthusiastically continued their demonstrations with the help of a large beachball and a plate of peas, the door behind them opened to let in a small, red robot. "Hello Clay! Hello Apollo!" it announced, face screen glowing green as it displayed a smiling face. "Welcome to the Space Center, guest!"
"Oh hey, it's Ponco!" Apollo cried, grabbing Luke's wrist to drag him over to the small bot. "Luke, this is Ponco, the first of the Space Center's robots!

Luke nodded a greeting. This was not the first robot he'd met by far, but he had to admit it was rather refreshing to meet one that wasn't disguised as a human. The bolts on top of its ovoid head resembled pigtails somewhat, and now he was closer he could see eyelashes on the face displayed on the now-blue screen.

"Do you want me to register your friend?" Ponco asked in a cheerful tone.

Sol came up behind the boys, running a hand through his mop of red hair. "Ponco," he ordered, "register Luke Triton here, will you?"

"Of course, Mister Starbuck!" Ponco replied, and sat quietly for a moment until something in its hardware beeped. "Done! If you need any help, feel free to ask me, Luke Triton!"

Ponco's face turned a deeper blue as it displayed a sad frown, slumping into a miserable-looking posture. "Oh no! I will remember to call you 'Luke' from now on!" Its face again turning green and happy, the little robot danced for them, declaring "We are now officially friends! Nice to meet you, Luke! I'm so happy! So very happy!"

Clay laughed, slapping Luke on the back before slinging his arm over Apollo's shoulders, cockily. "Ponco's the creation of the robotics engineers," he explained. "Robots with emotions. Apparently they're in the process of making a whole army of them!"

Sol shook his head, laughing. "Say that to their face and you won't dare say it again!" he warned good-naturedly. "They take their work very seriously, and for good reason."

"I gotya, Mister Starbuck," Clay replied, laughing as he noticed Apollo rolling his eyes at the statement. "C'mon Luke, let's get back to our tour!"

'Clay was right about Missus Major making everything boring,' Luke thought to himself. 'I don't think I've ever been so disinterested in one of my favourite hobbies...'

Today, English class consisted of everyone in the room taking turns reading aloud a paragraph of their selected reading material; in this case, To Kill A Mockingbird. Luke had never heard of the book before, but apparently it was a classic story that their teacher was very fond of, to the point that she stopped the reading after every second sentence to analyse something or other for her students. Luke was glad she seemed to be happy, but it made absorbing the story difficult and tedious. Not to mention, he didn't agree with her thoughts on the Finch children calling their father by his name. 'Babies are too young to 'decide' if they call their father 'Daddy' or not! They call people what they are told to call them!' He wasn't brave enough to voice his disagreement, though.

They had entered the last ten minutes of the class, and the tension in the room as the thirty-odd students waited for lunchtime was almost palpable. Ernest Holmes, the boy who had accosted Luke in the cafeteria on his first day, was reading a passage about the local 'spook' Boo Radley, and Luke had to force his eyes to stay open lest he fall asleep to Ernest's droning monotone. A glance to his left revealed Clay was in much the same position, book open on his desk but eyes firmly closed.

A creaking sound rang through the room, and Ernest stopped talking as he and everyone else in the room turned to look at the door, about half of them jumping in shock as they did so. The classroom door opened only about halfway before Nancy's head leant in, giving Mrs. Major a bright smile.

"What is it, Miss Kindly?" Mrs. Major asked, a single eyebrow raised.

"I was just wondering if I could take Luke Triton from you today," Nancy replied, eyes glancing around the room until she spotted Luke near the back, and she gave him a smile. "I'm afraid he's needed elsewhere."

The English teacher had to think for a moment, but then nodded and turned to Luke. "Master Triton, you may go. Check with me later for homework."

"I will, Missus Major," Luke promised, closing his book and shoving it and his notes into his satchel. He could feel the class's stares on him as he cleared his desk and walked across the room to join Nancy at the door, and was as curious as them to find out what he was needed for. He wasn't in trouble, was he?

Once they were both outside the classroom, door closed behind them, Nancy placed a hand on Luke's shoulder and led him towards the stairs. "The Principal has called for you in his office," she explained.

"Don't worry," Nancy laughed, "you're not in trouble, dear! You have a visitor!"
'A... visitor?' Luke's mind began to race as he wondered who his 'visitor' was, and why they had come now. 'Is it someone from the Space Centre? Are they banning me from coming back? They didn't want Clay, so it can't be a total ban on all three of us... Or maybe it's that detective I met in hospital! Does he have more questions for me? Maybe he's found Mum and Dad! I knew they were still alive!' As he reached the top of the stairs at the third floor, not far behind Nancy, his thoughts turned to perhaps more realistic possibilities. 'Maybe the Professor and Flora have come to help! I suppose they could have got my letter by now... The Professor might have a lead on how to find Mum and Dad! I knew I could count on him to save me!'

After what seemed like an eternity, Nancy and Luke reached the door of the Principal's office. Smiling at Luke, Nancy placed her hand back on his shoulder and opened the door, walking them in side-by-side. "Mister Turner," she announced, "I have young Triton here."

The room was rather large, a converted classroom, and looked about as posh as Luke recalled it being when he'd been in here on his first day. The biggest difference was that, instead of sitting behind his massive desk, surrounded by certificates and trophies, Principal Turner was standing in his usual purple suit by the opposite wall, which was a floor-length window the width of the entire room. He turned to face the newcomers, scratching his chin in a show of wisdom beyond his years. "Ah, Miss Kindly, thank you for fetching him."

Luke's eyes were immediately drawn to the only stranger in the room, a man stood at the Principal's side. He was dressed much less smartly, in jeans and a grey hoodie, and he turned to face the door as he heard it open. Above his smiling face (which was vaguely familiar) was a blue beanie, with the word 'Papa' written in purple along the side.

Nancy guided Luke further into the room and left, closing the door behind her. Luke half-wished she would stay, frantically trying to wrack his brain for clues as to who the stranger before him was. "As I'm sure Miss Kindly told you," the principal continued, "you have a visitor, Triton." As he spoke, the stranger reached up to his head and pulled off his beanie, revealing spiky, and rather messy, black hair.

Luke gasped in sudden recognition. "Mister Wright!" he cried, and dashed across the room, throwing his arms tightly around Phoenix's waist and burying his head in the loose hoodie as he burst into tears.

"Whoa there, Luke," Phoenix said, patting Luke's bare head as he leaned down a little to be more on his young friend's level. "Wanna leave some room for me to breathe?"

Struggling to hold back his tears, Luke released Phoenix and stepped back, rubbing at his tear-filled eyes. "I'm sorry," he mumbled.

"No, no, don't be," Phoenix insisted with a shake of his head, kneeling down. "It's been a while since you've seen a familiar face, huh?" Over Luke's shoulder, he noticed the principal quietly leaving the room, and was glad his young friend had proven beyond a doubt that they indeed knew each other without even having to say anything. "I'm glad it turned out in my favor to mention that!" "It's alright to cry, I understand."

Luke nodded, leaning into Phoenix again for another hug, which the ex-lawyer was glad to give.

Phoenix found himself being reminded once again of the emotional reunion he and Luke had shared with Maya and Professor Layton in the ruins below Labyrinthia, although the circumstances this time couldn't have been more different. He decided to give the teen some time to calm down before trying to start a conversation; They had a lot of important stuff to discuss.
Finally, Luke's breathing returned to normal and he pulled away from Phoenix, rubbing the last of the moisture from around his eyes. "How did you find me, Mister Wright?" he asked in astonishment. "I didn't think you lived near here!"

Phoenix laughed. "I'm a Los Angeles native, born and bred!" he said. "Professor Layton got your new address, both of them, and asked me to check up on you when he noticed you'd be close by."

Luke frowned, realising this would have been the first address he sent home, fresh off the boat on the other side of the country. "But I never even got to see the new house!"

"It's fine," Luke said, even managing a smile. "They never found their bodies, after all. I don't think they're dead."

Phoenix laughed. "Of course! 'Just like when we thought the Professor was dead... Too bad I wasn't here to help when he was still in mourning, though.' The perfect puzzle for the apprentice of Professor Layton, huh?"

"Uh-huh!" Luke agreed with a big grin, putting his hand up to his head as if to grip the blue cap he wasn't allowed to wear during school. "By the way, thank you for coming to visit, Mister Wright." He shrugged, blushing. "I really appreciate it."

Phoenix rubbed the back of his head in embarrassment. "Uh, sure," he bashfully replied. "About that..."

"Oh!" Luke cried, interrupting Phoenix as he looked around the office. "Where's Maya? Didn't she come with you?"

Restraining a wince, Phoenix looked away. "Yeah, about that too..."

"And why aren't you wearing your suit?" Luke continued, crossing his arms. "You looked so smart in that! Unless this is how you dress when you're not in court?"

Phoenix sighed, staring at the floor. Luke suddenly noticed his older friend's change of mood and halted his flow of questions. "Mister Wright?"

"It's a long story," Phoenix sighed. "To every one of your questions. He looked up, meeting Luke's concerned gaze. "Basically, I... left my job. I don't work as a lawyer anymore. Maya's very busy with her own job, so she can't be here to see you today." He thought a moment. "She says 'hi', by the way. And hopes you're okay."

"I'm fine," Luke almost instinctively replied. "Why'd you leave your job, though? I thought you were a great lawyer!"

"Thank you," Phoenix said with a grateful smile, "but, as I said, it's a long story. I can tell you it another time. We have other things to talk about now."

Although Luke wasn't satisfied with the given answer, he decided to let it slide for now and reluctantly nodded in agreement. "What did you want to talk about?"
Phoenix took a deep breath as he searched for the right place to begin this conversation. "Well," he said, "as much as we may disagree with them, officially the state has decreed you an orphan, correct?"

Luke nodded. "And I have to stay here or in a foster home from now on," he added.

"Unless," Phoenix interrupted with a wary smile, "someone adopts you, of course."

Luke paused. "I... hadn't thought of that," he admitted, then frowned as he rubbed his chin in thought. "I don't think I like the idea of a couple of strangers taking me in and trying to replace Mum and Dad..."

"Any adoption going through would be entirely up to you," Phoenix assured the boy, patting his shoulder. "You get final say. Believe me, I've been through all these hoops adopting Trucy."

Phoenix grinned. "My daughter," he proudly explained, then reached into the pocket in the front of his hoodie and pulled out a small photo. Luke took it for a better look and saw a cheery young girl with a bob of brown hair, wearing a red top hat and cape. "She's eight," Phoenix added. "You could say it's because of her I got my current job."

"She's cute!" Luke agreed, handing the photo back before changing the subject. "So they won't just hand me off to people and say they're my new parents? That's a relief..."

Phoenix shuffled uncomfortably, an impressive feat considering he was still kneeling to be closer to Luke's eye-level. "Luke, that's partly why I came today. I want to make you an offer."

Luke looked over at his friend suspiciously. "Offer...?"

After a moment's pause, Phoenix stood back up to his full height. "To give you a place to call home, and all the help finding your parents I can get," he proclaimed, "I can adopt you into my family, alongside Trucy." He thought a second more, then added, "I already checked with the state, and they'll be happy to let it go through. Only if you want to, of course."

Luke was too shocked to react at first. 'A-adopt me!?’. He took a small step back, staring off into the distance as he processed the offer. 'Mister Wright... wants to adopt me!?'

"You don't have to answer now," Phoenix assured him. "Take your time, think about it. If you decide not to, I can still offer my help, if you want it."

Still unable to formulate a response, Luke mutely nodded.

Phoenix reached into a pocket and pulled out a small white card, which he looked over before kneeling down again and holding it out for Luke. "Here. If you want to find me or contact me. You can call any time."

Luke took the offered card. On one side, scrawled in pen, was a series of numbers obviously belonging to a phone, while the other side had 'Wright & Co. Law Offices' neatly printed above an address and a separate phone number. "I thought you weren't a lawyer anymore...?" Luke muttered.

"It's an old card," Phoenix replied with a shrug. "Don't have any new ones, but I haven't changed my address or phone number, so it still works." He paused. "You just call me when you make your decision... or just want to chat, I don't mind."
Despite all his worry, Luke managed a smile and nodded. "I promise, Mister Wright."

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
Despite his ongoing uncertainty over the things they had talked about, Luke couldn't resist a wide smile of happiness at having seen Phoenix again. It felt like the universe was reminding him the world he used to know was still out there, unchanged, and he didn't have to fret that he would lose total contact with all his old friends, despite the sudden loss of his parents. It was reassuring that, despite all the unexpected changes in his life that he was still settling in to, he had friends both new and old to help him through it.

"Luke!" came a distinctly 'Chords of Steel' cry from across the hall, and Luke looked up to see Clay and Apollo, sat near the middle of the cafeteria at the end of a table. Apollo was standing, waving frantically as he added "Over here!"

Grinning, Luke waved back to his friends to let them know he'd seen them, and, after quickly grabbing something to eat, hurried to meet them.

"Finally!" Clay cried in false exasperation as Luke jumped into a chair next to Apollo. "What took you so long? And what did they need you for, anyway?"

"Whatever it is," Apollo remarked, "you're obviously really happy about it."

Luke laughed. "An old friend of mine lives near here! He came to find me!"

Clay and Apollo both gasped in delighted surprise. "Wow!" Clay said, clapping his hands. "That's awesome! I didn't think you had friends here!"

"I didn't either," Luke replied, embarrassed. "I had no idea where in America he lived."

"Good thing he found you, then," Apollo pointed out. "He came by just to see you?"

Luke paused only half a second before fixing his friends with a big smile. "Yep!"

Apollo's eyes narrowed. "You're lying."

"N-no I'm not!" Luke replied, shocked to be called out so confidently.

Clay rolled his eyes. "Oh, come off it, Apollo. How is he lying?"

"But he is!" Apollo insisted. "I don't know how I know, but I know he's lying!"

"In other words, you're making all this up. Again."

Luke looked around them nervously to assess how likely the trio were to be overheard by other students. "Alright, I admit it," he quietly said, interrupting the argument.

"See?" Apollo muttered in a surprised Clay's direction.
"I just don't want to talk about it here, okay?" he continued, giving Apollo a pleading look. "Can we bring this up again later?"

Apollo blinked in surprise. "Uh, sure," he answered, looking uncomfortable. "Look, I'm sorry for accusing you, but--"

Clay scoffed. "Personally, I think Apollo just makes it up and lucks out a lot of the time."

"Whatever," Apollo replied, giving Clay a playful glare. "You're just jealous."

"At how transparent you are?" Clay joked. "Hardly!"

Dormitory, Room 321

Once again, the three boys found themselves in the tidiest of their three rooms, Luke's. While Apollo and Clay had immediately sat on the bed as they joked around, Luke had taken his time placing his homework on his desk, sitting in his chair as he went through his bag.

"Oh, hey," Apollo suddenly realised, "weren't we meeting in here for a reason?"

"Luke's friend!" Clay remembered, turning towards their English friend. "You were gonna give us the full story!"

Luke laughed, pulling out the last of the books from his satchel. "It's not all that exciting!" he insisted. "Really!"

"Tell us anyway!" Clay eagerly insisted, leaning forward so far he was only barely sitting on the bed. "C'mon, Triton!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "You could try showing some restraint, Clay."

"Restraint is for sissies!" Clay replied.

The smile on his face slowly fading, Luke picked up his blue cap on the corner of his desk, putting it on his head as he pulled Phoenix's business card from a pocket in his black uniform. He looked at the printed text on the front of it thoughtfully for a few moments. "My friend," he quietly explained. "He's offered to adopt me."

There was a very long silence. Clay slowly straightened back up in his seat, while Apollo simply stared at the floor in thought.

"That's why you didn't want to talk about it in the cafeteria," Clay thought aloud as he connected the dots.

"Mm-hmm," Luke replied with a nod, looking over to his friends. "He left it to me to decide, but I'm not sure what to say." He sighed, musing over his options aloud. "If I turn him down, he'll still be my friend and offer help, but I'll be stuck in foster homes when I'm not here, and I'll never have a place to call my own. On the other hand, if I accept, I'll probably have to transfer schools again, and I only just made two of the best friends in the whole world." He blinked away tears as he looked over to a surprised Clay and Apollo. "I'd hate to have to leave you guys so soon!"

"It's okay, Luke!" Apollo said, standing up and crossing the room. "You're fine! We'll find a solution!" As Luke smiled back, Apollo placed a hand on his friend's shoulder. "I'm sure if you ta-!" Mid-word, Apollo froze, and Luke realised after a moment that he had caught sight of the business card in Luke's hand. "I-is... is that a Wright and Co. Law Offices business card!?" he stuttered.

Clay looked up in shock. "What!?" He jumped to his feet and ran over to the desk, peering at the card as Luke held it up. "How'd you get a card from the Forgin' Attorney!?"

"Don't call him that!" Apollo immediately objected. "It's not true!"

Luke looked up at his friends with growing concern. "F-forging attorney...? What do you mean?"

"The papers started calling him that," Apollo explained, crossing his arms as he glared off into the distance. "It's all lies!"

Clay turned and sauntered back towards the bed. "They call him that because it's true," he said with a shrug of the shoulders, reaching his destination and flopping down on Luke's mattress casually. "He was caught using forged evidence in court, so they banned him. There was all sorts of uproar over how many of his 'miraculous' cases were faked, too."

"He was stripped of his badge, not banned," Apollo clarified, sternly facing Clay as though this was a conversation they'd had a few times already. "And none of his verdicts were overturned either, which just proves he was framed."

"So," Luke began to ask, already dreading the answer, "who is the Forging Attorney?"

Apollo turned to look down at Luke with surprise. "You haven't heard of Phoenix Wright?" he asked.

Luke felt his insides go cold.

"Of course he hasn't!" Clay cried. "Luke only moved here a couple weeks back, and the For-, I mean, Wright got caught back in... what, April? May?" He rolled his eyes, laughing. "It's not like he was world-famous!"

Apollo was still watching Luke, who had turned his worried gaze back to the card in his hands. Ignoring Clay, he placed a hand on the back of Luke's chair. "Luke? Are you okay?"

Clay stopped laughing as he realised his friends weren't paying attention. "Huh? Something wrong, Luke?"

Luke blinked rapidly to hold back the tears. "He said he wasn't a lawyer anymore," he whispered. "He didn't tell me why..."

Above his head, Luke heard Apollo take a sharp intake of breath. "M-mister Wright... He's your friend, isn't he?"

"Uh..." Clay muttered from across the room, going pale. He stood up, raising his hands. "L-look, Luke, I didn't mean any of what I said, okay? I got nothing against the guy, I swear!"
"It's fine," Luke whispered, not moving. "You didn't know he was my friend."

There was an awkward silence for several long moments.

Clay nervously laughed. "Well, hey, you heard what Apollo said! He was framed, right? It wasn't his f-!"

"How did you become friends with Phoenix Wright!?" Apollo cut in, giving Luke a wide-eyed and excited stare. "That's so cool! I'd have given anything to get to meet him!"

Luke blinked in surprise, looking up at his friend. "Huh?"

"He's the best defence lawyer alive today!" Apollo continued to gush, grinning. "I went to some of his trials when I could, and no matter how bad it gets for him, he always turned everything around and won in the end!"

Clay rolled his eyes. "Great, we've set Apollo off..."

"I've read all of his case-files in the courthouse library, too!" Apollo continued, not noticing his friend's interruption. "Did you know he once cross-examined a parrot to prove who the murderer was!?"

At this, Luke suddenly laughed. "Yeah, he's the world expert on cross-examining parrots!"

Apollo laughed. "You could say that, I guess!" he agreed. "The last trial of his I went to, he even performed an exorcism in court!"

"What!?" Luke replied, both shocked and highly confused. 'I bet Maya had something to do with that...'

Clay shook his head. "He's making it up," he assured Luke, ignoring Apollo's glare. "You have no idea how long I've had to endure him gushing about his 'hero' after spending a weekend at the courthouse."

"It was only a full weekend twice!" Apollo weakly protested. "Out of, like... four trials I got see in person!"

Apollo shrugged, flustered. "Well, I didn't see the entire trial for the first one, a-and Mister Wright wasn't even the defence lawyer on the first day of the last one I went to!"

Luke just laughed. 'I'd love to see Apollo's face if I brought up the witch trials I helped Mister Wright with!' "Well Apollo, do you want to meet him?"

"Huh?" Apollo asked, confused. "M-meet...?"

"Nancy has a phone, right?" Luke asked Clay, who nodded with a smirk. "Then I'll just go and call him!" Clutching the business card in his hand, Luke dashed out of his room and down the hallway to the stairs. Behind him, he heard Apollo beginning to protest as he belatedly chased after, and Clay laughing loudly at the impromptu low-stakes chase scene.

As the adrenaline pumped through Luke's veins, he began to laugh loudly, his voice echoing through the concrete stairwell as he charged down the steps. Through his mind raced memories of his adventures back home in England with the Professor, running from, or sometimes even towards, danger in their never-ending quest to solve the mysteries of the world and save the innocent. 'I'm going to keep doing our good work, Professor! Just watch! I'll make you proud of me!'

Wright Talent Agency

Trucy's Bedroom

"Can't I take a break?" Trucy whined, tugging her red silk hat over her head as she slumped in her chair.

"You only just finished your last break," Phoenix pointed out, pushing the piece of paper on the desk in front of her closer to the protesting eight-year-old. "You're almost done, anyway. Don't you want to get it over with now, so you can go and play?"

Before Trucy could reply, a chiptune rendition of the Steel Samurai theme buzzed from Phoenix's pocket, and the ex-lawyer sighed as he reluctantly stood up. "You get to work," he warned his daughter. "I'll be right back."

Once out in the hallway, Phoenix pulled his phone from his pocket and checked the screen, a routine he had become used to since the incident in April. It wasn't a number he recognised, but since the ringtone was nearing its end, he only had a second to debate whether he should answer it or not. He decided to answer. "Hello?"

"Mister Wright!" came the familiar voice of a teenage boy through the scratchy phone lines.

"Luke!" Phoenix cried in surprise. "I wasn't expecting you to call so soon!"

Luke laughed, and Phoenix noted he seemed out of breath. "I thought maybe we could meet up this weekend!" he offered. "I'd love to meet Trucy!"

In the background, a second voice came into hearing range, shouting loud enough to be picked up by Luke's phone. "WAIT, YOU'RE ACTUALLY CALLING HIM!?"

"Uh, sure," Phoenix replied, deciding to ignore the background noise for now. "Is Saturday good? We're not doing anything that morning."

"LUKE, IF YOU SERIOUSLY SET THIS UP, I AM GOING TO KILL YOU!" the voice in the background shouted. It was abruptly joined by a third voice, which was simply laughing at the top of its lungs.

"That's great!" Luke laughed, apparently well aware of the noise but choosing to ignore it. "Is it alright if I bring along a friend of mine? He'd love to meet you!"

"I AM SERIOUSLY GOING TO DIE OF EMBARRASSMENT IF YOU MAKE ME MEET HIM!" the voice in the background protested.

Phoenix paused in thought. "Are you faking this to annoy your friend back there?"

"No!" Luke cried, offended. "I do really want to meet Trucy!" The laughter returned to his voice as he continued, "Annoying Apollo is a bonus!"
"I AM GOING TO MURDER YOU, TRITON!"

Phoenix laughed. "Then, it's a deal! Meet you at the school gates around ten?"

"Ten!" Luke repeated. "It's a deal!"

"THEY'LL NEVER FIND YOUR BODY, LUKE!"

The phone hung up with a click.
As annoyed as Apollo pretended to be after being set up on a 'date' to meet Phoenix Wright, Luke could tell he was secretly excited. The biggest clue was perhaps the fact that he had talked non-stop about his favourite defence attorney the entire rest of the week.

"I first heard of him when he was defending the hero of this TV show we used to watch, the Steel Samurai," Apollo had said, nudging Clay as a prompt to back him up. "I wanted to go see the trial, but it was during school, so I had to hear about it after. And then there was this big, important case just after Christmas where a famous prosecutor was accused of murdering a defence attorney! And Mister Wright not only proved he didn't, he found the true murderer of that case as well as the murderer of a case that happened over a decade ago!"

"Everyone seemed to love him after that," Clay remarked.

"That's when I became a fan!" Apollo boasted. "I wasn't able to go to all his trials because they were during school, but I caught the end of one where he caught out the Chief of Police and the Chief Prosecutor for two murders, accomplice to murder and forging evidence! That was the first time I got to see him in person, too! And then there was the Berry Big Circus one, where everyone thought the magician had flown away from the murder scene, but it was actually the acrobat, hiding the murder weapon in his wheelchair!"

"And the Mask DeMasque case," Clay cut in. "Took Apollo days to shut up about that one."

"It was really awesome!" Apollo protested. "Plus, it was technically two trials that time, cuz the guy was legally proven innocent of the Mask DeMasque thefts, then was accused of a murder, and Mister Wright proved it was this other fake 'detective' guy both times!"

"Hey, I heard about Mask DeMasque!" Luke cried. "I didn't know Mister Wright solved that case!"

Clay was surprised. "You heard about Mask DeMasque? I didn't think that news got to England."

"He stole a lot of valuable, historical artefacts," Luke pointed out. "If it wasn't in the news, the Professor or my parents would have told me about it." He laughed. "That was not long before I met Mister Wright!"

Of the last case he'd watched in court, Apollo couldn't say much... at least, not much Luke could understand. It was apparently very convoluted and confusing, heavily featuring spirit mediums (which made Luke worry for Maya's safety) and an exorcism in court. There hadn't been a single person in the case that was in the courtroom both days either, with the prosecutor and judge switching between days and someone else apparently standing in for Phoenix on the first day. Even the defendant was somehow switched with another person overnight. The whole crazy trial had resulted in the conviction of the second day's prosecutor for murder, the defendant getting charged as his accomplice despite the efforts of her dead (and evil) twin sister to blame someone else that she'd been unknowingly possessing the entire time.
All in all, that particular story made Luke's head hurt.

"So, how did you end up meeting Mister Wright in England, Luke?" Apollo asked.

Luke thought for several long moments. "It's... really complicated," he explained. "The Professor and I ran into him and his assistant on a case... a really confusing and complicated case..." He sighed. "Like most of the stuff the Professor took on, it's difficult to believe without a lot of explanation. This one more than most, probably. I'd rather not talk about it yet, actually."

Clay had left for home on Friday afternoon, making Luke and Apollo promise to tell him all the juicy details of their meeting with 'The Forgin' Attorney' the moment he returned on Monday. Although Apollo had rolled his eyes, Luke promised to fill Clay in on their 'adventure', and the pair thus found themselves sitting on a bench that Saturday morning, not far from the front gate.

Apollo was looking pale, hands white as he gripped the bench beneath them. As he did every weekend, he had rolled up the left sleeve of his uniform jacket to wear his family's bracelet. His usually impeccably styled hair was also looking a little limp. "Do you think Mister Wright would mind if I cancelled?" he asked, voice much higher in pitch than normal. "I mean, I never wanted to meet him anyway, right?"

"You're fine, Apollo!" Luke cried, tugging his blue cap on his head determinedly. "Mister Wright's going to pick us up, and we're going to have a great time together!"

"Yeah," Apollo breathed in reply, nodding fiercely as he repeated the words to himself as loudly as he dared. "We're gonna have fun today! This is gonna be awesome!"

There was a metallic tapping sound, and Luke and Apollo looked up to see a man in jeans and a hoodie, knocking on the barred gates as he smiled at them from under his ever-present beanie. Beside him, watching them curiously, was a little girl in a red magician's outfit.

"Mister Wright!" Luke cried, jumping to his feet and racing to the gate.

"I am so gonna die of embarrassment," Apollo muttered to himself as he morosely followed his friend.

Luke bounded straight to the talkbox mounted next to the barred gates, reaching up to push the button eagerly. "Mister Thrume, Apollo and I are going out for the morning!"

"You got it, kiddo," Hugo replied through the scratchy speaker, and a moment later, the buzz of the deactivated locks sounded from above.

Without wasting a second, Luke pushed open the gate, and Apollo caught up in time to catch it as his friend dashed straight through to reunite with Phoenix, stopping just short of a hug. "Thank you for coming, Mister Wright!"

Immediately, Luke turned to face the young girl, who was narrowing her eyes as she inspected the odd boy in blue with one arm in a cast. He tipped his cap. "And you must be Trucy! Pleased to meet you!" He held out his cast-free hand. "My name's Luke Triton!"

Trucy stared at him a moment longer, then broke out into a smile, giggling as she took his hand to shake. "Pleased to meet you!" she parroted back in an imitation of Luke's accent. "I'm Trucy Wright!" She giggled again at the formality of the greeting, but Luke didn't seem to mind.
Phoenix looked over to the gate, still being propped open by a nervous Apollo. "And your friend?" he prompted Luke.

"Ah!" Luke cried, dashing over to Apollo and grabbing his arm to drag him away from the gate. Apollo meekly protested, but eventually allowed himself to be pulled firmly out of the school grounds, the gate clicking shut rather ominously behind him. "This is Apollo Justice!" Luke announced in greeting. "He's in some of my classes, and one of my best friends!"

"Nice to meet you, Apollo," Phoenix said with a small nod.

Apollo soundlessly opened and closed his mouth several times before he was able to stutter a stunned "H-hi," in return.

Trucy began to giggle again, and Luke was unable to resist a smile, glancing at Trucy as he tried to hide it behind his right hand.

Phoenix watched the boy for a moment or two. "You seem to be turning red," he pointed out in concern. "Are you okay?"

"I'm fine!" Apollo suddenly shouted, then slapped his face with his left hand as he realised how awkward he sounded. 'Please ground, swallow me up right now before I do anything more embarrassing!'

While Trucy and Luke began to giggle more loudly, Phoenix's attention was brought to Apollo's bracelet, glinting in the sunlight as the boy's wrist moved. 'Wait... is that...?'

"You're funny, Apollo!" Trucy told the older boy, who lowered his hand to glare at her. "Actually, can I call you 'Polly'? 'Apollo' is so hard to say!"

"Don't call me 'Polly'," Apollo muttered, crossing his arms.

"Thanks, Polly!" Trucy chirped, either not noticing or just ignoring Apollo's eye rolling in response.

Luke patted Apollo's back in commiseration, still trying to hide his giggles. "Don't worry, Apollo! You've only been telling me all week," his composure faltered and Luke began to laugh, "about how Mister Wright is your idol and all!"

Apollo grunted. "You're a cruel, cruel kid, Triton."

"I heard 'cool, cool'!" Trucy replied, giving Apollo her biggest grin.

"You don't count," Apollo shot back.

Phoenix shook his head, chuckling at the kids' antics. "Alright, why don't we get moving?" He waved his hand at them to follow him and began to walk down the path. "I thought we'd drop by my place and then have a picnic at a park not far from us. Sound good?"

"That's great!" Luke cried, running up alongside his older friend. "I must admit, I've been curious to see where you live!"

"It's not that far from here, considering," Trucy assured him, skipping happily on her father's other side. "Maybe I could show you some of my tricks while we're there!"

Apollo, lagging behind the trio, sighed. "Tricks?" he repeated. "I think I've seen enough of those already."
"We're hoooome!" Trucy sang out as she pushed through their front door the moment Phoenix unlocked it. While her father merely smiled and quickly followed her, Luke took his time coming in to look around the room.

Fittingly, it reminded Luke most heavily of an office. There was a long and thin reception desk by the front door, opposite an aging black leather sofa. Against one wall was a bookcase full of what looked like legal books, and nearby was a upright piano, decorated with various magic-themed trinkets and a large black-and-white portrait of a man in an outfit similar to Trucy's. A coffee-maker sat on the piano stool, indicating the instrument saw little use. In a corner was a tall plant in a round, white pot. A small writing desk against another wall was covered in paper and writing utensils, and the drawings tacked up on the wall around it indicated it was in heavy use by Trucy.

Apollo paused at the door to read the black letters written on the glass. "This still says 'Law Offices'," he pointed out.

"Haven't got around to changing it," Phoenix quickly replied with a nonchalant shrug, though he was already at the door leading further inside. "Trucy, why don't you show the boys around? I have some stuff to grab before we head out again."

"Sure, Daddy!" Trucy cried with a wave, and Phoenix disappeared through the door, leaving it open behind him. Trucy immediately turned towards the two teen boys standing by the reception desk and fixed them with her largest smile. "And now for the grand tour of: our home!" she announced, throwing her arms out wide. "This is the reception! It's our front door, and where our customers come if they want to hire one of our talents!"

Apollo frowned. "Talents?"

"Me and Daddy!" Trucy replied. "I'm the CEO!"

Luke laughed. "Oh, because Mister Wright isn't a lawyer anymore! Of course you can't run a law office here!"

Trucy nodded. "We're a talent agency." She pulled open a drawer in the desk and pulled out two identical flyers that she quickly handed off to Luke and Apollo, who quickly noticed the title 'Wright Talent Agency' in bold letters on the hot pink background. "Daddy plays the piano, and I'm a magician! We're hoping to get more talents for our agency soon."

Apollo glanced up at the portrait on top of the piano. "If you're a magician, I guess that explains the 'Troupe Gramarye' ripoff outfit. And that portrait."

Trucy frowned, putting her hands on her hips. "My outfit is not a ripoff! My daddy made this for me before he disappeared! And that," she pointed at the portrait, "is a picture of him for when he comes back!"

"Whoa, sorry!" Apollo quickly apologised with a frown, rounding the reception desk to approach the piano and get a closer look at the portrait he had accidentally offended.

Luke scratched his chin in thought. "You call your biological father and your adoptive father 'Daddy'?” he said. "That's a recipe for confusion if I ever heard one."

Apollo blinked as he belatedly realised what Luke had voiced, that the 'daddy' in the portrait was most definitely not Phoenix. Even so, he still looked vaguely familiar. "Trucy?” he asked. "Have we seen your dad somewhere before?"

"That Daddy?” Trucy replied, smile less wide than it had been before. "Yeah, he and Mommy and Grandpa were all in Troupe Gramarye."

Apollo froze.

Apollo slowly turned away from the piano. "Luke,” he sternly answered before Trucy could, "Troupe Gramarye is the reason Mister Wright lost his badge.” As Luke gasped at the news, Apollo looked down at Trucy, who was sadly staring at the floor and hiding her face behind her hat. "I didn't know Zak Gramarye had a daughter, though. Why'd Mister Wright take you in after what your father did?” he continued.

Trucy didn't answer.

"Does it really matter?” Luke asked Apollo, stepping around the desk and awkwardly placing his cast-covered hand on Trucy's shoulder. "Mister Wright cared enough about Trucy to take her in and call her his daughter, despite having lost his job.” He gave Trucy a sympathetic smile. "I think we've seen enough of this room, don't you? Let's continue with the tour.”

After a short pause, Trucy looked up at Luke, a smile plastered on her face that was betrayed only by the tears sitting in the corners of her eyes. "You bet!” she said, then headed for the door Phoenix had disappeared through. "Daddy's office is next! Follow me!”

Luke gave Apollo a warning glare before following Trucy, and Apollo stood for a few moments in thought before reluctantly rejoining the 'tour'.

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
After the confrontation in the reception of the office, Trucy's tour of her little home had been a very quick one. They'd only glanced at Phoenix's office (a much less cluttered space than Trucy's reception area), before Trucy hurried them through a side-door leading to a kitchen, where Phoenix was packing a small backpack with supplies. From there, the trio went up some stairs into the actual 'home' part of the apartment, where the bedrooms and main bathroom were. Phoenix's was off-limits, but Trucy proudly showed off her cluttered little room and the guest room nearby, where she told Luke he would be staying should he decide to "become my big brother! I always wanted a big brother!" Apollo had rolled his eyes and muttered something about annoying little sisters, but Luke and Trucy only ignored him.

Phoenix had had to hurry the children out after that, wanting to get to the park before too many other people took up valuable grass-space. Luckily, it was only a block away, and an easy walk. Trucy ran ahead with their blanket, throwing it down protectively on a patch of empty grass that wasn't too cluttered with dropped twigs and seeds from the tree above.

"I've never been to this park before," Apollo said as they settled into their claimed spot.

"Understandable," Phoenix replied with a friendly smile. "Gourd Lake tends to be more popular, I find."

"Oh yeah!" Apollo cried with a grin. "You had that big case at Gourd Lake once!"

Phoenix laughed, "Yes, yes I did!" Having finished dropping weights strategically on the corners of the blanket to keep it from moving in the breeze, he dropped to the ground and crossed his legs. "Luke said something about you being a fan of mine earlier, didn't he?"

Luke nodded, giggling. "You should have seen his face when I told him who the friend who visited me on Tuesday was!"

"Shut up," Apollo muttered with a glare. "I'm not the only person who was a fan of Mister Wright!"

"Really?" Trucy asked curiously, sitting cutely on the blanket next to her father. "Daddy has fans?"

Phoenix shook his head. "Not anymore, Truce," he said, patting her shoulder. "Don't think I had that many when I was still practising law, either."

"You still have Polly!" Trucy pointed out.

Apollo turned red again, turning steadfastly off to the side. "Yeah, well, the fanclub was massive. I'm sure there are others still out there, too."

"Fanclub?" Luke repeated, and quickly noticed Phoenix was also giving Apollo a surprised look.

"What fanclub?" Phoenix asked.
"You didn't know?" Apollo replied, looking confused. "The founders claimed it was semi-official."

Phoenix thought for a moment, scratching his chin, then returned his gaze to Apollo. "Did they ever say their names?"

"No," Apollo said with a shake of the head. "My-Fairy and Precious-Fairy were their usernames, though."

"'Fairy'...?" Luke repeated again, now even more confused.

Phoenix laughed. "No, no, I think that clears up who was behind it. Have you heard much from them since February?"

Apollo had to think for a moment. "Well, they were apparently going on vacation and missed the big case you had then... Actually, yeah, they kinda disappeared after that." He crossed his arms, pondering on the mystery of his former online associates. "They always knew when you had a case before that too, then they just stopped. I wonder what happened to 'em?"

Luke similarly crossed his arms (rather awkwardly around his cast), nodding to himself. "Now that's a puzzle if I ever heard one!"

Phoenix laughed. "Not a difficult one, I'm afraid," he said, "not if you know them like I do." Before anyone could reply, he poked Trucy. "Hey, you wanna show the boys around? We've got two whole hours here, after all."

"Yay!" Trucy cried, jumping to her feet and rushing at Luke, grabbing his free arm. "C'mon Luke, I'll show you where the play equipment is!"

"Cool!" Luke replied, and the pair ran off down the path.

After watching the pair run off, Apollo sighed and sat down on the blanket, opposite Phoenix. "No offence," he said, "but I'm way too old for that kind of stuff."

"None taken," Phoenix replied, shrugging. "To be honest, I wasn't sure how old you'd be until we met you this morning. Luke didn't say anything about you."

Apollo laughed. "That's fine, Mister Wright. I didn't exactly give him a chance to, after all."

Phoenix nodded, giving the teen a smile.

There was silence for a minute or two. Apollo watched the clouds through the branches of the tree nearby, while Phoenix was idly sorting through the small supply of food and crockery he'd packed, deliberately taking his time. In the park around them, a few other small groups had set up picnic blankets, and there was even a group of people who were flying kites in the largest tree-free space they could find, on the side of a nearby hill.

Phoenix finally finished his sorting and sat quietly for a few moments. "Say, Apollo?" he spoke up, breaking the silence.

Apollo jerked in surprise as he was pulled out of his thoughts, looking over to the ex-lawyer. "Huh?"

"I don't mean to pry, and feel free not to answer this if you don't want to," Phoenix continued, before gesturing to Apollo's left wrist, "but I was just wondering about your bracelet there. Where'd you get it?"
Right hand instinctively going to said bracelet on his wrist, Apollo had to think for a few moments. "It... was left with me," he eventually decided to reply. "When my dad died and... and my mom disappeared. When I was a baby."

Phoenix nodded sagely. "I see."

"When I become a lawyer," Apollo continued, staring off into the distance, "I'm gonna wear it in court, so my mom might recognise me by it."

"A noble cause," Phoenix replied, smiling. "When a moment, he laughed, adding incredulously, "Did you just say you want to be a lawyer!?"

Apollo nervously rubbed the back of his neck. "Um, yeah," he admitted, more confidently continuing, "I want to protect people in court, like you do! Er, did."

Phoenix laughed a moment more, shaking his head. "Fine, that's fine!" he said. "But that's what you want to do! Don't think it's so easy, though. If you've seen any of my trials, you should have figured that out on your own."

"Yeah," Apollo replied, blushing. He decided not to bring up the few of Phoenix's trials he'd seen, to save himself further embarrassment.

"Incidently," Phoenix continued, scratching his cheek in a show of idleness, "you're not jealous of my offer to Luke, are you?"

Apollo was surprised at the question, shifting in his seat on the blanket. "Why?"

"You were put in foster care as a baby, and you're still there," Phoenix pointed out, "plus in a boarding school instead of with a more permanent foster home. I know you'll be an adult yourself in a few years, but have you never wanted to be adopted by someone? Have a stable home, at least?"

Apollo found himself rubbing at his bracelet in thought as he stared at the blanket beneath him. "I... wouldn't say no to the right offer, I guess," he admitted. "It's... just never worked out that way for me."

Phoenix mulled on the answer for a few moments before only nodding, and leaving the conversation at that.

"If you're not too exhausted, we could always discuss the offer I made you now."

Luke and Trucy had returned from their 'tour' of the park, which had consisted of about thirty or so circuits of the play equipment at the top of the hill. The moment they had returned to the safety of the blanket, they had dropped to the ground and were lying on their backs, hats off as they panted in their happy exhaustion. Claiming it was "too hot" to wear her cape, Trucy had feebly managed to unpin it, though hadn't pulled it out from underneath her, and was now pouting at the tree branches above them as she gripped the diamond-shaped pin in one hand. Phoenix had insisted they sit and rest for a while before he got out their food for lunch, which the pair had complained about inbetween their own panting for air.

Luke attempted to push himself into a sitting position, but was unable to support his upper-body.
weight without his left arm and was forced to flop back down on the blanket. "Alright," he eventually answered to Phoenix's question, staring at the sky through the tree-branches. "Discuss what, exactly?"

"Good points, bad points," Phoenix suggested with a shrug. "Making compromises and such. We don't have to if you don't want to."

"It's fine," Luke replied, smiling. "I only have two problems with it actually."

Phoenix nodded. "Lay 'em on me, then."

Luke pointed into the sky with his right pointer finger. "Firstly, what happens when we find my parents? Does that nullify the adoption?"

"I'm sure it would be possible to arrange something, should they turn up," Phoenix replied with a shrug. "I don't see why there wouldn't be."

Apollo smiled. "You used to be a lawyer; Shouldn't you know?" he asked jokingly.

"I dealt in criminal cases only and you know that," Phoenix said, giving Apollo an amused smile regardless.

Luke added his second finger to his pointing, making a 'two'. "Secondly!" he announced. "I don't want to leave Clay and Apollo at Turner Boarding School." He dropped his hand back on his chest. "Would it be possible for me to stay there if I was adopted? I could do what Clay does and come home for holidays and most weekends."

Phoenix thought for a moment. "I could make it work," he eventually decided. "It's definitely too long a journey to be doing twice a day, so you'd have to be certain you want to stay in the school most of the year."

"But that's not fair!" Trucy complained, balling her hands into fists at her sides. "I want a big brother!"

Luke laughed. "You'll still get one!" he replied. "I'll just be with my friends most of the time!"

"Plus," Phoenix added with a grin, "he'd only distract you from your homework. More than you're already distracted from it."

Trucy pouted. "Am not distracted," she muttered, crossing her arms.

Apollo smiled at the conversation, but looked away to hide that it wasn't entirely genuine. 'Luke's gonna go through with it, then.' He couldn't deny a part of him was envious of his friend's new, loving family, but he refused to let it show, not wanting to ruin Luke's good time. 'He's just lost his parents, he deserves something good to happen to him. I'm fine where I am.'

"Hey, Apollo," Phoenix called, shocking the teen into paying attention to the conversation again. "I didn't mean to leave you out of the conversation. What are your thoughts?"

Apollo frowned. "Huh?"

Luke was also confused. "But I'm still going to be at school...?"

"Hypothetically, of course," Phoenix continued, giving the boys an enigmatic smile, "if you were in Luke's situation, Apollo, what would be your concerns about being adopted? It's bound to happen
For an instant, Phoenix could see excitement in Apollo's eyes, but it was quickly overtaken by a pessimistic frown. "That would never happen," he pointed out. "I've got three years left before my time is up, and anyway, most people want babies when they're adopting. I missed that chance." He shook his head, forcing a smile. "I'm fine where I am."

Trucy frowned, pushing herself up into a sitting position to face Apollo. "No you're not." she replied.

Apollo glared at her. "Yes, I am," he insisted.

"I can tell when people lie," she said, utterly serious. "And you're definitely lying about something."

"Wow, really?" Luke cried, rolling onto his right to enable himself to also sit up. "Apollo can do that, too!"

Apollo only blinked in surprise, glancing at Luke before returning his gaze to Trucy, who was still staring sternly at him. After a moment's silence, he sighed, looking away. "I don't want to talk about it," he said.

"That's fine," Phoenix said, having watched the small confrontation with a carefully guarded expression. He waited a moment for Trucy and Apollo to calm down, then pulled open the small picnic bag beside him. "Now, who's up for lunch?"

"Ooh, me!" Luke cried, suddenly finding the energy to scramble over to Phoenix's side. Trucy, similarly excited, followed close behind.

Apollo, although smiling, waited patiently where he was. 'If I was in Luke's situation... I'd be looking forward to becoming a Wright, too.'

"SO?" Clay demanded impatiently as they sat down with their lunch trays. "Tell me what happened on Saturday, already! I've been waiting all morning!"

Apollo shrugged nonchalantly, hiding a smile behind his food. "We had a picnic."

Luke similarly restrained his own amusement, biting his lip. "Yep!"

Clay groaned exaggeratedly, falling onto the table around his food. "Guuuuuys!" he whined. "I've been waiting for this all weekend! The suspense is killing me!"

"I thought you just said you'd only been waiting since this morning?" Apollo asked with a sly grin.

"Just tell me, you jerk!" Clay shot back behind a fake pout, making a feeble swipe at Apollo's food that the other boy easily dodged. "Or I won't be your friend anymore!"

"Hey, no more being insulted every five minutes!" Apollo replied cheerfully, shooting the now-giggling Luke an exaggerated grin. "Awesome!"

Clay whined a few seconds more before Luke finally decided to put their over-dramatic friend out of his misery.

"Mister Wright came to pick us up with his daughter, and took us to their home on our way to have a picnic!" he explained. "They run a talent agency now!"

"Really?" Clay asked in surprise. "What's an ex-lawyer doing running a talent agency?"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Trucy says she's the one who runs it."

"Trucy being his kid?" Clay specified, Luke giving him a quick nod. "And after seeing his home, you just went on a picnic together?"

"Mm-hmm!" Luke replied. "It was fun! Trucy totally tired herself out playing on the monkey bars!"

Apollo smirked. "You did too, you big kid."

Luke looked embarrassed. "Uh, well... it's only gentlemanly to accompany a lady, you know... even to play on the equipment."

"Mister Wright hashed out the details with Luke to adopt him," Apollo continued for Clay. "He's gonna stay at this school."

"Wow, awesome!" Clay replied, giving Luke a thumbs-up. "It's great to have you sticking around!"

Luke giggled. "I couldn't leave you guys behind! I'll be over at their place for some weekends and over school breaks, like you!"
Clay nodded. "Makes sense. Just make sure you're here on the weekends we go to the space center, okay?"

"Deal!" Luke replied.

Apollo stared at his food, hoping his friends wouldn't make a habit of going home on the same weekends. He'd gotten used to always having a friend around.

Later that day, Luke was working alone at his desk in his dorm room, books and papers spread out before him.

"Knock knock!" came a call from outside the door, and, a moment later, Nancy opened it, smiling as she spotted Luke working hard at his desk. "Ah, getting a head start on our homework, are we?" she asked as she entered the room.

Luke smiled sheepishly, standing up from his chair. "Um, yes. Did you want something, Nancy?"

"Letter for you, dear," Nancy replied, holding out a plain envelope in her hand. "From England, apparently."

"The Professor!" Luke gasped, almost ripping the letter out of Nancy's hand in his excitement. "He wrote back!" He dashed back to his desk, throwing a belated "Thank you!" over his shoulder.

Chuckling to herself, Nancy left the room.

My dear Luke,

I was greatly saddened to read your letter and learn what had come of you and your mother and father. Hopefully, by the time you receive this, Mr. Wright will have met up with you. I gave him a call to let him know where you were, as it seems your parents happened to make their new home in the city he lives in. He should be able to assist you with finding information, as he assisted us in Labyrinthia.

Your new friends sound very exciting. In fact, I'd hazard a guess that you might learn something very interesting if you asked this Apollo about his hero, that is, if you have not already learned what I speak of from Mr. Wright himself. Clay also sounds like a smart boy; Not just anyone can become an astronaut, after all. He will have to be dedicated to make it that far.

I will be sure to keep in mind over the holidays that your letters may be delayed in finding their way to me. Over the summer months, it may be best that I temporarily write to the address where you are staying then, in order for us to keep in touch.

Flora misses you also. She has turned to baking to distract herself. I fear I will have to replace our oven before too long. It was perhaps a mistake to start spending more of my time at home, where the smell of burnt pastry has begun to permeate the apartment. Flora appears to have charmed our neighbours into offering their help instead of complaining, which is a blessing. We are both doing well, otherwise. Life continues as usual.
I have enclosed a few puzzles I discovered recently that may interest you. Do remember to reply when you are able.

Your friend,

Professor Hershel Layton

Clay had dragged his fold-up stool into Luke's room, and, at Luke's insistence, they were doing homework before moving on to more fun things to do. Luke was at his desk, while Clay and Apollo used textbooks to write on, Clay on his stool and Apollo on the bed.

There was a knock on the door, quickly followed by a voice calling, "Knock knock!" Luke got up to attend to the door, only to stop as they heard the sound of Nancy's master key turning in the lock.

"Hi, Nancy!" Luke called as his door creaked open.

The middle-aged dorm-mother poked her head into the room with a smile, then slowly made her way in. "Got a letter for you, Luke."

"Ooh!" Luke cried, eagerly taking the proffered letter from Nancy's hand. "Thank you!" He dashed off to his desk, grabbing a pen lid in the absence of a letter-opener to carefully open the envelope.

"Oh, and you're here too, Apollo!" Nancy added, surprising the teen as she pulled another letter out of the bundle in her hands. "There's one for you as well."

Apollo took the letter with some reluctance. "One... for me?" he repeated in disbelief.

"Well, I'll leave you boys to it," Nancy cheerfully said, turning and leaving the room with a wave.

"Who'd write you a letter?" Clay asked Apollo, placing his makeshift textbook-desk and homework on the floor as he stared at the paper in his friend's hand.

"I dunno," Apollo replied, staring at the front of the letter to confirm it was indeed 'Apollo Justice' that it was addressed to. Giving his friend a shrug, he grabbed a corner of the flap on the back of the envelope and ripped it open, creating a jagged hole roughly along the top. As he tugged the letter from its prison, Luke similarly finished opening his envelope and slid his own letter out.

There was an ominous silence as the two boys read their letters, Luke smiling and Apollo staring in shock as his eyes ran down the paper in his hands.

"Whoo-hoo!" Luke cheered, dropping his letter on his desk and turning in his chair to grin at his friends. "Mister Wright must have put through the request to adopt me! There's a social worker coming to-!" Noticing Apollo's expression and similar letter, he halted his cheers rapidly. "Apollo?"

Apollo continued to stare at his letter.
Clay held out a hand towards his friend, then reconsidered and pulled it back. "Apollo? What's it say?"

"This has to be a cruel joke," Apollo muttered.

Clay frowned, then snatched the letter from his friend's hands, to no protests, and read it himself. After a few moments, he gasped. "No way!"

"What!?" Luke cried, standing up from his chair. "What is it!?"

"Someone wants to adopt Apollo!" Clay announced in disbelief, holding the letter up for Luke to see.

"What!?" Luke cried again, rushing to Clay's side to similarly snatch away the letter and read it himself. He frowned as he read it, glancing back at his own letter on the desk. Aside from their names at the top, the letters were practically identical, saying that a request had been processed to adopt them and a social worker would be coming by to discuss it with them, although at a different scheduled time for Apollo than Luke. 'Hmm, another puzzle! And I think I know the answer, too.' "Apollo, how many adults do you know outside school?" Luke asked.

Apollo, still staring stunned into space, shook his head. "I dunno," he mumbled. "The people at the Space Center, Mister Wright... But why would any of them be adopting me?" He sighed, turning to stare at the wall behind him. "It's probably some weird couple who's asked to adopt any fifteen-year-old so they don't have to look after me for too long."

Clay frowned, then stood up from his stool and lightly whacked his friend on the head. When Apollo protested, giving the other boy a glare, Clay crossed his arms and stood tall. "Stop being so pessimistic!" he ordered. "It's not like that would stop us being friends, would it? Besides, can't you refuse an adoption if you don't like the parents?"

"Of course you can!" Luke cut in with a nod. "Mister Wright told me that last week!" 'Not that he'll want to, if my deduction is correct...' Apollo shook his head. "Mister Wright isn't an adoption lawyer," he pointed out, "he can't know for certain." He sighed again. "I'll have to wait until this social worker comes to figure out what I can do... and if I'll be transferred out of this school or not."

"Even if you are," Clay insisted passionately, "we're not going to stop being friends! We'll find a way to keep in touch!"

"Yeah!" Luke agreed with a nod. "You'll be fine, Apollo! Just you watch!"

Apollo sat in silence for a few moments before looking up at his friends and smiling. "You're right. Thanks, guys. I'm glad you two are my friends."

Clay suddenly squirmed, then pulled Luke and Apollo into a tight hug. "I love you guys!" he declared.

"Yeah, we love you too," Apollo mumbled with a glare. Luke just giggled and returned the hug.

"Come on in, Mister Justice!"

Apollo nervously entered the room, pausing in the doorway for a moment before he continued in. It was a small room, populated with only a single desk against the wall and two chairs, one of which was occupied by a short woman in a scarf, blouse and pencil skirt, who gave Apollo a friendly smile as he passed through the open door.

"Could you please close the door behind you, dear?" the woman asked. "Don't want this conversation to be overheard, after all."

Apollo nodded, reaching behind him to push the door closed, then pushed his hands into his pockets as he ambled over to the empty chair, unsure if he should sit or not.

The woman stood up, holding out a perfectly manicured hand. "It's nice to meet you, Mister Justice. I'm Miss Order, but you can call me Lauren."

She seemed genuinely friendly, but even so Apollo hesitated before reaching out to shake her hand, half-worried her long nails would scratch him.

"Sit down, dear," Lauren requested, gesturing to the empty chair as she sat back down in her own. "We have quite a bit to talk about."

Apollo nodded as he reluctantly lowered himself into the seat, his hands gripped together nervously in his lap. "Someone wants to adopt me," he stated.

Lauren laughed to herself. "Indeed!" she said. "I'm taking on your case as a favour for him." She turned to the paper on the desk beside them, running her hands over them. "It doesn't look like your previous case worker did very much for you after putting you here, did he?"

"He found me places to stay over breaks," Apollo mumbled with a shrug, but had to admit to himself the older man who still ferried him between school and his various foster homes had never really seemed to care about Apollo... especially after his age reached double-digits.

"Mmm," Lauren hummed to herself critically, then looked back up at Apollo with a perky smile. "Well! Hopefully we can do something to change that today, yes? If nothing else, I can least see to getting you a transfer to someone else."

Apollo thought for a moment before shrugging. "Doesn't seem like there'd be much of a point."

"Maybe so," Lauren agreed, looking concerned as she registered the teen didn't look too happy. "Are you alright, dear?"

"I'm fine," Apollo insisted, staring at the papers on the desk. "Who's trying to adopt me, anyway? Is it even someone I know?"

Lauren seemed confused for a moment, then laughed. "Oh dear, no wonder you looked so concerned! He didn't tell you?"

Apollo frowned, looking up at the woman in confusion.

"He must have wanted it to be a surprise," Lauren muttered to herself, rolling her eyes. "Honestly, you'd think he'd've learned better with Trucy..."
Trucy!? Apollo blinked in surprise. "Wait, you mean... Mister Wright is the one adopting me!?”

"Phoenix Wright, yes," Lauren answered, smiling. "I was beginning to wonder if he’d given me the wrong name there! He said you went with him on a picnic last Saturday?"

Apollo nodded. "Yeah, we did! H-he asked me what I thought about adoption, but...” He shook his head, still in shock. "Why’s he adopting me, though? Luke was already his friend, but... I’m just some kid!”

Lauren shrugged. "Search me,” she replied. "He only told me he had his reasons, but not what they were."

There was a short silence while Apollo slowly pulled himself together, steadfastly hiding away his excitement at the prospect of getting to know his idol more. A part of him wondered if this was an elaborate and cruel joke, but he quashed the thought with the more rational point that Phoenix didn't seem cruel enough to go so far on something clearly so important to the teen.

"Would you like to get started?” Lauren asked. "Or do you want to block the request and end things here? It's up to you."

Apollo shook his head. "N-no, we can keep going," he insisted, forcing a smile and finding it was genuine despite his lingering nervousness. "After all, we've got fifteen minutes until you have to see Luke, right?" He shrugged. "May as well fill up the time somehow!"

Fifteen minutes later, Luke was waiting patiently beside the closed door into the room he was scheduled to meet the social worker, leaning against the wall. After he and Clay had seen Apollo off from the cafeteria, Luke had worried about their friend, who had been highly distracted ever since they received their letters two days ago. Although Luke suspected who it was trying to adopt his friend, he hadn’t wanted to say anything without knowing for sure, just like the Professor always does!, and thus waited in hope that Apollo would be leaving the room happy.

The door suddenly swung open, and Apollo bounced out of the room, grinning. "Hey, Luke!" he cried as he noticed his friend. "Good luck in there!"

Luke grinned to mirror his friend, the pair fist-bumping before Apollo thrust his hands in his pockets and strolled off down the hallway.

"Come on in, Mister Triton!” a voice called from within the room.

Giggling, Luke headed into the office. 'Something tells me Apollo will be fine after all!'
"In other news, magician Valant Gramarye was today released from police custody. Officials say all suspicion of him has been lifted regarding his involvement in the murder of his mentor, Magnifi Gramarye, founder of the world-famous Troupe Gramarye magic act. Valant said in a press release that he looks forward to returning to the stage, performing as the last surviving member of the Gramarye group."

Phoenix sighed as he clicked a button on his remote and turned off the television. "Well, there goes my chance to question Valant again," he grumbled to himself, lying across the black sofa and propping his legs up over the armrest. "So much for finding out more about Thalassa's bracelets from a reliable source..."

Silence reigned in the apartment for only a few moments before a familiar ringtone sounded from the low table, where Phoenix had left his phone. Sighing loudly, Phoenix pulled himself back into a sitting position and grabbed the noisy device off the glass, checking the screen to see the number. His face immediately fell. "Uh oh." Wincing, he pressed the button to answer and held the phone to his ear, putting on his best bluffing game. "Hey, Edgeworth," he casually greeted his friend. "Isn't it the middle of the night for you right now?"

"Highly amusing, Wright," Miles Edgeworth replied from the phone speaker, sarcasm dripping from his tone. "I'm currently in Canada; The time-zones aren't more than a few hours' difference."

"Tch!" Phoenix rolled his eyes. "Can you blame me? You're usually off in Europe or Asia. I never know where you are when you leave the country." He smirked. "What am I, your babysitter?"

Edgeworth sighed a long-suffering sigh. "No, but I'm apparently yours," he pointed out. "I just received an interesting call from Trucy's social worker."

Phoenix bit his lip. 'Honestly, I'd forgotten Lauren only put Trucy through with your help,' he thought about saying, but restrained himself. "I didn't want to bother you, y'know?" he said instead. "You being off on another of your trips and all."

"You got caught up in your investigation into Kristoph Gavin and forgot, didn't you?" Edgeworth interrupted, a harsh tone to his voice.

Restraining a growl, Phoenix nodded, briefly forgetting Edgeworth couldn't see it.

"I'll take your silence as a yes," Edgeworth replied, sounding more calm. "The only opinion I can express with the knowledge I have now is that three children to look after might be a sufficient distraction for you. None of us want you destroying yourself with this investigation of yours."

"Yeah, yeah," Phoenix muttered, partly glad his friends had refused to abandon him and partly still wishing they'd gotten far away from him when they still could. He hated the thought that, just by talking to him, any one of them could have their reputations and careers demolished just like his in the blink of an eye. 'That's it, no more asking favours from Gumshoe.'

Edgeworth paused before continuing. "Wright, why don't you tell me about these boys you're insisting on taking under your wing?" he asked. "And then you can tell me what Maya thinks of all this."

Phoenix grinned at the mention of his former assistant. "She seemed on-board with it when I spoke to her last," he said, teasing his childhood friend. "She has more faith in me than you do, Edgeworth!"

The man on the other end of the phone line sighed, and Phoenix could imagine him shaking his head in exasperation. "Just tell me about the boys, Wright."

A part of Phoenix longed to waste as much of Edgeworth's time as he possibly could, but in this case he decided to be kind. It was in everyone's interest they get this ball rolling as quickly as possible.

Phoenix was moving dirty plates and cutlery from the sink to the dishwasher when he heard his phone ringing in the distance. After hurriedly drying his hands on the dishtowel, he raced through the door to his office, where he'd left the blue device on his desk. He took only a glance at the number calling, but it was a long enough look for his brain to register who it was as he clicked to answer.

"Why hello there, oh great Master of Kurain!" Phoenix announced over-exaggeratedly into his phone, restraining a laugh. "Why is a great spirit medium like you calling a lowly pianist such as myself?"

Maya giggled on the other end of the line. "Not pianist, lawyer!" she corrected despite her laughter. "It feels wrong to call you anything other than that!"

Phoenix laughed, relaxing as he sank into the black sofa he and Maya had spent so many nights on as she subjected him to endless Steel Samurai marathons. "Alright then, 'lawyer'!" he conceded. "Honestly, I'm surprised you were able to call this week. You said you'd be busy until November!"

"I found some time alone," Maya airily explained, and Phoenix could imagine her shrugging nonchalantly. "Somewhere with a signal." She giggled again. "Plus, I just had to get an update on what's going on with Luke! Is he alright? You were able to meet with him, weren't you? Has he decided what he wants to do yet?!"

"He's fine, don't worry," Phoenix assured her. "I took him and his friend out on a picnic with Trucy."

"Ooh, I forgot about his friend!" Maya cried, suddenly turning stern as she continued, "Was he a nice kid? Tell me honestly, Nick. I'm not letting Luke hang out with jerks. I don't care how many of Kurain's elders I piss off in the process!"

Phoenix laughed. "Don't you worry about Apollo, he's a nice kid." 'Speaking of Apollo...' "By the way, Maya, was there something you forgot to tell me about?"

There was a brief silence on the other end of the line. "I... can't think of anything," Maya eventually replied, sounding confused. "You'll have to be more specific."

"Something on the internet," Phoenix continued, smiling as he imagined the look on Maya's face as she realised what he was talking about. "That you and Pearls ran, apparently. I think Apollo said your usernames were 'Fairy-Mine' and 'Fairy-Pearl'?"

"My-Fairy and Precious-Fairy!" Maya angrily corrected, before realising her slip and quickly stammering an excuse. "I mean, I don't know who they were, but Pearly and I knew about the fanclub! I wasn't a part of it, and, honestly, there weren't that many people, so I didn't want to hurt your feelings by telling you about it, and..." She trailed off and sighed in resignation. "This 'Apollo' told you all about it, huh?"

"He told me enough," Phoenix replied, feeling sorry for putting Maya on the spot. "Apparently you two were posting about my cases the moment I got them? I think it was a bit of a stretch claiming to be 'semi-official', though."

Maya scoffed. "Why? I'm your assistant, anything I do related to the office is semi-official!"

After a brief, confused pause, Phoenix shook his head and decided to leave the topic at that. "Back to Apollo, I think you'll be hearing a lot more about him soon."

"Oh? Why?"

"I've offered to adopt him."

There was a pause as Maya processed the small bombshell. "Okay," she eventually said. "Are you developing a problem here, or...?"

Phoenix laughed. "You'll agree with me when you hear my reasoning: I think he might be Trucy's long-lost older half-brother. On their mother's side."

"Really?" Maya asked, surprised. "Oh, wait, you said you were researching Trucy's mother! Did you find something?"

"Yup," Phoenix replied with a grin. "Thalassa Gramarye had rather unique bracelets, an heirloom made especially for her bloodline. Two of them, actually. But, and this is the kicker, all the pictures from before her death to about fifteen years ago have her wearing only one."

Maya hummed in thought. "So he and Trucy have matching bracelets?"

"No, actually," Phoenix admitted. "What got me interested in them was that Trucy hadn't inherited one. I found a single article showing Thalassa with both, and it claimed she had married a stage performer and was expecting a kid. Nothing else I've found mentions them as anything more than rumours, but I wouldn't be surprised if there was a grain of truth in there, considering this article's not that much older than Apollo."

"Ah!" Maya cried as she saw Phoenix's reasoning. "I see! And only a lawyer like you could have connected those dots, huh?"

Phoenix rolled his eyes at her teasing. "Apollo told me himself he was left with the bracelet as a baby and has nothing else to connect him to his family. I don't know if he'll accept my offer yet, but if he does, I plan to tell him and Trucy what I've found out. It's only fair."
"Aw, poor kid," Maya sighed. "Is he a lot like Trucy? I bet they get on like proper siblings already! Oh, and does Trucy get on with Luke? I can't see why she wouldn't, but..."

"Don't worry," Phoenix laughed, "all three of them get on just fine! Trucy's looking forward to getting an older brother or two, although she is upset that they want to stay at their current school, so she won't be able to see them all the time."

Maya thought for a moment. "You said they were at a boarding school, right? Why'd they want to stay there?"

"Friends, mostly," Phoenix replied with a shrug. "Luke plans to stay at ours some weekends, and I suppose Apollo will do whatever Luke does. They'll be here over school breaks, too."

"They'll have to share a room," Maya sighed nostalgically. "Sis and I did that for a while, before she decided to become a lawyer." She laughed. "There aren't nearly enough bedrooms in that apartment of yours to fit you all!"

Phoenix scoffed playfully. "We'll see!" he insisted. "If there was enough room for me and three Feys at once, I say there's enough for me and three kids!"

"Mia doesn't count!" Maya protested. "Besides, she might still be there occasionally! You need all the help you can get, becoming a single father of three in only..." She paused to mentally go over how much time had passed since May. "Five months!"

"And what about you?" Phoenix shot back, finding he was being serious in response to Maya's joking objection. "You're the Master of Kurain now. Every time we talk, you always sound like you're having so much trouble making Kurain a better place..." He paused to rub his forehead. "I worry about you sometimes," he admitted.

Maya was silent for a few moments. "I worry about you, too," she quietly replied. "Hey, there hasn't been any mention of you in the papers for a few weeks now, right? Maybe, the next time I have a day off, we could arrange to get those three kids of yours up here. Have a family vacation?"

Phoenix smiled. "Not much of a vacation, only one day," he pointed out, cheering up already. "But, yeah, that would be great." How long has it been since I last got to see you in person? I miss having you around the office every day. And Pearls too, of course.

"Oh heck, I gotta go," Maya suddenly cried, sounding harried. "I'll call you the next moment I have free, okay Nick?"

Phoenix nodded. "Of course, I'll talk to you later."

"Bye!" Maya added, just before her line went dead.

Sighing, Phoenix lay down on the sofa. It would be a while before he felt motivated enough to get up and resume his household chores.

View the Court Record
"She said we have to have two 'supervised' meetings with him first," Apollo was explaining to Clay as they entered his room, "and then it goes through officially."

"Huh, weird," Clay mumbled, dropping onto Apollo's unmade bed as though it were his own. "I guess I can see why they have to do it, though."

Luke closed the door behind him and held his arms across his chest as he leaned against Apollo's empty drawers. He had been in Apollo's room only a few times since befriending him, but even so it was abundantly clear that not even Apollo liked to spend time in his room. As the teenager owned nothing but his bracelet and the uniforms and school supplies the school provided him with, it was a barren place that felt more like a hotel room than a place to call one's own. "I'm sure Trucy had to go through all this too," Luke mused. "I wonder if she'll be allowed to come?"

Apollo scoffed, sitting on his bed beside Clay. "Still, who'd've thought Mister Wright would want to adopt me!? How many kids get to be adopted by their idols like that!? This is so cool!"

Clay laughed, patting his friend on the back. "Calm down there, Bessie! You can fanboy over your future dad to his face in these meetings. Then they'll let you through for sure!"

"Ha ha," Apollo deadpanned with a roll of his eyes, only to add after a pause, "Actually, that's a good point. We can't call him 'Mister Wright' once he's adopted us."

Luke tapped his chin with his right hand. "Maya calls him 'Nick'. Or we could just call him 'Phoenix'."

"Who's Maya?" Clay asked.

"Yeah, you and Mister Wright have mentioned her before," Apollo pointed out, frowning in thought. "She a friend?"

Luke nodded. "She was Mister Wright's assistant when he was a lawyer," he explained, grinning. "The Professor and I met her in England, with Mister Wright!" He decided not to mention the time Maya covered him in phosphorescent moss and he was left sopping wet in a dank, underground cave after washing it off. "She said she was a spirit medium, too!"

Apollo's eyebrows shot up. "Really!?" he asked. "Do you think she was involved in Mister Wright's big trial in February?"

"I've been wondering that myself," Luke admitted with a shrug, moving over to sit in Apollo's desk chair. "I forgot to ask Mister Wright on Saturday."

"But you were there," Clay pointed out to Apollo, poking him in the shoulder. "Shouldn't you remember if there was a 'Maya' involved?"
Apollo crossed his arms, giving his friend a glare. "I'm not \textit{that} good with names," he grumbled. "Besides, that trial was so weird I was focusing more on what was \textit{going on} than who the people were."

"That's understandable," Luke agreed, recalling how confusing Apollo's recap had been. "We'll have to ask Mister Wright when we next see him. Oh, and about what we should call him, too."

"Do you not want to call him 'Dad'?' Clay asked, resting his head in his hands as he leaned forward, elbows on his knees. "That's always an option. Or 'Father', 'Papa', 'Pops', 'Old Man', 'Male Parent'..."

Apollo smiled. "I like 'Dad'. Trucy calls him 'Daddy'.'

Luke winced. "I... can't call him those. I already have a father. No offence to Mister Wright."

"Yeah, I mean, he offered to stay your friend even if you didn't want to live with him," Clay pointed out, then elbowed Apollo as he straightened up in his seat. "Hey, do you think Mister Wright's parents are around? You might get grandparents too!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Yeah, cuz I really want to get to know smelly old people..."

"That's not nice, Apollo!" Luke objected, crossing his arms awkwardly around his cast. "The elderly are generally wiser, and full of good stories and life experiences we can all learn from!"

Clay raised an eyebrow, staring at Luke incredulously. "Did you rehearse that or something?"

"Nevermind," Apollo muttered, frowning as he raised his hands in surrender. "I'm sorry, okay? I'm sure Mister Wright's parents are lovely."

Luke smiled and nodded, proud to have changed his friend's mind.

\textit{Dear Professor Layton,}

Thank you very much for getting in contact with Mr. Wright for me! He met up with me only a few days before your letter arrived, and has indeed promised to help me with the mystery of what has happened to my parents. He has also offered to make my life here until then a little easier by offering to adopt me, and extended the offer to my friend Apollo too. Also, Apollo did finally tell me the story about what happened to his 'hero', so I do know now that Mr. Wright isn't a lawyer anymore and why. Clay was adamant in calling him by a nickname the media gave him, 'The Forging Attorney', until he found out Mr. Wright was my friend and apologised. Apollo seems to be in shock over meeting his idol, not to mention said idol offering to adopt him. Speaking of, we both accepted. It will make my search for Mum and Dad a lot easier.

Clay says he's very aware of the work he needs to do to become an astronaut, then he lectured me on everything he's learned about space travel from his mentor, Mr. Starbuck. He's also very close to everyone else at the Cosmos Space Centre, which isn't far from here, and seems to love showing off just how much he knows whenever we go there.

You already have Mr. Wright's address, don't you? I think it might be easiest you send me letters there from now on, since I will be spending my school breaks there (and some weekends - exact days are impossible to give) with Trucy and Apollo. Has Mr. Wright told you about Trucy already? He adopted her in May, and she's very sweet. She's promised to get me to one of her magic shows one of these days!

Perhaps we should buy Flora a cookbook of some kind? I don't know if she would resent not being allowed to experiment with her cooking, not after the "fish cake" she made before I left. Either way, I hope she continues doing well. And you too, of course! If you ever are able to visit me here, I'm sure Flora would love to see the Space Centre herself: They have robots there that are specifically programmed to recognise and respond to emotions, for the purpose of one day being companions for humanity's ventures into space! Clay is very excited about it, and I'm sure he'd love to recount every detail for her.

Thank you for the puzzles! They were great fun to work on during a break in my homework! I thought up a few myself since I arrived here, and have included them in this letter. I hope you enjoy them!

Your friend and apprentice,

Luke Triton

"'Nick' is fine with me," Phoenix mused, leaning back in his chair in the empty classroom. "Or any variant on 'Daddy', since Trucy already calls me that anyway. Whatever you're comfortable with."

Apollo grinned, lying more than leaning on the desk he had sat at. "Great!" he chirped. "Thanks, Mister Wright!"

Lauren smiled to herself. "You should have seen Trucy when Mister Wright here suggested she call him 'Daddy'. Picked it up immediately, she did."

Phoenix chuckled. "Trucy is very unique like that. In the best way possible, of course."

"By the way," Lauren continued, turning to Apollo, "I do apologise I couldn't organise to get us out of your school for this first meeting. Once we have all four of you together next week, it should be a lot easier to get you out of here."

"It's fine," Apollo assured her with a shrug. "I'm sure Trucy's having fun keeping Luke busy, running all over this place. Besides," he grinned, "I have plenty of things I can talk to Mister Wright about!"

Phoenix couldn't resist a smirk. "Lemme guess, some of my old trials?"

Apollo straightened up in his chair in surprise. "How'd you know?"

"I guess I'm getting to know you," Phoenix somewhat sarcastically replied, laughing. "Go ahead, talk to me. I'm curious to know which of my trials you sat in on."
Rubbing the back of his neck in embarrassment, Apollo began to talk.

Outside, Clay was laughing his head off as Luke chased Trucy in circles around the courtyard.

Luke looked out the window in delight, watching Trucy show off her magic tricks to a delighted Clay while Apollo stood nearby, pretending to be disinterested. I'm glad they get on so well!

"Apollo said yesterday you were curious about Maya?" Phoenix asked, sitting nearby.

"Uh huh," Luke said with a nod, turning in his chair to face his friend and trying not to look too worried. "Especially since Apollo said you had a big case about spirit mediums in February?"

"Don't you worry," Phoenix assured him with a smile, "Maya is perfectly happy and alive." He laughed. "She's just... inherited a rather important position back in her home town. She had to quit being my assistant full time to take care of it."

Luke thought for a few moments, recalling a conversation the four of them had had back in Labyrinthia about where they came from. "Didn't she say something about her town being full of spirit mediums like her?"

Phoenix chuckled to himself and nodded. "They take it all very seriously up in Kurain. The Feys are a highly important family, and Maya's the head of it now."

Lauren looked up from the book she was reading in interest.

"The head!?" Luke repeated in disbelief, jaw dropping open. "How'd that happen?"

"It was always going to, eventually," Phoenix explained with a sigh. "We just thought we'd have another few years before it became a problem. It all kinda came out of nowhere."

Luke pulled his feet onto his chair, hugging his knees. "Did the previous head of the family suddenly die?"

Phoenix couldn't resist a short, bitter laugh. "She came out of hiding specifically to die, apparently."

"Huh?" Luke asked, cocking his head to one side.

"It's a long story," Phoenix sighed, rubbing his face with one hand. "Maya's mother, the previous Master of Kurain, went into hiding about... eighteen years ago now. If she didn't reappear, Maya was going to inherit Mastership once twenty years had passed."

Luke hummed to himself in thought. "They must have both been something very important."

"What was, dear?" Lauren asked.

"Whatever made her go into hiding," Luke explained, "and whatever made her reappear before she Phonix smiled to himself. "Yeah," he muttered. "They were."

"You should have ordered it last week," Edgeworth coldly reminded his friend over the phone. "It would be arriving now, and you wouldn't be having this problem."

"And how are you planning to move them and the suitcases they inevitably have from their school to your apartment?" Edgeworth added. "Possibly during peak hour, I might add."

"I'm serious," Edgeworth continued. "I'll pay for it myself, if I have to."

Phoenix blinked in surprise, sitting up in his desk chair. "Really...?"

"I may as well," the prosecutor admitted. "I'm essentially acting as your financial guardian now." He paused, then added in a more serious tone, "Just don't get any ideas of 'charitably' taking on more children. Three is more than enough."

"Ha ha," Phoenix deadpanned.

"Trucy always saves seats in the front row," Phoenix explained as he led Lauren and the two teenage boys through the crowded bar. "Be careful," he teased, "she may pick one of you to be her 'lovely assistant' tonight."

Apollo frowned. "Why are you looking at me!?!"

Luke smiled. "That sounds like fun! I can't wait to see what she can do!"

"I'll admit," Lauren said, "I have been curious to see Trucy's talent in her family business. I never got to see a Troupe Gramarye act live."

"You'll certainly enjoy yourself, I can guarantee that," Phoenix assured her with a smile, then paused and pointed at a table by the stage with a grin. "Ah, looks like our seats!" He snatched the small 'reserved' sign from the centre and dropped into one of the chairs. Luke excitedly dragged Apollo over to take the two seats closest to the stage, and Lauren gingerly lowered herself into the last remaining of the four chairs.

Apollo turned to face Phoenix. "Do you see Trucy's show a lot, Mister Wright?"

Phoenix nodded. "I try to come by every week, but sometimes they want me at work on Saturdays."

"Goodness!" Lauren gasped. "Does Trucy go home on her own!?"

"Oh no," Phoenix explained, shaking his head. "I drop her off before her show, then she comes and meets me at my job. It's not far away, so one of the adults usually walks her over."

Lauren sighed in relief. "That's good to hear!" she nervously laughed. "I was worried for a second there!"

Phoenix laughed. "Honestly, Trucy is always begging for more shows." He gestured around the full house. "As you can probably see, her act is already really popular, so her boss certainly wouldn't say no."

"Why don't you let her, then?" Apollo asked.

"Since her family always travelled, she hasn't had consistent schooling," Phoenix sighed. "I've restricted her to one show a week until she's caught up, and even then, I've told her no shows on school nights." He frowned darkly at the stage. "Not that it helps making her do her homework every night, though."

The lights began to dim, and Luke bounced in his seat as the crowded bar began to suddenly quieten. "It's starting!" he hissed.
For Apollo and Luke, the adoption process was over in a flash. After seeing Trucy's magic act the previous Saturday (Apollo was indeed called up on stage as Trucy's latest 'victim', in his words) and finishing off their second supervised meeting with their future parent, Lauren had pulled out some forms to hash out the final details with the boys and Phoenix on their adoption. To Phoenix's surprise, although Luke wanted to keep his surname, Apollo was eager to change his and take on the 'Wright' name. Since they would be staying at their current school, it was agreed they would hold off on moving in to their new home until the following Friday (although Apollo was quick to point out he had nothing to move, but was looking forward to it regardless).

Clay was feeling a little put out as he helped the new brothers move Luke's handful of suitcases out into the courtyard. "You guys aren't gonna run off and forget me, are you?" he asked as they sat on the benches. "We're still gonna go to the Space Center together on most Saturdays?"

"Of course we are," Luke assured him, holding his teddy with his broken arm and the handle of a suitcase with the other. "I wouldn't miss hanging out with you for anything!"

Apollo smiled, idly tapping the bracelet on his left wrist. "Except, you know, the process of being adopted. That's all over now, but it was more important, unfortunately."

Clay shrugged. "I guess I can't blame you. Trucy is pretty incredible." He pouted. "I can't believe I didn't get to go and see her magic act!"

"You can come tomorrow!" Luke suggested. "You know where we live now, you can meet us there before the show!"

"Would that be okay?" Clay wondered. "With your new dad, I mean?"

"It should be fine," Apollo pointed out. "We're already planning on going to see it again, anyway."

One of the many cars parked by the dormitory gate drove away, and the open spot was immediately filled by a small van, painted along the side with the name and number of a local cab company. The side door flung open and a small girl with a bob of brown hair bounced out, wearing a school uniform consisting of a pale-yellow blouse and checked skirt.

"They're here!" Apollo cried, leaving the suitcase he'd been carrying and dashing over to the gate. Luke and Clay shot each other a look and decided to wait where they were.

Phoenix was just closing the passenger door behind him when a teenage boy slammed into him, gripping him tightly in a hug. He looked down to see brown hair, lovingly arranged into spikes at the front. "Apollo?" he asked in surprise.

Apollo spoke quietly, and, although his words were muffled by Phoenix's chest, they were still perfectly understandable. "Thanks, Dad."
A part of Phoenix was tempted to snarkily ask what he was thanking him for, but mostly he was shocked at the choice of name the teen had suddenly given him. He decided to take the comment as a general thanks and smiled, returning Apollo's hug. "You're very welcome."

After a moment, Apollo and Phoenix separated, and Apollo dashed off to the gate, which Trucy had rushed to hold open when she saw Apollo running through a few moments before. She glared at her new brother as he approached. "Hugs later! We have work to do!" she admonished him sternly.

Apollo rolled his eyes, muttering "Alright, alright," as he walked through the gate. "You're on gate duty anyway..."

Trucy stuck her tongue out at Apollo as he passed.

Phoenix and Apollo walked together across the quiet side of the school's courtyard to where Clay and Luke were sitting with Luke's re-packed suitcases. "Hi, Mist-, I mean, Nick!" Luke called, waving as he stood up, teddy trapped tightly between his cast and chest. He had been struggling to switch to Phoenix's nickname since the adoption process started, and Phoenix couldn't help but smile every time the younger teen messed it up.

Clay threw Phoenix a quick salute against his ever-present visor, standing up and grabbing the largest of Luke's suitcases. "We putting them in the cab out there, Mister Wright?"

Phoenix nodded. "Yes, thank you, Clay." As Clay headed off, Apollo took one of the remaining two suitcases and Phoenix grabbed the last, to Luke's consternation.

"I can carry it, Mi-, uh, Nick!" he cried.

"I'd rather I do it," Phoenix replied with a smile. "You're already carrying that bear, aren't you?"

Luke opened his mouth to reply, but couldn't think of a comeback, so he hugged his bear tighter as he closed his mouth again.

The cab driver opened the back of his van to let the small family load Luke's bags inside, and, once they were done and back on the sidewalk, Clay moved to his two friends to pull them into a sideways hug. "See you tomorrow for this magic show?" he asked.

Trucy, having abandoned her post at the gate, gasped in delight. "You're coming to see my show!?"

Clay smirked. "Duh. It's the best magic act in town, isn't it?"

Phoenix smiled as Trucy bounced on the spot with joy. "We'll see you tomorrow then," he said. "Six-thirty would be best, if you're planning on meeting us at the office."

"I told you it would be fine," Luke whispered to his friend, grinning.

Clay released his friends with a laugh. "Seeya then, Wrights!" He strolled back towards the gate, giving Trucy a pat on the head as he passed.

Phoenix piled his three children into the back of the cab, taking his seat back in the front with the driver. As they peeled off back into peak hour traffic, Phoenix heard Apollo, Luke and Trucy already deep in their own discussion about something he couldn't quite hear over the engine. He smiled, happy they were keeping themselves entertained for now. It would be another hour and a half before they would arrive back at the boys' new home.
"I can't believe I forgot to introduce you guys to Mister Charley!" Trucy shouted as she shoved the front door of their home open, brandishing the keys Phoenix had given her wildly. "He's such an essential part of this office!"

Phoenix rolled his eyes in amusement as he entered after her, carrying the largest of Luke's suitcases straight through further into the apartment.

Apollo frowned, dropping his one suitcase at the end of the reception desk. "What, you have a pet?"

"Yep!" Trucy chirped, bouncing in place next to the plant by the door into Phoenix's office.

Luke carefully closed the front door behind him, dragging his suitcase carefully so as not to lose his grip on his teddy bear. "If you have a pet, why didn't you mention him before!?" he asked, almost indignantly, leaving his final small suitcase where it sat and walking over to join Apollo and Trucy. "I'm brilliant with animals!"

Trucy giggled. "Well, he's not an animal, really." Before her brothers could protest, she gave a grand gesture towards the tall palm lily at her side. "Ta-da! This is Mister Charley! He's our mascot!"

Apollo's face fell. "It's a plant."

"Yep!" Trucy cried, hands on her hips.

Luke gave her a polite smile. "He's... a very nice plant!" he said, one hand at the brim of his cap.

Trucy giggled. "You don't have to pretend," she muttered, then instantly brightened up again, crying, "That's okay! You'll learn to love him!" She petted one of Charley's leaves fondly. "Daddy says Mister Charley's been here longer than him! He's seen an awful lot for a mere plant!"

"That he has," Phoenix said, and the three looked up to see their father appearing in the door through to his office. "I'll tell you the whole story sometime," he promised the boys, then cast a glance to the abandoned suitcases behind them. "Right now, we should get you two settled in first. Do you remember where your room is?"

Apollo and Luke glanced at each other worriedly, while Trucy only continued to grin. "I can show them!" she chirped.

"Before you go up, though," Phoenix interrupted, hand up to keep Trucy from running off, "I have to warn you, there's only one bed up there right now. I've ordered a second, but it hasn't arrived yet." He shrugged in apology. "I've set out a sleeping bag for one of you to use until then, if that's alright."

"That's fine," Apollo and Luke said in unison, pausing to blink in surprise at each other as Trucy giggled. Apollo shook his head and continued, "I'll sleep in it. It's been ages since I got to go camping!"

Trucy clapped her hands together. "C'mon, I'll show you guys where your room is!" she cried, then raced past Phoenix into his office.
Without the sunlight streaming in through the large windows, Phoenix's office was bathed a deep blue tint, hiding the details of the shelves of legal books and casefiles that covered the walls. Nestled in the wall opposite the windows, hidden between the shelves, were two doors; One led to a small toilet, while the other marked the entrance into the residential section of the apartment, leading to the kitchen and dining area. From there, next to a laundry area and back door, was a staircase to the upper floor, which led to an open landing and corridor that lined the way to the bedrooms and bathroom. Phoenix's room was the furthest away at the end of the corridor, next to the bathroom that Trucy warned them had a second door inside they had to lock when they were using it, as it was also connected to the main bedroom. Trucy's room was next to it, the closest door to the stairs, and Apollo and Luke's new room was inbetween, opposite the bathroom.

As they entered the room, Trucy hanging back in the doorway, Luke and Apollo paused to look around. It had changed a bit since their first visit over two weeks ago now, with the single bed moved up against a wall, along with its bedside table. The cupboard by the doorway was left open, Luke's large suitcase and an innocent-looking letter sitting in front of it, and, against the opposite wall to the bed, a sleeping bag was laid out, a second bedside table sitting beside it.

Apollo shrugged, smiling. "It'll look much better once we get my bed in," he pointed out, strolling over to the sleeping bag and dropping down to sit on it, to Trucy's amusement.

Luke nodded, walking over to the bed and carefully arranging his teddy against the pillow. "I've never shared a room with anyone on a permanent basis before," he said. "Only hotel rooms." He decided to wait to investigate his suitcase, feeling too drained to face it right now.

"I always shared rooms with my parents and Uncle Valant," Trucy replied, crossing her arms in thought. "Until Daddy adopted me, of course."

"I've shared rooms before," Apollo said with a shrug. "Most foster kids do at some point." He grinned. "Don't worry, Luke. We'll be getting on each other's nerves like real siblings before too long."

Luke giggled, sitting on the bed. "I hope it's a long time before that happens!"

"Everything okay in here?" Phoenix asked as he entered the room from behind Trucy, carrying Luke's last two suitcases. "I'll leave these by the cupboard for you to unpack in your own time, Luke. Oh, and don't forget this letter that arrived for you from the Professor."

"Thank you M-, Nick!" Luke cried, making a mental note to check out the letter before he went to sleep.

Trucy tugged at Phoenix's sleeve as he placed the suitcases in his hands by the other two. "Daddy, I'm hungry! Is it dinnertime yet?"

"You're always hungry," Phoenix replied, ruffling Trucy's hair. "But it is probably time to eat, I'll admit."

"Oh, good!" Luke cried, jumping to his feet. "I'm starved!"

Apollo rolled his eyes as he dragged himself back to his feet. "You're always hungry, too," he mumbled.

Phoenix laughed as he headed off down the corridor. "Well, Hungry and Starved, I'll see what I can do for you, shall I?" Trucy cheered as she followed after, while Luke and Apollo only smiled, walking to the kitchen at their own pace.
My dear Luke,

I am happy to hear of the rapid progress you are making already! Although, I must admit, I did not expect Mr. Wright to offer to take you in as his own, nor for you to accept such an offer. Regardless, I am sure your parents would be happy to hear you have someone who cares about you as he does to look after you. I can imagine your friend Apollo must be over the moon to also be taken into Mr. Wright's family, if he still idolised him after the incident in April.

Tell your friend Clay I apologise for offending him in expressing my concerns. He sounds very enthusiastic and well prepared to follow his dream to its fruition, and I wish him the best of luck.

I am well aware of young Trucy, as you suspected. Mr. Wright has told me about her in his own letters, although I did not learn about her until shortly before you left England, and I regret I was distracted and unsure of how to tell you of Mr. Wright's predicament myself. I hope you'll forgive me saying I think we were both a little distracted at the time.

Both Flora and I are doing very well. I do not think a cookbook would be the solution to Flora's experimentation. As you say, she would resent being made to follow a list to the letter, although if I can convince her to stick to only minor changes from a trusted recipe, it may help her cooking instincts down the road. She tried experimenting with my tea set last week, and I'm afraid I had to crack down on her. She apologised only an hour later, but I still regret the little spat regardless. I'm sure Flora would appreciate seeing the robots at the Space Centre you spoke of, and certainly seemed intrigued when I told her of them. I'll keep them in mind should we ever visit.

The Ascots came to visit the other day, and Flora had great fun asking them all about Monte d'Or and old Stansbury, and playing with young Sherry. Randall claims he is thinking of surprising Henry by leaving the city in his care and simply going on holiday, although I suspect that is more likely to give poor Henry a heart attack than anything else. They asked after you, so I told them you were doing well.

The puzzles you sent were very enjoyable! I let Flora take a crack at them, although she needed a hint or two to find the answers (through no fault of the puzzles, I can assure you). I've included a few more for you, should you need a break from your studying.

Your friend,

Professor Hershel Layton

Palm Tree Shopping Mall

"But I hate shopping!" Apollo complained as he lagged behind his family, wandering down the aisles of the first clothing store the Wrights had spotted in the local mall. "Can't I go back home?"
Phoenix laughed. "Wouldn't that defeat the purpose of specifically buying you clothes?" he asked. It had become his personal mission for that day once he learned of Apollo's meagre belongings, wanting the boy to feel more at home no matter how much he was fighting the idea right now. "You can't always wear that uniform, y'know!"

Apollo pouted, crossing his arms. "Watch me!"

Trucy, once again dressed in her magician's outfit all ready for her show that evening, skipped to Apollo's side and stared at him with a big grin. "Okay, I will!" she cried gleefully.

"You know what I meant!" Apollo objected, making a swipe at Trucy's hat that she ducked to avoid with a giggle.

Luke looked around at the racks of shirts they were currently inspecting. "What's your favourite colour, Apollo?" he asked. "That would give us something to start with, at least."

Apollo thought for a moment. "I've always liked red, I guess," he admitted.

"Me too!" Trucy cried, flapping her red cape, then tapped her chin in thought. "Although, I've been thinking of making my next stage outfit in another colour, just to try it out. Like, I could try my Grandpa's black outfit, or Mommy's blue. Or come up with my own colour, like purple! Or green!"

She grinned at Apollo. "What do you think?"

Phoenix pulled a pair of red shirts, identical except for their differing sizes, off the racks and held them out to Apollo. "These look interesting?" he asked. "You might need to try some on to find your size."

Apollo gave a long-suffering sigh and took the proffered shirts. "I'll be back in a bit," he muttered darkly.

"You don't want to collect more than two first?" Phoenix called after him, but Apollo didn't reply.

Phoenix's Office

Luke waited until after lunch to approach Phoenix and ask for somewhere he could write his return letter to the Professor (Trucy and Apollo were using the kitchen table to play a particularly heated game of Monopoly), and Phoenix immediately led him through into his office.

"I totally forgot you'd want desks of your own," he said apologetically as he walked over to pull out the chair behind his desk, hurriedly collecting the loose papers that littered its surface. "I'll have to look into that, but in the meantime, you can just use mine."

"Thank you, Nick," Luke said with a smile, clutching his letter from the Professor close to his chest. "I'll be sure not to leave a mess!"

Phoenix laughed, stepping back to allow Luke to sit down. "No worries, I leave it in a mess" anyway.” He opened a drawer to shove the papers in his hand in, pulling out a small tablet computer to make room for them.

"This?" Phoenix clarified, holding up the small tablet, and when Luke nodded, he placed it on the desk. "It was my job computer, when I was still a lawyer. We used to nickname it 'the Court Record' because that's primarily what it was used for."

"Sure it does!" Phoenix cried, holding a small, circular button along the long edge of the device until the screen lit up, a brown and red log-in screen asking for Phoenix's password. "I'm still in the habit of using it to keep up with notes and interesting stuff I notice, actually. These things are specially designed to slot into our benches in the courtroom, so they automatically update with all new evidence, and let us control the holograms we use to display it to the court."

Luke stared at it a moment in surprise. "Wow, an actual modern courtroom is real different to witches court, isn't it?"

Phoenix laughed. "Yeah, real different," he agreed, holding the button on his tablet down again until the computer began to shut down. "I'd offer to show you, but I don't have access to a courtroom anymore. You'd have to ask Apollo."

"That's fine," Luke replied, nodding. He finished adjusting the chair and started work on his letter. "I keep notes on things myself, in my notebook. I've always found it's a good habit to have!"

"Yeah, I suppose it is," Phoenix said under his breath, ruffling Luke's hair. "Let me know if you need anything else, huh?" Leaving Luke to his writing, the ex-lawyer left the room.

Dear Professor Layton,

Apollo and I moved in to Nick's, Mr. Wright's, apartment yesterday. We have to share a room because it's not all that big, but we're fine with it, since we won't be here all the time except during the holidays. I've never got to share a room before! Apollo says we'll start to annoy each other eventually, but he was just joking. I think. Apparently there's a hold up on his bed getting here, so he's using a sleeping bag for now. Trucy was really excited for us to get home, and keeps boasting of her 'two new big brothers'. She and Apollo are always teasing and annoying each other, but I think they've gotten really close deep down.

I'll pass your apologies and well wishes on to Clay when I see him next. He's coming by this evening to see Trucy's show, and I think he's worried that Apollo and I are going to forget him because we have a new family and home. We very specifically wanted to stay at Turner Boarding School to keep being his friend, so I hope to show him there was no need to worry in the coming weeks.

It was very distressing to learn of what happened to Nick to force him to quit being a lawyer, but I can understand why I didn't hear about it until I was over here. I don't blame you for anything, Professor. It was just bad circumstances all around.

I'm sorry to hear that you and Flora had a fight. Is she missing me terribly? Tell her I miss her too, but we'll be fine, both of us. Saying that to myself has helped a lot when I've felt down these past few weeks, so it might help her. I learned it from Clay and Apollo actually, and it's almost become a catchphrase between the three of us! It's amazing to think I've already been in America over a month; I think I'm even beginning to miss Flora's unique sandwiches, if you can believe it.

I hope the Ascots are doing well? I remember seeing Sherry when she was only a few months old, but that was only just after we found Flora, so she'll be much bigger now I suppose. Has Angela passed down that necklace yet, or is it still too early for that? If you see them again, it's okay to tell them about my parents. I have a new home and I'm fine, so there's no need to worry about me.

That reminds me, I still need to write to Arianna. I promised her I would once we arrived, but I think I got distracted.

Thank you for the extra puzzles! I've put them to one side to look at later, once I have some time. I already prepared some of my own to send with this letter; I hope you and Flora enjoy them!

Your friend and apprentice,

Luke Triton

"Wow, I almost didn't recognise you in that!" Clay laughed, poking Apollo's brand new red shirt and brown pants, which the teen had changed into without prompting once the family returned from their shopping trip. "You've actually got something to wear now!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Well done, you've noticed that people change clothes occasionally. The phrase 'babies have no concept of object permanence' comes to mind."

"Aw, you don't need to be so negative about it, Polly!" Trucy chirped with a smile, bouncing on her heels. "You look great without that stuffy uniform on!"

"It doesn't matter how many times you say that," Apollo sighed, crossing his arms, "you're not going to win any points with me." He turned to Clay and added, "Seriously, she said that about every single thing I tried on this morning."

Clay laughed, leaning on the reception desk behind him. "Hey, it's a little sister's job to annoy their older brother, isn't it?"

Apollo immediately turned to Trucy. "Take that seriously and I'll kill you."

Trucy smiled and shrugged. "Why would I do that?" she innocently asked.

"Suddenly I'm glad I'm an only child," Clay said with a grin.

Apollo shook his head in exasperation, hiding a small smile.

"Is everyone ready to go?" Phoenix asked as he entered the room, looking around at the three there. "You got everything for the show, Truce?"
Trucy tapped her chin. "I think so." She reached a hand into the pink, heart-shaped bag hanging off her hips, rifling through the contents rapidly.

"Everything except these!" Luke called, entering the room behind Phoenix and holding aloft a pair of oversized blue bloomers, decorated with soft pink hearts.

"My panties!" Trucy cried, rushing forward to take the prop from her brother. "Thanks, Luke!"

Apollo closed his eyes. "Magic panties," he corrected under his breath. "It's not that hard to say!"

"Then, if we've got everything," Phoenix announced, waving the collected children towards the front door, "let's get out of here so the show can go on!"

"Yay!" Trucy cheered, rushing ahead. Luke and Clay followed with their own cheers. Apollo waited until Phoenix placed a hand on his shoulder with a chuckle to follow at a slower pace, but was nonetheless excited to be seeing his new sister showing off for the crowds again. Not that he would ever admit it out loud, though.

Once they got outside, Phoenix called to the trio ahead, "Trucy, you'll let me know if you spot Eldoon's, won't you?"

"Sure, Daddy!" Trucy replied with a wave. "I know the drill!"

Apollo looked up at Phoenix curiously. "Eldoon's?" he repeated.

"Noodle stand," Phoenix explained with a smile, "Trucy and I get dinner there every Saturday." He laughed to himself. "Didn't get a chance to introduce you and Luke to him last week, since Lauren insisted on meeting at the Wonder Bar 'n all."

"Is that it, Mister Wright?" Clay called from ahead, and Phoenix and Apollo looked up to see a wooden pull-cart sat on the corner ahead, being slowly walked away from them by an old man in white, wearing a red bowl on his head that gave him the appearance of stringy, blond hair, betrayed only by his natural whitened locks visible beneath.

Trucy gasped, racing towards the cart and waving wildly. "Mister Eldoon!" she cried. "Mister Eldoon!"

Clay and Luke glanced at each other before running after her, laughing.

The cart stopped and the old man looked around, adjusting his thick glasses as he spotted the small group approaching him. "Is that young Trucy?" he asked.

"It's me!" Trucy replied, catching up to the cart with Clay and Luke close behind her. "I brought my brothers this time!"

"Ah, I see!" Eldoon said, smiling proudly down on the two boys behind her. "And what fine young men they are!"

Clay laughed nervously, blushing. "N-not me, sir, I'm just a friend."

"Second one's here," Phoenix added, ruffling Apollo's hair as the teen whined "Daaaaad!" in protest.

"Ah, I see!" Eldoon said again, examining Apollo through his glasses as the last two members of the group arrived at the cart. "And what would your name be, young man?"

Apollo rubbed the area around his bracelet nervously. "Apollo," he muttered.
Eldoon clasped his wrinkled hands together. "Apollo! The Greek god of music, truth, and the sun itself!" he announced, chuckling as he explained, "Among other things, of course! I used to be quite the fan of Greek mythology as a boy, you know."

Apollo looked away, well aware of his ancient namesake.

Luke held out his hand. "And I'm Luke!" he introduced himself. "Pleased to meet you!"

"Pleased to meet you too, Luke," Eldoon replied, shaking the boy's hand good-naturedly. "Now, I understand your little family, and friend, are here for some food?"

"Five bowls, but not too salty tonight," Phoenix said with a grin. "Don't want to kill them, after all."

Eldoon gave a hearty laugh, walking around to the back of his cart. "You've got it, Mister Wright!"
With Trucy privately showing off some of her more complicated magic tricks to Apollo (who everyone could tell was only faking his extreme reluctance to go along with it), Phoenix and Luke headed to the office. Luke had been eager to get started on the investigation into his parents' disappearance, and Phoenix had assured him he had already gathered some of the necessary research they needed, all ready for once the adoption process was over and Luke was settled in to his new home.

"I tried looking for newspapers myself," Luke explained as he sat on the black leather sofa, "but there weren't any in the school library and I didn't know where I could look after that."

Phoenix nodded, grabbing his tablet computer from his desk and quickly powering it up to log in. "Even if there were, I'm sorry to say you might not have found anything anyway."

Luke frowned. "What do you mean?"

"The police said barely anything about it to the press," Phoenix explained, navigating to a specially prepared folder in his 'cases' program as he said down beside Luke. "There wasn't much to report on." He opened up a scan of an article and handed the tablet off to his younger son. "That's the most I saw, if you want to see it."

Luke took a few moments to read the article in silence.

YET ANOTHER ACCIDENT ON "DEMON PATHWAY"

August 26

Forest Road, a woodland road in the mountains not far from the city and nicknamed "the Demon Pathway", has claimed two more victims in a hit-and-run car accident late last night, police report. A car containing a couple in their thirties was hit by something much larger and forced off the road, where the driver and passenger lost their lives, sources say. "They had a minor with them, who has survived and is in the hospital for treatment of his injuries." The victims have yet to be officially identified, but police say more information will become clear as their investigation continues. They urge anyone with any further information on the accident to please come forward.

"No," Phoenix agreed solemnly, leaning back on the sofa. "It says a lot more than any other articles I found did, though."

Luke sighed, also leaning back as he looked up at Phoenix. "That's not good."

Phoenix shook his head, then smiled. "It's a good thing newspapers aren't my only source of information."

"They aren't!?!" Luke asked in surprise, sitting up straight.

"I used to be a lawyer, remember?" Phoenix said with a chuckle. "I still have friends in high places, even if they won't always talk to me."

"That's brilliant!" Luke proclaimed, holding the tablet in his hands tighter in his excitement. "Were you able to find out anything?"

Phoenix shrugged. "A little," he admitted. "Firstly what you told me, about the bodies not being there. Secondly, that this is only the latest in a long line of accidents on that road." He sat up. "Every few months, a car mysteriously crashes somehow in the middle of the night, and there's always at least one person from the car missing, with enough blood left to indicate they almost certainly died. The police are totally stumped. 'Thank goodness for Gumshoe's inability to keep secrets... and his willingness to do anything for a kid.'"

Luke tapped his chin in thought. "No wonder they won't talk about it to the press," he mused aloud. "You're telling me," Phoenix laughed. "They're so embarrassed about it, they keep switching detectives, and they haven't involved the Prosecutors' Office at all, even though they highly suspect it's some grand serial murder case on their hands."

Luke sighed. "If only the Professor was here..."

"We're not totally out of ideas," Phoenix assured Luke, gently taking back his tablet computer and flipping through his few assorted notes and pieces of evidence. "One thing I haven't done yet is go to Forest Road itself. We likely won't find anything there by now, but it can't hurt to have a look around."

"Agreed," Luke said with a nod. "The only possibility I can think of is that my parents walked or were dragged away from the car." He crossed his arms. "Although, I don't know why they would have left me behind..."

"They likely didn't have a choice," Phoenix pointed out. "They would have been injured like you. Probably knocked unconscious. I'd say someone else removed them." He shrugged. "Can't say why that someone else left you behind, though."

"And then there's the question of what hit us!" Luke added as the thought occurred to him. "It must have been something big and strong to force our car off the road and still be able to drive off!"

Phoenix nodded, then placed his tablet computer on the low table in front of them. "Gumshoe's already thought of that. Miraculously," he said. "Boasted he was doing a search for any trucks or other large vehicles needing repair."

Luke frowned a moment, then nodded in recognition. "Detective Gumshoe?!" he confirmed. "I spoke to him in the hospital!"

"He told me," Phoenix replied, smiling. "Gumshoe's a friend of mine, actually. Very good at sharing information, if you know how to talk to him."

Luke giggled. "That's good for us, then!" He looked at the computer on the table, tapping his chin. "So, what's our first move in the investigation?"

"A trip to Forest Road, I think," Phoenix answered, leaning back in his seat and smiling. "Do you think Apollo will mind babysitting Trucy for this afternoon?"

Apollo gasped in amazement, sat on the floor beside his new younger sister, an abandoned deck of cards strewn in front of them. "And he just let you go?"

"Yep!" Trucy giggled. "He was so embarrassed that Daddy wasn't in there, he even got his handcuffs caught on his collar!" She held her hands over her mouth in an effort to keep from laughing too loudly. "He almost choked himself!"

Apollo snickered, also hiding his mouth behind a hand. "Poor guy!" he said between giggles. "You might have cost that bailiff his job, you know!"

A showing off of magic had quickly led to an explanation of how a simple card trick worked, which had somehow led to the young pair discussing Trucy's former life as a Gramarye, via her newest and most difficult trick, Mister Hat.

"It was my very first public performance!" Trucy protested, hands on her hips. "Daddy said we'd really impress everyone if we made him disappear!" She paused and pulled her hat down over her eyes slightly, looking down to the cards on the floor. "I miss him sometimes. Him and Mommy."

Apollo frowned, then, after a moment of thought, reached out a hand to rest on the girl's caped shoulder. "I never met them," he admitted, "but sometimes I miss my parents, too. And I wonder what my life might have been like if they'd... never left me."

Trucy turned her gaze up to her new brother, giving him a small smile. "My mommy always told me never to waste time on 'what ifs'," she said. "You can't do anything to change 'em. Besides, if Mommy and Daddy hadn't disappeared, I wouldn't have our Daddy and two amazing big brothers!" She jumped up on her knees and threw her arms around Apollo's neck in a tight hug, surprising the older boy. "We're all gonna look after each other, and find Daddy a new Mommy for us, and help Luke find out what happened to his parents, and maybe find my Mommy and Daddy and your Mommy and Daddy too!"

Apollo winced. "A-actually, my dad died when I was a baby," he admitted. "And doesn't finding our existing families defeat the purpose of creating a new one with each other...?"

Trucy released Apollo, looking up in surprise. "Oh... I'm sorry."

"It's fine," Apollo insisted, shaking his head. He forced a small smile. "My mom's still out there somewhere, though."

"Just like mine," Trucy replied, giving him a grin. She promptly jumped to her feet. "Oh yeah! And when you become a lawyer like Daddy used to be, you'll let me help you with your investigations, won't you? The way Daddy tells the stories, they sound so exciting!" She pouted and crossed her arms. "He won't let me help with his secret missions at all!"
Apollo bit his lip, hiding a smile. "I'll... think about it," he agreed, then raised an eyebrow. "Wait, what secret missions?"

Sighing, Trucy sat back down on the carpet. "Daddy thinks I have no idea, but there's nothing else he could be investigating right now except for who really killed my grandpa and who framed Daddy for forgery!" She fiddled with the diamond brooch holding her cape on. "He leaves me with Uncle Larry or Uncle Edgeworth, or goes off when I'm at school, and I don't get to help! It's so unfair!"

"We have uncles?" Apollo muttered.

"But Luke's helped him with an investigation before," Trucy continued, "and you're a lot older! Maybe he'll let you help, and you can convince him to let me help, too!" She reached out and grabbed Apollo's shirt, looking him fervently in the eyes. "You'll do that, won't you Polly?"

Apollo frowned, pushing his younger sister away from his face. "Hang on a second," he said insistently. "We don't even know if Dad'll let Luke in on this 'secret mission' of his. He might have a good reason to leave us all out of it!"

"Don't be so boring!" Trucy protested, crossing her arms. "This'd be good practise for you, since you wanna be a lawyer 'n all!"

At that moment, there was a knock at the door, and it creaked open a little way before Phoenix stuck his head into the room with a smile. "You two having fun in here?"

"Yes, Daddy!" Trucy chirped, standing up and giving her father a wide grin.

Apollo nodded. "Did you want something, Dad?"

Phoenix hummed in thought, entering the room fully as Trucy eagerly ran to his side. "Luke and I were planning to go out this afternoon and start our search for his parents. Will you two be okay on your own here?"

Trucy and Apollo glanced at each other in shock, Trucy smiling while Apollo was more wary. "Let us come with you!" Trucy cried loudly, grabbing Phoenix's arm and tugging on it firmly. "We want to help!"

"Huh?" Phoenix asked in surprise, gazing blankly at his daughter. "You want to come?"

Apollo sighed internally, but decided Trucy's earlier pleading had convinced him and approached his father. "We want to help out Luke. Besides, if I'm going to be a lawyer when I grow up, I'm gonna need some practise in investigations, right?"

Phoenix looked between Apollo's calm face and Trucy's determined one, then shook his head with a sigh. "Alright, fine, if you two are sure."

"Yay!" Trucy cheered, twirling on the spot.

"Don't blame me if you find this trip boring, though," Phoenix continued, then turned and began to leave the room. "I'm going to make a call, then we'll get ready to leave, okay?"

"We'll be fine, Dad!" Apollo replied with a smile.

With Phoenix now out of the room, Trucy bounced up to Apollo, giving her brother a hug. "See?" she said. "We're gonna prove ourselves useful, and then Daddy has to let us help him with his secret missions!"
Apollo chuckled. "Yeah, I guess so," he admitted.

Ring ring... ring ring... beep!

"Oh, hey pal!"

"Hey, Gumshoe. You're not busy right now, are you?"

"Nope! Hey, how are your kids? Everything go fine?"

"Yes, everything's fine. Just getting the boys settled in this weekend, before they head off back to school tomorrow. You and Maggey doing well, I hope?"

"Sure, sure, pal! Uh... look, you're not gonna ask for another favour, are you?"

"Oh, no, I promise, no more favours. I think you've done more than enough for me already. It's just, I was gonna take Luke to look around Forest Road, but I'm having trouble finding it on my map. You wouldn't be able to give me some simple directions, would you?"

"... You know what? I can do better than that, pal!"

"Huh?"

"I'm not doing anything today, and that Triton kid really touches my heart, still believing his mom and dad are out there somewhere! sniff I'm gonna give you a lift!"

"Um, not to insult your generosity, but my other two kids are wanting to come along too. Is there even room for all four of us in that old car of yours?"

"Sure there is, pal! You guys hang tight, I'll be there in twenty minutes!"

Click!

"... Well, that didn't go the way I was expecting."
"The detective's here!" Trucy shouted as she charged out of the Agency's reception area, down the stairs to the street below. Not far behind her was Luke, his satchel slung over his shoulder as he rushed to follow his younger sister.

Phoenix and Apollo were the last to arrive down on the sidewalk, Apollo nervously hugging one of his new sweaters tightly as it failed to completely protect him from the cold breeze. Phoenix gave his friend a wave, distracting Gumshoe from his excited greeting of Trucy to direct a grin in the ex-lawyer's direction.

"Gumshoe!" Phoenix cried.

"Hey there, pal!" the detective replied, giving Phoenix a quick and small salute.

Phoenix chuckled, holding Trucy back from bouncing all over Gumshoe's ramshackle car. "Thanks again for doing this. You didn't have to."

"I know!" Gumshoe replied, looking proud. "I wanted to, pal! Now come on, everyone in!" He opened the side door, gesturing the children into the back seats.

"I bags the middle!" Trucy cried, climbing in.

Luke, despite his excitement, more calmly walked around to enter the back-seat from the other door, laughing to himself. Apollo rolled his eyes and followed Trucy in.

After some time getting the car to start, Gumshoe peeled off from the parking spot outside the Agency and into the intermittent traffic of the street. "So, I've met two of you," he said to his rear-view mirror, addressing the back-seat. "I'm guessing little dark-hair is Apollo, right?"

"Uh, yeah," Apollo mumbled, unsure what to think of the spontaneous nickname.

Phoenix smiled from the front passenger seat. "He said yes," he translated, then decided to run his friend through the names of the rest of his children as a refresher. "Luke has the cast on his arm, and Trucy's the girl."

"Daddy!" Trucy giggled. "He's already met me and Luke!"

"Luke and me," Luke corrected, pointing a finger into the air. "You always put the 'me' or 'I' last."

Apollo couldn't resist a smirk. "Yeah, we Americans just can't handle the Queen's English, can we?" he asked, gently elbowing Trucy between them as she grinned.

Luke laughed. "Neither can most of the English, to be honest!"

Gumshoe snickered from the front seat. "Man, you guys remind me of my brother and me when we were kids! Those were good times, pal!"

October 6, 11:12AM
Forest Road

'It looks like just a normal stretch of road,' Luke thought to himself as he climbed out of the car. A stretch of tarmac surrounded by trees as far as the eye could see, with only faint tire marks on the road to indicate there had even been any kind of incident at all. There was only a small area of grass before the trees, just large enough to park a car like Gumshoe's.

Trucy climbed out onto the road behind Luke, giving him a tight hug from behind as she buried her face into the back of his shoulder. "Are you okay?" she quietly asked.

Luke just nodded, giving his sister a smile as she pulled away. "I'm fine, Trucy. Thank you."

Phoenix looked around as he joined Gumshoe at the side of the road. "They've cleared everything up already?" he asked.

"It's been over a month, pal," Gumshoe pointed out with a smile, hands in his pockets. "Needed to open up the road again, anyway." He leaned in close, holding up a hand to whisper, "I'll be honest, you're not gonna find anything. We scoped the place out good."

"It's still possible, though," Apollo said from behind the detective, giving Gumshoe a shock and causing him to jump away with a shout.

"D-don't sneak up on me like that, pal!" Gumshoe cried, brushing his coat off as he calmed down. "Whaddya mean by that, anyway?"

Apollo shrugged. "The police missing something," he replied. "Isn't that how Dad won most of his trials, because of stuff the detective on the case missed?"

Gumshoe looked hurt, and Phoenix grinned sheepishly, rubbing the back of his neck. "Nothing against you of course, Gumshoe," the ex-lawyer said, walking around to rest his hand on his older son's shoulder. "Apollo was a bit of a fan of mine." Seeing Apollo's confused look, he leaned down to whisper, "Gumshoe was the detective on almost all of my cases, believe it or not."

"Oh!" Apollo cried in shock, then gave Gumshoe his best apologetic smile. "Sorry sir, I had no idea..."

"S' alright, pal," Gumshoe mumbled.

Luke and Trucy approached from the other side of the car, and Luke tipped his hat with a polite smile. "I didn't mean to eavesdrop," he said in the detective's direction, "but please don't take it personally that I want to investigate the area myself, Detective."

Gumshoe grinned, waving off Luke's concerns. "Aw, don't you worry, pal! I understand!"

Phoenix nodded proudly. "A good philosophy to have, in my opinion." He then turned to Gumshoe.
"So, where was the car found?"

"Right over here, pal!" Gumshoe replied, turning with a swish of his trenchcoat and striding over to a patch of grass not far away, the Wright family close behind him. "It was all smashed up in the front and side; Some of the tires had even come off!" He crossed his arms as he regarded the area, seeing in his mind's eye the car as he had first found it. "Honestly, I was surprised we even found one survivor in that mess!"

Apollo looked over to Luke, who was glaring at the patch of grass as though it had personally caused the accident. "You recognise anything, Luke?"

"Mm-mm," Luke mumbled in the negative, shaking his head. "I was asleep at the time, and the accident knocked me out anyway. My memories of the journey to the hospital are too fuzzy to recall anything specific."

Trucy walked over to the tree line, hands on her hips. "So if Luke's mommy and daddy weren't in the car, they must be in the woods somewhere, right?"

"Good idea, Trucy," Luke said, although this was a conclusion he had already come to on his own. He looked up to his adoptive father. "Are we allowed to search the forest, Nick?"

"Sure," Phoenix agreed. "But we can't go too far. It's easy to get lost out here."

October 6, 11:18AM

Woods near Forest Road

The group of five wandered carefully through the forest, always keeping the road and Gumshoe's car in sight through the trees (which was more difficult than it sounded). Luke stayed in the lead, carefully watching the ground for any sign his parents may have left behind, and Phoenix stuck close behind, redirecting him if they strayed too far from the road and offering his more experienced eye to the search. Gumshoe, Apollo and Trucy lagged behind, mostly keeping their attention on their surroundings so the group wouldn't get lost.

Apollo, bored out of his skull, decided to pass the time in his own way. "Is this like any of your other cases?" he asked.

"Who, me or Gumshoe?" Phoenix asked, looking over his shoulder as he began to lag behind Luke.

"Both, I guess," Apollo answered with a shrug. "You worked together a lot, right?"

Gumshoe laughed. "Well, I guess this forest does remind me of that murder at Gourd Lake, right pal?"

Phoenix thought a moment. "Well, there's no lake," he pointed out, "and a lot more mountains, but I agree there are a lot of trees." He smiled. "It's more like Hazakura Temple, if you ask me."

"Except there's no snow here," Gumshoe replied, gesturing to the orange foliage and occasional bare branch above them. He gave Apollo a grin. "But, yeah, Mister Wright and I worked together a lot over the past three, four years, didn't we pal?"
"Like I said, almost every trial I've ever been involved with," Phoenix repeated, having now fallen far enough behind Luke to be more alongside Gumshoe.

"That's how you became friends, right?" Trucy asked brightly.

Gumshoe grinned, reaching out to pat Trucy's head before remembering she was wearing a hat and patting her shoulder instead. "You bet, pal! We made almost as good a team as me and Mister Edgeworth do!"

Phoenix smiled wryly. "If only that had mattered for anything in the Gramarye trial. We weren't much of a 'team' that time."

Apollo looked up at the embarrassed detective in surprise. "You were the detective on that case?" he asked.

"Yeah, well," Gumshoe muttered, scratching his neck as he looked over to Phoenix. "If you'd just spoken to me before that trial, pal, you wouldn't have had to forge that page..."

There was a horrible silence as Phoenix (quickly followed by the rest of the group) stopped dead in his tracks, staring sternly into the distance. Trucy similarly stared sadly at the ground, hiding her face under her hat.

"Uh, sorry, pal, I-I didn't mean..." Gumshoe stuttered as he realised what he'd said. "Y-you know I-!"

"Forget it," Phoenix muttered darkly, and he stalked off ahead to catch up to Luke.

Gumshoe wilted as Phoenix disappeared behind a tree. "Aw, me and my big mouth," he sighed. After a moment's pause, Apollo reached up and patted Gumshoe's arm. "D-don't worry," he said in an attempt at comfort. "I mean, the whole world is accusing Dad of forgery, he's probably used to it..."

"You wouldn't say that if you'd seen 'im that day," Gumshoe muttered sadly, then shook his head determinedly. "No worries, pal! We're gonna finish this investigation here, okay!?" With that, he stubbornly started following Phoenix's path.

Apollo and Trucy glanced at each other and shrugged in unison before hurrying after the detective. "So I guess you met the detective during the Gramarye case?" Apollo quietly asked his sister.

Trucy nodded. "He wanted to know where Daddy was on the night Grandpa died," she explained. "I didn't see him again until the trial, though." She grasped Apollo's hand, to the teen's surprise. "That was a pretty terrible day for all of us, as much as Daddy jokes about it..."

FLASHBACK: Disbarment

- Six Months Earlier -

April 20, 9:15AM

Wright & Co. Law Offices

Phoenix's Office

Phoenix slumped forward in his seat on the black lounge chair, elbows on his knees and head hanging between them. His white dress shirt and blue pants were crumpled from having been slept in, and made the lawyer - former lawyer - look far more unkempt than he normally would be. Hanging off his nearby desk was his red tie and blue jacket, a dark spot on its lapel marking the spot where his defence attorney's badge had once sat. The blinds on the window were pulled tightly shut, letting in only thin lines of sunlight at their edges and blocking the view beyond of the Gatewater Hotel across the street. The office phone, sat on the low glass table in front of him, had been unplugged the moment it began to ring the previous night, and sat eerily silent, the headset resting off the hook, to the side of its base.

In the distance, Phoenix heard muffled voices and the opening of his front door, and sighed. 'Knew I should have locked that.' He listened as the voices got closer, refusing to move from his position, until finally the door leading from his office to the reception area was flung open with a bang.

"Mister Wright!" Gumshoe cried in surprise, dashing around to stand by the low table nervously. "You came back, pal!"

"As I suspected he would," came a familiar voice, and Phoenix looked up to level a glare at Edgeworth as he followed Gumshoe. Behind him was a teenage girl with long black hair held in a ponytail over her head, looking curiously around the room as she fiddled with a blue scarf pinned around her neck. Phoenix gave her only a cursory glance before returning his glare to his red-suited friend. "Don't give me that look," Edgeworth continued to Phoenix, wagging a finger in his friend's direction. "I'm not here to condemn you, and you should know that full well."

Phoenix sighed and dropped his head again. "You shouldn't be here," he mumbled.

"And why not?" Edgeworth asked, only then noticing a mostly-full wine bottle dangling from one of Phoenix's hands. "If anything, we can keep you from making terrible decisions such as trying to drink." He leaned forward and gently removed the bottle without a fight from the ex-lawyer, who had found it in his kitchen and not examined what it actually was until he took a swig and despised the taste, lacking the motivation to put it away again afterwards.

"Geeze, where did you go to?" the teenage girl asked, arms crossed. "Gummy said you'd disappeared when he woke up."

"He told us what happened yesterday," Edgeworth added, placing the wine bottle on the far end of the table from Phoenix, just in case he tried to grab it again. "Something about a forged diary page and the removal of your badge." He cast a glare to the suit jacket hanging across the messy desk. "I see it wasn't entirely hysteria."
Gumshoe groaned to himself. "Aw, c'mon, sir!" he mumbled. "I was up most of last night tryin' to look after him!" He shook his head sadly. "Least I could do after what I said in court..."

"I'm an adult," Phoenix growled, looking up only to shoot another glare in the detective's direction. "I can look after myself, and I'm allowed to leave my own home for a few seconds without people panicking about me." He left unsaid that he had gotten as far as the furthest entrance to People Park before someone had recognised him and he'd fled back to his office, hanging his head again so he didn't have to look his two friends (and the strange girl they'd brought with them) in the eye. "Just leave me alone. It's for the best."

Edgeworth grunted, crossing his arms and tapping his fingers firmly. "No, it is not. You are our friend, Wright. We refuse to abandon you in a time of need."

"Yeah!" the girl cried, pumping a fist into the air with a cheery grin. "Besides, it's not all that bad! Mister Edgeworth lost his prosecutor's badge two weeks ago, but the P.I.C. gave it back to him a few days later!"

"I'm afraid this is an entirely different situation, Kay," Edgeworth interrupted, shaking his head at the girl. "I gave up my badge temporarily. Wright has been stripped of his. Dishonourably, at that."

Phoenix scoffed under his breath, moving his hands to rest his head in them, propped up against his forehead. "Rub it in, why don't you."

Kay huffed. "Well, the least we can do is let some sunlight in here," she said, and skipped over to the blinds. Gumshoe awkwardly followed to help her with the cords that controlled them.

"Quite frankly," Edgeworth continued, lowering himself politely onto the lounge next to Phoenix, "I didn't think it possible that the Bar Association would strip you of your badge within a day of a forgery accusation. Yet apparently, it has happened."

"It was more than an accusation, Edgeworth," Phoenix replied, looking up with only a sad expression instead of the glare he'd been wearing previously. "The prosecution proved it was forged beyond all doubt. Gleefully." He dropped his head back into his hands, his palms covering his eyes. "They cast a vote. Only one person thought I deserved another chance, and he was the brother of the friggin' prosecutor who accused me." Sunlight suddenly filled the room, and Phoenix shot a quick glare in Kay's direction before having to avert his eyes from the bright light. "I had those closed for a reason!"

"And as you said to me in return," Edgeworth countered, "you should not blame yourself for a mistake that was not yours."

Edgeworth was silent for a few moments. "But it was not you who forged it?" he asked in a neutral tone, ignoring the outburst to Kay.

"Like anyone cares about that," Phoenix spat. "Like you said about SL-9, all that matters is I presented evidence that was forged. I was responsible for it."

Kay had her face pressed to the glass, looking at the street below. "Huh, that girl's got weird clothes on," she muttered. Gumshoe quickly followed her gaze and placed a hand over his mouth, looking worried.

"But it was!" Phoenix shot back, looking up at his friend in exasperation. "I knew there was something off about that page, but I presented it anyway! I didn't even think about it!" He sighed, trying to hide the hitch in his voice as he buried his face in his hands again. "If only Maya'd been "there, she'd've stopped me..."

"Um," Kay quietly cried, pointing out into the street and glancing back at the two lawyers on the couch. "I think someone's..."

"Sir?" Gumshoe meekly tried to interrupt.

Edgeworth looked around the room. "Speaking of, where is Maya?" he asked. "You have spoken to her, have you not?"

Phoenix shook his head with a groan. "No, no, the absolute last thing Kurain needs right now is for its Master to be associated with..." He suddenly found himself unable to talk, and had to pause to catch his breath. "A forger like me."

"Pretty sure you're too late on that," Kay said, her back now to the window.

Edgeworth looked over to the pair. "What do you mean?" he asked.

Gumshoe winced. "She's-"

The front door slammed open, making everyone in the room jump, and a moment later, a young woman in purple formal robes appeared in the office door. "Nick!" she cried, quickly locating her friend and charging around the couch to drop at his side. "I saw what happened in the paper!" she added, throwing her arms around Phoenix and giving him a tight hug.

Phoenix had to fight to keep from breaking down. "Maya, you shouldn't be here," he managed to whisper, feebly trying to pull away from her grip.

"And why not!?" Maya shot back, releasing Phoenix from the hug and giving him a glare, fists on her hips. "And don't say it's because of some dumb title, because the Master of Kurain refuses to believe you did anything wrong and doesn't care what people think about it!"

'Well, she should care,' Phoenix thought, but couldn't bring himself to say, instead only shaking his head. "Maya, please..."

Maya's glare faded, and she brought a hand up to her face. "Nick, remember what Sis always said? And Mister Armando?"

Phoenix didn't even have to think about it before the saying ran through his head once again. The only time a lawyer can cry is when it's all over.

"It's not over yet," Maya continued, gripping Phoenix's hands and staring pleadingly into his eyes. "You can find a way to undo this and turn it all around, like you always do!"

"Not this time," Phoenix whispered, leaning unconsciously towards Maya as he fought off the tears. "It's over, Maya."

Maya pulled Phoenix into another hug, and this time he returned it, clinging to her as she clung to him. "I'm sorry I wasn't here earlier, Nick," she said, close to tears herself.

There was a short silence as Phoenix quietly sobbed into Maya's shoulder. A part of him registered that Maya seemed to have not brought Pearl with her, which Phoenix was eternally grateful for. The last thing I want right now is for little Pearls to see me like this..."

"I don't mean to interrupt," Edgeworth interrupted, "but Maya is right."
'Damn, I forgot he was here.' At first, Phoenix refused to move, unwilling to break the hug just yet, but relented when he felt Maya gently pulling away. He took the chance to discreetly wipe his face with a sleeve before looking up to find Edgeworth had stood up from the couch at some point and was standing near the window with Kay and Gumshoe.

"This whole situation is sounding more and more suspicious to me the more I hear about it," Edgeworth continued, arms crossed and fingers tapping away in thought. "If nothing else, we need to investigate and determine exactly how this farce of a trial of yours even happened."

"So what do we do first?" Maya asked.

"You go back to Kurain," Phoenix insisted.

Maya crossed her arms and shook her head firmly. "No way! Not until we get you back on your feet, at least!"

"We start," Edgeworth interrupted, a touch frustrated, "by investigating this forgery. Who made it, if it was commissioned, how it got into your hands."

Phoenix winced. "Let's forget that last part."

"Why?" Kay asked. "Isn't it kinda important?"

"It was specially given to me via an innocent party," Phoenix explained, not wanting to bring up young Trucy Enigmar to someone he didn't even know. "There's nothing to look at there."

"And we know it was commissioned, sir," Gumshoe brought up. "Prosecutor Gavin had the guy in the courtroom, though he didn't know who had ordered it from him."

Edgeworth closed his eyes in thought. "So Klavier Gavin was the prosecutor?" he mused aloud.

"Do you know him?" Kay asked, starting to look a little bored as she leaned against the window behind her. "Is he one of those corrupt guys we're still trying to weed out?" Suddenly she looked excited and sprang up. "Do we need to steal the truth from him!?"

"Settle down, Kay!" Edgeworth ordered, to Kay's disappointed groans. "As far I can tell, Gavin is one of the more honest prosecutors I've met, but I admit I've only met him the once so far." He thought for a few moments more. "That would make the brother who wanted to give you a second chance Kristoph Gavin, I imagine?"

Phoenix only nodded.

"Hm." Edgeworth frowned. "I've faced him in court a few times. They call him the Coolest Defence in the West for a reason."

Maya smiled. "Did you win?" she asked, cheekily.

"I found the truth and had the guilty declared guilty," Edgeworth only said.

"That means yes," Kay translated with a grin.

Edgeworth ignored his assistant. "In that case, our best bet is to find this forger and see if they were telling the whole truth in the courtroom. They may give us further clues as to who the commissioner was."

Phoenix frowned, deep in thought. "Actually," he said, "as much as I appreciate your help... I should
"What!?!" Gumshoe cried, distraught. "But we wanna help, pal!"

Maya, on the other hand, looked excited. "You have a plan?"

"Sort of," Phoenix replied, giving Maya a tired smile. "We're gonna need more information first, though."

With a squeal of delight, Maya gave Phoenix a bear-hug. "See? I told you it wasn't over yet! That's the Nick I know!"

Edgeworth cracked a small smile. "In that case, you can question this forger, and I will look into Klavier Gavin." He signalled Kay towards the door, and she seemed happy to finally be leaving. "Don't hesitate to contact me if you require help, Wright."

Maya gave Phoenix another quick hug. "Hey, I know I've been real busy lately," she quietly told him, "but you call if you need someone to talk to, huh?"

Phoenix nodded. "Don't worry about me," he replied. "I'll be fine." He paused a moment. "But seriously, I was recognised on the street this morning. At least for now, it's a bad idea for us to be friends in public."

Maya sighed. "Sure," she admitted sadly. "Don't think I like any of this, though!" Huffing to herself, she stood up and took a moment to straighten out her robes. "I can't believe I never get to be your legal assistant again! This is so unfair!"

Phoenix chuckled to himself. "There are worse things," he pointed out, standing up and jokingly poking his friend in the direction of the door. "Now get out of here! Say hi to Pearls for me!"

"Alright, alright, I'm going!" Maya cried, throwing her hands in the air with a smile. "I'll be back though, mister! You can count on that!"

Left alone in his office, Phoenix looked over to where the sunlight fell on his abandoned suit jacket and tie. 'Say goodbye to your beloved suit, Phoenix,' he told himself. 'You won't ever be wearing it again, after all...' He sighed. 'I think I have some kind of hooded sweater or a hat somewhere I can wear.'
Luke was so focussed on his visual search of the forest floor, he never noticed the conversation between the rest of his group, nor how far behind they fell from him. Although he knew full well too much time had passed to find any remains of tracks his parents might have left in their flight from the crashed car, he still hoped beyond reason to find some sign that the police might have missed. At one point, he had happened upon a local squirrel, but the poor thing was so skittish of humans, it had only told him it knew nothing of any accidents before running off. After that, Luke had, on a hunch, started specifically looking under low bushes and other ground-covering foliage, thinking it was unlikely the police had looked under every single one.

"Any luck?" Luke heard Phoenix ask, and he looked up to see the hoodie-wearing ex-lawyer approaching quickly, looking slightly tense.

"No," Luke replied with a shake of his head. Deciding not to question whatever had happened while he wasn't paying attention, he moved to the nearest cluster of ferns and shuffled through the lowest branches to examine the forest floor below. "I'm currently running on the assumption there might be clues hidden under the plants. It would be great if there were any animals around to talk to, but wild ones don't tend to want to talk much."

Phoenix nodded. "Ah, yes, almost forgot about your 'gift' with animals," he said, looking around before heading to the nearest bush and pulling the branches up. "Of course, any local wildlife was just as likely to be scared off by all the loud-" He suddenly paused. "Aha..."

Luke stopped his search, looking up to see Phoenix slowly kneeling by the small bush, peering at something hidden under the branch he was holding aside. "What?" the thirteen-year-old asked. "Did you find something?"

Not taking his eyes off the hidden object he'd found, Phoenix waved Luke over. "Do you recognise this?"

Luke walked over and kneeled beside Phoenix, then gasped in shock as he finally saw what his adoptive father had found: a small bracelet made up of square wooden beads, each one carved with intricate designs on the four outwards faces. The metal clasp that was designed to hold it tightly around the user's wrist was broken and covered in dirt, and a large plastic charm was tied to one end with a ribbon, heart-shaped and with the letters 'NY' printed on it in a bold black font. Most troubling of all, a multitude of the beads in the middle of the fragile thread were caked in a suspicious-looking brown substance. "Th-that's Mum's!" Luke cried, and moved to grab the item before Phoenix threw out an arm in front of the boy to halt him in his tracks.

"Don't touch it," the ex-lawyer instructed. "It's valuable evidence." He jerked his head towards Luke's satchel. "You brought the Court Record, right?"

Luke nodded, reaching into his small bag to retrieve the tablet computer. "You want to take notes?" he asked as he handed it over.

"Sort of," Phoenix answered with a smile. "Hold this branch aside for me, would you?" As Luke complied, Phoenix quickly typed his password on the touchscreen and held the computer up in front of the bracelet, adjusting it back and forth a little before Luke heard a loud 'click' from the device's speakers.

"You're taking a picture?" Luke realised as Phoenix returned to fiddling with the touchscreen.

"Yup," Phoenix answered, shooting Luke a grin. "Advantage of having this thing on hand at all times. Although it was easier when I had an excuse to carry my suitcase everywhere with me." Quickly locking the screen, he shoved the thin computer under an arm and started searching through his pockets. "Can you get out that spray-bottle and glasses I gave you earlier?"

Luke nodded, again reaching into his satchel with his free hand.

"Did you guys find something?" Luke heard Apollo call, and he glanced up to see his siblings running towards them, closely followed by Gumshoe.

"You bet we did," Phoenix replied, carefully avoiding directing his comment in Gumshoe's direction as he abandoned the search in his pockets. "We're just documenting where we found it for now."

While Trucy and Gumshoe hung back (Trucy not wanting to get in the way and Gumshoe out of pure guilt), Apollo raced to Phoenix and Luke's sides. "What does that involve?" he asked, an excited smile on his face. "You take a picture of where you found it, right?"

"Nick just did that," Luke replied, finally finding the requested items and pulling out of his satchel an unmarked spray-bottle (except for the words "Ema Skye" scrawled in pen near the bottom) and a pair of white-rimmed glasses with red lenses. "What are these for?" he asked as he held them out.

"You'll see," Phoenix answered with a smile, placing the glasses on his face and carefully spraying the ground around the bracelet, then the bracelet itself. His smile slowly widened to a grin. "Aha."

Gumshoe jumped forward. "What'd you find, pal!?" he cried. "It's covered in blood, right!?"

Phoenix pulled the glasses off, holding out the spray-bottle matter-of-factly. "This bottle contains Luminol," he explained. "Luminol reacts to blood, among other things, but you can only see the reaction with one of these," he held up the glasses. "A friend left me them a few years back, but I've never really needed 'em before now. See for yourself." He offered Luke the glasses, and reached up to take hold of the errant branch, only to be beaten to it by Apollo.

Warily, Luke took the offered glasses and placed them gently on his face. Immediately after noticing how the world was suddenly bathed in a red tint, he saw the bright blue glow of the bracelet on the ground, and similarly tinted specks all through the dirt. He gulped nervously. "A-and the blue stuff is blood?"

"Most likely," Phoenix replied. "Like I said, there's lots of other things it can react to besides blood and other bodily functions, but I doubt in this case it's anything else."

"Wow," Apollo breathed, still grinning excitedly. "How did it even get here?"

Luke handed the glasses to his brother, looking slightly queasy. "Mum bought it in New York, when we got off the ship. She must have left it here as a deliberate clue."

While Apollo put on the glasses himself to view the Luminol reaction, Phoenix went back to his pockets and finally pulled out a crumpled-looking plastic bag. "Now we've documented where it was," he explained, putting his hand into the bag like a glove, "it's time to collect it." He grabbed the bracelet, then expertly turned the plastic bag inside-out around it, securing the opening shut as he stood up. While Apollo released his branch, Luke got to work replacing the Luminol bottle and the glasses Apollo was still wearing in his satchel.

Phoenix walked over to Gumshoe, holding out the bag with the bracelet inside. "You'll make more use of this than us," he said.

Gumshoe nodded, taking the offered bag. "Hey, uh, pal, about earlier..."

"Forget it," Phoenix insisted, walking off towards the road. "We all make mistakes."

Luke stood, watching curiously as his adoptive father left. "What happened?" he quietly asked Apollo.

Apollo shook his head, looking uncomfortable. "Believe me, you don't want to know."

Phoenix made it all the way back to the road before he remembered the tablet computer he still had under his arm. 'Oops.' He carefully removed it and idly turned it on for something to do with his hands as he waited for Gumshoe and the kids to catch up. 'Hmm, actually, now that I think about it...'

There was a crashing of branches as Luke and Trucy exited the forest and came back onto the road. "Oh, do you want me to put that away again, Nick?" Luke asked as he noticed the computer in Phoenix’s hands.

"No need," Phoenix replied with a shake of his head. "Not yet, anyway." Spotting Apollo and Gumshoe also joining them, he jerked his head in the direction of the road. "Do you three want to stand together somewhere? I want to take a picture of you all."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Really?" he asked, but didn't object, quickly walking after Trucy. Luke giggled as he joined them.

Gumshoe laughed as he watched Trucy arranging her brothers at the roadside, to Apollo's protests and Luke's happy smiles. "Aw, you guys are so cute together!"

Throwing her arms around her brothers' necks, Trucy dragged them down to her level and directed a grin in Phoenix's direction. "We're ready, Daddy!"

Apollo groaned as he awkwardly kneeled to make his pose more comfortable. "Could have consulted us on this, first..."

"Smile, Apollo!" Luke reminded him, awkwardly throwing his cast-covered arm over Trucy's shoulder to match hers over his. Apollo moved to help support it with a spare hand. "This is our first family photo!"

Phoenix grinned as he held up the computer, ready for the picture. "Everyone say 'Apollo is a dork'," he joked.
"Not funny!" Apollo cried, but he smiled anyway.

A moment later, the camera went off with a loud click.
"Wait, you didn't change your name!?” Clay cried, dramatically throwing up his hands as he fell against the railing. "Why didn't you say that when I was going on about 'Luke and Apollo Wright'!? 'The Wright Brothers'!? 'Look at Luke Wright and his brother Apollo'!!?"

Apollo grinned, sitting on the stairs that led to the fourth floor above them. "We just felt like letting you make a fool of yourself."

"Well, technically," Luke giggled, "I count as a 'Wright' even though it's not in my name!"

The trio of boys were hanging out on the walkway by the stairs on the third floor, waiting patiently for Starbuck to return with a promised lunch for them. They had spent that morning in Cosmos Space Center following around various workers and, for Apollo and Luke, watching Clay help out and gush about the moon mission set to happen soon as well as his two friends now being adopted into the same family. For now though, they were happily taking a break while Clay dramatically pined having talked up the newly-adopted brothers as both being named 'Wright'.

"But why didn't you change your name!?” Clay demanded, sliding to the ground and pouting. "I had all these jokes lined up on 'Luke Wright', and now I can't use 'em!"

Luke thought for a moment, then burst into laughter. "Oh wow, I didn't even notice my name would have become 'look right' if I'd changed it! That's amazing!"

Apollo shook his head in amusement. "You do know the saying about what happens when you assume something, don't you Clay?"

"You can shut up," Clay mumbled in reply, crossing his arms as Apollo laughed.

"If you're that upset about it," Luke said, "you can go ahead and still use your jokes. Even though I didn't change my name, they'll still make sense considering the circumstances!" He gripped the brim of his cap and nodded. "I'm looking forward to hearing them, actually!"

"Don't do that," Apollo advised with a smile. "You'll never hear the end of it."

Clay simply stared up at Luke for a few moments. "You're a saint, Triton," he said, then grinned and gave him a thumbs-up. "I guess it's in your name to look on the right side, isn't it?"

Luke giggled, while Apollo rolled his eyes, telling his friend, "That was terrible. I hope your other jokes have more thought put into them than that."

"You're just jealous," Clay replied, giving Apollo a wink.

"Of what?” Apollo shot back with a smirk. "Your inability to tell a clever joke?"

"Aw, come on," Clay needled his friend, "be like Luke and look right past my flaws!"
Apollo pulled a disgusted face, ignoring Luke's laughter. "Is that seriously your best shot?"

Clay grinned. "You want my best shot? Look, Wright, you can't handle my best shot!"

Luke was now doubled over in laughter, while Apollo just facepalmed. "Why are you my friend?" he asked.

"It even works with you, Apollo!" Luke pointed out in delight, still giggling to himself.

"Yeah!" Clay cried. "This works way better than the Greek mythology jokes!"

"Don't remind me," Apollo mumbled, crossing his arms.

Luke tilted his head in confusion. "Greek mythology jokes?"

"My name," Apollo pointed out. "Y'know, from the Greek god Apollo?"

"We looked it up on Wikipedia one time," Clay explained with a shrug. "He's a lot like our Apollo, too!"

"He's nothing like me," Apollo objected. "For one thing, he had, like, a million lovers."

Clay laughed. "Male and female!" he gleefully added.

Luke smiled. "Wow, sounds like a busy guy!"

"He was also, I think, the god of medicine and plague, and the sun, and music of course," Apollo continued, counting off on his fingers, "and probably justice too, given my old name."

"Oh yeah, there was a cool story about that!" Clay cried, turning to Luke. "There was this myth about where the court system originated, where some guy was accused of something and ran to the goddess of wisdom, Athena, for help!"

Apollo nodded as he recognised the story. "Yeah, and Athena created the first court to sort out what had happened. She was the judge, and Apollo was the defence lawyer."

"Wow!" Luke gasped. "That is a fitting name, considering you want to be a lawyer n' all!"

"Yeah, I guess," Apollo mumbled, hiding a smile.

Luke thought for a moment, then asked, "What happened in the court case?"

"Uh," Clay muttered, then shrugged. "Don't remember, actually."

"Athena sided with Apollo, of course!" Apollo boasted. "Although, it's been a while since we looked all this up. We might be wrong on some points."

Clay gave Apollo a cheeky grin. "Yeah, Apollo probably lost."

As the two old friends descended into a light-hearted slap fight, Luke's attention was distracted by movement on the floor above. He turned his gaze up the stairs, and found himself locking eyes with a young girl, maybe a little older than Trucy, peering around the wall. Her bright orange hair was pulled into a ponytail on the left side of her head, and she was wearing a set of massive pink headphones with odd antenna sticking out of them. Luke and the girl stared at each other for a moment before the girl gasped and disappeared.
"Wait!" Luke cried, attracting Apollo and Clay's attention as he dashed past them and directly up the stairs.

"Hey, we're not allowed up there!" Apollo cried.

Clay wasted no time in following his friend. "Luke, come back!" Apollo jumped to his feet to join the chase.

As Luke stepped off the metal stairway and into the hallways of the fourth floor, he frantically looked around for where the girl he'd seen had gone. Seeing a glimpse of yellow disappearing around a corner to his left, he quickly turned and continued the chase, calling out, "Wait, I won't hurt you!" As he approached the corner he'd seen the girl run down, suddenly he found his path blocked by a tall woman in a labcoat walking in the opposite direction, and bumped into her before he was able to stop, falling backwards onto his behind with a cry of surprise.

Apollo and Clay, not far behind Luke, stopped dead in their tracks, staring up at the woman in fear. "Uh..." Clay mumbled.

Luke rubbed his head to ease the pain of his fall, and looked up warily to see the dark-haired woman regarding the three boys with a stern expression. Under her labcoat was a yellow kimono, and in one hand she was holding a screwdriver, which she tapped against her other hand in an undoubtedly ominous way.

"What are you three doing up here?" the woman asked.

"We were trying to stop Luke!" Apollo immediately answered, before crying in pain as Clay elbowed him in the side.

"We're really sorry, Doctor Cykes," Clay continued, edging slowly forward towards his downed friend as the scientist stared him down. "We promise this was a one-time thing, we won't do it again."

With Clay's help, Luke got to his feet. "I'm really sorry," he added to the woman, ignoring Clay's subtle nudgings to return downstairs. "This was my fault. I saw a girl up here, but she ran away, so I wanted to talk to her. Clay and Apollo were just trying to stop me."

The woman's eyes widened at the mention of the girl, and Luke noticed her posture slightly stiffen. "If I catch you up here again," she warned in the same calm tone of voice, "or anywhere near where you've been strictly forbidden from going, I will not hesitate to have all three of you banned from the Center, do you understand?"

"Yes, ma'am," Luke replied, while Clay and Apollo both nodded. "We won't come up here again."

"See that you don't," the scientist replied, and she held out her free hand towards the boys in a clear signal that it was time for them to leave.

"There you boys are!" Starbuck proclaimed as he strolled into the room, a plastic container under one arm. "Why didn't you stay where I..." He trailed off, regarding the three boys on the comfortable lounge chairs alongside the holographic windows. Although spread out by the fixed placement of the chairs around the tables, they were making no effort to socialise despite it, slumped in their seats and sullenly avoiding eye contact. Starbuck frowned. "Oh geeze, you guys wouldn't have something to do with why Metis is so upset, would you?"

Apollo looked up. "Metis?" he repeated, quietly.

"Doctor Cykes, y'know, labcoat, yellow kimono," Starbuck explained, placing his plastic container on the table and giving the three a serious look. "What happened?"

Clay and Apollo gave each other a glance. Luke adjusted his cap. "Mister Starbuck," the young gentleman asked, "do you know anything about the girl on the fourth floor?"

Starbuck looked confused for a moment, then opened his mouth in a silent gasp of realisation. "Ah, you met the robotics' kid, did you? No wonder..." He moved to the empty seat and sat down. "She lives here, but she has ear problems or something. Doesn't get on with strangers well, so she mostly stays up around the lab."

Clay frowned. "What do ear problems have to do with strangers?"

"She was wearing strange headphones," Luke pondered aloud, tapping his chin in thought. "If she has ill-health, I suppose Doctor Cykes was very worried about her, and that's why she threatened to kick us out."

Starbuck grimaced. "Sorry, guys. I should've got you to wait away from the stairs..."

"It's no-one's fault but ours," Apollo insisted, giving the astronaut a smile. "Let's forget about it for now, huh?"

Entrance

There was a solemn silence as the three teenage boys collected their bikes from the gates at the front of the Space Center. Luke paused, rubbing the thick plaster cast on his left arm, then turned to his friends. "Clay, I'm afraid I think it might be best I not return here after today."

"What?!" the budding young astronaut cried, dropping his bicycle back against the metal gates with a clang. "Why not?!"

"We really upset that scientist today," Apollo pointed out. "Actually, I agree with Luke. The two of us should stay away for a little while, at least until she calms down."

Clay slowly looked down to stare at the stone walkway below their feet.

"It's not like we're never coming back," Luke continued, "and we certainly don't hate coming here!"

"It isn't as important for us to be here all the time," Apollo picked up, placing a hand on Clay's shoulder, "not like it is for you. She won't object to just one of us running around, like she did to all three of us."

There was a short silence, then Clay looked up to return his friends' worried gazes. "I hate to admit it, but you guys are right." He then paused and smirked. "Or Wright, I should say."

Apollo rolled his eyes, crossing his arms in disgust, while Luke simply smiled.

"Actually, this was something I was planning to bring up before Luke arrived," Clay continued to Apollo. "You used to drag me to the courthouse all the time before Mister Wright got done in for forgery, and I didn't enjoy it but I went anyway because we were friends." He shrugged. "I didn't see the point in dragging you here if it was just as enjoyable for you as the courthouse was for me."

Apollo's glare softened. "I've never minded, Clay."

"It's fine," Clay insisted with a smile. "I'm gonna be an astronaut, right? I belong here!" He gestured grandly to the large, round building with a proud grin. "You? You're gonna be a lawyer, so you belong in the courthouse!" He then turned to Luke. "And you! You... have never said what you're gonna be, have you?"

Luke sheepishly grinned and shrugged. "I haven't decided yet. I do know it probably won't be an astronaut or lawyer, though."

"Well, there!" Clay said, slapping Apollo on the shoulder. "I'll keep coming here, you go back to your courthouse visits with your new dad, and Luke can decide what he wants to be!"

"And we'll still all be best friends, right?" Luke asked.

"'Course we will," Apollo said with a smile, pulling Clay in for a one-sided hug. "Nothing's gonna get between the three of us!"

Clay laughed, pulling a giggling Luke into their group hug. "Man, we need to make friendship bracelets or something!" he joked. "Make this official!"

"Y'know, I realised something last night!" Trucy announced as she sat at the table with her bacon-and-egg breakfast.

Apollo raised an eyebrow as he turned his head towards his sister at his side. "What?" he asked, fiddling with his knife and fork.

"You guys don't make your own costumes, do you?" the eight-year-old asked sternly, crossing her arms. "I haven't seen any of you preparing for Halloween!"

Phoenix looked over from the kitchen counter, where he was busy cleaning up around the cooling hot plate. "Don't tell me you haven't at least heard of Halloween, Luke!"

Luke shrugged, stabbing at his egg-covered toast with his fork. "Sure, I've heard of it, when I was living in London. It isn't really a thing we do in England though, so I don't know all that much about it."

Apollo smiled. "Oh boy, you're in for a treat, then!"

"I'll make your costume!" Trucy insisted, bouncing in her seat. "I'm gonna dress up as a magic bunny!"

"You know what the traditions of Halloween are, don't you?" Apollo asked, taking pity on his younger brother. "Everyone dresses up, kids walk around the streets and get candy?"

Luke thought for a moment, embarrassed to ask the main question on his mind. "Um... when exactly is this?"

Trucy burst into laughter. "The last day of October!" she cried. "We've got... um... ten days left!"

Apollo frowned in thought. "It'll be the middle of the week this year," he mused. "I don't think we'll get to celebrate together."

"Nonsense," Phoenix replied, making his way to the table to sit down beside Luke. "Sure, it's a long way between here and your school, but you can make it for one night on special occasions like this. You'd just have to get up super early the next morning." He gave Apollo a grin. "Clay can come too, if he wants to come trick-or-treating with us."

"O-oh, uh," Apollo muttered, blushing, "that's nice of you to offer, Dad, but Clay and I are a bit old to trick-or-treat."
Trucy stuck out her tongue and blew a raspberry to indicate her opinion on Apollo's claim. "You both come!" she insisted. "I'll make your costumes, too!" She tapped her chin in thought. "What do you think Clay wants to dress up as this year?"

Luke shook his head, silently eating.

"I'd suggest a certain someone," Phoenix continued with a knowing smile, "but I think this year, you'd be better off with something that makes use of that cast on your arm."

'Certain someone...?' Luke mused to himself. What does he mean by that?

Apollo leaned back in his seat, putting down his cutlery momentarily to tap on his forehead with an index finger. "I don't know about you guys, but I can't really think of any characters with arm casts."

"Ooh!" Trucy cried. "How about someone with a robotic arm, or an arm-cannon?" She squealed. "Or there's all sorts of characters with armour we could hide a cast under!"

"I think Luke would prefer something simple for his first Halloween," Phoenix pointed out, giving the worried boy a sidelong glance.

"A character with a cape?" Apollo asked Luke. "You could wear it so it hangs over your left arm and hides it from view."

Luke thought for a moment. "Does it have to be an existing character or person I dress up as?" he asked.

"Not necessarily," Phoenix answered with a smile. "You got something in mind?"

"I like Apollo's idea," Luke admitted, "but I can't think of anything it would fit with. Maybe I could just dress up to look nice?"

"I could design you a fantasy-themed outfit!" Trucy suggested, clapping in her excitement. "Like, a ranger or something!"

Luke nodded, beginning to smile. "That sounds nice. Thank you, Trucy!"

"No problem," Trucy boasted, tapping her bare head where her silk hat normally sat.

Phoenix turned to Apollo. "And what do you have in mind to dress up as, Apollo?"

Apollo shrugged. "I dunno," he admitted. "It's been years since I was last able to dress up as anything at all."

Trucy grinned. "You could dress up as Daddy!"

"N-no way!" Apollo immediately recoiled, turning red as Phoenix and Luke burst into laughter. "Who dresses up as their dad, anyway!? That'd just be weird!"

"Tell the truth, Polly," Trucy teased, poking her brother's arm as he glared at her. "You've dressed up as Daddy before, haven't you?"

"No, actually," Apollo pointed out. "Did you not hear me when I said I haven't dressed up for Halloween in years?"
"I wasn't a lawyer that long, Truce," Phoenix added, his laughter dying down as his mood turned more serious. "Besides, it would be a bad idea for anyone to go out dressed as me, especially so soon after what happened in April."

Trucy looked away guiltily.

"What about the Greek god Apollo?" Luke suggested, trying to quickly move on from the sombre tone of Phoenix's comment. "Have you dressed up as him?"

Apollo wrinkled his nose in disgust. "But that guy was always naked!"

Trucy giggled while Luke blushed, returning to his food. "Bad idea, then," he admitted.

"Ooh, I know!" Trucy suddenly cried, pointing to the ceiling. "We could all wear matching costumes!"

"Aren't you almost done with yours, Truce?" Phoenix asked, eyebrow raised.

"I'll be Luke's pet rabbit!" Trucy replied, grinning as Luke laughed in agreement. "Daddy, Polly, one of you can be, like, a mage, and the other can be a knight or a warrior or something!"

Apollo thought for a moment, then looked to Phoenix. "I'll be the mage if you're happy being a fighter, Dad."

Phoenix shrugged. "Fine with me."

Trucy cheered, jumping in her seat. "Yaaay, we're all gonna match!"

"Are you putting together your own costume, Nick?" Luke asked.

Phoenix nodded. "I'm sure I-"

"No!" Trucy interrupted, fists on hips. "I'm making yours too, Daddy!"

At that, Phoenix was struck dumb for a moment. "Trucy, you're busy enough making your brothers'-"

"I can do it!" Trucy insisted.

"On top of your homework?" Phoenix pointed out with a stern glare.

Trucy was unfazed. "Yes!"

"Seriously honey," Phoenix continued, tapping the beanie on his head, "this was more than enough. You don't-"

"I'm making yours!" Trucy interrupted again, then gave her father a grin. "It'll be easy!"

Phoenix sighed, then shrugged. "Alright, if you insist." He got up from his chair and headed to a small calendar hanging from a cabinet door in the kitchen. "But, you're leaving mine till last, and I reserve the right to cancel it if this interferes with your homework."

Trucy pouted, gripping the edges of her chair seat. "It woon't!" she whined insistently. "I promiiiise!"

Apollo smirked. "Man, Truce, Luke and I do our homework without complaining. What's the matter
"You're just boring!" Trucy shot back, giving her elder brother a glare.

Luke grimaced guiltily. "Don't... drag me into this, okay?"

Phoenix returned to the table, placing the calendar down and circling the 31st with a pen from his pocket. "And the deadline is set," he announced, then thought a moment and flipped the calendar over to November. "Your birthday is coming up after that, isn't it Luke?"

"Mm-hmm," Luke replied with a nod. "The tenth of the eleventh, the day before Remembrance Day!" He giggled. "It was fun on my seventh birthday back in twenty-twelve, because then the date was ten-eleven-twelve!"

Apollo looked confused for a moment, then gasped in realisation. "Oh yeah, you say the date differently in England, don't you?"

"It's only us that does month-day-year," Phoenix explained, giving the still-confused Trucy a smile. "It's why I prefer to not use numbers to indicate the month, especially given the number of prosecutors I worked with who were trained in Europe."

"Oh, yes," Luke said with a smile, embarrassed. "I keep forgetting the switch, to be honest. My homework is always being returned with the date in the corner 'corrected'...

Phoenix chuckled, marking the tenth of November on the calendar.

Trucy turned to Apollo, giving him a curious smile. "When's your birthday, Polly?"

"May," Apollo replied, resting a hand on the table. "Not for a long while."

"Not as long as mine!" Trucy giggled. "Mine's the end of August!"

Eyebrows raised in surprise, Apollo laughed. "Wow, that is a long time!" He looked over to Phoenix. "Actually, when's yours, Dad?"

"December," Phoenix replied, flipping the calendar to the last month of the year and spinning it on the table for Apollo to see the already-labelled date there. "Twelfth of the twelfth." He gave Luke a grin. "Back in twenty-twelve, it was the twelfth of the twelfth of the twelfth."

Luke giggled. "How old were you then?" he asked.

Phoenix had to think for a moment, rubbing his chin with one hand. "I was turning twenty, I think," he eventually answered, then grimaced. "Larry dragged me out to all the 'end-of-the-world' parties he could find. Somehow managed to pick up yet another girlfriend while he was at it, too."

"Uncle Larry?" Trucy asked, then giggled as she turned to her brothers. "That'll be really funny once you meet him!

Apollo frowned as he recognised the name, then looked up at Phoenix. "Uncle Larry?"

"He's an old friend of mine," Phoenix explained. "Babysits Trucy occasionally."

"Uncle Edgeworth, too!" Trucy added, giving a curious Luke a grin. "I bet he didn't want to go to parties with you and Uncle Larry, huh Daddy?"

Phoenix tensed, looking vaguely uncomfortable. "Uh, he was living in Germany at the time." He paused, frowning in thought. "I think. We weren't exactly in contact with him."

Trucy blinked in surprise, her amusement gone. "Oh."

After a short pause, Luke gave Phoenix and Trucy a polite smile. "So, do Apollo and I get to meet our new uncles, then?" he asked. "They sound very interesting!"

"They are!" Trucy exclaimed, perking up again immediately. "Uncle Edgeworth said they've been friends with Daddy since they were my age!"

"That long?" Apollo asked in surprise.

Phoenix frowned. "I'm not that old."

Apollo blushed, frantically backtracking. "Oh, uh, I-I didn't mean-!"

"Hey, it's alright!" Phoenix laughed, walking around the table to pat Apollo's shoulder. "I was kidding, don't worry about it."

"R-right," Apollo muttered, looking embarrassed as he stood up, grabbing his empty plate. "I need to..." Trailing off, he shuffled past Phoenix to the kitchen sink.

"Oh, and I need to get started on everyone's costumes!" Trucy cried, jumping out of her chair and running off towards the stairs behind her.

Phoenix jumped and ran after Trucy. "Trucy, you need to put your plate in the sink, first!"

Luke shook his head in amusement, then went ahead and took care of his sister's plate himself. 'It's only gentlemanly to help a lady out when she needs it!'

"I think I made a bad decision..." Luke whined into his pillow.

Apollo resisted the urge to roll his eyes, buttoning up his uniform jacket from his bed opposite Luke's. "You bet you did," he muttered.

"I did warn you," Phoenix said, sitting on Luke's bed and rubbing the sick boy's back. "Not even Maya can handle all that candy at once, and she has an iron stomach."

Luke frowned as he remembered the fish-and-chips eating contest he and Maya had in London, now almost a full year previous. To his eternal annoyance, Maya had won, and Luke had suffered a stomach ache as a result... however, that loss was not nearly as painful as the over-abundance of sugar in his system right now. "I think I'm going to throw up..."

"I'll get you a bucket," Phoenix offered, standing up.

"I'll get it," Apollo cut in, jumping towards the door in his eagerness to not be around if Luke followed through on his claim. "It's in the laundry, right?"

Phoenix nodded as he sat back down, watching the elder boy disappear out the door. "You stay home from school today," he told Luke. "It's Friday, so I don't think you'll miss much. Consider it a long weekend."

Luke weakly nodded, clutching his tummy tightly under his blankets, which was quite difficult around his bulky arm cast. He cursed his inability to resist the urge to scarf down all the sweets he had gained the moment the family returned home the previous night (even Trucy had been surprised when his little pumpkin-shaped basket had ended up empty), and groaned again as he recalled thinking the at-the-time minor stomach ache would die down overnight.

"Maybe next year you'll think twice before eating that much at once?" Phoenix said with a smile.

Apollo reappeared at the door, holding out a small plastic bucket. "This is it, right?"

"Perfect," Phoenix said, getting up only for a moment to take the offered item and placing it next to Luke's head. "Luke, if you need to throw up, do it in this, okay?"

Luke nodded, reaching out to grip the brim of the bucket awkwardly with his left arm.

Phoenix looked up to Apollo. "Need company to the bus stop?"

"I'm fine," Apollo said with a shake of his head, giving Luke a worried look. "Do you need me to tell the teachers, or...?"

"You can if you want," Phoenix replied, smiling at Apollo's show of concern. "I'll be giving the school a ring, anyway."

"She's still as asleep right now," Apollo pointed out, confused.

"I will be leaving to take her to school later," Phoenix answered, patting Luke's shoulder. "It shouldn't take more than forty minutes. I'll let you know when we leave."

Phoenix smiled, then quickly ruffled Luke's hair and stood up off the bed. "I'll check up on you later, okay?" Waving to Apollo to follow him, Phoenix left the room.

Left alone with his thoughts, Luke distracted himself from his self-induced predicament by thinking back on the previous evening, his first Halloween. It had gone much as he expected a night of trick-or-treating would, given his little experience with it through imported American popular culture, with Trucy mostly leading their little group of four house-to-house in the streets Phoenix took them to, excitedly screaming "Trick or treat!" the moment she saw the door begin to move. Apollo, to Trucy's annoyance, tended to hang in the back of their group with Phoenix, waiting on the street and insisting he was fine when Trucy would shout her assurances that she was getting some of the offered treats for him too. His little basket ended up with barely half the amount of sweets in it that Luke and Trucy had, although both had offered him shares of their own baskets inbetween houses.

Clay had not ended up joining them that night. Although he was happy to accept Trucy's offer to make him a costume (she had only just finished them all in time), he much preferred the idea of running around the dorm, attempting to scare people. Apollo had been surprised when Clay decided he would dress as a vampire, saying he expected his space-obsessed friend to want to be an astronaut instead. Clay had simply scoffed. "Pfft, I dressed up as an astronaut almost every year as a kid! Don't I deserve to do something different once in a while?"

The night had already begun by the time Apollo and Luke arrived home after school. Trucy had hurriedly helped them change into their costumes before they went out, and the group had finally returned, exhausted, an hour later. Luke had immediately dropped into a chair at the kitchen table and starting munching on the sweets in his little basket, carefully unwrapping them with his one free hand while still eating the previous one he'd tossed into his mouth.

"No offence, Truce," Apollo mumbled as he sat in his chair at the table, dropping his basket in front of him with a thud, "but I really am too old to trick-or-treat anymore."

"The way you acted, you certainly were!" Trucy objected, fists on her hips and a scowl on her painted rabbit-face. "You didn't even try to have fun, did you, Polly?"

Phoenix tapped Trucy on the head, between her rabbit-ears, as he walked past. "Hey, Apollo is allowed to decide what he finds fun. Most kids his age tend to have costume parties for a reason."

Pulling the hooded cape off his shoulders (Trucy had made matching ones for all three of them), he disappeared into the laundry.

Luke paused in his eating, struggling with a particularly difficult wrapper. "That's a good point. I didn't see all that many kids my age out there tonight."

"Don't know why," Trucy said with a shrug, pulling off her rabbit-paw mittens and opening Luke's candy for him. "You get to dress up and get free candy out of it. Why wouldn't you go trick-or-treating?"

"Believe it or not," Apollo replied with a wry look, "candy loses its appeal as you grow up. Plus," he leaned back in his chair, arms crossed, "most people won't hand it out to teenagers. And by the time you're an adult, you can just buy your own if you want it."

Luke frowned, popping a piece of chocolate in his mouth and quickly swallowing it. "So I'll only get one or two trick-or-treats before I'm too old?"

"No!" Trucy insisted, clinging to Luke's cape. "You have to keep coming with me, since Polly is being boring and won't!"

"We're not making anyone do anything," Phoenix called as he re-entered the room, back in a casual shirt and sweatpants after removing his costume. "If Luke or Apollo want to come again next year, that's up to them." He paused as he noticed Luke still chowing down on his candy. "Slow down, Luke, you'll make yourself sick."

Apollo frowned, having twisted in his chair to look up at Phoenix and focussing on his hair. "Wow, Dad, I've never seen you without a hat before."

Phoenix laughed, running a hand through his spiky black locks. "Yeah, I tend to find not wearing one makes me look like a lawyer." Before Apollo could respond, Phoenix was waving at Trucy. "C'mon, Truce, time to get all that paint off your face."

A floorboard creaked out in the hallway, startling Luke awake, and he looked up from his pillow blearily as he realised he'd fallen asleep. 'When did that happen? And what time is it?' There was sunlight streaming in through the bedroom window, which overlooked an alleyway below and other apartments opposite them, so Luke reasoned it had been a few hours at least since Apollo left for school, allowing for the sun to get high enough in the sky for the amount of light he could see. He caught a glimpse of the bucket Phoenix had left him, where it had fallen on the floor, and suddenly felt queasy again as he was reminded why it was there. Lying back down so he couldn't see the bucket, he tried to find something else to think about to distract himself. Had Trucy gone to school yet? And if she had, was Phoenix back from taking her? 'Today's Friday... that's the last day of the school week. It's also... wait, what is the date today?'

It suddenly occurred to Luke that, with Halloween over, today was the first of November, and thus the countdown to his fourteenth birthday had begun. He wondered how different this birthday would be to his previous ones: Would everyone be wearing poppies for Remembrance Day, or was that not a tradition here? Had he and Apollo been in the Wright family long enough to get any gifts this year (gift-giving was still a birthday tradition in America, wasn't it)? Would Luke suddenly find he missed his parents... or, that he didn't miss them at all? At that thought, Luke shivered. 'I don't even know which would be worse, missing them or not!' He could remember all the times he'd been sick when he was younger, and his mother had sat at his bedside looking after him until he got better. During the months in Misthallery when she was 'on holiday', Luke had often cried himself to sleep out of missing her, feeling alone in the world and thinking it had been his father to blame for her sudden disappearance. The rumours around town that his parents had had a fight hadn't helped.

Luke regretted now more than ever his arguments with his father on the move to America. It had been exactly the opportunity Clark was looking for, and Luke knew his parents had both been excited for it, even if he had been steadfastly against leaving London from the start. 'If only they'd listened to me...' He found himself gripping the cast on his left arm, and a part of him wondered if he'd been fooling himself, believing so intently that they were still alive out there. You went ahead with the adoption, after all, a voice in the back of his head pointed out. If you truly believed your mum and dad were still alive, you would have turned Nick down. You'd be doing your investigation with him as friends, not as father-and-son, and you wouldn't be so happily ignoring it to do schoolwork and hang out with friends.

Feeling hot tears pricking at the corners of his eyes, Luke fiercely shook his head, hugging himself tightly despite the ache in his tummy making the action painful. 'No! I'm not happy, I'm trying to find a new life here, for after Mum and Dad get back!' he told himself. 'And they're still alive out there, I know they are! I... just don't have any proof of anything yet...'

There was a creak as the bedroom door slowly opened, and Luke hurriedly wiped his eyes before looking up and seeing Phoenix poke his head in, hair hidden once again beneath his cyan beanie. "Oh, you're awake!" the older man said as he stepped into the room. "Feeling any better?"

Luke nodded, quickly rubbing at his nose in a feeble effort to disguise a sniff. "I'm fine."

Phoenix frowned, properly entering the room. "You and Apollo have been here long enough that I know saying that usually means the opposite," he pointed out, then moved over to sit on the bed by Luke's feet. "This isn't just the stomach-ache, is it?"

"I'm fine," Luke insisted again instinctively as he sat up, rubbing at his nose and eyes. "I just... I guess I'm just missing Mum and Dad."

After a moment's silence, Phoenix leaned forward and pulled Luke into a hug, which the boy accepted as the tears returned to his eyes. "If you need anything," Phoenix reminded him, "don't hesitate to ask, okay? Even if you just want a sounding board to talk about them, or something. I want to help, if I possibly can."

Luke nodded, clinging tightly to the loose black hoodie that had become Phoenix's new 'uniform'. "I know," he mumbled into his adoptive father's chest. "Thank you, Nick."

Taking a deep breath of anticipation, Luke opened the small suitcase tagged 'Clark Triton'.

It had taken a lot of thinking and avoiding and preparing and putting off, but finally Luke had closed himself up in the room he shared with Apollo, dragged the two suitcases rescued from the car crash out of the closet, and sat on the floor with them to finally open them up. He told himself it was fitting he do so on his birthday, as it was as good a time as any to admit to himself, despite his own vocal insistences to the contrary, that he might never find his parents alive, and allow himself to truly start over with his new life.

If only he could make himself open his eyes and look at them.

'This is ridiculous,' Luke told himself. 'It's not like you're the only kid in the world who's lost their parents. Apollo and Trucy were orphans too, and they certainly don't drag things out like you're doing right now!' Shaking his head in self-directed anger, Luke gripped the edges of the small suitcase and forced his eyes open.

On one side of the collection of personal items retrieved from the car were Clark's prized autographed archaeology books, the ones that he had repeatedly boasted had been the catalyst to persuade him to apply to Gressenheller, where he met both Brenda and Professor Layton. Close by was a spare tie, rolled up and held firmly in place with a hair-tie borrowed from his wife. Underneath a small collection of pens and novelty erasers was a notebook, which Luke recognised as his father's journal. To one side of that, held together with a rubber band, was a stack of business cards, sitting on top of what looked like Clark's passport and various travel papers. A fake poppy flower made of hard plastic and silk sat crumpled in a corner, one Luke remembered seeing appear in his father's lapel every first of November, only to be almost ceremoniously removed again as the sun set eleven days later.

Luke found his vision getting blurry, so he quickly wiped at his eyes to clear the accumulating water. 'I'm not crying... I just had my eyes open too long and dried them out a bit.'

To his right was Brenda's matching suitcase, and Luke had already grabbed the lid of the unlocked trunk before realising what he was doing and stopping in his tracks. 'Is it a wise idea to open them both now...? Maybe I should wait a bit before...' He frowned and shook his head determinedly. 'No. I need to stop putting this off.' With a flick of his hand, Luke now sat between the two open cases containing the last remaining belongings of his parents.

Brenda's suitcase was much more cluttered than Clark's, and full of what looked like her growing collection of strange American souvenirs she had picked up on their cross-country trip, as well as a few of her smaller favourites from her existing collection of ordinary strange objects. Underneath, her passport, papers and a journal much like Clark's was barely visible, as well as whatever else of hers was hiding in the small trunk. Right on top, a shiny pin immediately caught Luke's attention, emblazoned proudly with a heavily stylised cartoon phoenix from the city of the same name.
"Ooh, Clark, look at this state here, Arizona! Let's start the drive from there!"

"I think you're underestimating how big the distance is from their capital to Los Angeles, dear."

"Nonsense! Look, they have a town called 'Brenda'! We can stop and look at it on the way!"

"Uh, Brenda, darling, I don't think it will be exciting enough to-"

"Hey, and there's a 'Clarkdale' over here! I wonder if there's a 'Tritonville' or a 'Luketown'?"

"I think you need to put the map down."

"Are you telling me you seriously don't want to see a town named after you?"

"They're not. It's a co-incidence."

"Aw, c'mon, grumpy-gills! Look, they have a town called 'Nothing'! How can you not want to see that?"

"Darling-"

"Hey, Clarkdale has a 'Luke Lane'! Are you sure you want to move to California and not Arizona? It's looking better by the minute!"

"Darling, you can't judge a place by its names. Besides, my job is in Los Angeles."

"... Can we at least stop over there? We could get a train or bus into California from Phoenix."

"From what?"

"Phoenix. It's the name of Arizona's capital city. Neat, huh?"

"... Fine."

"Great! I'll try and find one that passes town-Brenda!"

"..."

Luke blinked away the tears as he slowly reached out for the small pin. At the time the decision had been made, he had been sulking in a corner about his helplessness in preventing the move from going ahead, too busy wrapped up in his own world to even notice that the city shared the name of his current caretaker. His eyes drifted to his father's suitcase, and he remembered when he and the Professor had introduced themselves (the second time) to Phoenix and Maya in the front hall of Labyrinthia's courthouse. It had been the first time he'd seen Phoenix's suit without an apron or desk in the way, and he remembered thinking to himself at the time that it wasn't often he saw someone dressed in a blue suit and red tie who wasn't his father. 'Cruel foreshadowing by the universe at large, or massive co-incidence?' Regardless, Luke snatched up the spare tie from Clark's trunk, pulling the hair-tie off it with a snap. He had already unravelled the tightly rolled up piece of fabric and slung it over his neck before he remembered he had no idea how to tie a tie, despite all the times he'd watched his father do it over the years. 'And even if I did know, I don't suppose I could do it without my left hand.' He clumsily attempted to clip the tie together using the phoenix pin, but was forced to admit defeat after accidentally pricking his thumb with the pointy bit. Dropping the pin into his lap, Luke shook his hand to distract himself from the sharp pain. This isn't going well. He pulled the tie off his shoulders with a sharp tug, letting it fall to the ground with a sigh. After a moment of thought, he instead reached for the silk-and-plastic poppy in his father's suitcase, and carefully tried to see if he could make it attach to the phoenix pin in his other hand.

"Luke?" Apollo called from outside, knocking on the door. "Are you planning on coming back downstairs, or not?"

Luke jumped in surprise, almost dropping the small items in his hands. "Coming!" he called. *How did I get distracted from my own birthday celebration!?

The door opened, and Apollo looked in to see his younger brother trying to re-roll the tie that had fallen to the floor between the two open suitcases. "You're going through your parents' things?" he asked, confused, walking over to take a peek himself. "Why? Didn't you already do that?"

Luke shook his head, abandoning the tie with a sigh. "I've been putting it off. At least it's over with, now." He then held up the pin and fake poppy. "Could you help me put these on my jumper, Apollo?"

Apollo thought for a moment, then nodded, kneeling opposite Luke to pin the cartoon phoenix to his brother's woollen sweater, carefully ensuring the red flower was held in the middle.

"Thank you," Luke said, a sad smile on his face.

"No problem," Apollo quietly replied.

Phoenix's Office

"Ooh, pretty flower!" Trucy said from the corner of the black lounge as her brothers entered the room. "Why you wearin' that, Luke?"

Luke smiled and shrugged. "Oh, well, I guess it's not a tradition here, but back in England we wear poppies like this one for Remembrance Day tomorrow." He remembered too late that Trucy could see the slight lie of distraction when she frowned suspiciously at him in response.

Apollo cut off any objections Trucy might raise as he made his way to one of the chairs dragged into the office from the kitchen table. "But that's tomorrow?"

"Dad would put his on at the beginning of November," Luke explained sternly, fiddling with the red flower. Everyone would be wearing them by today!"

"Okay, okay!" Apollo replied, throwing his hands into the air in surrender from the impassioned lecture.

"I still think it's pretty!" Trucy said, smiling again.

Phoenix laughed to himself as he emerged from behind his desk. "I'm terrible with flowers, myself," he said, grabbing a plastic bag from behind his chair. "Everyone sit down, and we can get this Luke rushed to Trucy's side, trying not to look excited at the prospect of presents in case it was seen as greedy or selfish. "Honestly, I'm happy just being here for my birthday!" he said in an attempt to be humble, sitting on the couch beside his sister.

"Oh?" Phoenix laughed, sitting in the second kitchen chair, next to Apollo's. "Well, in that case, you won't be needing these!" He pulled a wrapped box-shape from the bag, a card taped to one side.

Apollo leaned forward, looking at the card taped to the side of the gift. "Oh, that one's mine!" he cried before anyone could reply, and took the box from Phoenix's hands. Before Phoenix could jokingly misinterpret the older teen's meaning, Apollo had stood up and was offering the present to Luke with a grin. "Happy birthday, bro."

Luke smiled and took the gift with a grateful nod. "Thank you, Apollo!" he made sure to say, before placing the gift on his lap to read the card.

Trucy bounced in her seat impatiently. "Open it already!" she demanded.

"I have to read the card!" Luke insisted with a frown. "It's polite!"

"Let Luke open them the way he wants," Phoenix gently reminded Trucy. "When it's your birthday again, you can rip them open at the speed of light to your heart's content."

Trucy crossed her arms. "I don't open them that fast!"

Having finished looking at the card, Luke flipped the box over and began undoing the tape, taking care to cause as little damage to the wrapping as possible.

"Just rip it!" Trucy cried. "We're throwing out the paper anyway!" She then paused uncertainly and looked over to Phoenix with a worried expression. "We are throwing it out, right?"

Phoenix laughed. "Be patient, Truce."

A matter of minutes later, Luke had in his hands two brand new books, one a book on puzzles that Trucy had admitted (after her hurry to have Luke open it, no less) Phoenix had picked out for her to give him, and the other a book of sheet music for the violin. "I found this really cool Doctor Who music book," Apollo had explained with a shrug, "and I figured, since it's like some English cultural icon, it was the one you'd be least likely to hate. You did say you were gonna start playing your violin again, after all." Luke had made sure to thank them both and even gave Trucy a hug to assure her he loved her gift regardless of who picked it out.

When it came to Phoenix's gift, the patriarch of the family paused for thought as he extracted the final present, larger than the other two, from the bag. "This... is less of a 'gift'," he explained carefully. "More of a 'returning', really." He held it out for Luke to take. "They're still going through everything else, but I got Gumshoe to sneak this out early for you."

Curiosity piqued, Luke unwrapped Phoenix's gift a little quicker than the other two, and was astonished to discover a third book, larger than the other two and much thicker.

"What's that?" Trucy asked, staring confused at the patchwork cover.

"It's..." Luke had to pause and take a deep breath. "It's one of my family's photo albums. The most recent one."
Apollo gasped, giving Phoenix an astounded glance. "Woah, how'd you manage to get that, Dad!?"

"Like I said," Phoenix explained with a mysterious smile, "I... persuaded Gumshoe."

Luke ran a hand over the scraps of fabric and other bits and bobs on the cover, unsure if he wanted to open it just yet. "Mum always loved decorating the books when we filled the old one up. I helped her with this one, actually. It was a long time ago," He frowned in thought. "We stopped taking as many pictures as we used to when Dad became mayor of Misthallery. He was just too busy. And, after that, I was away with the Professor a lot, too."

Trucy crossed her arms as she regarded the wider-than-it-was-tall photo album. "What did they look like?" she asked. "There are pictures of them in there, right?"

There was a short silence as Luke thought for a moment, then he gave his sister a smile. "I'll show you," he promised, then flipped the album open to a random page in the middle...
"It's already the end of the day for us," Professor Layton said with a soft laugh, "but I imagine your birthday has been pleasant so far this morning?"

"Yep!" Luke chirped in reply, still beaming from the chair behind Phoenix's desk as he held the office phone tightly to his ear. "We aren't doing anything special, but after everything that's happened over the past few months, I don't really want to!" His legs swung back and forth gleefully, making the chair softly sway side to side with his excited movements. "I also found my dad's special poppy that he always wore this time of year, and Apollo helped me put it on!"

"That's good to hear," the Professor replied, a smile in his tone.

"And Nick managed to get one of Mum's photo albums!" Luke continued. "I was just showing it to Trucy and Apollo when Nick called you!" He paused thoughtfully. "It's funny, I don't remember there being so many photos that were so recent. Mum had pretty much filled it up."

The Professor hummed in thought. "She must have wanted to start over after the move, with a new album. Either that, or switch to a digital one."

Luke frowned to himself. "Oh yeah, Nick said something about physical photos not being a 'thing' so much anymore here..." He looked over to the black couch, where Trucy was humming to herself as she leafed through the pages of photos on her own. He was surprised to find Apollo had disappeared already, and supposed he'd followed Phoenix shortly after the man had handed Luke the phone with a warning not to extend the special long-distance phone call for too long.

"I don't imagine my parcel has arrived yet," the Professor chuckled.

"Parcel?" Luke repeated, curiously. "No, we haven't got a parcel. I did get your letter last week, though!"

Layton laughed again. "Oh yes, I received your reply, thank you!" He hummed in thought. "It clearly takes a little longer for a parcel to get through the post than a letter. I shall keep that in mind for next time."

Luke giggled to himself, wondering what the Professor and Flora might have sent him as a birthday gift. "I can't wait to get it!"

"Would you like to talk to Flora while we're on the line with you?" the Professor asked.

"Oh, yes please!" Luke cried. "It would be lovely to catch up with her, too!"

"I'll go get her then," Layton replied, as cheerfully as it was possible for him to sound. "I shouldn't take too long."

Luke heard the sound of the phone on the other end being placed gently on the Professor's desk, and sat patiently while he waited to speak with Flora. It occurred to him that he had acquired some similarities with the young woman since they last spoke, in that she had lost her mother and then her father to sickness when she was still a girl. 'Wow, how many people do I know who were orphaned and happily adopted into new families?' Not that Flora's adoption had ever been official, of course; The Professor had decided to keep her origin quiet, and as she was almost an adult when they met her, there had seemed little point. 'I should make a list. Me, Apollo, Trucy, Flora, the Professor... Wait, does the Professor count as 'orphaned', though? ... Do I count as orphaned?'

"Luke?" a squeaky voice called from the phone speaker, and Luke jumped as he was startled out of his thoughts. "Are you there?"

"Hi, Flora!" Luke said with a laugh. "How have you been?"

"Luke!" Flora cried in delight. "It's been ages since we've got to talk! The Professor's been telling me what's in your letters, but it's not the same!"

"But it's okay," Flora continued, "since you found a new family and all!" She laughed. "When will you visit? I'd love to meet them!"

"I don't know," Luke admitted. "There's four of us, and I don't think we have a lot of money to go around. You might have to come to us, I think."

Flora thought a moment. "That might be a better idea," she agreed. "Then I can see those robots you mentioned, from that space centre your friend goes to!" She huffed. "Of course, this time last year I went to go visit Saint Mystere, and then you and the Professor went and had another adventure without me!"

Luke winced. He'd almost forgotten that Flora had been away on the week they'd been kidnapped to Labyrinthia, and thus had just missed meeting Phoenix and Maya in the day they'd had left to explore London before going back home. She hadn't been at all happy when she heard the story upon her return, although Luke had hoped their final adventure together in the so-called 'Future London' had sated her. "I've said I'm sorry about that..." he mumbled.

"Oh, it's fine," Flora insisted, calming down with a sigh. "Anyway, you should have seen how big Sherry Ascot's getting! She's walking and talking now!"

"Really?" Luke asked, amazed. "Wow! It's hard to imagine baby Sherry doing that!"

Flora laughed. "That's why you need to see her! And when she was here, I got thinking about what happened with Clive and all those refugees from Future London and the area that got flattened by the mecha..."

Luke frowned. "What about them?"

"Well," Flora explained, "long story short, people did die in the chaos, and some of them were in all likelihood parents to kids like us or Clive."

"And after the way he lost his own mum and dad," Luke mused, balling his left hand into a fist.

"So I'm trying to talk the Professor into looking into it!" Flora continued. "I mean, there might be a cute little baby like Sherry, waiting for a family to take them! And the Professor gets along great with her, and I'd look after them, too!"
Luke was too surprised to reply for a moment. "Wait, you want a baby brother or sister? Don't babies... y'know, cry all night?"

"Oh, sure," Flora said dismissively. "That's why I'd help out! The Professor tends to be up all night anyway, so I'd look after it during the day and he could look after it at night!"

"I know that!" Flora cried, offended. "I'd even cook boring old regular recipes for them, and everything!"

At that, Luke paused. "Have you mentioned that to the Professor?" he asked.

"Huh?" Flora replied, confused. "No, why?"

Before Luke could respond, he felt a tug on his right sleeve and turned the chair around a little to see a pouting Trucy, holding out the heavy photo album and pointing at a particular photo. Frowning, Luke mumbled "Hang on a second," into the phone and held it against his shoulder to block the microphone. "What is it, Trucy? I'm on the phone!"

"Who's this?" Trucy demanded, tapping the page next to a photo of two young women, one in a red cape and sporting twin blonde braids over her shoulders, and the other with dark hair, wearing two small cones on her head that resembled cat ears. "That's the only photo of them I could find, and it isn't labelled!"

Luke smiled. "Oh, that's Espella and Miss Belduke, when they visited London in February!"

Trucy tilted her head to one side, curiously. "And who's Spella and Miss Bell-duk?"

"Espella and Miss Belduke," Luke repeated. "Ask Nick about them if you have to know now. He and Maya met them in England." He started to move the phone back to his ear, only to be cut off by Trucy's dramatic groan as she dropped her arms to dangle the photo album by her knees.

"Seriously, when are we going to meet this Maya person!?" Trucy cried. "You and Daddy are always talking about her!"

"Not always," Luke corrected, but the eight-year-old wasn't listening.

"This is so unfair!" Trucy complained, and stomped off towards the kitchen. "DADDY!"

Luke sighed, then placed the phone back against his ear. "Sorry, Flora, Trucy wanted to ask me something. What were we talking about?"

Reception

After a morning full of loud discussion, Phoenix was glad to see his kids finally settle down and quietly watch the TV for a while. Thus, with the three in his office, television blaring, Phoenix was taking momentary refuge in reception, sitting at the desk that had been his once upon a time. "I can't believe it's been three years this September... It still feels like I only just joined Mia's office as her assistant.' He frowned, leaning back in the chair. 'Of course, it also feels like it's been forever, with all the crap that's happened since. Even ignoring this year on its own.'

Phoenix idly picked his phone off the desk and re-read the conversation by text message still displayed on the screen.

Since I am back in the country, I feel I should make an effort to introduce myself to your new charges. Are you all home today?

    Hey fantastic timing! My son turns 14 today. They grow up so fast :(

Wright, they have only been 'yours' just over a month. I'm assuming they are indeed home today?

    Don't mock my empty nest syndrome. It's a serious condition. I've locked them all up in my office to appease it

I can very easily forward this conversation out-of-context to certain people and have them all taken away from you, you know.

    Of course they're all home. Law Child and Magic Child are introducing Puzzle Child to Steel Samurai in the office

    You do know how to take a joke right?

Then I will drop by to introduce myself to them. Which one had the birthday today?

    Luke

    The English one

That is indeed excellent timing, then. I have something he may appreciate as an expatriot.

    Don't make up words Uncle Edgeworth. You'll confuse the children ;)

Don't blame your poor vocabulary on me. I'll be there in ten minutes.

Phoenix smirked to himself and placed the phone back on his desk. As fun as it was to mess with Edgeworth, he had to remind himself sometimes that his friend didn't always take it well. Not to mention, he owed the prosecutor a great deal for his behind-the-scenes help on all three adoptions, convincing the powers-that-be that the famous "Forgin' Attorney" was capable of being a parent. Although, the moment Trucy had met him, she had dubbed him 'Uncle Edgeworth', and the thought of the prosecutor's face as the name had instantly stuck would always make Phoenix laugh. He hoped the nickname would stick with the boys too, but he wasn't going to get his hopes up too high.

There was a gentle rapping at the door, and Phoenix looked up to see a familiar silhouette beyond the smoked glass. Smiling, he jumped to his feet and rounded the desk to unlock and open the door, greeting the burgandy-suited man beyond with a wave. "Edgeworth! Nice of you to join us!"

Edgeworth raised an eyebrow as he entered the office, but obviously elected not to say anything. "Did you tell them I was coming?" he asked idly.
Phoenix shook his head, closing the door behind his friend and explaining "I didn't want to disturb them." He gestured towards the office door, trying not to smile too widely. "Please, guests first."

Sighing softly to himself, Edgeworth shook his head and headed through into the office beyond.
At the sound of the door opening, Trucy was the first to look away from the television, and gasped as she recognised the visitor. "Uncle Edgeworth!" she cried, jumping off the couch and running to cling to the man in a tight hug. "It's been ages since you last visited!"

Not entirely used to the young girl's method of showing affection just yet, Edgeworth gingerly patted her head, ignoring Phoenix's snickering behind him and hoping it didn't give the two teenage boys now staring at him too terrible a first impression. "It's nice to see you too, Trucy."

Apollo moved to turn off the TV, while Luke simply got to his feet with a polite smile, watching the man gently extricate himself from the eight-year-old.

Phoenix edged into the room around Edgeworth, guiding Trucy away with a smile. "Alright Truce, out of the way now." He flashed Edgeworth a grin. "Wanna introduce yourself to the boys?"

"Fine," Edgeworth replied with a barely repressed sigh, and turned to the two curious teenagers standing by the couch and television. "I understand Wright - your father, that is - has mentioned me to you. My name is Miles Edgeworth." He gave them a small bow, one hand on his burgundy jacket and the other firmly at his side.

"Oh, yeah," Apollo replied with a nod, "Trucy's talked about you, too!"

"It's nice to meet you, Mister Edgeworth!" Luke added, a hand to his cap in greeting.

Edgeworth looked over the two critically, and turned his gaze to Luke. "Judging by the poppy on your chest, you must be Luke, correct?"

Luke was surprised, but nodded. "Yes, that's me."

"Which makes you Apollo," Edgeworth continued, turning to the older boy.

Apollo nervously rubbed his bracelet. "Yes, sir," he said.

"In August, yes," Luke replied, then frowned as he detected a faint English accent in Edgeworth's voice. "Are you...? No, Nick said you lived in Germany for a while, right?"

"Indeed I did," Edgeworth replied, a faint smile on his face as he held his hands up to either side as though putting himself on display. "In fact, that is partly why I wanted to talk to you once I returned from my trip. It's a sad fact of life that we are rarely tourists in our own hometowns. I was only eight when I discovered so myself."

Luke glanced quickly behind him to Apollo, then to Trucy, and got only confused looks in return.
Phoenix, however, was looking off into the distance, lost in thought.

"Much to my disappointment," Edgeworth was already continuing, "I had no concrete reminders of my home after I left for Europe, only my own memories. That is why I thought you might appreciate this." He reached into a pocket in his jacket and pulled out a small plastic object, a black clamshell with blue coverings shaped into a handle opposite the hinges.

Luke took the offered object gingerly, and noticed it made loud, distinct rattlings of small objects inside it as it moved. As he tried to open the clamshell, the blue sections slid, and he realised they were storage drawers of some kind.

"I bought this myself on a trip to London back in two-thousand-and-four," Edgeworth explained. "It's a travel board game, themed on the London Underground. It served myself and Franziska well on many a long trip."

Finally, the clamshell opened with a click, and Luke was greeted with the very centre of the familiar Tube map, the yellow bottle-shape of the Circle Line dominating the small space as it nestled next to a simplified version of the familiar path of the river Thames. Most of the stations listed were, strangely, greyed out against the white background, and Luke quickly noticed a lonely station on a branch of the Piccadilly line that he never recalled seeing on any other map. One of the drawers slipped open in Luke's hands, and he could see twin packs of small cards held together with a rubber band, as well as a stack of small red magnets and a bunch of brightly coloured figures, clearly meant to be individual markers for the players.

Apollo peeked over Luke's shoulder, looking over the colourful lines of the map with a smile. "Two-thousand-and-four, huh? That thing's as old as me!" he said.

Luke looked up to Edgeworth with a smile. "Thank you very much, Mister Edgeworth," he said gratefully.

"You're very welcome," the prosecutor replied.

Trucy, having wormed her way out of Phoenix's grip, bounced at Luke's shoulder as she tried to get a look at the small game. "Ooh, we should play it! I want the pink person!"

"There isn't a pink person," Apollo pointed out with a wry look, crossing his arms. "You've got purple, yellow, green, or dark blue."

"What?" Trucy complained, fists on her hips. "What kind of game doesn't even have a red person!?"

"That would get confusing with the red markers," Luke explained, holding the game to show Trucy the pile of magnetised red circles in the drawer. "How about you be purple, and I'll be dark blue, okay?"

Trucy dramatically sighed, but nodded. "Fiiiiine."

Phoenix gave Edgeworth a grin. "I think they like it," he whispered.

Edgeworth restrained a smile. "That was the idea."

Before Edgeworth left once again, he pulled Luke aside for a short lecture on culture differences. "You'll have probably worked a lot out on your own," he acknowledged, "but when I noticed the poppy on your chest, a few things came to mind that aren't as obvious. Firstly, we refer to tomorrow as Veterans Day, not Remembrance Day. Our Last Post is slightly different to yours, and we don't use the poppy as a symbol for the war dead."

"More generally, there are a few pronunciation differences no-one really thinks about," Edgeworth continued. "Route is 'rowt', the letter Z is 'zee', herb is said without the H, some words like 'penchant' and 'lieutenant' are said the way they're spelled." He thought a moment, arms crossed. "Word differences: 'holiday' here refers strictly to public holidays, Christmas, and the like; Leaving home for a time is called a 'vacation'. All the differences surrounding cars would take an hour to elaborate on, so I'll pass on that for now. What you call chips, we call fries, same for crisps with chips. A water tap is called a faucet. A queue is a line. We call trousers pants and underwear... well, underwear. One you might find humorous is that we call our homeless people 'bums'."

Luke resisted a smirk at that comment.

"Perhaps one of the strangest differences is 'mobile' and 'cell' phone, though," Edgeworth said with a shrug. "That's all I can think of off the top of my head. Oh, and don't make the mistake of calling an 'eraser' a 'rubber'. You won't hear the end of it."

Luke decided not to ask about that last one. He'd learned his lesson the day he asked to go to the toilet in class and was punished by the teacher for being rude. Who'd've thought Americans would prefer a euphemism like 'bathroom'?

"Culturally," Edgeworth continued, "food portion sizes are a lot larger here than in Europe. Also, if you buy something in a store, prepare to pay more than what the tag says, since sales tax isn't added to the displayed price."

"What!?" Luke cried. "Isn't that false advertising!?"

Edgeworth shrugged. "It's the way things work here. I don't understand it either." He glanced at the watch on his wrist and the door back out to the reception. "I'm afraid I'll have to be going now. Happy birthday."

Luke gave the man a smile. "Thank you again, Mister Edgeworth!"

Phoenix made sure to catch his friend before he disappeared, giving him a quick hug before the prosecutor could object. "Thanks for dropping by, Edgeworth!"

"It was my pleasure," Edgeworth replied with a polite smile. "Give my regards to Maya when you next speak to her."

"Of course!" Phoenix agreed.
game to have a go at it. Although greatly annoyed to end up last in the initial turn order, she was excited to try out the game and determined to win, teaming up with Apollo to (accidentally on his part) box in Phoenix's yellow figure and directly cut off access to two of his in-game destinations. Despite a lucky roll early on, Phoenix quickly found himself boxed in again at the other end of the board, and spent many turns unable to move his figure anywhere as his three children rapidly advanced on their own goals.

"Oh, the card says I can send anyone to anywhere!" Luke announced as he read a Hazard card he had drawn from the deck.

Apollo sighed. "I'm already skipping a turn, I don't think you can screw me over any more than I currently am."

Trucy gave Luke an intense glare from across the table. "Do. Your. Worst." She spun a finger cockily over the board. "I'd recommend you send me to somewhere on this green line. It's exactly where my last destination isn't!"

Apollo rolled his eyes as he quickly noticed his sister's bluff. "You're being a bit obvious, there."

Luke smiled apologetically. "Well, actually, I was going to move Nick somewhere."

"Huh?" Phoenix said as he looked up from the board. "Move me where?"

The teen thought a moment, then smiled. "I know! Baker Street! It's where Sherlock Holmes lived!"

As Luke moved the pieces, opening the station and closing another as the rules stated, Phoenix broke into a smile and laughed. "Aw, thanks Luke! You didn't have to do that!"

"Yeah," Trucy pointed out, "the whole point of the game is to screw everyone else over!"

"I don't think so," Luke replied. "Besides, I'm almost certain Nick misread that card and should have never become stuck behind a closed station anyway."

Phoenix suppressed his laughter. "Actually," he cut in, flipping over one of the facedown Souvenir cards in front of him, "Baker Street was one of my destinations! That was a great help, Luke!"

"Oh!" Luke cried in surprise, giving his father a smile. "That's good, then!"

"We're not supposed to be helping each other!" Trucy complained, but was silenced by a quick elbow from Apollo.

To Trucy's further annoyance, when her next Hazard card forced her to skip a turn, Phoenix's next card also allowed him to send any player to any station of his choosing, and he quite gleefully announced he was sending Trucy back to her starting point. "Hey," he argued as Trucy loudly complained, "you're the one who said we're supposed to be stopping each other, right? And you're winning, aren't you?"

"It's doesn't FEEL like I'm winning!" Trucy cried.

Four turns later, the same thing happened again.

"Why are you sending me over there!?" Trucy whined as Phoenix moved her purple figure according to the instructions on the Hazard card. "Luke's the one winning!"

Luke shifted uncomfortably in his seat.
"Because Luke didn't gleefully box me in at the start," Phoenix replied with a neutral expression, "and Apollo has been sent all over the place by these cards enough. Do you need to take a break from this?"

"No!" Trucy shouted, hands clutching the table edge. "I can still get second!"

Despite being forced to skip a turn, Luke ended up winning the game in the end, with Apollo a close second and Phoenix third place after them.

"But I was almost at my last destination!" Trucy complained, grabbing the tiny die from her father and rolling it to get a six. "Ha! See?" she cried, moving her magnetic figure to the last station on the line and flipping her final Souvenir card. "I finally got there! And now I have to get back to King's Cross!"

Apollo and Luke gave each other wary looks before sneaking off towards the stairs.

Phoenix shook his head as he watched Trucy frantically continue to roll the die and move her figure, then snatched the white cube as it was flung once more across the board. "That's enough, Trucy. I think it's time you went to bed."

Trucy whined. "But Daddyyyyy!"

"'But Daddy' nothing," Phoenix sternly replied, placing the die down and plucking his daughter off her chair to carry her off. "Bedtime."

"I'm not tireeeeed!" Trucy complained as she gripped Phoenix's neck, although made no effort to fight his grip on her as he took her upstairs. "I was winniiiiiing!"

Phoenix only ignored her as he carried her to her bedroom.

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
"Feels weird to have it off after all this time, huh?" Phoenix laughed.

Luke blushed from his seat on the benches overlooking the lake, quickly removing his hand from where it had been rubbing his newly cast-free left arm. "Haha," he mumbled with an embarrassed smile. "I guess I was thinking that, yes."

As Luke's appointment to remove his cast had ended up in the middle of the day, Phoenix had decided to arrange for the teen to have the entire day off, as he would only have an hour or two on either end of the school day anyway. Thus, after leaving the hospital, they had dropped into the nearby Gourd Lake Park for a late lunch.

"Why are those things called 'Samurai Dogs', anyway?" Luke mused as he handed the empty paper wrappings to his father. "They've got nothing to do with samurais, let alone the Steel one."

Phoenix smiled as he combined Luke's rubbish with his own to toss in the nearby bin. "They used to be called 'Gourd Dogs'."

Luke crossed his arms, frowning in thought. "See, that's a much better name! It fits the shape, it fits the location, and there's a pun in there to boot! Why'd they change it?"

At that, Phoenix couldn't resist a short laugh. "Blame a friend of mine for that. Although, he did say they became a lot more popular after he changed the name."

"I guess that's fair," Luke sighed, "even if it doesn't make much sense." As Phoenix sat back down next to him, Luke eyed the suitcase sitting on the ground between them. "Not to change the subject, but there is something I noticed when we left the hospital and... Nick, don't take this the wrong way, but if you don't want to be recognised, wouldn't a less conspicuous bag be a good idea?"

"Probably," Phoenix admitted, then reached out and pulled the suitcase into his lap, flipping the locks open. "That reminds me, something arrived for you yesterday."

Luke's eyes widened. "From the Professor!?" he asked.

Phoenix just smiled in answer. "And to think, if it weren't for the public holiday, you might have received it in time for your birthday!" He opened the case and pulled out a box, only just small enough to fit inside. "For you." He held it out with a grin.

Luke excitedly took it, looking over the postage marks and address on the top. "I've been waiting for this!" He paused as he realised the cardboard flaps were, understandably, all taped down. "Wait, how am I supposed to open it?"

Phoenix chuckled as he pulled a small pair of scissors out of an inside pocket of his suitcase. "Thought you might need these," he explained as he offered it to his son.
A minute later, Luke was excitedly pulling open the top of the box in his lap, eyes glued to the bubble-wrapped insides as he passed the scissors back to Phoenix. "Wow, they must have worried that whatever this thing is would break!"

Phoenix held the scissors in his hand for now, just in case they were needed again. "Take care not to let any of that fly off," he warned.

"I will," Luke promised, pawing through the layers of plastic to get a glimpse of the somewhat weighty object within. "It looks pretty dark," he narrated, and tried shoving his hands down the sides to lift the whole thing out at once, only to stop as he hit paper on one side. "Oh!" He paused and dug out the obstructive paper, smiling as he recognised it was an unsealed, unmarked envelope. "The Professor must have decided to send his letter with it!" Giving Phoenix a brief grin of excitement, Luke moved the box onto the bench beside him, and pulled out from the envelope a brightly coloured birthday card (signed inside by both Flora and the Professor) and a letter, which he quickly unfolded to read.

My dear Luke,

I'm glad to hear you are continuing to settle in to your new home. Even as I write this, your Halloween has been and gone, so I hope to hear that everything went well. If possible, I would love to see a photo of how Trucy's costumes turned out, as your descriptions make them sound simply wonderful.

I would agree that staying away from the Space Centre for a while sounds like the right thing to do. You were instructed to keep out of the way of this girl for a reason, and I don't doubt her caretakers worry for her health greatly. I'm glad your friend Clay seems to understand this as well, and I'm sure this will have no effect on your friendship in the long run.

I'm sure any suggestions I may have for Mr. Wright's birthday would pale in comparison to anything you think of yourself. You know him better than I, after all. And, speaking of birthdays, I do hope you like the gift Flora and I put together for you. She was the one who suggested it actually, and I'm sure you'll recognise why when you unwrap it, if you haven't already.

On that note, I do not doubt your family would be greatly entertained by stories of our exploits over the years. My thanks for keeping Claire out of it, although this ability of Apollo's and Trucy's sounds very intriguing. Do either of them know how it works?

With all the time we've been spending in Future London helping sort out what happened down there, Flora has begun taking an interest in the refugees. I managed to persuade her they didn't need any food, so she resurrected her old sewing habit to try and put together clothes, and, before I knew it, she was returning home with tales of potential orphans of Future London we should check up on. She doesn't know quite where they might be, but is convinced they are out there and that we have to find them. I've tried dissuading her, but she is quite persistent.

I've suggested to Flora she start writing to you as well, since she has complained of missing you. She simply says for now that she is thinking about it, but has never been the best at writing letters.

I will end this letter here, on the assumption you have yet to open the rest of the parcel. There are the usual puzzles included in the envelope, and I do hope this managed to arrive in time for the 10th.

Your friend,
Professor Hershel Layton

Luke giggled in glee, folding the letter back up and making a mental note to write a reply as soon as he could.

"Everything going well?" Phoenix asked, holding out a hand in a silent offer to hold the envelope for a while.

"Yup!" Luke replied, handing the paper to his father. "Though the Professor did write this back at the beginning of the month, so I already knew they were fine!" Pulling the box back into his lap, Luke peered eagerly at the bundle of bubble wrap inside. "I can't wait to find out what it is!"

Phoenix laughed. "Then get it out of the box and find out!"

Luke didn't need any more prompting. He thought for only a moment how best to handle the situation before moving the box back onto the bench next to him and again shoving his hands down the sides, weaselling his way to the bottom of the box and getting a firm grip on the underside of the bulky wrapped object. Very carefully, Luke raised the heavy gift out of the box, pausing to shift his grip every time the bubble wrap caught on the box and tried to lift the whole thing. Finally, he had the dark-coloured gift, only barely visible through the plastic covering, in his lap, and had to request the scissors back to cut open where the wrapping had been securely taped together to keep from unravelling, which it quickly began to do once it was loosened. Fighting to keep the plastic from flying off in the breeze, Luke was too busy shoving the bubble wrap back into the box to even look at his opened gift for a minute or two, Phoenix grabbing it when it almost fell off Luke's lap and onto the ground in the teen's haste to keep from littering.

"Ugh, I think that's the last one," Luke sighed as he shoved the last of the bubble wrap into the box, even temporarily closing it again for good measure.

"I imagine you would know what this is supposed to be from," Phoenix spoke up, looking at the figures in his hands as his son turned in his seat. "I know what it looks like, but..." He held it out, ready for its recipient to take.

Luke froze as he instantly recognised the bronze statuette, although it was much smaller than he remembered it being; It was of two figures, one an adult man in a top hat, scarf, and moustache, a cane in one hand, and the other a small boy in a hat not unlike Luke's favourite cap, holding an open book and looking up at the man with a large smile. "Y-yeah," Luke managed to say, still stunned. "I know what that's from."

Phoenix held the statuette out a little further, prompting Luke to finally take it in his own hands. "Do you want to say?" he gently asked.

"S-sure," Luke stuttered, still staring at the heavy object now in his lap. 'I may as well... after all, I told everyone the story a few weeks back, and was telling the Professor about it in my last letter, and how I tried to go with Claire's cover story until Apollo saw through the lie and I had to argue the truth was a personal thing and I wasn't going to tell it.' He shook his head to bring himself back on topic. "You remember how I was telling you all about the Professor's and my adventure in Future London, right?"

"You were, yes," Phoenix replied with a slow nod. 'Just as I remember you warning us it was difficult to believe until you got to the end of the story... Apollo wouldn't stop pointing out impossibilities the entire time. That was almost half the fun of it, though.'

Luke was silent for a few moments before he continued, looking up at Phoenix. "One of the parts I left out because it didn't seem important," he forced himself to explain. "There was this statue in a park. The sign said it was of an author who used his stories to befriend a boy who was terminally ill, but it wasn't." He looked back to the statuette in his lap. "It turned out Clive made it, in memory of how the Professor comforted him after his parents died." He felt tears beginning to prick at the corners of his eyes. "And since Clive looked a bit like me, so does the boy in the statue."

Phoenix moved to rest a comforting hand on Luke's back, getting a small smile in return.

"Before we crossed the river," Luke continued, "I had a small argument with Flora, and she was complaining how the Professor and I were always together, and it reminded me that Dad was moving us overseas, so I ran off." He rubbed at his wet eyes with a sleeve. "The Professor found me by this statue. He said we were true friends, and that wouldn't change no matter how far apart we were."

"Very true," Phoenix said with a smile, rubbing Luke's back as the teen forced himself to calm down. "It's the same with me and Maya, even though she's so busy nowadays we barely get to even talk."

Luke giggled. "That just reminds me of when Trucy was demanding we meet her the other day."

Phoenix couldn't help a small laugh himself. "Yeah, I think Trucy's got her sights set on making Maya her new mother or something. She and Pearls would get along great!"

"Pearls?" Luke repeated. "You and Maya mentioned her in England, didn't you?"

"Maya's cousin, yes," Phoenix replied, quietly removing his hand from Luke's back now he was sure the teen was okay. "She's convinced Maya and I are 'special someones' for some reason." He rolled his eyes as Luke laughed. "Only a year older than Trucy, too."

Luke decided not to mention that he'd been convinced for a day or so after initially meeting them that Maya and Phoenix were actually a couple, until he noticed how the pair did nothing more romantic than holding hands. The way Phoenix had broken down after Maya's 'death' was pretty convincing on its own, too. 'Thank goodness that all turned out to be a trick, though.'

Phoenix put the scissors back in his suitcase. "Incidentally, a year ago today, Maya and I arrived in England. I had a surprise court case thrown on me the day after that, defending some young woman." He grinned. "I don't remember her name, of course. Spella something. I think she may have introduced me to a certain English professor and his apprentice, too."

Luke giggled, then sighed as he remembered the events of that day. "This time last year, the Professor and I were in his office when Espella arrived with a note from one of the Professor's former students. We were trying to help her escape from the witches when we got kidnapped on London Bridge."

"Nothing good can come of witches and kidnappings," Phoenix joked.

"Oh, I don't know," Luke replied airily, failing to hide his smile. "We made some good friends in the end!"

"None of them lawyers, I hope!"
The two broke down into giggles, giving each other a one-armed hug as they remembered all the good of their days in Labyrinthia.

Ruffling Luke's hair, Phoenix gestured to the box sitting on the bench beside him. "Why don't you put that away for now? I can take it home and you can show it off to your siblings on Friday."

Luke nodded, unable to stop the massive grin planted on his face. "Sure, Nick!"

"What kind of things do you even get an adult?"

"We'll think of something."

"Except we've been saying that for...! How long has it been?"

"A couple weeks n-"

"A couple weeks now! At this rate, we may as well jump to Christmas!"

"I'm making Daddy a scarf. I'm done for Christmas."

"Unfortunately, Apollo and I aren't handy with knitting like you are, Trucy."

"... Luke, we're terrible sons. We have no idea what to get Dad for his birthday, the first birthday of his since he took us in."

"Apollo?"

"We deserve to be thrown out on the street."

"Apollo, I think you're taking this a bit too seriously..."

"Think about it, Polly! Is there anything Daddy needs? Maybe you and Luke could team up and get it for him!"

"... What does Dad need?"

"Um... I'm sure he needs something..."

"That's it. We're dead."

"Um, actually, Apollo... I think I might have an idea of something he needs."

"Yes!" Clay cried, punching his fist into the air as he entered a high score into the arcade machine. "I am the king of Asteroids!"

Apollo rolled his eyes, standing nearby with arms crossed. "Yeah, you and, like, nine other people."

Eyes focussed on the Tetris clone he was engrossed in, Luke giggled to himself from a neighbouring machine. "Gee Clay, asteroids aren't that big. I don't think a kingship over them would be something anyone would want!"

Apollo shot Luke a glare. "Of all the things to pick up from Dad, you choose his terrible sense of humour?"
Clay grinned as he left his game to move over to Luke. "Well, Luke isn't going to pick up his career like you are, Apollo."

"I-!" Apollo stuttered, turning red. "I-I was always going to be a lawyer! Dad has nothing to do with it!"

"You said Nick inspired you to be one, didn't you?" Luke asked, barely paying attention as the uncleared blocks began to clutter his screen. "That still counts."

"Doesn't," Apollo muttered, but decided not to argue any further at the sight of Clay's disbelieving grin. "Anyway, we need to get moving. We were going to get the thing for Dad's birthday today, remember?"

Clay pouted. "But I wanted to have a go at the Tetris ripoff after Luke was done!"

"You can still go on after me," Luke replied, then grunted as his pile of tetronimos reached the top of the screen and the game ended. "Git!" he muttered at the machine with a glare, resisting the urge to kick it, then turned towards his friend with a smile. "You don't have to come with us, Clay. Nick's not your dad, after all."

"Nah, it's fine," Clay sighed, waving a hand. "It's boring hanging around here on your own, anyway." He flung an arm over an unimpressed Apollo's shoulder. "So, where we goin'?"

"To find a place that sells bags," Apollo replied, removing Clay's arm and heading towards the arcade's exit, his two best friends close behind him. "We're getting Dad something more inconspicuous, to replace his suitcase he still carries everywhere."

Clay frowned. "He does? Like, everywhere everywhere?"

"Out everywhere," Luke specified. "He doesn't to get Trucy from school, but anywhere else we need to go, he generally has the suitcase." He shrugged. "I think maybe he took it everywhere when he was a lawyer, so he's still in the habit."

As they reached the wide thoroughfares of the shopping mall, Apollo began to scan all the shops in sight, wondering which way to look first. "And it's only one part of the whole gift, too."

"Wow, what else are you getting him?" Clay asked with a smirk. "Backpacks can get pretty expensive, and we did just spend a few dollars back in the arcade. It better be a cheap gift!"

"Don't worry!" Luke said with a laugh, shaking his head. "We've got some money set aside!"

"We pooled our funds with Trucy," Apollo added, making a decision and turning to his right. "We have enough."

Luke skipped after his brother. "We thought about what we were going to do for ages!" He then frowned in thought, returning his walk to normal as he turned to Clay. "And Apollo and Trucy were explaining this 'Black Friday' thing to me. Is that an actual thing that happens?"

Clay crossed his arms. "People going crazy, injuring if not outright crushing each other and the poor employees stuck serving them all for the sake of getting stuff for super-cheap? Sad but true."

Luke winced. "Oh. That's terrible." He shook his head. "Anyway, we're only spending money on the bag. The rest of it is all homemade stuff."
"Uh-oh," Clay said with a cheeky grin, advancing on Apollo to jokingly elbow him. "I'm picturing children's artwork for the fridge!"

"It's nothing like that," Apollo told his friend, waving him off.

Luke suddenly jumped, rushing to Apollo's side. "Oh, Apollo! We still haven't worked out when we're giving this to Nick!"

"On his birthday...?" Clay asked, a single eyebrow raised.

"We have school," Apollo explained. "It's next Thursday."

"Oh," Clay muttered, tapping his chin and thinking to himself. "If you won't want to wait 'til the weekend," he eventually suggested, "I guess you'd just have to sneak out of school."

Luke frowned incredulously. "Sneak out!?" he repeated. "I thought you'd suggest something more sensible, like spending the evening at home!"

Clay gave Luke a grin. "Since when am I sensible?" he pointed out.

"We are not sneaking out!" Luke fiercely insisted.

"Don't I get a say in this?" Apollo asked, eyelids lowered.

"We're not sneaking out!"

Sirius Turner Boarding School for Boys
Front Gate

"I can't believe we're sneaking out."

Clay laughed as he casually led his friends to the dorm-side gate, against the flow of students heading back inside at the end-of-lunch bell. "Do you have a better idea, Wrights?" he asked. "You had over a week to think of one!"

Apollo gave his brother a smile and patted his shoulder. "C'mon, cheer up! It's not like we'll be doing this again." He briefly paused before jokingly adding, "This year."

Luke sighed, shaking his head. "You're not helping, Apollo."

As the trio reached the talkbox mounted next to the gate, they slowed to a stop. Apollo adjusted the bag on his back, trying to look casual, and elbowed Luke into looking a little less guilty, just in case a teacher came across them.

Clay cleared his throat, gave his friends a confident grin, then slammed a finger into the button below the speaker. "Hey, Hugo! My pals the Wright brothers need to leave! It's an emergency!"

There was a short pause before the speaker fizzled to life. "That's probably the weirdest prank call I've ever heard."
Clay put his free hand on his hip indignantly. "Have you seriously forgotten about Luke and Apollo Wright? They need to get out of this gate right now, man!"

"I haven't heard anything about an emergency," Hugo drawled, disbelief evident in his tone. "The gate's not opening until school's over."

"Wait, they haven't told you!?" Clay cried with a large gasp, hamming up his shock as much as he possibly could. "Their great-uncle is dying, he might be gone within the hour! They have to go and say goodbye to him!"

Hugo sounded incredulous as his voice crackled from the speaker. "Great-uncle...?"

"He rocked them to sleep when they were babes!" Clay dramatically explained. "He taught them not to stick forks in power points! He helped them learn the alphabet!"

"Y-yeah, whatever," Hugo interrupted, "but I still can't let you out without a note from a teacher or the principal."

"But that would take too long!" Clay continued, waving his free arm around in hammy desperation. "If they don't leave now, they'll miss the bus, and then they won't get to the hospital within the hour, and won't get to say goodbye! How could you do that to them, Hugo!??"

"But-!"

"Can't you hear them crying out here?" Clay waved at his friends, and Apollo quickly jumped towards the speaker, jamming a finger against his nose to close off one nostril and doing his loudest sniff in the direction of the small microphone beside the talkbox button. "They can barely speak, they're so distraught!" Clay cried.

"Alright, alright!" Hugo shouted, and the buzzing of the unlocking gate rang from above them. "Just be quick, okay?"

Clay grinned, giving the talkbox one last parting shot as Apollo opened the gate. "You're a pal, Hugo!"

"This better check out with the principal!" Hugo warned, and the speaker went quiet.

"We are in so much trouble," Luke groaned as Clay released the button on the talkbox.

Dancing in delight, Clay pushed Luke out the gate after Apollo. "Quick, before someone spots you!" he laughed.

"I can't believe that worked," Apollo said with a smile, closing the gate behind Luke. "How long until he remembers we're adopted?"

Luke frowned. "Does Mister Thrume even know we're brothers?"

"Who cares!?" Clay cried, waving his hands at the pair through the bars. "Get out of here!" With that, he spun around and ran off to class.

Laughing, Apollo grabbed Luke's wrist and the pair disappeared in the direction of the bus-stop.

Trucy pouted at the desk as she worked on her homework. It had taken several minutes of convincing, but she had managed to persuade Phoenix to leave her alone in the reception area with her schoolwork. She had claimed it was her birthday present to him to be on her best behaviour, when, in actuality, it was only a small part of her plans for the afternoon. It unnerved her that her father had still looked suspicious of her despite letting her get her way, but she was sure it was just her own guilty nerves.

The handle on the front door softly turned, and Trucy looked up to see Apollo's face appearing in the opening door. He gave her a smile, peeking around to check the room was empty before coming in. "Where's Dad?" he whispered.

"The office," Trucy replied, jerking her head towards the closed door as she pushed herself off her chair. "I'll have to distract him so you can get up to my room."

Luke crept in behind Apollo, quietly locking the front door behind him. "I'm pretty sure we almost got caught at the park," he quietly whined. "We are so going to get expelled!"

Apollo shushed his brother, grabbing his arm to guide him somewhere hidden from the office once the door was opened. Trucy waited until she was sure they would be out of their father's sight, then collected her homework from the desk. "I'll distract Daddy in his bedroom," she told them, "but I can only do that for a minute or two. You need to hurry into my room the moment the coast is clear."

"Don't worry," Apollo replied, giving her a thumbs-up. "We'll meet you there in a sec."

Trucy grinned, then hugged her work to her chest and headed into the office, swinging the door wide open as she ran in.

Apollo and Luke held their breath as they listened to the conversation beyond the door.

"Daddy, I need to talk to you!"

"What is this about, Truce?"

"Come with me!"

"What?"

"We need to talk privately!"

"... About your homework? Who'd even listen in on us?"

"Daddyyyyyy!"

"Alright, fine! Where do you insist you have to be to ask for help on this!?!"

Luke silently sighed as he heard Phoenix and Trucy heading into the kitchen. Apollo was grinning widely, and Luke wondered if he was enjoying this. "C'mon!" the older boy whispered excitedly, and, gripping the backpack to his chest, ran through into the office. Luke shook his head and followed.

Phoenix had first started worrying about the Psyche-Locks five days ago.

It wasn't uncommon to see one or two pop up on someone in his day-to-day life, but, without a murder investigation in progress, Phoenix usually didn't see the point in invading people's right to privacy. It was helpful on occasion when he suspected one of his children was hiding something that deserved to be properly out in the open, but he was happy to otherwise let them keep their little secrets. A lot of the time, especially in the weeks leading up to Christmas, a Psyche-Lock or two was innocuous thoughts on gifts anyway.

He had first caught his children chatting animatedly in Luke and Apollo's room when the boys were home for Thanksgiving, 'caught' because they suddenly got all quiet and looked up at him innocently when he knocked at the door to check up on them. It was as they insisted they weren't doing anything suspicious Phoenix saw the familiar chains and a single red Psyche-Lock appearing around each of the three's hearts. He had been confused about what the trio could possibly have been discussing until he happened to glance at the calendar and remembered there was not only his birthday but Christmas coming up in the next month. At the time, he had simply laughed and rolled his eyes as he resolved to leave them to it, and smiled to himself when he asked them again later and the single Locks had split into twin pairs.

Another school-week had gone by, and Apollo and Luke came home for another weekend, quickly and quietly pulling Trucy aside to talk with her in their room after dinner. Luke had hung back to get a drink, and when Phoenix had asked him about his week at school, four Psyche-Locks appeared. Such a large number was uncommon enough on its own, but Luke's guilty behaviour as he fled from Phoenix's surprised questioning only made the father's concerns grow.

Luke had spent that weekend avoiding Phoenix, and, to Phoenix's surprise, Apollo and Trucy seemed to be helping him. The pair's own number of Psyche-Locks had increased to three each, and it was only because they were continuing to be incredibly calm about the secret the three were undoubtedly sharing that Phoenix decided to ultimately leave them alone. It hadn't stopped him from worrying, but, with Luke and Apollo both at school until the next Saturday, it had freed him for a while to keep his attention on Trucy's suspicious behaviour. Besides suddenly becoming very protective of the privacy of her room, the little girl had started insisting on doing her homework in reception instead of the little desk next to her bed. Although Phoenix had asked her reasons, he'd only gotten lies and the three Psyche-Locks in return. Nevertheless, he'd gone along with Trucy's odd performance, knowing sooner or later the Locks would shatter and he'd finally get an answer for the whole strange thing.

'I honestly thought that would be happening today though,' Phoenix thought with a sigh. He glanced up at the door to reception opposite him, through which Trucy had stubbornly insisted on doing her homework alone and with the door closed. 'This definitely has something to do with my birthday,' Phoenix decided, 'but nothing at all to do with "giving me a quiet afternoon"!?' He paused. 'On that note, can't believe I'm actually twenty-seven. Only twenty-seven. I have a fifteen-year-old son, after Suddenly, the door to reception swung open, and Phoenix looked up to see Trucy bouncing in, hugging her homework to her chest and looking proud of herself. "Daddy, I need to talk to you!"

Phoenix frowned. "What is this about, Truce?"

Instead of answering, Trucy skipped around the desk and grabbed his hand, dragging her father in the direction of the kitchen. "Come with me!"

"What?"

Trucy leaned forward, speaking in a mock-whisper. "We need to talk privately!"

Phoenix resisted a sigh as he saw the Psyche-Locks reappearing, and frowned when he noticed the initial three had become four. He gave Trucy a withering look, glancing noticeably at the papers and books in her arms. "About your homework? Who'd even listen in on us?"

"Daddyyyyyy!" Trucy whined, tugging on his arm again.

Rolling his eyes, Phoenix gave in. "Alright, fine!" He stood up. This better result in this secret of yours finally unravelling! "Where do you insist you have to be to ask for help on this!?"

Trucy only grinned, pulling him ever more forcefully through into the kitchen and up the stairs. "Quick, quick!" she cried. "We have to hide in your room!"

Phoenix frowned as his daughter dragged him down the hallway towards the master bedroom. "Why?"

"It's a secret!" Trucy cried, dashing to the bedroom door and hurrying Phoenix inside before closing it behind them.

'You bet it's a secret,' Phoenix thought wryly, but plonked himself down on his bed anyway. "Alright, what is it?" he sighed.

Trucy climbed onto the bed beside her father and rested her books on her lap, flipping through her papers and pulling out one that said "MATH" in big important letters at the top. "I need help with my three times tables!"

Phoenix stared at the paper for a solid second. "And why did you have to ask for help here specifically?"

"Because!" Trucy insisted, then tapped at her paper. "I can never remember three times eight!"

Rubbing at his eyes, Phoenix leaned forward on his knees. "What's three times seven?" he asked her.

Trucy scrunched up her face in thought, and Phoenix found himself wondering how much of it was an act. "Twenty?" she asked.

"Close," Phoenix replied, straightening up. "Little bit m-!" He paused as he heard a creaking from out in the hallway, and his head spun around to the closed door.

"Twenty-two?" Trucy asked, poking her father and fixing him with an innocent smile. "Is it that?"

Phoenix frowned, still watching the door. "Did you hear that?"
"That's just the building settling!" Trucy brightly explained, but Phoenix found her childlike reasoning less reassuring thanks to the four Psyche-Locks making a reappearance. "It creaks all the time, Daddy!"

There was a short silence as Phoenix fixed Trucy with a suspicious glare. "It's twenty-four," he answered, then stood up.

"Wait!" Trucy cried, pulling together her papers and books as Phoenix strode to the door. "Daddy!"

Phoenix threw the door open and jumped out into the... empty hallway, pausing in surprise. 'But... I could have sworn... I definitely heard something!'

Trucy gleefully skipped out past Phoenix down the hall. "Thanks for the help, Daddy!" she called over her shoulder. "I'm going to finish up in my room!" With that, she opened her bedroom door and jumped in before closing it with a thud behind her.

Left alone and very confused, Phoenix scratched his head. 'I could have sworn she'd left her door ajar earlier, too.' Shaking his head, he went back downstairs to his office.

Five minutes later, Phoenix was sitting at his desk, puzzling over the mystery of Trucy's secret. 'Enough is enough,' he told himself. 'I'm confronting her on it today!' He was collating together any and every scrap of evidence he could think of that might hint towards her true intentions, in the hope that he would have enough to break through the four Psyche-Locks and convince her to tell him the truth. 'Firstly, I think bamboozling her with the Psyche-Locks increasing as today approached is enough to convince her I know she's hiding something specifically about my birthday. It worked with Drew Misham, after all. That should break one of them, with any luck, but I'll still have three left.' He rubbed his chin in thought, idly flipping through the Court Record. 'Thinking back on it, she may have been sneaking someone in.' He'd already checked the front door was locked, but, as would have been pointed out in a courtroom, that didn't mean it had been locked the entire time Trucy had been alone in the room. 'Whoever it was must have hidden very quickly after making the floor creak. They would have made even more noise going downstairs, and the bathroom and the boys' room was too far away, so they're likely in Trucy's room right now... if they haven't snuck out the back door already.' He frowned. 'No, Trucy would have come back in here to 'distract' me if they were sneaking out. In which case, if I go up there right now, I can-'

There was a methodical thudding of three pairs of feet rushing down the stairs at top speed.

'Ah, it's just the kids coming down. Now, where was... Wait a second.' Phoenix looked up just in time for the door through to the kitchen to fly open, revealing the three Wright children standing in the doorway with massive smiles on their faces.

"Surprise!" Apollo and Trucy shouted, arms thrown out wide, while Luke opened his mouth only briefly before silently closing it again, looking slightly guilty as he kept his hands behind his back.

Phoenix was too shocked to reply for a few moments, Trucy running in and grabbing his hand to again pull him out of his chair. "C'mon, we have to sit on the sofa!" she demanded.

Apollo giggled. "Happy birthday, Dad!" he cried, quickly elbowing Luke into nodding agreement despite his continued avoidance of eye contact.

"What are you two doing home!?" Phoenix asked, half in surprise and the other half in exasperation that Trucy (who was still slowly pulling him out from behind the desk and towards the lounge) had gone to such lengths to sneak her own brothers into the apartment under his nose. "And this early in the afternoon?"

Luke winced, hands still hidden, but Apollo grinned, running around to help Trucy push Phoenix down onto the sofa. "We wanted to spend time with you, Dad!" he reasoned, standing back as Phoenix reluctantly sat down and Trucy threw herself into his lap. "It would have been terrible to make you want until evening to get the present we got you!"

Phoenix sighed. "Present. Of course. That accounts for... maybe three of the four Psyche-Locks. I'd bet the fourth is the actual contents of this present."

Luke walked forward and held out his hands, revealing a completely average-looking black backpack, arm-loops pulled tight and stuffed with padding. "We weren't able to wrap it," he apologised.

Phoenix couldn't help a laugh as he felt the tension of his concerns fading away. "You've gone to all that trouble sneaking into your own home at a time you're supposed to still be at school, if not on your way here, and you're worried about not wrapping it?" Luke blushed guiltily as Phoenix took the bag, but smiled anyway. "A backpack, huh? Is this a subtle message that my beloved suitcase is out of fashion?" Phoenix continued with a grin, patting the open space on either side of the lounge to direct the boys to sit down.

Apollo laughed as he jumped to Phoenix's side. "Totally!" he replied.

"That's not the only thing!" Trucy protested, bouncing in Phoenix's lap as Luke gingerly took his place next to them. "Open it, open it!"

Phoenix laughed as he did so, placing the backpack on the floor and quickly pulling out a flat object wrapped in dark blue fabric. "What's this?" he asked as he slowly pulled the woolly fabric out of the knot it had been tied in.

"I was going to give it to you on Christmas," Trucy explained, "but I changed my mind." She grinned. "It's a scarf!"

"Ah, I see!" Phoenix said as he unwrapped the scarf from whatever it was wrapped around, and quickly found that said object it was hiding was in fact three objects: a trio of handmade birthday cards, individually addressed in big letters to 'Daddy', 'Dad' and 'Nick'. "I wonder who made each of these?" he joked as he put the scarf down to read them.

Trucy wriggled around in Phoenix's lap to hug him as he silently read through the cards, and, one by one, Apollo and Luke leaned against his sides, reading the lovingly hand-drawn pictures and messages they had made together the previous weekend over his shoulder. As Phoenix finished the last one, he placed the cards in his lap and reached out with his arms to pull the boys into a hug around Trucy, who giggled gleefully.

"I love you guys," Phoenix quietly told his children.

Smiling, Apollo and Luke seemed happy to return the hug, locking the family of four into a tight circle of love.

"But, just so you know," Phoenix bluntly added, "I can tell when you're keeping secrets from me."

The smiles on Trucy, Luke and Apollo's faces instantly died.

"Ooh, it's pretty!" Trucy cooed as she carefully poked the magatama, then pulled it from Phoenix's hand as she realised it wouldn't hurt her if she touched it.

"Why is it glowing?" Apollo asked. "How is it glowing?"

Luke crossed his arms, frowning in thought. "I'm certain I've seen something like that before," he said. "I can't remember where, though."

Phoenix grinned, carefully taking the green stone back from Trucy. "It's called a 'magatama'," he explained. "Maya wears hers around her neck, which is where you would have seen one before, Luke."

"Ah, I see," Luke replied with a smile and a nod, uncrossing his arms. "That makes sense!"

Trucy frowned at the mention of Maya, but was cut off before she could complain again about wanting to meet her.

"Actually, this one used to be Maya's as well, but she gave it to me a few years ago," Phoenix continued. "It's glowing because... well, I can't answer 'how', but the 'why' is because Maya's cousin Pearls filled it with spiritual energy so I could use it."

Apollo frowned. "Use it?" he repeated.

"That's its power," Phoenix replied with a grin. "It tells me when someone I'm talking to is hiding something from me."

Trucy looked impressed. "How does it do that?"

Luke looked doubtful. "You're sure it isn't a trick or something?"

"I'm sure," Phoenix told Luke with a wry smile. "You can't fake Psyche-Locks."

Apollo crossed his arms, imitating Luke's disbelieving look. "And what are 'psycho locks'?" he asked.

"Psyche-Locks," Phoenix corrected, gently elbowing Apollo. "They're representations of the locks on a person's heart. The more of them there are, the more desperately they want to keep their secret."

Trucy thought for a moment. "So, you knew the entire time that we were keeping this surprise a secret?"

"I knew you were keeping a secret," Phoenix explained, tapping Trucy on the nose, "and I figured it had to do with either Christmas or my birthday, so I didn't pry. I must admit though," he turned to Luke, "when I saw four Psyche-Locks on you, I started to worry there was something else you were hiding from me."

Luke squirmed uncomfortably for a moment before suddenly announcing "Apollo and I got out of school early because Clay fooled Mister Thrume into thinking there was a family emergency and Apollo wanted to get home before dark!"

"Luke!" Apollo cried.

"I'm sorry!" Luke added guiltily, hysterical tears beginning to leak from the corners of his eyes. "They're gonna kick us out of school and we'll never finish our education and we don't deserve to live with you!"

Trucy whacked Luke's torso with one hand, giving him her best glare. "Are you stupid!? You're my brother, you're not going anywhere!"

"I don't doubt you'll both be in trouble," Phoenix added, giving the sulking Apollo and still slightly frantic Luke a stern look, "but I don't think they'll expel you simply for skipping one afternoon. You'd have to do a lot worse than that."

Luke rubbed at his eyes with a sleeve. "You don't hate us for sneaking out?"

"Of course not," Phoenix assured him, ruffling Luke's hair. "As a father, I'm disappointed, but since you did it for my birthday, I'll leave any punishments on this occasion for the school to deal out to you." He smiled, poking Apollo's arm. "Just don't do it again, okay?"

Apollo nodded, giving his father a small smile. "Sure."

"We won't, Nick!" Luke cried more exuberantly. "We promise!"

Trucy looked between her brothers. "Well, you know what this means, Luke and Polly: Now we have to think about what to get Daddy for Christmas!"

As the two boys groaned, Phoenix laughed. "Don't bother," he assured them, tapping the cards and scarf in his lap. "What you got me today is more than enough, I can promise you that!"

A few minutes later, Phoenix had arranged the three cards along the top of the short bookcase by his desk, next to the window. Beside them was a short line of birthday cards from Phoenix's friends, even one from his parents. Pride of place, however, was carefully given to the handmade 'thank yous' at the front, addressed individually to 'Daddy', 'Dad' and 'Nick'.

My dear Luke,

You may notice this letter is slightly fuller than usual. Flora has finally decided to write a letter for you, so we've bundled them together to save on postage. I trust that this has also arrived after the card that we sent Mr. Wright for his birthday; If not, please apologise to him for us on its late arrival.

On that note, your idea for a gift for him does indeed, as I said, pale in comparison to anything I could have suggested. I'm sure he will appreciate the love you put into making cards by hand.
However, I must ask what your plans for the day exactly were? You seem very vague on them, so I can't help but wonder if something worries you.

I would suggest, when you next decide to share a story of our exploits, to ask Mr. Wright what he thinks about talking of Labyrinthia. I'm sure he would want to help in telling that one, especially considering the times we split up for various reasons. If Miss Fey is around, she may also want to contribute, although I seem to remember you mentioning she was not available and thus may have to sit out. Otherwise, you will have to decide between Misthallery and Folsense for the subject of your story.

I'm sure Flora will talk at length about it in her letter, but she found an orphan from Future London the other day. He's only a baby, which seems to have excited her even more, and she's started accumulating good boys names for him. I'm actually quite fond of his existing name, 'Alfendi', and I hope whoever does adopt the boy decides to keep it. He apparently has a reputation for being a bit of a terror to his handlers.

This American holiday of Thanksgiving sounds... unusual. The way you describe it, it sounds as though it began as a genuine day of giving thanks and has devolved into simply an excuse for a feast... and this 'Black Friday' that follows it sounds especially troublesome. I hope what you heard about it is indeed exaggerated.

Everyone here is in full swing for Christmas now. The shops have set up all their displays, and there are Christmas lights going up everywhere you look. I saw Dean Delmona personally setting up the tree in the hall of the university yesterday, so it's clear he hasn't learned from the trouble doing so caused last year. I find you can't argue with Christmas cheer, though.

I will end my letter here, I think. I hope you enjoy the puzzles I sent, and that this letter finds you well.

Your friend,

Professor Hershel Layton

Dear Professor Layton,

Don't worry Professor, your card for Nick's birthday was sitting in his office yesterday, so it must have arrived earlier this week while I was at school! I had a peek inside too, and I don't think Flora had to be quite so forceful asking him to look after me. I'm not sure if you saw that or not before sending it, but I'll thank her for her concern in the letter I write to her after this.

As for our plans for Nick's birthday, well, I'm afraid you'll be awfully disappointed in me to hear them. We wanted to be home that evening so the three of us could give Nick his present in person, but Apollo didn't think it would be fair to make him wait for us to get home, since it's after dark by the time we arrive. He and Clay convinced me the right thing to do would be to sneak out of school at the end of lunch to get home around the same time Trucy does. We somehow managed to do it too, because Clay made up some story about a dying great-uncle who knew us as babies and tricked Mr. Thrume into opening the gate for us. I was so guilty about it, Nick actually noticed and was worrying about me, but he says he's forgiven us now. The school hasn't, though. We've got afternoon detention for all of next week, me, Apollo, and Clay. We do deserve it, but next time they try to talk me into that, I'm refusing to go along with it.

Asking Nick is a good idea when it comes to story-telling, thank you for suggesting it, Professor. I didn't even think of Maya, though. I don't think she'd like being left out, so I'll wait until she has the free time to come visit us and ask her then. In the meantime, maybe the Spectre of Misthallery would be a good story to tell next! There's no sense in telling them backwards, now I've thought on it a bit, and I think I'll be alright talking about Mum and Dad now.

Alfendi sounds cute, even if he is a terror! Flora said he was really well behaved when you met him, but the nurse said he's usually crying all the time? I don't blame him, I suppose. I'll do my best to talk some sense into Flora, but you have to admit her promise to learn normal cooking sounds tempting.

Admittedly, it was Apollo, Trucy and Clay who explained Thanksgiving and Black Friday to me, so I may be off on what it's about. Nick didn't seem to care about it either way, though that may have been because he says we don't have the money for a traditional feast. Clay and Apollo insist they weren't exaggerating on Black Friday though, and I did see some story in the paper talking about an injury toll and protests against it, so I'm inclined to believe them.

It's kind of snuck up on us, but we're entering our last week of school for this year! Apollo thinks we got distracted with all the worries we were having about Nick's birthday (Trucy is already trying to get us together to talk about a Christmas present! Nick insists we don't need to bother, though.), but it will be nice to have a couple of weeks where we don't have to go all that way to school so early in the morning. I'm curious to see what differences there are between American and English traditions when it comes to Christmas, actually. I discovered by accident the other week that there's an American robin that's much bigger and different-looking to our English one (it's not nearly as cute, too!).

I'm running out of paper, so I'll stop here. My next letter will probably be after New Years, taking into consideration the mail getting clogged with Christmas cards and packages, so I hope you have a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year, Professor!

'First day of the winter break, and here I am cleaning my room,' Phoenix thought to himself as he brushed a dustcloth across every horizontal surface he could reach. 'Probably would have been smarter to do this while the kids were all out at school. Oh well, too late now. At least they're occupied at the moment.' He shivered a little and regretted his decision to put his hoodie and beanie in the wash today of all days. 'Should have known better than to trust the forecast. It was supposed to be warmer than usual today! Eh, suppose this is why I should have more than one hoodie and beanie. I was not prepared to suddenly be living day-to-day without my suit again.'

The ex-lawyer's musings were interrupted by a buzzing in his pocket, shortly followed by a chirping ringtone. 'Excellent, a distraction!' Smiling to himself, Phoenix gladly abandoned the dustcloth and pulled the blue phone out of his pocket and checked the screen. Smile becoming a grin at the displayed name, he hit the button to pick up the call and pressed the phone to his ear. "Maya!" he cried in delight.

"Hey Nick!" the spirit medium replied cheerily from the other end of the line. "'S been a while, huh? Sorry I haven't been able to get in touch as quickly as I thought..."

Phoenix shook his head, just glad to be talking to his best friend again. "Don't worry about it. You've got a lot of work to do up there."

"Not right now I don't!" Maya giggled, and Phoenix could imagine her victorious grin. "I've managed to get next week off, since all the elders are going off for midwinter to do training!"

"You're not joining them? Isn't that a bad thing for the Master of Kurain to do?"

"Pffft!" Maya scoffed. "I can do whatever I want, I'm the Master! But, yeah, I'm exempt because I already did my training this past week. Planned it nicely, didn't I?"

Phoenix resisted the urge to scoff right back, sitting on his bed as he grinned to himself. "Yeah, I'm sure that was deliberate on your part."

"Shut up," Maya replied, in a tone that suggested she was rolling her eyes. Phoenix couldn't resist a laugh. "How are the kids?" Maya continued. "I think I've got all your texts on what's been going on. They're off school now, right?"

"Yup," Phoenix said with a nod. "Luke and Apollo got in real late last night, since they had to finish up their last detention for skipping school."

Maya sighed. "That was so sweet of them, though! They wanted to give you a birthday present while it was still light out!"

Phoenix chuckled. "Unfortunately, the school was never going to see it that way," he pointed out.
"Well, that's because they're boring!" Maya argued. "Luke's such a little gentleman, he'd never do something like that without a good reason!"

Laughing to himself, Phoenix decided not to explain how distraught Luke had been about it and that it wasn't even his idea in the first place. "Trucy's still complaining about wanting to meet you, by the way," he said instead, his tone becoming serious. "I'm lucky she hasn't been at the Club on the same nights as Kristoph, actually. It feels like it's only a matter of time before she spills something to him."

"Can't you tell her how important it is she not mention me?" Maya asked. "She can keep a secret, right?"

Phoenix shrugged. "If I specifically say to be quiet around Kristoph, that will be enough of a warning that she'll treat him differently, and he'll pick up on that, I'm sure. On the other hand, if I tell her generally to not mention you any more, she'll probably just brush it off as mean old Daddy not wanting her to whine any more and ignore me." He sighed. "I don't know what to do."

Maya was silent for a moment. "Hey, I have an idea!" she suddenly exclaimed. "Have you got any plans for next week?"

"Don't think so, no."

"Well, you do now!" Maya cried. "Come up to Kurain! I'll get to see Luke again, introduce myself to the other two, and they can all meet Pearly!"

Phoenix frowned. "How does this solve the Kristoph problem? I don't want him knowing I'm still friends with you."

"We can discuss that later," Maya insisted. "Bring them to Kurain on Monday! I'll even buy the train tickets for you!"

"Really?" Phoenix sighed. "I'm not totally broke, y'know!" He waited for a reply, but none came. "Hello? Maya?" After several more moments of silence, he pulled the phone away from his ear to curiously look at the screen, only to find it sitting on the normal idle cycle. 'Huh. That's weird. She must have lost signal suddenly.' Shrugging, he decided to head downstairs to see what the kids were doing.

"Covent Garden! Ha!" Apollo was shouting as Phoenix entered the room, and he saw the elder of his sons flipping over a small card with a confident grin as Luke and Trucy groaned from their seats at the kitchen table. Between the trio, sitting in the middle of the table, was the board game Edgeworth had given Luke, decked out with three of the magnetic figures and six red 'closed station' markers dotted throughout the famous train map.

"Now you're winning!" Trucy whined, grabbing the die as it was offered to her and quickly rolling, only to groan again. "One!? This dice is rigged!"
"If there's only one, it's a 'die'," Luke patiently explained as Trucy pushed her purple figure along the yellow line it was sitting on. "More than one are called 'dice'."

Trucy rolled her eyes as she ignored him, handing Luke the die with a glare levelled in Apollo's direction.

Phoenix approached the table as Luke rolled the die and began to move his dark blue figure. "How's it going?" he asked, resting the phone lazily dangling in one hand on the tabletop.

"Good," Luke replied with a grin, then placed his figure on a station and flipped the second of his four cards. "Knightsbridge!" he cried, eliciting yet another groan from Trucy.

"Now you're both winning!" Trucy whined.

"I'm sure your luck will turn around, Truce," Phoenix assured her.

Apollo smiled as he took the die, quickly rolling it from a fist. After a moment, he laughed in surprise. "Woah, I got a six!"

"That's so not fair!" Trucy complained.

Apollo grinned and shook his head. "No no. It's this that's not fair." He carefully counted stations on the blue line his figure was travelling along, then landed it purposefully only two steps along. "Russell Square!" he shouted, flipping the third of his four cards.

Trucy dropped her head to the table with a thud, mumbling muffled groans as Apollo flicked the die in her direction.

"You're getting all the good hazard cards and die rolls today, Apollo!" Luke pointed out in amazement.

Apollo shrugged, grinning. "I did come second last time. I guess I'm just good at this game."

Phoenix's phone began to buzz, singing its chiptune ringtone again. "Oop," Phoenix muttered, grabbing it back up to quickly check the screen and answer the call with a smile. "Hey! You lose signal or something?"

Luke frowned as he watched Phoenix turn and wander off towards his office. "Wait a second," the teen said to his siblings, "I just realised I've heard that tune before!"

Trucy scoffed as she lifted her head off the table and reached for the die. "Steel Samurai," she muttered.

"Yeah, I noticed that the weekend we first met him," Apollo said with a shrug, arms crossed as he leaned back in his chair. "I guess you'd never seen the Steel Samurai before we showed it to you, so you wouldn't have noticed it."

Luke thought to himself as Trucy rolled the die and began to move her figure. "That makes sense," he decided.

Phoenix gently closed the office door behind him, listening to Maya's explanation for how her phone had suddenly disconnected on its own and how upset she was that it had chosen the worst possible moment to do so. "I don't even know when it cut off, because I just thought you'd gone quiet because of your kids or something, and when I looked at my phone-!

"Hey, calm down," Phoenix interrupted, resisting a smile. "You were insisting I take the kids up to Kurain on Monday, weren't you?"

Maya sighed to herself and hummed a positive. "Y'know, if you're that worried about Trucy saying something to Kristoph, once they're up here I can feed them a scare story to convince her to keep quiet?"

Phoenix shrugged. "She might not go for it. I think, if we're just semi-honest and say bad things could happen if they spill they know the Master of Kurain, that might be enough."

"Oh! I don't remember, did you tell Luke about that yet?" Maya asked. "The Master of Kurain thing, I mean?"

Glancing at the door behind him, Phoenix smiled. "Hmmm," he mumbled, trying not to let any laughter into his tone. "Don't remember." He opened the door and wandered back into the kitchen.

Luke was moving his figure around the middle of the board, and announced to the table, "And, since I'm stopping at Victoria, I'm changing to the Victoria line!" Dropping his magnetic figure to leave it sticking to the map, he grabbed a card from the pile in the far corner of the board.

Trucy was peering at the map key next to the card pile. "Oh!" she cried, looking up to Apollo. "He means the light-blue one!"

"Wait, actually," Maya was saying in Phoenix's ear, "I do remember now! You were saying something about how he was curious about my mother, weren't you? So you did tell him!"

"Mm-hmm," Phoenix mumbled, biting his lip to hide his smile as he slowly approached the kitchen table.

Luke frowned as he read his card. "I'm skipping a turn, too?"

Apollo burst into laughter. "Oh wow, both of you got that!? One right after the other!?"

Trucy crossed her arms. "Why'd you have to be the one to get the open-close stations and we get skip-turns!? You're winning!"

"Nick?" Maya asked suspiciously. "What are you doing?"

Luke shook his head as he passed the die to Apollo. "I guess you get two turns in a row, then," he said.

Apollo fist-pumped in victory.

As Phoenix approached Luke, he placed a hand over his free ear and started talking as loudly as he could without shouting. "Oh no, I'm losing you! Oh wait, I think I can fix the signal if I hand you over to Luke!"

Luke looked up in surprise. "Huh?"

"What?" Maya cried, confused.

"Yup, gotta hand you over to Luke, talktoyoulaterMaya!" With that, Phoenix had shoved his phone into his bewildered son's hands.
Luke scrambled with the phone for a moment before deciding to put it to his ear. "Hello?" he nervously asked.

There was a short silence. "Luke? Is that you?"

"Oh!" Luke gasped. "Maya!" He jumped to his feet, placing his hand over the phone's mic to address his siblings. "I'll be right back!" With that, he had dashed off into Phoenix's office for some privacy.

Phoenix grinned as he lowered himself into his seat at the kitchen table, enjoying the slightly confused looks on Apollo and Trucy's faces. "So, who's winning?"

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
"It's been ages since we got to talk!" Luke cried as he carefully closed the office door. "How have you been doing, Maya?"

Maya laughed. "Aw, I've been fine! 'Specially when compared to everything Nick tells me you've been up to!"

Luke blushed. "Uh... what exactly has Nick been telling you?"

"Well, what you did for his birthday was really sweet," Maya replied, but her jovial tone faded as she continued. "Oh, and he told me what happened to your parents back in... September?"

"August."

"Right. Sorry."

Luke smiled. "It's fine," he said. "We... did a little investigating with Detective Gumshoe, back when the adoption went through. And, of course, I've got Apollo and Trucy and Nick now."

"It still hurts, though," Maya pointed out. "I barely knew my mom, but it still hurt to suddenly lose her."

It took Luke a few moments to be able to respond. "Yeah, it still hurts," he admitted. "I'm fine, though. I'm coping." He took a deep breath in and out to steady himself. "Nick tells me you're the head of your family now? That that's why you've been too busy to visit?"

Maya sighed. "Yeah, 'head of the family' works. I've got a proper title, but it's a bit weird using it still." She giggled. "Oh, and as for the 'visiting' thing, you just wait 'til you get off the phone!"

"You'll see!" Maya sang in response. "Oh, and you got the room next to Nick's, right? The one opposite the bathroom?"

"Yes, that bedroom is mine and Apollo's," Luke replied, smiling. "How do you know it?"

Maya laughed. "I know the office like the back of my hand! I used to stay there when I was in the city! Too long a trip to commute, y'know."

Luke was intrigued. "Nick let you stay here?"

"Less 'let me' and more 'had no choice'," Maya explained with a chuckle. "It's complicated, but I'll explain it to you when we next talk! Ooh, how's the Professor and everyone back in Labyrinthia? And after you tell me that, we have to discuss what you guys are planning to do for Nick for Christmas!"
When Luke had finished talking to Maya and returned to the kitchen table, the first thing he noticed was the racket Trucy was making as she ranted loudly at Apollo. Luke could pick up the usual offenders in Trucy's vocabulary when playing his board game, such as 'unfair' and 'rigged', and could guess by Apollo's massive grin as he leaned back in his chair, arms crossed, what might have caused it.

Phoenix looked up as the office door opened, and stood from the table. "Ah, you're done!" he said as he approached Luke, reaching out to retrieve his phone. "Have fun catching up?"

Luke nodded, smiling as he returned the item to its owner. "I did, thank you!" he replied, then headed back to his seat at the table. "What happened while I was busy?" he asked his siblings.

"Apollo won the game!" Trucy declared, pointing angrily at the smug teen sitting beside her.

"What!?" Luke cried, running to the table to address Apollo. "But you still had your fourth destination to get to and returning to your starting point!"

Apollo just nodded, still grinning. "Yup!" he replied. "Only needed two turns!"

"After you left, he rolled a one and got to his fourth stop," Trucy explained, "then on his next turn, he went to change lines, and the card sent him straight to his next destination!" She huffed, falling back in her chair. "So he won just like that!"

"Yup!" Apollo added, still grinning proudly.

Phoenix laughed as he walked up behind Luke, patting him on the shoulder. "Hey, nothing stopping you two continuing the game," he pointed out. "Don't you want to find out who's in second place?"

Trucy and Luke looked at each other for only a moment before Luke jumped into his seat and Trucy grabbed the die from in front of Apollo, tossing it across the table in a hurried roll.

Poking Luke as he walked behind him, Phoenix lazily sat back down in his seat. "So, did Maya mention she made some plans for us for next week?"

Luke frowned, concentrating on the game as Trucy moved her figure on the board. "I think she was hinting at something."

"Green Park!" Trucy cheered, flipping her third card.

"She did say before she hung up to remind you she wants to pay for train tickets," Luke continued, idly reaching for the abandoned die.

"And I'm changing lines!" Trucy announced, grabbing a hazard card. "The dark blue one!"

"Piccadilly!" Luke corrected her, but was ignored.

Trucy read her card with a grin and moved her figure to a station covered with a 'station closed' marker, allowing her to relocate the small red magnet elsewhere across the board. "Ha! Now I'm on the right line and I can get back to King's Cross later!" the eight-year-old gloated in Apollo's direction, only to get a smug smile in return.

"Still didn't win first," Apollo pointed out.
Phoenix shook his head. "Getting this conversation back on track," he said, pausing to look down at the train map on the table, "no pun intended, I suppose I should explain what she was talking about. Maya has next week free, so she's invited us up to Kurain over Christmas."

Luke dropped the die he was rolling earlier than he intended in shock, and Trucy gasped loudly. "Really!?" she cried. "We'll finally get to meet your Maya!?"

Apollo had gone pale. "K-Khu..." He frowned. "Did you say... 'Kurain'?"

"That's it," Phoenix assured him as Luke recovered and began to move his figure. "It's only a couple hours away by train, up in the mountains."

"Jinxie lives up in the mountains!" Trucy added, then frowned in thought. "She doesn't need so long to get to school, though."

Unnoticed by his family, Apollo minutely sighed in relief. 'Stupid... of course he didn't mean...'

Luke finished moving his figure and grabbed a hazard card. "Changing to the Central line," he announced. "I suppose your friend doesn't live as far away as Maya does," he continued, passing the die to Trucy and relocating another of the red markers on the board. "She told me just now that she used to live here at the office when she was in the city, since it was too long a trip home."

"A couple of hours isn't much longer than the trip from here to school," Apollo mused aloud, finger held to his forehead in thought.

"That's by bus," Phoenix pointed out. "By train, two hours is a much longer distance to cover."

Trucy cheered as she flipped her last destination card, having rolled just a large enough number to reach it. "Piccadilly Circus! I'm winning!"

"Actually, you two have Maya's room," Phoenix continued to the boys, a nostalgic smile on his lips. "She used to stay here occasionally when this was still Mia's place."

Apollo was caught off-guard by the question, but recovered enough to quickly return to his 'thinking' pose. "That was the first time you went up against Prosecutor Edgeworth, right?"

"Yes, it was," Phoenix answered with a nod, idly wondering if Apollo had made the connection between the prosecutor and the 'uncle' who'd visited not that long ago. "It was a murder, too; almost all of mine were."

"I remember something about a clock that looked like a statue," Apollo mumbled, then blinked and looked up at his father with wide eyes. "Didn't the charges get transferred to you on that one?"

Phoenix nodded again. "Do you remember the name of the victim? Or the first defendant?"
Apollo was forced to shrug, looking guilty. "I'm terrible with names," he admitted. "Sorry."

"No problem," Phoenix calmly replied, smiling. "The first defendant was Maya. It was how we met."

"Really!?" Luke cried with a frown, and Phoenix noticed the game had quietly continued while he'd been distracted, as Luke was again moving his figure across the board. "What a way to meet your best friend!" He stopped his marker at the very edge of the map and grinned at Trucy as he flipped his last card. "Notting Hill Gate!"

Trucy rolled her eyes, smiling smugly as she took the die.

"Although," Luke continued, tapping his chin in thought, "I suppose the circumstances surrounding how I met the Professor were sort of similar. It was just a mystery though, not a murder."

Phoenix chuckled. "Yeah. Oddly enough, we were always going to meet that evening anyway." He looked over to the office door, seeing in his mind's eye the last conversation he'd had with Mia before her death. "Mia was my mentor, and Maya's older sister. This used to be her office, a long time ago."

Apollo and Luke glanced at each other as they mutually realised who the victim of the case had been.

"I won!" Trucy suddenly cried, slamming her figure down on the board and startling the rest of her family from their conversation. "I beat you this time, Luke!" As she looked up and noticed everyone staring at her with wide eyes, she returned their gazes with one of confusion. "What?"

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
Phoenix found himself feeling more and more like a mother hen the closer they got to Kurain. In addition to herding his little family in the right direction, he found himself counting and recounting that the three of them were all nearby and following him, checking and double-checking they all had their little travel bags, and all on top of keeping track of his own bag and the family's train and bus tickets.

"Trucy, we're going this way, please."

"Coming, Daddy!"

"Luke, do you have your bag?"

"Don't worry Nick, I've got it!"

"Apollo, would you watch your siblings while I get our tickets out, please?"

"Sure, Dad."

Finally, they got off the bus in Kurain Village and Phoenix busied himself doing a final check-up while they waited for the bus to do a spin of the nearby open area before heading back down the mountain. "Trucy, Luke, Apollo, you've all got your bags... Where's mine? Oh, you have it, thank you Apollo." Taking his wheeled travel bag from his eldest son, Phoenix sighed in relief, turning to watch the bus disappearing down the road. "Looks like we made it to Kurain in one piece!" he announced.

Trucy and Luke were staring wide-eyed at the little town that lay before them, traditional Japanese houses lining the street and spreading up the sloped ground into the forests surrounding them. The giant boulder to their left also attracted some of their attention, although neither were attempting to approach it just yet. Apollo, although also admiring the view, was focussing more on paying attention to his immediate surroundings, keeping half an eye on his younger siblings while trying to mainly listen to Phoenix.

"So where's Fey Manor?" Luke asked as he surveyed the houses eagerly, hoping to spot a glimpse of Maya's familiar purple outfit between the buildings.

"Ooh, do they live in a tree-house!?" Trucy squealed, holding a hand above her eyes as she peered into the forests.

Phoenix laughed, instinctively glancing up and down the dirt road before slowly walking across, wheeling his bag behind him. "I'm afraid you won't find anyone living in trees here, Truce."

Apollo nudged his younger siblings to ensure they were following Phoenix before trailing at the back of the small group himself. "Is it a long walk?" he called to their father.

"Not long," Phoenix assured him with a knowing smile, reaching the other side of the road and lifting his bag over the stone steps of the magnificent building opposite the bus stop.

Luke's eyes widened as he looked from Phoenix's bag up to the mansion before them. "Wait, that's Fey Manor!? I thought it was a town hall!"

Trucy's smile widened to a grin and she squealed excitedly, bouncing across the road to the bottom of the steps. "We get to stay in the biggest, most amazingest house in the village!? That's so cool!"

Casting a sideways glare in his sister's direction, Luke muttered, "'Amazingest' isn't a word."

Phoenix couldn't resist a laugh as he approached the wooden door of the manor, leaving his bag at the top of the steps to the porch while the children huddled together on the edge of the road. "I'm sure Maya will love to show you around," he assured them, knocking on the doorframe. "We'll need to find her first, though. And remember, we've got a few days here, so don't go doing everything in the first da-

The front door of the Manor was flung wide open, and the voice of a young girl cried "Mister Nick!" before said young girl, dressed in a pale pink outfit not unlike Maya's, jumped out from behind the doorframe and latched onto Phoenix, arms clutched around his middle as she buried her face in his stomach.

"H-hey, Pearls," Phoenix said, smiling as he petted the girl's head with one hand and held her shoulder with the other. "Been a while, huh?"

Aside from her outfit, Luke quickly noticed the girl, somewhere around Trucy's age at his best guess, had bare feet and light brown hair styled up at the back of her head in a large loop that bore an odd resemblance to a pretzel.

"Is that Maya's cousin?" he wondered to himself.

Pearl pulled away from Phoenix, hands balled into fists at her sides. "You haven't come to visit Mystic Maya in forever! How can you be special someones if you don't spend any time together!?"

"Nick?" called a voice from inside, and a moment later a dark-haired young woman in a purple kimono appeared in the doorway. Her eyes almost immediately latched on to Phoenix, who smiled as he spotted her. "Nick!"

"Hey," Phoenix had just enough time to say before Maya jumped forward, just barely avoiding Pearl as the girl leapt to one side. The ex-lawyer and spirit medium stood silently for a while in a tight hug, smiling brightly as they treasured the long-awaited moment of reunion, Maya's head resting comfortably on Phoenix's shoulder while Phoenix buried his face in her hair.

"Hi, Maya!" he called, waving.

Breaking their hug, Maya and Phoenix looked up, and Maya's grin widened as she recognised the teenage boy in blue. "Luke, is that you?" she asked, stepping past Pearl to jump down the porch steps. "Why didn't you tell me you've gotten so much taller?"

Luke frowned. "I'm not taller!" he protested.

Maya bit her lip, failing to hide a smile as she poked Luke's nose. "Yeah, you are. Your head's at my
"Is not," Luke grumbled, pulling the brim of his hat down, though he wasn't sure quite why he was fighting the idea. "Maybe you've shrunk!"

While Maya laughed, Trucy's confused frown slowly turned into a smile. "Are you Maya?" she asked.

"That's me!" Maya replied, giving the girl a grin and holding out her hand. "You must be Trucy!"

Trucy grinned, bouncing as she shook Maya's hand eagerly. "Yay! You're our new mommy, right?"

Maya's face instantly went red as she recoiled in shock. "Huh?"

Pearl gasped, eyes sparkling as she looked up to Phoenix. "She is!?"

"No, no!" Phoenix cried, waving his hands as his face similarly went red. "We're just friends!"

"Mister Nick!" Pearl protested, moving to roll up her sleeves. "That's not a nice thing to say about your special someone!"

Maya shook her head, giving her young cousin a pained look. "Pearly, please..."

Chastened, Pearl slowly backed down, hands clasped together as she sadly stared at the porch floor. Phoenix rubbed at his face in embarrassment as the colour slowly returned to normal. Luke shot Trucy a nervous glance, noticing she still seemed a little in shock at the rapidity of the protest to her question.

"We're just friends," Maya repeated to Trucy. Sighing, she then turned to the last of the trio, forcing a smile. "And you must be Apollo!" She grabbed for his left hand before the teen could react, forgetting to shake as she used the chance to give his bracelet a closer look. "Nick tells me you were in the audience for some of our trials!"

"My trials!" Phoenix corrected.

Apollo nodded, carefully pulling his hand from Maya's grasp and rubbing at his wrist nervously. "Uh, y-yeah, I was," he admitted. "I, um, I didn't recognise you until I saw you, though."

Maya grinned, but then frowned, fist held to her cheek in thought. "You're, like, my height," she pointed out. "How can I baby you when you're so freakishly tall?"

The teen was almost too shocked to respond for a few moments. "Actually, I'm one of the shortest in my classes," he mumbled, posture slumping.

Phoenix patted Pearl on the shoulder and gestured to the group at the bottom of the porch steps. "You want to introduce yourself too, Pearls?"

"Oh!" Pearl quietly cried, and she dashed down to Maya's side, fixing the three visitors with a wide grin. "It's nice to meet you all! Mister Nick and Mystic Maya have told me about you!"

"Yes!" Maya added, giving the girl a quick hug. "This is my cute little cousin, Pearly!" She then gestured to each of the other three in turn, whispering, "If you didn't hear earlier, that's Trucy, Luke and Apollo."

Pearl nodded, whispering back, "Don't worry, Mystic Maya, I heard!"
Trucy grinned, excited to have another girl around her age to befriend, and she grabbed Pearl's hand to shake it gleefully. "Hi! It's really nice to meet you!"

Luke crossed his arms, frowning in thought. "So is it 'Pearls' or 'Pearly'?"

Pearl gave Trucy a polite smile as she withdrew her hand, chewing on the thumbnail nervously. "Well, my name is Pearl, but Mister Nick calls me Pearls and everyone else usually calls me Pearly."

Apollo grinned. "Nice to meet you, Pearly!" he said, deciding not to shake her hand after seeing Trucy do so already.

"Oh, hey!" Maya suddenly cried, noticing the travel bags the three had either on their backs or dropped on the ground in front of them. "We should get you inside! I'll give you a tour while we show you where you'll be sleeping!" Waving for the trio to follow her, she jumped up the steps and ran back inside, Pearl following behind with a big grin.

Excited to be meeting other kids her age for once (despite Trucy being a year younger and Luke five years older), Pearl was quick to invite the trio to her room once the tour of the grand Fey Manor was complete.

"It's not much," the nine-year-old apologised as she led her new friends in, "but this is where I sleep and keep all my toys."

Trucy quickly locked her gaze on the blue ball sat on the low bed, emblazoned proudly with a picture of the Steel Samurai. "Wow, you have a Steel Samurai ball!"

Pearl nodded, picking the object up. "Mystic Maya gave it to me!" She then blushed, embarrassed. "Although I didn't see any of the show until more recently. We don't watch much television up here."

"Really?" Apollo asked in surprise, distracted from his examination of the sparse room that reminded him rather oddly of his school dorm. "What do you do to pass the time?"

"Play with my ball or other toys, study channelling techniques," Pearl began to answer, checking off a mental list, "talk to Mystic Maya, play a board game, draw-"

"At least you keep yourself entertained!" Luke decided to interrupt, not wanting to drag out the question any further.

Trucy bounced over to the window overlooking a garden beyond, and sat down. "So, Pearly," she cried, patting the floor nearby to indicate she wanted the older girl to join her, "what do you think about making Miss Maya our new mommy?"

At that, Pearl immediately perked up, dropping her ball back on the bed as she jumped to join Trucy by the window. "Mister Nick and Mystic Maya are destined for each other!" she declared, hands to her face as she fawned over the mental image of the pair as lovebirds. "It's like a fairy-tale! Mister Nick has saved Mystic Maya so many times, and he would do anything to defend her honour!"

Luke covered his mouth with a hand to prevent a snort escaping, while Apollo crossed his arms, leaning against the wall by the door. "If you two are going to turn this into a match-making session, I'll take my chances with Dad."

Trucy stuck her tongue out at her eldest brother. "If you're going to be boring and not help us get a new mommy!" she cried accusingly.

Apollo rolled his eyes, muttering, "Yeah, whatever." He pushed himself off the wall and turned towards the door. "You guys do what you want, just leave me out of it." With that, he left the room.

"What about you, Luke?" Trucy added, fixing her other brother with a bright smile. "You want a new mommy, right?"

Luke restrained a smile, thinking for a moment. "Well, I'd never call her 'Mum', but if I'm honest, I actually agree with you, Pearl."

Pearl smiled widely, mouth wide open. "Really?" she asked.

"Yup!" Luke replied with a nod, walking over to sit with the two girls. "When I first met Nick and Maya back in Labyrinthia, I thought for the longest time they actually were a couple."

"Because they are!" Pearl insisted, looking sad. "I don't know why they keep saying they aren't!"

Trucy crossed her arms, pouting. "Well, we have to get them together!"

Pearl nodded emphatically. "I've been trying for years!" she cried. "I got them a honeymoon 'soo-eet' at the Gatewater Hotel, and then I booked them into the Special and the Ultra Course at Hazakura Temple!" She sighed, slumping. "Nothing I do seems to work!"

Luke reached out to pat the girl's shoulder sympathetically.

"Don't worry!" Trucy assured her new friend, tipping her silk top hat. "With the three of us working together, I'm sure we'll think of something that'll work!"

"Um," Luke found himself butting in, uncertainly, "maybe we shouldn't?"

The two girls looked up at him, shocked. "What do you mean!?" Pearl asked, an angry look on her face. "They belong together!"

"And I agree with you on that!" Luke quickly insisted, raising his hands up in surrender. "It's just... don't you think forcing them is more likely to push them apart than together?"

Trucy and Pearl stared blankly in the teen's direction for a few moments.

Luke sighed. "It's a natural human reaction when being forced into something to fight it. Nobody likes losing control of their own choices, after all." He shrugged, hoping his meagre explanation was making sense to the girls. "If we keep pushing Maya and Nick into being a couple, they'll just keep fighting it and insisting they're only friends. What we should do is back off, do nothing for a while, and give them a chance to actually consider the idea on their own terms without anything being forced on them."

Pearl and Trucy stared at the floor, deep in thought. "We should... do nothing?" Trucy repeated.

"Are you sure that will work?" Pearl asked, giving Luke a worried look. "What if they still don't get together?"

Luke thought for a long moment. Pearl's sad look was reminding him of Flora, and how upset she always looked at even the slightest implication that someone didn't like her experiments in cooking. This was going to be just as hard a subject to broach, so Luke decided to deal with it the way he always had before: by ignoring the problem. He gave Pearl a smile. "And why wouldn't they?" he assured her. "They're meant for each other, right?"

Pearl grinned. Trucy gave Luke a suspicious look, but didn't interject.

December 23, 2:04PM
Apollo sighed as he stalked down the hallway and into the entrance hall of the mansion, called the Meditation Room if he remembered correctly from Maya's earlier tour. I'm sure I heard Dad and Maya going in this direction earlier. Finally, he heard their voices drifting in from an open door to one side, and rushed to the doorway, a sliding wood door that was open only a crack.

"And what about Apollo?" Maya asked from the nearby garden.

The teen stopped dead in his tracks.

Phoenix softly laughed. "He's doing 'fine', as he and Luke would say! Y'know I caught him in the office with one of Mia's law books the other day?"

Apollo winced as he heard Maya laughing. "Well, it's officially become awkward to interrupt." Nevertheless, he made no move to leave. Instead, he tip-toed to the door and peeked out, seeing his father and spirit medium friend out in the garden by the Winding Way, their backs to him as they leaned against the high wooden walkway. Phoenix had lost his beanie since the end of the tour, and looked far more relaxed than he had on the trip up to Kurain, while Maya looked somehow calmer now she wasn't excitedly showing the kids around her large home. Besides, that book made my head hurt. Then Dad surprised me, I dropped it, and it made my foot hurt...

"If he can make any sense of those things, he's welcome to them," Phoenix continued, a smile in his tone. "It's not like they'll be at all relevant by the time he's actually studying to be a lawyer anyway!"

Maya was still laughing. "Aw, but he's gonna try anyway!" She shook her head, letting loose one last giggle before changing the subject. "He's getting on with Trucy?"

"Mm-hm," Phoenix replied, nodding. "They get on just like that." He snapped his fingers to illustrate his point.

"Understandable, considering!" Maya pointed out knowingly.

And what's that supposed to mean? Apollo asked himself, confused. Considering what?

There was a short pause, and Maya gently rocked her body against Phoenix's in a friendly jab. "You told them yet?"

Apollo frowned. Told us what!? What are you hiding from us!?'

"Not yet," Phoenix replied. "I'm thinking I'll wait 'til May, make it a birthday present. Or I might just get impatient and do it earlier, we'll see." He turned his head just enough that Apollo could see a smirk on his face, although the teen quickly hid behind the door to avoid being spotted. "Of course, I'm not gonna make it easy for them."

Maya scoffed. "You? Making things easy?" she joked.

"He wants to be a lawyer, after all!" Phoenix laughed. "I'll make it a little investigation for him. He can ask Luke for help if he needs it."

Apollo rolled his eyes, carefully peeking through the crack in the doorway again.
Maya scratched her cheek in thought. "Speaking of Luke, do you think you could get him to tell that story to me and Pearly? It sounds interesting!"

'She must mean that story about his last adventure with this Professor of his,' Apollo mused.

Phoenix shrugged. "I dunno, Apollo and Trucy would probably rather hear something new." He glanced over to Maya before returning his gaze to the garden in front of them. "I was thinking they might like to hear about Labyrinthia, actually. Luke hasn't told them about it yet."

"That's a good idea!" Maya gasped, hands clasped together eagerly. "After all, we never told Pearly the full story, did we?"

Phoenix opened his mouth to respond, then thought better and closed it again, only to look over to Maya and again change his mind. "Should we maybe tell Luke to leave out...?"

"The night we were separated?" Maya filled in, and Apollo noted how serious the two suddenly were, as though the event were some great tragedy (though he couldn't imagine how simply being away from someone for a single night was that bad).

"Yeah," Phoenix replied, nodding and looking away again to sadly stare at the ground. "That was the worst night of my life, ignoring the Hazakura incident of course. I don't think any of us particularly want to relive it."

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Before today, you'd been apart for longer than I've known you both combined, for goodness' sake...'

Maya nodded, also staring at the ground. "It was pretty scary," she agreed, then looked up at her friend. "You know what scared me the most, though?"

Phoenix returned her gaze curiously. "What?"

"More than the Shades, more than being lost in the forest," Maya answered, leaning in against Phoenix's side, "I was worried sick about you."

Apollo blinked in surprise. 'Lost in the forest? 'Shades'?' He began to rethink his earlier mental criticisms of their comments as he realised he had no idea what it was they were actually discussing.

There was a short pause before Phoenix moved his arm around to Maya's shoulder, pulling her tighter against him as they rested their heads against each other.

Apollo backed away from the door. 'Whatever they're talking about, he told himself, 'I'll find out about it later.' He shook his head as he turned and headed off back down the hallway. 'I think I'm starting to see why the others think they're a couple, though.'

FLASHBACK: Sunflowers

- One Year Earlier -

November 15, 7:15AM
Bakery

Phoenix repressed a yawn as he slid into his seat at the table next to Maya, placing a specially wrapped fresh loaf of bread beside him where it wouldn't be forgotten. 'It is far too early to be suffering jetlag and already neck-deep in a case...' He was the last to come to the table, having deviated to the kitchen to pick up something for Espella when they went to visit her after breakfast. He'd volunteered earlier to help Patty prepare the bread and pastries for both the shop displays and their morning meal in an effort to wake himself up, but, needless to say, it clearly hadn't worked as well as he'd hoped.

"Are the two of you engaging in an eating contest, by any chance?" Professor Layton remarked with a smile.

Phoenix looked up to see Luke and Maya, sitting opposite each other, piling great amounts of Patty's pastries onto their plates, and the two of them both grinned sheepishly up at the Professor before moving to begin eating. The lawyer sighed, running a hand over his face. "How the two of you are so energetic after getting no sleep last night, I'll never know," he sighed.

Maya scoffed, elbowing her friend. "C'mon Nick, we have a case to investigate! There's no time for sleep!"

"That's because you're insane," Phoenix muttered, grabbing a random pastry from the tray. "Besides, Espella's my client. You should probably have a nap or something."

"You're just grumpy because you're jetlagged," Maya replied with a smile. "You fight jetlag by staying awake in the sun and only trying to sleep at night, silly!"

Professor Layton nodded to himself, cutting a loaf of bread into slices. "Ah, yes, you are both American, are you not?"

"Los Angeles, yes," Phoenix replied, smiling. "Born and bred."

"Just arrived-! Well," Maya paused, fist to her cheek in thought. "We landed the evening before defending Espella in London, but who knows exactly how long it's been for us since then."

The Professor nodded sympathetically. "It is difficult to judge any time passed between leaving London and arriving here, I'll agree."

Luke paused in his stuffing of food into his mouth to swallow. "When we get back to London, do you think no time would have passed back home?" he asked. "Like in the Narnia books?"

Phoenix shrugged. Professor Layton frowned in thought. "We have no way of knowing that until we do return," he pointed out, pulling on the brim of his top hat. "And until then, I don't think we should waste any time worrying about it, Luke."

Luke nodded, smiling as he returned to his food.

"We've got two weeks here at least," Phoenix continued, leaning back in his chair and unconsciously reaching for the small golden pin on his lapel. "Once we get Espella cleared of this ridiculous witch charge, then we can find a way out of here." He frowned to himself. "I still can't believe I'm doing this without any kind of forensic evidence at all..."

The Professor chuckled to himself, giving Phoenix a smile. "I must admit, I am rather ashamed of myself for not noticing your badge when we first met, Mister Wright." Phoenix glanced to the pin he was running his fingers over. "It is a defence attorney's badge, is it not?"

Maya rolled her eyes as she noticed Phoenix begin to grin. "And now you've got him started."

"Yep!" Phoenix brightly replied, ignoring his assistant. "Every defence attorney back home gets one of these when they pass the bar! It's required if you want to stand behind the bench in court!"

Luke abandoned his food for a moment, peering over to the small object. "Can I see?" he asked.

"Don't encourage him!" Maya cried. "He'll show that thing off 'til the cows come home!"

Scoffing in Maya's direction, Phoenix unscrewed the badge from his lapel. "I worked hard for this thing, I'm allowed to be proud of it!" he argued, then passed the tiny object over the table to Luke. "Be careful with it," he instructed the boy.

"I will!" Luke promised, and he examined the badge closely. "It's very shiny!"

Phoenix grinned proudly. "I take good care of it."

"You keep polishing it the way you do," Maya warned, "and it'll lose that shiny coating, you know!"

"Like you'd know," Phoenix pointed out, rolling his eyes. "You've never had one! And don't claim you saw Mia's, because that's just outright lying."

Maya stuck her tongue out at her friend.

Luke frowned as he looked at the round badge in his hand. "Why are there scales in the middle?" he asked.

"Those would be the Scales of Justice," Professor Layton answered with a smile, finger in the air, then he frowned in thought. "Although the symbolism behind the shape baffles me somewhat. I would have thought a shield might be appropriately symbolic, but the pattern doesn't resemble any round shield I have known."

Phoenix rubbed his chin. "I do know what it's supposed to be shaped like," he replied, "just not off the top of my head. I think I looked it up once, or it came up in conversation with Mia or something..."

Maya smirked. "What, there's something about your precious badge you don't know?" she joked. "It's a miracle! Zvarri!" She waved a hand through the air in a grandiose gesture.

Resisting a laugh behind his hand, Phoenix tried and failed to give Maya a stern look. "I'm busy enough memorising law and case details for my clients, I don't need to waste brain space on trivia!"

Luke angled the badge over his head, watching it glint in the light of the rising sun through the
"Is it a sun?" he asked.

"Sunflower!" Phoenix suddenly cried, snapping his fingers.

Professor Layton frowned, confused. "Sunflower?" he repeated.

"That's what it is!" Phoenix added. "It's some kind of thing about how it always faces the sun, so it's a symbol of 'the light of truth' or something." He shrugged.

Maya and Luke glanced at each other before looking at the badge in Luke's hand. "Never would have figured it was a flower," Maya admitted.

Phoenix shrugged. "You know me and flowers," he pointed out to her, gently elbowing the young woman in the side. "I was never going to remember a fact like that."

Luke handed the badge back with a smile. "Thank you for letting me look at it, Mister Wright!" he said.

"No problem, Luke," Phoenix replied, laughing at the boy's unfailing politeness as he attached the beloved item back to its usual home on his lapel.

Casting a glance at the kitchen to ensure Patty was out of sight, Professor Layton pulled a fob watch from a pocket inside his jacket, and checked the time. "We should hurry and get moving," he announced, quickly replacing the item and standing up.

Luke cried out in surprise and hurriedly stuffed the last of his breakfast into his mouth as he jumped off his chair.

"Isn't it a bit early, still?" Maya asked, picking at the crumbs left on her plate.

"You're thinking of the Detention Center back home," Phoenix pointed out, standing from the table and ensuring he grabbed the loaf by his side. "They won't have strict opening times here."

Maya nodded and followed her friends, sneaking as many of the bread crumbs from her plate as she could before her friends got too far ahead.

"As it seems we are all ready to go," Professor Layton said as he exited onto the street, "shall we make our way to the court?" He turned to watch for Luke and Maya tumbling out the front doorway. "So does everyone remember how to get there?"

"Sure," Phoenix nodded. "We just head east from here, and it's on the other side of the forest, isn't it?"

Maya clapped her hands to remove the last of the crumbs from them, crying, "Boy, Espella must be feeling so sad and lonely! Let's get a move on!"

Luke giggled, skipping after as the group headed off. "Let's go!" he agreed.
A field of sunflowers stretched out as far as the eye could see, even from high up above where Luke was currently hovering. They were glowing a deep yellow in the light of the setting sun somewhere behind him, and it took the boy a few moments to recognise with a sudden gasp of fright that the beautiful plants had in fact been turned to gold.

The sun behind him switched off like a light, and Luke found himself falling towards the field below. The sunflowers, however, were still glowing, but this time it was in the light of an all-consuming crimson fire, burning between the golden stems and reaching up with flapping tendrils to catch the boy in blue as gravity took him closer, accelerating through the air, unable to scream...

Luke woke up in bed.

He almost sighed in relief as he found himself facing the wall, cozy under a thick blanket with his cap acting as a pillow for his head, but changed his mind as he woke up fully and remembered the situation. 'Oh yeah, the Professor's been... and Maya...’ He shook his head, then rolled over to look around the room from his spot on the middle bunkbed. Everything seemed much the same as it had been when he went to sleep, with the piles of wooden crates and barrels, empty bottles, half-finished statues, and the empty hammock slung between them. 'Wait, empty!?’

Luke sat up and jumped out of bed as it registered Phoenix was absent from the bed he had chosen. A glance up told him Espella was still fast asleep in the bed above his, her red cape pulled tight around her as a second blanket in the cold night, and the thirteen-year-old panicked for a moment that their older friend had maybe abandoned them while they were sleeping. A closer inspection of the hammock allayed his fears though, as he found Phoenix's jacket (with prized defence attorney's badge attached) and red tie slung over the back of one of the statues, out of the way. By the door, he also spotted their three pairs of shoes, where they had been left as the three got into bed. ‘So where is Mister Wright, then?’ Seeing no sign in the room itself, Luke tiptoed to the door, making sure he wasn't disturbing Espella's sleep as he slowly pulled it open.

The chandelier and candles in the bar itself were all still lit, and Luke blinked for a moment as he slowly adjusted to the light, pushing himself out the door. Behind him, he pulled the door almost to a close, not wanting to wake Espella with the light nor with the noise of any unseen mechanisms clicking into place.

"I'm the only one who can protect Luke and Espella," Phoenix's voice said from somewhere below. "But I'm scared. I'm scared that what happened to Maya will happen again..."

Luke clapped a hand to his face to restrain a gasp. 'Mister Wright!' "Maya, huh?” Rouge replied, and Luke could hear the clinking of glass as she adjusted something at the bar. "I caught wind of what happened today in court. She seemed... very important to you."

There was a short pause. "I'm... all right," Phoenix insisted, but even Luke could tell it was a lie. "I'm just... not sure I can protect those two.” He sighed. "More than that... I just don't want them to think I might fail them."

A part of Luke told him to go back to bed, to stop eavesdropping on what was clearly a private conversation, but his feet refused to move. Since their escape from the courtroom that evening, the boy had been worrying about his lawyer friend. It seemed Phoenix had shut down from the loss of Maya, and Luke couldn't blame him after doing almost the same thing losing the Professor. Against his better judgement, he began to softly creep towards the stairs.

"You want to protect them," Rouge slowly said, a dangerous tone to her voice, "and don't want them to think you'll fail, huh?” She huffed to herself in thought. "That all sounds well and good. But you want to know what I think? I think you're just telling yourself what you want to hear."

"Huh?" Phoenix replied, sounding more confused than anything else. "What do you mean?"

Luke peered over the top of the stairs and spotted the pair at the bar, Rouge standing behind it while Phoenix sat on a stool opposite her. Between them was a small array of daggers and glasses, which looked to be possibly the remains of a puzzle. Rouge was frowning, and she leaned forward on the bar to hold a gloved fist up as though ready to throw a punch. "I think the words coming out of your mouth right now are downright selfish."

Phoenix was leaning back in shock. "H-hey, what are you-?"

"Have you taken a second to step back from your wallowing and think how worried they must be about you right now?" Rouge continued, and when Phoenix only stared sadly at the floor in reply, she leaned back and crossed her arms. "So it's hopeless, huh? Do you think those kids are hopeless too?" She rolled her eyes. "Pshh, don't make me laugh! You wanna see hopeless? That's easy. Just take a look in the mirror."

"That's no way to talk to Mister Wright!" Luke objected in his head, and instinctively took a step down the stairs before stopping himself.

"How do you expect to protect those two," Rouge continued, gesturing above her to where their room was, "if you can't even manage to get a hold of yourself?"

Finally, Phoenix seemed to respond, looking up and giving the bartender a glare. "I-I...!"

There was a long pause, before finally Rouge softened her gaze and gave Phoenix a smile. "It's okay," she assured him. "I get it. You had some really, really rough stuff happen to you today. Unimaginably sad, emotionally trying stuff."

Phoenix had returned to staring at the floor. Luke slid down to sit on the top step, peering down through the bars holding up the railing.

"That's why the first thing you need to do," Rouge continued, reaching out to rest a hand on the lawyer's shoulder, "is just accept it. Accept it all. The sadness, the remorse... everything. Honestly, I don't blame you for expressing just how hard this whole situation has been on you. Who could?"

Luke leaned against the railing, hugging himself tightly. "I guess there's no hiding... we might be able to save the Professor, but poor Maya..."

"I," Phoenix croaked, and paused before continuing, his whole body tensing up in his seat as he directed his head even further downwards, pulling away from Rouge's touch. "I can never forgive myself for letting this happen. I couldn't do anything, not a single thing! I did nothing to help Maya at all!" He leaned forward, head almost on the bar as he gripped it tightly, thoroughly angry at himself.

"Maya gave her own life to save Espella! If only I'd been quicker, if only I could've done something, Maya would still be..." His anger spent, Phoenix pulled his arms up to form a pillow on the bar, burying his face in it. "She'd still be here by my side," he quietly added, then shook his head as Rouge again reached out to rest a comforting hand on his shoulder. The lawyer began to sob. "It's all my fault..."

'If I'd been quicker following the Professor,' Luke echoed, 'Maya would never have been accused of turning him to gold... He might never have turned to gold in the first place! They'd both be here, helping us save Espella.' He closed his eyes, head slumped. 'And Maya would be here to cheer up Mister Wright... He's so upset... I wish I could do something for him...'
An ever-so-soft creaking in the floor behind him shocked Luke back into action, and he looked up and behind him to see Espella wincing at the noise she'd caused. Seeing Luke staring up at her, she gave him an embarrassed smile. "Luke, what are you doing here?" she whispered.

Luke pulled himself to his feet, returning the embarrassed grin. "Ah, Espella, what are you doing up at this time?"

The teen shrugged, looking sad. "I couldn't sleep," she claimed, tip-toeing to the top of the stairs. "I thought I'd just get a glass of water." Peering down into the bar below, she paused. "Who's that over there? Is that... Miss Rouge and Mister Wright?"

Panicking, Luke grabbed Espella's arm and gently pulled her away from the stairs. "Hey, we should head back to bed, Espella!" he insisted. "We have an early start tomorrow, after all!"

There was a short pause before Espella bit her lip, humming in agreement. "You're right," she agreed, giving the boy a smile before heading back towards their room.

Luke followed Espella a few steps before stopping and staring down to the lower floor through the bars of the railing. He couldn't see the pair downstairs from here, but he knew his friend was probably still breaking down over Maya. 'They are definitely a couple,' he decided. 'Or... were.' He sighed to himself, shaking his head. 'I'll make myself more useful to you, Mister Wright. I promise.'
"It was just as the Storyteller said:" Luke dramatically narrated to the assembled group. "A man from afar falls to a golden curse! But it wasn't Nick who fell, it was the Professor!"

Trucy and Pearl, cuddled up to either side of Phoenix on the edge of Trucy's low bed, gasped.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "C'mon, he's not actually dead," he pointed out. "Luke's been writing letters to him, remember?"

Maya poked him in the side, shushing the teen.

Luke resisted a giggle at Apollo's reaction. He knew he wouldn't have been able to tell this part of the story so gleefully when the pain of initially thinking the deception had been true was still fresh in his mind, but sufficient time had passed that he was able to ham up the drama of Professor Layton's brush with being turned to gold for the sake of a good story. "That's not the end of it, though!" he continued, leaning forward from the floor cushion he was sat on. "The Talea Magica that fell by Maya's feet, and the spell we'd all heard as we ran down the hall? That was enough for Inquisitor Barnham to place the blame on Maya!"

The two girls gasped again, cuddling even closer to Phoenix as he resisted a smirk at Luke's gleeful narration. "Yeah, Maya has a problem with keeping herself out of trouble," he joked. Maya stuck out her tongue at him in response.

Apollo held a finger against his forehead in thought. "So you ended up in Witches' Court again?" he asked, trying not to look excited at hearing a brand new story of one of Phoenix's trials.

"Mm hm!" Luke said with a nod. "Nick defended her, of course!"

"And weren't you one of the prosecution's witnesses?" Maya asked with a knowing smile, poking Luke's arm and pretending to think hard on the question. "I seem to remember there being a certain boy in blue down there!"

Luke blushed, pulling his cap over his eyes. "U-um..."

Taking pity on the teen, Phoenix ruffled the hair of the two girls at his side. "Luke was understandably upset at losing the Professor. After all, we didn't know yet if we could reverse the gold spell on him."

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Will you stop pretending magic is real!?" he objected.

"What was worse," Phoenix continued, ignoring Apollo's outburst, "was that Barnham had managed to convince Luke Maya had to have been the witch responsible, so to get anywhere in that trial, my first task was to try and calm him down and make him see reason."

Luke rubbed an arm, staring at the floor in an attempt to hide his embarrassed blushing.
"You managed it though, right?" Apollo asked with an excited smile. "By pointing out magic wasn't real?"

Pearl frowned, while Trucy rolled her eyes. "Will you drop that already?" the young magician replied, exasperated.

Phoenix chuckled. "I did it by proving there was no possible way Maya could have dropped that staff. When the Professor's statue fell, the arm snapped off and was stolen by one of the witnesses."

Apollo resisted muttering a sarcastic remark. 'Oh yes, "the Professor's statue"; You're definitely not admitting right there that the supposed 'magic' is all totally fake...'

Pearl looked scandalised, arms on her hips. "Who could do such a thing!? That's someone's arm they're taking!"

"Ugh, he was a pretty terrible person all around," Maya admitted, waving a hand. "But hey, Nick got him to return it, and he even told us he'd found it on the floor between me and the staff!"

Luke scrunched up his face in thought. "Yeah, but then Inquisitor Barnham tried to say we'd just misheard whether the staff or the Professor fell first..."

Phoenix grinned. "Hey, Apollo," he called to the teen, "do you remember the trial for the Gourd Lake murder?"

Apollo jumped in surprise at being asked the question out of nowhere. "Huh? Uh, yeah, I remember reading about it." He started to go over his memories of the case file in his head, trying to find a parallel between it and the current case they were discussing. "A man was out on the lake with a prosecutor after midnight on Christmas Eve, and the man was found dead from a bullet wound on the shore the next morning. There were pictures taken by an automatic camera that suggested the prosecutor was the shooter, and two-, er, three witnesses, one of whom was the owner of the camera, another was out on the lake for some other reason, and the last was this old guy suffering from dementia or something that ran the boat shop."

"Wow, impressive," Maya commented, smiling. "I was there, and even I don't remember it that well!"

"And how did we prove the 'old guy' was faking it?" Phoenix asked with a smile.

Apollo frowned. "You... called his pet parrot as a witness?"

"One of the other witnesses was a bard, Mister Birdly!" Luke announced, a finger in the air as he instantly brightened up. "He had a pet parrot that went with him everywhere, called Cracker!"

"Cracker had a trick," Phoenix picked up, "that he could perfectly imitate any sound he'd heard. We were able to get him to repeat what he'd heard when the Professor was turned to gold."

Apollo slapped his hand against his face. "Oh no," he sighed.

"Wow!" Pearl cried. "That's so clever, Mister Nick!"

"So you proved Miss Maya was innocent?" Trucy asked with a grin.

Maya laughed. "Not quite yet!" she said.

"Cracker was supposed to say 'Goldor', the name of the gold spell," Luke explained, "but instead he said 'Godoor', and at the wrong time, too!"

"He made a mistake?" Apollo thought aloud.

Phoenix shook his head. "We were just misinterpreting what he said," he continued. "There was a spell called 'Godoor', which could make a portal in any wall that was painted green."

"Oh!" Apollo suddenly cried out, remembering an earlier part of the story Phoenix had told. "The bit of green wall behind the painting!"

"Exactly!" Phoenix replied with a proud smile. "It wouldn't have been a big hole, but it was big enough to throw something through."

Maya giggled. "Do you want to try and figure this one out yourself, Apollo?" She gave him a wink. "It's good practise for when you become a lawyer yourself!"

"U-um," Apollo muttered, turning red. "I... wouldn't be very good..."

"No-one is on their first try," Phoenix pointed out, feeling sorry for Maya putting the teen on the spot. He looked down to Trucy and Pearl. "Are you two okay with stopping for a bit to let Apollo figure out what happened?"

Trucy nodded, giving her father a bright smile. "Sure!"

"I'm okay with that, Mister Nick!" Pearl added.

Luke pulled his notebook and pen out of his satchel on the floor beside him, flipping to the back page as he held it out. "You can use this if you want, Nick!"

"Ah, thank you, Luke!" Phoenix said, taking the offered items and immediately sketching a small map on the paper.

For the next ten minutes or so, Phoenix carefully walked Apollo through the case.

"So the butler did it, right?"

"Hmm... You want to call him to the stand? What do you want to ask him? Keep in mind, only girls can be witches."

"Um... if he's actually a girl?"

"Good idea. He won't answer you though, not yet. First, you have to show a logical connection between him and the murder."

To Apollo's credit, Luke thought he did very well, considering he was essentially being asked to guess what Phoenix had done.

"Alright then, Greyerl admits, yes, she's actually a girl."

"I knew it!"

"But, she's been watching the trial and knows you don't have any actual evidence, so she's going to leave."
"What!? But-! How do you solve the case without-!?"

"Exactly. What do you do to keep her on the stand, Apollo?"

Especially since Phoenix was playing it like it was a game rather than a retelling of actual events.

"Greyerl says a neighbour helped her break down the door."

"Wait, a neighbour? Who's this neighbour?"

"... Congratulations, you've just called Emeer Punchenbaug to the stand."

Trucy and Pearl also loved throwing in their own ideas, wanting to join in on the 'game'.

"Ms Mailer says she dropped by to pick up a very important letter she was told would be ready, and once she found it, she left again to deliver it."

"Oh wait, Luke and the Professor had that letter they found in the Storyteller's place, didn't they Daddy?"

"The blank one? Why would Belduke deliver a blank letter?"

"Was it magic disappearing ink, Mister Nick?"

"Hey, I'm supposed to be working this out!"

Eventually though, the fun wound down and the sad truth of Jean Greyerl's story came out.

"Greyerl also saw Belduke's letter, and glimpsed the words 'truth' and 'witch', among other things. She thought he was planning to out her to the Storyteller himself, so she pulled out her Talea Magica and created a portal behind his desk specifically to steal it, swapping the real letter for the blank sheets Luke and the Professor found. When she saw Belduke's head leaned back on his chair, fast asleep, she was overcome with anger at his betrayal, and choked him to death."

"So... she did do it?"

"... Luke, would you like to take over here?"

Luke watched the faces of his siblings and Pearl as he told them of Greyerl's reading of her master's letter, and of how, once Belduke's suicide came out and Maya's name was cleared, Phoenix fought for Greyerl to not be punished, as she hadn't actually done anything as a witch. Trucy and Pearl cried out in shock when Espella gave herself up in her place, and Luke even spotted Maya and Phoenix repeatedly giving each other looks as the story edged closer and closer to the moment of truth.

"And then, still trapped in that terrible cage," the teen narrated, intensity in his tone, "Maya dropped like a stone into the flame pit, burning alive!"

Trucy and Pearl gasped, clinging to Phoenix.

"That's bullsh- er, bull crap!" Apollo cried, hesitating only to keep from swearing in front of his father and young sister. "Maya's sitting right there, she's clearly not dead!"

Maya gave him a cheeky grin. "Who's to say for sure? I could be long dead and just being channelled by another talented spirit medium right now!"

Pearl was holding her hands over her mouth, looking worried. "Mystic Maya, I don't remember you mentioning this part when you told the story to me before!"

"Don't worry, Pearls," Phoenix assured her, hugging her close. "I promise you there's a happy ending."

"Besides," Apollo angrily continued, having not noticed Pearl's quiet outburst, "the last time Luke told us a story, I pointed out repeatedly that there's no such thing as time travel in real life, and you know what? Future London, future Luke, future Professor... All of it was a hoax!"

"Hey, spoilers!" Maya protested, hands on her hips. Luke looked away awkwardly as he very deliberately continued to not bring up Claire. Trucy crossed her arms, giving her oldest brother a glare. "I just realised... ! You know what you're doing?" she asked. "You're asking to jump to the end!"

Surprised out of his anger, Apollo looked over to his sister. "Huh?"

"You heard me!" Trucy shot back. "You keep demanding answers, and forgetting that the answers are at the end of a story!" She wagged a finger at him. "So shut up and listen! We'll get to the end when Luke says so! Not you!"

Apollo was too shocked to respond. Luke waited a moment before deciding to break the silence and continue the story. As he described Barnham taking pity on them and telling them where to go, he cast the occasional glance over to Phoenix, who was similarly casting glances at Maya (who was herself listening intently to a part of the story she hadn't been present for). The teen carefully skipped over how Espella and Phoenix had been badly grieving Maya's loss, and hoped the missing part of the story wasn't noticed by his small audience. He didn't want to dwell on how terrible the experience had been for them at the time.

"Rouge let us stay the night in a spare room upstairs," Luke narrated, "and we decided that, since Espella's trial was going to be tomorrow evening, we'd have to work all the harder the next day."

Maya frowned in concern. "You didn't have any trouble sleeping that night?"

Luke shrugged. "We were fine," he insisted, dodging eye contact and trying not to look in Phoenix's direction.

Trucy's eyes subtly widened as she picked up the lie and assumed the worst. Apollo, however, frowned. "What, did you have nightmares or something?"

"Leave it, Apollo," Phoenix warned.

"What?" Apollo asked, part confused and part annoyed.

"Just leave it."

Apollo quietened as Luke continued the story. Phoenix only half-listened, distracted by the memory of that terrible night that he had never spoken about to anyone, except only to say it had been the worst experience of his life (until Hazakura Temple beat it out, of course). He could see the telltale Psyche-Locks that indicated Luke was hiding something, and knew they were best left alone. 'They'll be about how he was awake when I got back to the room, I'd say,' he told himself. 'We all needed a little healing time to ourselves that night.'
View the Court Record/Luke’s Notebook
It had been a hectic morning, the younger children all waking up at the crack of dawn and Luke excitedly leading the way as the four children rushed to open their gifts. They only had one each (not counting chocolates from Santa or Trucy’s craft-work), but everyone was happy with what they had and, wrapped up in their new scarves Trucy had made for everyone, the kids headed out into the cold air to see if they could find any Christmas snow.

Pearl chewed a thumbnail nervously as she led the way down the road to the nearby river, pastel pink scarf hung loosely around her neck. "I don't know if we'll find anything," she admitted. "It hasn't been that cold this year."

Trucy huffed, pulling her cape tightly around herself despite the layers she had on beneath it. "Snowy Christmases are funner," she muttered.

"'Funner' isn't a word," Luke pointed out, hands in his trouser pockets and a light blue scarf around his neck.

Trailing at the back of the group, Apollo looked up from the phone in his hands, the present he had received that morning. "Good. You guys would just give yourselves frostbite anyway," he called through the red scarf pulled over the bottom half of his face. "Dad'd kill me."

Trucy looked back at her eldest brother, one eyebrow raised. "Why are you following us if you don't even want to play?"

"I have to watch you, don't I?" Apollo pointed out. "Dad and Maya are busy enough without you guys causing trouble."

"We don't cause trouble!" Trucy protested. "Besides, you're watching your phone, not us!"

Luke and Pearl gave each other a look.

Apollo shot Trucy a smirk, looking up from his phone. "You're not causing trouble yet, are you?"

"You're trouble!" Trucy quickly replied, sticking her tongue out for good measure. "And boring!"

"Thought hard about that one, did we?" Apollo said with a smile, looking back down to his phone. "Besides, I'm not done setting this up yet."

Trucy huffed for a moment. "You're a set-up!" she quietly retorted.

Apollo snorted, but didn't reply.

Suddenly, Pearl stopped, throwing up an arm to keep her friends from passing her. "We have to look somewhere else," she calmly announced.

"Why?" Trucy asked, before looking ahead of them and instantly seeing the answer to her question. "Oh."
The four kids locked their gazes on a large brown bear not far ahead of them, leaning up against a tree and sniffing at the bark. Unseen by the others, Luke's face instantly lit up.

Apollo tensed up, slipping his phone into a pocket. "Great, just our luck to run into a bear that isn't hibernating. If we just turn and leave, will it notice us?"

Pearl shook her head, still focussing on the bear. "They're pretty calm, especially in winter. If we don't disturb it, it will ignore us."

"Woooow!" Trucy sighed, hands clasped together in excitement. "I've never seen a wild bear before! It's so close!"

Luke grinned. "Do you want to meet her?" he asked.

Apollo gave his brother a stern frown. "What are you talking about?"

"I've always dreamed of getting to pet a bear!" Trucy replied, ignoring Apollo, then sighed with longing. "I'll never get to, but I've always wanted to!"

"Luke, what are you planning?" Apollo insisted, crossing his arms and still glaring at his brother.

Luke gave Apollo a shrug, then walked right past Pearl and towards the bear.

"Wait, you shouldn't do that!" Pearl cried, but was kept from following him by Apollo's hand on her shoulder.

"Luke, get back here!" Apollo demanded.

Ignoring the cries of his brother and friend, Luke strode up to within a metre or two of the wild bear, who dropped back down to all fours to watch the approaching teen, softly growling under her breath. Luke tipped his cap. "I don't mean to bother you, Missus Bear," he said. "My name is Luke. I was just wondering if you had some time to spare for a quick favour."

"Luke, what are you doing!?" Apollo cried.

The bear paused for a moment, then stepped closer to Luke, sniffing at his winter coat. The teen smiled calmly as she pushed her nose into his chest, then watched her step back, making snuffling sounds through her nose.

"Oh, thank you!" Luke said. "It's my little sister, you see. She was admiring you and I was wondering if you would let her come and see you up close." He scratched behind an ear, embarrassed. "She was also hoping to get to pet you, but I can tell her not to if you like."

The bear sat on her haunches, and made a few more snuffling sounds in Luke's direction.

"Really?" Luke asked, smiling. "Thank you so much! I'll go and get her!" He turned and casually walked back towards his friends, grinning in self-satisfaction as he registered the three were all giving him distinct variants of a dead stare; Pearl was watching him in confusion, while Apollo was glaring, and Trucy had her mouth open in a massive smile. Luke held out his hand to Trucy. "She's going to let you pat her, Truce!"

Trucy's grin somehow got even wider, and, after only a moment's pause, she bounced to Luke's side, taking his hand. As Apollo and Pearl looked on, too shocked to speak, Luke led Trucy down the path to where the bear sat, watching them approach. Trucy hung behind Luke a little, nervousness overcoming her excitement the closer they got.
Luke stopped in front of the bear, closer than he had been before, and gently pulled Trucy forward to his side. "Missus Bear, this is my sister Trucy. Trucy, this is Missus Bear."

The bear leaned forward, sniffing at Trucy as the young girl giggled. Emboldened by the animal's interest in her, Trucy slowly reached out a hand, and was surprised when the bear moved her head into it in silent permission to let the girl pet her fur.

Luke grinned, leaning in close to his sister. "She says it's nice to meet you," he told her.

Trucy giggled again, gently rubbing her hand back and forth along the top of the bear's head. "It's nice to meet you too, Missus Bear!" she said. After a moment, she bit her lip in thought and withdrew her hand. "Thank you very much!" she told the animal.

The bear nodded once, made some snuffling sounds in Luke's direction, then turned and lumbered off into the forest.

Trucy watched the bear leave in amazement and, the instant it disappeared, squealed loudly, dropping Luke's hand and running back down the path to Pearl and Apollo. "I GOT TO PET A BEAR!"

Fey Manor

Guest Room 1

"Quickeest?" Phoenix asked with a grin. "Really?"

Maya laughed as she watched her friend carefully rewrapping the mug she had bought him in the mounds of bubble wrap it had arrived with. "Well, even fathers of triplets usually have to wait nine months!" she pointed out.

Phoenix shook his head. His gift, a joint effort of Maya and Pearl on the behalf of his three children, was a blue mug proudly emblazoned with "World's Best Dad" on one side... only "Best" was crossed out and "Quickeest" written underneath in black marker. "I'm not the only adoptive father in the world, you know," he replied, trying to sound stern despite his smile. "It's usual to have to wait a few weeks for everything to become official."

"And how many adoptive fathers adopt three kids in five months?" Maya said with a giggle, hands on her hips. Over the top of her usual purple kimono was a hot pink sweater, the logo for the Pink Princess plastered across the front, and Maya wore her gift gleefully despite Phoenix's teasing on the bright colours it boasted. Around her neck she had hung the white scarf Trucy made for her, the ends dangling down towards the floor she was currently sitting on.

"Closer to six," Phoenix corrected, carefully packing the wrapped mug into his suitcase, which was lying on the floor between where the two were seated. "I started the process for Trucy in April and Apollo and Luke's adoption wasn't finalised until-"

"DAAAAAAD!"
The pair looked up to the door as they heard the shout. Phoenix frowned. "Apollo?" he called back, mentally debating whether he should get up or not. Apollo's tone didn't sound urgent, but he wasn't sure he wanted to risk being wrong. "What is it?"

There was a pounding on the floor that got closer and closer, and Phoenix and Maya stood up just in time for an upset Apollo to appear in the doorway, hands on the frame as he leaned in. "Did you know Luke can talk to animals!?" the teen cried.

Phoenix couldn't resist a sigh of relief, sharing a glance with Maya as the pair laughed. "That's what this is about?" the spirit medium asked. "You had your father and me worried, there!"

Apollo looked horrified. "You did know!" he accused.

A quicker pair of feet thundered down the hallway, and Trucy dashed into the room under Apollo's arms, surprising the teen into jumping back away from the doorframe. "Daddy!" she cried as she ran to Phoenix's side. "Daddy, I got to pet a bear!"

"Oh?" Phoenix asked, surprised to hear there were any bears out and about in the middle of winter. "Is this Luke's doing, huh?"

"Uh-huh!" Trucy nodded, an ecstatic smile on her face. "He asked her if I could pat her, and she said yes, and then Luke took me over to meet her and I got to pet her!"

Pearl and Luke then appeared in the doorway, bypassing the irritated Apollo and running in after Trucy. Pearl ran straight to Maya's side, crying "Mystic Maya, Luke can talk to animals!"

Maya nodded, giggling as she leaned down closer to Pearl's level. "Yeah, he did it a few times while we were in Labyrinthia together!"

Apollo rolled his eyes and stomped up behind Luke, poking the younger teen's back to attract his attention. "If you were talking to animals in Labyrinthia," he said, "why exactly did you never mention it?"

Luke shrugged, smiling. "I thought it distracted from the story," he explained. "After all, all I left out was that we had a parrot friend in Future London who helped us get into Chinatown, and the secret passages we used in Labyrinthia's courthouse were something I learned about from Eve the cat!"

"And that it was your idea to ask Birdly's parrot for help during the trial," Phoenix added.

"Oh, that's all?" Apollo sarcastically asked.

Luke nodded, giving Apollo a bright grin. "More or less!"

Sighing, Apollo shook his head. "Anything else we should know about before you give me another heart attack?"

At that, Luke blushed. "Oh, sorry Apollo," he said, an apologetic smile on his face. "I didn't mean to scare you before. Can you forgive me?"

Apollo was surprised for a moment, before finally relaxing and returning the smile. "Yeah, I'm fine."
"So Apollo, Nick tells me you were a member of his fanclub!"

Apollo snorted in surprise, fighting to keep from either spitting out his mouthful of curry or forcing it up his nose from shock.

Pearl gasped in surprise from her seat next to Trucy. "You were!?

Around the low table, sitting on traditional Japanese floor cushions, the rest of the Wright family laughed, watching Apollo sputter and swallow his food. The teen shot a glare at Maya. "You couldn't have waited until my mouth was empty!?

Maya shrugged apologetically. "Heh, sorry," she apologised, then reached across the table to pat his shoulder. "I was just going to ask what your username was. We might have talked!"

"Yeah!" Pearl added, eagerly nodding. "What was your name?"

Apollo thought a moment, frowning curiously. "You were members, too?" he asked.

Trucy jumped in her seat as a thought occurred to her. "Miss Maya, you should tell Polly what your name was, too!" she instructed, then tapped Pearl beside her. "You too, Pearly!"

Maya grinned proudly, arms straight as she leaned on her crossed legs. "Oh, you know, Pearly and I were only Precious-Fairy and My-Fairy." She tossed her head, briefly throwing her fringe above her. "You might have heard of us."

Luke frowned. "Wait, weren't those the usernames of...?

Phoenix, sat next to Maya, hid a snicker behind a hand.

"You founded it!?

Phoenix couldn't resist a laugh. "Once you told me about them when we first met," he explained, "I asked Maya about it." He smirked. "It was quite a shock to me, too. For different reasons, though."

"We had to leave though," Pearl sadly explained, "after Mystic Misty died. We didn't have the time."

Apollo nodded. "Uh, yeah, I remember BlackbirdLuck took over near the end." He then frowned as something occurred to him. "Wait, are you talking about that weird case Dad had in February?"

Maya smiled sadly. "What do you think?" she asked.

"Wait," Luke spoke up, hand gingerly raised. "She was your mother, right? That you and Nick were telling me about?"

"BlackbirdLuck..." Phoenix interrupted, musing to himself. "That's Maggey, right?"
Maya gave Phoenix a nod. "She offered to take over, and once we'd recognised who each other was, I left her to it."

Apollo and Luke gave each other a glance as they realised the subject of Misty's murder was off-limits.

Pearl sighed, turning to Trucy and explaining "I don't know if you've heard, but the fanclub doesn't exist anymore."

"Yeah, I heard," Trucy sadly replied, then crossed her arms and frowned. "I don't know why, though! If there were so many fans of Daddy's, why did they just believe everything the papers said?"

"I don't know about anyone else," Apollo spoke up, "but there were a bunch of us who were posting in the forum that didn't believe it." He shrugged. "But, the people who did outnumbered us, and essentially harassed everyone who was left until Blackbird shut the whole thing down. She said she used to be a cop, and even murderers were more decent than the haters that took over."

Luke picked at his food with his fork. "That's a shame," he said. "Couldn't those of you who believed in Nick stay in touch?"

Apollo shrugged. "Some people probably did. But, well, I was a bit scared to try. When people heard how old I was, they always refused and told me not to, so I'd given up."

Maya tapped her cheek in thought. "Maggey might still be in touch with some people," she said, then broke out into a grin. "Oh yeah, you haven't told me what your username was yet!"

Apollo blushed. "Uh..."

"Yeah!" Pearl cried, hands clapped together in an imitation of her cousin. "Tell us your name, Apollo!"

Staring at his plate, Apollo turned beet red. "teelyustisoveh," he mumbled.

"Can't hear you," Phoenix replied, grinning.

"SteelJusticeLover," Apollo repeated, louder this time.

"Yeah, I think I remember you!" Maya cheerfully announced. "You were one of the local kids who'd been to some of Nick's trials!" She then smirked. "Oh, and weren't you one of the Steel Samurai fans, too?"

Apollo didn't reply, still too embarrassed of his old username.

Pearl was still deep in thought. "Were you the person who had to use a school computer all the time, and someone else got into your account once?"

"Clay," Apollo said. "I asked him to watch my computer while I ran to get something, and he decided to prank me by posting something on my account."

"I'll give you Maggey's number later," Maya promised Apollo as she returned to her food. "She might be able to get you back in touch with some people!"
As much as the Wright children had enjoyed getting to spend time in Kurain with Maya and Pearl, all too soon the time to part had come. Trucy and Pearl compared a few last notes on what they hoped to get out of the books they each had received as Christmas presents (Pearl's a fantasy novel and Trucy's a guide book on homemade plush toys), while Luke and Apollo were hurriedly copying Maya's number into their brand new phones, promising to keep in touch via texts. Apollo was also taking the chance to copy down Maggey's number, eager to see if she still knew any of his old online friends.

Phoenix ran his eyes around the room to check his children and all their belongings were present, then glanced at his watch. "Five minutes till the bus comes," he noted aloud, then walked over to Maya, interrupting her from her conversation with the boys. "We'd better head outside so we don't miss it."

Maya sadly nodded, biting her lip to keep from tearing up. "I'm gonna miss you!" she cried, throwing her arms around Phoenix, although it wasn't clear if she was referring to the whole Wright family or Phoenix alone with her statement. "You need to come back sometime soon, okay?"

"As soon as we can!" Phoenix promised, giving her a quick hug. "We need to get moving, though." He pulled his beanie out of his hoodie pocket and pulled it over his head.

"Oh!" Maya cried, and she waved to Trucy to gather the Wright children around her. "Kids! I have something very important to tell you before you all go!"

"I'm not a kid," Apollo grumbled, stuffing his new phone into a pocket while Luke and Trucy gave each other confused glances. Pearl watched curiously from Maya's side.

Maya cleared her throat, then fixed the trio with a stern glare. "It's vitally important you never mention me or Pearly to anyone outside Kurain, okay? Actually, don't mention Kurain itself at all, got it?"

"Being Master of the Kurain Channelling Technique is a very dangerous job to hold," Maya continued, keeping up her stern façade. Luckily for her, this explanation was not technically a lie. "If you let it loose to anyone that you know me, no matter how trustworthy they seem, they may mention it to someone else, and then you would be putting yourselves in danger. Do you understand?"

There was a short pause as the trio digested the dire warning. "We will," Luke and Trucy promised, while Apollo nodded his head vigorously. "Not a word to anyone," Luke added.

Maya kept up her stern glare for a few moments more until she was sure she'd scared the kids enough, then she smiled at them. "Thank you. Now, you have fun on your way home, and be good for your dad, huh?"

Phoenix, standing by the door as he watched for the bus, gave the group a warning cry: "I think I see the bus coming!"

"We'll be good!" Trucy promised Maya, and the family dashed about to gather their bags, running out the door and into the bus stop just as the vehicle was approaching the Kurain Boulder. Maya and Pearl close behind them.

Maya gave Phoenix one last hug. "Keep in touch," she insisted.

"Why wouldn't I?" Phoenix asked with a smile, returning the hug, then pulling the bus tickets out of his jeans pocket. "I'll text you once we get home."

Maya and Pearl waved as the Wright family got onto the empty bus, which took off again to turn around and putter back in the direction of the train station. Neither of the spirit mediums stopped until the bus was well and truly out of sight.

Pearl gave Maya a hug as the older cousin sighed. "Don't worry, Mystic Maya," she said, "Mister Nick and Apollo and Luke and Trucy will come back."

"You bet they will," Maya replied, giving Pearl a grin before tightly hugging her back, rubbing her forehead against her younger cousin's. "Nick's an honorary Fey, remember? He'll never be too far away from us."

Hi, you don't know me, but my name is Apollo Wright. I used to be a member of the Phoenix Wright fan club when it was still online, I was steeljusticelover, and Maya gave me your number because she thinks you might still be in touch with other members of the fan club. If I have the wrong number, please feel free to ignore me.

Hey there SJL! Or should I say Apollo? ;) Maya told me about you! Yeah, I'm still in touch with a whole bunch of people. We actually started up a second, private forum to get away from the haters, since they'd so overrun the old one and we couldn't find a better way for all of us to keep in touch. If you give me your email, I can send you an invite to join up? I'll keep a look out for you and get your account certified. You must be pretty proud to have been adopted by the one and only Phoenix Wright, huh? ;) Detective Gumshoe told me quite a bit about you as well! - Maggey Byrde aka BlackbirdLuck

Yeah, it was a bit of a surprise meeting Dad the way I did. I've kinda gotten used to it tho, since I live with him now and all. My email is ajustice@siriusturner.edu and I look forward to the invite! Thank you Blackbird, I really appreciate this! Wow, you know Gumshoe? Was he in the club or something?

And your invite is sent! I'll look out for you on the forum! Oh, and you're very welcome SJL ;) Detective Gumshoe wasn't in the fan club, he's just a good friend of mine!

Thread: Hey guys

steeljusticelover [CERTIFIED USER], 01/02/2020 10:33:35AM

Hi everyone, steeljusticelover here! I don't know how many of you remember me, but I was on the old forum too. I ran into My-Fairy and Precious-Fairy on a vacation and they got me in touch with Blackbird, so here I am again! How’s everyone been doing since the old forum closed?

CelestialImpacts, 01/02/2020 12:02:26AM

Hello there, stranger! I think I remember you, actually. You're 14, aren't you? You were one of the kids trying to sign up for the IRL meetups that we had to decline?

Oh, and how are the Fairys doing? We haven't heard from them much except for Blackbird saying they've been really busy at their new jobs.
steeljusticelover [CERTIFIED USER], 01/02/2020 12:12:14AM

15 now, actually. And yeah, I lost touch with everyone here because I figured no-one wanted to get to know a minor. I mean, I get why I suppose, it was just disheartening to lose touch with everyone because I'm still young.

The Fairys are doing great, even though they're really busy! They're not nearly as refined irl tho.

Pocky-Hockey, 01/02/2020 03:17:57PM

Yooo SJL! Wasn't expecting one of the literal babies to make it here with us! Hey, why's Blackbird certified you? Did you somehow manage to befriend Mr Wright while you were away? I suppose that's how you ran into the Fairys, huh?

Thunderdome, 01/02/2020 03:58:09PM

Welcome back, SJL! I don't think I remember you, but I'm looking forward to getting to know you now we're such a smaller group! I hope the trolls didn't get to you too bad before the old forum closed down.

What do you mean, "the Fairys are refined"? I remember My-Fairy being the goofiest when it came to Steel Samurai arguments! xD Precious tho, she was a real refined lady, despite her terrible typing skills. I'm glad to hear they're both doing well.

CelestialImpacts, 01/02/2020 04:36:48PM

Pocky, just befriending Mr Wright doesn't necessarily make you certified. Blackbird would be the better person to ask on that. I'm more curious as to why we're still doing the 'certified' thing when Mr Wright isn't a lawyer anymore. We don't have trial announcements, so why do we need to know whose word can be trusted?

SJL, don't worry about it. You managed to find your way back here, after all. We'll be your online friends until you're old enough to come to a meetup... whenever we end up next holding one, of course.

steeljusticelover [CERTIFIED USER], 01/02/2020 05:24:31AM

Sort of, Pocky. I'm actually friends with one of his sons. You guys heard about that, right? But yeah, as Celestial said, I don't know why we're still doing the certified thing. I didn't realise that was what Blackbird was talking about when she sent me the invite.

Thank you, Thunderdome! No, I didn't post much after those guys took over. I think they were happy to ignore me as long as I didn't contribute to any discussions. And thank you to Celestial as well. It'll be great meeting old friends again and making new ones too.

(I guess I forgot My-Fairy was such a Samurai fan. I should have used that opportunity when I had it to finish some of the arguments we had about it... although not in my dad's hearing, because he would have totally mocked me for it, I just know it.)

BlackbirdLuck [CERTIFIED USER] [ADMIN], 01/02/2020 08:58:13PM

Hey, glad you made it here, SJL! Welcome back!

As SJL said, he's been certified because he actually has a much closer connection to Mr Wright now than I do, rivalling the Fairys' connection to him. I guess it didn't occur to me that we may not need the 'certified' system anymore, but I'm keeping it, for now at least. After all, what if Mr Wright manages to prove he was framed and gets his badge back? We're gonna want to know, right? Besides, Dime is certified for her connection to Global Studios, not Mr Wright, so it's not like that's the only thing we've certified people for.

Don't worry SJL, I passed on that Mr Wright had adopted two boys once My-Fairy told me about it. Do you know why he suddenly did that? We had this massive argument on possible reasons and everything before I had to close it for people crossing lines. You can probably find the thread easily, if you want.

Dime_Quarters [CERTIFIED USER] [MOD], 01/03/2020 06:46:25AM

Wow I thought we had everyone who was gonna make it across already! Welcome back, Steel! Always great to see another of the Samurai fans back in the team!

I would be totally fine if we abolished the 'certified' system btw. I was only ever in this group for the friends I made here, thanks to My-Fairy inviting me in when she started it up. (No offence to Mr Wright, he's a nice guy)

steeljusticelover [CERTIFIED USER], 01/03/2020 07:39:50AM

Hey Dime! Great to see you again!

(Blackbird: My dad would more make fun of me for getting into a heated argument over it. My sister and I found tapes of the show in his office that we watch when we're bored, so he already knows we watch it. Not sure how they got there, tho)

As for why Mr Wright adopted them, I do know that one of them was an existing friend who was suddenly orphaned, so Mr Wright took him in. The other one, I really can't say. My best guess is, he just liked him... or pitied him. Maybe a mix of both.

I'll skip on reading that thread you mentioned. It looks massive.

Pocky-Hockey, 01/03/2020 09:10:43AM

Wooooow that's cool! And I'm not being sarcastic either, I'm genuinely impressed here. What are his kids names btw? You'd know, since you're friends with one of them.
BlackbirdLuck [CERTIFIED USER] [ADMIN], 01/03/2020 11:22:03AM

Pocky, we already discussed that we weren't going to invade Mr Wright's privacy or the privacy of his children. It's in the rules, and one of the reasons we closed the thread discussing them. Consider this your first warning.

SJL, I hope the other son is okay with what you've said. Is that what he told you himself?

(I've started a new thread to discuss the pros and cons of keeping or abolishing the 'certified' system, for anyone who hasn't seen it yet)

ForgotMeKnot, 01/03/2020 02:07:16PM

Is it really a breach of privacy to ask their names? I'd think we should ask SJL on his opinion, if he knows them personally. He'd know what those kids are comfortable sharing.

On that note, hi SJL. Great to see you back.

Pocky-Hockey, 01/03/2020 03:58:39PM

Exactly my point! I'd understand demanding details on their personal lives or for photos, but just asking for their names isn't crossing any kind of line I can see! It's not like we're all storming down to Wright & Co Law Offices to ask them in person.

Dime_Quarters [CERTIFIED USER] [MOD], 01/03/2020 05:47:25AM

Do we have to start another thread to have this discussion? Honestly, arguing borders feels iffy to me, because it feels it would be very easy to decide you deserve their names, then that you deserve photos, and then more and more details on them from there. That's how celebrity gossip chains got started, isn't it? Also, anything we get from Steel is secondhand, and since when do kids honestly know or appreciate an appropriate privacy filter? No offence, Steel.

Also, Steel, it feels really mean to that 'other' son to say he was adopted because Mr Wright pitied him. I certainly hope you're repeating something he told you himself and not jumping to your own conclusions. And if it is something he said himself, give that kid a hug from me and tell him to talk about it with Mr Wright. You can't let that kind of negative thought fester and ruin a relationship.

BlackbirdLuck [CERTIFIED USER] [ADMIN], 01/03/2020 09:36:50PM

I propose we not demand ANY details from SJL and leave it to him to offer any information he has made certain the Wrights are comfortable with. Mr Wright knows you're a member of the fanclub, right SJL? I seem to remember MyF mentioning that.
Alright Blackbird, that sounds good with me.
I hope we haven't scared you off, SJL. You still there?

Not everyone is able to reply immediately, Knot. Isn't SJL the one who could only get on the forum through school computers? I don't think schools are back yet, so he might be having trouble getting online.

Steel! Great to see you again! I thought we'd lost you to the haters there! It's not quite as grand as it once was, but welcome back to the PW fanclub forum!

You may notice I'm not a mod anymore. We had to cut down on the discussion boards since there are so few of us now.

Fine fine, I'll go with the suggestion Blackbird made. Still dying of curiosity over here, tho.

You sure you can't tell us anything, SJL?

Sorry I took so long to reply, been busy.

At this point, I'm not going to say anything more about the Wrights. And Blackbird, Dime, I was repeating something he told me. Don't worry, he's going to go over it with his dad. He appreciates the advice. :)

We have a couple of home computers, but they belong to Dad and they're ancient. My brother and our best friend head out to the library sometimes to book time on the computers there. Usually though, we just use our school laptops, but they're a little old and we have to return 'em over summer.

Hey Liz! Don't worry, I've always been loyal to Mr Wright. :) The forum may not be as crowded as it used to be, but that just means we'll all be closer as friends, right? Also, he only found out about this place through me, so he knows I'm a part of it, don't worry.

That's good to hear, Steel. I hope your friend feels better after talking about it with him.
I don't remember you bringing up your family before, now I think about it. I guess it's easier to talk about personal stuff with a smaller group, huh?

Mr Wright didn't know about this place before!? I always thought he did!

Thunderdome, 01/04/2020 08:09:59PM

It's not like he'd know we've reformed, tho. We're deliberately keeping this one a secret.

ForgotMeKnot, 01/04/2020 08:41:15PM

I'd always thought it was originally called 'semi-official' precisely because he DIDN'T know. MyF and Precious were close friends of his or something, weren't they? I always assumed MyF started the club because she OBVIOUSLY had a massive crush on him, and kept it a secret because she was embarrassed about it.

Oh, but this is all grown-up talk. Ignore us old fogeys, SJL. You're the baby of the group now, so we're gonna look after you, okay? :)

steeljusticelover [CERTIFIED USER], 01/04/2020 08:50:59PM

Just because I'm the youngest, doesn't make me a child. :| I'm the oldest in my family, not counting my dad.

(and Precious would totally agree with you on MyF having a crush)

Liztropical, 01/04/2020 08:52:34PM

Hey, no smacktalking about the Fairys! If MyF says there was nothing between them, there was nothing between them!

Steel, don't you have school tomorrow? I'd say that makes you the baby of the forum on its own! ;)

steeljusticelover [CERTIFIED USER], 01/04/2020 09:04:29PM

You guys are as bad as my dad and sister. :|

Chapter End Notes

Aside from Apollo and Maggey, there are two other Ace Attorney characters hiding behind the above usernames. Both are from the original trilogy, and they should be easy to spot by looking at the online handles I gave them.
(I hope you guys don’t mind me doing something a little different for this chapter, too)
"Dad... can we talk?"

"Sure, what about?"

"Um... privately?"

Phoenix gestured Apollo into his bedroom and closed the door behind them. Apollo was looking nervous, right hand clutched to his left elbow while his left hand dangled down against his thigh, pulled into a tight fist as he resisted crossing his arms. He stood awkwardly by the door, eyes darting around the room, and it occurred to Phoenix that neither of the boys had really set foot in his room before.

Clearing his throat, Phoenix gestured to the bed, stepping forward as if to demonstrate. "Wanna sit down?"

Apollo nodded, and followed his father to the side of the unmade single bed. They sat on its edge as one, but Apollo kept his gaze focussed on the floor, studying the beige carpet.

There was a short, awkward silence. "So," Phoenix spoke up, hands clasped together in his lap, "what did you want to talk about?"

The teen stayed quiet a few more moments, gathering his thoughts. "Dad," he mumbled, staring at the carpet, "why did you decide to adopt me?"

Phoenix was too shocked to respond for a second. "'Why'?
he repeated.

Apollo only nodded in answer.

"Well..." Phoenix muttered, reaching up with one hand to rub the back of his head uncertainly. "That's a tough question." He then frowned, giving his son a curious stare. "Why'd you wait so long to ask?"

"I was just thinking, is all," Apollo insisted. "You barely knew me... not like you knew Luke."

Phoenix mentally waved away the image of the Psyche-Lock as it popped up around his son, deciding the real answer was 'it's personal'. "I knew enough," he said, resting a hand on Apollo's shoulder. "You got along well with Trucy, and with Luke. You clearly didn't object to me."

Apollo slowly turned his head to look up at Phoenix.

"Luke even said at the time, the two of you and your friend Clay obviously didn't want to be separated," Phoenix continued, "although it looked like you seemed to think that was happening anyway." He took in a deep breath and sighed, giving his son a smile. "I knew from that first meeting you were an outstanding, dedicated young man, and, if it was at all possible, I was going to be making room for you here... if you wanted to accept it, of course."

Apollo stared at Phoenix for a few quiet moments, seemingly studying him for any hint of a lie. "It wasn't because you pitied me?"

At that, Phoenix almost laughed in surprise, removing his hand from Apollo's shoulder. 'No, no, serious face, serious face!' "What? Of course not!" he cried, incredulously. "Why would you-?" He then frowned as the events of that first Saturday they had spent together ran back through his mind, and he remembered how the two of them had discussed Apollo's bracelet while Luke and Trucy were otherwise occupied. Grimacing, he added, "Oh... actually, I can see why you thought that."

Apollo briefly glanced away, looking uncomfortable.

"I'm so sorry, Apollo," Phoenix said, moving his arm back up to hold Apollo in a sideways hug. "I should really have talked it over with you at some point. I didn't think at all about how you would have seen it."

"Mmm," Apollo mumbled, and Phoenix thought he saw a hint of tears in the corners of Apollo's eyes before the teen threw his face into Phoenix's chest, clinging to him in a tight hug. "Thank you, Dad. For everything."

Phoenix couldn't resist a smile at the brief moment of deja-vu, and returned the hug. "You're very welcome. You know what we need, though?"

"What?" Apollo's muffled voice responded.

Grinning, Phoenix's gaze turned to a deck of cards on his bedside table. "How much do you know about poker?"

January 5, 7:06PM

Borscht Bowl Club

On the one hand, Apollo was glad he'd taken the advice of his online friends and brought up his concerns with Phoenix as to why he'd been adopted. They'd talked, hugged it out and that was that.

"A pro watches their opponent's body language for any 'tells', ticks in their movements that give away if they have a good or a bad hand."

On the other hand, now Apollo was being introduced to his father's real job... the hard way. And the fact that Trucy hadn't been exaggerating when she described how badly Phoenix played piano wasn't helping.

"Trucy's quite good at it, so she's been along and helped me out a few times. Since you share her ability, I think you'll have no trouble spotting them yourself."

"Isn't that cheating, though?"

"Nope. Besides, I don't think I'll be needing help for any games that happen tonight. This is just for you to practise."

Apollo sat at the table next to the grand piano, forehead on the bare wood and hands over his ears. It didn't do much to block the discordant plinks and plonks of Phoenix's fingers on the white keys (he didn't seem to bother even aiming for the black ones), but Apollo couldn't resist trying anyway.

"You holding up over there, Apollo?" Phoenix asked, a smile on his face. "Sorry to stick you with the worst table in the house."

Apollo looked up. "Worst?"

"It's next to the piano," Phoenix pointed out with a grin.

Apollo rolled his eyes, dropping his head back on the table's surface. "Of course," he mumbled. 'At least Dad's aware he's a terrible pianist...'

Phoenix laughed. "You do remember we discussed things you could do to keep yourself occupied if you're bored?" He gestured to the black backpack on the floor by Apollo's feet. "You've got my old work tablet in there, some books to read..."

"Yeah, yeah," Apollo replied, reluctantly sitting up to stare down at the bag. Running through the mental list of what had been packed as his 'anti-boredom supplies', he had to admit it was the tablet computer that intrigued him the most. Luke had spoken briefly of what was in their father's old 'Court Record' when he had briefly used it, and Apollo remembered hearing that there seemed to still be evidence lists from some of Phoenix's past trials. Mind made up, the teen reached into the backpack and dug through it until he found the thin tablet computer, turning it on as he pulled it into his lap.

"Password's 'x-mas list', no spaces," Phoenix said.

Apollo blinked in surprise as he looked up at his father, who was still tapping away at the piano. "What?"

"X-mas list," Phoenix repeated, shooting a quick grin as his son. "All lowercase except for a capital L, no spaces or punctuation." He chuckled. "Don't worry, I change it up all the time. Force of habit."

It took a moment for the intended message to register in Apollo's brain. "Oh. Thanks." Returning to the computer in his lap, he carefully tapped out the password on the onscreen keyboard.

Phoenix smiled from his seat on the piano stool, clumsily attempting one of the few tunes Maya had tried to teach him in the many quiet weeks they shared between cases. He had very quickly stopped being self-conscious about his total lack of talent when it came to music, especially with his new boss assuring him "The worse you play, the more people wish to play poker, da?" It had certainly already proven to be an asset at times, helping persuade the occasional wary challenger to fortify their nerves and challenge him already just to stop the terrible death throes of once-decent music assaulting their ears.

It was quite a stroke of luck, finding the Borscht Bowl Club. After adopting Trucy, Phoenix knew his one chance to clear his name lay with finding her birth father, Shadi "Zak Gramarye" Enigmar. Given Enigmar's... unique method of choosing an attorney, the former lawyer figured his best bet to find him was on the poker circuit, and had thus thrown himself into researching the oftentimes underground community of not-quite-gamblers. Bolstered by his win over Enigmar, Phoenix had walked into the Borscht Bowl Club (it was the closest to his home and thus first on his list) and talked himself up to the owner as 'unbeatable', putting his absolute best bluffing face on. By some miracle, he easily won the two games the owner challenged him to, and was immediately hired. He attributed the fact that he still had yet to lose to both his usual dumb luck and Trucy's occasional 'help'. Plus, the longer his winning streak continued, the more agreeable the boss was towards ensuring his best asset was treated well.

The door of the small restaurant opened and closed, and a tall man with blond hair spilling over his shoulder in a twisted ponytail entered the room. He looked around, tugging on the cuffs of his suit jacket, before fixing his gaze on the grand piano in the corner and heading over. Phoenix resisted a smirk as he noticed Apollo was still engrossed in whatever he was reading on the screen of the Court Record, his back to the rapidly-approaching visitor.

Phoenix ended his latest attempt at a song by running his hand up and down the keys and spinning on the piano stool to face the man, throwing his arms out wide. "Kristoph!" he called, making Apollo jump and look around franticly as he noticed they had a visitor. "Been a while, hasn't it?"

"A few weeks, yes," Kristoph replied, giving Phoenix a polite but friendly smile as he reached the table. He turned to Apollo with a curious look. "I see you've brought one of your sons tonight."

"This is my eldest, Apollo," Phoenix said, gesturing to his son, before looking to the teen and gesturing to their visitor. "Apollo, this is a friend of mine, Kristoph Gavin. He's a defence attorney."

Apollo was halfway through acknowledging the man with a nod before Phoenix's words registered and he looked up at Kristoph in shock. "You're a defence attorney!?" he repeated, suddenly noticing the circular golden badge on Kristoph's lapel.

Kristoph nodded, looking down at Apollo. "Indeed I am. Do you have an interest in law?"

Apollo turned bright red, looking away. "Uh, yeah, I do," he admitted, before boldly returning his gaze upwards. "I'm gonna be a defence attorney too one day!"

"Oh?" Kristoph replied, amusement tugging at the corner of his lips. "Intending to bring honour back to the family name, are we?"

The teen was confused for only a moment before again blushing and shrinking into his chair, hugging the computer in his hands close to his chest. "Oh, uh, I guess it does look like that, doesn't it..."

Phoenix laughed. "It's a dream he's had since before we met," he explained, waving for his friend to sit. "But enough small talk, Kristoph! We have some catching up to do!" He winked. "And after that, I'm sure my son will want to grill you on the wonders of life behind the defence bench."

Apollo somehow turned even redder. "Daaaaaaad..."

Kristoph only gave Apollo a serene smile as he sat in the offered chair. "I would be glad to," he insisted.

View the Court Record
"You're not angling them right," Apollo told his sister as they sat by the small lake. "You have to throw it more like this!" He demonstrated with a wave of his arm.

Trucy frowned in thought, picking at the small pile of pebbles between them that the pair had collected together. "This is harder than it looks!" she complained, but still picked out another smooth rock and again knelt as close to the water as she dared.

"Throw it flat," Apollo instructed, rushing to crouch by her side and again imitating a throw with his own arm. "Like you're playing baseball, swinging the bat."

"I haven't played much baseball," Trucy muttered, but threw the pebble anyway. To her surprise, the small stone skipped once off the flat surface of the water before disappearing into the depths. "I did it!" she cried.

"I knew you'd manage it!" Apollo said in congratulations, grinning as he watched his sister rush back to the small pile of rocks to pick out another. "I figured this would be easy for you, since it's a kind of magic trick, in its own way."

Trucy giggled as she dropped back into a crouch at the water's edge, tongue sticking out as she prepared another throw. "And I'm the best there is at magic tricks!" she boasted, tossing her stone only to watch in disappointment as it failed to skip. "Aw..." Undeterred, she ran back for another pebble to try again.

Apollo softly laughed as he carefully leaned back and sat down properly, hugging his knees. He watched his sister in silent thought for a few moments, before softly calling, "Hey, Truce?"

"Mmm?" Trucy replied, carefully aiming her next throw over the water.

"Do..." he started to say, then paused and took a breath before continuing, "do you think Dad will be going to work tonight?"

Trucy threw her pebble, silently cheering as it skipped once before dropping into the still water. "He hasn't said anything, so I don't think so," she replied, staying put for the moment as she turned to face Apollo with a frown. "Are you going to replace me when Daddy needs help now?"

Apollo froze. "Uh..."

"'Cuz that would be awesome!" Trucy continued, grinning. "That old club is so smelly, and Daddy isn't always playing poker, so I have to sit at the table, bored stiff, and listen to Daddy's piano playing!" She rolled her eyes exaggeratedly. "It's so boring!"

Apollo blinked in surprise. "You... don't like helping Dad out?"

"Nope." Trucy shook her head, jumping to her feet and skipping to their small pile of rocks to pick out another suitable candidate for skipping. "Well, I like the actual 'helping' part, it's just the in-between I hate!"

Laughing, Apollo watched Trucy run back to the water's edge with another pebble. "How'd you end up helping him, anyway?"

"Uncle Larry and Uncle Edgeworth were too busy to babysit me this one time," Trucy explained, sitting at her brother's side. "Daddy had to bring me in to work, and he had this big important game lined up with this guy from another club who was supposed to be unbeatable." She grinned. "Daddy beat him, of course!"

"Of course," Apollo repeated with a smile.

"Anyway," Trucy continued, rubbing her fingers along the smooth edges of the pebble in her hands, "Daddy let me sit next to him, and I knew his game was important, so I thought I'd help him. I whispered to him, I said 'He's got a good hand, I can tell!' And Daddy listened to me, too!" She smiled to herself, looking at her hands. "Daddy was really surprised when we talked about it after! Every time he had a big game after that, or if no-one could babysit me, he'd ask me to come along and help. Since I'm a kid, no-one really pays any attention to what I'm doing there, anyway."

Apollo looked out over the small lake, his mind already looking back to the previous Sunday. Phoenix had had two games that night, one just after Kristoph left and one not long before they packed up to head home. As instructed, he'd focused his time on watching Phoenix's opponent, and surprised himself when he was so easily able to pick up the 'tells' Phoenix had told him about, mostly thanks to his sudden realisation midway through the match that his bracelet tightened around his wrist when said 'tells' were happening.

"That guy sure liked to tap his finger a lot..."

"Yep. Probably thought doing it all the time lessened its likelihood of being picked up."

"Are all tells that easy to notice? Like, a tapping finger slowing down or speeding up?"

"Not all of them. The best players are so difficult to read, only you and Trucy would be able to do it."

"But... how do I know if you've spotted it or not? What if I want to help you, like Trucy does?"

"... You don't."

The second visitor to challenge Phoenix was, as promised, much harder to read. Apollo had pretty quickly noticed he could feel when the guy had a good or a bad hand, but, now he had the help of his bracelet to tell him when to focus, it took him only a little longer to identify why. He remembered deciding there was no way Phoenix could have noticed the tell, then screwing up his courage to reach out and tap his father's elbow, whispering "Good hand." Phoenix had only glanced at him, giving no other visible acknowledgement of the hint, but Apollo was pretty sure he'd listened, as the rest of the game moved from a neck-and-neck tie to the outright wins Phoenix was becoming known for.

"Well done. I figured you must have spotted his tell, the way you were staring at him!"

Apollo winced, sitting back down in his chair by the piano. "Was I that obvious?"

Phoenix laughed, turning around on his stool to face the piano. "Your eyes bugged out, you were staring so hard at him!" He gave his embarrassed son a grin. "How could you tell, by the way?"
"I wasn't sure at first," Apollo admitted with a shrug, rubbing at his bracelet. "I just kept feeling like he was smiling, or frowning... then I realised, he actually was, but he hid it so quick it was barely noticeable. I only picked it up because..." He trailed off, deciding not to talk about his bracelet just yet, and smiled nervously. "I... guess I helped you, then?"

Phoenix simply smiled for a moment before reaching out and ruffling Apollo's hair, to the boy's annoyance.

Apollo frowned at the lake as one of Trucy's stones managed to skip twice before disappearing below the water, idly rubbing at the bracelet on his wrist. "What about Dad?"

"What about him?" Trucy asked, walking back to pick out another rock.

"His tells," Apollo explained, looking up to watch his sister. "We had the guy who tapped his finger and the guy who hid his expressions... but no matter how hard I watched Dad, I could never pick up what was on his mind."

Trucy paused, thoughtfully tapping the stone in her hand against the pile.

Apollo sighed, looking back out over the small lake. "He's such a different person when he plays poker. Totally unreadable. It's almost... scary, in a way."

"Daddy hides a lot more than you think," Trucy quietly said, moving to sit next to her brother and returning his confused look with a sad gaze. "He was really hurt when he couldn't be a lawyer anymore. I could see it in his eyes, all the time. Sometimes, he'd forget I was there and just stare at his office, looking like he was going to cry."

Apollo couldn't imagine their carefree father crying. He'd seen Phoenix angry, and mischievous, and relaxed - even the kind of thoughtful someone gets up to only when they don't realise they're being watched! - but he'd never seen him sad. It struck him suddenly that there was a lot he didn't really know about his father, no matter how many casefiles he'd read.

"I did my best to make him better," Trucy continued, fiddling with the stone in her hands. "Even though he doesn't look it anymore, I think it still hurts him. He's just got better at hiding it."

Apollo found his thoughts turning to Luke, and the few rare nights when he had been woken by his brother's crying, missing his parents and his former home despite months having passed since he unwillingly left them behind. "They don't want us to worry," he pointed out, "Dad and Luke. That's reasonable, I suppose."

Trucy huffed, looking out over the lake. "But we're family now! We're supposed to worry! It's our job!"

Laughing, Apollo tipped Trucy's hat off her head and ruffled her hair, turning her frown into a giggle. "I guess it's up to us to remind them of that then, huh?"

The pair's laughter was interrupted by a soft clearing of the throat behind them, and the duo spun around to see an elderly man watching them, smiling in a friendly way as he leant on a cane. "Excuse me," he asked them, "but would you two know where the exit to Kitaki Avenue is? I'm afraid I've gotten a little lost this afternoon!"

Apollo nodded, and pointed down a path to the man's right. "If you go that way, and turn right, it should lead you straight there."

The man peered down in the direction Apollo pointed, then gave the pair a grin. "My eternal thanks, young man!" He winked to Trucy. "You have a very intelligent brother there, young missy!"

Trucy shrugged, grinning mischievously. "He's not, usually."

"Hey!" Apollo protested, but Trucy only giggled.

The man laughed. "Ah, I knew when I looked at you that you had to be brother and sister! You've probably heard this a lot, but the two of you have the same face, you know!"

Apollo and Trucy were too confused to respond, glancing at each other. "Uh..." Apollo mumbled.

"Well, I'd better be going!" the man announced, tipping his hat to them as he slowly began to walk off. "Again, my thanks for your help!"

The pair silently watched as the man disappeared down the path, then looked at each other with confused frowns.
Apollo ran his hand over his carefully gelled spikes one last time, opening the door to the bedroom he shared with his brother. They were home from school on spring break, so Apollo and Luke were making the most of their days home, in-between meeting up with Clay to do various things around the city together. For now though, Apollo was simply set on finding his school-issued laptop.

‘I wonder if Pocky's replied to that thread yet?’ the teen wondered as he walked over to his side of the room. His eyes ran over Luke's side, checking on the bronze statuette displayed on his brother's bedside table, before he returned his attention to his own, the black rectangle sitting half-off the table’s surface underneath the re-purposed desk lamp, a cord dangling from a corner down to a power-point near the bottom of the wall. ‘Actually, I'm surprised a bunch of Troupe Gramarye fans have no idea Magnifi had a granddaughter... Now I'm wondering if I should have mentioned that or not.’ He reached for the laptop, intending to unplug it from the charger cable, but his thoughts on his computer and online friends were distracted as he noticed something sitting on his bed.

‘Huh...?’ Leaving the laptop for now, Apollo reached for the paper and plucked it off his pillow, carefully opening it to investigate the strange item.

The first thing that caught his attention was the photo at the very top. It was of a young woman, on the cusp of adulthood, sitting with her elbows resting on a table in a beam of sunlight, a lush forest visible behind her. She was looking off to her left, a finger held against her lips in an odd cross between a frown and a smile. ‘Why is she familiar?’ Apollo asked himself, slowly sitting on his bed as he clutched the paper. ‘She's very beautiful.’ Tearing his eyes away from the picture, he turned his attention to the rest of the paper, and quickly noticed it appeared to be a printout of an old newspaper article. ‘What's the date on this thing...? October, two-thousand-three? That makes this thing older than me. What's it doing here?’ He blinked in surprise as he finally read the headline of the article, and sighed as he realised who the page must belong to. ‘Gramarye. Of course. It's Trucy's. Is that why the lady seems familiar? She's probably a relation. Maybe an aunt?’ Although he didn't want to pry by reading the article in full, he couldn't resist taking another close look at the woman in the photo. She was wearing a white dress, and earrings that sparkled so harshly in the sunlight that the resulting lens flare totally hid them from view. On her wrists were twin bracelets, which Apollo only glanced over at first until the pattern on them registered and he snapped his attention back to them instantly. ‘What the...!? They look just like mine!’ His gaze jumped back and forth from the picture to his own bracelet on his left wrist for a few moments, comparing the two and failing to find any differences between them. ‘But... what's one of the Gramaryes doing with bracelets just like mine...? Are... are they not as unique as I thought...?’ Shaking his head to clear out the creeping uncertainties, Apollo decided to take the plunge and read the article.

GRAMARYE DAUGHTER LEAVES TROUPE?

Lone child of the famous Magnifi Gramarye, Thalassa Gramarye, has quit performing with the world-famous magician's troupe. "It's by no means permanent," she says in a public statement made yesterday. "I'm not ruling out returning to magic. I simply feel that, at this point in my life, I'm happier away from the stage."

Anonymous sources say the eighteen-year-old has recently wed Borginian performer Hyperion Reylu, and may already be expecting a child herself.

When asked if her father supported her decision, Thalassa responded, "My father has always supported every choice I made for myself, and I will do the same for any children I may have in my future."

"'G-Gramarye heirloom bracelets...? It... it can't be!" Apollo resisted the urge to crumple the paper into a small ball. He thought back to everything Trucy had mentioned over the past five months about her first family, and remembered, aside from her father's famous disappearance and her grandfather's murder, that she had described her mother as 'disappeared' once. But what exactly did she mean by that? And is this Trucy's mother, or an aunt? He stared at the article for a few more moments before coming to a decision. 'I guess I only have one option here: interrogate Trucy.'

Clutching the paper in his hand, Apollo jumped to his feet, abandoning his computer and charging out the door into the hallway. He had last seen his sister ('Oh god no, we might actually be blood-related') watching television with Luke in the office, so he headed downstairs to check there.

Phoenix's Office

"In international news, a ruling has finally been given today on the investigation into former British Prime Minister, Bill Hawks, and his involvement in underhanded dealings both before and after his election that is alleged to have caused a deadly explosion in central London over ten years ago, and even to have led to his own kidnapping last year."

"About time!"

"Not a very gentlemanly comment there, Luke."

Apollo opened the door from the kitchen, pausing as he looked around and was unable to see his sister. "Where's Trucy?" he asked.

Phoenix and Luke looked up from the couch, where they had been watching the television. "In her room," Phoenix answered with an almost gleeful smile.

The teen resisted growling to himself. "Argh, I just came down here!" he cried, waving the paper in his hands as he turned to leave again.

Luke frowned, noting Apollo's agitation. "Are you okay, Apollo?"
"I'm-! I'm fine!" Apollo insisted, resisting the urge to slam the door as he stormed out.

Luke stood to follow his brother, but Phoenix stopped him with a hand to his arm. "If he wants help, he'll ask for it," he told the younger teen.

Trucy's Room

Apollo knocked only once on Trucy's door before opening it, finding the young girl within stood in front of her full-length mirror, her wooden Mister Hat puppet propped up from a hidden mechanism somewhere under her cape. She turned in surprise as her brother entered, swinging so fast she almost toppled over from the carefully-balanced weight of the puppet on her back.

After checking his sister hadn't hurt herself, Apollo cleared his throat and held out the paper in his hands with a stern look. "I think I found something of yours in my room."

Trucy raised an eyebrow at the piece of paper. "But I haven't been in your room," she pointed out.

When Apollo only deepened his frown, she sighed and took the paper anyway, unfolding it to look at the contents printed on the inside. She blinked in surprise as she saw the photo. "That's Mommy!" she cried, then looked up at Apollo with wide eyes. "Where'd you get a picture of my mommy!?"

Now it was Apollo's turn to look confused. "What are you talking about? It isn't yours?" he asked, then shook his head. "Look, I found this on my bed. If that's your mom, maybe you'll know about those." He pointed to the photo, tapping firmly at her wrists.

"Her bracelet?" Trucy asked, then gasped in surprise. "Woah, she has two of them in this! I didn't know Mommy had two!"

Apollo's hand jumped to his left wrist, rubbing at the bracelet there. "Well, this photo is from before even I was born, so-"

"Woah!" Trucy cried again, her eyes jumping from the photo to Apollo's bracelet, and she grabbed the teen's hand, pulling him down a little as she compared his bracelet to the two in the photo. "Yeah, they look exactly like your's!" She giggled, releasing Apollo's hand and watching him gingerly rub it while shooting her an annoyed look. "It's funny, though," she continued, "cuz Mommy only ever had one that I saw." Her smile turned sad. "She used to wear it all the time... she was probably wearing it when she disappeared, too."

Apollo suddenly felt guilty for jumping into his sister's room as though she were being accused of something. "What happened to her?" he asked.

"She was practising a new trick," Trucy explained, staring at the photo, "with Daddy and Uncle Valant. They made her disappear, but something went wrong. She didn't come back."

'A... literal disappearing trick?' Apollo thought to himself. 'Somehow, something seems off about that story...'

One hand on Mister Hat's bowtie to keep him steady, Trucy ran to her bedside table, pulling out the small drawer and rooting around in the mess of small objects there until she pulled out a golden locket. She flipped it open, smiling at the picture inside, then gestured for Apollo to join her, holding out the locket for him to see. "Look, it's even the same picture!"

Apollo approached, taking the locket and examining the small photo contained inside. Just as Trucy said, it looked to be the original picture from the article, cut down for the locket in a way that hid her bracelets perfectly from view. "Your mom's pretty," he said.

Trucy giggled, holding the article in her hands close to her chest. "Silly! She must be your mommy, too!"

Apollo frowned, holding out the locket to return it and pretending he wasn't blushing. "We can't say that for sure!" he protested.

Trucy took back the locket, still giggling as she returned it to her drawer. After bumping it closed with her hip, she pulled her cape closed in front of her and concentrated hard, trying to hide the movement of her arm underneath. Mister Hat bounced as his mouth flapped open, 'saying' "Hey, you need to look at the facts, kid! Wooden you say it looks pretty certain?"

Apollo rolled his eyes, resisting the urge to punch the puppet in the face.

"Oh!" Trucy cried as a thought occurred to her, and she quickly withdrew Mister Hat back into his resting place, grabbing her hat from his head as the mechanism rapidly obeyed. "We need to tell Daddy and Luke!" she proclaimed, grabbing Apollo's wrist and dragging him away.

"W-wait!" Apollo cried, but Trucy didn't listen, determinedly pulling him out of the room.
The door from the kitchen opened with a bang, making Luke spin around in surprise to see Trucy drag a very red Apollo into the room. Phoenix only smiled at the two and quickly muted the television.

"Guess what!" Trucy announced, holding the article up high. "Apollo's mommy is my mommy!"

"What!?" Luke cried, jumping to his feet to take the article in Trucy's hands. "How do you- oh, actually, she looks just like you two."

Apollo finally pulled his wrist from Trucy's hands. "No, she doesn't," he insisted.

Trucy giggled. "Mommy gave Apollo one of her special bracelets! That's how we know!"

"Oh yeah!" Luke laughed as he noticed the bracelets in the photo. "And I guess that's why you both have the same ability to sense lies, huh?"

Apollo frowned in thought, immediately remembering his bracelet's tendency to tell him when people were lying. "Didn't think of that," he admitted.

Phoenix grinned, watching Trucy bounce in the excitement of their discovery. "Well, I guess that just makes it official for you two, doesn't it?"

While Trucy giggled, Apollo gave their father a suspicious look. "Wait a second, did you know about this!?"

Phoenix shrugged, scratching his face idly. "I may have lost that article there somewhere in the vicinity of your bedroom this morning..."

Apollo sighed and rolled his eyes. "At least we now know the real reason you adopted me..."

"Oh!" Trucy gasped, clapping her hands and turning to Apollo. "You're a Gramarye! I have to teach you some magic tricks!"

"Magic...?" Apollo repeated, warily backing away already.

"It's the family business!" Trucy insisted, jumping forward to grab Apollo's arm again. "C'mon!" With that, she had once again dragged him out of the room.

Luke blinked in surprise, the old article still in his hands. "Well, I certainly wasn't seeing this coming." He moved to sit back down next to his father, looking up at him curiously. "You really knew all this time?"

Phoenix only grinned, moving to unmute the television. "I have to keep some secrets."
Did Luke get on to you about going to the library tmrw?

Yup. He said you had something to tell me? And so soon after my birthday too! Is this a coming out of the closet thing? You're free to tell your best friend anything yknow ;( I wont judge.

Very funny. :\ Actually Trucy wants to come with us. We have some big news she wants to tell you in person

Ah I see. She can come along if she wants.

You don't mind?

Trutru's cool. She can come with.

Don't call her that

I'll see yo guys at the library tmrw ;) right Wright?

Why are we friends

You know you love me.

Public Library

"Are you serious?" Clay asked, astonished.

"Yup!" Trucy chirped, bouncing in her seat opposite Clay at the table in the library. "Cool, huh?"

Apollo grinned, still setting up his school laptop on Clay's left. "Told you you'd want to be sitting down for this," he said.

Clay was, for once, speechless, leaning back in his chair and staring between Trucy and Apollo with a confused frown. "So you two...? How did you find out for sure?"

Giving a world-weary sigh, Apollo couldn't resist rolling his eyes. "Apparently Dad knew the entire time. He must've been researching Trucy's family at some point and found this old newspaper article from before I was born about our mom."

"Mommy gave Apollo one of her special Gramarye bracelets!" Trucy butted in, pointing to Apollo's wrist eagerly. "And there was that old guy in the park a few months ago that thought we looked alike, and Luke thinks we both look like Mommy, and we can both tell when people are lying!"

Clay crossed his arms, tapping his chin in thought. "Huh. Guess wearing that old bracelet everywhere did pay off then."

Apollo shrugged, turning to his computer and trying to hide his smile.

"You said you have the same mom?" Clay continued, turning to Trucy. "What about your dad?"

Trucy shook her head. "Different daddies. My Daddy wasn't married to Mommy until after Apollo was born."

"We don't know for sure yet," Apollo continued, tapping at his laptop keyboard, "but that old article Dad found is in the right time-frame for Mom to have been pregnant with me, and she'd just married someone else at the time, who we can only guess was my birth father." He paused, frowning in thought. "She was only eighteen, too. She was so young..."

Clay hummed curiously, then gave Apollo a smirk as he saw his friend's screen. "You found this out yesterday and you haven't already looked it up?" He pointed at the search engine, currently set to search Thalassa's name. "I thought that was why you wanted to come here today!"

"Not everything can be found on the internet!" Luke announced, arriving at the table with a pile of books in his arms, which he deposited next to Trucy and opposite Apollo. He promptly sat down and began to look through them, one by one.

Apollo scoffed, swiping his finger on his laptop's touchpad. "Well, I was trying to do online research yesterday, but a certain someone insisted on teaching me sleight-of-hand instead!"

Trucy stuck her tongue out at her brother in response.

Clay laughed. "Oh yeah, if you two are actual blood-siblings, that makes you a Gramarye!" Clay realised, slapping Apollo's shoulder. "Are you going to learn magic and perform with her on stage, then?"

Trucy gasped loudly in sudden excitement.

Apollo went pale. "Oh God, no."

"But it would be so fun!" Trucy insisted. "Besides, I've tried teaching sleight-of-hand to Daddy and some of my friends at school, and they took forever to figure it out! You have to learn more tricks with me!"

"They what?" Apollo repeated, remembering how much praise Trucy had given him the previous night when he finally perfected the trick. "But it's the easiest trick in the book, isn't it?"

Luke laughed, looking up from his pile of research. "You may as well, Apollo," he pointed out. "If you're as good at it as Trucy thinks, you might find it fun!"

"Yeah!" Trucy agreed.

Apollo groaned, but eventually nodded his agreement. "Fine, I'll give it a try."

"Yay!" Trucy cheered, jumping in her seat as she threw her fists into the air in triumph.

Luke hurriedly shushed Trucy. "This is a library!" he reminded her.

Clay stifled giggles for a few moments, then finally noticed what most of Luke's books appeared to be about. "Luke, are you looking up Greek mythology?" he asked in surprise.
Looking up from his book, Luke grinned sheepishly. "I've been meaning to do more reading on it for a while," he admitted. "I was actually wondering if Apollo was given his name as some kind of family theme, so I'm trying to see if I can find the names of the rest of Troupe Gramarye at the moment."

"Ooh!" Trucy cooed, looking over Luke's shoulder at his books. "Is 'Trucy' the name of a Greek god?" she asked.

Luke shook his head. "'Fraid not," he said.

Apollo snickered, taking a sip from his water bottle. "I doubt Luke's gonna find anything, Truce. 'Magnifi', 'Zak' and 'Valant' aren't exactly Greek-sounding."

"'Thalassa' might be, though," Clay pointed out. "You never know."

Trucy huffed, leaning her forearms on the table as she continued peering at Luke's books. "What about 'Artemis'?"

Apollo spat out his drink.

Clay laughed. "Where'd you get 'Artemis' from?"

"It's my middle name," Trucy explained with a shrug. "Mommy wanted it to be my first name, but Daddy didn't like it."

Lacking any more liquid in his mouth to spit, Apollo only continued to sputter.

Luke pulled a small book from the middle of his pile, and slid it over to Trucy. "Artemis was Apollo's twin sister, and the goddess of the hunt! She's also probably the oldest character in the entire Greek pantheon!"

Trucy excitedly flipped open the offered book, 'The Beginner's Guide to Greek Mythology', cooing in excitement as she skimmed the pages.

"She had a chariot pulled by deer with golden antlers," Luke continued, one finger pointing into the air, "and fourteen hunting dogs! Some say she was also the masculine to Apollo's feminine!"

Apollo, still coughing, rolled his eyes as he checked his computer was okay. "Gee, how flattering."

Clay just laughed. "Luke's done his research!" he pointed out, elbowing Apollo. "Impressive!"

Ignoring his friend, Apollo returned his attention to his computer screen. "If only it was as easy to find information on Mom as it is on our namesakes," he grumbled.

"What do you mean?" Trucy asked, looking up from her book. "Troupe Gramarye was really popular! It should be everywhere!"

Apollo paused before answering, frowning at his screen. "You said she 'disappeared' four years ago now?"

Trucy nodded.

"I can't find anything on it," Apollo admitted, throwing his hands in the air and leaning back in his chair. "She's performing with Troupe Gramarye, then she just stops and everyone says she's left the Troupe, but there's no trace of what actually happened to her."

"Really?" Luke asked. "Nothing at all?"

Trucy sadly turned another page in her book, but said nothing.

Clay hummed in thought, tapping his chin. "What about your dad?" he asked his friend. "Your real one, I mean?"

Apollo sighed. "I don't know where Dad, our real dad, found that article," he said, unable to resist the jab at Clay's wording as he reached into his bag to remove the mentioned printout, "so I'm not sure I'll find anything else on 'im we can read. This says he was Borginian, and they use a different alphabet to us... Not to mention, when he died, anything that could identify him burned up, and Mom had disappeared in the chaos; There's no information to find there."

Trucy blinked in surprise, watching Apollo carefully.

"Bummer," Clay sympathised.

"There's nothing stopping us from trying!" Luke said, trying to perk up his brother. "I'm positive we'll get something useful out of today's research, even if we have to use an online translator to do it!"

View the Court Record
You’ll be happy to hear I finally told them

Told who? About what?.

OH APOLLO AND TRUCY HOW DID IT GO.

Better than I feared :) Trucy’s ecstatic and Apollo seems happy to have some answers, even if there’s still so much we don’t know. Even Luke seems happy w the news

Trucy’s actually roped Apollo into learning some magic and might be dragging him on stage in future lol

Hang on, I think Apollos texting me the news himself, I need to send him a congrats.

He just might kill me if he learns you already knew, just a warning

Maya, this is Apollo. I thought Id let you know that it turns out Trucy and I have the same birth mother, so we’re actual blood siblings and not just adopted ones

Hey wow, that's amazing! Congrats on that, kiddo!.

Don’t worry, I know you already knew

How do you know that lol I’m just congratulating you kiddo.

I overheard you and Dad over Christmas talking about something concerning me and Trucy that you weren’t telling us yet. It was this, wasn’t it?

Ah I guess you caught us fair and square then ^^; if you knew we had a secret why didn’t you ask?.

It didn’t seem like the right time tbh. Its fine, Dad probly asked you not to say anything huh?

Got it in one :) you say congrats to your sis for me.

Will do :)

Hey.
Hey Nick.

What

Guess what.

What, Maya
Apollo knew I knew and isn't mad so ha.

I repeat, ha.

Don't ha me Nick :P.

That's my line

Oh wait now Lukes texting me.

Great, get out of here :P I need to talk to Law Child

DID APOLLO TELL YOU?

YEAH HE DID ISN'T IT AMAZING.

I KNOW! AND THEY WOULD NEVER HAVE MET IF IT WEREN'T FOR ME AND NICK!

THAT MAKES YOU TWO AMAZING AS WELL IF YOU ASK ME.

Wait, why are we yelling?

You started it :P.

Nick's just come in here telling Apollo off about eavesdropping. Did he already know you knew?

Hey wait why did you both know I was in on the secret!?.

I didn't think Nick would have kept it from you, but I didn't want to assume without evidence. You and Nick are really close, after all.

Well at least you didn't eavesdrop :P And what's this about close, you been listening to Pearly?.

Nevermind Nicks my best friend I don't mind admitting that.

:) I'll talk to you later, Maya. Nick's free now if you want to call him.

Watch it kid :P.
"You can't bring a book to the dinner table, Trucy!" Luke protested, sitting down in his usual seat.

"Why not!" Trucy asked, clutching the Beginner's Guide to Greek Mythology to her chest. "I'm still reading about Apollo and Artemis!"

Phoenix stifled a laugh as he carefully removed the book from his daughter's arms and sat it on the kitchen bench, right behind his seat. "You'll damage it," he pointed out. "I'm not paying for damaged library books."

"Besides," Luke continued, arms crossed, "it's rude to read at the dinner table!"

Trucy pouted, but sat down next to an amused Apollo, who patted her shoulder sympathetically. "You'll have plenty of time to read more about them later," he pointed out.

"But I want to do it noooow," the eight-year-old whined, wriggling unhappily in her seat.

Phoenix laid out the four plates of store-bought, microwaved lasagne for the family, then sat down himself as the three children rapidly began to eat. "Dare I ask if you found anything interesting today?" he asked with a smile.

"Mommy named me 'Artemis' because she's Apollo's twin sister!" Trucy chirped.

"Oh really?" Phoenix replied.

Apollo snorted, quickly swallowing his mouthful of food. "I didn't even know Truce here had a middle name!" he laughed.

"Although," Trucy continued, "Artemis was older than Apollo, and the book says she was something called a 'virgin' goddess." She frowned in thought. "It didn't say what that means, though."

Phoenix and Apollo cast each other terrified glances.

Jumping to the rescue, Luke pointed a finger into the air knowingly, saying "That means she never kissed anyone!"

"Oh!" Trucy replied with a smile, not giving any indication she'd picked up on a lie. "That makes sense!"

Phoenix and Apollo sighed in relief.

"And," Trucy continued, "both Apollo and Artemis could heal people and also make them sick!"

Apollo nodded. "Yeah, I remember reading that. Apollo was the patron god of hospitals because of it, I think."

Luke chuckled, picking at his food with his fork. "I found something pretty interesting while conducting my own research, too!"

"More Greek mythology?" Phoenix asked with a joking grin. "Please, no, it's too much."

Giggling at Phoenix's teasing, Luke gave his siblings an excited grin. "I found where the name 'Thalassa' comes from!"
"You did!?" Apollo cried in surprise.

"She was a primordial sea goddess!" Luke explained. "Her name is also the Greek word for 'sea', so she's essentially the personification of the ocean."

Trucy frowned. "What's 'pry-mord-eel'?"

"It means she was the first one of her kind," Luke added with a smile. "I found Hyperion, too!"

Apollo perked up, unable to deny he was curious to hear the story behind his birth father's namesake. "You did?"

Luke nodded. "He was a titan. He fathered the god of the sun, as well as the goddesses of the moon and the dawn." He paused, and shrugged with an apologetic smile. "With his sister, of course."

Trucy screwed up her nose at Luke's last comment. "The Ancient Greeks were weird," she muttered.

"According to them," Phoenix pointed out, "we're the ones who are weird." He smiled. "By the way, no points for figuring out where my name comes from."

Apollo and Trucy giggled, shooting sidelong glances at each other.

"Actually," Luke continued, "there's a lot of Greek mythology in modern names... or at least, among our family."

Phoenix frowned. "You mean your name has a connection, too? 'Luke's' Biblical, isn't it?"

Luke nodded, looking sheepish. "Well, it's actually originally Greek, but... I meant Triton. He's a Greek sea god. I... never changed my name, after all."

Trucy looked confused. "I thought a 'triton' was that forky-thingy with the three points...?" She held up three fingers to illustrate her thoughts.

"That's a 'trident'," Apollo told her, resisting a laugh.

"Triton had a trident," Luke added, feeling less nervous after the change of subject, "but he's better known for carrying a giant conch shell that he used as a trumpet."

The four ate in silence for a few moments, before Phoenix turned to Apollo. "What about you, Apollo? Did your research today turn up anything?"

Apollo slowly chewed his mouthful of lasagne in thought. The moment he swallowed, he reluctantly shook his head. "Not much. I didn't find that article you gave us, and there was nothing on Trucy's and my mom that wasn't Troupe Gramarye related... but at least we tracked down my father. I know his name now."

Phoenix nodded. "I did most of my research using the courthouse library. It has a database of newspapers you can run a search through."

"Okay," Apollo noted. "I'll remember to try that one next."

"I doubt you'll get any more luck," Phoenix sadly informed him. "I didn't find anything more on either of your parents than that article you have." He shrugged. "What did you find on your father?"

Apollo thought a moment before answering. "Well... nothing I didn't already know," he admitted.
"Polly's dad died in a fire! It's so sad!" Trucy cried. "He burned to death rescuing Polly, and Mommy never found them after!"

Phoenix turned to Apollo in surprise. "What happened?"

Apollo sighed. "According to what I was told as a kid, my dad was a travelling musician," he explained. "I guess he took Mom and me with him. We were in Asia, and he took me to a performance for the country's queen..."

"You said it was arson, didn't you?" Luke added, looking concerned. "The queen died too, and the country was in so much uproar after that he was never identified."

"Mom probably thought I'd died with my dad," Apollo continued, frowning at his food. "After that, she would have gone back to Troupe Gramarye alone."

Phoenix thought over the information for a few moments. "When did all this happen?"

"October, two-thousand-four," Apollo mumbled, picking at his food. "I would have been five months old."

The family was again silent for several moments. Finally, Phoenix nodded. "That makes sense," he said.

"During the adoption process," Phoenix explained, facing Apollo, "Lauren showed me the file registering you into the foster system... Though I'm not sure how to pronounce the name of the country in question. Or where 'Justice' came from."

Apollo forced a smile. "All they knew about my dad was his stage name: 'Jangly Justice'. He told them he was from California, and that my name was Apollo. I guess nothing else ever came up before the attack."

Phoenix didn't miss that Apollo hadn't touched on the country he'd been left behind in. "If I remember correctly, the form did say you were about five months old at the time."

While Apollo stared at his food in silence, Trucy scrunched her face up in thought. "So, why didn't Mommy tell them who you were and bring you back to Grandpa?" she thought aloud. "That doesn't make sense!"

"That country's queen had just been assassinated," Luke pointed out. "I doubt the news Apollo had survived got very far at all, and it's not like your mother would have known where to look for him." He shook his head. "Even so... If she's dead, I guess we'll never know her exact actions."

"She's not dead!" Trucy insisted, perhaps a little too stubbornly, crossing her arms and fixing Luke with a glare. "She got stuck in a disappearing trick!"

Phoenix was halfway through doing the dishes when he happened to glance up at the calendar hung on a cupboard door and realised what the date was. 'April nineteen? Now why is that a familiar da-
Oh...' He was forced to grip the edges of the sink as the realisation caused him to stumble in shock, his previously content mood suddenly turned sour. 'It's... already been a year since I lost my badge...' He glanced at the time and scoffed darkly. This time last year, I was in front of the Bar Association, actively losing it...' He tried to make himself reach for one of the dirty plates in front of him, to move it to the dishwasher, but only got halfway before a memory hit him.

Phoenix hurriedly threw the last of his papers into his suitcase, cursing his latest client's refusal to co-operate and the complete lack of investigation he'd had any time to do. 'If only Maya were here,' he found himself thinking, and shook his head to rid himself of the distracting thought. 'She has enough to do. I'm perfectly capable of defending a client on my own, even one as difficult as this.' Thus, mentally psyching himself up, the blue-suited lawyer ran out the door.

The ex-lawyer felt his breathing begin to accelerate, and was suddenly glad the kids were all out right now. The last thing I need is for them to worry about me.' He hurriedly shook his hands to dry them, abandoning the sink and open dishwasher as he fled the kitchen, running upstairs in the direction of his bedroom.

He was halfway up the stairs when he spotted Detective Gumshoe on the next floor, standing around and mumbling to himself as he read through some kind of file. Grinning, Phoenix waved to his friend, jumping to the top of the stairs and calling, "Hey, Gumshoe!"

The detective looked up in surprise, smiling as he recognised the approaching defence attorney. "Hey, pal!" he replied, closing his file and holding it close to his side as he turned to face his friend. "What're you doing in the courthouse today?"

Phoenix laughed. "What else would I be doing here?" He felt a niggling sense of dread at the back of his mind as he found himself asking the same of Gumshoe, and added, "Um, you wouldn't happen to also be working the Gramarye case, would you?"

"Yep!" Gumshoe proudly replied, before suddenly realising what the question actually meant and looking confused. "Wait, you're Enigmar's lawyer? Last I heard, that other Gavin guy was workin' for 'im!"

Phoenix shrugged. "Apparently he changed his mind. Hired me last night," he explained, then cast a curious look at the file in Gumshoe's hands. "He didn't tell me anything, though. Think you could give me a run-down before we go in?"

Gumshoe scoffed, "You'll be hearing it anyway in court, pal!"

"Ah, yes," Phoenix replied, giving his friend a cocky smirk, "the moment when I tear apart your testimony in court is always my favourite part of a trial!"

"Hey!" Gumshoe cried, glaring. "We've actually got good evidence this time! There's no way you're winning this case!"

"We'll see," Phoenix calmly replied, happily allowing himself to believe his own boasts for the moment, if only for the boost in self-confidence he desperately needed right now.

Phoenix almost tripped on the top stair, just barely catching himself before he crashed into the carpeted floor. Shaking his head, he ran down the hallway, throwing open his bedroom door and running inside, leaning against the door as it closed again behind him.

Phoenix had been given a choice: provide absolute proof Magnifi beyond a doubt wrote more in his journal, or lose the trial. Failing to protect an innocent life, especially after everything he'd gone through to get where he was, was out of the question, so he'd presented the suspicious-looking page young Trucy Enigmar had passed on to him, and pointed the finger at Valant for the murder. The court erupted into a noisy clamour, forcing the judge to repeatedly call for order so proceedings could continue.

"But, but wait!" Valant protested from the stand. "This is... That's impossible! That old man couldn't have written that..." Klavier Gavin smirked from behind the prosecutor's bench, and threw out his arm dramatically in Phoenix's direction. "Objection!" he called, then relaxed and laughed to himself. "Finally. You just couldn't resist, could you, Herr Wright?"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, leaning palms-down on the defence bench. "Resist what?" he asked, an almost patronising tone to his voice as he spoke to the teenage rockstar opposite. "Presenting solid evidence?" 'We'll just ignore for now that I wasn't nearly as sure about it five minutes ago...' Klavier smiled cockily at the attorney for a few moments before turning to the tall podium to his left. "Herr Judge?"

"Y-yes, Prosecutor Gavin?" the judge replied.

"Might I request we put the current cross-examination on hold? The prosecution would like to call a new witness."

He could remember the feeling of dread that had built up and settled in his stomach as the audience had been ushered away and the 'forger' shown in. One hand gripping at his chest where his suit lapel used to be, the Phoenix of the present slid down the door until he was sitting on the floor, unable to keep himself from shaking slightly as the memories ran through his head.
"The regional prosecutor's office received a tip-off yesterday," Klavier explained, grinning as he fiddled with his hair. "Illegal evidence has been prepared for the trial of Zak Gramarye."

The judge frowned. "Illegal... evidence?"

"I initiated an investigation," Klavier continued, gesturing to the nervous man at the witness stand, "and found this witness. A painter to the world at large, Drew Misham has another side, you might say. He is skilled in making perfect reproductions of certain things." He paused, smirking at Phoenix. "Forgeries, in other words."

Phoenix blinked, mind still reeling as a part of him realised what was going on. "F-forgeries!" he repeated.

"W-well!" the judge cried, looking rather nervous himself. "So, we are to understand that this page here is..."

"A fake," Klavier answered, smugly resting his hands in his pants pockets. "Prepared by a certain defence attorney."

At the direct accusation, Phoenix finally managed to spring into action, throwing out an arm and shouting "Objection! Hold it! I didn't 'prepare' this evidence!"

"Objection!" came a responding shout from the other side of the courtroom. Klavier clapped his hands together, leaning forward as he grinned at the attorney opposite him. "Ah, the attorney speaks!" he almost sang in delight. "Something about this page, I presume." As he stood tall again, he began to play with his fringe, a patronising tone to his voice. "But what is he saying? It makes no sense! After all," his tone suddenly became dark as he threw out his arm to point at the defence bench, "it was you who presented this evidence to us, Phoenix Wright!"

The sudden memory of the trial of Lana Skye, and how Edgeworth had barely survived his own accusations of forged evidence, was enough to quieten Phoenix again for several minutes.

"I'm such a fool," Phoenix muttered to himself. "What's the point of this stupid investigation? I haven't found anything I can use!" He clutched his head as the hot tears began dripping down his cheeks, his body slipping to one side to lie on the floor. "I'm never getting my badge back... I'm sorry, Mia..."

Kitchen

Trucy was the first of the trio to enter the room, looking around as she skipped to the dining table and deposited her small bag there. "Daddy!" she called. "We're back!"

Luke stretched his arms as he headed straight to the kitchen, intending to get himself a drink, and paused as he noticed the sink full of dirty dishes and the open dishwasher. "That's odd," he said, walking over to the pile and peering into the half-full sink. "Why'd he leave this?"
"Leave what?" Apollo asked, closing the door to the office behind him as he entered. "Where's Dad?" Seeing the abandoned chore, he frowned. "Wait, that's not like him."

As Apollo and Trucy followed Luke into the kitchen, the boy in blue stuck a wary finger into the soapy water. "It's not cold, but not exactly warm anymore either," he told the others, shaking his finger to dry it. "Nick can't have been gone long."

Trucy suddenly gasped. "Wait, what's the date today!?" she demanded, grabbing Apollo's arm.

"Oh no!" Trucy cried, hands covering her mouth as she backed away from her brothers, looking scared. "It's been exactly a year since..."

Apollo's eyes widened. "Since he lost his badge..." he filled in.

"What!?" Luke said, glancing up at the calendar nearby. "But why would he...?"

Apollo shook his head to pull himself together, deciding to take responsibility for his younger siblings. "Luke, do you know how to finish up the dishes?"

Luke thought a moment, then nodded. "Uh, sure, I can do that."

"Good." Apollo rested a hand on Trucy's shoulder. "You help him, huh?"

"But how will that help!?" Trucy cried, still looking worried. "We need to find Daddy!"

"I'll do that," Apollo assured her. "Don't you think it would help Dad to have this done for him when I do?"

Trucy thought a moment, then nodded, agreeing to the request despite her worry for Phoenix.

"Good girl," Apollo said, then dashed off towards the stairs. "I'll be right back!" he promised over his shoulder, glimpsing Luke showing Trucy what to do before they disappeared out of his sight.

Apollo decided his first destination would be his father's bedroom. Although he highly doubted Phoenix had left the apartment, he had to be sure before he went back downstairs alone and worried his siblings. The sight of the closed door at the end of the hallway bolstered his resolve, and the teen quickly dashed down the hallway, pressing his ear to the small gap between door and door-frame. He couldn't hear anything at first, but after a moment he heard what seemed to be the sound of a bed creaking, and almost sighed in relief. 'He's in there!' Leaning back, Apollo gently knocked on the door. "Dad?" he softly called.

There was no answer.

Starting to worry, Apollo knocked again. "Dad, I know you're in there." When there was still no answer, the teen sighed, leaning against the wall. "Trucy was right, huh? Losing your badge still hurts; You've just got better at hiding it." He frowned. "You probably think hiding away in there isn't going to make us worry, but you're wrong. We're family now, because of you. It's our job to worry about each other, and you locking yourself up only makes us worry more." He pushed himself off the wall, ranting to the closed door. "You're gonna do that to us? Make us worry about you because you won't talk to us when you're not feeling the best, pretending everything is fine like life's just one big game of poker!?!" He paused, crossing his arms as he forced himself to calm down. "I know you'd probably be more comfortable spilling this kind of thing to Maya or Uncle Edgeworth, but... Y'know, I'm almost sixteen now, and that's considered 'adult' in some countries, right? I can listen to you if you want." He shrugged. "Anyway, I promised Luke and Trucy I'd come back with you. They're finishing up the dishes in the kitchen, so you don't have to worry about those." He pressed his forehead to the door, arms dropping to his sides. "Just come out, Dad. Please?"

There was a short pause, then the door opened, surprising Apollo as he jumped away from it. He looked in, only glimpsing Phoenix at the edge of his view as the man walked back to the bed and sat down. Gulpimg, Apollo carefully pushed the door open a little wider and entered, gently pushing it closed behind him. "Dad?" Phoenix was sat on the edge of the bed, slumped forward with his head in his hands, leaning on his elbows and knees and seemingly staring at the carpet. Apollo nervously took a deep breath to steady himself, then walked up to his father's side and sat down next to him, hands clasped in his lap. "You want to talk about it?"

There was a long pause before Phoenix sighed. "I didn't want you three to worry about me," he quietly told Apollo. "This has nothing to do with you."

"What are you talking about?!" Apollo cried, finding himself feeling offended. "You're our dad! If it has to do with you, it has to do with us!" He paused a moment, then added, "I didn't even know you a year ago, personally anyway, and you losing your badge hurt me then, too. And you should have seen Luke when Clay and I told him what happened to you, and I'm positive it hurt Trucy at the time as well, not just because of what happened to her father." He sighed, hoping his impassioned plea had been heard. "Just let us help you, Dad! None of us want you to hurt alone..."
Phoenix took a few seconds to formulate a reply, lifting his face from his hands and turning his red eyes towards Apollo. "Would you be prepared," he whispered in a scratchy voice, "to keep a secret from Luke and Trucy?"

Apollo blinked in surprise. "Huh?" He thought a moment, then reluctantly nodded. "I guess so. Why would I have to?"

Phoenix glanced up at the door, ensuring it was closed before he straightened up a tad in his seat. "As much as I love your sister, she's incapable of keeping a secret that doesn't involve magic. You and Luke I can trust on that, but Trucy would quite rightly demand to know the details if I told you both, and this is a secret that's too dangerous to allow to get out."

"Dangerous?" Apollo repeated, already jumping to various conclusions of his own as he pondered what this secret was and how it related to his father's lost badge. "More dangerous than you being accused of forgery?"

Phoenix nodded. "I was led into a trap, my last day in a courtroom," he continued, a stern tone to his voice. "I foolishly walked into it, but I'm not allowing the same mistake to happen a second time. No one else can do this but me."

Apollo looked down at the carpet for a few moments in thought, then looked back up to meet his father's gaze with a determined stare. "I'll keep the secret," he promised. "Let me help you, Dad."

After a moment's pause, Phoenix's stern glare softened into a smile, and he ruffled Apollo's hair, to the teen's exasperation. "I knew I could count on you," he said, then turned serious again. "That piece of forged evidence was given to me on the morning of the trial via an innocent third party. I don't have any evidence to say who commissioned it, only my own gut feeling and the word of a little girl who won't even talk about it because she's too scared to."

"N-not Trucy, right?" Apollo found himself briefly worrying. "Or Pearly?"

"Not Trucy or Pearls," Phoenix assured him with a smile. "No, this little girl hasn't even left her own home in years. It took me a while to convince her to do anything more than stare at me. He shook his head, getting himself back on topic. "The person who created that forged evidence did so on commission for a client, but said client covered his face when they met in person and never gave his name. All he left behind was a very unusual bottle of nail polish."

Apollo suddenly found himself thinking of when Kristoph had last visited them at the Borscht Bowl Club, and the attorney had paused at one point to do his nails. He remembered because the bottle had caught his attention, being a beautiful glittering blue and with a sculpted hand reaching upwards from the lid.

"I've eliminated the prosecutor and any of the Gramaryes as the client in question," Phoenix continued, "but, the day Zak Gramarye hired me to defend him, he fired his previous attorney, the brother of the prosecutor I faced in court. I've looked, and there's no paperwork proving it, but I'm pretty sure this attorney was the forger's client."

Apollo could feel his heart beating faster in anticipation. "Who was it?" he asked, wondering if it would be a name he recognised.

Phoenix smiled, deciding not to answer just yet. "This attorney was actually already an acquaintance of mine in the year or two beforehand," he continued, staring off into space. "We'd bump into each other in the hallways of the courthouse, congratulate each other on recent wins, commiserate on the occasional loss..." He chuckled. "At the time, I thought that was the reason why he was the only person on the board of the Bar Association who voted to give me another chance." His expression then darkened. "Then I started connecting the dots. By that point, he'd reached out to me and become one of the few friends I had left. I couldn't- can't afford to let him know I'm on to him."

"Wait," Apollo interrupted, beginning to connect his own dots, "does this have anything to do with why we aren't allowed to talk about Kurain to anyone?"

"Part of it, at least," Phoenix answered. "I'm happy to let him think I'm all alone and have given up on returning to law." He then grinned, ruffling Apollo's hair again as the teen rolled his eyes, deciding not to complain. "I'm sure he thinks the closest I'll ever get is through you, and you won't be a lawyer yourself for a few years yet. By then, why would I still be investigating into a lost cause like the disappearance of Zak Gramarye?"

Apollo thought for a few moments. "Wait... He's a defence attorney... and I've met him?" he realised.

Phoenix nodded, smile fading.

Apollo's eyes widened. "It's Mister Gavin, isn't it?"

"I'm afraid so," Phoenix replied. "Try not to treat him any differently the next time you meet him, huh?"

"Oh, yeah," Apollo agreed, firmly nodding as he processed connecting the idea of forged evidence to the eternally calm attorney he'd met by the piano. "Of course I will."

"That's my boy," Phoenix said, pulling the teen into a reluctant hug.

Unprepared for the sudden display of familial love, Apollo rolled his eyes. "Thanks, Dad," he sarcastically replied. "I needed my hair ruined and my ribcage crushed today."

"Glad I could oblige," Phoenix laughed, releasing the teen and standing up. "Now, I'd better get downstairs and assure your siblings I'm alright. Coming?" With that, Phoenix left the room.

Sighing, Apollo stood up and brushed himself off. 'It wasn't the secret I was expecting,' he thought to himself, 'but I've got a responsibility now to help Dad keep it.' Nodding to himself, he followed his father back downstairs.

As he entered the door into the kitchen from the laundry, Phoenix was greeted with the loud cries of Apollo and Trucy as they argued over who was making lunch. Luke sat not far away, engrossed in a book at the kitchen table, apparently ignoring the ongoing conversation.

"You are perfectly capable of making a sandwich yourself!"

"But I'm tired!"

"You haven't been doing anything!"

"I've been teaching you magic!"

"Did I ask to have a lesson today?"

"Pfft, you're never getting on stage with that attitude, Polly!"

"Did I ask to go on stage!?"

Hiding a smile, Phoenix walked over, one hand on his hip while the other leaned on the kitchen counter. "Getting along, are we?"

Apollo and Trucy jumped in surprise, looking up at their father and looking like they'd been caught with their hands in the cookie jar. Trucy was the first to recover, giving Phoenix a wide grin. "Oh, hi Daddy!"

Phoenix nodded his acknowledgement of the greeting, then turned to Apollo, who was crossing his arms and pretending not to roll his eyes in his sister's direction. "Actually Apollo, I wanted to talk to you."

"Huh?" Apollo replied, looking up in shock. "About what?"

Turning, Phoenix walked past the table, tapping Luke's head to attract the teen's attention. "You've got a birthday next week, of course," he pointed out, lowering himself into his chair next to Luke's. "Since we can't do anything on the day, I was thinking celebrating next Saturday instead."

Luke blinked in surprise as he felt the tap on his head, looking up at the ongoing conversation and putting his book down as he realised he was being asked to pay attention.

Apollo, following Phoenix around to the table, rubbed the back of his head in thought. "Sounds good," he agreed. "Celebrating how, though?"

"We're a bit old for parties, I think," Luke pointed out.

"But you already have a magician to entertain everyone!" Trucy argued, running around and bouncing on Apollo's arm, to her brother's annoyance. "I haven't gotten to do a party yet!"

Phoenix laughed at Trucy's enthusiasm. "I was actually thinking we could go out somewhere. You could invite your friend Clay, too."

Apollo opened his mouth to respond, but was beaten to the punch by Trucy, still bouncing at his side. "Oh! Oh! We could go to Gatewater Land!"

"Hey, it's my birthday!" Apollo pointed out, elbowing Trucy to stop her tugging on his arm. "I'm deciding what we do!"

"But it's so cool!" Trucy cried. "I went there last year, when Daddy and Uncle Valant were performing there, but I didn't get to see any of it because we were too busy!"

Phoenix tapped his chin in thought. "Ah yes, I think I remember seeing them advertising that when I was there myself..."

Luke frowned. "Does this 'Gatewater Land' have anything to do with the Gatewater Hotel across the street?"

At that, Phoenix couldn't help a laugh. "Yeah, and after all the help we gave them, getting them their popularity! I think they still advertise it, even!"

Trucy huffed, tapping Apollo's arm. "See, Luke hasn't even heard of Gatewater Land! We should totally go!"

Sighing, Apollo shook his head. "Are you just incapable of letting me make my own decision in peace?"

"What do people normally do at sixteen?" Luke wondered aloud. "We could call Clay and ask what he thinks...?"

Apollo thought in silence for a few moments, looking torn. Eventually, he sighed and rolled his eyes. "Fine, we'll go to Gatewater Land."

"YAY!" Trucy cheered, bouncing around the room in glee.

Phoenix nodded. "Alright then." He stood up and headed back into his office. "I'd better look it up, see if anything's changed there over the past year."

"It's a themepark," Apollo explained, taking pity on his brother and briefly sitting in Trucy's chair opposite him. "It's themed on the cops. They made a lot of noise about it when they opened last year, saying it was a thank you for everything the police had done for them."

"Okay," Luke replied, calmly taking in the information. "It's a bit strange for a hotel chain to open a themepark though, isn't it?"

Apollo grinned, resisting a laugh. "Yeah," he agreed. "Actually, I've always been curious to see it. Never got to go before. It should be fun!"
Luke giggled. "I hope so!"

Apparently I'm taking the kids and a friend of theirs to Gatewater Land next week for Law Child's birthday. Interested?

No, thank you. I've had quite enough of that place for one lifetime, and I'm sure you can handle your own children. Provided you don't invite Larry, of course.

I would advise you however to stay away from the haunted house. And the costumed badgers. And not for the reasons you're undoubtedly thinking, I assure you.

Lol! I'm not holding Apollo and Clay back from the haunted house if they want to go, but Luke and Trucy will be happily steering clear of it anyway I think .

We'll avoid the kidnappings and murders, dont you worry Uncle Edgeworth ;).

Very funny, Wright. I hope the children have fun on your outing.

You bet they will :) .

Gatewater Land
Main Gate

Clay stifled a laugh as he recognised the teen in a red cape walking towards him on the bridge in front of the Gatewater Land theme park. "Nice outfit, Gramarye," he said through his hand, failing to hide his grin.

Apollo frowned, pulling the silk top hat further down on his head. "I'm only borrowing it," he mumbled.

"Yup!" Trucy chimed in, bouncing at his side in her identical (although smaller) hat and cape. "I gave him my spare hat and Mister Hat's cape, just for today!"

"Oh?" Clay replied, hiding snickers. "Looks great on you, dude."

Luke joined the trio with a giggle. "You should see what he got from a friend of Nick's!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "You mean the thing that gave Dad a laughing fit when we realised what it was?" He held up the front of Trucy's spare cape for a few moments, pointing Clay to a small circle of cardboard pinned to his shirt.

Unnoticed, by the others, Trucy looked back the way they'd come and promptly dashed off.

Clay frowned at the yellow card for several moments. "What is that?" he asked. "A flower? With scales drawn on it?"

"It's an attorney's badge!" Luke giggled. "Made out of cardboard!"

"Oh!" Clay cried, laughing in surprise. "Man, no wonder you're wearing it, then!"

Apollo turned almost as red as the cape he was throwing back over the fake badge. "Shut up." The moment Apollo had pulled the piece of cardboard from the parcel Maya sent them, the small object had sent Phoenix to the floor in a fit of laughter, although none of his children understood what was quite so funny about it and Phoenix refused to explain, telling Apollo to go ahead and wear it if he wanted to. To Luke, Trucy and Clay, the cardboard badge was only funny in that it was a gift for Apollo the future lawyer, even if said future lawyer didn't see the humour.

"Oh yeah, I have a gift for you, too!" Clay cried, reaching into the bag slung over his shoulder and pulling out a small jar. "Sorry it's just the usual."

Apollo shrugged, accepting the hair gel with a grin. "That's fine. It's all I need, anyway."

"Speaking of fake," Luke spoke up, finger held knowingly in the air, "you might be interested in the book I got for Apollo!"

"He won't," Apollo insisted.

"At least let me hear what it's about!" Clay laughed. "C'mon, what is it?"

Apollo sighed. "It's a look at Greco-Roman myth and astrology."

Clay stared for a second before again having to stifle his laughter. "Oh, right, that fakey-fake fakerson stuff you keep being so interested in?"

"I already know it's fake," Apollo replied, rolling his eyes. "For the last time, I don't take it seriously. It's just interesting."

Luke frowned. "Are we talking about the ancient myths or the astrology here? Because that applies to both."

"Astrology, duh," Clay said, elbowing Luke playfully. "That stuff's, like, an insult to us astronauts! And law-boy here keeps reading it!"

Before Apollo could reply, Trucy returned, Phoenix beside her. "Ah, there you are!" he called as they approached. "You kids should know better than to run off in the middle of a crowd!" He gave Clay a brief nod. "Hello, Clay."

"Hey, Mister Wright!" Clay replied, giving the man a small wave.

"Can we go in now?" Trucy excitedly asked, bouncing to the bridge railing to look down at the rowboats dotted along the canal beneath them. "Ooh, they have boats! Can we ride them?"

"It's Apollo's decision what we do first," Phoenix gently reminded the girl, then turned to look at Apollo. "Any ideas what you want to do?"

Apollo turned to look ahead, where the front gate stood tall just beyond a decorative fountain. "Can we just go in and see what's there first?" he asked.
Phoenix nodded. "We can do that."

"Yay!" Trucy cheered, jumping to Apollo's side and grabbing his arm. "We're going in!"

With that, the group of five headed through into the park.

"This summer is gonna be so fun!" Trucy cried, bouncing ahead of her brothers and Clay as they approached the front doors to one of their favourite hangouts in the local mall. "I only had Daddy to play with last year! We're gonna do lots of fun stuff together, right?"

"Right, Wrights!" Clay replied, laughing as he shot the girl a thumbs-up.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "You're never gonna stop saying that, are you?"

Luke giggled, skipping ahead to Trucy's side as they led the way into the arcade. "Where do you want to start, Trucy? The classics are over there, and then there's the racers section on that side, and the first person shooters on the far wall..."

Clay's attention was caught by a poster in the window of the opposite shop, and he stopped dead, frowning. Apollo, looking back in concern, paused to stay with his friend as Trucy and Luke ran off ahead. "What is it?" he asked.

"I totally forgot," Clay mumbled, gesturing to the poster. "I still have to get my dad something for Father's Day."

"Father's Day is coming up?" Apollo replied, a smile slowly forming on his face. "Hey, this'll be the first year I actually have a father to celebrate it with!"

Clay laughed, slapping Apollo's arm as he turned back to the arcade, slowly catching up to Luke and Trucy. "Congrats on that, dude!" He then shook his head solemnly. "It's not all that great, though. You just get a card, maybe write a little somethin' in it." He shrugged. "My dad always expects something from me, so I just give him the card in the morning and he leaves me alone."

Apollo frowned in thought, arms crossed. "When is it, exactly?"

"This Sunday," Clay replied.

"What?!" Apollo cried in shock, jumping away from his friend with eyes wide. "So soon?!"

Clay nodded nonchalantly. "It's not a big deal, dude. I can take you to get a card today, if you want."

"That's not the point!" Apollo argued, then looked ahead and noticed Luke and Trucy standing at the intersection of the classic games and the racers, discussing where to go first. Shooting Clay a look, he ran up to his younger siblings, making sure he was close enough to be heard over the loud music above them before he started to speak. "Guys! Father's Day is this Sunday!"

"What?!" Luke cried in surprise as he and Trucy spun to face their brother. "Already?!"

Trucy gasped. "Oh! We have to get Daddy something!"

"You guys have had dads before!" Apollo pointed out. "What do you normally do on Father's Day?"
Clay rolled his eyes, standing just far enough away to listen in on the conversation. "You guys are seriously making a big deal out of nothing, I swear."

Ignoring his friend, Luke crossed his arms, thinking to himself. "Well, for my dad, Mum always got a fancy pen for me to give him, and I made a card." He smiled nostalgically. "Sometimes we got him some other small thing too, if he hadn't used up the ink from the last one just yet. He always loved them."

"Mommy always took care of getting a gift for Daddy, too," Trucy agreed, tapping her chin in thought before sadly looking to the floor. "After she disappeared, I never really knew when Father's Day was anymore, so I was never able to get anything for him. I don't think he minded, but..."

"If you want to get something for Nick," Luke continued to Apollo, wringing his hands worriedly, "maybe just you and Trucy should take care of it. I don't know if I really have any right to, since I don't call him 'Dad'."

Apollo frowned, shaking his head. "Nonsense. He adopted you, he counts as a father."

"What do we get him, then?" Trucy asked. "A fancy pen?"

"What did you do last year?" Luke responded. "You passed the one-year mark a few weeks ago, didn't you?"

Trucy shuffled uncomfortably for a few moments. "I didn't realise when it was," she admitted. "We didn't do anything."

Clay groaned dramatically and stomped forward in determination, placing his hands on Apollo and Trucy's shoulders. "Look, Wrights," he said, "you really are thinking too hard on this." He looked down at Trucy. "You didn't do anything last year?" he confirmed.

Trucy nodded.

"Then," Clay continued, looking Apollo and Luke in the eyes, "this will be Mister Wright's first Father's Day too. He won't be expecting anything." He looked between the three, ensuring they all heard his message. "I think he'd be happy enough just getting cards from you guys, as an acknowledgement of what he means to you. You don't need anything big to do that."

There was a long pause as the Wright children thought on their friend's advice. Finally, Luke looked up with a smile. "You know what?" he said. "Clay's just given me the perfect idea!"

My dear Luke,

Apologies for the longer gap than usual between letters; Alfendi has finally arrived back home after overcoming his illness, and he has proceeded to once again take up almost all of my and Flora's free time. Now he's free and able, he's taking every opportunity to crawl all over the apartment. Multiple times, Flora and I have had to pull him out from underneath desks and tables, specifically in my office. He especially loves grabbing for things in there, although when I have handed him objects that would be safe for an infant to hold, he quickly loses interest.

Now that he is feeling better, Alfendi is very quiet. I'm told most children are saying words by this age, but Alfendi seems content to point and glower at us until we guess what he wants. He does grunt during mealtimes if he doesn't like the food, but Flora is always able to get him to at least smile with the way she feeds him. I'm not worried about him, I assure you; All children grow at their own rate, after all.

I'm sure at least some of the news concerning Bill Hawks' trial has reached you in America. Inspector Chelmey invited me to watch the trial in-progress (I suspect I was on a list of potential witnesses they wanted on-hand, just in case), but I wasn't able to make it every day due to Alfendi's illness. Dimitri was called multiple times as the primary witness, and even Clive was brought in once. You might have enjoyed watching it yourself, although it wasn't as exciting as a Witch Trial; I'm certain Mr Wright would have loved to see it, and your brother Apollo. The prosecution is having trouble making any charges related to his own kidnapping stick, as I thought they would, but it seems certain he will finally be facing charges for the explosion eleven years ago.

I'm glad to hear your day out to celebrate Apollo's birthday went well. It seems every time you write, you describe your siblings more and more alike! I suppose that is only natural, speaking from experience as someone who discovered a lost sibling they didn't know existed previously. Apollo is clearly enjoying it himself, if he didn't complain about wearing that magician's outfit you described.

You mentioned in your last letter you were planning to find a way to pay respects on this 'Memorial Day' holiday. Is this the American version of Remembrance Day? I thought I recalled you mentioning Remembrance Day was still a public holiday there, but what for if not remembering the millions lost to war?

The usual puzzles are enclosed. I hope you and all your loved ones are well.

Your friend,

Professor Hershel Layton

Dear Professor Layton,

It's great to hear from you again, Professor! Don't worry about taking so long to reply, I understand if you don't have as much time to anymore.

I'm glad Alfendi is doing well! I admit, I was starting to worry something had happened when I noticed your and Flora's letters were late! It sounds like he likes hiding in the dark. Maybe he feels safer there? I know I do sometimes, especially when I was younger.

I have heard some of what is going on with Mr Hawks' trial. Nick and I usually watch the news together, and it was a great relief when the newswoman finally mentioned it! Even though I've already told Nick all about it, I had to remind him of some things again, because he'd forgotten some details over the past few months. For example, he got Mr Allen and Clive confused! I'll have to look up some of this trial online and see if he's interested in looking at it, and if Apollo is too.

Am I describing Apollo and Trucy as alike? I suppose I must be. They ARE very alike, after all. Apollo may have liked wearing the outfit for a day, but I think he's still wary about being dragged on stage. Trucy seems determined to make it happen, given how often she pulls him into her room to teach him magic, but he seems to be helping her with tricks as well, since she's getting very good with her ventriloquism now. She's not looking off to the side when Mr Hat talks anymore, and she must have found a new way to make him move, because her arm isn't as noticeable!

Memorial Day is essentially the American Remembrance Day, yes. They specifically honour only the soldiers though, and the custom is to go to graveyards and leave little flags on the graves, instead of any kind of service with the poems and the Last Post and the minute silence. They still have a holiday in November, but they call it Veterans Day, and it's to honour returning soldiers, I think. I don't know why it's so different here, but I have decided I will wear Dad's poppy in both May and November, to honour the dead on both days. It seems only right (or 'Wright', as Clay would say!).

Summer holidays have just started, and Father's Day is coming up for us. I don't remember if it's on the same day as back in England, but I think it is. It's Mothering Sunday that on a different date, isn't it? Anyway, this will be a first for Apollo and Nick, and the first time Trucy and I have had to take care of a Father's Day gift ourselves. Trucy lost her mother a few years before her father disappeared, so she hasn't even noticed when it was since then, she says. I wasn't sure at first about getting Nick a card from me, but Apollo and Clay convinced me I should. We're just going to get him cards this year, but we're going to make them special and write messages in them. And I don't mean 'messages' like a simple "thank you", since we did that for his birthday cards, I mean detailed messages thanking him for taking us all in and making us a family. I've already written mine out, but Apollo and Trucy are taking a little longer to get theirs perfect.

Actually, by the time you get this, Father's Day would have already passed. Did Flora get something for you from Alfendi?

I have a few more puzzles than usual, so I hope you and Flora enjoy them in whatever time you have available!

Your friend and apprentice,

Luke Triton

P.S. I really miss Mum and Dad... If it's not too much trouble Professor, could you maybe write about your favourite memories of them in your next letter? Thank you.

Phoenix stretched his arms as he exited the stairs into the apartment's kitchen. In front of him, the children were all huddled around the dining room table, playing a round of Luke's board game, and barely noticed Phoenix as he idly approached.

"No-one's going to Elephant and Castle, are they?" Trucy asked as she moved a red marker to the mentioned station, a hazard card in her hand.

Luke and Apollo shook their heads, then Luke looked up in surprise as he noticed Phoenix. "Oh, hey Nick," he said with a smile.

Phoenix nodded a greeting to the kids as they glanced up at him, still concentrating on their game. "Having fun?" he asked them with a grin. "Who's winning?"

"We only just started, so no-one yet," Apollo explained as the die was passed to Luke. "We actually decided this time to try not to deliberately get in each other's way. See how that strategy turns out."

Chuckling in amusement, Phoenix watched Luke move his piece and pass the die on to Apollo, then moved off towards his office. "Well, have fun then," he called.

"Mmm," Trucy replied, staring at the die in Apollo's hand as he moved to roll it.

Alone in his office, Phoenix shook his head in amusement as he closed the door to the kitchen. ‘Those three always amaze me,’ he mused as he headed to his desk. 'After that first disastrous game, I thought you'd never be able to convince Trucy to play it again, let alone to play non-competitively!' He pulled out his desk chair to sit down, only to pause as he noticed a small pile of envelopes sitting on the seat, face downwards. 'Now that's odd.' He picked the out-of-place objects up and, noticing there happened to be exactly three, flipped through them to see if they were labelled. Sure enough, in three different styles of handwriting, the three envelopes were addressed to 'Dad', 'Nick' and 'Daddy'. 'Why are these...?' Phoenix started to ask himself, then suddenly remembered how he'd only just been reminding himself upstairs to find time to call his father, as today happened to be Father's Day. 'O-oh...'

Phoenix slowly lowered himself into his chair, placing the envelopes gently on the desk in front of him. He supposed it shouldn't surprise him that his three kids would do something on this day in particular, but the fact they did was still a big enough shock to render him speechless for several moments. 'It must be that, even though two of them actually call me 'Dad', it still feels weird to think of myself as their father?' He shook his head, deciding his feelings were too tumultuous to pin down at the moment. 'I should just read these things. Get it over and done with.'

He opened the first letter and pulled out a card within; It was a matte grey, but with a black heart shape in which there was a cut-out message reading "First Father's Day". Phoenix stared at it for a moment, thinking 'Yep, that's certainly true,' then sighed and opened it up. The inside was blank, but there was a small sheet of paper folded up within, printed off from a computer. Frowning in confusion, Phoenix unfolded the paper to read it.

Dad,

I won't deny, the main thing on my mind when I heard you wanted to adopt me was "OMG the famous lawyer Phoenix Wright wants to be my dad!". My favourite guilty pleasure fantasy when I became a fan of yours was that one of my horrid teachers would be murdered and you would be defending the accused, so that we'd get to meet and become friends... even then, though, I always told myself it was unrealistic to dream you'd want to take me in. I thought it was a dream coming true when Luke arranged for me just to meet you, so you can imagine how out-of-the-blue it was to hear you'd taken that next step.

Talking of surprises though, bringing me to Trucy was another one. I liked her plenty when we were just adopted siblings, but learning we were legitimately half-siblings? In retrospect, I can see why you decided to wait to tell us, since that might have overwhelmed me a bit had you told us at the time we met.

The card applies to both of us. I've never had a dad before, after all. Sure, there were foster parents, but I never really had the chance to connect with any of them, not like I have with you, and you're the best dad I could have asked for, even if you can be really annoying or embarrassing sometimes (but I suppose that's in the job description, isn't it?). When I think of you now, I don't think of the case files or the memories of your trials that I got to see, not anymore. I think of my Dad, who took me in even though I'm almost an adult already, who gave me a sister and a brother, who gave me a place I can call home for the rest of my life (even after I eventually move out). You may not be a lawyer anymore Dad, but I don't care, because you'll always be amazing to me. Thank you for teaching me how to spot tells, and for letting me in on your secret investigation, and just in general for everything you've done for me over the past year. There's too much to list!

Happy first Father's Day, Dad. Thank you for everything.

Love,

Apollo

Phoenix rubbed at one eye with a hand, chastising himself for finding it was wet. 'It's just a letter. Sure, it's heartfelt, and Apollo really put his all into it, but...' He shook his head. 'Next one. Move on to the next one.' He put Apollo's card and letter to one side, reaching for the next envelope in the pile and pulling out another card. This one was a pastel green, with "Happy Father's Day" written in pastel blue and a tie pictured next to it. Phoenix only smirked at it before opening the card, not being surprised this time to find the card was again blank and there was a letter folded up inside to replace the message. 'Well, here we go again.' He unfolded the letter to read it.

Nick,

I'm not sure where to begin with this letter. It's still difficult for me to mentally connect 'Phoenix Wright' with 'father', so I wasn't sure at first if it would be at all correct to get you a card for today.
However, Clay and Apollo pointed out to me that you did adopt me, so even if I don't call you 'Dad' or 'Daddy' like Apollo and Trucy, you still count as a father for me, regardless of if my Dad is alive or not.

I already thought of you as a good friend before my parents died, and I think I can safely say we’ve only gotten closer since the adoption. I don't know how I'd be coping with this move to America without the help of you, Apollo and even Trucy, and it was very brave of you to offer to take me in considering how hard it is for us to get by (and you don't have to try to hide that; We can tell and we’re happy to help any way we can). I'm very grateful for the offer of a home, and a brother and sister, and even for the help in investigating what happened to my parents (even though our investigation has stalled rather badly at the moment).

One thing I know for sure is that, if my dad were to appear on our doorstep tomorrow, he would take one look at everything you've done for me since he disappeared, shake your hand and say "Thanks for looking after Luke for me." I couldn't be happier with how everything’s turned out, despite all the hardship it took to get to this point.

Thank you for everything, Nick.

All my love,

Luke

Phoenix smiled as he refolded the letter. 'Poor Luke. He's caught between missing his dad and being nice to me on Father's Day.' He put the card with Apollo's, then turned to the third envelope. The final card was brightly coloured, with 'Daddy' written in large, mismatched lettering as though drawn by a child. 'Fitting.' He shook the card a bit to loose the letter hidden within, then put the card down to open the folded piece of paper and read the contents.

My Daddy!

When my other daddy told me I could trust you, I didn't know exactly what he meant. I miss him a lot since he left, but since I came to live with you, I've gotten two cool older brothers, and one of them even has the same mommy as me! I'll always miss my other daddy, but you being here for me now he's gone is the best thing ever! I promise to do my hardest to look after you and Apollo and Luke, so don't you worry about a thing Daddy, because we'll always be here for you.

We all love you lots and lots and don't you dare ever think we don't, okay?

Your Trucy

PS Please get us a new mommy soon, okay?

'Short and sweet,' Phoenix mused with a teary laugh at the postscript, 'just like the author.' He rubbed at his eyes again as he collected the three cards, wondering what to do with them for a moment before simply turning around and placing them on display on the bookshelf behind him. The letters he left on his desk for the moment, standing up and heading to the kitchen door. 'I have a little something else to do now.'
Trucy wriggled around in an odd sort of seated dance, singing a nonsense song to herself in her own personal celebration. "I wo-on, I wo-on! I won ov-er you two! I won the ga-ame! I beaaat you! I'm the wiinner!"

Luke sighed as he placed his figure just short of its goal. "Nope, I'm definitely in last."

"You never know," Apollo comforted him as he took the die. "I might roll a one, then you might roll another six!"

Luke shook his head, and his feelings were confirmed when Apollo's roll yielded a five, more than enough to move his figure to his final destination. "Yeah, I was never going to get to Putney Bridge and all the way back to King's Cross before you got back to Paddington," Luke pointed out, resting his chin on the table. "It's not your fault, I just got all the bad cards and spent half the game struggling to get this close."

Apollo looked embarrassed, and started to collect together the cards dotted around the table to clear the game away.

Trucy finally took notice of her brothers' progress and stopped her dancing. "Oh hey, did you come second, Apollo?"

"Yup," Apollo said with a nod, still picking up the dropped cards.

"Yay!" Trucy cheered. "I still beat you!" She returned to dancing.

Luke picked his head off the table, pushing his cards towards Apollo and forcing a smile for Trucy. "Congratulations, Truce."

"See what happens when we work together for a change?" Apollo added, shooting his sister a smile as he shuffled the deck of Souvenir cards.

Trucy giggled. "I still wo-on!" she taunted them.

The door to the office opened, and the three children stopped what they were doing instantly to look up, seeing Phoenix standing in the doorway. None of them had forgotten the letters they'd carefully planted twenty minutes ago before setting up to play their game, and they were unsure what to think as they stared up at a somewhat thoughtful-looking Phoenix not far away.

"Hey Daddy!" Trucy called, forcing her biggest smile despite her worry. "I won our game!"

Luke and Apollo carefully got up from their chairs, standing awkwardly. "Did you find our...?"

Luke began to ask before trailing off, fiddling with his hands.

Phoenix nodded, and began to walk towards the trio by the table. "I love the cards," he said. "The letters, though?" He chuckled, stopping near the table by Luke and Trucy. "Those were my favourite part."

Trucy grinned, jumping out of her seat to hug Phoenix tightly around the middle. "Love you, Daddy!" she cried.

Apollo smiled, running around Trucy's seat and joining the hug at Phoenix's side. "Love you, Dad," he echoed.

Phoenix held the two tightly with his right arm, then looked to Luke, holding out his left arm expectantly. The younger teen shuffled awkwardly for a moment before his eyes began to water, and he jumped into the family hug without a word.

"I will never stop loving you guys," Phoenix said, hoping he could adequately reply to their letters all at once without losing his composure. "No matter how bad it gets for us, you three will always make me the proudest father in the world."

It was a long while before Phoenix found the time that day to call his father.
FLASHBACK: Spectre

- Four Years Earlier -

April 22, 6:49PM
Triton Estate
Luke's Room

Luke sat at his small desk, reading through his notebook again as he cramped up against the typewriter that took up most of the table-space. 'I wonder if my letter got to London?' he idly wondered. 'If Mister Layton's going to solve this mystery, he'll need to be here for a spectre attack.'

A scratching at the window alerted Luke's attention, and he jumped from his chair to open the thick blue curtains. Just beyond the glass was a small purple rat with a lick of curled fur on the top of its head, and the boy quickly opened the window a crack, letting the rodent in. Holding out one hand for the rat to jump into, Luke then closed the window and the curtains, carrying his animal friend into the dark room. "What is it, Toppy?" he asked. "Has the spectre changed locations? Is it not appearing in Great Ely Street anymore?"

The rat waved its front legs all around, squeaking madly as it gesticulated to its human friend.

Luke gasped. "People? Coming here? What people!? Who were they!?"

Toppy squeaked a little more.

"A man in a top hat?" Luke repeated, looking thoughtful. "And a woman in a yellow coat?" He bit his lip, staring into space. "I wonder if it could be..."

Suddenly, there was a knock on the door. Luke started, whispering "Someone's here!" and rushing to his chair, where his satchel hung. "Quick, Toppy! Hide!" He held his hands out to his satchel, and the rat squeaked only once before jumping in. Luke thought a moment before grabbing his notebook and sliding it in beside the rat, then pulled the flap over the opening to hide the illegal visitor.

"Luke?" called a voice, slightly muffled through the door. "My name is Hershel Layton. I'm a friend of your father's. Could we talk for a moment?"

Luke gasped. 'It's really him!?' He cleared his throat, standing tall and taking a few steps towards the door. "Certainly," he announced, trying to sound important and aloof. 'Like Dad,' he thought darkly. "But first, you'll have to solve my door puzzle."

"Your... door puzzle?" the man outside the room repeated. He then gently laughed, and it sounded as though he had turned his head to talk to a companion. "I see. Luke means to test our mettle with a puzzle."

"So we shall," Layton agreed, and it sounded as though he was addressing both his friend and the ten-year-old sequestered away in the bedroom.
Luke took a deep breath, and slowly crossed his room to the wall opposite his door, at the end of his bed. He almost stumbled over the violin propped up against the corner, but quickly moved the black case into place again and carefully stepped past it. "If you truly are the esteemed Hershel Layton, then this puzzle should be no problem," he told them, crouching down so he could see the line of light coming through underneath his door, broken only by the shadows of the two people outside. He explained the rules of his carefully thought out riddle, gave them a minute to look around outside his door, and waited for their signal they were ready to solve it.

"You know what you have to do?" the boy asked, staring hard at the light underneath the door.

"I believe so, yes," Layton replied.

Luke instructed them to stand in front of the door. "Remember," he reminded them, "you can't do anything to solve this puzzle." Hoping they'd picked up on the hint, he held his breath and, lacking a watch, began to count. 'One elephant, two elephant, three elephant, four elephant...' As the seconds passed, he kept his gaze firmly on the four breaks in the line of light under his door. Occasionally, he thought he saw one begin to move, but it would always stop. The pair outside didn't make a sound. '"eleven elephant, twelve elephant, thirteen elephant, fourteen elephant... Fifteen elephant.' Luke let out his breath all at once, gasping excitedly as he sat up. "That was what you had to do!" he cried happily.

"You can't do anything to solve this puzzle!," Layton repeated, sounding amused. "Or, in other words, to solve this puzzle, you can't do anything. 'Nothing' was the 'thing' we had to do to solve this riddle. An interesting puzzle, Luke."

Luke couldn't resist blushing from the praise.

"So, even from inside his room, he could hear us if we did something?" the woman mused to herself.

"Now Luke," Layton continued, "are you convinced that we are who we say we are? Will you open the door now?"

'Oh, right!' Luke jumped to his feet. "As I promised," he said, pushing away his excitement to put on his stern airs again as he ran to the door and unlocked it, tugging once on the handle to signal it was open before turning around and running to the window next to his desk. He stood at the small gap in the curtains, staring out across the back gardens and listening as the door to his room slowly creaked open, two sets of footsteps walking in to his bedroom.

The doubts began to circle in his head again. 'What if he decides not to investigate? What if he sides with Dad and says there's nothing going on? What if Dad's already got to him and he's actually in on the whole thing?!' He screwed his eyes shut. 'Stop it, Luke. That's why we're testing him first.' He slowly turned his head, sending a glare to his visitors as he got his first good look at them.

Just as Toppy had said, the man wore a brownish-black jacket over an orange turtleneck, and had a matching black-and-red top hat on his head. The woman had flowing brown hair and a yellow coat, and Luke could see a notepad sticking out of a pocket near where her hands were idling. Although the man, obviously Layton, had his attention fully on Luke, the woman was taking the chance to look around his dark bedroom first.

Luke stared back, eyes narrowing a little as he grunted a quiet reply.
Layton slowly and deliberately reached into his jacket and pulled out a familiar looking envelope. "Your letter. I thought you might want it back."

Gasping, Luke half spun around to face the pair. 'How'd he...!?'

The woman looked intrigued. "Professor, you think Luke wrote the letter?"

Layton smiled as he held the opened envelope out for her to look at. "Clark was never a fan of typed correspondence." He looked back towards Luke. "He always wrote his letters out in longhand." The letter was replaced in his jacket. "Moreover, only someone very close to Clark would know about our past together. This someone would know I could never ignore a friend in need."

Luke continued to stare at the man, resisting the urge to smile proudly. 'I knew I made the right choice in who to ask.' "Are you really Professor Layton?" he asked, properly turning to finally face his visitors full-on.

"Is this true, Luke?" came a voice from the hallway, and Luke gasped again in surprise before levelling his sternest glare in the direction of the door. In walked a tall man in a blue suit and sporting a full, brown beard, pushing his way through the two visitors to sternly confront his son. "How could you do something like this?" He held out his hands, almost pleadingly, unfazed by the loathing coming from Luke. "What were you thinking? Were you even thinking at all!?"

Without a word, Luke turned around to stare back out his window. He had nothing to say to his father.

"Here, now," Clark said, a warning tone in his voice, "don't you turn your back on me again!"

"Clark, please," Layton interrupted.

Luke heard his father sigh, then turn to face his friend. "Forgive me," he said. "The boy has barely spoken to me in the last six months. He's been so withdrawn since the appearance of the spectre, I don't know what else-"

"Very soon," Luke said, bringing his father's frustrated rambling to an instant halt. He gathered up all the hatred he could muster and directed it into his next sentence. "The world will end." He heard his visitors quietly gasping in surprise, but Clark made no sound.

"The end of the world?" Layton repeated. "What do you mean by that?"

"I mean what I just said," Luke mumbled, keeping his gaze levelled out the window. It wasn't pretty, but all likely scenarios he had laid out led to it.

The woman scoffed. "Luke, you can't say something like that and not elaborate," she told him.

Clark sighed. "He just won't open up to anyone," he said, and Luke heard him turn away from the window, seemingly deciding to ignore Luke as Luke was ignoring him. "He wasn't always like this. When he does speak, it's only to say something inscrutable, as you just saw." He scoffed. "Prophecies... absurd."

"Prophecies?" Layton repeated, sounding intrigued.

"It's all my fault," Clark sighed, and for a moment Luke almost felt sorry for him, before hurriedly pushing the thought from his head.

"What are you talking about, Clark?"
There was a short pause. "I'm sorry. I have urgent business I must attend to in my study." Luke felt a wave of relief as he heard his father leaving the room. "We can discuss this later." He paused at the door, and Luke turned his head only a little to see his father watching him from the doorway. "Luke, Mister Layton is a close friend. Please talk with him. Perhaps you could even help him." He didn't seem to expect a reply, as he immediately turned to Layton. "Thank you, Hershel." With that, he was gone.

Luke quietly sighed to himself as he looked back out the window, trying to keep from dwelling on the problem of his father. 'I don't have the time to worry about things like that right now...'

Another set of footsteps entered the room, and Luke heard their butler Doland announce, "I'm afraid that it is time for Master Luke to retire."

'What, now?' Luke objected to himself, turning around to face his room again.

"What, now?" the woman protested, and Luke almost spoke up in annoyance that she had voiced his thoughts. "We're right in the middle of something! It's still light out!"

"Nevertheless, it is bedtime," Doland continued, stepping into the room and beginning to pull back the covers on Luke's bed.

Layton thought a moment. "If I may, Doland," he said, "I'd like to ask Luke just one more thing." Without waiting for a reply, he turned to the ten-year-old. "Luke, though the town has been repeatedly attacked by the spectre, no one has been injured. It seems than an oracle alerts the townspeople about which areas to evacuate from." Luke stole a glance at his satchel, then to Doland. "Luke, I believe that you are this oracle. Am I correct?"

"What!?!" the woman cried.

"Absurd!" Doland scoffed.

Luke fidgeted uncomfortably where he stood.

"Luke," Layton continued, "I must ask you a very important question: Do you know when the spectre will appear next?"

Doland stepped in front of the boy. "Master Luke will not stand for such balderdash," he insisted. "Please leave at once!"

Luke thought only a moment, then looked up, a stern frown of determination on his face. "Tonight," he said.

Doland stepped back, all three adults looking down at the boy in surprise.

"But," the woman breathed, "how could you know that?"

Layton gripped the brim of his hat, thinking to himself. "Tonight..."

"If you want, I can also show you where it will appear next," Luke offered, trying to keep the hopeful tone out of his voice. He didn't want to admit he missed wandering the world outside his bedroom.

"I would very much like that, Luke," Layton replied, smiling as he nodded his thanks to the boy.
Doland laughed uncomfortably. "Master Luke! This joke is in poor taste!"

Luke shuffled nervously. "Please don't tell my father about this, Doland," he begged.

"Master Luke," the butler sighed, "I... Are you certain this is okay?"

Nodding firmly, Luke answered, "Yes. Did you tell the townspeople? About the spectre?"

Doland smiled kindly, nodding back. "I did, just as before. I will make a final tour of the area to ensure everyone has gone."

"But then, where will the spectre appear tonight?" the woman asked.

"Then we must go now," Layton decided, taking a step towards the door. "Even if we can't stop the spectre, we must confirm Luke's prediction." He walked out of the room, the woman close on his heels. Luke quickly grabbed his satchel off his chair, taking care not to jostle Toppy inside as he hurried after his new friend.

"Good luck," Doland quietly called after them, before turning and beginning to re-make Luke's bed.

Luke couldn't help but feel a bit uncomfortable as he sat on the blanket in the heavily crowded park. In the sky, the sun was setting behind the buildings to the west, and flashes were visible in the streets as people saw the fading light and lit up various fireworks of their own. Trucy was bouncing on her tip-toes to spot the pre-show antics, eager to see as much of the excitement as she could before Phoenix dragged her back home to bed. Not far away, Apollo and Clay were amusing themselves playing rock-paper-scissors, although Apollo seemed to be having more fun as he was winning every round, laughing at Clay's grumbling as he again chose poorly and accused his friend of somehow cheating. Phoenix was seemingly engrossed in a book, but Luke spotted him frequently glancing up to check on the four kids under his care. Despite lacking his favourite hoodie, he still seemed hot in the beanie he refused to remove, more concerned with being recognised than with his own comfort.

It wasn't the heat of the midsummer night that was making Luke uncomfortable (although it didn't help). It also wasn't the crowds, as Luke was used to them from his time in London. No, what was bothering Luke was more the atmosphere of this unique American holiday he was experiencing for the first time. Everywhere he looked, he saw white stars on blue backgrounds, stripes of red and white, painted faces and flags of every size and shape being either worn or simply waved in the air. To be honest, it was seeing that flag plastered over every available surface that he was finding rather creepy.

Desperate for something else to look at, Luke pulled his phone out of his pocket and opened up the texting app, tapping out a short message.

Hey Maya. Anything happening in Kurain tonight? I need a distraction.

He sighed as he hit 'send', staring at the screen as the text flew off into the digital void. 'Don't know how long it will take her to respond, but it's worth a try anyway.' He frowned in thought. 'Do they even celebrate this... whatever-it-was-called holiday in Kurain? The village seems so... Japanese-style? Chinese? Some kind of Asian. I should really set aside some time to research and learn how to tell those apart.'

Clay huffed as he lost yet another round of his game, looking over to his other friend. "Hey, Luke, can I play with you for a bit? 'Pollo here has to be cheating!"

"I am not!" Apollo insisted, though the laughter he was struggling to talk through said otherwise. "You're just really bad at this!"

"Yes!" Clay cried, eagerly jumping to his feet and rushing over to sit next to Luke, holding his fist out ready for a game. "Ready?"
Nodding, Luke held out a fist to mirror Clay's, and the pair moved their hands up and down, chanting, "Scissors, paper, rock!" On the final word, Luke spread his hand out flat, while Clay stuck out two fingers. There was a moment's pause before Clay laughed, throwing his arms into the air and crying "I won! I finally won!"

Luke giggled, glancing over to Apollo to see his brother rolling his eyes good-naturedly. Before he could say anything in response, the phone in Luke's pocket buzzed, and the teen quickly pulled it out to read the screen.

Not much. Me and Pearly are watching fireworks on tv. You okay kiddo?

"What is it?" Clay asked, leaning forward curiously as he spotted the device in Luke's hand.

Luke pulled the phone away, shoving it back in his pocket as he remembered Maya's warning. "Nothing," he insisted, but quickly relented enough to add, "Talking to someone."

Clay frowned a moment, then shrugged and dropped the subject. "Another round?" he offered, holding out his fist again.

Sighing, Luke shook his head. "I'm not in the mood. Sorry, Clay."

Apollo and Clay glanced at each other, concerned. "You alright?" Apollo asked.

"I'm fine," Luke replied, looking away and not caring if the lie was seen through or not. "Just tired."

"Ohhh, I get it!" Clay suddenly cried, grinning at Luke. "You're English! You have to be sad on the day England lost her greatest colony, huh?"

Luke frowned as his friend laughed. "Why would I care about that?" he pointed out. "All the colonies got independence sooner or later."

Clay's laughter ended somewhat awkwardly. "Dude, I was joking," he mumbled, wincing.

Apollo moved over to sit by his two closest friends. "Do you want to talk about it?" he asked his brother. "Maybe do a Chords of Steel session?"

There was a short pause before Luke shook his head. "There's nothing you guys can do, anyway. I'll be okay."

Suddenly, a bright light from the distance attracted the trio's attention, and they looked up to the dark sky as three fireworks whistled above them, exploding in a beautiful display of red, white and blue light. Trucy squealed in delight as she ran around to find the best viewpoint on their blanket, watching the sky as more and more lights whizzed by overhead, popping in a rhythm only professional displays ever managed to achieve.

Luke watched the fireworks for a moment before looking over to Phoenix, who had put his book away to peer up at the display thoughtfully. "Nick?" he called.

Phoenix looked over to the teen. "Hmm?"

"Is it alright if I just go home?"
Phoenix thought a moment before frowning in concern. "You okay?"

"I'll be fine," Luke promised, forcing a smile.

Seeming reassured, Phoenix nodded and pulled out a set of keys from his pocket, holding it out for Luke to take. "Be careful of the fireworks on the way, huh?"

Luke stood, taking the keys. "I will," he agreed, then turned to Apollo and Clay, deciding not to interrupt Trucy's enjoyment of the display above them. "I'll see you two later."

Although they looked worried for him, Apollo and Clay gave Luke a nod, watching silently as he turned and walked away.

Was Luke texting you? He seems down, and he's gone home just as the fireworks started

He has? He did send me a message and I thought he sounded kinda down. Any idea what the matter is?.

Thats what I was asking you! No idea?

It IS independence day. Maybe he misses England?.

Thats a possibility I spose. I'd better make a note not to invite him out to celebrations in future

I could offer to let him call the Prof but he'll be asleep atm and Luke seems to think he'll be fine on his own Yknow what? I think I have an idea.

Oh no

What 'oh no'? I'm inviting you guys up to Kurain again!

You have time off to do that?

I'm making time. Luke needs me!

We can make it over Pearlys birthday okay?

... You can just MAKE time to see us?

Get with the program Nick! This is an emergency!

I'll get back to you tomorrow with dates and times! Enjoy the fireworks!

July 4, 8:21PM
Luke sighed as he entered his bedroom, flicking the last of the long line of light switches he'd passed on his way from the front door. He took only a few steps in the direction of his bed before tripping over the sleeping bag on the floor, remembering too late that Clay was sleeping over for the night to watch the firework display in People Park with them. Shaking his head at his own clumsiness, Luke stepped over the temporary bedding and headed over to his own, sitting on the edge only briefly before deciding to lie down on top of the covers, staring at the ceiling.

He was sitting in his favourite corner of the living room, his nose in a book while his mother dusted the ornaments as she rearranged them on the nearby dresser. The house was quiet, as it normally was, and the young boy was enjoying the chance to read without any interruptions.

From upstairs, there was a loud thudding of someone coming down the stairs, and Luke recognised the rhythm of the footsteps as belonging to his father. He looked up, seeing the sound attracting his mother's attention as she turned away from her chore and moved towards the door.

"Brenda!" came a call from the hallway, and a moment later the door opened, a man in a white shirt and a loose red tie flung himself into the room, looking around for a second before he spotted his wife standing nearby, arms crossed. "Brenda, you will not believe the horrid news I was just listening to over the wireless!"

"Oh?" Brenda replied, arms uncrossing as she began to look worried. "What?"

Clark groaned angrily, throwing his hands into the air. "Yet another group of racist, flag-waving wankers causing a riot somewhere in the world, burning buildings, shooting innocent people by the dozen!" Not noticing his wife's face darkening, he wagged a finger knowingly. "I keep saying this is what happens when people put any kind of foolhardy pride into a bloody strip of fabric, but no-one listens to sense, do they!? They just let these idiots hide behind nationalism to excuse their own behaviour! Bloody bo-!"

"Clark, would you watch your language around our son?" Brenda quietly interrupted, glaring at her husband.

The man paused in surprise, suddenly noticing the six-year-old sat nearby, watching the conversation curiously. "Oh... I didn't see you there, Luke," he told the boy with an embarrassed smile.

Young Luke cocked his head to one side curiously. "What's a 'wanker'?"

"It's a word we don't use," Brenda replied, shooting another dark look at Clark while he winced uncomfortably. "Ever."

Luke thought a moment before nodding. "Okay. Why are they waving flags?"

Clark huffed, crossing his arms. "Never put too much pride into the Union Jack, Luke. People who put pride in flags generally end up attaching the worst of beliefs to it."

"Like what?" the boy asked.
"Like that killing people who are different from them is a good thing," Clark solemnly explained. "You know better than that, don't you?"

Luke nodded fiercely. "That's just mean!" he told his parents with a firm nod and the sternest glare he could manage. "Why do they do that, anyway?"

Brenda shook her head. "Who knows?" she replied. "Besides, the Union Jack is the one flown at sea," she chided Clark, nudging his arm with a smile. "It's the Union Flag on land. I didn't think Luke was at all desperate to be a sailor, last I checked."

Clark chuckled, giving his wife a loving look. "You always choose the best time to make me look like a fool, don't you?"

Luke rubbed at his eyes, pretending he didn't notice his arm came away wet, and rolled over to stare at his bedside table. The bronze statuette he'd been given for his last birthday had pride of place next to the lamp, and at its foot had been left the plastic poppy and goofy-looking phoenix pin. After retrieving the items from his parents' suitcases last year, Luke hadn't had the heart to put them away again, so they now sat in the open where he could look at them. He briefly debated getting up to retrieve the photo album in the bottom drawer, but decided ultimately he didn't want to make the effort to actually move and stayed put.

'It's not just Dad though,' Luke told himself. 'Here, they hang their flag in classrooms, and say a pledge to it every morning... Don't they find that weird? It's like you're not allowed to have a problem with it, or you're alienated and... ' He sighed, unable to finish his thought. 'I miss Guy Fawke's Day. At least then it was fireworks without any flags. And bonfires.'

The phone in his pocket buzzed, and Luke pulled it out to find a text from Phoenix.

Trucy and I are on our way back. Can you make sure the door is open for us?

Making one last rub at his eyes to ensure they were dry, Luke quickly tapped out a reply and got out of bed to head downstairs.

I'll wait for you in reception. See you in a minute, Nick.
The Channelling Chamber

Be sure to bring a photo of your parents with you to Kurain okay?.

Why?

Cuz me and Pearly want to know more about them of course! Didn't Nick say you have a whole album of pictures?.

Yes, I do. Why are you so interested in them?

I need a reason to have an interest in something now? ;) Just make sure you bring it along Luke.

Fey Manor
Hallway

Luke had just woken up and was stumbling towards the kitchen with a yawn when he was suddenly accosted by an energetic spirit medium in purple.

"Luke, I've been thinking on it for a while, and I think I've finally hit upon an answer!" Maya explained, grabbing Luke's arms. "I can actually help you! And I think you'll like this, too!"

"Huh?" Luke mumbled, still half-asleep.

"I'll explain later!" Maya promised, patting Luke's shoulders and running off. "Be ready once I'm done with my preparations, okay?"

Luke shook his head, still highly confused. 'Thinking on what? What answer?' They'd arrived in Kurain only the previous day, and he'd thought at the time that Maya was treating him oddly, almost carefully, as though he might break down in tears at any moment. 'I'm not some fragile doll,' he angrily mused to himself, rubbing the sleep from his eyes as he returned to his walk. 'I wonder if this has anything to do with how she was so excited to look at Mum's photo album last night...?'

July 15, 10:40AM
Fey Manor
Meditation Room

"We're ready!" came the cry throughout the mansion, and the four Wrights and two Feys gathered in the Meditation Room at the front door. The forbidding, thick wooden doors nearby, which had been locked tight until now, were open, revealing a dark, windowless room beyond. Pearl looked excited, Phoenix stern, and Apollo and Trucy simply confused, while Maya was almost as excited as she'd been that morning, running to Luke and grabbing his hands. "I have a little surprise for you," she told the teen. "It may or may not be pleasant, but I think it's exactly what you've been needing the past year."

Releasing her grip from the confused Luke, Maya pulled an important-looking black key from her sleeve and handed it to Phoenix, who held it tightly, as though it might fly away should he not be careful. She gave him no instruction, so Luke presumed this was something they had done before.

Maya didn't reply. With a sad smile, she took Luke by the hand and led him through into the small room, closing the doors behind them.

Luke looked around warily. The room was a lot brighter than he expected, lit by maybe a hundred small candles dotted all around the floor. At the far wall was an old-looking paper screen, behind a small shrine of more small candles. On the floor were paper mats, soft to the teen's bare feet.

Having released Luke's hand, Maya quickly tip-toed to the paper screen, checking the inky blackness between it and the wall, then moved to kneel down on the mats with her back to the candle-shrine, patting the floor in front of her to invite Luke to join her. "This is the Channelling Chamber," she told him. "Don't be scared. We're not doing anything yet."

Luke thought a moment before gingerly kneeling down on the paper mats, as close to Maya as was comfortable. "What is this about?" he warily asked.

Maya sadly smiled. "I've never fully explained to you what it really means when I say I'm a spirit medium, have I?"

Frowning in confusion, Luke paused before he replied, "Spirit mediums supposedly talk to the dead, don't they?"

"'Supposedly'?” Maya repeated, an eyebrow raised.

Luke blushed in embarrassment. "Uh, well, not to offend you, I just-!"

"It's alright," Maya laughed. "We've probably heard worse insults over the years!"

"I'm sorry," Luke mumbled, staring at the floor as he tried to force the red from his face.

"I just said, it's fine," Maya insisted, leaning forward to rub Luke's arm comfortingly. "Here in Kurain though, we do a little more than just talk to the dead."

Luke looked up curiously, unsure if he wanted to believe what Maya, friend or not, was saying right off the bat.

Maya held her hands together in her lap, looking a little unsure of herself. "I-I know you don't know for sure if your parents are alive or dead at this stage, but, y'know, I figure it's a win-win if I-"

"They're probably dead," Luke darkly interrupted, again staring at his lap. "I know."

There was an awkward silence for a few moments before Maya again spoke. "I can try to channel them. They'll take over my body for a little while, give you a chance to talk to them. If you want to."
Luke didn't respond.

"I can only channel one at a time, though," Maya continued, clutching her hands together tightly. "Do you want me to go ahead?"

It was a long time before Luke made a move, raising one arm from his lap to rub at his eyes. "I do. I need to apologise to Dad," he mumbled, trying to hide the hitch in his voice. "I want to talk to Mum, but... Dad's more important first."

Maya nodded, giving Luke a sympathetic smile even though he couldn't see it. "I remember what he looks like," she said. "And his name's Clark, right? Just so I know who I'm looking for."

"Mmm," Luke replied with a small nod, forcing himself to sternly look up to Maya's face despite his damp eyes. "A-and, I'll know if you've faked it, okay?"

Maya couldn't resist a small laugh, assuring her friend, "Oh, don't worry; If it doesn't work, it will be obvious!" She shuffled in her seat a little, holding her hands together in front of her chest and taking a deep breath to calm herself. "Normally," she whispered conspiratorially, giving Luke a wink, "we ask visitors to close their eyes as well, to help convince any shy spirits to drop by, but I don't mind if you want to keep yours open. I don't think your dad will be shy of you, huh?"

Luke forced a nervous smile, gripping his knees as he watched his friend. She closed her eyes and concentrated, fingers interlocking into fists until only her pointer fingers were still extended. Despite the frown in her eyes, her face otherwise looked totally serene. Luke was sure it was just his imagination, but it seemed the hundred individual little flames in the candles around them flared at the same moment, and collectively got brighter.

Despite his intention to watch Maya closely for any trickery, Luke found himself losing his nerve and moving his gaze down to the floor, seeing only her knees opposite his.

'I hate to not trust her completely, but I have to be certain she isn't trying to give me false comfort! What's a question I can ask Dad to ensure it's him if this succeeds?' As he ran through possibilities in his mind, his attention was then called back to the floor he was staring at, as he noticed something was strangely off about Maya's knees.

'Wait, I didn't think Maya's legs were quite that...'

As he watched, her hands lowered into view, untangling themselves from each other, and Luke suddenly realised those were not Maya's hands.

"Luke...?"

Luke's gaze shot up, and the teen found himself staring into his father's beardless face ('Dad looks super weird without his beard.'), looking down on him with wonder from underneath Maya's black fringe. 'H-how...!?'

Clark chuckled, shaking his head. "My goodness, Luke, look at how you've grown! How long has it been?"

A part of Luke's mind jumped to work, figuring out a laundry list of possible explanations for what he was seeing. 'Hallucinogenic gas? Hypnotism? Body-swap with a look-alike and a sound-alike feeding them lines?' The rest of him, however, was overcome with shock, and quietened the doubts the more he stared at the figure kneeling before him. Finally, he tossed any doubts or suspicions of trickery from his head and threw himself into his father's arms, loudly sobbing, "I'm so sorry!"

Clark grunted a bit as he suddenly found a crying fourteen-year-old huddling against his chest, but he was quick to hug Luke tightly and offer comfort. "Luke, you have nothing to apologise for," he assured his son. "I should be apologising for not being there for you!"
Luke shook his head fiercely, almost pulling his hat off as he rubbed it against Clark's chest. "I was mad at you!" he pointed out. "And then you died! You're dead and I was still mad at you!"

"Oh, Luke!" Clark mumbled in comfort, pulling Luke tighter towards him. "I never blamed you for being mad. I was dragging you away from England, from Hershel and Flora, from all our old friends in Misthallery! Of course you would take a while to warm up to the idea!"

Luke sniffed a little before slowly nodding. He had to admit, it was a relief to hear those words being said with his father's voice.

"Aside from what happened to me, how are you?" Clark continued. "How's your mother? Are you doing well?"

At that, Luke frowned, leaning back from his father to look up at his face in confusion. "Isn't... Mum dead too?"

Now it was Clark's turn to look confused. "I haven't seen her," he admitted with a shrug. "I assumed you were both together, after we got pulled from the car."

Luke paused a second, then jumped to his feet, searching his pockets for his notebook. A moment later, he'd pulled out a pen to accompany it, and dropped back to the paper mats as he flipped the worn blue notebook open. "Dad," he instructed as he readied his pen, "tell me everything you remember about the accident! From beginning to end!"

Clark was still confused, but shook his head and decided to acquiesce to Luke's request.

"Well, it makes sense you don't remember it," Clark began, thoughtfully. "You were asleep at the time, if I recall." He crossed his arms. "I was driving. Your mother and I were chatting between ourselves to pass the time." He smiled to himself at the memory, then frowned. "Then... that thing appeared."

"Thing?" Luke repeated, writing down small, hurried notes of his father's words into his notebook. "Like a lorry?"

Clark shook his head, sending Maya's long hair waving about his shoulders. "No, the silhouette was wrong for a lorry," he replied. "It was... tall. Wide enough to take up the whole road. The headlights were in entirely the wrong places; It looked like they were even moving independently."

Luke hummed to himself in thought as he noted down the observations.

"I tried to swerve out of the way, but I don't think I got very far," Clark continued. "It was like it... moved suddenly at the last second, to meet us just before we hit the trees." He sighed. "I'm sorry I can't be of any more help."

"It's okay, Dad," Luke assured him, smiling as he continued to write. "Every little bit helps in an investigation!"

Clark chuckled. "I'm sure," he agreed. "After that is a bit fuzzy, I'm afraid. I don't recall the accident itself. My next memory is of being pulled from the car by the rescuers."

Luke tapped his pen against his chin in thought. "Do you know how long that was after the crash?"

"Not too long," Clark replied. He reached up to rub his chin, only to be surprised when his hand met bare skin instead of hair, and, looking somewhat perturbed, crossed his arms tightly to keep himself from dwelling on it. "It was still dark. Your mother was awake, I remember, talking to me." He frowned. "She'd cut something. She had blood streaming down her arm." He shook his head at the memory. "The men... I think they were men... They were all in leather uniforms. They took us into the forest a little way and left us there for a while, I assumed to go get you. I tried to talk to them, but they just told me to rest."

Luke paused in his writing momentarily as he realised why the bracelet they'd found had been so badly blood-stained. He briefly wondered what had happened to it after Phoenix handed it off to Gumshoe.

"I'm sure I'm misremembering things," Clark continued warily, "but I seem to recall that the men who rescued us all had the same face... but different voices."

"That's odd," Luke agreed, noting the fact down. "They must have been disguising themselves for some reason."
Clark shrugged. "I admit, I found myself a bit suspicious when they came back with syringes." He shivered. "I was too weak to stop them, but they injected us with something." He sighed. "The last thing I saw before I lost consciousness was your mother reaching under a bush. I must have passed on before I had the chance to wake up again."

Luke smiled, realising Brenda had been deliberately leaving them a clue with the loss of her bracelet. The syringes, though, were an equally important clue that needed attention. "They weren't real rescuers," he pointed out.

"I realise that now," Clark sighed. "I was hoping for the best, but if your mother is still missing out there..." He paused, looking down at Luke with a confused frown. "What happened to you? Surely someone's looking after you until your mother is found!"

Luke winced, abandoning his notebook for the moment. "Dad, as far as the authorities are concerned," he explained, "you and Mum were killed in the crash. Nobody ever found your bodies."

Clark blinked in surprise. "Never...?"

"I've been fine, I promise," Luke continued. "They found me in the car the next morning, and took me to the hospital. I've..." He paused, nervously avoiding his father's gaze. "I've been adopted. By a friend of mine. I don't know if you remember me talking about him or not."

After a short pause, Clark chuckled. "You'd have to tell me his name for me to answer that," he pointed out, then looked around the room curiously. "Where are we, by the way? If we were back in England, surely Hershel would be looking after you."

Luke smiled. "Still in California," he answered. "My friend lives here. His..." He paused again. "When the Professor and I were in Labyrinthia, we met them there. Maya's a spirit medium," he gestured to Clark's purple dress, "and Nick's... Mister Wright... he used to be a lawyer."

Clark picked at the kimono as though only just noticing it, then turned his attention back to his son. "Is he looking after you? Are you happy?"

Luke thought a moment, then shyly nodded.

"Then I have nothing to complain about," Clark decided, hands clutched together in his lap.

Luke looked up in surprise. "You don't?"

Clark laughed. "You think I'd be upset someone was looking after you now that I can't anymore?" he asked with a knowing smile. "I remember how you raved about this 'Mister Wright' and how talented he was. Considering the circumstances, it sounds like you couldn't have a better father!"

Biting his lip, Luke looked away. "Fathers Day was last month," he said. "I almost didn't get Nick anything."

"Ah, it's July, is it?" Clark deduced with a smile, crossing his arms. "Can't be more than a year since I last saw you, so it must be twenty-twenty, correct?"

Luke frowned. "Dad, you're getting off-topic!"

Clark laughed in response, reaching out to ruffle Luke's hair. "Ah, I see. I'm still 'Dad', but your new father is only 'Nick'." His smile tightened a bit in concern. "You know I don't mind that you have a new 'Dad', Luke. You don't have to wait for my permission to accept him."
Fiddling with his hands, Luke looked away nervously. "But I already have a 'Dad'," he quietly argued, trying to hold back the tears pricking at the corners of his eyes as he edged closer to his father's side. "I don't want to forget you, Dad..."

Clark gently pulled Luke back into a hug. "And I know you never would," he replied. "If you don't want to, you don't have to call this Nick 'Dad'. I called my own father 'Pop', for example."

Luke sniggered. "'Pop' is what I called him, too!" he pointed out.

"True," Clark said with a laugh. "Maybe not the best suggestion I've ever had, then!" He hugged Luke in silence for a few more moments. "Think about it, though. Discuss it with him. Oh, and," he lifted Luke's chin with a finger to look his son sternly in the eye, "you tell this 'Nick' he better look after you, or I'll be haunting his nightmares."

Luke grinned. "Don't worry, Dad. Even if Nick's busy, Apollo and Trucy are always there!"

Clark frowned and tensed up, confused. "Who?"

"Apollo and Trucy!" Luke repeated, pulling away to give his father a big grin. "They're half-siblings, and Nick adopted them too, so they're my new brother and sister!" He giggled. "Apollo's a little older than me, but Trucy's turning nine in August!"

Clark relaxed with a soft laugh. "Ah, the one thing your mother and I never gave you: Brothers and sisters!" he joked.

Luke giggled for a moment, then quietened and leaned back in to hug Clark again. "I suppose I could call Nick 'Papa'," he mused aloud. "Trucy's hat that she made for him says that, even though she calls him 'Daddy'." He smiled to himself, snuggling his father tightly. "I love my two dads."

"And the both of us love you right back." Clark returned the hug, although his sincere smile soon changed into a concerned frown. "I think my time here is running out," he said.

Luke froze in shock, then looked up at Clark with wide eyes. "So soon!?"

Clark held Luke's face, giving his son a tearful smile. "Never forget I love you, son. You look after your new family. Continue doing your best to find your mother."

Luke nodded, blinking away his own tears. "B-but I want you to help me, Dad!"

Sniffing, Luke clutched his father tightly, unable to restrain his sobs. "I love you too, Dad..."

The hug continued for uncountable moments, the hand on Luke's head patting him comfortingly, and Luke focussed on it so he wouldn't know exactly when Clark's spirit left Maya's body. He didn't want to have to say goodbye to his father again, not so soon after learning he was never going to be finding him alive.

The hand moved from his head to wrap around Luke, and the teen quickly noticed how different this hug felt to Clark's bearhugs, letting out another round of sobs as he knew his father was gone.

"It's okay," Maya murmured from above his head. "You let it out, Luke. No one will judge you."

It was several minutes before Luke calmed down enough to pull himself together. Maya didn't say a word until her young friend was finally sitting in front of her again, his face dry (despite his red eyes) and his arms gleaming in the candlelight with the thin layer of salt water covering them. Her own kimono was a little wet around the chest area, but she didn't seem to mind, smiling sympathetically at Luke.

"If you don't want to just yet," she offered, "I can try for your mother in another few hours. Give you time to calm down."

Luke thought for a moment, busying himself by picking up the abandoned notebook and pen on the floor. "What happens," he slowly asked, "if you try to channel someone who's still alive?"

Maya cocked her head in surprise. "The channelling fails," she answered. "Did I not manage to explain that before I channelled your dad?"

"I might have interrupted you," Luke replied, mind already whirring on his next question.

"Oh, okay," Maya replied, frowning to herself. "You think your mom might be...?"

Luke nodded. "Dad thought she was still alive. He said something about not having seen her."

Maya thought a moment, then slowly smiled. "You want me to check if she's there or not?"

"If you can," Luke replied, blushing a little. "I was going to ask if it was possible to see she was there without channelling her."

"Of course it is!" Maya chirped, then jumped back into her 'channelling' pose, hands together with index fingers pointing to the ceiling. "Her name's Brenda, right? I remember what she looked like."

Maya closed her eyes, concentrating as she went totally still. The only sound in the dark room was the crackling of the candles and the pair's breathing.

Luke waited impatiently, staring at Maya and holding his hands together to keep from making any distracting noises. His notebook in his lap was pressed tight into his legs to keep it from slipping, his pen clutched in one fist. The candlelight played against the features of Maya's face, tricking Luke multiple times into thinking he could see his mother's nose or eyes, before he realised his mistake and saw only Maya's calm face.

It seemed to be forever before Maya gradually relaxed, her hands drifting down towards her lap as her eyes opened. She stared off into the distance for a moment in thought, then looked up to meet Luke's excited gaze, and slowly smiled. "I can't find her," she announced. "I think your mother's still alive!"

Phoenix had been pacing back and forth in front of the chamber doors for a while now, methodically tapping the key in his hand against his palm. Once he'd helped Pearl explain what was going on to Apollo and Trucy, he'd quickly taken to the nervous pacing, a distracted frown on his face. Pearl still looked excited, fiddling with her hands as she sat on the floor where she'd led her honorary cousins once the doors to the Channelling Chamber had closed. "It's been so long since we used the Channelling Chamber!" the birthday girl squeaked. "Mystic Maya is so busy nowadays, it's always the elders handling clients!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, turning his gaze from Trucy drawing on his left to Pearl on his right. "Are you okay with this happening today?" he asked.

Pearl frowned. "What do you mean by that, Apollo?"

"It's your birthday," Apollo pointed out with a shrug. "I'd've thought you wouldn't want to be overshadowed or something."

"No...?" Pearl replied, looking confused. "I may be turning ten, but today is just a day." She then smiled again. "And we're making Luke happy! That's the important thing!"

Trucy looked up from her paper, covered in pencil scribbles. "But didn't you say that if Miss Maya channels his mom and dad, that means they're actually dead?" she asked. "I thought he said they were still alive!"

"That's the thing, we don't know," Apollo answered, giving his sister a sad shake of the head. "Not knowing if they're alive or dead is probably a worse feeling for Luke than knowing for sure if they're dead or simply missing." He crossed his arms, thinking. "Actually, it's a worse feeling in general, not knowing that kind of thing for sure."

Trucy frowned to herself, then returned to her drawing.

Finally, the forbidding double doors began to open with a conspicuous creak. Everyone in the room paused, looking up expectantly as first Maya then Luke emerged from the room. Maya gave them all a reassuring calm smile, while Luke seemed deep in thought, his eyes red from crying.

Phoenix took a step forward, torn between running to comfort his middle child and giving him space. "Luke? Are you alright?" he asked, the black key Maya had given him clutched tightly in his hands.

Luke looked up in mild surprise as he was pulled from his internal train of thought, but gave Phoenix a smile. "I'm fine," he said. "Really, I am."

Apollo stood up, followed by Trucy and Pearl. "What happened in there?" he asked.

Maya grinned, clapping her hands together. "Well, we have some good news and some bad news!"
she announced, turning towards Luke to pass the topic on to him.

"Good news first!" Trucy cried, gripping her paper she had been drawing on in her hands and staring intensely at Luke. "I wanna hear good news!"

Luke thought a moment. "Well, it's all kind of a mix of both good and bad," he admitted.

"Are they still alive?" Apollo asked, nervously clutching his bracelet. "Your parents?"

To Apollo's surprise, Luke giggled a little. "We think Mum might be!" he replied.

Trucy and Pearl cheered, the younger of the two dropping her picture and jumping on Pearl to swing her around in a brief celebratory dance before Pearl nervously extracted herself, looking a little embarrassed.

Phoenix smiled, looking relieved. "What about your dad?"

"He's..." Luke paused, and his sad look answered the question all on its own. "Dad died just after the accident. But," he turned his face up to meet Phoenix's sympathetic gaze with a determined look, "he told me everything he remembers about that night, so I think we have a few leads now on the investigation!"

Although surprised at Luke's ability to be keeping calm, Phoenix returned a determined smile and nodded. "Sure. We can go over them together later."

Before anyone else could respond, Apollo jumped forward, reaching into the pocket of his shorts. "Maya! Are you able to do another channelling?"

Maya looked confused, glancing over at Phoenix just as he smiled knowingly. "Why?" she asked.

Apollo rushed forward and pulled out a tightly folded piece of paper, which he carefully pulled open and held out to Maya, showing off the image of Thalassa Gramarye that dominated the top half. "Can you find out if she's alive?"

"That's your mom!?!" Maya realised.

Trucy ran up behind Apollo, slapping his back and rushing around to his front as he cried in pain, recoiling from the hit. "Mommy's alive! I told you she is!" she insisted.

Apollo frowned at Trucy, but decided to continue his plea to Maya rather than respond. "Pearly said you need a photo and a name, right? Well, this is the photo, even if it's a bit old, and her name is Thalassa Gramarye. Is it possible to find out if she's still alive or not?"

Trucy growled, stomping her feet before resorting to slapping Apollo again.

"Trucy, stop that!" Phoenix warned her, getting ready to step in and drag her away if he had to.

"You're not listening!" the eight-year-old accused her brother.

"Yes, I am!" Apollo replied. "You need to face it Trucy, no one vanishes in the middle of a disappearing trick, not unless they're trying to run away! You don't think she was running away, right?" Noticing Trucy's slight wince as she glared off to the side, he softened his harsh tone a little. "Something happened, and we don't know what. All I want to do right now is confirm if she's alive or dead. Okay?"
Everyone watched in silence for a few moments, before Trucy sniffed, rubbing at her nose with the back of her wrist. "Okay," she mumbled, still staring at the floor.

"If you two want to come with me," Maya offered, resting her hands comfortably on Trucy's shoulders, "we can find out the answer to that question."

As Maya, Apollo and Trucy disappeared into the Channelling Chamber, Pearl moved to clear up the small mess Trucy had left on the floor from her drawing, including the paper itself and a small pile of coloured pencils. Phoenix and Luke stood next to each other in silence, watching the thick double doors.

"Will Trucy be okay?" Luke quietly asked, looking up at Phoenix worriedly.

Phoenix smiled, looking down at the teen. "Are you?"

Luke blushed a little, and nodded, looking away again. 'Should I...? I probably should.' Steeling his nerve, he turned back to face Phoenix with a smile. "When I was talking to Dad, he wanted me to pass on that you have to look after me, or he'll haunt your nightmares."

"Ah," Phoenix mumbled, looking a bit put-down by the comment. "I'll... do my best."

"You weren't already?" Luke giggled, and, when Phoenix rolled his eyes, added, "Don't worry Nick, you're doing a great job!"

Phoenix laughed, ruffling Luke's hair through his hat. "Good to hear! I don't want to disappoint your father, huh?"

Behind them, Pearl smiled, happy knowing Luke was doing well after the morning he'd gone through.

Luke stared nervously at his feet. "There was another thing Dad and I talked about," he continued. "I... I've not been thinking of you as a father, like I should."

"I understand, Luke," Phoenix replied, peering down at his younger son as he worried what was troubling him. "You still have your dad. I don't want to replace him."

It was a few moments before Luke responded, looking up to meet Phoenix's gaze. "Is it alright if... if I call you 'Papa'?"

Phoenix stared blankly for several seconds, then slowly smiled, moving to ruffle Luke's hair again. "I wouldn't mind that at all."

Pearl grinned, watching through her fingers as Luke giggled and hugged Phoenix. Watching them bond was almost as heart-warming as the best romance in her eyes.

The Channelling Chamber doors swung open, deceptively fast, and Trucy bounced out energetically, running to Phoenix and pulling on his arm as Luke hurried out of her way. "Daddy! Daddy!" she cried. "She's still alive!"

"Oh?" Phoenix asked in surprise, looking up to see a happy Apollo and Maya following after. "You couldn't channel her?"

Maya shook her head. "Guess she must still be out there somewhere!"

"She didn't run away!" Trucy insisted, shooting a glare at Apollo that was met with a rolling of his eyes. "Mommy would never leave me and Grandpa and Daddy!"

"Alright, alright," Apollo mumbled, crossing his arms. "It was just a suggestion of what might have happened!"

Luke giggled. "I guess we've all got investigations to do!" he said.

"You bet," Maya replied, hands on her hips as she shot a cheeky smile in Phoenix's direction. "I'm starting to worry I've lost the knack for channelling! Maybe I should try for Sis as a test!"

Phoenix went red, holding his hands up as his eyes went wide. "N-no need to do that!" he cried, a little higher-pitched than normal. "Don't want to bother Mia for no reason, after all!"

Maya pouted but relented. "You've got to tell her sometime, Nick," she pointed out, then turned back towards the chamber. "I've got to clean up. I'll talk to you guys later, okay?"

Phoenix sighed in relief, ignoring the curious looks his children were now giving him. "I... need to return this key to Maya," he mumbled, waving the key in his hand as he followed her into the chamber.

My dear Luke,

This past Saturday was Alfendi's first birthday. Flora and I took him out around London, and I think he quite enjoyed it, although moreso for the people-watching than the change of scenery. Flora was quite happily getting ice-cream and chatting away to him about one thing or another, and Alfendi actually seemed to be intently listening to her. He also seems to be attempting to say her name, as I heard him saying something like 'Fofo' to himself in his pram. Why he prefers to practise his speech on his own, I don't think I'll ever understand. Flora was also encouraging him when he was distracted by a toy and started tossing it out of the pram repeatedly. I suppose at least they were both having fun, but I would prefer not to end up being the one to have to play this 'game' when he decides to play it at home.

As for this 'channelling' of Miss Fey's, I find myself still a bit wary. I understand your point that she is a friend and would not lie, not to mention that we have certainly seen stranger things over the years, but I can think of so many ways what you experienced could be faked. I suppose I shall have to see it for myself to fully believe it. I certainly do not intend to needlessly hurt your feelings talking about it so. In any case, I am glad you got to talk to Clark, and that the experience has helped you move on and accept Mr Wright. It is truly sad to hear Clark is gone, although, as you say, we still have every hope of finding your mother alive at this point. We certainly mustn't waste it.

I have got on to Paul regarding those masks of his, but I'm sorry to say what he told me would be of little help; Paul's masks came from an English company in Sussex, and the ones these 'rescuers' of Clark's had on would be American in origin. I would look for a manufacturer in the Los Angeles area first, if I were you; I don't imagine a group as shady as this would go too far for supplies.

The usual puzzles are enclosed, along with a photo Flora took of myself and Alfendi last week. I assure you, I am not sleeping in that picture, merely resting my eyes a moment. I hope you and your loved ones continue to be well.

Your friend,

Professor Hershel Layton

Dear Professor Layton,

Oh, I didn't know Alfendi's birthday was coming up! You should have warned me so I could send him a present! What do babies like as gifts? I'm glad he had fun on the day, though. Flora said in her letter that someone started lecturing her, thinking she was Alfendi's mother? That sounds horrid! It seems like Flora gave them a good talking-to at least.

I'm sorry I rambled a bit in my last letter, talking about the channelling. I know there's still a possibility it was faked, but I don't believe it was. Dad was far too real to not be there, and besides, Papa says Maya used to channel her sister all the time in the city when he was having trouble with his early cases (she was his mentor, you know). Maya told me she would have done that in Labyrinthia too, but she'd have been accused of being a witch had anyone noticed, so it was too dangerous. She did laugh that it didn't help anyway, but that's beside the point.

It's too bad to hear Don Paolo couldn't help. I thought he would have some kind of insight into this kind of thing, considering how often he was trying to trick us one way or another. I guess I'll have to start looking without a clear starting point then. Thanks for asking him, Professor.

Speaking of Mum and Dad, it's almost been a full year since the accident. Detective Gumshoe has invited us to the police storage warehouse tomorrow, to look through the things they kept from the moving truck. Most of the furniture is gone, apparently, but hopefully there'll be things like my Sherlock Holmes books in there, and the rest of the photo albums. It'll be nice to see those again. I should try and keep some of Mum's stuff for when we find her. I think anything I can't take is getting auctioned off or something, so I have to be thorough.

I've included some of my own puzzles for you and Flora. The photo is adorable! Don't worry Professor, I know you're not sleeping in it, no matter what Flora says! Alfendi's quite a bit bigger than in the last photo you sent. The three of you continue looking after each other, okay?

Your friend and apprentice,

Unit 015

"Detective Gumshoe!" Trucy shouted, running away from her family's group walking along the pavement and towards the large man in a coat hanging around outside one of the long line of garage doors in the side of the building.

"Hey there, pal!" Gumshoe laughed in response, returning the girl's hug and shooting a smile to the short-haired woman with glasses standing next to him. "Told ya they wouldn't be long!"

Phoenix pushed along Luke and Apollo at his sides, grinning as he followed his daughter at a more leisurely pace. "Hope we didn't keep you waiting!" he called in greeting. Luke waved to their friend, while Apollo only nodded, remembering the last time they'd met Gumshoe almost an entire year ago.

"Nah, no problem, pal!" Gumshoe replied. "Glad you could make it!"

The woman at the detective's side smiled cheerfully at the Wrights, giving Phoenix a quick salute. "Nice to meet you again, Mister Wright!"

"Hey there, Maggey," Phoenix replied, a little surprised. "Wasn't expecting to see you here! Oh, and I should make some introductions." He moved his hands on top of Luke's and Apollo's heads, to Apollo's annoyance. "Luke, Apollo. Over there is Trucy. Kids, this is Maggey Byrde, a former client of mine."
"Hi!" Trucy chirped.

Maggey turned to Apollo, crossing her arms with an open smile. "Ah, so you're Apollo! Nice to finally meet you in person!"

Apollo blinked, shoving Phoenix's hand off his head with a confused look. "Huh?"

Laughing, Maggey decided to elaborate. "Maya gave you my number, remember? I'm hurt you'd forget about me, Steel!"

Hearing his internet username, Apollo went pale. "Oh, Blackbird! I-I'm sorry, I... forgot, I guess..."

"Hey, you're fine, pal," Maggey giggled, waving a hand. "I don't mean to embarrass you in front of your dad!"

"Too late!" Phoenix cheerily replied, poking Apollo's arm as the teen rolled his eyes. "I forgot, you two know each other from that fanclub, huh? You probably want to catch up!"

"That can wait 'til later, pal!" Gumshoe cried, turning to pull the sliding door behind him up and open. "We've got a job to do!"

Luke gasped, running forward and ducking under the door the moment it was high enough for him to enter. The light spilled into the room beyond, the dark concrete-walled cube full of boxes, most open or half-open, littered all over the floor and into several piles almost as tall as Trucy. Someone flicked a switch behind him, and a single bulb in the roof above flickered on, lighting the dark corners that the sunlight couldn't reach and illuminating a few forgotten chairs and a chest of drawers tucked up the back.

Looking at the boxes, Luke was struck at how well he remembered them from the weeks before they left England, either from packing his own things into them or from watching them be taken away and piled into a moving van to begin their journey to America a week or two ahead of the Tritons themselves. There's so many... Where do I even start?

Phoenix came up behind the teen, placing a comforting hand on his shoulder. "You okay?"

Luke nodded. "I'm fine, Papa," he replied, then looked up with a smile. "We'd better get started, huh?"

Apollo watched as Gumshoe pulled out a list of the boxes and began to read them out, Trucy running around to locate the ones he named. Very soon, they'd settled into a routine with Phoenix helping Luke go through a box, take out things he was interested in keeping, then Gumshoe ticking off that box as checked and sending Trucy off to find the next one on the list. Standing outside watching the proceedings were Apollo and Maggey, content to stay out of the way.

"Can I ask you something, Steel?" Maggey asked, a serious look on her face.

Startled out of his thoughts, Apollo looked up with a confused look. "What?"

"Back when you first joined the new forum," Maggey explained, a hand shyly reaching up to grip her other arm, "I made the stupid decision to ask if you knew why Mister Wright adopted you and your brother."

"Yeah, I remember that," Apollo mumbled with a blush, scratching the back of his neck. "What Maggey frowned to herself. "I just wanted to apologise and... ask if you were okay." She gave him a concerned look. "You talked to him about that, right?"

Apollo had to resist laughing. "Yeah, sure I did!" he said, grinning. "Turns out Trucy was my half-sister already!"

"Oh!" Maggey gasped in surprise. "Really!?"

"Dad was keeping it a secret," Apollo continued, giggling behind his grin. "Wanted to surprise us!"

"Well, it surprised me!" Maggey replied, smiling. "Speaking of the forum, I was expecting you to join up and boast about how you got adopted." She frowned, giving him a curious look. "Why the pretence that you're just friends?"

Apollo shrugged, thinking to himself. "I guess I figured no-one would believe me," he explained. "I... didn't want everyone to reject me right off the bat."

Maggey gripped her hands together, concerned for her young friend. "Hey, I'll back you up," she offered. "No-one's gonna argue with the admin."

"Thanks for the offer," Apollo said, giving her a grateful smile, "but it's fine. I'm happier not being the centre of attention." He gave her a half-lidded stare. "Anyway, you know Pocky would ambush me with demands for details every second of the day."

"That's a good point," Maggey relented, arms crossed.

In the garage, Trucy loudly cried, "There's one over here!", attracting Maggey and Apollo's attention. She ran to a wall by the entrance, where a small stepladder was folded against the wall. "I found a ladder!"

"That's a stepladder, Truce," Phoenix replied from one of the piles of boxes, a small frown on his face as he corrected her.

Apollo scoffed. "It has 'ladder' in it, who cares what she calls it?"

Phoenix gave Apollo a somewhat frustrated look. "It unfolds and makes steps, it's a stepladder."

"You can make steps with any ladder," Apollo pointed out, rolled his eyes, "providing you angle it right!"

"Do we have to discuss this now!?!" Luke cried, exasperated.

"Yeah!" Gumshoe chimed in. "It's clearly a ladder, pal!"

Phoenix slapped his face with one hand. 'I give up.'
Luke hummed in thought, sat on one of the benches out the front of the school watching the cars go by on the road outside.

Apollo smirked. "You have to say them out loud y'know, or I can't count 'em."

Luke winced, then sighed. "Okay, um..." He held up a finger, frowning in concentration. "California, Arizona... New York... Mississippi..."

"That's four," Apollo said. "Forty-six to go."

"Texas," Luke continued, then looked over to Apollo warily. "Is there a state called 'Dakota'?"

Apollo snorted, but quickly schooled his face back into a neutral expression. "Sort of," he replied.

Luke frowned. "You're not being very helpful."

"I'm not giving you the answer," Apollo insisted with a grin.

"GUYS!" came a raspy shout from somewhere behind them, and the brothers turned around to see their friend Clay barrelling out of the school doors towards them, a terrified look on his face. "GUYS, IT'S AWFUL!"

Giving each other confused glances, Apollo and Luke jumped to their feet, meeting Clay as he arrived at their bench, doubled over panting. "What's going on?" Luke asked. "Did your detention get extended?"

"The... the rocket!" Clay cried through his laboured breathing. "It's...! Mister... Starbuck...!"

"Okay, calm down," Apollo instructed his friend, patting his back and guiding him to sit down. "Use your big boy words."

Clay was too distressed to react to the mild insult, sitting on the bench and hugging his middle tightly as he slowly regained his ability to speak coherently. He was serving detentions for a half-hour after classes for two weeks after skipping school the previous day to hang out at the Cosmos Space Center, helping out in preparation for the launch of the Center's manned mission into outer space that morning. He'd wanted to be there on the launch, he'd told his friends, but was persuaded by Director Cosmos to drop by a day early instead... not that anyone knew if he was aware Clay was skipping school to do so.

Luke patted his friend's back as he sat beside him. "Are you calm enough to talk now?"

Clay nodded appreciatively, then gave his friends a worried look. "The HAT-1... it's had a series of critical failures. It launched the probe successfully, but... they don't know if Mister Starbuck will make it back to Earth."

Clay only nodded. "They're not going into details, so I don't know any more than that..." He sighed, staring at the asphalt below their feet. "Poor Mister Starbuck... And I was only just talking to him yesterday!"

"He'll be fine, Clay!" Luke insisted, holding his fists up and giving his friend a determined frown. "Mister Starbuck will get back home, just you wait!"

Forcing a small smile, Clay nodded, but it was obvious he didn't actually believe it. "I wonder if they'll give me a copy of the photo..."

Clay nodded. "When I was there yesterday morning, we took a team photo. Me, Mister Starbuck, Director Cosmos... even Ponco and the robot scientists."

"Aw, that's nice of them!" Luke said, trying to cheer up his friend with a smile. "They count you as part of the team!"

"Yeah," Clay laughed, though he still had a sad smile. "Mister Starbuck lent me one of his old jackets, too." He frowned. "Now I wish I'd got to keep it..."

The three friends sat in silence for a few moments, Luke patting Clay's shoulder in an attempt to offer comfort.

Apollo thought for a moment, then looked over to Clay. "Oh, um, I almost forgot... Did you find out why Director Cosmos sent you home early yesterday?"

Clay frowned, staring at his friend. "I get the feeling you know."

Luke looked between them, confused. "Why? Did something happen?"

Clay sighed, turning to Luke. "Apparently someone was murdered. One of the robotics scientists, I think. I only found out about it today, when I was looking up the launch at lunchtime."

"Oh no!" Luke cried. "And you were there, but you didn't know!?"

"No-one told me," Clay replied, shaking his head with a frown. "I was downstairs from there with Mister Starbuck, then Director Cosmos came in, kicked me out and didn't say why." He sighed, reminded of his mentor's current predicament. "I barely got to say goodbye to him..."

"He's not dead," Apollo sternly pointed out, "not yet. Don't lose hope." He held up a fist in determination. "We keep fighting to the bitter end! As long as we believe he'll be okay, Mister Starbuck will pull through!"

"Yeah!" Luke cheered as he joined in. "And the three of us will be there to welcome him home, right?"

Clay slowly smiled at the prospect of his friends returning to the Space Center, then flung his arms around their necks with a grin. "You bet we will!" he cried. "Mister Starbuck's gonna get home safe and be absolutely fine!"

The three teenage boys loudly cheered to themselves as they began to repeat the affirmation to themselves, determined to believe in the best possible outcome at all costs.
Dad, have you heard about the hat1 rocket?

Yeah I saw that on the news. I guess Clay must be upset.

Upset is a bit of an understatement :|

Why?

Hang on, your brother is texting me now.

PAPA, DID YOU HEAR ABOUT THE ROCKET?

APOLLO LITERALLY JUST ASKED ME THAT WHY ARE YOU BOTH TEXTING ME AT ONCE?

OH, SORRY, I'LL LET APOLLO TELL YOU THEN!

SEE YOU TOMORROW, PAPA!

See you tomorrow, Luke :) And turn your caps lock off.

Sorry!

Mr Starbuck is Clays mentor, how do you not remember this Dad?

I cant remember every little detail of Clays life, hes not the one I adopted.

But at least now I know why he'd be more than upset, thats very distressing.

Did Luke mention we want to invite him over for another sleepover? Mr Starbuck isn't landing until tomorrow evening and we don't want to leave Clay alone.

Thats reasonable. Tell him he can come over as long as he doesn't camp himself in front of the news 24/7.

We wont let him do that, dont worry.

Thanks btw

Nice to know thanks are an afterthought with you ;).

I'll see you tomorrow.
Luke, Clay and Apollo sat bunched up together in their pyjamas on the black leather couch, staring at the television screen. At their feet, Trucy yawned in her nightie, leaning against Apollo's legs as she watched with them, a continuing view of sunlit open ocean and sky, narrated over by the droning monotone of a tired newscaster.

"Why are we looking at the sea?" Trucy asked, trying not to look as sleepy as she felt. "The guy said he was gonna land!"

Apollo and Luke looked to Clay, but he was staring so intently at the screen, he didn't appear to have heard Trucy's question. "Mister Starbuck has a long way to fall," Luke explained, stepping in for his friend. "He has to land in the sea, so he doesn't get hurt."

"Before you ask," Apollo cut in, giving his sister a dry look, "that's why he's taking so long. We don't know exactly how high he is at the moment."

Clay adjusted his ever-present visor nervously. "They said his heat-shield has malfunctioned!" he spoke up, starting to sound panicky. "What if he burns up in the atmosphere!?"

Luke and Apollo instantly turned to comfort their friend, grabbing his shoulders. "He'll be fine, Clay!" Apollo cried.

"Yeah!" Luke added. "We're going to go meet him when he comes home, remember?"

Clay nodded, trying to keep himself calm with the positive thoughts, but still bit his lip hard as he stared at the live news broadcast.

The office door opened, and Phoenix wandered in, the only one still in his day clothes. "He hasn't landed yet?" he asked.

Luke looked up and shook his head, shooting his father a worried look.

Phoenix grimaced in sympathy, then headed over to the lounge, leaning on the back to watch the television over the trio's heads. "I'm sure he'll appear soon. There's no reason for him not to."

Clay didn't react, leaning forward in his seat, fists clenched tightly as they rested on his knees.

Suddenly, the view on the screen swung upwards towards the cloudy sky, zooming in and just barely keeping focus on a cone-like object hurtling towards the sea, a parachute clinging to the top point. "And we have visual contact!" the newscaster announced. "The HAT-1 command module has made it to Earth!"

"YES!" Clay cheered, leaning back in his seat and throwing his arms into the air, narrowly avoiding Phoenix as the older man jumped back in surprise.

"Careful there!" Phoenix cried.
"But," the newscaster continued as the camera slowly zoomed out on the descending spacecraft, "is our brave astronaut within safe and unharmed?"

Apollo glared at the TV. "Screw you!" he shouted. "Mister Starbuck's gonna be fine!"

"He can't hear you, Polly," Trucy quietly pointed out, hiding a yawn.

"The moment we know for sure he's safe," Phoenix decided, giving Trucy a warning glare, "you're going to bed, young lady."

Trucy looked up in surprise, whining, "But Daddyyyy!"

Clay, sitting almost on the edge of his seat, shot Trucy a grin. "Don't worry, it'll probably take a few minutes still before they get Mister Starbuck out."

"Yeah," Luke chimed in, "and then we're going to bed." He gave his friends a meaningful look. "Aren't we?"

Apollo nodded without hesitation. "Once we see Mister Starbuck back on Earth, I'll drop dead out of pure relief!"

Clay snorted. "Wait 'til we see him again in person to do that!"

Trucy crossed her arms and sulked as she turned back to the television, only to promptly have to hide another yawn. Phoenix smirked to himself at the kids antics, leaning on the lounge again now he wasn't in danger of getting punched in the face by Clay's enthusiasm.

The five watched in silence as Starbuck's spacecraft slowly touched down on the water's surface, and a small boat, followed by a massive ship, sped to meet it. The parachute was carefully pulled out of the way, the newscaster commentating all the while, and, finally, the door was forced open after some difficulty, the workers in the small boat helping pull free a red-haired man in a bright orange spacesuit.

Clay jumped to his feet, screaming "HE'S SAFE!" and causing everyone around him to jump back, wincing and clutching their ears.

"Solomon Starbuck has returned safely to Earth!" the newscaster cried, a tone of excitement evident in his voice. "He has survived the terrible ordeal no-one ever expected would happen!"

As Luke, Apollo and Clay celebrated amongst themselves, Phoenix rounded the sofa and crouched down by Trucy, grinning. "Bed-time." Trucy sighed, but got up without question, clinging to her father's neck as she silently asked to be carried. Phoenix didn't object, picking her up and holding her tightly as he got to his feet. "You three turn everything off before you head up, okay?" he instructed the boys as he started heading towards the door.

As Phoenix and Trucy left the room, Clay dropped back down on the lounge, sighing in relief. "Oh I'm so glad Mister Starbuck is okay...!"

Apollo laughed, crossing his arms as he watched the Starbuck on the TV being helped onto the massive ship, the remains of his rocket being secured to a crane to be lifted out of the ocean. "Just like I said at the beginning of this mess, he's just fine!"

Luke nodded, fighting off a yawn. "And when he gets back home tomorrow, we'll go and meet him,
Clay grinned. "You bet!" He then sat up. "But you guys are right, we really need to head to bed." Jumping to his feet, he bounced over to Luke, throwing an arm over his shoulders. "We need to be full of energy tomorrow!"

Luke mutely nodded, beginning to head off to the door. "It is really late." Clay shot Apollo a grin as he followed Luke, and the two quickly left the room.

Apollo rolled his eyes as he turned off the TV. "Perfect. Leave me to take care of this," he grumbled to himself, and quickly left the room, turning off the light as he went.
Phoenix looked through the newspaper article with a solemn eye, wondering if he should bring it up to Clay or not. It was connected to the same Space Center the HAT-1 was, although the peril of the malfunctioning rocket had quickly blitzed almost any mention of the murder from making the news anymore, and he had no doubt Clay at least knew who the victim was, even if he wasn't as close to her as to his mentor.

The door burst open and Clay, Apollo and Luke raced into the room. "We're going out, Dad!" Apollo cried, and the three ran towards the front door.

"Hey, hey!" Phoenix called, getting up from his chair behind the desk as he attempted to halt the trio for a moment. "At least tell me where you're going!"

Luke grinned, clutching his satchel where it hung over his shoulder. "The Space Center!" he announced. "We're going to meet up with Mister Starbuck!"

Phoenix was surprised, but decided not to question it. "Alright," he said with a shrug as he sat back down. "Let me know when you're heading home."

"We will!" Luke and Apollo replied in unison, charging out the door with a grinning Clay.

'Clay seems happy enough,' Phoenix mused to himself as the front door slammed closed. 'He might not have known this murder victim after all. Or Starbuck surviving his ordeal is distracting him.' He stared down at the article on his desk. 'But another prosecutor convicted of murder? At least this time they caught him immediately instead of fifteen years later.'

As if on cue, the phone in Phoenix's pocket started to buzz, singing a chirping tune as its owner pulled it out to check the screen. Frowning at the name he saw there, Phoenix pressed the button to answer. "Edgeworth? Why are you calling me?"

"'Hello' would have sufficed," Edgeworth replied from the phone speaker, sarcasm dripping from his tone. "I trust by now you've heard of the prosecutor who was convicted yesterday."

"Yeah, I heard of him," Phoenix said, leaning back in his chair. "Simon Blackquill, the supposed 'king of suggestion'." He scoffed. "Is there something in the water over at the prosecutor's office? That's like the fourth convicted murderer since von Karma himself!"

Edgeworth grunted to himself. "Four individual cases in two years does not a pattern make," he insisted. "Besides, three of those were last year, and the general public didn't care about those cases as they are clearly caring about this one."

Phoenix frowned. "What do you mean?"

"You were disbarred last year," Edgeworth immediately pointed out.
A little shocked at the sudden bluntness, Phoenix winced. "Thanks for reminding me of that," he mumbled.

"One of those previously mentioned prosecutors, not to mention the aforesaid Manfred von Karma, were brought down by you," Edgeworth continued. "It was a great shake to the public trust in the law when the heroic Phoenix Wright, who they believed they could trust, appeared to be almost if not just as bad as the men he had brought down."

Phoenix paused in thought. "People really cared that much about me?" he mused aloud. "I mean, I know I had a fan-club, but."

"Fan-club or not," Edgeworth cut in, "hot on the heels of your disbarment, we have another prosecutor convicted of murder. Even with the distraction of this spacecraft disaster, there are a lot of unfriendly eyes pointing our way." He sighed. "I fear for the public perception of lawyers of all kinds now."

"I'm sure you'll get through it," Phoenix said, running his eyes once again down the article discussing the prosecutor's confession and subsequent conviction. "I mean, the law survived a Chief of Police and Chief Prosecutor being put away for murder, accomplice to murder and obstruction of justice on the same day. Why not a single young prosecutor?"

Edgeworth didn't reply immediately, deep in thought. Eventually, he merely muttered a dark "We'll see," and changed the subject.

Cosmos Space Center
Entrance

There weren't very many regular workers at Cosmos Space Center, but it still felt like a small crowd gathered just behind the main gate, out of sight of the road. Clay was nervously pacing, and several times an employee at the Center would approach him to chat a little while before leaving again, leaving Apollo and Luke feeling out-of-place in the building they had once visited so regularly. Ponco and Clonco, the resident robots, whirred around through the crowds, apparently ordered to ensure everyone was healthy and safe from heatstroke as they stood out in the hot sun. To Luke's surprise, not only did Ponco still have him and Apollo registered in her (it's?) database, but Clonco did too, despite the pair never having met him (it?) before.

"Your body temperature is point-five degrees higher than average!" Ponco warned Luke during her latest round, her neutral blue face blinking on her screen. "We recommend you sit in the shade to cool down, Luke!"

Luke looked up in surprise from where he was reading Professor Layton's latest letter to pass the time. "Is that Celsius or Fahrenheit?" he reflexively asked, a common question he'd had to pose since his arrival in America.

Apollo, sitting at Luke's side on the grass next to the concrete path and reading over his shoulder, rolled his eyes. "Does it matter?"

"My apologies!" Ponco cried, her face flashing a deeper blue as she briefly miming crying. "I have been programmed to use Celsius! Would you prefer a translation into Fahrenheit?"

Luke smiled in surprise. "No need, Ponco. I actually prefer Celsius." 'For one thing, I always know what temperatures in Celsius mean...' He got to his feet. "Will you tell Clay where I am, Apollo?"

Apollo sighed, also standing up. "I may as well join you. Clay's busy talking to, um," he looked over to where their friend was standing with a man they didn't know, "someone or other. He won't miss us."

"Thank you, Ponco!" Luke called, waving to the robot as he and Apollo walked over to the shaded area closer to the front gate.

"You're welcome!" Ponco replied, a green grin on her screen, before turning and wheeling off to check on someone else.

Just as the brothers were finding a spot to sit in the grass where it was shaded, a car pulled up on the road outside, a side-door opening to reveal a familiar man in a blue jumpsuit, a dark-blue jacket identical to the ones most of the HAT-1 team were wearing over the top.

Luke gasped.

"It's Mister Starbuck!" Apollo shouted, and his Chords of Steel quickly alerted most of the crowd to Starbuck's arrival.

Luke watched from a distance as Clay led the charge to welcome Starbuck back to the Space Center, Director Cosmos at his side to keep everyone from crowding the man in their joy. It took several minutes for the crowds to begin to clear enough for Luke to even see the astronaut after that, and Apollo waited impatiently at his side, eager to greet Starbuck but not wanting to leave his brother behind.

Finally, Clay came to find his friends, grinning widely. "C'mon, you guys! I told Mister Starbuck you were here to see him!" Grabbing their arms, he pulled Apollo and Luke through the milling crowd to the astronaut's side.

Apollo waved as Clay finally released his arm. "Hey, Mister Starbuck!"

Starbuck turned to the three teens with a smile. "So you two are here! You came back!"

"Yeah, we just had to come by to check that you were alright," Luke giggled, blushing.

"Ah, yeah, I'm alright," Starbuck replied, rubbing the back of his head with a nervous grin. "Just barely."

Director Cosmos, standing atop his motorised scooter nearby, scoffed to himself, pulling on his moustache. "You won't believe the sheer number of requests for interviews I've had to chase off since last night. Our astronaut has become a star!"

As the group erupted into conversation, Luke found his attention drawn to the doors of the Center itself. Clonco was trailing behind a labcoated woman in black gloves and bright pink tights, purple hair styled into twin points above her head. As she headed towards the doors to push them open, she suddenly rounded on the green robot, shouting something Luke couldn't make out over the happy crowd around him, then stormed into the building, leaving Clonco to return to the party alone.

'Very curious,' Luke thought to himself, wondering who the woman was and what had her so upset at the little robot.
"Woah, seriously?" Clay cried, drawing Luke back into the conversation.

"Apparently," Starbuck replied with a nod, looking embarrassed. "Dunno how I feel about it just yet, though. It's bound to take all sorts of liberties..."

Apollo scoffed. "But that would be so cool to have a movie made about you!"

Luke laughed in surprise. 'A movie!? About Mister Starbuck? That would be cool!'

"At any rate, we will see what happens," Director Cosmos insisted rather sternly. "Nothing is set in stone."

My dear Luke,

I hope I am not irritating you that I start off most every letter nowadays with an update on Alfendi first and foremost. He's beginning to walk now, although only alongside something he can hold onto to keep his balance. Flora is greatly enjoying mothering him, as usual, and I seem to be getting a little more free time than I've been used to over the past year to actually work on my classes again! I don't recall if I mentioned I was having to cancel so many lectures at the last minute due to a lack of preparation. In any case, Dean Delmona reduced the classes I've been covering, so the workload is much easier to handle now.

The Ascots came by for a visit, but I don't think Sherry quite knew what to do with Alfendi. He was rather wary of her, sticking close to Flora and glaring at everyone if they tried to get too close. Randall thought the whole thing was hilarious, which I don't think helped Alfendi's opinion of him.

I'm glad to hear you recovered your Sherlock Holmes books, among all those other items you mentioned. I agree it's a shame you couldn't keep everything you wanted, but it is a bad habit to keep everything one ever owns, and especially hard to escape when grieving for lost loved ones. A good clean-out now and then is a good idea.

I don't recall a 'fan club' being mentioned before. You say Apollo and this friend of the detective's were members of it? I can't imagine a lawyer, even one as brilliant as Mr Wright, managing to acquire 'fans', let alone enough to form an online community.

I'm glad to hear Trucy enjoyed her birthday. I believe she is nine now, correct?

The usual puzzles are enclosed.

Your friend,

Professor Hershel Layton

Dear Professor Layton,
It's alright Professor, I love hearing what Alfendi's been up to! I'd love to meet him in person too, but I guess we'll have to wait and see if that ever happens. It's nice to hear he's walking! And Alfendi is almost all Flora talks about in her letters, so I guessed she was making the most of him while he's small and cute!

That's nice of the dean to help you out like that. Is someone else picking up the classes you had to drop? If so, would I know them?

Aw, poor Sherry! I'm sure once Alfendi is a little older he'll appreciate strangers visiting him a little more!

I didn't mention Papa's fan-club before? I could have sworn I did! Yes, Apollo was a member of it, but I understand the public forum self-destructed a bit after Papa lost his badge. Some of the core members are still in touch as friends, which is how Apollo knew Ms Byrde (They call each other 'Steel' and 'Blackbird', because of their usernames on the old forum!). Maya and her cousin Pearl actually founded it, apparently! They don't have reliable internet in Kurain, and since Maya is so busy now they had already left the fan-club before everything destroyed itself.

Trucy is nine now, yes! I think she's already looking forward to next year, when she hits double-digits! I also think she's currently planning something for Apollo, possibly to try and convince him to try performing on stage with her. I can't say I envy either of them!

You've heard of the HAT-1 Disaster, right? Or, rather, they're calling it the HAT-1 Miracle now it's over. I don't remember if I mentioned Mr Starbuck before, but he's Clay's mentor, so Clay was very upset when the rocket malfunctioned and we thought he might not make it. Papa let us stay up late to watch Mr Starbuck's landing, and then today we decided to come back to the Space Centre with Clay to greet him when he came back! Apparently there was also a murder there the day before the launch, when Clay skipped school to drop by, but I don't know much about it. Everyone's talking about the 'miracle' over anything else.

I've included my own puzzles. I hope you, Flora and Alfendi are all well!

Your friend and apprentice,

The first thing Trucy had done once the excitement of the HAT-1 Miracle died down was gather her family together to discuss what they were doing for the upcoming Halloween holiday... although it was less of a 'discussion' and more of an 'announcement'.

"We're gonna all have Troupe Gramarye outfits!" the nine-year-old cried with a grin.

Apollo frowned. "Wait, you're taking the lazy way out this year and just wearing your normal clothes?"

"Silly Polly!" Trucy replied, sticking her tongue out at him as she crossed her arms. "I'm making myself a new costume!" She tapped at her chin in thought. "I'm thinking I'll try out blue first. See how I like it."

Phoenix and Luke glanced at each other in confusion. "So your plan is to make a Gramarye outfit for all four of us?" Luke asked.

Trucy grinned and nodded. "Yep!" She pointed to Phoenix. "Daddy, you're going to be Grandpa! Luke," she pointed to the younger of her brothers, "you can be Uncle Valant! And Polly," she turned to her older brother, "you're going to get your own proper stage magician's outfit!"

Apollo looked crestfallen. "Oh, I see. This is an excuse to give yourself a new outfit and make me a matching one for when you finally drag me on stage. I get it."

Trucy scoffed. "You don't have to look so down about it!"

"Hey, at least she's not making you dress up as me," Phoenix said with a smirk, making Apollo hide his reddening face behind a hand.

Phoenix's Office

Aside from Trucy now spending all her free time in her room sewing, or dragging various family members out with her to fetch supplies, the rest of the family thought nothing of the approaching holiday until the final week of the month. With Halloween this year falling on a Saturday, plans were easy enough to make.

"Hey, Dad!" Apollo called as he charged through the reception door, Luke at his heels. "They're Phoenix couldn't resist a smile. "Trucy's going to be upset neither of you are trick-or-treating with her this year."

"As long as you come to her act that night, I'm sure she'll forgive you," Phoenix assured the pair. "That's part of why she decided our theme for us this year."

"Really?" Apollo asked, surprised. "I thought maybe the Wonder Bar would have its own special acts it wanted to do on Halloween."

Luke giggled as a thought occurred to him. "Trucy probably has her own special act set up especially for it!"

Phoenix grinned. "She has something up her sleeve, alright," he agreed. "We'll just have to wait and see what it is."

Reception

On the evening of the thirty-first, Clay arrived at the front door of the agency, clad in blue with a darker blue jacket thrown over the top. He laughed as Luke let him in, running his eyes up and down the younger teen's yellow cape and tight black jumpsuit. "Wow, what's with the banana outfit?" he joked as he entered the reception area.

Luke smiled, spinning around in his costume so his friend could see it all. "I'm Trucy's Uncle Valant!" he announced, tipping his yellow top hat as the felt streamers imitating the man's black locks began to tangle around his shoulders. "That's our theme this year!"

"You guys have a theme?" Clay repeated in disbelief.

The door to the office opened and Phoenix came in, leaning against the doorway and grinning through the fake beard wrapped around his jaw. "Clay! Nice to see you made it!"

"Hey, Mister Wright!" Clay replied, not commenting at all on Phoenix's black suit and matching hat and cape.
Ignoring the interruption, Luke gave Clay a confused frown. "We had a theme last year, too," he pointed out. "We even told you about it and you joked it was 'cute'!"

"Did I?" Clay mused aloud, then shrugged. "Eh. My costume's still better."

From behind Phoenix, Apollo poked his head into the room, edging in around his father as he rolled his eyes at Clay's comment. "Wow, you're dressed as Mister Starbuck, no-one saw that coming," he sarcastically muttered with a grin. "You're missing the red hair, by the way."

Clay stifled a laugh as he saw Apollo's red hat and cape, over a black jumpsuit similar to Luke's except that it was baggy around the knees where it met his white boots. "Oh boy, Luke's a banana and Apollo's a tomato!" he cried.

Apollo frowned, crossing his arms as he pretended not to notice Phoenix and Luke hiding smiles. "You've seen me in the hat and cape before," he pointed out. "Besides, how'd you get your outfit, anyway? Beg Mister Starbuck to borrow an old uniform?"

"Shows what you know!" Clay boasted, hands on his hips. "I was given this jumpsuit specifically for tonight! It's mine now!"

Luke smiled, poking at the jacket. "And this?"

Clay squirmed, crossing his arms and admitting, "Well, yes, the jacket is just an old one that I'm borrowing... B-but that's only because Mister Starbuck isn't allowed to give it away!"

In the middle of Apollo and Luke's laughing at their friend, Trucy bounded into the room, twirling to show off her brand new blue hat and cape. "Clay! Look at my new outfit!"

"Hey, lookin' good!" Clay replied, giving the girl a thumbs-up. "Blue really suits you!"

Trucy giggled. "This is the colour Mommy wore!" she said. "So now we're all dressed up as the members of Troupe Gramarye!" She paused and pouted, glaring at Apollo and Luke. "Not that we had all four members when Daddy took me trick-or-treating earlier."

October 31, 6:57PM

Wonder Bar

With everyone assembled, and Clay's assurances he'd eaten already (although he insisted he meant no offence to Mister Eldoon and his salty noodles), the five made their way to the Wonder Bar. Trucy immediately disappeared backstage, and Phoenix led the trio of teenage boys to a table near the stage, which was once again reserved for them.

"Huh, I'd've thought Ms Vogel would tell Truce to leave these tables open," Phoenix mused aloud. "Put us a little further back."

Clay jumped into a chair, quickly followed by Luke and Apollo. "Man, I wonder what tricks she has planned for tonight?" he asked.

"And 'wonder' you might!" came a cry from behind him, and the family spun around to see a slender woman in a red dress, dark hair pinned up and make-up carefully applied, making her look something like a movie star. She smiled playfully at Clay as she approached the table. "Little Trucy is our biggest talent here!" She giggled at her own joke, throwing a wink to Phoenix, who looked away awkwardly.

"Boys," Phoenix said, gesturing to the woman with a polite smile, "this is Aderyn Vogel. She owns the Wonder Bar."

"Nice to meetcha!" Aderyn sang, hands on her hips as she grinned at the trio.

Luke's eyes widened as he suddenly picked up on the lilt in Aderyn's voice. "You're Welsh!"

"Luke!" Phoenix cried in a mixture of surprise and stern disapproval at his rudeness.

Aderyn only laughed. "Aye, picked that up, did ya?" she asked. "I'm from Cardiff. You ever been?"

Luke blushed, shaking his head. "Oh, no. I did a lot of travelling back in London, but I don't think I ever made it to Wales."

"Ah, London, 'ey?" Aderyn repeated, giving the teen a sympathetic look. "Could say the same about me, to be honest. Done a lot of travellin' in my day, but I never went to London." She smirked. "I was thinkin' you sounded a little Cockney, mate."

"Anyway," Phoenix interrupted, gesturing to the boys, "Ms Vogel, these are my sons and Trucy's brothers, Luke and Apollo."

Apollo waved. "Hi."

"Nice to meet you, ma'am!" Luke added with a cheery grin.

Aderyn shook Luke's hand, giving the boys a friendly nod.

"The last one is Clay, he's a friend," Phoenix continued.

Clay gave Aderyn a small salute and cocky grin, to her delight.

"Well, I hope you all enjoy the show tonight!" Aderyn chirped. "By the way," she added, tapping Luke's hat, "since you guys are in the front, you might wanna remove these once the show starts. Don't wanna block the view for everyone else."

Luke obediently removed his hat immediately and placed it on the table, carefully arranging the black streamers attached to the inside of the brim so they didn't tangle.

"I was going to ask about that," Phoenix admitted, glancing at the stage almost right next to their seats. "Is it really okay we're sitting here? You don't want paying customers in these seats?"

Aderyn smirked to herself, a hand over her face in an attempt to hide it. "Oh, it's fine," she insisted, glancing at Apollo. "Anythin' for my best little performer!" With that, she threw a final flirting wink to Phoenix and sauntered back towards the bar, laughing to herself. "Wunderbar!"

Apollo frowned in thought. "She's definitely in on whatever Trucy's planning," he decided.

"Yup," Clay agreed with a smile.
View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
As the restaurant finished filling to the brim, Phoenix nervously began to fiddle with his hat, Aderyn's request to remove it for the show playing across his mind opposite his fear of being recognised in public. Only as the lights above them dimmed and the blue curtain on the stage lit up did he finally pull the black top hat and fake beard off his head, resting them on the table in front of him while running a nervous hand through his spikey hair.

There were a few other acts that went on before Trucy's magic show was due, in its regular slot. Aderyn eagerly hosted, cheerily talking up each of her performers and throwing in handfuls of fluent German that contrasted greatly with her Welsh accent as she walked back and forth across the stage, microphone in hand. The wait was long enough that the Wrights almost forgot about Trucy's suspicious plans for the evening, and Phoenix forgot entirely about his recognisably visible hair.

"And now for an act I'm sure you've all been lookin' forward to," Aderyn announced, twirling the microphone cord in her free hand, "a little magician who truly puts the 'wonder' in 'Wonder Bar'!" A small cheer rose up from members of the audience who were clearly regulars. "Ah, I see she needs no introduction, aye?" she joked, grinning as she surveyed the crowd. "Well then, I guess I'll let 'er get right to it! Here she is, little Trucy Gramarye!" As she strode off stage, the curtains beginning to twitch as they opened, Aderyn could be heard calling to someone, "Das ist wirklich wunderbar, nicht?"

Trucy's act proceeded as it usually did, with Trucy focussing more on tricks she could play up a 'horror' aspect of, whether it was the pretend gore of chopping off a hand, or her usual card tricks now being accompanied by a short story of how their 'magic' was the result of a haunting from a tragic death.

"Ooh!" Trucy squeaked into the microphone pinned underneath her blue cape. "For this next bit, I'm gonna need a very brave volunteer to come up on stage to play with these haunted cards!" While idly shuffling her deck, she skipped along the front of the stage, looking out over her audience.

Apollo rolled his eyes, sinking down in his seat slightly as he tried not to call attention to himself. As fun as it was to watch his little sister shining in the spotlight, he had helped her practise every trick and spiel, and had no desire to be dragged up on stage as her 'assistant'... again.

Clay bounced in his seat, waving an arm eagerly. "I'll do it!" he cried. "Me!" There were similar cries coming from behind them, of other similarly impatient potential volunteers.

Trucy paced back and forth, tapping her chin as she critically evaluated the eager crowd. Slowly, a cheeky grin spread across her face. "Aw, do we not have any willing volunteers out there tonight?"

A small laugh bubbled across the crowd, most of the volunteers falling silent.

Trucy gave an exaggerated shrug. "Well, this is Halloween! There's all sorts of spooky, dangerous spirits hanging around up here!" She held a hand up to her mouth, adding in a stage-whisper, "It's too dangerous to let just anyone come up on stage, y'know! Don't wanna upset the ghosts of long-dead acts!"

Apollo frowned. 'Is... is she doing what I think she's doing...?'

Trucy's pacing stopped right in front of the Wrights' table, and she grinned as she peered down into the darkness. "I guess I have no choice but to call up someone who won't sue if the spirits don't like them!"

"Oh no," Apollo muttered, gripping the brim of the red top hat on the table in front of him.

Holding out her hand to her eldest brother, Trucy called with a grin, "Come on up, Apollo!"

His family shooting amused grins in his direction (Clay was more disappointed over missing out), Apollo stood up from his chair, jamming the red hat back on his head as he stalked around to the stage stairs near the bar. To his surprise, he heard the audience applauding him as he came under the stage lights, and remembered after a second he was wearing a matching outfit to Trucy's, only in red while her's was now blue. They probably think this was planned, ' he thought, then resisted a scowl. Well, it was on her part, anyway.'

Trucy skipped to the small table in the centre of the stage, placing her deck of cards down while she picked up the loose wireless microphone, holding it out for Apollo to take with a grin.

Apollo resisted the urge to glare at his sister, checking the mic was on by tapping the top and being rewarded by the sound of thudding from the speakers. "Okay, that's on." He was mildly surprised when the comment got a small laugh from the audience, but told himself to ignore them and focus on Trucy for now. "This isn't your revenge for me not going trick-or-treating with you tonight, is it?"

Grabbing her cards again and ignoring his comment, Trucy began to idly shuffle them, facing the audience although she was fixing her brother with a cheeky smile. "So, Apollo, you know how to do this phantom card trick, don't you?"

Apollo frowned. "Yeah, but I've only got one hand free at the m-!" He paused, then placed his free hand on his hip with a stern glare. "So that's why you had me practise it one-handed, you sly devil!"

As the audience laughed, Trucy shrugged innocently, holding out the cards with an expectant smile. "You had a grand plan tonight, didn't you?" Apollo continued, taking the cards and carefully shuffling them one-handed on the table. "Make me a Halloween costume, teach me magic for months..." He paused to move the microphone from his face, spreading the deck of cards out in his hand and holding them out to face Trucy. Once she obediently took one, showing it only to the audience, Apollo straightened up the deck on the table, freeing his other hand to again allow him to speak. "All of that was so you could drag me up here like a pet dog to show off what I can do. Put your card on the deck, already."

Trucy giggled, placing her card on the top of the deck and watching as Apollo carefully shuffled the cards again. "Aw, you're not a pet dog to me, Apollo!" she said. "You're not cute enough, for one thing!"

As the audience both laughed and sighed in sympathy, Apollo just rolled his eyes. "Yeah, I'm quite happy not being thought of as 'cute'," he pointed out. Finishing with his reshuffling, he slipped a single card out of the deck and took a stern peek at what it was. "Seven of diamonds?" he asked, holding the card out for the audience to see.
Trucy only grinned as the audience applauded the successful trick. Apollo placed the card back down on the pile, smiling back at her. 'Y'know what? I could actually get used to this.'

As the minutes passed, Apollo found himself more and more at home on the stage, exchanging careless banter with his little sister. In addition to performing some of her simpler card tricks, he helped her accomplish some of the more difficult parts of the act, their constant discussion honed from the months of practising as they kept the audience's attention on them and away from the real clues to the secrets of their craft. To his surprise, he didn't mind the constant audience attention as much as he feared he would, unable to really see far into the crowd thanks to the bright stage lights shining directly on him. His Chords of Steel training also helped, in that he was able to keep his voice at a constant volume and speed instead of trailing off or speaking so fast he fumbled over his words, both scenarios Trucy had warned him of beforehand. In fact, it was quite a while before Apollo even noticed he'd been on stage far longer than Trucy's typical volunteers.

"Isn't this the point you usually send your victims back into the audience?" Apollo asked as their previous conversation ended.

Trucy looked up from where she was putting away the props from their last trick. Without missing a beat, she smiled at her brother and replied, "Aw, but I like talking to you!"

Apollo scoffed playfully. "You talk to me almost every day of the week!" he pointed out, relieved when he heard the audience chuckling in response.

"No, I don't!" Trucy cried, standing up and planting her hands on her hips. "You have school!"

Crossing his one free arm across his front (his other arm still busy holding the microphone to his face), Apollo gave his sister a sarcastic look. "We live in the same house," he replied. "Remind me how long we've been siblings?"

Trucy couldn't respond immediately, as Apollo's comment seemed to particularly amuse their audience for several seconds. She gave her brother a knowing nod. "See, they're only laughing because they have no idea what the answer to that question is," she said.

Apollo grinned. "Yeah, and the answer they're thinking of is technically just as correct!"

Much to apparently everyone's disappointment, Apollo slipped off-stage after that to return to his family's table, sitting between Clay and Luke as they happily applauded him along with the rest of the audience. Trucy's act ended not long after, and she gave the gathered crowd a bow before the curtains closed, cutting her off from view as Aderyn came back out to wrap up and introduce the next act.

"What a show, right?" Aderyn cried emphatically. "Give it up for little Trucy and her big brother Apollo! What a good sport, huh?"

Apollo blushed, sinking in his seat as he felt the stares of the people around him focussed in his direction. The applause that followed helped, though.

October 31, 8:17PM

Wonder Bar
It was several minutes after the show ended that Trucy finally emerged from the backstage door behind the bar, running gleefully to her family's table. "Daddy! Daddy!" she called, immediately jumping up on Phoenix's lap to hug him. "Wasn't my act amazing tonight!?"

Phoenix chuckled, while Apollo rolled his eyes, Clay and Luke exchanging stifled laughs. "Your act was wonderful," Phoenix assured his daughter, hugging her and shooting Apollo a grin. "Both of you did fantastic up there."

Apollo stared at his lap, pretending he wasn't blushing at the praise.

"Ah, you're all together!" came a cry from the direction of the bar, and Aderyn approached the table, clapping her own applause for the young magicians. "You two were brilliant, you were!" She laughed, looking between Trucy and Apollo. "So, what's the word on turnin' that into a more permanent state of affairs, then?"

Apollo's eyes widened in shock. "Huh?"

"That were a test run," Aderyn replied, Trucy grinning from Phoenix's lap as said father raised an eyebrow in impressed surprise. "Trucy proposed we try it out tonight, and, if the audience liked it, I'd consider hirin' you on as a permanent performer!"

Clay laughed, slapping the stunned Apollo's arm. "Dude, do you realise how awesome that is!?"

Apollo raised a hand to silence his friend, staring at Aderyn. "Wait, you're willing to pay double just to have me on stage with Trucy?" When the woman cheerfully nodded, he frowned in confusion. "Why?"

Aderyn sadly smiled and shrugged. "I guess I just like you," she said. "Plus, that were the kind of chance I didn't always get back in my performin' days."

Surprised at the truthful admittance, Apollo stared for a moment before smiling. "Well, I should probably practise some more with Trucy first," he said, "but I'd be happy to accept your offer, Ms Vogel."

Trucy cheered as she bounced in Phoenix's lap, causing the man to wince a bit in pain. Luke and Clay joined in the cheering, while Aderyn only reached out to shake Apollo's hand with a wink. "I look forward to workin' with you, Mister Wright!"

"Me too!" Apollo found himself admitting with a laugh.

Chapter End Notes

Aderyn's "Das ist wirklich wunderbar, nicht?" is the German equivalent of "This is truly wonderful, no?". Thanks to retconnedtimelord over on Tumblr for correcting my initial translation!
Luke's music stand was a bit old, and had trouble standing up sometimes, but it had been recovered from the Triton moving van and it was a better option than simply balancing his violin books on whatever surface would take them. In fact, Luke had made sure when he found the music stand and his old violin books to immediately separate them to ensure they were taken home, and even gone through some of them again out of a fear he was drifting off-key with his finger positions. Ideally, he'd have a violin teacher to help him stay on track, but the teen knew the Wright family's finances were permanently on the rocks and had no desire to put a further strain on it, thus he continued regular practise sessions on his own.

He was in the middle of one such practise session when there was a quick rapping on his door, which promptly opened without waiting for an answer. Noticing Trucy bounding in, Luke reluctantly put his violin down, waiting for his sister to announce what she wanted.

Closing the door again behind her, Trucy very quickly skipped to Luke's bed, side-stepping his fragile music stand and sitting on the blankets, giving her brother a grin. "Hey Luke!"

"Hi, Trucy," Luke replied, giving her a polite smile while he awkwardly stood with his violin and bow in hand. "What did you want?"

Trucy stared at him a few moments before deciding to respond. "You know what would be cool?"

"If you signed up to the Agency as one of our talents!" Trucy announced, giving a meaningful glance to the violin.

For a few moments, Luke was too shocked to respond. "You mean... our Agency? The Wright Talent Agency?"

Trucy rolled her eyes. "Duh! You could play your violin and get money for it! Like Polly and I do with magic!"

Luke looked down to the violin in his hand. "Perform my violin...?" He shook his head, looking back up to his sister. "I don't think that's a good idea. I'm not that good at it."

"Nonsense!" Trucy scoffed, crossing her arms with a smile. "I'm sure I can find you someplace to perform where people will agree with me that you're good!"

Giving up on his practise for now, Luke set about putting his carefully kept instrument back in its case. "I'm sorry Trucy, but I'm not planning on taking up music as my job when I grow up." He closed the case, leaving it on the floor at his feet as he then turned to his books.

Trucy pouted, watching as the violin books were put away in a small bookcase at the foot of Luke's
"So?" she asked. "You can still do it as a hobby!" She paused for a moment in thought, then added, "What do you want to be when you grow up, anyway?"

Luke looked up from the bookcase, eyes wide in surprise. "Uh..."

Trucy stared for a moment, then gasped, hands at her mouth. "You don't know?!" she asked.

Blushing, Luke quickly rushed to and collapsed his music stand, leaving it next to his violin case and silently walking over to the bed, where he sat down at Trucy's side without a word.

"I always thought," Trucy eventually continued, looking embarrassed, "since you were really into keeping up with your violin, you'd want to be a music professor or something. Y'know, like Professor Layton."

Trucy shrugged. "You are good at it," she said. "You're good at a lot of things." She grinned. "You tell great stories of your adventures! And you're really smart, too! You could do whatever you wanted to, I bet!"

"That's the problem," Luke admitted. "Out of everything in the world, there's nothing in particular I really want to do when I leave school." He sighed, leaning on his knees. "I love puzzles, but there's no real job you can do revolving around them. I love animals too, but I don't know how I could use that in a grown-up job."

"You could be a vet!" Trucy piped up excitedly. "There's a girl in my class who's always talking about how she's going to be a vet when she grows up!"

Luke looked over to his sister in surprise, slowly sitting up straight in his seat. "Hey... that actually makes perfect sense!" He grinned, beginning to laugh. "I'd be a brilliant vet! I can talk to the animals and find out what's wrong with them directly! Why didn't I ever think of this before!?

Trucy giggled, clapping her hands in celebration. "Yay! We found your dream!"

"Dream?" Luke repeated incredulously, before laughing again. "It's more of a 'goal', I'd say! Becoming a vet isn't going to be easy! 'Of course, I have to develop a passion for it to stand a chance, given how much studying it requires...'"

"It will be for you, I bet!" Trucy said with a grin, leaning across to give her brother a hug. "You're the smartest person I know! 'Cept for Daddy, of course."

Luke smiled as he reflected on the praise.

"Of course," Trucy continued, leaning back and fixing Luke with a bright smile, "in the meantime, you can still join the agency as a violinist!"

After a moment of thought, Luke sighed and nodded. "Sure, why not?"

---

My dear Luke,

I'm relieved to hear you are more than happy to read my updates on Alfendi. Indeed, it would be wonderful were the two of you able to meet, but the unfortunate reality is that neither of us is in the best situation to be able to just jump across the Atlantic right now.

I would hope Flora continues to love Alfendi even once he ceases to be 'small and cute'. It was one of my biggest worries when she started insisting we look into adopting a baby, that she would grow bored with it once it became a child. I don't recall if I mentioned that or not in a previous letter. Regardless, I don't think it will be a problem at all, as Flora and Alfendi do indeed get along swimmingly.

I'm sorry to say you won't know the person picking up my dropped classes; She has only recently joined the university. She is talented however, so I would hope she stays on as a professor here for a long time.

I shouldn't be surprised to hear this 'fan-club' of Mr Wright's fell apart so quickly, but I find I am. I was almost tempted to look it up myself, actually. At least before all that, it did some good with these friendships you mentioned, such as between Apollo and Ms Byrde. As for Miss Fey being the one to start it all up, I must say that was the least surprising thing to hear. I still recall how you told me our first evening in Labyrinthia that you were convinced they were a couple.

The incredible story of the HAT-1 Miracle did indeed reach us over in England. I must admit, I found Mr Starbuck's name familiar when I heard it on the news, but could not place from where. I hope your friend Clay is alright, since I can imagine it would have hit him hard to see his mentor in such peril. The story seems to have so captured the public imagination, it is only now finally beginning to disappear from the headlines. I've heard rumours they plan on making a movie about the event, although I imagine such news would be easier to verify in Los Angeles than in London, and even easier if you know Mr Starbuck personally. Flora told me she got up early to watch the landing, although I was too busy to do such a thing myself. It was at some time around sunrise for us, which is altogether too early for me.

I had not heard of a murder at the space centre, however. If you find out any more about it, I would be interested to hear it.

The usual puzzles are enclosed, as is your birthday gift for this year. Be sure not to open it until the tenth. Flora, Alfendi and I are doing splendidly, I assure you, and we all wish you a happy birthday.

Your friend,

Professor Hershel Layton

28th October, 2020

Dear Professor Layton,

At the time of writing this, I haven't opened your gift, but Papa tells me he'll let me call you the morning after my birthday (since we'll be at school on the day), so I can thank you then. Or, did thank you then, since you won't be reading this until after!

You aren't jealous that my Papa had a fan-club, are you, Professor? If you searched online, I'm sure you'd find a group of people similarly connected through admiring you! You're just as amazing as Papa, so there's bound to be something! And I'm not the only one who thinks Papa and Maya should be a couple; You will have to meet Pearl when you finally manage to visit us here!

I think I remember Mr Starbuck mentioning there had been offers made on the day he got back to do a movie, but I don't know if there's anything happening with that still. Clay's been by the Space Centre every day he's had free, and Apollo and I have gone with him a few times, too.

Halloween was a week ago today, and boy was it exciting this year! Trucy dressed us all up in costumes fashioned after her family when they were all Troupe Gramarye, with Papa as her grandfather Magnifi, me as her uncle Valant, Apollo as her father Zak and herself as her mother Thalassa. We didn't find out till later that the reason she decided on the 'theme' on her own was because she was going to have a performance of her act at the Wonder Bar on the day, and she had concocted a grand plan to trial herself and Apollo together on stage! Apollo complained, but he really enjoyed himself, so he's said yes to doing it again in future! Trucy's using the costumes she made for them as the basis for their new permanent stage outfits, and she says she's going to change her stage name to Artemis Gramarye, to match Apollo once he takes on 'Gramarye' as his stage name. They really were amazing on stage as a pair! I wish you could have seen it, Professor! Trucy's even making sure not to call him 'Polly' while on stage, she says to emphasise their names once they're performing together every week. Oh, and Papa's even given the go-ahead to let them perform more often! Trucy and Apollo have to talk about it with Papa and their new boss, but they're really looking forward to it!

I've included a photo of the four of us in costume, and some new puzzles inspired by Halloween! I hope you, Flora and Alfendi are doing well!

Your friend and apprentice,

Luke Triton

P.S. Do you think I'd make a good vet?

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
"It's the first Monday off from school, and what are you two doing with it?" Apollo asked, hands on his hips.

"Enjoying it?" Trucy replied with a grin, sitting on the lounge next to Luke, the television in front of them paused in the middle of an episode of Pink Princess.

Apollo rolled his eyes, ruffling his red cape as he pulled it tighter around himself. "No, you're wasting time watching TV when there's freakin' snow out there to enjoy for once," he continued. "I'd've thought, out of anyone, you two would be the most excited for this."

Luke shrugged. "It's not cold enough out there," he said.

"Especially not for real snow," Trucy added. "Real snow is more fun."

Apollo sighed, stalking off towards the front door. "Fine then. I'm going to the park to actually experience the snow event that has been carefully set up exactly for ungrateful people like you." With that, he was gone, the door falling closed behind him.

Trucy scoffed to herself as she leaned back in her seat and set the episode to continue playing.

Luke curled up beside his sister, getting comfortable. "Do you think Apollo's jealous he's never got to experience real snow like us?" he asked.

"Yup!" Trucy chirped with a grin. "He obviously didn't have enough of it when it snowed here a few years back!"

"Or when we were in Kurain last year!" Luke added with a laugh.

The pair settled in to watch their show without another thought for their brother. Although the special 'snow event' being set up in People Park looked intriguing, neither were really interested in the fake snow meant to make the warm winter feel more Christmassy. Luke was used to seeing snow at least every couple of years back in London (and never as early as Christmas itself), while Trucy had spent much of the first five years of her life in colder climates, sometimes living in places where it snowed almost year-round. Although there was frequently snow on some of the mountains surrounding the city, Apollo had admitted to never having gone to see it when he was younger. Secretly, Luke didn't blame him for still being excited to see it, even if it was fake like the event in People Park. to his front door and turned towards People Park, a voice called out, causing him to halt.

"Excuse me, kid! In the Gramarye cape?" Apollo turned, finding to his surprise a young woman wrapped up in a green coat, smiling at him hopefully. She gestured towards the stairs he had just come out of. "Would this happen to be the Wright Talent Agency?"

Apollo was too surprised to respond for a second, before catching himself and giving her a friendly smile. "Yes, actually! Would you like me to help you?" 'How often do we even get customers!?'

The woman laughed, waving a hand dismissively. "Oh no, that's alright! As long as there's someone inside, I think I'll be fine, thank you!"

Apollo watched as the woman headed up the stairs, a gleeful grin on her face. 'I wonder if I should have warned her it's just Luke and Trucy in there right now...?' After a pause, he shook his head and headed off towards the park. 'Nah.'

It was the sound of the front door opening that alerted Trucy someone had entered the office, and she jumped up to pause their show.

"It's probably Apollo," Luke pointed out, uncurling to sit normally in his seat. "He must've forgotten something."

As if in answer to his assertion, an unfamiliar voice called out, "Hello? Is this the Wright Talent Agency?"

Luke's eyes widened, and Trucy jumped to turn off the television, running to the reception door and throwing it open. Luke hurried behind her, and the pair stood in the doorway grinning up at the green-coated young woman beyond. "Welcome!" Trucy cried exuberantly, arms in the air. "We here at the Wright Talent Agency are always here to help!" She strode forward, taking the somewhat surprised woman's arm and gently guiding her towards the office. "What is it you need, ma'am? Magician? Musician? Both? More than one but up to two of either?"

The woman didn't respond as Trucy led her to the lounge in the office, looking around at the former law firm and the two children currently occupying it for several moments before smiling at Trucy, trying to hide her discomfort as she sat down on the black couch. "Actually, I was looking for a musician," she admitted.

Trucy gasped, clapping her hands together. '"That's wonderful! Both of our musicians are in the building currently!' She turned to Luke, who was standing off to the side somewhat awkwardly. "Luke, did you want to get your violin to demonstrate for our client?"

The woman perked up. "Violin?" She grinned, turning to Luke. "That's perfect! A violinist is just what we need!"

Luke forced his biggest smile through his surprise as the woman began to dig through her purse. "Oh, that's good, then!" he said. "I'm glad to be of help!"

"Here!" the woman said, pulling out a folder that she handed off to Luke. "This is the music we'll be performing! Can you play it?"
Taking the folder, Luke opened it and found it to be full of sheet music, set out for a violin with accompanying lyrics listed below. He examined the pages critically, leafing through it for a few moments before giving the woman a smile. "Yep, I can do this with a little practise!"

"Excellent!" The woman cried excitedly, then held out her hand. "My name's Aria Holliday, by the way. I don't think I ever introduced myself!"

Luke took her hand to shake it politely. "Luke." He paused a split-second, then added, "Wright. I'm Luke Wright." Noticing Trucy's strange look, he gestured to her. "This is my little sister Trucy. She's usually in charge around here."

Aria laughed, not seeming to notice Trucy's resulting pout. "Nice to meet you!"

"Trucy, could you go get my violin for me?" Luke asked, holding up the folder of music in his hands. "I'd like to try a run-through."

Trucy nodded, then paused and grinned. "Oh, I'll get Daddy while I'm at it!" She turned her bright gaze to Aria. "He handles all the money around here!" Without waiting for a response, she ran off towards the kitchen door.

Aria bit her lip as she watched Trucy disappear, and Luke could have sworn he heard her quietly squeal. She turned to Luke, standing from the couch and forcing herself back to business. "Now, the performance is on the twenty-fifth, by the lake in People Park. We'll be starting around seven, but we'll have to show up a little earlier to get everything set up."

Luke nodded. "That won't be a problem," he assured her, then frowned curiously, looking down at the music. "Did you have another violinist who had to cancel suddenly?"

Aria sighed, crossing her arms. "Yeah," she admitted. "I mean, I know we're not technically professionals, but he could have told us earlier he'd be going on vacation for this." She huffed to herself, staring out the window at the hotel across the street. "Honestly, it's like the guy was raised in a barn sometimes!"

Luke smiled sympathetically, but, before he could answer, the door to the kitchen opened again, and Phoenix wandered in, beanie on his head and Trucy at his side, a black violin case in her hands. He smiled politely at Aria as he headed behind his desk. "Ms Holliday, I assume?"

Aria nodded eagerly, a massive grin on her face as she ran to the desk. "Yes!" she cried, then seemed to reign in her excitement and stood calmly. "Are these two your children, Mister Wright?"

Trucy shot a look to Luke behind Aria's back and giggled. Luke tried to give her a disapproving frown, but couldn't resist a smile.

Phoenix nodded politely, arranging the papers on his desk to find the barely-used form he had designed for keeping track of one-off clients. "Two of the three, yes," he replied with a proud smile, finally locating the form and pulling out a pen to start filling in details. "So you want to hire Luke, right?"

"Luke Wright, yes," Aria replied. "We need a violinist on the twenty-fifth."

"It's in the park, at seven," Luke added, clutching the folder of music in his hands as he ran up to the side of the desk. "That'll be okay, won't it Papa?"

Phoenix nodded, shooting Luke a grin. "That's perfectly fine. We can drop by and watch you perform!"
"Oh, that'd be wonderful!" Aria cried in a high pitch, clapping her hands together. "We'd love for you all to come by and watch!"

Trucy giggled, running around to hand Luke his violin and looking up at Aria. "Miss Holliday," she asked in her best business-like tone, "may I ask how you came to hear of the Wright Talent Agency?"

Aria thought a moment, tapping a cheek. "Well, to be honest, a friend of mine posted about it in this online forum we go to," she explained, then turned to Luke. "I think he's a friend of yours? I don't know his real name."

Luke frowned in thought, looking to Trucy. "You think it might be Clay?"

Aria snorted. "'Clay'. That would fit the old stick-in-the-mud!" she giggled to herself. "Kinda suits his username, too!"

Aria shrugged. "All I know is he's a teenage boy who is supposed to know you. Besides, a lot of people are very different on the internet than in real life."

Phoenix interrupted the conversation to hold out the form and his pen for Aria to take. "If you would just sign this, Ms Holliday," he said, "then we can get everything confirmed to go for you."

Here We Come A-Carolling

December 25, 7:21PM
People Park

It was a minuscule crowd of people, but there was still applause when the humble performance by the six singers and their violinist huddled under the streetlight finally ended. Luke sighed in relief as he put down his bow, lowering his instrument back into its case sitting at his feet. Aria loudly thanked the crowd for their time, then headed over to the teenage boy with a grin. "Hey, that was great!" she cried, gloved hands clapping together. "You're pretty good at this!"

Luke blushed, busying himself locking up the black case. "Oh, I'm alright, I guess," he answered, then stood up to reach for the music sitting on his stand. "Thank you for the compliment, though!" He held out the folder of sheet music. "You'll want this back, I assume?"

"Oh, yeah, thanks!" Aria chirped, taking the small folder with a laugh. "If we ever have another problem with my idiot friend, I'm definitely coming to you first!"

"Thank you," Luke said with a blush, collapsing his music stand and wincing as it promptly fell sideways onto the pavement below their feet, where bits of fake snow from the previous week still clung in irregular patches. "Oops."

Behind Aria, a familiar voice chuckled. "Need help?" Phoenix asked, approaching Luke with Trucy and Apollo at his sides, both siblings clad in their matching capes although only Trucy wore her hat.

Luke grabbed the folded music stand with a smile. "I'm fine, Papa," he assured his father, standing up with his violin and stand in hand. "How was it?"

"That was great!" Apollo cried with a grin from Phoenix's right, fists held before him.

"I said you were good at this!" Trucy pointed out with an I-told-you-so tone, arms crossed. "And I was right!"

Phoenix laughed at Trucy's comment, saying to Luke, "I thought it was a wonderful performance."

Luke smiled, while Aria squealed as she clapped her hands. "Oh, I'm so glad you enjoyed it, Mister Wright!" She glanced down at Apollo and Trucy "And you two, as well!" While Apollo rolled his eyes, Aria turned her excited gaze back up to Phoenix. "You have very talented children!"

Phoenix laughed again, hands on Apollo and Trucy's shoulders as he proudly grinned. Before he could say anything though, Trucy tipped her hat to Aria. "If you think Luke's good, you should see what me and Polly do!"

Paying Luke's comment no attention, Trucy pulled a flyer out of her hip-bag, handing it to a curious Aria. "Come to the Wonder Bar the Saturday two weeks from now! We're having our first performance as a pair!"

"Ooh!" Aria cooed as she looked over the newly printed flyer advertising the range of talents the family shared. "I should have guessed you two were magicians, what with the cute Gramarye outfits!" She giggled. "You sure it's legal to perform in those?"

"About that," Apollo butted in with a grin, arms crossed, "Trucy and I are actually both Gramaryes. We're just continuing the family tradition."

Aria was shocked, the Wrights all quietly amused at her reaction. "Really!? I mean, I knew Zak had a daughter, but..." She shook her head, then fixed a bright smile on her face and looked between the caped pair. "I will definitely come by to see your show! I'm looking forward to it already!"

Trucy and Apollo grinned, glancing at each other, only for Trucy to suddenly gasp and lunge at her oldest brother. "Polly, you're not wearing it!"

Apollo jumped out of Trucy’s path, frowning as he circled Phoenix to try and dodge her. "I don't want to wear it!" he complained, only for Trucy to grab his cape and pull him to a halt in threat of choking himself. "Let go!"

Phoenix gave Trucy a glare, convincing her to release her brother, then turned to Apollo as the teen fled to his father's left, opposite from Trucy. "Apollo, you may as well make your sister happy and put it on for a minute."

"But-!" Apollo objected, then sighed. "Fine." Out of the small bag hanging off his belt where Zak would have kept his gun holster, he pulled a hot pink beanie, which his quickly threw on his head, revealing the word 'Bro' stitched in blue along the side. He glared at Trucy, ignoring Luke's badly hidden giggles. "I put way too much effort into my hair this morning to flatten it under this pink monstrosity."

"Now that's not a nice thing to say about your Christmas present," Phoenix chided the teen, grinning. He then turned to Aria, who was watching the siblings with a smile. "We'll let you go now, Ms Holliday. Thank you for hiring Luke tonight."

"Oh no, thank you!" Aria insisted, giggling for a moment to herself before blushing and fidgeting where she stood. "Actually Mister Wright, I should probably admit... when our first violinist cancelled, I didn't just come to you because you were close. She picked at the end of a coat sleeve self-consciously. "I've actually been a fan of yours for a while now. Y'know, back when you were a lawyer."

The Wrights stared in surprise for a moment before Phoenix turned to Apollo with a smirk. "Wow, you guys just keep popping out of the woodwork, don't you?"

Aria raised an eyebrow.

Apollo turned red as he looked away. "Daaaaad..." He briefly glanced back at Aria suspiciously, but otherwise kept his gaze focussed on his feet.

Trucy tapped her chin in thought. "Wait, does that mean you didn't hear about us from Clay?"

"Clay?" Apollo repeated in confusion.

"No, no, I was telling the truth there!" Aria insisted, a serious look on her face. "This friend of yours posted about it on our forum and was all enthusiastic about how you were expanding your range." She paused, crossing her arms in thought. "Actually, if you two are Gramaryes, that probably explains why he knows so much about the Gramarye family too."

Apollo went pale, staring at Aria with wide eyes.
"Anyway, I should probably get going," Aria chuckled, waving a hand. She smiled at the Wrights and began to walk away. "I'll get in touch if I need a replacement violinist again! See you on stage, kids!"

"Bye Miss Holliday!" Trucy replied, waving her arm in reply as the woman disappeared down the path towards Kitaki Avenue.

Phoenix laughed, gesturing for his children to follow him as he headed off towards their home. "C'mon, let's go. It's way too dark to be out and way too late for certain children to be away from home."

"Awww!" Trucy whined, taking Phoenix's hand as she reluctantly followed him. Luke laughed as he joined the group, but Apollo took a little longer, staring in the direction Aria had disappeared for a few moments before shaking his head and rushing to catch up to his family.

Blackbird? Are you up?

I don't want to disturb you if you're busy or something

Hey steel. Nah I'm free. What's the matter?.

I think our latest client at the agency was someone from the forum

I see. You want me to do anything about it?.

No I'm fine. I'm just panicking a bit that they've figured out who I am and that I lied about it and everything

Well that's not a nice holiday gift. But hey, if anything bad does come of this you can count on me to keep a handle on it.

But I can promise nothing bads gonna happen. No ones gonna judge you, no ones gonna stop being your friend, okay?.

Okay. Thanks Blackbird. That helped

No problem pal :) Feel free to text me anytime if you need someone to talk to.

I will :) thanks again

December 25, 8:34PM
Wright Talent Agency
Luke and Apollo's Room

Apollo stared at the dark ceiling, listening to Luke's steady breathing from the other side of the room.
In his hand was his phone, the screen turning off as it timed out since Apollo had sent his last text to Blackbird - Maggy - a few moments before. He was still a little uneasy, but his friend's assurances that his online friendships wouldn't change was helping.

'If only I knew who this 'Miss Holliday' was!'

Groaning, Apollo turned on his side, reaching out to carefully drop his phone onto his bedside table before pulling his arms under the warm blankets. From here, he could see Luke, almost entirely hidden under his own blankets, his brown hair sticking out from under the covers as the teen slept facing the wall. Apollo smiled. 'At least one of us is getting some rest. Despite what he thinks, Luke did actually play really well at the park today.' His smile died. 'Except, Luke was only hired in the first place because Holliday had heard about the Agency from me... If I hadn't posted about it, I wouldn't be lying here worrying that my online friends are going to figure out I've been lying to them, but at the same time Luke wouldn't have had this first opportunity to play for a paying audience. Well, sort of 'paying audience'. He mulled over the situation for a few moments before shaking his head and curling up into a ball, the blankets pulled up to his chin. 'No. Posting about it was the right thing. Blackbird's right, no-one's gonna judge me for hiding the truth... even if they do figure it out.' With that, Apollo closed his eyes and finally drifted off to sleep.

Thread: People Park on Christmas!

Pocky-Hockey, 12/24/2020 05:37:38PM

Oh wow I totally forgot to post about this here but like

Is anyone free tomorrow evening? My friends and I run an amateur choir, with one of my friend's brothers playing the violin (except he isn't this time because reasons) and we're performing in People Park tomorrow! We'll be by the lake at 7pm! Anyone who can come, let me know and we can have a mini-meet-up!

Oh and if someone complains this has nothing to do with Mr Wright you'd be wrong bucko because guess who I've hired to replace my friend's idiot brother when he dropped out? ONE OF MR WRIGHT'S KIDS, BABy I am beyond pleased I got an excuse to actually meet them it's amazing

Wow, that sounds cool, Pocky! But be honest, was there actually a problem with your friend's brother, or did you just want an excuse to check out the Talent Agency? I must admit I'm a little wary, especially since it wasn't all that long ago Steel was advertising them here.

Unfortunately, I won't be able to make it to People Park tomorrow. Let us know how it goes, huh?

ForgotMeKnot, 12/25/2020 09:14:51AM

Hey, you've met Mr Wright and his kids? Spill! :D

I can't make it either, but I hope it all goes well for you, Pocky.

Pocky-Hockey, 12/25/2020 10:23:42AM

Nope, I'm not talking. :) We have those privacy rules for a reason and my relationship with Mr Wright and his kids is purely professional!

Dime_Quarters [CERTIFIED USER] [MOD], 12/25/2020 01:35:27PM

Well that's a surprise! It's a shame you gave us so little warning you were performing tonight, Pocky! I'm out of town, but I might have been able to drop by had I known earlier.

And I'm sure the entire purpose of Steel posting about the Talent Agency was to give them business, so I'm sure no one minds Pocky dropped by. Just continue to be aware of the privacy rules, huh?

ForgotMeKnot, 12/25/2020 08:21:25PM

You're such a buzzkill Dime :/ Don't worry, we'll keep to the rules.

Pocky's performance should be over by now. Where is she? I wanna hear about it went!

Pocky-Hockey, 12/26/2020 09:32:25AM

AAAA So I didn't post last night once the performance was over because it was late, but everything went amazing! Even Mr Wright liked it! :D Were any of you guys able to come?

Oh and someone tell SJL he was bang on about the Wright Talent Agency. The kid with the violin was great! And the other two even invited me to go watch their little magicians act in a couple weeks! Wait actually SJL ARE YOU READING THIS? I found out how you know so much about the Gramaryes, you little nutjob ;D

I'm glad to hear everything went well Pocky, but could you try not to insult Steel, even playfully?

I can pass on a message for you if you'd like. We have each other's phone numbers.

ForgotMeKnot, 12/26/2020 02:18:24PM

SJL's a big boy, he can handle a joke :/ I know we say he's the baby of the forum but c'mon Blackbird.

So Pocky, you hired one of the Wright kids to play for you and the other two invited you to watch their show!? Are you assimilating yourself into being their friend or something!? Now I'm just dying to know more about these kids. Which one is SJL friends is? If he'd just show up already we could maybe meet up with him at the magic act.

Pocky-Hockey, 12/26/2020 06:45:42PM

Blackbird, is SJL okay? I'm guessing you guys talk outside the forum, so you sound like you'd know better than us.

It's not like that, Knot. xD I think I may or may not know SJL's real name, since I told them I heard about the agency from a friend of theirs (they only gave me one possibility, and IT FIT SO WELL GUYS), but I didn't say it was through the fanclub. Of course, if SJL is friends with the older kid, the one I didn't talk to, then this is all crap anyway.

Also apparently there was another Gramarye child because he's said older kid. Zak's little girl SJL was boasting about was one of the Wrights! I am so looking forward to seeing them perform, you Thanks Blackbird, I'm fine.

I heard about your performance, Pocky. It sounds like it went well. Yeah, the Gramarye kids are the ones I'm friends with. Their stage names are Apollo and Artemis Gramarye, and they're looking forward to performing too. They were really excited about their brother yesterday. Did you know you were his first client?

I won't be able to do any meet-ups, though. I'm busy the night of their first performance. Actually, I'm busy most weekends.

Pocky-Hockey, 12/27/2020 10:02:24AM

Aw, are you telling me your real name isn't 'Clay'? It's perfect! It matches your username! Well, the 'steel' part, not so much 'justice' or 'lover' xD

No meet-ups? :o But you used to be so eager to do those! And you're not going to go watch your friends on their first performance!? This is the closest we'll ever get to the famous Troupe Gramarye acts, people!

(Also I love their stage-names... although "Apollo's" isn't very imaginative, is it? ;D )

steeljusticelover [CERTIFIED USER], 12/30/2020 06:27:48PM

It's fine Pocky, really. No, I'm not Clay, though he'd probably agree with you on what you said (if he was a member here, I'd bet you his username would be 'spacedork' :P ). And the thing about Apollo is kinda true, so there's no hard feelings there. He and Artemis fully understand why I can't be in the audience to watch their show and they accept it.

I didn't reply to the thread because I wasn't sure what to say. It had nothing to do with you, don't worry.

I've met Mr Wright a lot over the past year. He makes strange comments all the time. I wouldn't pay him any attention.

Title: A Very Important Question

Pocky-Hockey, 12/30/2020 06:43:20PM

You know SJL's real name, don't you? Could you answer a very important question for me?

Are you seriously asking me to tell you Steel's real name? The rules still apply in PMs too. It's none of your business what his real name is.

Yes or no: Is he Apollo?

And what makes you think he is?

A lot of little things, really. Mr Wright said something about meeting fans to Apollo in a sort of teasing way, Luke didn't think 'Clay' sounded like my description of SJL, Trucy almost demanded I go see their show but is apparently okay with SJL ALWAYS being too busy to see it despite being a friend (this would make sense if he's on stage with her), SJL’s talked about having a sister and a brother and a father but nothing else (which also fits if he's one of the Wrights), he knew about Trucy being a Gramarye which proves he genuinely knows the Wrights and hasn't been faking anything... Did he figure out I was a member of the forum and might know who he was and that's why he's been so short with me lately?

Look, if he is actually Apollo, I can see why he kept quiet about it. I won't spill, I can promise that.

The rules of the forum say we protect the privacy of the Wrights above all else. I consider that to apply to Apollo, too. He doesn't want who his father is to be a big deal, and this is one place in the world it definitely would be.

You really did scare him, you know. I made him a promise nothing bad would happen and he wouldn't lose any friends, so I'd better not find you've broken that promise I made him, okay?

Thanks for telling me the truth, Blackbird. You can count on me! I won't let you, or Steel, down! My lips are sealed!

(but seriously, thanks. I won't say a word)

???

Okay...

I hope to hear your thoughts on Apollo and Artemis' act when you go to see them. They've been working hard on it, so you'll post a review afterwards, won't you? Like, a one-off exception to your 'resolution'?

Wright & Co Law Offices
Phoenix's Office

Pearl sighed as she sat, totally dwarfed, in the chair behind Phoenix's desk. "Mister Nick's name is hard."

"To spell?" Maya sympathised, crouched next to the chair as she typed into the keyboard of the ancient computer that had once belonged to her sister. "Yeah, it took me a while to get it right." She then smirked as she realised what she'd said. "'Wright'. Pfft. That part was easy!" While Pearl watched in confusion, Maya dug through the mess coating Phoenix's desk and pulled out a small holder of business cards, pulling one out to give to Pearl. "I just always kept one of these on hand until I memorised it."

Pearl nodded, studying the small card in her hands as Maya returned to her typing. After a few moments, she looked back up at the CRT monitor, watching her cousin carefully picking out a colour scheme. "Is that part of why we're making a 'four-um' for his 'club of fans'?" she asked. "So they can learn to spell his name?"

"No, Pearly," Maya replied, frowning as she wondered how she could explain it any clearer when she wasn't exactly a technology buff herself. "Nick's... 'club of fans' doesn't exist yet. This forum is going to be a place where all his fans can find each other! We're starting the club!"

Pearl thought a moment, then nodded. "Okay."

Clicking a final button to finish the process, Maya bit her lip in excitement, watching the website load. Finally, it popped up with a message that set-up was complete, and Maya jumped in place, cheering as loudly as she dared. "It's up!" she cried, then grabbed the mouse. "You want to sign up as a fan, Pearly?"

The girl had a think for a while before replying. "On a 'four-um', you have to write messages for each other, don't you, Mystic Maya?"

Maya nodded, only then pausing as she saw Pearl's nervous nail-chewing and realising what the problem was. "Oh, are you upset because you're still learning to spell?"

Pearl looked away, but it was clear the answer was 'yes'.

"I'll type for you, then," Maya offered, clicking buttons to set up the first account on the new forum after hers. "I called myself 'MyFairy', so how about you go with 'PreciousFairy'? I think that suits you!"

"Thank you, Mystic Maya," Pearl muttered, looking up at the monitor uneasily, "but why do we need new names?"

Maya paused, turning to her young cousin. "That's how the internet works," she explained. "It can be very easy for not-nice people to see everything you do, so you give yourself a new name and you don't tell strangers anything about where you live or what you look like." She gave Pearl a smile. "Understand?"

Pearl nodded. "Yes, I think so."

"Good!" Maya returned to setting up the account. "I'll give you co-founder status, since we're making this together." She winked in Pearl's direction. "Remember we're keeping this a secret from Nick, though!" As Pearl was nodding excitedly, Maya heard a creaking of floorboards from the kitchen, and, panicking, hurriedly closed the internet browser, standing up straight and putting on her best innocent grin just as the door creaked open. In the doorway stood Phoenix, mostly dressed in his usual blue suit except for the jacket slung over his shoulder, badge just visible gleaming from the lapel.

Phoenix frowned suspiciously at the girls as he saw them sat (or stood, in Maya's case) behind his desk. "What are you two doing?"

"Nothing!" Maya sang, grinning widely. "How's your new bedroom, huh?"

After a moment, Phoenix shrugged. He'd only finished moving in to the upstairs apartment the previous day, no longer able to afford renting both the office and his old flat at the same time. "It'll grow on me," he admitted, then swung his jacket off his shoulder to start pulling it on. "What are you two doing on that computer?"

Pearl shook her head, pushing herself off the chair and running around the desk. "We were just looking, Mister Nick!" she insisted. "I've never used a com-pyu-tah before!"

Phoenix turned to Maya with a raised eyebrow, doing up the buttons on his jacket. "And if I had that magatama of yours on me right now, would I be seeing Psyche-Locks?"

Maya shrugged, returning Phoenix's gaze with a mischievous grin. "I guess you'd have to fetch it to find out!" She then nodded towards his spiky hair. "Unless of course you have lingering brain damage from that hit to the head!"

"H-hey, objection!" Phoenix shouted, one hand flying to the back of his head, where he could still feel the bump the fire extinguisher had given him exactly a week ago. "The amnesia wore off, didn't it!?"

Maya just laughed, waving a hand dismissively at her friend as she walked out from behind the desk. Phoenix rolled his eyes, then headed back into the kitchen. "I'll deal with you later!" he promised darkly.

"Sure you will!" Maya replied, crossing her arms with a smile. "Old man!"

Penny's Kitchen
Penny Nichols sat slumped at her kitchen table, a bowl of cereal sitting untouched in front of her. She sighed as she stared into the milky meal, trying and failing to psyche herself up to eat. 'It's not like I'm doing anything today,' she told herself. 'Maybe skipping breakfast won't be that bad? Wait, no, if I start saying that now, I'll be saying it on mornings when I do have work and that would be a terrible idea to talk myself into.'

Just as Penny was reaching for her spoon, the mobile phone on the benchtop began to vibrate, loudly singing the Pink Princess theme. Eager for a distraction, the young woman jumped to her feet, abandoning her cereal and leaping for the phone, which she answered in a heartbeat. "Hello?"

"Penny, it's Maya!" cried the voice on the other end of the line. "Do you know anything about online forums?"

Penny frowned, her free hand tapping idly on the countertop. "Why? Are you having trouble with one?"

"Sort of," Maya admitted, sounding embarrassed. "How... do you get people to join them?"

"Join them?" Penny repeated, confused. "Well, it's the job of the forum owner to advertise, but other than that, you can't make someone sign up to something they don't want to."

There was a long pause from the phone's speaker. "So," Maya eventually continued, sounding even more embarrassed, "how does the forum owner... advertise?"

Penny thought a few moments. "You've started up a forum," she deduced.

"Yes!" Maya cried, upset. "And no-one's joined except me and Pearly! I know there are other fans out there, but they haven't found my forum!" She groaned. "Argh, and I spend ages putting it together!"

Penny decided not to vocalise her suspicion Maya the known technophobe had likely followed a short prepackaged tutorial on customisation and spend a maximum of five minutes putting her forum together. "Well, what's the focus of your website?" she asked. "What fans are you trying to attract?"

Maya didn't respond immediately. "Fans of Nick," she admitted. "And I know there are fans, because he had one as a client the other week, so I put together an official fan-club, but no-one's signed up yet!" She huffed. "Where are they!? How do I find them!?"

Sighing, Penny sat back down in her chair. "Well, I guess you'd have to find places where general law fans hang out and advertise there," she thought aloud. "I dunno, I'm not a fan of that kind of stuff. I'd have to do some research before coming up with a better strategy." She was beginning to regret first introducing Maya to online forums back when they first met, showing off the Steel Samurai board she was an avid member of.

There was another pause. "Would you join the fanclub?" Maya asked.

"Me!?" Penny repeated incredulously. "I'm not a fan of Mister Wright!"

"You don't have to be!" Maya begged. "I'll make a little subforum thing for Steel Samurai! You'll like that, right!?"

"You'd have to do better than that to persuade me!" Penny cried, then paused before quietly adding, "You'd make me a moderator, right?"

"Of course!" Maya replied. "And when you join up, you'll help me advertise, right?"
Penny thought for several long moments, her free hand automatically grabbing a spoonful of cereal that she stuffed into her mouth. By the time she had swallowed, she had made her decision. "Alright, I'll do it."

"There's a what!?" Maggey Byrde cried in disbelief.

"You really didn't know?" the woman opposite her, hair dyed a bright pink, asked in surprise. "I'd've thought if anyone knew, it'd be you!"

Maggey shook her hands in barely restrained excitement. "Elly, why didn't you tell me earlier!?" She looked around, then, spotting a nearby unmanned computer, dashed off immediately to claim it. "I have to look it up!"

Elly Cooper watched her friend of two years run off with an exasperated look. "What, now?" She followed after, adjusting her bailiff uniform as she walked. "You're seriously this big a fan of the guy? You lost your job because of him!"

"Mister Wright is the lone reason I'm not in jail!" Maggey shot back, bringing up the internet browser and the first search engine that came to mind. "My bad luck has nothing to do with him!"

"Alright, alright!" Elly cried, crossing her arms as she watched Maggey quickly locate the website she was looking for. "But seriously, I thought it had been you who started everyone talking about this fan-club. How did you not know about it?" She paused, then blinked in surprise. "Wait, you're signing up now!?"

"Of course I am!" Maggey cried, deleting her latest attempt at a username. "Well, 'LawBird' is taken. 'Blackbird'?" When that attempt also returned an 'already taken' error message, she sighed in defeat.

Elly smiled in sympathy, petting her friend's shoulder. "Bad luck, Mags. Maybe think of something on your way home?"

Maggey thought a moment, then smiled. "Of course!" Typing in 'Luck' at the end of her name, she again tried to create her account and cheered loudly when she was finally successful. "BlackbirdLuck!" she shouted, fists in the air. "I have an account! My luck is turning around!"

Elly sighed and rolled her eyes, but smiled softly. "At least you're having fun," she said, hands on her hips as she watched Maggey celebrate.

Sirius Turner Boarding School for Boys

Computer Room 2
"It is the best thing I've ever seen, I swear!" Clay insisted, typing in a URL into his internet browser. "There's tonnes of people just like me!"

Thirteen-year-old Apollo rolled his eyes, idly fiddling around with his own computer next to Clay's. "Great, a whole website full of space dorks."

Clay scoffed as the forum loaded on his screen, hurriedly logging in. "Dude, there's forums for every subject under the sun these days." He smirked. "I bet there's even one for your lawyer hero!"

"He's not my hero!" Apollo muttered, blushing a deep red as he crossed his arms. "He's the best defence lawyer in the world, and I'm going to be just like him one day!"

Laughing, Clay elbowed his friend's arm. "Whatever you say, dude! Keep on dreamin' on!"

Apollo's glare went unnoticed as Clay focussed on his computer, browsing the space-themed forum he had been proudly boasting about only a moment before. The boy turned to his own computer, where the browser was open to the school's default search engine. After a moment of thought, he leaned forward in his chair and, casting a furtive glance at Clay to ensure he wasn't watching, typed in 'Phoenix Wright forum' and hit enter. After an agonising few seconds, the search results popped up, and Apollo's eyes widened in surprise as he saw the top result. The Official Phoenix Wright Fanclub Forum! Restraining an excited gasp, he quickly clicked on the link, scrolling down eagerly to survey the forum as it loaded. 'Wow, they've got a Steel Samurai sub-forum!' Making a mental note to check that one out later, he navigated into the boards that specifically focused on the lawyer it was named after, amazed to find an avalanche of threads within devoted to discussing his hero. 'Which one do I read first? Oh, I know, the one I got to see in person!' He thought for a moment, then scowled. 'Argh, what was the name of the defendant?! Maybe if I search for 'Chief Prosecutor' I'll find the thread on it.' He grinned as the search found him the intended result, eagerly reading the assembled thoughts of his fellow like-minded fans.

A few minutes later, Apollo's fun was called to a halt: "What are you doing?" Clay said.

Apollo jumped, turning red as he registered his friend leaning across and staring curiously at his screen. "H-how long have you been...!?"

"Wait, 'The Official Phoenix Wright Fanclub Forum'!?!" Clay read aloud, grinning mischievously. "Wow, I was just kidding, I didn't think it actually existed!" He laughed. "And official, too! Think the guy runs it himself? What an ego!"

Glaring, Apollo crossed his arms. "Obviously he doesn't run it himself! Mister Wright is way too busy with his cases to run a fan club!"

Clay scoffed. "And how many cases has he had again? Seven?"

"Eight," Apollo corrected. "And he's never lost! Not once!" He sighed in frustration. "Don't you realise how amazing that is for a defence lawyer?!"

"Whatever, law boy." Clay replied with a grin, returning to his own computer. "Have fun with your weirdo law friends. I'm hanging with the cool kids!"

Apollo rolled his eyes as he returned to his reading. He has a point, there. 'Law friends'. Heh. He smiled. And I think I already have a good username in mind to use, too!

[View the Court Record]
Apollo had been a little surprised to find a star on the front of their dressing room door, under the rather intimidating name 'Gramarye' in all-caps, taped above the cardboard star on a piece of A4 paper. Trucy had merely giggled as she dragged her astonished brother inside, closing the door behind them and jumping towards a small dressing table, the mirror resting unsteadily against the wall behind it. It was a small room, but Apollo mused it didn't need to be all that big anyway, as he and Trucy were already in costume as they arrived. Not to mention, Trucy was only nine years old and didn't need as much space as a full-grown adult would.

It hadn't taken long for Trucy to apply her own make-up, then sit her brother down in the chair and do the same to him. It was the first time Apollo had found himself having to wear any kind of cosmetics, and he had to fight the urge for several minutes to wipe the strange substance off his face once it had been carefully applied. A glance in the mirror assured him it wasn't even obvious he was wearing any at all, but he knew it would still be a potentially bad idea to erase his sister's hard work before they went out in front of their audience. In fact, the longer they waited, the more time Apollo had to think, giving his mind the opportunity to come up with a list of things that could go wrong that only got lengthier as they waited to go on.

At the same time, Trucy was unnervingly calm, running around their little dressing room like a whirlwind, checking on every prop multiple times to ensure it was ready to go on-stage. "Magic Panties, our deck of cards, the little guillotine, all five linking rings, water tube," she muttered to herself, then began to run her hands through all the little hideaways and hidden pockets throughout her costume, each filled with a different object and ready for their specific tricks. "Okay. I think everything's all ready to go." She looked up to Apollo with a grin. "You ready?"

Apollo sighed, arms wrapped tightly around his middle as he sat perched on the chair. "I was ready to go out there ages ago!" he complained, looking up at the clock hanging on the wall opposite the door. "We couldn't have come a little later?"

Trucy shook her head, very seriously. "We need the time to make sure everything's perfect, just in case something isn't," she explained, then crossed her arms. "You do not want to be running late when the call comes to get on-stage, believe me."

Groaning, Apollo turned and rested his forehead on the cool surface of the dressing table. "This wait is agonising," he mumbled. His right hand found its way to his left wrist, where his bracelet normally sat, and, although Apollo knew it was sitting safely on his bedside table, he found himself missing the comforting object.

Smiling sympathetically, Trucy walked up to her brother and patted his shoulder, using her other hand to nudge his hat, sitting on the table, a little nearer to its owner. "Cheer up, Polly! Once we get the call to go on, we won't have time to worry about anything!"

Apollo looked up only to shoot his sister a glare. "That's not helping."
Trucy giggled, then gasped. "Oh! I almost forgot!" She pulled her Magic Panties prop out of her hip-bag, dramatically pointing at it a few times before pulling out a small velvet box, which she handed off to Apollo while stuffing the fabric prop back in her pouch. Apollo took the small box warily, raising an eyebrow at Trucy as she finished replacing the oversized underwear and grinned at her brother expectantly. "Well? Open it!"

Sighing, the sixteen-year-old flipped open the box... and stared in surprise.

"You like it?" Trucy asked, one foot tapping at the floor shyly. "They weren't ready for Christmas, and I made 'em myself, so they don't look amazingly pretty, but..."

Apollo smiled, reaching up to knock Trucy's blue hat off her head and ruffle her hair, to the girl's giggles. "They look great," he assured her, placing the box on the table to extract the two identical bits of home-made jewellery it contained, made of clay and painted gold. Glued to the back of each was a small safety pin. "One for each of us, I assume?" He pulled the bare pin out of his cape, where the cardboard club had been on Halloween, and set about attaching one of the new pins in its place.

Trucy nodded, doing the same with her diamond pin. "The two arrows and the two pins!" she elaborated. "When I was doing research on Apollo and Artemis, I found that they were both associated with bows and arrows, so I thought it fit!"

Apollo turned towards the mirror, fixing his top hat on his head. It didn't annoy him as much as it used to that his carefully-constructed hair style was hidden under the hat, he had to admit, although he found himself barely recognisable in the full outfit. Propped up around his head was the tall collar of his cape, the same one that had been passed down to Trucy by her birth father, and underneath was the black jumpsuit Trucy had made for him almost three months previous, although the round buttons it had sported before had now been replaced with diamond-shaped ones to match Trucy's dress, the laces between them carefully removed. The latest addition, painted gold to match the golden buttons of the jumpsuit, was a small pin in the shape of a bow with two arrows pulled back and ready to fire. Although the bow and arrows were made of clay, the taut string was made of wire, and helped to hide the safety pin glued to the back of the arrows.

Having fixed her hair and replaced her hat on her head, Trucy stood next to Apollo, making final adjustments to the placement of her own pin. Her outfit, apart from the colour change to blue, was still otherwise identical to the way it had always been, down to the red neckerchief poking out from behind the curves of her cape as it struggled to stay put around her shoulders. She gave her brother a grin. "Ready now?" she asked. "Got all your hideaways, your microphone pack?"

Apollo stuck a hand inside his collar to check his microphone was in place, then ran through his mental check-list as he patted down every secret compartment dotted throughout his costume. After a few moments, he felt confident returning Trucy's grin. "I'm ready."

As if on cue, there was a knock on the door. "Five minutes!" Aderyn called from the other side of the wall.

"Coming!" Trucy replied, then turned to her brother with a wink. "We're gonna be fantastic!"

Apollo could only laugh in agreement.

January 9, 7:28PM

Wonder Bar
They couldn't see the audience from where they were standing, but the stage, complete with amateur stand-up comedian, was directly in their line of view. Next to them was a sign, reading in large letters "YOU CAN BE HEARD ON STAGE FROM HERE", which Trucy had carefully made sure was in front of them as they watched the act preceding theirs. The trio of stage hands were milling about, impatiently waiting to close the curtains so they could rush out to put Trucy's larger props in place for the duo's upcoming performance.

Trucy gently tugged on Apollo's cape, prompting him to lean down and allow her to whisper in his ear as she pointed at the man on stage. "This guy needs a better joke book!"

Apollo smirked and nodded, whispering back, "Or an instruction video on how modern comedy works!"

As the pair snickered amongst themselves, Aderyn emerged from somewhere behind them, giving the siblings a wink as she rearranged her hair around her shoulders. "You two ready?" she quietly asked.

"Is it too late to back out?" Apollo joked, Trucy hiding her giggles behind a hand.

Aderyn snorted, rolling her eyes and checking her watch. "Well, that was the longest ten minutes of my life," she mumbled, then stalked forward, staring at the man on stage as she mimed tapping at her watch. The amateur comedian glanced in her direction, then quickly and nervously wrapped his act up, the stage hands immediately pulling the curtains closed as Aderyn walked out on stage, her black dress billowing about her ankles.

Apollo and Trucy gave each other only a glance as they dashed out on stage, past the star of the previous act as he sadly headed to the dressing rooms, mumbling to himself. One of the stage hands, a young woman not much older than Apollo, placed Trucy's small table of props in centre stage just as the siblings arrived, and gave them a wink as she mouthed "Good luck!". Apollo mouthed a "Thank you," in return, and the backstage crew disappeared off-stage. Trucy shot Apollo a look, reaching behind her hip bag, and Apollo almost gasped in surprise as he similarly reached behind the pouch hanging from his belt, where the battery pack for his microphone was hidden, and flipped it on. 'Can't believe I almost forgot that!'

"So here they are," came Aderyn's introduction from the other side of the curtains, "Apollo an' Artemis Gramarye!"

Apollo took a deep breath in the pause before the curtains shifted and began to open, the audience beyond applauding the arrival of the Wonder Bar's star act. He planted a grin on his face, glancing at Trucy to see her doing the same, and took her lead in stepping forward to acknowledge the crowd's excitement to see them.

Following their rehearsed script, Trucy took a little bow. "Hello, everyone!" she called, then gestured to Apollo. "This is my brother Apollo..."

"... and this is my sister Artemis!" Apollo picked up, also bowing as he held his hand out towards Trucy.

"And we're here to show you some amazing sights tonight!" Trucy continued, leaning forward in excitement. "Ain't that right, Apollo?"
Apollo pretended to think a moment. "Well, 'amazing' is such a subjective term..."

"Just agree with me!" Trucy cut in, looking annoyed as their rehearsed script demanded. The exchange was met by the audience with a small laugh, and Trucy took the chance to jump back to their little table and pick up five linked rings sitting in one corner. She held the chain out to the audience. "Now, who's seen this trick before? Raise your hands!"

Apollo shook his head, giving the crowd a pleading look. "Please don't. Then we'd have to come up with something to replace it."

Ignoring the crowd's amused reaction, Trucy held one end of the chain out for Apollo to take. "Here, stretch it out so the audience can see it properly!"

As prompted, Apollo took the offered ring and the pair held it out, loosely letting the chain hang. "Huh, these make a funny sound when they hit each other!" he pointed out, referring to the ringing noise the chain made as it moved.

"Yeah, but you have to be careful!" Trucy replied, turning to the audience in an almost exaggerated way. "These are special, magic rings!" Next to her, Apollo looked thoughtful and began to shake his end of the chain up and down. "If you're not careful, they might just go right through each-!" With a gasp from the audience, the ring in Apollo's hand suddenly separated from its neighbour, sending the chain falling down limply on Trucy's side. The pair stared with their best shocked look at the loose ring in Apollo's hand, giving the audience a few moments to laugh at the 'trick gone wrong'.

Trucy held her free hand on her hips, giving Apollo a glare just as the audience began to quieten. "What did I just say?"

Putting on an embarrassed smile, Apollo shrugged. "Er, sorry, Artemis." He quickly leaned down and nabbed the chain from Trucy's hand. "I can fix it, though!" he insisted, and began to whack the loose ring against the other end of the chain, being very careful not to activate the gimmick that allowed them to 'link' together. Although trying his best to appear to be concentrating fully on the chain, he kept half-an-eye on Trucy, waiting for a cue from her that they had perhaps teased the audience enough.

'Trucy was right,' Apollo told himself as he hid a smile. 'We will be fantastic.'

View the Court Record
Apollo and Trucy's act had ended with a round of applause, and Apollo even spotted through the stage lights a few people giving them a standing ovation, obviously having greatly enjoyed the pair's debut performance together. Once the curtains closed, Apollo didn't have the time to pause and process the past ten minutes, as Trucy pulled him off-stage and the pair collected their props from the stage-hands before heading back to their dressing room, ensuring they'd turned off their microphones as they left the backstage area.

Trucy sighed loudly as she placed their props on the dressing table, making herself busy checking they were all there before she started putting them all away again. Apollo placed the few he'd picked up on the table where she could see them, then leaned heavily against the wall. His mind was racing as he thought back over everything that had happened since the curtains opened, his thoughts moving too fast to be able to focus on any one thing for too long.

Nodding to herself, Trucy pushed their props into a round pile, content they were all accounted for. She thought a moment, then looked up at Apollo. "Our first joke was a bit of a dud. We should think of something to replace it."

Apollo stared in confusion for a moment before he was able to recall what she was referring to. "Oh, yeah, it was a bit, wasn't it?"

"And," Trucy continued, one hand pointing into the air in thought, "we need to practise the 'cup and balls' routine. I don't think we pulled it off as well as we should've."

"Sure," Apollo agreed, staring into space as he nodded.

Trucy paused a moment, then slowly smiled at her brother. "Yeah, it's a real rush when you first get off stage, isn't it?"

Apollo blinked in confusion, then gave his sister a glare. "I've been on stage before, remember?" he pointed out.

Giggling, Trucy sat down on the chair by the dressing table. "But after that, you had other acts to watch," she replied. "It's different sitting back here after a good performance."

After thinking over her words for a moment or two, Apollo found he had to agree. It was so quiet and relatively dark in the dressing rooms during the show, but out on stage it was loud and bright. Even in the audience, there was still the noise to distract from the dark. A part of him wondered how the comedian who had preceded them had coped upon his return to his dressing room.

"Don't worry," Trucy assured her brother, jumping to her feet and patting his arm. "You get used to it."

"I sure hope so," Apollo instinctively replied with a raised eyebrow. "If I mentally shut down after every performance, there's no way we're doing this more than once a week."

Trucy laughed.

Wonder Bar

Restaurant

Once the show had ended, and all their props were safely locked away in their dressing room, Trucy showed Apollo the way to the backstage door behind the bar, leading out into the restaurant area of the building. After carefully snaking their way through the two bartenders already working in the narrow space, they exited the employees-only area and paused as they looked out over the tables that still housed a majority of the audience from the show.

"I didn't see them sitting next to the stage," Apollo muttered to his sister, removing the top hat from his head. "Where'd you reserve their table?"

Trucy shrugged. "I asked Aderyn to do it," she admitted. "I told her Daddy wanted to be a little back from the stage this time."

Apollo sighed, then took Trucy's hand. "C'mon, let's go find them." As he led her towards the tables, slipping his hat back on his head, he hoped they wouldn't find their path blocked by too many people wanting to stop and congratulate them; He'd had enough of that with the people backstage.

As the siblings snaked their way through the tables, Apollo was relieved to find that most people were content to leave them alone, some shouting cheers their way as they passed, waving to the caped duo as they continued their search. Trucy always returned their acknowledgements with loud 'thank you's, while Apollo gave them a polite smile and wave, quickly returning to his search.

"Apollo! Trucy!" came a call from Apollo's right, and he turned just as Trucy pulled her hand out of his, running to where Luke was walking towards them with a smile on his face.

"Luuuuke!" Trucy cried, pulling her brother into a hug. "Did you like it!? Was it good!?"

Luke laughed as Apollo joined them, hugging his little sister back. "You were brilliant!" he assured her. "Both of you!"

"Thank you," Apollo replied with a grin, again taking off his hat to carry it in one arm. "Where were you guys, anyway? We didn't see you."

"We're over here," Luke gestured behind him as Trucy finally pulled out of the hug. As he led his siblings through the crowd, he continued, "Papa said it was like you'd grown up doing that your whole lives! You really work well together up there!"

Apollo and Trucy shared proud grins. "It kinda felt like that for us, too!" Apollo said.

A few moments later, the Wright siblings arrived at their destination, a small table around which were sat Phoenix, idly playing with his phone, and Clay, who jumped to his feet the moment the pair arrived. "There you are!" he cried in exasperation, throwing up his hands. "Do you realise how long we've been waiting for you two!"

"Two minutes?" Apollo replied with a cocky grin. "Oh no, you poor boy."

Phoenix put away his phone as Clay scoffed, then stood, being ambushed by a hug from his daughter. "Did you two have fun?"

Trucy nodded. "Yup!" she replied. "We were great, weren't we, Daddy?"

Laughing, Phoenix nodded his agreement. "As if you could be anything less!"

Clay poked at Apollo's cape as he noticed the golden bow holding it together. "Hey, where'd this thing come from? You weren't wearing that before you got on stage!"

Apollo adjusted it proudly. "Trucy made them. They fit our theme-naming."

Clay scoffed and rolled his eyes.

Luke's attention was drawn away from the table, and he smiled and waved at a figure lingering not far away. "Hello, Miss Holliday!"

Everyone looked around as the woman waved nervously, approaching the table. "Hey, thought I'd drop by after you invited me and everything!" she called.

"Thank you for coming!" Trucy said, bouncing in place as she gave Aria a grin. "Did you enjoy the show?"

"Yes, I did," Aria replied, tucking some hair behind an ear. "Very much, actually!"

Apollo grinned. "That's great to hear!" he assured her. "We're glad you had fun!" 'So, this is Pocky, huh? A little more shy now, but otherwise exactly how I'd have expected her to be,'

Luke turned to Clay. "Miss Holliday hired me to play on Christmas," he explained.

"Ohhh!" Clay replied, shooting the woman a thumbs-up. "Gotcha!"

Phoenix chuckled, placing his hands on Trucy's shoulders from behind her. "We at the agency are very proud of all three of them," he said, smiling at each of his kids in turn. "They're tremendous talents."

Apollo blushed, looking away. "Daaaad," he mumbled. Luke fiddled with the sleeves of his jumper, looking like he wanted to protest, but kept quiet. Trucy only grinned wider, looking up at Phoenix happily.

Aria giggled, beginning to look more comfortable again. "I can certainly agree with that!" she assured them, then turned to Apollo. "I'm actually writing up a review of your show when I get home!"

Apollo perked up, but didn't seem too surprised. "Really?"

Trucy gasped. "Wow, cool! I don't get to read many reviews of the show!" She bounced forward, out of Phoenix's grip. "Where will you post it!?"

"D-don't worry about that," Apollo cut in, holding up his free hand to signal to his sister. "I'll find it. It shouldn't be hard."
Clay frowned. "How?"

Apollo gave his friend a dry look. "Ever heard of a search engine?"

Aria giggled. "Yeah, there won't be that many websites talking about 'Apollo and Artemis Gramarye', huh?" she agreed, then clapped her hands together. "If all goes well, I'll post it up tonight!"

"I'll keep an eye out for it!" Apollo promised with a grin.

Thread: Apollo and Artemis Gramarye's Debut

Pocky-Hockey, 01/09/2021 10:27:38PM

As I have promised certain people, here is my review of Apollo and Artemis Gramarye's new magic act!

(Talk about the kids goes in this forum, doesn't it? ALSO I HAVE PERMISSION TO POST THIS BEFORE YOU ASK)

If you haven't heard already, two of the Wright children are magicians, the grandchildren of Magnifi Gramarye himself, and they've just started performing together in a cute little place called the Wonder Bar! It's the kind of restaurant where you sit at tables (which are all semi-circular!) facing a stage, and every night (and afternoons on weekends I think) they have a show. It's like six different 10min acts, and the Gramaryes are right in the middle, but they really deserve to be the finale because they were WAY better than anyone else up there tonight. I mean, if you're a big fan of magic, I'm sure it's all stuff you've seen before, but these kids have chemistry and they make it interesting no matter how many times you've seen someone else doing this trick! And did I mention Artemis is like maybe 10 at the oldest? Apollo's a teenager, but he comes across as the less experienced of the two (which only makes it more interesting to watch), and leaves a lot of stuff for Artemis to do. They also talked between themselves a LOT, and man does Artemis's chipper attitude bounce off Apollo's dry sarcasm! They had a running gag where Artemis would call a volunteer on stage and Apollo would refer to them as her 'victims', even apologising to them as they came up! I was sitting too far away to be called up myself, unfortunately!

Anyway, I had a lot of fun tonight, but I'm exhausted! I'm off to bed now, but I might think of more to gush about tomorrow xD

CelestialImpacts, 01/09/2021 10:36:48PM

Permission? From who?

Wow, sounds like a lot of fun! I guess I have to make it a goal to drop by this place one weekend and see them. Do they perform every week, and how often every week are they working?
Never been a big fan of magic, but these kids sound like talented performers, if not magicians. And one of them is 10 years old?

ForgotMeKnot, 01/10/2021 09:41:21AM

Hey, cool! Did you see if Mr Wright was in the audience? Surely he'd be there to watch his kids! Tell me you talked to him, dude.

Dime_Quarters [CERTIFIED USER] [MOD], 01/10/2021 09:52:17AM

Knot. Rules. Don't make me give you a warning.

Pocky, sounds like a lot of fun! I see no problem with these kinds of posts about performances the Wright kids are doing, since that's something they're putting out in public themselves. I guess I should think about dropping by to see them, since I also work in the entertainment industry and all. They'd probably be a lot easier to work with than some actors (or crewmembers actually, most of the time) I've met over the years.

steeljusticelover [CERTIFIED USER], 01/10/2021 10:04:29AM

C'mon Knot, we have rules here for a reason ;) And the Wrights told her themselves they wanted to see it, didn't they Pocky?

I'm glad you had a lot of fun! They've told me it was a lot of hard work, but hearing the audience enjoy it really made the whole thing worth it a million times over.

I've sent your review to them, too! Apollo says your praise means a great deal to him, and Artemis just squealed and ran all over the house boasting about how nice you were (she's actually 9, by the way). Anyway, they're both happy, and they hope to see you again sometime down the line!

Celestial, at the moment they're performing every Saturday evening, but they're considering expanding to Sunday evening and afternoon, too. I'm sure they'd love for anyone to stop by and see!

Pocky-Hockey, 01/10/2021 11:32:25AM

Aw, I'm glad they liked it, SJL! :D Yeah, even if the rules didn't allow this, I put it up at their request, so ha :P

Okay, so Artemis is 9. I wasn't far off! She's real talented for a 9yo.

Also, tell Apollo I loved the thing how he was always 'ruining' Artemis's tricks, like at the beginning with the rings that could link and unlink? Don't overdo it tho, because that's the kind of gimmick that can get old fast.

steeljusticelover [CERTIFIED USER], 01/10/2021 01:25:57PM

I'll pass it on, Pocky! Thanks again! :D

View the Court Record
Luke stormed into his junior year dorm room with a frustrated sigh, running straight to the tidy desk in the corner. Behind him, looking a little concerned, were Apollo and Clay, who filed in and closed the door behind them before standing by the bed awkwardly, watching their friend open his school-issued laptop and begin clicking through it as he leaned on the desk instead of sitting down.

"So..." Apollo spoke up. "What did you need help with, then...?"

Luke dropped into his chair, waving his friends over. "I've been researching for almost a year now!" he explained, trying to calm himself down as Apollo and Clay slowly walked up behind him. "I just... I've hit a wall, and I don't know what to do next!"

Clay shared a glance with Apollo, crossing his arms. "What are you researching?" he asked.

Luke opened a text document, then leaned back in his chair as he gestured to it. "Local companies that manufacture rubber face-masks. There are a lot of them around here."

"Yeah," Apollo laughed, "they would get a lot of money from the film industry making those!"

Clay frowned. "Why?" he asked, confused. "Are you trying to buy one yourself, or...?"

Luke froze as he remembered that he had very deliberately kept the story of Maya channelling Clark from Clay, as a part of the 'keep Kurain a secret' promise they'd made their first Christmas together. "Uh..." He hurriedly tried to think of a convincing excuse.

"We found one," Apollo jumped in. "On Forest Road."

Luke sighed in relief, sending a silent thankful glance to his brother.

"Really!?" Clay replied, surprised. "Why didn't you tell me before!??"

"I guess we forgot!" Luke answered with an embarrassed shrug. "I've been doing research on it too, so I think I wanted to wait until I had something to share!"

Clay scoffed, but seemed to accept the explanation. "So you're trying to track down who bought it?" he reasoned.

"Yup," Apollo replied, leaning in to read the list Luke had left on his laptop screen. "Wow, there really are a lot around."

"The problem is," Luke said, "these companies I've listed won't give some random fifteen-year-old information on their previous clients!"

Clay adjusted his visor, staring off into space. "Not even if you tell 'em it's for a murder investigation?"
"Why would they believe us?" Apollo pointed out. "They'd only give that kind of stuff to detectives."

"Aha!" Clay replied, snapping his fingers with a grin. "You guys have a detective friend, don't you? Ask him to help you!"

Clay nodded. "Yeah, him! He'll help you, right?"

The brothers thought for a moment. "He has his own cases to work on, doesn't he?" Apollo mused aloud. "Would he even have the time to help...?"

"Never know until you ask!" Clay pointed out, gently slapping Apollo's arm.

Luke winced to himself. "He's not working on the Forest Road case anymore, remember?"

Clay and Apollo looked confused. "He's not?" Apollo asked.

"Y-yeah, he said when we last saw him," Luke explained with a shrug. "There was another accident there last June, so his boss replaced him with another detective, a 'rookie' by the name of 'Fulbright' apparently." He paused, staring at the desk. "Detective Gumshoe said the same thing happened to the last detective on that case, when my parents disappeared there."

Clay crossed his arms. "Well, you can still ask him to help, can't you?" He shrugged. "So he has to lie a little! He'd want to find the truth as much as you!"

Luke looked back to his list. "I'd have to ask Papa to call him, anyway. We don't have his number."

Apollo suddenly gasped, attracting his friends' attention. "Wait!" He pulled his phone out of his pocket and scrolled through his contacts. "I have Blackbird's number!"

Biting his lip to keep in a laugh, Clay repeated, "Blackbird?"

"Oh, Miss Byrde!" Luke realised, turning to Clay to explain, "She's Detective Gumshoe's girlfriend!"

Clay raised an eyebrow. "And how do you have her number?" he asked his friend with an amused look.

"None of your business," Apollo shot back, then paused. "Should I call...? Maybe I should text. She might be busy."

Rolling his eyes, Clay pushed Apollo's arm. "Just call her!" he cried.

Twisting in his chair to look up at his brother, Luke shrugged. "Maybe text her to check she's okay with being called?" he suggested. "You could ask if she's with Detective Gumshoe at the moment, and if he'll talk to us."

Apollo thought a moment, then nodded. "I'll try that first." He began tapping out a message to his online friend.
Are you busy right now?

Not right now. What's the matter?

Nothing serious, I was just wondering if you were with Detective Gumshoe atm?

Yeah, we just met up. You got a message for him?

Luke has a potential lead on finding his parents but we can't progress on our own. Would Detective Gumshoe be able to help us out?

I'm afraid that's out of the question. I'm sorry about your brother but investigations are really better left to the police. If you take your lead to them, they can look into it for you.

Again I'm really sorry we can't help.

It's fine. Thanks anyway Blackbird.

Papa, what did you do when your investigations hit a snag?

Issues with your research into those facemasks huh? Sorry to say that at that point I was always forced to give up and find my answers in court, which isn't exactly an option for you.

Is there anything I can do? Pep talk? Take a second look at what you have?

We were trying to ask Detective Gumshoe to help us, but Ms Byrde said we should leave the investigation to the police.

Yeah that's a thing the police will do. If I could convince em for you I would, but they won't listen to me either.

Don't lose hope. We'll find something.

Even if it takes years?

Even then.

Apollo sighed, dropping backwards onto his brother's bed, his phone in one hand. "Well, there goes that lead," he grumbled.

Clay, sat next to Apollo, nodded in agreement, resting his head on a hand dejectedly.

Luke stared at the list on his screen, the encouraging message from Phoenix still displayed on the screen of the phone in his hands. Slowly, he put the phone down on his desk, then covered his face with his hands.

"We can't give up here," Clay said, frowning into the distance.
Apollo looked up. "What else can we do?" he pointed out. "Detective Gumshoe won't help us."

"Then we'll just have to help ourselves!" Clay insisted, standing up with his fists held up determinedly. "We can research those companies Luke found! See if that helps us narrow down the possibilities!"

Luke looked, slowly turning around in his chair. "Research the...? How would that help?"

Clay shrugged. "Well, if we can find out everything about them, they're probably upstanding companies," he reasoned, "so they'd be less likely to be involved with a criminal organisation!"

"An organisation!?" Apollo repeated, sitting up in shock.

"Duh!" Clay replied, rolling his eyes. "There's been a tonne of accidents on that road. A single person couldn't do all that!"

Luke nodded, frowning in thought. "That makes sense," he decided. "And if any of the companies on my list seem at all suspicious, that makes them likely candidates, right?"

Clay gave his friend a thumbs-up. "Right, Wright!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "All of this only raises the question of what they hope to accomplish from kidnapping people even more," he pointed out, then held out a hand to begin counting off. "They're somehow crashing these cars without killing the people inside or leaving a trace on the road, they specifically kidnap only some of the people inside, leave false evidence that these people died, then take them who-knows-where to do who-knows-what!"

Clay rested his hands on his hips, chewing his lip. "Yeah, but we don't exactly have clues to any of that, yet."

Luke was still lost in thought. "What if we don't find anything because they've been manufacturing the masks themselves...?" he wondered aloud, turning to look at his list again. "They might disguise themselves as one of the companies making them!"

"Woah, clever!" Clay laughed. "That way the police would have loads of trouble finding 'em even with that 'mask' lead!"

Apollo smirked, sarcastically adding, "Yeah, then the three teenagers uncover them and get themselves killed!"

Clay shot his friend a glare. "We're not confronting them, geeze!"

Luke looked up with a smile. "We could always visit them physically with some of the masks from my collection!" he joked.

"Ugh, I call dibs on not being the girl or the old men," Apollo immediately replied, hands in the air.

"Wait, what?" Clay said, turning to Luke with a surprised look on his face. "You have a mask collection?"

Luke blushed, shrugging. "It's a long story," he said, then began to count on his fingers. "I have one each of the Professor and Flora, and one of Inspector Chelmey, Doctor Schrader, Dean Delmona..."

Clay's laugh interrupted the list. "I have no idea who any of those people are," he pointed out, "but you'll have to tell me the story when you show this 'collection' of yours to me!"
"Oh, yes," Luke agreed, embarrassed. "We can do that on Saturday, can't we?"

Apollo shook his head. "It would take us all day for you to tell him those stories," he lamented. "Although I bet Trucy would love that."

Luke nodded in agreement. "She does like my stories, doesn't she?"

"It's a deal, then!" Clay cried, giving Luke a thumbs-up. "Stories and a mask collection, Saturday sharp!"

Luke laughed. "Deal!"

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
There was only one person at the stop as the bus pulled up alongside, bouncing in place in her school uniform as she watched the doors creaking open before her. The first person to emerge was a seventeen-year-old who paused on the final step with confusion as he noticed the nine-year-old girl waiting, and he stepped out on the pavement frowning at her. Behind him, his younger brother paused to throw a smile and a wave to the bus driver. "Thank you, sir!"

"What are you doing here?" Apollo asked Trucy, arms crossed, as Luke jumped out beside him.

Trucy only chirped a bright "Hi!" and jumped on her brothers, pulling them into a hug. Luke chuckled as he hugged her back, although Apollo only rolled his eyes, sending a glance back at the bus as it pulled back out into the afternoon traffic. Trucy jumped back with a grin. "Uncle Edgeworth came over, so Daddy asked me to come and find you!"

"Mister Edgeworth is visiting?" Luke repeated, surprised.

"Why?" Apollo added, confused.

Trucy shrugged. "It must be something important," she decided, turning and skipping off in the direction of home. "They wouldn't talk about it in front of me."

Luke and Apollo shared a glance as they began to follow their sister. "But usually Dad talks with Uncle Edgeworth on the phone, doesn't he?" Apollo thought aloud. "Why did they need to talk in person?"

"Maybe he wanted to ask Papa's help on a case?" Luke reasoned. "That could be why they're keeping it such a secret."

Trucy shook her head. "Uncle Edgeworth didn't have any papers that I saw," she said, then looked up at Apollo with a questioning look. "You need papers to talk about a case, right?"

Apollo shrugged.

Luke tapped his chin in thought. "Well, whatever it is," he eventually decided, "I guess we'll have to wait until we get home to find out..."

Apollo was in the lead as the trio stepped into their home, pausing as he entered the kitchen and saw Edgeworth and Phoenix sat across from each other at the table, a pair of mugs sat between them. Phoenix looked up with a smile as Luke and Trucy filtered in, stopping to either side of their brother as their conversation suddenly halted. "Ah, there you are!" Phoenix waved the children closer. "We've been waiting for you to get back!"

The kids shared a wary glance before stepping forward. Luke decided to give Edgeworth a polite smile and wave. "Hello, Mister Edgeworth!"

Edgeworth nodded, taking a quick sip from his cup before returning the smile. "Greetings," he replied, then looked to Trucy. "My apologies for sending you away, but your father and I wished to discuss logistics privately before revealing the surprise too soon."

Trucy immediately perked up. "Surprise?" she repeated, jumping to Phoenix's side with a grin. "What's the surprise, Daddy? You can tell us now, right!?"

Phoenix laughed. "Sure!" he said, to Trucy's cheering. "You remember how summer vacation is starting in a couple weeks, don't you?"

"Of course we do," Apollo loudly sighed, crossing his arms. "Luke and I've been suffering through exams, haven't we?"

"I haven't!" Trucy chirped.

Apollo narrowed his eyes at her. "Well, lucky you then."

Trucy stuck out her tongue at him.

Phoenix laughed. "Well, we've spoken to Maya and it looks like you two," he pointed to Apollo and Trucy, "will be spending your first two weeks of summer break up in Kurain!"

Apollo looked confused. "Really!?"

"Really!?" Trucy gasped, a wide smile on her face. "We get to spend more time with Miss Maya and Pearly!?" She jumped in place, cheering.

Phoenix grinned, glancing at Edgeworth, who was absenting himself from the conversation by busily sipping from his mug. "Well, we've been invited," Phoenix simply said.

Slowly, Edgeworth put his mug down on the table and turned to specifically face Luke. "I've invited yourself and Wright to join me on my upcoming research trip to London, England." He smiled. "Would you be interested in coming?"

The Wright children stared for a few moments as the words sunk in, then, finally, Trucy shouted, "WHAT?"

Luke's shocked gaze quickly turned into a broad grin. "R-really!? You'll let me come along?"

"What does he get to go!?" Trucy continued. "I wanna go to London!"

"Thank you so much, Mister Edgeworth!" Luke cried, clasping his hands together while his eyes shone with unshed tears of joy. "It feels like forever since I was last in Blighty!"
Trucy crossed her arms, pouting. "It's not fair! I wanted to see the university and Misthallery and Future London!"

Phoenix sighed, holding a hand up in the hope of silencing Trucy before she descended into a full-on tantrum. "Truce, it was very generous of Uncle Edgeworth to invite just me and Luke," he told her in the most serious tone he could muster. "It's a bit rude to try and demand he extend that to you too, don't you think?"

Apollo nodded as Trucy only glared at the ground. "Yeah, and I think Luke deserves to go more than us," he added, giving her a stern look.

Trucy didn't reply.

Luke took a step towards Edgeworth, unable to tone down his delighted grin. "Thank you so much for inviting me, Mister Edgeworth!" he repeated. "This really means a lot to me!"

Edgeworth nodded, giving Luke a polite, though warm, smile. "I'm glad to hear it."

Apollo poked Luke's shoulder, grinning. "Hey, congrats!"

Luke giggled. "Thanks, Apollo!"

"Oh, that reminds me!" Phoenix said, reaching for an envelope sitting on the table nearby and holding it up towards Luke. "You'll probably want to tell the Professor, won't you?"

Gasping in excitement, Luke made a grab for the letter. "Oh yes!" he cried, then turned around and dashed towards the office. "The Professor and Flora have to know as soon as possible!"

My dear Luke,

I'm afraid I must begin this letter by lamenting that I will be glad when Alfendi's baby teeth finish coming in.

Unrelatedly, Alfendi gave us a scare yesterday when he ran straight into a door frame while playing with Flora. He may be able to run, but he clearly has yet to master anything other than speed. Nothing was broken thankfully, but he is wandering around the apartment a lot more carefully than he was before.

It would have been Apollo's birthday last Friday, would it not? I imagine that makes him seventeen now. Another year and he will officially be an adult! I wonder, did their performance that weekend reference it at all, or was it business as usual?

We had the May Day bank holiday last week, and Flora decided it was the perfect time to take Alfendi out on a picnic. She made quite a stockpile of supplies for it, more than we'll ever need, and I'm quite surprised at myself that what I'm about to write is true, but the food was simply delicious! She has come a long way since she started following recipes and learning how cooking normally works... I believe she's even learning how experimenting with food actually functions; When we next get the chance to meet in person, I'm sure she'd love to demonstrate such for you. In fact, I may have complimented her so much she's beginning to realise her previous attempts were not perfect. Do please be gentle on her if she inquires as to your true opinion of her past cooking ability.
Things have been very quiet around here the past month, so I find I do not have very much to write about. I hope things have been more exciting for you. How is your investigation going? Have you found any more leads?

The usual puzzles are enclosed.

Your friend,

Professor Hershel Layton

15th May, 2021

Dear Professor Layton,

I have some wonderful news! Mr Edgeworth is going to London from the 7th to the 18th of June, and he's invited Papa and me to come along! I'm going back to England! I can't wait to see you and Flora again, and to meet Alfendi! He's almost two, isn't he? I can hardly believe it's been so long since I left!

Apollo and Trucy are going to stay with Maya while we're in London, and Trucy's really upset about it, but I'm sure they'll have a great time anyway! Apollo is seventeen now, like you said, but I guess Papa prefers there be someone else to look after them rather than leaving him to look after Trucy alone. Actually, I should ask if they're still planning to do their show while we're away. I don't think they made any reference to Apollo's birthday in their show, now you mention it.

No new leads on my investigation, but we can talk about that more in person! I can't wait to see London again! And to see how good a cook Flora is now, of course! And then I also have to write a letter to Arianna if I want to see her while I'm town, too. I have a lot to plan before we go!

Mr Edgeworth says we'll be arriving in Gatwick Airport, around 2pm your time (Papa thinks he might adjust to the jetlag better by arriving in the middle of the day). Will you be able to meet us there? I suppose you can call us to answer that, since there won't be time for a return letter!

I included some puzzles for you all. I can't wait to see you next month!

Your friend and apprentice,

Luke Triton

21st May, 2021
Their flight was scheduled to leave at seven in the evening on the Sunday. As Los Angeles was eight hours behind London, and the flight itself took eleven hours in total, it would be six in the morning by their internal body clocks when they landed at two in the afternoon in Gatwick on Monday. Phoenix argued, as last time it was the middle of the day for him although he was landing in the evening, this would be easier to adjust to, although Edgeworth claimed exactly the opposite, saying they would be flying into the rising sun and years of experience told him this was harder to adjust to. Nevertheless, their day of departure had arrived, and Edgeworth had appeared at the Wrights' door to take Phoenix and Luke away with him to the airport.

Phoenix fussed over Apollo and Trucy as Edgeworth and Luke carried their bags down to the car. "You'll sure you'll be okay tonight?" Phoenix asked the siblings, one hand on Apollo's shoulder while the other held Trucy's cheek. "You can handle dinner alone, and breakfast tomorrow?"

"We'll be fine, Dad," Apollo sighed, resisting the urge to roll his eyes. "And you're sure you can get to the train station on time tomorrow?" Phoenix continued, looking between the two with concern. "You'll make your train, and you know what bus to get at the other end?"

Trucy giggled. "Stop worrying, Daddy!" she told him with a smile. "Polly knows what to do, don't you, Polly?"

Apollo nodded, and began to count off on his fingers. "We have leftovers for dinner, we've gotten breakfasts for ourselves a million times already so that's not at all hard to do, the train and bus timetables are pinned to the fridge, and the bus will have 'Kurain' on its sign so we can't exactly miss it." He crossed his arms. "Not to mention, if we have any problems I can just call Maya. She's promised to be available if we need her."

Phoenix was still unsure. "You won't forget to lock everything up when you leave?"

"I won't," Apollo promised, exasperated. "All the openable windows, the back door and the front door, and I won't forget to leave up the sign saying the office is closed and everything."

"You'll remember to take your keys with you?" Phoenix prompted.

"Yes!"

Edgeworth sighed from behind Phoenix as he and Luke arrived back in the apartment. "Stop mothering them, Wright," he said. "Apollo is more than capable of looking after himself and Trucy for one day."

"Exactly!" Apollo agreed.
Phoenix stuck his hands into the pockets of his hoodie, still looking worried. "What about when you come back down on Saturday? Will you be okay getting to and from the Wonder Bar?"

"Dad!" Apollo shouted, throwing his hands in the air in frustration. "Trucy and I will be fine!"

"Yeah, Miss Maya and Pearly are coming with us that night!" Trucy pointed out, crossing her arms.

Phoenix gestured with his shoulders as though he was holding up his hands in defeat, although they didn't leave his pockets. "Alright, alright," he muttered as he stepped back, though he didn't look convinced.

Luke stepped forward, and was about to speak when Trucy raced forward and threw herself onto him in a tight hug. She rubbed her face into his shoulder, saying, "You'll have lots of fun in London, won't you? And you'll come back with more stories about you and the Professor?"

Smiling, Luke hugged his sister back. "You bet I will," he promised her. "I'll be thinking of you the whole time!"

"Don't waste your time doing that!" Apollo joked, stepping forward to gently punch his brother on the arm. More seriously, he added, "Have fun. We'll be waiting to hear about it when you get back."

Trucy pulled away from Luke and jumped on Phoenix, hugging his middle. "We'll miss you, Daddy!" she cried.

Phoenix smiled, kneeling down to hug his daughter. "I'll see you in two weeks," he said, then stood up and pulled Apollo into a sideways hug. "You'll look after each other, won't you?"

Apollo nodded, pulling away and awkwardly rubbing the back of his neck. "I'll, um... I'll text you when we get to Kurain, Dad."

Phoenix nodded gratefully. "Thank you."

Edgeworth looked at his watch. "As heartwarming as this is," he announced, "we need to get going." He turned and walked out the door.

Pulling all three of his children into one last hug, Phoenix planted a kiss on Apollo and Trucy's foreheads. "You two be good," he said, releasing them. As Trucy nodded eagerly, Phoenix and Luke ran for the front door.

Luke paused at the door to give his siblings one last wave. "Bye, guys!"

"Bye!" Apollo and Trucy called, then the front door closed and the two were alone. After a pause, Trucy looked up at Apollo with a grin. "So, how much trouble would we be in if we burned the apartment down?"

Apollo gave his sister a glare, then silently turned and headed inside.

You guys are heading off soon right?.

Yup. You'll look after Apollo and Trucy won't you?
Lol stop worrying Nick! They'll be fine! Apollos like 17, he could probably look after himself.

I mean at that age Sis moved to the city to be a lawyer, and I met you.

You’re different tho, you’ve always been independent

So’s Apollo, and Trucy too to some degree.

Stop worrying, they’ll be fine. I’ll make sure of it.

Thanks Maya. See you when we get back?

We’ll see, but I hope so :) Have fun in jolly old England!

We will :) Seeya

Hey, thought I'd wish you luck before you left!

Hi Maya! We're in the airport now, waiting to board the plane, so I can't chat for long.

Lol that's okay, I just wanted to tell you to have fun! I'll keep an eye on your brother and sister huh?

Haha, I know Apollo and Trucy will be fine! Did you want me to pass on a message to the Professor when we meet him at the airport?

Sure, tell him I said hi! Oh and if you happen to meet up with anyone from Labyrinthia you'll let me know won't you?

Of course! And I'll tell you all about London when we get back!

I'm looking forward to it already! :D Seeya in a few weeks, hopefully!

Talk to you later, Maya!

Gatwick Airport

Arrivals Area

It was a very tired trio of travellers that dragged themselves out into the arrivals area after collecting their bags, but Luke was refusing to let his lack of sleep get to him, looking all around the open hall eagerly. "The Professor said he'd be here with Flora and Alfendi!" he cried, somewhat disappointed at his inability to see them.

"He probably is," Phoenix pointed out, also joining the search as Edgeworth filed along behind them. He rubbed one hand along the top of his head, contemplating whether or not to remove the beanie to make himself more recognisable for their friend. "It'll take us a while to find him in this crowd, though."

Edgeworth nodded in agreement. "It's perhaps best we find somewhere with a good vantage point and wait for them to come to-"

"Professor!" Luke suddenly cried, dashing off into the crowd with his bag swinging behind him. "Flora!"

"Wait, Luke!" Phoenix called after him, following his son in a mild panic while also trying to see where the English professor was hiding in the crowd. Edgeworth rushed behind him at a brisker pace, but seemed to be refusing to actually run just yet himself.

When Phoenix caught up to Luke, he found the teen locked in a tight embrace with a young woman in an orange dress, reddish-brown hair pulled up into a ponytail with a ribbon. Despite their close proximity, they were seemingly already deep in conversation, loudly squealing to each other about how long it had been since they last met and whether or not Luke had grown taller. Nearby stood an older man in an orange turtleneck, who looked up as Phoenix and Edgeworth approached with a welcoming smile, his hands resting on the handle of a pram currently locked into place between him and Luke. Inside was a toddler with stringy red hair, staring sternly up at the strangers.

Layton tipped his hat. "Mister Wright, a pleasure to see you again!"

Phoenix grinned, nodding his head as he approached the small group. "Professor! It's been a while!" He held out his hand, and the old friends shook warmly. "We were worried you hadn't come for a moment there!"

Layton laughed. "Oh no, we wouldn't have missed meeting Luke here for the world!"

At that moment, Luke and Flora suddenly ended their excited conversation, and Luke jumped to Phoenix's side. "Oh, I should make sure everyone is introduced!" he cried, then gestured to Phoenix and Edgeworth, looking at Flora. "Flora, this is my Papa, Phoenix Wright, and his friend Mister Edgeworth. Papa, Mister Edgeworth, this is Flora Reinhold!"

Flora gave the two men a wave. "Hello!"

Phoenix waved back, while Edgeworth gave her a small bow. "A pleasure," he said.

Luke stepped forward, gesturing between Layton and Edgeworth. "Mister Edgeworth, this is Professor Hershel Layton. Professor, this is-!"

"Miles Edgeworth," Edgeworth cut in, bowing to Layton before turning to Luke. "My apologies, but if we're doing full introductions, I feel it's only fair to mention."

Luke smiled, unoffended, while Layton tipped his hat. "Then it is to you I must offer my thanks for allowing Luke this chance to visit," he said.

"Please, think nothing of it," Edgeworth replied.

Layton stepped over to the pram, reaching in for the toddler inside. "That leaves one last person for the introductions," he said, picking the quiet young boy up and holding him in his arms, where the baby promptly clung to his father's neck, peering over his arm curiously at the newcomers. "This is Alfendi Layton. As of tomorrow, he is twenty-two months old."
Luke jumped forward eagerly to greet the toddler. "Hello, Alfendi!" he cried. "I've heard a lot about you!"

Alfendi buried his face in his father's shoulder.

Phoenix laughed. "Shy, is he?"

"He's wary of strangers," Flora explained with a shrug. "We think it might have to do with what happened to his parents."

"We can explain another time," Layton added, prising the toddler from his neck to place him back in the pram. Flora moved to help strap the boy in, and Layton looked up to the three visitors with a smile. "Now, where was it the three of you were staying while you're here?"

Meanwhile, Thousands of Miles Away

June 7, 1:26PM
Kurain Village

Apollo and Trucy waited impatiently as the bus they had just gotten off slowly turned itself around and headed back down the mountain, freeing up the road for them to dash across towards Fey Manor. Waiting on the porch, grinning in excitement, was Pearl, waiting for her unofficial cousins to arrive.

"Pearly!" Trucy shouted, bounding up the stone steps and launching into a hug with her friend. "It's great to see you!"

"Hi, Trucy!" Pearl replied, politely hugging the younger girl back. "It's been a while!"

Apollo settled for a wave as the girls parted. "Is Maya around?"

Pearl shook her head. "She's in a meeting right now," she explained, looking apologetic. "She asked me to make sure you were settled in."

"Oh, that's alright, Pearly!" Trucy chirped, gripping the handles of her backpack as she bounced in place. "We know where to go and everything!"

Apollo laughed in agreement. "Yeah, this place is like a second home!"

Pearl pressed her palms to her cheeks as she blushed. "Oh, I hope Mister Nick thinks so as well!" she cried.

Trucy squealed, clapping her hands. "Me too!"

Sighing, Apollo rolled his eyes, then headed into the mansion.

________________________

Just thought I’d let you know, Trucy and I are in Kurain. Before you ask, I locked up all the windows and doors, the sign was still there when we left, and I have my keys on me.

Thank you, Apollo. I knew I could trust you, it was just difficult to convince myself. :) It's almost 10pm here and Lukes already knocked out from all the excitement. Hows Maya and Pearls?

The usual as far as I can tell. Mayas in a meeting so we haven't seen her yet. Trucys catching up with Pearly right now.

That's good :) I'll call you around 9am tmrw your time so be prepared. Love you Love you, Dad.

Apollo pressed 'send' on his latest message to Phoenix, pretending his face wasn't bright red as he then quickly locked his phone screen and shoved the device deep into a pocket. Sitting in the Winding Way outside the side room, he could hear Trucy and Pearl loudly talking amongst themselves nearby, and wondered what they were so excited about. Probably our show on Saturday, he decided. Given how easy it seems to be to impress the Feys with magic, anyway.

The door from the Meditation Room slid open, and Apollo looked up in surprise to see Maya's head poking out, searching the small garden curiously before spotting Apollo and rushing towards him with a smile. "Apollo!" she cried, crouching at his side and petting his head. "Great to see you again, kiddo!"

The teenager waved the hand off his hair with an annoyed look. "Pearly said you were in a meeting."

Maya nodded, biting her lip to hide a smile. "Snuck out," she said with a shrug. "Had to check you guys made it okay!" She laughed, elbowing Apollo playfully. "Your dad woulda killed me if you hadn't!"

Apollo smiled, knowing he couldn't argue with that. "We made it fine," he assured her. "Trucy's talking to Pearly, if you hadn't noticed," he added, gesturing in the rough direction of the open window that the pair's conversation was drifting out of.

"Yeah, I noticed," Maya laughed, standing up. "I figure there's no reason to disturb them." She then waved for Apollo to stand next to her. "Now come here, I want to see how much you've grown!"

"Seriously?" Apollo sighed, rolling his eyes. "You know I'm taller than you n-"

Maya tapped a finger on Apollo's head. "Uh-uh! Get up here, I want to see." Apollo contemplated pointing out that Maya wasn't his mother, but decided it was easier to just do as she said and not make a fuss about it. Maya was fond of comparing their height whenever they met in person, after having noted with disappointment when they first met that he just about matched her in how tall he was. In fact, he was unsurprised to see, as he stood straight next to his impatient unofficial mother figure, that he had a good few additional centimetres on her since the last time she insisted on measuring him against herself.

Maya spent a few moments trying to stretch herself up to Apollo without going on tip-toes, but was eventually forced to give up. "You have Nick's height, I bet!" she complained, arms held straight at her sides as her hands curled into fists. "Just my luck that you're not taking after me in that regard!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "I'm not biologically related to either of you," he pointed out.

Waving a hand, Maya turned and headed back towards the door. "Well, I'd better get back to work!" she cried, back to her usual cheerful self. "Talk to you later, Apollo!" With that, she was gone.

Sighing, Apollo sat back down, dangling his feet off the wooden balcony. Why are all of my family weird?
What's the time over there right now?

Just gone midday.

Oh, yes, it's just after 8 in the evening here! I should have remembered it's an 8 hour difference!

Lol! Dad was telling me how you went out today with your friends Ariana and Tony?

Arianna and Tony, yes. We went back to Misthallery, so I met pretty much everyone I used to know there! It did get a bit frustrating after a while how almost everyone would greet me by immediately offering condolences for what happened to my mum and dad, but I had fun seeing everyone again. I even found Toppy, though he's getting old now!

Wow, did everyone seriously know about your parents? :/ And Toppy was the rat that helped you out when you met the Professor, right?

Misthallery isn't all that big, and Dad was the mayor here. I guess news of the crash spread really quickly. Yes, Toppy was my rat friend. He was probably the only old friend who didn't know what had happened, actually. All the people around my age didn't mention it, I think because they knew all the adults would be separately apologising. I should have thanked them before I left.

Well you had a good time at least. Tired yet? ;).

A little! It was worse this morning, but I'm really trying to power through the jetlag. I might find something boring to do for a while until I feel I can sleep! Maybe I could ask Papa about his day with Mr Edgeworth again, it sounded like even they thought it was boring!

Lol! Good luck with that!.

Thanks! By the way, did you know Papa brought his old suit with us? He's wearing it instead of his usual jumper and hat.

Jumper=sweater, did you forget already? Lol! Yeah it must be weird seeing him in the suit again. Does it even still fit him? He hasn't been a lawyer for a couple years now.

It is weird, yes! But I should get going now. Talk to you tomorrow, Apollo!

Seeya then :).

Train Station

"But how did you even do half of those!?" Maya gasped as their small group of four made their way onto the platform to catch the last train back to Kurain. "That has to be actual magic!"

Pearl nodded in agreement. "How did you not cut off your hand in that 'gill-o-teen'?" she asked
Apollo, looking worried. "That looked like it might have really hurt!"

Apollo laughed, sharing an amused glance with Trucy. "Aw, a magician never reveals their tricks!" he said.

"Magician's code!" Trucy chimed in with a grin.

Maya pouted, balling her hands into fists as the group came to a halt on the platform. "Stupid code," she muttered darkly to herself. "Max said that about his magic, too!"

"Max?" Trucy repeated, confused.

"He's a magician too," Pearl explained. "He works at the Berry Big Circus, here in town."

Apollo's eyes widened. "Wait, you mean Max Galactica!?" he asked. "The guy Dad defended for murder!?"

"Oh!" Trucy cried. "I know who he is! He used to compete against Daddy and Uncle Valant in the Magician's Grand Prix!"

Maya laughed. "Ah, I see you know who he is!" she said, holding her hands behind her boastfully. "Yeah, I met him when Nick was defending him for murder. Boy, what a case that one was!"

"He had a wonderful act!" Pearl cut in. "He flew through the air, then he disappeared!" She pressed her hands to her face, smiling in glee at the memory. "It was the first magic act I ever saw, and the first time Mister Nick and Mystic Maya took me out somewhere!"

"Huh, really?" Apollo replied. "That case was the first full trial of Dad's I got to see!" He laughed to himself. "I actually dragged Clay along to watch some of it with me! Man, he hated it, even after all the excitement of how Dad took down that acrobat guy!"

"You mean Acro?" Maya asked, hand held to her face as she solemnly remembered the trial. "Yeah, that was an eventful trial, wasn't it?" The train pulled into the station, halting the conversation as Maya gestured the three kids towards the nearest door. "Okay, everyone in!" she cried as she began to herd them. "We gotta make the last bus, or we're walking home in the dark!"

---

_How was your day?_

_Actually pretty eventful. How much did Papa tell you when he called earlier?_

_Eh he didn't say much, just that you'd had a busy morning and it would take too long to explain it all :/ What happened?_

_It's a bit of a long story. Actually, tell Trucy we have her 'adventure' over and done with to tell her about when we get back on Friday._

_We're not even seeing you until Saturday xD But yeah I'll tell her. Short version?_

_I'll leave that to Papa. He was more involved than me._

_Aw! Lol._
I'll just say we went to Gressenheller University and something went a bit wrong. You can hear the full story on Saturday.

Alright I'll look forward to it then. Of course Trucy and I are gonna invent our own versions in the meantime tho xD.

Haha! Feel free, although it might make the truth a little less exciting!

I'll talk to you tomorrow, Apollo.

Seeya then :) .

June 16, 2:05PM
Fey Manor
Pearl's Room

The first thing Apollo saw as he walked through the doorway was the hula hoop falling clumsily from around his sister's waist. Coming to a halt in confusion, he frowned, watching as Pearl ran to grab the fallen ring of plastic from around Trucy's feet. To his surprise, Trucy was, for once, lacking her hat and cape, wearing only the black dress and white boots of her usual magician outfit. He decided to lean against the door frame as he watched.

"You're supposed to start swinging before you let go," Pearl instructed, helping Trucy hold the hoop around her middle.

Trucy nodded, holding the object tightly as Pearl let go and stepped back. Frowning in concentration, she began to swing her hips around in a circular motion, then let go of the hoop, which swung meagrely around her waist only once before again falling to the floor at her feet. Crying in frustration, Trucy threw her fists against her legs. "This is so hard!"

Pearl nervously fiddled with one of the bands wrapped around her wrists. "I'm sorry," she mumbled.

"Don't be sorry, Pearly. You just need practise," Apollo said, startling the two girls as they noticed he was there. He pushed himself off the door frame. "The more you do it, the easier it is to do."

Trucy glared at her brother, then grabbed the hoop off the floor, flipping it over her head and holding it out towards him. "You try it, then!" she challenged him.

Apollo shrugged, smiling. "Sure. It's been a while, though." Taking pleasure in Trucy and Pearl's surprised looks, he took the offered hoop and, with his free hand, promptly took Trucy's lead in removing the hat, cape and belt of his costume, putting them to one side where they were out of the way. Noting he was too close to the walls for comfort, he shooed the girls back a little until he had a reasonable free space, then flipped the hoop over his head to hold it around his waist. 'Okay, Apollo. It's been a few years... or, more than a few, really, since you last did this... Do not screw up.' With a practised, though rusty, motion, Apollo swung his hips side to side, throwing the hoop around his waist to spin there.

Trucy and Pearl gasped. "Wow!" Trucy cried.
Grinning, Apollo said, "Let's see if I can pull off a trick or two, huh?" Without waiting for a reply from the girls, he jumped a little and shifted the hoop to spinning around his upper legs, then down close to his ankles, before kicking it back up to his waist. Smiling proudly at the successful trick as the girls gasped in awe, Apollo moved to try and gets his arms inside the spinning object, but misjudged his movements and hit the hoop instead. Although he tried to catch it, the plastic ring fell to the floor with a clatter, leaving Apollo wincing at his mistake. "Oops."

To Apollo's surprise, Trucy and Pearl erupted into applause, bouncing in place and grinning widely as they cheered his effort. "That was amazing!" Pearl cried.

"Yeah, that was so cool!" Trucy added, running to her brother and tugging on his arm. "Why didn't you ever say you were good with a hula hoop!?!"

Apollo shrugged, blushing. "Well, I guess it never came up," he said, "and, really, I'm not that good anymore. It's been ages since I last played with one."

Pearl peered down at the fallen hoop curiously. "What happened to your hoop that you don't have one anymore?" she wondered aloud.

Once again shrugging, Apollo looked away, frowning. "It wasn't mine, really. It belonged to this foster family I was staying with." A hand reached up to rub the back of his neck. "I played with it so much, they even sent me to hoop dance classes for a while." He frowned. "Then they couldn't look after me any more, so I had to go."

Pearl held a hand to her mouth, eyes wide in sympathy.

Trucy knelt down and grabbed the hoop off the floor, swinging it over Apollo's head as he pulled his hand down to avoid getting whacked with the moving hula hoop. "But that sounds really cool!" she cried, pausing to look over the smallish hoop. "Y'know what? We need to get ourselves our own hoop like Pearly's!" She looked up at her brother with a grin. "Then we can figure out a way to work it into our act!"

Apollo blinked in surprise. "Really?"

"Sure!" Trucy chirped, pushing the hoop towards Apollo again. "C'mon, let's find a better place to practise so you can teach me and Pearly how to do it!" With that, she raced outside.

Pearl and Apollo shared a confused glance before shrugging and following after, smiles on their faces.

View the Court Record
Although they had met up almost every day since their arrival the previous Monday, Luke was still highly excited to greet the Layton family as they found each other in the front hall of Gressenheller University. Luke and Flora ran to each other to tightly hug, although Luke quickly pulled away to then run to Layton and young Alfendi, who managed to give the teen a small smile as he recognised the visitors. Luke gave the toddler a small wave, which was returned, although Alfendi followed it up by again hiding his face in his father's shoulder.

Edgeworth looked around the entrance hall with an inscrutable expression. "You're sure we aren't disturbing you, coming here?" he asked.

"Please, it's no trouble at all," Layton insisted, tipping his hat as Alfendi looked up curiously. "I am here on research today, so we shouldn't have anyone interrupting."

"Oh!" Luke cried, turning towards his father. "Should I maybe show you around before we go to the Professor's office?" He scratched at the side of his head, grinning in embarrassment. "It's quite easy to get lost here if you don't know the campus very well..."

Flora giggled. "He's speaking from experience, of course!"

Luke blushed, rounding on his friend. "Well, you got lost here a lot, too!"

Phoenix laughed, crossing his arms to keep from fiddling with the old suit he'd dug out from his closet to wear on the trip. "I'm sure we'll work it out!" he assured his son, then gestured to Edgeworth. "We're meeting with that professor of law here first, remember?"

Edgeworth nodded. "Indeed. I have her office number, so she shouldn't be hard to locate."

"In that case," Layton said, "Luke can return to my office with us while you go to your meeting. We can meet up there when you are done."

Phoenix grinned. "Sounds like a plan."

Luke dashed to Phoenix to give him a hug, saying only, "See you later, Papa!" before running off again with Flora.

Layton adjusted Alfendi in his arms and gestured down the nearest hallway. "My office has the top hat on the door. It's not far down this way," he told them.

"Understood," Edgeworth replied.

"We'll see you later, Professor," Phoenix added with a small laugh.

Alfendi wriggled, asking to be put down, and ran off the moment his feet touched the wooden floor. Layton followed closely behind, ensuring the toddler was not likely to hurt himself as they headed Edgeworth pulled his organiser out of a pocket, flipping it open to the current day. He looked over his own notes for a moment before looking up at the nearby stairs and heading towards them, snapping the organiser closed. "This way, Wright. She's on the first floor."

Phoenix paused. "Then why are we going upstairs...?"

"'First floor' meaning the first floor off the ground," Edgeworth explained, stopping at the first step to wait for his friend to catch up. "This floor is called the 'Ground Floor' here, not the 'First'."

"Oh, okay." Phoenix mumbled, rolling his eyes at the unexpected difference in terms as he hurried towards the stairs.

June 15, 10:49AM

Gressenheller University

First Floor Hallway

"The stairs are back this way, aren't they?" Phoenix mumbled to himself as he and Edgeworth wandered back down the hallways towards the lobby. "Man, Luke was right when he said it was easy to get lost!"

Edgeworth crossed his arms, fingers tapping as he thought to himself. "I think we need to turn down this next hallway coming up," he said, gesturing to an upcoming intersection.

Phoenix sighed, digging his hands into the pockets of his suit pants. "I hope you're right. I don't want to have to dig out my phone and call Luke to come find us." 'And it was so nice to pretend at being a lawyer again, learning about the English law system properly... y'know, not by being thrown into the deep end in a deliberate effort to get someone wrongfully declared guilty! ... The good mood is promptly ruined by getting lost.'

One thing that had been glossed over about this trip to Phoenix's kids was the true purpose of the original invitation to Phoenix himself; Much to Edgeworth's disappointment, public opinion on the state of the courts in California had rapidly declined after the conviction of Simon Blackquill. Although Phoenix didn't see what they could possibly do about it, Edgeworth was determined that the deterioration of trust could be halted and possibly even restored if they first cleared Phoenix's name, and, for that, he had come up with the idea of a new system of judging criminals.

"If the public do not trust the judges alone," Edgeworth had explained, "then what better way to change their minds than by bringing them into the judging process itself?"

"Like a jury?" Phoenix had asked, scratching his chin. "Didn't that old system get scrapped precisely because people hated doing it?"

Edgeworth had sighed in response. "Obviously they didn't know what they had until they lost it," he almost snapped. "I understand, contrary to your experience, the United Kingdom still uses jury trials for the majority of its cases. The one you participated in would have been subject to this 'pulling of strings' that got you defending in it." Phoenix hadn't been convinced, so Edgeworth would later add, "And how exactly are you planning to prove Gavin framed you in the 'forged evidence' scandal...?"
without any evidence, then? At least with a jury you can ask for a conscience vote."

Phoenix hadn't been able to argue with that.

As they turned down the new hallway of the university, Phoenix noted an open, sunlit space at the other end and grinned hopefully. "Look, the lobby!"

Edgeworth shook his head. "It can't be. He gestured to the hallway behind them, extending beyond where they had turned off it. "We're not at the front of the building."

Phoenix sighed, throwing his hands in the air dejectedly. "So we're still lost."

"Not exactly," Edgeworth replied, a small smile at the corners of his mouth as he continued walking. "There may be stairs there. If we can return to the ground floor, it will be easier to find our way to the lobby from there."

"I hope you're right," Phoenix mumbled, keeping pace with his friend as he rested his hands back in his pockets.

The silence was interrupted by a scream suddenly sounding from a doorway to their right.

Phoenix and Edgeworth only glanced at each other before racing to the door the sound had come from. Phoenix reached it first, throwing the door open and racing into the dark room. It was a classroom, built for smaller tutorial classes or practical assignments, with a chalkboard on the wall by the door and an array of desks lined up down the room. Against the far wall was a large cupboard, its door hanging open, and standing in front of it was a pre-teen girl with long orange hair done up in a ponytail on the side of her head, a school uniform her only clothes. She was staring, hands over her ears, at the floor in front of her, where, hanging out of the opened cupboard, was the body of an older woman, bright hair stained with blood and tucked underneath the collar of a green coat. She rested face-down on the laminated floor, her legs awkwardly folded at the bottom of the cupboard that she had clearly fallen out of.

The two men moved forward as one, Edgeworth towards the woman on the floor and Phoenix to the girl, gently holding her shoulders and pulling her away from the grisly scene. She was reluctant to move, seemingly still in shock, until Phoenix knelt down next to her. "Hey, c'mon, let's get out of the way now," he whispered, and directly addressing her finally alerted the girl to the men's presence, making her look up in surprise at Phoenix. He gave her his best friendly smile, saying, "We'll just get in the way hanging out in here, okay?" The girl thought a moment, then mutely nodded, so Phoenix stood back up and took her hand.

Edgeworth was kneeling by the body, his hand pulling away from her neck. "Dead, but not long," he announced, looking up to see his friend leading the girl back out into the hallway. "If you'll call the police Wright, I'll begin an investigation here."

Phoenix nodded, pulling his phone out of his pocket.

"The number here is triple-nine by the way," Edgeworth added as a reminder.

"Got it," Phoenix replied, exiting into the hallway and closing the door as the girl followed him.

After discovering the scene inside, it felt almost eerie to find himself back out in the quiet hallway, although the sun shone through the windows at the distant ends of the large corridor. Nearby, against the wall by the door they had just come out of, was a convenient bench, so Phoenix led the girl over to sit down. "I've gotta call the police, okay?" he told her, and, when she nodded her acknowledgement, he turned his attention to his phone.
"Nine Nine Nine, what is your emergency?"

View the Court Record
Phoenix dropped onto the bench next to the girl as he hung up the phone. 'Man, I almost forgot how long it can take to inform the police of a murder.' He frowned. 'Actually, I should probably find a way to inform the university, too. Wait, that'd be easy, I could just call Luke and get him to pass the message on to the Professor. As much as I'd hate to ruin their day, it's kind of necessary given the circumstances.'

He felt a soft tugging on his sleeve, and looked down to the girl sat at his side, gazing up at him worriedly. "Um, excuse me," she mumbled, "sir?"

Phoenix smiled. "My name's Phoenix," he said, "but you can call me Nick if you want. What's your name?"

The girl only continued to look nervous. "Uh, it's, um..." She hugged her arms close to her tummy, rubbing her hands comfortingly by her elbows. "A-Athena."

"Nice to meet you, Athena," Phoenix replied, holding out his hand to shake.

Although she was still too shy to face Phoenix directly, he spotted a small smile as Athena shook his hand, slowly becoming more comfortable with him.

"Did you want to ask me something?" Phoenix continued.

Athena nodded, her hands slowing their nervous petting. "My teacher might be worried about me. I was supposed to come right back once I found my..." She paused, then gasped, hands flying to her mouth. "Oh no, my notebook!"

The girl jumped to her feet and looked ready to run straight back into the classroom, so Phoenix threw himself forward to grab her arm and prevent her from leaving. "Bad idea!" he cried. "That's a crime scene now! You can't just run in!"

Athena chewed her lip nervously. "But my notebook is still in there!" she cried, only to sigh and reluctantly sit back down, arms flopping at her sides. "Missus Hawkins let me come and get it, and she told me to be right back! I can't go back to class without it!"

Phoenix glanced up and down the hallway. "You're here on a school trip?" he asked her, hands clutched together in his lap.

"Mm-hmm," Athena said with a nod. "All of Year Seven came out here today to talk to some of the professors about what they teach in university."

After a moment of thought, Phoenix smiled and pulled his phone out of his pocket. "Well, I know of a way to get a message to your teacher for you," he offered, "seeing as the police will probably want to talk to you before you can go back to class."
Athena looked up, eyes wide in fear. "Th-they will?"

Phoenix patted her shoulder. "It's okay, they'll just want to know what you saw." He thought a moment, then added in a more serious tone, "You were the first to find the body, so anything you might have seen could be vital to finding who did it."

The girl didn't seem convinced, but gave Phoenix a nod to show she understood.

On his phone, Phoenix hit one of his contacts and held the phone to his ear. After a few moments of ringing, the other end of the line picked up.

"Papa?" Luke asked from the phone speaker. "Did you get lost?"

"Er, not quite," Phoenix replied, wincing a bit as he remembered his last conversation before discovering the body. "I'm sorry to have to ruin your good time with the Professor, but there's been an... incident."

There was a pause from the other end of the line. "Incident?"

"I'm afraid Uncle Edgeworth and I found a body," Phoenix bluntly explained. "I'm going to have to ask you to ask the Professor to pass on to the dean that the police are on their way."

"O-oh," Luke mumbled in surprise. "I'll do that, sure. Where is it?"

Phoenix glanced over to the classroom door again, where the room number was displayed under a picture of a blooming flower he couldn't identify. "Room zero-thirty-six," he said. "The door has a flower on it."

"What kind of flower?"

"I-I don't know," Phoenix admitted, trying not to sound frustrated. "It's on the second floor you'd say here."

Luke took a moment to reply, and Phoenix wondered if he was writing this down. "Okay, I'll make sure Dean Delmona knows about it," he promised. "Is there anything else?"

Phoenix nodded, forgetting for a moment that Luke couldn't see him. "Yeah, one other thing, actually."

"It's a rose," Athena suddenly chimed in, startling Phoenix from his conversation.

Covering the microphone, Phoenix turned to the girl with a confused look. "Sorry?"

"The flower on the door," she explained, pointing to the picture nearby. "It's a rose."

Phoenix paused a moment, then gave Athena a smile. "Ah, thank you," he told her, then returned to his phone. "Apparently the flower on the door is a rose, but that wasn't what I was going to say."

Luke giggled. "Okay, Papa! What else were you going to say then?"

"There's a school trip somewhere in the building right now," Phoenix explained. "If you could find out where they are, and explain the situation to the teacher, I'd greatly appreciate it."

"There is?" Luke wondered aloud, starting to sound worried. "Why? Is the body a kid!?"

Phoenix shook his head, surprised to hear Luke's conclusion. "N-no, of course not!" he cried. "I think the body belongs to one of the professors here, actually... No, it was discovered first by one of the kids from the school trip. Her name's Athena, and I think her teacher might be getting worried about her by now."

"Missus Hawkins," Athena reminded Phoenix. "And that was Professor Rains inside."

Phoenix had opened his mouth to pass the information on to Luke when he suddenly realised what Athena had said and turned to her with a surprised look. "You knew who it was...?"

"What was that, Papa?" Luke asked.

Athena looked embarrassed, running her hands through her ponytail. "Y-yeah," she admitted. "She was talking to us about biology in plants."

Phoenix stared at the girl for another moment or so before returning his attention to his phone.
"Apparently the victim is a Professor Rains, and she teaches biology in plants," he said.

"Oh, Professor Rosa Rains, the botanist!" Luke cried. "I met her once, before I left!" He paused a moment, then added, "Professor Layton is leaving now to go find Dean Delmona and that school trip. Shall we catch up to you when we're done?"

"That's a good idea," Phoenix agreed, certain now that Luke had been writing everything down to immediately pass along to Layton. "I'll see you in a bit. Love you."

"Love you, Papa," Luke replied, then hung up.

Sighing, Phoenix returned his phone to his pocket. "This is why I didn't become a detective," he mused aloud to himself.

The background noise of the university had slowly become an increasingly loud babble over the past few minutes, and Phoenix looked around to see various classrooms both in and out of this particular hallway opening up to empty of students, turning the babble into a full-on crowd, everyone talking at the top of their voices to be heard by their neighbour. At his side, he noticed Athena gripping her ears tightly, and reasoned it might actually be easier to return inside the classroom, at least until everyone had gone. I hope no-one's expecting a class with Professor Rains, though. Resting a hand on Athena's shoulder, he leaned in close and said to her, "Why don't we wait inside where it's quieter, huh?" Athena nodded, looking grateful, and followed Phoenix as he stood and escorted her back into the classroom.

Edgeworth looked up as the door opened and closed. "Have the authorities been informed?" he asked, standing from where he was examining the body.

Phoenix nodded, guiding Athena towards the nearest desk. "Luke and Professor Layton are finding the dean, and then they're going to track down Athena's class so they don't worry about her." He paused to silently instruct Athena to sit down. "Oh, and apparently our victim is one Rosa Rains.
She's a professor of biology here. A botanist, specifically."

Edgeworth raised an eyebrow. "A little more information than I was expecting you to return with," he admitted. "Although it does make sense, given the high quantity of dirt under her fingernails."

Athena again tugged on Phoenix's sleeve. "Um, would it be alright if I found my notebook while we're in here?"

Phoenix leaned down to the girl's level. "Where'd you leave it?" he asked.

The girl stood, looking around the room before pointing at a desk on the other side of the classroom, near where the body had fallen. "Over there," she said. "I was looking when I heard something in the cupboard..." Rubbing an arm nervously with her other hand, she sat back down, shooting glances in the direction of said item of furniture.

Edgeworth took a cursory glance over the desks nearest to him, then reached under one and plucked an A5-sized exercise book off the chair, holding up for Athena to see. "Would this be it?"

Athena nodded, grinning. "Yes, that's it!" she said. "Thank you, sir!"

Phoenix chuckled. "I guess my friend here is good for something, huh?" he joked.

Ignoring the comment, Edgeworth strolled towards them, reading the front of the booklet. "Athena Cykes is your name?" he said, holding it out for the girl to take. "I can tell you are not from around here by your accent."

Athena winced, taking the notebook and hugging it tight to her chest.

Phoenix shot Edgeworth a glare, though he was surprised to realise that she did indeed talk with an accent more reminiscent of California than London. "I don't see how that's relevant," he pointed out, protectively resting a hand on the girl's shoulder. "She did just discover a body, Edgeworth."

"I'm aware, Wright," the burgundy-suited prosecutor replied, arms crossed, before turning to Athena. "Maybe you could tell us more about what happened before we found you. You were here looking for your notebook, correct?"

Athena nodded, staring at the desk in front of her as a hand reached up to cling to the collar of her school uniform, where the golden chain of a necklace was just visible. "I heard something," she repeated. "I thought maybe there was someone, or something, trapped in there, so I went to open the door." She hugged herself tighter, looking distressed. "I... I..."

"It's okay, you don't have to talk about it," Phoenix assured her, kneeling to be closer to her level while shooting murderous glares at Edgeworth in a silent warning to back off.

Edgeworth rolled his eyes, then turned and walked back over to the body without another word.
"So we meet them as they arrive," Luke asked as they walked briskly from the dean's office to the lobby, "and show them where the room is?"

Layton nodded, a hand resting protectively on the brim of his hat. "It shouldn't take them long," he explained. "Scotland Yard isn't far away."

Flora hugged Alfendi tighter as she tagged along at the back of the group. "Do you think it will be a detective we know?" she wondered. Although Layton had initially wanted to leave the pair in his office, both Flora and Alfendi had kicked up such a fuss at being left behind that he had reluctantly agreed to let them come along, provided Flora kept herself and her baby brother out of the way of the investigation. "It would be nice to see Inspector Chelmey again!"

Luke giggled, looking back at the young woman. "Yeah, I haven't seen him in a few years! Has he changed at all?"

Flora shook her head, grinning. "Nope!"

The group arrived in the lobby, standing near the entrance doors. The halls had quietened again now the switch-over between classes had ended, with any remaining stragglers either heading to the inner courtyard or to an office somewhere in the building. Luke adjusted his hat as he peered out the glass doors. "I hope they come soon," he said, "whoever's coming."

Alfendi began to fuss in Flora's arms, asking to be let down, so she gently placed the boy on the ground. "What is it, 'Fendi?" she asked him, but the baby only toddled over to Layton, gripping his trouser legs tightly in his fists.

Layton crouched down to Alfendi's level, giving him a reassuring smile. "What is it, Alfendi?" he asked. "Are you worried about something?"

The baby rubbed his face against Layton's knee, making soft whining noises as he refused to talk.

Luke looked over to Flora questioningly, but she just shrugged with an apologetic smile.

"Are you worried I'm leaving you?" Layton asked, one hand petting the toddler's red hair. When the baby looked up at him with sad eyes, the Professor chuckled, taking Alfendi into his arms and standing up, holding his son close. "Well, you don't have to worry about that. I can promise I will never leave you."

Flora sighed wistfully. "Aw, little baby!" she cooed.

Luke restrained a giggle, looking out at the road outside, and jumped when he recognised a car parking by the bus stop. "Professor!" he cried, pointing at the blue police car. "They're here!"

Everyone looked up, watching in anticipation as two men got out, one solemnly stalking towards the university doors while the other scrambled close behind on his much shorter legs.

"You were right, they haven't changed!" Luke added.

Layton nodded, shifting Alfendi to his other arm. "Indeed," he said with an amused smile.

One banging of the doors later, Chelmey and Barton strode into the university lobby. Chelmey instantly spotting the small group and quickly approaching them, hands behind his back. "Layton. Should have guessed it was you," he growled, not seeing Barton cheerfully give the group a wave behind him. "So where are they then?"

Layton tipped his hat. "Good day to you, Inspector, Constable," he greeted the officers. "Professor Rains' body was discovered in her classroom on the first floor. We can show you there promptly." He nodded to Flora and Luke to follow him, then turned towards the stairs.

Chelmey pulled out a notebook, waving at Barton to tag along as he stuck to Layton's side. "Rains, huh? When did you find her?"

"We didn't!" Luke objected, crossing his arms. "My Papa and Mister Edgeworth did!"

Chelmey stopped, bringing the party to a halt as he looked back in surprise, staring at the teen for a moment. "Hang on, you're that Triton boy!" he cried as he recognised Luke. "I thought you left?"

Luke nodded. "Oh, I did! I'm visiting!" he explained, then giggled. "It's good to see you again, Inspector!"

"Hmm," Chelmey mumbled, then turned and continued to follow Layton, sending the group once more into motion. "I thought it was you lot that discovered the body."

"I'm afraid not," Layton replied. "As Luke explained, it was his father - adoptive father, not Clark Triton - and a friend of his that stumbled upon it. We offered to show you there so they could guard the scene."

Chelmey grunted to himself, tapping his notepad with his pencil as they emerged onto the upper floor. "Right," he said. "Let's get to it, then."

"Wow, you're twelve?" Phoenix proclaimed, with a hammed up tone of wonder.

Athena giggled, running her hands through her ponytail.

"My daughter's only nine!" Phoenix laughed, leaning against the desk next to Athena's that he had sat in as Edgeworth continued to stand around the body. "Of course, then I have a son who's fifteen, so you're about inbetween the both of them!"
"Oh, I didn't know you had kids, mister!" Athena replied in surprise. "Do they go to school near here?"

Phoenix laughed again. "Ah, no, they go to school back home in California."

Athena momentarily froze in shock. "California?"

"We live there," Phoenix explained, not noticing her reaction. "I'm here on a business trip actually, although my younger son did come with us to visit some old friends. He used to live here."

After a moment's pause, Athena smiled and nodded, although she looked a little confused. "O-okay."

A knock at the door interrupted the conversation, and Phoenix looked up just as the door was opened by a stern looking man in a tan trenchcoat, a brown moustache hanging over his top lip. He scowled around the room as he sauntered in, taking in every detail. Behind him, to Phoenix's relief, was Professor Layton, Alfendi in his arms.

Edgeworth looked the man up and down, then waved a finger in his direction. "You must be the police, I assume?"

Behind Layton, Flora and Luke sidled into the room, Luke giving Phoenix a small wave that was quickly returned. A short policeman in uniform sidled in after them, slowly closing the door at his back.

"Detective Inspector Chelmey," the coated man introduced himself, looking down his nose at Edgeworth with a hint of suspicion. "And you would be the people who discovered the body, I take it?"

Edgeworth nodded, stepping away from the scene and holding out his tablet computer. "I took the liberty of documenting the scene as we found it once we established Professor Rains was deceased," he explained. "I'd guess cause of death was the wound on her head."

Chelmey snatched the small computer out of Edgeworth's hands and looked at the screen critically for a few moments. "Hmph. Well done," he begrudgingly admitted, handing the tablet off to Barton as the constable scurried to Chelmey's side to take it. "We will need to take witness statements from the three of you," he pointed out, pulling his notepad from a pocket.

"Naturally," Edgeworth replied, giving a little bow. "My name is Miles Edgeworth. I'm a prosecutor."

"Oh ho ho, you are, are you?" Chelmey scoffed, giving Edgeworth a warning glare. "That why you're trying to take over my crime scene? Feh! High-and-mighty prosecutors trying to take over our jobs, like they did in America!"

Phoenix shot Edgeworth a questioning look, which the other man only ignored, concentrating on stifling his glower in the detective's direction.

"Your misunderstanding of the system of law in the United States aside," Edgeworth continued, arms crossed, "Wright and I were walking past in the hallway outside when we heard a scream and came in here immediately. The body was on the floor, and I attempted to check her pulse and breathing only to find there was none of either. The body was also rapidly cooling down, indicating it could not have been dead long."

Chelmey rapidly scribbled the story down on his notepad. "And who's 'Wright'?" he asked.
"That's me," Phoenix spoke up, standing from his seat by Athena and resisting the urge to crack a joke at the perfect set-up line he'd inadvertently been given. "Phoenix Wright. I was the one who actually called you guys in."

The detective narrowed his eyes at Phoenix, scribbling in his notepad. "And the 'scream'?"

"Athena," Phoenix explained, gesturing to the girl sitting next to him as she shrank away from the attention. He patted her shoulder comfortingly, leaning down to her level. "Do you want to tell the detective what you told us a little while ago?"

Athena rubbed her arms nervously, standing from her chair. "Um..."

"Speak up, girl!" Chelmey cried, waving his pencil at her and not seeing her wince in response. "Can't hear you if you mumble like that!"

Phoenix shot the detective a glare. "Ignore him," he told Athena. "Take your time."

Chelmey was about to respond, when Layton cut him off. "Please, Inspector," he said, lowering Alfendi to the floor to rest his tiring arms, "the girl has just discovered a body. A little patience is in order, is it not?" Chelmey grumbled, but kept quiet.

Athena stared at the desk in front of her a while before feeling brave enough to speak up again. "I left my notebook behind," she said, as loudly as she dared. "Missus Hawkins said I could fetch it if I was quick, so I ran back to get it." She paused, gripping her arm tightly. "I heard something move in the cupboard, so I thought I'd open it to see what it was, and..." Her right hand moved from her arm to her mouth, the knuckles pressing into her lips.

"Understandably," Phoenix picked up, staring at Chelmey as though daring him to upset Athena further, "she screamed and Edgeworth and I found her. Any objections?"

Chelmey narrowed his eyes, returning the stare for a few moments before writing Athena's story in his notebook. "So she screamed just as you two happened to be passing by in the hallway?" he confirmed.

Edgeworth nodded, tapping a finger against his arm. "Quite fortuitous timing. The hall was quite empty otherwise, and no-one else ever came to investigate."

"And did the pair of you even see this girl before she came into the room?" Chelmey asked.

Phoenix's eyes narrowed suspiciously as Athena shook under his hand, her hands moving to her ears. "You aren't seriously trying to suggest she caused this, are you?" he asked, a dark tone to his voice.

"Please, Inspector," Layton chimed in, looking equally worried, "at least wait to make your conclusions until after your investigation has finished! We aren't going anywhere, after all!"

Chelmey growled, waving his pencil around angrily. "Now look here, this is my crime scene and I'm in charge! Not you," he pointed to Edgeworth, who rolled his eyes, "not you," he pointed to Layton, who crossed his arms, "and most definitely not you!" He gestured to Phoenix, who didn't react at all to the outburst, used to hearing the cry from detectives. "I don't even know what you are!" he added to Phoenix, face red as he worked himself up.

Teeth clenched in anger, Luke stormed forward, hands balled into fists. "He's my Papa!" he cried. "And he's a brilliant investigator, as good as the Professor!"
"Luke," Layton interjected, pulling the teenager back with a hand on his shoulder, "a gentleman never causes a scene."

Phoenix only rested his hands on his hips, returning Chelmey's glare. "Consider me Athena's defence. I'm not letting her be accused of something she didn't do."

Chelmey scoffed. "Ha! And what kind of authority do you have to do that!?"

Phoenix suddenly froze as Chelmey's words registered, his confidence draining away in an instant. Luke gasped, hands to his mouth.

"None, I tell you!" Chelmey continued, not noticing the reaction.

Edgeworth stepped forward, levelling his best glare at the detective as he stepped between him and Phoenix. "He's with me," he sternly said. "That's all the 'authority' he needs."

Before Chelmey could bite back, Layton raised his hands, planting himself between the detective and prosecutor. "Please, gentlemen, we can discuss this calmly and rationally," he said, somehow managing to calm Chelmey down with his plea. "This is being treated as a murder investigation, after all. We must all keep clear heads if we hope to find the true culprit."

A sudden, childish cry echoed through the resulting silence. "Wake up!" Everyone turned towards the body, where the sound had come from, and were shocked to see young Alfendi crouched at the corpse's side, poking Professor Rains in the cheek. "Not nap!" he added, frowning.

"Alfendi!" Layton cried as he and Flora raced across the room, the Professor reaching the baby first and plucking him rapidly off the floor and away from the body. He turned to Flora, eyes wide in worry. "Flora, I thought you were watching him!"

"I thought he was standing by your legs still!" Flora replied, looking equally terrified.

Alfendi pointed accusingly at the body. "Sleeping!" he cried.

"No, she's not sleeping, Alfendi," Layton told the boy, carrying him back to the other side of the room. "I'm afraid Professor Rains is dead."

"De...?" Alfendi repeated in a confused tone, propping himself up on his father's shoulder to look him in the eyes.

Layton winced to himself, wondering how he was supposed to explain death to a child too young to talk. "I'm afraid it's very complicated," he said.

Chelmey huffed, walking past the small family and towards the corpse. "Keep the baby under control, will you Layton?" he cried, waving for Barton to follow him. "C'mon Barton, we have an investigation to get underway!"
The first thing Luke had done once everything calmed down was run to Phoenix as he slowly sat down next to Athena. "Papa, are you okay!?” he quietly cried, eyes shining with concern.

Phoenix forced a smile through the residual shock, patting Luke's shoulder comfortably. "I'm alright," he insisted. "Why don't you help the Professor and Flora watch Alfendi?"

Luke glanced between the Layton family and his father for a few moments, then sighed. "Okay," he reluctantly agreed.

"Good boy," Phoenix said, giving Luke one last pat before the teenager wandered off. He watched his son go for a few moments, approaching the Laytons to admire Alfendi babbling away in Flora's arms, the most talkative the baby had been since they first met him in the airport. In the corner where the body of Professor Rains lay, Chelmey was walking around, staring hard at every inch of the area. Occasionally, he barked something at Barton to write down. Nearby, Edgeworth stood watching them, fiddling around with his tablet computer. Phoenix had no doubt he had already investigated the area thoroughly and would not hesitate to speak up if Chelmey's conclusions differed from his.

Phoenix felt a gentle tap on his arm, and looked around to see Athena still sat at his side, looking up at him with the same worry Luke had been showing only a few moments before. "Mister Wright...?"

Forcing a smile on his face, Phoenix turned in his chair to face the girl. "What is it, Athena?"

Athena didn't reply for a few moments, seemingly arguing with herself internally on what to say. Eventually, she opened her mouth and forced out, "A-are you a prosecutor like Si... Mister Edgeworth?"

Phoenix was surprised. "A prosecutor?" he repeated, smiling a little at the thought. "Ah, no, but I am a lawyer." Too late, he remembered his gut reaction wasn't exactly true anymore and kicked himself for letting it out. 'I guess it's understandable. I've been pretending otherwise since we arrived here.'

"You are?" Athena replied, confused. "What kind?"

'Well, too late to back out and admit I'm not now,' Phoenix decided. "A defence attorney, actually," he explained, allowing himself to happily pretend a little longer. "My job is to stand opposite prosecutors in court and make sure they give the defendants a fair trial."

Athena thought on this a moment, and Phoenix wondered if she was going to come out with the next question he usually heard, the veiled accusation that he got criminals off scot-free. To his surprise, when Athena finally spoke, she instead asked, "So you don't let them send someone to jail if they haven't done anything?"

"Y-yeah," Phoenix answered, surprised and relieved. "I believe my client didn't do it, and I fight in court to find the truth of what happened and send the real guilty party to jail." He chuckled. "I'm pretty lucky to have only had one of my clients found guilty, but he was more or less the actual murderer, so justice won out in the end."

Athena looked impressed, then frowned as a new thought occurred to her. "So, um, if you had a client who was already in prison," she asked, "could you get them out?"

A part of Phoenix suspected she had a specific person in mind, and he immediately empathised with the girl. "Of course I could," he said. "It's never too late to overturn a wrong verdict. In fact, I've done that very thing in the past." Though I'll never understand how the initial trial happened with that fake behind the defence's bench...'

Athena pulled at the necklace hidden under her uniform collar, deep in thought.

Chelmey loudly coughed, walking back to the assembled group on the other side of the room. Once he had everyone's attention, he snatched his notepad back off Barton. "Alright, now we just need to establish when the victim was last seen alive. Does anyone know if she had any classes today?"

After a short pause, Athena stood up, looking determined. "She was talking to my class about biology," she explained, only for her determination to immediately falter. "It, um... was maybe... five minutes before I realised I left my notebook behind?"

"So in that five minute-or-so gap," Edgeworth mused aloud, fingers tapping against his arms, "Professor Rains was either murdered or died in an accident, in which case someone tried to cover her death up."

"I'll make the deductions here!" Chelmey protested, writing in his notepad while sending a glare in Edgeworth's direction.

Edgeworth shrugged, giving the detective a smug grin. "Of course," he replied. "I was only stating the obvious, given Ms Cykes is clearly not able to have moved Rains' body without getting herself covered in blood, and lacked any time to clean herself up."

"The lack of blood," Chelmey shot back, waving his pencil at the prosecutor, "is precisely my earlier point! How do you kill someone and not leave a trace of blood on yourself or the environment!? In fact, how do you open a cupboard and have a body fall out on top of you without it touching you and leaving blood behind!?"

Athena gripped her elbows, arms held tightly against her middle. "I-it didn't fall out immediately," she said. "It... sort of hung there for a second, then started tipping over towards me, so I jumped back."

"Hung?" Chelmey repeated, then made a note in his notepad.

Edgeworth looked back towards the cupboard, then strode over and plucked a plastic-coated hook from a hole in the back wall. It was white, aside from the bloodstains, and had a screw sticking out of the bottom. Regarding the screw for a moment, Edgeworth wasted no time in crouching at the side of the body, sticking his hand down the back of her green coat.

"Hey!" Chelmey cried, running to Edgeworth's side. "No fiddling with the crime scene!"

A moment later, Edgeworth pulled out a wooden rod, slightly curved, with a tiny hole in the centre of the convex edge. Standing up, he pushed the hook's screw into the hole, revealing the completed object to be a coat-hanger. "I believe that solves your mystery, Detective. Ms Cykes is obviously incapable of having literally hung the body in the back of the cupboard," he pointed out, rather smugly.
Chelmey snatched the coat-hanger off Edgeworth with a scowl, then handed it off to Barton.

Athena leaned over to Phoenix with a grin, whispering, "The sound I heard must have been the coat-hanger breaking!"

Phoenix quietly laughed. "Wow, you must have really good hearing to have heard that!" he remarked.

Embarrassed, Athena ran her hands through her ponytail. "Y-yeah, I do," she admitted.

Phoenix was too surprised to respond for a moment. "Wait, really?"

"Should we maybe start asking around?" Luke suggested. "See if anyone else saw her, or anyone in the hallway outside?"

"An excellent idea, Luke," Layton said. "We would need to be quick about it if we wish to catch them before they leave the university."

"I saw someone!" Athena piped up, only to shrink back again when the room's attention focussed on her. "W-well, sort of..."

"That could be just the clue we need," Phoenix pointed out, giving her a friendly smile. "What did they look like?"

Athena thought for a moment, one hand rubbing the opposite arm nervously. "It was a man," she said. "He was wearing black... His hands were really dirty."

"Dirty how?" Edgeworth asked, arms crossed. "What were they covered with?"

"Um, dirt, I think," Athena replied, her hand reaching for her collar again as she thought. "He was very tall. I saw him go into another classroom, on the other side of the hallway."

Chelmey remained silent as he wrote the information down on his notepad. Waving at Barton, he strode towards the classroom door. "We'll see if we can find this witness before he goes too far," he announced, rounding on the assembled group one last time as he opened the door. "And I want to see nothing changed in here when I get back!" After shooing Barton out in front of him, Chelmey slammed the door shut and was gone.

Alfendi's babbling quickly broke the resulting silence, and Luke, Flora and Layton quickly resumed conversation as they kept the baby entertained. Edgeworth strode to the classroom's windows, looking out to an inner courtyard of the old building. He quickly flicked opened the latch at the bottom and opened the window fully, sticking his head out to peer directly down.

Phoenix patted Athena's shoulder as she lowered herself back into her chair. "That was very brave of you to stand up and tell us all that," he complimented her. "You've really helped out in this investigation."

Athena ran her hands through her ponytail, blushing with pride. "Really?" she said. "Am I... good enough to be an investigator when I'm older?"

"Definitely!" Phoenix laughed.

"Wright," came a call from the other side of the room, and Phoenix and Athena looked up to see Edgeworth standing at the open window, gesturing for his friend to join him. "I believe you'll want to see this."
Phoenix shot Athena an apologetic smile as he stood up. "I'll be right back," he promised her, unable to deny he was excited to see whatever Edgeworth had found.

"That's okay," Athena said, smiling back. "I'll be here."
Outside the classroom's windows was a small courtyard, surrounded by the walls of the old university building. The ground was mostly covered in grass, except for the paved pathway straight down the middle that connected the two doors back inside. Around the walls, dotted around in carefully planned patches, were small gardens, populated with beautiful flowers, small bushes and the occasional young tree. As instructed, Phoenix only took in the view for a moment before looking directly down into one such small garden, and smiled as he saw what his friend had spotted. Hidden behind a bush were two overturned pots, one large and round while the other was small and rectangular, piles of loose dirt surrounding them on top of the lovingly spread pebbles that carpeted the garden. Sticking out of the loose dirt were a handful of plants of varying sizes, roots sticking up into the air while their green leaves struggled to catch light from the dark corner of the courtyard. The largest of the plant remains mildly reminded Phoenix, to his discomfort, of Charley back home.

"Wow," Phoenix muttered, leaning back into the classroom to give Edgeworth a grin. "Guess we found our possible murder weapon-slash-place of death?"

"Possibly," Edgeworth agreed, smiling smugly. "They're a bit far away to tell for sure, but I'd say one of those pots had blood on it."

Phoenix snorted, throwing another glance at the garden below. "I'd say there's something red on both of them, and it can't be anything other than blood," he said, then threw his friend a teasing smirk. "What, is your eyesight failing in your old age, Edgeworth?"

Edgeworth shot Phoenix a glare. "We are the same age, Wright," he pointed out.

Chuckling a little, Phoenix turned to where the Layton family was gathered. "Hey, Professor?" he called, attracting Layton and Luke's attention while Flora busied herself keeping Alfendi occupied. "You wouldn't happen to know if Rains had a couple of potted plants in here, do you?"

"Pot plants?" Layton repeated, not noticing Phoenix suddenly bite back a smirk at the expression. He scratched his chin in thought. "She always had a few around, yes. I did think it rather odd that I couldn't see any when we first came in."

Luke nodded, a finger pointed into the air knowingly. "She always kept them under the windows, so they'd get the morning sun!" he explained. "She was always talking about them! Loved them like they were her children, Dad said!"

Athena perked up from her seat by the door. "Yeah, she had some when my class were in here earlier!" She pointed towards Phoenix and Edgeworth. "Right under that window!"

Phoenix and Edgeworth shared a glance. "Can you remember what they looked like?" Phoenix asked the girl.

"Yeah!" Athena cried with a grin. "One was big, and the other was a little boxy one... Um, they were both black, and the big one had one big plant in it, and the small one had three little plants!"

"I'd say that's them, then," Phoenix decided, turning to Edgeworth as he gestured to the window.

"Indeed," Edgeworth agreed, smiling as he crossed his arms. "Of course, we'll have to inform the detective when he returns, so a proper forensic examination can occur."

Layton smiled. "Ah, the culprit tossed them into the courtyard, did they?" he realised. "Yes, those pots were small enough to do that."

Alfendi began to fuss, clinging to Flora's dress.

"Aw, what is it, 'Fendi?" Flora asked the baby, bouncing him in her arms. "Are you tired?"

"No!" Alfendi firmly replied, rubbing his face sleepily into her shoulder.

Flora and Layton shared a knowing look. "I'm sure Inspector Chelmey won't complain if you leave to put him down for a nap," Layton assured her. "It has been a very exciting morning."

"I'll see you later, Flora!" Luke said with a wave.

"Bye, Luke!" Flora replied, holding the whining Alfendi close as she carefully carried him out of the room. "I'll see you later, Mister Wright! Mister Edgeworth!"

The two men nodded in response, and, as the door closed behind Flora, Edgeworth frowned in concern. "The detective is taking a long time to return," he mused. "Perhaps we should go and find him?"

"This witness must be difficult to locate," Layton pointed out, a hand tugging on his hat. "They have had plenty of time to move about. They may have even gone home."

The room was silent for a few moments as everyone mused to themselves. Phoenix looked over to Athena. "Actually, when were you supposed to be leaving the university, Athena?"

Athena thought for a moment. "Before lunch, I think," she said, legs swinging under her chair. "We were just going to have a bunch of the professors talk to us about things we might want to do when we grow up."

"That could mean any time between now and one o'clock," Layton quietly pointed out. "Perhaps we should also relocate Missus Hawkins to confirm how long you can stay here."

"I could do that," Luke offered. "I remember where she said she'd be."

Phoenix shook his head, one hand resting on his hip. "Better not," he said. "If too many people disappear from this room, we could really upset the detective."

Athena suddenly turned her head towards the door. "I think he's coming back now," she said.

As if on cue, the door swung open and Chelmey stomped in. "Alright, the forensics have arrived, so you lot need to move." He gestured behind him with a thumb. "You can sit in on our interview with the other witness."

"How very kind of you, Inspector!" Layton remarked with a smile.

"Yeah, yeah," Chelmey waved him off, leaving the room.
The room directly opposite Rains’ was dark, the windows covered by blinds and the artificial bulbs above the only source of light. The walls were covered in anatomy posters of frogs and salamanders, with the cupboards along the back wall all very visibly locked tightly shut with warning signs taped to their fronts. Scribbling away on something at the teacher’s desk was a tall man in a black suit, pointedly ignoring the newcomers to his classroom as his forehead shone with sweat.

Layton tipped his hat as the rest of the small group filed in behind him. "Good morning, Professor Keil," he greeted the man at the desk. "I understand you met with Professor Rains earlier today?"

The man at the desk, Keil, jumped in surprise as he looked up. "Er," he mumbled, "y-yes, I suppose I did, yes. How’d you know, Professor Layton?"

Phoenix guided Athena to a desk about halfway down the classroom, where she happily sat with her school book. Luke sat in the desk next to hers, shooting Phoenix a grin as he silently declared to help watch over the girl. Edgeworth stayed near the front of the room with Layton and Chelmey, Constable Barton standing to one side with notepad in hand.

"I hope this all wraps up today," Phoenix muttered to Luke. "Don't want to make your siblings worry if I don't call them this afternoon."

"I'm sure they'll be fine, Papa," Luke assured him in a whisper. "Sure, Apollo might worry, but they'll understand when we tell them we were too busy to call today." Noticing Athena watching them, he gave her a smile. "Oh, I don't believe we've been properly introduced!" He held out a hand to the surprised girl. "My name's Luke! You're Athena, right?"

Athena shyly nodded, shaking Luke's hand. "Hi." She studied his face carefully, as though recognising him from somewhere, but didn't say anything about it.

"Not Athena Wright, Athena Cykes," Phoenix joked, ruffling Luke's hair. "Geeze, stop attaching our name to everything!"

"You can talk, Papa!" Luke retorted with a giggle.

At the other side of the room, Layton was filling Edgeworth in on Chelmey's new witness. "This is Professor Keil. He teaches biology and zoology here." He turned to Keil. "Amphibians are your speciality, I believe?"

Keil nodded. "I'm a batrachologist," he answered, rather proudly. "Used t'work in a lab, y'know."

"I see," Edgeworth replied, arms crossed.

Turning to Chelmey, Keil insistently continued, "An' I've already told you all I know! She wasn't there when I dropped by! I didn't even know she was dead until you told me!"
Athena looked up from her desk in surprise.

"And may I ask why you were going to see her?" Chelmey pushed, hands clenched together behind his back.

Keil shrugged. "I was goin' t' congratulate her on her project gettin' funded," he said.

Athena bolted upright from her chair. "No, you weren't!" she objected.

Everyone turned to look at Athena with surprise. "And who are you t'say I wasn't, little girl?" Keil shot back with a glare, also standing from his chair.

Athena seemed to lose her nerve at the retort, pausing and looking up at Phoenix uncertainly. Seeing his reassuring smile, she turned back to Keil with a determined frown. "I have really good hearing, better than most everyone else in the world," she explained. "I can hear what you're really saying, what your heart is saying, and your heart is saying you hated Professor Rains! You couldn't have been going to thank her!"

Edgeworth and Layton looked intrigued at this statement, although Chelmey looked sceptical. Keil simply rolled his eyes. "Right, because that wasn't a total load of gibberish," he scoffed.

Athena looked down, disheartened. Beside her, although still curious about her outburst, Phoenix and Luke both sent Keil a stern glare.

"I think what the girl says has merit," Layton argued, turning to his colleague. "After all, your rivalry with Professor Rains was widely known. Your own project was turned down in favour of hers, was it not?"

Keil went pale.

"Oh really?" Chelmey butted in with a smug grin, gesturing to Barton to have the information noted down. "Not quite the 'good friends' angle you were giving us earlier then, Mister Keil?"

Avoiding eye contact, Keil ran a nervous hand through his hair. "W-well, it's not right t' speak ill of the dead, y'know..."

"Maybe you'd like to tell us again what happened after the school kids left," Chelmey offered with false kindness only to drop the act as he continued. "The real story this time, or I will have you nicked for obstructing justice!"

Keil gulped, fiddling with his tie. "O-of course, Inspector," he agreed.

"I wanted t'ave a chat with Rains," Keil admitted, sinking back into his chair, "about why her project got funded and mine didn't, but when she came in, she was constantly busy, and I couldn't pin her down t' talk." He thought a moment, then sighed. "After the din from that school group had passed, I waited a few minutes before I went t' confront her. She... she wasn't in her room, so I came back here."

"Are you sure about that?" Edgeworth asked, fingers tapping on his arm.

"Hey!" Chelmey butted in, shaking a fist at the prosecutor, "my witness! I ask the questions!" He looked at Keil for a moment before grudgingly nodding in Edgeworth's direction. "What he said."

Keil nodded. "Of course I'm sure. The room was dark, and she was gone."

Layton tugged on his hat brim. "You didn't, say, look around the back of the room, where her cupboards are?" he suggested.

"Of course not!" Keil insisted, looking upset. "I don't go diggin' around in people's cupboards when they're not there!"

As the group argued, Luke snuck a sidelong glance at Athena, who was concentrating on the conversation, then carefully leaned across and tapped her arm. She looked over to him curiously, and Luke noticed the movement had also attracted Phoenix's attention. "Athena, if you can hear what people are really thinking," he said, "is there anything else you've picked up from listening to Professor Keil?"

Athena thought for a moment. "He doesn't like kids," she whispered. "He sounds really upset about his project too. Most of all, though... he sounds really scared. Especially when he talks about Professor Rains."

Phoenix rubbed his chin in thought. "So when you say you can hear someone's 'heart'," he mused aloud, "what you mean is you can hear their true emotions?"

After a moment or two of reflection, Athena nodded. "I... guess so," she said. "Yeah, that sounds right, actually."

A part of Phoenix wondered how many of his own white lies she'd noticed since they met.

"Do you think he did it, Papa?" Luke asked, looking worried. "That Professor Keil is scared because he knows he'll be found out?"

Phoenix didn't reply, staring hard at the group around Keil's desk. They were still arguing, and it didn't look like Edgeworth, Layton or Chelmey had managed to weasel any more information out of Keil, who was still insisting he never saw Rains and also that he didn't see anyone in the hallway.
"Go question him, Papa," Luke said, a knowing smile on his face.

Phoenix shot Luke a horrified look and shook his head. "N-no, there's too many people questioning him already. I'll just get in the way." The last thing this investigation needs is a has-been lawyer butting his head in...

"When are you next going to get a chance to do this?" Luke pointed out. "Surely you have some secret technique you used in court to get people to give you more information!"

Athena looked between the two, confused, but kept silent.

Phoenix thought on Luke's words for a few moments before slowly smiling. "Well, there is one thing I was very well-known for," he said, giving his relieved son a grin before ruffling his hair through his hat. "I'll be right back." With that, he left the pair and headed towards the group at the front of the room, hands in his pockets.

"This murderer didn't teleport into her room!" Chelmey was angrily pointing out, fist waving in the air. "You must have seen someone coming or going! You yourself said you were watching the hallway the entire time!"

Phoenix cleared his throat, slotting himself into an open space in the rough semicircle of people in front of the desk. "Excuse me, Professor Keil, may I ask a question?"

Everyone looked over at the man in the blue suit, baffled. "I... suppose so?" Keil agreed.

"Do you mind!?" Chelmey cried. "This is a murder investigation here!"

"You know anything about plants?" Phoenix casually asked the zoologist, ignoring Chelmey. "It's just, I noticed Professor Rains had a few in her classroom! Beautiful little things! Do you know what kind they were?"

Keil wrinkled his nose in disgust. "Plants!? I'm a batrachologist! I don't know anythin' about some ruddy plants!" he protested. "Besides, there aren't any in Rains' room right now, so what kind o' weed have you been smokin'!?"

Edgeworth narrowed his eyes at Phoenix. "Wright..." he muttered in a warning tone.

Phoenix scratched his chin in false confusion. "Oh? Wasn't Professor Rains a botanist, that is, she specialised in plants? Why would she not have plants in her classroom?"

Layton smiled, picking up on Phoenix's game. "A good point," he said, turning to Keil. "It's widely known around the university that Professor Rains loved her pet plants, and her classroom has never been without one. Yet, you already seem to know her plants are conspicuously missing, so not only have you been in the room since the school children left but the plants were gone already when you dropped by." He crossed his arms. "Why, then, did you not find this fact odd enough to mention before?"

Keil was sweating buckets, nervously wiping his brow. "W-what do I care about her ruddy plants?" he cried, but his attempted tone of anger fell into more childish whining.

"This is the first I've heard of them," Chelmey pointed out to his fellow questioners with an annoyed tone, waving at Barton to ensure he was writing the information down. "Do we know anything else about them right now?"

Edgeworth sighed, ignoring Chelmey's comment. "I hate to play devil's advocate, Wright," he told his friend, "but that little stunt of yours hasn't proven anything. He was not fond of Rains or her plants, so he had no reason to bring them up should he be telling the truth about not seeing her."

Phoenix scoffed, rolling his eyes. "Objection! He knows he's the most likely suspect right now! Why would he hide a clue that could catch the real culprit if it wasn't him?"

"Objection!" Edgeworth shot back. "The fact he did not get on with Rains is enough of a reason that he might have genuinely forgotten about her missing plants!"

"Objection! What kind of ill-thought out excuse is that!?" Phoenix cried.

"It's better than your ill-thought out excuses, Wright!" Edgeworth replied.

"Gentlemen!" Layton firmly announced, stepping between the two with his hands held up to quieten them. "May I remind you we are not in a courtroom!"

As the two men sheepishly backed down, Chelmey rolled his eyes, muttering, "Should've known, they're both lawyers..." Turning back to the very confused Keil sat behind his desk, the detective continued, "So what is the story behind these pots, then? Why didn't you mention 'em before?"

Keil thought for a long moment, then determinedly shoved his hands under his armpits. "I-I have a right to remain silent!" he announced, more like he was reminding himself than using it as a defence. "I don't have t' say anythin!'"

His four questioners sighed in frustration, individually pondering the best next step to take. Eventually, Phoenix ran a hand through his spiky hair, frowning in thought. 'Surely there has to be a way to convince him to talk!' He thought back over his past week in London, and all the meetings and research trips he and Edgeworth had taken together in their efforts to learn the intricacies of the English law system, desperate for some kind of clue as to how to proceed. 'Wait a minute... Athena said he sounded scared when he mentioned Rains?' Luke's question ringing in his mind, Phoenix chose his avenue of questioning. "Professor Keil," he said, "I don't doubt you wanted to talk to Rains about her project getting funded over yours." Keil looked away, glaring at a wall, but Phoenix wasn't disheartened. "My only question now is, was her death an accident?" There was a short pause. Keil continued to not respond, while the rest of the group watched Phoenix, curious to hear what he had to say. "I don't think you understand, but right now you're facing murder charges, and there's more than enough evidence to convict you. You may not have the death penalty here in England, but murder will still get you a lifetime of jail. If you didn't mean to kill her, and admit it was an accident, that's a manslaughter charge. Manslaughter will still get you jail time, but ultimately you'll get the chance to live your own life again afterwards." He thought a moment, then added, "Of course, that's if the courts agree with you on what happened."

Edgeworth smiled. "I'm impressed, Wright, You have been paying attention."

Phoenix shot his friend a smirk, turning back to Keil. "If you tell the truth now, and co-operate with the police, you're much more likely to get a shorter conviction. I may not be your attorney, but I think I can trust you'll make the right choice here."

Keil sat in silence for a minute or two, then finally sighed, hands dropping to his lap as he leaned forward in his chair. "Alright," he admitted, "I... I did talk to her."

Chelmey raised an eyebrow, impressed that someone had finally got Keil talking.
"I went across the hallway the moment I heard those kids were gone," Keil continued, staring at his lap. "I just wanted t' talk to her, I-I didn't mean..."

"Take your time, Severin," Layton gently assured Keil, a soft smile on his face.

Keil nodded, taking a deep breath. "I... lost my temper, we got into an argument, and..." He frowned. "I saw those ruddy pot plants of hers under the window. They were the basis of her research project, y'know. I... decided I was gonna throw 'em out into the courtyard, get rid of 'em so she had nothin' t' research, but she tried t' stop me." He sighed, eyes squinting shut. "One moment, we were fightin' over that pot plant, the next, the plant was out th'window and Rains... Rosa... was face down in th'other one, blood all over..." He paused, taking another deep breath. "I panicked. She had her coat hangin' in the cupboard, so I put it on her and shoved her in there until I could work out what to do... and that pot plant had blood all over it, so I dropped it out th'window like th'other one." One hand rubbed at his eyes, and he started to sniff loudly. "I-I didn't mean... I didn't mean to kill her..."

The room was silent for a few moments as Keil resisted tears. Finally, Barton looked up at his superior. "Does this mean our investigation is over, sir?"

Chelmey sighed, reaching into his coat for a pair of handcuffs. "I suppose so," he agreed, then pointed the constable to the door. "Go tell the team about those pot plants in the courtyard, will you?"

Barton nodded, pocketing the notepad and pencil as he dashed out of the room.

"Protocol says I have to handcuff you while I take you down to the station," Chelmey explained, rounding the desk to approach Keil. "Just co-operate and this will be over with quickly."

"You did the right thing confessing, Severin," Layton assured the other man.

Keil nodded, mutely standing to offer up his hands to Chelmey to be cuffed. He gave his colleague a sad smile. "Thank you, Hershel. You'll tell the dean I didn't mean to rob him of any employees, won't you?"

"Of course," Layton agreed, a hand on his hat.

Edgeworth smiled in thought as Chelmey escorted Keil out into the hallway. "When will criminals learn the truth always comes out eventually?" he said to himself.

Phoenix looked back to where Luke and Athena were sitting, both looking sad from the bittersweet conclusion to the case. Unable to resist an amused smile, Phoenix approached the pair, hands in his pockets. "So, have fun?"

Athena's hands slowly lowered from around her mouth, eyes shining with unshed tears. "No wonder he sounded so sad!" she whispered.

Luke reached over to pat her shoulder comfortingly. "It's alright, Athena," he assured her. "Everything turned out okay in the end!"

Phoenix chuckled, gesturing for the two to get up. "C'mon," he said, "it's time we got out of here."

As the group emerged into the hallway, still dotted with busy policemen and women, a voice cried out, "Athena!"

Athena looked up in surprise. "Missus Hawkins!?" she dashed forward, almost running into a middle-aged woman with short brown hair, who, although careful not to unnecessarily touch the girl, was undoubtedly beyond relieved to have found her.

"Are the nice police done with you yet, Athena?" Hawkins asked, visually checking over the smiling girl as though counting every part of her body to ensure it was there. "It's time for us to leave! I'm sorry you had to miss out on all the lectures."

Athena nodded, hugging her lost notebook to her chest. "It's alright, Missus Hawkins," she replied. "I discovered what I want to do when I grow up anyway!"

Hawkins looked surprised. "You did?"

Nodding enthusiastically, Athena turned to look back at where Phoenix, Edgeworth, Layton and Luke were, only to see the quartet slowly heading away down the corridor. "Oh, wait a sec!" the girl told her teacher, then raced after her new friends. "Mister Wright!"

Phoenix stopped, looking behind him as Edgeworth, Layton and Luke also came to a halt just in front of him. "Athena?" he asked curiously, kneeling down to the girl's level as she ran up to him. "What is it?"

"I wanted to tell you!" she excitedly said, breathing hard more from excitement than from the short sprint. "I decided what I want to be when I grow up! I'm gonna be a defence lawyer like you!"

Phoenix blinked, surprised. "A defence attorney?" he repeated.

Athena nodded, then began to play shyly with her ponytail with one hand. "I... used to live in California," she admitted, "and I have this friend back home who got put in jail for something he didn't do." She looked back up into Phoenix's face with a determined stare. "But I'm gonna save him. I'm going to become a defence attorney like you and get him out of jail!"

Phoenix couldn't resist a smile at the familiar-sounding plea. "I could name a couple of lawyers who became defence attorneys to save someone close to them," he said.

Behind him, unseen by Phoenix, Edgeworth rolled his eyes.

"But don't think it will be easy," the ex-lawyer warned Athena. "Getting into law is a lot of hard work. You've got to be prepared for that."

Athena nodded. "I will, I promise!" she assured him. "And, when I do become a lawyer..." She paused, smiling sheepishly. "Do you think I could maybe come work for you?"
Edgeworth just barely held in a snort of amusement. Luke bit his lip to keep his growing smile from showing.

Phoenix took a moment to process the unexpected request, then smiled. "Well, I don't see why not," he decided, reaching into an inner pocket of his suit jacket for one of his old business cards he was still getting rid of, although he'd stopped apologising for their out-of-date business name as part of the ploy that he hadn't been disbarred. "When you pass the bar in... hmm, I'd say about ten years or so," he held out the card to the girl, "give me a call. I'll always be available to help."

Athena grinned, reading the old 'Wright & Co.'-emblazoned card with glee. "Thank you, Mister Wright!" she cried.

"And when you're looking for a law degree to take," Professor Layton suddenly spoke up, one hand pointing into the air and a smile on his face, "may I recommend one of the courses we offer here at Gressenheller? Our law department is always delighted to see an eager student such as yourself."

Athena giggled, giving the Professor a grateful nod. "I will, sir!" she said.

Hawkins, having approached the group, laughed as she heard the tail-end of the conversation. "Athena, it's time to go," she reminded the girl.

"Coming!" Athena called, running to join her teacher and giving one last wave to her new friends. "Thank you again, Mister Wright!"

Phoenix waved back, laughing as Hawkins took the girl's hand and led her around the far corner into another hallway. "It's nice to have a dream, huh?"

Luke giggled. "She'd get along great with Apollo, wouldn't she?" he joked. "They were both inspired by you!"

Phoenix scoffed in brief embarrassment, but then smiled proudly, turning to his son. "And who wouldn't be?" he replied. "I'm amazing!"

Luke laughed, but Edgeworth rolled his eyes. "In your dreams, Wright," he replied, shaking his head and starting the group walking back down the hallway towards Layton's office. "You always have relied too heavily on your capacity to bluff. I'd say your luck would run out one day, but I'm inclined to think it already has."

Phoenix winced. "Don't need to rub it in," he muttered, one hand rubbing at his lapel where his badge used to sit.

"In my opinion," Layton interrupted with a smile, "it's very charming that Mister Wright is still able to work some good in the world despite the sudden career change." He crossed his arms, turning to Phoenix. "Should young Athena decide to study here, I will be happy to keep half an eye on her progress for you."

Although surprised at the offer, Phoenix nodded gratefully. "That'd be great, thank you, Professor."

"It's not a problem," Layton replied, chuckling to himself. "I am only returning a favour."

"In any case," Layton continued, "we had best return to Flora. I'm sure she is eagerly waiting to hear what happened after she left."
"Hey, Dad!"

"Good morning to you, Apollo! How was your day yesterday?"

"Eh, nothing really exciting. Trucy was teaching Pearly how to knit. I practised some magic in the side room. Maya was really busy, so we didn't see her much. What about you?"

"A very busy morning. Uncle Edgeworth and I stumbled on something after the meeting we had planned today with a professor of law here."

"Wow, really? Stumbled on what?"

"... It's a long story. I'll have to explain it when we get back."

"What? Aw, come on, Dad!"

"Haha! Sorry, it would just take too long to tell the whole story now. You can always ask Luke if you're desperate. I know the two of you have been texting each other."

"Yeah, but Luke doesn't text me until the middle of the day!"

"That's only in a few hours, it's not exactly a long time."

"It's shorter than waiting for you to get back."

"Haha! Well, that is true, but I really think this story is better heard in person. Is Trucy around?"

"Yeah, I'll go get her. Love you, Dad."

"Love you, Apollo."

June 15, 7:19PM

Grace Hill Hotel

The two Wrights were sat happily on the beds in their hotel room, full from dinner and happy to relax as they watched the news on the television. Luke lay flat on his belly, head propped up on his hands, while Phoenix propped himself up against the wall, pillow pushed up as a cushion while one leg dangled off the side of the bed in front of him. Nearby, Edgeworth sat on the chair at the desk, reading something on his tablet computer.

Edgeworth looked up at his travel companions. "Wright, about that Cykes girl we met today..."

Phoenix blinked, turning to his friend with a confused look. "What about her?"

Luke also looked up curiously. "Do you know who her friend was she's trying to save?"

"I... believe so," Edgeworth admitted, glancing at the tablet in his hand. "Let's just say, I think it would be wise to keep in touch with her. She could be of great help in future."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "'Keep' in touch? She can contact me, but I can't contact her," he pointed out, then smirked. "Besides, isn't it a bit creepy for a twenty-eight-year-old man like me to befriend a twelve-year-old girl?"

Luke propped himself up on his elbows, looking behind him at his father. "But she's older than Trucy. Doesn't that make it different?"

Phoenix shook his head. "I'm literally a stranger she met this morning," he explained. "It's very different to my relationship with you three."

"But..." Luke protested, then thought better of it and quietened, still looking confused.

"And the fact that I have three kids doesn't effect it either," Phoenix added, smiling fondly as he recognised Luke's concern. "Criminals are perfectly capable of having kids of their own."

"Whether it's 'creepy' or not," Edgeworth continued, "the case Ms Cykes was involved with is an important one. If she holds true to her promise and returns to California with a badge, it would be ideal were she to work closely with you." He placed the tablet on the desk. "Of course, how a lawyer can take up a job at a talent agency, I don't know."

Phoenix shrugged. "By then, Apollo will have his badge too," he pointed out. "If I can't get her a job working with me, we might be able to pull some strings to have her work with Apollo, depending on where he ends up getting a job. Like Luke said, those two would probably get on like a house on fire."

Luke frowned. "Without all the property damage and trauma, hopefully..."

Edgeworth thought a moment, then nodded. "That could indeed work," he agreed, ignoring Luke's comment as he turned back to his computer. "In any case, we can't make any concrete plans until she acquires said badge. We have no choice but to wait until then."

"I'm sorry, Professor," Luke cried, tears pouring down his cheeks, "but I'm not a gentleman yet!" Blubbery loudly, the thirteen-year-old threw himself at his beloved mentor, rubbing his face into his jacket.

Layton stood surprised for a moment, then smiled, gently returning the hug. "There there," he whispered to his young apprentice. He reached up with one hand to adjust his hat, trying to hide the tears threatening in his own eyes. It had been a rough couple of weeks for all of them, and he would be the first to admit it.

"Oh, Luke!" came a cry from nearby, and Layton looked up to see Brenda charging towards them, eyes filled with concern for her son as she dropped a medium-sized suitcase by Luke's. "Are you alright, baby!?"

Luke reluctantly pulled away from the Professor, rubbing at his eyes as he attempted to stop his blubbering, and was quickly ambushed by a hug from his mother, which he gladly returned, slowly getting himself back under control. "I-I'm alright, M-Mum," he tried to insist through his tears, mumbling into his mother's shirt.

Brenda frowned in concern, hugging Luke tighter. She gave Layton a questioning look, but the man only pulled his hat down over his eyes, unsure what he could even say in return.

"Well, that's everything set for the hold," Clark announced as he approached, also placing a medium-sized suitcase down by Luke's and Brenda's. "Now all that's left is- oh, is Luke alright?" He walked over to his wife, watching his son with concern as Brenda only shrugged in response. "Luke?"

Luke rather childishly turned his head firmly away from his father.

Clark sighed, disappointed but unsurprised by his son's reaction. Instead, he then turned to Layton. "Well, we're all about ready to board. I guess this is goodbye, Hershel."

Layton smiled sadly. "Only a 'so long'," he insisted, "until we meet again."

"Ah, yes, of course," Clark replied, forcing a laugh through the sad tone in his own voice. He held out his hand, and Layton in return grabbed it to firmly shake. "Until we meet again, old friend. May it be sooner rather than later." Layton nodded in silent agreement, then Clark turned and, after shooting Luke a worried glance, moved to pick up both his and Brenda's suitcases, one in each hand. "I'll go ahead and get these situated in our cabin," he quietly told Brenda. She nodded her understanding, and Clark left.

Luke had managed to calm down, but still clung to his mother, desperate for comfort. "I don't want to go," he mumbled into her shirt.
"I know," Brenda replied, sadly petting Luke's hair where it stuck out on the back of his head. "You'll love America once we settle in, I promise."

"Your mother's right, you know," Layton chimed in, not wanting to see his young friend leave in tears. "You can write to Flora and myself once you arrive."

Brenda suddenly gasped. "Oh, that's right, we never gave you our new address!" She pulled away from Luke towards where she had left her suitcase, only to remember too late that Clark had already taken it away. After a frustrated pause, she muttered, "Oh, well, let's see if I can remember it..." She tapped her chin for a few moments, slowly turning back to face Luke and Layton. "United States of America, obviously, and the state we're moving to is California, so you have to put a big 'CA' in there somewhere... Postcode is some ridiculously long string of numbers, but I've not the slightest idea what any of them are. I... think we're going to be in Los Angeles itself? We might be just outside it." She sighed, giving Layton a defeated look. "I'm not being much help, am I?"

Layton looked intrigued at the mention of Los Angeles, but gave his friend a smile when she couldn't produce a precise location. "That's alright. You can send me your new address once you get there."

"Oh!" Luke cried, suddenly perking up again. "I can mail it to you once we arrive in America!"

"A splendid idea," Layton replied. "I shall look forward to it."

Brenda giggled, a hand to her mouth. "That would work!" she agreed, then patted Luke on the head. "And, if I find any cute souvenirs you might like, I can send them to you then!"

"Souvenirs?" Layton repeated, feeling a twinge of dread.

Luke playfully scoffed at his mother. "Mum's planning to find every tourist shop she can between here and our new home. Packed an extra suitcase just for souvenirs."

"And knick-knacks!" Brenda added insistently, winking as she poked Luke with a finger. "I'm hoping to have a sub-collection of American paraphernalia to set up once we get there!"

The massive steam-powered horn of the mighty ship nearby blew two loud notes, billowing steam from its massive smoke-stacks. The three stood below looked up at it for a moment before returning their gazes to each other with a sad look.

"I guess it's time we joined Clark," Brenda said, patting Luke on the head before holding her hand out to Layton. "Until we meet again, Hershel?"

"Until we meet again," Layton agreed, shaking the offered hand as he forced a small smile. "I wish you luck on your move, Brenda."

Luke didn't reply immediately, frowning in thought for a moment before slowly stepping forward. "U-until we meet again, Professor," he said, staring at his friend's shoes rather than his face.

After a short pause, Luke looked up into Layton's face with a smile. "I'll write soon," he promised, then took a step backwards. "So long."

"So long," Layton replied.

Luke forcefully turned himself around, running to his massive suitcase and only just managing to hold it off the ground. Brenda quickly ran to his side to help, and the two headed off towards the nearest ramp onto the ship.

Before disappearing into the crowd, Brenda looked back at Layton to wave. "See you again, Hershel!" she called, then the pair were gone.

As they handed Luke's suitcase off to a friendly crew-member, Luke paused, looking back out at the docks over the ship's railing. Brenda, noticing his distraction, gave the crew-member their cabin number before resting a hand on her son's shoulder. As Luke looked up at her in surprise, pulled out of his thoughts, she gave him a knowing smile. "Do you want to stay up here for a bit?"

Luke thought for a moment, then silently nodded.

"Our cabin's ten-oh-five," Brenda told him. "Just ask a crew-member if you can't find it."

Brenda kissed her son on the forehead, her hand automatically moving to keep her hair out of the way as she leaned forward. "I'll see you in a bit, honey." With that, she left.

Luke slowly walked over to the railing, resting his hands on the smooth iron, warm from the sun's rays beating down overhead. The ship below his feet was unmoving, held still in giant underwater clamps as its larger cargo was transported onboard. Laid out before him was the expanse of the docks, warehouses and smaller boats laid out in a grid around the canals of water. There were people everywhere he looked, although nowhere was busier than the concrete dock directly below him.

'I wonder if the Professor's still there?'

Luke felt a wave of guilt wash over him for bursting into tears earlier. Yes, he was leaving his whole life behind, but the Professor needed friends after what had happened the previous week, and losing Luke and both his parents was undoubtedly going to be hard on him, too. 'He must feel absolutely awful! And I didn't help at all!' He ran his eyes frantically around the crowds below, looking for the distinctive top hat he had never - 'Well, ALMOST never,' - seen Layton without.

That night the previous week, at the end of their adventure in Future London, Luke remembered watching in surprised silence as his mentor removed his hat, staring up into the clouded sky as the pollution from Clive's giant mechanical beast generated a summer snowfall that had lasted only a little way into the night before melting away again. He wondered if, after all of Layton's insistence that he never removed his hat, it would be happening a lot more often now. He hadn't seen the hat apart from its owner since that dark night that Claire had disappeared, but what happened to it when the Professor was alone, he couldn't say.

Unable to find Layton in the crowd, Luke instead turned his eyes to the Laytonmobile, parked on the edge of the dock facing out to sea. Luke had insisted on spending every moment he could with Layton and Flora the past few days, so it had been the Professor who took him to the docks that morning. 'I couldn't stay at home... not with Dad organising the move.' He frowned at the thought of his father, still angry at the whole idea of moving so far away, but was distracted as he finally spotted a top hat heading through the crowd towards the red car parked there. "Professor!" he called, waving, but the man was simply too far away to hear him over the bustling crowds, standing next to the Laytonmobile as he looked up at the ship before him. Luke sighed, giving up on trying to catch his attention just yet.

When the ship finally pulled away from the dock and headed out to sea, Luke firmly stayed out on deck, waving madly, until Dover was out of sight.

"Don't wander off, Alfendi!" Flora warned, lowering her baby brother to the tiled floor as she rested her arms.

Luke crouched down by the toddler, holding out his hand to shake. "I don't think we'll be seeing each other again for a while," he said with a smile. "Goodbye until then?"

Alfendi looked up at Luke for a few moments, then firmly gripped one of Luke's fingers, gently attempting to wave it up and down. Luke giggled as he repeated the action himself, watching the boy then let go and give the teenager a serious look. "Bye bye," Alfendi said.

Luke nodded. "Bye bye," he repeated, then stood up and turned to Flora. "Until we see each other again?"

Flora smiled sadly and nodded. "I hope it's soon," she said, hands held tightly together in front of her chest. "I really missed you when you were gone."

"Me too," Luke replied, then, after a pause, pulled Flora into a hug. "I'll write to you again soon, okay?"

Although surprised at the unusual body contact, Flora smiled and returned the hug. "Okay. I promise I'll reply, too."

Luke giggled, letting her go and watching as the young woman quickly busied herself chasing after Alfendi as he attempted to disappear into the crowds around them. He looked over to where Alfendi's pram sat, next to the Professor. Layton was saying his own goodbyes to Phoenix and Edgeworth, shaking hands and exchanging pleasantries about how nice it had been to have them in the country and that they hoped to be meeting one another again soon.

"Maybe next time you should come to us!" Phoenix suggested with a smile. "I think that's the only way Maya will get to see you again, and she was really annoyed she had to miss this!"

Layton chuckled, arms crossed. "And I shall be delighted to see Miss Fey again. You and your family would be able to give us the grand tour, I presume?"

Luke paused a moment, then smiled, approaching the small group. "It's 'Luke Wright', Papa! You're saying my name wrong!"

Phoenix laughed. "Ah, yes, I have a problem with that!" The moment Luke came within range, he immediately ruffled his son's hair through his everpresent blue cap. "You finished your goodbyes to Flora and Alfendi?" he asked, more seriously.

Luke nodded. "Flora's making sure Alfendi doesn't get lost," he explained, gesturing behind him to where he'd last seen the pair.

Edgeworth nodded, looking at his watch. "I think it's time we checked in," he said, then turned to Luke. "Wright and I can save a spot in the line for you until you've said your goodbyes." With one final nod in Layton's direction, the prosecutor had turned and was walking off, pulling his travel bag behind him.

Phoenix sighed. "Until next time, Professor," he said.

"Until next time," Layton agreed, tipping his hat.

Patting his son's shoulder, Phoenix pulled his beanie out of the pocket of his hoodie, which he had donned to replace his suit before they left the hotel that afternoon. "You catch up to us when you're done. Don't take too long, though."

Pulling his beanie over his spiky hair, Phoenix gave the pair a smile, then turned and followed Edgeworth, his black backpack hefted on his shoulders.

Luke and Layton turned to face each other, sad smiles on their faces. "I guess this is another goodbye," Luke said.

"Indeed," Layton agreed, then held out a hand. "Until next time?"

"U-until next time," Luke agreed, shaking the offered hand then, after a pause of thought, jumping forward to hug the Professor. After a moment, he felt Layton return the hug, and the pair stood silently for several moments before Luke pulled away, eyes glistening with unshed tears. "I'll write soon," he promised, grabbing his travel bag off the floor nearby.

"I look forward to it," Layton replied, and Luke was sure he could see tears threatening the older man's calm demeanour.

They stood in silence for a few more seconds, then Luke turned and went to find his father in the queue for the check-in.

It only occurred to Luke after he left that he was no longer able to hide his face in the Professor's shoulder when they hugged anymore.

If you're awake, Papa and I just landed back in LA.

Hey congrats. Trucy and Pearly have gone to sleep, but me and Maya are still up. We'll see you tmrw? Have a safe trip back home.

We will. See you tomorrow.

Also it's 'Maya and I'.

Got it xD You got your story of that adventure you had prepared? Trucy's gonna demand it the moment we see you.
Yes, I've been writing notes to practise telling it for her. Actually I'm really struggling to stay awake at the moment. We went to sleep on the plane and it's 5am back in London.

Oops lol. Will you be able to get back to sleep at all? How's Dad?.

I think Papa was attempting to stay up so he'd be able to sleep when we arrived, but he took a nap towards the end. He seems more awake than me. I'll just have to see if I manage to sleep through the night though.

Good luck. I'll see if I can talk Trucy into delaying the story until you've settled back in.

Luke?

Goodnight, Luke :).

"HELLO?" Apollo called as he and Trucy let themselves into their home and ventured through to the office in search of their father and brother, who were supposed to have returned the previous evening. "Dad? Luke?"

Trucy pushed past her brother, bouncing towards the kitchen door. "Daddy! Luke!" she called. "We're home!" Just as she was about to reach out for the door, it swung open, forcing Trucy to jump back to avoid getting hit.

"Oh no, sorry!" Luke cried as he noticed his sister moving away. "I didn't realise you were so close to the door!"

Trucy only grinned. "Luuuuke!" she shouted, jumping on her brother and hugging him tightly. "I missed you!"

Luke laughed, hugging his sister back while waving to Apollo. "I missed you too!" he assured her, then gently pulled her through into the kitchen. "I wish you could have come! I could have shown you all around London!"

Apollo laughed, pulling the hat off his head that he'd been wearing only out of a lack of somewhere else to keep it. "At least you had a good time!"

"Yeah!" Trucy cried, bouncing eagerly at Luke's side. "Where's Daddy? I want to hear about the adventure you had!"

Luke laughed. "Oh yeah, we promised you we'd have an adventure, didn't we?"

The stairs nearby creaked as Phoenix came down, and he'd barely had the time to greet his children with a wave before Trucy had launched herself at him, clinging to his middle. "Daddy!" she cried. "I missed you sooo much!"

Phoenix laughed as he plucked Trucy off the floor and carried her back into the kitchen, waving for Apollo to join in. "Did you two have fun with Maya and Pearls while we were gone?"

Apollo nodded, running to his father to briefly join the hug before sheepishly pulling back again. "Yeah, we were fine," he said, looking between Phoenix and Luke. "What about you two? Was London fun?"

Luke grinned, nodding enthusiastically. "I got to see the Professor and Flora again, and got to meet Alfendi!" he boasted, more to Trucy than to Apollo. "And I spent a day back in Misthallery with all my old friends there, too!"

"Apart from the Professor," Phoenix picked up, lowering Trucy back to the ground, "there wasn't anyone Maya and I met the last time we were there." He shrugged. "That's alright though, since I was busy enough helping out your Uncle Edgeworth with his business trip."

"Your adventure!" Trucy cried, bouncing at Phoenix's side as she pulled on his hoodie sleeve. "Tell us about your adventure!"

Phoenix laughed, sharing a glance with Luke. "Aw, you sure want to hear it now?" he teased. "It's a terrible story; It could ruin your entire day!"

Trucy crossed her arms, pouting up at Phoenix. "I want to hear the story!" she insisted.

"Well, if you insist," Phoenix said with a laugh, gesturing to the kitchen table as he walked around to his usual seat.

Trucy grinned, rushing to grab Apollo's arm and drag him to the table despite the teen's protests that he could walk on his own. Luke just giggled as he sat in his chair, next to Phoenix.

Finally pulling free of his sister, Apollo slid into his chair, watching his father and brother with concern. "Aren't you jetlagged at all?" he asked. "We can do this when you're more awake."

"We're fine," Luke insisted with a smile.

"A little tired, maybe," Phoenix admitted, casting an amused glance at Luke as the teen rubbed at his eyes, "but we'll be back to normal in a day or two."

"I've been practising this one!" Luke boasted, changing the subject back to the story of their 'adventure'. "You ready to hear it, Trucy?"

Trucy nodded eagerly, a big grin on her face. "Yes! Yes! Tell it already!" Apollo rolled his eyes, but smiled as he settled in to listen.

Luke giggled. "Okay, well, this all happened on Tuesday. Mister Edgeworth, Papa and I were going to spend the day at Gressenheller with the Professor, Flora and Alfendi..."
"Cor!" Luke cried as the trio approached the front gate of the Space Center. "They really did rebuild it!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Turnstiles? Really?"

Since Apollo and Luke's last visit to Cosmos Space Center, the entire front section of the entrance outbuilding had been rebuilt. Gone were the sliding metal gates and thick walls, replaced with pillars holding up the roof and small twin ticket offices surrounding a pair of turnstiles, the function of which wasn't clear as there was so much open space to easily walk around them. Above the green sign of the Center's name, and the round GYAXA logo, was a circular sculpture resembling a space station. Although it looked like it was built to spin, it was currently stationary. Beyond the building itself, the paved path to the Center's front door had been widened and a traffic light set up in front of the tracks that the launch pads used to encircle the main building.

Clay grinned. "What, you didn't believe me?" he laughed. "Y'see, this is what you guys miss out on when you don't come by more often!"

"It wasn't even covered in scaffolding last time!" Luke cried, running around the outbuilding to examine its new structure. "How'd it go up so fast!?"

Apollo gave Clay a look. "You're not counting the beginning of summer when Luke was in England, are you?"

"Oh yeah, and you were with distant family or something?" Clay mused, rubbing his chin. "I actually forgot about that, but yeah."

"You forgot?" Apollo replied, arms crossed. "You were bugging me every day to find a way back to visit the Space Center with you, then, once Luke and Dad got back, you suddenly lost interest in asking us to come by!"

Clay shrugged, giving his friend a cocky grin. "Well, I wanted to make sure you didn't get bored!" He giggled. "Give you an excuse to escape family members?"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Thanks, but I don't hate my family." He thought a moment. "Boredom was a legitimate issue, though."

Before Clay could do more than laugh, Luke ran back to the pair, looking panicked. "Wait, guys, when does this ceremony start!?"

"We've got a while yet," Clay assured him, "but I don't see why we can't head in now." He began to saunter towards the Center's front doors, cockily waving for his friends to follow. "C'mon, I'll take you up!"
Apollo and Luke shared a glance, Apollo irritated and Luke hopeful, then the brothers ran after their friend.

August 2, 10:30PM
Cosmos Space Center
Space Museum

"This used to be Launch Pad Two?" Luke said in awe as the trio exited the long corridor and emerged into a massively tall room, so tall that its ceiling was invisible in the inky blackness above.

Apollo rubbed the back of his neck as he looked up at the replica rocket where it disappeared into the darkness. "Wow. It almost makes my neck hurt just thinking about how high that rocket is..."

Apart from the dimensions of the room, and the large rocket by the far wall, it was almost unrecognisable as the functional launch pad it had previously been... not that any of the three boys had seen it before its refurbishment. To one side was a display, proudly showing off photos, articles and even a space suit and spare HAT-1 team jacket. Various people were dotted around in the circle of light from the few lamps set up in the rafters, and a temporary stage had been set up near the rocket, a ramp on one side giving away who it was intended for.

Clay grinned as he noticed the display, grabbing his friends' arms as he dragged them over to it. "Hey, Mister Starbuck was telling me about this!" he cried, ignoring Luke and Apollo's startled cries as they were suddenly pulled out of their thoughts. "They put the photo we took on display! The one with me in it!"

Apollo and Luke glanced at each other as Clay released them from his grip, watching their friend running along the brightly lit display case and stopping at the end, under the team jacket. They followed him to near the end of the display, where Clay was excitedly pointing at the lone photo in the section second from the end. "Wow," Apollo said, leaning in to see it more clearly. "You look almost as happy there as you do now," he added with a smirk.

Luke giggled, admiring the photo. Wearing a spare team jacket over his school uniform, just as he'd boasted at the time, was the image of sixteen-year-old Clay, standing proudly next to a slightly younger Starbuck, their arms slung over each other's shoulders although Starbuck had to kneel down slightly to match Clay's height. In front of them, right in the centre of the photo, was Director Cosmos, giving a stern thumbs-up from atop his everpresent motorised scooter. At his side was Ponco, cheerfully grinning for the camera through a multitude of bandages that covered her head and one of her arms. Behind the small robot were two women that Luke found vaguely familiar, although he couldn't quite place why for either of them. He assumed he'd probably seen them around the Center during one of the trio's visits over the past two years. "Everyone must have been so proud!" he said. "This was the day of the launch, wasn't it?"

"Day before," Clay corrected, giving his friend a grin. "I had detention on the day itself, remember?"

Apollo was admiring the jacket hanging nearby when he paused, frowning. "That jacket's ripped on the side," he pointed out, gesturing to the clean tear on the left of the buttons.
Luke and Clay looked up to see what Apollo was referring to, confused. "I wonder what happened to it?" Luke wondered.

"And why they didn't fix it," Clay added, then, after a short pause, shook his head and turned away from the display. "Well, enough of that! Let's find Mister Starbuck!"

Luke and Apollo laughed as they followed their friend.

As it turned out, Starbuck wasn't hard to find, standing at the edges of the small crowd and peeling himself away the moment he spotted the three boys. "There you are!" he cried as he approached, waving to the trio. "I was waiting for you guys to show up!"

"Hey, Mister Starbuck!" Apollo replied with a grin.

"There was no way we were gonna miss this!" Clay added, waving to his mentor. "No way was I gonna let my two best friends in the world miss it, either!"

Luke giggled. "You must be excited, Mister Starbuck!" he said to the astronaut. "I heard they announced that movie finally!"

Starbuck laughed in embarrassment, rubbing an arm with the opposite hand. "Y-yeah, but this one's a documentary, not really a movie, you know?" He shoved his hands into the pockets of his jacket. "I think the script-writer decided he had to do both, but one at a time, and somehow managed to strike a deal with his higher-ups? I don't really know all the details."

Apollo shrugged. "Who ever does with the movie business?" he pointed out, one eyebrow raised.

"Didn't they cast the guy to play you, though?" Clay asked, confused. "That famous movie actor?"

Starbuck nodded. "Hank Thomson. He was hanging around last week, actually." He smiled. "I could've introduced you guys to him if you'd dropped by!"

Clay looked excited at the idea, while Apollo mentally scoffed, shaking his head. Luke only looked confused. "I've... never heard of him?" he admitted.

"To be fair," Apollo pointed out, "you also don't watch many movies."

Starbuck quietly laughed. "Yeah, apparently they're still doing 'reconstructions' for the documentary, so he's still involved! He's really excited about it, too!"

Apollo crossed his arms. "Wait, does this script-writer guy know about Clay?" He gestured in his friend's direction. "They're not including him in this, are they?"

Clay gasped, smiling. "Whoa, you mean they might!?" he cried.

"That never occurred to you?" Luke asked. "You were the one boasting that you were an unofficial part of the team!"

Starbuck laughed. "I really don't know, I'm afraid!" he told them. "You'd have to ask this guy yourself!"

Clay looked disappointed, but Apollo laughed. "Hey, if he does include you," he told his black-haired friend, "you'd just be the 'mascot', anyway."
"Would not!" Clay argued.

"Alright alright," Starbuck interrupted, holding up his hands to calm the pair down, "enough of that! Hey, you know what?" He pointed to the rocket above them with a thumb. "I'd show you guys the rocket replica, but it's just a shell right now. They don't even have the lights for the top installed yet."

"Aw!" Clay sighed, disappointed. "But I wanted to check it out!"

"Of course you do!" Luke giggled.

"S-sorry," Starbuck mumbled, running a hand through the mop of red hair on the top of his head. "Maybe once it's done."

Apollo wasn't sure if his promise was a lie or not.

"Everyone!" came a call from the direction of the small stage, and the quartet looked around to see Director Cosmos rolling up the ramp, his scooter giving him additional height over the crowd than what the stage alone gave him. "First off, thank you all for coming to our little ceremony!"

The small crowd, gathering a little tighter around the stage, cheered in response. Starbuck waved at the three teenagers and led them a little further in himself.

"It is a great honour that so many of us could make it this morning!" Cosmos continued. "As you all probably know, the official opening will be in October, on the anniversary of HAT-1’s launch. By then, we should have the rest of our lighting up, and a few more space props furnishing the path here!" A handful of people in the crowd, evidently the people in charge of said props, whooped. "Ms Blackquill has also assured me," Cosmos continued, "that the robots are ready and willing to direct visitors, once we have them. But, as of today, I think it's prudent that we now refer to Launch Pad 2 by its new name: the Space Museum!" As the audience cheered, Cosmos pulled a plastic bottle of water from a pocket, then turned towards the rocket behind him.

"This is what we did to the original HAT-1 rocket," Starbuck whispered to the boys in explanation. "Didn't want to damage it with glass or wine."

Once the cap had been unscrewed, Cosmos held the waterbottle high, then, to raucous cheering from the crowd, tossed its contents over the replica rocket. "I christen thee, 'HAT-1 Replica Metis' of the Space Museum!" he announced.

Luke and Apollo glanced at each other in confusion, but quickly shrugged as they mutually decided not to question the rocket's unusual name.
The small room was nearly pitch black, barely large enough to spread out your arms and not be touching both sides. Aging wallpaper was barely visible on the walls, ripped and tattered as the hanging fragments waved in an invisible breeze. Screams and shouts echoed slightly from other rooms within the temporary structure, while a recording played from overhead speakers of phonograph music accompanied by the white noise of screeching wind.

The door at the darker end of the room creaked open, and three teenage boys in a variety of costumes sidled in, standing as close to one another as they dared without actually touching. Their eyes darted fearfully around the room, and they stuck firmly to the open areas furthest from the walls as they edged their way carefully to the door in front of them.

Suddenly, the wall on the trio's left snapped open, and an ominous figure leapt out of the darkness with a screech. Two of the boys screamed, clinging to each other as they jumped back. The third, however, only flinched in surprise before smiling widely at the figure's intricate make-up in the dim light, a hand on the brim of the top hat on his head. "Wow, that's an amazing costume you have there!"

The other two boys groaned as they quickly got over their momentary fear. "Luke!"

Luke looked back at his friends with an innocent smile. "I'm just congratulating the actors on a job well done!" he insisted, then turned back to the confused-looking actor as they slowly slunk backwards into their hole. "You're doing great!" he assured them.

Apollo rolled his eyes, grabbing Luke's arm as the trio headed towards the exit door with a huff. "This is the last time I invite you to a haunted house," he grumbled. "You take all the fun out of it!"

Clay shrugged as he followed the two brothers, pulling his borrowed HAT-1 team jacket tight around his neck to protect it from the cold breeze. "I guess Luke has a point about them being almost nothing but jump-scares, though," he reasoned. "Especially that one."

Once outside under the night sky, stars obscured by the bright lights of the Halloween fair, the trio made their way back to their assigned meeting place by the lake. "I wonder if Trucy and her friend have finished with what they were doing?" Luke wondered aloud.

Apollo shook his head, spotting the lake ahead and failing to see their little sister nearby. "Doesn't look like it," he said, rubbing the centre of his forehead. "Honestly, they can take their time. I've had enough 'warding charms' slapped on my face today."

Clay snorted in amusement. "Man, I wish I was there to see that!" he said.

Luke giggled, but Apollo shook his head. "Don't remind me," he mumbled.
The first thing Jinxie Tenma had done once Trucy took her into the office was shriek "DEMON!" and slap a small piece of paper on Apollo's forehead. "You won't get me, blue demon! My mama is still outside if you try!"

Apollo stood, blinking in shock, as he registered the girl's words. "Demon...?" 'I understand blue, given my costume, but...' Phoenix held a hand over his mouth to hide a smile, while Luke was as shocked as Apollo, lacking the words to speak. Trucy ran to stand between her friend and her brother. "No, Jinxie, this is my brother, Polly! I told you about him!"

"You said he wore red!" Jinxie argued as she half-hid behind Trucy, gesturing to the blue suit Apollo was wearing as his costume that night. "And you didn't tell me he had horns!"

Apollo grimaced, a hand flying to his carefully-styled hair that he had refused to hide under a wig. "It's hair!"

"Apollo's wearing a costume tonight!" Luke explained to the girl, rushing forward. "We all are! He's dressed as our papa!"

Phoenix smirked at the reminder, Apollo quietly blushing. "Yeah, well," the teenager shot back at his brother, "you're dressed as your Professor Layton, aren't you?"

Luke tipped his top hat proudly. "Yup!"

Jinxie cast several suspicious glances between Apollo and Phoenix, the latter in a Steel Samurai costume as he watched the kids interacting from the doorway. Apollo gingerly pulled the paper from his forehead, examining the Japanese script and paw-print with a raised eyebrow. With a wordless scream, Jinxie promptly pulled out another identical paper and slapped it where the previous one had been, standing almost in an action pose as she fixed Apollo with a fierce look. "My warding charms are not to be under-estimated!"

Apollo gave Jinxie a level stare.

Luke looked between the two in concern. "Maybe you should wear a hat?" he suggested to his brother.

Trucy patted her friend's dark hair with a smile. "It's okay Jinxie, Polly is a good demon!" she told her. "He's going to be a lawyer like Daddy when he grows up!"

"A... good demon?" Jinxie carefully repeated.

Apollo sighed. "Can't I just be a person?"

Ignoring Apollo, Trucy gave her friend a bright smile. "Yep! He was supposed to be wearing a wig tonight," she tugged on her own wig of dark brown curls, "but if his hair bothers you, we can get him to wear a hat!"

"Jinxie thought for a moment, casting nervous glances at Apollo's hair, then carefully gave her friend a nod.

Apollo looked to Luke for help, but only got an apologetic shrug. Sighing again, he turned and stalked off further into their home. "I'll go get a hat," he groaned.
Phoenix patted Apollo's shoulder as the teenager passed him. "Why not get that beanie Trucy made for you?" he suggested with a smile. "It's the most like mine, after all!"

Rolling his eyes, Apollo headed off towards the stairs.

Apollo ran a hand along the pink beanie covering his hair, wishing he could pull it off without having to worry about a ten-year-old slapping his face, 'warding charm' or not. "Where did those two go while we were in the haunted house, anyway?"

Clay shrugged. "Trucy's friend said something about the stalls, maybe?" He then scratched a cheek in thought. "Speaking of, what is that girl's costume? I can't figure it out."

"Apparently, she's not in a costume," Luke explained, peering off in the direction of the fair's market stalls. "Jinxie's family is very big on demons and the like, so she's covered herself in those warding charms to protect herself." Although the girl only had two charms on her forehead when they first met her, she had slowly acquired more on various parts of her clothes and arms as the night wore on, and refused to take them off for any reason. The Wrights had decided to simply leave her to her own devices.

Apollo gave Clay a glare. "Speaking of costumes, mind explaining why you just repeated last year's instead of getting a new one?"

Clay scoffed. "Naw, last year I dressed as Mister Starbuck! This year, I'm just an astronaut!"

"Mister Starbuck is an astronaut!" Apollo pointed out, waving his arms in frustration. "They're the same thing! You didn't even change anything about the costume!"

"And what about you?" Clay laughed in response. "You're dressed as your dad! Did you just borrow his suit!?"

Before the pair could descend into an argument, Luke held up a hand. "Wait, I see Trucy!"

Sure enough, in the direction of the stalls was a worried-looking ten-year-old girl, racing down the path towards them. One hand was on her wig to keep it from flying off, and her black robes and gold-and-red scarf flapped in the breeze behind her. As she spotted her brothers, she waved frantically with her free hand, running straight towards them. "Polly! Luke! Help!"

Apollo and Luke glanced at each other in concern before racing to meet Trucy halfway, Clay hurrying close behind. Apollo was the first to reach her, leaning down as he gripped his sister's shoulders. "What is it? Did something happen to Jinxie?"

Trucy panted for a moment as she recovered from her sprint. "I was... playing one of the games... where you have to throw a ball," she haltingly explained through her gasps for air. "When I... looked around... Jinxie was gone!" She shook her head rapidly, knocking her wig slightly askew. "I can't find her! She doesn't... know her way around the park like we do!"

Luke gasped, a hand on his hat as he looked around frantically. "Oh no! If only Papa was here!"

"You're telling me!" Trucy interjected. "I went to all that trouble... making a costume for him... and no-one's gonna see it!"
"'Make'?” Apollo repeated under his breath. ‘More like bought...’

Clay looked between Apollo and Trucy. "We can find her, can't we?"

Apollo nodded, looking to his sister. "Why don't you take us to where you last saw her?" he asked. "We don't need Dad's help. Not yet, anyway."

Trucy thought for a moment, then nodded. Once Apollo released his grip on her, she then turned and more calmly led her brothers and friend towards the fair.
In the end, it didn't take very long to find where Jinxie had disappeared to.

Once they arrived at the stall where Trucy had last seen her friend, Apollo instructed everyone to split up, but for Trucy to stick with one of the three older boys; As they had phones, he wanted them to be able to contact each other the moment they found any sign of Jinxie. After some whining that she wanted a phone of her own, Trucy grabbed Luke's hand, and the three teams headed off in opposite directions to begin their search.

Clay headed towards the haunted house, slowly sauntering along as he studied the faces of anyone shorter than his shoulders.

Ok I've reached the haunted house and no sign of her

    Thx but maybe you could not text me until you actually find something? :

    I'm keeping you updated on my progress! :P

    Every time my phone beeps I think maybe someones found her :

    So don't think that! Problem solved :D

    This is serious, Clay :|

Luke and Trucy headed to the darker, less crowded sections of the market behind the stalls, where technically they were not supposed to be at all. Trucy had insisted, pointing out that Jinxie may have gotten scared enough to try and hide there, and her impassioned plea was enough to let any adults trying to chase the pair out agree to leave them be. Although Luke hoped to also use the quieter environment to ask the help of nearby animals, it seemed there weren't any brave enough even to frequent where they currently were.

Any luck? :

No, sorry. Trucy's convinced a few adults to keep an eye out for her, but we haven't seen her yet.

Trucy says to try looking underneath tables, by the way. I'll pass that on to Clay, too.

    Alright I will. Let me know the moment you find anything :

We will, don't worry.
Apollo stuck to the brighter sections of the market, the opposite end from the haunted house. Following Trucy's hurried suggestions, he made sure to take a peek under the tables wherever he could, and even asked the occasional stall owner or passer-by if they'd seen anyone matching Jinxie's description (the best he could do was "this high, very pale skin, black ponytail, has covered herself in paper?"). By some stroke of luck, one woman smiled in recognition and was able to point Apollo to a nearby stall selling handmade ornaments all shaped like rabbits.

As Apollo ran to the self-proclaimed 'Bunny Beloveds' stall, he almost cried in relief to see a familiar dark-haired girl sitting just behind the table, petting an extremely fluffy toy rabbit. "Jinxie!" he shouted, almost throwing himself at the table and giving the girl a grin. "We finally found you!"

Jinxie looked up in surprise, but, seeing Apollo leaning over the table above her, she shrieked and slapped a warding charm on his forehead, jumping to her feet and clinging the toy bunny tightly. "Don't eat me!"

Apollo stood frozen in shock, moving only when he heard the owner of the stall approaching, obviously alerted by Jinxie's shout. "Oh, I'm sorry, she's been doing that to a lot of people!", the woman said, gently pushing Apollo away slightly as she pulled the charm off his face. "Usually it's people in scarier costumes though..."

"Eh, yeah, she's got it in her head that I'm a demon," Apollo explained, rubbing his forehead with a sigh. He gave the stall owner a glance and was surprised to see she wasn't in a costume herself, perhaps the only reason Jinxie seemed happy to stay in her care. "We've been looking for her, actually. Thanks for taking care of her."

The woman nodded, giving Apollo a friendly smile. "Ah, so you're in charge of her, are you?" She turned to Jinxie. "Did you hear that, sweetie? Your friend's here to take you home!"

Jinxie only widened her eyes, looking around Apollo frantically. "Where's Trucy! ?" she cried. "You gobbled her up, didn't you!?"

"No, I didn't!" Apollo replied, sighing in frustration. "Why would I even do that!?"

The stall-owner seemed worried, giving Apollo a concerned look. "I'm sorry, if she doesn't want to go with you-"

"Yeah, I know," Apollo muttered, realising he should have known this would happen. It was a basic safety tip that lost children were never to be 'returned' to someone they didn't trust, and it seemed there was no-one Jinxie didn't trust more right now than Apollo. The teen pulled his phone out of his pocket. "Jinxie, I'm gonna call Trucy and get her over here, and prove I didn't eat her, okay?"

Turning away from the stall, he stood off to one side and called Luke's phone. When Luke picked up, it was with a slightly panicked tone he immediately shouted "Have you found her!?"

Apollo blinked in surprise, giving his phone a frown. "Hi," he replied pointedly. "Yeah, I found her. There's a 'bunny' stall, past the play equipment from where we split up. She won't go with me, though."

"Bunny stall, got it!" Luke replied, then paused before thoughtfully adding, "Are there any actual bunnies there?"

Apollo sighed. "No, Luke, there are no real rabbits," he told his brother. "Do you think you'll be able to find us?"

"Mm-hmm," Luke said, almost audibly nodding although he was starting to sound slightly out-of-breath. Apollo suspected the pair were running full-tilt to meet him. "Trucy and I are already on our way! Does Clay know yet?"

"I'll call him," Apollo promised. "Seeya when you get here."

Luke chirped "Bye!" before promptly hanging up.

Apollo looked back at the stall as he lowered his phone, and was frustratedly unsurprised to see Jinxie sat on her stool, glaring at him. "Trucy's on her way," he told the girl, though was met with no response. Sighing, he returned to his phone to call Clay.

"Yo bro," Clay sang as he picked up. "Any news?"

"We've found Jinxie," Apollo explained. "If you come back to where we split up, there's a stall selling rabbit-themed stuff just past the food stalls. Luke and Trucy are already on their way."

"Ah, you found her!" Clay replied with a laugh. "Past the food court? Shouldn't be hard to find."

Apollo closed his eyes to resist rolling them. "Just get here, will you? After all this excitement, I'm thinking we should at least get the girls back home before we lose one of them again. I'm not explaining to my dad why we couldn't keep an eye on them like we promised."

"Dude, I'm pretty sure your dad'll understand," Clay assured him. "I'll find where you are, and we can play babysitter getting them back to your place."

"Thanks," Apollo muttered gratefully. "I'll see you in a bit." Clay hung up without another word, and Apollo sighed as he put his phone away.

Suddenly, there was a shout to Apollo's right, and he turned to see Trucy flashing past him in a streak of black, running to Jinxie's side. "Jinxie!" Jinxie jumped from her stool, mouth open in surprise, and Trucy quickly launched herself at her friend to give the other girl a hug. "Jinxie, where'd you go!? I was so worried when I couldn't find you!"

"I saw a group of demons headed our way!" Jinxie cried, clinging to her friend as the plush rabbit fell forgotten to the grass. "I was so scared! I thought you got eaten by a demon!"

Quickly catching up, Luke tipped his top hat to the woman manning the stall. "Thank you for looking after her, ma'am," he told her, panting from his brief sprint. "We've been very worried about her!"

The woman smiled. "Oh, it's no problem!" she assured him, and turned to Apollo with an apologetic look. "I'm sorry I couldn't let her go with you before, it's just."

"I know, I know," Apollo sighed. "She doesn't like me. No-one would have let her go with me." He smiled to show there were no hard feelings. "I don't blame you."

Wright Talent Agency
Kitchen
Once they'd met up with Clay, the five kids all headed back to the Wrights' home. Although Clay would then bid his friends goodbye before heading to his own home, Jinxie was staying the night and returning home after school the next day. "I'll see you two tomorrow, Wrights," Clay told Apollo and Luke as he bid them goodbye on the street outside their home. "Another time, Truce!"

"Bye, Clay!" Trucy called, waving as Clay walked off with a laugh. "Seeya later!"

The Wright kids and Jinxie met Phoenix, now out of his costume, sitting in the kitchen with a glass of grape juice, and he fixed the quartet with a smile as they entered. "Have fun at the fair?" he asked.

Trucy nodded, although Apollo and Luke gave each other nervous glances. Jinxie kept quiet, hands clasped together as she looked to Trucy. "We played lots of games!" Trucy cried, nudging her friend. "Didn't we, Jinxie?"

Although Jinxie nodded, Phoenix's eyes narrowed as he watched the four. After a moment, he bluntly said to them, "Tell me what happened."

Apollo and Luke winced, remembering how Phoenix was always able to tell if they tried to hide anything.

"Nothing!" Trucy insisted, still smiling brightly as she bounced on her heels. "We may have gotten a bit lost, but we found our way home in the end!"

Apollo sighed, stepping forward. "Trucy and Jinxie wanted to do different things from me, Luke and Clay, so we thought we should split up, but then Jinxie got lost. We found her though, then we came straight back here. It was my responsibility, I shouldn't have let it happen."

"I-it was my fault, too!" Luke insisted, jumping to Apollo's side. "We should have realised it was a bad idea to leave the girls on their own!"

"Hey, we can look after ourselves!" Trucy protested, arms crossed.

Phoenix sat silently in thought for a moment or two, then slowly smiled. "I'm glad you could tell me the truth," he said. "Since you already know what it was you did wrong, I'm not going to harp on about it. You've learned your lesson, and everything's turned out okay in the end."

Apollo and Luke glanced at each other with surprised smiles.

Phoenix stood up. "Trucy, Jinxie, why don't the pair of you get ready for bed? It's getting late."

"Okay, Daddy!" Trucy chirped, grabbing the silent Jinxie's arm and pulling her to the stairs. "C'mon, Jinxie, I'll show you my room!"

Luke ran to Phoenix and gave him a hug. "We really are sorry, Papa," he said. "Thank you for not getting mad."

Phoenix chuckled as he hugged Luke back, giving Apollo a smile as the elder teen hung back, looking embarrassed. "As long as you never make the same mistake again, I don't see any reason to be upset. You seem to have handled it well, after all."

Apollo suddenly ran to join the hug, just as Luke had been pulling away. "Thanks, Dad," he quickly said, then just as quickly dashed off upstairs.

Luke nodded, running after his brother with a giggle.
"Warren Street Animal Shelter, can I help you?"

"Um, hello, I was wondering if you were welcoming volunteers at the moment?"

"We're always open to anyone wishing to volunteer. If you want to drop by and pick up an application, all you need to do is fill it in and our manager will arrange an orientation. I can fill part of it out for you over the phone, but you'll need to sign it yourself and check we've got everything correct."

"Oh, thank you! I won't be able to drop by until the weekend, though. Will you be open?"

"Haha, we're open eight to seven, seven days a week! If you're coming in on Saturday, just tell the guy at reception that you spoke to Duck. I'll leave a note so he'll expect you. May I ask how old you are?"

"I, um, just turned sixteen yesterday."

"Then we're gonna need parental permission, I'm afraid. Your mom or dad there?"

"My papa is, yes. I'll get him. Thank you again, sir!"

"No problem, kid. What's your name, by the way?"

"I look forward to working with you, Luke."

Warren Street Animal Shelter
Reception

Luke looked around as he pushed through the glass doors of the animal shelter. It had been a long road of research and both internal and external deliberating, but here he was, newly sixteen years old and applying for his first job, only a half-hour's bus ride from home. 'Well, if a volunteering position could be called a 'job', I suppose.' The room, to Luke's disappointment, was empty. Directly in front of the doors was a table, a small bell set out on the counter, and to either side of it were double doors into the inner corridors of the shelter. 'I wonder where the receptionist is?' He walked up to the desk and hit the bell, telling himself it wasn't nearly as fun to do as he thought it was and resisting hitting it more than once.

There was a commotion behind the door to Luke's right, and he looked up just as one of the double doors swung open, a young man with a black mohawk jumping out. He paused for a moment as he looked Luke up and down, then gave him a patented 'customer service' smile and walked over behind the desk. "Welcome to Warren Street Animal Shelter! May I help you, sir?"

Luke grinned. "Hello! I'm picking up my application to volunteer here!" He paused, nervous. "I, um, spoke to Duck over the phone on Thursday?"

The man (Luke noticed his name-tag read 'Cailen') thought for a moment, then gasped. "Oh yeah, you're that kid! Forgot about you!" He slipped into the chair behind reception and leaned sideways to open various drawers Luke couldn't see, before finally seeming to find what he was looking for and standing back up again, placing a paper and pen on the counter in front of Luke. "Just finish filling it in, let me know if anything Duck put in is wrong."

Luke nodded, looking over the form.

"Oh, yeah," Cailen continued, holding out his hand, "I'm Crow. Nice to meet ya."

"England, huh?" Crow mused, tapping his chin. "What, online, or you met on holiday...?"

"I used to live there," Luke admitted with a giggle. "Usually people notice my accent and figure it out."

Crow looked shocked for a moment, then sighed. "Aw, I knew you were talking funny," he groaned. "I'm terrible with accents."

Luke giggled, filling in the final details of the form. "That's okay. It's not as obvious as it used to be, anyway."

After a moment or two, the doors on the right again opened, this time ejecting a middle-aged woman with orange hair. Unlike Crow, she lacked a name-tag. She gave Luke a smile as she approached. "Ah, you're our new volunteer, are you?"

Luke nodded. "I'm Luke! Nice to meet you!"

Crow gave the woman a frustrated look. "How did you remember the note Duck left and I didn't?" he sighed.

"Little thing called memory," the woman joked to Crow, then leaned on the counter, reading over Luke's shoulder as he signed the form. "Luke Wright, huh?" she said, then held out her hand. "Kitty. I think 'Northpaw' would work for you."

Luke was already moving to shake her hand when her comment registered, and he paused, confused. "Huh?"

"You think Northpaw?" Crow repeated thoughtfully. "I was thinking more along the lines of some kind of bird."

"His name's 'Wright' and he's right-handed," Kitty replied with a shrug, then laughed as she saw Luke's bemused expression. "It's a tradition. Everyone who works here, except the boss of course, gets a nickname. It's usually animal-themed, but we've had exceptions."

"Oh, I see," Luke replied, looking to Crow. "So that's why your name-tag says 'Cailen', not 'Crow'?"

Crow nodded. "Cailen Rog. Kitty here's real name is..." He looked over to her, frowning in thought. "Tiger, isn't it?"

"Tiger Vadas," Kitty replied with a smile. "To be honest, 'Kitty' sounds more like my real name than "Tiger'. Barely anyone calls me that!"

"Hell, Duck's real name is 'Drake'!" Crow laughed. "We coulda gone with some cool dragon theme, and we went with Duck!"

"Excellent!" Crow cried, taking the application and giving it a quick once-over. "I'll get this to the boss, and he'll probably give you or your dad a ring on Monday to organise an orientation."

"I don't see why he won't accept you," Kitty continued. "We're pretty short-staffed at the moment, and you seem like a perfectly reasonable young man." She shrugged, smirking. "We accepted Crow here, after all!"

Crow frowned, filing the application into a drawer. "Hey!"

Ignoring the receptionist, Kitty waved Luke towards the doors she and Crow had come out of. "You want a quick tour, Northpaw? It's just the three of us here at the moment, so I can show you around before you head back home."

"I'd love that!" Luke replied, rushing to Kitty's side. "Thank you, Kitty!"

"No problem!" Kitty sang, leading Luke through the swinging double doors.

Beyond the reception was a long, white corridor, lined on either side with enclosures separated from the main hall with clear plastic doors. Inside each one, Luke could see a different variety of dog, sometimes alone, sometimes paired up. "Wow," he breathed, grinning widely as he saw the collection of canines stretching before him.

Kitty giggled. "This is just the dogs!" she said. "We have the cats on the other side, but I'm feeding the dogs at the moment."

Luke paused by one of the enclosures to kneel down and wave at the interested dog inside. "Are they all happy here?"

Kitty opened her mouth to answer, then paused. "Well, I hope so," she eventually answered. "We're only a small shelter, and a no-kill one, so our biggest problem is overcrowding."

"Overcrowding?" Luke repeated, looking up in surprise.

"People have a tendency to not neuter their pets," Kitty explained, "so when they have kittens or puppies they can't sell off themselves, they just dump them on us." She sighed, crossing her arms. "Not to mention the idiots who decide after a day they don't want a pet anymore, or, even worse, wait until it's stopped 'being cute'."

Luke gasped, scandalised. "Dogs and cats are always cute!" he cried.

Kitty laughed, cheered by the fervent belief of the teen. "We may think so, but unfortunately not everyone agrees with us." She frowned. "Not as many people adopt animals as drop them off. We can tell people we're full and not accepting anything, and just get animals dumped on our door as a result. It's a lose-lose situation." Shaking her head, Kitty waved Luke to the doors directly in front of them, where the corridor extended off to the side, housing more dogs beyond. "But enough of my pessimistic nonsense. C'mon, I'll show you the dog run!"
Beyond the door and through a short corridor, Kitty and Luke emerged back into the sunlight of midday. In front of them was a large, fenced-off enclosure, inside of which were a small pack of about ten or so dogs, running around madly as they played together. One of them barked as it spotted the two humans approaching, and in moments the whole group was bouncing at the fence, howling for attention.

Kitty sighed, waving at the dogs as she feebly commanded, "Quiet! No barking!" When the animals proceeded to ignore her, she sighed and rubbed her face with one hand. "What am I even doing."

Luke gave her a sympathetic grimace, then turned to the barking mass himself. "Guys, we can't understand you when you all talk at once! One at a time, please!"

"It's pointless," Kitty told the teen. "At this point they're just fuelling... each... other...?" To her utter bafflement, at Luke's plea the entire pack had almost instantly quietened, and was now sitting silently at the fence, tails wagging. One of the dogs, a golden retriever-cross, was pushing itself against the wire mesh, making soft whining noises at Luke, who was leaning down towards it and listening intently, occasionally even nodding. Kitty shook her head, but the image before her didn't change, so she was forced to accept it as reality. "Northpaw...?" she quietly asked. "How'd you do that?"

It took Luke a moment to register he was being addressed, and he looked up at Kitty with an innocent smile and a shrug. "I'm just good with animals, I guess," he explained, then gestured to the enclosure. "Is it okay for me to spend some time with these guys? I won't be a problem, I promise."

Kitty thought a moment, then slowly nodded, still getting over the shock of the suddenly quiet dogs. "Um, sure, I'll go let you in."

"Thank you so much, Kitty!" Luke cried, skipping after her towards the gate.

"I'll let you out once I'm done feeding the other dogs," Kitty added, opening the gate to allow the teen to mingle with the eerily obedient dogs currently in the enclosure. "Just shout if you need anything."

Luke nodded, surrounded with the crowd of canines the moment he entered the dog run. "We'll be good, won't we?" he asked the dogs, who all wagged their tails, a couple of them barking once in apparent agreement.

"Right," Kitty replied, then slowly turned and walked away. 'I think I'm gonna need a stiff drink tonight...'

Phelan Pound, the owner of the shelter, was a short man not much taller than Luke, his most distinctive feature being the black circle beard around his permanently smiling mouth. He was waiting in reception when Luke arrived on the day after Thanksgiving for his orientation, and cheerfully greeted the teen with an energetic handshake. "I'll give you a tour and show you how everything works!" he told Luke, throwing an arm over the teen's shoulders as he led him through into the dog kennels.

Feeding the dogs as they arrived was a very tall man with thick eyebrows, who looked down at Luke somewhat sternly.

"Gagnon, this is our new recruit!" Pound happily announced, waving at the teen. "His name's Wright!"

The man blinked in surprise, then smiled, the action making him instantly look a lot friendlier. "Oh, Crow left a note about you! 'Northpaw', is it?"

Luke giggled in relief, nodding. "Yeah, that's me!"

"Duck!" the man replied, reaching out to shake Luke's hand with a grin. "We spoke on the phone!"

"Oh!" Luke cried in recognition. "Nice to meet you in person, sir!"

Duck laughed, waving the comment off. "Please, the whole reason we have the nicknames is to use 'em! 'Duck' is fine. Pleasure to be working with you, Northpaw!"

Pound sighed good-naturedly, pulling a small notepad out of a pocket and making a note with an equally small stub of a pencil tied to the wire binding. "Another nickname to remember," he said, then gave Luke a side-long glance. "You gonna be sticking around, Wright? I only graduate to these nicknames with people who actually hang around."

"Two years isn't a long enough time?" Duck muttered with a smirk.

Luke shrugged. "I hope to stay here as long as possible," he admitted. "This is the closest animal shelter to home, and I want to help the local animal population any way I can."

"Spoken like a true animal lover!" Duck laughed, then he turned to Pound. "Boss, Reindeer and Fox are in the recuperation room when you're ready for him to learn how the surgery works."

"Good point," Pound replied, then gestured for Luke to follow as he walked off. "Come along, Wright, we still have the rest of the tour to finish before we get down to the nitty-gritty!"

Luke waved to Duck as he left. "I'll see you later, Duck!"
After being shown the cat enclosures and all of the procedures for feeding and providing basic care for the animals, Pound led Luke into a room hidden away behind his office, inbetween the two corridors that housed the cats and dogs. This room contained a mixture of the different cage sizes Luke had seen, although overall they were smaller than the largest of the dog enclosures. About half of them housed an animal inside, and Luke could hear some of them quietly talking to their neighbours, although they were in various states of pain or sleepiness. Sat on the floor, laid out on a blanket, was a large black Labrador, a white spot on its chest. Around it were crouched two people in lab-coats, the younger woman petting the canine to keep it calm while the elderly man listened to its heartbeat with his stethoscope. Luke noticed the woman had a name-tag on her coat reading 'Vixen', although whether or not the man had one he couldn't tell, as his back was to the door. He took Pound's lead in hanging back until the grey-haired man removed his stethoscope, at which point the woman waved to the pair of newcomers as they approached. "Hey, Mister Pound! We're just finishing up with Bonnie here!"

"Let's get her back in her cage," the man cut in, ignoring Pound and Luke behind him as he stood up. "She'll be fine tomorrow."

"Reindeer!" Pound called, waving to the man as the young woman gently led the dog to an open cage nearby. "You got time to show the new recruit around the surgery?"

The man looked around, fixing his gaze on Luke with a dismissive sniff. "Said I'd have time, didn't I?" he replied. He looked the nervous teen up and down, turning around enough for Luke to notice the name-tag on his coat that read 'Rudolf'. "What was your name, kid?"

"Nice to meet you, Northpaw!" the woman replied, bouncing back to the group as she finished with her patient. "I'm Vixen, but everyone calls me Fox!"

Luke nodded, grinning. "Hello Fox!"

"Bagley and Reindeer here are our resident vets," Pound explained to the teen, gesturing to the sick animals surrounding them. "Bagley's interning at the moment, but she's due to start working full-time here any year now." He looked to the young woman, grinning at his own joke.

Fox bit her lip, moving a clump of hair behind an ear. "I've just got this final year of study before I get my veterinary medicine degree," she explained to Luke. "Until then, I'm just Reindeer's assistant."

Luke tapped his chin. "That's a thought. Volunteering here would be hard if you're away at university."

"You're sixteen, aren't you?" Pound asked. "You've got a while before you have to think about college."

"Um, not really," Luke explained. "I skipped a year or two when I moved here, so I'll be starting university next September. Or August."

Pound rubbed his chin. "Well, just let me know what your plans are closer to the date and we can sort it out then," he decided.

"I've got a deal with my lecturers at the moment," Fox added with a grin. "I'm interning here and studying online instead of going all the way up to Davis to attend my classes this term!"

"Oh, Davis!" Luke cried in excited recognition. "Ivy University! That's one I'm thinking of going to! Could I ask you about it later?"

Reindeer narrowed his eyes at the teen. "Planning to be a vet, are you?" he spoke up.

Luke turned to the old man in surprise, having forgotten he was there. "Y-yes, sir," he replied. "It's part of why I wanted to volunteer at a shelter."

The man scoffed. "Plenty of kids like animals, say they want to be vets. What none of 'em realise is how much work you gotta do to be good enough to be trusted with the health of an animal." He wagged a finger at the teen. "It can be ten times the work of a human doctor! You may think, just because you're smart and skipped some years of school, that it will be easy for you, but you don't even know the meaning of hard. Are you listening to me, boy?"

Luke stared up at Reindeer, equally sternly. "I know it's going to be a lot of hard work, sir. I'm doing all my research now so that I can be ready to start my studies the moment I arrive at the university I chose. I'm still looking at options, but I fully intend to put my all into whichever course I end up taking." He glanced over to the dog the pair had been previously looking at. "And I don't mean any disrespect by this, sir, but you have no idea what I've been through to get to this point. You have no business telling me I don't know what hard work is."

Reindeer stared back for a few moments, then a corner of his mouth twitched upwards. "I like you," he decided. "You got spunk. Northpaw, was it?"

Pound nodded. "Yup."

"Northpaw," Reindeer repeated, chuckling at the confused Luke. "I'll see you around, kid." With that, he turned and headed off to a door behind him.

Laughing, Pound elbowed Luke. "Don't mind Reindeer, he has to scare every kid we get in here."

Fox shrugged, looking embarrassed. "He can be scary, but he's really skilled. I'm pretty honoured he's mentoring me." She ran her hands through the red ponytail draped over her shoulder. "Come talk to me once we're done here and we can talk about college."

"I will, thank you!" Luke replied with a nod.

My dear Luke,

I'm glad to hear your birthday was an enjoyable one! That was indeed good timing that the parcel arrived the day before; I was worried I had left sending it too late. And your Halloween celebration does indeed sound like it was a harrowing experience. It is fortunate the girl was found so quickly.
Please do discuss your university options with Mr Wright thoroughly before making a decision. To be honest, I had expected you to consider Gressenheller as an option before I sent the reference materials with your gift, and was wondering why you hadn't asked for anything. Regardless, if the American system is anything like ours, you'll be needing to send out applications soon, so a decision as to where to prioritise must be made quickly. I'm always willing to act as a reference for your application here if you want to apply, and I'm sure Flora and Alfendi would appreciate seeing you on a more regular basis, although it would come at the expense of your family having the pleasure of your company. I can't imagine Trucy would like that at all, if I remember rightly her past reactions to being separated from you for any length of time.

Alfendi has taken to parking himself in my study and drawing while I work. I've had to watch him to ensure he doesn't try to draw on anything other than the paper we give him, but it's nice to know he's not far away. Flora tells me he likes to play cooking or mealtimes with her, and he very deliberately follows us if we leave him alone in a room. It's amazing the little things you notice that make you realise a baby is growing up. Now I understand why Clark and Brenda were always so excited to talk about you non-stop before you all moved to Misthallery!

Don't be afraid to call me if you need to discuss your university options in person. Differing time zones permitting, I will try to be available for you if you have any questions.

The usual puzzles are enclosed.

Your friend,

Professor Hershel Layton

27th November, 2021

Dear Professor Layton,

I've been doing a lot of research into universities and veterinary medicine degrees over the past few weeks. It looks like I'd have to spend time away from home anyway, since the nearest accredited university may be in California, but it's half the state away, and I haven't measured it but I'm almost sure that's at least the entire length of Britain from top to bottom. The other problem though is how to transfer my schooling here back to England and I guess the other way once I'm done? I haven't checked yet if a vet degree from overseas would be recognised in America, it only just now occurred to me it might be necessary. I did look at the requirement paths and I noticed it takes almost twice as long to become a vet here as it does in England! You have to take two separate courses, a 'pre-med' degree and then the veterinary medicine degree itself, while the information from Gressenheller you sent me says it's just the one course over there! This is so confusing. I think I need to pin Papa down and discuss it with him more to work out what to do. His advice last time was just to research my options first, but I feel like that's only made it harder.

One thing I have done since my birthday is finally look into local animal shelters. I found one about thirty minutes from home, and they've signed me up as a volunteer there, so I'm now dropping in every weekend and any weekdays I have off from school! Papa had to give his permission for me to work, and I'm obviously not getting paid, but it's a lot of fun and I've made some good friends there already! In addition to the animals and other volunteers, there are the receptionists and the boss, and the two vets. One of them is currently studying at that university I mentioned, so I was asking her about it to see if it helped me decide what to do. They also have a tradition at the shelter that everyone who works there has an animal-themed nickname, so everyone has dubbed me 'Northpaw' because I'm right-handed and I told them my name was 'Wright'. I thought it would make the whole thing easier if I didn't have to explain why Papa's name was different from mine.

Mum and Dad were always talking about me when I was a baby? I suppose I shouldn't be surprised, but I didn't know they did that. Was any of it written down? Do you remember anything they were particularly happy about? Or upset?

I've been too busy to think about puzzles, so I haven't got any to send this time. Sorry about that, Professor. Thank you for offering to let me call you though. I might take you up on it, maybe when I talk to Papa about what I'm doing with my education.

Your friend and apprentice,

Luke Triton

A Surprise Trip

Time is running out Pearly. If we can’t get miss Maya here, can we get Daddy to Kurain again?

But if all of you come here, Mr Nick and Mystic Maya won’t get alone time! We have to get him to come alone, and I will stay out of their way!

You can come here!!! I can get out the sleeping bag and you can stay in my room and Polly can babysit us except we’ll have to do it over a weekend so he won’t be at school instead.

And give Mystic Maya and Mr Nick a romantic weekend alone! It sounds so perfect! ^o^

THEN ITS SETTLED~! Lets do it this weekend! Will miss Maya be free?

Oh yes, I can ask the elders to keep her skedyuel open, like she does when you come up to visit!

Excellent! I can get the train tickets with my pocket money and surprise Daddy with them :D.

I think I will wait to tell Mystic Maya until I leave, so she can be surprised when Mr Nick gets here!

Oh and we must try not to look excited. I think I may have just made Mystic Maya suspishus already. :;

Hmmm :/h Keeping secrets from Daddy is hard, but I think I can do it! Operation Get A New Mommy is go!

o I forgot Mr Nick had Mystic Maya’s magatama! Good luck, Trucy!

Don’t worry about me, soldier C: I can handle Daddy, you look after miss Maya!

Phoenix was beginning to regret getting Trucy her own phone.

Sure, it had seemed like a good idea at the time, after she had managed to lose her friend in the park last Halloween. He and Maya had laughed at the realisation that Pearl was similarly getting her own phone for different reasons, and wouldn’t it be the cutest thing to see their faces light up as they were given each other’s numbers?

Then Trucy had shoved a backpack she had packed herself into Phoenix’s hands and showed him a ticket for the next train to Kurain.

Phoenix frowned, looking sceptically at the bag in his hands. "Truce, did Pearls set you up to Trucy scoffed, crossing her arms. "Nobody 'set me up'!" she protested. "Pearly and I agreed that you and Miss Maya need some time together! You aren't making any effort to find us a new Mommy anyway!"

Apollo and Luke, stood not far away, glanced at each other in confusion. "That's what this is about?" Apollo cried, equal parts surprised and exasperated. "You want to hook Dad up with Maya!"

Phoenix sighed, rubbing his forehead. "Truce, I thought you were already over this..."

"Exactly," Luke added, raising an eyebrow as he gave his sister a look. "Why are you doing this now?"

Trucy grinned innocently. "Well, we can't have Polly babysit me and Pearly if he's at school!" she explained.

Apollo shook his head fiercely, almost laughing in disbelief. "Oh no you don't! Leave me out of this!" Waving his hands, he promptly turned around and headed upstairs, cape flapping behind him.

Phoenix again sighed, wishing it was as easy for him to deny any involvement in his daughter's plot. "Trucy, please tell me you haven't arranged for Pearls to stay here while you've got me up in Kurain..."

"Yup!" Trucy chirped, then pushed her train ticket into his hands and pulled her father towards the door. "Now come on, Daddy! You need to get to the train station before your train leaves!"

To Phoenix's surprise, Luke ran up to the pair, helping Trucy hurry their father out the door. "May as well go, Papa," he said, a smile on his face. "No use wasting Trucy and Pearl's effort to set it all up!"

Phoenix shot Luke a glare, standing very deliberately still. "You didn't help them with this, did you?"

"Of course not!" Luke replied, offended, although he quickly smiled. "But you'll say hi to Maya for us while you're there, won't you?"

Groaning in exasperation, Phoenix gave up fighting his children and headed out the door. "You two are so grounded when I get back!" he threatened over his shoulder, but the pair only giggled as they waved goodbye.

Wright Talent Agency
Reception

Pearl looked around in awe as she was shown through the front door of the Agency, taking in how much the room had changed since her last visit almost three years previous. Various magic paraphernalia still dotted the walls and shelves, as did photos and drawings of Trucy and Apollo in their stage outfits, usually in the middle of a trick. In a corner was the piano Maya had brought in long ago, a portrait on top while a violin case rested on the stool, a brand new music stand stood nearby with a host of music books resting open to their owner's favourite pieces. The desk that had once held an array of scribbled ideas from Trucy now housed a much tidier array of Apollo's papers and books, the teen having claimed the reception as his place to work. On the reception desk was a stack of fliers, which Phoenix had recently redesigned, featuring a colourful lineless pattern of two top hats and a ribbon of music notes encircling them, coming from a violin on one side and a piano keyboard on the other. Underneath, a new text-box proudly proclaimed the magician pair were now doing matinee performances at the Wonder Bar.

Pearl tore her eyes away from the fliers on the desk, walking over to where Charley stood next to the door and running a hand along his leaves. "I was expecting things to have changed here," she said, "but I wasn't expecting things to have changed quite so much."

Luke and Trucy glanced at each other, each feeling guilty for their own parts in the transformation of their family home since they moved in. "It sort of looked like a boring office when Daddy adopted me, though," Trucy explained, shrugging. "A talent agency has to look fun and inviting!"

Luke rubbed at the back of his head. "Actually, now I have the two of you here," he said, pausing to sternly cross his arms, looking between the two girls. "I thought we agreed trying to push Papa and Maya together would just push them further away! Why are you two forcing them to be romantic!?"

The girls winced. "We got impatient," Trucy admitted, wringing her hands.

"We're sorry, Luke," Pearl added, staring at the floor.

Luke sighed, but gave the girls a smile. "I suppose I can't blame you for being impatient. Papa and Maya haven't really had much of an opportunity to just be friends, have they?" He laughed. "If nothing else, I suppose they can have fun spending time together!"

"And get a chance to finally confess their feelings!" Pearl added, hands clasped together while her eyes sparkled hopefully.

Trucy squealed, running to Pearl's side. "Yeah! We can make a ring for Daddy to propose with!"

Luke frowned as the girls giggled together. "Um, they're not even a couple yet," he pointed out, but the girls weren't listening, already running off further into the house. Shaking his head, he locked the front door and moved to follow them.

In the kitchen, Luke found Apollo had ventured downstairs and was now standing forlornly in the middle of the room, Trucy and Pearl standing either side of him as Trucy asked her brother an endless series of questions about how he planned to be watching over them until Phoenix's return the next day. "Are you going to force us to go to bed? Maybe Pearly and I want to have a sleepover and stay up all night! You're not going to make me do homework, are you? That would be rude while we have a guest over! Are we allowed to go out to the park?"

"Better question," Apollo interrupted, pushing through the girls and walking over to Luke as he spotted him coming in. "We have a performance tonight and two tomorrow. What's Pearly planning to do while we're working?" He spun around and glared at the pair, arms crossed. "Did you even think of that?"

The girls looked at each other blankly. "N-no, I guess we didn't," Pearl admitted.
"Yeah," Trucy muttered in agreement, crossing her arms and tapping a foot in thought. "I suppose you could come watch us? Except Polly can't look after you from backstage..."

Luke giggled. "I can do it while you two are busy," he pointed out.

"Oh, that's a good idea!" Pearl cried, hands pressed together. "And could we go watch one of your performances?" she asked Apollo.

Apollo and Luke shared an amused glance. "Don't see why not," Apollo said, shrugging. "You okay to sit through yet another of our boring old acts, Luke?"

"Sure," Luke laughed. "You promise not to try and call me up as a volunteer?"

"I make no promises," Apollo replied with a smirk.

"Yay!" Trucy cheered, bouncing in place before turning to Pearl. "C'mon Pearly, let's get my room set up for our sleepover!"

Pearl nodded, replying "Okay!" before following Trucy up the stairs. "You're in my old room, aren't you?"

Apollo watched the two disappear before sighing in relief. "Man, I'm glad we got that sorted out," he said, turning to Luke with a suspicious glare. "Did you have anything to do with this?"

"Of course not!" Luke immediately replied, offended. "Why does everyone think I did!?"

"Maybe because you've told me before that you thought Dad and Maya were a couple when you first met them?" Apollo pointed out, one eyebrow raised.

Luke blushed, shrugging. "Well, yeah, but..." He frowned. "Wait, Papa doesn't know that, so why did he think I was involved in this!?"

"Probably because you're terrible at keeping secrets even without Dad's precious maggy-tama thing," Apollo replied, smiling. "It's beyond obvious you agree with them." He paused before giving his brother a smug smirk. "You're not jealous because Trucy and Pearly didn't involve you in their 'brilliant' plan, are you?"

"Very funny," Luke muttered, looking away to hide that he actually was, though only a little bit. He turned and headed back out towards reception. "I'm going to practise my violin for a bit."

"Don't let me catch you sending 'romance' tips to Dad and Maya, huh?" Apollo laughed.

"Stop it!"

Phoenix was somewhat surprised to find Maya waiting for him at the bus-stop as he arrived, nervously pressing her palms together as she gave him an embarrassed smile. "Hi," Phoenix greeted her, waving.

"Hey," Maya replied, giving him a small bow and pausing only momentarily before exploding with, "I'm so sorry about Pearly, I had no idea she was going to do this, I only just found her letter!"

Phoenix laughed, equally embarrassed. "Hey, I had no idea what Trucy was doing, too. And I've got the magatama!"

Maya sighed. "Yeah, I guess so," she admitted, watching the bus driving back down to the train station. "I s'pose I'd better show you in then? At least it was just a visit they arranged this time."

Nodding, Phoenix smiled in agreement, pulling his beanie off his head. "Sure. I should probably take a look at what Trucy decided I would need while I was here." He gestured to his backpack with a thumb.

Maya led Phoenix across the road and into Fey Manor, where the two paused for a moment as Phoenix dropped his backpack and sat down to remove his shoes. "Any idea what might have prompted them to do this?" Phoenix asked.

"Probably just both of them talking over the phone," Maya pointed out, referencing how both girls had received their own phones the previous Christmas. She sighed. "And we thought it was so funny when we arranged to give them each other's number..."

Phoenix kicked off his second shoe. "You think Luke's involved? He seemed awfully supportive of them kicking me up here."

Phoenix paused a moment in thought before standing up. "Why would Trucy care?" he pointed out, deciding to change the subject rather than discuss his suspicions concerning Luke. "Pearls has probably been talking to them." He rested his hands on his hips. "Apollo certainly seemed to already know what they want us to do."

"Oh yeah, Pearly," Maya sighed, leading Phoenix further into the house towards the guest room that was usually reserved for him when the Wrights visited. "I'm sorry about that..."

Phoenix followed his friend in silence, and, when they reached his room, was quick to dump his backpack on the bed, gesturing for Maya to sit down with him. "That's my other question," he said. "How exactly did Pearls get it in her head that we were 'special someones'? She was already going on about it the day I met her!"

Maya scratched at an ear, nervously entering the room. "Well," she mumbled, "I suppose I should finally admit..." She sighed, then sat down next to a curious Phoenix. "I... sort of accidentally implied..."
Phoenix nodded, remembering those few months well. He'd fought as hard as he could to keep Edgeworth from wrongly going to jail, and Maya had been fighting equally hard the whole time to try and channel Mia to help, but was simply unable to do it through lack of practise. After an emotional conversation at the train station, she'd promised to come back once she'd finished her training, but that still left Phoenix in the empty office day after day, all alone and directionless for a full six months. If it hadn't been for a timely interruption by the Skye sisters, Phoenix was sure he'd have moped back and forth between the office and his old flat until the day he reunited with Maya. "What, was it the story of how I defended you for murder?" he asked. "I suppose she could have seen Mia asking us to look after each other as some 'destined love' thing."

Maya looked away, blushing. "A-actually," she replied, unsure of her words, "it was... less what I said and more... how I said it..."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "What do you mean?"

"I..." Maya took a deep breath, staring at the floor. "I sort of... used to have a big crush on you."

While Maya turned even redder, Phoenix's eyes widened. "You had a crush on me?"

"Well, can you blame me!?" Maya shot back, finally looking up to meet her shocked friend's eyes as her skin colour slowly returned to normal. "Sis told me all about her talented junior partner, then suddenly she's dead, and I thought everything was hopeless and I was going to die too, but you insisted on defending me despite us being total strangers and won, not only saving my life but being the first person to beat Edgeworth in court, and to top it all off you were a really great guy too!" She groaned in frustration. "I think I even told you you'd made me a fan!"

At that, Phoenix couldn't resist a snort of laughter, the shock wearing off. "Well, you did start up that fan club," he pointed out, gently teasing her. "Doesn't that technically make you still a fan?"

Maya crossed her arms, looking away again. "I just did that out of pity," she insisted. "Because you were always under-appreciated by everyone."

Phoenix found it amusing how she was apparently unable to quickly construct an excuse that actually mocked her closest friend. He was about to open his mouth to respond when he saw five Psyche-Locks materialising around her, and instead scoffed. "Yeah, don't know why you're trying to hide that you're a fan," he pointed out, reaching into his jeans pocket to pull out the glowing green magatama, which he examined closely. "I actually forgot I still had this on me. I would've left it with Pearls if I'd remembered."

Maya only blushed, tensing up as the Psyche-Locks didn't even shake.

The lack of response instantly killed Phoenix's teasing mood. "Maya?"

"It's fine," Maya quietly insisted, then turned to Phoenix with a forced smile. "That's what Apollo and Luke say all the time, right? It's fine! Let's talk about something else."

Phoenix frowned. "Maya, please tell me what's wrong," he replied, twisting on the bed to give his friend his heartfelt request, the magatama clutched tightly in his hand. "If something's worrying you, I want to help."

"Ugh!" Maya cried, turning away with a pout. "It's nothing! Just because I'm keeping a secret, it doesn't mean anything bad is going on!" When Phoenix only crossed his arms in response, she shot him a glare over her shoulder. "You care that much, try breaking them. I can guarantee you'll be disappointed."

Phoenix stared at Maya for a few moments before sighing in defeat. 'She's right, I'll have to try breaking these to figure out what's going on. It's almost hard to focus through all the 'what ifs' though. And where am I going to find the evidence to back up my guesses?' Rubbing at his chin in thought, he mused aloud, "Well, my first guess was that you were hiding being a fan of mine, but I suppose I should have known better than to think such an innocent secret was behind five Psyche-Locks." When Maya didn't react to the comment, he reflected on their conversation a little longer, wondering where to start. "I suppose, going backwards in order of what we've been talking about... Does it have anything to do with that crush you mentioned?"

The five Psyche-Locks shook as though they were about to break, Maya's posture tightening up as she firmly kept her back to Phoenix. After a moment, the Locks again stilled, remaining attached to the illusionary chains surrounding Maya in her seat.

"I'll take that as a yes, I guess," Phoenix muttered as he went pale, trying not to sound as suddenly overwhelmed as he felt.

"You could say that," Maya whispered, head bowed as one of the Psyche-Locks, to Phoenix's surprise, simply faded away instead of shattering. He wondered if the unusual disappearance was Maya consciously deciding to put less effort into keeping her secret, rather than having the detail dragged out of her. "You're on the right track, anyway."

Phoenix sat for a while in thought. After a long pause, he stood up. "I think I can guess the answer," he quietly said, dropping the magatama onto the bed. "I'll leave you alone."

Maya looked around just in time to see Phoenix walk past her, heading straight out the door and into the hallway outside, out of sight. "Nick...?" Her arms moved up to hug herself tightly as it registered Phoenix had actually walked off and left her alone. "Oh no... He... He knows..." Biting her lip to keep from suddenly bursting into tears, Maya pushed herself to her feet, feeling a sudden urge to run far away and hide, although she would settle for locking herself in her room. 'Why did I tell him!? What was I thinking!?" As she lamented not having any work to do this weekend thanks to Pearl's meddling, the Master of Kurain took wobbly steps out of the guest room and burst into a sprint towards the master bedroom, hoping she wouldn't pass Phoenix on the way. It wasn't merely that she didn't want him to see her crying, but she didn't want him to see her at all. 'He's guessed my crush never really went away, I know it! He's walked off because it's shameful that I couldn't change how I feel even after all this time! How can we be friends with this hanging over us!?'

When Maya reached her bedroom, she slammed the door closed and threw herself onto her bed, hugging her pillow as she let out her tears, muffling them into the soft fabric. It was going to be a long time before she felt up to making human contact again.

View the Court Record
Fey Manor was unusually quiet that day, its only two inhabitants carefully avoiding each other as they sat silently in their individual bedrooms. It was only once the sun had set that their alone time was finally up; Maya ventured out into the kitchen to make dinner, and, upon finishing, rang the customary dinner bell to alert the household of the evening meal. When Phoenix arrived, he found her already eating, avoiding eye contact and conversation, so he silently sat down on the floor cushion opposite her and reached for his fork. Instead of eating however, he ignored the hunger eating at his stomach (he had missed lunch, after all) and looked across the table at his friend. "Luke wanted me to say 'hi', by the way."

Maya's eyes screwed shut, and she slammed her chopsticks to the table, staring red-faced at Phoenix. "Do you hate me!?"

Phoenix blinked, confused. "H-huh?"

"You asked me about my secret, and it wasn't a yes-or-no answer, but you figured it out anyway, didn't you!?" Maya continued, looking more and more visibly stressed with every word she said. "You hate me, I know you do! Because I can't control how I feel and I've tried to stop but I can't help it even though I know it can never happen and I don't deserve to be your friend!"

Phoenix, still a little nonplussed over the sudden emotional outburst, rushed to his feet and around the table, offering his friend a calming hug. "Maya, it's okay, calm down!" She clung to his chest the moment he sat on the floor beside her, crying ugly tears into his hoodie. "I could never hate you! Why did you think I would?"

Maya sniffed, hiding her face in shame. "You walked off in disgust, didn't you?"

"What!? Of course not!" Phoenix cried in surprise. "I..." He paused, blushing as he pondered how best to put his complicated thoughts on the matter. He settled on the nearest believable excuse, one with a convenient amount of truth in it. "I realised your secret was a personal one and I had no right to pry. I walked off because..." He paused again. "I... needed some time. To figure out what I thought about it." He shook his head. "I'd never hate you, Maya. You mean too much to me."

There was a short pause before Maya nodded, hugging her friend tightly as she occasionally sniffed to herself. "When Pearly gets back," she whispered, words muffled as she spoke into Phoenix's chest, "I'll talk to her. Tell her why we could never be... what she thinks we are."

Phoenix smiled. "And why would you do that?"

Maya paused, confused, and pulled out of the hug to direct her tear-stained face at Phoenix. "Huh?"

Shrugging, Phoenix tried not to grin. "Well, the kids see you as a mother anyway, don't they? Apollo and Trucy, I mean. May as well let them have a mom while their other one is missing. Luke too, possibly." He cleared his throat, looking away from Maya's thoughtful face. "Plus I kinda feel the same way about you so I can't blame you," he muttered under his breath, pretending he'd said nothing as he immediately followed it up with, "And Pearls would stop bugging us if we let her believe she'd succeeded anyway, so-"

"What was that?" Maya asked, smirking as she interrupted his speech. "Did you just say what I think you said?"

Phoenix feigned ignorance, trying not to blush. "What, about Pearls not bugging us, or asking Luke if he'd take you on as a second mom?" He shrugged, forcing a mischievous smile. "I know it's shocking, but he accepted me as a dad, so anything's possible."

Maya laughed, shaking her head as she whacked Phoenix's chest with the back of a hand. "Inbetween that! You know full well what I'm talking about!"

"Nope, 'fraid not," Phoenix insisted, half-jokingly, rubbing at the back of his neck as his face turned pink. "Pretty sure you just imagined it."

"I did not!" Maya replied, laughing. "You said you felt the same way, you dork!" She laughed a moment more, watching Phoenix blush as he avoided eye contact, then clasped her hands together, grinning at her friend. "Just so we're on the same page," she said, gathering up all of her courage. "I love you, Nick."

Phoenix paused only a moment before meeting her eyes, arm lowered back down to rest in his lap. He leaned towards her a little, a part of him still nervous about being overheard despite being totally alone with her. "I love you too, Maya," he whispered.

To Phoenix's surprise, Maya squealed loudly, wriggling in glee as she gave Phoenix a quick hug, feeling it was wrong to do much more just yet. "Wow, it's such a relief to get that out finally!" she cried. "Like, I was thinking we'd legitimately never discuss this, and here we are!"

Chuckling, Phoenix nodded in agreement. "It is a bit of a relief, isn't it? What have we been doing all these years when we should have been having this conversation?" he joked. 'Including putting it off by saying we took too long to get to this point?'

Maya shifted in her seat, grinning as she turned her back to Phoenix and leaned on him like a chair, his arms automatically moving to support her. "I took ages even figuring it out myself," she admitted. "I mean, I always knew I had a crush on you, but after a few years I noticed how long we'd known each other and it was like 'at what point has it stopped being a crush, Maya?'." She huffed, twisting her head to look up at Phoenix. "Y'know?"

"I can guess," Phoenix replied, laughing to himself. "I was in denial about it until... well, today, I suppose."

"Today?" Maya repeated, surprised. "Really?"

"In retrospect, it's a bit obvious," he reasoned, more to himself than Maya. "I mean, the way I reacted all those times I thought I'd lost you forever... I think I knew, but I was pretending I didn't, because it hurt to think it would never happen." He winced. "Also... it kinda felt like it would be betraying Mia to think of you that way. I figure I've disappointed her enough by now, so what's one more thing?"

At his confession, Maya frowned, then pushed herself back up and spun to face Phoenix. "Is this the real reason you've been refusing to just admit to her what happened with your badge?"

"What? No!" Phoenix cried, crossing his arms defensively. "I'm just not ready to tell her yet!"
"It's been almost three years, Nick," Maya pointed out. "I talk to Sis once a year on my birthday, when Pearly channels her for me and we spend some quality time together like we used to." She paused a moment, fiddling with her hands in her lap. "She always asks after you, y'know."

Phoenix looked away guiltily.

Maya thought for a moment, then reached out to rub Phoenix's arm in comfort. "In the interest of not keeping any more secrets," she admitted, "I couldn't lie to her face. I've already told her basically what happened."

Phoenix sighed, now feeling doubly terrible. "Sorry to make you have to be the one to do that," he mumbled. "I should have been the one to break it to her."

"She doesn't hate you, if you're wondering," Maya continued, a small smile on her face. "She does want to hear it from you, but I think she's also dying to hear about the kids." She giggled. "Dying literally!"

It took a moment for the joke to register through Phoenix's moping, and he shot an amused glare at Maya. "That was terrible."

"Made ya smile, though!" Maya pointed out, moments before a loud gurgling cut through their conversation and the pair looked down at Phoenix's stomach in surprise.

Phoenix grinned in embarrassment, looking over at the abandoned table holding their half-finished and untouched dinners respectively. "I think that's a sign we should eat our food before it gets cold."

Maya shrugged, grinning in amusement. "Yeah, probably," she agreed. She watched Phoenix walking back over to his seat on the opposite side of the table, quickly tucking into his noodles, and smiled as she picked up her chopsticks to follow his lead. "We should probably also talk about... well, us," she pointed out. "Are we actually 'special someones' now, like Pearly's always said?"

Phoenix mused on the question as he swallowed his mouthful. "Isn't it still shameful for the Master of Kurain to be involved with the Forgin' Attorney?" he replied, somewhat bitterly.

Maya scoffed. "Who cares!? You're my best friend in the whole world... or, well, boyfriend now? And I don't care who knows it or what they think!"

"Even Kristoph Gavin?" Phoenix pointed out, eyebrow raised.

"Even him!" Maya huffed, cheeks puffing out. "Seriously, what can that guy do to me that I haven't already lived through? And how would it impact your investigation, anyway!?"

Phoenix rolled his eyes. "One, he might still hurt you, and two..." He paused, having to recall if he had any reasons from years before. "I'm sure I had a reason for two. I'll get back to two."

Maya scoffed. "Why would he possibly hurt me? He's, what, forged some evidence and framed you for it? Doesn't sound like a violent person to me!"

Although annoyed, Phoenix was forced to concede that point. "Even so, I'd never met the guy before and he very likely arranged to take me down simply because Enigmar changed attorneys at the last minute. Isn't Kurain in a bad enough position that he could easily do the same to you should Trucy mention how close you two are?"

Maya picked at her noodles. "Hmm. I guess that is a thing," she agreed, then scowled. "Stupid Kurain. Wasn't enough to take my mom, my dad, my aunt, my uncle, my sister and my cousins, was it? Has to take Nick too!"

Phoenix gave her a sympathetic smile. "I'm not going anywhere, I promise," he told her. "Let's just finish eating and we can discuss this properly then."

[View the Court Record]
After dinner, and a long talk, Maya took Phoenix's hand and led him to her bedroom. Cushions were placed opposite each other on the floor, and the pair sat down, Maya carefully adjusting her robes to cause the least discomfort for her sister's larger frame. "You ready?" she asked.

Phoenix nervously scratched his neck as he made himself comfortable on the cushion. "We're not doing this in the Channelling Chamber?"

"Pfft, you think Mia's the kind of spirit to cause trouble?" Maya replied, laughing. "We've done this a ton of times before, remember?"

"Yeah," Phoenix mumbled, embarrassed, "I just thought you'd told me it was some rule that every channelling in Kurain had to..."

Maya shook her head. "Mia's a Fey. She doesn't count," she insisted, then took a deep breath, preparing herself. "Ready?"

Phoenix thought a moment, then slowly nodded, staring at the floor as he pushed his hands into his hoodie pockets. He was still nervous about confronting Mia after all this time, knowing she would be disappointed in him, but Maya's assurances that everything would be okay had given him the confidence to agree to see her tonight... not that the conversation he'd just finished with Maya about their complicated relationship was making it easier to bear.

"Phoenix?"

Phoenix just barely resisted a wince at the sound of his mentor's voice, and slowly looked up to meet Mia's eyes. "H-hi."

Mia briefly paused, pushing Maya's fringe to one side as she furrowed her brow in Phoenix's direction. "Is something the matter?"

'Ooh yeah, Maya probably told her to act surprised when I finally got around to confronting her on this.' Sighing, Phoenix looked back to the floor. "I know you know. Maya said she already told you."

There was a short pause before Mia replied, "I would have preferred to hear it from you."

"I know." Phoenix wasn't sure if it was possible to feel more guilty than he did right now.

"You could always elaborate on what Maya told me," Mia continued. "She said something about forged evidence and that you'd been stripped of your badge, but not much more." She paused, then quietly added, "You really worried her."

Phoenix nodded, then forced himself to meet his mentor's concerned gaze. "Long story short, someone slipped me forged evidence and told the prosecution I was going to present it. I'd run out of options, so I... I didn't think, I just threw it out as a last-ditch attempt to get my client acquitted." He shook his head, looking away again. "The prosecution jumped on me, brought out the guy who'd even made the damn thing. Then, to top it all off, my client vanished from the courtroom before he could be declared guilty. I'm pretty sure people were thinking I helped him, too." He sighed. "They took my badge that afternoon. Only one guy on the board wanted to give me a second chance, and he offered his help later, but..." He looked up again, seeing Mia's hand resting on her chin as she paid him her full attention, the neutral expression on her face marred only by the slight furrowing of her brow. "Edgeworth helped me out investigating what happened, and we don't have any evidence to prove it, but it's looking like this guy was the one to betray me in the first place. His name's Kristoph Gavin, but I don't think he was practising yet when you died."

Mia shook her head. "No, I've not heard of him," she confirmed. "Although working to convict someone with not much evidence? That's a struggle I can certainly relate to."

Phoenix softly smiled at the memory of how they'd taken down Redd White in the courtroom, only a matter of days after Mia's murder, although the smile quickly died. "He's not as bad as White," he explained. "Not a murderer, I mean. The guards at the detention center apparently saw him talking with my client before he hired me, and he's the brother of the prosecutor who cornered me in court. Edgeworth says the prosecutor checks out, and the guy left the country after anyway, so there's really no-one else we could say is responsible."

"But not enough evidence to convince a court," Mia concluded, frowning in thought, "you're right. What's your strategy then?"

"Pretend I know nothing," Phoenix replied. "Kristoph drops by my new place of work every so often, and we've invited each other to dinner a few times, so I think I can say he considers me a friend." He shrugged. "Basically, I'm biding my time until I can either find the evidence to clear my name... or he finally slips up big time."

Mia thought to herself in silence, nodding absently in agreement.

"Edgeworth also has a big plan for what we could do," Phoenix continued. "We're working together on a new system of court that might allow us to convict Kristoph even with what we have."

Mia looked intrigued, though stern. "That sounds like a potentially dangerous thing to be able to do," she pointed out.

Phoenix shrugged sheepishly. "We are still working on it. In the meantime, I'm also trying to track down my former client. If I could just get him to tell me the truth, I might be able to clear his name... as well as some other things." He returned to staring at the ground, leaving a long pause before he resumed talking. "You're disappointed in me, right?"

Mia didn't reply immediately. "I don't think anyone could beat you up about this more than you already have," she said. "I am sad circumstances have left you in this position, but it's very heartening that you have a plan, and friends to help you." She gave Phoenix a smile as he carefully lifted his head back up. "But, of course, that isn't the only thing you have yet to tell me about, is it?"

After a short, confused pause, Phoenix broke into a grin. "Oh, right, the kids!" He reached into a pocket in his jeans and pulled out a small photo, which he handed over to an interested Mia. "That's them! Apollo's the oldest, on the right, then that's Luke on the left and Trucy in the middle! She's the youngest," he explained, almost giddy at the rare chance to gush about the trio. "This was them the first weekend after Apollo and Luke's adoption, so they're quite a bit older now. I should arrange a new photo actually. Oh, and Trucy and Apollo are talented magicians! They have a show every weekend, in this bar not far from the office, and they always draw in a crowd! Luke's very smart too, he sometimes performs with his violin to help out with bringing money in, and he's going to study to become a vet once he finishes school in July. He's already skipped a few years, so I like to think of him as a prodigy in his own right-

Mia laughed, surprising Phoenix into halting his impassioned spiel. "And to think, you're the same man who couldn't connect with a seven-year-old boy back in... how long ago was that? Five, six years ago? And here you are now, a proud father of three!"

Phoenix blushed. "W-well... They're my kids. They may not be biologically, but they're mine all the same. I can't help but be proud of 'em."

"Every father should," Mia replied, smiling fondly at her former student. She handed him back the photo. "Maybe one day I could meet them in person."

"Yeah," Phoenix agreed, casting a fond look at the photo before putting it away again. "A-actually, Mia... there is one more thing."

Mia raised an eyebrow, arms crossed under her ample bosom. "Something else?"

"The only reason I'm up here this weekend," Phoenix explained, "is because of Pearls. She's been talking to Trucy you see, and apparently Luke too..."

"Ah," Mia sighed. "Yes, I can imagine." She smiled, amused. "So now you have two little girls and a teenage boy trying to set you up romantically with my little sister?"

Phoenix nervously rubbed at the back of his head, looking away as his face started turning red. "Mmm," he mumbled, biting his lip as he failed to find an adequate reply. "Yeah, about that... Maya and I were talking today and..."

"And they've succeeded?"

Phoenix winced, looking up at Mia's knowing smile. "Y-you're not disappointed...?"

Mia laughed. "Why would I be?" she replied. "Maya's almost twenty-three, she can make her own decisions," She looked off into the distance thoughtfully. "She's nearly as old as I was when I met Diego." Smiling mischievously, Mia gave Phoenix a wink. "She's certainly older than you were when you last had a girlfriend."

Groaning at the thought of the red-head she was referring to, Phoenix hid his face behind a hand. "D-don't remind me," he muttered.

"Not to mention," Mia continued, "if there's anyone I can trust to look after Maya, it's you, Phoenix. You've always given it your all protecting her, and I don't expect that to change if you decide to 'upgrade' your relationship, in a sense. And, in return, there's no-one I can trust to look after you more than her. You're good for each other. Far more than I expected when I first asked you to look after each other."

Phoenix thought for a moment, hands clutched together in his lap.

"Of course, there is the problem of your and Kurain's reputations," Mia pointed out with a concerned frown, hand brushing against her cheek. "You two thought about that, didn't you?"

Phoenix scoffed. "Of course we did," he replied. "Maya wants to go ahead no matter what anyone thinks, but I've convinced her we can still do this while keeping everything quiet." He smiled. "She's actually coming down into the city with me tomorrow, to break it to the kids. She's going to offer to be their mother, I think."

Mia slowly smiled, marveling at how much her sister's life was about to change. After a pause, she looked around. "Is there any paper around? I'd like to leave a message for her myself."

"Uh, yeah, over here," Phoenix said, getting to his feet and leading the former spirit medium to Maya's desk against the wall. He gestured to a piece of paper and pen set out ready to be used, explaining, "Maya figured you might want to, so she left that out for you."

Mia nodded, pulling the seat out from the desk but pausing before sitting down, turning to Phoenix. "You two will look after each other as well as those kids of yours, won't you?"

Phoenix gave her an offended look. "Of course I will! Maya, too! What do you take us for?"

"Good," she replied, giving her former student a loving smile. "Maybe I'll talk to you again soon."

"Until then," Phoenix said, nodding his goodbye with a grateful smile before turning to leave. "Tell Maya I'll be in my room if she wants me again tonight," he asked.

Mia sat at the desk, laughing to herself. "I will," she promised. "Until next time, Phoenix."

"Phoenix?"

"Oh, hey Chief. Do we have a case?"

"Afraid not. Are you free tonight?"

"... Why?"

"My sister's coming into town, so I thought maybe we could all go out to dinner and introduce you to each other. If you're busy, we can-"

"Oh, no, I'm not doing anything. Was just planning on lazing around my apartment, really."

"Ah, that's good! So it's settled, then."

"... You're really going to introduce me to this fabled sister of yours?"

"'Fabled'? Haha! She's said the same thing about you, y'know."

"Really? What's so 'fabled' about me?"

"You'll have to ask her that. Come back to the office around nine? We can go out together from here."

"Sure, I'll be back here at nine."

"Then it's a date."

Fey & Co. Law Offices
Reception

The office was unusually dark when Phoenix arrived, out of breath from the sprint as he'd raced to regain lost time. He glanced at his watch as he leaned against the door, closing it behind him, and groaned. 'Still late!' Chastising himself, he looked around the empty room, registering the quiet darkness. 'Guess they left without me.' Sighing, he moved to round his desk, intending to leave an apology note for when Mia returned, but something halted him in his tracks. 'What's that smell...?' He sniffed for a moment, then froze, eyes going wide. 'Blood...? Mia!' Barely pausing for thought, the twenty-three-year-old ran to the office door in front of him, pushing at the wood panelling and throwing it open.

Underneath the window, sat against the wall where the glow from the streetlights outside didn't quite reach her, was Mia Fey, slumped and lifeless with an ominous red stain in her long brown hair. At her side was crouched a teenage girl in strange purple robes, fearfully reaching out towards the woman's face as her eyes filled with tears. "Sis..."

Phoenix didn't give the girl a second thought. "Chief!" he shouted, racing into the room towards the unfortunate scene.

The girl was up like a shot, staring at Phoenix with wide eyes as she jumped back, towards the spray of broken glass on the carpet behind her. "W-who...?"

Torn between checking on his mentor and curiosity towards the strange girl, Phoenix paused, looking her up and down. "Who are you?" he replied to her unspoken question.

The girl was breathing hard, and Phoenix worried she would faint. "I... I didn't..." After a short pause, her eyes rolled up into her head and she collapsed.

"Whoa, whoa!" Phoenix reacted quickly, just managing to catch the teen before she fell onto the broken glass below. 'Just my luck. She's out cold.' He looked between the girl and Mia for a few moments before sighing and hoisting the girl into his arms, carrying her back into reception. Opposite his desk, next to the front door, was a black leather sofa, and he carefully laid her down on the soft surface. 'I have a feeling she's not going to try and run,' Phoenix decided, looking at the girl's strange outfit once more. 'I should probably get back to the chief, though.' Wincing to himself, he ran back into the office, stepping over the mess littered across the floor as he made his way to Mia's side, crouching much like the girl had been.

"Ch-Chief?" Phoenix rested a hand on Mia's shoulder, able to feel the residual warmth of life through her black suit. Biting his lip, he carefully shook her, hoping her stillness was just a trick of the dim light. "Chief?" There was no response, and Phoenix realised he could already feel the warmth fading away. Ignoring the pricking at his eyes, he shook her again, a little more forcefully. "Chief? M... Mia?" He felt his throat closing up, and, as the cold began to set in against his fingers, he lowered his head. "Ch-Chief..." Resting his forehead against her shoulder, Phoenix screwed his eyes shut. He allowed himself only a minute or two to mourn, then pulled himself to his feet, wiping at his eyes with a sleeve. 'It's hard seeing her like this, but if there are any clues here... I'm gonna need my camera.' Turning towards the door, he strode back out into reception.

The first thing Phoenix noticed as he rounded the corner was that the strange girl had disappeared. 'Where'd she go!? Uh oh, I hope she didn't run on me.' Running a hand through his black, spiky locks, he stepped over towards his desk, only to suddenly come face to face with the girl, stood by the bookshelves next to the door, where she had been just out of sight. "Yipes!" Phoenix yelped as he jumped in shock, the girl gasping as she similarly stepped back. The pair stared at each other with wide eyes for a very long moment before Phoenix took a deep breath, calming himself down. "Um, excuse me but," he asked, "who are you?"

The girl didn't respond, looking away nervously as she fiddled with her sleeves.

Phoenix took another deep breath. "It's okay," he assured her. "I work here."

This seemed to perk the girl up, as she looked back to Phoenix, apparently studying him intensely with her eyes. It didn't take long for her gaze to lock on to the brand new badge sitting on Phoenix's lapel. "Maya," she eventually replied. "Maya Fey."

Phoenix blinked in surprise. "Maya... Fey?"

The girl, Maya, nodded.
"So, you're the chief's...?"

"Sister," Maya confirmed. "I'm her younger sister."

Phoenix nodded. *The chief did say her sister was visiting... Didn't think I'd be meeting her under quite these circumstances, though."

"She said she wanted me to keep some evidence for her," Maya continued, returning to fiddling with a sleeve.

"Evidence?" Phoenix repeated, confused. But we don't have a case right now...?

Maya only nodded, looking distressed. "I-it was that clock," she whispered. "It was 'The Thinker'."

Phoenix's eyes widened in surprise, and he resisted the urge to slap his own face out of frustration. Should have known. Everything Larry touches is cursed. He looked around, spotting his suitcase where he'd left it under his own desk, and moved to retrieve it. While he busied his hands with the job of pulling the suitcase onto the desk and opening it, he watched Maya out of the corner of his eye. She seems to be in shock... To be honest, I probably am too. Regardless, I have to know what happened, and I don't want to disturb her, but... Pulling his almost brand new tablet computer from its home, he closed the suitcase and turned to the girl. "Um, Maya, was it?" When the girl nodded, looking up at him curiously, he continued, "Can you tell me what happened?"

Maya thought for a moment, looking like she was fighting back tears. "I came in," she whispered. "The room was dark." She sniffed, rubbing at her nose with an arm. "And Sis... Sis..."

Phoenix winced as he watched the girl start to quietly cry. With no idea how to offer comfort to a stranger, he opted instead to leave the room. The chief was already dead. That was all I needed to know.

In the office, Phoenix couldn't help but feel choked up looking down at his mentor's body. Chief... You helped push me to become a defence attorney, took me in as your junior partner, helped me so much even before I passed the bar... and now you're... He shook his head. Moping later. Police. Gotta call the police. Shoving the tablet under an arm, Phoenix looked around for the office phone and quickly located it on the low table, still intact by the upset lounge chair. Carefully stepping over the rubble, he leaned down and picked up the receiver, only for it to mysteriously open right down the middle in his hand, only one or two badly connected screws holding the casing together. W-what the...!?!

A scream shattered the quiet atmosphere, and Phoenix spun around, feeling his heart stop. Across the street, looking out of a window from the luxurious hotel opposite, was a woman with pink hair, a phone in her hand as she stared right at Phoenix. "Police!?" she shouted. "Please, come quick!"

Phoenix felt the phone drop from his hand in surprise, watching as the woman spun around to run back into her room. The hell was that!? he asked himself, then shook his head, breathing deeply to force himself to calm down. Police. Police are taken care of. Now for clues. He cast a suspicious glance at the phone, mentally promising to make a note of the oddity, then stepped over towards Mia's body. Turning the tablet computer on, he first took a photo of Mia as she sat, then moved in to take a close up of the wound on her head. Struck on the head with a blunt object, I'd say. She probably died instantly. He heard the click of the camera and sighed as he stepped back once again.
'I hope she did, anyway.' He looked down on the floor and instantly spotted a familiar statue lying by his feet, a red stain coating the side of its base. 'Murder weapon. Of course.' He quickly snapped a picture of it, then turned to the glass shards littering the carpet nearby. 'Must be that glass light stand. That thing was brand new, wasn't it?' He made sure to take a picture, hoping the detail would come in handy.

Sighing, Phoenix took a moment to look around the room. 'Anything else that looks like a clue?' He found his gaze repeatedly settling on Mia, and was about to drag himself back out of the room in defeat when he noticed something white sitting on the floor by her hand. 'Huh?' Running over and crouching by Mia's side, Phoenix lifted his computer to first take a photo. The object looked to be a piece of paper, specifically a receipt, which he reasoned must have fallen out of Mia's hand when he was shaking her earlier. Through the ominous red stains, he noticed it was dated for the previous day, from a nearby department store. 'Should I turn it over...?' he asked himself, knowing it could be a vital clue. 'I almost don't want to, but...' Taking a deep breath, he quickly flipped the paper to the blank side of the receipt, and recognised instantly that the blood had been carefully applied, writing out a single word that he took a photo of in disbelief.

'Maya'.

Phoenix gulped. 'Did Mia write this? Was she trying to tell us something about that girl?' He glanced back at the door through into reception, hoping the girl hadn't actually run off while he'd been busy. Staring at the photo of the bloody word on his tablet's screen, he sighed. 'I think I'd better show her this.'

Back in reception, Phoenix found Maya sitting at his desk, peering at the many sticky-notes surrounding his computer screen, each one covered in its own boredom doodle he'd done when business was slow. Blushing, he rushed to her side and reached over to start pulling them off, piling them on the desk. "D-don't! Ignore those!" he cried.

Maya frowned, leaning out of his way. "Don't ignore them...?" she repeated.

"Y-you know what I mean!" Phoenix cried, giving up on the task as he pulled his tablet out from under his arm. Sighing, he turned to Maya as she got out of his chair, watching him nervously. "Look, before Mia died," he explained, "she wrote a message with her own blood, on the back of this receipt."

Maya frowned in confusion as Phoenix held out the tablet, which she reached out to as she studied the image on its screen. After a moment, her eyes went wide and she jumped back in fright. "Th-th-that's my name!" she cried, her voice slowly increasing in pitch. "W-why!? Why would she write my name!?"

'Uh oh. Now I've done it.' Recognising panic when he saw it, Phoenix quickly killed the image and tossed the tablet onto the desk, holding his hands out to the teenager. "Please, just calm down!"

"W-why would Sis write my name!?" Maya cried, pressing herself against a bookcase and looking like she was going to faint again.

Before Phoenix could formulate an answer, loud sirens cut through the quiet night, and Phoenix ran to the window. He barely had time to register the red and blue lights spinning from atop the police... cars below before a loud thumping up the stairs attracted the pair's attention to the front door, which exploded open as a trench-coated detective and two officers jumped into the room, guns up.

"Freeze! Police!" the detective shouted as the officers followed him into the room, glaring between the terrified teenage girl by the desk and the surprised man at the window as they both raised their hands into the air. While one each of the officers kept their guns on the two witnesses, the detective was quick to lower his, shoving it back in his holster as he instead pulled out his police badge.

"Alright, I'm Detective Gumshoe, pal," he announced, gesturing to the officers to lower their guns, which they quickly did. "We received a report from the building across the way." Phoenix glanced back at the hotel across the street, remembering the woman he'd seen. "Got a person saying they saw a murder. Anyway, I don't want either of you moving one inch, 'kay?" Phoenix and Maya slowly nodded, lowering their hands, and the detective waved to an officer as they ventured into the office, the second staying behind to watch over the two witnesses.

'Great. Just great,' Phoenix mused to himself, and he cast a concerned look over to Maya, who was still leaning against the wall, staring wide-eyed at the floor. 'She wouldn't have...? No, of course she didn't.'

"Whoa!" came a shout from the other room, and Gumshoe burst back through the door, waving a small piece of bloodstained paper in his hands. "Scuze me!" Maya yelped in surprise as the paper was shoved into her face, Gumshoe making sure both of them saw it. "This word 'Maya' here mean anything to you?"

Phoenix paled, glancing at Maya as she began to shake. "Um... that," she muttered, "that's my name-"

"WHAT!?” Gumshoe shouted, and he immediately waved at his two subordinates, showing them the receipt. "The victim drew this here note in her own blood, pal! With her dying breath, she wrote down the killer's name!"

Maya shook her head, beginning to panic again. "K-killer? I'm not-!

Unfortunately, Gumshoe wasn't listening. "Case closed! You're coming down to the precinct, ma'am!"

"W-what!?" Maya cried, but the two officers grabbed her arms, quickly cuffing her before dragging her around the desk and towards the front door. "No, wait, I didn't kill her! I swear I didn't! I didn't kill her!"

Phoenix couldn't help but wince at the frantic shouts as the teenage girl was taken away. 'I wish there was something I could do...'

"Hey, you!" Gumshoe called, pulling Phoenix out of his thoughts. "We're gonna want to take you down for questioning, pal. Don't go anywhere."

"I won't." Phoenix promised, sighing. 'I have to find out what happened to Mia... and to do that, I'm going to have to talk to this 'Maya' girl myself. As soon as I possibly can.'
Phoenix looked up as he heard soft footsteps outside his door, and smiled as he recognised Maya, 'Holy crap, this is my girlfriend,' standing there with a shy smile. "Hey," he said, waving from his seat on the bed, pushed up tight against the wall as he wasted time playing with the Court Record, which he'd found in his backpack. 'That's one thing Trucy got right, anyway. Wright. Pfft.'

Maya giggled to herself, bouncing into the room and making short work of climbing across the bed to Phoenix's side, curling up against him. When he reached an arm around her to pull her tighter, planting a quick kiss on her forehead, she blushed, playfully pushing him away. "Tell me how everything went with Mia!" she demanded. "It went well, didn't it? I told you it would go well!"

Phoenix rolled his eyes. "Congratulations, you've had more opportunity to gauge Mia's reactions to the tragedies of my life recently." When Maya laughed in response, he tossed the tablet computer in his hand to one side, cuddling up closer to her. "What did she say in her letter?"

Maya thought for a moment before responding, resting her head on Phoenix's shoulder. "That it was about time we finally talked about us. She's been telling me for a few years now that I needed to tell you how I felt." She fiddled with her sleeves, her face turning red. "I guess it was kinda obvious to everyone but us, huh?"

Phoenix chuckled, resting his head on Maya's in the comfortable way they often did when they thought no-one was watching. "To be honest, I'm pretty sure Luke already knew about us long before meeting Pearls. I... didn't really take thinking you'd died in Labyrinthia well."

Maya grinned. "The Professor probably twigged too, from how I was reacting to it," she assured him. "I... never really mentioned that I worked myself up pretty bad, worrying if you were okay."

"You weren't the only one," Phoenix sighed, hugging Maya tighter as his free hand gripped one of hers. "I was inconsolable when you were kidnapped. When I thought you'd die, I just... shut down. The bartender at the place we stayed in overnight, she had to... figuratively slap some sense into me, once Luke and Espella were in bed. Then when I thought you were trapped on the other side of Dusky Bridge with a murderer..." He shivered. "I'm still not sure how I managed to hold myself together long enough to ensure you were safe. Iris, or what we thought was Iris, was accusing you of the murder and I just snapped." He smiled nostalgically, despite all the rage attached to that particular memory. "I guess that's the point when I stop believing in my clients to the very end: If they try and accuse you of murder."

Laughing, Maya turned in her seat and hugged Phoenix tightly around the chest, resting her head comfortably under his chin. "You're such a dork," she whispered. "That's what I love about you, though."
Apollo had looked up in surprise from his work desk when he heard the front door unlocking. "Dad?" he called, only to very quickly add in surprise "Maya!?" as the two adults entered the home. "What are you both doing here so early!?"

"Go get Pearls and your siblings, please," Phoenix sternly ordered, arms crossed. As Apollo wilted in anticipation of trouble, Maya imitated Phoenix's pose at his side. "We need to have a talk."

It took a few minutes, but before long the four kids were all sat scrunched together on the couch in the office, Phoenix and Maya standing nearby. Phoenix noticed Pearl had taken the opportunity while back in the office to drag Charley out of the reception, although he had gotten no further than just inside the office door. He supposed that was as good a place as any for the plant to live.

"Are we in trouble?" Trucy quietly asked from her spot between Apollo and Pearl, hat in her hands.

Phoenix and Maya, keeping their stern expressions on their faces, shot each other a look. "What exactly were you hoping to accomplish this weekend with this little prank?" Phoenix asked.

"Hey, I didn't have anything to do with it!" Apollo cried. "Why am I getting punished!?"

"I didn't, either!" Luke added, sitting next to Pearl. "I promise!"

Pearl stared up at the two adults with wide eyes. "We just wanted to give you some time alone together!" she insisted, eyes shining with unshed tears. "You never get to anymore!"

"And it had nothing to do with making us 'admit' to being special someones?" Maya asked, hands on her hips.

Trucy and Pearl glanced at each other, then gave the adults their cutest looks, nodding insistently.

Phoenix stared at the two for a few moments before suddenly giving them a bright smile. "Well, that's too bad!" he said. "You would have been able to chalk it up as a success!"

The four kids stared in shocked silence as Phoenix and Maya shot each other cheeky grins. "Huh?" Apollo muttered.

"We had a talk," Maya explained, hands pressed together. "One we probably should have had a while ago." She shrugged nonchalantly. "We've decided, although Kurain's reputation is better than it used to be, it's still not in a good enough place for its Master to openly be friends with Nick here, let alone admit to being his girlfriend!" Giggleing to herself at the still-new term, she rolled her eyes. "So, it looks like that's another secret you guys have to be keeping to yourselves!"

As one, Trucy and Pearl suddenly squealed, jumping out of their seats as they individually ran to Phoenix and Maya. While Trucy launched herself at her father's chest (her hat was tossed unceremoniously onto Apollo's lap), Pearl simply bounced in glee at Maya's side. "I always knew it was an amazing fairy-tale!" Pearl cried, hands pressed to her cheeks. "A forbidden romance against all the odds...! I knew you were destined to be together, Mystic Maya!"

Trucy also bounced, clinging to an almost equally excited Phoenix. "Does this mean Miss Maya is our Mommy now!?" she demanded. "Even if she's a secret?"
"Ask her!" Phoenix laughed, looking to Maya.

Maya shrugged with an embarrassed smile, waiting for the girls to calm down before she answered the question.

Dropping his sister's hat on the abandoned lounge, Apollo got to his feet, looking very confused. "Wait, did I hear everything right? Dad and Maya are dating now, but we can't talk about it to anybody just like we can't talk about Kurain?"

"That's it, more or less," Phoenix replied, gently pushing Trucy to loosen her stranglehold on his chest. "Did you have any objections?"

Apollo thought a moment, then sighed and shook his head. "I guess not," he admitted, crossing his arms. "You two were always acting like a couple anyway."

Phoenix and Maya blushed as they shot each other amused looks, then Phoenix turned to his other son. "What about you, Luke?"

Luke was still sitting on the edge of the lounge, deep in thought until Phoenix's question dragged his attention back to the conversation. "Oh, um," he muttered, "I don't have any problems with it."

Apollo raised an eyebrow in surprise. "Luke?"

"But something's the matter?" Phoenix pointed out, concerned.

"Hey, you always said you agreed with us!" Trucy protested, arms crossed as she confronted her brother. "Did you change your mind!?"

"Of course not!" Luke replied. "I tried to help you, didn't I?"

"Yeah, but," Pearl quietly butted in, "and I don't mean any offence by this, your plan didn't work..."

Luke only sighed, staring at the floor. Maya patted Pearl's shoulder to instruct the pre-teen to stay put, then walked across the room and sat down at Luke's side, giving him a sympathetic smile. "Your mom's still out there, isn't she? You're worried about her."

"Trucy and Apollo's mum is out there somewhere, too," Luke pointed out defensively, not moving except for a lonely sigh. "I... really worry about Mum, but I'm not sure if I'm overreacting, or..." He wiped at his eyes with a sleeve.

Immediately, Phoenix rushed to Luke's other side, sitting on the sofa's arm. "I know, our investigation hasn't been moving very fast, has it?" he said in comfort, rubbing Luke's shoulder. "Whoever these kidnappers are, they're very good at covering their tracks."

"You're definitely not overreacting, I can promise you that. And I don't want to replace your mom, especially if it makes you unhappy," Maya assured Luke, taking hold of one of his hands to offer comfort as the teen looked up to meet her gaze. "I'm happy for you to just call me 'Maya' like always. You can think of me as... a big sister! Or a cool aunt!"

Apollo scoffed. "Yeah, one who's dating Dad."

"Hush, you," Phoenix told Apollo with a smirk.

Luke smiled. "I'd appreciate that, Maya. Thank you." In return, Maya grinned and pulled the teen into a hug, which he gratefully returned.
Trucy giggled, happy to see her brother cheered up, and bounced towards the sofa. "So, Miss Maya, does that mean you're okay with me calling you Mommy?" she asked, barely restraining her excitement. "I can call you Mommy, can't I?"

Giving the girl a grin as she pulled out of the hug with Luke, Maya laughed softly to herself. "Of course you can!"

Cheering, Trucy ran to Pearl, and the girls grabbed each others hands as they twirled in joy. Apollo shook his head, then gave Maya an apologetic smile. "Um, I'm just gonna stick with 'Maya' myself. Is that okay? It would be weird to call you 'Mom'."

"Why wouldn't it be okay?" Maya asked with a giggle as she stood up, pausing to straighten her robes. "I'm certainly not going to dictate your lives like an evil stepmother!"

"You're certainly dressed for it," Phoenix joked.

In response, Maya simply crossed her arms and pointed her tongue in Phoenix's direction.

Trucy stopped her spinning with Pearl, gasping. "Oh, wait! We're a family now!" She turned to Maya and Phoenix, who was standing up from the edge of the lounge. "Mommy, Daddy, we should get a new family photo while we're all together!"

Phoenix rubbed his chin in thought. "Hmm. I was just thinking yesterday I needed to update the one I already have." He shot Trucy a grin. "Why not? Everyone huddle together somewhere, and I'll get my computer!"

It had been a quiet evening at the club. Aside from one opportunist who had wandered in off the street, Phoenix hadn't even had any need to go down to the Hydeout to play poker. Not that he minded all that much; The night was still young, and he wasn't bored of his paid piano practise yet, alone with his thoughts as he stabbed at the keys.

It had been Maya who taught him how to play piano. She and Mia used to play together when she was young, she once explained, and she'd kept up learning in Mia's absence. At some point between Mia's death and Phoenix moving in to the apartment above the office, Maya had somehow acquired an old piano from somewhere that now lived in reception, and occasionally, when the office was especially quiet and Pearl was away in Kurain, she would drag Phoenix out to try and teach him. Phoenix himself, when Maya had left to become the Master of Kurain, hadn't made any effort to keep up what little skills he'd learned, which had come back to bite him after his disbarment. Even now, if Phoenix was up in Kurain (or, as was the case two weeks ago, Maya was at the office), she would find time to pull him to the closest piano to make him practise with her, insisting all the while it was even more important now he was supposed to be playing professionally. Although he had initially hated being dragged from his important lawyering work to waste time at a piano, he no longer minded all that much being made to sit down with Maya for a while. The children inevitably scattered at the sound of his playing (part of him liked to joke he'd trained them well), so it was just the two of them for however long Maya decided her 'lesson' was.

Phoenix couldn't resist a smile at the thought of Maya. It was strange to think of her as his girlfriend after all this time, and he was still trying to work out at what point he had actually fallen in love with her, through the strong denial he'd been living with for so many years. His best guess was that the progression from 'friend' to 'best friend' to anything stronger had been such a gradual one, there was no concrete beginning or end point to find. All he could say for certain was that they'd been friends at her second time in the defendant's chair, and she was the most important person in his world by the time of their trip to England.

"Good evening, Wright."

Phoenix almost jumped in his chair, spinning to see the familiar face of Kristoph Gavin looking down at him from a metre or two away. "Oh, Kristoph!" he cried, smiling at his 'friend'. "I didn't expect to see you today!"

"Indeed," Kristoph chuckled, sitting down at the nearby table as Phoenix turned around on his stool. "Apparently you were suddenly called away when I came by last."

Phoenix thought a moment. "Was that two weeks ago?"

Kristoph nodded. "I can't imagine what it might have been," he continued, looking genuinely curious. "I was at the Wonder Bar meeting someone for a case. I half expected to see you there as well."

Laughing, Phoenix leaning back against the piano keyboard, being careful not to press down on the keys. He crossed his arms as he raised a teasing eyebrow in Kristoph's direction. "Seeing Apollo and Trucy's act? I thought you said you didn't like magic, Kristoph!"

"I... can appreciate it," Kristoph insisted, pushing his glasses up as they threatened to slip down his nose. "I must admit those two seemed to be the most talented performers on that stage."

"Pfft, 'course they are!" Phoenix scoffed, shrugging in feigned obliviousness. "Not even legal adults, and Apollo and Trucy could out-act anyone! They're the best magicians in the world!" He laughed at Kristoph's tight smile. "Then again, as their father, I am a bit biased," he admitted.

"Indeed," Kristoph sighed. "My question was related to your other son, however."

"Yes, I believe it was him," Kristoph continued. "I noticed him in the audience while I was looking for you. There was a girl with him, maybe Trucy's age. She was wearing what looked like traditional Japanese garb."

It was only thanks to Phoenix's trained poker face that he didn't react outwardly to the description of Pearl as he recognised it. "Oh?"

"I recall you said you had a falling out with your former assistant," Kristoph asked, looking somewhere between concerned and curious. "Assuming of course that the girl I saw was indeed related to the Feys of Kurain."

Phoenix slowly smiled and chuckled to himself. "Aw, guess I've gotta come clean," he joked. 'Sooner than I would have liked, but at least Maya and I did go over this possibility, so I'm not totally unprepared.' 'I got back in touch with Miss Master of Kurain a couple weeks ago. Can't really be open about it, what with Kurain's reputation on the line and all, but we're... rebuilding our friendship.' 'After all, that is mostly true. '

Kristoph looked even more confused now. "I was not under the impression a village of spirit mediums was in any particular danger of their reputation being slandered," he said.

Phoenix shrugged. "Then call it them being wary thanks to past experience," he replied, deciding to skip over how it was mostly him that was worrying, rather than Maya. "The kids have gotten attached to Pearls, who was the girl you saw at the Wonder Bar. Maya, though, we're trying to take slow before telling everyone we're back in touch." He thought a moment. "Actually, we haven't even told Edgeworth yet. I should remember to do that." 'Not that he'll probably care in the slightest that we're dating now, but we should at least try and announce it to someone outside the family.'

Although still confused, Kristoph seemed to accept this explanation. "I see. I shall keep this a secret between us for now, then."

"Please do," Phoenix said with a small laugh. "I'd appreciate it."

It was difficult to explain Phoenix's complicated relationship with Kristoph. It was very easy to slip and become the mask, allowing himself to think of the other man as a genuine friend, especially when he found himself dwelling on how he truly was in for the long-haul on this investigation and might never complete it. At times like that, it was only the thought of his three children that cheered him up, and of how Apollo was even in on the situation to help him if he needed it... not that he was planning to go crying to young Apollo when he felt down, but the thought of his eldest son's support was usually enough to boost his mood.

As far as Kristoph went, however, Phoenix was never quite sure what to believe. On one hand, despite his often cold demeanour, he was very friendly and appeared to genuinely care for Phoenix and, by extension, his children. On the other hand, sometimes, on the very rare occasions something seemed to personally offend him and coax Kristoph to anger, Phoenix caught glimpses of something dangerous lurking beneath the surface. It was nothing concrete, and he usually convinced himself later he'd imagined it, but the brief scare was enough to remind him to always be on his guard.

The two men's conversation was interrupted as two more visitors arrived in the restaurant, heading straight over to the piano as they waved to the waitress.

Phoenix smiled. "Trucy, Apollo! We were just talking about you!" he called.

Trucy grinned as she skipped to the table. "Hi Daddy! Hi Mister Kristoph!"

Apollo gave Phoenix a more sedate wave, turning almost immediately to Kristoph with a friendly smile. "Hi, Mister Gavin! We didn't expect to see you tonight!"

"I was in the area," Kristoph replied with a nod of greeting.

Trucy bounced to Phoenix's piano, trying to climb into his lap until Phoenix quite firmly sat her on the stool at his side, as she was getting too big for him to see over. Apollo, meanwhile, lowered himself into a chair next to Kristoph, looking up to the man hopefully. "Actually, there was something I've been wanting to talk to you about, sir," the teen said.

"Oh?" Kristoph asked, turning to face Apollo with an eyebrow raised. "Please continue."

"I've... been wanting to ask your advice on something," Apollo admitted. "I'll be going to college at the end of this school year, and I was wondering if you had any suggestions for the best law course to take."

Trucy snapped her head around from where she had been cuddling against Phoenix. "What!?!" she cried, then jumped to her feet to stare furiously at her brother. "But we're professional magicians! Why are you leaving me to be a lawyer!"

"I'm not leaving you!" Apollo shot back with his own determined stare. "I'll still perform and practise with you, but I've dreamed of being a lawyer for years and our magic career isn't going to change that!"

Trucy wilted a little, looking upset. "But..."

Kristoph pressed the bridge of his glasses in thought. "You're still going ahead with becoming a defence attorney?" he asked Apollo.

Apollo turned to Kristoph, giving him a firm nod. "I've been studying for the LSAT, next month," he said. "If I get a good score, I... I want to help people. I want to protect them from false charges and keep the innocent from paying the ultimate price for crimes they didn't commit! I want to be the one person on their side when no-one else will be!"

Trucy mutely sat back down at Phoenix's side, hands clutching the pin on her cape as she stared at the floor.

"A noble pursuit indeed," Kristoph chuckled, then turned slightly towards Phoenix. "I would have expected you to ask your father for advice, however."

Apollo blushed, shooting Phoenix a glance. "I, um... already did, actually."
Phoenix shrugged, looking sheepish as he comforted Trucy with one arm, rubbing her back gently. "What can I say? I haven't been a lawyer in years!" He scratched a cheek in thought. "Actually, I don't know if Ivy University is even still doing law courses nowadays..."

"They are, I looked into it," Apollo said, then sighed. "Not that we'd be able to afford me going there, though. And I'm not likely to win a scholarship like Luke probably would."

"I'm sure we can convince your grandparents to donate a little to your cause," Phoenix said, although he winced as he admitted, "although, yeah, Ivy's pretty expensive."

Kristoph sat still in thought. "A career in both entertainment and law," he mused to himself. "If my brother could do it, I suppose you could, too."

Apollo blinked in surprise. "You have a brother?"

Nodding, Kristoph gave the teen a rare warm smile. "He calls himself Klavier. He studied at Themis Legal Academy, actually."

"I've heard of Themis!" Apollo piped up in excitement, then calmed down again almost immediately in annoyance. "I wasn't allowed to go there, though. My old social worker said I was too young to make that kind of choice."

"I myself went to Cardea Institute of Technology," Kristoph continued. "Compared to some of your other options, I think you'll find it relatively cheap, and I can't imagine the quality of its courses will have declined since I left."

Apollo nodded. "Cardea Institute of Technology," he repeated, "got it!" He then turned to Phoenix. "Have you got a piece of paper, Dad? So I can write that down?"

While Phoenix nodded and reached into his bag to find a notebook, Trucy finally lifted her head to glare at her brother. "If you stop performing," she warned him, "I'll never forgive you."

Apollo watched his fuming sister for a moment before getting up and walking around the table, standing at her side. "I won't miss a single performance," he said, "I promise. As hard as it will be to study law on top of keeping my magic skills aligned with yours, I vow I won't ever let you down. Okay?"

Trucy stared at him a moment before sniffing, jumping to her feet to throw a hug around her brother's middle. "You better not," she warned him through her tears, but smiled at the reassurance regardless.
My dear Luke,

It appears old Bruno, of St Mystere, has fallen ill. Flora has left to look after him and the town, leaving myself looking after Alfendi alone. He seems to understand Flora has a friend who isn't well, but clearly wants Flora to return. I fear I may have to try explaining death to him again when she does. We haven't heard from her in a few days now, but I trust she will call soon.

I understand it was Miss Fey's birthday last Monday. With this new relationship between her and Mr Wright, did you all meet up again to celebrate?

I apologise for the somewhat abrupt nature of this month's letter. Alfendi has not been taking Flora's absence well, as a two-year-old would, so this week has been a difficult one. I imagine we shall talk again soon regardless, what with the sorting out of your application to Gressenheller.

The usual puzzles are enclosed.

"So since my grades have always been really good, despite me being so young," Luke announced to his siblings, "it looks like I'll be going to Gressenheller University back in England!"

Apollo and Trucy stared at him blankly. "Huh. I was wondering why you pulled us away from practise," Apollo muttered.

"Y-you..." Trucy muttered, beginning to look upset, "w-w-what...!?"

"I'm going to university in England," Luke repeated, fiddling with his hands as he shot Phoenix, standing at his side, a nervous look. "They have an accredited veterinary medicine course there, which is actually shorter than the ones here, and since I used to spend a lot of time at Gressenheller, I know the area really well and it won't be too hard to adjust to it."

"Professor Layton's been helping us sort everything out," Phoenix added, hands in the pocket on the front of his hoodie. "We just got off the phone with him. Luke's application has been approved, pending good grades."
Trucy gave Luke a stare that was somewhere between furious and hysterical. "B-but why!? Why are you going to England!?!"

Luke looked away in thought, then shrugged. "Why wouldn't I?" he replied, quietly. "I miss England a lot. The Professor works at Gressenheller, and its where my mum and dad studied, too. Where they met, and fell in love. Mum was always using the library they had... I spent a lot of time there when I was the Professor's apprentice." He looked up to Trucy, only to notice her rapidly tearing up and immediately held up his hands somewhat frantically. "B-but I know I'll miss you guys when I'm there! A-and it's certainly not a permanent thing, because I'll be coming back home over holidays!"

"Backpedal harder," Apollo muttered, eyelids lowered.

"B-but you're leaving us!" Trucy cried, hands clutched together as tears rolled down her cheeks. "D-don't you love us anymore...?"

Panicking slightly, Luke ran to Trucy, waving his hands as he leaned down to her height. "Of course I still love you! I'll only be in England during term to attend classes! I'm coming back!" He bounced on his feet a little. "I-I'll even talk to you on the phone every day if you want me to!"

"But b-both you and Apollo are l-leaving me!" Trucy sobbed.

"We are both graduating from school and going to college," Apollo pointed out, one eyebrow raised. "Pretty sure doing that doesn't annul you being our sister."

To Trucy and Luke's surprise (as they had forgotten his presence in the midst of their conversation), Phoenix then appeared at their side, holding out a box of tissues for Trucy, which she gratefully took a few of to blow her nose. He kept silent, rubbing Trucy's back in comfort while staying out of the conversation himself, although he shot Luke a meaningful look.

"Trucy, I promise you I'm not leaving!" Luke said, managing to calm himself down a little. "It'll be like now, when Apollo and I go away for school, except that I won't be able to come home over weekends... Terms are shorter though, so I'll be home more often than you think!"

Trucy took a fresh tissue to wipe at her eyes. "You'll call me every day?" she quietly asked.

"If you want me to," Luke agreed, glad to see Trucy calming down. "Is that alright?"

The girl thought a long time before responding, looking up with a serious expression on her face to meet Luke's eyes. "You're not allowed to come to our show anymore."

Surprised, Luke leaned back, blinking. "Uh...?"

Apollo sighed. "Don't I get a say in that?" he pointed out, arms tightly crossed. "It's my show too!"

Apollo nervously avoided her gaze before reluctantly nodding. "Turns out Clay's applying to Cardea, too," he said. "We're gonna dorm together."
Trucy gave him a glare. "And you're not going to miss practise or performance like you promised?"

"I won't miss a single one," Apollo repeated, one hand held up as though making a solemn vow, which he sort of was. "If it conflicts with study for my law degree, so be it."

After a long, stern stare, Trucy nodded, giving both of her brothers a grin. "Good!" Dropping her tissues to the floor, she pulled them into a hug, all three of them grinning.

Phoenix laughed. "I hope you're planning on cleaning that up, Truce!" he cried, moving to return the box of tissues to its usual home on the kitchen counter.

"I will, Daddy!" Trucy replied, letting go of her brothers and racing to retrieve the dropped tissues and take them to the nearest bin.

Dear Professor Layton,

Since Flora didn't send a letter with your last one, you'll offer her my apologies again for what happened to Bruno and St Mystere? I forgot to mention this when we were on the phone, but if she wants to see living robots again, there is always Ponco and Clonco at the Space Centre here. Could you mention that to her, please? I'm sure she'd love to meet them.

We did meet up for Maya's birthday, actually! Her birthday fell on a public holiday this year (I think it was Presidents Day? I can't remember for sure), so we didn't have school and Papa took us up to Kurain. We could only be there for a few hours, but it was nice seeing them again. I hope seeing them more often is permanent!

After we got off the phone with you, Papa called down Apollo and Trucy from their rehearsals, and I told them about how I might be going to Gressenheller. Apollo was happy for me, but Trucy got upset because we're both going to be away from home for much longer periods of time, and she seemed to think it had something to do with her. I've had to promise to call her every day, although it looks like the only time I could do that would be the middle of the day in Britain and early morning here, but she's calmed down about it now. Apollo and Clay will (hopefully) be going to the same university here in the city, so they're planning to room together. Apollo's similarly had to promise Trucy to meet her regularly for rehearsals and their shows, even if his studies suffer because of it.

Speaking of Clay, it's his birthday next week. He keeps boasting about how he's now allowed to drive us around in his car (Apparently there's a rule that you can't drive around non-family members under twenty years old before you're eighteen?), and has promised to take us out to the Space Centre. I'm hoping to get my license and a car eventually too, but since Papa doesn't drive and Apollo isn't interested in it either, we don't have a car. I am old enough to get a learner's permit, but without a car to practise in there's little point chasing it up yet. Apparently the usual thing here is for people to sit in a classroom and take a lesson on road rules before they can get their permit. I don't understand it. Isn't that what on-road practise with an instructor is for? If it wasn't for Clay, I'd be under the impression that they learn everything in a classroom and don't even sit in a car until taking their test! Oh, and then there's the difficulty of finding someone who'll teach me manual instead of automatic.

Wow, I didn't mean to prattle on for so long about cars! I guess it's just still confusing for me and I'm trying to sort out my thoughts by explaining it to someone. The different terminology is still something I'm getting used to.

I pulled together a few puzzles I made over the last few weeks, including one for Alfendi. I hope it's not too hard for him, and of course it's too late to help with how much trouble he was causing you in Flora's absence. I hope to be seeing you all soon, anyway!

This is supposed to be a surprise but I should warn you that Trucy and me are on our way to Kurain atm

You're what!? Thanks for warning me! I'll make sure I'm free. Why are you two coming up here? .

It's just for a short visit. You'll see when we get there :)

May 8, 1:25PM
Kurain Village

"It'll be the perfect surprise!" Trucy had said as she begged Apollo to take her on the long trip to visit Kurain that morning. "And you're eighteen now, so nobody can say we went without an adult!"

Although Apollo dearly wanted to pass her off to Luke (who was studying hard for their finals coming up), when he heard her intended mission, he found he couldn't say no to his kid sister. Thus, he bought them tickets up the mountain and found himself two hours later escorting her off the bus in Kurain Village.

Apollo sighed as they waited for the bus to pass them on its way back down to the train station. "This is so embarrassing," he muttered.

Trucy stuck her tongue out at him. "You're just being silly," she said, dismissing him as she promptly began to skip across the road. "Mommy will love this!"

Following close behind, Apollo tightly crossed his arms. 'I will never get used to her referring to Maya as "Mommy". It's both way too accurate, and way too weird; She's only five years older than me! At least Dad's eleven years older!" He thought a moment. 'Although, for Trucy... that becomes twelve and eighteen. Eh, still weird.'

Jumping up the stone steps in one bound, Trucy made for the front door of Fey Manor, standing on her tip-toes and reaching up high with a gloved hand to knock on the yellow wood. She giggled in the ensuing silence, shooting Apollo a wide grin as he joined her, and, eventually, the door was opened by a pre-teen girl with brown hair, who smiled as she recognised the visitors. "Hi, Pearly!"

Trucy called.

"Trucy! Apollo!" Pearl replied, clapping her hands in delight before hurriedly waving the pair inside. "What are you two doing here?"

"Surprise," Apollo explained in the dullest tone of voice possible, waggling his fingers in the air to indicate a false sense of excitement.

Trucy skipped inside, grinning at Pearl. "We came to visit Mommy!" she cried. "Do you know where she is?"

Pearl smiled, closing the door behind Apollo as he followed Trucy in. "Mystic Maya's working in her room! I'll go get her!"

"Great!" Trucy chirped in reply, watching Pearl hurry off. "Thank you, Pearly!"
Apollo sighed as he sat down on the nearby low shelves, pulling off his boots. "Y'know, there's one thing I've been meaning to ask you..."

Trucy cocked her head to one side, balancing on one leg to remove her own boots. "What?"

"Our mom is still out there somewhere, even if we don't know where to start looking," Apollo pointed out, shoving his shoes into one of the shelves underneath him. "What if we actually pull off a miracle and find her again? Or she finds us?"

Trucy paused thoughtfully, working her second boot around her ankle. "I guess the same thing I'll do if my other daddy comes back," she decided, finally working the shoe free and pulling it off in one swift motion. She walked over to the shelves Apollo was sitting on, carefully placing her boots inside. "I'll have two Mommys or two Daddys. Mommy Maya, Mommy Thalassa, Daddy Nick, and Daddy Zak."

Apollo frowned, looking away as he felt a twinge of guilt at the memory of how he'd reacted when he first learned who Trucy's biological father was. "Why did your other dad leave you behind?" he wondered aloud. "He honestly thought you'd be better off in foster care than with him?"

'Did... he know about me? Did Mom ever mention me to anyone after she thought I'd died? If it weren't for Dad taking me in, what would I even be doing right now?'

Trucy looked at her brother for a moment, then sat at his side, giving him a hug. "We can ask him when he gets back," she brightly assured him, although Apollo could hear a twinge of sadness in her voice as she spoke about her distant father. "He'll come back. I know he will."

From the nearby hallway, Maya finally emerged, Pearl close behind. "Trucy! Apollo! What are you two doing here?" Maya laughed.

Apollo and Trucy got to their feet, Apollo relieved that Maya hadn't mentioned their arrival was anything but a surprise. "Hi, Mommy!" Trucy called, running across the room to grab Maya in a hug. "Surprise!"

"That's my line," Apollo muttered with a smile.

Maya laughed, patting the top of Trucy's hat as the girl pulled out of the hug. "I hope this is a short visit," she said. "I don't want your dad panicking if you're not home tonight!"

"We'll be on the next train back to the city," Apollo promised. "Trucy had something to give you, though."

Trucy quickly shushed her brother. "Don't spoil the surprise!"

"A gift for Mystic Maya?" Pearl asked, biting a fingernail in confusion. "But her birthday was in February!"

Trucy shook her head, giving the equally confused Maya a wide grin. "Today's special!" she announced, then reached into the heart-shaped bag at her hip and pulled out a greeting card, which she pushed into Maya's hands. "I know you're not technically our mommy," she explained with a nervous shrug, "but I wanted to give you a card anyway."

Maya looked at the card with wide eyes. Proudly emblazoned across the front were the words 'Happy Mother's Day', surrounded by cute heart-shaped balloons. "It's Mother's Day today...?" she realised, opening the card to see inside.

Pearl quietly gasped as she realised what the card was, hands over her mouth.
Inside the card, above a few printed lines about the virtues of having a mother, Maya saw Trucy had scrawled the line 'To Mommy Maya'. Underneath, also in her distinctive scrawl, were the words 'From Trucy and Apollo and Luke', as well as the hurriedly written addition 'but they were too busy to sign this themselves'. Maya suspected otherwise, but couldn't resist a smile as she bit her lip to keep her emotions in check.

Trucy held her hands behind her back, rubbing a toe into the floor. "D'you like it?"

Maya closed the card, leaning down to show Trucy her smile directly. She surprised herself that she was having to force the words out through threatening tears tightening her throat. "I love it."

Grinning, Trucy jumped forward to give Maya another hug, which the woman returned with a laugh.

Apollo scratched at the back of his head, still embarrassed by the whole thing and unsure if he should interrupt. "If you're wondering, Luke doesn't know about the card," he explained. "I didn't even know about it until Trucy asked me to help her deliver it."

Maya giggled, patting the top of Trucy's hat as the pair ended their hug. "I guessed it was something like that," she said.

Trucy pouted in Apollo's direction. "You're ruining it!" she complained, face blushing a soft pink.

Pearl quietly squealed to herself, palms pressed to her cheeks. "I didn't even realise it was Mother's Day today!" she admitted, then calmed down and nervously chewed a fingernail. "It's been a long time since I last celebrated it..."

"Even longer for me," Maya added with a sigh, giving Pearl a sympathetic glance before leaning towards Trucy to give her a soft smile, the card hugged to her chest. "Thank you, Trucy. Your card really means a lot to me."

"I'm glad," she replied, a proudly matter-of-fact 'of course it does' tone to her voice.

"Of course, Dad doesn't know about it either," Apollo continued, finger pressed to his forehead in thought. "We kinda snuck out. When we get home, he's gonna wonder where we disappeared to."

Loudly groaning in exasperation, Trucy threw up her hands at her brother. "Alright, alright! We'll get going back home then!"

Placing the card securely in a pocket inside her robes, Maya laughed as she watched Trucy stomp back over to where she'd stashed her shoes to put them back on. She looked over to Pearl, who seemed a little uncomfortable at Trucy's anger but was otherwise happy to see her extended family. "You know what?" Maya suggested, clapping her hands together as she walked over to the Wright children. "Pearly and I will walk with you down to the train station!"

"Really!?" Pearl cried with an excited smile.

Trucy, sat on the floor midway through pulling on a boot, looked up in surprise. "Wow, you will!?"

Apollo smiled gratefully, sat on the shelves as he retrieved his boots from where they'd been stashed. "Thanks, Maya. It'd be great to have some company."

"I know, it's quite a walk if you're not used to it," Maya replied, waving a hand as she went to get her sandals, Pearl running alongside as she did the same. "You guys have only done it... what, once, twice before?"
"On your birthday!" Trucy pointed out, jumping to her feet as she finished putting on her shoes. "We came up then, too!"

Pearl dropped her sandals to the floor and stepped into them, running off excitedly to the front door, Trucy at her heels. "Come on, let's go!" she cried, waving to Maya and Apollo.

A few minutes later, the quartet was on their way to the station, walking together down the road at an even pace, although Apollo had to frequently slow himself down as his long legs threatened to leave the two much shorter girls behind.

"So, Trucy," Maya spoke up as they left Kurain behind, "you're turning eleven this year, aren't you?"

Trucy nodded. "Mm-hm! Daddy says I'm getting to be a big girl!"

Maya laughed. "I don't disagree!" she said. "It did just occur to me though: If I'm your mother now, it looks like I need to give you the puberty talk. And you're the right age to start thinking about it, too."

"Puberty?" Trucy replied, confused.

Pearl grinned. "Mystic Maya gave me that talk when I was ten!" she said.

Apollo tightly crossed his arms, looking uncomfortable. "Um, isn't she going to get that from school?"

Maya frowned. "You honestly trust a school to give a decent talk on puberty and sex that answers all a kid's questions?" she pointed out. "Besides, she's clearly not going to get any kind of useful advice from you guys. No offence."

Apollo, bright red, looked away. "None taken."

"But what is 'puberty'? Or 'sex'?" Trucy asked, still confused. "I think I've heard the words before, but I don't know what they mean!"

Maya thought a moment before answering. "Well, to explain it in full would be to have the talk here and now," she explained, "but in short puberty is a period of growth every teenager goes through to become an adult. With some exceptions, it's different between girls and boys, so your dad and brothers would have gone through a different kind of growth than I did, or you and Pearly will." She frowned in thought. "Sex is a lot longer to go into. You'll have to wait for that one."

"It's very fascinating!" Pearl chimed in.

Apollo hid his face behind a hand, still bright red. "Please don't talk about it here," he begged.

Trucy frowned in thought, looking between Maya and Apollo. "Alright," she eventually said. "When are we going to have this talk, then?"

Maya rested a lightly curled fist against her cheek. "I'll talk to your dad about it," she said. "We'll arrange something."
"Thank you," Apollo sighed in relief.
The hall buzzed with activity as the ceremony came to an end, and seats were quickly vacated as students, and occasionally their families too, bid each other fond goodbyes and promises to keep in touch throughout their wildly varying futures.

"I'm gonna be a police detective!" Ernest Holmes boasted, a fist to his chest. "Gotta give the gift of my amazing intellect back to the people, I always say!"

Apollo gave him a level stare, eyelids lowered. "You never say that," he pointed out.

Luke bit back a laugh, remembering how Ernest had very nearly not graduated at all thanks to his consistently lower-than-average grades. "Good luck, Ernest!" he told their friend. "I'm sure you'll make a great detective!"

"Just like my ancestor!" Ernest only continued to boast, moving to push back his fringe with one hand, only for the errant hair to immediately flop right back over his eyes. "The great Sherlock himself!"

Clay rolled his eyes. "That'll be the day," he laughed, draping himself over his friends' shoulders, to Apollo's annoyance. "Me, I'm going to be the most amazing astronaut you ever saw! One day, Ernest, you can boast to your kids that you went to school with the great Clay Terran!"

"What, there's an astronaut course in college?" Ernest asked, confused.

"He's doing engineering," Luke explained, a hand moving to grab Clay's elbow and support his weight.

"Mister Starbuck recommended it!" Clay boasted.

Ernest wasn't impressed, his own ego deflated by the reminder of someone else's. "Yeah, whatever," he mumbled, looking between Apollo and Luke. "What about you two?"

Luke shrugged. "I'm going back to London to study as a vet!" he cried, then hurriedly added, "Veterinarian, I mean. Not 'veteran'. 'I've already had one awkward misunderstanding today...'"

Apollo shoved Clay off his back, to the other teen's disappointed laughter. "Lawyer," he said. "You never know, we might work together one day, Ernest."

"Pfft!" Ernest laughed, his ego back in full force. "I'll blow you away with my deductive skills! Just make sure you don't work against me, and we'll do great!"

Apollo nervously laughed, knowing in his heart that would never happen. "Uh, yeah, I'll do that..."

An older woman not far away called for Ernest's attention, and the young man gave her a wave before shooting his classmates a grin. "Well, I'll see you guys around maybe! It's been fun!"
"Bye!" Luke called as the trio waved, and their friend left to join his family.

"Who was that?" asked a voice behind them, and the three teens spun around to see Phoenix and Trucy stood behind them, dressed unusually proper with Phoenix in his old blue suit (which was starting to look rather threadbare) and Trucy in the black dress she normally hid under her magician’s cape.

"Mister Wright!" Clay called in greeting. "Trucy! Great to see you again!"

Trucy giggled as she gave Clay a wave.

"That was Ernest," Apollo explained, jerking a thumb in the direction of the Holmes family.

Luke nodded. "He's the one who's always boasting about being descended from Sherlock Holmes?" he added.

"Ah, yes," Phoenix said in recognition, then smiled knowingly, rubbing at his chin. "Well, there's something you share with him."

The four kids shared glances, confused. "What do you mean, Daddy?" Trucy asked.

"My great-grandfather," Phoenix explained. "He was Japanese, and, apparently, spent some time in London working with Sherlock Holmes."

The four were too surprised at first to react to the out-of-left-field news. "Really?" Luke added.

"According to family legend, anyway," Phoenix added with a laugh. "My father loves telling the story. Kinda surprised he never took the opportunity to impart it to you!"

"That's so cool!" Luke cried, excited to have some kind of connection, however tenuous, to one of his idols. "If I'd known that before... oh wow, I can't believe all this time I've had an ancestor who worked with Sherlock Holmes!"

Clay laughed. "Yeah, but that doesn't sound nearly as impressive as being descended from him, does it?" he pointed out, gesturing to the Holmes family. "Whether or not it's even true!"

Apollo smiled. "We're descended from the great Phoenix Wright," he said. "That's good enough for me."

"Aw, shucks," Phoenix said, hiding a threatening blush by immediately ruffling Apollo's hair, to the teen's annoyance.

Trucy was about to respond when she was distracted by a figure moving towards them through the crowds. "So who's that?" she asked, pointing towards the woman approaching them.

The three boys turned to look, only to immediately be ambushed as the short woman jumped on the nearest of the trio, which happened to be Luke. Sobbing at the top of her lungs, she hugged Luke's chest and cried "Oh my poor dorm dears! All off to lead amazing lives and change the world... and I'll miss every last one of you!"

Luke wasn't quite sure how to react to the interruption, looking around at the rest of the equally confused group. "Um, Nancy...?"

"Why, I remember taking you here from the hospital after that terrible accident!" Nancy continued, reaching into a pocket for a handkerchief as she, seemingly accidentally, released Luke from her grip. "A poor lost little boy with his teddy bear, coming to a dreary old school like this! Just look at how grown up you are now!"

Apollo sighed. "You do this every year, Nanny K..." he pointed out, looking around the room. "How many people have you cried on so far?"

"You'll be fine, Nanny K!" Clay cut in, stepping forward to grip the woman's shoulder firmly. "You've been like a real mother to us! We'll never forget you!"

"Oh, that's so sweet of you to say, dear!" Nancy sighed, patting the tears from her eyes with her handkerchief. "I remember when the two of you first became friends, always sneaking out of your rooms at night! 'To watch the stars', you always said!"

Apollo looked embarrassed. "Well, we were," he mumbled.

Phoenix couldn't help an amused chuckle, though he tried to hide it behind a hand. "You and Clay did what?"

Clay shrugged, giving Trucy a grin as she giggled. "We only stopped 'cause we kept getting caught!" he explained, interlocking his hands behind his head cockily.

Luke shook his head at the unsurprising news, then turned back to Nancy with a smile. "Thank you for looking after us, Nancy. We won't ever forget your kindness."

Nancy sniffed a moment before nodding, hands wringing the handkerchief in her hands. "You go off and change the world, dears," she said, then turned to Phoenix. "You'll look after your boys, won't you Mister Wright?"

Phoenix grinned. "Does that include Clay?"

"Yeah, you'll look after me, won't you?" Clay joked. "I'm one of 'your boys', right Wrights?" He elbowed Apollo, who just rolled his eyes.

Nancy laughed. "Oh, I know you three will be just fine!" she assured them, already waving. "After all, that's what you were always saying so loudly in your rooms! Now you go off and have amazing lives!"

As Nancy turned and began to walk back off into the crowd, the three teens waved after her. "Goodbye, Nancy!" Luke called. "Thank you!" She waved back over her shoulder before disappearing.

Phoenix looked at his watch. "Was there anyone else you three wanted to say goodbye to before you go?" he asked.

Luke, Apollo and Clay all glanced at each other before shaking their heads. "Can't think of anyone in particular," Apollo said.

"Yeah, that was Nanny K," Clay began, counting off on his fingers, "and we were chatting to all our classmates both before and after the ceremony... Teachers generally gave us their goodbyes in our last classes with them."

"I think the big speech Mister Turner gave was his goodbye," Luke chimed in.

Trucy groaned. "That guy made me fall asleep!" she complained. "He was so boring!"
"Count yourself lucky you never had to sit through his assemblies every week," Apollo replied, poking Trucy's nose with a smile.

"Plus, it is getting late," Luke pointed out, peering through a nearby window to the darkening sky outside.

"Then let's get going," Phoenix suggested, stepping towards the door as he waved for the four to follow. "Say goodbye to this old school!"

Luke grinned as everyone fell into step around Phoenix. "Goodbye, school!" he loudly called, to Trucy's amusement.

Clay made sure to walk alongside Phoenix, giving him a somewhat sheepish smile. "By the way Mister Wright, thanks for offering to be my 'parent' today. It was kinda... disheartening when my old man didn't want to come."

"No problem," Phoenix assured him. "You three boys are close enough, I'm happy to consider you one of the extended family."

"You're just saying that because he's giving us a ride home," Apollo joked to his father, elbowing Clay.

Clay just laughed.

As the group approached the door, they were stopped by a man in his mid-twenties with a brown ponytail, who held out a hand to Clay, Luke and Apollo expectantly. "Hey, you three need to turn in your student cards. No exceptions."

Apollo and Clay sighed as they reached into their uniform pockets to retrieve the items, but Luke was distracted, staring at the man thoughtfully. "Mister Thrume...?" he eventually asked.

The man took a deep breath as Apollo and Clay looked up in surprise. "Yeah, it's me," he admitted with another sigh. "Honestly, not many people recognise my voice without the scratchy speakers..."

Clay laughed as he and Apollo handed over their cards. "Wow, you're not at all what I imagined, Hugo!" he cried.

Hugo waved the comment off, only to stare at Clay's card as he received it, quickly looking up to give Clay a glare. "Hey, you're that tricksy kid!" he cried. "You got me in trouble so many times with your sneaking out in the middle of school!"

Clay shrugged, grinning somewhat cockily. "Hey, not my fault you always believed what I was telling you!"

Hugo gave Clay another glare as he took Luke's card, then put Clay's away as he turned his attention to the remaining two. After a moment, he looked confused, glancing up at the brothers and at Phoenix nearby. "I... thought your name was 'Justice'," he told Apollo.

"Uh... it used to be?" Apollo said, a little surprised to be reminded of his former name. "I changed mine when Luke and I got adopted, though Luke here didn't." He gestured to Luke, who gave Hugo a wave.

"Come on, Hugo," Clay said with a laugh, "you seriously didn't know about our resident Wright brothers?"
Apollo gave Clay a glare.

Hugo looked down at Luke's card, surprised. "Woah, you mean you two are brothers!? I thought that was a joke!"

At that, Clay burst into laughter. Even Trucy started giggling.

Turning red, Hugo waved the group towards the door. "Just get going," he told them, but directed a glare and a pointed finger at Clay as the quintet began to leave. "But take note, I'm glad to see you gone, Terran!"

"I love you too, Hugo!" Clay replied, throwing a kiss as he followed the Wrights out of the building.
It had been a very usual Independence Day for the Wright family this year. While Phoenix took Trucy out to watch the fireworks in the park, Apollo and Clay had gone to join the celebrations at the Cosmos Space Center, Clay boasting non-stop about his still-new ability to drive unrestricted as they went to the quiet, isolated valley to see the local variant of the traditional pretty explosions. In the meantime, Luke stayed at home, listening to the cacophony outside as it was only vaguely muffled by the walls and closed windows.

His first year home alone on this day, Luke had quickly discovered it was quietest in his bedroom; Not only was it on the opposite side of the building to the street, but the small window overlooking the alleyway below meant there was more wall to soften any sound echoing across the bricks. Although he was in the apartment, he had locked the doors and windows anyway, as he was, by design, as far from them as possible.

'I wonder if the Professor will be writing back this week?' he mused to himself, looking over to the statuette on his bedside table. 'It usually takes him a week or two to reply, especially when classes are on.' Shaking his head, he returned his attention to his book, the next in line in Luke's re-read of his Sherlock Holmes collection. If questioned, he would have to admit he was re-reading them (this time, anyway) purely because of the comment Phoenix had said during their school graduation. His collection was far from complete (quite a few of his books had been lost in the shuffle of the move and the car accident), and the extended biography of the famous detective was notoriously incomplete itself, but even so Luke was hoping to catch a glimpse in one of his books of a Japanese man who might have conceivably been Phoenix’s ancestor... not that he had any idea what the man's name might have been, but he was sure he could ask Phoenix if a name was brought up.

The distant shouts seemed to die down for a moment. Luke took the opportunity to focus more on his book, as it was difficult to do so with the noise from outside. However, his silence was interrupted by a crashing of glass, causing Luke to jump. No sooner had he laid his book down and got to his feet than the crash was followed by a loud, fizzing bang. Gasping in shock, and hoping dearly that the unnervingly close sound was merely from the street outside, he ran out of his room and into the hallway, making a break for the stairs.

It was as Luke reached the top step that the smoke alarms went off.

Ever since he was a boy, it had been hammered into Luke's head that, on the sounding of a fire alarm of any kind, he was to leave the building and call for help. However, on this occasion, Luke didn't think anyone would argue if he dallied a bit first. Spinning on his heel, he sprinted back into his room, lunging at his bedside table to grab his phone from its usual resting place, tugging it off its charger as he again changed direction for Apollo's bedside table on the other side of the window. Resting there was his brother's silk hat, and, underneath, his gloves, items Apollo only wore on-stage and stored here otherwise. 'If this isn't a false alarm, he'll need these.' Throwing the gloves and phone into the hat, Luke hugged it tightly to his chest and again left the room, the smoke alarms' high-pitched beeping ringing in his ears.
Once in the kitchen area, Luke again paused to look around for the source of the smoke that had set off the alarms. There were two in the apartment, linked to both go off if one detected smoke; One was in the hallway above the stairs, placed to wake up anyone sleeping should it go off overnight, while the other was in the main office next to the kitchen, so cooking or burning food wouldn’t cause false alarms. As Luke had yet to smell anything suspicious, he didn’t think it was the upstairs alarm that had been set off, and, to his confusion, the kitchen seemed to be totally clear too. He cast a glance at the laundry behind him, the closest path to outside. ’It’s a little early to abandon ship without even finding out what’s causing the problem, isn’t it?’ Making his decision, he placed the hat and its contents on the dining table and ran to grab the small fire extinguisher and fire blanket from where they had been carefully hung near the fridge. Thus armed, he dashed into Phoenix’s office.

Luke heard the crackling of the fire before he spotted it. As he stood by the desk, he looked in the direction of the sound and noticed the door into reception had been left wide open, the room beyond lit by a flickering orange light. Gathering up his nerve, Luke shoved the fire extinguisher under an arm and readied the blanket, running to the door and nervously looking beyond into reception.

The room was a mess - moreso than usual. A brick rested by the shattered window, shards of broken glass surrounding it. On the carpet, right in the middle of the blaze, Luke could make out the blackened remains of what he could only guess was a firework casing, quickly burning up as the fire spread through the room. For a few moments, the teen was too shocked to move, staring at the blaze in disbelief. ’Why would someone...? HOW would-!? N-no, I can ask questions later; I have to put out the fire!’ Forcing himself back into motion, he ran through the thickening smoke to the rapidly growing small fire and tossed the blanket as best as he could. It didn’t cover the whole fire, and his aim wasn’t very good with the fire extinguisher under his arm, but the burning section of carpet between him and the original source of the fire seemed to have been successfully smothered, sending a wave of thick smoke up into Luke’s face as it settled. He coughed through the smoke, waving it away as he stepped back into slightly clearer air, only to groan as he looked up and saw the rest of the fire, which the blanket had failed to cover. ’Can I retrieve the blanket, or would that just cause more problems...? I think I’d better leave it.’ Luke readied the fire extinguisher, pulling it out from under his arm and turning it to read the instructions on the side. He had previously read them purely out of curiosity when he was bored, but any memory of what they said had gone out the window when faced with an actual problem. This time, Luke found himself struggling to concentrate on the bright, clear pictures through the adrenaline and noise, but managed to get his bearings to pull the pin from the top and, pointing the nozzle at the rest of the fire, sprayed the white foam wildly.

With a great hissing, the mass of red flame overtaking reception seemed to die down. Luke couldn’t see much of anything through the white foam covering the area immediately around the front desk and door, and there was still a faint sound of crackling, but he assured himself it must be the foam working its magic. Sighing in relief, he placed the extinguisher on a corner of the reception desk that hadn’t gotten itself encased in white, then turned and wandered back into the office, where the air was clearer and he could begin to breathe. The adrenaline from the emergency was beginning to die down, but the loud beeping of the smoke alarm above him reminded Luke he couldn’t stop to relax just yet. ’I’ll need to tell Papa what’s happened... Oh, and would the perpetrators still be hanging around!?’ He ran to the window, only to see out in the street the usual small groups with their fountain fireworks, spraying sparks of light in the middle of the road as onlookers watched from the pavement. ’...Did any of those people even notice what happened up here!?’ Growling in frustration, he turned his attention back inside the apartment. ’Argh, and those alarms are killing my ears! Maybe first I should try and turn them off. I can’t call anyone with those things blaring right above me, anyway. Where’s Papa keep the instructions?’

Assuming his quarry was somewhere in a bookshelf, Luke ran his eyes along the rows of books against the walls around him. To his annoyance, he could only see the usual mixture of Phoenix’s old law books and Trucy and Apollo’s much newer magic books, which had started to migrate into wherever they would fit in the small apartment. Luke frowned in thought, wondering where the booklet might be. 'Actually, I wouldn't be surprised if it was in reception, knowing my luck tonight.' As he slipped a hand under his hat to run it through his hair, he sighed and made his way back into the fire-damaged room. 'I'll be lucky to see it through all the foam, but there's no harm trying.'

The odd crackling sound, to Luke's surprise, only seemed to have gotten louder in his absence, and, as he looked around in an attempt to read the titles of the books in the nearby bookcases, he quickly noticed an unusual orange glow on the furniture on the other side of the wall of foam. Gasping in sudden realisation, Luke grabbed the fire extinguisher and jumped as close to the foamy mess as he dared, pointing the nozzle through towards where he could see the glow. 'How did I manage to miss that it was still burning!? And how am I so terrible at aiming that I've blocked my own view of where the fire is!!?' He searched for the location of the crackling fire in vain, finally being forced to give up as he dropped the extinguisher back on the reception desk. 'I could have handled this so much better,' Luke told himself with a defeated sigh, running back out to the kitchen to retrieve his small hatful of supplies. He paused only to ensure every door he passed on his way out was closed behind him.

"Luke? Why are you calling me?"

"Papa! It's all my fault! Well, not fully my fault, but I only made it worse and I'm so sorry!"

"Whoa, whoa, calm down! Luke, what's going on?"

"I... well... Okay, before you ask, I've already called the fire brigade. They're on their way."

"... What happened."

"You're kidding," Apollo breathed into his phone, standing at the edge of the artificial light set up in the grass not far from the Space Center's main building.

Clay raised an eyebrow. When Apollo had suddenly and mysteriously gotten a call from his father, he had decided to answer it purely because it was unusual, and thus the pair had run as far from the noisy fireworks and explosion-loving crowd as they could. Clay was as curious as to the purpose of the call as his friend, and tapped his fingers impatiently against a leg as he waited for the news.

"Alright, I will," Apollo promised, looking unsettled. "Don't worry about me, Dad. Just keep me updated, and I'll be fine. You're sure you don't want me back right now?" He bit his lip as he listened to his father's reply, then sighed. "Okay. I'll text you when I'm on my way, then. Bye."

Clay watched eagerly as Apollo hung up, the black-haired teen promptly bouncing to his friend's side. "Well!?" he cried, grabbing Apollo's arm. "What's going on?"

Apollo pulled his arm from Clay's grip, rolling his eyes. "If you must know," he said, "some vandal threw a firework into our apartment. They've put out the fire, but they don't think it's safe for us to stay in there tonight."

"Whoa," Clay laughed, impressed, then shook his head and put on a more serious expression. "I mean, uh, sorry about your house. Do you know what the damage is? Where are you going to stay?"

"Dad didn't say much," Apollo said with a shrug. "I don't think we know what's damaged, anyway. Apparently Dad's spoken to our insurance, and they can put us up in the nearest hotel for a few nights." He paused and thought a moment. "Or, I think he said 'nearest'."

Clay crossed his arms. "Nearest sounds about right."

Apollo shrugged again. "Maybe," he agreed, "except that the nearest hotel to home is the Gatewater across the street."

It took a moment for the statement to sink in, and Clay stared at Apollo as he recognised the name of the famous building, probably the most luxurious hotel in town. "Oh."

"'Oh' is right," Apollo muttered, then sighed and headed back towards the crowds, tugging his cape back from his shoulders. "Let's get back to Mister Starbuck. I'll explain what's going on."

"Everything seems to be in order, sir!" the woman behind the counter chirped, pulling out four cards from somewhere underneath her desk. "I'll have your keys ready momentarily!"

Phoenix breathed a sigh of relief that, for once, something had finally come through for him... especially considering his past history with this hotel and its staff. "Thank you," he said, casting a wary eye at the woman's manager as he gave them a friendly smile and again disappeared into a back room. 'And thank your manager for not recognising me... that guy's creepy enough even when there isn't a murder I'm trying to investigate...' He self-consciously tugged his beanie down tighter on his head.

Trucy watched intently as the woman ran the four cards one by one through a small machine on her desk, the ten-year-old almost hanging off the edge of the counter as she peered over the top, standing on her tiptoes. The woman noticed the girl's gaze and gave her a smile, which Trucy responded to with a giggle.

Luke had been amusing himself during the long wait (it had taken a while for the hotel manager to contact their insurance company) by reading some of the tourist brochures lined up near the check-in counter. It was half a game of 'which of these places have I been' and half 'which of these places have I never heard of before that sound interesting'. The Gatewater Land leaflets were the most prominent, and Luke had been overlooking them until he eventually ran out of anything else interesting to look at, and cast his eye over them out of curiosity if they'd changed since the Wrights went there a few years previous. In his hands, he still held Apollo's hat and gloves that he'd 'rescued' in his escape from the fire, although he now regretted it as it looked like they'd be back in the house long before Apollo would be needing the items next.

"If you're at all interested," the woman spoke up, noticing Luke's perusal as she ran the last of the card keys through her machine, "we have a remarkable tourist attraction right here in this building!"

"You do?" Luke asked, looking over to the woman in surprise.

Trucy frowned. "I've never heard of something in this hotel!"

Phoenix closed his eyes for a moment to quash his frustration. "It's nothing special," he told the kids.

"Now that's not true, sir!" the woman chirped, finishing with the cards and slotting them into pre-prepared cardboard sleeves. "The 'Room with a View to Kill' is very popular! Everyone loves the tours we run!"

"I beg to differ," Phoenix muttered.

Luke wandered over to the desk, tapping his chin in thought. "What is this 'Room with a View to Kill'?" he asked. "Did something happen once in one of these rooms?"

"Indeed it did!" the woman replied, cheerfully explaining, "We had a very high-profile murder happen within view of the hotel, and the murderer planned it all out from one of our third-floor rooms!"

Trucy cooed in delight. "That sounds cool!"

"It's not," Phoenix interrupted, starting to get irritated as he turned to the woman behind the counter. "May we please have our keys?"

"Oh, of course, sir." The young woman handed Phoenix the four cards she had been holding in her hands. "Rooms fourteen-fourteen and fourteen-sixteen, right next door to each other. Enjoy your stay!"
"Thank you," Phoenix muttered, trying to restrain himself from angrily snatching the keys. He immediately headed off towards the lifts, waving for Trucy and Luke to join him. "C'mon, you two."

Luke and Trucy cast concerned looks at each other, then moved to follow their father.

Gatewater Hotel
Room 1414

When Apollo met up with his family, he found them already settled in to their rooms. It hadn't been difficult, considering they'd not yet been allowed back into the apartment and thus had only what they'd brought with them when they first left earlier that evening.

Trucy was yawning as she lay on one of the twin beds in the room, already stripped of her shoes, hat, cape, and even her red scarf. Cuddled up against the pillows, she looked ready to fall asleep where she was, though she was forcing herself to stay awake and gave Apollo a tired grin as Luke let him in. "Hey, Polly," she quietly called.

Phoenix, sat on the other bed, visibly sighed in relief to see the last of his children had made it to their temporary 'home'. He tapped at the upside down red hat sitting next to him, the pair of white gloves poking out the top. "Luke rescued these for you."

Apollo paused in surprise, blinking once before turning to Luke standing next to him. "You... shouldn't have?"

Luke blushed, hands clasped behind his back. "I-I was worried the whole building might be going down!" he explained. "Those were the first things I thought of to take with me when I left..."

Apollo thought a moment, then nodded. "Okay. That's fine, I don't mind." He walked over to Phoenix to take the missing parts of his magician's outfit, a part of him glad he took Trucy's lead in wearing most of it as his regular garb. "It shouldn't take more than five days for us to be back home, right?" he asked his father. "It's Monday today, and Truce and I don't have another performance til Saturday..."

Phoenix shrugged. "We won't know until the investigators have finished inspecting the place," he admitted. "The fire didn't spread outside reception, but it apparently got to the ceiling, and they said there's a possibility it damaged structure or something." He sighed, shaking his head. "We'll hear back from them tomorrow."

Apollo nodded, then looked over to Trucy to find she appeared to have dropped off to sleep already, curled up in her black dress on the hotel pillows. He smiled, a part of him wondering if she had been too tired when he came in to even remember by tomorrow that they'd spoken. "I guess we'd better turn in," he whispered, gesturing to his sleeping sister to point her out to Phoenix and Luke.

Luke smiled, a hand to his mouth to keep from giggling. "Good idea," he agreed. "Shall we see you tomorrow, Papa?"

Phoenix nodded, patting Apollo's arm. "I'll see you tomorrow. Luke has your room keys, by the way."
"Sure," Apollo quietly replied, grinning as he moved to follow Luke out of the room. "Seeya tomorrow, Dad."

The two teens kept quiet until they'd closed the room door behind them, and Luke led Apollo to the room next door, opening it with a card key in his pocket. "Did you and Clay have fun?" he asked, opening the door and shoving the key immediately into a small socket on the inside wall.

Apollo laughed a little at the reminder, following Luke in as the lights overhead flickered on, revealing the small room to be a mirror image of its neighbour. "It was dampened a bit after Dad told me what was going on at home," he admitted. "What even happened?"

Luke sighed, pulling the other card key from his pocket and laying it out on a table. "I don't really know," he admitted. "I heard a crash, then a bang, and the smoke alarms went off... I went to investigate, found someone had thrown a brick and a firework through the reception window. Somehow." He paused, pulling his hat off his head and gripping it tightly in guilt. "I... couldn't put out the fire, so I had to get out the back door and call the fire brigade."

Apollo paused a moment from his inspection of the nearest bed, putting down his hat and gloves and walking to Luke's side to rest a comforting hand on his shoulder. "You're fine, Luke," he reminded his brother. "You did the right thing."

Luke thought a moment before nodding, giving Apollo a small smile. "Thanks, Apollo," he said. "I'll try to remember that."

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
When the Wrights met up the next morning to go down to breakfast together, Trucy enthusiastically greeted Apollo with a loud hug. True to Apollo's prediction, she couldn't remember seeing him the night before.

All of the four members of the family felt various degrees of dishevelled as they travelled the fourteen floors down to eat. Even if all of them regularly wore clothes several days in a row, only Luke and Phoenix had ever been forced to sleep in them before, and neither had resorted to it in a very long time. Even Apollo, after growing out of all his other clothes while alone at Turner School, had stripped to his underwear to sleep... not that he'd felt comfortable doing so while sharing a room with Luke.

Once sat at a table, the family set about getting food and chatting as they ate. Trucy was very quick to launch into a rapid description of the night before for Apollo, telling him about the fireworks she and Phoenix had managed to see before the fire in their home broke out and they'd been forced to return. "And then Daddy was talking to the fire people for ages," she explained, "and it took even longer to get the insurance people on the phone!"

"It was the Fourth of July," Apollo pointed out. "We won't have been the only people whose home was vandalised by idiots."

Luke scowled, stabbing at a sausage on his plate with his fork. "Tossers," he muttered darkly under his breath. "Literally, too."

"But then we came here," Trucy continued, "and there was this kinda weird manager guy who talked to the insurance people, and a nice lady who got us our rooms!"

Phoenix hid a smirk behind his food at Trucy's description of the manager.

"And the nice lady mentioned they have a touristy thing in this building," Trucy added in a vaguely confused tone, picking at her food. "Something to do with a murderer."

Apollo was intrigued, but quickly noticed Phoenix, sitting opposite him, scowl at Trucy's words, intently looking away. "What was it?" Apollo asked his sister, a little wary.

"She called it 'Room with a View to Kill'," Luke explained, noticing Apollo's thoughtful expression. "Have you heard of it?"

Apollo took a moment to reply, glancing at Phoenix. "Maybe," he admitted. "I'm not sure."

Trucy crossed her arms, thinking. "Well, she said a famous murder happened here once, and they let people tour the room."

Luke shook his head. "No, the murder happened somewhere else! The murderer planned it from a room in the hotel."

"And people line up to tour this room?" Apollo questioned, confused. "Why?"

"Exactly," Phoenix agreed, returning his attention to the conversation. "Nobody except those close to it remember the murder itself, and they are the people least likely to tour the place the murderer planned it." He frowned, staring at his plate. "Besides, it's just a normal hotel room. There isn't even anything special about it."

Luke and Trucy shared another glance as they recognised the repeated odd behaviour from the previous night. "How long ago did this murder happen, anyway?" Luke warily asked.

Phoenix thought a moment. "Six years, come September," he said, still staring at his plate, although more thoughtfully now than in anger.

"Only six years?" Trucy cried, offended. "I thought this was some old-timey murder from aaaaaaages ago!" Huffing, she leaned back in her seat, arms crossed. "Why was it such a famous murder, anyway?!"

Phoenix smiled. "The murderer had done a lot more than just kill someone," he explained. "This guy had an entire empire built around collecting and using blackmail material on every person in this city with some modicum of fame or power."

Luke was surprised. "Wow, really?" he asked, then laughed. "I guess it's a good thing he got caught!"

Apollo frowned, silently eating. 'So I was right, then...'

"But if he could blackmail so many people, how'd he get caught?" Trucy asked, leaning forward eagerly in her seat as she questioned her father. "What happened to his 'empire'?"

Phoenix thought a moment, then sadly smiled. "If you have so many questions," he said, "why not go on this tour yourself? I have to meet with the inspector today anyway, and it's probably best you all wait here in the hotel until we're done."

"I'll take you," Apollo offered to Trucy. "On the tour, I mean."

Trucy grinned. "Wow, you will!?" she cried, glancing at Luke to see him also looking excited at the idea. "They'll have, like, a tour guide who knows all about it, right?"

"Can't imagine why they wouldn't," Phoenix said.

"It sounds interesting!" Luke laughed. "That should definitely keep us occupied while you're talking to the inspector, Papa!"

Phoenix smiled. "I'm glad."

"We can organise a tour once Dad's left," Apollo said to Trucy, who squealed excitedly. "I'm sure they'll be happy to show off the thing that made them so famous."

Gatewater Hotel
"And here it is, exactly as our fair murderers left it!" the manager of the hotel boasted as he opened the otherwise ordinary hotel room door and showed the three Wright children in. "The Room with a View to Kill!" He chuckled a little, one hand held across his abdomen in a small bow while the other gestured around the room. "I came up with the name myself!"

Trucy jumped in to the room, excited at first, but quickly deflated when she realised, exactly as Phoenix had said, it was merely an ordinary hotel room, not all that different from their own cheaper rooms upstairs. This one was larger, had a single queen-sized bed against the far wall instead of two singles, and the door opened with an ordinary metal key, but it otherwise had the same beige wallpaper, orange carpet and blue chairs. "Oh," she muttered.

Luke adjusted his hat, gaze sweeping the room and noticing the little details that seemed to prove it had remained untouched, true to the man's word. On a small table by the window were two wine glasses, accompanied by an open wine bottle, and the bed had been made, but not as professionally as he'd seen the hotel staff do so. "This is...?" He cleared his throat, casting a glance to their nearby guide. "Very exciting," he insisted, although his tone gave away his disappointment.

Apollo hung at the back of their group, closing the door behind them. He only took notice of the fake flowers sitting in a pot to the side, nearby a blue screwdriver sticking awkwardly out of a drawer. 'Just like Dad described in his case-files... Surely the police would have taken it in to prosecute the wiretapper, though? Maybe it's just a replica.' He looked over to the manager, standing nearby watching them expectantly, and asked, "So, can you tell us the story behind this murder that happened?"

The manager laughed cheerfully as Luke and Trucy looked over to him, Trucy impatiently awaiting the tale. "Of course, sir! Oh, it was many years ago now!" he began. "I was but a mere bellboy then!"

"It was six years ago!" Trucy pointed out, arms crossed.

Thrown off a little by the interruption, the manager scratched his cheek. "Y-yes, well, six years can be a long time, miss," he insisted, quickly returning to his well-practised tale. "The esteemed Redd White of Bluecorp checked in here with his secretary." He sighed, nostalgically. "Ah, what a beautiful woman Miss May was! I personally checked them in myself, you know."

"Really?" Luke asked in surprise, now understanding why, when they'd arranged to do this tour, it had been the manager who stepped forward to take them up instead of one of the 'lesser' employees.

"It was an ingenious plan," the man continued. "They specifically asked for this room, because it has a wonderful view of their victim's office!" With that, he gestured to the window, leading the group to the scene laid out before it. Luke and Trucy smiled as they hurried after him, peering over the table and out the window, although they were surprised to recognise the street outside their home. "She no longer works there of course, but you can see it still!" the manager continued, pointing to a second floor window across the street. "That dark window with the blinds half-shuttered!"

Luke and Trucy, when they realised what the man was pointing at, gasped, Trucy clapping her hands over her mouth in shock. Apollo rested a hand on Trucy's shoulder, looking across the street much more calmly. The dark office the hotel manager was referring to, right next to the broken, boarded-up windows of their front room, was their father's.
"I hear the place is a talent agency now," the manager continued, interpreting the younger pair's surprise as awe of the view. "Regardless, at the time I believe it was a law office!" He chuckled again.

Trucy would have spoken up to boast about her family's talent agency, but was still too shocked to speak.

"The poor woman was investigating into Mister White's, and Bluecorp's, illegal affairs," the man explained. "They realised she was on to them, and came here to off her!"

"What did they do?" Luke asked, staring in awe at their guide. "Why was this room so important?"

The man laughed to himself. "Why, to create an alibi, sir! They tapped her phone, found a time to pin the blame on another, and crafted their perfect frame-up!" He turned and hurried over to the bathroom door, reaching in and pulling out a medium-sized cork board, on which were pinned all sorts of newspaper articles. His trio of guests slowly followed to read them, quickly noticing every article on the board seemed to be about the murder and how it was uncovered in court. "Well, not ab-so-lutely perfect!" the guide continued. "Miss May ensured I would be her alibi, but she was arrested for the tapping of their victim's phone! And then Mister White, he tried to get away with his crime by confessing to the tapping, only to change his mind and confess to the whole thing!"

Trucy and Luke both looked over at Apollo, standing behind them. "You knew all about this, didn't you?" Trucy accused him.

Apollo only shrugged.

Taking no notice of the sibling disagreement, the hotel manager leant the board against a wall and hurried to the drawer, where the screwdriver was sticking out. "And now for the best part, the drawer in which they kept the wiretap...!"

It was a quiet and rather awkward trip back down to the lobby, and the trio quickly sat in a row on one of the comfortable sofas dotted around the massive room at the entry doors.

"Stay here and look out for Dad?" Apollo asked, looking to Trucy at his side and Luke next to her.

Luke nodded, but Trucy instead looked up at her oldest brother with a glare. "If you knew someone was killed in Daddy's office," she loudly accused him, "why didn't you ever mention it before!?"

Apollo quickly shushed the girl, looking around as her words echoed in the open space. After shooting apologetic smiles to the few who turned their heads in confusion towards the trio, he returned Trucy's determined glare with one of his own. "Because you wanted to see it," he explained. "Plus, Dad knew the victim, and I didn't want to accidentally upset him by bringing it up."

Trucy blinked in surprise. "He did?"

Luke thought a moment, running a finger across his chin. "His mentor, right?" he asked. "I'd forgotten Papa mentioned she was murdered. He never said it was in the office, though."

"Huh?" Now Trucy looked between both her brothers in confusion. "What are you guys talking about!?" she cried.

"You don't remember?" Apollo asked, one eyebrow raised.

"It was a while ago," Luke pointed out. "If I remember correctly, I don't think Trucy was even paying attention at the time."

Trucy huffed, crossing her arms.

"I'll explain then," Apollo offered, resisting the urge to smile at his sister's threatening anger as he rested a hand on her caped shoulder. "I've read Dad's case-file and notes on it several times, so I think I probably know more about it than that tour guide."

Trucy only pouted at her oldest brother's smug grin.

"Her name was Mia Fey," Apollo began. "She was Maya's older sister."

At that, Trucy again blinked in surprise. "She was!?"

Luke smiled. "You remember her now?" he asked.

"Mommy's mentioned her!" Trucy cried, glancing back and forth between her brothers. "Her 'Sis'! That means she's our aunt!" She thought only a moment, not noticing Luke and Apollo's confused looks, then grinned. "That makes her Auntie Mia! We should ask Mommy and Pearly if it would be alright to meet her one day!"
Apollo stared at Trucy in disbelief, crossing his arms. "That's what you're focussing on here...?"

"So, um," Luke spoke up, getting the conversation back on track, "she was investigating this Bluecorp company and they tried to kill her for it?"

Nodding, Apollo continued, "Yeah, and frame Maya. Dad stood up for her, though. He proved the wiretapping had happened, he got himself accused in Maya's place, and then Maya channelled Mia and helped him get the murderer to confess."

"Auntie Mia sounds so smart!" Trucy gleefully told Luke, her legs swinging as they dangled over the edge of her seat.

Apollo snorted in laughter. "You should see her case-files!" he cried, grinning excitedly. "Dad's kept 'em all, and she was an amazing attorney!"

Luke giggled. "You've been studying them?" he realised.

Apollo shrugged, looking embarrassed. "Well, I haven't gone through all of 'em yet..."

The entrance doors swung open, and the trio looked around as a familiar man in a white shirt and blue beanie came in to the lobby. Trucy jumped to her feet, waving as she ran to him. "Daddy!" she cried, attracting Phoenix's attention just as she reached his side, grabbing his middle in a tight hug.

Phoenix laughed as Apollo and Luke slowly joined them. "Ah, you're all here!" he said, then gently pried Trucy off his abdomen. "I have some good news!"

Smiling, Phoenix nodded, and his three children erupted into cheers.

Reception

After a brief trip back to their hotel rooms to ensure they had everything they'd arrived with, Phoenix led the Wrights back to their front door, carefully unlocking it and pushing it open to enter the damaged front room, stepping gingerly on a line of rags leading to the office beyond. Apollo, Trucy and Luke filed in behind him, looking around in shock.

The green carpet that had stretched into the neighbouring office was completely gone, cut off at the doorway, leaving a dirty grey subfloor. Great swathes of the beige walls were similarly missing, revealing the wooden framing and electrical wiring usually hidden behind the drywall, while the parts that remained suffered black stains from the smoke. The broken window pane was covered by wooden boards, which appeared to be nailed into the frame, while the other two panes of glass around it were blocked from letting in much sunlight thanks to a thin layer of smoke still covering their inside surface. Every bit of furniture that used to sit in the room had vanished, leaving it empty, echoing back the trio's quiet gasps as they took in the reality of the situation.

"Almost everything in here was damaged beyond repair, if not destroyed completely," Phoenix explained, watching the trio. "Anything left stinks of smoke, but I think we can clean them up with a little elbow grease. We might have to invest in a few air fresheners or aromatic candles or something, just until we get the faint smell out of the rest of the rooms." He winced as he looked to Apollo specifically. "Oh, by the way... Your desk was completely gone, Apollo. Nothing in that corner survived. Sorry."

"It's fine," Apollo replied, still looking around the room in vague shock, "I'm fine. I just had my old school stuff there... and some things for college. I can always print those out again." He turned his gaze to Phoenix, forcing a small smile. "At least we're alive, right? And it was just this room that got hit. We've only been out one night."

"My violin was in here," Luke quietly realised aloud. "And all... well, most of my music." He sadly stared at the floor, gripping his other arm in self-comfort. "Mum gave me that violin... It was a Christmas present..."

Trucy suddenly squeaked. "The piano!" she shouted, and almost dashed out into the room before Apollo and Luke instinctively grabbed her. "My portrait of Daddy was on there!" she meekly added, gripping her brothers' arms as she hung off them, almost dropping to the rag-covered floor if not for Apollo and Luke holding her up. She sniffed, tears gathering in her eyes. "How can I remember what he looks like for when he comes back...?"

Luke pulled Trucy towards him into a hug, letting the girl cry. "It's okay, Truce. You can let it out if you want."

Phoenix quietly stepped backwards and hurriedly walked into the office, unnoticed.

Apollo dropped to his knees, placing his hat on the floor and rubbing Trucy's back. "Don't you worry. We can make another one."

"No need," Phoenix interrupted, re-entering the room as the trio looked up in surprise, seeing him standing with a small smile and his hands behind his back. "It smells of smoke, and the piano itself was beyond repair, but the fire did spare this at least." He swung his arms around, revealing in his hands the missing portrait of Zak Gramarye, a little blackened near the bottom but otherwise totally intact.

"Daddy's portrait!" Trucy cried, running forward and grabbing the frame from Phoenix to hug before jumping back, holding it at arm's length with a disgusted cry. "Blegh! Wow, it does stink of smoke."

Luke and Apollo giggled, shooting each other relieved looks as Apollo got back up off the floor, retrieving his hat.

"Don't worry, Daddy," Trucy said to the portrait, smiling widely. "we'll get you cleaned up in no time!" With that, she happily skipped into the office. Apollo and Luke moved to follow after her.

Phoenix stood by the door, but held out a hand to stop Luke before he followed his siblings further into the home. "I'm sorry about your violin," he said giving Luke a sympathetic look. "There really wasn't much left of it."

Luke sadly nodded, rubbing an arm in self-comfort as he looked away. "I'm fine," he insisted. "It's just a violin. I have other things from Mum and Dad." He sighed. "Besides, if I'd been able to put out the fire-"

"And you can stop that right there," Phoenix interrupted, giving his son a stern look as Luke met his gaze in surprise. "This wasn't your fault. You did everything you could." He smiled. "If it weren't for what you did do, that fire would have done more damage for sure. Probably would have spread into the office." He paused briefly, more for effect than anything else. "You should be proud."

Phoenix softly laughed, reaching up to ruffle Luke's hair through his hat, to the teen's giggles. "Let's join your siblings," he said, and the pair headed through into the office.

As Trucy entered the room, her portrait of Shadi Enigmar's stage persona held gingerly in her arms, she paused, her attention grabbed by the window overlooking the street outside. The Gatewater Hotel was as visible here as her home had been from there, and she rushed to the small sofa to place the sooty portrait of her biological father down. "You sit here for a moment, Daddy," she told it, ensuring the frame would not fall from its perch.

Apollo, having been examining the old coat-rack rescued from the neighbouring room, raised an eyebrow as he watched his sister's antics. "What are you doing?" he asked, a part of him wondering if he even wanted to know the answer to his question.

"It was in here, wasn't it?" Trucy replied, a 'well duh' tone to her voice as she stepped towards the window, looking across at the row of windows on the hotel's third floor. "I wonder where that room we were in is?"

Apollo opened his mouth to respond, but thought better of it and changed his mind, shaking his head as he wandered towards the kitchen door, his hat still held securely in his hands.

Phoenix and Luke finally entered, Phoenix closing the door behind them so as to keep any lingering smell of smoke from needlessly spreading to the rest of the apartment. "What are you two talking about?" he asked idly, crossing the room towards his desk.

"Auntie Mia," Trucy casually replied, then turned and held her hands on her hips with a scowl, seemingly not noticing all three members of her family freeze and stare in her direction. "How come you never told us about her, Daddy!?""}

Phoenix blinked, a blank look on his face that slowly gave way to a confused frown. "'Auntie' Mia...?"

Apollo and Luke shot each other horrified glances, wondering if they should speak up.

"Yeah!?" Trucy cried, running to the window and standing in its centre as she looked out at the hotel across the street. "The tour guide said someone watched her die in here from that room we went to in the hotel!" She fixed Phoenix with another glare. "Why didn't you ever say someone died in here!?!"

To Apollo and Luke's surprise, Phoenix then laughed, pulling his beanie off his head and tossing the item onto his desk. "Oh, it just never came up," he airily explained, walking over to join Trucy at the window. "We found her body right there where you're standing, underneath the window."

At that, Trucy squealed and jumped away, staring at the spot of carpet under the centre pane. "Right there!?" she repeated.

Phoenix laughed again. "Aw, don't tell me you're afraid of Mia's ghost, Truce?" he teased, leaning down towards her.
"No!" Trucy insisted, brushing back her cape as though wiping off dust. "I just... thought I saw a bug. Besides!" She crossed her arms, putting on a know-it-all tone. "Mommy or Pearly could channel her if they wanted to, so she's probably hanging out with them!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Really," he sighed.

"Exactly," Phoenix chuckled, poking at Trucy's nose with a grin. "Why would she want to scare you? That would be a terrible first impression for when you all finally meet each other!"

Luke frowned. "Wait, does she know about us?" he asked.

"Course she does," Phoenix replied, standing straight as he turned towards Luke. "I actually spoke to her in January, and Maya spends some time with Mia every year on her birthday."

"Maya's birthday?" Apollo clarified.

"But we visited Mommy on her birthday this year!" Trucy pointed out. "Why didn't we see Auntie Mia then!?"

Apollo sighed, and would have crossed his arms had he not been holding his hat. "We were only there for an hour or two," he replied. "I presume it's Pearly who channels Mia, and she obviously wanted to spend that time with us instead of channelling someone else."

Trucy tapped her foot, but had no objections, so she silently accepted the argument.

Luke thought a moment, looking to Phoenix. "Papa, if you knew what this 'Room with a View to Kill' was about, why didn't you tell us before we went there? We might not have gone if we'd known it was about the murder of Maya's sister... and in this office, too." He gestured to the window, where Phoenix had said her body was.

Phoenix shrugged. "Who am I to tell you how to spend your own time and money?" he said, then smiled as he looked to Apollo. "Besides, Apollo seems to have told you more about it than that creepy ex-bellboy did."

Apollo blushed, looking away. "Well, I've read your notes on the case a few times," he quietly admitted, "a-and they were asking questions, so..."

Shaking his head, Phoenix quietly laughed to himself. "Right now, I'm curious to see what the chief thinks of 'Auntie Mia'," Phoenix continued, winking at Trucy, who simply grinned. He then turned to look out the window, directing a stern stare into the room he still distinctly remembered seeing April May standing in on the night of Mia's death. "That room, though... It's been almost six years, and they're still flogging it out as a tourist attraction to every passer-by?" He frowned, turning his expression into a glare. "I don't think I'll ever understand what goes on in the heads of the staff over there..."

Apollo and Luke shot glances at each other, unsure how to break the suddenly serious mood. Trucy simply followed Phoenix's eyes, still trying to locate the window to Room 303.

Phoenix sighed, turning away from the window and heading behind his desk, offering his kids a reassuring smile. "But, we have work to do, don't we?" he pointed out, searching the loose paper littering the area to find a blank piece.

"We do?" Trucy asked, running to grab her dropped portrait of her birth father.

Phoenix finally located a blank piece of paper, grabbed a pen, and walked around his desk towards the door further into the home. "Making a list of the stuff we lost in the fire, of course," Phoenix explained, patting Apollo's shoulder as he passed. "Have to furnish that room again once it's been rebuilt. This talent agency won't get any customers with a reception room like that!" He opened the door and headed through into the kitchen.

Trucy giggled, skipping after Phoenix. Apollo and Luke smiled as they followed. "So we'll get a new piano and violin?" Luke suggested. "Oh, and I don't suppose that old computer on the desk survived, did it?"

Phoenix shook his head, sitting at the dining table as he started writing a list on the blank piece of paper. "Whole thing melted from the heat," he said, then began to mutter to himself. "Lessee, piano, violin, desk... Those are all stuff for the agency, so those have priority."

In a few moments, Luke, Trucy and Apollo had also sat in their regular seats at the table. "We kept our fliers in there, too," Trucy pointed out with a sigh. "We'll have to order to have them reprinted!"

"You might want to redesign them again first, Papa," Luke giggled.

Phoenix scoffed good-naturedly, returning his attention to the list. "Quite honestly, it'd be nice to have a brand new piano. That old thing was something Maya brought in, and it was really starting to look shabby."

"Couldn't hold a tune, either," Luke replied with a grin.

"Nah, that's just Dad's playing," Apollo added, shooting Phoenix a mischievous look.

"Hush," Phoenix said, pretending he couldn't hear the three kids giggling madly.

"So last night was a bit hair raising

Hm?

Someone threw a firework through our window

WHAT!?!?!?!? .

WE'RE ALL OKAY I PROMISE

YOU BETTER BE OR I'LL KILL YOU THEN CHANNEL YOU THEN KILL YOU AGAIN!!!!! .

I'M THE MASTER OF KURAIN I CAN DO THAT!!!!! .

Luke was home, he managed to keep it restricted to reception

The police apparently got a profile on the guy from onlookers, they say they know who he is

The building has been inspected and declared safe so we were only out a night

Where did you go overnight? .

The Gatewater. I wasn't sure how long my phone battery would have to last, so I waited to tell you what was happening

If you scare me like that again Nick I swear you will be meeting Sis in the afterlife.

I'm sure I would be. Btw apparently the kids are all eager to meet their 'auntie Mia', guess who called her that Aw, I can't be mad with the kids! I guess we'll have to arrange something when we have the time. ;).

__________________________________________________________

So are you three okay? Your dad told me what happened :(.

APOLLO: We're fine. Luke was the only one home at the time, and Dad says he stopped the fire getting too bad

That's good. It was reception that got hit right?.

APOLLO: Yep. We lost almost everything in there. I think the only thing that survived was Trucy's portrait of her dad

APOLLO: The carpet's totally gone, and a lot of the wall is missing at the moment too

Wow... .

LUKE: Hey, Maya! What Apollo said. It's weird how much a room changes when it's all stripped down, but Papa says some builders will be coming sometime to replace the window and rebuild the floor and walls.

APOLLO: Yeah, they're going to try and match the carpet and walls to their original color, so it still goes with the office

TRUCY: WE HAVE TO CLOSE THE AGENCY UNTIL RECEPTION IS BACK TO NORMAL, IT'S A DISASTER!

APOLLO: It's not that bad, Truce :/

TRUCY: YES IT IS

I hope you get everything running again soon :( you still have the wonder bar don't you?.

APOLLO: Exactly. And Dad has the bowl club too. It's just any walk-in one off jobs we're missing atm

LUKE: My violin's gone. So's Papa's piano. We have to replace those before I can help out again.

The piano's gone!? I got such a good deal on that! D: .

But the important thing is all four of you are safe and alive. I'm glad for that at least.

TRUCY: You'll come visit us soon, won't you Mommy? :3 And bring Pearly?

We'll see Trucy ;).

"Actually, you two have Maya's room," Phoenix continued to the boys, smiling nostalgically. "She used to stay here occasionally when this was still Mia's place."

Luke thought curiously as he rolled the die and moved his figure. "I think Maya's mentioned Mia. Who was she?"

"Does this have to do with Charley?" Apollo asked. "You said something about him having seen a lot for an average plant."

Phoenix thought in silence for a long moment. "Apollo," he eventually said, turning to his eldest, "you've read all my case-files from the courthouse library. What do you remember about my second ever case?"

December 22, 11:30AM

Wright Talent Agency
Phoenix's Office

Fifteen-year-old Apollo cast a furtive glance around the room as he poked his head through the crack in the door. Seeing no-one inside, he checked there was nobody in the kitchen behind him and dashed into the office, carefully closing the door once inside.

A part of Apollo told him he was being stupid; Why sneak around in his own home? Phoenix was his father - had been for almost three months now - and there was no reason he couldn't ask if there were files or even notes of any of the ex-lawyer's cases lying around, or if Apollo could maybe look at them. The rest of Apollo said this was the only time he could do this; Phoenix was busy organising their trip tomorrow, going to meet a friend of his and Luke's up in the mountains, and Luke and Trucy were trying to help, putting together things they would need for the four days they'd be away. Apollo had thrown together some of his clothes and a few books Luke had leant him, and his packing was done. Asking to poke around in Phoenix's office would only bother his father, and, if he said no, what was Apollo's plan then? 'Better to ask forgiveness, I think the phrase goes? Besides, with us leaving tomorrow, I'm pretty sure Dad would say no.'

The conversation they'd had the previous day over Luke's board game had bothered Apollo all night.

"I remember something about a clock that looked like a statue," Apollo mumbled, then blinked and looked up at his father with wide eyes. "Didn't the charges get transferred to you on that one?"

Phoenix nodded again. "Do you remember the name of the victim? Or the first defendant?"

Apollo was forced to shrug, looking guilty. "I'm terrible with names," he admitted. "Sorry."
"No problem," Phoenix calmly replied, smiling. "The first defendant was Maya. It was how we met."

Back before the fan club had fizzled out in the wake of Phoenix's disbarment, Apollo had prided himself on knowing all the small details about every case. He'd spend the whole afternoon sitting in the courthouse library, reading the official case-files and courtroom transcripts until he'd memorized every argument and every piece of evidence used to support it. Now, though? 'I haven't read a case-file in months... how'd I forget all of that so quickly? I mean, I always knew I'd never manage the names, but forgetting so much about Dad's first big trial?' Apollo sighed to himself, leaning against the door. It was because he'd forgotten so much about his idol-turned-parent that Apollo was convinced he had to return to his former hobby. How could he call himself a fan, let alone a fan who wanted to become a lawyer himself one day, if he could no longer recall any of that information he'd once so prided himself on knowing?

Phoenix looked over to the office door with a thoughtful, far-off look in his eyes, and Apollo wondered what was on the ex-lawyer's mind. "Mia was my mentor, and Maya's older sister. This used to be her office, a long time ago."

Apollo and Luke glanced at each other as they mutually realised who the victim of the case had been.

A part of Apollo was angry at himself for deciding to leave out Luke. Much of the previous evening had been spent telling his little brother everything he had managed to remember about the case: that there had been a conspiracy with a big businessman, that Phoenix had almost lost until he'd resorted to threatening to release a list of people to the press, and that said list had been full of famous important people who had committed suicide, a fact discovered by one of Apollo's old friends in the fan-club. It had led to a lot of speculation that the businessman, who Apollo couldn't remember the name of for the life of him, had overseen more than one murder before finally being executed the previous year. Luke had wanted to question Phoenix about it immediately, but Apollo had convinced him to leave it alone, wanting to re-read the case-file first. For Luke, this had translated to "after our trip" - another reason Apollo was leaving him out of his little 'mission' this morning.

'But I should get going before I lose my chance.' Pushing off from the door, Apollo tip-toed behind Phoenix's desk and crouched down, looking over the drawers kept within reach of the big, comfortable chair currently tucked under the desk, its wheels having long left marks in the carpet from years of use. He held out a hand towards the drawers, wondering which to try, but paused as he noticed keyholes by the handles. 'Uh-oh. What if they're locked?' Closing his eyes, Apollo decided to take a chance, and reached out for one randomly. The plastic handle firmly in his grasp, he gave a firm tug... and was surprised when he felt the drawer slide out easily at his touch. Eyes blinking open in shock, he smiled as he saw the drawer, conveniently the one furthest to the left, indeed open in front of him. He pulled it open a little wider, and grinned as he saw a sea of carefully organised files within. Every one was marked with an unfamiliar handwriting, a code of two letters followed by a dash and a single number. Underneath each was scribbled a month and year, and a quick scan told Apollo that the earliest, the ones hidden at the back of the drawer, were from as far back as February, 2013. The most recent, the file at the very front, was labelled "AUG '16". Apollo frowned. 'Huh. That's weird. Dad didn't take his first case until that August, didn't he?' He ran a hand through the files, seeing glimpses of the official documentations, transcripts, and even loose notes and copies of written evidence. These can't be Dad's. What are they doing here? Whose are they?"
At that moment, Apollo heard the door to the kitchen opening, and immediately reacted, slamming the drawer closed and jumping back, almost falling over onto the green carpet and hitting his head on the desk behind him. Eyes wide, he looked up around the chair and computer monitor to the kitchen door, only to see Phoenix stood in the doorway, one hand on the doorknob and an equally surprised look on his face as he stared back at the teen.

"You are in for it now, Apollo..." the fifteen-year-old told himself, meekly standing up, although he couldn't make his eyes meet his father's. He opened his mouth to speak, but couldn't think of an excuse that wasn't babbling. It was plainly obvious what he'd been doing; Talking would just make it worse. He gripped his bracelet tightly, waiting for the retribution that was sure to come.

After a long pause, Phoenix laughed. "Were you looking at my case-files?"

Apollo winced, although he was a little surprised at the reaction. "Um... yeah," he admitted, carefully looking up at Phoenix's amused face. "You're not mad?" he asked.

"Why would I be?" Phoenix replied, still laughing as he entered the room, pushing the door to a mostly closed position behind him. "If I didn't want you in there, I'd've locked them up!"

"Oh," Apollo mumbled, now beginning to feel embarrassed for worrying in the first place.

Grinning, Phoenix walked around the desk to stand next to Apollo, arms crossed as he leaned against the back of his chair. "Feel free to go through them. I don't mind, I promise."

'The grin says you're looking for another opportunity to tease me,' Apollo thought with a sigh, but he obediently knelt down by the drawers anyway. He had automatically re-opened the one he'd been looking in already before he remembered what he'd been doing immediately before the interruption, and looked back up at his father. "Actually Dad, I was wondering..." He gestured to the drawer. "Whose cases are these? They can't be yours, right?"

Phoenix's grin downgraded to a smile. "You're correct on that point," he agreed. "Those weren't my cases, though do feel free to read them anyway. Those were Mia's."

"Mia's?" Apollo repeated as Phoenix crouched down at his side, sitting comfortably on the carpet. "Your mentor's?"

Phoenix nodded. "She was an amazing lawyer. Everything I know I learned from her, so I'm sure you'd pick up something studying her cases too." Smiling, he reached to the drawer next to Apollo's and pulled it open, revealing another stack of files and folders within. "These were mine," he explained. "Not as organised as Mia kept hers, but it's in order, so that's good enough for me." He chuckled to himself. "Organisation was one thing she never was able to teach me before she left."

Apollo looked over the files in Phoenix's drawer, and found he had to agree. They were labelled and ordered identically to Mia's, by two different sets of handwriting (one he recognised as Phoenix's, but the other was different to even the writing on Mia's files), although bits of the documentation, the notes and other bits of paper stuck out everywhere, making it harder to even locate the labels or where the separate files began or ended. Looking at the dates, he noticed the file at the back was labelled "AUG '16", while the one at the front was "FEB '19", only ten months previous. Something in the back of Apollo's head told him there was something off about that most recent date, that maybe there was a file missing, but he decided to ignore it for now, running a hand through the case-files as he caught glimpses of familiar official records, transcripts he'd once studied, copies of evidence he'd only read about, and even messy, handwritten notes he'd previously only dreamed of being so close to.
"I'd offer to let you take some to Kurain with us to read," Phoenix said, interrupting Apollo's train of thought, "but honestly I'd rather these not leave the office."

"Alright," Apollo replied, nodding as he gave his father a grin. It seemed like a reasonable request, especially in return for unrestricted access to the personal files of the Phoenix Wright. 'How did I end up getting adopted by my hero again?' He was so amazed at the opportunity, he almost forgot that his original intention had been to look up a very specific case, so it was with a small cry of discovery that he reached into the back of Phoenix's drawer, grabbing the file second from the back. It was labelled "NS-2 SEP '16", and the haphazardly organised paper inside fell into place as the file was removed from its home, making it already look much tidier. "This was the one I was looking for," he explained, giving Phoenix an apologetic look. "That's... okay, right?"

Phoenix was surprised, but slowly smiled. "Of course it is," he insisted, then pushed himself to his feet, hands shoved into the pocket in the front of his hoodie. "By the way," he added, "let me know if you have trouble reading my handwriting in those things. I was only ever writing my notes for me, so I didn't try to be tidy with them."

Apollo nodded, watching as Phoenix then turned and left the room, closing the door again as he went. He hoped he hadn't accidentally upset his father, but any thought he might have had to follow and check up on him was overtaken by the excitement of the treasure trove before him, and he simply had to examine his chosen file immediately. Leaving the drawers open, Apollo stood up, clutching the file firmly in his hands, and moved for the desk. He pulled out the chair and sat down, plopping the file on the (for once) clean surface (which he suspected Luke had cleared recently, as tidy as he was). After opening the file, Apollo very quickly pulled out the official documents and the court transcript, putting the familiar papers to one side as he focussed on the small pile of handwritten notes. On top was a crumpled scrap of paper with a message in the unfamiliar handwriting: "When my sister couldn't find any contradictions in a witness's testimony she would bluff it and press the witness on every detail! The witness always slips up and says something wrong... It worked lots of times!" Frowning at the strange item, he put it aside, as he also quickly did to the small stack of newspaper clippings that were underneath it. After that, to his surprise, was a list of handwritten names... a very familiar list of names, one he had read so many times in the court transcript he had once managed to even recite the first three. 'This... It's the suicides! The ones Dad threatened to release to the press to get the murderer to admit to it!' It looked like Phoenix had never even finished reading the whole list to the court, as it was much longer than Apollo remembered it being, and none of the names in the latter half were familiar at all. The handwriting, to his confusion, wasn't Phoenix's, but it also wasn't the mystery writer of the strange note he'd already put to one side. He glanced back at the still-open drawer of Mia's case-files, studying the careful script of the labels that poked up periodically from the folders. 'Was it...? Did she write this before she died?'

After a long pause for thought, Apollo shook his head, moving the list aside. 'I'll work it out another time.'

Thread: EMERGENCY! Help me convince PreciousFairy...

steeljusticelover, 09/02/2022 04:07:38PM

... to return to the forum! READY SET GO!

Pocky-Hockey, 09/02/2022 06:45:42PM

Wait, what!?

Precious, are you reading this? We miss you, friend! You were always so wise, but at the same time really innocent and naive... I also really miss your little romance posts you used to do now and then!

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN], 09/03/2022 09:36:50AM

Precious might be coming back!?

Tell her (and MyF) to contact me if she wants her old account set up again. You can give her my number, can't you Steel?

Drewby, 09/03/2022 09:50:34AM

Precious-Fairy? As in one of the co-founders?

... can she promise not to be so infuriating?

Liztropical, 09/03/2022 10:44:08AM

Drewby, please don't bring your beef with Precious into this thread. If you don't like her, what are you doing in here to begin with?

Precious, I really miss you! You brought such a sense of refinement to every thread you commented in!

Drewby, 09/03/2022 10:50:53AM

Your not a mod anymore, I don't have to listen to you
Dime_Quarters [MOD], 09/03/2022 01:35:27PM

It's called 'common courtesy', Drewby. I don't want to have to suspend you again.

It would be great to see you back, Precious. Though, I thought you left because you'd be somewhere with terrible internet? Does that mean your situation improved?

ForgotMeKnot, 09/03/2022 03:21:25PM

AUGH SJL, you scared me when I saw that 'EMERGENCY' in the title of a PINNED THREAD, do you want me to die of a heart attack!? I thought another firework had gone thrown thru the Wright's window or something!

Why is Precious potentially coming back and not MyF? Or are we convincing Precious TO convince MyF? Uh-oh, looks like you're gonna be out a job, Blackbird ;D

steeljusticelover, 09/03/2022 04:26:27PM

Thanks for the comments, guys! I gave your arguments to Precious, and here's what she has to say in response:

"Thank you for all the kind words, everyone! I also miss being able to spend so much time with you all. Drewby, I'm sorry you got so upset about my stories, but if you'd been nice and said something much sooner, I could have done much more to fix them than I was able to. I had some amazing ideas planned before I had to leave! :o

"I've been practising my spelling a lot since I left, so I no longer need My-Fairy to type for me. It looks like I let a lot of you think I was a grown-up, but actually I'm younger than SteelJusticeLover. I'm sorry for lying, and I feel really bad about it. :( \n
"SteelJusticeLover told me how the forum is much smaller and private now, so, since I know only our friends will see it, we took a photo together! I've asked him to include it when he posts this. Thank you again, everyone!"

I was trying to convince her to come back because she's going to school here in the city now, so she has internet access. Since she's always over here playing with my sister (they're about the same age), I figured it was worth a try. :)

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN], 09/03/2022 04:34:52PM

Very funny, Knot. ;) Besides, MyF made it quite clear when she passed the forum down to me that she would most definitely never have the time to be running it herself again, so if she came back, it would only be as a normal user.
Oh, you two took a selfie!?! I... guess I wasn't expecting that. I have to say though, you've grown a lot since we met in person, Precious! Let me know if you change your mind about coming back!

Liztropical, 09/03/2022 06:35:30PM

Wait, Precious, you're... 10? 11!? I always thought you were, like, MyF's older sister or something! That means you were... what, 6 or 7 when we met? And you're sure all those intelligent sounding words were all you, if MyF was doing your typing?

This... is a shock.

Dime_Quarters [MOD], 09/03/2022 07:35:27PM

... I guess now is a bad time to admit I'm one of the few who was in on Precious's secret already? We only met the once, but I agree you've grown a lot. You were 8 at the time, weren't you? That'd make you about 11 or 12 now.

And Steel: that's you? Really? You're sure you want to insist that?

steeljusticelover, 09/04/2022 09:17:36AM

Precious just turned 12. She says she was 7 when she and My-Fairy started up the original forum. But yeah, I was surprised to find that out when I first met her too!

And yeah, that's me, Dime. Why wouldn't it be? That's just my normal clothes if that's your question. There's nothing weird about it.

Pocky-Hockey, 09/04/2022 11:35:23AM

AAAAA PRECIOUS!!! You're so cute~! I had no idea you were such a little kid! :DDD Actually I bet that's the real reason Steel wants you back, so he isn't the baby of the forum anymore! Haha!

ForgotMeKnot, 09/04/2022 01:30:16PM

I agree with Dime. I was at the Wonder Bar in July, when the Gramaryes were doing their show every night for a week or two. You said they were raising funds to rebuild their agency, right? I was even trying to talk to 'em after the show, but they disappeared quick...

Actually, haven't a lot of us been to see the Gramaryes by now?

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN], 09/04/2022 04:43:01PM

Dime, Knot: Check your PMs!
steeljustice lover, 09/04/2022 06:08:27PM

I'll take down the stupid picture then... get Precious to take another one without me in it or something.

CelestialImpacts, 09/04/2022 07:02:26PM

It's your choice to take down the photo SJL, but I don't think it was stupid. You turned 18 this year, didn't you? I thought you looked like a very strapping young man.

It looks like there are more of us than I thought who had met the Fairys IRL. There are 9 of us here, and I'm counting 4 of us who already knew Precious was so young.

Dime_Quarters [MOD], 09/05/2022 09:26:18AM

Steel, I'm sorry for confronting you like that. I didn't intend to upset you, and I should have politely questioned you through PM before... doing what I did.

Hey, I didn't know you'd met the Fairys IRL, Celestial! We gotta compare stories over PM sometime ;)

Speaking of this forum having 9 members... I hear that's about to become 10. :D

Liztropical, 09/05/2022 11:44:49AM

Is Precious actually coming back!?

Excuse me a moment, I have to go run around the block to let out my excitement.

Precious-Fairy, 09/05/2022 02:07:12PM

Hello everyone! Thank you again for all your kind words! :)

I am truly very sorry to have allowed you all to believe I was a grown-up for so long. My-Fairy thought it would be better that way, especially when there were hundreds of users back on the old forum. It's very sad to see how few of us are still around after all this time. ;(

When I took that picture with SteelJusticeLover, I had no idea it would cause so many problems! Anyone else who has a problem with him will have to go through me in future! >(

LizTropical, I think it was in the forum's second year we became friends, wasn't it? So I would have been seven or eight then. It's great to see you again! And My-Fairy always wrote down what I told her to, but I've never been very good at spelling, so she got all the words right when I couldn't.

DimeQuarters, hi! I'm afraid I don't really remember meeting you. I'll ask My-Fairy though. If it was just once, that's probably why I've forgotten. I'm sorry. :)
Pocky-Hockey, thank you! My-Fairy is also always saying I'm cute! SteelJusticeLover says he just wanted me back because my old friends here would love to see me again. I didn't know everyone called him the baby of the forum though. He's a grown-up now. He's going to start studying to be a defens aterny in a few weeks.

CelestialImpacts, I remember you! I hope things are going much better for you now!

ForgotMeKnot, 09/05/2022 04:21:07PM

I'm just gonna say this, totally unrelated to anything: Apollo Gramarye is a sly dog.

Great to see you back, Precious! If you're not good at spelling, you should get a spell-check app for your browser or something. As far as I can tell, all you got wrong was 'defence attorney'.

Wait, SJL is studying to be a defence attorney!?

Precious-Fairy, 09/05/2022 05:58:03PM

YOU TAKE THAT BACK ABOUT APOLLO. >(

steeljusticelover, 09/05/2022 05:59:18PM

Calm down, Precious. He didn't mean anything by it.

Dime, thanks for the apology. I'm fine. And I'll be thinking twice about posting any more photos.

Knot, I've never really hidden that's what I was planning to do? It's been my dream since I was a kid. And I don't know why you think that about Apollo, but isn't being sly a necessity for being a magician?

Pocky-Hockey, 09/05/2022 06:36:33PM

looks at time-stamps Yep, you two are posting in the same room, aren't you? ;D

Welcome back, Precious!

steeljusticelover, 09/05/2022 06:40:09PM

... Like I said, Precious is always over here to play with my sister. So, yeah, we're kinda in the same room with our computers atm.

ForgotMeKnot, 09/05/2022 10:03:58PM

Wait, Precious, I was kidding! I'm sorry!
You make a good point, Steel. strokes beard I shall let you live... for now.

Drewby, 09/06/2022 10:41:44AM

Looking at the info in this thread, it looks like it's time for a fresh start between us, Precious. Maybe if YOU'D been open about your age, I wouldn't have got so angry at your childish story-telling in the first place.

Could you repost that picture, SJL? I missed getting to see what you looked like.

steeljusticelover, 09/06/2022 11:31:50AM

Sorry, I'd rather not.

Precious-Fairy, 09/06/2022 03:49:54PM

SteelJusticeLover explained it to me ForgotMeKnot, so I will forgive you.

Drewby, I can be nice. If you would be nice too, we could be friends.

Dime_Quarters [MOD], 09/06/2022 04:17:09AM

Well I'm glad you two are settling your disagreements. Although it would help if everyone kept the /hostile tone/ out of it.
My dear Luke,

I imagine this will be the last letter I send to you before you make the trip here to begin your studies at university. As I write this, we have only three weeks left before classes start. I have been busy preparing materials, and Alfendi has been doing his best to help, although anything more than a single sheet of paper he has a tendency to either drop or chew on. I hope your own preparations are going much more smoothly.

Flora has also been busying herself lately. I don't recall if I mentioned she was looking for another job in my last letter, but her quest to be self-sufficient has taken another odd turn. In short, Flora has decided that, despite it only being a matter of weeks until we will see you again, it is high time all three of us went to California to visit your home there. What's more, she has decided to pay for it with some of the Reinhold Inheritance, and is refusing to let me even look at how much it will cost. She also appears to have looked up the hotel you mentioned, the one across the street from your home. I'm sure she will be telling you all about it in her letter, but I will go over everything just in case.

At the moment, it seems that we will be returning here on the same flight as you, arriving on the morning of the 18th. We will be leaving here on the evening of the 15th, although arriving in California far too late for a reunion at the airport. It looks as though we will only have the one day to look around while we are there, unless you feel there is time to do something before leaving on the 17th.

Given the flight is said to be eleven hours disregarding stops, I do not know how Alfendi will handle it. Since we are leaving in the evening, it should be dark enough that he will sleep the whole way, but it is difficult to predict how he'll react. I'm already trying to explain to him what this trip will entail so he is prepared, but it is difficult to describe what it is like to fly.

I shall be in touch if our plans change at all. The usual puzzles are enclosed.

Your friend,

Professor Hershel Layton

28th August, 2022

Dear Professor Layton,

You're coming up here? I must say Professor, I wasn't expecting to be reading that!

I'll be happy to show you around while you're here. I don't think we'll have the time to do both the things that immediately come to mind though: Showing Flora the Cosmos Space Centre or taking you up to Kurain to see Maya? And it looks like the 16th is a Friday, so both Trucy and Pearl will be in school. I'm sure both of them will be sad to not meet you properly, although I can try and make sure we do something together before we leave on Saturday.
(I'm thinking visiting Maya would be the better thing to do now I think about it - She'd be terribly disappointed to miss seeing you again, and if Flora wants to come back sometime, I can show her the Space Centre then.)

The Gatewater is well known as the most luxurious hotel chain in town (or at least they advertise themselves as such), so if Flora wants to shell out the money to stay there, it would be nice to have you close by. They do have some cheaper rooms though, like the ones we stayed in, so don't worry about it too much. Speaking of the fire, our reception room is almost back to normal now! It still looks a little empty without all the stuff we used to keep in there, but we've got some new bookcases and a few desks, so it looks a lot more professional than it used to! Papa's decided to keep the new piano in his office, and Trucy's already started decorating it with some of her and Apollo's old props.

My preparations for university are going well. I have everything I think I'll need packed except my clothes, because I'm still wearing them. Apollo and Clay are starting to prepare too, although they have another week until they start their first semester.

I'll be glad to see you all when you arrive! Give me a call or a text when you want to meet up!

Your friend and apprentice,

Luke Triton-Wright

September 16, 8:57AM

Wright Talent Agency

Reception

The sound of a violin sang around the room, spilling out through the closed doors and nearby window, its notes faintly heard even on the busy street below. Stopping and starting only occasionally to correct wrong notes, the violinist played from memory, imagining, as he often did, that somewhere in the world his mother could hear the tune, and maybe follow it home.

Since the destruction by fire two months previous, the Agency's reception room had undergone a series of changes: Although the carpet and walls were rebuilt good as new, back to how the room had looked before the tragedy, its contents could not have been more different. Unable to find a desk to match the one in the office, Phoenix had thrown his arms up and instead ordered three that matched each other, one for each of the Agency's 'subordinates'. One, quickly designated as Apollo's, sat by the front door where the original main reception desk had been, blocking off most of the room from the entrance and outlining a 'corridor' through to the office. The other two sat opposite each other either side of the window; Luke's now sported a miniature music stand and a small pile of books both new and old, while Trucy's was a mess of fabric samples and scribbled ideas on scraps of paper. In contrast, Apollo's desk was almost untouched, sitting empty in preparation for his upcoming years of study. The wall space inbetween was filled with some new (still mostly empty) bookcases, in which Luke had made a valiant effort to rehouse all the books on magic spread throughout the home, only to give up once Trucy attempted to 'help' by relocating a few of Phoenix's old law books to join them. The wall opposite Apollo's desk was blank, lacking any of the photos or posters it once displayed, and the old sofa that had once sat underneath was, despite being mostly undamaged, now gone, thrown out with everything else as part of the 'refreshing' of the room in general. The coat-rack, cleaned up of the soot that had coated it on one side, was back in place by the door, mirroring Charley's new home in the office next door.

The handle on the entrance door slowly turned, opening silently as two figures crept into the room. They smiled as they saw the tall teen in blue standing at the other end of the room, his back to them as he played his violin to the window. The figure in front, a young woman with brownish-red hair done up in a ponytail with a red ribbon, grinned as she tip-toed inside, a hand over her mouth as she held back giggles. Behind her, a man in a top hat, a three-year-old boy in his arms, crept in, allowing the door to close behind him. The thud and click of the latch startled the violinist, who jumped as he spun around to finally face the visitors.

Luke grinned. "Flora! Professor! And Alfendi too!" Laughing, he hurried to place his violin and bow down on his desk.

Laughing, Flora ran around Apollo's desk to greet her old friend, the pair meeting halfway in a gleeful hug. "Wow, and I thought you were tall when we saw you last year!" she cried, looking up at Luke as they parted. "You've grown again, Luke!"

Blushing, Luke adjusted his hat, noting with some embarrassment that he was now taller even than the Professor (not counting the hat). "W-well," he muttered, "Papa says I might end up the tallest of the family once I'm done growing. I match Apollo now, y'know."

Layton laughed as he followed Flora around to greet Luke, Alfendi in his arms paying more attention to the room. "It's a pleasure to see you again, Luke," he said, reaching out a hand to shake. "And it's nice to have the opportunity to see your home!"

Luke giggled as he shook the Professor's hand, giving Alfendi a smile as the toddler briefly looked his way. "Papa's taken Trucy to school," he explained, "but Apollo's home at the moment. I'll show you around!" He stepped around his friends, heading to the door inside.

Flora clasped her hands together, looking around. "Is this the room that was destroyed?" she asked. "By the fire?"

Pausing, Luke turned back around. "Oh, yes, it was this room," he answered, giving an apologetic smile. "It's a bit empty still. Sorry."

"Nonsense," Layton replied, smiling as he lowered Alfendi to the floor. "If you hadn't told us, I doubt we'd have known there was a fire here only a few months ago." He chuckled as he adjusted his hat. "It looks quite clean and new, in my opinion."

Luke blushed, rubbing the back of his head. "I... suppose I just notice it more because I knew what it used to look like really well," he admitted, then gestured to the door through to the office. "If you'll come through, I'll show you Papa's office!"

Alfendi, apparently excited at the invitation to explore, squealed and charged past Luke into the next room, closely followed by Luke and Flora, eager to ensure the toddler didn't hurt himself on anything. Layton followed them with a soft laugh, one hand on the brim of his top hat.
The first thing to catch Flora's attention in the office was the shiny black piano sitting against the wall, directly in view as they walked in. She cooed as she spotted it, her watch over her baby brother forgotten as she ran to inspect the instrument. "It's so shiny!" she cried, running a hand along the closed lid covering the keys.

Luke giggled, noticing Flora's excitement attracting the attention of Alfendi. "That's Papa's piano," he explained, walking to Flora's side. "It was brought in here because reception was still in pieces when we got it, and Papa decided he liked it in here."

Alfendi stared for a few moments, sucking on his fingers and casting occasional glances at his father, watching from the door. After a short pause, he toddled to Luke's side, tugging on the teen's pants. Surprised, Luke looked down to the boy, crouching a little to more closely match the three-year-old's height. "What is it, Alfendi?"

"What's a piano?" Alfendi asked.

Luke was a little taken-aback by the question, but recovered quickly enough to give the boy a smile. "It's a musical instrument," he explained, standing up straight and opening the lid to reveal the clean white-and-black keys within. "You press these, and they make a sound!"

Alfendi strained to see what Luke was referring to, and Flora picked him up off the floor to sit him on the piano stool, where he was able to marvel at the shiny keyboard. "These?" he asked, pointing to the piano keys.

"Yup!" Luke giggled, pressing one randomly with an index finger to demonstrate. "My papa practises on this one. His job is to play piano!" 'Well, technically.'

Although unsure at first, Alfendi reached out to the keyboard with both hands, lightly resting them on the keys at first before imitating Luke and holding a pointer finger onto a single key directly in front of him. He slowly put more pressure on it until the key depressed under his touch, a soft note emanating from the piano. He frowned in confusion, then lifted his finger and pressed again, slightly harder this time, eliciting a louder note that made him jump in surprise. Grinning, the boy quickly began to experiment with the instrument, eager to hear the variety of sounds he could produce with it.

Layton chuckled as he joined the group. "And this is why we didn't get him a toy xylophone," he quietly said to Flora.

Flora huffed, though she still smiled at her adoptive father. "He's having fun," she pointed out.

The door to the kitchen suddenly opened, and in stormed a cape-less and somewhat drowsy Apollo. "Luke, what the hell are-!" His angry frown vanished as he spotted the visitors staring back at him, his face rapidly paling. "Oh." He ran a hand through his hair awkwardly. "I forgot you guys were coming today."

Layton tipped his hat to the young man. "Good morning," he said. "I hope Alfendi wasn't disturbing you."

Luke giggled, walking over to his brother. "Eaten breakfast yet?" he asked.

"Was in the middle of it," Apollo muttered in reply.

Giggling, Luke turned to his friends, gesturing to Apollo. "This is my brother, Apollo. Apollo," he turned to his brother and gestured to his visitors one at a time, "this is Alfendi, Flora and Professor Layton!"

Apollo gave them a small wave, which Alfendi returned. "Luke's told me a lot about you all," he said.

"All good, I hope!" Flora replied, giving him a wink. She petted Alfendi's hair with one hand, keeping her eyes in Apollo's direction. "Luke's told us a lot about you as well!"

As Apollo sighed, Layton stepped away from the now-silent piano, towards the brothers. "Maybe you could show us the rest of your home, Luke," he suggested. "I assume we are waiting for Mister Wright to return before we go to see Miss Fey."

"That'll be another twenty minutes or so," Apollo replied, arms crossed. "Until Dad gets back, I mean."

Luke nodded in agreement. "He told me before he left to not go out of our way to wait for him. If we're ready to go, he wants us to leave and he'll catch up to us."

"That seems a bit mean," Flora replied, picking Alfendi up off the piano stool as he complained and reached wildly for the keyboard. "It's a long journey, isn't it? Shouldn't we take it together?"

Now placed back on the floor, Alfendi tried his hardest to climb on the tall stool he had previously been sat on, although he wasn't having any luck. "I wanna play more!" he cried.

"Maybe later, Alfendi," Layton promised.

"It's not that long," Apollo assured Flora. "Long enough that you have to make a day-trip of it to be worth it, but..."

Giving up on the piano stool, Alfendi ran to Layton's side, pulling on his trouser legs. "Papa!" he cried. "Wanna play with the piano!"

Giggling at the toddler's insistence, Luke leant down on his knees. "Tell you what, Alfendi," he proposed, "why don't I show you around the rest of my home, then you can come back and play the piano. Alright?"

Apollo sighed. "I'd better finish my breakfast," he told Luke as his brother straightened up from talking to the three-year-old. "Lemme know when you're going to leave."

"Sure," Luke replied, and Apollo returned to the kitchen.
The first thing Phoenix heard as he arrived home was the irregular plinking of the piano echoing from his office. They haven't left yet? he realised with some confusion, heading through from the reception. As he opened the door, he quickly noticed both his sons, Professor Layton, and Flora stood around the office (although Apollo appeared to be perched on the edge of the desk), their discussion halted as they turned to the newcomer. Phoenix grinned, idly noting the piano also went silent as he entered the room. "Professor! Flora! Welcome to America!"

Layton smiled, tipping his hat. "A pleasure to see you again, Mister Wright," he replied, stepping forward to shake Phoenix's hand. "Luke has been showing us around your lovely home."

Phoenix snorted. "'Lovely' is a bit of an exaggeration," he pointed out, then looked over to the piano, seeing Alfendi sitting on the stool and staring in his direction. "Ah, so that's who was playing on the piano!" He shot the toddler a thumbs-up. "Don't worry Alfendi, you're playing better than I do!"

Alfendi put a hand in his mouth and looked away.

Flora giggled, waving from where she was standing by the piano. "Hello, Mister Wright!" he called. "We thought we'd wait for you before we left!"

"I told them they didn't have to," Luke interrupted, shrugging, "but they insisted."

Phoenix laughed. "Aw, that's alright!" He glanced at a clock hanging on the wall by the television. "There's a train every five minutes, though we're not gonna be able to catch a bus at the other end." He looked around at their visitors. "You're ready for a fifteen, twenty minute walk?"

Layton thought a moment, rubbing his chin. "That's a good point," he muttered, then turned to Flora. "I shall have to fetch Alfendi's pram before we go. Will you wait here a moment, Flora?"

"Of course," Flora replied with a nod.

"I shall be right back," Layton announced, petting a confused Alfendi on the head before heading out.

Apollo, still sitting on the edge of Phoenix's desk, called to his father, "So does that mean we're leaving now?"

"Get off that," Phoenix ordered, then, once Apollo had slid off the desk, answered, "I guess so, if everyone else has what they'll need."

"I'm ready, Papa!" Luke said, patting his satchel hanging on his shoulder.

Apollo shrugged. "We don't really need much; We're just visiting Maya."

Alfendi, getting bored of watching the conversation, returned to hitting random keys on the piano.

Flora thought a moment, looking at Phoenix's hoodie and beanie. "Mister Wright, are you sure you don't want to take off your jumper and hat before we go? It's a bit warm for so many layers, isn't it?"
Luke jumped forward to explain, "By 'jumper', she means your sweater. That's what we call them in Britain."

Phoenix nodded, giving Luke a smile before returning his attention to Flora. "I'll be fine, thank you. It's a surprisingly thin material."

"It probably feels warmer to you than it does to us, anyway," Apollo added, looking to Luke. "Didn't you say yesterday it was like twenty degrees colder in England right now?"

Luke thought a moment. "In Fahrenheit," he agreed, turning to Flora to explain, "That's a ten degree difference in Celsius, so it would seem much warmer here to you."

Flora giggled as she nodded in agreement. "It's difficult working it out exactly, since everyone seems to use Fahrenheit over here."

"Tell me about it," Luke agreed as he rolled his eyes only with a hint of bitterness. "I still get confused by all the different measurement scales they use here!"

Phoenix hid a laugh behind a hand. "We are standing right here, y'know," he pointed out.

Luke blushed, fidgeting with a sleeve. "Y-yeah, I... I wasn't directing it at you, Papa..."

"Well, it won't matter so much once you're back in England with us," Flora pointed out with a smile. "But I guess we can talk about it more once the Professor gets back!"

The two families quickly settled in to a group of four seats on the train, with Alfendi sitting (or rather, standing) in his father's lap as he stared out the window and Luke squeezing his lanky frame into the seat he was sharing with Flora, although he still stuck out into the aisle a little.

"So what's this 'Space Centre' like?" Flora asked Apollo, hands clasped together eagerly. "Luke's told me the people built robots with emotions there!"

Apollo nervously laughed, rubbing the back of his head. "Well, I don't know too much about it; Clay's the space nerd."

"He's our friend," Luke filled in with a giggle, elbowing Flora. "You'll get to meet him tomorrow!"

"Ooh, I can't wait!" Flora replied, adding with a sigh, "We won't have time to visit it on this trip, after all."

"If you ever decide to come back here on your own, Flora," Layton pointed out, hands supporting Alfendi as the toddler leaned against the window, "you could go visit it then."

Alfendi bounced in Layton's lap, pointing out at the intermittent buildings beyond. "Papa, look!"

"I'm looking, Alfendi," Layton assured him.

"I guess I'll have to," Flora agreed, giving Luke a smile. "Sometime next year?"

Luke nodded. "Maybe during the summer! Trucy and Pearl will be off school then, so they could join us!"

"Would they even be interested in going to the Space Center?" Phoenix laughed.

"Then they could come to one of our shows!" Apollo suggested, grinning as he tapped at the red cape hanging over his shoulders. He looked over to the Layton family. "You guys are gonna be gone tomorrow morning, so you'll miss it this time!"

Flora thought a moment, curled fingers resting against her chin. "Your magic act?" she confirmed. "When is it on?"

"Every Saturday and Sunday, seven PM," Apollo answered, crossing his arms as he proudly stuck out his chest. "We also do a matinee on Sundays, around three, and over the summer holidays we're going to be performing every night." He giggled. "Trucy has to concentrate on her school work."

"What about you?" Apollo continued, resting his hands on his knees as he curiously watched Flora. "Luke's told us his stories of the adventures you guys got up to loads of times. How much of 'em is true?"
Luke scoffed, failing to hide a mischievous smirk. "You don't believe I tell you guys the whole truth?" he asked. "You're a living lie detector, aren't you?"

Apollo rolled his eyes, giving his brother a smile. "Everyone knows any storyteller worth their salt exaggerates the truth to make stuff more exciting!" He looked over to the Professor, who was still balancing Alfendi in his lap. "Like, there wasn't seriously an entire second London built in a cavern, was there?" He turned to Flora. "Or a village entirely populated by robots?"

Flora stared wide-eyed at Apollo for a few moments before getting to her feet, frowning. "Excuse me, I think I might wander along the train a little," she said.

Luke frowned in worry as he shifted to allow her past. "Flora? Are you okay?"

"I'm alright," Flora insisted, ignoring the confused looks Apollo and Phoenix were giving her. "I'll be back in a few moments." With that, she had wandered off down the train carriage.

Apollo thought a moment, then frowned at Luke, who was still watching Flora leave worriedly. "You did exaggerate about the village of robots," he decided.

"Quite the opposite," Layton replied, surprising Apollo with his serious stare. "Had you been in London last year, we could have taken you there ourselves to prove it. As it happens however, Saint Mystere is no longer functioning."

Phoenix rubbed his chin in thought. "It shut down?"

"Flora tried her best to keep it running," Layton continued, "but I'm afraid her efforts were in vain." He sighed. "As much as she would have liked otherwise, she simply isn't mechanically minded. Her skills are in cooking. She couldn't repair the robots faster than they were breaking down."

Phoenix frowned sympathetically, noticing Luke fidgeting with his sleeves and guessing he had already known. "The poor girl. They were her family growing up, weren't they?"

Apollo glanced in the direction Flora had gone, looking chastened. "I... didn't upset her too bad by bringing it up, did I?" he asked.

"I'm sure she will be fine, in time," Layton assured him. "She is still grieving, however."

Alfendi bounced in Layton's lap, pointing out the window again. "Papa!" he cried. "Papa, look!"

"I'm looking, Alfendi," Layton insisted, indeed turning to look out the window. To Apollo, he continued, "Regardless, I would suggest apologising to Flora when she returns. If nothing else, she will greatly appreciate it."

Kurain Village

After a lengthy walk from the station to the village, Phoenix led the group straight to Fey Manor. "Here we are!" he announced, climbing the steps to the small porch. "Maya's expecting us, so we can just go in."

Layton paused in his pushing of Alfendi's pram, looking at the stone steps with some concern. "We will need a few moments to follow you," he said.

"You need help getting the stroller up?" Apollo asked, watching as Flora plucked Alfendi from his seat and let him walk.

"We can handle it, thank you," Layton replied, giving Apollo a grateful smile as he moved to carry the pram up the short distance to the porch.

With Phoenix already inside, Flora held Alfendi's hand and helped the three-year-old navigate the steps, directing him inside. Luke followed her, Apollo hanging back to stay with Layton in case he needed help with the unwieldy pram.

Flora was surprised as she looked around at the bare room, pausing just beyond the door. "Wow... I wasn't expecting such a grand manor to be so... plain," she admitted.

Phoenix, shoving his sandals into the shelves nearby, laughed, looking up as Luke entered behind the young woman, pulling his shoes off as he walked in. "If there's one thing you can say about the Feys, it's that they aren't a very extravagant family," he said, pulling off his beanie to toss it in with his shoes. "Especially not what they call the 'main family'," he added, waving his fingers in the air to simulate quotation marks.

Flora thought to herself as she led Alfendi further into the room and away from the door, unwilling to let her little brother run off on his own just yet. Phoenix, seeing she had no more questions, shoved his hands into his hoodie pocket and wandered out to the middle of the room, watching the door that led further into the mansion.

Luke gently poked Flora's shoulder, his socks still in his hand. "Flora, we need to take off our shoes," he told her.

"Oh!" Flora realised she should have noticed both Phoenix and Luke doing so before, and hurried Alfendi over to the low shelves, clearly intended to hold the footwear of visitors. Once released from her grip, Alfendi lowered himself to the floor and pulled at his shoes, pausing only to let Flora unlace them for him before eagerly tearing off his shoes and socks. Flora herself removed hers in a more dignified manner.

As Layton and Apollo finally entered the manor, the door further inside finally rolled open, and Maya emerged, grinning as she spotted her visitors. "Hi!" she called, running first to Phoenix, who was closest. They greeted each other with a quick kiss, holding each other's arms before Maya moved ahead to the Laytons. "Professor! It's so good to see you again!"

Flora blinked in surprise as she watched Maya enter. She hadn't known what to expect of this 'Maya' she'd heard so much about, but it definitely wasn't a short, cheerful woman in long, traditional robes. She hung back, unsure just yet how to act around the extremely casual and extremely important woman in front of her.

Layton laughed as he held out his hand to shake Maya's, saying, "It's been too long, Miss Fey!" before Maya surprised him by pulling the man into a brief hug. He quickly recovered, directing his hand to gesture to where Flora was standing, Alfendi sitting at her feet as he explored the shelves nearby. "May I introduce Flora Reinhold and Alfendi Layton, the other members of my family."

Maya quietly squealed as she moved towards the pair. "Hello! Luke and Nick have told me about you!"

To Flora's relief, the older woman held out a hand to shake instead of going for a hug, and she gladly returned it. "I've heard about you from the Professor," she said. "It's nice to finally meet you, Miss Fey."

"Please, call me Maya," Maya insisted, leaning down to briefly coo at Alfendi, who was totally ignoring her as he tried to see if he could fit himself into one of the spaces in the shelves. "Aw, aren't you such a cutie-pie!" Unoffended by the lack of attention from the toddler, she then stood and walked over to where Luke and Apollo had ended up, standing next to each other at the door. "And how are my two boys?" she asked, pulling them into a hug as Luke laughed.

"You're barely six years older than me!" Apollo cried, rolling his eyes.

"We're fine, Maya!" Luke told her, both of them ignoring Apollo's comment.

Maya gave the pair a grin as she again moved on. As she walked back over to somewhere she could address her visitors as a group, she waved a hand in Alfendi's direction. "I think Pearly left her ball out in the garden by the Winding Way? He can play with it if he's interested."

"I'll go check!" Luke offered, jumping to where Alfendi was hanging out of one of the shelves and carefully extricating the toddler from the confined space. "C'mon Alfendi, I'll take you outside and we can play together!"

Flora fidgeted nervously. "You don't want me or the Professor to go with you?" she asked.

"We'll be fine," Luke assured her, taking Alfendi's hand as he stood up. "Won't we, Alfendi?"

"Um," Alfendi muttered, a hand in his mouth.

"I'm sure they will be alright, Flora," Layton assured her, both of them watching as Luke led Alfendi out to the Winding Way. "We won't be far away if he needs us, after all."

Maya smiled. "In the meantime, I'd love to show you around the manor! Oh," she gestured to Layton's feet, "but could you please take off your shoes first, Professor? Don't want to track dirt into the house."

"Of course," Layton agreed, and moved to obey her request.

"So what even brings you guys here to America?" Maya asked as her tour finished in the dining room, everyone sitting around the table on the floor-cushions as she wandered into the neighbouring kitchen to prepare tea. "Wanted to make sure Luke wasn't travelling alone or something?"

Layton looked to Flora to answer, and she paused to think for a moment. "Something like that," she answered. "I had a... relative die suddenly, several months ago now, and they left me a lot of money. I thought it was about time I started using some of it."

Maya paused, teapot in hand, and looked over to the girl sympathetically. "Oh, I'm sorry to hear that," she said, well-versed in dealing with grieving clients. "It's never pleasant to have to say goodbye to someone, especially when it's without warning."

Layton and Phoenix privately agreed, although only Phoenix knew Maya was speaking from personal experience.

"I'll be alright," Flora insisted, staring at the table as she moved a strand of unruly hair behind an ear. "It's probably high time I started becoming independent anyway. Most girls are living on their own by twenty-one."

Maya thought for a moment, then placed the teapot down and walked back into the dining room, sitting at Flora's side and taking her hands to attract the young woman's full attention. "Look, I'll be the first to admit I'm exactly the opposite of 'most girls'," she pointed out, "but if you're not ready to be out on your own in the world, don't feel pressured to do it... especially not if you're still grieving a lost loved one. Believe me," she laughed bitterly, "that is not the kind of situation you want to willingly put yourself in."

Flora didn't answer, quietly thinking to herself. On the other side of the table, Phoenix raised an eyebrow in Maya's direction.

"I take it you speak from experience, Miss Fey," Layton realised, surprised.

Maya shrugged nonchalantly. "It's okay," she replied. "Losing my mother, my sister... it helps me connect to my clients. I know what it's like and how to help them."

Flora, although shocked to hear about Maya's family, became confused at the mention of 'clients'. "What is your job, Maya? If you don't mind me asking, of course," she said. "I don't think Luke's mentioned it."

Maya grinned, hands held together. "I'm a spirit medium!"

"A... spirit medium?" Flora repeated, even more confused.

"Queen of the spirit mediums," Phoenix quipped with a smirk, only for Maya to stick her tongue out at him with a smile.

Layton gripped the brim of his hat, deep in thought.

"I'm the Master of the Fey Channelling Technique," Maya explained to Flora. "We can channel the dead, and we get clients who pay us to do it." She rested her hands in her lap, thinking a moment. "It's actually easiest to channel people who died suddenly. Most of our clients tend to be relatives wanting to say a last goodbye, because they didn't get the chance to when their loved one was still alive."

"And then there are the nut-jobs who hate the person they're asking you to channel..." Phoenix added, still smirking.

"Shush!" Maya ordered him, hiding an amused smile.

Apollo rolled his eyes, leaning forward and resting his elbows on the table. "Flora, if you think she's making it up, just talk to Luke. She channelled his dad for him a couple years back."

"And what about me?" Phoenix cut in with a laugh. "Maya and Pearls have channelled Mia dozens of times in front of me!"

"You don't count as a reliable source, Dad," Apollo argued, "you're dating her!"

Flora giggled, deciding to ignore the Wrights' interruptions. "Thank you, Maya," she told the older woman with a grateful smile, "but I did get the chance to say my goodbyes." She looked away, smiling sadly. "Besides, most of my friends... I don't think you'd have much luck channelling them."

Maya looked sceptical, but accepted Flora's decision not to request her services. "It's up to you," she said, then got to her feet. "All we'd need is a photo and a name."

Layton watched as Maya returned to the kitchen, setting up the water to warm in the teapot and busying herself readying the tea leaves and cups for her visitors. Eventually, he decided to break the silence and said, "Luke told me quite extensively of when you channelled Clark."

"Oh?" Maya asked, leaving the water to warm up as she returned to the dining room. "I don't think he talked about it to us, much."

"No, he didn't," Phoenix added, shaking his head. "He told us what he'd learned about the car accident, but not much else." He was unsurprised that Luke had opened up to Layton instead of his new family though, as Clark had been a friend of the Professor's and, especially back then, Luke had been closer to his former mentor than his siblings or new father.

Layton thought to himself a few moments more, arms crossed and eyes closed. "I must admit, I am still hesitant to believe any of it," he admitted.

Maya laughed. "Aw, that's okay, Professor! We get a lot of sceptics up here, too!" She sat down, her smile fading. "I've seen more people than I'd care to admit calling us 'scams' and 'con artists' and..." she paused to sigh, "other stuff like that."

Layton looked up, eyes wide. "Goodness, I... don't mean to imply such harsh words myself!" he insisted.

"It's fine, Professor," Maya repeated, giving her friend a reassuring smile. "Were you wanting a demonstration? I'm sure my sis would be happy to talk to you about it."
Apollo gasped in excitement. "We could finally meet Mia!"

Phoenix laughed, patting Apollo's shoulder. "Calm down there, rookie. You'll meet the chief eventually."

Embarrassed, Apollo crossed his arms and looked away with a glare.

Layton gave the teen a small smile. "I hate to disappoint you, but I actually had someone else in mind." He reached into a pocket of his trousers and pulled out a small photo, which he stared at for a moment before sliding it face-down along the table in Maya's direction. "Luke tells me he's not mentioned her to you, so I don't expect you'll recognise her at all."

Maya retrieved the photo, studying it in silence. Phoenix and Apollo were mildly confused, but Flora watched Layton in worry. "Professor, you don't mean...?"

"Her name is Claire Foley," Layton continued. "Depending on how you count it, she died either three or thirteen years ago, in an explosion." He paused, pulling at the brim of his hat. "I trust that's enough information."

Maya stared at the photo a moment more, then nodded with a determined expression and returned the photo to Layton the way it had been given to her. "It won't be a problem, Professor. I'll take you in to the Channelling Chamber once we're done with the tea." At that, she stood and returned to the kitchen.

Apollo scratched at the back of his head. "So, um... can we ask who she is? Or... was? If Luke wasn't allowed to tell us..."

"Not 'wasn't allowed'," Layton corrected. "Luke merely elected not to mention her on his own. I believe he might have felt it wasn't necessary to his story." He closed his eyes. "In any case, I would rather not discuss her now. Once the channelling is over..." He paused, sighing a little as he thought. "I may talk about her then."

September 16, 12:03PM

Fey Manor

Meditation Room

Once Maya had distributed the tea, Flora had taken a while to adjust to it not being the more familiar black variety, Maya and Phoenix had laughed over the memory of Maya's own freak-out reaction to black tea on their trip to London, and everyone had eventually finished drinking, the group headed out to the Meditation Room, ready for Maya to channel Claire for Professor Layton.

"It shouldn't take long to prepare the chamber," Maya assured him as she pushed open the doors, readying a lighter to get started lighting the hundred-or-so candles littering the room's walls. "I'll be ready in a few moments!"

"Take your time, Miss Fey," Layton replied, smiling as he watched her get to work.

The door leading to the Winding Way slid open, and Luke poked his head in with an embarrassed smile. "Oh, what's everyone doing down this end of the house?" he asked, nervously entering the "Maya's gonna do a channelling," Apollo answered in a bored tone, arms crossed as he leant against the wall.

"She's channelling Claire," Flora added, fiddling with the end of her ponytail.

Luke looked over at Layton in surprise. "Y-you actually asked her, Professor?"

Layton didn't reply, only continuing to watch Maya lighting her candles with a stern look on his face.

"She was gonna channel Mia," Apollo said, shrugging, "but the Professor had this other person you've never told us about in mind."

Luke winced a little at the accusation he hadn't told the entire truth in his stories. "W-well," he mumbled, changing the subject and attempting to look nonchalant, "you know Trucy would have killed us if we got to meet Mia before she did."

Phoenix looked around a little, frowning in thought. "Wait, where's Alfendi?"

Flora gasped, looking around the room with her hands over her mouth, and even Layton was distracted from watching Maya to turn to Luke, eyes wide.

"Oh, he's fine," Luke insisted, pausing to shrug, embarrassed. "We were playing, but he started getting upset and angry, and I thought he was trying to throw a tantrum, so I took him into the side room, and he kinda..." Luke paused to tap his fingers together, "curled up on the floor and went to sleep."

Layton laughed, immediately easing the tension in the room. "I'm not surprised!" he explained. "It's well past his usual bed time back home."

Luke sighed in relief that he wasn't in trouble, rubbing at an arm. "I, um, guess you're not trying to adjust to our timezone, since you're only here for today," he realised aloud.

Maya finally re-emerged into the room, the black key of the Channelling Chamber in hand. "I'm ready," she announced, looking to Layton. "Professor?"

As everyone watched, Layton paused a moment, then nodded. He followed Maya into the small, dark room, and the thick wooden doors closed behind him. A few moments later, Phoenix, Apollo, Luke and Flora heard the clicking of the lock.

Luke frowned in thought. "It really depends," he eventually answered, giving Flora an apologetic smile. "We'll have to wait and see if the Professor and Claire have a lot to say to each other or not."
Professor Layton watched Maya lock the doors, then stuff the key into her sleeve as she tiptoed to the screen at the back of the room, peeking behind it before settling down in front of the 'altar' nearby. She gave him a wide grin and patted the mat on the floor, a clear signal for him to join her.

"Are you ready?" Maya asked as Layton sat in front of her, legs crossed.

The professor had to think a moment before answering. "As ready as I can be, I suppose," he quietly replied, struggling to keep his tone even as his throat threatened to close on him. He reached up with both hands to gently remove the hat from his head, placing it on the floor beside him. "I'm certainly more ready than I was the last time I had the chance to say goodbye."

Although surprised to see Layton without his hat for once, Maya decided not to ask any questions, recognising it was a bad time to chat. "Since you're a friend, I can make the same allowances for you as I did for Luke," she explained. "There's a whole lot of tradition about how these meetings are supposed to go, like everyone closing their eyes and stuff, but..." She shrugged, giving her friend a small smile. "It's just traditions; They don't actually affect how a channelling goes. You can watch me if you want."

Layton chuckled. "I would hate to step on any sacred traditions, Miss Fey."

Maya giggled. "I wouldn't call 'em 'sacred'!" she replied, more calmly adding, "Seriously, I used to channel my sis for Nick all the time, without any of these 'traditions' dictating how or where. The only reason I never did it in England was..." She paused for thought, holding a hand to her cheek. "Well, the times when we might have needed her help, I was kinda more worried about getting accused of being a witch. Again."

"Understandable," Layton replied, nodding.

Maya nodded with a grin, glad to have said what she wanted to. She shifted a bit until she was comfortable, then pressed her hands together in a praying motion. Giving one last small smile to Layton, she closed her eyes and frowned in concentration, her fingers curling around until only her index fingers were pointing to the ceiling, resting against her bottom lip.

Although Layton knew, and had personally experienced, many different ways in which one could trick the eye into seeing whatever they wanted, he was inclined to simply believe in Maya's ability upfront. Despite his years of breaking down illusions and tricks, he'd seen his fair share of the unexplained and supernatural, and he was reluctant to believe a friend like Maya would intentionally trick people into seeing their loved ones again... especially given how this 'illusion' was apparently highly portable. He watched her as she concentrated, intending to make full use of her given permission to bypass tradition. At first, it didn't look like anything was happening, but before long Layton noticed a small glow, which seemed to be emanating from the yellow magatama hanging around her neck. No sooner had he registered the sight than the glow intensified in a brilliant flash of light that forced Layton to close his eyes, shielding his face with an arm. Thus protected, he tried to open his eyes again, only to discover he had been temporarily blinded by the flash, large spots of purple and red dancing in the centre of his vision and blocking all but the candle flames flickering at his sides. Letting out a small groan of annoyance, Layton attempted to return his vision to normal, rubbing at his eyes with his arm and blinking rapidly.

"Hershel...?" a familiar voice asked, sounding wary.

Layton paused, then lowered his arm to look in Maya's direction, only to note with frustration he could only catch glimpses of her hair and robes. "Claire?" he asked, squinting. "If that's you, I'm afraid to say I appear to have temporarily blinded myself."

There was a moment of silence before Layton heard a response. "Pffft-!" Claire exploded in laughter, and Layton could just catch glimpses of Maya (or was that Claire...?) doubling over on the mat in front of him.

Layton frowned. "I don't find this as hilarious as you do," he pointed out. At the back of his mind, he recognised this reunion would have been a lot more emotional had he not made the mistake of staring at Maya's magatama during the channelling process and 'ruining' the mood.

Claire momentarily calmed down, still panting from her laughing fit. "Wh... when I saw you rubbing at your eyes," she explained, "I thou... thought you were crying or something!" With that, she dissolved into more laughter.

Layton crossed his arms, waiting for his former girlfriend to stop laughing at him. To his relief, the spots in his vision were beginning to clear, giving him a slightly better view of the woman sitting opposite. "When you're quite ready."

"Gi... gimme a minute!" Claire panted, leaning with one arm on the mat as she pulled herself together. "Oh, my sides hurt now! Or, actually, they're not mine." Layton could just see her patting around her ribs with one hand. "Looks like I need to apologise to this poor girl whose body I'm borrowing. I'll have to ask you to do that for me, Hershel."

"I'll pass it on to Miss Fey," he promised.

"But still," Claire continued, "how did you manage to blind yourself??" She restrained a giggle. "And what are you even doing getting someone to drag me back from the dead? I'd've thought you wouldn't believe in that kind of thing... although..." She paused for thought, a finger held to her chin. "I suppose given what Clark's told me, I should've been expecting this sooner or later."

Layton blinked in surprised. "You've spoken to Clark?"

"Sadly, yes," Claire continued with a shrug, then giggled again. "He still boasts all about Luke like he was the be-all and end-all!"

At that, Layton found he had to laugh. "Ah, yes... it's been so long, I forgot he always did that!"

As the pair shared their amusement, Layton had a moment to finally register that the spots had cleared from his eyes, and his vision was back to normal. Although he'd been looking her in the face for a while, it was only now (with the spots obstructing his vision cleared) that he actually noticed the strange sight of Claire's face underneath Maya's straight, black hair. Although it was a bit off-putting to see Claire without her wavy, orange locks (and in a purple kimono to boot), it was something he could deal with for the opportunity to have a final talk with his loved one... again.

A thought seemed to strike Claire, and she gave Layton a worried look. "How is Luke, by the way? He's getting on with his new family? Oh, and Flora! I hope she's doing alright!"
Layton smiled. "You needn't worry about either of them. Luke is very happy with how his life is going, and Flora..." He winced a bit at the thought of the turmoil the young woman had put herself through after the demise of Saint Mystere. "Flora is doing as well as can be expected, but I will continue looking out for her, in the absence of her parents."

Claire softly smiled. "That's good to hear," she said, then clutched her hands together tightly as she thought to herself for a few moments, staring at her lap. When she looked back up, she gave Layton a cheeky smile. "Oh, and I hear through the grapevine there's another new addition to your little family?"

Layton was at first confused, but then laughed, reaching a hand up to fiddle with his hat before remembering he had taken it off and running his hand through his hair instead, pretending that had been his intention from the start. "I suppose Luke told Clark who told you?" he asked, getting a giggle from Claire in answer. "Alfendi was orphaned in the destruction Clive wreaked on London, and when Flora heard about him, she begged we take him in." He smiled, thinking back on the young boy currently sleeping not far away. "He's quite a handful, but he's my son. I wouldn't give him up for the world."

Claire pressed her hands to her chest, biting back happy tears. "Oh, if only I could meet him," she sighed, but shook her head. "But no. I have no business being in this world anymore." She gave Layton a smile. "I know you'll look after him Hershel, and Flora too. The three of you can look after each other, like a family does."

Layton couldn't speak for a moment, only mutely nodding. When he was able to talk again, he said, "When you next talk to Clark, tell him Luke's attending Gressenheller. He should be happy about that."

"Really!?!" Claire cried, then laughed. "Wow, I thought Clark was exaggerating how far ahead that boy was academically! Luke's going to university now?" She marvelled at the thought for a moment. "What's he studying? Geology? Archeology?"

"Veterinary medicine," Layton replied, unable to hide a somewhat proud smile. "He was concerned at first about leaving his family to obtain his degree in London, but I think he's happy for the opportunity to live in his former home city again, if only temporarily."

Claire seemed surprised. "Huh. I'd've thought he'd go for the same degree as Clark or Brenda." She shrugged. "Ah well, I guess him having Brenda's face and Clark's hair doesn't necessarily mean he'll have the same interests."

Layton nodded in agreement. "He comes back with us tomorrow morning, local time. First semester starts Monday."

"That soon?" Claire asked, although she seemed unsurprised. "How's the rest of his family taking it? I assume poor Brenda is still missing."

"She is, regrettably," Layton replied. "Mister Wright is proud of him, as he should be. I hear his younger sister Trucy didn't take it well, but has slowly warmed up to the idea. His brother Apollo I can only assume, but he seems to be happy for Luke." He then frowned in confusion, giving Claire a look. "What exactly do you mean by 'rest of'? Clark doesn't know about this, yet."

Claire grinned innocently. "Do you, Flora and Alfendi not count as extended family?" she asked, then paused to giggle. "I saw the way you looked after Flora and Luke when we were in 'Future London'," she added in a conspiratorial tone. "I bet even then you were a father figure to him!"
Layton didn't smile in response, frowning sadly as he thought back on Luke's last few weeks in London before the grand move that ultimately cost the young boy both his parents. "I had to be," he quietly admitted. "Clark was about to move him across the world. Luke wasn't taking kindly to it."

Claire's smile quickly died. After a brief, uncomfortable silence, she leaned forward to rest a hand on Layton's shoulder. "Hershel," she said, and his gaze lifted to meet hers. "Clark and Brenda made us his godparents for a reason. I don't think Luke would have been with you at all if they didn't think of you as a second father for him."

"Mister Wright is his father now," Layton pointed out.

"And?" Claire replied before Layton could continue. She lifted both her hands to his face, holding Layton's cheeks in her palms. "If this Mister Wright loves Luke like a real father, he'd agree with me, and you know it."

After a few moments, Layton smiled. "Thank you, Claire."
"I'm thinking of going with a theme for their names, but it's difficult to decide," Luke explained with a sigh, sat on one of the floor cushions he and Apollo had retrieved as they waited for Layton and Maya's return. "Some of them I have the perfect title for, but all the others have too many fitting options!"

Flora, sat on another cushion nearby, thought for a moment. "Well, what are you calling them right now?"

"Whatever Trucy calls 'em, usually," Apollo remarked with a grin, arms crossed as he sat by the nearby wall.

Luke shot his brother an unamused look, turning back to Flora to reply, "Well, for most of them I like to have the title be 'The Adventure of' something. So, for example, the story of we met," he gestured between himself and Flora, "is called 'The Adventure of the Curious Village'."

"Not 'Saint Mystere'?" Flora asked, head slightly cocked to one side in confusion.

Luke bit his lip. "Er, no," he admitted. "I thought it would be best to keep real names out of the titles."

Phoenix, standing near the thick doors to the Channelling Chamber, laughed, interrupting the conversation. "Yes, you're planning on maybe eventually publishing them, aren't you?" he asked with a grin.

Luke blushed. "Um..."

"Really!?" Flora cried, surprised. "But what about the names still being in the story itself!?"

"I-I'm still thinking about it!" Luke hurriedly assured Flora, hands held up. "Once, or if, I start properly writing them, I'm going to change real people's names, I promise!"

Flora seemed suspicious but accepted Luke's explanation. "Okay then," she continued, "what about the other stories you tell your sister?"

Luke took a moment to sigh in relief, then thought to himself, counting off on his fingers. "Let's see, the other titles I'm sure about... There's when the Professor, Emmy and I went to Monte D'Or, which I'm calling 'The Adventure of the Miracle Mask' -"

"Even though it was called the 'Mask of Chaos'," Apollo interrupted, an eyebrow raised above his smirk.

Luke shushed his brother. "'Miracle Mask' is alliterative!" he cried, then turned back to Flora. "And when we travelled around the world with Professor Sycamore and Aurora; That one's called 'The Adventure of the Azran Legacy'." He thought a moment, silently counting off his 'adventures' on a hand. "Oh, and I forgot about when the Professor and I went to Ambrosia. I decided to call that one 'The Adventure of the Eternal Diva'."

Apollo looked up with a frown. "'Diva'!?" he repeated in indignation.

"Janice was an opera singer, and the queen in the legend sang too," Luke explained with a shrug. "It might not fit perfectly, but I can't think of any better word to fit 'singer' than 'diva'."

After a moment, Apollo decided he had to agree and shrugged.

Flora thought to herself a moment. "So... the first time the three of us went on the Molentary Express, and everything that happened in Future London... you don't know what to call those stories?"

Luke nodded. "I was thinking either 'Diabolical' or 'Pandora's Box' for the Folsense adventure," he explained. "The Future London one, I'm torn between 'Lost' and 'Unwound Future'."

"I still think you should go with 'Diabolical Box' and 'Lost Future'," Apollo chimed in. "They make more sense."

"But 'Pandora's Box' and 'Unwound Future' are so poetically perfect!" Luke argued, then threw up his hands as he growled in frustration. "I don't know what I'll end up deciding on."

Flora giggled a little at her friend's predicament, and reached out to pat his shoulder sympathetically.

Apollo smirked a little at Flora's predicament, and reached out to pat his shoulder sympathetically. Apollo smirked, looking to Flora. "He has the same problem deciding between 'Last Specter' and 'Spectre's Call'. One's 'poetic' and the other's practical."

The thick doors to the Channelling Chamber swung open, Phoenix jumping back as Apollo, Luke and Flora perked up in their seats, quickly moving to stand as they saw Maya emerge. Not far behind her was Professor Layton, his hat in his hands and a small smile on his face as he thought to himself.

"Professor!" Flora cried, running to Layton's side with a worried frown. "Are you okay?"

Layton looked up in mild surprise before giving Flora a reassuring smile. "I'm quite alright, Flora. Don't you worry about me."

Flora stared for a moment more, then smiled back, relieved.

Maya grinned as she walked to Phoenix's side, giving him a wink. "Another satisfied client!"

"It's a pity the girls are in school today," Maya continued, crossing her arms idly. "Me or Pearly could have channelled Mia while all of us were together!"

Phoenix just laughed.

Apollo scratched at the back of his head as he stepped forward. "You... could do that anyway, Maya," he suggested. "I mean, we don't have to tell Truce or Pearly..."

"You'd betray Trucy just like that?" Luke cried in an outraged tone, fists on his hips, though his smile gave away his true intention.
Wincing, Apollo looked away.

"Knock it off, you two," Phoenix said, waving his hand at the pair and pretending he wasn't grinning. "Besides, I want to see Mia's face when Trucy greets her with a hug and a loud 'Auntie Mia'!" He briefly imitated Trucy, only to quickly descend into giggles along with Maya.

"You two are a pair of children," Apollo muttered in the pair's direction, only to have to immediately shoot a glare at Luke when said brother started giggling along with them. Noticing Apollo's look, Luke was quick to stop, giving Apollo an innocent smile.

Flora looked away from the goings-on with a smile, turning back to Layton. "By the way, I checked on Alfendi while you were busy."

"Oh?" Layton asked. "How is he?"

"Fast asleep, just like Luke said," Flora replied with a sigh of relief that her small family was content. "We'll probably have to wake him up to eat, though."

Layton thought a moment. "That's a good point," he said, then reached into a pocket and pulled out a fob-watch, checking the time. "It's half past eight in the evening back home. It will have to be a late supper."

Maya looked over in surprise. "Oh right, it's time we ate!" She clapped her hands together, giving everyone a grin. "When everyone is ready, join me in the dining room and I will prepare our meal!"

Flora watched Maya walk off. "I'll go wake up Alfendi," she told Layton, heading towards the Winding Way.

"Be careful," Layton warned her. "He won't be happy about that."

"I will, don't worry," Flora replied, shooting him a reassuring grin before she ran off.

Dining Room

Alfendi had been grumpy upon being woken up, but once placed at the table (in Layton's lap so he wouldn't try to run off) he calmed down, sleepily allowing his father to force him to eat. Layton, to everyone's surprise, did not put his hat back on immediately, leaving it to sit on the table as the group chatted together.

As their previous conversation lapsed into silence, Maya took the chance to clear away everyone's empty plates. Phoenix was quick to turn to Layton. "So, um, I'm curious. This Claire you wanted to talk to... an old friend?"

Layton thought a moment, then nodded, smiling. "You could say that," he replied, slightly distracted as Alfendi played with one of his hands. "She was a physicist. Along with Clark and Brenda, she was one of our group of friends at university."

Apollo looked over to Luke in surprise. "Wait, aren't those your parents' names?"
"Mm-hm." Luke nodded, smiling in mild embarrassment. "They didn't tell me that much about her, though. She died when I was... well, Alfendi's age." He jerked his head in the young boy's direction. "By then, we were in Misthellery already."

Maya giggled, arriving back at the table to start picking up cutlery she'd missed. "Aw, I can just imagine you as a cute baby, Luke!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "You clearly haven't seen Luke's family photo albums yet then," he pointed out.

Phoenix chuckled, helping Maya from his seat. "I guess we'll have to get them out the next time you come down to the Agency," he told her.

"Ooh!" Maya cried, excited. "Sounds fun!" She then winked at a giggling Luke. "I only saw the one of them last time, after all."

Apollo frowned in confusion, then sighed, hitting his forehead with one hand. "Right, Luke brought one up here when you channelled his dad... I forgot."

Phoenix shrugged, giving Apollo a sympathetic smile. "Eh, I did too. It's not that big a deal."

"It didn't have any cute baby pictures in it, though," Maya pointed out with a grin.

Flora giggled, leaning over to play with Alfendi from next to Layton. "I forgot to bring my camera," she lamented. "Alfendi looked so cute when he was sleeping in the spare room!"

"When we head back to the city," Phoenix asked, rubbing at his chin in thought, "is Alfendi going to sleep the whole way?"

"He seemed fine sleeping on the plane," Layton replied. "I don't think the train ride will bother him once he's settled."

While everyone else was distracted, Flora grabbed Layton's hat from the table and rested it on Alfendi's head, where it promptly fell to rest on his nose, completely covering the boy's eyes. He seemed startled, looking around a moment as if wondering where the world had gone. "Look, it fits already!" Flora said, grinning. "You look just like your papa in that, 'Fendi!"

Alfendi smiled from under the hat.

After a fond farewell to Maya and Kurain, the Wrights and the Laytons took the bus and the train back into the city. As predicted, Alfendi fussed in his pram between bus and train, but once settled in his father's lap he was quick to fall asleep again. Once they arrived back in the agency, Alfendi was left to sleep in Phoenix's room while Phoenix himself left to collect Trucy from school. In the meantime, Luke and the Professor amused themselves in the kitchen swapping puzzles, while Apollo and Flora sat in the office watching TV.

Apollo heard the front door opening a single moment before it was following by the banging of the office door, giving him enough time only to turn in his seat towards the noise. There was a loud squeal, attracting Flora's attention, and Apollo made for the remote with a sigh.

"HI YOU MUST BE FLORA MY NAME IS TRUCY!" Trucy shouted as she jumped at Flora where she sat on the sofa, clinging to the young woman's neck.

Flora was too shocked for a moment to respond. "Um... hello there." She gently pushed the girl off her lap and away from her neck. "It's... nice to meet you."

Trucy just grinned.

Phoenix entered the room much less noisily, closing the door behind him. "Remember to be quiet, Truce," he reminded her. "We've got a baby sleeping upstairs. Don't want to wake him."

Apollo sighed as he stood up, placing the remote by the now-off television. "If he wakes up and starts crying, I'm blaming you," he added.

Trucy stepped back from the sofa, glancing worriedly at the door to the kitchen. "So I'm not going to get to meet Alfendi?" she cried.

"You can tomorrow," Flora offered, sitting forward in her seat as she gave the girl a smile. "It's very late right now back home, but tomorrow morning he'll be awake!"

"Hmph," Trucy mumbled, sticking out her bottom lip. "I guess I havta wait." She then fixed Flora with a grin. "But I can meet you and the Professor, though! Luke's told us all about you, Flora!"

"He's told me about you, too!" Flora replied, laughing. "You're Trucy, aren't you?"

Trucy nodded, bouncing in place.

"Well, I'll introduce you to the Professor, then!" Flora continued, getting to her feet and gingerly brushing off her dress.

"Yay!" Trucy cheered.

Apollo shushed his sister. "Baby!" he reminded her.
Trucy shrugged apologetically, then followed Flora to the kitchen door, whispering, "Yay!"

Luke thought hard as he sat at the dining table, one hand curled around his chin as he frowned in concentration. After a long moment of silence, he suddenly smiled, looking up at the Professor opposite. "I've got it! The answer's three, isn't it?"

Luke quietly cheered to himself, watching as Layton marked on the tiny scoreboard in the corner of the paper that the teen had won another point. "So now it's my turn!" he cried, and he returned to thinking as he brainstormed his next puzzle to try on his mentor. 'I better make it a good one...' At that moment, the door to the office swung open, and Flora entered the room, closely followed by a very excited Trucy. "Mister Wright is back!" Flora announced with a smile.

Luke looked up, grinning as he spotted his sister. "Trucy! You're home!"

Trucy gave her brother only a cursory wave before skipping forward towards Layton, who stood from his chair. "Hi!" Behind her, Apollo entered the room, leaning against a nearby wall with his arms crossed.

Layton tipped his hat to the girl. "Hello," he replied.

Flora giggled, and Luke also got up from his seat, gesturing between the pair. "Professor, this is my little sister Trucy! Truce, this is-!"

"The Professor from your stories!" Trucy filled in, bouncing excitedly as she stared up at the man in the top hat. "I've been looking forward to meeting you!" she told him.

Layton laughed. "Ah, well, thank you! Luke's told us a lot about you in his letters!"

"Is it okay if I call you 'Uncle Professor'?" Trucy continued, still grinning.

Layton was taken aback, a quick glance to Luke confirming that the question was unexpected by all involved. "Er..."

Apollo sighed, slapping his face with one hand. "Seriously?" he asked, levelling a glare at Trucy. "You don't have to make every close friend into a member of the family, y'know."

Trucy quickly stuck her tongue out at Apollo. "You call Uncle Edgeworth and Uncle Larry 'uncles' too, Polly," she pointed out.

Apollo sputtered, turning red. "B-but... That's different! For one thing, Uncle Larry demanded we call him that!"
Layton laughed, attracting Trucy's attention back to him. "That's quite alright," he assured her. "I already have one honorary niece. I don't mind having another."

Luke frowned in concern. "You're sure you want to do that, Professor? Sherry at least calls you 'Uncle Hersh'..."

Trucy squealed in glee, giving Layton a quick hug, surprising the older man. "Thank you, Uncle Professor!" she cried.

Phoenix laughed as he belatedly entered the room, tucking his beanie into the front pocket of his hoodie. "That's what you're calling the Professor, Truce? Really?"

"I tried telling her how stupid it sounds," Apollo said, sulking by the wall. "Big surprise, she didn't listen."

"I think it's cute," Flora cut in with a smile.

Trucy shot Flora a grin, then tugged on Layton's arm. "Uncle Professor! Did you really swordfight a vampire to convince him Miss Katia wasn't his fiancée?"

"He wasn't a vampire!" Apollo reminded her.

Layton and Luke laughed at the memory of the swordfight she mentioned. "No, he wasn't a vampire in the end," Layton explained to Trucy, "but I did have to fight him off when he attacked me with a sword. He simply wasn't listening to reason, otherwise."

Trucy giggled in delight. "And does your car really turn into a plane!?"

"The one Paul made for me does," Layton replied with a good-natured smile, sitting back down.

"And there really was a magic mask that could turn people into stone?" Trucy continued, bouncing in excitement. "Or into horses?"

Phoenix laughed, walking up behind Trucy to ruffle her hair. "What, you want the Professor to re-tell all of Luke's stories for you?"

Trucy shrugged, looking sheepish.

Layton pulled at the brim of his hat, smiling to himself in thought. "I can think of one you might like to hear again," he said, looking up in Luke's direction. "Although I think Luke might prefer to tell it himself."

Luke frowned in confusion. "Which one?"

Flora gasped, her hands to her mouth. "Oh, you don't mean...?"

"Future London, of course," Layton replied, as calm as ever.

"Wait," Apollo cried as he started to connect the dots, taking a few steps towards where Layton sat at the table. "You don't mean this 'Claire Foley' was connected to the 'Lost Future' story...?"

Trucy blinked in confusion. "Who was what?"

"You want me to tell them, Professor?" Luke asked, dropping back into the seat opposite Layton at the table mostly out of shock. "You don't want to tell them about Claire yourself?"

Phoenix ran a hand through his hair as he watched the chaos unfolding. "I agree with Trucy. What's going on?"

There was a short pause as everyone waited to see who would speak up first. "Claire Foley," Layton eventually said, looking up to Phoenix and then down to Trucy. "Luke told me he left her out of the story he told you about our adventure in 'Future London'."

"He did!?!" Trucy cried in surprise, looking over to an embarrassed Luke.

"Yeah, I remember that," Apollo said, a finger pressed to his forehead as he thought. "I noticed he was leaving something out, and he just said it was personal."

Phoenix also thought a moment. "'Depending on how you count it'," he repeated. "She's tied in somehow to the time travel charade."

Layton closed his eyes in answer.

"How long does it take to tell that story, Luke?" Flora asked, walking around the table to take the seat next to Layton. "I'm actually interested to hear it myself."

Luke thought a moment. "The full, un-edited version takes at least an hour," he explained, "but having to mentally re-edit it as I go to include everything about Claire will extend it a bit." He looked around their small kitchen. "Plus, I don't know if there's room for everyone to sit down as I tell it..."

"I'll go get some of our office chairs, then," Phoenix said with a smile, then turned and headed off into the office. "We'll only need two."

Trucy was looking excited again. "Ooh! Ooh! Is the story very different!?" she cried, dashing around Luke to clamber into her usual seat at the table, the only currently-empty chair. "Can I still help!?"

Luke laughed. "Sure you can!"

"Yay!"

Apollo sighed, shaking his head. "I have a feeling I'm not gonna like this story very much..."

View the Court Record
"And with that, Inspector Chelmey walked off with the Prime Minister," Luke narrated to his family, spread around the small dining table. "The Professor, Celeste behind him, walked over to the bench Dimitri was still sitting on." At first, he'd been nervous about telling a story partly about Layton and Flora to Layton and Flora themselves (especially for the parts where Trucy gleefully parroted recreated dialogue in an imitation of Luke's imitations of his friends), but as neither objected and quietly gave him encouraging smiles, Luke slowly forgot his awkwardness and was able to properly focus on his tale. "Meanwhile, I was with Flora. As it was starting to get late, and half of London seemed to be flattened, we decided together that it was best we returned home." He closed his eyes in thought. "Flora decided to go on ahead, but I was going to tell the Professor what we were doing before I left."

Apollo, sat in a chair from reception, sighed as he rested his crossed arms and chin on the edge of the table between Trucy and Flora. "So that's basically it?" he interrupted. "The grand secret behind this 'Claire Foley' was that she looked a lot like her younger sister, died in a failed science experiment, and happened to be the Professor's girlfriend?" He paused to throw an apologetic look to Layton. "No offence."

"None taken," Layton assured him, leaning back in his chair with closed eyes and a sad smile.

Luke scratched the back of his neck uncomfortably. "W-well..."

Trucy scoffed. "He hasn't even finished the story yet, Polly!" she pointed out fiercely, only to lean back on her elbows as she gave Luke an excited grin. "Go on, Luke!"

Luke thought a moment, fiddling with a sleeve. "When I found the Professor and Celeste again... They were still standing by the bench, but Inspector Chelmey had come back and was taking away Dimitri. I... wasn't sure what to make of it, because they both - the Professor and Celeste, I mean - looked upset. They were just staring at each other."

Apollo frowned, sitting up a little straighter as he recognised a new part of the story. Flora silently gasped, her hands over her mouth as she remembered hearing this part before.

"I asked what was wrong... startled them a bit, but they just said everything was fine. Celeste..." Luke frowned, contemplating for a moment how best to unravel the upcoming bombshell for his siblings and father. "She told me I'd grown into a fine young man. She'd been appointed my godmother when I was a baby."

Trucy blinked in surprise. "Wait, really? I thought you'd just met Celeste."

"Yeah," Apollo said, surprised to find himself agreeing with Trucy for once. "That was one of the new parts of the story, that the Professor hadn't even heard of her before... when, y'know, he should have heard from Claire about her sister at some point, estranged or not."
Phoenix raised an eyebrow at the odd sight of Trucy being the one to point out a 'contradiction', but said nothing.

Luke paused for a moment, then decided to just come out and say it, sitting up straight and looking Apollo and Trucy dead in the eyes. "It was then she told me that 'Celeste Foley' didn't exist. She never had." He watched as the pair looked even more confused, then sighed. "Her real name was Claire. She was Claire Foley."

Apollo and Trucy were too surprised to speak. Phoenix, however, smiled, rubbing his chin in thought. "Depending on how you count it," he repeated. "The time travel experiment worked."

"But only for a moment," Layton picked up, smiling sadly as he sat back in his chair, arms crossed. "Her body wasn't stable. She was destined to eventually return back in time, to the moment of the explosion." His smile faded, and he stared at the table in front of him. "And her time was running out."

Trucy squeaked a tiny gasp, hands to her mouth. "Oh no!" she cried, eyes shining with sympathetic tears. "Poor Uncle Professor!"

Layton was surprised by the girl's concern for him, but gave her a smile. "I'm quite alright, Trucy," he assured her. "After all, can I not now talk to her whenever I wish?"

"Oh yes!" Flora cried in sudden recognition. "Maya channelled her for you today!"

Trucy gasped, grinning widely. "You went to see Mommy!?"

"By that she means Maya," Phoenix quickly explained for Layton and Flora with a smile.

Layton opened his mouth to respond, only to be interrupted by a loud sigh from Apollo, which attracted the attention of everyone in the room. He gave Luke a suspicious look. "You're seriously telling me that time travel is an actual thing?"

Luke frowned. "You didn't believe spirit channelling was a thing either until Maya channelled my dad."

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Oh, right. Spirit channelling is real, therefore every single other myth and fairy tale must also be real," he sarcastically replied.

"Because I'm usually right!" Apollo argued, waving a hand that he quickly moved to start counting off on. "The 'future' London was faked, the 'spectre' was a robot, there was no such thing as real magic or witches, the weird guy in the old mansion wasn't a vampire, and Maya never died!"

"And what about the things you were wrong about?" Trucy argued in return, hands on her hips. "Somebody actually time travelled once, Loosha was one of those 'spectres', hypnotism and hallucinations..." She paused, her rant interrupted by the difficult word that she quickly decided to skip. "That weird gas stuff! You never saw either that or the hypnotism thing coming, and all the old Azran artefacts and machinery! And-and!" She pointed at Flora. "What about the village of robots!?"

"Which I'm still doubtful about, by the way," Apollo shot back, not noticing Flora draw back from the conversation, looking uncomfortable.

"I don't see why," Luke spoke up, giving his brother a stern look that he hoped was a good enough signal for Apollo to drop the conversation. "You're all praise about Ponco and Clonco."

Apollo scoffed, crossing his arms. "Ponco and Clonco were built by a professional roboticist and programmed by a master programmer," he said, "and actually look like robots, not real people. You're telling me a single person, an amateur at that, built thirty unique, life-like robots, with programmed personalities good enough to pass as people? Of course I'm going to doubt that."

"Bruno was a qualified technician," Flora cut in, surprising Apollo as he spun to see her glare. "A very skilled one. Maybe he should have been doing something more with his life than helping my father after my mother died, but he chose to make robots for us and look after me, and he kept looking after those robots until his death."

Apollo shrunk back, chastened. "I, uh... I'm sorry, Flora."

"It's... fine," Flora sighed, looking away sadly. "Besides, he told me he outsourced most of the programming. He had an online friend he was always talking to."

"Bruno's dead?" Trucy asked, looking both shocked and upset.

Flora just nodded.

Phoenix smiled to himself. "You probably need to tell Maya that story about the robot village, Luke," he said. "She's never heard it, has she?"

Luke shrugged, smiling in embarrassment. "I've only managed to tell her three or four," he admitted. "And no, 'Curious Village' isn't one of them."

"It strikes me we have gotten very off-topic," Layton pointed out, looking around the table. "You never finished your story, Luke."

"Oh, right!" Luke realised with a gasp. "We got distracted talking about Claire!"

"It's so amazing Celeste was Claire the whole time!" Trucy cried, settling back down to listen to the younger of her brothers. She looked over to Layton and Flora and explained, "In the old version of the story, Celeste was just someone who had a sister die in the accident! Luke never even mentioned the stuff about Claire!"

"I can see why," Flora agreed, giving the girl a smile.

Phoenix watched Apollo carefully, giving him a stern look. "You're going to not interrupt the rest of this?" he asked.

Apollo sighed. "Sure," he agreed.

Luke paused a moment to ensure no-one else had anything to say, then cleared his throat. "Well, um... Claire and the Professor told me what was going on. She'd been friends with my mum and dad in university, along with the Professor, so she said she was glad they were doing well." He frowned a bit at the thought that they weren't anymore, but decided not to bring that up. "By then, everything was getting busy again with all the onlookers and rescue services still trying to get everything back to normal, so we found a quiet alleyway to go to..."
FLASHBACK: The Lost Future

- Three Years Earlier -

August 12, 6:49PM
Avoncombe Park

"I'll see you later then," Flora said with a smile.

The pair parted with a wave, Flora disappearing off down the street while Luke turned back towards the park, looking around the grassy area that the modified Laytonmobile had landed in. To one side was the bench he had seen Dimitri resting on earlier, and he noticed with surprise that Inspector Chelmey had returned, and was escorting Dimitri away, casting glances behind him as he left. Standing alone, not far from where Luke had last seen them, were Layton and Celeste, staring at each other with wide, tearful eyes.

Luke frowned. What had happened while he'd been talking with Flora? 'I haven't seen the Professor like that since... well...'. He ran across the pavement and onto the grass, stepping gingerly towards the two adults. "Professor?"

Luke glanced worriedly between the two, distrusting of their false assuring smiles. "What's wrong?" he asked.

Celeste laughed to herself, then stepped forward towards Luke. "You've probably heard this a lot, Luke," she said, "but you really do look a lot like your mother." She gave him a warm smile. "You've really grown into a fine young man."

"Huh?" Luke asked, confused. He looked to Layton for answers, but found the Professor looking away, hiding his face behind the brim of his hat. "How do you know my mum?" he asked Celeste.

Celeste giggled to herself, a hand held to her mouth. "Both Brenda and Clark were friends of mine for a long time. They made me your godmother, you know."

Luke was only even more confused. "But I didn't even know I had godparents!" he cried. "What are you talking about, Celeste?"

The redhead paused for a moment before giving Luke a sad smile. "I'm sorry, Luke," she said. "I'm afraid I had to lie to you, down in that 'Future London'. My name isn't Celeste."

Luke was shocked. "What!?"

"There is no Celeste Foley, and there never has been," the woman continued, a hand fiddling with the scarf around her neck. "My real name... is Claire."
Blinking in surprise, Luke stared up at her. "Claire?" he repeated. "B-but... how can you...?"

"That experiment ten years ago," Claire explained, in an almost matter-of-fact way. "It worked, but only for a moment. I only have so much time left here before I have to go back to the moment of the blast."

Luke looked back over to Layton, who was still hiding his face behind his hat, and suddenly understood why the normally composed Professor was so upset. "Sh-should I... leave you both alone?"

"Nonsense," Layton suddenly spoke up, giving Luke a stern look. "You shouldn't be out alone this late, especially given what's happened this evening." He then looked around, vaguely confused. "Where's Flora?"

"She went home already," Luke explained. "She wanted me to tell you she'd see you there."

Layton thought a moment, then sighed, pulling at the brim of his hat again. "At least we know she can look after herself for the short trip. She'll be safe at home."

Claire took a moment to survey the park and nearby road, which was slowly filling up with onlookers now the police had gone and the mayhem of Clive's machine had died down. "It's getting busy." She turned to Layton with a smile. "I think we should find somewhere more private to talk, Hershel."

After a pause to look around, Layton agreed.

It hadn't been a long walk to find their 'private place to talk'; As Layton still refused to let Luke head home alone, the boy was tagging behind the reunited couple as they walked hand-in-hand down the street. They spoke quietly as they walked, and Luke did his best not to listen, feeling very much like a third wheel but not wanting to make his mentor angry by sneaking off while Layton's back was turned. Not to mention, although he wanted to assure his parents he was alive and safe, he didn't mind all that much waiting a little before returning home.

Eventually, Claire and Layton ducked into a quiet alleyway, away from the busy roads full of people. Luke looked back warily, but followed them in. He was surprised when Claire seemed to come to a stop, looking around the alley before smiling at a confused Layton. "Here seems as good a place as any," she said.

Layton paused, then looked up ahead where a single lamp shone before the path ended at a brick wall, splitting off to either side and out of sight. "I suppose so," he quietly agreed.

The couple walked forward a little more, towards the pool of light from the overhead lamp. Luke looked around a bit before stepping forward and dashing to the nearby wall, leaning against it somewhere out of the way, where a part of the building jutted out. He didn't want to lose sight of the adults, so, although he was staring at his feet in a show of not eavesdropping, he frequently cast glances towards them from the corners of his eyes.

Claire let go of Layton's hand, looking up at the lamp above with a smile. "They had so much artificial light down there," she said. "It's a pity that it had gotten so dark by the time we finally got out."
Layton thought a moment, then nodded. "Their artificial sun," he mused aloud, although there was a hitch to his voice that betrayed his false calm. "It had to look real, for the trapped scientists..."

Looking over to Layton for a moment, Claire's smile faded. "I know you don't like to talk about it," she said, "but you don't still have those nightmares, do you? I hate to think of you suffering through them alone still, after all this time."

Layton didn't reply immediately, pulling at his hat. "They've... not gone away," he quietly admitted, "but they aren't as bad as they used to be." He forced a small smile as he returned her gaze. "I know they're just a fantasy now."

Claire briefly smiled back, then turned her head to the concrete path they walked on. After a long pause, she sighed. "I know there's still so much we should talk about, but I don't think any amount of time would be enough." She looked up to him again, a sad smile on her face. "I suppose this is it, Hershel." She turned her body to face him fully. "I have to go back to my own time. Back to that day when... we parted."

"No, Claire," Layton muttered, just barely managing to hold himself together.

Claire bit back a laugh, worried it would open the floodgates, and stepped forward, resting her hands on Layton's chest as he reached to hold her shoulders. "I'm sorry I can't stay," she told him, lowering her head against his shoulder as they embraced.

Luke decided to look away. This was far too private for him to be there for, and he was wishing more than ever that he'd been allowed to go home back at the park. 'Why is the Professor so insistent I had to stay with them, anyway? I'm thirteen! I'm old enough to walk home alone! A-and, even if he thinks I'm not, we could always ask a policeman to go with me!' He then frowned in thought. 'Oh, but the police might all be busy with the refugees from Future London, and all the damage Clive caused... I hope Flora was right that he missed her and the Professor's place.'

"Claire, wait!" Layton cried, and Luke looked up to see Claire in the middle of walking away, having halted at the Professor's desperate cry. There was a long pause, then Claire began to turn around.

Luke quickly returned his gaze to the pavement at his feet. 'Don't notice I was looking, don't notice I was looking... has that lamp suddenly got brighter, or is it just me?'

"We had so many... plans for the future," Claire said. "You won't forget, will you? Our shared past... and our... lost future?"

There was another pause, and Luke wondered if they were hugging again.

"You can't go!" Layton suddenly shouted.

Luke almost winced, turning his head away from where the pair stood. 'They're not hugging, then...' 'I don't want to say goodbye again!' Layton continued. "I can't, I won't!"

There was another pause. "I know you," Claire replied, in a calm, quiet almost-whisper. "And I know you'll stay strong. After all..." She almost laughed, but it sounded more like a sob with her sad tone. "That's what a gentleman does."

Luke almost looked around at the familiar refrain, but stopped himself as his eyes met his feet. A part of him wondered if Claire was simply repeating Layton's phrase or he had picked it up from her.
"I must go now, Hershel," Claire continued. "Thank you for everything. Goodbye."

'Wait... 'goodbye'!? ' Luke could hear a single pair of footsteps walking off down the path, and looked up in worry to see something glowing disappearing around the corner to the left. He pushed himself off the wall and ran to catch up with it, past the unmoving Layton and to the corner he'd seen the light from. Beyond, in the darkness away from the lamp above them, he saw the glowing figure of Claire Foley, firmly walking away from him. As he gasped in shock, she faded away into nothingness, a few remaining motes of light falling to the ground as they too disappeared. 'Oh... So she's...? ' He blinked once, turning back to where Layton still stood. "She's gone!"

The best word Luke could find to describe Layton's expression was 'broken'. At Luke's call, he tensed up, then slowly turned around. Just as Luke was thinking of going to comfort his friend, he saw the man's shoulders start to shake, and, with a deep breath to calm himself down a little, the Professor turned his face to the sky. A hand reached up to remove his top hat, which Layton hugged close to his chest as small white flecks resembling snow (though they could also have been dust from the smoke emitted by Clive's machine) began to fall from the sky.

Luke was unsure what to do, shocked at the sight of his mentor without his trademark hat. 'Wh... What are you supposed to do when it's the adult who's sad?' He watched a few moments more, then gently walked over to join Layton. Without a word, he stood at the elder's side, and rested a hand on his arm in an offer of comfort.

Although he still stared at the sky, Layton smiled. Blinking away tears that rolled down the existing tracks on his face, he looked down to the worried teen. "Thank you, my boy. I'm glad to have had a friend by my side for this."

Although surprised, Luke tried to smile through his concern. "Anything I can do to help, Professor."

Layton quietly chuckled, giving a fond smile to the hat in his arms. "We should get you home now, Luke," he said. "I'm sure your parents will be worrying about you." With that, he slowly walked back out to the street.

Luke stared after his mentor for a moment. 'I hope he'll be okay... ' He cast a single glance back at the corner he'd seen Claire disappear behind, then sighed and rushed to catch up with Layton.
"The elders only agreed to it because Mystic Maya said it would help teach us how to be independent, for our training, so they set it up a few years ago," Pearl was explaining to Layton as she and Trucy played with Alfendi on the floor. "I didn't think I'd ever want to use it, but I changed my mind when I realised I could spend more time with my friends here over the week!"

"As good a reason as any," Layton agreed, watching the girls and Alfendi with a smile as he sat on the nearby sofa. "It was nice of you to come to meet us today regardless, Pearl."

As, like Trucy, Pearl had missed seeing the Laytons in Kurain, she had arrived that morning to meet them (and say goodbye to Luke) before they left. Shortly after coming through the door and being introduced to Layton and Flora, Trucy had dragged her away to show off young Alfendi, who was enjoying the attention of people closer to his age. As the three of them played together with some of Trucy's old toys, Pearl was answering Layton's question about her current arrangements going to school in the city.

"It wasn't a problem, Mister Professor," Pearl replied with a grin. "Mystic Maya wanted me to come and give her goodbyes to everyone, anyway."

Layton chuckled. He'd tried to correct Pearl already on his name, but the girl seemed to have forgotten again, so he decided to leave it be.

From the direction of the neighbouring room, the small group heard a door open and shut, and a voice called out, "Yo, Wrights! Where are you guys?"

Layton frowned, looking to Trucy as she gasped. "Where you expecting anyone else today?"

Trucy jumped up, grimacing. "Um..." She cast a worried glance at Pearl, then took a deep breath and put on a wide grin, running to the door to reception. "Hi, Clay!" she shouted, rushing to throw the door open.

Layton stood, turning to look as the door revealed a laughing young man with messy black hair, a shiny visor sticking out over his grinning face. "Trucy! Where's 'Pollo and Luke, huh?"

"I'll go get them in a sec!" Trucy promised, waving her brothers' friend in.

Clay stepped into the room, only to pause as he locked eyes with Layton. Although surprised at first, he quickly grinned. "Oh, hi there!" he called, waving. As Layton smiled back, Clay then noticed Pearl sat with Alfendi on the floor. "Hey!" he added to them, seeming slightly confused. "Apparently the Agency is really crowded today?" he remarked to Trucy, giving her an amused grin.

Trucy just shrugged, keeping the smile plastered on her face. She skipped over to Layton, gesturing between him and her newest guest. "Uncle Professor, this is Clay! He's Luke and Polly's friend!"

"Ah, so you're Clay?" Layton asked, tipping his hat to the young man. "My name is Professor Hershel Layton; It's a pleasure to meet you."
"Whoa, cool, you are the Professor!" Clay cried, balling his hands into fists in excitement as he bounced forward. "I thought it might be you from the hat!" He stuck out a hand. "Clay Terran! Luke's told me tons about you!"

Layton shook Clay's offered hand, chuckling at his enthusiasm. "I've heard a lot about you from Luke, too," the Professor said. "He says you're studying to become an astronaut."

Clay laughed, adjusting his hat. "What can I say? It's true!"

"And of course, I should introduce my son too," Layton continued, gesturing to the toddler on the floor (currently poking at the button eyes of one of Trucy's handmade dolls). "This is Alfendi Layton."

Alfendi looked up at the sound of his name, peering curiously up at his father and the newcomer nearby.

"Hey, kid!" Clay called, giving the toddler a wave.

Alfendi stared at Clay for a moment, then waved back.

Pearl gently got to her feet, giving Clay an embarrassed smile. "Um, should I introduce myself too...?" she asked Trucy, biting at a thumbnail.

Clay frowned, confused. "Why... wouldn't you...?" he asked.

Trucy's smile faltered a little as she looked between the two, thinking over the question. "I'll let Polly and Luke do that!" she eventually announced, then sprinted for the kitchen, disappearing behind the door.

Clay raised an eyebrow. "Okay," he muttered to himself, still confused.

"I'm sorry, Mister Clay," Pearl replied, looking away.

Layton looked between the pair, finding himself as confused as Clay. "I must admit, why and how the two of you do not already know each other puzzles me as well."

"Don't worry, Mister Professor," Pearl said, one hand fiddling with a bracelet, "there is a good reason Mister Clay doesn't know me."

Clay crossed his arms, scoffing. "Can't wait to hear this," he mumbled.

The door to the kitchen opened again, and into the room burst Apollo and Luke, frantically rushing to greet their friend. Apollo, much like Trucy, had an almost-convincing grin, but Luke was visibly nervous and smiled in more of a grimace than anything remotely genuine. "Clay!" Luke cried. "We weren't expecting to see you until we got to the airport!"

Clay pouted at the pair. "What, I'm not allowed to show up early and spend more time with my best friends before one of them goes to England for three months!?"

Luke winced, rubbing at an arm as he stepped back and looked away. "I'm sorry, Clay; I didn't mean it like that..."

Apollo sighed, then rested a hand on Clay's shoulder. "Trucy said she hadn't introduced you to Pearly, so..." He gestured to Pearl, still biting her thumbnail as she watched them. "This is Pearly. She's a friend of the family."
"Hey," Clay called to Pearl with a defeated sigh.

Pearl quickly bowed a greeting in return. "Hello," she said, giving Clay a friendly smile. "I've heard a lot about you, Mister Clay."

Clay stared at Pearl for a moment, then turned back to Apollo with a frown. "So how come she knows me but I've never heard of her?"

Luke nervously started pulling at his sleeves. "I-it's a long story," he said.

"There's a short version, though," Apollo continued, looking Clay dead in the eyes with a serious stare. "You can't keep a secret."

"Hey!" Clay replied, hands on his hips as he glared at Apollo. "I can too keep a-!" He paused, thinking for a moment. "No, you're right, I can't." He ran a hand through his hair, giving his friends a relaxed grin. "Man, what's so secretive about her, though?"

Luke sighed in relief, glad to see his friend's anger gone.

Apollo smirked. "What, you think we're going to tell you and let that secret out?"

Clay scoffed, shrugging. "Worth a try, isn't it?"

Pearl giggled to herself.

Layton chuckled, crossing his arms. "As much as I'm also curious to hear this 'secret', I'm glad this has been happily sorted out for everyone," he said. "In fact, Luke, you should introduce your friend to Flora." He turned to Clay. "She was most disappointed when she realised we wouldn't have the time on this trip to visit this 'space centre' we've heard so much about."

Clay's face lit up with a bright smile. "Oh man, next time you come, I'll definitely give you a tour!" he cried. "It's an amazing place to visit! I can even get you behind the scenes a little, and show you the stuff normal tourists don't get to see!"

Luke laughed. "Come and tell Flora that! She's the one who's really interested!"

"Sure!" Clay replied, adjusting his visor with a smug grin. "Anything for a lady interested in space!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Please don't tell me you're going to try and flirt with her."

Instead of answering, Luke and Clay laughed and rushed through to the kitchen door. Apollo gave a long-suffering sigh, glanced at Layton with a raised eyebrow, then followed them, closing the door behind him.

With the boys gone, Pearl lowered herself back down to the floor, tidying some of the unused toys littered around Alfendi into a pile. Layton moved to sit back down on the sofa, watching with a smile as Alfendi took the tidying as a challenge to make another mess, slamming his hands into the pile with a giggle to send the toys scattering in all directions.

While Pearl smiled serenely and moved to re-tidy the floor, Alfendi giggling madly, Layton leaned forward. "If I may ask, Pearl," he said, a curious frown on his face, "what exactly was the reason Clay was not aware of you before today?"

Pearl paused in her tidying, not even reacting to Alfendi impatiently scattering the pile with an almighty cackle. "It's a long story, Mister Professor," she explained, brow furrowed nervously. "A lot of it was before I was even born."

Layton's eyes widened in surprise. "Oh?"

"It started a long time ago," Pearl said, her hands moving automatically to rebuild the small pile of toys for Alfendi. "Kurain Village was famous then, Mother said. We were well-respected, and the Master had a great sway on all sorts of things." She frowned. "I... can't remember if she said exactly what."

Layton thought a moment, resting a curled hand on his chin. "I don't suppose it really matters," he assured her. "What happened, then? Given what Miss Fey... er, Maya, told us about your village's... detractors, I don't imagine that is quite true anymore?"

Pearl shook her head, watching as Alfendi grew bored of scattering the toys and instead began to mime a conversation between a misshapen hippo and a squirrel. "There was a murder," Pearl continued. "A very famous one. The police couldn't figure it out, so they decided to call in the Master of Kurain to secretly channel the victim for them." She shook her head. "But the man the victim accused was proven innocent, then word got out of why the police had accused him in the first place."

"Oh dear," Layton mumbled, recognising immediately how the village's reputation must have nose-dived overnight. "And it's taken this long to rebuild your village's good reputation?"

Pearl opened her mouth to reply, then paused. "Sort of," she eventually said. "It wasn't until after Mystic Mia died, and Mystic Maya and Mister Nick met, that that old murder was finally solved. Kurain Village could finally overcome the past."

Layton noted to himself that he would have to ask Phoenix or Maya for the full story at another time. "And what does all this have to do with keeping you a secret from Clay? Surely Maya doesn't consider him to be a potentially violent detractor of your village's... 'talent'?"

Pearl shook her head. "Oh no, that's not the reason at all!" she explained, surprised. "It was Mister Nick who told us to keep everything a secret!"

"Mister... Wright?" Layton repeated, confused. "Why did he...?"

"It was after he lost his badge," Pearl sighed, hugging herself at the thought of the terrible memory. "You should have seen how much everyone hated him. He said, after everything Mystic Maya had done to help Kurain recover, the last thing we needed was for him to be associated with us." She closed her eyes a moment or two. "I was so angry at him. I thought he was abandoning us." She returned her gaze to Layton, a small smile on her face. "But Mystic Maya didn't let him. No matter how busy she was, she always made time to call him until he agreed to keep in touch with us, even if we were all too busy to see each other in person anymore." She giggled. "But then Mister Nick adopted Trucy and Apollo and Luke, and they started coming to visit us in Kurain, instead of us coming into the city!"

Layton smiled. "I see," he said, laughing a little at the almost deceptively simple answer that he should have seen coming. "I'm glad to hear there's a happy ending, regardless."

Pearl giggled, then returned to playing with Alfendi.
"Looks like this is as far as we can go," Phoenix announced as the group entered a massive room, and he directed everyone to the side of the crowd to keep out of the way.

"It's so busy here," Pearl said as she looked around, sticking close to Flora, who was walking alongside the sleeping Alfendi's pram as Layton pushed it.

Clay scoffed as they came to a stop near a wall. "It's LAX; Of course it's busy."

Trucy sniffed, then jumped at Luke and hugged his middle tightly, burying her face in his chest and knocking her hat askew. "I don't want you to go!" she cried. "Can't you stay at home? With me?"

Luke watched his sister with concern, hugging her back. "I'm sorry, Truce," he told her. "I have to go. It's too late now to change my plans."

"Don't you worry, your brother will be back before you know it," Layton added, giving the girl a reassuring smile although she couldn't see it.

Trucy just shook her head, clinging tighter to Luke. "Both of you are leaving me and Daddy!" she stubbornly accused her brothers, muffled by Luke's jumper. "Why can't you stay!?"

Apollo sighed, a hand to his face as he realised she was addressing him as well. "We've gone over this, Trucy..."

"I'll be back for Christmas," Luke promised. "It's only a couple of months. It'll be over before you know it!"

Trucy looked up at Luke with wide tearful eyes, her hat almost falling off were it not for one of Luke's hands at the back of Trucy's head. "You're not even going to be back for your birthday!? Or Daddy's birthday!? Or Halloween!?"

"I'll... have classes," Luke pointed out with a wince. "I won't have the time to come home."

"Flying between here and London is eleven hours or so in the air," Phoenix explained, shrugging. "That's not the kind of journey you can take lightly."

"I promise to text you every day," Luke added, giving Trucy a smile. "You'll never go more than twenty-four hours without hearing from me!"

Trucy thought a moment, letting go of Luke with one hand to wipe at her eyes. "You really promise?" she asked in a small voice.

After a pause, Trucy smiled, burying her face back in Luke's chest as she hugged him again.

Pearl ran to Luke and briefly joined the hug. "We'll miss you, Luke!"
Luke laughed, wrapping an arm around Pearl before she pulled away with a smile. "I'll miss you too, Pearl!" Trucy shifted at his side, hiding under Luke's arm as she rubbed at her eyes and nose, her other hand wrapped around her brother's back as she still clung tightly to him. "Say goodbye to Maya again for me?" Luke asked Pearl.

The young spirit medium nodded. "Sure," she agreed.

As Pearl stepped back, Clay stepped forward, grabbing Luke's free hand to shake with a super serious expression on his face. "We'll see ya, dude. Keep in touch, okay?"

Luke giggled, but nodded. "Of course I will! I have to keep you in line so you and Apollo don't kill each other!"

Clay grinned. "Yeah, like Apollo would ever be able to beat me in a fight!" he boasted.

"Hey!" Apollo cried, running to Clay's side and poking his friend's arm. "I'm not the one whose room is so disorganised he stepped on his hat and broke it!"

"Still fits, doesn't it?" Clay replied, adjusting his cracked visor with a wink before pointedly stepping away, leaving Apollo standing alone opposite Luke.

Luke shrugged as Apollo sent him a look, then giggled. "Have fun at your 'college'," he said with a grin.

Apollo scoffed, crossing his arms as he returned the grin. "Have fun at your 'uni'," he replied. "Don't let too many animals die, will you?"

"You know I won't actually be looking after any for a few years yet!" Luke laughed.

Phoenix then swept forward, pulling the two brothers (Apollo reluctantly, although he secretly enjoyed it) into a family hug that Trucy giggled as she joined. "Don't have so much fun over there you forget about us," he warned with a smile. "We'll miss having you around."

Phoenix leaned over to plant a quick kiss on Luke's forehead (both of them being exactly the right height to do so) while he ruffled Luke's hair through his hat. "Love you, Luke."

"Love you too, Papa."

The Wrights held their hug for a few moments more before Phoenix pulled back, Apollo blushing and hiding a smile as he was released from Phoenix and Trucy's grip. Even Trucy finally let go of Luke, though she grabbed his hand to keep contact with the younger of her brothers a while longer.

Layton tipped his hat, giving the Wrights, Clay, and Pearl a smile. "I suppose this is 'so long'," he said. "Until we can next visit."

"Oh, yes!" Flora cried excitedly. "I'm definitely coming back next year! I have to see that space centre after all!"

Clay grinned. "And I will be delighted to show it to you, my lady!" he announced with a grand tone, giving Flora an exaggerated bow.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Knock it off, Clay."

Flora giggled, blushing.
"Goodbye Mister Professor, Ms Flora!" Pearl called, waving. "And say goodbye to Alfendi too, when he wakes up!"

"We will," Flora promised.

"We'll see you another time then, Mister Wright," Layton continued to Phoenix.

Phoenix smiled. "I look forward to it, Professor."

With a bit of effort, Layton moved the pram containing the sleeping Alfendi around to point towards the check-in counters, looking up for the nearest screen to tell them where to go for their flight. "It's time we got moving then. The plane will leave without us if we take too long here."

Luke looked down to Trucy, still tightly clinging to his hand. "I'll text you tomorrow morning," he told her. "Promise."

Trucy bit back tears, nodding sadly.

Phoenix wheeled Luke's old suitcase to his side, leaving it for the teen to take. "We'll see you at Christmas."

Luke nodded, taking his trunk and carefully pulling his hand from Trucy's grip. After a moment, he set off towards the check-in counters with Layton and Flora, Layton pushing Alfendi's pram while Flora pulled along their travel suitcase.

Clay waved madly as the small group left. "Have fun, dude!"

"Keep in touch!" Pearl added.

"Don't be too awesome without us!" Apollo joined in with a grin.

Luke laughed as he waved over his shoulder. "Thanks!" he shouted back. "I'll see you when I get back!"

Trucy watched sadly as Luke and the Layton family disappeared into the crowd, then turned and leapt on Phoenix without a word, clinging to his middle much as she had Luke's.

Phoenix gently hugged his daughter, patting her back comfortingly. "Don't worry," he quietly told her. "He might not be home all the time, but Luke will never stop being your brother."

Trucy sniffed into his hoodie, but didn't reply.

Clay sighed as he watched the crowds. "Man... It's gonna be like old times again, then?" he asked Apollo. "Before Luke moved here?"

Apollo shrugged. "Not really," he pointed out. "We're not at school anymore, I've got a dad, brother and sister that I didn't back then..."

"Luke's still going to talk to us, though," Pearl pointed out to the pair. "We all have phones. It's just the time differences that will make it difficult."

"Yeah, I guess that's true," Clay agreed, then gave Pearl and Apollo a grin. "We'll just have to work hard to be awesome without him, huh? Make him jealous he decided to go!"

Apollo laughed, though he shook his head. "You're such a jerk, Clay."
Luke stared out the window as Los Angeles disappeared far below him. Somewhere in the seats ahead of his, the Layton family had settled in with Alfendi, who was once again drifting off to sleep for the long journey home. He was glad to have a window seat, even if it meant he couldn't sit closer to his friends. The last time I did this, I was with Papa and Mister Edgeworth, and we were only going to be gone a fortnight...’ He sighed, hugging himself as he rested his forehead against the window. I'm on my own this time, and I'll be gone much longer... Why does it feel like I'm moving away? I'll be back home for Christmas!

The images of his parents crossed Luke's mind, and he remembered the disastrous journey that was the Tritons' move to California. Maybe I should have asked Maya if I could talk to Dad before I left... We could have checked Mum was still alive while we were at it.’ He closed his eyes. I hope Mum's doing okay... I'll find you when I get back, Mum. I promise.’

There was a 'dong' sound above Luke's head, and he looked up to see the seatbelt lights had been turned off. Over the speakers came an announcement from the pilot: "Ladies and gentlemen, we have reached cruising altitude and you are now free to roam about the cabin, however please note that if you are sitting in your seats, for your safety, please keep your seatbelts on and secured. Thank you." Another 'dong' signalled the end of the announcement, and Luke heard the general chatter of the crowded plane slowly start up again.

The teen turned his head back to the window, looking out on the landscape below. I miss Mum and Dad everyday already; I guess Papa, Apollo and Trucy are just going to add to the list. Until I'm back home again, I'll just have to talk to them, and Maya and Pearl, and Clay, and all my friends at the animal shelter, as much as I can to make up for it.’ He found himself smiling at the thought of his family and friends being happy again upon his return. I have a promise to keep, after all.

Good morning! ;)

Good midday! ;D It's almost Halloween and your not here :/

I'm sorry Trucy, I can't make the time to come home, especially for a Monday evening. I was thinking of going to one of the costume parties people are throwing here though; It won't be the same without one of your amazing outfits of course! :

Polly said the same thing :/ not about the outfits tho, I'm still making some for him and Clay

Oh and I'm almost done with Polly's surprise too! ;D I'm thinking of giving it to him tonight, since I won't see him tmrw

Oooo, sounds interesting! You'll have to get a picture of it for me! :

You'll see it when you get back, silly! xD

Haha, that's true! I'll have to ask Apollo or Papa to get that picture for me, then! :

NO I AM TELLING POLLY AND DADDY YOU HAVE TO WAIT BECAUSE YOU WENT TO ENGLAND :P

Aw, if you insist! I have studying to get back to now; Break a leg on your performances today! :

Thanks Luke! ;D I'll talk to you tmrw!

How's England?

It goes. Clocks have gone back. Met some more old friends today, but Alfendi tried to kill them with a teddy bear. :

He what!? I have to hear THIS story! Was it anyone you've told us about before?

The Ascots, actually! It isn't really all that exciting a story: Angela was holding him and he starting hitting away at them with his bear! :

Oh man, I wish I coulda seen that xD

I should get back to work; Break a leg today! :

Thanks! Altho I think Truce has something in store. She's been sending me really weird texts this week. I hope she hasn't pranked my costume or something, since she's giving it to me after the matinee today

Ah, I'm not allowed to comment on that, I'm afraid! Haha, don't worry though, I know you'll love it!
Over the weeks since Luke and then Apollo had left home for their respective tertiary studies, Trucy had been rather distant to Apollo when they met up every weekend for their regular parts in the Wonder Bar's stage shows. She hadn't ever let it show on-stage, like a true professional, but in person she had a tendency to either text him or talk 'through' a handy stagehand or their boss Aderyn. She had tried doing so with Phoenix the second week of Apollo's semester, but he had pulled her aside to talk, out of Apollo's hearing, and she never did so in front of their father again. Apollo could only guess what Phoenix's exact words to her had been.

As he entered the Wonder Bar through the back door, Apollo dusted off his dull red top hat and planted it on his head, covering his carefully gelled hair spikes. Inside, standing by some steps in the corridor, he spotted Aderyn and one of the stagehands talking, and waved as he planned to dash past.

"Oh, Apollo!" Aderyn cried as she registered the young man, briefly breaking off from her discussion with the stage-hand. "Your sister wanted me to tell you: She's working on summat, so she wants you to knock before going in to your dressing room today."

Apollo stared at his boss for a few moments, surprised. "Wait, she had an actual message for me?" he replied. "Not something she wanted to say to me from two feet away?"

"I know; Surprised me, too!" Aderyn laughed in response. "Dunno what she's got for ya, though. Break a leg tonight!"

"You too!" Apollo said, giving the Welsh woman a grin as he returned to dashing down the corridor. His smile quickly turned to a worried frown once alone. 'I already picked up my and Clay's costumes from her... what else has she got in store?'

The siblings had already seen each other that day for their matinee performance, and were looking forward to doing something possibly a little grander for their Halloween Eve evening act when they next reunited that night. They had been chatting like everything was back to normal between them, and Apollo had been hoping it would stick... but not if it brought more odd behaviour like this along with it. 'I just want to be able to talk with my sister again like we used to... No surprises, no ignoring me. I just want my sister back.'

As he reached their dressing room door, Apollo almost automatically reached for the handle before remembering Trucy's 'message' and instead knocked on the doorframe. "Truce?" he called. "It's me. Can I come in?"

"Wait a sec!" Trucy called, muffled by the door between them. After a long pause, during which Apollo contemplated ignoring her instructions and just going in anyway, the doorhandle turned and was pulled open, revealing Trucy standing just inside and grinning excitedly up at Apollo. "Polly!
Come on, I have a surprise for you!"

Apollo opened his mouth to question what this 'surprise' was, but Trucy had already turned and dashed inside, towards a hook on the wall over which she appeared to have flung a blanket to hide something hanging underneath. Apollo groaned as he stepped into the room, closing the door behind him. "Trucy, what is this?"

Trucy pressed the toe of a boot into the floor, blushing in embarrassment. "Um, I was kinda thinking," she admitted hesitantly. "About your stage outfit..."

"My... stage outfit?" Apollo repeated in surprise, one hand picking at his cape. "What do you mean?"

Trucy sighed dramatically. "I mean, I made it for you years ago! It needed replacing anyway!"

Apollo sputtered. "Wait, 'replacing'?!" He gestured angrily to the covered object under the blanket. "You mean you've made me a new outfit and not even consulted me on it?!?"

"I consulted Daddy and Luke!" Trucy argued. "Daddy even made sure it was 'court-appropriate'! I wanted to surprise you!"

Apollo glared at Trucy for several seconds, before stepping back with a sigh. "Well, I guess it's stupid to pass judgement before I've even seen it." He raised an eyebrow in her direction. "You're sure this isn't some highly elaborate prank because I'm at college now?"

Trucy shook her head, a serious look on her face. "I miss you and Luke being home, but I wouldn't let that get in the way of our show," she promised, pausing to glance up at the covering beside her. "I thought you deserved something that was more uniquely yours than just an old Halloween costume of my daddy's outfit. Luke suggested the colour, and Daddy helped me with the design."

Apollo frowned, casting a glance over Trucy's well-worn cape and hat. "What about you? Your's is just Mom's, isn't it?"

Running a hand along the edge of her cape, Trucy nodded, looking to the floor. "I did think about making myself a new one too, but..." She shook her head. "I like it. I like the colour, I like the design... I like kinda looking like Mommy when I wear it."

Apollo stepped up to rest a hand on her shoulder in silent comfort.

"Plus Daddy said I wasn't allowed to pierce my ears or take the straps off my dress," she added with a small smile, looking up at her brother. "Luke thought maybe I should try out changing my colour to purple, 'cause Mommy wore blue and Daddy wore red."

Apollo snorted in laughter, looking over to the nearby wall where an old Gramarye poster had been hung; Trucy had found it a few years back, introducing both her and Apollo to a forgotten fifth member of the Troupe, outfitted in green and purple with a mask covering the right side of his face. It was kinda funny that this Mister Reus was so forgettable it had slipped Luke's mind that he'd ever seen the image that now lived in this dressing room, alongside Magnifi, Thalassa, Zak, and Valant. Grinning, Apollo turned back to Trucy. "You could look good in purple."

Trucy giggled. "But I like blue too much," she said. "Besides, purple wouldn't go with your outfit very well!" Before Apollo could react, she stepped out of his reach and pulled the blanket down off the hook, revealing her surprise underneath while accidentally entangling herself in the blanket as it fell over her head.
Apollo frowned, staring at the revealed costume while one hand helped disentangle his sister. At first glance, it looked much like his current costume, except that the dull pinkish-red of Zak Gramarye had been replaced with a much brighter crimson more befitting Apollo's tastes. As he looked closer at the cape hung limply over the coathanger that also held the rest of the new outfit, he also noticed that the purple and blue card suits that decorated the edges had gone, leaving the plain white diamonds with gold beads on the corners. The black jumpsuit underneath also seemed to have been swapped out for a more formal-looking waistcoat and tight pants, with a heart-shaped bag modelled after Trucy's in the same crimson colour of the new cape. The waistcoat was held together by the same two rows of round buttons as his current outfit, while the shirt underneath looked to be a regular dress shirt. Tucked under the collar, unknotted in any way, was a necktie the same shade of blue as Trucy's cape and hat. Trucy herself was now pulling the blanket off from over her head, so Apollo left her to it and stepped forward, lifting up the edge of the cape to peek underneath and noticing that the dress shirt had carefully had its sleeves removed, causing Apollo to smile. 'Man, if she'd talked to me about this, I could have asked her to give me sleeves so I didn't have to shave my armpits anymore!'

Folding up the blanket and dumping it on the floor, Trucy looked up at her brother with a nervous smile. "So... do you like it?"

Apollo turned to her with a grin. "It's perfect."

After a pause, Trucy squealed and jumped on Apollo to give him a hug. "I'm so glad you like it!" she cried, bouncing on the spot as she stepped back again. "I'm gonna make myself a new cape like yours over the week! Then we can match!"

Laughing, Apollo watched his sister celebrate to herself for a moment. "You're not expecting me to change into it tonight, are you?" he asked. "I don't think we have the time to swap all my props over, and it might take me a while to adjust to it."

Trucy scoffed. "Of course not! You can take it home tonight and practise in it over the week!" She grinned. "Then we can debut our new look next Saturday!"

"Yeah, I'll need to learn how to tie a tie, too," Apollo thought aloud, looking at the new costume with a smile. "It looks way better than this old thing," he added to Trucy, patting the cape pinned around his neck. "You're the best, Truce."

Trucy blushed, grinning. "Only coz I got Daddy and my two big brothers looking out for me," she said, then frowned. "Except for Daddy not letting me get earrings. Or cut the straps off my dress."

She shot another grin at Apollo. "But we can convince him sometime, can't we? You'd tell Daddy I'd look great with earrings, right?"

Apollo laughed at his sister's audacity in demanding his support. "Maybe if you stop only ever talking to me through someone else?" he suggested. "I like talking to you like this, just us two." He shrugged, watching Trucy's smile falter. "Kinda feels sometimes like my sister's love is dependant on only ever doing what she wants, and not getting to control my own life."

Trucy looked guilty, hands behind her back, and she avoided Apollo's eyes. "I'm sorry," she mumbled. "I just... I miss having you and Luke around. You're not even home for weekends anymore."

After a pause, Apollo reached out and pulled Trucy into a hug. "I miss Luke too," he said, "and I miss seeing you and Dad as often as I used to... but that's just a part of growing up. Eventually, me and Luke are going to move out into our own places, and so will you. We'll still be a family, and we'll still make time to see each other as often as we can." He smiled. "After all, Luke still texts you..."
Trucy sadly smiled, clinging to Apollo. "Every morning," she whispered. "Sometimes he does it when he's in class. It's the middle of the day for him, y'know."

Apollo laughed. "Well, there you go!" he said. "You're never getting rid of us, Trucy Artemis Wright, no matter how hard you try!"

After a moment, Trucy giggled, hugging Apollo tighter in silent thanks.

"Now let's get everything ready for our show," Apollo said. "We've got an audience to please!"

Together Again

Good morning! :

Are you coming home yet? >(

You're not even saying hello anymore? :

You said you turned in all your stuff so why aren't you coming home!?!?

Assignments, and I AM coming home, just not today. I have to finish packing by tonight, and I'm leaving tomorrow morning for my flight.

You ARE coming home!?!?!? FINALLY! So I'll see you tomorrow? :D

Looks like it. :) I'll be on a plane this time tomorrow, so don't expect to hear from me again until you get home from school. You haven't finished term yet, have you?

Nope, still got another week. I can't wait to see you!!!! :DDD Do you think Daddy would let me skip tomorrow?

Don't skip school, Trucy. I'll see you when you get home, I promise. :)

Aw ok :(

Lemme guess, you told Truce you were coming home tomorrow

Why, what's she doing?

Bouncing all over the apartment shrieking about how she can't wait

Oh... she must be excited, I guess!

Dad's planning how we're going to meet you at the airport. Trucy won't stop begging to skip school. Should I invite Clay?

I've told Trucy to be patient and go to school instead of meeting me! Go ahead and tell Clay to come if he's available. You guys finished a week ago, right?

Yeah we've been done a while now. We actually got really used to being roommates too. Clay never does anything by halves

I can believe that! I'll see you at the airport!

Seeya then :)
Luke took a sip of the cool glass of water in his hands, hoping the cold would keep him awake for a few more hours. He stood in the kitchen, leaning against the counter by the fridge, assuming that staying upright would also help him keep from nodding off.

"You must be glad to be back where it's warmer!" Apollo joked, standing nearby as he idly spun his new hat in his hands. "I mean, it's winter and all, but it's way warmer here than in England!"

Luke giggled. "I grew up with England's temperatures; I prefer the cold!"

Apollo scoffed. "Preferring the cold? Crazy talk!" He laughed. "I mean, I love the snow and all, but it's way too cold to actually enjoy when it comes around, y'know?"

Luke resisted a smile, shaking his head. "No, I don't know."

Apollo opened his mouth to give a confused reply, then noticed his brother was joking and shook his head with an amused sigh, Luke giggling to himself. "I still think warmer weather is better," the elder brother argued. "You don't have to hide under several uncomfortable layers of clothing, your fingers and face don't freeze off because you can't cover them... Not to mention, you could wear ten layers on cold days and still feel cold."

"I see your point," Luke replied, deciding not to point out that they had had this discussion multiple times over the years and it was clear neither would ever be swayed from their opinion. "I disagree with your thoughts on layers being uncomfortable and not working, but I see why you prefer warmth."

Apollo opened his mouth to reply, only to again pause as he heard their home's front door banging open. "Heads up," he muttered, turning to the office door. "Trucy's home."

Luke grinned, pushing off the counter as he turned to carefully place down his glass of water. He had a feeling there was a tackle-hug in his near future.

The pair heard another door's banging through the wall before the nearby door from the office violently swung open, an eleven-year-old girl eagerly looking around the room from the doorway before her eyes locked on Luke and Apollo in the kitchen. Her face broke into a wide, excited grin, and she ran towards Luke at full speed, latching around his middle in a tight hug.

"LUUUUUUUUUUKE!" she shouted. "I MISSED YOU I MISSED YOU I MISSED YOU I MISSED YOU!"

Luke laughed as he hugged Trucy back. "I missed you too!" He petted the top of her bare head, buried into his jumper. "But you were fine while I was away, weren't you? Just like we said you'd be!"

Trucy didn't reply, rubbing her face into Luke's chest a few more moments before looking up at him with wide eyes. "But you weren't here!" she cried. "And you'll be going away again after New Years!"

Apollo sighed, slapping his face with a hand as he walked off.

"I just got home a few hours ago, and you're already thinking of when I next leave?" Luke pointed out with a smile. "We've got three weeks together to look forward to!"

Trucy looked unconvinced, biting her lip as she hugged Luke tighter.

Phoenix panted as he finally made his way into the kitchen, pulling off his beanie with one hand. "Geeze Truce, did you have to run all the way home from the bus-stop!?" he cried with exasperation. "Luke wasn't going anywhere!"

Trucy didn't reply, clinging to Luke as Phoenix trudged across the kitchen to get himself a drink of water. Apollo watched with a smirk, but decided not to comment.

"Oh, I just remembered!" Luke said, breaking the silence and giving Trucy a wide grin. "You did a great job with Apollo's new look! The brighter colour works really well on him!"

"I know, right!?" Trucy enthusiastically replied, finally pulling away from Luke to run to Apollo's side and pulling him over closer to their brother. "See, he's got this waistcoat and tie underneath that looks all lawyerly, so he can wear it in court," she explained, pulling aside Apollo's cape and ignoring his annoyed looks, "and I made him a new bag that looks like mine, and I updated our capes so we don't have the card suits on the ends anymore!"

Apollo shoved his hat on his head, deciding to let Trucy do what she wanted. "I just already showed it to him," he muttered.

Luke laughed. "I know you worked really hard on it, but it looks like it was a breeze for you to do!" he complimented her. "Like I was telling Apollo, I've got to drop in on your next show to see it in action!"

Trucy giggled, bouncing on her heels with a proud grin. "He's got new gloves, too!" she added.

"Oh yeah, so I can wear my bracelet on stage now," Apollo agreed with a grin, tapping at his left wrist where it sat. "Best part about the new outfit by far!"

As the kids laughed, Phoenix downed his glass of water and turned to them with an exhausted smile. "You'll be heading up to Kurain tomorrow, right?" he asked Luke. "Maya will be excited to see you back."

"Yeah!" Trucy cried. "And Pearly's coming by this afternoon, too!"

Luke nodded. "Yup, I'm planning to visit everyone while I'm here," he assured them, then began to count off on his fingers. "Clay met me at the airport, Pearl's dropping by today, I'll go and see Maya tomorrow... Then I also want to visit the animal shelter I was working at, ask Mister Edgeworth or Uncle Larry if they want to see me while I'm in the country, and Clay might drag me to the Space Centre at some point before I have to go back to London again."

Trucy's face fell at the mention of London. "You can't stay here? They'd let you do classes online, wouldn't they?"

Luke gave her a sympathetic frown. "I'm sorry, Trucy. They probably would, but practical classes aren't the same if you're not physically there."

Trucy just looked away.

"Not to mention, London is where I grew up," Luke continued. "I like going back there and seeing old friends. Even though I miss you guys an awful lot, but..." He shrugged, looking around at his family. "I've accepted you guys will never want to live there, and I think, even once I am old enough to live alone, I'd hate to move back there on my own."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "Really?" he asked. "Not even for a year or two?"

Apollo reached under his hat to scratch at his head. "You really think you won't change your mind? You're, like, seventeen. That's still pretty young."

"I could say the same about eighteen," Phoenix pointed out with a grin.

Apollo gave his father a glare.

"I'm sure," Luke said in answer to the question, giggling. "Why, are you thinking of changing your mind about staying in LA, Apollo?"

Apollo rolled his eyes, then was forced to recoil as Trucy whacked him with the back of a hand. "Ow, hey!"

"Don't you dare move away!" the girl accused him, then ran to Luke, staring at him with big eyes. "You really promise not to stay in London forever?"

"I'll always come back," Luke promised, and was immediately greeted by another hug from his sister. After a pause, Luke looked up at Phoenix with a grin. "Hey, while I'm visiting Maya, do you think she'd mind channelling my dad for me again? He'd love to hear what's been going on at Gressenheller since we left!"

Phoenix chuckled, a hand on his hip. "I'm sure she'd love to," he assured his son.

Apollo sighed at Trucy. "Geeze, you didn't overreact this much when I came home at the end of term," he mumbled, then gave Luke a smile. "I am glad you're back, though."

Before Luke could reply, Trucy had jumped back with a gasp, turning to Phoenix. "Wait, Daddy, I forgot it's your birthday today!"

"Oh yeah, the big three-oh!" Apollo added with a grin. "How do you feel about being so old, Dad?"

Phoenix gave Apollo a half-lidded stare. "Very funny," he deadpanned, then looked over to Trucy with a smile. "Honestly, just Luke coming home was a good enough gift for me."

Trucy shook her head stubbornly. "Nuh-uh!" she cried, then grabbed Phoenix's hand and began to drag him into the office. "We can't let something like Daddy's thirtieth birthday go past without doing something to celebrate!"

Apollo and Luke shared amused looks as Phoenix reluctantly let himself be pulled away into the next room. "You weren't hoping distracting her with you coming home was going to make us forget, were you?" Apollo asked.

Luke shrugged. "It's was Papa's idea," he replied, then headed into the office with a laugh. "I knew it wasn't going to work! "I am glad to be home, though. Even if it is only for a little while!"

- END OF 2022 -
View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
Phoenix hated doing finances. It was a necessary evil, but he hated it all the same. It didn't help that, with Luke away in England for most of the year and both Phoenix's sons now attending their respective universities, there was less money than usual going in (although not much of a difference in how much they were spending, considering it was only Phoenix and Trucy at home most of the time). Luke had returned to London early the previous Sunday, to Trucy's mild annoyance, but Apollo still had another week before he was again out of the apartment. With Trucy at school, he was apparently using today to read through the rest of Mia's old case-files, having grabbed a bunch from the very back of her drawer and wandered off to his desk in reception to read them.

Phoenix sighed as he leaned forward on his desk, rubbing his temples as he took a brief break from his work. 'I wouldn't even mind this so much if it didn't give me such a headache! I studied art, not math!' Huffing in irritation, he forced himself to return to his computer. 'But, I gotta get this done. Complaining won't do the work for me.'

The door to reception opened and Phoenix looked up to see Apollo stood in the doorway, looking vaguely confused. One hand still rested on the door where he had pushed it open while the other held a folder full of paper and related files, which Apollo kept glancing at as he contemplated stepping into the office.

Phoenix smiled. "Got a question about an old case?" he asked, leaning back in his chair and crossing his arms smugly. "I hope you read all the files you took in there with you, first."

Apollo looked up at his father with a frown, then finally stepped forward into the room, heading to Phoenix's desk. "You knew exactly which case I was gonna get to today, didn't you?" he asked accusingly. "Seriously, if I'd known I'd find this, I'd've got around to finishing Mia's files years ago."

Phoenix just smirked. "What, and spoil the surprise of you finding it yourself?"

Glaring at his father, Apollo reached the desk and slammed the folder on a section that was, for once, clear of anything else. "You met your mentor because she defended you when you were accused of murder," he said. "How was that not important enough to mention!?"

"Because that was years before she died?" Phoenix replied with a shrug, his grin fading. "It's not like it was the only time I've been accused of murder."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What, is it not the first time you had a girlfriend dump you through killing someone?"

Phoenix frowned, and Apollo seemed to recognise he'd stepped over a line and looked away guiltily. "Think less of me if you want," Phoenix said, "but 'Dollie' was my first serious girlfriend. For eight months, she was the sweetest, kindest person I'd ever met." He stared at the abandoned case-file on his desk, eyebrows furrowed. "And it took five years for the full truth of that trial to even begin to come out, anyway."
Apollo looked curiously at the folder. "What do you mean?" he asked. "I've read the other file, and it looked like Mia took you on specifically to save you from this Hawthorne person."

"I didn't mean that," Phoenix replied with a smile, looking up at Apollo. "I know it's not the same as being there, but you surely picked up from the transcripts that Dahlia was a less-than-sweet, not-at-all-kind kind of person, right?"

Reluctant to admit he hadn't wanted to judge, Apollo just shrugged.

"That's because I was right when I said the Dahlia who attended the trial wasn't my 'Dollie'," Phoenix explained, a nostalgic smile on his face. "I never really knew Dahlia at all. Only met her twice before she died!"

"Huh?" Apollo muttered, confused. "What do you...?"

"I guess it's been a while since you read that file," Phoenix added with a grin, spinning his chair towards the drawers behind him to pull out the one containing all his old case-files, grabbing the one right at the front. He held it out for Apollo. "Maybe you should refresh your memory. This was one of the ones you saw in person, wasn't it?"

Apollo nodded, recognising the date and police code on the label (February 2019, Phoenix's second-last trial) as he took the offered folder. "It's connected to the other case?" he asked, frowning. "Is... is that why I could never understand what was going on towards the end...?"

Phoenix laughed, irritating Apollo, and leaned back in his seat, arms crossed. "Well, since you first watched it happen, you've met Edgeworth, Maya, and Pearls, learned all about spirit channelling, Mia, and now Dahlia and something about Diego Armando if you were paying attention... I don't see why you wouldn't understand it better on a second glance!"

Apollo sighed, deciding not to point out he'd read it last only a year or two ago, long after being introduced to the Feys, Edgeworth or spirit channelling. As he thought back on the case-file in his hands, he remembered specifically the parts he had always found confusing. "Wait, if Hawthorne was executed... was she the one Maya was channelling? Pearly's... cousin?"

"Half-sister," Phoenix corrected with a smile. "And don't expect me to tell you anything else; Re-read the file first!" He waved at the folder in Apollo's hands, restraining a laugh.

"Yeah, yeah, I will," Apollo muttered, rolling his eyes. He shoved the file under an arm, deciding to put his questions about it aside for later. "I did have a serious question though: How'd you go from an art student, albeit one studying law, to Mia's junior partner?"

Phoenix didn't reply immediately, looking off to the windows at his side as he thought.

Apollo flipped open the case-file still sitting on the desk, running his eyes down a random page of the trial transcript. "Reading this, it's hard to imagine most of these words being said by you... And how did you manage to eat a necklace!?!"

At that, Phoenix couldn't resist giving his son a smirk. "With a lot of difficulty," he remarked. "It was very crunchy, as I recall."

"Wasn't it made of glass?" Apollo asked, an eyebrow raised.

"Plastic," Phoenix assured him with a grin. "Didn't make it easier to swallow. Didn't make it easier on the way out, either."
Apollo grimaced, shaking his head. "Gross..."

"You asked," Phoenix pointed out with an amused shrug. Leaning forward in his chair, he rested his elbows on the desk and stared at the open case-file Apollo was still leafing through, hands at his mouth. "As for your other questions... it was a long time ago. People can change a lot in... how long has it been? Almost nine years now?" He shook his head in astonishment. "Wow, it has been a long time..."

As the ensuing silence stretched on, Apollo mused to himself, looking through Mia's physical records of the old case. 'Given what happened, I shouldn't be surprised Dad has a lot of painful memories of this trial...’ Out loud, he decided to change the subject. "I've never really thought about it before, but I guess you didn't always want to be a lawyer, huh? Why'd you make the switch from art?"

Phoenix didn't reply immediately, slowly smiling as he continued to stare into the distance. "That's a long story," he said. "Let's just say... your uncle Edgeworth convinced me initially, but it was my experience in court with Mia that gave me the push to really put my heart into pursuing it." He closed his eyes, chuckling to himself. "I still would have eventually become a lawyer without Mia, but who knows if I would have accomplished my goal that way."

Apollo frowned, giving his father a curious look. "Goal?" he asked. "What goal?"

Phoenix only continued to sit and smile, events of years long past running through his mind. "It's a long story," he repeated, then opened his eyes to glance meaningfully at the folder under Apollo's arm. "Now run along. You have a case-file to read."

Shooting Phoenix a glare, Apollo decided to ask again later. Sighing, he turned and walked back to his desk in the next room. As he reached the doorway, he paused, one hand on the frame, and turned back to his father. "By the way, once I'm done with these case-files... Maybe you could finally let me look at the one for the Gramarye case? The one you've hidden away somewhere?"

Phoenix blinked in surprise. "Uh..."

Ignoring his father's blank response, Apollo left the room without another word.

---

So I think I've just discovered why its always Dad doing the design for our pamphlets and advertising.

Because he's the oldest of the four of us and has the most practise drawing?

Nope, because he studied art in college.

Wait, what? When did Papa study ART? He graduated as a lawyer, didn't he!?

It was a surprise for me too. I finally finished reading Mia's old casefiles, and it turns out she only met Dad because she defended him when he was an art student.

But why was Papa studying ART!? He's always been so passionate about being a defence attorney! Even WITHOUT his badge!

Search me. I asked him but he didn’t tell me.
Well I sort of asked him.

Actually it was more a question about why he switched to being a lawyer. He just said it was a long story.

Now I think about it, wasn't Grandma a comic artist before she retired? Maybe Papa was following in her footsteps before discovering his passion?

That's a good point. I'll ask him once I've finished rereading this other casefile he dumped on me.

Oh yeah isn't it the middle of the night for you rn?

Just gone one in the morning. I couldn't sleep though - still adjusting to the timezone.

Well you won't get any sleep talking to me! Go to bed you dingbat! :P.

Alright, alright, I'm going! Talk to you tomorrow! :)

GO TO BED.
April 6, 8:33PM
Wright Talent Agency
Bathroom

The room was echoey, and rather loud when the shower was running, and opening your mouth under the stream of water was likely to get you a mouthful of soap if you weren't careful, but none of that stopped Trucy from singing as she cleaned herself up every night.

"Throw your doubt away and come fly with me!" the eleven-year-old chirped to herself, dancing a little as she rubbed the soap all over her body. "For a day, believe you live in a dream! Let magic take your breath away, let me show you anything's possible!"

Tonight, Trucy was feeling especially cheery, as both her brothers were currently home from their respective places of study. Apollo would be leaving again at the end of the week, but Luke would be sticking around a little longer before ultimately leaving again, and, although Trucy was still in school herself, she was making the most of having them both around.

"Breathe in, close your eyes and you'll see what you've been missing," she sang into the soap bottle, bouncing only a little so she didn't slip and fall in the enclosed space. "Make a wish and maybe you'll be lucky! Make a wish and maybe you'll-!"

Suddenly the bathroom was plunged into darkness.

Shrieking in shock, Trucy dropped her soap bottle and jumped out of the shower, having only enough foresight to grab her towel and wrap it around her wet, soapy body before throwing open the door. Still screaming, she ran into the hallway and promptly collided with her eldest brother's arm, clinging too tightly to her towel to grab onto him as she would have preferred.

"Geeze, quiet down, Truce!" Apollo cried as he grabbed his sister before she could run off down the darkened corridor. "It's just a blackout!"

"I was in the shower!" Trucy loudly complained, pulling her towel tighter and gesturing to the shower cap covering her hair. "It's really dark in there!"

Apollo looked past Trucy into the room beyond, and, although he couldn't see much in the deep shadows, he noticed he could still hear the running water within. "Wait, you haven't turned off the shower!?

"It's dark in there!" Trucy angrily cried in response.

A light shone from the direction of the stairs, and the siblings looked over to listen to the footsteps of Phoenix and Luke as they came up from the kitchen below. "Are you two alright?" Phoenix asked, pointing the torch in his hands at the floor so the family of four could all see each other in the dark.

"We heard a scream!" Luke added with a concerned frown.
Apollo sighed, gesturing to the bathroom. "Trucy was in the shower," he said.

"The lights suddenly turned off!" Trucy almost shouted in explanation. "It's really dark in the bathroom!"

Phoenix suddenly noticed that Trucy was clad in nothing more than her towel. "Truce, did you run straight out here?"

"And left the shower on," Apollo muttered, crossing his arms as he shot his sister a glare.

"Of course I did!" Trucy cried in a vaguely hysterical tone, hugging herself under her towel. "It suddenly went dark! What was I supposed to do!?"

"Turn everything off first?" Apollo muttered.

Luke shot Apollo a disapproving frown. "Leave her alone, Apollo!"

Phoenix gave Trucy a sympathetic smile as he realised how freaked out she had been by the unexpected darkness. "It's alright, Trucy," he promised her, resting a hand on her wet shoulder. "It's just a blackout. We can give you a flashlight if you want to finish your shower."

Trucy firmly shook her head. "Not until the lights come back!" she insisted.

"Are you sure?" Luke asked. "We can get my torch for you; It turns into a lantern!"

"No!" Trucy cried, shaking her head again. "I'm not going back in there until we have lights back!"

Phoenix sighed, pinching at the bridge of his nose. Given how long the power had been gone, they were unlikely to see it back for a while, and Trucy couldn't stand around as she was for that long. He looked over to Apollo. "Apollo, could you go turn off the shower and fetch your sister's school uniform from the bathroom, please?"

Apollo rolled his eyes, but nodded in agreement, stepping into the darkened bathroom without a second thought, confident he could find his way around without a source of light.

"Truce," Phoenix continued to his daughter, "why don't we take you to your room, and you can dry off and get dressed, huh?"

Trucy thought a moment, listening to the squeaking sounds of the shower tap being spun and the water slowing to a trickle. Although still uncertain about letting herself be alone in the dark, she gave her father a small nod.

As Phoenix gently walked Trucy down the hallway, he called to Luke over his shoulder, "Would you get your flashlight for her, Luke?"

"Of course!" Luke replied, and he dashed off to dig around in his room for his torch.

A few minutes later, Phoenix had gathered the small family in the office, sat on the open carpet around Luke's torch. Luke had suggested they turn the dark night into a 'camp out' of sorts, so his torch was acting as a campfire while some spare blankets were pretending to be sleeping bags. Although Phoenix had hoped the location of the office would provide Trucy some comfort from outside streetlights, they also appeared to be dead, so he suspected their wait for the power to return was going to be a long one.

The presence of her family and the view of the stars through the large windows of the office helped Trucy settle down after her earlier scare, although she still stuck close to whichever member of her family was in nearest reach. At the moment, it was Luke, and she sat at his side, clinging to his arm, as Apollo and Phoenix returned from ensuring all the lights elsewhere in the apartment were off should the power suddenly return. "What are we going to do?" she asked, quietly. "Until the lights come back?"

Apollo grinned, pointing his torch up at his face as he crouched down on one of the blankets. "Tell ghost stories!" he cried.

When Trucy hid her face in Luke's arm in response, Phoenix shot Apollo a glare. "We're not doing that," he said, ignoring Apollo's subsequent sigh of disappointment. He also lowered himself to the carpet, giving Luke a smile. "Stories are a good idea, though. Maybe we could give Luke a break from the same seven stories he's always telling you, Trucy?"

Luke blushed in embarrassment, although Trucy managed to giggle. "What story, then?" she asked, eyes wide with curiosity.

"How about a story about Mia?" Apollo asked, turning to Phoenix with a grin. "You must have something about her!"

"Yeah, Auntie Mia!" Trucy agreed.

Phoenix laughed, rubbing at the back of his head. "I, uh... don't think I have any stories about Mia, actually..."

Apollo smirked. "Are you kidding, Dad? I've read the case-files; You had some interesting stuff before she died!" He snorted, hiding a grin behind a hand. "Not to mention the story of how you met!"

Phoenix shot Apollo a death glare.

Luke frowned in thought. "There's a story behind that?"

"Not a very interesting one," Phoenix insisted, sighing. "Honestly, I'd suggest the time Mia died and Maya and I met, but I expect you've already heard all about that one from Living Lie Detector over here." He jerked his head in Apollo's direction with a raised eyebrow, the teen rolling his eyes with a scoff in response.

Trucy thought a moment. "What about after that? Like, Luke went on loads of adventures with Uncle Professor. Didn't you have adventures with Mommy?"

Phoenix laughed. "None as impressive as Luke's, but I suppose a lot of my cases could count as 'adventures' in a certain light."

Apollo grinned, nodding enthusiastically. "How about the Steel Samurai one?" he suggested. "I could get the case-file for you to help!"

Although surprised, Phoenix nodded, watching as Apollo immediately jumped to his feet, torch in hand, and dashed off eagerly to the hidden drawers behind Phoenix's desk.

"The 'Steel Samurai one'?" Luke repeated, confused. "What's that one about?"

Luke was taken aback by the accusation, unused to not being the storyteller for once. "Um, sorry."

Phoenix laughed. "It was my third case, the first trial conducted by Wright & Co Law Offices and the first one I investigated with Maya’s help."

Trucy's eyes lit up, but before she could talk, Apollo returned with a case-file in hand, which he handed to Phoenix with a grin as he sat back down in the rough circle. "Found it!" he announced.

"Ah, yes, thank you," Phoenix said, taking the folder with a smile and leafing through it. "Now I'll have some props to jog my memory."

Trucy squealed, throwing herself to the floor to eagerly look up at Phoenix, her head propped up against the floor by her elbows. "Where does it start, Daddy!?"

"You'll have to bear with me; I'm not as good at this as Luke," Phoenix said, throwing a grin to Luke, who shrugged good-naturedly in return. "I guess you could say... the story started here, in this room. It had been a few months since Mia died, and, despite the publicity, we weren't getting any calls for cases..."

Chapter End Notes

Trucy's song taken from the lyrics written for her theme, 'Child of Magic', by Adriana "adrisaurus" Figueroa.

Also, I've finished Azran Legacy now, so potential spoilers for that from this point on.
"It's always so bright and sunny here!" Flora said as she left the airport with the Wrights and Clay, pulling her travel suitcase behind her. "No wonder you never want to leave, Luke!"

"There's other reasons I want to stay besides the weather," Luke pointed out, sending a brief smile to Trucy clinging happily to his side.

Phoenix quietly chuckled to himself, then looked to Flora. "Where are you staying this time? Back at the Gatewater?"

Flora shook her head. "I thought I'd try somewhere different!" she explained cheerfully. "There's a little bed-and-breakfast a few streets down from you that I thought looked cute."

"Ooh, I can take you there!" Clay chimed in with a grin. "The Wrights were planning to take public transport home anyway, so-"

"No way," Apollo interrupted, shooting his friend a glare. "Give you several minutes alone to outrageously flirt with our guest? Why should we do that!?"

Flora blushed. "I don't mind," she insisted.

"I thought you came to take their luggage for them, anyway," Phoenix chimed in, scratching the back of his head. "We only agreed to take the bus home because there isn't room for all of us in your car."

"We can compromise!" Luke suggested. "Clay can take Flora to check in and drop off her luggage before they meet us back home, and Apollo can go with them!" He looked to Trucy at his side. "I suppose you would want to stay with me and Papa, huh?"

Trucy grinned, nodding firmly.

Clay shot Apollo a smirk, and Apollo sighed. "Sure," he agreed.

"Fine with me!" Clay added, turning to Flora and gripping his visor as he leaned forward in a small bow. "Shall I take your bag on the way to the car, milady?"

Flora giggled. "Oh no, I'm fine taking it myself kind sir, thank you!" she insisted.

Apollo groaned as he rested his face in the palm of one hand.

Luke laughed, sharing a smile with Trucy. "I'm glad to be home," he said. "One year down, two to go!"

"Oh right, that's your first year of study over!" Phoenix realised. "How's it feel?"
"Pretty good, I guess!" Luke replied with a shrug and a grin. "I'm actually interested to see how much smaller my classes get as we go on. We've already lost quite a few people as we have more to learn."

"Huh, really?" Apollo asked, crossing his arms. "I haven't noticed anyone dropping out of my law course yet."

Clay nodded. "Same with my engineering classes," he added. "Although it is hard to tell, since we still share a bunch with other degrees."

"Oh!" Trucy suddenly cried, bouncing away from a surprised Luke to run to Flora's side. "Flora! Didn't you say last time you were here that you were gonna get a job as a cook?"

Although astonished at the reminder of how long ago her last visit was, Flora smiled and nodded. "Yes, and I managed to find one, too!"

"Ooo, congratulations!" Trucy chirped.

Flora giggled. "Thank you. It was a lucky break too; My manager agreed to take me in and train me even though I don't have any kind of formal education or training."

"The Professor vouched for her," Luke filled in. "We actually went there one night, too!" He winced. "It's just too bad Alfendi threw a tantrum and we couldn't enjoy it much."

"You'll just have to come another time, then!" Flora insisted with a smile.

Trucy grinned. "And can we go if we're ever in London?"

"Of course!" Flora replied.

Phoenix laughed. "In the meantime," he said, "why don't we look forward to your performance tonight, huh?"

"Right, almost forgot about that," Apollo muttered.

"It's gonna be so cool!" Trucy cried to Flora, then ran back to Luke and grabbed his hand. "You're coming too, aren't you?"

"Of course I am!" Luke laughed. "I always miss seeing your show when I'm away!"

"Yay!" Trucy cheered.

Wonder Bar
Restaurant

Up on stage, Trucy exaggeratedly frowned as she looked around their small 'set', peering under the nearest table and a chair before glaring at Apollo, fists on her hips. "Apollo, where did you hide the magic hat?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Me? Are you sure you didn't make it invisible and misplace it again, Artemis?"
Trucy huffed, giving him a haughty look. "Well, we can't do our next trick without it!"

"What, summoning doves again?" Apollo asked with a small smile. "You have to stop doing that, anyway. We're out of space to keep them."

A ripple of laughter spread through the audience. At a table in the front row, Luke glanced over to Flora, sat on his right, happy to see she was enjoying the show as much as he'd hoped she would. On his left was Phoenix, watching the stage proudly, while Clay was on Flora's other side, rolling his eyes at the antics on stage although he was smiling at the chance to watch.

Trucy grinned as she 'spotted' the missing hat behind a box, lifting it up into the audience's view. It was similar in design to her's and Apollo's, but this top hat was black with a red band: the same hat Luke had used for his Halloween costume a few years previous, and that Phoenix had used the year before that (when it had a white band instead of crimson). "Ha!" Trucy cried, waving it smugly in Apollo's direction. "Your attempts to hide the magic hat have failed once again!"

Apollo scoffed as Trucy placed the hat upside-down on the table. "Let's not summon any more animals. Our rabbit hutch is full to bursting after you insisted on pulling just the two from that hat."

"Fluffy needed a friend!" Trucy cried. "How was I to know he was a she!?"

Raising a hand to quiet his sister's arguments as the audience tittered in amusement, Apollo stepped forward and looked out over the crowd with a smile. "Looks like we're gonna need a victim for this trick anyway."

"Volunteer!" Trucy corrected in a stage-whisper, running to his side.

"Yes, 'volunteer', I meant 'volunteer'," Apollo continued, his smile unchanging as the audience laughed at the reappearance of the running gag. He peered out over the crowd for a few moments before grinning. "Ah, and I think I see someone in the front row!"

Luke resisted a smile, casting a glance to the unsuspecting Flora on his right. He noticed Clay similarly shooting her a glance, hiding snickers of amusement.

While Trucy waited on stage with a massive grin, Apollo jumped down into the audience, pulling a microphone from seemingly thin air as he bounded across to the Wrights' table, promptly holding the microphone out towards a surprised Flora with a smile. "Hello there, young lady! May I ask your name?"

Flora looked around at Clay, Luke and Phoenix for a moment, then, seeing them only smiling encouragingly, turned to Apollo with a tentative smile of her own, leaning slightly towards the microphone. "Um, Flora," she mumbled.

"Good evening, Flora!" Apollo chirped in response, and waved for her to get up. "Come on up on stage!"

Flora hesitated for a moment, but, seeing Luke and Clay also waving for her to go, slowly got to her feet. As she walked around Clay, Apollo offered her his free hand, which she gingerly took as she allowed herself to be led to the stairs and up on stage. The audience clapped as she entered the stage lights, nervously following Apollo as he brought her to centre stage, where Trucy stood waiting with a great deal of unfamiliar eyes staring directly at her from the dark open space beyond.

Just as Flora was beginning to think of running, Trucy reached out and grabbed Flora's hand to shake enthusiastically. "Hello there, Flora!" she cried, giving the young woman a wink with the eye hidden from the audience. "What brings you here tonight? Visiting a friend?"

Flora thought a moment before nodding.

"Ah, I see, I see!" Trucy continued. "My prediction was correct!" She then paused to think, imitating Apollo as she pressed a gloved finger to her forehead. "I sense you've come a great distance to be here tonight! London, England, I believe?" She opened an eye to look up at Flora with a smile, and, once Flora had given her a small nod in response, tipped her hat pridefully. "Ah, of course! You must be a big fan to have come all this way just to see Apollo and Artemis Gramarye perform!"

Flora had almost opened her mouth to speak when she heard Apollo scoff, and turned to see him giving Trucy a smirk. "Now now, we both know you only know that because we picked her up from the airport today personally."

Trucy didn't react for a few moments, waiting for the resulting peal of laughter from the audience to die down. Flora suspected they had called on her specifically for that joke. "Well, ruin a good trick if you insist!" the girl continued with a shrug, still brightly smiling. "Let's get on with the other one, then!" Subject appropriately changed, she whirled around with a flash of her cape to continue the show.

Flora looked around the tall room with a gasp, a wide smile of amazement on her face. "I've never seen a real space rocket this close up before!"

Clay grinned, crossing his arms smugly. "Cool, huh?"

That morning, Clay had met the Wrights at their apartment with his car, and he, Luke and Apollo had picked up Flora together before heading on to the Cosmos Space Center. At Luke's suggestion, once they arrived, Clay first took Flora to the previously-named Launch Pad Two, now better known as the Space Museum. A few other tourists were milling about the room, admiring one of the many displays set up to either decorate the large vertical space or to inform readers of space-travel and the history of the Space Center's ill-fated attempt to send a human to the moon.

"Technically, that's not a real one, though," Apollo chimed in with a wave of his hand. "It's just a replica."

Clay scoffed. "Replica inside and out!" he shot back. "If they wanted to, it could go into space today!"

Luke smiled brightly. "Oh, they finished it?"

"Yep!" Clay replied, shooting Luke a thumbs-up. "Mister Starbuck even said it gave 'im flashbacks to the original HAT-1 rocket! It's completely identical!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Flashbacks...?" he quietly repeated.

"We were here at the opening, a few years back!" Luke boasted to Flora. "A lot of this was still in-progress then."

Flora giggled. "I remember you writing to me about it!" she said, looking around at the displays. "Are these about the HAT-1 Miracle?" she asked. "I watched the astronaut landing safely from that!"

"So did we!" Clay replied, bounding over to show Flora the display specifically focussed on the infamous accident. "See, here's a photo from the day before lift-off!"

As Flora followed him to see, he tapped his finger firmly at the side of the photo featuring him. "I got to come 'round that day, so they let me be in it with Mister Starbuck!"

Flora gasped as she looked over the picture, and excitedly pointed at the other side of the photo, where Ponco stood, covered in bandages. "Is that one of the robots!?"

Luke laughed as he nodded, catching up to the pair. "Yeah, that's Ponco!" he explained. "Clonco looks mostly the same, but green!"

Clay frowned as his presence in the photo was brushed off, but carried on regardless through his pouting. "Oh, yeah, one of 'em should be around here somewhere. There's always one not far from the museum." He turned around, saying, "Isn't that right, Apollo?" but only to pause as he realised Apollo had disappeared. "Huh? Where'd he go?"

"He's your brother," Clay cried, stepping away from the display as he looked around. "You should keep an eye on him!"

Luke raised an eyebrow, watching Clay search for the missing Wright. "You're his roommate," he replied. "Besides, Apollo's nineteen; He can take care of himself."

Clay huffed, and Flora wrung her hands in concern, watching Clay stalk off towards the entrance to the converted hangar. "Will he be okay?" she asked Luke.

Boarding Lounge 2

Beyond the corridor back into the main building, Luke and Flora were surprised to find the boarding lounge much less empty than they were expecting. Sat on one of the chairs by the tables was Apollo, watching the nearby green robot as it sat dormant, the back of its head open to expose its innards. Kneeling at the short robot's side, hands deep in its inner workings, was a woman around Clay's height, dressed in bright pink tights under a short lab-coat and large black gloves. Clay himself, standing behind her as he watched the woman's work over her shoulder, looked up with a smile and waved as he spotted Luke and Flora's entrance. "Hey guys! We found Clonco!"

"So I can see," Luke commented, nudging Flora out of her excited staring at the robot to lead her over to their friends. "Is something wrong with him?"

"What do you think?" the woman in the coat spat, adjusting her wrap-around safety glasses with a quick glare in Luke's direction. "This pile of scrap metal shuts down for no reason and everything's hunky-dory? Of course something's wrong with him!"

Flora blinked in surprise at the woman's harsh tone, then frowned. Before she could speak up, Apollo was talking.

"I came out here earlier and found Clonco deactivated," Apollo explained, "so I called for someone to take care of him."

"Oh, yeah, I should do introductions or something," Clay laughed, bounding over between Luke and Flora to slap his hands on their shoulders with a grin. "Guys, this is Ms Blackquill! She's the resident robotics expert around here!"

Luke thought a moment. "I thought there was more than one...? Robotics experts, I mean."

"Your information's out of date," Blackquill replied, seeming to finish her adjustments as she got to her feet, slapping the panel on the back of Clonco's head closed. She looked Luke over with an intense stare. "I know you. Luke, right?"
Although surprised, Luke nodded.

"I've seen you three boys around a lot," Blackquill explained, casting glances between Luke, Clay and Apollo. "Practically members of staff, in a way." As Clay grinned proudly, she then raised an arm and karate chopped the top of Clonco's head, which bounced around as though the robot's neck was a spring before coming to rest, the black screen that acted as the robot's face flickering as it came to life.

Flora gasped, a hand flying to her mouth. "Careful!" she cried.

Blackquill raised an eyebrow, almost smirking in Flora's direction. "And who's this?" she asked. "One of you boys' girlfriends?"

Clonco's face lit up with a green smile. "H-h-hello. M-my naaaame is Clonco."

Disregarding Flora for now, Blackquill gave Clonco a glare and karate chopped the robot a second time, its screen turning yellow with shock. "Pipe down, Hunk of Junk! I got more work to do on you first!"

Apollo and Luke shared frightened looks, unsure quite how to act around the scientist, although Clay stood calm, his hands firmly gripping Luke and Flora's shoulders. Flora, however, was fuming. "You should be treating him better!" she cried. "Hitting him like that isn't nice!"

"'Nice'?" Blackquill replied with a disbelieving laugh, taking the chance to whack Clonco on the head a few more times with an open palm. "He's my robot to do with as I please. It's not like he can feel pain."

"But the robots here have emotions, don't they!?" Flora shot back, pulling away from Clay's warning grip on her shoulder. "Pain is more than just physical feelings, it's emotional too!"

At that, Blackquill's smirk dropped into a glare, and she stared at Flora for a long moment before responding. "Listen to you, all high and mighty like you know anything about this at all."

Luke watched Flora fuming warily. He agreed with her on principle, but recognised losing his temper and getting angry at Blackquill wasn't going to change anything. Not to mention, Blackquill scared him a little. "Um, perhaps we should all calm down for a moment... Discuss this rationally?"

Blackquill scoffed to herself, grabbing Clonco's head with both hands and physically dragging the robot along as she stalked off towards the elevator. "I don't have time for a philosophical argument. If you'll excuse me, I have a robot to repair." As she reached the door, she bumped into someone coming the other way, who stood to the side and watched with wide eyes as she pushed past him and disappeared.

Flora relaxed her hands from the balled fists they had formed as she forced herself to calm down from the stern discussion. Suddenly she wasn't as eager to learn about the resident robots as she had been.

Starbuck looked over in surprise as he saw the three boys and their friend, then cast a wary glance in the direction Blackquill had disappeared to. "Geeze, what is it with you guys and pissing off the robotics lab?"

"It's not like we try to annoy people," Apollo mumbled, arms crossed.
Stepping into the lounge, Starbuck noticed Flora and gave her a grin. "Hello, there!" he said in greeting, holding out a hand. "You a friend of these three?"

Flora nodded, shaking the offered hand with a smile. "Flora Reinhold," she introduced herself, then looked up at him curiously. "Are you... Solomon Starbuck? The astronaut?"

"Oh, uh," Starbuck stammered, fiddling with his hands in embarrassment although he still gave Flora a smile. "Just 'Sol' is fine, but, yeah. That's me!" He shot her a thumbs-up, forcing a confident grin. "At your service, ma'am!"

Luke and Clay glanced at each other and laughed. "We told you about Flora, didn't we Mister Starbuck?" Clay explained. "She's a friend of Luke's, visiting from England!"

"I was watching your landing from the HAT-1 Miracle!" Flora added with a bright smile, only to then frown in sympathy. "That must have been terrifying to go through!"

"Uh, y-yeah, it was," Starbuck nervously admitted, fiddling with his jacket. "B-but hey, who wants to talk about that?" Forcing another grin, he headed back over to the door, waving for the four to follow him. "We can show you around! Right, Clay?"

Clay grinned. "You bet!" he cried, rushing to catch up.

Apollo rolled his eyes, getting to his feet as he gave the worried Flora a reassuring smile. "They're always like this. It's best to just humour them."

Luke laughed in agreement, waving for Flora to follow as he hurried to run after Clay and Starbuck. "C'mon, we'll lose them!"

"Here it is!" Luke announced as he pushed open the front doors of the animal shelter where he occasionally worked. "Come on in!" He held the door open, and, not far behind him, Trucy and Flora entered, looking around the small room in wonder.

"Cool!" Trucy cried.

"It's very... cozy," Flora added, casting a wary eye over to a young blonde woman sat behind the reception desk, levelling a stern glare over the top of her pointed glasses.

Luke noticed the woman and gave her a wave, approaching the desk. "Hello there! You must be the new receptionist Crow mentioned!" He held out his hand to shake. "I'm Northpaw! It's nice to meet you!"

The woman didn't move, continuing to stare at Luke and ignoring his offered hand. "Can I help you?"

Luke was a bit taken aback by the woman's tone, withdrawing his hand, but pressed on regardless. "My name's Luke Wright, but everyone here calls me Northpaw. I volunteer here when I'm not at university. Is anyone else around at the moment?"

The woman stared at him a few moments more, then reached for a walkie talkie sitting on her desk. Holding it up to her face (and still staring at Luke), she pressed the button. "Mister Pound, someone wants to see you in reception."

"On my way," a voice replied through the crackling speaker.

The woman smirked at Luke as she replaced the small device on her desk. "Manager's on his way."

Luke frowned in confusion. 'Does... Does she think I'm lying?' "Alright," he said, then turned to smile at the equally confused Flora and Trucy. "My boss is on his way," he told them. "I'm sure he won't object to me showing you around."

Trucy grinned, bouncing on her heels. "Yay! I can't wait!"

The woman rolled her eyes and turned her attention to her computer.

A minute later, one of the two pairs of doors leading further inside swung open, and a short man with a goatee stumbled through, balancing on a pair of crutches while one foot dangled below him, wrapped in a thick cast. He smiled as he spotted Luke. "Ah, Wright! So you're Gatti's 'someone', huh?"

Luke was about to wave in greeting when he spotted Pound's injured foot. "Mister Pound! What happened to your leg?"

Pound shrugged. "Eh, broke my foot. Believe me, it's not an exciting story." He smiled, waving to Flora and Trucy. "These two lovely ladies friends of yours?"

Luke nodded, gesturing to the pair. "This is Trucy, my little sister, and Flora, a friend who's visiting from England."

"It's nice to meet you," Flora said with a smile.

Trucy bounced, waving vigorously in Pound's direction. "Hi Mister Pound!"

Pound laughed, adjusting his crutches to carefully turn around. "Oh, Wright, I suppose you've met Gatti here? Our new receptionist?"

Luke nodded awkwardly in the woman's direction, noticing she was looking somewhat chastened now and deliberately avoiding eye contact. "Yes, sort of," he said. 'She definitely thought I was fibbing earlier...'

"What's the nickname they gave you again?" Pound asked, stepping towards the desk as he gave Gatti a curious look. "I remember it was explained to me as 'lion' in another language."

Gatti sighed, looking up. "My name's Leo, so Kitty decided the obvious answer was 'Simba'." She rolled her eyes. "Apparently it's from some African language. Don't ask me which."

'Swahili, actually,' Luke mentally replied, though he decided not to say it out loud and potentially incur the woman's wrath again. "Well, it's nice to meet you, Simba!" he brightly told her, tipping his cap.

"Wright here's studying to be a vet, aren't you?" Pound continued, giving the teen a grin. "Thinking of helping out Fox and Reindeer when you're done?"

Luke shrugged, blushing. "If you'll have me!" he giggled.

Simba huffed to herself, turning back to her computer with a frown.

"Oh, is it alright if I show Trucy and Flora around while they're here?" Luke asked.

"Of course!" Pound replied, shooting the excited teens a smile before turning back to the nearest door into the shelter. "Have fun while you're here, girls!"

"Thank you, sir!" Flora called after him, waving.

Trucy giggled, running to Luke's side. "We will!" she promised Pound as he disappeared through the door, then turned to her brother. "So, where are we going first?"

Luke laughed, then headed towards the other door, waving for his friends to follow him. "C'mon, this way!"

Warren Street Animal Shelter
Recuperation Room

"Northpaw!" Fox cried in delight as she spotted Luke entering the room, abandoning the cat she was cuddling to run and greet her friend with a hug. "You're back!"
"Hello, Fox!" Luke laughed in response, hugging her back. "Having fun without me?"

"Eh, you know. It goes." Fox shrugged, pulling back and looking around to spot the disgruntled cat now staring at them. "Oops, I think I upset her," she whispered, then noticed the two visitors fawning over the cat from behind Luke. "Oh, you have friends!"

Trucy looked up in surprise, then burst into laughter.

Luke blushed, noticing Flora's equally amused look. "Poor choice of words, Fox..."

Noticing her mistake, Fox turned red. "Oh, er, I didn't mean I was surprised you have friends, I just meant..." Deciding to leave it, she spun around, carefully approaching the cat watching them. "C'mere, Sandy," she called, but the cat only walked around her, out of reach, her tail sticking straight up into the air.

Sandy stared at Luke for a few moments, then stepped forward to sniff his hand, quietly meowing.

"I promise I won't hurt you," Luke told the cat, and she responded by jumping into his arms, purring contentedly. Luke giggled as he slowly stood up, petting Sandy's orange fur.

Trucy gasped in delight, poking Luke's side. "Will she let me hold her?" she asked hopefully.

Luke gave the cat a smile. "Will you be alright with my sister taking over, Sandy?" When the cat meowed in response, Luke adjusted Trucy's arms into a holding position with one hand, then carefully handed her the orange furball. As Trucy giggled, running a hand through Sandy's long fur, the cat returned to purring.

Fox huffed to herself as she watched the exchange. "I will never understand your strange affinity for animals, Northpaw," she muttered.

Flora cooed over Sandy, restraining herself from reaching out to pet the cat in case said cat objected to the unwanted contact. "She's so sweet!"

"You should've seen her when she arrived!" Fox laughed. "Oh, by the way, I'm Vixen," she added, waving to Flora and Trucy. "You can call me Fox if you want, though."

Before anyone could reply, the door to the next-door surgery opened and an elderly man walked in, drying his hands with a towel. "I'm hearing voices in here," he announced, then looked over to the visitors and smiled as he spotted Luke. "Ah, Northpaw, you're back from England."

Luke tipped his cap with a grin. "Hello, sir!" He gestured to Trucy and Flora. "By the way, this is my little sister Trucy, -"

"Hi!" Trucy chirped, her hands busy with Sandy.

"- and this is a friend of mine, Flora!" Luke continued. "She's visiting from England!"

Flora waved. "Hello!"

Fox gave the pair a smile, while Reindeer scratched his chin, watching Trucy.

Luke turned to Trucy and Flora. "Since Fox has already introduced herself, this is Reindeer," he said, gesturing to the older man. "He's the 'top dog' of the surgery here!"
"Hey, only I'm allowed to tell that joke," Reindeer replied with a smile. He then turned to Trucy. "So you're Northpaw's little sister, huh? Does that make you 'Southpaw'?

Trucy thought a moment, then grinned. "Oooh! So Daddy and Polly would be Eastpaw and Westpaw!"

Fox snorted in barely restrained laughter, and Reindeer blinked in shock before smiling. "Why not? A 'Paw for every point on the compass."

"Then I'll be Eastpaw!" Trucy decided.

Flora frowned in thought. "Apollo's left-handed...?"

Trucy nodded. "You didn't notice?" she asked.

"I'm not calling you 'Eastpaw'," Fox told Luke with a laugh.

Reindeer chuckled to himself, stepping forward towards Trucy and scratching Sandy behind an ear. "Did you three see Pound on your way in?" he asked, changing the subject.

"Oh, yes," Flora replied with a worried frown. "He broke his foot!"

"Said it wasn't an interesting story, too," Luke added, confused. "Do you know what happened?"

Fox slapped a hand to her face, failing to hide a laugh. "Do we!" she giggled to herself.

"He broke his foot in a way only he could," Reindeer explained with a smile. "He literally stepped wrong in his own backyard."

Trucy frowned. "He tripped?"

Fox shook her head, still giggling. "Nope! Literally put his foot down to take a step, broke it instead!"

Luke also began to laugh. "Wow, you're right! Only Mister Pound could break his foot taking a step!"

Reindeer gently picked up Sandy from Trucy's arms, carrying the cat back to an open cage nearby. "Let's just let Sandy here rest, and we can show you girls how our little surgery here works...

LA International Airport
Departures Area

"I had so much fun while I was here!" Flora said as she gave each of the Wrights a hug goodbye. "I'll have to make plans to visit again sometime!"
"Make it soon!" Trucy told her, hugging the young woman tightly. "And take Uncle Professor and Alfendi back with you! They have to see my and Polly's show!"

Apollo laughed, poking Trucy's back as she pulled away from Flora. "What, you wanna pull the same routine on them, or something?"

Trucy shrugged. "Alfendi might be a bit young," she said, then grinned and winked at Apollo. "I have something else I want to show Uncle Professor anyway!"

Apollo thought a moment, then returned her grin. "Oh yeah, that! Forgot about that!" He then winked back at his sister.

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, but decided not to pry on the pair's inside joke. Turning to Flora, he shoved his hands in his pants pockets. "We'll see you when you next decide to visit, then," he told her.

"Yes, of course," Flora replied with a smile. "I have to see if I have time next year, or maybe the year after, but I'll definitely try to come back sometime!"

Luke adjusted his cap, looking at Flora's travel case. "You'd better get going, I guess," he said, then looked up to give his friend a smile. "I'll see you in September, then?"

Flora nodded. "The Professor and I will see you at... Gatwick, Heathrow... whichever airport you arrive in!" she promised. "And Alfendi, too!" She looked around at the other three. "Goodbye, everyone!"

As Flora picked up her bag and headed off to the check-in counters, the four Wrights waved back. "Bye, Flora!" Trucy called. "See you later!"

Before disappearing into the crowd, Flora turned to give the family one last smile before heading off home.

"I have no idea what you're even worrying about," Clay said, lounging on Apollo's bed with his hands behind his head. "I mean, you barely live here anyway, so what can she complain about?"

Apollo sighed, picking through a box of old magic props as he sat on the floor nearby. "You clearly do not know Trucy as well as you think you do."

Clay scoffed. "If anything, she should celebrate losing you from the house!" he claimed. "It's not like she doesn't see you all the time. Certainly more than you guys see Luke right now..."

"Shut up, Clay," Apollo groaned, pushing the box to one side and burying his face in his hands. "She very nearly disowned me when we started college. This time, she's gonna kill me, I just know it."

After a short pause, Clay pushed himself up on his elbows, looking down at his friend. "Dude, you gotta move out sometime. You can't stay here forever, sharing a room with your brother and all." He grimaced. "I mean, I love Luke, but you're nineteen and he's almost eighteen. You should have had your own spaces ages ago."

Apollo sighed, hands dropping to his lap. "Yeah, I know... This is the right thing to do, I just..." He shook his head. "There's just no way I can break this gently to Trucy. She might not forgive me this time."

The door swung open, and Luke wandered in, closing the door behind him. He smiled wearily as he spotted his friends, pulling his old satchel off his shoulder. "Hey guys," he greeted them, placing the worn bag on top of the small bookcase at the foot of his bed and sitting down on the arranged covers with a sigh. It was only then he noticed Apollo's morose state and gave his brother a concerned look. "Everything okay?"

"We're moving out," Clay said with a shrug. Luke blinked in surprise. "Huh!?"

"Clay!" Apollo cried, shooting his friend a glare.

"Oops," Clay mumbled with a shrug, lying back down to hide the grin on his face. Apollo rolled his eyes, throwing up his hands with frustration. "This is exactly why we didn't tell you about the Feys..."

Luke thought a moment, hand tapping against his mouth. "I suppose that makes sense," he conceded. "Most people begin to move away from home once they're at university..."

"I figured you'd be okay with it," Apollo sighed, leaning against the bed-frame behind him. "Dad will be, too. It's Trucy that's the problem."
Luke winced in sympathy, remembering Trucy's reaction when he revealed he would be attending Gressenheller in London. "So, have you been putting this off, or is it deliberate that you're planning to tell her this on her first day back at school?"

Apollo rubbed at one arm uncomfortably. "A bit of both," he admitted. "Since we've gone back to the school-time schedule for the show, she won't have to share the stage with me until Saturday, so she has time to calm down if she reacts badly... although I don't want to put it off too long, since we've actually starting looking for a small apartment to rent."

Clay nodded, shooting Luke a grin. "Think you'll still be around to help us move, or are you planning to be back in London by then?"

Luke chuckled at the joke. "I guess we'll see when you move! I'll definitely help if I can."

Apollo sighed, checking the time on the alarm clock on his bedside table. "Trucy and Dad'll be home soon. Pearly might be dropping by, too. I kinda want to get this over with, but..."

"Trucy's going to be excited about seeing all her friends again," Luke filled in with a smile, and shrugged. "Maybe give her ten minutes to run off some steam before telling her?"

Sighing again, Apollo looked away to stare at his hands, gripping his bracelet tightly. "I... just hope she doesn't hate me for this," he whispered.

"And Alex was telling us all about her trip to Canada!" Trucy excitedly told her father, brothers, Pearl and Clay as she bounded around the room. Phoenix and Pearl had sat at the table with a drink each, cooling down from the hot walk home from the bus, while the other three were stood dotted around the room, almost serving as bases for Trucy to hit as she ran in circles around them.

"That sounds fun!" Luke said with a smile, humouring his sister as she dashed past him. "What were they doing while they were up there?"

"Sightseeing, mostly," Trucy explained with a shrug, pausing for a moment to bounce on her heels. "They went to Niagara Falls, and she was talking all about this boat they went on, and a bridge where you could see the water falling and stuff."

Apollo tapped his fingers nervously against his bracelet, glancing uneasily at the clock on the microwave. 'A few more minutes, then I have to kill her good mood...' As the seconds passed, he was finding it harder to concentrate on Trucy's excited rambling about what all her classmates had been getting up to over the summer, the terrible news he was about to break to her looming in his mind. 'Yep. Prepare to be disowned here, Wright. Gonna have to leave show business. Probably be forced to work under my old name. I always used to say 'Justice' was the best name a lawyer could have.'

A tapping on his arm pulled Apollo out of his thoughts, and he looked down in surprise to find Trucy standing in front of him, staring suspiciously at her brother. "What's the matter, Polly?"

"Uh..." Apollo immediately went pale, glancing up to Clay and Luke to silently beg for help. Clay only grinned at his friend's discomfort, while Luke gave him a sympathetic look, making a 'go on' gesture with his hands.

"Well?" Trucy pushed, hands on her hips as she gave Apollo a stern glare.

"N-nothing," Apollo insisted, firmly looking away from his sister. 'I'm trying to be kind to you! Ramble for a few more minutes!'

Trucy only continued to glare. "Tell me."

Clay stifled a giggle behind a hand. "Go on," he taunted Apollo, ignoring his friend's frustrated sigh. "She's given you an invitation and everything!"

"May as well get it over with," Luke agreed, with a sympathetic frown.

Trucy looked around, noticing only Pearl and Phoenix seemed to be as confused as she was. "What's going on...?"

"Do you three boys have something to tell us?" Phoenix added, getting up from his chair and casting a wary look between the trio.

Pearl bit a fingernail worriedly. "Is it bad?"

Clay and Luke looked to Apollo, Clay grinning while Luke nervously fiddled with a sleeve. Apollo clutched at the homemade pin holding his cape around his shoulders. 'Luke's right. Better get this over with.' He looked between Trucy, Pearl and Phoenix, but focussed more on his sister, worried for her reaction. "Clay and I have been thinking about it over the past few months, and we've decided it's time for us to move out. We're thinking of renting a small apartment together near our college, at least until we finish there."

Phoenix was surprised, and seemed torn on how to react. "Oh. That... wasn't what I was expecting to hear." Equally surprised, Pearl simply thought to herself in silence.

Trucy seemed to be frozen, staring up at Apollo with wide eyes. Slowly, the shocked gaze shifted, the corners of her mouth curling downwards while tears accumulated in her eyes. "Y-you're... leaving?"

"I'm moving out," Apollo repeated. "I'll still hang around here, and see you every weekend; I just won't be sleeping here anymore."

Trucy only continued to stare, eyes shining.

Phoenix rubbed at the back of his neck, frowning in thought. "Geeze... I, uh... I'll definitely support your decision, Apollo, but..." He shook his head, trying to pull himself together. "When are you planning on going?"

"Have you told Mystic Maya yet?" Pearl added, concerned for her cousin. "She'd want to know, too."

"I'll text her in a bit, Pearly," Apollo promised, then turned to Phoenix with a vaguely amused smile. "And we're still looking for a place, Dad. You'll have to put up with me for a while yet."

"We might have some trouble, since places will be going fast as semester starts," Clay pointed out, rubbing at his nose. "but I'm sure we'll find something and be settled in before we have any classes to get in the way." He paused. "Well, hopefully."
"Meaning we might be moving out near the end of September," Apollo clarified.

Pearl frowned. "In about a month? I thought moving took longer than that..."

Clay scoffed. "You can do anything if you're dedicated enough!" he insisted.

Trucy sniffed loudly, drawing Apollo's attention back to her. "B-but why are you leaving?"

"I..." Apollo sighed, then leaned down a little to match his sister's height. "I can't share a room with Luke forever. I need my own space." He gave her a smile. "You think that'd keep me from hanging around and bugging you all the time, though? You couldn't fight me off with a shovel."

Trucy stared back at Apollo for a long moment, then slowly smiled and grabbed her oldest brother in a tight hug. "I wouldn't want to," she whispered in reply.

"It was a lot of work, though. They really should have given themselves more time to organise everything," Luke told the long-haired cat lying in his lap as he ran a hand along her back. "I think my sister's actually planning on going over there after school. Papa seems to be okay with it, anyway."

Sandy meowed curiously, briefly interrupting her purring for only a moment.

Luke laughed. "It's actually quite a nice place, considering it's so small! I don't know what the policy on pets is, but I'm sure Trucy will be finding out soon." He smiled fondly at the thought of his sister. "She's always wanted the chance to include animals in their act. It's never been possible because they don't allow pets in our home."

The orange tabby seemed to sniff disapprovingly, curling up tighter in Luke's lap.

"That may be your view on it," Luke said in amusement, "but I think you'll find most humans disagree!" When Sandy didn't reply, he mused in thought for a moment. "It's going to be weird at home, now Apollo's out in his own place... well, his and Clay's. Not counting dorm rooms, I haven't had a bedroom to myself since..." He frowned, thinking back to the house he had lived in with his parents, before the move from London. That was such a long time ago... and I still don't know what happened to Mum. He winced, guiltily. 'Maybe putting off the search wasn't a good idea...? But it's not like I really had a choice. I hit a dead end! What else was I supposed to do!?' A part of Luke started to berate himself for not trying harder to find his missing mother. It couldn't have been that hard after all, not if he'd just thought harder and found the right clue he'd surely missed in his initial investigation. *But not even the Professor had any ideas for where to go next! If a mystery has even the great Professor Layton stamped... what hope do I have!?'

A plaintive meow dragged Luke out of his thoughts, and he noticed Sandy in his lap staring at him, somewhat annoyed his petting of her had stopped. "Ah, s-sorry, Sandy," Luke said, rubbing at his eyes as he noticed there had been tears threatening at the corners of his vision. "I was just... thinking." He returned to running his hand over the cat's long fur, smiling as she settled down happily. "You're going to find it a lot harder to have conversations like this once I go back to uni on Saturday. I expect you'll have a new family by the time I come back. A sweet cat like you should go in a flash, now you're up for adoption."

The pair were sitting in one of the smaller cat enclosures, near the back of the building. Luke had left the door half-open as he entered, trusting his relationship with Sandy would keep the feline firmly in her small 'room'... a place she only had to herself thanks to the fact she wasn't getting along with the other cats, which had inspired a hasty reshuffle as the staff found a place for the abused cat to stay.

Sandy mewed quietly, rubbing her head against Luke.

"Of course they'll love you," Luke promised her. "And they'll be good people, too. Mister Pound wouldn't let them take you if they weren't."
Before Sandy could reply, Luke heard a distinct cough behind him and spun around, eyes wide. Standing in the doorway of the enclosure, a smirk on his face, was Reindeer, watching the teen. "Not interrupting anything, I hope?"

Luke shook his head. "Er, n-no, of course not," he insisted. 'How long have you been standing there!?' "Um... did you want something, sir?"

Reindeer smiled, stepping inside and crouching down near where Luke sat, Sandy in his lap. "Don't worry, you're not the only person in the world who talks to the animals as though they can understand you."

Luke tried not to look uncomfortable as he smiled back. 'If only you knew... not that you'd believe me, probably.'

"I'm always overhearing someone spilling their troubles to one of the dogs, or trying to tell a cat to sit still for a photo or something," Reindeer continued, although Luke thought he seemed more amused than trying to actually reassure him. "Nobody has any idea how sound can travel down these corridors... especially if you leave all the doors open."

At that, Luke winced. Not only had he left Sandy's gate ajar, but he remembered leaving the door at the end of the hallway open too, having come from the storage room as he fed the cats. "I... guess it's kind of a habit around here to leave as many doors open as possible to make things easier, huh?"

Reindeer chuckled to himself, watching Sandy as she purred in Luke's lap. "Well, I won't complain. I've learned all sorts of interesting things from what I overhear."

Luke frowned, shooting the old man an accusing look. "It's not very polite to eavesdrop."

Laughing, Reindeer shook his head. "That it isn't!" he agreed. "But hey, I'm a nosy old man. I get what fun I can out of life."

"Acknowledging it doesn't make it better," Luke pointed out, pouting a little. "Why don't you tell people when you can hear them so they know to close the doors?"

"Told you, haven't I?" Reindeer replied with a smirk. When Luke blushed as he realised the elder man was right, Reindeer chuckled quietly to himself, adding, "Besides, I thought you sounded troubled, talking about your brother moving out."

Luke looked away. 'Ah... so that's how long he was listening to me...’ "I'm fine," he insisted. "I'll just take some getting used to." He forced a smile for his concerned co-worker. "This time next week, I'll be back in London annoying everyone around me by shouting "I'm fine" at them."

Reindeer quietly laughed, and Luke didn't doubt he was remembering the few times over the years Luke had been nervous enough to accidentally shout the phrase in someone's face... usually to Reindeer himself. "Well, we all miss you while you're gone," he said, smiling down at the contented cat in Luke's lap. "Especially the animals, I think."

"I'm sure they're fine," Luke said, petting Sandy with a now-genuine smile. "Everyone else is here for them. And then they get adopted, and have families to love them."

Reindeer nodded in agreement, then scratched his chin in thought. After a pause, he shook his head, as though dismissing an idea, and gave Luke a smile. "Speaking of families, how young was your sister when you moved here? I couldn't hear a hint of an accent when I met her in... how many months ago was it?"
Luke shrugged. "That was July," he replied, then frowned in confusion. "What do you mean by 'accent'...?"

"Your family moved here from Britain, right?" Reindeer asked. "That's why you're going to England and getting that doctorate to lord over us when you finish." He grinned.

Blushing, Luke shook his head. "Oh, I won't use the title if I end up working here," he insisted. "I don't want to wrongly imply I'm more skilled than you or Fox." As Reindeer laughed, the teen thought more on the rest of the elder man's question. As he recognised the source of confusion, he tapped a finger against his mouth, pondering how best to answer. "Mum, Dad and I did move here from England," he agreed. "But... well, my family now isn't the same family I... moved... with? If that makes sense?"

Reindeer stared at the teen, nonplussed. "Huh?"

Before Luke could reply, Sandy leapt out of his lap and jumped up onto one of her climbing platforms, where she hissed briefly at the pair before settling down to sleep where she was. Luke smiled, getting to his feet. "Guess she's sick of us already," he said, and left the enclosure. "Can't blame her."

Reindeer nodded in agreement, following Luke out and closing the gate behind them. "I'll take your word for it," he replied, and the pair began to walk together down the hallway, idly checking on the other cats in their pens. "Back to my question though," he continued, "you moved here with your mom and dad? Where do your brother and sister come in?"

Luke shrugged. "It's... complicated," he said as explanation.

"I've got the time," Reindeer replied.

Sighing, Luke decided it wouldn't do any harm to tell his friend the story. Looking up at Reindeer's face, the old man certainly seemed genuinely interested. "I was an only child," Luke said. "Dad got a job here, so we moved, but then there was a car accident and Mum and Dad..."

Reindeer looked surprised. "Ah, so your mom...?"

"They both died," Luke said, deciding to give the simple version and not try to explain the truth as he knew it. Predictably, Reindeer looked confused, so he continued, "Once I was orphaned and in foster care, there I met Apollo and Trucy, whose parents were also dead or just missing. I already knew Papa as a friend, but that's a long story in itself, and he found us and decided to adopt all three of us." He smiled. "That's the simplified version, anyway. This was all back in twenty-nineteen. We've been a family ever since."

Reindeer seemed surprised, and thought over the information for a moment or two. "Geeze, kid, I had no idea..."

"That's alright," Luke assured him with a nostalgic smile, staring into the distance. "I haven't had much reason to talk about Mum and Dad here, though I do miss them a lot. And you only just met Trucy; You still haven't met Papa or Apollo."

Nodding in agreement, Reindeer shoved his hands in his pockets. "Well... in that case, Northpaw," he said, "I think it's time this old man stopped bothering you."

"Oh, you weren't bothering me!" Luke insisted, giving his friend a bright grin. "I don't mind talking about my family!"
"That may be," Reindeer chuckled in reply, pulling up a sleeve to check his watch, "but you're usually heading home around this time, aren't you?"

Luke thought a moment, then laughed. "I'd better get going then!" He ran back to the storage room, where he had left his satchel and belongings, waving back to Reindeer as he went. "See you later, sir!"

Reindeer waved back as he watched the teen disappear around the corner, then stared into the nearest enclosure, watching a trio of kittens within playing together. "What I wouldn't give to understand you guys the way he can," he mumbled, then smiled. "Ah well. Youth is for the young." Shoving his hands back in his pockets, he ambled off in the opposite direction.

FLASHBACK: Sudden Departure

- Six Years Earlier -

Luke giggled, pausing in his watering of the plants as the puppy at his side yipped in excitement. "You have a lot of questions, don't you?" he asked, laughing at the pup stopped instantly, seeming somewhat embarrassed. "It's okay! I have plenty of time today, helping the gardener with the watering, so I can answer them for you!"

The elder dog behind him, the pup's mother, nudged at the boy, making a soft grunting sound in her throat.

"That's alright," Luke assured her. "You're not being a bother, I promise." He looked back to the puppy, whose mouth was open in a wide grin. "And of course we get cold in winter! In fact, I just came back from a place so cold, it snows year-round!" The puppy yipped excitedly, causing Luke to laugh as he pulled at his open cardigan. "It wasn't that fun for me, since my cardy is very thin. Mum's actually insisted on taking me out clothes-shopping soon to see about getting something warmer!"

Luke heard a door open nearby, and turned around, gripping the watering can tightly. Standing in an open doorway, several metres away, was a young woman in a yellow coat, brown hair falling in waves over her shoulders. Forgetting immediately about the pair of dogs behind him, Luke carefully placed his watering can down on the brick edge of the flowerbed, and ran around the paved path to meet his friend. "Emmy!" he called, running to greet her with a smile. "Did the Professor want to-?"

His question was cut off as he spotted a suitcase sat on the ground near Emmy's feet, propping open the door behind her. As he paused his run, he looked up at his friend quizzically, but she avoided his gaze. "Emmy?"

"Has the Professor told you?" Emmy asked, still looking away sadly.

Luke suddenly wished he still had the watering can in hand, so he had something to grip as he felt the sudden anxiety creeping up his back. "T-told me what?"

Emmy paused for a moment before sighing. "Of course he didn't," she muttered, then turned to finally face Luke. "I'm... I'm resigning. As the Professor's assistant."

It took the young boy a moment to react to the surprising news. "You're...?" He shook his head. "But, why!? How will we solve all our future investigations without you!?"

"I'm sure you'll be just fine," Emmy insisted, finally managing a small smile for her eleven-year-old friend. "The famous Professor Layton and his assistant... one and only assistant now, not just number two."

"That sound better?"

"Much better," Luke replied with a smug nod, only to pause in thought before giving Emmy a worried frown, eyes wide. "But the Professor still needs an assistant! You can't go, Emmy!"

"I don't really have a choice," Emmy sighed, her smile replaced by a sad stare. "I took this job in the first place to... spy on the Professor for Uncle Leon." She looked away, guiltily. "With Targent gone, my mission's over. There's no reason to stay."

"Yes, there is!" Luke cried, jumping towards his friend with a determined look, fists in the air. "You're our friend! We need you!"

Emmy shook her head, giving Luke a sad smile. "No, you don't," she said. "The last thing either of you need is a traitorous friend."

Luke felt the memory of the brief betrayal hit him like a punch to the gut. "You're not a traitor," he insisted, tears involuntarily coming to his eyes at the memory of how he'd endlessly cried as he'd been dragged down the tunnel of the Azran Sanctuary, the sharp icicle in Emmy's hand inches from his throat. "W-we don't blame you for that."

Emmy looked away. "Maybe you don't," she agreed. Without another word, she turned around and picked up the suitcase holding the door back inside open.

"Wait!" Luke cried, and Emmy paused, her back to him. "Don't go! Please, Emmy!" He struggled to think of another way to beg his friend to stay, but his mind only came up blank. "P-please... don't go..." He clutched his hands together, blinking away tears as he stared at Emmy's back. "You're one of my best friends."

There was a long pause before Emmy finally spoke. "I'm sorry," she quietly replied. "I guess I'm not a very good one."

Luke felt his hopes drop, and turned his gaze to the paved path below his feet.

Emmy didn't move for a moment, but then slowly placed her suitcase back down, and half-turned to look at Luke. He carefully looked up to meet her sad eyes, and she gave him a soft smile, walking over to the boy. Before he could react, she had pulled him into a hug, resting her chin on the top of his head. "Maybe I'll come back one day," she assured him. "If you're still around, we'll meet again then."

Luke bit his lip, hugging Emmy's waist tightly. "Of course I will be!" he replied almost indignantly, struggling to keep his voice from breaking. "I wouldn't be the Professor's apprentice if I left!"

Emmy laughed. "No, you wouldn't be!" she agreed, then pulled back, giving Luke a wide, if sad, smile. "Until then," she quietly said, then stepped back over to her suitcase.

Luke watched silently. He didn't move or make a sound until Emmy had walked back inside with her suitcase, disappearing with the click of the door mechanism. With the finality of the ensuing silence, he rushed to press his back against the bricks of the nearby building wall, gripping his tummy tightly as he slid down into a sitting position on the paving. 'First Professor Sycamore is Descole... then Aurora dies... and now Emmy...' Failing to fight back any more tears, he buried his face in his hands, curling up into a ball as he mourned the end of an era.

October 25, 8:15AM
Luke skipped merrily as he got off the bus outside the university. He'd been feeling over the moon since that morning, when his parents passed on the message to him that Layton had requested Luke join him for an investigation. 'I wonder what we're going to do? Rescue another town from mechanical spectres? Find another ancient historical artefact? Reunite lost loved ones after years of separation? Or maybe it'll be something totally different and unexpected, like... like something so amazing and spectacular I can't even imagine it!' He giggled, adjusting his new jumper. 'I can't wait to find out!'

As he turned the corner to the small parking lot serving the university, Luke quickly spotted the familiar red shape of the Laytonmobile and, standing next to the open driver door, Layton himself. Gasping in excitement, he broke out into a run, waving madly to attract his mentor's attention. "Professor! Professor!"

Layton had been perusing a letter in his hands, brow furrowed in concentration, but as he heard Luke's call, he turned and looked up, smiling at the sight of the approaching boy. "Luke! Glad you could make it, my boy."

Luke giggled as he ran to join his friend. "Another investigation, Professor? What are we doing this time? Who are we going to help?"

Instead of replying immediately, Layton cast a thoughtful look at the letter still in his hands, then shook his head and began to fold it up. "I'll explain once we're out of the city. It's a couple hours journey to our destination." He replaced the letter in its envelope and put it away in an inner pocket of his jacket. "Why don't you get in the car and we can be on our way?" he instructed with a smile.

Luke nodded, grinning, and made for the nearby door into the back seat.

To Luke's surprise, Layton laughed, causing the boy to halt in his tracks. "Oh, no need to sit in the back! You can sit up the front with me, Luke."

"But that's Emmy's seat!" a part of Luke instinctively replied, and Luke had to pause for a moment to pull himself together at the reminder of their missing friend. 'N-no... Emmy's gone now. There's no reason I can't sit there.' He walked around the back of the car to get in the passenger side, unsure of what he was doing at every step. He could remember all the times he and Emmy had fought (or, more accurately, he had fought Emmy) over the right to sit in the front, even though Emmy, as an AdultTM, had won every time, a knowing smirk on her face as Luke was grumpily relegated to the back. Sitting there now, at Layton's side, felt like a hollow victory, and Luke was struggling to fight off the wrong-ness as he strapped himself in.

Layton, already seated behind the wheel, cast a worried glance at Luke as he also clicked his seatbelt into place. "Is everything alright, Luke?"

Layton, midway reaching to turn the key in the ignition, paused. "It does," he quietly agreed, then moved to start the car.
"Do you know what happens to am-in-als when they die?"

Alfendi grinned, hugging his worn teddy (a gift from Luke) tightly around the neck. "They get eated."

"Eaten," Luke corrected, sighing as he shook his head. "And no, they don't get eaten when they die."

"Do too!" Alfendi insisted, pouting and sticking his nose in the air. "Papa told me that's what meat is! Dead am-in-als!"

"An-im-! Never mind," Luke muttered, running a hand over his face. "Your papa's right, but we don't eat all animals when they die." He tried to give the boy an understanding smile, although a part of him knew his explanation would be ignored in favour of Alfendi's fixation on the 'dead animals' part. "We don't eat pets, after all. Pets get buried when they die, like people!"

Alfendi's frown deepened. "We do too eat them!" he argued. "Flora said! Dogs get eated in some places, and guinea pigs, and we're always eating fish!"

Luke mentally cursed Flora for telling Alfendi those particular factoids, and wondered if Layton had also attempted to explain this issue to the young boy. "Yes, but that's usually animals we've never met, like pigs, cows or sheep who've lived their whole lives on farms we've never been to. For individual animals we're friends with, we don't want to kill or eat them. When they die, we just bury them, as our friends."

Alfendi looked sceptical. "How do you know?"

At that, Luke had to smile. "What, you don't believe me?" he asked. "I am a vet, remember." 'Almost one, anyway!' "You're sure you want to ignore a vet?"

Alfendi nodded firmly.

"You're a hundred percent sure you want to do that?" Luke added, crossing his arms as he gave the boy a playful smirk.

Tilting his head to one side, Alfendi looked up at Luke in confusion. "What's... hunnerd percent?"

Luke laughed, realising something as complicated as percentages (not to mention a number as high as one hundred) would be something totally foreign to the boy for several years yet. "Why don't we go ask your papa? He should be done with his class by now!"

Alfendi grinned brightly, nodding his head as Luke got to his feet. "Papa's office!" he announced, and ran off to the nearest door leading inside.

"Alfendi, wait!" Luke called, but the boy was off like a shot, and Luke hurried to catch up.

The door opened as Alfendi reached it, and, not stopping for whoever was coming out, the boy charged straight through into the opening, tripping up a woman in yellow, who fell to the ground with a cry as her sunglasses went flying from under her cap. Alfendi was knocked to the ground by her side, grunting as he hit the bricks below, his fall cushioned by his large teddy bear.

Luke gasped in surprise and ran to meet the pair as they picked themselves up off the pavement. "I'm so sorry!" he cried on Alfendi's behalf, pulling the boy to his feet with one hand as he offered the other to the woman. "Can I help-?" At that moment, he caught sight of the woman's face as she brushed her brown braid over her shoulder, and cut himself off with a gasp.

Midway through brushing the dirt off her yellow blouse, the woman looked up and also gasped as she noticed Luke staring at her, the retrieved sunglasses in her hand falling back to the ground. "U- um..."

The pair stared at each other in silence for a long moment. Alfendi looked between the two in confusion, one arm still held loosely in Luke's grasp. Finally, Luke seemed to regain the ability to speak, and stammered, "E... Emmy...?"

Emmy blinked, then slowly smiled apologetically, relaxing slightly out of her tense stance. "H-hello, Luke."

Before either could say anything more, Alfendi ripped himself out of Luke's grip and kicked Emmy in the shin, dashing off inside.

"Alfendi, get back here!" Luke shouted, abandoning Emmy for the moment as he ran after the young boy, his voice echoing in the halls as he spotted his wayward charge not far ahead. It didn't take him long to catch up, grabbing the mischievous boy's hand and immediately dragging him back in the direction of the courtyard. "That was a very naughty thing to do!" he told Alfendi, who only pouted as he attempted to claw Luke's hand off his. "You are going to apologise to Emmy for kicking her!"

"Are not!" Alfendi cried. "She walked into me!"

Luke didn't reply, internally fuming at the boy as he escorted him back to the door. He pushed it open, looking around for Emmy with a friendly smile, but, to his astonishment, she was nowhere to be found. "Emmy?" At first, Luke was confused, wondering where his old friend could have disappeared to, but it was quickly overcome with disappointment as he realised that, once again, she didn't want to be found. 'I... I missed my chance for a last talk with her? Again!?'

Alfendi grunted to himself, attempting to cross his arms with one hand still held firmly in Luke's and the other still gripping his teddy. "She still walked into me," he muttered to himself.

Luke shot the boy a glare but said nothing, recognising he was mostly angry at himself for letting Emmy slip away so easily. Instead, he simply turned around and headed back inside.

Professor Layton's Office
Luke sighed as he closed the office door behind him, Alfendi beginning to again struggle to pull himself from the eighteen-year-old's grip. Not far away, he quickly spotted Layton standing by his desk, looking through some papers strewn across an open book, his hat resting not far away. Hearing the door close, the Professor looked around to greet the pair with a smile. "Luke, Alfendi. Have fun?"

Alfendi looked away guiltily as Luke immediately shot another glare at the boy. "Alfendi tripped someone up and then kicked her," Luke explained. "Just now as we were heading up."

Layton was surprised at first, then crossed his arms and fixed Alfendi with a stern stare of disapproval. "Is this true, Alfendi?"

The four-year-old avoided his father's gaze, fidgeting with his jumper. After a moment, he nodded. "You know full well that's not a polite thing to do," Layton continued, crossing the room to approach his son. Luke released the boy's hand, but Alfendi didn't take the opportunity to run, using both arms to hug his teddy tightly. "I hope you apologised to this woman."

"We didn't get the chance," Luke admitted, staring off into the distance as he wondered where Emmy had disappeared to. "Alfendi ran off, and she'd disappeared by the time I caught up."

Layton gave Luke a curious look, but quickly returned his attention to Alfendi. "Then you had better remember what she looked like, Alfendi. The next time you see her, you are going to apologise. Do you understand?"

Alfendi thought a moment, then nodded. "Good," Layton replied, relaxing back into a small smile. "You can run off and play now."

Still guiltily avoiding his father's gaze, Alfendi wasted no time running off to a corner of the office next to Layton's desk, where a small box of toys, pencils and colouring books rested. Dumping his bear on the floor nearby, he dropped to the floor and pulled out a handful of coloured pencils and a book from the box, flipping open the book to a random page to find something to colour.

Alfendi now occupied, Layton turned his attention to Luke. "Did something else happen?" he asked quietly, the concerned look back on his face.

Luke thought a moment. "Not really," he said. "It's... The woman Alfendi ran into."

"Hmm?" Layton replied, curious. "What about her?"

"She..." Luke sighed again, still puzzling to himself as to why their old friend had reappeared only to run off again. Looking Layton in the eyes, he admitted, "It was Emmy."

Layton seemed surprised for only a moment, then smiled. "Ah, she's been forced to reveal herself then."

"Hmm?" Layton replied, curious. "What about her?"

"She..." Luke sighed again, still puzzling to himself as to why their old friend had reappeared only to run off again. Looking Layton in the eyes, he admitted, "It was Emmy."

Layton seemed surprised for only a moment, then smiled. "Ah, she's been forced to reveal herself then."

Now it was Luke's turn to be surprised, although it brought with it more confusion. "Huh?"

"I noticed she's been hanging around again over the past fortnight," Layton added with a smile, and headed back to his desk, sitting in his chair. "I imagine she's back in London for her job, but still hasn't had the courage to visit us."

Luke watched Layton in shock. "Y-you... you've known she was here all along!?" He ran to the spare chair by Layton's desk, sitting down as he watched the Professor organise his papers with a smile. "B-but you said you had no idea where she'd gone! That she didn't want to be found and we had to respect a lady's wishes!"

"And I was telling the truth, at the time," Layton replied with a laugh. "It wasn't until a year or two later I happened to discover what Emmy was doing with her life. Not long after, I started noticing her sneaking around the university in disguise."

Luke suddenly connected dots in his head. "The sunglasses," he realised aloud. "And the cap, instead of her old coat. She's wearing her hair differently, too."

Layton nodded. "She appears for a few weeks every year, around this time. I haven't approached her, but I've noticed her sneaking into the back of my classes several times, and she likes to conceal herself in the courtyard and discreetly watch us from a distance." He chuckled. "Although she hasn't spoken to us, she seems to be checking up on how we're doing, in her own way."

Leaning back in his chair, Luke scratched at the back of his head. "And now she knows without a doubt I've recognised her, do you think she might come forward?"

"Maybe," Layton agreed, looking out the window with a soft smile. "I suppose we shall have to wait and see."

It had been a very usual Friday morning for Hershel Layton. After dragging Alfendi out of bed and into some clothes, he had passed the boy off to his sister to eat breakfast, leaving Layton to collect his material for the day's classes and office work before leaving. After a short lecture for a group of first-year archaeology students, he was now settled in his office, engrossed in marking assignments for another of his classes.

Behind him, Layton heard a knock on his door. This was far from unusual, so he only made a mental note of where he was up to on the paper before him. "Come in," he called, placing down his red pen. The door creaked open slowly, and Layton turned his chair to one side to greet them, only to pause as he saw the nervous figure poking their head through the doorway, gripping the edge of the door. "Ah, this is a pleasant surprise," he said, giving the figure in yellow an encouraging smile as he gestured to the spare chair nearby. "Why don't you come in? It's been a long time since we had a chat, Emmy."

Emmy drummed her fingers against the door for a moment, then gently stepped into the room, leaning against the door to close it behind her. "You don't seem so surprised," she pointed out, walking slowly across the room. "I suppose Luke told you what happened yesterday."

Layton continued to smile, watching Emmy politely sit in the offered chair. "He did, yes," he agreed, adjusting his hat. "I understand a certain little boy will owe you an apology when next you meet."

Emmy had to think a moment before laughing. "Oh, yes, the little redhead. Is he yours?"

Chuckling, Layton crossed his arms. "I can't imagine you don't already know the answer to that. You've seen him with us since he was a year old, haven't you?"

Eyes wide, Emmy stared at Layton for several seconds. "Uh..." A blush spread across her face, and she looked down guiltily. "You knew I was there the whole time," she realised.

"Indeed I did," Layton replied. "At least, I'm sure it didn't take me long to notice you, hiding at the back of my lecture hall the year Luke left."

Emmy continued to stare at her lap, palms pressed into her knees as she winced. "In retrospect, sneaking into your classes was a bad idea. I just had to make sure you were okay," she explained, looking up to meet Layton's eyes. "I mean, of course I knew you'd all be fine without me, but I had to check."

Layton nodded. "I thought that might be the case." He cast a glance to an abandoned newspaper on the edge of his desk. "I understand you're working for the World Times now?"

"Oh, yes," Emmy admitted, smiling as she pulled a few strands of hair over her shoulder, fiddling with them nervously. "I was wondering if you'd happened to notice that. It's a great excuse to travel the world, see exciting things. Plus, I'm back in London every November to review my contract, so I can visit Uncle Leon." She looked away again, forcefully brushing her hair back over her shoulder.
"I... was never quite sure if I was ready to talk to you or Luke yet. Couldn't bring myself to confront you." She sighed, then turned back to Layton with a sad frown, folding her hands neatly in her lap. "I've been keeping an eye out for both of you in the news, since I left. I heard what happened to the Tritons in America."

Layton frowned in thought, remembering his missing friends. After a moment, he remembered something and gave Emmy a curious look. "And how did you learn of what happened to Clark and Brenda? I seem to recall it wasn't widely publicised."

Emmy shrugged. "I worried about Luke when I didn't see him around Gressenheller that year. I ran a search for 'Luke Triton', but that got me nothing, so I thought I'd try his parents' names on a whim." She sighed. "I got a retrospective article on that road they died on, listing the dead in memoriam. After that, I was so scared for Luke, but I had no idea where to even start looking for him. Did they take him back to Britain, or was he still in America? And England on its own would be hard enough to search, assuming he wasn't in Wales or Scotland or something, but the entire United States?" She ran a hand through her hair, huffing in frustration. "You have no idea how relieved I was when I recognised him last year. I was beginning to think he'd dropped off the face of the earth."

Layton laughed, adjusting his hat. "Luke's been quite safe, I can assure you. Of course, he can tell you all about that himself."

Emmy nodded, beginning to look guilty again. "He wasn't too mad I ran off like that yesterday, was he?"

"I can't imagine why he would be," Layton assured her. "He seemed to be looking forward to seeing you again properly."

Emmy smiled, leaning back in her chair. "That's good," she said.

The pair sat in comfortable silence for several moments, relaxing as they enjoyed each other's company after so long apart.

"Oh, that reminds me," Emmy spoke up again, nonchalantly tapping a finger against the side of her mouth, "have you been in touch with... former-Professor Sycamore? Descole?"

"My brother?" Layton filled in with a smile, crossing his arms. "He's sent me the occasional letter, though I cannot reply to them with no return address. Did you have something to do with that, Emmy?"

Emmy blushed, shrugging. "Yeah," she admitted. "I... ran into the Bostonius in South America, and Raymond suggested I join them... helped me persuade Desmond to let me." She grinned. "We travel the world, exploring, solving puzzles, helping people... I write reports, take pictures, and send 'em off to my boss to be edited and published." The grin faded a little. "It's a lot like what I used to do when I was your assistant, only without all the secrecy and betrayal."

"Which we've long since forgiven you for," Layton reminded her, giving Emmy a concerned look. "We'd already forgiven you when you left."

Emmy nodded in acknowledgement, but kept her guilty stare at her lap, staying silent.

The quiet moment was interrupted by a short, confident knock on the door, which was promptly opened to reveal a young woman in a peach-coloured dress, red-brown hair done up in a neat ponytail with a red ribbon. At her side was a young boy with messy crimson hair, clinging tightly to her arm with one hand as he stuck the other in his mouth. "Professor," the woman called, "I hope we aren't interrup- Oh!" She paused as she spotted Emmy in the extra chair by the desk. "I suppose we'd better come back la-"
"Emmy!" cried a voice behind her, and a tall young man wearing a blue cap pushed his way into the room, dashing towards Emmy with an excited grin. "You came back!"
Emmy stood up in surprise as she recognised Luke, just in time for him to grab her in a tight hug, his chin scratching against the side of her forehead with the tiniest hints of unshaven stubble. She laughed, then pushed her friend away, looking him up and down as he continued to grin widely at her. "Wow, Luke, when did you get so tall?" she asked.
Luke, by now long used to hearing the question from his friends in England, giggled as he shoved his hands in his pockets. "American mandate," he joked, giving her a wink. "They feed you growth hormones in your sleep."
Layton got out of his chair and waved Flora in, approaching the pair with a smile. "Flora, Alfendi, may I introduce Emmy Altava, an old friend of ours."
Alfendi frowned as he watched Emmy, who gave the pair a wave in greeting. Flora gasped, smiling in recognition of the name. "Oh! You're that Emmy! I've heard a lot about you from the Professor and Luke!"
"I wish I could say the same," Emmy replied, clasping her hands behind her back in mild nervousness. "It's nice to meet you, Miss...?"
Layton smiled, looking at Emmy as he gestured to Flora and Alfendi. "Emmy, I'd like to properly introduce you to my adoptive children; Flora Reinhold and Alfendi Layton." Emmy blinked in surprise. "Oh, you're...?" she replied, looking at Flora. "I always thought you were his new assistant."
Flora giggled, deciding to let go of Alfendi's hand. "Well, before I started finding my own path in life, I did help the Professor out when I could," she explained. "Luke was usually better at it than me, before he moved away."
"I don't think so," Luke replied, shrugging. "I just had more experience!"
Before anyone else could speak up, Emmy suddenly jumped back with a cry of "Ha!", dodging a feeble punch from a very surprised Alfendi standing at her side. Grinning, she dropped into a crouch and grabbed the boy's outstretched hand. "Thought you could sneak up on a master of martial arts, eh?"
"Woah," Alfendi muttered under his breath, staring at Emmy with wide eyes.
"Which reminds me," Layton said, crossing his arms and giving Alfendi a stern glare. "You have something to say to Emmy about yesterday, don't you, Alfendi?"
Alfendi looked back at his father, then to Emmy, thinking to himself for a moment before pointing his eyes at the floor. "Sorry," he muttered.
"It's alright," Emmy replied, smiling at the boy as she released his hand. "Next time, I'll just throw you into a headlock." Giving the awestruck boy a wink, she got to her feet and turned to Luke as though nothing had happened. "Oh yes, I was going to ask you what you've been getting up to since I left, Luke! You've been in America, I take it?"


Luke nodded, grinning. "Yep! That was a couple years after you left!" As Flora shooed Alfendi into his play-corner and settled herself on the sofa, Luke began to explain...

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
Alfendi seemed nervous as he clung to his father's hand, almost hiding behind it as he peered out at the passers-by as they walked down the street. "Can we go home yet?" he meekly asked, hands curling around the Professor's fingers.

"Not yet, I'm afraid," Layton replied with a reassuring tone. "Look, we're almost at the cafe now."

Flora gasped in excitement as she spotted a small sea of tables under a large awning, and a familiar brown-haired woman standing within, facing away from them. "I can see Emmy!" she cried, and dashed ahead, waving in their friend's direction. "Emmy, over here!" It didn't take long for Emmy to hear Flora's calls, and the two were quickly happily greeting each other as Flora made her way through the sea of tables.

Luke giggled. "At least we found her quickly!" he pointed out, walking alongside the Professor as he sent him a grin.

Layton smiled, adjusting his hat as he watched the two women happily chatting away as they sat down. "And it appears she brought a friend along."

"Huh?" Luke turned back to inspect the selected table, and noticed a third figure, wearing a black-and-grey cloak, sitting next to Emmy. As Luke recognised the brown hair curled around where he was used to seeing a white boa, he almost stopped in his tracks, just barely keeping pace with Layton and Alfendi as his shocked expression deepened into a frown. "What's he doing here?"

"Now now," Layton whispered, giving Luke a stern look. "He's a different person now."

"How can you know that?" Luke hurriedly hissed back, casting nervous glances at the rapidly approaching table as they entered under the awning of the cafe. "We haven't seen or heard from him in years!"

Layton didn't answer for a moment. "Give him a chance, then," he replied, then turned to the visiting pair with a wide smile, tipping his hat. "Emmy! A delight to see you again!"

Emmy, who had sat with her back to them, looked around with a grin. "Professor! Luke! Glad you could make it!" She then threw a wink to Alfendi, who was still clinging to Layton's hand as he stared up at her. "Oh, and you too, Alfendi. Come sit down! You two remember Desmond here, don't you? We've been travelling together the past few years!"

The caped man turned to give the pair a nod, somewhat nervously adjusting the red glasses perched on his nose. "Layton."

"Of course," Layton said in answer to Emmy, tipping his hat to Sycamore with a smile before leading Alfendi around the table to sit next to Flora, himself taking the empty seat between Alfendi and Emmy. "Always a pleasure to meet old friends again," he added.

seat open if you want to sit down."

At that, Luke gave the man a frown. "I don't need to be told what to do, Descole."

"Luke," Layton called in warning as the teen moved to take the remaining empty seat, between Flora and Sycamore.

"There's no need for such hostility," Sycamore calmly replied, almost seeming more comfortable being greeted with anger than kindness as he crossed his arms underneath his cape. "We parted as friends, did we not?"

Luke only glared at the man as he sat at Flora's side, edging his chair closer to her. "You may have saved my life once, but that doesn't make up for everything else you did," he replied. Sycamore only calmly returned Luke's stare, and a part of the teen wondered if he privately agreed before Luke quietened that part of him and continued, "If you've really changed, you have a lot to prove first."

Sycamore didn't reply, staring back at Luke in the resulting silence.

Luke and Sycamore's end of the table remained fairly icy as the minutes passed. Emmy, Flora and Layton, doing their best to brush past the situation, continued to happily chat as they drank the tea the group had ordered, occasionally casting nervous glances in Luke's or Sycamore's direction. Alfendi mostly ignored the table at large, eating a small plate of biscuits Flora bought for him or colouring an activity sheet one of the cafe's workers gave him. Although Sycamore was happy to politely respond to any questions Flora and Layton had for him about the years since he'd left, Luke kept quiet, avoiding eye contact and giving short answers when Emmy or Flora tried to entice him to join the conversation.

Eventually, Alfendi began to tug on his father's sleeve. "Papa! Papa!"

When Layton obediently leaned down, Alfendi held up a hand and whispered something into the Professor's ear. Layton smiled at the boy. "In that case, we'd better ask where the men's room is, hmm?" Standing from his chair, he gave the rest of the table an apologetic tip of his hat. "We'll be right back," he assured them, helping Alfendi climb off his chair and leading the boy into the cafe.

The resulting silence as Layton temporarily left the conversation would have been a comfortable one, and was for several moments, before Sycamore again turned to Luke, a look on his face somewhere between sympathetic and his usual stern neutral. "We heard what happened to your parents," he said. "My condolences."

Flora and Emmy sent each other worried looks.

Luke took a moment to respond, having been staring at the table. When he did react, he started by looking up at Sycamore with a glare. "When did you ever care about my mum and dad?" he asked, strangely quiet despite the anger in his tone. "You locked Mum in the cellar for six months. You told Dad you'd kill her if he didn't do what you wanted. You let me believe they'd had a fight and everything strange that was happening was because of my dad. So, I re-iterate: When did you ever care about me or my family?"

There was a long silence after Luke's calm outburst. Flora and Emmy glanced at each other, wondering if they should speak up or not, but Sycamore beat them to it, pressing his glasses to his face with a sigh. "I suppose it's true. I was never friends with Mister and Missus Triton; I couldn't afford to be, since it would endanger my mission. I did know I would never be required to actually end their lives, since it was clear they cared about each other and you too much to endanger anyone." He paused, looking away. "I... did think, perhaps, those few weeks we spent together on the Bostonius had made the two of us at least friendly acquaintances, despite what happened. I did once try to kill you in Ambrosia, but I saved your life in the Azran Sanctuary, so I believed that particular sin was paid for. And..." He met Luke's angry gaze, his brown eyes a mixture of sadness and a fury that was dulled by time. "I do know what it's like to lose your entire family in one fell swoop. If nothing else, I can empathise with what that feels like."

Luke stared back, feeling his anger fade away and be replaced with guilt. "I... I still can't forgive you," he replied, keeping his stare stern. "Not yet."

"I have no expectation I will be forgiven for my actions," Sycamore replied, crossing his arms and closing his eyes. "To be perfectly honest, I only came here today because Emmy begged me to."

"I didn't beg," Emmy protested, one hand on her hip. "I requested you join me because I thought it would be good for you!"

Sycamore opened his eyes and turned to Emmy with an amused smile. "With you, there is precious little difference."

At that moment, the group heard the unmistakable sound of a giggling child from very close by. Flora looked around in confusion. "Alfendi?"

Sycamore cried in shock and jumped to his feet, knocking his chair back with a screech of metal on concrete. He gripped the edges of his cloak, looking down with wide eyes at a small redhead boy peeking out from under the table, looking back up at him with a mischievous grin. "Uh..." Before anyone could say anything more, Alfendi had run at Sycamore, pulling himself inside the cape and giggling as he proceeded to hide within.

"Alfendi!" Luke cried, unsure how to best extricate the boy from the cape. "Leave Professor Sycamore alone!"

Sycamore sighed as he looked over to Luke. "Just 'Mister' Sycamore, I'm afraid," he explained, sounding a touch exasperated. "I haven't been a professor for a number of years now."

Layton came running up to the group, looking worried. "Has Alfendi...?"

"He's here," Flora quickly assured him with a smile, gesturing to Sycamore. "Playing with his uncle."

Layton sighed in relief, looking over to where Alfendi was still giggling as he hid in Sycamore's cape. "Alfendi, you must stop running off like that."

Sycamore lifted a section of his cape and watched the happy boy within with a smile. "That's right, I am your uncle, aren't I?" He chuckled, looking up at Layton with a smirk. "Are you sure he isn't biologically yours, Layton? He's got the Bronev nose..."

Layton lowered his eyelids in an almost uncharacteristic sarcastic stare. "I'm sure." He pulled a watch from a pocket and inspected the time. "In any case, I think it's time we got going. The two of you are leaving London tonight, are you not?"
Emmy nodded, also standing from her chair. Sycamore was still busy with the giggling boy running around under his cape, watching Alfendi with a smile. "And to think, I only wore this today because I thought it was cold out," he commented to himself.

Flora laughed as she ran to try and coax her brother out of hiding. "Come on, Alfendi, it's time to say goodbye to Emmy and Uncle!" She then paused, looking up at Sycamore apologetically. "Oh, um, you don't mind if we call you that, do you? Given you're the Professor's brother? If you're uncomfortable with it-

"I don't mind," Sycamore assured her, the smile on his face a mix of sadness and pride. "You are my niece and nephew, after all."

While Flora giggled and turned her attention to persuading Alfendi out from underneath Sycamore's cloak, Emmy turned to Luke. "Hey Luke, you said you're living in California now, right?"

Luke nodded, becoming the last to stand from his chair at the table as the group began to leave the cafe's seating area. "Mm hmm. L.A., specifically."

"Well, if we ever happen to be in the area," Emmy continued with a smile, throwing an arm around Luke's shoulders, "how would we find you? You've got an address, right?"

Giggling, Luke returned her smile. "That's easy! Just look up the Wright Talent Agency!" He gave her a proud grin, hands on his hips in his best imitation of Apollo and Trucy's stage personas. "There's only one place to go if you want it done Wright!"

Sycamore smiled in amusement, pulling his cape tight around his shoulders. "I see, 'Wright' as in the name. Very clever."

Emmy only smirked at Sycamore. "No wonder you like it, with your terrible sense of humour!"

Sycamore only glared at her in return.

"Dad?"

"Hey Apollo. Are you free right now?"

"I'm not doing anything important. What is it? Why'd you call me?"

"Aw, am I not allowed to simply wish to hear your voice? Haha!"

"... Well, this is me talking. What is it, Dad?"

"Surely you've noticed what tomorrow is."

"Tomor?- Oh, yeah, duh. I was planning to spend the day with you guys, as usual. Will you be at home, or...?"

"Up in Kurain again, actually. That seems to be a tradition, now."

"... Huh, you're right. Every second year. So I'll meet you guys at the train station then?"

"If you want. We were planning to torture poor Luke and get the ten-past-eight train so we can catch the first bus into Kurain."

"Hasn't he usually got over the jetlag by now?"

"You can meet us for the same train, or catch a later one. It's up to you."

"No, I'm fine getting up that early. I had a class at that time this term. I'll meet you guys at the station."

"Alright. We'll see you tomorrow morning, then. Love you."

"Love you, Dad."

Apollo and Clay's Apartment
Living Room

Apollo ran a hand over his hair as he entered the main room of the small apartment he shared with his best friend. "Clay?"

"Down here, dude," Clay called, and Apollo noticed the black-haired young man stretched across the sofa, waving in his friend's direction. "You want something?"

"Sort of," Apollo replied, walking around and gingerly sitting next to Clay's feet. He gestured with the phone in his hand. "My dad just called. I'm gonna be gone all day tomorrow and the morning of the day after to spend Christmas with my family."

Clay thought for a moment. "Huh." He then smiled at Apollo. "Can I come?"

Apollo frowned. "Your dad hasn't asked to spend it with you?"

Sighing, Apollo shook his head. "We're not staying at the Agency," he explained. "We're staying with Dad's girlfriend again."

Clay paused, then looked up at Apollo in shock. "Your dad has a girlfriend!?

Apollo remembered too late that he and Luke had been keeping that particular factoid to themselves for a reason, and slapped a palm over his face. "Shouldn't've mentioned that."

"Now I have to come!" Clay cried, sitting up and giving Apollo a wide grin. "I didn't know Mister Wright had a girlfriend!"

"It's not that exciting," Apollo pointed out, glaring at Clay as he stood up. "It's Maya, Pearly's cousin. I've told you about her before, remember? Trucy calls her 'Mom'?

Clay scoffed, watching Apollo walk off. "But you didn't mention she was doing it with your dad!"

Apollo shouted in disgust, stopping in his tracks to shoot Clay a horrified look. "Ergh! Don't put that mental image in my head! That's the last thing in the world I want to be thinking about!" As Clay only laughed, he shook his head, trying to clear his mind of the thought of his father's sex life. "Dad and Maya are supposed to be a secret, anyway!" he argued.

Clay stopped laughing and thought for a moment. "Oh they are, are they?" he asked, grinning mischievously.

Apollo crossed his arms and shot his friend a glare, recognising what he was doing. "Don't you dare."

"Tell you what," Clay said, pushing himself off the sofa with a smug smile and nonchalantly ambling to Apollo's side. "You let me come along, and it stays a secret!" He propped an elbow on Apollo's shoulder, resting his weight on his friend as he leaned his grinning face close to Apollo's half-lidded stare. "We got a deal, dude?"

Apollo stared at Clay for several moments before sighing and pushing his friend off his shoulder. "I'm not the one to be asking permission from, anyway," he pointed out. "I'd have to ask Maya, and I don't think she'd be happy with some random stranger joining us at the last minute."

Clay only continued to grin, hands on his hips. "Aw, too bad," he said. "I guess if your answer is no, I'll just have to resort to desperate measures!" He reached into a pocket with one hand.

As he realised what Clay was doing now, Apollo's eyes widened in surprise. "Don't you dare!" he repeated, hands curling into fists.

Pulling his phone out of his pocket, Clay studied it idly, still grinning. "Hmm, I've been meaning to call that cute girl Sandra from my architecture class!"

"No!"
"I'm sure she'd love to hear all about your dad's secret girlfriend!" Clay continued to tease, ignoring Apollo's protest.

Apollo groaned loudly, rolling his eyes and throwing his hands in the air. "Fine! I'll ask Maya if it's okay for you to come!"

"Aw, thanks, dude!" Clay said with a grin as Apollo stomped off into the hallway. "You're the best!"

Apollo brushed Clay off with a sigh, pausing in the door to give his friend one final warning. "I'll ask her, but I'm telling you she's gonna say 'no'!"

Fey Manor
Winding Way

"I can't believe you said yes to this."

Maya laughed as she watched Pearl and Trucy drag Clay off to show him the rest of the Manor. "I don't know why you're so surprised!" she pointed out, elbowing her unofficial son with a grin. "You and Luke are always talking about your 'best friend Clay'! You made me curious!"

Apollo huffed, brushing her off. "He's only interested in you because I accidentally mentioned the thing between you and Dad."

"You make it sound like they have some fearsome, tentacled creature sitting between them," Luke remarked with a smile.

Phoenix laughed, gesturing to Luke as he pointed out the eighteen-year-old was currently standing exactly between him and Maya. "Would that make it you, then?"

Luke giggled. "I guess so!" he replied, then, ignoring Apollo's eye-rolling, headed off in the direction of the house. "I'd better check the girls aren't mistreating Clay."

Maya waved at Luke as he went. "While you're there, better tell the girls about this creature of Apollo's!" she called with a wink.

Apollo sighed, covering his face with one hand. Once the still giggling Luke had disappeared back inside, the elder Wright brother turned to Maya and Phoenix with a curious frown. "By the way, do you have any plans for how we're spending today? I know we're leaving early tomorrow morning."

Maya and Phoenix gave each other a knowing smile before turning to Apollo with innocent shrugs. "Maybe," Phoenix answered.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Meaning yes," he pointed out.

"Maybe," Maya repeated, identical mischievous grins on her and Phoenix's faces.

Apollo sighed and followed Luke back into the house.

Phoenix wrapped an arm around Maya, watching Apollo disappear inside. "So do you think he'll explode with anger or excitement when he finds out? Or maybe just freeze in shock?"
Maya giggled. "I think his poor little fanboy mind is going to implode. Then maybe he'll dig out a list of questions for her and spend the whole time dogpiling her with them!" Phoenix laughed, and Maya planted a quick kiss on his cheek, only to draw back with an amused frown. "Ugh, you need to shave! Almost cut my lips to ribbons with that old man stubble!"

"'Old man'!?" Phoenix shot back, rubbing his chin with a smile. "I'll have you know I'm only thirty-one! That's a respectable age for a father of three!"

Maya scoffed, rolling her eyes. "Whatever you say, old man!"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "You do realise you're the same age right now that I was when you first started calling me that?"

Maya just grinned. "Yeah, but I'm one of those forever-young types. You were born old!"

Phoenix shook his head with a laugh, as the two tightened their grip on each other. After a pause, he looked to Maya with a concerned frown. "Are you and Pearls all set up for tonight? You've talked it over with her?"

"Of course I have," Maya assured him. "Pearly's decided she's going to do the honours."

"Not you?"

Maya shook her head. "I was all ready to; I got pretty insistent with Pearly that she should get to celebrate today with everyone here, but she was more insistent that I get to do that instead." She shrugged, blushing a little. "I guess she wants me to be conscious for all of my break from work. I don't often get time off."

"Nope," Phoenix agreed, resting his head on Maya's. "Won't this be the first time we get to see Mia together? Since... you know."

"Since you stopped being a dork and admitted you liked me back?" Maya filled in with a grin.

Phoenix lifted his head to shoot Maya a quick glare. "I wasn't going to put it quite like that..."

Maya giggled. "Nah. You came up for my birthday this year, remember?"

"Oh yeah, while Trucy was at school," Phoenix realised. "Forgot about that."

From somewhere inside the house, the pair heard the distant shouts of Apollo arguing with Trucy. Clay's voice soon joined them, seemingly trying to escalate the argument for his own amusement, while Luke's pleading tone entered the fray in a valiant-though-fruitless attempt to calm everything down.

Phoenix smiled. "Ten bucks Apollo loses it tonight."

"You're on, old man."

After dinner, Pearl had quickly taken charge of the extended family's movements and dragged everyone into the living room, where there was a traditional Japanese table called a kotatsu set up - a low table with a blanket spread out underneath, and a heater to keep the underside warm. Clay had instantly fallen in love with the invention, and sat underneath it with a massive grin on his face as Pearl promptly set out a pile of her board games for the five 'kids' to play while Phoenix and Maya watched from the sidelines.

As a heated game of Mouse Trap came to an end, Trucy eagerly grabbed Monopoly to set up as Pearl packed the previous game away in its box. "This one is rather fragile," the young spirit medium explained, getting to her feet with box in hand. "I'd better put it back right away, just in case."

"We're not going to throw it across the room or anything," Apollo pointed out, one eyebrow raised. "I know," Pearl replied with a smile. "You guys keep on playing without me. I'll be back as soon as I can."

Clay scoffed. "Uh, you're just worried you'll lose at Monopoly!" he laughed. "Go ahead, I don't blame ya, dude! No-one beats the Clayster!"

"Ha!" Trucy cried, poking Clay in the arm with a smirk. "You're not gonna beat me! I'm gonna be the doggy!"

"Hey, I wanted to be the dog!" Luke protested.

"You can be the top hat!" Trucy replied with a smile, sliding the small metal piece across the table to her brother. "And Polly can be the shoe!"

Apollo sent his sister a glare. "No way, you can be the shoe."

Pearl smiled as she stepped away from the table, packed-up board game in hand. As she passed Phoenix and Maya, she sent them a gleeful grin and a wink, which Maya returned as the girl slipped out of the room.

"Step one..." Phoenix whispered to Maya with a smile.

After some more arguing over the pieces they would claim as their own, the Wright kids and Clay started their game. It wasn't more than a couple of minutes before a figure appeared in the doorway, unnoticed by the four at the table. Maya looked up with a grin, elbowing Phoenix to alert him to the new arrival.

"Grunting in pain at the assault to his ribs, Phoenix looked over to the door, smiling as he recognised the figure standing there, fitting Pearl's clothes much better than she had in years long past. Getting to his feet, he walked over to the table and rested a hand on Apollo's head, ruffling the young man's hair and causing him to groan in exasperation. "Okay kids, better put your game on hold for a while."

"What's going on, Mister Wright?" Clay added, confused.

Trucy pouted. "But I'm winning!" she cried.

Apollo raised an eyebrow at his sister, pulling Phoenix's hand off his head. "We only just started the game. No-one is winning."

Phoenix grinned, jerking his head in the direction of the door. "We have a visitor," he said.

The four stared at him in confusion for a moment, before turning to look at the entranceway. Stood at the edge of the light, arms crossed in front of her large bust, was a woman wearing Pearl's pink robes (reshuffled a little to better fit her larger frame), with Pearl's hazel bangs framing her face. She smiled at the group, though she stayed stood where she was and made no attempt to approach them.

"May I introduce," Phoenix continued, delighting in seeing Luke's and Apollo's shocked expressions (the pair having quickly twigged as to who she was) and Clay's and Trucy's more confused ones, "my former mentor and Maya's older sister, Mia Fey." As Trucy gasped in shock, Phoenix leaned down towards Apollo, who was still staring wide-eyed in Mia's direction. "Surprise."

Before anyone else could react, Trucy was on her feet, racing around the table towards the woman. "AUNTIE MIA!" she shouted, latching her arms around Mia's waist and sending her hat flying.

Mia looked surprised at the title, but quickly warmed to the girl and patted her head. "It's nice to meet you," she said.

Luke was the next to stand, retrieving Trucy's hat from the floor. "It's a pleasure to finally meet you, Mia!" he told her, tipping his cap with a grin. "Papa and Maya have told us a lot about you!"

Mia seemed amused. "And they've told me a lot about you in return," she said, watching the grinning Trucy release her from the hug. "You're a perfect young gentlemen in blue, which makes you Luke, correct? And you, the little magician girl, must be Trucy."

Trucy nodded, not reacting as Luke replaced her hat on her head. "That's us!" she cried.

His eyes fixed on Mia, Clay leaned over towards where Apollo was still frozen in his seat. "Dude," he whispered, "why's she wearing the same clothes as Pearly? And the same hair, even?"

Phoenix grinned at Clay. "Have Luke and Apollo not explained the 'spirit-channelling' thing to you yet?"

"Wait, this has to do with that!?!" Clay replied, somehow looking even more confused than before.

Chuckling at Clay's confusion, Phoenix poked Apollo in the shoulder. "Go and say hello," he prompted him. "She's not gonna bite."

Knocked out of his frozen stare, Apollo gave Phoenix a terrified look. "Get up and talk to her!??" he hissed at his father. "Just like that!?!"

Mia looked up from where she had been talking to Luke and Trucy, fingers brushing against her cheek. "You're Apollo, aren't you? Are you going to join us?"
As Apollo looked back up at Mia in terror, Trucy grinned and waved at him. "C'mon, Polly! Come and talk to Auntie Mia!"

Maya restrained a giggle, giving the young man a cheeky smile. "You're not scared, are you?" she asked.

"N-no," Apollo muttered, turning red. Reluctantly, he got to his feet. "Why would I be?"

"Exactly!" Luke added, trying to reassure his brother. "After all, everything worked out fine the first time you met Papa, right?"

Apollo temporarily recovered enough from his fear enough to scoff. "Yeah, but Dad's a huge dork."

Phoenix frowned. "Hey..."

Mia smiled to herself, amused. "Well, we all have our moments," she cryptically agreed. "You're the one who's studying to be a defence attorney, right?"

Although still blushing in nervousness, Apollo nodded. "I-I've read all your case-files that Dad kept," he explained, beginning to smile. "You were really talented."

"Thank you," Mia replied with a grateful chuckle, "but that's only because I had a lot of practise. I'm sure Phoenix would agree."

Phoenix laughed, ruffling Apollo's hair to the latter's annoyed disapproval. "With Apollo, maybe!" he said, ignoring said son's glare as he shoved Phoenix's hand off his head. "I might have gotten up there with another year or two under my belt, though!"

Luke tapped his chin in thought, then turned to Mia. "That reminds me, did you ever have a fanclub, Mia? I'm sure you must have had fans."

Mia seemed confused for a moment, then shot an embarrassed Maya a knowing smile. "I'm afraid not," she replied with a neutral tone. "At least, not to my knowledge. I know Maya started one for Phoenix, though."

Clay raised an eyebrow in Maya's direction, then rolled his eyes and stood. "Okay, um, I'm really confused here, so I think I'll go and find where Pearly disappeared to, 'kay?"

Trucy and Maya simultaneously snorted in amusement, while Mia and Luke hid smiles (Phoenix, while he also smiled, made no attempt to hide his grin). Apollo simply rolled his eyes at his friend. "Yeah, good luck with that," he muttered.

Clay frowned. "Huh?"

"You're not gonna find her!" Trucy explained with a giggle.

"Clay, I know we've explained spirit channelling to you," Luke tried to add with a sympathetic smile. "Pearl's not here. She's channelling Mia." When Clay only continued to look confused, Luke's smile morphed into a worried frown. "Apollo explained who Mia was, didn't he?"

"Wait, why is it my job to explain that to him!?" Apollo objected.

Luke shrugged. "I thought you had!" he said. "I mean, you two live together at the moment, and... You're a fan of her like you were of Papa, right?"

"N-no!" Apollo insisted, turning red again.
Clay smirked. "Oh ho, really?"

"Shut up, Clay," Apollo muttered at his friend with a glare. "You weren't even supposed to be here today!"

"Aw, what kind of thing is that to say to your best friend on Christmas?" Clay replied with a mischievous grin.

Apollo only rolled his eyes.

Phoenix moved to sit back down at Maya's side, watching Mia direct the kids to sit down again so she could talk with them more comfortably. Trucy quickly erupted into questions, pulling Mia to sit at her side of the kotatsu, which Mia attempted to answer through Apollo trying to quieten his sister with the claim she was being annoying. Phoenix grinned at Maya. "I think they all like each other," he whispered.

Maya grinned, giving Phoenix a wink. "You owe me ten bucks, Nick."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "According to who?"

"Apollo didn't 'lose it', did he?" Maya pointed out with a smug grin. "I win the bet!"

"Pfft, yeah right!" Phoenix quietly scoffed. "He totally lost his mind in awe. Were you even paying attention?"

Maya shook her head at Phoenix's joking smile. "Nuh-uh, don't you use that lawyer-speak on me! I won, fair and square!"

Phoenix restrained a laugh, shooting a quick glance at the table, where Apollo was now eagerly asking Mia various questions about some of her cases while Trucy stared at him in confusion, Clay and Luke smiling with varying levels of amusement. Assured he wasn't disturbing them, Phoenix leaned in close to Maya with a grin. "Aw, I'm afraid I don't have any cash on me," he said. "You wouldn't happen to accept kisses as payment, would you?"

Maya hummed in thought, biting her lip to hide a smile. "I think I can accept them just this once," she whispered, and giggled as she and Phoenix began to exchange swift smooches.

"Mommy, Daddy!" Trucy suddenly cried angrily from the table. "Stop that! We're trying to talk to Auntie Mia and you're being gross!"

"Really, Truce? 'Gross'?" Phoenix repeated with a laugh, looking up to see that Trucy's protests had attracted the attention of the whole table, Mia looking apologetic while Clay and Luke just seemed confused.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Yeah, maybe you two could get a room if you're gonna do that," he agreed.

Phoenix laughed as he stood up. "I'm being ganged up on by my own children!"

Maya only crossed her arms, fixing Apollo with a mischievous smile. "Are you sure you want me and your dad off on our own?" she asked. "We might get into all sort of 'trouble'... if you know what I mean."

After a moment of confusion, Apollo and Luke suddenly recoiled with cries of disgust, while Trucy wrinkled up her nose and stuck out her tongue. "Don't even imply that!" Apollo cried.
"Whatever you two do alone, I don't want to know about it!" Luke agreed.

Maya cackled in glee as she stood up, gesturing for Phoenix to follow her as she left the room.
"C'mon, Nick! Let's give the kids some room, shall we?"

As the couple disappeared into the hallway, Apollo levelled a glare at Trucy. "I hope you're proud of yourself for that," he mumbled.

The door into their small dressing room opened with a bang, causing Apollo to jump as he looked up from going over the Gramarye siblings' magic props. "Geeze Truce, where've you been!?” he cried, turning to face his sister as she closed the door behind her. "I know we leave a lot of leeway, but-!” He paused, noticing Trucy glaring into the distance and rubbing at her eyes, trying to hide a sniff. "You okay, Trucy?"

The twelve-year-old girl rubbed at her eyes once more. "Mm hmm," she insisted, jerking her head up and down in a brief nod.

Apollo stared at her for a moment more before walking to her side, leaning closer to his sister's height and resting a hand on her shoulder in concern. "Truce, what's the matter?” he quietly asked.

Trucy sniffed, then looked up to meet her brother's eyes with an unmistakably tear-stained face. "I had a fight with Daddy,” she admitted.

Apollo was surprised to hear that, as it wasn't very often their father truly got mad. Whatever it had been about, it was clearly something dear to Trucy, so he gave his sister a sympathetic smile and guided her to the chairs by their makeshift vanity. "Here, come sit down and tell me all about it."

Trucy sniffed again, then looked up to meet her brother's eyes with an unmistakably tear-stained face. "I had a fight with Daddy,” she admitted.

Apollo watched his sister with concern. "He did say he'd think about it, though. Next year."

"Of course," Apollo sighed, rolling his eyes.

"So I thought,” Trucy continued, "since he agreed to do that, I might ask him about getting my ears pierced."

Apollo watched his sister with concern. "He turned that down too?"
Trucy paused a moment, then nodded again. She reached a hand into the bag at her hip. "I bought these this week," she said, pulling something out that was hidden in her fist, "and I thought Daddy might agree once he saw what I wanted to wear." She held out her hand, uncurling her fingers to show Apollo a pair of shiny, gold-coloured earrings, shaped like diamonds. Although the front was pointed, the back was flat, and Apollo could easily see the studs that marked where they would hang from an earlobe. He held out a hand to look at the diamonds, and was surprised when Trucy grabbed his hand and dropped the earrings into it. "They match my buttons," she pointed out, "and the white diamonds on our capes, and the gold goes with the beads and our pins."

"Yeah, they'd fit our general design scheme really well," Apollo agreed, rolling the earrings around in his hand for a moment before looking back up at his sister in concern. "Dad still didn't listen?"

Trucy nodded with a morose look. "He got upset that I was 'wasting my money' on a pair of earrings, and said I'm never going to wear them while I'm under his roof," she quietly explained, beginning to tear up again as she recalled the argument. "So I... I said my other Daddy would have let me wear them, then Daddy got angry and said I was welcome to go find him if I could, then I noticed it was getting late, so I came here."

Apollo blinked for a moment in shock, having not realised such harsh words had been exchanged. He doubted Trucy's departure from home had been as calm that night as she'd unintentionally implied. "Oh man, Truce..."

"And before I left, I..." Trucy continued, her voice breaking as the tears began to fall. "I told Daddy I wasn't coming back!" With a wail, she leapt across the small space onto her brother's chair, her hat sent flying as she wrapped her arms around Apollo's neck and cried into his shoulder, knocking his own hat askew.

Apollo was surprised for only a moment before he wrapped his arms around his sister in comfort, removing one arm only briefly to move the diamond earrings and his hat to the small table where they were out of the way. "Aw, Truce, it'll be okay," he mumbled into her ear, helping her move into the more comfortable (for her; he was willing to sacrifice personal comfort for his sister's well-being) position of sitting in his lap instead of awkwardly leaning over him. 'I'd suggest you try out the Chords of Steel routine to help you cheer up, but backstage isn't exactly the place for it... There has to be something I can do for you, Trucy...'

Trucy hiccuped, tightening her grip on Apollo. "N-now Daddy thi-thinks I... I hate him!" she sobbed.

"I can promise you he doesn't," Apollo assured her, patting her back. "I'm sure Dad didn't mean what he said and knows you didn't mean what you said either."

Trucy sniffed a few moments more, still shaking a little in distress. Outside their door, Apollo could hear hushed voices and hurried footsteps, and realised with a glance at the clock that the show had started. They now had a fifty-minute countdown to the appearance of Apollo and Artemis Gramarye on stage, all bright and bushy-tailed as they always were in the spotlight, but it was looking increasingly likely it wouldn't be happening tonight. 'I hope Aderyn doesn't mind asking everyone to run a little long... or does she have a back-up act tonight to take our spot?'

The siblings sat in a long silence broken only by the occasional sob from Trucy. Apollo occupied his mind over the passing minutes by outlining an idea in his head, which quickly became more and more solid as he constructed a plan of action to help his little sister. 'It's kinda crazy, and I'll need to do a bit of research first,' he reasoned, 'but it's guaranteed to work. I think."

Eventually, Trucy moved her arms away from Apollo's neck, leaning back and rubbing at her eyes.
Apollo kept a hand at her back to help support her, a sympathetic frown on his face. "Are you up to going on-stage tonight?" he quietly asked. When Trucy didn't react, he added, "We need to make that decision now. Aderyn has to have time to organise filling the gap we'd leave."

Trucy thought for a long moment, staring at her hands folded in her lap. "I'll go on."

"Are you sure?"

Nodding firmly, Trucy stood and moved back to the other chair, attempting to dry her face with her already-wet gloves. "I just need to get my make-up on," she insisted, her voice hoarse. "I'll be fine."

Apollo watched her for a few moments to ensure she was certain about going ahead with the show, then sighed. Leaning forward and giving his sister a smile, he moved her hands away from her face. "I'll put your make-up on," he offered, grabbing a box of tissues from the table and handing it to Trucy. "I think you'll find these will dry your face better."

Trucy sniffed and nodded, feebly returning the smile as she took the box.

"You know what?" Apollo continued, moving his chair closer to hers. "There's that public holiday next Thursday. Since neither of us will have classes, want to come spend the day with me and Clay?"

Trucy looked up at her brother in surprise. "Really?" she asked.

Apollo nodded, pulling out their meagre make-up supplies ready to put on himself and his sister. "Apart from the times Dad drags me back home to have dinner with you, we don't really see each other outside of this place." He gestured to the building around them with a grin. "Dad won't mind letting us have some quality time together, would he?"

It took a few moments for Trucy to react, her confused frown slowly morphing into a grateful grin. "Yeah," she quietly agreed, more enthusiastically adding, "We'll have loads of fun with just the two of us!"

"That's more like it!" Apollo cheered. "Now hold still; We don't want to get foundation on your costume."

Wonder Bar
Backstage

If anyone noticed Artemis Gramarye was less cheerful than usual on stage that evening, they didn't bring it up to the little girl herself. Hiding her hoarse voice behind an ad-libbed 'disappearing voice trick gone wrong', Trucy did little more than smile at the audience, doing any of her talking through her puppet Mister Hat instead of as Artemis. Apollo, to her relief, had been quick to offer to take over for what he called 'the harder stuff', and bounced around the stage that night without a single hint to the audience that there was anything going on for the pair behind the scenes. Trucy's morose mood only seemed to be noticed by Aderyn and the other regular backstage staff, but, busy keeping everything running, none of them did anything more than send the pair concerned looks as they raced past.

Neither Apollo nor Trucy seemed to want to spend much time back in their dressing room as they came off-stage. Well-practised with their end-of-show routine, they didn't say a word to each other as they cleaned their faces and packed up their props for another night, ready to unpack them again the next day. While tidying their small vanity, Apollo quickly noticed Trucy's beloved diamond earrings still sitting by the mirror, where she seemed to be pointedly ignoring them. Deciding the sight of the items were only making her relive her earlier argument with Phoenix, Apollo took the earrings and slipped them into his bag, deciding he would keep them safe until Trucy next needed them.

Trucy was the first to finish, but, unwilling to leave on her own, she waited for Apollo. As he wrapped up with his preparations, he rested a hand on Trucy's shoulder and the pair left without a word, Trucy sticking close to Apollo's side as they made their way through to the back door.

Aderyn spotted the pair as they passed, running up to them with a cry of "Apollo! Trucy!" As the pair turned to look at her, she stopped in front of them with an embarrassed laugh, then turned to Trucy. "Hey, are you alright, kiddo? Did somethin' happen today?"

Trucy bit her lip, staring at the floor as she leaned on Apollo, who patted her shoulder comfortingly. "Sort of," he admitted. "We can handle it."

Aderyn still seemed concerned but, lacking the time to push, decided to leave it. "Oh, there was one thing I needed to tell you," she said, jerking a thumb in the direction of the back door. "Your dad was lookin' for ya. He's waiting outside."

Apollo wasn't sure whether to be annoyed or relieved Phoenix had come to meet them. "Thanks," he told their boss. "We'll see you tomorrow."

"Sure," Aderyn agreed, then, sending them one last concerned look, she hurried off back down the hallway.

The first thing Apollo noticed as he opened the back door of the restaurant was the thirty-one-year-old man in a hoodie and cyan beanie pacing not far away. Said man paused as he heard the door open, turning to look up at the pair with wide eyes, and Trucy, still hiding at Apollo's side, gasped, hands flying to her mouth. The trio stared at each other for a moment or two before Trucy tore herself away from her brother and ran to Phoenix, shouting, "I'M SO SORRY, DADDY!"

Phoenix grunted as the twelve-year-old collided with his chest, wrapping her arms around his waist. "No, Truce, I'm sorry," he told her, a pained expression on his face. "Um, maybe you could not hold me so tight, though...?"

"Oh," Trucy mumbled, releasing her father and sniffing as the tears returned to her eyes. "Sorry, Daddy."

"S'okay," Phoenix mumbled in response. Apollo noted with some pride that he looked equally as miserable as Trucy. "Truce, I promise I didn't mean what I said about kicking you out," Phoenix continued, crouching down to sit on his heels and looking up at his daughter, taking one of her hands in his. "I'd never leave my little girl out on the streets alone."

Trucy stared back at him, her free hand fiddling with the pin holding her cape on. "And I'm sorry I said that stuff about my other daddy," she quietly replied, blinking as the tears began to roll down her cheeks. "A-and that I wouldn't come home... I-I didn't mean it!" She jumped forward to again pull Phoenix into a hug, and he returned it with a sad smile. "I don't hate you, Daddy."

Phoenix softly chuckled, holding Trucy tighter. "No amount of disagreements could make me stop loving you."

Watching the pair from near the back door, Apollo found he couldn't help but feel a little bitter. 'None of this would have happened if you weren't so freakin' over-protective, DAD.' Not wanting to ruin the moment, or start a fight with Phoenix, he stayed silent and made sure to keep a neutral expression on his face. 'If all goes well, this whole issue will be resolved by this time next week anyway. As long as Dad doesn't actually lose it once I pull this off.'

Phoenix and Trucy finally broke their hug with relieved smiles, Phoenix getting back to his feet. "Aderyn told me you went ahead with your act," he said, looking between Trucy and Apollo as the latter slowly approached. "How'd it go?"

"Okay," Trucy replied with a shrug, then grinned at Apollo. "Polly and Mister Hat did all the talking for me."

Apollo half-smiled. "It was Trucy's call to go on-stage," he explained, then shrugged. "It wasn't our best show, but we entertained the audience and that's all we ever really aim to do."

Phoenix nodded. "I'm glad everything turned out," he said, and looked to Apollo with a tired smile. "I guess we'll see you tomorrow then, Apollo."
"Yeah," Apollo agreed, avoiding Phoenix's gaze by looking to his sister. "Hey Truce, we still on for Thursday?"

Trucy had to think a moment before she remembered what Apollo was talking about, and grinned widely. "Yeah! Definitely!"

Phoenix looked confused, looking between the pair. "Thursday...?"

"The public holiday?" Apollo explained, trying not to look nervous or possibly trigger one of his father's 'psyche-locks'. "Trucy's coming over to my place for the day."

Not seeming to see anything suspicious, Phoenix smiled. "Ah, okay. Sounds fun." He patted the top of Trucy's hat. "You're probably looking forward to some quality time with your brother outside of your job, huh?"

Trucy giggled, nodding.

Apollo hid a sigh of relief. 'Step one complete...'

You're thinking of doing WHAT!?

You promised you wouldn't tell! .

I'm not going to BREAK that promise! But... seriously!? Behind Papa's back like that!? Is it even LEGAL!?

YES ITS LEGAL. I looked it up. There's restrictions on minors for everything BUT the ears. She could do it herself if she wanted .

See? I've thought this whole thing out. By the time Dad notices there'll be nothing he can do about it .

Sorry Apollo, but I think you're underestimating Papa's powers of observation. He was a good lawyer for a very good reason.

And he loves to point out he isn't one anymore. Besides it took me pointing it out for him to even notice Trucy wore makeup onstage so I don't think he'll notice this .

Yes, but he IS an unbeaten poker player now, remember?

Fine, go ahead. Just be careful. If I'm right, and Papa notices, it's going to be Trucy who bears the punishment.

Trust me. Dad will never suspect a thing .

Apollo and Clay's Apartment
Living Room
Apollo grunted in annoyance as he shuffled the bits and pieces of a spacecraft model kit around the small coffee table, trying to make the small apartment look somewhat tidy. "Seriously Clay, I thought you grew out of these years ago...."

Clay huffed, only barely helping Apollo by moving some of the smaller pieces into a nearby box. "Excuse me, model kits are a very adult hobby," he argued, only to follow it up by childishly sticking his tongue out at his friend.

Apollo rolled his eyes, and decided not to respond.

At that moment, a knock echoed from the front door, and Apollo grinned, dropping what he was doing to race over to the front of the room, where the entrance to their apartment was. Throwing open the door, he greeted the pre-teen beyond with a wide smile. "Trucy!"

"Hi Polly!" Trucy chirped, bouncing into the apartment as Apollo closed the door behind her. Noticing Clay, she gave him a wave. "Hi Clay!"

"Yo," Clay replied, giving the girl a quick salute.

Trucy turned back to Apollo, giving him a wide grin. "So, what are we gonna do today?" she asked. "Did you have something in mind?"

Apollo had to keep himself from snorting in amusement. "You could say that," he said, winking.

Trucy frowned. "What's that supposed to mean?"

Biting his lip to hide a smile, Apollo pulled out his phone to check the time. "If I tell you, it'd ruin the surprise!" he claimed.

Trucy crossed her arms, looking unimpressed. "What are we doing?"

"You'll see," Apollo said, replacing his phone in his bag and quickly checking he had everything he needed. "I promise you'll love it. We probably need to leave about now to get there in time for our appointment, actually." Although Trucy looked sceptical, Apollo opened the front door again, waving in Clay's direction. "We'll see you when we get back, Clay!"

Clay briefly held up a hand in goodbye. "Later," he replied, smiling at Trucy as she sent him a suspicious glare before reluctantly following her brother out the door.

Even though it was a short walk to their destination, Apollo still had to bring up a map on his phone to ensure he was leading his sister in the right direction. Trucy remained wary, watching her brother carefully as he finally put his phone away with a smile, pointing to a shop-front across the road, a large sign above indicating its name was 'Frizz 'N Curlz Hair Salon'. "There it is!" he announced, taking his sister's hand to led her across the quiet road.

Trucy glared, looking between the shop front and Apollo. "That's a hairdresser," she pointed out.

Apollo only grinned, leading her to the door. "We're not here to cut hair, though," he said, pointing to a sign hanging nearby.

Confused, Trucy looked over the indicated sign. As she read the words ('Piercings available, Apollo grinned proudly, escorting his sister into the small shop. "I thought you might like this surprise!" he joked.

"I'm getting my ears pierced!" Trucy squealed happily, then stopped dead just inside the door, looking worried. "Wow, I'm getting my ears pierced..."

After informing the receptionist they were there for an appointment, Apollo took Trucy to sit down on a nearby sofa. "Are you alright?" he asked.

Trucy nodded, though she still looked worried. "Daddy's gonna notice," she pointed out, then frowned. "Will they even let me get earrings without him here?"

"Course they will," Apollo promised. "I'm a law student, remember? I looked it all up. 'And then had to explain what I found to both Clay and Luke, but that's neither here nor there.' He gave her a reassuring smile. "And don't worry about Dad noticing. I figure, if you get something small, we can cover it with tape and make-up and he won't see a thing." When Trucy only continued to look worried, he gave her a concerned frown. "If you want to back out now, you can. I did kinda spring this on you."

For a moment, Trucy seemed likely to agree, only to then frown and give Apollo a determined stare. "I'm gonna do it," she told him. "I don't care if Daddy doesn't like it. I'm getting earrings."

Apollo smiled. "Then let's do it."

A woman with a ring in one nostril came out and smiled at the pair. "So, which one of you am I mutilating today?"

Trucy looked confused, but Apollo grinned, pointing to his sister. "That'll be Trucy here."

"Trucy, huh?" the woman asked, giving the girl a friendly smile. "We going through your earlobes today?"

Although a little intimidated by the prospect of what was about to happen, Trucy forced a smile and nodded.

"Excellent!" the woman cried, clapping her hands together. "Come through to the back with me, and we'll have this all over with in a jiffy!"

As she led Trucy and Apollo into the back room, the woman introduced herself as Jade. "Honestly, there was never any other job I was going to go into," she joked as she pulled up a display of small, simple stud earrings, all paired off in their identical colours. "Not with the last name 'Pierce'!"

Trucy picked out a pair she thought was the least obtrusive, and Jade sat her down at what looked like a spare hairdressing table from the front room. After rubbing some kind of liquid on Trucy's ears (she didn't know what it was, but the strong smell reminded her of the Wonder Bar's kitchen, the few times she'd ended up in there), Jade marked with pen where on Trucy's ears the holes would be going. Once placement had been approved, a clamp-like contraption was affixed to Trucy's right earlobe and Jade sat in her rolling stool at the girl's side, her cart of tools right next to her.

"Stay perfectly still," Jade warned Trucy. "Don't move your head until I tell you, okay?"

Trucy almost nodded before remembering the instruction. "Okay," she replied, her voice shaking as she fought to stay calm.

Jade smiled, and Trucy swore she spotted a glimpse of a long, silver object in her hand. "Don't you worry, this won't hurt; You'll just feel a pinching. Stay calm and think about something else for a bit."

"Mmm," Trucy hummed in forced agreement, closing her eyes and trying to think of something, anything, other than her current situation.

"Hey Truce," Trucy heard Apollo say from somewhere to her left, "you'll never guess what happened before my lecture yesterday!"

Trucy frowned, a part of her wondering how he could sound so cheerful at a time like this... but she had to admit she was curious. "What?"

"There was this group of girls sitting in the row in front of me," Apollo began to explain. "They were really excited about this band they were fans of, called 'the Gaviners'."

"That's a weird name," Trucy replied with a frown.

Apollo laughed. "Yeah, that's what I thought! But, you remember Mister Gavin, right? One of Dad's friends?"

Trucy had to think for a moment, and restrained herself from nodding. "Yeah, I remember him. Don't see him so much since we stopped meeting Daddy at his work."

Anything Apollo might have said in reply was cut off as Trucy felt the pressure of the clamp on her right ear fade, although there was a distinct pinching feeling left behind that she definitely didn't want to focus on. "Okay, one ear down!" Jade announced, and Trucy, unwilling to move or open her eyes just yet, heard the woman roll her stool around to Trucy's left, where the girl soon felt the clamp taking hold of her other ear. "You're doing great so far, sweetie," Jade assured her.
"Yeah, like I was saying," Apollo continued, now from Trucy's right, and she wondered if Jade had signalled for him to keep talking. "I thought it was weird this band had a similar name to him, and I remembered he mentioned his brother was a performer, so I thought I'd ask the girls." He paused, sounding amused as he shortly added, "They pretty much confirmed my suspicions! Turns out the Gavinners are the band Mister Gavin's little brother runs!"

Trucy was surprised. "Wow, really?"

"Yup!" Apollo replied with a laugh. "But Mister Gavin also said his brother was a prosecutor, so I asked them about that, and they said something kinda weird."

"Weird how?"

"Turns out Klavier Gavin only ever prosecuted one case," Apollo explained. "They said he quit after to focus on the band."

Trucy thought for a moment. "Didn't Mister Gavin say he was still... being a lawyer?" she asked. "As well as doing his performing stuff?"

There was a pause before Apollo responded. "That's what confused me," he replied, and Trucy realised he must have nodded in the pause. "I've actually read the case-file of the one trial he ran, too. The weirdest thing, though, is-"

"And we're done!" Jade announced, interrupting Apollo's train of thought. "You can open your eyes now, sweetie."

Feeling a wave of mixed trepidation and excitement, Trucy gingerly peeked out of one eye first, then opened the other to join it. At first, she didn't see much out of the ordinary, but quickly noticed the small blue gems of the studs she had chosen winking at her from the centre of her earlobes, which seemed redder than usual but not enough to alarm her. Although she could feel the unusual pinching pressure of the studs inside her ear, she decided it wasn't painful. After a moment of careful observation, she grinned, and looked up at a proud Jade. "It looks great!"

Jade laughed. "It'll look better once they settle in, I promise!" she said, then started putting her equipment away.

Trucy turned to face Apollo, who mirrored her grin as he looked over her new additions. "They look awesome!" he assured her, and Trucy giggled.

"Some things you should know:" Jade interrupted, approaching the pair with a careful frown. "First of all, leave those studs in for six to eight weeks to let the wound heal. Under no circumstances take them out before three weeks; That's just asking for infection."

Trucy nodded, giving Jade a determined frown. "Don't touch 'em for eight weeks, got it!"

"I'd also recommend you keep something regularly in there for six months to a year," Jade added, smiling a little at the girl's serious reply. "Those holes will probably close up otherwise."

"Don't leave 'em empty!" Trucy replied, smiling. "Got it!"

Jade grinned. "Then we're done here," she said, looking to Apollo. "I'll take you up to reception to pay, and you can go enjoy the rest of your day!"

Apollo laughed, watching Trucy admiring her reflection in the mirror. "Oh, we'll definitely do that," he assured her.
Once at reception, Trucy bounded around admiring herself in every reflection she could catch, while Apollo went through the process of paying Jade for her services. She sent Apollo a wink as she clicked away on her computer. "So, you really know Klavier Gavin?"

Apollo shook his head. "Never met him. Our dad's an... acquaintance of his older brother."

Jade looked disappointed. "Aw. That's a shame. It'd be brilliant to meet the Klavier Gavin." She grinned. "Ah well. I'll always enjoy their music!"

Apollo sighed. 'I've really got to look this guy up.'

Guess who's proud of her new jewellery? :D

Awesome! Tell Trucy it looks great!
You're sure Papa won't notice that?

NO HE WONT, STOP ASKING THAT
Trucy bounced around the room a million times and said thx btw

Well, I guess Papa can't complain now they're in. Good luck hiding them.

No prob. As long as we watch what we say, Dad won't suspect a thing

I hope you're right, Apollo. For Trucy's sake, at the very least.

Apollo and Clay's Apartment
Bathroom

"Wow, are you guys sure you know what you're doing?" Clay asked, arms crossed as he leaned against the bathroom doorway, watching Apollo and Trucy as they stood by the sink, where the room's mirror hung. "It looks terrible."

Apollo sent his friend a glare, trying to apply make-up to Trucy's left ear so it didn't look quite so red (although it had calmed down since the piercing that morning). "If you've got several years worth of experience with this that we somehow don't know about," he said, a clear sarcastic tone to his voice, "then please feel free to speak up."

"We're doing our best!" Trucy added, fiddling with the tape covering the stud on her other ear. "We don't want Daddy to notice them!"

"Careful with that!" Apollo cried, motioning for Trucy to put both her hands down. "You'll pull it off!"

Clay grinned. "Y'know, before today, you Wrights never came across as the 'rebel' types. I'm impressed!"
Trucy pouted, clutching her hands tightly to keep from fiddling with Apollo's work. "Well, if Daddy had let me get earrings, Polly wouldn't have had to help me!"

Apollo snorted. "C'mon Truce, you would've done this on your own eventually anyway."

"I guess," Trucy agreed, shrugging. "I mean, I wouldn't have thought of it so quick on my own. I didn't even know I could just walk into a store and get my ears pierced without Daddy there!"

"I'm sure some places would've wanted your dad there," Clay assured her, still smiling in amusement. "Besides, you couldn't try and hide it from him without Apollo here!"

Apollo blushed, and pretended he hadn't heard her. "Okay, I think I've done all I can for that ear," he said, moving around to Trucy's other side, where he quickly moved her hair aside to get to work on her right.

Trucy stared into the mirror, studying the disguise on her left ear. After a moment, she smiled. "It looks good! I don't think you can tell at all there's an earring there!"

Clay looked more sceptical, rubbing his chin. "I dunno, it looks really lumpy. I don't think that's gonna slip by Mister Wright, especially if he sees her from the back."

"There's nothing I can do for the size of the studs," Apollo pointed out, shooting Clay a quick glare. "Dad doesn't have any reason to look at her ears anyway; He won't notice."

"You're sure about that?" Clay pushed.

"Yes," Apollo insisted with a frustrated sigh. "Honestly, you're as bad as Luke. Trust me, Dad won't see a thing."

Being well-trained in the art of spotting lies, it wasn't in Apollo or Trucy's nature to themselves distort the truth... off-stage, anyway. Being consummate actors, they didn't think it would be too hard a task, even if it was their father they were lying to. As long as they made sure not to directly lie or leave a question unanswered, Apollo insisted, Phoenix wouldn't see a single Psyche-Lock and would never have any reason to suspect there was anything going on.

That didn't stop them being nervous as they walked in the Agency's front door.

"Is that you, Trucy?" Phoenix called from the next room as the door closed behind them. "Is Apollo with you?"

The siblings gave each other a determined nod, then planted wide smiles on their faces as they strode through into the office, Trucy gleefully leading the way. "We're both here!" she announced, staying by the door as she noticed Phoenix sat behind the desk, giving him a wave. "We had lots of fun with Clay!" she boasted.

Apollo nodded in agreement, grinning at their father. "It's nice to spend some time together outside the Wonder Bar for once!"

Phoenix frowned as he looked between the two, only to quickly focus on Trucy. "Is there something wrong with your ears, Trucy?"

It took the pair a few moments to react, their smiling expressions unchanged. "Why would there be?" Trucy asked.

Apollo forced a laugh that he hoped sounded carefree. "I didn't let Trucy out of my sight all day; She didn't get into any trouble, Dad!"

Phoenix's frown deepened, and he stood from his chair. "I'd ask what the two of you are hiding, but from the available evidence, I think I can guess."

'Dammit, Luke!' Apollo mentally cried, keeping the calm smile on his face. 'Of all the times you couldn't be wrong!'

Trucy's smile started to falter, and she drew closer to Apollo, reaching for his hand. "G-guess what, Daddy?" As her hand found Apollo's, they gripped each other tightly, seeking and offering comfort as Apollo's plan fell apart around them.

Phoenix stepped out from behind his desk, gesturing to Trucy. "I suppose you two have been planning this all week, then?"

Apollo felt his sister's grip on his hand tighten, and he dropped any pretence of a smile, stepping in front of the twelve-year-old protectively. "Trucy didn't know anything about it. I surprised her."

"And how did you do it, huh?" Phoenix continued, stepping towards the pair with a glare. "Isn't there a law against body piercings without the presence of a parent?"

Apollo almost rolled his eyes. "It's friggin' legal to do the ears!" he almost shouted in frustration. "I'm a law student, I looked it up!" He looked back to Trucy with a sigh. "Why is that always the first question anyone asks!?" Without waiting for a reply, he turned back to Phoenix, who seemed vaguely surprised by the information. "If Trucy had the money on hand, she could have done this on her own, entirely legally. I just sped the process up."

Phoenix stared back at Apollo for several moments, then looked to Trucy with a stern frown. "Trucy, you're grounded."

"What!?" Trucy cried. "Why!?"

"Why do you think?" Phoenix replied, crossing his arms. "I told you 'no', and you just ignored me and went ahead anyway." He pointed at her ears with a glare. "You can remove those right now."

Trucy blinked, surprised, and her free hand flew to one of her ears. "But I can't!"

"You are perfectly capable of-

"No," Apollo interrupted, "she really can't." As Phoenix's questioning glare turned to him, he explained, "The woman who did it said taking out the studs in the first three weeks was inviting infection. Ideally, she shouldn't touch them for eight weeks, to let the wound heal."

Phoenix stared for a few moments, then sighed and returned his stern stare to Trucy. "In that case, you are grounded for as long as those studs stay in," he decided.

"What!?" Trucy cried.

"Once these eight weeks are up," Phoenix continued, "you are removing them."

"No!" Trucy shouted, her face turning red as she started to mirror Phoenix's anger but none of his calm. "I've wanted earrings for years! I'm not taking them out!"

"Too bad," Phoenix replied. "They are coming out, young lady."

"No, they're not!" Trucy shot back, letting go of Apollo's hand as she screamed at their father. "And if you make me take them out, I'll... I'll just get them re-done!"

"No, you will not."

"Yes, I will!"

Phoenix glared at Trucy for a few moments before sighing, seeming to realise she was determined to stand her ground on that point no matter the punishment. "Fine," he agreed.

Apollo blinked in surprise, daring to hope. 'Did we... finally convince him?'

"You can keep one."

Apollo's face fell. 'No, of course we didn't."

"One!?" Trucy cried in disbelief. "You can't have one earring!"

"Yes, you can," Phoenix replied, looking remarkably calm. "As I understand it, having only one can be somewhat fashionable."
"But they sell earrings in pairs!" Trucy pointed out. "Every time I found something pretty to wear, I'd be wasting money on an extra one I can't use!"

"You should have thought of that before you pierced your ears without permission," Phoenix insisted, although Apollo thought it was ludicrous to genuinely expect her to have foreseen the direction of this conversation. "I'm already being very generous allowing you to keep the one, anyway. You either agree to that, or they both come out." He stared at Trucy expectantly. "Which will you go for?"

Apollo watched Trucy as she continued glaring at Phoenix, thinking his ultimatum over. Finally, she stood on her tiptoes, trying to look more aggressive to their father. "Fine!" she cried, and pointed to her right ear, mostly hidden behind her hair. "I'll take out this one! You can barely see it anyway!"

With that, she pushed past Phoenix and stormed out towards the kitchen. A moment later, her angry footsteps could be heard thumping up the stairs towards her room.

Phoenix's eyes were closed in the aftermath of the argument. Apollo, recognising this was the ideal time for him to leave, stepped back towards the door to reception, only to be halted by a word from Phoenix: "Apollo."

The nineteen-year-old paused, turning back towards his father. "Dad."

Opening his eyes, Phoenix looked up at Apollo with a stern, though tired, stare. "I recognise you aren't living under my roof anymore and there's nothing I can do to punish you... but I'm very upset and disappointed that you deliberately disobeyed me on your sister's behalf."

Apollo returned the even stare. "I know. To be perfectly honest, I thought you forbidding her from things as small as going to sleepovers, wearing make-up, and getting her ears pierced was..." he paused to find a word that wouldn't offend his father, "well, ridiculous. Getting earrings, wearing bare shoulders under her freaking cape? She just wants to be grown-up. Fighting her on little steps like that won't stop her, it'll just make her fight harder."

Phoenix sighed and shook his head. "No. You don't even understand what-"

"Yes, I do," Apollo interrupted, forcing himself to stay calm as he crossed his arms. "If you let her do these things, she's not going to get kidnapped, or starved for days, or frozen half to death. No-one's going to try and kill her, let alone succeed."

Phoenix stared at Apollo in surprise. "W-why would she be in danger of...?"

"That's why you're so overprotective of her, isn't it?" Apollo asked. "All those things happened to Maya, before you lost your badge. Trucy's the most like her, so you think the same things might happen, but they won't."

"O-of course they won't," Phoenix insisted, but his sudden avoidance of Apollo's eyes revealed the teen's point was hitting too close for comfort. "I don't even know how you got to that conclusion..."

"You were never like this with me or Luke," Apollo pointed out, relaxing a little as he realised Phoenix's anger was long gone. "We never got picked up from school every day, or forbidden from staying away from home overnight. We never had to regularly check in with you if we were out with Clay. You were all supportive of Luke going to college in London, and we don't see him much now, outside summer. You... didn't object to me moving out, either." He paused. "You can say it's because she's the youngest, but she's already almost Luke's age when we all met, and I'm not seeing you giving her the same kind of freedoms he had then."
Phoenix didn't reply, staring off to the side and frowning in worry.

His piece said, Apollo decided now was the time to go. "Just... think about it, okay? I'll see you later, Dad." Without another word, he turned and left.

Two of Diamonds

Am I overprotective?
Please don’t be busy right now Maya I need to talk to you

    No no I’m here, tho I might be slow replying .
    What’s that question supposed to mean anyway? .

Exactly what I said. Do you think I’m overprotective with Trucy?

    With Trucy, I guess so?? You don’t exactly let her do anything without permission .
    Even when they were still at school, the boys were pretty much constantly unsupervised as I recall .

I was afraid of that

    Ok what’s going on? What happened? .

Trucy got her ears pierced, Apollo says they went behind my back because I’m overprotective of her

    Huh. Ykno Sis had earrings? I wanted to get some too when I was younger but I always chickened out. Maybe I should try again! .

I think you’re missing the point

    Hmm .

Alright grumpy gills, I think you need a vacation. I expect to see you on my doorstep tmrw morning .

Maya no

    Nick yes! I’ll take the day off, you come up here while Trucys at school :) .

Do I have to?

    You bet you do old man ;) .

:\
Alright fine, I’ll be there tomorrow
Right now I gotta apologize to Trucy tho

    I’ll see you then then! :) .

Wright Talent Agency
Trucy’s Room

It had been ten minutes since Trucy slammed the door to her bedroom as she came in. Nine minutes since she had thrown her hat at her desk, kicked off her boots, and pulled open the pin on her cape to let the blue garment fall to the floor. About six since she had finished peeling off the tape on her new earrings, and done her best to start removing the make-up before the discomfort around the studs got to be too much to handle. Four minutes since she had thrown herself on her bed and started hugging her pillow, using its fluffy bulk to hide her tears.

It had also been about ten seconds since Phoenix started knocking on her door.

"Trucy?" Phoenix gently called from the hallway outside Trucy's door. "I know you're in there. I just want to talk, okay?"

Trucy frowned, looking up from her pillow only to shout "GO AWAY," at the door.

There was a short pause, during which Trucy hoped her father had given up, before the hinges of her door creaked as it was slowly pushed open.

"I said GO AWAY," Trucy shouted again, burying her face back in the pillow the moment her words were out of her mouth. "I don't want to talk to you!" she added, though the message was muffled through her pillow.

A few seconds pause, then the dull thuds of footsteps approached across her carpet, and she felt the heavy weight of her father settling on the edge of her bed, near her feet. "I wanted to apologise. For earlier."

Trucy glared into her pillow. She decided not to reply, and just wait for Phoenix to leave.

"I'm not going to change my mind on anything," Phoenix continued, giving her a warning. "I marked eight weeks from now on the calendar, and I'll expect you to remove one of those permanently then."

Hugging her pillow tighter, Trucy looked up only to direct her glare at her father. "Then you aren't really sorry! Not if you're still grounding me and making me lose one!"

Phoenix, who had been watching her in concern, sighed, giving her a stern look. "You went against my word and will be punished for that," he said. "Maybe if you'd waited a few more years, I would have let you keep both, but I'm not backing down on the compromise we made."

Trucy glared at Phoenix a moment before burying her face back in her pillow.

Phoenix sighed, and Trucy felt him adjusting his position on the bed. "I didn't mean to come off so harsh, okay? I had a talk with Apollo before he left, and... and I realise I've been restricting you a lot more than I probably should be."

Confused, Trucy slowly lifted her head, watching her father out of the corner of her eyes. He seemed to be leaning forward, elbows on his knees and staring at the floor. It didn't look like he'd noticed her moving.

"I'm not ungrounding you, or letting you keep both earrings, but I can promise, from now on, to try and be more open with what you want to do," Phoenix said, looking almost painstaking about the words coming out of his mouth. "Things like... going to sleepovers, wearing make-up off-stage... Little things like that."

At first, Trucy couldn't believe her ears. He was... relaxing some of his rules? Slowly, she pushed herself into a sitting position, watching Phoenix as he looked up to meet her eyes. They stared at each other in silence for a few moments before Trucy shuffled across to Phoenix's side, dangling her socked feet over the edge of the bed and hugging her father tightly. "I forgive you, Daddy," she said. "I'm sorry for disobeying you." She paused a second or two, then added, "But I don't regret it."

Phoenix chuckled, wrapping his arms around her to return the hug. "That's okay," he assured her. "I
I repeat: Uh-oh.

Calm down, its nothing as bad as... what happened yesterday. I've got what you could call another surprise for Trucy, and theres no way Dad can complain about this one.

I repeat: Uh-oh.

... I'm beginning to wonder why I miss you when you're away.

:(
Trucy was applying make-up when the door to their dressing room opened, admitting her somewhat frazzled-looking older brother. She turned to face him with a glare, eyeliner only half-applied. "What took you so long!?” she demanded.

Apollo shrugged, giving his sister a smile as he moved to their props arranged nearby.

"We're supposed to arrive early!” Trucy reminded him. "To make sure we-!” She cut herself off as she watched Apollo going over their props, noticing something off with the right side of his face. Her anger quickly faded as she gasped in surprise. "P-Polly... did you...?”

Grinning, Apollo looked up at his sister. "Yep," he confirmed, and pointed to the small red stud in his right earlobe. "Just this ear, though."

Trucy stared in confusion. "Why'd you do that?” she asked.

Apollo shrugged, walking over to sit in the chair opposite his sister. "Well, we're supposed to be a pair, aren't we? It would look weird if you had a single earring and I didn't." He chuckled. "Since you're keeping your left ear, I thought I'd do the right, so we mirror. Oh, and it means your 'pairs' of earrings never go to waste, since I can always take the extra."

Trucy held a gloved hand to her mouth, eyes wide and shining in amazement. "Polly...

"And, before I forget," Apollo added, reaching into his bag with one gloved hand, "there was something I needed to return to you." He held out his hand, showing Trucy the same pair of diamond-shaped earrings she had shown off the previous week. With his other hand, he picked one of the two up and held it out to her with a grin. "One for you, one for me. We can start wearing them once it's safe to remove our studs."

Trucy slowly smiled, her eyes tearing up. Without a word, she leapt across the small space between them and hugged Apollo tightly around the neck. "Thank you," she whispered.

Apollo grinned, hugging his sister back. "No problem," he assured her.

After a long moment, Trucy sniffed and moved back from her brother, reaching for the tissues to dab at her face. "Oh great, now I have to redo my make-up!” she cried, still smiling widely.

Laughing, Apollo nodded in agreement. "Let's get ready for our show!"
The conversation had fallen into silence as the minutes ticked ever closer to the required ringing of the ten o'clock bell. Despite Iris' frequent insistences she had to leave, and Phoenix's own need to attend to, neither had yet to move.

"Um, Mister Wright?"

Phoenix looked up from his musings, arms still wrapped tightly around himself in an effort to keep warm in the cold night. "Yes?"

Iris' hands flew up to the purple orb attached to the ties on her hood. "If it's alright with you," she said, "I would like you to have this." In one smooth motion, she had undone the pink straps and pulled the hood off her head, revealing a crown of long hair that Phoenix was surprised to see was black and not red. A concerned frown on her face, Iris pushed the white fabric into Phoenix's hands. Phoenix shook his head, pushing the hood away. "But this is yours!" he insisted.

'It isn't this some sacred part of your outfit!? Surely it at least helps keep you warm in the snow!'

"It has the power to protect you from evil spirits," Iris explained, still pushing the hood on Phoenix with a worried look. "I pray for your safety on this dark, cold night!" He stared back at her for a moment, then reluctantly accepted it, and Iris smiled, despite her concerned eyes. Clutching her hands to her chest, she slowly backed away, towards where Phoenix supposed the temple bell was. "I'm sorry, but I must bid you goodnight." She turned with one swift motion, attempting to disappear into the dark.

Phoenix blinked, then looked up at Iris' retreating back with wide eyes. "Wait a minute, Sister Iris!"

The nun paused in her rush, slowly turning her head to show Phoenix only the side of her face. "Y-yes?"

The lawyer took a moment to gather his thoughts. "Just now... you called me 'Mister Wright'," he pointed out, eyebrow raised in thought. "How'd you know my name? I never introduced myself to you."

Iris' eyes widened, and she turned to face Phoenix fully, looking more scared than ever. "Th-that's..."

"Sister Iris," Phoenix sighed, "please, tell me the truth." He took a step towards the scared woman, gesturing between them. "You and I... have we ever met before?"

Iris stared back at him for a moment, then looked away. The instant she did, Phoenix heard the rattling of chains as the images of Psyche-Locks sprung into existence before his eyes, the five crimson illusions bouncing as they clung to the woman's spiritual cage.
Phoenix was almost too shocked to respond for a moment, a part of him wondering if, as a Kurain nun, she even knew about the locks. "I-Iris..."

"O-oh!" Iris seemed to jump, pulling a small watch out of her robes, although she barely glanced at it. "I-it's almost ten!" As the Psyche-Locks faded away around her, she gave Phoenix a look somewhere between apologetic and relieved. "Perhaps we can speak again," she offered, "tomorrow." Before Phoenix could even begin to reply, she had spun around and dashed off into the darkness.

Phoenix stared after her for only a moment before shaking his head, pulling his white coat tighter around his suit, and wandering off to find the bathroom.

'At least there's one thing I learned for sure,' he comforted himself, running his fingers through the soft fabric of the hood one last time before secreting it away in a pocket of his suit jacket. 'She does know me. I'll have to take her up on her offer to talk... tomorrow.'

February 7, 11:06PM
Hazakura Temple
Courtyard

Phoenix had been in his room when he heard the terrified scream from the courtyard. Too hurried to throw on his jacket or coat, he endured the cold biting through his thin shirt as he raced down the hallways and out into the sheltered square. The first thing to catch his attention was a dark-robed figure lying on the ground below the statue of the throned Ami Fey, a sharply-spiked sword in the statue's hand sticking in the woman's back, her long hair spilling out over the snow. "M-Ms Deauxnim!" he shouted, running towards the body, only to trip a second later as his foot collided with something soft lying on the ground, throwing Phoenix to the cold snow.

"Hey!" came an indignant shout from somewhere in the vicinity of Phoenix's shoes. "Don't step on my tummy like that!"

Dragging himself to his feet, Phoenix looked back with surprise to see Sister Bikini sitting up in the dirt, brushing snow off her nun's robes as she also struggled to stand. "Wh-what are you doing lying there in the snow!?!" he demanded.

"I was passed out!" Bikini shouted back with a frown. "What do you think!?"

Phoenix blinked as he connected dots in his head. "So that blood-curdling scream was you...?"

"F-forget about that!" Bikini snapped, waving her hands at Phoenix as though to shoo him out of the courtyard. "Hurry up and call the police!"

Looking around in confusion, Phoenix stepped back a little, away from her furious waving. "Is there even a phone in the Main Hall?"

The nun rolled her eyes. "No, but we still get reception up here in the mountains! You must have a cell phone on you, right?!"

Phoenix froze (almost literally, considering how cold he was). "I, um," he mumbled, turning red as much with embarrassment as from frostbite. "I didn't bring it with me-"

"Oh, you're useless!" Bikini cried, throwing up her hands and turning away in disbelief. "I mean, even Iris has a cell phone..." She shook her head, looking determined as she spun back to face him. "We've got no choice! You'll have to use the public phone by Dusky Bridge! Hurry, hurry, hurry!" She resumed her waving, chasing Phoenix out of the courtyard. "Run as fast as you can!"

"Y-yes, ma'am!" Phoenix replied, and ran from the courtyard as fast as his legs could carry him. Bikini shouted something after him, but he was already too far away to make out the words.

February 7, 11:18PM
Dusky Bridge

Phoenix felt like his legs were killing him by the time he finally neared the end of the road. His breath froze into clouds around his face, the snow crunching under his feet as he pushed through to his destination. 'At least I'm not cold anymore,' he reasoned, rounding the last copse of trees. 'Once I tell the police what happened to Ms Deauxnim, I should go tell Maya too. She's just across the... bridge!?'

Phoenix's run came to a sudden halt. Up ahead, he could see the old bridge suspended over Eagle River, right next to the public phone he had been aiming for. The snow piled all around was glowing red in the light, and the heat of the crackling fire could be felt even from the other side of the makeshift parking lot. The other side of the ravine, where the Inner Temple lay, was cloaked in an inscrutable darkness.

Dusky Bridge was alight.

The nearby firepit burned hot on his face, even from a fair distance away. Above, he could hear the ominous clanking of the cage, beginning to close around its captive.

"Maya!"

Although he struggled, he couldn't pull more than an arm free from the pile of heavily armoured knights on top of him, pinning him to the ground.

"Help me, Nick!"

With a snap, the final gates closed around Maya's face, and the cage began to fall with a clanking of chains.

"Stop! You've got to stop!"

The cage dropped like a stone into the fire pit, which seemed to explode on impact, sending a shower of bright sparks all over.

"Mayaaaaa!"

When the cage rose back out of the flames, the gates had opened, and Maya was gone.

Phoenix wasn't sure if his heavy breathing was from exhaustion or panic, his weak legs from the long run or the reminder of Maya's last brush with death. He thought he felt dizzy, so he shook his head firmly to ground himself in the present. 'Maya... gotta check she's alright! A-and call the police!'

He had taken only a few wobbly steps forward before a voice suddenly rang out of the shadows to his right: "What are you doing here?"

"ARGH!" Phoenix couldn't resist a brief shout of panicked surprise, almost falling over as he spun around to see Larry sitting on a tree log, a sketchbook sitting in his lap.

Larry stood, leaving the book on the log and watching his friend with confusion. "Huh? What is it? Is it me?"

Phoenix shook his head, struggling to control his breathing. "D-don't scare me like that, Larry!" he snapped at his friend. "I almost had a heart attack!" 'In addition to the one I had when I saw the bridge...'

Larry pouted, crossing his arms. "My name isn't Larry!" he protested. "It's Laurice!"

Resisting the urge to roll his eyes, Phoenix waved his friend off, hurrying towards the bridge. "Larry, hurry up and call the police!" he ordered. "I'm going to the Inner Temple!"

"D-don't be stupid!" Larry shot back, running after Phoenix and grabbing his arm to keep him from walking straight out over the ravine. "The bridge is nothing but a burning wreck right now!"

Phoenix glared at Larry, shaking his arm free. "Listen to me!" he cried, perhaps more harshly than he should have. "There's been a murder! Here! At Hazakura Temple!"

Larry gasped, almost jumping back in disbelief. "Wha-what!?"

"The murderer might have fled across the bridge!" Phoenix continued, turning to continue his trek despite the building pain in his legs. "I have to make sure Maya is safe!" 'I already failed her once... I'm not doing that again!'

Larry made another grab for Phoenix's arm, terrified eyes pleading silently with his friend. "B-but...!"

"Please, call the police!" Phoenix repeated, shaking Larry off his arm for a second time. "I've got to go!" He started to run for the bridge, only for Larry to follow, throwing himself in front of Phoenix with arms held wide. Before Larry could muscle up the words to speak, Phoenix had tightened his hands into fists, glaring at the would-be artist for daring to stand in his path. "Get outta my way, Larry!"

"I-it's too dangerous!" Larry pleaded, but Phoenix ignored him, shoving his friend to one side and making a break for the bridge. "Nick, w-wait!"

'The last time there was a fire between me and Maya, I didn't, couldn't, do anything to save her...'

'I'll die before I let that happen a second time.'

"Is Polly here yet?"

Phoenix looked up from his desk with a smile as Trucy appeared in the doorway from the kitchen, still dressed in her school uniform. One hand was fiddling with her right ear, hidden under her hair. "Not yet," he told her.

Trucy gave a dramatic sigh and plodded into the room, throwing herself facedown on the nearest of the twin red sofas. "I wish he'd hurry up!" she cried, her voice muffled by the leather seat. "I wanna try out our new earrings already!"

Phoenix grinned in restrained laughter, placing a hand against his mouth as he returned to his work.

Luke, sitting on the other sofa with his notebook and a pen in hand, smiled at his sister. "Well, your grounding ends today, doesn't it?" he asked. "You could always go meet him."

Trucy sighed, then lifted her head to stare across at Luke. "Yeah, but what if he's still on the bus?" she complained. "I'd just be waiting at the bus-stop then! And that could be for hours!"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "I don't think he'll take quite that long, Truce."

Luke gave her a sympathetic look as Trucy flopped back down on the sofa. "I'm sure he'll be here any minute now," he assured her.

"He better," Trucy mumbled darkly into the red leather.

Today marked exactly eight weeks since Trucy had disobeyed Phoenix's orders and had her ears pierced, and she had arranged for Apollo to come over after school to help remove her right stud and try out various earrings she had bought for them while out grocery shopping with their father (Although she had still been grounded, he had allowed her to leave the apartment for things other than school or work if he was accompanying her). It seemed she was trying to make a big ceremony of the end of her grounding, considering how dramatic she had been about it since waking up that morning, demanding that Phoenix give her an exact time the grounding was lifted (he decided on the moment her school day ended), and telling Luke he had to be there to see when she and Apollo first wore the newest updates to their magician's outfits... even though Trucy had yet to change into hers.

As if on cue, there was a knock at the front door, which promptly creaked open, almost hesitantly. Trucy shot Luke a grin, then rolled off the sofa, jumped to her feet and bounded across into reception, shouting, "Polly! What took you so-? Huh?" Her run into reception paused just inside the door, as she caught sight of someone who was definitely not Apollo carefully closing their front door; A woman with long dark hair, wearing purple-pink robes very similar to Maya's and Pearl's, stood with her hands on the edge of the door, staring at Trucy with wide eyes. At first, Trucy was thrown off by their visitor being someone other than Apollo, but she quickly recovered as she realised the woman must instead be a client. Grinning widely, she ran to the woman's side, taking one of her hands and shaking it enthusiastically. "Hi there! Welcome to the Wright Talent Agency! Come in, come in!"
The woman was reluctant to follow Trucy, but seemed to lack the nerve to pull her hand out of the girl's grip. "I-I'm sorry, I think I have the wrong-"

"Who is it, Trucy?" Phoenix called from the office.

The woman froze at the sound of Phoenix's voice, even resisting Trucy pulling at her arm for a moment.

"It's a client, Daddy!" Trucy called back, dragging the reluctant woman through into the office. "See?"

As Phoenix caught sight of said 'client', his eyes widened and he shot out of his seat into a standing position. As she similarly spotted him, the woman blushed and looked away, one hand flying to the purple magatama around her neck.

Not seeming to notice the silent exchange, Luke tipped his hat to the newcomer as he got to his feet. "Hello there!" he called in greeting, giving her a friendly smile. "And how are you this afternoon, ma'am?"

"What were you needing today?" Trucy continued, bouncing on her heels as she looked up at the short woman, only half a head taller than the twelve-year-old. "Musician? Magician? We have our violinist in town until the end of next week!"

Luke giggled, waving. "That's me!"

"You know her, Papa?" Luke realised.

Phoenix stared at the woman for a moment more, the newcomer still避免ing his gaze by staring at the floor, her hand still fiddling with the magatama. "I do, yes," he answered, looking between his children as he continued, "Actually, could the two of you leave us alone for a few minutes, please?"

Trucy looked between Phoenix and the woman for a few moments, then sighed and dashed off after her brother without a word.

Luke closed the door gently behind him, leaving Phoenix and his guest alone in the office. They stared at each other awkwardly for several moments before Phoenix again cleared his throat. "So, Iris," he said, "what brings you here?"

Iris took a few moments to answer, pulling a few stray strands of hair behind her ear. "Mystic Maya suggested I should visit," she admitted. "She and Pearl have been telling me to since I got out of jail, to be honest."

Phoenix nodded in thought, recalling the too-few times he had visited Iris between her conviction and his disbarment. Her location in jail had made her the easiest of his friends to completely cut himself off from. "That was a few years ago, wasn't it?"

"Mm-hm," Iris agreed, staring at the floor with a sad look. "They told me you weren't a lawyer anymore. That must have been awful.”

Phoenix idly reached up to rub at the back of his head, and, encountering the fabric of his cyan beanie, decided to pull it off, holding the coarse material tightly in his hands. "I got through okay," he said. "I've got more to live for than just my badge."

Iris turned her gaze to the door leading to the kitchen. "The little one called you 'Daddy'," she pointed out, looking up at Phoenix. "That young man, he was also calling you 'Papa'."

Smiling proudly, Phoenix nodded. "My kids," he explained. "Two of them, anyway." He thought a moment, realising something as he saw Iris' confused face. "Maya and Pearls didn't tell you about them?"

Iris shook her head, still confused. "They... look a bit old to be yours," she admitted. "And I don't remember you having a family when last we met."

"Unless you count Maya and Pearls, I didn't, really," Phoenix replied with a shrug, shoving his beanie in his hoodie pocket. "No, I... adopted my kids, some time after I lost my badge." He frowned in thought, staring off to one side. "Come to think of it, it's almost exactly half a decade since that happened. How time flies."

The pair stood in silence for a few more moments. "Fee-, um, Phoenix?" Iris eventually spoke up.

Phoenix looked up. "Hm?"

"The reason I came today," Iris nervously explained, staring at the floor as her hand continued to play with her magatama, "was because I-"

The front door swung open with a loud creak, cutting Iris off. "Dad! Truce! Luke!" a voice called from reception. "I finally made it!"

Apollo laughed as he entered the office, spinning his hat in his hands. "Traffic, mainly!" he explained, only to pause as he noticed Iris stood by the desk, Phoenix's hand still gripping her upper arm. "You have a visitor?" he asked in surprise.

Phoenix half-smiled, glancing between the equally confused Iris and Apollo. Looking at Iris, he gestured to his son. "This is my eldest, Apollo," he explained, then looked to Apollo, dropping his hand from Iris' arm. "Apollo... this is Iris."

"Nice to meet-," Apollo began to say, only for the name to suddenly click in his head as he gave Iris a shocked look. "Wait, you're that Iris!? Dad's ex-girlfriend Iris!?"

Iris blushed, looking away again.

"Apollo here's an avid law student," Phoenix explained. "He was in the audience for your trial."

Apollo shrugged, scoffing as he crossed his arms (being careful with the hat in his hand). "Not that I understood any of it at the time," he pointed out. "The first day I was just disappointed the famous Phoenix Wright wasn't there, the second... Well, I gave up trying to work out what was going on around the time the exorcism happened." He rolled his eyes.

At that, Iris smiled and let out a small giggle. "Yes, my sister was always very dramatic," she said, seeming to finally relax. "She probably could have been a brilliant actress, if she hadn't wanted to study literature instead."

Phoenix chuckled, and turned to Apollo. "Your siblings are probably upstairs. Trucy was waiting for you."

Apollo nodded with a fond roll of his eyes. "Yeah, she's been texting me madly all week to make sure I'd be here," he said, uncrossing his arms and holding his hat tight. "I'd better go put her out of her misery." He gave Iris a nod. "It was nice to meet you, Iris." As Iris smiled in response, Apollo left the room, closing the door again behind him.

"He's a pleasant young man," Iris told Phoenix. "He must set a good example for the younger ones."

Phoenix snorted in laughter. "Hmm, some of the time," he said, trying to hide his grin as he remembered what today was the eight-week anniversary of. "Mostly the example-setting one is Luke, though." He watched Iris for a moment as she looked vaguely confused. "You'd probably understand what I mean if you got to know them," he suggested.

"Oh, no," Iris insisted, shaking her head. "I don't want to intrude... especially not if the younger ones don't yet know about me, and my sister."

Phoenix grinned. "Well, Pearls is your half-sister. Does she count?"

Iris shook her head, looking concerned. "You know what I mean, Feenie. Explaining Dahlia to them... is not something I was expecting to do. I'm not prepared for it." She paused, then looked up at him with a hopeful smile. "Maybe another time?"

Chuckling, Phoenix nodded. "Sounds good. Apollo and I can explain the whole 'Dahlia' thing to them in the meantime, if you want."

Iris nodded, taking a few steps towards the door. "I'd like that," she replied, then paused and looked back at Phoenix. "By the way, Pearl told me about your relationship with Mystic Maya."

Phoenix blushed, looking away as he rubbed at the back of his head. "Ah... she did, did she?"

Iris giggled. "I'm glad to hear you're both happy," she said. "You certainly deserve to be. And..." She paused again, her hand flying once more to her magatama. "I'm... glad we can be friends."

Phoenix was too surprised for a moment to respond, then he smiled at Iris. "So am I."
THE ADVENTURE OF THE CURIOUS VILLAGE 4/June/24

We were a long way from London when the Professor finally handed me the letter that had led us on our latest investigation. It was simple enough; A rich baron had recently died, and his inheritance was left to the first that could find it... a contest, if you will. The baron's wife, a Lady Dahlia, wrote to the Professor's assistance, and thus we found ourselves speeding down the quiet, country road to the tiny village listed on a map included with the letter. Little did we know that the things we saw that day in the village became a secret we would have to keep from everyone for the rest of our lives...

I looked up from the letter in my hands. "But Professor, why are we going to solve an inheritance dispute?"

At my side, in the driver's seat of his beloved car, my mentor the Professor smiled. "Now now, do you really think I'd take on a request as ordinary as that? No, this is an altogether unique situation, and it has piqued my intellectual curiosity! But I suppose I should explain the case before we arrive at our destination: Two months ago, Baron Augustus Reinhold passed away. Shortly after his death, his will was disclosed; The contents of it were fascinating, to say the least. 'The Reinhold family treasure, the Golden Apple, is hidden somewhere within this village. To whomever successfully locates this treasure, I offer the whole of my estate.' Naturally, those who attended the reading of the will immediately set out in search of the treasure, but in the end, everybody came back empty-handed. It turns out that no-one had even heard of this Golden Apple until its mention in the will."

I was impressed. "Wow... that's some puzzle, alright."

"Quite. Augustus Reinhold was such a perplexing individual. I wish I could have met him before he died."

I smiled as I folded up the letter. "By the way, just what is this Golden Apple? Do we know?"

"In short, no: It's as much a part of the mystery as where it's hidden." He shook his head. "I can't shake the feeling that this is linked to some larger mystery... something huge."

At that, I began to get excited. "Is that your famous intuition again, Professor?"

The Professor didn't reply, smiling to himself. "Our first step is getting to this town. It's called St Mystere; We should be nearing it by now."

And thus, we arrived in St Mystere.
"Luke?"

The eighteen-year-old almost jumped from his staring at the paper in front of him, looking over to the small boy watching him from not far away. "W-what is it, Alfendi?"

Alfendi hugged the plush rabbit in his arms tighter, looking at the pen and paper in Luke's hands. "What are you doing?"

Luke cast a glance to the heavily-scribbled-on piece of paper. "Um... writing, actually."

The four-year-old frowned. "No you weren't," he insisted. "I was watching!"

"W-well," Luke explained with a nervous smile, "you may not have seen me actively writing... I was... re-reading this prologue, o-or first chapter I've written, to work out how to rewrite it and make it better." He turned his attention to the words with a frown. "It's just written down almost exactly how I tell the story aloud at the moment. I had no idea I'd have to do so much rewriting once I started adapting it for a potential book..."

Alfendi screwed up his nose dismissively of Luke's excuse.

Luke sighed, placing the paper down on the Laytons' coffee table in front of him. "Forget about me," he said, turning to the boy with a forced smile. "What are you doing, Alfendi?"

Grinning, Alfendi held up the plush rabbit in his arms to show to Luke. "I'm playing fireman!" he announced.

"That sounds fun!" Luke replied. "You're saving your toys from a fire, huh?"

Alfendi shook his head, hugging his rabbit tightly around the neck as he continued to brightly grin. "They've already died from the smoke. I'm getting their bodies!"

Luke froze, unsure how to respond at first. "That's... very realistic of you, I suppose."

"I'm gonna be a fireman when I grow up!" Alfendi boasted. "Papa says you have to practise something a lot to be good enough to get money for it!" He then turned and dashed back out of the room, dragging his toy rabbit by the paw as he went.

Sighing, Luke leaned back on the sofa. 'At least I should be thankful that's the worst he throws at me?' Not that he would ever regret offering to babysit Alfendi in the gaps left by Flora and the Professor's busy schedules, provided he didn't have his own classes to attend in the meantime. Luckily, with Alfendi in school most of the day, said gaps and Luke's classes didn't often collide. 'It's better for someone he knows to watch him, anyway.' Even with school every day, Alfendi still didn't talk much around strangers, unless they happened to discover his interests and engaged his talkative side... at which point they usually freaked out at his enthusiasm and ran to the boy's father with their 'serious concerns'. Luke reasoned it was much less of a hassle to just let Alfendi play alone, and allow him to be himself, without dragging panicky strangers into it.

Just as Luke was reaching for his written story and a fresh piece of paper, his mobile phone, sitting on the table next to them, began to buzz. "Oops, never took you off silent, did I?" he muttered to himself with a smile, grabbing the device to read the screen. Giving the phone a surprised look, he hit the button to answer and pressed it to his ear. "Trucy?"

"Hi!" Trucy chirped through the phone speakers. "It isn't, like, a bad time for you, is it?"

"No," Luke assured her, glancing at a nearby clock. "I don't usually have classes in the afternoon; It's only just gone five." He frowned in confusion. "Why are you calling? I'm usually expecting your texts around this time."

There was a short pause. "I thought it was midday for you when we talked?"

"I usually send you a 'good morning' text around the middle of the day for me, yes," Luke explained with a smile. "That's early morning for you. I wake up around your midnight, if I have a morning class."

Trucy hummed in thought. "I guess I misremembered the time difference..." she mumbled, then changed the subject to more confidently add, "So! What are you doing today? Uh, did today?"

Luke laughed, relaxing back into the chair. "Well, I had two classes today, one a lecture and the other a tutorial. Right now, I'm babysitting Alfendi until the Professor's last class finishes."

"Oooh!" Trucy cooed. "How's baby Alfendi?"

"Not a baby anymore," Luke pointed out with a smile. "He's going to school now, remember?"

"He's still a baby to me!" Trucy argued.

Luke decided that was a good point, shrugging. "He's fine," he said. "Actually, he's playing in the other room at the moment, while I try to see if I'm capable of being an author."

There was a short pause before Trucy responded. "You're writing your stories down!?" she squealed excitedly. "Tell me, tell me!"

Looking down at the battered paper containing his first draft of a prologue, Luke winced. "It's... not going very well so far," he admitted.

"What!?" Trucy cried. "Nonsense! Your stories are amazing!"

"I'm glad you think so," Luke replied, always happy to hear his sister's praise, "but I don't think the way I tell them to you translates well to paper."

Trucy thought a moment. "Yeah, I guess you can't do all the acting and funny voices in writing," she agreed. "You were still thinking of what to rename everyone, right?"

"Mm-hmm," Luke said, nodding. "At the moment I'm thinking of not giving my character a name at all; If I'm telling the story in first person, I don't think I'll ever have to even describe him! Or her, actually!"

"You're making your character a girl?" Trucy asked, confused.

"I'm leaving it up to interpretation," Luke explained with a grin. "At least, I'd like to. Have you seen how much fewer stories there are out there with girls as the main characters? I'd hate to accidentally contribute by making my 'apprentice' character too much like me."

Trucy hummed as she mused on Luke's reasoning. "Okay!" she chirped in reply. "What about Uncle Professor?"
"He's just 'The Professor'," Luke giggled. "I couldn't think of anything that fit him better than his actual name, so I figured, well, most people just call him 'Professor' anyway! I don't have to name him!" Trucy giggled in agreement, and Luke continued, "But I still haven't put much thought into anything else yet. Flora suggested I could keep the original names of the robots of Saint Mystere, so I decided I'd try that story first, since it would be the easiest. The fewest things to re-name, and all."

"Oooh!" Trucy cooed in interest. "Sounds cool! I can't wait to read it!"

Luke giggled, until a thought occurred to him and he frowned. "Wait, you didn't answer me earlier," he realised. "Why are you calling me today, Trucy?"

There was a long pause before Trucy sighed. "I'm bored!" she whined. "Polly still has classes and Daddy's busy and I already went up to visit Mommy and Pearly yesterday and it's only the first week of summer and I have nothing to do!"

Luke was surprised. "It's only Tuesday morning and you're already out of ideas to occupy yourself?"

"Mm-hmm," Trucy mumbled, then dramatically sighed.

Luke restrained a smile as he imagined his sister dramatically throwing herself onto her bed. "Well, what about your school friends? Can't you hang out with them?"

Trucy grumbled for a moment. "I guess..."

"You don't want to?"

Sighing, Trucy admitted, "I just saw them on Sunday! They came to see my show with Polly and then we went out together!"

Luke wondered why two days was too short a time to see them again, but decided not to question it. Not far away, he heard the sound of a key in a lock, followed by the front door creaking open. "Oh, sounds like the Professor is back," he told Trucy. "I have to hang up now."

"Aw!" Trucy cried. "But I'm still bored!"

"Papa!" Alfendi squealed, and Luke saw the four-year-old dash past the open doorway as he ran to greet his father at the entrance.

There was a long pause before Trucy responded, during which Luke listened to Alfendi excitedly telling Layton about his day at school. "Alright," Trucy eventually agreed with a sigh. "I'll just lie here waiting for you to call back."

"Love you," Trucy replied in a tired tone.

With that, Luke hung up the phone, giving it a fond smile as he imagined what his sister might be doing at that exact moment as she impatiently waited for her brother to entertain her. 'I'll call her once I've said hello to the Professor,' he told himself, then placed his phone in his pocket and stood to go greet his mentor.

"Alright everyone, please calm down!" Dean Delmona called as he strode into the bustling room, taking his place at the head of the table. As the assortment of assembled professors began to quieten from their chatter, the dean clasped his hands together. "Apologies for the late start; I was held up outside."

Hershel Layton looked around the room as the general hubbub finally died down. He had been puzzling all morning as to the meaning of this meeting, but upon arrival, it seemed everyone else was just as confused as him. The general assumption would have been that it was a departmental issue with the Psychology and Law groups, given everyone else was a teacher of one of the two, but the addition of Layton spawned confusion; Why one archaeology professor in a room of psychologists and lawyers?

Finally, Delmona judged the room quiet enough to continue. "I'm sure you're all curious as to why I called you here... in fact, it's to do with a very unusual submission we received for the upcoming year." He cast glances at two of the professors seated nearby. "I'm sure you two know what I'm talking about."

The respective heads of the two departments, Professor Erkens and Professor Cattell, looked at each other in surprise. Cattell gave the dean a confused look. "You don't mean that fifteen-year-old who applied to take an analytical psychology degree, do you?" she asked.

"Wait," Erkens cut in, holding up his hands with wide eyes. "You've got to be kidding! You mean we've got the exact same fifteen-year-old applying to be a defence attorney as well!?"

This only seemed to spark more confused conversation between the assembled teachers. Hershel took the opportunity to raise a hand, looking to the dean. "Dean Delmona, that still doesn't explain why I am here," he pointed out. "I'm not connected to either of these departments."

Delmona scratched his head with an embarrassed smile. "Ah, Hershel, she told me it was you who recommended she apply here, so I thought your input would be most helpful." He coughed awkwardly when the professor only gave him a puzzled look, adding, "I hope you remember her on sight, because she seemed quite certain you knew her."

"It is the Cykes girl, right?" Erkens cried over the hubbub of the room. "I thought we were breaking university records just admitting her for one course! What the hell's she doing applying for two!?"

"Calm down, Ewald," Delmona replied, hands held up in a calming motion. "That's exactly what I called everyone here to discuss! The girl herself is even in the building if you want to ask her any questions." Erkens opened his mouth to respond, but Delmona cut him off, clarifying, "Any polite questions, Ewald."

"She sounds like an intriguing student," Cattell explained, the room quietening as she spoke. "She spoke in her application about how she has sensitive hearing, and can understand people's emotions through the tone of their voice."
"Then what's she doing wanting to become a lawyer?" Erkens pointed out with a frustrated sigh. "This Cykes girl sounds like a fine psychologist!"

Hershel frowned, the discussion sparking something in his memory. "Did this girl mention in her application any role models leading her to law?" he asked.

Erkens had to think for a moment, scratching at his chin. "Uh, yeah, that one American guy. The attorney who got busted for forging evidence?"

"That isn't exactly very specific, is it?" one of the other law professors pointed out, rolling her eyes.

Another of the law teachers, a Professor Lamont, frowned in thought, tapping her cheek. "I suspect you are referring to Phoenix Wright, are you not?"

"Yeah, that guy!" Erkens cried, looking proud to have found the answer. "He kick-started that 'dark age of the law' they've got going on in California right now!"

Hershel blinked in surprise to hear his friend referred to so callously.

Lamont frowned. "No offence Ewald, but once again you prove you know very little about anything outside our own system of law." She crossed her arms, tapping her fingers sternly. "I met Mister Wright a few years ago, when he came to visit me with a colleague of his; I'm sure you've heard of Prosecutor Miles Edgeworth, have you not?"

Erkens paled, leaving no doubt that he recognised the name. "W-well," he mumbled, "it's not that simple, Noriko..."

"Yes, I recall their visit clearly," Hershel picked up with a smile, only to frown. "Not for all the right reasons, unfortunately."

Lamont nodded. "That was the day of Rosa's death," she added. "I understand they got caught up in it as they left."

Cattell gave Hershel a curious look. "How do you know a pair of American lawyers, Hershel?" she asked.

"Mister Edgeworth I have only met in passing, when he was here a few years ago." Hershel replied with a smile, one hand to his hat. "Mister Wright is a dear friend of mine. I met him on an... expedition many years ago now, before he lost his badge."

Half the table gave each other knowing looks as they translated what 'expedition' meant when used by the famous Hershel Layton.

"Nevertheless," Hershel continued, crossing his arms, "I believe I do know why young Athena Cykes wishes to be a lawyer; Mister Wright left quite an impression on her as he helped us solve the mystery of Rosa's death. I told her our law department would be happy to take in such an eager candidate," he scratched his chin in thought, "though I do not know where the psychology degree comes into it."

"We can ask her that later," Delmona assured everyone. "One thing we do need to discuss however is whether it would be appropriate to accept her into two full-time courses at once, especially considering her age."

"No way!" Erkens cut in, slamming his hand on the table with a glare. "She's way too young! Make her take one at a time, or none at all!"
Lamont adjusted her glasses, giving Erkens a pointed glare. "Calm down, Ewald. This isn't court."

"She obviously believes she is capable of doing both at once," Hershel pointed out. "She may have a more realistic view of her abilities than we give her credit for."

Delmona thought over the conflicting views in the resulting silence. "I suppose I had better fetch this girl then," he decided. "She can tell us why she wants to take on both at once, for starters."

"W-wait!" Cattell interrupted, almost jumping to her feet as she held up a hand to call the dean's attention. "I'm sorry for keeping this to myself, but I actually do know why Miss Cykes wants to study psychology."

"You do?" one of the other psychology professors asked in surprise.

"Why did you keep it to yourself, Margaret?" Hershel added.

Cattell ran a hand through her hair nervously. "I wasn't sure if it was appropriate for me to bring up," she admitted. "But if you're going to ask her anyway..." She shook her head. "You see, her mother was a psychologist too, and Miss Cykes said she found the subject interesting and studying it made her feel closer to her mother."

"Now that is a good reason," Hershel muttered to himself, a hand to his mouth in thought.

Delmona nodded. "Well then, I shall fetch our young applicant, shall I?"

The teenager who entered the room trailed behind Dean Delmona, nervously playing with her hair. She was dressed in casual yellow, a blue ribbon tied around her orange ponytail that matched the sad-looking blue face on her odd necklace. From one ear dangled a golden crescent-shaped earring. As the girl spotted Hershel, she grinned and gave him a wave, her necklace turning green as the face switched to a happy one. Hershel smiled at her in reply.

"Here we are, young Miss Cykes herself," Delmona announced, a hand briefly patting Athena's shoulder. "Professor Cattell, maybe you'd like to go first?"

Cattell thought a moment, then stood, Athena's retrieved application in hand. "Miss Cykes, I'm sure you know why you're here today."

The teen nodded, looking stern. "You're gonna say I can't handle two courses at the same time." She looked away, a hand covering her necklace as it flashed blue. "You think I'm crazy, just like everyone else."

"Oh, no, dear," Cattell insisted, looking worried for the girl, "of course not! For one thing, I'm a psychologist; Nobody is 'crazy' to us!"

Athena met Cattell's gaze again, but still looked unconvinced.

"I'm merely concerned that two full-time courses at once is too much work even for an adult," Cattell continued. "Why not do one at a time? There's no hurry."

"Yes there is!" Athena argued, clutching her necklace tight as she gave Cattell a determined look. "I need to become a lawyer as fast as I can! And I need the kind of practise with my abilities that this psychology degree will give me!"

Erkens raised an eyebrow. "Why? What's the rush?"

Athena bit her lip, unsure how to respond. "I... have a friend back home I need to help," she admitted. "I don't know how long he has left."

"He's been sentenced to death, I presume," Lamont cut in, smirking to herself as she adjusted her glasses. "And you can't trust any attorneys working in this 'homeland' of yours to defend him properly."

Avoiding their gaze, Athena shook her head. "I thought I might be able to ask Mister Wright to, before..."

Erkens scoffed, crossing his arms. "Yeah, 'til he got done in for forgery!"

Hershel sent the law professor a glare. "Ewald, may I remind you that Mister Wright is a friend of mine? One of his sons attends this very university."

"Er, sorry, Hershel," Erkens mumbled, rubbing at the back of his head before blinking in surprise as the last statement registered. "Wait, really?"

Hershel turned his gaze to Athena with an understanding smile. "I seem to recall you mentioned when we last met that you came from California, where Mister Wright lives, correct?"

Athena blushed and nodded.

"In that case," Cattell said, watching Athena with a concerned look, "why not just focus on this law degree? You can pursue psychology at a later time."

"Because I want to," Athena replied, looking up again with a deadly serious expression on her face. "I'll attend every lecture, finish every assignment... I-I'll even take classes over the summer!" She finally removed her hand from her necklace, revealing its happy green face as she gave the entire room in general a determined look, holding a fist tightly near her chest. "I'll do it to prove I can, just as much as to learn everything I'll need to to be the first ever psychologist-lawyer, and I'm going to revolutionise the court system!"

The room stared back at Athena in silence for several long moments. Finally, Lamont chuckled, adjusting her glasses. "Well. I'm convinced."

Looking around the room, Hershel saw most of the other assembled teachers nodding in reluctant agreement, and gave the teen a warm smile. "May I be the first to welcome you to Gressenheller, Miss Cykes. I'm sure you'll enjoy your time here."

Athena could only grin in response.

View Layton's Notebook
On the first day of Autumn Semester, it was usual for new and returning students to drop by Hershel Layton's office in a constant stream, asking for help on their first day or simply greeting their teacher at the beginning of a new academic year. It was why he always made sure to have something simple to be working on, so he could drop it at a moment's notice to greet the latest knock at his door... as he was doing at that moment, placing his cup of tea down in its saucer as he marked his place in the book lying open on his desk. "Come in."

The door opened with a soft creak, and Hershel turned in his chair to see his latest visitor was an orange-haired teenager, looking slightly nervous as she edged into the room. He gave her a smile. "Miss Cykes, a pleasure to see you again," he said in greeting, tipping his hat as he got to his feet. "Was there something else you wanted while you were here?"

Athena grinned, bouncing more confidently into the room as the door closed itself behind her. "Hi, Professor Layton!" She paused, rubbing the back of her neck nervously. "I, uh, just wanted to drop by and say thanks for helping me out..."

Hershel chuckled, gesturing for the teen to come closer as he rounded the orange sofa. "It was no trouble at all, I assure you!" He sat down on the couch with a smile, patting for his visitor to join him. "Athena, did you want to ask something about Mister Wright?"

Nodding, Athena stared at the floor, twirling a finger around the lock of hair dangling in front of an ear. "I know now he'd already lost his badge when I met him," she explained. "I even asked to work with him... and the card he left me said he still worked at a law office." She looked up at Hershel, frowning in worry as her necklace glowed blue. "Why did he lie? Is he okay?"

Hershel chuckled, giving her a reassuring smile. "I can assure you, he is quite happy." When Athena still seemed unconvinced, he added, "I even asked to work with him... and the card he left me said he still worked at a law office." She looked up at Hershel, frowning in worry as her necklace glowed blue. "Why did he lie? Is he okay?"

Hershel chuckled, giving her a reassuring smile. "I can assure you, he is quite happy." When Athena still seemed unconvinced, he added, "I even asked to work with him... and the card he left me said he still worked at a law office." She looked up at Hershel, frowning in worry as her necklace glowed blue. "Why did he lie? Is he okay?"

"Oh!" Athena cried, her necklace flashing yellow as she jumped in shock. "O-of course I believe you, Professor!" she insisted.

"I'm not offended if you don't," Hershel insisted, continuing to serenely smile, hands folded in his lap. "After all, I see him in person very rarely; We stay in contact through the occasional letter and my friendship with Luke."

Athena shrugged, blushing as her necklace again turned green. Before she could reply, there was another knock at the door, attracting the pair's attention just as the newcomer opened the door anyway.
"Professor!" Luke called as he entered the room, a wide grin on his face. "I thought I'd-! Oh!" He stopped dead as he noticed Athena on the couch, still standing in the doorway.

"Speak of the devil," Hershel muttered with a smile, getting to his feet.

"I-I'm so sorry, Professor," Luke insisted, slowly backing out of the room and blushing in embarrassment. "I didn't know you had a guest..."

"No no," Hershel quickly replied, holding up a hand to signal for Luke to stay. "Luke, surely you remember Athena Cykes?" he asked, gesturing to the teen. "From the incident with Professor Rains?"

Luke blinked in surprise, looking over at Athena to meet an equally shocked gaze. The two stared at each other for a moment before breaking into identical wide grins. "Athena!" Luke cried, running into the room and towards the teen with a hand outstretched to shake. "It's so great to see you again!"

"Hi Luke!" Athena cried, jumping to her feet to eagerly shake the young man's hand. "I should've guessed it was you Professor Layton mentioned was coming here!"

Luke laughed. "What are you doing here?" he asked. "It can't be another school trip!"

Athena shook her head, grinning proudly with her hands on her hips. "Nope! I just started studying here!"

Impressed, Luke blinked in surprise. "Wow," he muttered, then grinned. "We should start a club for under-age applicants!"

At that, Athena looked confused. "Why? How old are you?"

"Oh, um," Luke muttered, blushing. "W-well, I'm eighteen now," he admitted, "but I was sixteen when I started here." He grinned. "I'm studying to be a vet!"

Athena smiled. "I'm fifteen," she said, winking proudly. "I'm studying to be a psychologist-lawyer!"

Luke laughed. "Wow, that sounds impressive!" he said. "You decided to go ahead and be a defence attorney?"

"Yup!" Athena replied, nodding. "Even if Mister Wright isn't one anymore, there's no reason I can't be!"

Luke stared at her for a moment, then winced in embarrassment. "Ah, you found out about that," he realised, looking away. "J-just so you know, Papa didn't-"

"It's okay," Athena insisted, shrugging as she gave Luke an understanding smile. "I heard how happy he was talking about being a lawyer. He must have enjoyed pretending."

Hershel raised an eyebrow as he watched the pair, standing by his desk and sipping from his teacup.

"Y-yeah, I think he did," Luke agreed, forcing a nervous grin. "S-so, what's this 'psychologist' part about, then?" he asked, walking around to sit on the orange couch where Layton had previously been.

Athena sat back down, grinning. "You remember I can hear people's emotions, right?" she reminded him. "Court's a scary place. I figure, if I can hone my abilities and become a psychologist as well, I can use them to help keep witnesses calm so they can tell their stories clearly and accurately!"
Luke thought a moment, then winced a little at a particular set of memories that ran across his mind. "Yeah, that... actually sounds like a really good idea," he said, not noticing Athena's confused look as he turned his gaze downwards.

Athena frowned. "Are you alright?"

"Hmm?" Luke looked up. "Of course I am."

"Oh," Athena mumbled, looking thoughtful as one hand began to fiddle with her necklace. "I-I wasn't sure; There were a lot of emotions in what you just said, so..."

"I'm fine," Luke insisted, only for the almost instinctual phrase to make him laugh as it reminded him of something. "Oh yeah, you have to meet Apollo! Papa even said you'd get on like a house on fire!"

Athena frowned in confusion. "A... pollo?"

"My brother!" Luke explained with a bright smile. "He's also studying to be a lawyer, back in California!" He paused, a thoughtful look coming across his face. "Huh. Athena and Apollo. That's an odd co-incidence."

"What is?"

"The Greek mythology connection, of course," Luke explained, smiling. "It seems everyone in my family has one! Artemis, Triton, Phoenix..." He shook his head, pulling himself back on topic. "Anyway, do you know the story about the first ever trial?"

Athena thought a moment, one hand straying to her right ear to tap the crescent earring hanging there. "I... don't think so?" she replied.

Luke giggled. "Apollo first told me this story," he said, "with our best friend Clay, of course, though I had to look it up myself later to get all the details! It being an Ancient Greek story, it predictably involves violence and murder."

Athena seemed surprised, but then smiled. "I suppose it would, if it's about the first ever trial!"

Luke laughed. "Yeah, I guess so!" he agreed. "Anyway, this family in Troy were essentially killing each other one-by-one, each new death out of revenge for the previous murder. The god Apollo and a group of beings called the Furies argued over whether the last in the series of deaths was justified, so Apollo took everyone to the goddess Athena, and they argued their cases to her, with the Furies saying the latest murder wasn't justified and Apollo saying it was." He giggled. "Athena sided with Apollo! That made him the first ever defence attorney, and Athena the first ever judge!"

Athena seemed amused, but something was troubling her, and she again began to poke at her earring, deep in thought. "That... sounds vaguely familiar," she admitted. "Did you tell me that story last time?"

Luke frowned, confused. "Nnnno? I remember telling it to Trucy once, but... I don't think we even had the time when we last met."

"Weird," Athena muttered, still thinking as she tapped at her earring. "Then why do I...?" Suddenly, she gasped, paling as her tapping instantly halted. "Oh..."

"What?" Luke asked, concerned for his new friend. "What's the matter?"

"N-nothing!" Athena insisted, jumping to her feet. "Um, I should probably get going, I have a lecture this morning." She hurried to the door. "I'll talk to you later, Luke!"

"Wait-!" Luke cried, standing up. Hershel looked up from his seat at his desk, watching with a bewildered look.

Athena threw open the office door. "Thanks again, Professor!" she called, then ran out into the hallway, leaving the door to close itself behind her.

Luke stared after the teen for several moments before sighing and turning to his former mentor. "What was that about?"

Hershel had to shake his head. "I'm afraid I have no idea," he admitted. "Something would appear to have spooked her."

"But what?" Luke wondered, sitting back down and tapping a finger against his chin in thought. "I told her that story... she seemed to think she heard it from me before..."

"Athena sided with Apollo, of course!" Apollo boasted. "Although, it's been a while since we looked all this up. We might be wrong on some points."

Clay gave Apollo a cheeky grin. "Yeah, Apollo probably lost."

As the two old friends descended into a light-hearted slap fight, Luke's attention was distracted by movement on the floor above. He turned his gaze up the stairs, and found himself locking eyes with a young girl, maybe a little older than Trucy, peering around the wall. Her bright orange hair was pulled into a ponytail on the left side of her head, and she was wearing a set of massive pink headphones with odd antenna sticking out of them. Luke and the girl stared at each other for a moment before the girl gasped and disappeared.

"Wait!" Luke cried, attracting Apollo and Clay's attention as he dashed past them and directly up the stairs.

Starbuck frowned. "Oh geeze, you guys wouldn't have something to do with why Metis is so upset, would you?"

Apollo looked up. "Metis?" he repeated, quietly.

"Doctor Cykes. Y'know, labcoat, yellow kimono?" Starbuck explained, placing his plastic container on the table and giving the three a serious look. "What happened?"

Clay and Apollo exchanged nervous glances. Luke adjusted his cap. "Mister Starbuck," the young gentleman asked, "do you know anything about the girl on the fourth floor?"

Hershel frowned in concern. "Luke?"
"She lives here, but she has ear problems or something," Starbuck explained. "Doesn't get on with strangers well, so she mostly stays up around the lab."

Clay frowned. "What do ear problems have to do with strangers?"

"She was wearing strange headphones," Luke pondered aloud, tapping his chin in thought. "If she has ill-health, I suppose Doctor Cykes was very worried about her, and that's why she threatened to kick us out."

Luke shook his head, turning to look up at his friend with a shocked expression. "I-I... I think I might have met Athena before."

Luke sat in the grass, as he did many days, underneath the tree at the back of the courtyard. It being autumn, most trees were avoided by the other students due to their tendency to drop leaves at the worst possible times and on the worst possible places, but Luke didn't mind, parking himself on this particular tree's roots and nonchalantly brushing off any leaves that landed on him. Having finished his lunch, the eighteen-year-old was packing away his rubbish in his satchel to dispose of later, and extricating a textbook to read, a homemade bookmark constructed by his little sister sticking out the top. May as well get to work on memorising these drug effects, he mused to himself. Still got a few minutes. Better to use them constructively.

It had struck Luke the previous day that this would be his final year studying at Gressenheller. A part of him missed his first year, when he had, what seemed in retrospect at least, less work to do and more free time to spend with friends. Alfendi had yet to start school then, so he was usually somewhere around the campus, being watched by either his father or sister; Luke had always enjoyed helping to look after the toddler around his classes, although nowadays the young boy rarely came to the university anymore.

"Luke?"

Interrupted from his train of thought, Luke looked up from his book. To his surprise, a teenager in yellow was standing not far away, watching him with a nervous smile as she adjusted the backpack hanging over her shoulders. "Athena!" he cried, and gave her a polite smile. "Hello!"

Athena grinned, relaxing as she was recognised, and skipped over to join Luke under the tree. "What are you doing, Luke?" she asked.

Luke laughed, showing her his book. "Getting started on exam study, I suppose!" He moved his bookmark to his current page, closing the book and watching Athena. "I was kinda thinking I'd scared you off, given how fast you left the other day."

"O-oh, yeah," Athena mumbled, blushing as she ran her hands through her ponytail. "S-sorry about that."

Glancing at his book, Luke recalled for a moment the conversation he'd had with his former mentor, just after he'd last seen the teenager standing beside him.

*Hershel frowned, placing his teacup back in its saucer as he stood from his desk. "You've met her before?" he repeated, rounding the sofa and sitting in the seat Athena had just vacated, all the while watching Luke curiously. "When was this?"

"J-just after the adoption," Luke explained, eyes still wide in shock as he processed the revelation he had just made. "Clay and Apollo and I were at the Space Centre, a-and that story I just told Athena... that's where Clay and Apollo first told it to me!" He took off his cap, running a hand through his hair as he forced himself to stay calm, staring off into space. "I-I saw a girl on one of the floors above, and tried to chase her, but we, or I, lost her, and I ran into this scientist!"

Luke nodded, pausing as he realised he had been starting to panic for a moment there. "I think the scientist I literally ran into that day was Athena's mother," he said, managing to keep himself more level-headed with the aid of his former mentor at his side. "Mister Starbuck said the girl we saw... 'belonged' to the robotics scientists, and had ear problems, so she was kept away from strangers."

Hershel frowned. "Hmm. I remember now; You wrote to me about that incident," he recalled. "Didn't you and your brother decide not to return until this scientist had calmed down?"

"We didn't go back to the Space Centre until after the HAT-1 Miracle," Luke explained, "and I never saw that scientist again." He frowned. "But, we did run into Ms Blackquill when Flora was last visiting... she said she was the only scientist working in the robotics lab now." Again, he tapped a finger against his chin, thinking. "I wonder what happened to move Athena and her mother to London?"

Hershel softly grunted to himself, tugging at the brim of his hat to cover his eyes.

"Do you suppose I should ask her?" Luke continued. "She must have recognised me when Papa introduced us. Why didn't she say anything?"

"Whatever the reason," Hershel interrupted, giving the young man a stern stare, "she doesn't seem to want to discuss it."

Luke blinked in surprise before he realised what the professor was hinting at, his hands twisting at his cap. "O-oh, yeah," he mumbled, feeling chastened. "'A gentleman always follows a lady's wishes', right?"

Hershel nodded, giving Luke a small, but proud, smile. "Miss Cykes most likely has a very good reason for not wanting you to recognise her from this chance meeting of yours. If she wishes to discuss it, I don't doubt she'll bring it up herself... in her own time."

Although it had taken him a while, Luke had eventually managed to put aside his burning curiosity and agree with his former mentor not to confront the teenage girl with the list of questions brewing in his mind since the moment he had recognised her for the headphoned little girl in the Space Centre. He looked up at the worried Athena with a smile. "It's fine," he told her, knowing he truly meant it.

Athena smiled in relief, and sat down at Luke's side, taking the time to find a comfortable spot among the tree roots. "I just finished a lecture," she explained with a grin, pulling her bag off her back. "It ran a little late today. What about you?"

"Heading off to a tutorial in about five minutes," Luke replied, taking the chance to check his watch. "I've had this teacher before, though; She's always late, so I can take my time."

Nodding, Athena looked around the quiet area of courtyard. "You don't have anyone to wait with?" she asked, concerned.

Luke took a few moments to respond, tapping a finger against his book in thought. "No. For much the same reason you didn't leave class with anyone else, probably."
Athena spun around to look at him in surprise. "Huh?"

"The age difference," Luke pointed out with a sad smile, busying himself by putting his book back in his satchel. "The first semester or two I made a few friends, but they couldn't ever take me out anywhere... I was too young, and uninterested, in getting drunk or breaking the law, so they stopped asking." He closed his eyes, the smile becoming a frown. "Everyone else, they were focused on doing the work, like I was, but they just saw me as a kid. Then one person found out I used to be Professor Layton's apprentice, and no-one tried to be my friend after that." He sighed. "The Professor says they were just intimidated, but I doubt anything I could do would make them care about me at this point."

Luke was surprised by a pair of arms throwing themselves around him, and he opened his eyes to see Athena, seemingly on the verge of tears, hugging him tightly. "That's so sad...!" she squeaked. "No-one should have to go through that!"

Resisting the urge to laugh at her sympathetic tears, Luke patted the teen on the back. "Really, I'm fine," he assured her. "I have the Professor, Flora and Alfendi to talk to, and my family is only a text away, most of the time." He giggled. "And, I would hope to count you as a friend now, too."

Athena looked up in surprise, releasing the young man from the hug. After a moment, she grinned widely. "Of course you can!" she cried. "I'd love to be your friend!"

Luke laughed, leaning back against the tree behind him. "I'm glad to hear it!"

Still grinning, Athena moved to sit against the tree next to him. "Oh yeah, I'd heard about Professor Layton's accomplishments!" she explained. "You'll have to tell me about this 'apprentice' thing sometime!"

At that, Luke had to laugh again, giving the teen a knowing look. "Well, I have been writing it down. Maybe I could let you look over it. For mistakes and such."

Athena looked up, and, seeing his amused smile, giggled. "That sounds awesome!" she replied, excited. "I'd love to!"

"Great!" Luke replied, then looked at his watch, his smile turning into a frown. "Hmm. I'd better get going to class."

"Aw," Athena sighed, watching with disappointment as Luke hung his satchel over his shoulder and got to his feet. "We can talk again later, right?"

Luke nodded. "Of course!" he assured her. "Where will you be in an hour's time?"

"Either still here or at home," Athena replied, a hand fiddling with her necklace. "I have another class this afternoon."

Luke grinned. "Then, if you're sticking around, I'll meet you back here under the tree!" he promised. "We can compare our schedules and arrange to meet up more often!"

Athena nodded, returning the grin. "That sounds awesome!" she agreed, and she gave her new friend a wave. "I'll see you then, Luke!"

"Bye!" Luke called back, turning with a laugh as he ran off towards his classroom. "See you later, Athena!"

"You don't have to come, you know," Luke quietly told Athena as they stood between the flower beds underneath the window of Professor Layton's office. "I know the American traditions about Remembrance Day are very different to ours."

Athena giggled, sitting on the brick walls of one of the gardens. "You forget I've been living in Europe for four years now. I already know all about it."

Luke contemplated sitting opposite the fifteen-year-old, but worried about accidentally crushing some of the flowers, so decided to stay standing. "In 'Europe'? Are you saying you haven't just been living in London?" he asked.

Shaking her head, Athena smiled. "My aunt loves travelling," she said. "Her favourites to visit are Germany and France. They don't speak much English there, so I know a bit of Deutsch and Francais thanks to her putting me in local schools."

Luke giggled. "I suppose other languages are always useful to know!" he agreed, then paused in thought. "So, you've been skipping entire years of school while you've been here... and still had the time to learn two other languages and repeatedly move home around the mainland?" He shook his head in amazement. "No wonder you knew you could handle two major degrees at once!"

Athena grinned proudly. "Danke schon, merci beaucoup! You should see the number of hobbies I keep up, too!"

"Oh really?" Luke laughed. "Such as?"

"I'm a pretty good artist!" Athena boasted, arms crossed. "And I always make sure to keep track of my diet and exercise, so I stay fit and healthy!"

Luke giggled. "Wow, you don't ever rest, do you?"

"Of course I do!" Athena shot back with an indignant look. "Rest is an important part of staying fit and healthy!"

Before the nineteen-year-old could reply, he heard a cry behind him. "Luke!" Quickly turning around, he saw Flora entering the courtyard from the nearby door, leading young Alfendi by the hand.

Luke smiled, giving his friend a wave. "Flora! Alfendi!" He cast a quick glance at Athena next to him, watching the newcomers curiously. "Come over here so I can introduce you to Athena!"

Flora waved at the teenager, approaching with a friendly grin as she dragged along the reluctant young boy at her side. "It's nice to meet you properly, Athena!" she said. "I don't think we ever got the chance to talk the last time we met!"

Athena's curious look turned to a smile as she recognised the young woman. "Oh! No, we didn't!"
she agreed, shaking Flora's hand. "It's nice to meet you... Flora?"

"That's me," Flora replied with a smile, then indicated the boy at her side, who was giving Athena a stern glare. "This is my little brother, Alfendi," she continued.

Gasping, Athena clapped her hands together, giving Alfendi a wide grin. "Aww, you're the baby who got all excited about the body!" she cried in recognition, then held out a hand to shake. "It's nice to meet you again, Alfendi!"

Alfendi continued to stare.

"Fendi," Flora warned the five-year-old with a falsely-sweet tone, nudging her brother with the hand gripping his.

Biting his lip, Alfendi begrudgingly shook Athena's hand, sending a glare somewhere off to his side.

"Thank you, sweetie," Flora told her brother with a smile.

Luke peered behind the siblings, a confused look on his face. "Where's the Professor?"

"He said he had something quick to take care of in his office," Flora explained, gesturing to the windows above them. "He promised he'd be right out."

"We still have enough time to get to this graveyard, right?" Athena asked with a worried frown.

"Of course we do," Luke assured her, quickly checking his watch. "The Professor especially always leaves plenty of time to spare."

Flora held a hand to her chin, seeming concerned. "I think he's expecting someone to join us."

Athena frowned. "Aside from me?"

"He's invited someone else?" Luke asked. "Who?"

Flora shrugged, looking frustrated. "I really don't know anything else. He said something vague about 'visitors' and just gives me that infuriating smile when I ask... you know, the one he always has when he knows what's going on and you don't."

Luke nodded sympathetically. "Yeah, I know that smile." He then turned to Athena. "Oh yeah, speaking of, have I given you the latest couple chapters of Curious Village yet, Athena?"

Athena shook her head. "Don't think so. I've read up to the point where the Professor and the apprentice just got to the top of the tower?"

Flora grinned. "Ah, you're about to get to the best part, then!" she told the fifteen-year-old with a wink. "Any ideas on the mystery yet?"

Before Athena could answer, there was a cry of "Surprise!" from behind Flora, causing her to jump with a shriek as she pulled Alfendi into her arms protectively. She and Luke turned to look at the cause of the shout as one, and Luke was the first to react, grinning widely.

"Emmy!" Luke cried, rushing forward to greet his friend and just barely restraining himself from pulling her into a hug. "What are you doing here!?"

Emmy laughed, reaching up to rustle Luke's hair through his cap despite the young man's height. "I promised I'd come back and visit, didn't I?" she pointed out.
Flora sighed in relief, letting go of Alfendi as she gave Emmy a wave in greeting. "It's nice to see you again! Could you... not give me a heart attack next time?"

"Oh, sorry about that," Emmy muttered, running a hand through her hair with an apologetic smile.

"Uncle!" Alfendi suddenly squealed, running away from the group and towards Desmond Sycamore, who was standing a short distance away looking vaguely uncomfortable, and almost downright terrified when he spotted the small boy racing towards him. Luckily for him, Alfendi stopped a little away from the man, looking him up and down critically. "Where's your cape!?" he demanded.

Sycamore pushed his glasses tightly against his nose, almost seeming to sweat from the disapproval the five-year-old was giving him. "I-I apologise," he said, deceptively calmly. "I didn't think it was cold enough today to require it." When Alfendi only continued to glare at him, he nervously added, "I'll... be sure to bring it next time."

Alfendi grinned. "Good!"

Flora rushed over to her brother's side, giving Sycamore a smile as she gestured for him to join them. "It's great to see you again, Uncle! I suppose it was you and Emmy the Professor invited to join us today?"

Sycamore nodded, adjusting his glasses again. "He... made a compelling argument," he admitted. Emmy then seemed to notice the fifteen-year-old sitting on the bricks, watching the goings-on curiously. "Oh, hello there!" she said in greeting, holding out a hand. "You must be Luke's friend the Professor mentioned!"

Luke jumped in surprise. "Oh, Athena, I'm so sorry, I-!"

"It's alright," Athena quietly insisted with a smile, although her necklace flashed blue. She stood and shook Emmy's offered hand, giving the woman a warm grin. "I'm Athena Cykes! Nice to meet you!"

"Emmy Altava!" Emmy responded, then smirked and jerked a thumb behind her to Sycamore, who Alfendi was leading back to the group with a determined look. "The loser back there's my travelling companion, Doctor Desmond Sycamore."

Sycamore looked up with wide, angry eyes. "Excuse me...?!"

"You're a 'doctor', Uncle?" Flora asked in surprise.

"Well, y-yes," Sycamore admitted, trying to ignore Alfendi tugging on his arm as the boy played with his frilly sleeve, "in that I have a doctorate in archaeology... But I prefer to forget about that, hence why I ask to be called 'Mister' and not 'Doctor'."

Luke couldn't resist a somewhat proud smile. "I'll have a doctorate myself at the end of this school year."

"Goody for you," Sycamore shot back with a glare.

Athena looked between the two nervously, then turned to Sycamore. "So, you're Flora and Alfendi's uncle, Mister Sycamore?"

Sycamore sighed and gave the teen a nod. "We're what you might call 'estranged'," he explained, "but I am Layton's brother. We're," he paused to adjust his glasses, frowning in thought, "attempting to form a relationship."

"One other than 'mortal enemy'?” Luke muttered to himself, not noticing the curious look Athena gave him in response.

Having not heard Luke's aside, Emmy looked up to the window above them that she remembered as belonging to Layton's office. "Does the Professor know about Uncle Leon...?” she wondered aloud.

"Know what?” Flora asked, seeming confused.

Sycamore scoffed, attempting to cross his arms before deciding not to deprive Alfendi of his fascination with the frilly sleeve under his suit. "Please, spare him the misery of knowing that man might be out and about again. It's the least you can do."

Luke's eyes widened. "They've released him!?”

"No, no!” Emmy cried, shaking her head and looking somewhat frustrated. "They've just given him permission to go on supervised outings to universities, to give talks about the Azran!” She smiled, proud of her 'uncle'. "One of the Oxbridges asked him to guest lecture, apparently! He is the world's foremost expert on the Azran civilisation, after all!"

Luke gave her a doubtful look.

"And you,” Emmy continued, shooting Sycamore a look, "might stand to be a bit nicer to him! He's your birth father, after all!"

"That man is no father of mine,” Sycamore hissed, shooting wary glances down at Alfendi, who was ignoring the conversation. "I'm not nearly as forgiving as my little brother, so kindly stop asking!”

Emmy and Sycamore continued to glare at each other until a clearing throat behind them attracted everyone's attention to Hershel, standing not far away watching the group with a concerned look. "Is something the matter?"

"Papa!” Alfendi cried with a grin, running to meet him. "Papa, it's Uncle!"

Hershel gave the boy a smile. "Yes, I know," he told him with a laugh. "I invited him, after all."

Emmy and Sycamore both stepped back, avoiding each other's gazes. Flora, wringing her hands nervously, planted a smile on her face and approached Hershel. "You should have warned us, Professor!"

"And ruin the surprise?” Hershel pointed out, amused. "Now why would I ever do that?”

Athena watched as the subject was quickly changed, the emotionally-charged conversation relaxing into a more friendly one. A part of her, however, still pondered on the anger and sadness she had heard, not only between Emmy and Sycamore shortly before Layton's arrival, but between Luke and Sycamore too. What had happened that had these 'friends' so upset? 'I wish I could help them... but I'm not a psychologist yet.’ She frowned, gripping Widget around her neck tightly. 'One day I will be, though. I'll help them all out... and make Mom proud!'
Once the group had split up and Luke had offered to walk Athena home, the conversation had died between them.

It wasn't that the silence was uncomfortable; in fact, Athena quite liked not having to concentrate on a conversation over the background hubbub of the busy city, even on an important public holiday such as today. Not to mention, the morning had been a bit of a roller-coaster in her opinion: Before the two-hour memorial service Luke had invited her to, there had been the emotionally-charged meeting with Emmy and Sycamore, which everyone else had ignored as they all headed off. After the memorial, tragedy had struck when the fraying poppy Luke had pinned to his jumper with a safety pin suddenly fell apart in his hands.

"Oh no!"

Luke's cry attracted the attention of the entire group, who turned to look almost as one. Athena, hearing the despair in his voice, ran to his side, only registering as she got there that Luke had dropped into a crouch, scrabbling on the gravel below their feet for green and red pieces of what looked like fabric. "What's the matter?" she asked.

"I-I was just adjusting it!" Luke cried, gathering the pieces of fabric and a small black circle of plastic into his hands and holding them close to his chest. "I didn't want it to...!"

"I see..." Hershel said from behind Athena, and she looked up to see him watching with a sympathetic gaze, one hand on the brim of his hat. "That poppy was never built to last, Luke."

It was only then Athena noticed the piece of lonely green plastic pinned to Luke's jumper. Above it, Luke was still staring at the remnants in his hands. With a sigh, he hid them in his fists, standing back up as his gaze hardened. "I know," he replied, still staring at his hands. Athena wondered if any of the others could still hear the sadness in his harsh tone like she could. "It was just plastic and fabric. It was always going to fall apart eventually."

Glancing around at the others, Athena noticed Emmy and Sycamore shooting each other confused looks, while Flora seemed to be busy keeping young Alfendi from running off. Luke himself was shoving the remains of his poppy into his pockets, unpinning the lonely stem from where it still sat on his chest. Athena took a moment to prepare herself mentally, then asked her friend, "Why was it important?"

Luke looked up in surprise at her question, then sighed again, shoving the stem and safety pin into his pocket and continuing to walk out of the parking area the group were still standing in. "It was my dad's," he admitted as he walked, barely seeming to notice Athena keeping pace at his side or the rest of their group more reluctantly following behind. "He used to wear it every year, and I picked up the tradition... I just hoped I'd be able to keep it in one piece longer than this."

Athena frowned in thought as they walked. 'Mister Wright wore it?' she wondered. 'I didn't think he was the type...' Out loud, she asked Luke, "Do you want to talk about it?"
For a long moment, Luke didn't reply, and Athena was beginning to contemplate retracting her question when finally the teen turned to her with a small smile. "Alright."

Although much of what Luke had told her for the next few blocks only confused Athena further as she tried to connect the stories to what she knew of Phoenix Wright, the rising tone of happiness in Luke's voice compared to sadness had convinced her to keep quiet, watching her friend with an encouraging smile.

"Dad had really strict rules regarding poppies," Luke began. "October was way too early to wear them in his opinion; He liked to get angry at newscasters for putting them on 'too quickly', but Mum would always shut him down by telling him to write an angry letter if it bothered him so much." He chuckled to himself at the happy memory. "When we were living in Misthallery, we were one of the few families there to not have direct family on the memorial at the edge of town. Sometimes someone tried to tell us we couldn't go there, but Mum had this really great speech, and she and Dad used to tag-team it if someone bothered us!" Giggling, he gave Athena the brightest smile she'd seen from him since he introduced her to Flora first thing that morning. "It was great! If I remembered it clearly, I'd recite it for you!"

"Sounds like it would have been fun!" Athena replied, grinning.

Luke giggled, then looked away as his smile faded. "Once we got home, the poppies always had to go off immediately. Mum said once it was to 'symbolise the short life spans of the actual flower' or something, but she was just joking." He paused a moment, thinking deeply to himself. "Dad's favourite thing to do to lighten the mood after a memorial was to pull off his poppy once we got home, shout that we'd spent enough time living in the past, then proudly announce he was going to go continue his latest archaeological study in his office."

From behind them, Athena heard Hershel chuckling to himself. "Yes, he did love that joke."

'Now I'm even more confused, though,' Athena thought. 'Mister Wright studying archaeology? And why does everyone sound so sad about it?'

"He did it every year," Luke continued, then frowned as a note of anger entered his voice. "Well, except for the year Mum was 'away'." He shot a quick glance behind him, and Athena looked around to notice everyone else, except for Alfendi and Sycamore, firmly looking away. While Alfendi was distracted watching passers-by, Sycamore was staring evenly at Luke's back, adjusting his glasses with one hand. "That year, I don't think Dad even noticed the date. He was working too hard," Luke darkly continued. After a pause, he sighed, the anger dissipating from his voice. "It's at times like this I ask myself why it was ever so necessary for us to have to leave London... but I won't ever get an answer. Besides, there's nothing anyone can do to change the past, is there? It's no use dwelling on it."

The conversation, along with the one from when they all met up at Gressenheller hours earlier, continued to circulate in Athena's head. There were still two major thoughts she had taken from the day's events that confused her, and, as she kept telling herself, now was probably the best chance she'd get to ask about them. The first she dismissed as being unimportant, deciding her confusion over tying Luke's stories about his father to what she knew of Phoenix Wright was just because she didn't know the man all that well, and she would certainly look stupid if she asked. The other, though, had been on her mind longer, and a part of her was convinced it was a rather urgent problem.

Athena took a deep breath, then looked up at Luke by her side. "Luke, why are you and Mister Sycamore friends if you don't like each other?"

Luke seemed surprised at the question, looking back at the teen with wide eyes. "Huh?"

"I heard you talking to Emmy," Athena pointed out. "You were all happy just talking about her visiting, but if she brought up Mister Sycamore you were upset. You pretended to be happy about it, but I could tell you were faking."

"She seems to think you're friends with him like you are with her," Athena continued, "but I can hear it in your and Mister Sycamore's voices whenever you talk to or about each other: You're both angry." She cocked her head slightly to one side, fixing Luke with a curious stare. "Why?"

Luke looked away uncomfortably, shoulders held tense. "I-it's a long story."

Athena frowned. "Then tell a short version."

As Athena watched, Luke seemed to carefully weigh over his options, then eventually make his decision with a sigh, turning back to look at her with a sad stare. "When I was nine, my mum, my dad and I lived in Misthallery. Out of the blue, Sycamore came to my dad, under a disguise. He kidnapped my mum and our butler and locked them away in the cellar, and made my dad work to find something for him. Sycamore himself hid by pretending to be our butler, keeping a constant close eye on Dad. The worst part was that he was busy searching on his own anyway, destroying Misthallery with mechas while we slept."

Athena could only stare in surprise. Out of everything she was expecting to hear, that was not on her list.

"Months passed like that. It only ended when I finally found a way to call for help, and the Professor and Emmy answered. They rescued my mum and Doland, but Sycamore escaped, without even telling us who he was." Luke shook his head, looking away again. "We met him again a few more times in his disguise. One time, he tried to impale me on a drill, or at least drop me thirty stories to a sticky end. The other time, he sat back and let another guy try to drop me thirty stories, and almost drown a whole city in sand."

'Wow, this really would be a long story in full,' Athena realised. 'I should ask Luke to retell it another time.'

"The last time we met him, it was without his disguise, so we didn't know we'd met him before," Luke sighed. "He told us he was fighting to stop an evil organisation, helped us rescue a girl, and then took us all over the world while we solved problems and tried to stop this organisation he was fighting against." He paused, frowning. "He was right about the organisation, since it turned out they'd killed his wife and daughter, but it still hurt when he revealed who he really was. He stayed with us as long as he had to, then he put on his disguise and flew away, laughing."

Athena reached up and rested a hand on Luke's arm in offered comfort as she heard the rising distress and anger in her friend's voice.

"We were able to chase after him, but... all sorts of things went wrong, and the Professor, Sycamore and I were forced to work together for a while," Luke forced himself to continue, stopping for a moment before admitting, "He saved me then. I almost got zapped by lasers, but he pushed me out of the way and got himself hurt in my place."

Sadness, now? Athena made a mental note to definitely ask for the full story later.

"He helped us save the world, then left us, making it look like he was letting himself die in the collapsing ruins." Luke paused to frown. "I actually believed it for an hour or two, then I noticed the Bostonius was gone and realised he must have survived. The Professor probably figured it out immediately." He sighed, then looked over to Athena. "I know he's reformed and everything, but... I can't just forget everything he did! Especially to my parents." His face tightened, and he looked away again, tears beginning to prick at the corners of his eyes. "Does... that make me a bad person? Hating him like that?"

"Of course not!" Athena insisted, wrapping an arm behind Luke in a half-hug as their walk slowed. "And... I can't say anything professionally for a few years yet, but, from what you've told me... An awful lot happened between you two, huh?"

"Not just me," Luke pointed out. "He tried to kill the Professor a few times, even as the only one who knew at the time that they were brothers. I expect the Professor could forgive anyone though, if you gave him even a tiny reason. And Emmy... she probably felt guilty enough for what she did that forgiving Sycamore was easy."

Athena thought for a few moments. "Just because you want to forgive him, doesn't mean it'll be easy," she told him. "It also doesn't mean you have to forget what happened. I read that in a book once."

Luke couldn't help but smile at Athena's honesty on the source of her advice. "You're probably right," he admitted. "I... I need to think about it, though."

Laughing, Luke adjusted his cap with one hand. "A noble pursuit if I ever heard one!" he proclaimed, then gave her a relaxed smile. "But thank you. I really mean it."

"No problem!" Beaming, Athena skipped the rest of her way home.

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
To my dear friend,

It all happened when I was young - still a child, by most accounts, though I preferred to think of myself as a teenager to seem older. I was his apprentice, and lone assistant, back then, and the stories of our adventures were already widely known thanks to the papers... But the things we saw that day in the village became a secret we would have to keep from everyone for the rest of our lives, because, you see...

It was a bright and sunny day out in rural England. Our car bumped along the dirt road, winding its way through the trees to a destination only the Professor knew. I, the ever-loyal apprentice, was sitting at his side in the passenger seat, never too far away from my mentor.

I looked up from the letter in my hands. "We're going to solve an inheritance dispute?" I asked, confused. "That doesn't sound exciting at all!"

The Professor laughed. "Ah, but I think you'll find this is a rather unique case," he told me. "As it says in the letter, Baron Cornelius Avalon passed away two months ago. His will, once it was disclosed, indicated a heretofore unknown family treasure by the name of The Golden Petal was hidden somewhere in the village he called home."

"The Golden Petal?" I asked. The name intrigued me, and I simply had to know what such a treasure might be. The letter the Professor had handed me seemed to indicate we'd been hired to find something, after all. "Is that what we're looking for? What is it?"

"Not so many questions at once!" The Professor requested with an amused smile. "In short, nobody knows what this 'Golden Petal' is, only that whoever found it would inherit the entirety of Baron Avalon's estate."

I folded up the letter in my hands, putting it away in its envelope. "So it's still missing?" I realised. "And this Lady Hyacinth who wrote the letter, the Baron's widow, has hired the greatest puzzle-solver in the world to come and find it?"

The Professor laughed again, always humble about his fame. "It is indeed a puzzle as to where and what it is," he agreed, frowning in thought. "Baron Avalon staked his life on this mystery. My intuition tells me there's a lot more to this story than meets the eye."

Over the horizon, a great tower loomed, followed by the wall of a small village by a river, a drawbridge the only way in or out.

We had arrived in Gardens Dell.
Trucy giggled as she finished reading. "It's so awesome!" she cried, handing the paper back to her blushing brother. "Do you have more than just the prologue done? I want to read more!"

Luke laughed, re-folding the paper. "You've just read the entirety of Chapter One!" he told his sister. "I'm glad you like it, though! Athena's been loads of help stream-lining it with me... she's even done illustrations, though I don't have any with me at the moment."

"So is there more or not!?" Trucy demanded, ignoring most of Luke's reply. "I want to see what you've done with the story!"

"But you already know it back to front," Luke pointed out.

"I wanna know what you've changed!" Trucy argued. "Like, I thought you weren't changing the robots' names, and you changed Lady Dahlia!"

At that, Luke rubbed nervously at the back of his neck. "Well, after that story Papa and Apollo told us about the twins Iris and Dahlia..."

The apartment's front door swung open, quickly closing again with a thud. "Anyone home?"

Immediately forgetting her conversation with Luke, Trucy jumped off the couch with a grin, running to the reception door just as Apollo opened it from the other side. "Polly!" she shouted in greeting, giving the young man a brief hug before jumping back and indicating Luke. "Luke was showing me the first chapter of his book!"

"I-it's still a draft!" Luke added with a nervous smile, hugging the paper to his chest as he got to his feet.

"Sounds cool!" Apollo laughed, giving Trucy a grin as he entered the room properly, his sister bouncing at his side. "I'll have to read it later!"

Luke frowned in confusion. "You can read it now, if you like," he offered, holding out the paper. Apollo shook his head. "Nah. I actually had something I wanted to discuss with Dad, that I should get to as soon as possible." He looked around the room. "He's at home, right?"

"Yeah, he's here," Trucy assured him, gesturing to the kitchen door with a bored look on her face. "I think he's wrapping presents in his room."

"You might want to knock before you disturb him," Luke added with a smile. Apollo grinned in agreement, nodding at his siblings before leaving the room. "I'll be right back," he promised as he left.

Phoenix's Bedroom
At the knock on his door, Phoenix hurriedly shoved the small pile of books, DVDs and wrapping supplies under the covers of his bed. "Yes?" he called.

"It's me," came the voice of Apollo from the other side of the door. "Can I talk to you, Dad?"

Phoenix lifted the covers to assess what he had and hadn't wrapped. "Just a moment," he replied to his son, gathering together the pile to move to somewhere safer: into his closet. Once he had shoved everything into the nearest box, he carefully closed the doors and turned to face the entrance to his bedroom, casually sticking his hands in his hoodie pockets. "Come on in, Apollo."

The door gingerly opened, and Apollo stuck his head in, looking around a bit before coming in to the room. "Huh," he muttered to himself. "The others thought you were wrapping stuff for tomorrow."

Phoenix grinned, shrugging nonchalantly as he sat down on his bed. "You wanted to talk?" he asked.

Apollo nodded, closing the door behind him as he frowned in thought. "I wasn't sure how best to tell you this," he began as he crossed his arms, slowly walking over to join Phoenix, "so I've been putting it off. I figured maybe it would be best if I just said it straight out."

Raising an eyebrow, Phoenix watched his eldest son sit at his side on the bed. "What is it?"

Apollo took a deep breath, folded his hands in his lap, then looked up to meet Phoenix's eyes. "I've applied for my internship at Gavin Law Offices."

Phoenix stared blankly at Apollo for a very long moment that only seemed to stretch longer and longer. "I've applied to Mister Gavin to intern at his law office," Apollo repeated.

"What were you thinking!?" Phoenix suddenly hissed, casting glances at the door as he worried about Apollo's siblings potentially listening in. "He's not going to hesitate to accept you! You know what I've found out about him!"

Apollo nodded, giving his father a serious stare. "Yeah, I do," he replied. "Once you finally gave them to me, I read that case-file and all your investigation notes until I almost had them memorised."

"Then why did you apply to him!?" Phoenix asked, staring at Apollo with a look between anger and bewilderment.

"Because your current strategy is to wait until he slips up, isn't it?" Apollo pointed out, arms crossed. "You don't have any hard evidence to prove anything, just your gut instinct."

After a pause, Phoenix sighed, hiding his face in one hand. "And you think you might have better luck as his subordinate," he realised.

Apollo shrugged, embarrassed. "In short, yes," he admitted. "I want to help you, Dad."

Phoenix moved his hand to his chin, deep in thought and eyes closed.

When it didn't look likely he'd get an immediate response, Apollo tapped a finger nervously against his bracelet. "I'm not going to do anything stupid," he promised. "I won't try playing detective, at least not yet. I'll just be an intern. Do whatever busywork he gives me." He gave his father the smallest of smiles. "I'll be getting my badge next summer, anyway. Maybe by then we'll have that evidence we need."

Phoenix didn't react, thinking to himself for a long moment before, finally, opening his eyes to meet Apollo's. "I... suppose it's too late to stop this trainwreck you've set us on," he admitted.

"Not a trainwreck, Dad," Apollo objected with a frustrated frown. "I'll be careful! I know who I'm dealing with! And I have the experience to not let him pick up on anything, too!"

Sighing, Phoenix nodded. "Sure. I can't exactly stop you."

Apollo blinked in surprise for a moment, having expected a bit more of a fight, then relaxed into a smile. "Thanks, Dad," he said. "I won't let you down, I promise!"

Phoenix laughed. "I know you won't," he assured his son, resting a hand on Apollo's shoulder. "You'll make me proud like you always do. And hey, maybe he's got some good lawyering tips tucked away in that evil brain of his!"

Apollo snorted in restrained laughter. "I guess we'll have to see!"

"Did you sleep at all last night?"

Clay blearily looked up at his friend from where he was stretched out on the sofa, a laptop sitting on his chest. "Why? What's the time?"

Apollo frowned, hands on his hips as he cast a pointed glance at the small computer. "You have a clock right in front of you. You tell me." When Clay only stared blankly at the screen in front of him, Apollo rolled his eyes. "You didn't sleep last night."

"I have an assignment, dude!" Clay argued, picking up the laptop and carefully sitting up, placing his feet firmly on the floor. "I have to get it done!"

"Well you're not getting anything done by doing it on no sleep," Apollo argued, taking the computer from his friend's hands.

"Hey!" Clay protested, making a grab for the laptop before it seemingly disappeared into thin air behind Apollo's back. Glaring, he jumped to his feet and ran in circles around his magician friend, looking for any trace of where it had gone. "Gimme back my computer, dude!"

"In a second," Apollo promised, turning to face Clay with crossed arms. "I need two things from you, first."

Clay sighed, sitting back down on the couch. "Sure," he muttered in defeat. "I'll promise to go eat and take a nap before I do any more work."

Apollo smiled. "That's great of you to say, though I was going to ask something else first." When Clay looked confused, Apollo shrugged nervously and gestured to his outfit. "What do you think?"

Clay frowned, looking his friend up and down. Apollo was wearing the black suit he always had on, though it was usually hidden on weekends by his red cape. His usual heart-shaped bag was missing too, and his diamond earring had been replaced with the simple red stud Apollo usually wore to classes. From his knees down, he had his stage boots on, their black soles barely visible on the thick, dirty carpet of the pair's home. His hands sported their usual gloves, Apollo's ever-present bracelet glistening from his left wrist. "Your outfit?" Clay asked.

Apollo sighed, irritated. "Yes! Do you think I look professional?"

Clay raised an eyebrow at Apollo's worried expression. "Dude, that's what you've always worn to your classes. Why are you asking now?"

Apollo glared at Clay, then reached behind him and pulled out from nowhere the missing laptop, placing it on the coffee table behind him. "I'm heading off for my first day of internship," he replied. "I'll see you this afternoon."

"Oh," Clay muttered, watching Apollo storm off to the front door. "Um, I'll get right on breakfast
Apollo didn't reply, throwing open the front door.

"Good luck, dude!" Clay called, just as the door slammed closed behind his friend.

Apollo nervously adjusted his tie as he exited the elevator. 'I hope I'm not late...' His father's dire warnings echoed in his head as he checked his watch.

"Let him believe you've let your guard down, but always keep an eye out. He may be a simple law-breaker, but I have my suspicions he's capable of far worse, so watch yourself. Oh, and, above all... try to relax, okay?"

"Easier said than done, Dad," Apollo muttered to himself, finding the door not far away with a small sign on the nearby wall reading 'Gavin Law Offices'. "That must be the place." He then frowned and shook his head. "Stop talking to yourself, Wright. You got this. You're fine." Resisting the urge to shout, he firmly walked over to the door and pushed it open.

Perhaps it was because he was so used to his family's own messy office space that the neat and clean room he was greeted with surprised Apollo so much, making him pause in the doorway as he looked around in shock. Comfortable-looking chairs lined one wall, near an almost empty reception desk that appeared to be unused despite being free of any sign of dust or disrepair. There was a door in the far wall, held open with a small, simple wedge door-stopper on the carpet. 'Is... is this what a professional office looks like!?'

Apollo heard movement in the next room, and jumped inside, letting the door swing closed behind him with a thud. He winced a bit at the noise, hoping he hadn't caused too much of a ruckus, and rubbed at his bracelet nervously, shooting the door a quick glare.

"Is that you, Wright?"

"U-uh..." Looking around, Apollo realised Kristoph Gavin was standing in the office doorway, adjusting his glasses as he calmly watched the young man in black. "Y-yes, sir!" Apollo almost shouted, straightening up and swallowing his nervousness. In a quieter, almost meek tone, he added, "I... hope I'm not late?"

Kristoph's brow furrowed in the smallest frown, rubbing at an ear with one finger. "There's no need to shout," he said. "And you are actually a few minutes early, if anything."

Apollo tried not to wilt at his mistake. "Sorry, sir."

"Mister Gavin' is fine," Kristoph continued, stepping forward towards the young man as he looked him up and down. "I presume that is what you plan to wear in court?"

Shooting a glance down at his black suit and white boots, Apollo nodded. "It's part of my stage outfit. My sister designed it... with Dad's help." He struggled not to again reach for his bracelet, wondering if wearing the gloves today had been a bad move. 'At least I remembered not to wear the Kristoph thought for a moment. "It's adequate," he eventually decided, pushing his glasses further up his nose. "Certainly an improvement on your father's simple suit, with less eye-catching colours. The missing sleeves and those blindingly white boots are a bold choice, but I can't say I've not seen stranger sights from certain prosecutors. At least the boots will be invisible behind the bench."

Apollo sighed in relief. 'Remind me to treat Trucy later for making this work without the cape! Also, kill Clay for not pointing out the boots.' "I'll remember to wear normal shoes in future, Mister Gavin," he promised.

"That would be preferable," Kristoph continued with a hint of a smile. "To be perfectly honest, I was half-expecting to have to take you out shopping for suitable court dress myself. Students are notoriously low on funds, and I'm well aware of your family's situation in particular."

'Geeze, a shopping trip with my boss? What would that have been like?' Apollo wondered. Aloud, he felt some of his stage confidence returning to him as he smirked and asked, "Should I be insulted, Mister Gavin?"

Kristoph quietly chuckled to himself. "Why don't you come through to my office?" he asked, gesturing to the room behind him. "We can start putting you to work right away."

Wanna meet up for dinner tmrw nite? :

Oooo ok! Why tho?

Cuz I want to tell you all about my first day as an intern in person before we have to work :) .

:DDDD

I'll take that as a yes xD .
Eldoons at the usual time? .

Yeah! :D
Oh is it ok if Daddy comes too?

Sure :) .

Yay! We'll see you there! :D

January 18, 6:28PM
Mort Street

The breeze of the cold evening blew at Apollo's cape, exposing his bare arms to the winter air. 'Should've worn a sweater to work today,' the young man chided himself, tugging the edges of the red fabric tight around his torso, hoping the wind wouldn't grow strong enough to blow his hat off his head. 'Where the hell is Mister Eldoon? He's normally around here at this time!'
Finally, Apollo spotted a familiar cart winding its way around the corner ahead. Grinning, he raced forward, a hand on his hat to keep it from flying away as he used the other to wave. "Mister Eldoon!" he cried. "Mister Eldoon, I've been-!" It was then the man pulling the cart looked up, and Apollo finally saw his face, grinding to a halt as he recognised it was not the face of the person he was expecting. Instead of thin grey hair, there was nothing natural visible under this man's identical noodle-like wig of hair, and the lack of Dude Eldoon's blue glasses revealed similar thick eyebrows, although this man's were a deep black instead of grey. Other than that though, Apollo couldn't see any more similarities outside the man's wardrobe.

The two stared at each other in surprise and confusion for a long moment. "Who are you?" Apollo asked.

The unknown man scoffed to himself, climbing out from the pull-bar of the cart. "You're one of the regulars," he said, more as an observation than a question. "Sorry I won't know your usual. That kind of thing weren't exactly written down." With that, he began to open up the mobile stand for business, pushing open the shades and disappearing into the back.

Apollo shook his head, still confused. "Uh, just a normal bowl," he muttered, walking up to the window and pulling a small handful of notes from his bag. "Not too much salt, though. It disagrees with me, and I kinda have to be on stage in an hour or so." He watched the man silently working behind the low-hanging 'Eldoon' banner, and, shivering, pulled at his cape for protection from the cold. "So, where's Mister Eldoon?" he asked. "What's happened to him?"

The man sighed, pausing in his work only briefly before placing a bowl of noodles in front of the magician waiting outside. "By that, I'll assume you're asking about my pops and not me," he said.

Passing over his money, Apollo's eyes widened in surprise. "You're his son?" he asked, grabbing a pair of chopsticks. "The one he wasn't getting along with?"

"Told you 'bout that, did he?" the younger Eldoon muttered, then sighed. "I suppose I was just fighting destiny, trying to avoid this old stand. Who am I to break a tradition of fifteen fathers?" He shook his head, pressing a hand against the bowl and yellow wig perched on his head. "No, salty broth runs through my family's veins!" He looked to Apollo. "Name's Guy. What about you?"

It took Apollo a moment to realise he was being asked his name, and he quickly swallowed his mouthful of noodles. "Uh, Apollo."

"Nice to meet you, Pollo," Eldoon replied with a nod.

View the Court Record
Looking the young man up and down, Guy Eldoon crossed his arms and leaned against a counter top behind him. "What are you then, eh? An actor?"

"Magician," Apollo explained, smiling as he gestured to his outfit with his chopsticks. "Although I'm also studying to be a lawyer. My sister and I stop by here before our show all the time." He paused to look up and down the street, wondering where said sister was.

Apollo shot the man a glare. "Considering what happened to my dad six years ago, I wouldn't be surprised if they did more than just joke about it. Especially to my face."

Although confused, Eldoon decided to accept that and shrugged. "Speaking of fathers, I suppose I should break the bad news," he said, changing the subject. "My pops won't be coming back to this stand, I'm afraid."

"What do you mean?" Apollo asked, frowning. "I promised him just two weeks ago I'd tell him all about my first day of internship. My brother was going to tell him about London when he gets back in a few months."

Eldoon shook his head. "Sorry, sonny. I'm afraid he suffered a fatal heart attack over the week. Nobody's gonna be telling him anything anymore."

Apollo almost dropped his chopsticks and bowl in shock. "He's... dead?"

"That's generally what happens with a fatal heart attack, yes," Eldoon replied with another heavy sigh, staring off to the side. "If he'd only told me he..."

Apollo placed his chopsticks down on the small counter of the cart for a few moments, still trying to process the news. Although Dude Eldoon had never been a close friend, the old man had been a constant presence in Apollo's life for as long as he'd been a Wright. Many a night had been spent out looking for the old noodle cart when the family found themselves unable to scrape together the money for groceries, and Phoenix would ask for their meal to go on his tab... a tab that Apollo had heavily suspected for many years now the elder Eldoon would quietly discount as time went on. Before Apollo had moved out, he and Trucy (occasionally joined by Luke and/or Phoenix) would stop by the cart for dinner before going to work, and after moving out, sometimes, as he did tonight, he would plan to meet Trucy there instead of at the Wonder Bar. He'd never been the biggest fan of the salty noodles Eldoon made, but the old man had been such a friendly presence Apollo had never argued chatting with him. As the years passed, he even got less salty noodles out of the deal, so he was never going to be the one to complain about it.

"Polly!"

Pulled out of his thoughts, Apollo looked up to see Trucy running down the footpath towards him,
Phoenix trailing not far behind with a smile. He forced a small smile of his own, waving to his approaching sister. "Hey, Truce. Dad."

Trucy bounded to Apollo's side, gripping the counter sticking out from the window to the cart. "Mister Eldoon, I! Huh?" She looked the man within up and down, confused. "You're not Mister Eldoon!"

The younger Eldoon frowned, offended. "Yes, I am!" He turned his glare to Apollo, jerking his head towards the girl as he noted her identical cape and hat (except in blue instead of red). "This your sister, Pollo?"

Phoenix caught up as Apollo was nodding, peering into the cart with a confused gaze that quickly turned to recognition. "Hey, I know you!"

Guy Eldoon looked terrified for a moment, looking Phoenix up and down before seeming simply confused. "Eh?"

"It's Guy, right?" Phoenix asked, glancing nervously up and down the street before carefully pulling off his beanie. "You remember an old customer, don't you?"

Upon seeing Phoenix's unique hair, Eldoon broke into a grin. "Hey, ol' Phoenix! You still a regular after all this time, eh?"

Phoenix laughed, slipping the beanie back on as Trucy watched him in confusion. "You bet! What are you doing back here selling noodles? You seemed so excited about following your dream when you left!"

Eldoon sighed, losing his cheer almost instantly. "I guess sometimes dreams just don't work out. Yours didn't either, if I remember rightly."

Phoenix didn't reply, looking off to the side with an unreadable expression on his face.

Apollo looked to Trucy, deciding to put her out of her confused misery. "Truce, this is Guy Eldoon, Mister Eldoon's son."

Nodding, Trucy gave the man a grin. "Hi!" she chirped.

"Pleasure to meet ya," Eldoon replied.

"Mister Eldoon, my little sister Trucy," Apollo continued.

Eldoon laughed. "And what a fitting name it is, too!" he told the girl. "So, what can I get ya, Trucy-doll?"

Trucy opened her mouth to respond before realising she couldn't remember what her usual order actually was, as it had been so long since she had had to say it. She looked up to Phoenix for help. "Daddy, what is it I usually get again?"

"'Daddy'?" Eldoon repeated in surprise, looking to Phoenix. "They both your kids?"

Phoenix nodded, placing one hand on Trucy's shoulder and the other on Apollo's, a proud smile on his face. "A pair of successful magicians like these? I'd be crazy to say they weren't!"

Apollo blushed, brushing his father's hand off his shoulder. "Dad," he muttered.

Eldoon laughed. "Well, I won't question it, then!" he decided. "Now what can I do you kind folk Apollo watched as Phoenix placed his and Trucy's usual orders, the other bit of news concerning the Eldoons weighing on his mind. "Um, Mister Eldoon?"

Busy putting together the two bowls, Eldoon shot a glance at Apollo over his shoulder. "What is it, sonny?"

Apollo opened his mouth to speak, then lost his nerve and closed it again before reconsidering with a different train of thought. "How... how do you know our dad?"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, but Eldoon laughed. "Aw, I used to help my pops out for a time, selling these! Ol' Phoenix would drop by with his assistant all the time."

"It was the cheaper option to burgers," Phoenix picked up, smiling at the thought of Maya. "Luckily, Maya has a fondness for pasta, or I'd never have been able to convince her to eat it."

Trucy giggled, although Apollo hadn't been listening, frowning in thought as he wondered if it would be appropriate to pass on Maya's ability to channel the dead to someone who was mourning. Eldoon, unaware of Apollo's thought process, laughed again, turning back to the family and handing out Phoenix and Trucy's bowls of food. "He used to whip out his badge," Eldoon continued, gesturing to Phoenix with a grin, "and say to us, 'Put it on my tab, you know I'm good for it!'"

Phoenix rubbed at the back of his neck with an embarrassed smile. "Yeah, I probably need to check up on the status of said tab..." he admitted. "I hope your dad has that thing written down somewhere, or we'll have to ask him when he gets back."

Aside from the sound of Trucy happily eating, the cheerful atmosphere around the noodle cart quickly died. Eldoon paused just long enough for Phoenix to register something was wrong before leaning underneath his counter and fiddling around out of sight for several moments, the sounds of clinking bowls echoing from within the wooden cart.

Apollo bit his lip in thought. 'On the one hand, it's this Mister Eldoon's father who died and he might want to be the one to tell everyone... on the other hand, he's probably had to break the news to every regular who asks where the other Mister Eldoon is, and might not want to have to go over it anymore...' Sighing, he made his decision and looked up at Phoenix. "The other Mister Eldoon apparently died of a heart attack this week."

Trucy paused in the middle of shovelling another ball of noodles into her mouth, chopsticks sticking out between her lips as she looked up at Apollo in shock. "Mmwpht!?"

Phoenix stared for a moment before looking into the cart, where the younger Eldoon was emerging with a piece of paper in hand. "I'm sorry to hear that," he said.

Eldoon just sighed. "I've made peace with it," he admitted. "To be honest, the timing couldn't have been better. After all the troubles I've had, I finally reached out to him at New Year's. Was gonna start taking over this old thing again anyway. Would've liked a little more time with him before he passed, but what can you do." Changing the subject, he tapped the paper in his hands. "Looks like he wrote down what you owe us, Phoenix. At least he had the foresight to keep track of that."

Phoenix nodded. "That's good."

Trucy finished swallowing her massive mouthful of pasta, looking sadly into her bowl. "Poor Mister Eldoon..."
The younger Eldoon gave the girl a fond smile. "Don't you worry about either of us, Trucy-doll," he assured her. "My pops is in a better place, and I can look after myself."

Have your siblings told you about Mr Eldoon?

No? What happened?

Apparently he died of a heart attack over the week. His son's running the cart now

What!?

I know, it came out of nowhere. I think you'll like Guy though. He has his father's friendly attitude

This is the son he wasn't getting along with, isn't it?

Yep. Apparently they'd just made up

I think I need some time to process this.

I don't blame you. Feel free to call me if you need to talk, alright? I'm available any time you need me

Alright. Thanks, Papa.

Papa says Mr Eldoon died?

Yeah, he did
Still not sure what to think about it

Me too.

Oh yeah, I was going to tell you about my first day of internship
I got distracted by assignments... and the whole Eldoon thing

How'd it go?

Mr Gavin's a cool boss. He seems to really like me
Plus he approved of the suit Trucy made ;)

Haha! That's always a good sign! I bet Trucy loved that, too!

She mostly just boasted that it was all her, even though Dad was right there pointing out he'd helped her design it xD
Apparently he had to guide her through a few iterations before they got what I have now ;)

Yeah, I think I remember her complaining to me about that, haha!
I should get back to my own assignments though. Talk to you tomorrow?
Sure, seeya then

Bye!

View the Court Record
"Luke!"

The nineteen-year-old looked up from his book and smiled as he saw his friend approaching. "Hello, Athena!"

Athena grinned as she jogged to the pair's usual tree, looking up to the new leaves budding on the branches above them. Spinning on her heel, the sixteen-year-old plopped down on the ground and fixed Luke with a curious smile. "Hey, I've been meaning to ask for a while; Why this tree?"

Luke stared for a moment, then frowned in thought, moving to close his book. "What about this tree?"

Athena gave Luke a look. "I've heard how you feel when you talk about it," she pointed out, then gave him an understanding smile. "It's not just a random tree in the courtyard, is it?"

Luke slowly smiled and nodded, looking up at the branches above with a nostalgic gaze. "It's less the tree itself," he explained. "More the location."

Grinning in excitement, Athena hugged her knees. "Tell me about it?" she asked.

Laughing, Luke decided to comply, replacing his book in his satchel. "My parents both studied here at Gressenheller," he explained. "They were classmates with Professor Layton."

"Really!?" Athena asked in surprise.

Luke nodded, giggling at her reaction. "Dad studied archaeology; He even roomed with the Professor in their later years. Mum studied geology. Her best friend was a co-worker at a nearby restaurant; They were waitresses there."

He paused, looking up at the tree again. "This was just some random tree to Mum at first; It was near the geology department, and it was quiet here, so she liked to sit under it if she could to eat, or study, or socialise between classes."

Athena followed Luke's gaze, her expression somewhere between sad, confused and curious.

"It was here my mum and dad met," Luke continued, still staring at the branches. "Mum said Dad and the Professor were late to a class, so they were running, and Dad decided to take a shortcut past this tree... but he didn't see Mum sat on the other side until he'd already tripped over her." He smiled, remembering the laughter in his mother's eyes whenever she'd told her son the story. "He was still late, so he just apologised and ran off, but Mum said he sought her out the next day. He was worried he'd destroyed her books or something, and wanted to pay for them if he had!" He giggled, finally looking down from the tree and catching a glimpse of Athena smiling as she intently listened to his story. "After that, they became friends. Dad introduced Mum to the Professor, and Mum introduced them both to her friend Claire. Mum said the four of them were inseparable, right up until they had me and we moved to Misthallery."

His smile died a little, knowing how far apart the four friends were now. "When we moved back to London and Dad was working here, Mum pointed this tree out to me," he looked back up at the branches, "and told me the story. She always said this was her tree, because she and Dad and the Professor and Claire were always underneath it." He paused, then looked over to Athena with an apologetic smile. "It probably sounds a little stupid, but... I guess I'm continuing her tradition."

Athena smiled understandingly. "It's not stupid," she assured him. "It makes you feel closer to her, right?"

Luke nodded, giggling as he leaned back against the tree's trunk. "Yeah, I guess it does."

The two friends stared up at the branches above them for a while in silence. "That's why I'm studying psychology," Athena eventually said.

"Hmm?" Luke asked, looking over to her in surprise.

"My mom was a psychologist," Athena explained, looking nervous as she stared at her lap. "I find the subject pretty easy, and studying it makes me feel closer to her."

Luke watched her for a moment. "Was?" he repeated.

Athena sadly returned his gaze. "Both our moms are dead, right?" she pointed out, then looked away again. "Your dad must miss her a lot too."

It took Luke a moment to realise Athena was referring not to the deceased Clark Triton, but to the very alive Phoenix Wright, and he had to restrain a laugh, leaning forward a little. "I, uh, think I need to explain something about my Dad and my Papa..."

Athena looked back up into Luke's eyes, confused. "Huh?"

"My Papa is Phoenix Wright," Luke explained with a smile. "You've met him, when we solved Professor Rains' death. My Dad was Clark Triton." He grinned with restrained laughter. "Him, you've never met, and I'm sorry to say you probably never will, either."

Athena somehow seemed even more confused. "You... have two dads?"

Luke nodded. "A Dad and a Papa," he specified. "Dad was an archaeologist, and even Mayor of Misthallery at one point, and only lived in America for a few days. Papa was a lawyer until he got disbarred, and he's never lived outside California. Do you understand now?"

Athena thought for a long moment, face screwed up in concentration. "You're... adopted?" she slowly realised, her expression turning to shock as she belatedly connected the dots and looked up at Luke in surprise. "What happened to your mom and dad!?"

Luke raised an eyebrow. "You're actually asking that?"

Athena gasped as she realised what she had just said. "Uh, n-no, I was just... surprised," she quickly cried, pressing her hands to her reddening face. "Y-you don't have to answer that!"

Luke laughed, watching Athena as she sighed in relief that he wasn't mad at her probing question. "Honestly, I've told this story to a lot of my old friends when I've met them again on visits, so I don't mind telling it again. Do you want to hear it?"

Although she still looked guilty for her spur-of-the-moment question, Athena nodded, watching Luke intently.

"Alright then," Luke said, leaning back against the tree and smiling up at the branches. "Dad was offered a job in California. We were all set up to move there. This was..." He frowned in thought. "Wow, six years ago now. More accurately, five and a half." He shook his head, looking to Athena as he brought himself back on topic. "We sent off our shipping container of furniture and things, then we took our time getting to America, so we wouldn't be too far ahead of it. We took a ship to New York, then a plane to Arizona, and then we rented a car and spent a few days driving to Los Angeles." He paused, looking away and trying not to look sad. "We were almost there when it happened. Something hit the car. Dad was killed in the crash, but Mum disappeared. The police say she's dead, but I know she's still out there somewhere." He closed his eyes, taking a moment of silence before he managed to continue. "I'd already met Papa before, when he was in England once. He came looking for me after he heard what happened, and offered to adopt me on the spot." He couldn't resist a smile at the memory, eyes opening just enough to stare at his lap. "I still call myself Luke Triton officially, so Mum can find me when she eventually reappears, but otherwise I consider myself a Wright. I have my Papa and my brother and sister, and they're all I need." There was a very long moment of silence before Luke heard a sniff and looked up in surprise to see Athena staring at him, eyes shining with tears and a smile on her face. "Are... you alright, Athena?"

Athena nodded. "Mm-hmm," she insisted. "It's just... hearing how much you miss your mom and dad and how much you love your new family...!" She paused to sniff, rubbing at her eyes with one hand. "It's so sweet!"

Luke smiled at the girl, pulling a handkerchief out of a pocket to offer it to her. "Well, I'm sure you miss your mum just as much," he said, then paused in thought as he watched her dry her eyes. "Did you ever have a dad?" he asked. "You don't have to answer."

Athena thought a moment, then shook her head. "Never even knew who he was," she explained matter-of-factly. "Or is, even. After Mom died, I got sent to live with my aunt."

"That makes sense," Luke decided, remembering how Athena's aunt was the most common mention the teenager made to her home-life. "Were your mum and aunt not very close? With you and your mum living in California, I mean."

"Probably," Athena said with a shrug, giving her eyes one last wipe before attempting to re-fold the hankie to return to its owner. "Aunt Eury doesn't really talk about my mom." With a thoughtful frown, she left it at that and handed the handkerchief back to Luke. "Thanks."

Luke smiled, laying the damp cloth on top of his satchel to dry. "And she was a psychologist, right? Your mum, I mean?" When Athena nodded confirmation, he tapped his chin in thought, staring off into the distance. "Huh, of course! I should've known with all the fuss over Ponco and Clonco they'd need a psychologist in the robotics lab..." A moment later, he realised what he'd said and whipped around to look at Athena, eyes wide as he stuttered, "I-I mean... I wasn't going to mention that!"

Slowly, Athena seemed to wilt in place, giving the grass a sad stare. "So you did recognise me."

Luke wasn't sure how to respond at first, but looked up again at the sixteen-year-old, giving her a nod. "I worked it out the first day of last semester. I wasn't going to say anything though, not unless you brought it up."

Athena grunted something that almost sounded like an attempt at a laugh. "That story you told me? When I first heard it, I just heard my name. I thought you were talking about me, so I screwed up my courage to investigate."

Giving her an understanding smile, Luke rested a comforting hand on her shoulder.

"My mom didn't just die," Athena continued, a hand reaching for her blue-faced necklace. "Someone killed her. Everyone thought it was my friend Simon, but I could hear in his voice that he was lying. He never would have killed her, not in a million years." She closed her eyes, clutching her necklace tighter as she fought tears. "I tried to tell them, but no-one listened to me! They locked him away and sentenced him to death, and I got sent halfway across the world to live with my aunt!"

As the teen began to sob, Luke shifted himself over to sit next to her, pulling Athena close in a one-armed hug.

"I didn't even know my mom!" Athena continued, leaning on Luke and moving her hands to press against her eyes in an attempt to stop the flow of tears. "She barely talked to me... made me wear those headphones I hated so much... did she even love me at all, or was I just another of her experiments?"

"Of course she would have loved you," Luke instantly replied, more instinctively at first before quickly wracking his brain for evidence to back up his claim. "Those headphones... I remember seeing them on you when we first met. I'd bet anything they were supposed to help with your sensitive hearing."

Athena sniffed, beginning to calm down, but didn't reply.

"And the first thing, or one of the first things Clay and Apollo told me when they first took me to the Space Centre," Luke continued, "was that the robotics scientists had us banned from going anywhere near them. Your mum especially seemed furious when she caught me chasing you up there. Why would she have been so upset if she didn't love you and want to keep you safe?"

Although still sniffing, Athena stayed silent, rubbing at her eyes.

"I was so scared of her, Apollo and I didn't go back until after the HAT-1 Miracle!" Luke continued, then frowned in thought. "Actually, that must have been around the time she died, right? I remember something about a murder while Clay was there the day before. Wasn't that one of the robotics scientists?"

There was a moment's pause before Athena nodded. "That was her," she admitted, then sighed, pushing herself away from Luke and rubbing at her eyes. "I'm sorry."

"Nothing to be sorry about," Luke insisted, giving her one last pat on the back before withdrawing his arm. "We're friends, aren't we? I'll always listen to your problems, and try to be there to support you." He looked around the quiet courtyard, then gave her a smile, whispering, "I promise to keep your secrets, too. You can trust me with anything."

Apollo grinned as he made his way through the crowd of graduating students (graduated, now!), heading for the much larger crowds of friends and family, all trying to reunite with their loved ones now the big ceremony was over. Occasionally, he passed a classmate from his last three years of study and they would stop to give each other their final goodbyes before moving on again.

"Good luck out in the real world, guys!"

"Hey, you'll remember to e-mail me, won't you?"

"Careful with that shout of yours, Apollo!"

"I am totally sending you all a million pics of my badge when it arrives!"

Finally extricating himself from the crowd of students, Apollo clutched the generic certificate he'd been handed on stage that morning and picked a random direction to head off to in his search for his family. It didn't take long before Apollo found it was them who happened upon him.

"YO, 'POLLO!"

Before Apollo could turn in the direction of the shout, he was ambushed from behind by a hug from his best friend, Clay keeping Apollo's arms pinned to his sides as Trucy quickly joined them, running around to Apollo's front to hug him from that direction, neatly slotting her head under her brother's chin.

Clay whooped in victory. "Gotcha!"

"Surprise!" Trucy chirped.

"Guys, get off me!" Apollo cried, shooting Trucy a glare as he attempted to wriggle free of their grasp.

"Aw, but we're so proud of you, dude!" Clay laughed from above and behind Apollo's left ear. "We're not allowed to show our love for you through group hugs?"

Apollo rolled his eyes, wishing he could look his friend in the face from this angle. "Are you sure you're not just jealous you've got another year to go until you graduate?" he asked, smirking. "Just like I always said, it looks like I'm becoming a lawyer way before you could ever hope to go to space!"

Clay didn't reply for a very long moment. "Screw you," he eventually muttered.

Apollo grinned in triumph as Clay then Trucy released him from their grasp, only to promptly find himself encased in the grip of a woman in a purple robe. "M-Maya!" he cried in surprise.

"Aw, my widdle Polly is all grown up and becoming a lawyer like his daddy!" Maya squealed, hugging Apollo tightly before releasing him and fixing the young man with a proud grin. "Just got your badge to go, then you're all set to start defending the innocent, huh?"
"Ha!" Clay cried, poking Apollo defiantly in the ribs.

"Ow," Apollo muttered, shooting his friend a glare.

"The bet's not settled until you've actually defended someone in court!" Clay continued, crossing his arms.

Apollo sighed, rubbing at his eyes with one hand. "You seriously care that much about our stupid bet?"

"Hey, I agreed on my end that I had to actually get into space!" Clay argued, hands on his hips. "Make it fair on your end too, dude!"

"Fine, fine," Apollo agreed, waving his friend off. Looking around, he noticed Phoenix and Pearl had caught up to their small group and gave them a wave. "So we're all here now?" he asked with a smile.

"All of us except Luke," Trucy sighed, crossing her arms. "It's not fair that he couldn't come..."

"He's got his own final exams to deal with at the moment," Phoenix pointed out, ruffling Trucy's hair. "We all know he would've come if he could."

"I'm just glad I could get the time off to come myself!" Maya giggled. "I'd hate to miss seeing my boys graduating from college!"

Apollo was blushing too hard to protest that he wasn't 'her boy'.

Maya shrugged, giving Clay a smile. "I'm sure I'll work something out."

Clay seemed surprised, then sighed in defeat. "Lucky," he mumbled.

Apollo laughed, and patted his friend on the back sympathetically. "Don't worry, Clay. Both Luke and I will come to yours next year, okay?"

After a pause, Clay gave Apollo a grateful smile. "Sure," he replied.

Pearl pressed her thumb to her lips in thought. "So, when will you start lawyer-ing, Apollo? Will you be working at the Agency?"

Apollo shook his head. "Nah. A lawyer doesn't belong at a talent agency," he explained, quickly shooting an apologetic glance to his father with a hurried, "Sorry, Dad."

Phoenix smiled. "No offence taken," he assured his son.

"I've been interning at Gavin Law Offices, remember?" Apollo continued to Pearl. "Mister Gavin said he'd hire me on as a junior partner once I get my badge."

"Oh," Pearl mumbled in reply, then gave Apollo a smile. "Okay."

Trucy frowned at Phoenix, picking at his old blue suit. "You really should have let me make you a new one of those, Daddy. You look awful."

Phoenix pouted, looking offended. "Hey, this suit has been through a lot! There's a lot of important memories associated with this thing!"
"It looks older than me!" Trucy cried, arms crossed.

Maya smirked, a hand to her face. "Hmm. She has a point. I mean, you were wearing that when you jumped through a circle of flames into Eagle River, weren't you?"

Clay's eyes widened in surprise as he looked to Phoenix in awe. "Whoa, did you seriously do that, Mister Wright!?"

"I didn't jump," Phoenix objected, hands on his hips. "And the fire was less a 'circle' and more the reason I fell in the first place."

"Ooooh," Maya continued, ignoring him with a look of glee on her face, "and I think you were wearing that when we both got tased too! And that one time you broke down the door of the Channelling Chamber, and then jumping down into that sooty firepit in Labyrinthia!"

"Wait, tased!?" Apollo interrupted, confused. "When did that happen!?"

Clay snickered to himself. "Man, the lawyering life must be more exciting than I thought!"

"I have no idea about what any of those things Mommy just said are," Trucy complained, crossing her arms. "Except the Labyrinthia one."

Phoenix grinned, rustling her hair. "That's 'cause you haven't obsessively read all my old case-files like Apollo here. Maybe I'll tell you the stories sometime."

"Really!?" Trucy cried excitedly. At Phoenix's resulting nod, she happily jumped in the air and cheered, "Yay!"

Apollo frowned. "Yeah, am I never gonna get an explanation on this 'tased' thing?"

Pearl giggled, pressing her hands to her cheeks as she bounced between Maya and Phoenix. "And all of those things you did were for Mystic Maya!" she squealed in Phoenix's direction. "It was so romantic of you, Mister Nick!"

Phoenix and Maya giggled at each other for a few moments. "Except that time we got tased though," Maya pointed out to Pearl, patting the teenager's shoulder fondly before looking back up at Phoenix. "That was for Edgeworth, wasn't it, Nick?"

"Ungrateful jerk," Phoenix joked, then turned to the frustrated Apollo with a smile. "That was when we were trying to investigate the DL-6 incident. Maya and I ran into Manfred von Karma, and he hit us with a taser to steal our most valuable piece of evidence and make off with anything we might have been able to use in the files."

Clay laughed. "Wow, that sounds awesome!"

Apollo frowned. "Seriously?"

Phoenix nodded, his smile gone. "Deadly serious. Keep that in mind for yourself: Never confront the bad guy with your evidence." He gestured towards Apollo with a finger. "You take them to court and put them on the spot there. I had to learn that the hard way."

Apollo nodded, eyes wide in surprise but mentally making note of the advice anyway.

"Had to learn it twice, too," Maya added with a wink, lightening the mood after Phoenix's dire instruction to Apollo. "Not that we had much of a choice with Redd White though, huh?"
"What do you mean 'we'?” Phoenix asked, giving her a smirk.

Maya grinned innocently. "Well, we all know I would have been right there with you if I wasn't locked up at the time!"

"If you'd been right there with me,” Phoenix replied, holding back a laugh, "you'd've accused White of being Mister Grossberg's lover or something!"

"Well,” Maya replied with a dismissive shrug, "it could very well have been true, y'know!"

Trucy tugged a little on Apollo's black robes, examining them. "Do you have to return this, or do you get to keep it?"

"I have to return it," Apollo told her with a smile. "It's rented, I think."

Trucy pouted in disappointment. "Aw..."

Pearl looked around at the crowd that was finally beginning to dissipate around them. "Are we supposed to be leaving now?"

"Probably," Phoenix agreed, shoving his hands in his pockets as he looked around. "Apollo just needs to return his robes, then we can go."

Apollo snorted in laughter, grinning. "I'll get right on that, since I'm apparently holding everyone up."

"Yeah, why are you so slow, dude?” Clay joked, elbowing his friend.

As Apollo turned to leave, Clay and Trucy following close behind, Maya poked Phoenix in the arm with a finger. "Hey Nick, you'll let me know when they send out those e-mails for the graduation photos, right?"

Phoenix shook his head, remembering how earlier that day, at the prompting by the photographer for a 'family photo', Maya had promptly inserted herself into the proceedings alongside Phoenix and Trucy. Pearl, although told to join in by her cousin, had stayed at the side with Clay, watching with a gleeful smile. "They'll be e-mailing Apollo, not me," Phoenix told Maya with a smile, "but I'll make sure we get one for you."

"Good!” Maya cried with a grin. "It doesn't matter that much, though; We can get a better one at Luke's graduation!"

Phoenix rolled his eyes. Then why did you ASK?’

"I'd just like a photo of Apollo's special day," Maya continued. "You're supposed to have one for each of your kids, right? As a parent?"

After a moment of confusion, Phoenix smiled and shrugged. "Probably,” he agreed. "It'll be somewhere in the Parents' Rulebook."

Pearl looked up at them, seeming puzzled. "There's a rulebook?"
As their boat passed out of the dark tunnel into the candlelight of the stone room, the trio gasped in wonder.

"W-wow," Phoenix breathed, pausing in his punting momentarily before remembering to continue pushing their tiny boat forward. "Who'd have thought there'd be some ancient underground ruins here..."

"This place is amazing, isn't it?" Espella added, face lit up with a wide smile as she looked all around, drinking in every detail she could see. "Look at those large pillars! And that stream of water!" She pointed between the pillars holding the roof above the high walkway on their right, a statue on the opposite wall spilling a fountain from its mouth just visible beyond. "Everything here looks so old! I've never seen anything quite like it!" She then paused, looking to Phoenix in confusion. "And you say this kind of place is called a... 'roo-in', is it?"

Phoenix and Luke shot each other amused glances. "Oh yeah, I guess you don't really have any ancient ruins like this within Labyrinthia, huh?" he asked.

Luke opened his mouth to add to Phoenix's comment, only to stop and sadly frown, slumping in his seat as he stared up at the high stone ceiling, making only a soft noise somewhere between a sigh and a grunt.

The boat came to a stop with a jolt as it bumped against a low platform, next to a pair of other small boats identical to theirs. After mentally kicking himself for getting distracted by his young friend, Phoenix turned to Luke with a worried frown. "Something wrong, Luke?"

"It's just..." Luke sighed, looking down as he waved his hand through the water below them. "Looking up at the columns was making him think of the Azran Sanctuary. "This reminds me of the Professor," he admitted. "If he were here, he could tell us anything we wanted to know about these ruins."

"Oh, that's right," Phoenix mumbled, looking away as he lay the long stick he'd been using to direct their boat down along the side of the hull. "The Professor was an archaeologist, huh?"

Espella ran her fingers through the tuft of hair at the end of one of her plaits, feeling guilty for admiring the view.

"Sometimes," Luke quietly continued, "I can almost hear the Professor's kind words calling out... Even now, I can almost hear his voice..." He sniffed, rubbing a hand against his nose. "Professor..."

Phoenix thought about moving across to offer the boy comfort, but Espella, already sitting next to Luke, beat him to it, shifting slightly closer to the boy with only a small rock of the boat as she patted his shoulder. Instead, Phoenix closed his eyes, listening to the soft thudding of the boats against the ancient pier and the flowing of the water all around them. In a certain way... it did sound like voices. "Me too," he said. "And Maya's voice along with him."

Espella seemed to pause a moment in her patting of Luke's shoulder. "I-I think I can hear them as well," she admitted, sounding vaguely confused.

The young woman's comment seemed to finally break the melancholy of her companions, who both looked up in surprise, staring at each other and at Espella. "Um, come to think of it," Luke said.

"It really is like," Phoenix continued.

"We can actually hear them..." Espella finished.

The three stared at each other for a moment before crying "What!?" in unison.

"Now then," echoed a faint voice through the ruin, "let's head to the entrance..."

"Professor, wait up!" echoed a reply.

Luke shot to his feet, rocking the boat and almost tipping his companions into the water. "That's...! It has to be...!" he cried, then, before anyone could object, he charged out of the boat onto the stone pier.

Phoenix restrained a roll of his eyes, trying to hold the boat steady against one of its neighbours. "Yeah," he quietly agreed, trying not to sound sarcastic in his irritation. "There's no mistaking that."

Espella only smiled fondly, climbing out of the boat after Luke, but more gently so as to not jostle Phoenix behind her.

Not waiting for his friends to join him, Luke ran up the nearby stairs to the high walkway. At the far end of the room, he could see a massive door, closed and hiding whatever lay beyond it. About halfway between it and him, a man in an orange turtleneck and distinctive top hat emerged from a hidden pathway to the side, almost invisible behind the massive pillars lining the main path. "Professor!" Luke shouted, and broke into a run. "PROFESSOR!"

Hershel paused, then looked up in the direction of the shout. "Luke!" he had just enough time to say before the thirteen-year-old arrived at the man's side, throwing himself at his mentor and latching on to him with a tight hug. Although somewhat awkward about the physical affection, Hershel smiled at the boy as he patted his head. "What are you doing here?" he asked.

"P-Professor!" Luke sobbed into Hershel's jacket. "It... it's really you! I-I... I thought... you'd never come back!" He rubbed his face against his mentor's chest, struggling to control his breathing as his tears spilled down his cheeks. "Even though deep down I believed the spell could be broken somehow... there were times I just wasn't sure if it was possible!" He wailed again, clutching the man even tighter.

Hershel chuckled to himself as he rested his hands on Luke's shoulders, waiting for the teen to regain control of his emotions. "I'm so sorry, my boy," he quietly replied. "I've caused you quite a bit of worry."

"Professor!" came a cry from the direction Luke had appeared in, and Hershel looked up to see Phoenix and Espella emerging onto the walkway from the pier. "You're all right!" Phoenix called, relieved smiles on both of the pair's faces.

Luke slowly brought himself back under control as their friends caught up, sniffing to himself as he let go of Hershel and stepped back. Hershel gave him a reassuring smile before stepping aside to the centre of the path, Luke following him.

Phoenix noticeably looked up and down the path as he approached. "Um, Professor, where's Maya?" he sheepishly asked, scratching a cheek. "I, uh, thought I heard her voice, too."

Hershel smiled, noticing Luke and Espella sending amused grins at each other. "Not to worry, Mister Wright," he assured the lawyer. "Rest assured Miss Fey is just-

"YOOOOOO, NIlllllllick!"

Phoenix had just enough time to turn to his right with a startled look before a flash of purple came running from the side room and launched herself at him with arms wide, knocking them both to the paved ground.

"Hey Nick!" Maya kept shouting, refusing to stop clinging tightly to her friend as he attempted to sit up around the restrictions of her arms pinning his to his sides. "Nick! Nick!"

"M-Maya!" Phoenix cried in surprise, finally managing to sit up despite the spirit medium sitting sprawled on his legs. He pushed her off him, arms firmly on her shoulders as he stared at her grinning face, still processing what his eyes were telling him. "Am I dreaming?" he quietly asked, a small smile finally tugging at the corners of his mouth. "Is it really you?"

Maya just giggled. "Yup yup!" she replied. "The Professor and I are as real as real can be!"

Phoenix sighed, visibly relaxing as he let his hands fall from their grip on her shoulders. A part of him felt vaguely reminded of the first time Maya had channelled Mia in front of him (he reasoned it was the combination of overwhelmed disbelief and light-headedness). "You have no idea how relieved I am," he said with a soft laugh, shaking his head as he kept watching Maya with a fond smile. "Really. I've never been so happy to see you."

Maya looked away, suddenly seeming guilty. "I, uh... I'm really sorry, Nick," she said. "You must have been worried sick. It's just... Well, I wanted to do something to help Espella, y'know?"

"No, no!" Phoenix cried, extricating his legs out from underneath her as he rushed to comfort his friend. "It's not your fault Maya, it's mine." He shook his head. "If only I'd helped you sooner, then none of this would've happened, and you wouldn't," he had to pause as the mental image ran through his head again, "have been dropped into that pit of fire!"

"I..." Maya paused to sniff, then lunged at Phoenix, throwing her arms around his neck in another hug. "I thought I'd never see you again, Nick," she whispered. "I'm really sorry."

Phoenix just hugged Maya back, unable to put together the words to respond.

"Come now," came Hershel's voice from behind Phoenix, and the pair almost jumped apart in surprise, having both forgotten the others were there. They looked up at the trio standing in a group nearby, watching them with smiles on their faces, although Luke was still drying any remnant tears with a handkerchief. "Everyone here did the best that they could," Hershel continued. "That is what enabled us to power through the hardship and reunite." He crossed his arms. "Or, at least, that's what I believe."

Phoenix and Maya shared a smile. "Yeah," Phoenix replied, his gaze unmoving from Maya's. "You're right, Professor."

"Of course he's right!" Luke boasted, shoving his hanky into his satchel. "The Professor's always right!"

Maya laughed as she and Phoenix got to their feet. "Good old Professor Layton logic! Logic so good, it'll leave you good as gold, right Professor?" She winked, giggling mischievously as Phoenix promptly groaned and rolled his eyes.

Layton gripped the brim of his hat, laughing at the pun. "Indeed, Miss Fey!"

Espella looked to the floor, her smile fading a little from guilt as she played with the ends of her plaits. "I'm so glad you're all okay," she said, then screwed up her courage and fixed Maya with a scared stare. "Um, Maya, are you hurt!? Are you suffering from any burns?" She then turned to Hershel. "And Professor! Has your arm been properly re-attached to your body!?"

Hershel chuckled, amused. "We're quite all right, Espella, I assure you. You may rest easy."

"Yeah!" Maya added, running to the young woman's side with a reassuring smile and holding out her arms for her friend to inspect. "Look! We're perfectly fine!"

Espella bit her lip for a moment, then rubbed a hand almost frantically at her eyes, fighting back threatening tears of relief. "Oh, thank goodness..."

"Aw, Espella!" Maya said in a comforting tone, pulling the teen into a hug.

"We're entirely unharmed, Espella," Hershel added, patting Luke's shoulder with one hand to convey the message to the worried boy at the same time. "Please, dry your tears."

Espella nodded, rubbing at her face as Maya pulled out of the hug, only for the spirit medium to turn on Phoenix with a glare. "Look what you started, Nick!" she accused him. "Everyone got all sappy and now you made Espella cry!"

Phoenix gave her an incredulous look.

"Mister Wright!" Luke joined in, arms crossed. "A gentleman must never, ever make a lady cry!"

Phoenix rolled his eyes. "Why is it my fault!?" he asked with an irritated sigh. 'Besides, if anyone started the crying, it was you, Luke!'

Espella giggled, wiping the last of the dampness from her eyes. "Thank you, everyone."

Hershel turned to Phoenix. "Mister Wright, you kept these two safe and out of harm's way," he said, gesturing to Luke and Espella. "For that, you have my utmost gratitude."

Although surprised, Phoenix pulled himself together quickly enough to give Hershel a sheepish grin, rubbing at the back of his neck. "N-no problem, Professor! I, honestly, couldn't have done it on my own." He looked to Luke with a grateful smile, the teen grinning in response. "Luke and Espella really helped me when I needed it the most." He then glanced at Maya before returning his gaze to Hershel, adding, "Likewise, I should be thanking you for keeping Maya safe. Thank you so much."
Despite having said it, Phoenix still felt he hadn't properly conveyed how thankful he was, and could only look back to Maya with a smile, the pair staring at each other almost as though one of them might disappear again at any moment.

"Not at all, Mister Wright," Hershel replied with an almost proud smile. "After all, it is a gentleman's duty to help a lady in need."

Maya looked thoughtful at the professor's words, then grinned cheekily and elbowed a confused Phoenix. "Nick, you should really learn to be a proper gentleman, like the Professor here!"

Phoenix laughed, running a hand through his spiky hair. "I'm not too sure I'd be able to pull off the whole top hat look for one," he replied, throwing his friend a wink in return.

"Mister Wright," the professor continued, "it is an honour to once again team up with you. No matter what challenges may lie in our way, with your help I am certain we can overcome them." He waved a hand to the large door at the end of the room. "Let us go forth and solve the mystery that is Labyrinthia, shall we?"

Phoenix nodded, a determined look on his face. "Absolutely. We'll fight for Espella until the very end." He cast a glance to the mentioned teen, who sheepishly petted her braids in response. Mind made up, Phoenix stuck out his hand towards Hershel. "Professor, I'm looking forward to working with you and putting an end to this mystery once and for all."

Hershel nodded, taking Phoenix's hand and shaking it firmly. "It will be my pleasure, Mister Wright."

Luke paced nervously as he waited for his family to arrive, unused to being the one waiting. "Their plane's already landed!" he fretted to himself. "Where are they?"

"Be patient, Luke," Hershel advised the young man. "They will be collecting their bags. You'd know better than all of us how long that can take."

"Yeah," Luke sighed, pulling himself to a stop and staring at his shoes. "I guess I'm just... nervous."

Athena looked up at her friend with concern, one hand playing with her necklace. "Why? It's just your family, right?"

Luke nodded, but didn't say anything in response to her question. He wasn't sure he could even formulate an answer for himself.

"I suppose, given this wait," Hershel spoke up, "it is a good thing Flora offered to stay behind with Alfendi. He would not have taken this inactivity very well."

"Nope," Athena agreed, grinning at the thought of the active young boy. "Kinda a shame he couldn't come by to see friends arriving on his birthday, though."

Luke giggled, looking up to his friends. "I've never been in the country on Alfendi's birthday before!" he pointed out, then turned to Hershel. "Just think, Professor: six years ago! That was the last time we had an adventure together; Only a week or two after Alfendi was born!"

For a moment, Hershel smiled, then his expression turned sombre as he tugged at his hat. "He had only a handful of days with his birth parents before they were taken from him," he mused. "It might be considered a blessing he can't remember any of it."

Luke's good mood vanished instantly at the reminder. Athena seemed surprised, her necklace flashing yellow as she tapped at her earring with one hand. "I didn't know Alfendi was adopted," she said. "Mister Sycamore was making all those comments about how much he resembled your family, Professor."

"He likes to do that," Hershel admitted, crossing his arms at the thought of his brother. "I don't think he can accept that any similarities are just co-incidence."

Through the noise of the arrivals hall, a shout echoed from somewhere in the crowd. "YOOOO, LUUUUUUKE!"

Luke barely had time to turn around before a flash of purple was upon him, throwing her arms around the young man in a tight hug. "Maya!" he laughed in surprise, recognising his friend and hugging her back. "It's great to see you!"

"Aw, my widdle Luke's all grown up and graduating!" Maya squealed, tightening her grip on Luke as she shook him back and forth a little, then stepped back to look up at him with a wide grin. "Look at you!" she added, eyes locking on to a small patch of hair growing on the young man's chin. "You look more grown up than ever! Older than Apollo, even!" She winked, cheekily. "Not that that's much of a feat, to be honest."

Luke laughed. "Maya!" he attempted to scold her, only to shake his head as he gave up and gave her a smile. "Thank you for coming, though."

"Are you kidding?" Maya giggled, hands on her hips. "There's no way I'd miss one of my boy's graduations! Besides, we're doing the whole 'Labyrinthia reunion' while we're all here!" As Luke laughed, she then turned to Hershel with a smile. "Speaking of! How've you been, Professor?" She walked over, pulling the man into a brief hug.

Hershel chuckled, tipping his hat to his friend. "I have been perfectly alright, Miss Fey," he assured her. "It is a pleasure to see you again!"

"Luke!" came a call from the crowd, and Pearl soon emerged, pulling a large travel bag behind her. Luke waved, rushing to Pearl's side to greet her. "Hello, Pearl!" As the two exchanged smiles and a handshake, Luke took Pearl's bag and walked with her to join Maya, Hershel and Athena. "Thank you for coming!" he told her.

"I've never been so far away from home before!" Pearl said with a nervous smile, looking around at the airport. "So far, it... looks a lot like Los Angeles."

Maya laughed. "It's different once you get outside, believe me!" She then turned to Athena with a smile. "Hi there! You must be Luke's friend!"

Athena nodded sheepishly, and Luke (leaving Pearl's bag at her side) moved around to place a hand on her shoulder. "Maya, Pearl, this is Athena Cykes! Athena, this is my friend Maya Fey, and her cousin Pearl!"

"Hello, Ms Fey, Pearl," Athena said, giving the women a wave.

Maya laughed. "Please, just Maya is fine!"

"And you can call me 'Pearly' if you want, Athena," Pearl added, giving the teen a brief bow in greeting. "That's what my friends and Mystic Maya call me!"

Athena nodded, her nervousness seeming to fade. "Alright!" she agreed with a grin. "Maya and Pearly! Pleased to meet you!"

Luke laughed, hugging Trucy tightly and moving her away from Athena so as to not accidentally hit the older teen with his sister's flailing limbs. "Hey, Trucy! I wasn't gone that long, y'know!"

"Yes, you were!" Trucy protested, pulling away and shoving her fists on her hips with an angry glare. "You finished your exams weeks ago, and-!" Her tirade came to a sudden end as she noticed something new about Luke's face, and she stared at him in confusion. "Why do you have a beard?"

Luke blushed, but, just as he opened his mouth to speak, was interrupted by another approaching voice.

"Truce, stop running off!" Apollo cried as he arrived, sending a thankful glance to Pearl as he noticed the fifteen-year-old taking care of Trucy's abandoned bag. He placed his own down not far away and approached his siblings with his arms crossed. "It's a miracle we ended up on the right plane, having to stop all the time to chase you down again!" As Trucy rolled her eyes exaggeratedly, Apollo looked up to Luke with a smile. "Hey, L-", he said, only to also pause as he got a good luck at Luke's face. "Um, what's with the," he fought to restrain a laugh, gesturing to his own chin as he stared at Luke's face, "caterpillar on your chin there, Luke?"

Luke frowned, crossing his arms as his siblings broke into giggles. "It's just a goatee," he pointed out. "I thought I'd try it out... See what it looks like."

"It looks silly!" Trucy giggled, sending Apollo into snorts of restrained laughter.

"It does not!" Luke shot back before reining himself in from childish irritation. "Besides, I could have gone for the full beard, like my dad had!"

"Zak Gramarye had weird facial hair too," Apollo replied with a grin, hand to his face as he failed to hide his amusement. "Doesn't mean I should try it for myself."

"A beard isn't 'weird'!" Luke protested, rolling his eyes at the teasing.

Trucy paused, pressing her hands to her face. "Ooh, 'weird beard'!" she cooed to herself in amazement. "It rhymes!"

To Luke's relief, it was at that moment Trucy and Apollo were pushed aside by Phoenix, who rested his hands on their shoulders as he shot quietly amused glances back and forth between them. "Now now, you two aren't making fun of your brother's rather dashing new goatee, are you?"

Luke sighed, giving Phoenix a smile. "Thank you, Papa."

Phoenix threw Luke a reassuring wink.

"You can't talk, Dad," Apollo said with a frown. "You've got permanent stubble."

"Yeah, Nick!" Maya called to the family group with a grin. "Shave once in a while, will you?"

Phoenix pretended he hadn't heard Maya and smiled in his elder son's direction. "You're just jealous, Apollo; Now Luke really does look older than you!"

"What!?" Apollo cried in surprise.

Ignoring Apollo's outburst, Phoenix grinned as he turned away from the trio, heading towards where Maya stood with Hershel as he gave the man a wave. "We meet again, Professor!"

"Mister Wright," Hershel replied, tipping his hat with a warm smile. "Always a pleasure."

Phoenix then turned to the last member of the group, the young redhead staring up at him in wonder. "My my, and is this young Athena you have here?"

Athena blinked in surprise at being recognised, then bounced up to Phoenix with a wide grin, shaking his hand energetically. "Hello again, Mister Wright!" she cried. "It's been a long time, huh?"

Laughing, Phoenix nodded in agreement. "I was a bit astonished to hear you'd gotten into college so quickly! Or 'university', they say here."

Giggling in embarrassment, Athena shrugged nonchalantly, running her hands through her ponytail. "I got impatient," she offered as explanation.
Luke stepped towards the teen, pointing his siblings to her. "Guys, this is Athena. Athena, these are my siblings, Apollo and Trucy!"

Athena grinned, bouncing forward and meeting the equally excited Trucy halfway, the pair shaking each other's hands with glee. "Luke's told me a lot about you!" she said.

"Same here!" Trucy replied, then noticed the small gadget around Athena's neck, currently glowing a bright green. "Oooh, I like your necklace!"

"Thank you!" Athena chirped, patting the object proudly. "His name's Widget!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, but elected not to say anything, giving the teen a wave and a friendly smile. "Nice to meet you, Athena. You're studying to be a defence attorney, right?"

Athena nodded. "Yup! You are too, aren't you?"

"Pfft," Apollo scoffed, grinning proudly as he crossed his arms. "Graduated a couple months back!" He then shifted uncomfortably, admitting, "I'm still waiting on my badge to arrive, though. I was hoping I'd have it before we left."

"Oh, that reminds me!" Luke suddenly cried, opening his satchel and digging through the items within. "I had something I wanted to give you and Trucy!"

"A present!?!" Trucy cried, bounding to Luke's side as she excitedly watched him searching in his bag. "What is it, what is it?"

Luke laughed, pulling out a small plastic bag. "I was going to mail them to you as a graduation gift, since I couldn't be there myself."

"You had exams," Apollo pointed out with a shrug and an understanding smile. "It's fine."

"You didn't miss anything, anyway," Trucy whispered, rolling her eyes. "It was really boring."

Apollo raised an eyebrow in his sister's direction, while Athena stifled giggles.

Luke gave Trucy a smile. "They weren't ready in time to send through the post, so I thought I'd wait to give you these in person." With their attention fully on him, Luke unwrapped the plastic bag, pulling out two small objects. Smiling at his siblings, he reached out and showed the hidden items off. "I hope you like them."

Resting in Luke's outstretched hand was a pair of flat, metal objects, polished and shining a golden yellow. They were bent into a rounded triangle shape, which, on closer examination, proved to more specifically be a taut bow, the same symbol Trucy's handmade clay-and-wire pins on their capes displayed. The two arrows were even there, sticking out as simplified rounded shapes from the curved metal and pointing at the front of the bow, eternally ready to fly loose.

"One of Athena's classmates used to do metal-working," Luke explained. "I thought I'd commission him to make something a little more professional-looking for your capes... No offence, Trucy."

Trucy slowly gasped, carefully taking one of the moulded pieces of metal and examining the back, finding a thick metal pin welded there, the same golden colour as the main badge. Apollo similarly picked up the other badge to inspect it, and quickly found it to his liking, giving Luke a smile. "Wow, these look amazing!"

"Are you kidding!??" Trucy squealed, grinning widely and bouncing in glee. "These are fantastic!"
"I'm glad you like them!" Luke said, only to be ambushed by a sudden hug from his sister as he finished talking, sending him into surprised laughter.

Apollo looked up and noticed Phoenix, Maya and Pearl had joined the group, seeming curious about Luke's gift, so he showed them the new pin in his hands with a grin. "Looks great, huh?"

"Wow!" Maya cooed, glancing up at an impressed Phoenix beside her. "You guys are gonna look awesome wearing these on stage!"

Trucy pulled back from Luke, showing her new badge to Pearl. "You bet, Mommy!" she said to Maya, then promptly yawned, rubbing at her eyes.

Luke looked sheepish, hurriedly shoving the plastic bag still in his hands into his satchel. "Oh, I forgot, it's about three in the morning for you guys!"

"In that case," Hershel suggested, "since everyone is here and has their bags, it is high time we moved on."

"Good idea, Professor," Phoenix agreed, rubbing at his eyes himself as he was reminded how tired the travellers all were. Pulling the sleepy Trucy under his arm, he waved for everyone to follow the professor. "C'mon everyone; Hotel first, then we can rest for a bit..."
After a few hours of rest (during which Pearl and Trucy almost dropped off to sleep several times), Luke led the Wrights and Feys to the Layton household, where the small family was quietly celebrating Alfendi's sixth birthday. Luke, Flora and Pearl were sitting on the couch chatting, while Apollo and Trucy sat on the floor with Alfendi as he told them about school, his toys and various interests. In the doorway, Hershel, Phoenix and Maya stood, alternating between watching over the younger ones and quietly talking amongst themselves.

"Do you have stupid teachers in America, too?" Alfendi was asking Trucy with a sigh.

Trucy nodded, commiserating with her young 'cousin'. "Yeah. I'm pretty sure that's a worldwide thing. Sometimes I wonder why people go into teaching at all if they seem to hate it so-!" Her small tirade was cut off as she suddenly yawned, although she was quick to cover it with a gloved hand.

Alfendi watched, thinking to himself. "Are you tired?"

"All of us are, a little," Apollo admitted with a smile. "We just got here from America, after all."

"Oh, you mean like jetlag?" Alfendi replied, perking up. "Luke always has that at the beginning of term! Do you know why it happens?" Apollo and Trucy opened their mouths to respond, but the six-year-old wasn't waiting for an answer. "I can show you on Papa's globe!" Grinning, he got to his feet and looked up towards his father. "Papa! Can I use your globe, please?"

Hershel, watching the trio with Phoenix and Maya, smiled sheepishly. "Now Alfendi, I believe Apollo and Trucy don't require an explanation of what 'jetlag' is," he explained.

Alfendi paused, then seemed to wilt in place, staring sadly at the floor. "Oh..."

"But I don't mind if you wish to explain it to me," Hershel hurriedly continued, changing his tune at the sight of his son's sadness.

"Yeah!" Trucy added, giving Alfendi a grin. "We'd love to hear you explain it! Wouldn't we, Polly?"

Apollo seemed frustrated at his sister, but shrugged and forced a small smile for the boy. "S-sure, of course."

Alfendi smiled, brushing some of his long and wild hair from his face.

"Why don't you help me fetch it from my study?" Hershel offered, a hand outstretched to the boy, and father and son soon headed off down the corridor together.

"I guess he really was too young to remember visiting us," Apollo muttered to himself once the boy was gone.

Trucy giggled. "Aw, don't kill his excitement!" she told him. "It's so cute when little kids are passionate about something!"

"Like how people can die in their sleep from smoke inhalation?" Apollo replied, raising an eyebrow.

"He does want to be a firefighter when he grows up," Trucy pointed out with a grin.

In the doorway, Maya poked Phoenix to get his attention and stood close. "When the Professor gets back, I think I'm gonna offer to channel someone for him and Alfendi!" she quietly told him.

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "You honestly think a six-year-old you've known of almost his entire life has had anyone dear to him die that you haven't heard about?" he pointed out.

Maya scoffed. "It doesn't hurt to ask!"

Hershel soon returned, carrying a globe of the Earth in his hands that was about the size of his head. Alfendi was 'helping', gripping the side of the base with one hand, and walked alongside his father as Hershel took it over to Apollo and Trucy, where it was placed on the carpet. Alfendi grinned up at the man. "Thank you, Papa!"

"It was no trouble at all, Alfendi," Hershel replied, tapping his hair with his hand in the absence of his top hat.

Alfendi looked between Apollo and Trucy with a stern stare, his hands resting on top of the globe. "You have to be careful with this!" he told them. "It's one of Papa's things from his study!"

"Don't worry, we will!" Trucy assured him with a determined look. "Won't we, Polly?"

Apollo sighed. "I'll, uh, let you two handle it," he said, shifting slightly away from the pair.

Hershel returned to stand with Phoenix and Maya, giving them a smile. "Apologies for that," he quietly said.

"No problem," Maya replied, smiling. "Actually, I was wanting to ask... Is there anyone missing here Alfendi might like to see? Someone who's passed on?"

Hershel frowned, confused. "You're offering to channel a spirit for him?"

"It is his birthday," Maya pointed out with a grin.

"Oh, wait, I just figured it out," Phoenix interrupted, crossing his arms and giving Maya a look. "You want an excuse to have a nap, don't you?"

"No," Maya insisted, scoffing. "You know full well I'm not sleeping while I'm channelling someone!"

"You may not be dreaming, but you are unconscious," Phoenix pointed out.

Hershel's quiet chuckles stopped the argument in its tracks. "My first thought would be Alfendi's birth parents, except that I have no knowledge of their names, let alone any pictures of them," he explained. "Besides, Alfendi was only a handful of days old when they passed."

Maya and Phoenix were surprised. "That young?" Phoenix asked.

"Yes, unfortunately," Hershel replied with a small nod. He held a hand to his mouth as he continued, "My next thought would be more beneficial for the one you are channelling than Alfendi... Do you happen to remember Claire Foley, Miss Fey?"
Maya thought a moment. "I think I'll need to refresh my memory on her face," she said, smiling, "but channelling her again should be a cinch."

"I keep my photos of her in my study," Hershel said, and directed Maya down the hall. Maya shot Phoenix a grin before following the Englishman away through the corridor.

Professor Layton's study in his home was very much like his office at Gressenheller, with tables, chairs, shelves and even significant parts of the floor piled up high with paper and ancient historical artefacts. The walls, around the shelves, had various newspaper articles tacked up all around them, which Maya noticed on closer inspection seemed to feature the archaeologist's accomplishments over the years... except for the far wall, which was clear of articles. Instead, it featured a small array of framed photographs, each one a different shape and size.

"My apologies for the mess," Hershel said to Maya, treading a clear path across the floor to the desk under the window. He offered no further explanation however, instead reaching underneath for an old blue hatbox.

Maya thought a moment, then carefully closed the study door behind her, making her way across the messy floor to the far wall, her eyes on the photos as they came into her view. The largest had only two people in it she recognised, Hershel himself and a young Luke in a blue waistcoat; Luke was clutching a drink tightly, holding it just out of reach of a curiously sniffing Doberman at his side, while one of the four other people, all looking around Hershel's age, was trying to remove the professor's top hat. Maya couldn't help but giggle at Hershel's surprised expression as he clung to the beloved object in distress.

"Oh!" Hershel cried in surprise, and Maya looked around to see the professor noticing the object of her attention, abandoning his rifling through the contents of the old hatbox. "I see you've noticed those," he awkwardly pointed out, forcing a smile as he rushed to Maya's side.

Maya shrugged, feeling a bit guilty for examining them so eagerly. "Sorry, Professor..."

"No, no apologies necessary," Hershel insisted, sighing a little and giving her a more genuine, and relieved, smile. He gestured to the wall. "I actually forget these are here, since I see them every day. That one," he gestured to a small photo of himself with an elderly couple, "is of my parents."

"Aw, you all look so happy!" Maya chirped as she looked over the picture. "Is Claire on this wall?"

Hershel nodded, and wordlessly pointed to a slightly larger photo, off to one side and underneath a recent school photo of Alfendi. As Maya turned to look, she saw the photo featured four people, all young adults, wearing graduation robes and with their arms thrown over each other's shoulders in a sort of group hug, each one smiling or grinning widely for the camera. To her surprise, she recognised all four, two of them from Luke's old family photo albums (being his parents, Clark and Brenda), the third being Hershel himself, while the fourth was a redhead woman with glasses she remembered from the photo she had been shown three years ago. Maya pointed to the redhead.

"That's her, right?"

Hershel nodded. "I have a copy I had made for Luke," he quietly replied. "I felt a photo of his parents on their graduation day would be the most appropriate gift to give him on his own graduation."
Maya laughed. "My gift to him is just being here!" she joked, then turned away from the wall, headed to the centre of the room. "I'd better get to channelling her, then," she explained as Hershel followed her. "You'll have to explain to her what's going on, though. Sorry."

"It's no trouble," Hershel assured her, heading over to his desk. "I think I won't watch this time, however. I trust you aren't trying to trick anyone."

Maya giggled, watching as her friend returned to his hatbox, replacing items inside it to tidy away back under his desk. "I'll see you later, then!" With that, she closed her eyes and began the channelling process.
"Where's Mystic Maya gone?"

"She has decided, for whatever reason... she's going to channel a Ms Claire Foley."

At Phoenix's words, Luke and Flora had sent each other stunned looks, then shot to their feet and rushed out to the hallway, stopping dead as they spotted the closed door to the Professor's study. Behind them, Phoenix and Pearl followed more slowly, slightly confused at the pair's hurry.

"They must be in there," Flora pointed out to Luke, clutching her hands together in worry as she stared at the closed door ahead of them.

Pearl looked up at Phoenix. "Um... who is Mystic Maya channelling, Mister Nick? And why is everyone so worried about it?"

"Oh, n-no, we're not worried, just... surprised," Luke insisted, turning towards Pearl with a smile that failed to hide his concern. "Maya's channelled Claire before, remember? I think I last told you the story about her a year or two back."

Pearl had to think a moment before she recalled Luke's story. "The time-travel one?" she realised. "In that case, why are you so worried? Shouldn't it be a happy occasion for Mister Professor to see his special someone again?"

Luke and Flora gave each other worried looks, now feeling guilt on top of their concern. Phoenix rested a hand on Pearl's shoulder, giving her a smile. "You're half-right, Pearls," he assured her. "I think Luke and Flora are worried because Claire died a long time ago, and the Professor might be sad about that."

After a moment or two of thought, Pearl nodded. "Okay."

Before she could say anything else, a voice from behind her asked, "Why's everyone out here all of a sudden?", and the four looked around to see Apollo standing near the doorway to the living room, watching them with a confused frown.

"Mystic Maya's channelling Claire," Pearl explained with a smile before anyone else could formulate a reply.

"Claire?" Apollo repeated in confusion, then connected the dots with a gasp, eyes widening. "Oh! Claire!" He paused in thought, then his expression returned to confusion. "Why?"

Phoenix shrugged. "She offered to channel someone for Alfendi's birthday, and the Professor suggested Claire. I've no idea why for either of them."

With nothing else to add, the five stood in silence for a second or two before the door to the study began to creak open. As they all turned to watch, Hershel emerged, noticing them all gathered in the corridor with surprise. Instead of saying anything, he simply smiled reassuringly at Luke and Flora, then stepped forward, holding open the door as Claire, sporting Maya's hair and robes, followed him with an excited grin. She also noticed the small gathered crowd with surprise, but quickly flashed them a warm smile. "Hello there!"

Flora and Luke almost seemed to sigh in relief at the pair's happy faces, sending glances at each other before Flora took a step forward. "It's great to see you again, -!" she began, only to suddenly pause, looking nervous.

"'Claire' is fine," the woman assured her with a smile. "If you don't call Hershel here any variant of 'Father', you don't need to call me anything special!"

Flora blushed, occupying herself by playing with the strand of hair hanging in front of her right ear. Claire then turned to Luke. "And Hershel tells me you are graduating, Luke! I must admit, it's hard to imagine Clark and Brenda's baby doing that already!"

Luke giggled, tugging proudly at his hat. "Well, I am a few years younger than most of my classmates," he admitted.

"So was your mother!" Claire laughed, then sighed nostalgically, a hand resting on her cheek. "That goatee of yours reminds me of our graduation. Clark was first experimenting with growing a beard, and Brenda kept threatening to dye it bright pink if he didn't get rid of it!"

"She warmed up to it eventually." Hershel added with a smile, arms crossed. "I distinctly remember her mentioning once in a letter that she couldn't imagine Clark without his beard anymore."

Apollo smirked, looking to Luke. "Maybe I should try that," he suggested. "Just dye that overgrown soul patch of yours a hideous colour so you have to shave it off."

Luke shot his brother a glare.

"Now now, Apollo," Phoenix butted in with a knowing smile. "Jealousy doesn't look good on you."

"Huh...?" It took a moment for Apollo to catch what Phoenix was referring to. "I'm not jealous!" he objected.

Luke giggled, deciding to join in on the teasing. "Then why don't you try growing something?" he asked with an innocent grin, trying to hide his amusement. "Isn't it a Gramarye tradition, after all?"

Turning back to Claire, Luke noticed she seemed to be watching them with vaguely confused amusement, and felt his heart fall as he realised how much he might have to explain before he could introduce her to his family. "Um, Claire, has the Professor told you anything about my life since we last met?"

Claire smiled, almost cheekily. "Hmm, a little," she replied. "Mostly I've heard about it from Clark."

Everyone except Hershel and Pearl was surprised at that comment. After a moment, Luke grinned widely. "You've spoken to my dad!?"

Claire nodded, giggling, "You should hear him boast about you!"

Now it was Luke's turn to blush, pulling at the brim of his cap.

"Ah, there's no shortage of things to boast about with Luke!" Phoenix added, winking at his younger
"You say that about all three of us, Papa!" Luke replied, still blushing.

Apollo smirked again. "Yeah, isn't it a contractual obligation as our father or something?"

"Well, I was a lawyer," Phoenix pointed out, still sporting his joking smile. "I'd never turn down following the fine print of a contract!"

Giggling, Luke turned back to Claire. "I should get the introductions out of the way, then." He pointed behind him, gesturing to each person as he named them. "This is my papa Phoenix Wright, my brother Apollo, and a good friend of ours, Pearl Fey."

Phoenix tapped a hand against his head in an informal salute. "Ma'am." Apollo gave her a nod, while Pearl waved with a polite smile.

Claire waved back. "It's nice to meet you all!" she said, then turned to Hershel with a hopeful grin. "So, not to sound impatient, but where's little Alfendi?"

"He's in the living room with Luke's sister," Flora explained, gesturing to the doorway behind Apollo. "Did the Professor tell you-?"

"That Alfendi's six today?" Claire interrupted, not seeming to notice she'd cut Flora off in her excitement. "He did, yes! I'm looking forward to meeting the birthday boy!"

Luke looked to Hershel, gesturing to his family. "We'll wait in the dining room then. Is that okay, Professor?"

Hershel nodded. "We'll let you know when we're ready for you again," he promised.

"Hats don't belong there!" Alfendi protested, pouting at his lone remaining playmate.

Trucy scoffed. "Are you sure?" she asked jokingly, tapping the top of her blue hat she had left to rest on the globe from Hershel's study. "It looks like it belongs there to me!"

Alfendi continued to pout, crossing his arms. "I'm hundred percent sure!" he argued.

"Wow, a full hundred percent?" Trucy replied, trying not to laugh as she continued to mess with the boy. "That's awfully large for someone who's wrong!"

"I'm not wrong!" Alfendi cried, though he was starting to look unsure. "Hats only go on heads!"

"Oh, well, if it will make you feel better!" Trucy giggled, winking at Alfendi as she swept the hat off the globe and jammed it on the boy's head. Their heads being about the same size, it quickly and firmly came to rest halfway down his forehead, his wild hair sticking out every which way. "There we go! All good!"

Alfendi seemed stunned for a moment, but then slowly smiled and began to laugh.

Hurried steps towards them across the carpet attracted the pair's attention upwards, where, to their surprise, they came face-to-face with an unfamiliar woman wearing purple robes, straight black hair framing her face as she smiled eagerly at Alfendi, eyes brimming with awe. "Hello!" she whispered.

While Alfendi stared back at the woman with confusion, Trucy gasped in surprise, looking to Hershel and Flora standing a little behind her. "Uncle Professor! You asked Mommy to channel someone?"

"She offered," Hershel replied with a soft smile. "And I believe your family is in the dining room, if you wish to join them."

"Nah, I'm fine here," Trucy said, waving her hand as she dismissed the offer, not recognising it was actually a request. She looked to Claire with a smile, holding out her hand to shake. "Hi! I'm Trucy! What's your name?"

Claire tore her attention away from Alfendi, giving Trucy a smile. "Claire," she giggled, shaking the offered hand. "It's nice to meet you, Trucy!"

Flora cleared her throat, distracting Trucy from greeting the visitor further. "Your brothers, Mister Wright, and Pearly are expecting you in the dining room, Trucy. I can show you the way if you don't know where it is."

Trucy simply stared back at Flora, confused. "They're expecting me to what?"

Flora's polite smile hardened into a stern look. "Trucy, we appreciate your willingness to play with my baby brother."

"I'm not a baby!" Alfendi protested.

"- but your family is waiting for you in the other room," Flora continued, ignoring her brother. Trucy stared blankly at Flora for several moments before suddenly gasping, turning to look at Claire. "Oh, you're that Claire!" she cried, jumping to her feet with a guilty grimace. "Sorry!" She grabbed her hat off Alfendi's head, surprising the boy. "We'll have to play again later, Alfendi!" With that, she dashed off out of the room.

Flora sighed in relief. "As much as I like Trucy," she said, "she can be very dim sometimes..."

Claire giggled, sitting cross-legged on the floor as she returned her attention to the still-annoyed and somewhat baffled Alfendi. "A little birdy tells me you're six years old today," she said, giving him a wide smile. "So grown up!"

"I know!" Alfendi agreed, looking frustrated as he turned to Flora with a glare. "Stop calling me a baby already!"

Flora looked sheepish as she sat down at his side. "Well, you'll always be my baby brother, though!"

Hershel chuckled, also lowering himself to the floor on Claire and Alfendi's other side. "I'm afraid I have to agree with Alfendi on this one, Flora. He's long outgrown that label."

Alfendi gave Flora a triumphant smirk, and she shook her head with a fond smile.

"Woooow!" Trucy gasped in amazement, looking up at the medieval-styled buildings around them, the shadowy cranes towering above. "This is Labyrinthia?"

"In the flesh, so to speak," Phoenix replied with a grin as the group stepped through under the giant gate in the town's wall. At the familiar sight of the bustling market around them, he and Maya cast glances at each other, holding hands as they walked.

Pearl, unlike Trucy, looked around at the people, crowding around the stalls and chatting as they went about their chores. "They're all dressed so funny!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow at the teen, clad as always in her spirit medium robes. "You can talk..."

"Now now, no making fun of the local fashion!" Maya chided her cousin, only to look around herself and realise that Pearl wasn't referring to the medieval clothing the town had sported on her last visit: In the seven years since she had last been there, the local populace had moved on slightly from purely medieval to something that was a mix between modern and old, wearing handmade shawls or hats with factory-line shoes and logo t-shirts. "Huh," she mumbled. "They really are dressed funny."

Luke cast his gaze across the clouded sky, studying the horizon. "They've finally finished with the last of the old dome!" he exclaimed with surprise. "I was beginning to think they'd never be done taking it down!"

Hershel smiled, crossing his arms. "Indeed. I'm still surprised no-one ever fought to keep it, what with its ability to manipulate the local weather."

The group of seven continued in silence down the street, admiring the town as they passed through. The town in return slowly began to notice them, several of the townspeople giving the newcomers odd looks, or even excited stares as they recognised one or more of their 'returning heroes'. Luke and Hershel, used to the stares, took no notice, while Pearl, Trucy, Phoenix and Maya were too focussed on admiring the town to register the odd looks. Apollo, however, inched closer to Luke, feeling uncomfortable as he saw and heard some of the whispers through the crowds at the sight of the visitors.

Luke shot his brother a smile, leaning in slightly to his ear. "Don't worry," he whispered, "they've likely recognised the Professor and Maya."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "I can understand not recognising Dad without his suit, but haven't you been here enough they'd recognise you too?"

"Maybe," Luke admitted with a shrug. "I try not to assume that, though. Besides, who wouldn't recognise the Professor's top hat or Maya's outfit?"

"Touché," Apollo replied with a grin.
Trucy gasped loudly, then charged ahead of the group to an upcoming fork in the road, splitting off left and right to circle the centre of town. At the point where the three roads met, there was a large fountain, nestled between the surrounding buildings with a large arched wall at its back. On either side of the lower pool were copper statues of armoured knights, green with age, while the pedestal at the top of the tiered fountain featured two gleaming gold figures, standing back-to-back and pointing dramatically down towards the town gate. Squealing at the top of her voice, Trucy climbed up on the low wall of the pool's edge and bounced in place, staring gleefully at the lifelike statues above her. "Daddy! Uncle Professor!"

Pearl cried out in surprise as she also spotted the statues, running to Trucy's side to join her. "Mister Nick! Mister Professor! Why didn't you tell us about that!?" she asked, a massive grin on her face.

The rest of the group stopped in their tracks, Phoenix, Maya and Apollo staring at the fountain in shock while Luke hid a grin as he watched his father. Hershel simply gripped the brim of his hat with a smile.

After a pause, Apollo burst into loud laughter, doubling over to lean on his knees. Luke and Maya bit back giggles, and Phoenix was quick to direct a glare at the woman standing at his side. "It's not that funny, Maya."

"It so is!" Maya argued through her giggles. "I guess Ms Belduke wasn't kidding when she said they should erect a monument to you and the Professor, huh?"

Phoenix continued to glare, and Maya ran to join Pearl and Trucy, cooing over the statues with amazement. Derived of his partner to glare at, Phoenix instead turned to his sons, arms crossed around his battered hoodie as he stared at the young men leaning on each other for support through their peals of laughter. "Care to explain why you never mentioned that thing, Luke?"

Luke tore himself away from Apollo and forced himself back under control, wiping tears from his eyes as he failed to hide his grin from his father. "I wanted to surprise you, Papa!" he explained through his giggles. "I thought you'd like it!"

Phoenix continued to glare.

"I think it's a very good likeness, Mister Wright," Hershel added, still smiling serenely. "Especially considering we were all back in London at the time they made it."

Apollo's giggles began to subside, though he was still hiding a grin behind a hand. "Yeah, that reminds me, isn't that the statue of you they used in the 'Goldor' illusion, Professor?"

"It is, yes," Hershel replied, still smiling.

"It's a little morbid when you think about it that way," Luke admitted, finally bringing himself under control at the reminder of the harrowing experience. "We thought of it as the Professor's dead body until we found him again outside the town walls! Now it's up on display for the world to see."

Phoenix sighed, deciding to drop the subject, and was turning to give the fountain another look when he caught sight of some passers-by glancing between him and the statues with hurried whispers. As they noticed they'd been spotted, the passers-by quickly looked away and hurried on. Phoenix self-consciously ran a hand through his hair as he looked up to the unique hairstyle depicted on the statue of him above, the young, determined face staring off into the distance a stark contrast to the tired elder watching from below. "I should have brought my hat," the ex-lawyer mumbled.

Luke stepped forward to Phoenix's side, patting his arm sympathetically. "Why don't we move on,
"Papa?" he suggested. "Espella said she'd be in the old courthouse when we were ready."

"Oooh!" Maya chirped, bounding back into the conversation with a happy Pearl and Trucy at her sides. "Let's drop in on Ms Eclaire on the way! She's on my list of people to visit while we're here!" She looked to Hershel. "She still runs that bakery, doesn't she?"

Hershel nodded. "She does, I believe."

"Then let's go!" Maya cried, waving for everyone to follow as she headed off down the road to the right. "Better hurry if we want to see everyone today!"

Maya was still in the lead as the group reached the Eastern Shopping Area, and charged through the open doors of the bakery without hesitation. "Ms Eclaire!" she cried as she entered the building, blinking a little as her eyes adjusted to the sudden lack of bright sunlight. "Hello?"

As Trucy and Pearl filed in behind her, a teenage boy looked up at them from behind the kneading table, his hands white with flour from the dough he was working with. His eyes widened from underneath his mop of blonde hair as his gaze focussed on Maya. "Y-you're..."

"Hi there!" Maya chirped, giving the teen a wave. "Is Ms Eclaire in?"

After a moment of silent staring, the boy turned and ran through into the back of the shop.

Maya frowned, looking to the equally confused teen girls at her side. "We must have scared him."

Phoenix sighed in relief as he entered the bakery, running a hand nervously through his hair. "Geeze, it feels like running the gauntlet out there," he mumbled to himself, casting a glance at Luke coming in behind him. "Apollo decided not to come?"

Luke shook his head. "The Professor's waiting outside with him. They thought it might be too crowded in here if everybody came in at once."

"It is pretty small in here," Pearl agreed.

A muffled voice from the next room cried out in something sounding like frustration, the words indistinct at first but quickly becoming clearer as the source approached them. "... talk about it, Cecil! You're not like this with anyone!" Around the open door to the back room came a short, round woman with red curly hair, frowning as she turned to the visitors. "Can I-?" She stopped in her tracks as she saw the unusual group, watching them with wide eyes, her young assistant peering out from behind her with an identical expression.

Maya waved, grinning. "Hello again, Ms Eclaire!" she called. "It's been a while!"

"Maya!" Patty Eclaire cried, smiling widely as she ran across the room and pulled the younger woman into a hug. "Oh my dear, you've grown over the past seven years! I almost didn't recognise you!"

Softly laughing, Maya hugged Patty back as the baker sniffed away tears.

Phoenix failed to hide a snort of laughter, gesturing to Luke. "Really, out of anyone, it should be Luke here you say that to, Ms Eclaire!"
Luke blushed. "Oh, I, uh, hear it enough from everyone else, Papa..."

Patty looked up from hugging Maya to look Phoenix up and down with a curious look, only to smile again a moment later. "Phoenix!"

"Hello again, 'Boss!'," Phoenix replied with a smile and a wave, but was cut off from adding anything else as the shorter woman proceeded to latch on to him in another tight hug.

"You two kept your promise to come back!" Patty exclaimed, voice high-pitched as she fought off her rising emotional tears. "When you weren't here on the first anniversary, we all said you'd just had more important things to do, but by the fifth I was thinking you'd both just forgotten!"

"Aw, we'd never forget about you, Ms Eclaire!" Maya comforted her, patting her back as Phoenix awkwardly held her, unsure what to do. "We... were planning to come back sooner, but... things happened and... Well, we're here now!"

Luke looked concerned. "Missus Eclaire, didn't Espella pass on to you what I told her?" he asked. "I asked her to when she mentioned you'd been concerned about them..."

Patty sniffed, finally pulling away from Phoenix and looking up to Luke. She seemed confused for a second, then smiled at him in recognition, patting his arm. "Don't you worry, Luke. My head knew things were difficult, but it's not always so easy to convince the heart!" She then laughed, giving the young man a quick hug of his own. "Why is it you seem to be taller every time I see you?"

"I'm pretty sure I'm the same height I was last time I was here," Luke replied, a confused smile on his face.

"It must be the beard, then!" Patty laughed, poking at the goatee. "Makes you look so much older!" She then turned to the final two visitors with a welcoming smile. "Now, are you three going to introduce me to these two beautiful girls?"

Trucy and Pearl giggled as Maya grinned, pulling them close to her, one on each side. "Oh, these two?" the oldest of the three jokingly asked. She nodded her head in Pearl's direction. "This is my little cousin, Pearly," she then nodded towards Trucy, "and this is Trucy! She's..." Maya paused, looking to Phoenix inquisitively. "Wait, how much do we need to explain here?"

Phoenix only had the time to frown in thought before Trucy scoffed. "What's there to explain?" the teen said, pulling herself out from under Maya's arm. She stepped towards Patty, grinning widely as she curtsied politely. "My name is Trucy Wright! My mommy and daddy and brother have told me a lot about you, Ms Eclaire!"

Patty stared blankly at Trucy for a moment or two, then cast quick glances between Phoenix and Maya, who both looked away, blushing in embarrassment as the woman began to smile knowingly. "Ah, so this is the 'trouble' Espella said was keeping you away, is it?" she asked, then laughed and turned to Luke. "Now why didn't you tell us the full truth, young Luke? It would have been delightful to know sooner that these two finally admitted their feelings and started a family!"

As everyone's attention turned to Luke, the young man winced guiltily and looked away, tugging on his cap with one hand. Phoenix, guessing the source of his distress, placed a comforting hand on his shoulder, looking to Patty. "The full truth is actually a bit more complicated than that, Ms Eclaire," he explained. "That would be why Luke's left it simple."

Patty seemed confused, but decided to accept that explanation. "I won't keep you, then," she said, giving Luke a motherly smile. Turning to the others, she added, "Now, I'm sure you all have a lot of people to visit and, I understand, only today to do it, so you should all get moving!" Before anyone could protest, she was chasing them out of the shop, crying, "Chop chop! Come see me again later if you have the time!"

From the doorway into the back, her young apprentice sighed and returned to his work.

Once they left the town centre and headed down the wooded path to the courthouse, Luke explained to his family what he had not been explaining to their friends sequestered away in Labyrinthia: "The thing is, when I first came back here after I started at Gressenheller," he began, "I'd been visiting so many old friends, and I'd had to tell the story of what happened to my mum and dad so many times... not to mention, here in Labyrinthia they were all asking after you, Papa, and Maya too!" He sighed, hugging himself as he stared at the dirt road beneath his feet. "I... didn't mean to lie to them, but... it was just easier to answer 'how's everything going' with 'it's going fine, thank you'... Just say I was living in America, oh don't worry about Miss Fey and Mister Wright, they're very busy and can't find the time to visit, they'll come to England again as soon as they can..." He whimpered, squeezing his eyes shut as he hugged himself tighter. "I'm sorry... I meant to explain it to them eventually, I promise!"

Luke then found himself sandwiched in a two-way hug between Maya and Trucy, surprising him enough to pull him to a halt. "Now don't you apologise!" Maya ordered him. "It's totally understandable! We don't blame you in the slightest!"

Luke stared back at her, feeling the eyes of his entire family on them. "Are you sure?" he asked, voice wavering. "I mean, I haven't told them anything..."

Maya scoffed as she pulled away from Luke, hands on her hips. "Would I be telling you not to apologise if I wasn't sure?" she pointed out with a stern look. "Besides, it's not like you've outright lied, just," she shrugged, "been a bit vague on explanations. Which is totally understandable!"

"We forgive you, Luke!" Pearl added, clasping her hands together and bouncing at Maya's side. "Even though, like Mystic Maya said, there's nothing to really forgive..."

"Maybe Trucy and I should avoid mentioning who we are, then?" Apollo suggested as the group resumed their walking. "Make it easier?"

"No way!" Trucy cried, glaring at Apollo as she clung to Luke. "That would be abandoning family and I'm not doing that!"

"There's no need for such drastic measures," Hershel assured them from the back of the group. "I'm sure our friends would be satisfied to simply hear you are family; A lengthy explanation shouldn't be necessary."

Luke shook his head. "Except Papa wasn't my papa when we were first here! They'll all want to know how that happened, and that involves talking about my mum and dad." He sighed in defeat, now dreading the upcoming reunion in the courthouse.

Phoenix hummed in thought as he rubbed a finger against his chin. "They don't have internet here yet, do they?"

"They do not," Hershel replied. "I believe they are happy with their lifestyles as they are, though they are still introducing plumbing."
"I think they're hoping to have some electricity here eventually too," Luke added, looking to his father with a curious expression. "Why?"

"They won't know about my disbarment then," Phoenix pointed out, eyebrows furrowed. "Unless either of you has mentioned it, of course."

Luke shook his head. Hershel simply pulled at the brim of his top hat. "It wasn't my story to tell," the professor explained.

The group walked in silence for a few moments as Phoenix thought.

"So," Apollo spoke up, "what do we do, Dad?"

"What else is there to do?" Phoenix replied with a shrug. "We explain."

Trucy squealed in excitement as they left the tree line and came into view of the old Labyrinthian courthouse. "We're here!" she cried in a high-pitched voice, running from Luke's side to the steps leading under the massive arches of the red brick building's entrance.

"Wait, Truce!" Apollo called, running after his sister. Not far behind him came Pearl and Luke, excited grins on their faces.

Phoenix, Maya and Hershel exchanged amused glances as they watched the children charge ahead, and Hershel moved forward to join them. As the four young ones laughed amongst themselves, Luke pulled open the double doors leading inside, and they all hurried in, Hershel at their back. Maya looked to Phoenix. "Going to join them?" she asked.

Phoenix thought to himself, grimacing. "Oh... they had to meet up in the courthouse?" he asked, staring up at the high dome in the roof of the building in front of them, likely situated right over the fire pit in the courtroom itself.

"They don't use it as one anymore, though," Maya pointed out, gripping Phoenix's arm as she gave him a worried look. "Are you nervous about telling them how you lost your badge?"

"That I lost it in the first place," Phoenix corrected with a sigh, looking to his partner. "I really don't want to go into my own carelessness as to the 'how'."

Maya patted his arm, leaning her head on his shoulder sympathetically. "They're our friends, Nick, even if we haven't seen them in a while. They'll understand."

Phoenix thought a moment more, then smiled and nodded, planting a kiss on the top of Maya's head. "Well, it's been six years since I've set foot in a courthouse," Phoenix said, "but who's counting that kind of thing, anyway?" Laughing, the pair headed inside.

The first thing Phoenix and Maya saw as they entered through the doors was the happy circle at the other end of the room, near the entrance to the Inquisitors' Hall; Hershel was standing to one side as Luke finished eagerly introducing Espella, Eve and Barnham (the latter two a married couple for over a year now) to his siblings and Pearl, all six greeting each other with excited or simply welcoming smiles. As they heard the thud of the door closing, the group of seven looked around to Maya waved, leading Phoenix into the room towards their friends. "Hiya!"

"Maya, P-!" Luke cried, stopping himself mid-word and awkwardly continuing, "Um, you made it!"

Espella squeaked loudly, then charged forward with a grin, meeting Maya first and enveloping her in a hug. "Maya! Mister Wright!" Finishing her hug with Maya, she then ran to Phoenix, causing him to grunt with surprise as she grabbed him in an equally tight embrace. "I'm so glad to see you both again!"

Phoenix and Maya laughed, Phoenix somewhat awkwardly as he patted the young woman's back. "It's great to see you again too, Espella," he said.

Giggling, Espella broke away from him to grin at the pair. "We've been waiting for you!" she said, waving for them to follow as she crossed the room again to where everyone else waited.

Maya grabbed Phoenix's arm, pulling him after Espella, which he accepted without protest. "You had to meet us in the courthouse?" Phoenix asked. "Out of everywhere in Labyrinthia?"

Eve gave him an apologetic look, nodding her head in greeting. "It's away from the town and marketplace, and empty except for us," she explained. "We felt it was the best option to avoid unwanted attention."

"We get it anyway just walking through the town!" Maya pointed out with a smile, pausing as they joined the main group to give Pearl a quick hug. "I've got a little list of people to visit while we're here!"

"Oh!" Espella cried, eyes wide. "Have you seen Aunt Patty yet?"

"We dropped in on the bakery on our way here!" Luke assured her.

Maya tapped a finger against a cheek in thought. "Who's her new apprentice? He looked familiar."

Espella and Eve fought giggles, while Barnham simply smirked. "He hasn't re-introduced himself to you?" he asked. "That's Cecil Thomas; He's always talking about the time you two apparently helped him find his sister when he was lost."

Phoenix and Maya looked at each other in surprise. "Huh," Phoenix muttered. "Totally forgot about those kids we helped out that one time." He looked up at Eve and Barnham. "Congratulations on your marriage by the way, you two."

Eve looked away with a shy look, but Barnham smiled proudly. "Thank you very much, Mister Wright."

"So," Eve continued, brushing aside the compliment and gesturing to Apollo and Trucy, "Luke's introduced us to his brother and sister that he's told us about occasionally. How have you two been over the last seven years?"

Pearl nervously chewed a thumbnail as she and the Wright children all turned worried looks to the pair, Luke especially seeming likely to blurt something out if the silence extended too long. Phoenix and Maya looked at each other for a moment, holding hands as Phoenix gave their friends a shrug. "Eh, you know, b-busy and stuff," he said, avoiding their gazes as he ran a hand through his hair.

Espella raised a hand to her face, watching him with concern. "Is everything okay, Mister Wright?"
"Yeah, fine," Phoenix replied all too quickly, rubbing at the back of his head and putting on an innocent look.

Espella and Eve cast glances at each other, their expressions somewhere between worried and frustrated.

"For goodness' sake," Apollo sighed, rolling his eyes as he gave Phoenix an annoyed look. "Just say it! It's not that hard!"

Despite Apollo's pained cry, silence reigned for several more seconds as everyone awkwardly looked at each other. Finally, Luke couldn't handle it anymore, shrieking, "I'm so sorry, this is all my fault!" As he flailed his arms wildly, everyone staring at him in shock, he rapidly continued, "I was going to explain eventually but it was so easy to just keep lying and not mentioning what had really happened and I mean I couldn't imagine having to break it to friends that Papa lost his badge and wasn't a lawyer anymore and then talking about my parents dying or disappearing or however I was going to explain it and the whole adoption thing and how much I was even allowed to say about Maya and I'm so sorry I didn't tell you the truth!" His tirade over, Luke groaned in defeat and buried his face in his hands.

Trucy wordlessly ran to her brother's side and hugged him tight, and Maya did much the same thing, walking over and pulling the young man into a hug with a gentle coo of comfort. "Aw, Luke! There's no need for you to apologise!"

While Luke's family and close friends watched him with worried, sympathetic looks, Eve and Espella shared another glance. Barnham, noticing them, quietly sighed to himself and poked Eve's arm, the two giving each other looks for a second or two before Eve finally shook her head in defeat and crossed her arms, turning to the visitors. "I suppose now would be the time to admit this isn't entirely news to us."

As the visitors gave her a mixture of surprised and curious looks, Espella hurriedly added, "N-not that we were spying on you or anything! We swear!"

"We may not have much in the way of modern technology here," Eve continued, "but we do have a phone line and a computer in the Tower at least. It's a rather stable connection to the internet, even if we rarely use it."

Phoenix sighed loudly, running a hand through his hair. "Should've guessed," he said with a defeated tone. "Of course news of the 'Forgin' Attorney' would've reached even here..."

"Geeze, all the way back then?" Apollo asked with a wince, remembering the dark and forbidding website that had originally promoted Trucy and Phoenix's tiny agency. Luckily, it had been long replaced with something much more bright and professional, listing all four Wrights along with their talents and expertise. "That was before Dad let Luke and me rebuild it! It looked awful!"

"It didn't look that bad," Phoenix mumbled with a pout.

"It looked pretty terrible, Daddy," Trucy agreed, still pressing up against Luke as she gave Phoenix a knowledgeable look.

Phoenix pouted for a moment more before turning a frustrated look to Luke. "W-well, you agree with me, don't you Luke? You said it looked good!"

Luke shrugged, seeming uncomfortable. "Papa, I was just being polite," he quietly admitted. "Why did you think I insisted on helping to rebuild it?"

As Maya giggled, Phoenix threw his hands in the air, looking and sounding annoyed although there was a small smile on his lips. "My own children!"

Luke then turned to Eve and Espella with a confused look. "Wait, if you knew all along about Papa losing his badge and adopting me, why didn't you say anything?"

The two women looked guilty, but Barnham chuckled, shaking his head. "They said it felt like they were spying," he answered on their behalf. "I told them not to worry so much about it, but they were rather insistent."

"We didn't tell anyone else!" Espella added, hands clasped together. "Just me, Eve, Zach and my dad know! We promised to keep it to ourselves!"

"Don't concern yourself over the matter," Hershel assured her with a smile, a hand raised to signal for her to stop. "What's past is past. So," he crossed his arms, looking around at everyone, "now that you are caught up with us, I'm sure the Wrights and Feys would like to hear how you three have been doing..."
"Are you sure?" Phoenix asked with a smirk. "Disbarred lawyer, remember. Pretty sure there's a rule that I'm not allowed back in a courtroom."

"But I've always been curious about what a 'witches court' looked like!" Pearl said with an excited smile, then turned to Espella. "I'd love to look around! Thank you so much for offering!"

Espella giggled, pulling open the double doors leading through into the court. "I think you'll find it's changed a little over the years!" she told the group. "It's still the same courtroom, though!"

"Oh, Dad!" Apollo cried with an excited grin, fists held up. "Remember when you and Luke and Maya were first telling us about Labyrinthia, and you role-played the court sessions to let me figure out what the answers to the mysteries were? That was so cool!"

Phoenix laughed. "I'm glad you enjoyed it! Pity we could only do it twice!"

"You did what?" Barnham asked, laughter in his tone as he raised an eyebrow.

"Race you to the fire pit!" Trucy suddenly cried, dashing from Luke's side into the now-open courtroom beyond the doors.

"Hey, not fair!" Apollo shouted, racing after his sister. A giggling Pearl was quick to follow them.

Luke tugged on his cap with a determined frown. "Don't worry, Papa! I'll keep an eye on them!" With that, he had run off into the courtroom after his siblings.

"But-!" Phoenix objected, only to sigh as he realised Luke was long gone.

"If you're worried about the fire pit," Eve spoke up, a small smile on her face, "we've installed a lot of safety features around it since we started doing demonstrations. They're not going to be in any danger of falling down there."

Maya released Phoenix's arm and elbowed him with a wink. "See? They'll be fine! And didn't you say you were going to stop being so overprotective, anyway?"

"I'm not being overprotective!" Phoenix insisted, looking away with a pout. "I'm... rightfully concerned for their safety!"

Laughing, Maya grabbed Phoenix's arm and dragged him through into the courtroom.

The massive hall of the old courthouse hadn't, at first glance, changed much over the past seven years: There was the judge's podium by the entrance, and ahead the two desks for the Inquisitor and opposing Defender on either side, massive two-storied audience space closed off behind them. At the other end of the room from the entrance was the unusually wide witness stand, built for groups of people to testify at once, and behind that, the blackened fire pit, a grey metal cage hanging precariously above. The rolling staircase was pushed up to its side, and Apollo, Trucy, Pearl and Luke were visible on top. The open edge that Maya had once used to jump off was now secured with a railing, and, Phoenix noticed, the low, spiky fence that once encircled the fire pit had been entirely replaced, tall and imposing enough to keep anyone from attempting to climb in. The open torches on either side were as unlit as the fire pit itself, the room kept bright enough to see in by the addition of electric lights on the roof and along the wooden panels separating the audience from the court itself.

Maya cooed in amazement as she looked around the room, running to the defence bench and running a hand over the top. "This is almost exactly how I remember it! And I see what you mean about the safety features, Ms Belduke!" She gestured towards the fire pit with a giggle, smiling at the three locals as they followed her.

Phoenix cast a curious glance over the new lighting system, pointing to it with a thumb. "So, uh, I thought you guys were against using electricity?"

"Here is different," Barnham explained. "Very few of the locals come to this building anymore; For most, I understand it's because of too many bad memories associated with it."

At that, Phoenix couldn't help but give the fire pit an uncomfortable look.

"This is, however, our primary tourist attraction," Barnham continued. "We hold fake witch trials here when occasion demands, all under the guise of being a very dedicated historical re-enactment town of course."

"I love doing the trial re-enactments!" Espella added with a grin. "With all the changes we've made to that cage, it's actually quite comfortable to ride in, now!"

Maya gasped. "You play the witch, Espella?"

"Indeed she does!" Hershel replied with a proud smile, resting a hand on the brim of his hat. "I have seen their show on a number of occasions, and even Luke found the time around his classes to see it once. Espella is quite the talented actress."

Espella blushed. "Thank you, Mister Layton!"

"Huh," Maya muttered, tapping a finger against a cheek. "I don't remember Luke ever mentioning that."

Phoenix just shivered. "I'll do without, thanks," he said, shooting a glare to the fire pit before turning to his local friends with a confused look. "I don't know how you guys are the only people in town who don't mind being here, though."

"It did take a bit of practise," Espella admitted, playing with her hair.

"And we aren't here all that often," Eve explained. "Zach and I are busy with the town's affairs, Mister Cantabella has Labrelum to run-"

"That's why he isn't here this weekend," Espella cut in.

"- and Espella here does most of her work elsewhere in town," Eve finished. "We're only here for the mock trials and general upkeep of the building."

Before anyone else could add to the conversation, they were interrupted by the rushing of feet, and Trucy flung herself at the Defender's Bench Maya was still standing next to, looking at it in awe. "Is this the defence bench?" she asked excitedly.

Pearl, arriving quickly behind Trucy, seemed disappointed as she looked the bench over. "It... looks like a normal court bench," she said, looking up to Maya and Phoenix with a confused frown.

"That's because it is, Pearls," Phoenix replied, managing to give her a smile.

Apollo and Luke finally caught up to the girls, Apollo looking between the two benches curiously. "Coming in by the judge's podium threw me off a bit," he said, then pointed to the Defender's Bench, "but the defence is still on this side, right?" He moved his finger to point to the bench opposite. "And the prosecution's over there?"

Maya and Luke thought a moment, but it was Maya who responded: "I think so. They're on the same sides here as back home, aren't they, Nick?"

Phoenix shrugged and nodded, wondering why it mattered. "Sure."

Luke, who had been looking around between the bench and the fire pit, suddenly grinned and pointed to a seemingly-insignificant spot on the wall, down near the floor. "Oh, Espella, there's the tunnel where I rescued you, remember?"

Espella grinned and nodded. "Yep! Since you'd shown me those tunnels were there, I decided to map them out once we started renovating this place for the re-enactments!"

Apollo frowned. "Wait, surely your dad had the original blueprints for this building? It couldn't have been more than ten years old when it was last used."

"They were incorrectly filed," Eve explained. "We didn't find them until a few years later, and only then by chance."

Trucy rolled her eyes, giving her brother an annoyed look. "Polly, don't ruin this with your stupid questions."

"They're not stupid!" Apollo shot back. "They're legitimate lapses in logic that Luke never explains!"

Luke frowned, offended. "Just because I don't know the answer, doesn't mean there isn't one," he pointed out.

Eve smirked. "Alright then." She pointed to Apollo with a lazily smug wave. "You have questions about the events here in Labyrinthia seven years ago, young Mister Wright? Fire away."

Apollo seemed surprised to be asked, but accepted the chance to get some answers, taking a few moments to recall some of his questions specific to Labyrinthia as everyone watched him expectantly. "Okay, first of all, everyone was hypnotised not to see pure black, right? And that big bell tower was covered with it to hide it before it got hit by lightning. Why the hell did no-one ever literally run into that thing in the ten years it was there!?!" He sighed in frustration. "And those cranes on the roofs! Did no-one ever need to go up there for building work and run into those!? Why didn't birds landing on them ever tip anyone off!?!"

Eve shook her head, still looking smug. "Simple. It's all in how hypnotism itself works."

At that, most of her audience was confused. "Huh?" Apollo mumbled.

"It was only the conscious mind that couldn't see pure black," Eve continued. "The unconscious mind is fully aware of what the eyes are actually seeing, and it's that part of the brain that dictates what a person thinks. That bell tower? Everyone simply walked around it. They didn't wonder why, because their own mind was telling them not to." Apollo was already looking chastened, but she carried on. "And the cranes? We generally had the Shades take care of any building work around those, but the same principle applies. Any birds landing on them, again, would just be unconsciously ignored by anyone who saw such an event. To question it would break the 'spell', and that was the last thing anyone in this town wanted to happen before it was meant to."

Apollo shifted uncomfortably for a moment. "W-well... what about Dad and Maya? And Luke and the Professor? None of them wanted to be under your 'spell'!"

At that, Eve seemed a touch guilty, looking away. The four people Apollo mentioned also looked uncomfortable, although they were clearly curious to hear Eve's answer. "There are ways to make even an initially unwilling mind agree to what you want it to," Eve explained. "The ink we manufactured in the Eldwitch Woods helped a great deal, of course."

"Alright," Apollo agreed, moving on, "so what about the whole stupid idea of building this town in the first place? What was wrong with just getting a therapist?"

Espella fiddled with her hair, looking uncomfortable. "You'd have to ask my dad about that."

"A whole town, including our mothers, perished because of us," Eve pointed out with a glare. "Do you think our fathers were prepared to let that out?" She sighed, looking away. "I admit, things may have turned out better for all of us if they had simply pointed out to us back then that it had been me who rang that bell... but, given this happened twenty years ago now, there's not exactly anything we can do about it anymore."

An uncomfortable silence ruled the room, and Apollo took a step back, looking away. He decided not to ask any more questions.

Luke practically skipped as he left the ceremony for this year’s graduates of Gressenheller University, his sister at his side. "Not as bad as you thought it'd be, huh, Trucy?" he asked with a giggle, allowing himself to feel a little pride for his home country.

Trucy shrugged. "I guess there was less pointless talking," she admitted, "but it was still pretty boring."

Luke stopped and turned to look at her with surprise before sighing. "Yeah, I probably wouldn't have gone if I didn't have to be here," he quietly agreed.

Phoenix and Maya came up behind them, hand in hand. "So, which is it going to be?" Phoenix asked his son with a grin. "Doctor Triton, Doctor Wright? Maybe Triton-Wright?"

Giggling, Luke shrugged. "I don't really care about the title," he said. "The name though, I'll probably just go with 'Wright'; My dad was Doctor Triton."

"Aw, that's so sweet!" Maya cooed, while Phoenix tried not to look too proud as he grinned.

Apollo and Pearl caught up to the group, talking between themselves. "But it didn't take as long as yours," Pearl was saying. "That makes it shorter!"

"Yeah, but mine was a bunch of small ceremonies all split up!" Apollo argued. "Put together, they'd be shorter than Luke's!"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow as he looked back at the pair. "What are you two talking about?"

Before either could reply, Maya had gasped excitedly and pointed off into the distance. "There they are!" she cried, and dashed off, dragging Phoenix along with her as she dodged passing people (most of whom were also exiting the stadium after the graduation ceremony), making her way towards a trio of friends stood on the pavement.

Flora smiled and waved as she spotted the Wrights and Feys approaching through the thin crowds. At her side, Athena was playing patty-cake with Alfendi, but their game stopped when Maya got close enough for Flora to call, "Have you seen the Professor yet?", distracting the two as they turned to see their friends.

"Not yet!" Maya replied, coming to a halt by the trio and either not noticing or ignoring Phoenix’s relieved sigh as they stopped running, her iron grip on his hand unyielding. "I'm guessing it takes a while for the teachers to emerge though, huh?"

Alfendi shrugged. "We don't usually come to meet him," he explained.

As Pearl and the Wright children caught up, Athena grinned at Luke, giving him a wave. "Congrats, Luke! Your degree's finally over!"
Luke blushed, tugging at his cap (which had spent most of the ceremony itself tucked in his back pocket). "Thank you, Athena."

"My big brother's a vet now!" Trucy cheered, jumping on Luke to give him a hug. "He can come home and help all the animals and stuff!"

"It will be nice to be working at the animal shelter for more than just the summer," Luke added, giving his sister a smile. "And getting to do more than just feed, bathe, and socialise with them... plus all the other chores, of course."

Apollo smirked. "Trucy's only excited because she thinks you'll sneak out a fully trained rabbit for our act, or something."

"Am not!" Trucy insisted, though she glanced away shiftily.

Luke giggled. "We don't even have any rabbits at the shelter!" he pointed out. "It's dogs and cats only!"

"And I thought you weren't allowed animals at home?" Pearl added, brushing a hand against her mouth.

"They're not," Maya replied with a smile. "Except for Charley, of course!"

Alfendi frowned. "Why are you allowed a pet if you can't have animals?"

"Charley's a plant," Apollo told the boy. "He doesn't count."

"Ohhh!" Alfendi gasped, already deep in thought as he contemplated Apollo's answer.

Flora looked back at the thinning crowds still leaving the large building beside them, and smiled. "I see the Professor!" she announced.

Athena grinned and waved. "Professor Layton! Over here!" she called.

The top-hatted gentleman in the distance spotted the group, smiling as he recognised them, and made his way over.

"Finally!" Alfendi cried, throwing his hands in the air as he dashed off into the crowd. "Papa! Papa!"

Flora sighed, then looked around the group. "Fendi's been impatient for all of you to come out," she explained, then shot a quick glare in her brother's direction. "Very impatient."

"Aw, has he been looking forward to seeing his dad again?" Maya asked with a cheeky smile.

Luke frowned, confused. "Don't tell me he's looking forward to dinner!" he said. "That's unlike him, isn't it?"

Athena shrugged, equally confused, but Flora just gave them a secretive smile. "He has his reasons," she assured them.

Trucy waved as Hershel approached them, Alfendi gripping his hand and prattling away excitedly to his father. "Hi, Uncle Professor!" she called.

Hershel tipped his hat to the teen, Alfendi quietening at his side. "Alfendi tells me plants qualify as pets," the professor said, an amused look on his face.
Phoenix looked sheepish. "Depending on the plant," he admitted.

"Enough talking!" Alfendi ordered, tugging on his father's arm. "Let's go already!" He glanced around quickly, then looked back up at Hershel with an embarrassed look. "Which way are we going, Papa?"

Hershel smiled. "Well, there's no time like the present, I suppose," he said, and gestured the group down the street. "Shall we?"

The restaurant where the group was celebrating post-graduation wasn't too far from the nearest Tube station, and a short journey from the stadium where the graduation had been held; Hershel had told the Wrights he chose it specifically in the hope it would be free of any other families from the ceremony doing the same thing as them. Luke also noted to himself that it wasn't far from the London Aerodrome, though he doubted the random fact was anything more than a coincidence.

Alfendi was almost shaking with excitement as they walked through the grand double doors of the restaurant's entrance, Hershel quickly moving to the host stood nearby to inform him of their reservation. "It should be under 'Hershel Layton'," he said, removing his hat with one hand while he gripped Alfendi's arm tight with the other, keeping the boy from running off.

"You're seated right over there, sir," the host told them, pointing to the tables visible at the back of the room. "The other members of your party have already arrived."

"Excellent!" Hershel replied with a smile. "We can find it ourselves, then. Thank you very much, sir!"

Luke frowned, as confused as his family to hear what the host had told them. "'Other members'...?"

Flora grinned, giving her friend a wink. "Surprise!" she chirped.

Hershel led the group down a winding path through the tables, Alfendi tugging on his arm as the boy tried to race ahead to their destination. Luke warily cast his gaze around the corner of the room the host had gestured to, and quickly spotted a large table that currently boasted only two people: a woman with dark, wavy hair and a man with brown hair curled around his shoulders, the distinctive hairstyle only slightly less recognisable than the black-and-grey cape hung over the back of his chair.

Behind Luke, Athena gasped as she also spotted the table ahead. Grinning widely, she dashed past Luke and to the pair waiting for them, greeting them eagerly by grabbing the woman's hand to shake. "Emmy! Mister Sycamore! What are you two doing here?"

Trucy and Pearl stared at each other in amazement as they heard and recognised the names Athena was calling, eyes wide.

Emmy laughed, flipping her long hair over her shoulders. "The Professor invited us!"

"A pleasure to see you again, Miss Cykes," Sycamore added, giving her a polite smile.

As they reached the table itself, Hershel finally released Alfendi, and the boy was off like a shot to Sycamore's side, tugging on his arm with an excited grin. "Uncle! Uncle!"
"Hello, Alfendi," Sycamore said with a warm smile, shifting in his seat to give the boy his full attention. "Your father tells me you've just turned six!"

"Yup!" Alfendi replied, nodding eagerly. "I'm grown up now!"

As Sycamore laughed, Hershel pointed the Wrights and Feys to their two visitors with a smile. "Everyone, this is our friend Emmy Altava and my brother, Desmond Sycamore. I believe Luke has told you about them."

Tugging at his cap in embarrassment, Luke hid behind Phoenix.

Sycamore looked up from talking to Alfendi with surprise, his warm attitude quickly giving way to a sterner one as he stood from his seat, nodding towards the group as he awkwardly fiddled with his red glasses. "Good afternoon."

Emmy waved eagerly. "Hello! Luke's told us a lot about you!"

Maya was the first to recover from the shock of the unexpected introduction, giving the pair a grin and wave. "Maya Fey! Nice to meet you!" She then promptly elbowed Phoenix, who grunted a little at the shove to his ribs, but quickly gave them a polite smile and nod of acknowledgement.

"Hi," Phoenix awkwardly said, rubbing his side where Maya had poked him.

Trucy jumped forward, briefly tugging Pearl to signal for her friend to take her lead as they ran to Emmy, Trucy grabbing the woman's hand to enthusiastically shake while Pearl stood at Trucy's side, smiling. "Hi there!" the younger of the pair cried. "It's great to finally meet you, Emmy! I'm Trucy, and this is Pearl!"

Emmy laughed, looking at Trucy. "Ah, yes, Luke's little sister! I was looking forward to meeting you!" She then looked up to Phoenix. "And you're his new dad," she turned to Apollo, who was watching with wide eyes, "and you must be his brother Apollo, right?"

Phoenix grinned. "Apollo Wright, that's correct!" he said with a wink.

The terrible pun brought Apollo out of his shocked stare instantly, causing him to roll his eyes and groan. "Oh come on Dad, that was terrible!"

Phoenix just laughed, unnoticing of Sycamore hiding a smile. The introductions over, everyone moved to sit down around the table, Flora pausing only to warmly greet their two latest visitors. Trucy, however, took her chance the moment Flora moved on to run to Sycamore, who had been helping Alfendi into the chair at his side. "Hi!" she cried, giving him a bright grin, then whispered, "You used to be Mister Descole, didn't you?"

Luke, sitting between Athena and Pearl, spun to face his sister with a horrified expression. "Trucy, no!" he hissed.

Trucy shot Luke a glare. "What?"

Sycamore's eyes widened in shock, then he pressed his glasses to his face, avoiding eye contact. "You... could say that," he quietly admitted.

"Okay!" Trucy chirped in reply, then skipped around to the lone remaining empty seat at the table, between Apollo and Hershel.

Once the group had ordered their meals, Emmy turned to Luke, on the other side of her from Athena. "Hey Luke, surprised you didn't we?" she asked with a cheeky wink.

Luke laughed, trying not to look as uncomfortable as he felt. "Y-yeah, you did! What are you doing in London in August?"

"We already told you; The Professor invited us!" Emmy replied with a grin. "Couldn't pass up the opportunity to congratulate you on graduating, could we?"

"I guess not," Luke replied with a polite smile, though privately he knew Sycamore had never come for him; A glance to the man proved he was already fully focussed again on Alfendi, an almost fatherly smile on his face as the young boy endlessly prattled to his uncle about something or other that Luke couldn't quite hear. A small tap on his arm distracted Luke from his thoughts however, and he noticed Athena giving him a worried look. He didn't doubt she could hear in his voice that he was slowly feeling more and more panicked since their arrival at the restaurant, and she was the only person he had confided in regarding his conflicted feelings on Sycamore. He tried to give her a reassuring smile, and coped with his problem the way he knew best: changing the subject. "Are you sure you're okay, Athena? It's quite loud in here."

Athena scoffed, though she still looked worried for her friend. "I've told you a hundred times, I'll be fine!" she said. "I've got earplugs in my bag if it gets to be too much, and I know the way home if I have to leave early. Don't worry about me!"

"It's nice to finally meet you in person, Ms Emmy!" Pearl piped up, leaning forward and talking past Luke and Athena to the woman in the yellow coat. "I was glad to hear when you got back in touch with him a few years ago!"

Emmy laughed, waving a hand dismissively. "Just 'Emmy' is fine," she insisted. "And honestly, I'm regretting now how much I dragged my feet confronting the Professor again. You always regret it if you put off meeting up with old friends again for silly reasons."

Luke frowned, wondering if the odd comment was a co-incidence or a sly dig at him.

Pearl tapped a thumb against her chin in thought. "So, um... have you and Mister Sycamore...?"

"They're not special someones, Pearl," Luke jumped in, hoping to cut off any embarrassing questions. "Emmy and Mister Sycamore just travel together."

The young spirit medium thought for a moment. "So the airship you said she uses; Is that the Bostonius from your story?"

Luke nodded. "Raymond travels with them, too. He usually stays with the ship now, though."

Emmy gave Luke a knowing look. "Ah, I see. You told them all about me, but haven't mentioned Desmond at all, have you?"
Luke looked away guiltily, but Athena turned to Emmy, confused. "You're not surprised?" she asked.

Snorting in dark laughter, Emmy shook her head. "Disappointed, but not surprised. Those two aren't exactly subtle about it," she explained, then crossed her arms. "That explains why everyone seemed so shocked when the Professor introduced us, anyway."

"I'm sorry, Emmy," Luke said, just loud enough for her to hear him over the hubbub of the restaurant.

"Hey, it's not my problem," Emmy pointed out, sighing in an attempt to seem carefree despite the bitterness in her voice, one hand flipping at her hair. Forcing a smile, she looked across the table, to where Apollo and Trucy were quietly arguing between themselves. "So, you two are magicians, aren't you?"

Luke's siblings looked up at her with surprise, and Trucy was quick to give the woman a wide grin. "Yup! You should come see our show if you're ever in the area!"

"I already plan on it!" Emmy replied, winking at the teen.

Phoenix laughed, looking at the pair sat next to him. "I'm impressed! You two aren't piling them both with questions yet!"

"C'mon Dad," Apollo shot back with a smirk, "we do have some manners!"

Trucy narrowed her eyes in her brother's direction. "You don't."

Apollo glared at her in return. "Really? Now?" he hissed under his breath.

"You thought Mister Sycamore wasn't real!" Trucy loudly pointed out, attracting even the attention of the distracted Sycamore and Alfendi. "You didn't even know he was Uncle Professor's brother because you always walk out on that story!"

Sycamore raised an eyebrow.

Luke blinked in surprise. "Wait, you seriously thought I'd made him up!?"

Emmy burst into badly hidden giggles. Sycamore gave her an unimpressed look.

"W-well, yeah," Apollo admitted with an embarrassed shrug, "but-!"

"Ah, so it wasn't just Saint Mystere you doubted the existence of?" Flora asked with a teasing smile. "Let me guess, you don't think Folsense or Future London were real, either!"

Apollo was by now blushing madly in embarrassment, grimacing guiltily at Flora's comment. "I-I said I was sorry about the Saint Mystere thing!"

Maya, sat between Phoenix and Pearl, hid a smile as she reached across Phoenix to pat in the direction of Apollo's hand, just out of her reach. "Aw, don't you worry, Grumpy Gus! It's not like," she bit back a snort of laughter, "Luke doesn't have any reason to lie to you in the first place!"

Apollo levelled a glare at her. "You're not helping."

Phoenix, who had been sat back watching the conversation with a small smile, raised his hands. "Alright, that's enough," he announced, with a tone of voice that indicated loud and clear he was not to be argued with. As Apollo relaxed at the end of the teasing, Phoenix turned to him with a curious look. "Although I could have sworn you'd agreed to hear the end of that story by now. The ending's the best part, after all."

Apollo sighed, looking irritated. "I guess I just can't get past the magic floaty transforming ancient artefacts," he admitted, wiggling his fingers to illustrate how seriously he took the idea.

Hershel frowned. "You stopped listening at the formation of the Azran Key?" he asked.

Sycamore chuckled to himself, pushing his glasses up his nose with a smirk. "Ah, then you truly did stop listening at the worst possible time," he said, watching a now-rather-nervous Apollo. "Not that it's my proudest moment, but a minute longer and there would have been no doubt I was not an invention of Luke's."

"Yeah, no offence, but," Apollo began to reply as he shifted uncomfortably, only to pause and think over his words. "Actually, no, a lot of offence." He turned to Luke with a glare, gesturing to Sycamore. "If he's been hanging around as long as Ms Altava, why the hell didn't you mention it, Luke!? I'd've believed you, then!"

Luke was a little guilty at the accusation, but mostly just annoyed. "Why do I have to constantly prove I'm telling the truth!?" he shot back. "You'd've got all your answers about 'Azran Legacy' if you'd not walked out before I'd finished it!"

Athena had her hands clapped over her ears, watching the pair with wide, worried eyes. "Could you please stop fighting?"

"I thought I said that was enough," Phoenix said, sternly looking between his sons with arms crossed, his tone enough to make the two look away from each other guiltily. "Both of you are adults, and you should be capable of settling this like ones."

There was a long, awkward pause before Apollo sighed, looking across the table at his brother. "I... guess I'll listen to the end of that story, then," he agreed. "Like... when we get home."

Trucy perked up. "Can I help tell it?" she asked with a subdued grin. "I wanna be Aurora!"

Luke smiled. "Sure you can, Trucy," he agreed, watching his sister happily cheer at his response. He then turned to his brother. "Don't worry, Apollo; It'll answer a lot more questions than you'd think it would, I promise."

Apollo just mutely nodded, fiddling with his tie.

"And... I'm sorry for getting upset about it," Luke added. "I guess I'm just frustrated you've never given that story a chance before today."

Athena quietly sighed in relief, lowering her hands from her ears.

Emmy smiled. "It's almost a shame we don't have more time together!" she said to Luke. "I'd love to hear your version of our adventures on the Bostonius!"

"It would be entertaining," Sycamore agreed, fiddling with his glasses to hide a smile. "From what I remember, even then you were quite a gifted young storyteller."

Luke blushed, biting back a proud grin. He could easily recall the days and nights of their long journeys that he had passed by entertaining the crew of the small airship with tales of his, Emmy's and the Professor's adventures so far. He could only imagine how much Sycamore and Raymond had had to fight to present neutral reactions to his descriptions of the former's alter ego as 'the evil
Jean Descole', let alone all his 'evil plans'; The word 'evil' had featured a lot in his vocabulary back then, especially when it came to his mentor's nemesis. Eight years on, he had to admit he would have been more than glad to demonstrate how much more kindly he depicted the 'villains' of his stories now.

Gifts and Forgiveness

August 10, 6:59PM
Flightfeathers Restaurant

Once Luke and Apollo had cleared the air after their brief argument and everyone's dinner had arrived, it seemed the discussion around the table was quick to settle into something much more friendly than it had been before. Trucy all but demanded Emmy and Sycamore come visit them in Los Angeles after Apollo had heard the end of their story so she could ask them questions about it, not wanting to spoil anything for her brother, and, while Emmy had laughed, Sycamore had promised he'd see what they could do. Athena had shown off the capabilities of her constant computer companion Widget to Phoenix and Apollo, boasting of how she would be able to use it in court once she passed the bar. Maya spent several minutes teasing Luke by grilling Hershel and Flora on how many changes Luke had made to their story in his nearly-complete book, and Flora had happily joined in to jokingly complain about the various name changes and how she was never going to achieve the fame and fortune her friend's debut work would surely bring them. Even Pearl had overcome her shyness and had fun, leaving her seat to entertain Alfendi with an Agatha Christie book she'd brought in case of boredom, the pair discussing the mystery as it unfolded on the page and making theories on who would be pinned for the murder at the end.

All too soon, the celebrations had to come to an end, as their waiter took away their empty plates and Phoenix half-heartedly argued with Hershel on how much of the bill he should cover. While Pearl was moving her chair from behind Alfendi back to between Maya and Luke where it belonged, Emmy turned to her blue-capped friend with a grin. "I almost forgot!" she cried. "Desmond and I brought you something as congratulations for graduating!"

Luke blinked, staring at her in surprise. "You did?"

Emmy nodded, reaching under her chair and removing a backpack that she pulled into her lap. "I hadn't had the heart to go through my photos of our final adventure before I left," she explained as she pulled open the bag and dug around inside, "then I'd forgotten about them by the time I worked up the courage to face you and the Professor again. I decided now was as good a time as any to finally give you this."

As Luke watched, Emmy pulled out a medium-sized photo album, thick with photos and held together with a plain yellow binding. She looked over it for a moment before passing the album past Athena and over to her friend with a grin, ensuring the side facing Luke as it was pushed into his hands showed the small pale pink flower design that had been pasted there. He stared at it for a moment, unsure how to respond.

"You'll have seen a lot of them already," Emmy continued, flipping her hair with one hand. "It's copies of almost every photo I took of our time together, from Misthallery to London to the Bostonius."

After a moment more of staring, Luke placed a hand on the cover of the photo album and cracked it open, the thick pages following the binding to come to rest with the middle of the book lying open on Luke's lap, to a spread of photos detailing the icy landscape of Froenborg, as it had looked on their first time arriving there. Luke couldn't resist a smile looking at the pristine white snow, glimpses of his younger self dotted around as the eleven-year-old frolicked with unrestricted child-like glee on the chilly playground nature had provided him with. Despite mostly remembering Froenborg for how cold it was, it seemed the reality said Luke had enjoyed himself a lot more than he'd thought he had on their brief trip to Russia. "It's hard to think it's been eight years, huh?" he said.

Emmy nodded, smiling nostalgically. "Nine since we first met," she pointed out. "And I certainly never would have expected our lives to turn out the way they have back then!"

Pearl peered over Luke's shoulder at the photos, smiling curiously. "Wow, that snow is so clean!" she said.

Athena grinned, pointing to a shot of the younger Luke crouching at the edge of the road, clumping the nearby snow into what looked like a large snowball with an excited smile. "You were kinda cute when you were little!"

Maya leaned towards them from her seat nearby, straining to see any of the album's contents from where she was without getting up. "You'll have to show us that later, Luke!" she added with a wink.

"Of course!" Luke agreed. "We can go through it together sometime!" Closing the album, he turned his attention back to Emmy, noticing Sycamore, Alfendi and Flora also watching from behind her. "Thank you, Emmy. And you too, Mister Sycamore."

Sycamore hurriedly glanced away. "I-I had very little to do with that," he admitted. "It was all Emmy."

Emmy laughed, gently nudging the man. "Hey, that's not all we have to give today, is it?" she pointed out, glancing down at Alfendi as she passed her bag over to her travelling companion.

While Alfendi looked confused, Sycamore nearly jumped in surprise. "Oh, of course!" he cried, taking the bag and reaching inside with a growing smile. He turned to his young nephew in the seat next to him. "I couldn't pass up giving you something once I realised we'd be here so close to your birthday, Alfendi."

Alfendi's eyes widened as he began to grin excitedly. "You got me a present!"

Sycamore laughed, then pulled out of Emmy's bag a small bundle of blue cloth. Taking a corner of it with his other hand, he held it up for Alfendi to see, the bundle quickly unfolding itself to reveal that it was a smaller version of the cape currently hanging over the back of Sycamore's chair, with dark blue where his was black and light blue where his was grey. The ribbon that tied it together, unlike Sycamore's worn blue one, was a bright white. Smiling, Sycamore held the smaller cape closer to the amazed little boy. "Since you're so in love with mine, I thought it only fitting to make you a cloak of your own. Happy birthday."

Alfendi's open smile seemed to be threatening to overtake his face as he stared at the cloak, slowly reaching out to take it from his uncle before regaining his ability to speak, his voice squeaking as he bounced in his chair. "This is the most amazing-est, coolest thing EVER!" he shrieked, jumping off his seat to pull the cape around his shoulders.

Flora frowned as she noticed the new cloak dragging on the ground behind her brother's feet. "It's a bit big for him, isn't it?" she asked.

As Emmy retrieved her bag from his lap, Sycamore got out of his own chair to kneel by Alfendi, tying the cape's ribbons around his nephew's neck. "I intentionally made it a little long," he explained. "This way, he can grow into it."
Flora nodded, accepting the explanation as she watched Alfendi wriggling in excitement, watching his uncle's fingers securing the cape around his shoulders. "Don't forget to thank Uncle, Alfendi," she reminded him.

"Thank you, Uncle!" Alfendi obediently cried with a grin.

"You're very welcome," Sycamore replied with a smile, finishing with the ribbon and leaving it in a neat bow below the six-year-old's chin.

The moment his uncle's hands left the white ribbon around his collar, Alfendi was off like a shot, racing around the table and giggling madly with glee as his new cape fluttered behind him.

"Be careful, Alfendi!" Hershel cried, distracted from his discussion with Phoenix as the boy sped past them. "No running indoors, please!"

Eventually, Hershel and Phoenix came to an agreement on how to split the bill, with Hershel paying for the actual meal and Phoenix leaving a large tip; Somehow, Phoenix still managed to leave the restaurant feeling guilty, both for paying only the tip and, simultaneously, for paying anything at all. Given part of Hershel's argument had included the fact that the Wrights were out-of-pocket enough simply spending a few days in England, Phoenix supposed he shouldn't be surprised.

Lagging behind everyone else, Luke noticed Sycamore trailing somewhere behind Emmy, who was talking animatedly to Flora while Alfendi ran circles around everyone, showing off his new cape. As there was no-one else close to the man, and the group was imminently splitting up for their visitors to return to the Bostonius, Luke thought no more than a moment before putting on a determined expression and rushing to his former enemy's side. "Mister Sycamore?"

Sycamore looked up in surprise as he registered who it was approaching him. "Luke?" he asked, a confused frown on his face. "What is it you want?"

Luke felt his resolve faltering, but pushed on. "I... I wanted to apologise," he forced out, an apologetic smile directed at Sycamore. "For not giving you a second chance when I should have, and... generally not being very gentlemanly."

After a short, confused pause, Sycamore smiled, softly chuckling. "Honestly, you don't need to apologise for that," he said. "Thank you for doing so anyway, but having someone here who knew as well as I did that I didn't deserve forgiveness was... very reassuring."

Now it was Luke's turn to be confused. "Huh?"

"I must admit, I didn't care much for you when we first met," Sycamore continued. "The privileged young son of the mayor, living in a mansion with both his parents, a butler and a maid? I rather callously told myself you deserved to have a little hardship in your life." He fiddled with his glasses, thinking to himself as his smile faded. "After that, you were mostly just a nuisance; Layton's little apprentice, constantly getting in my way and foiling my plans. It wasn't until I invited you all on the Bostonius I actually got to know you." He returned his gaze to Luke, who was watching him with a solemn expression. "I've grown rather fond of you since. You're intelligent, you know your way around a good puzzle... Although you will forever have my greatest sympathies for what happened to your parents, I'm very glad you've been able to find happiness with your new family." He gave Luke a small smile. "I will miss seeing you in London every year, young Doctor Triton."

At that, Luke couldn't resist a small laugh. "I was actually thinking of going with 'Doctor Wright'," he admitted. "Dad was Doctor Triton, after all."

"My apologies," Sycamore corrected himself with a slightly larger smile. "Doctor Wright, then." He held out a hand. "Hopefully we shall meet again sometime, sooner rather than later."

Luke nodded in agreement, taking Sycamore's hand to shake. "I hope so too, Doctor Sycamore." Sycamore sighed at the reminder of his title, though his smile betrayed that he wasn't as bothered as he pretended to be, and Luke giggled.

As the two released each other from their handshake, Luke caught sight of Athena watching them, and realised she must have heard their conversation. She gave her friend a proud grin, and, after a moment, Luke gave her a happy smile back.

"You're not coming back!?" Alfendi cried in surprised disbelief, clutching at the edges of his new cloak as he stared at the young man kneeling in front of him.

Luke nodded solemnly. "I'm afraid not," he admitted. "My studies are over. I'm going home with my family and starting a new job back in America."

"But," Alfendi whined, face scrunched up in sadness, "that's not fair! I don't want you to go!"

"I'm sorry, Alfendi," Luke said, giving the boy a sympathetic look as he patted his shoulder with one hand. "I'll miss you too."

As Alfendi began to sniff, eyes shining with tears, Trucy jumped to the boy's side, pulling him into a hug (unlike Luke, she was short enough that she didn't have to kneel to reach Alfendi's height). "Aw, it's okay!" she told him with a comforting tone, petting at his unruly red hair. "You and Flora and Uncle Professor can come visit us sometime! Wouldn't that be fun?"

Alfendi just sniffed some more, leaning in to hide his face in Trucy's chest.

"That's right!" Pearl added, patting Alfendi's back. "You were so little when you were last in America! I'd love to show you around Kurain!"

As the girls comforted the young boy, Luke sighed and stood up, only to be immediately ambushed by a hug from Flora. "You won't forget to write to us, won't you?" she asked.

"Of course I won't," Luke assured her, hugging his friend back. "And you can call or text me whenever you want, too."

Phoenix and Hershel shook hands, not far away from their children. "It was a pleasure to have you all here," Hershel said, tipping his hat. "If timing and circumstance permit, it would be lovely to do this again someday."

"In LA, hopefully!" Maya added, shaking Hershel's hand after Phoenix. "You three can come to us again! Maybe we can all hang out, somewhere where people won't recognise me or Nick!"

Phoenix laughed. "Yeah, good luck finding that," he pointed out.

Apollo, noticing Athena standing back from the group, moved towards her with a small smile, giving her a wave. "So, uh, how long 'til you pass the bar?"

Athena seemed surprised to be addressed by Luke's brother, but smiled back as she shrugged. "Another year, maybe two," she replied. "Once I get my badge here, then I have to go through a process to apply for one in California, so who knows how long that will take."

Apollo nodded in thought. "Well, when you do, you'll get in touch with us, right?"

"Of course," Athena agreed, though she frowned a little in confusion. "Um, why?"
"Why?" Apollo repeated, snorting with laughter as he gave her a proud grin. "So maybe I could pull some strings to get you a job working with me!" He shrugged. "Y'know, depending on how much sway I can get at my office by then."

Athena stared for a moment, then grinned excitedly, Widget at her neck glowing a bright green. "That'd be great!" she cried. "You really want to help me!?"

Apollo nodded. "Why wouldn't I? You're obviously working on a really unique way of conducting a trial; Even Dad said last night that you're gonna revolutionise the courtroom when they finally unleash you on it!"

The sixteen-year-old couldn't help but blush at the praise. "Mister Wright really said that?"

"Yup!" Apollo laughed. "And he's right, too." He paused, noticing the accidental pun in his words with a smile. "In more ways than one. You can't always say that about Dad."

Not far away, Flora, having finished her goodbyes to Luke, was gently pulling Alfendi away from Trucy and Pearl, holding the boy tight as he hid his face behind fists balled around the edges of his cloak. "It's alright, Alfendi. I know life won't be exactly the same without Luke around, but... We'll go to America one day and visit him! We'll see him again!"

Luke nodded, giving the boy a smile. "That's right, Alfendi. This isn't goodbye, just 'so long'!"

Alfendi briefly looked up to give Luke a glare. "Papa always says that when you go away," he mumbled.

Taken aback, Luke adjusted his cap with an awkward smile. "O-oh, he does?" He decided not to mention where he had got the phrase from himself.

Apollo and Athena joined the group, and Flora looked between Luke's siblings and Pearl with a smile. "It was nice seeing you three again," she said. "Hopefully it won't be too long until we next meet!"

Pearl nodded in agreement. "Maybe you could come visit us next summer?" she suggested.

"Yeah, you have to do that!" Trucy cried. "Alfendi, Pearly and I won't have school, Uncle Professor won't have classes... you could come see our show again!"

"Oh, yeah!" Apollo cried with a grin. "You guys still need to come see it again! We have a whole routine prepared for you guys!"

Trucy shushed him with a smile. "Don't spoil it, Polly!" The pair proceeded to giggle at each other as everyone else gave them puzzled looks.

Athena moved over to Luke's side. "So, it's finally the day you've been moping about for two months," she said.

Luke frowned. "I haven't been 'moping'!" he insisted.

"Yeah, you have," Athena quietly replied, giving him an understanding smile. "It's not 'goodbye', but it certainly feels like it, huh?"

After a moment of thought, Luke sighed and nodded in agreement. "London was my home for so long," he said. "I'm really gonna miss it, and all the friends I made here. I don't even know if I'll get to come back."
Athena grinned. "I'll be joining you in California soon enough!" she pointed out, only for her smile to quickly fade again. "But I will really miss having you around to talk to between classes."

"You can always text or call me," Luke offered. "I'll be about half a day behind, but I'd hate to lose touch with you, Athena."

"Me too," Athena admitted, then forced another smile. "I guess I could always make it a regular thing, like you always had to text your sister every day!"

"I'm right here!" Trucy reminded them with a pout.

"She didn't mean anything by it," Luke reassured his sister with a smile, then turned back to Athena. "That'd be great! If nothing else, at least I'll know you aren't working yourself too hard if you're taking time out to talk to me!"

Athena laughed.

The three parents of the group approached, and Hershel tipped his hat to Apollo, Trucy and Pearl. "It was a pleasure having you all here," he said. "Hopefully it won't be too long until we can all meet again."

"Yeah!" Trucy loudly agreed. "You have to come see our show sometime, Uncle Professor!"

"We've had a special routine prepared for a few years now," Apollo admitted with an apologetic smile. "Plus, we're always changing our show anyway, so it's different from when you were last in LA."

Pearl gave Hershel a formal bow, her hands clasped together. "It would be our pleasure to again welcome you to Kurain Village sometime, Mister Professor," she added.

"You bet it would!" Maya said, walking over to give her cousin an impromptu hug. "You guys'll always be welcome up on our little mountain!"

"I'm glad to hear it!" Hershel laughed, and Flora giggled in agreement. Even Alfendi managed to look up curiously from where he was hiding against his sister's side.

Phoenix turned to Athena with a friendly smile. "And you'll let us know when you get your badge, won't you?" he asked. "I'm looking forward to seeing you in action in a courtroom."

Athena gave him a massive grin, only barely hiding just how excited she was. "I will, Mister Wright!" she promised. "I'll get my badge here, then I'll apply for my American one, and then I'll go join you all in California! I won't let you down!"

Phoenix laughed. "As long as you aren't killing yourself trying to reach unreasonable expectations, I don't think you could!"

With all other goodbyes said, Luke and Hershel looked to each other, each forcing a small smile. "I, uh..." Luke stuttered, "I guess this is 'so long', Professor."

Hershel nodded, tugging on the brim of his hat. "I wish you luck in your new profession," he said. "Don't forget to write to us."

"I won't," Luke promised, starting to find it harder to force a smile. "You'll come visit sometime, won't you?"
"Of course," Hershel agreed.

There was a very long silence as the two failed to add anything else to their conversation, avoiding each other's gaze. The rest of the group exchanged glances, ranging from knowing looks to confused frowns.

Maya raised an eyebrow at Phoenix, and he nodded as he got her intended message. "Alright, then!" he announced, breaking the silence with a clap of his hands. "I think it's time we started boarding this plane!" He grabbed his backpack off the floor by his feet, while Maya began to herd Pearl, Trucy and Apollo towards the security gate. Phoenix looked to Luke with a smile. "We'll start lining up; Catch up to us when you're done, but don't take too long, okay?"

Luke paused a moment in thought, then nodded.

"Bye!" Trucy called, waving to Athena and the Laytons as she and her family walked off into the distance, and were quickly out of earshot.

Flora gave Luke a smile. "Until next time," she said, and the two nodded at each other as she gently escorted Alfendi back outside; The young boy, hand held tightly in his sister's, kept his eyes glued on Luke, sadly waving until they were out of sight.

Athena looked between Luke and Hershel with a smile, then began to walk backwards towards the door outside, watching Luke. "I'll text you tomorrow afternoon!" she promised, waving.

Giving her friend one last grin, Athena turned and skipped away.

Luke and Hershel stood in awkward silence for a few moments, before Luke finally stepped forward and pulled the shorter man into a hug. "I'll miss you, Professor."

Hershel chuckled, gingerly patting Luke's back. "Nonsense. We'll be seeing one another again before too long. After all, I promised to help you find your mother, and I can't very well do that from London, can I?"

Giggling, Luke nodded. "I guess not!" He pulled back, giving his mentor a vaguely teary smile. "Once Apollo and I are settled in to our new jobs, I'll finally be able to get back on the search."

Spotting the tears in Luke's eyes, Hershel gave him a sad smile, patting the young man's shoulder. "Now now, no tears. This is only a 'so long', not a 'goodbye'."

Luke hurriedly nodded, wiping at his eyes as he tried to hide a sniff. "At least I'm not making a scene this time," he pointed out, quietly laughing to himself. Hershel only smiled, and, after a few moments, Luke was able to pull himself back together again. "Until we meet again, Professor."

Hershel nodded, stepping away from his former apprentice. "Until then."

After a moment's pause, Luke picked up his well-worn travel suitcase and walked off to join his family, waving to Hershel as he went.

'So long, Professor.

'Goodbye, London.'

Apollo and Clay's Apartment
Living Room

The first thing Apollo heard as he pushed open the front door of his home was the sound of electronica music and the vague wailings of a monster roar, which quickly stopped as the nearby TV was paused and a familiar face poked up from the front of the couch, smiling as he registered Apollo's arrival. "Welcome back, dude!"

Apollo gave his friend a smile, pushing the door closed behind him. "Thanks. Anything come for me?"

Clay laughed, remembering how impatiently Apollo had been waiting for the arrival of his badge before he left. "A buncha stuff, actually." He gestured down the hall, towards their bedrooms. "Left it all on your bed."

Smiling, Apollo nodded. "Right. Thanks." He gripped the handle of his travel bag tighter and started to wander towards his room.

"By the way," Clay continued, pointing a thumb at the paused TV, "I found a marathon of classic Doctor Who episodes, if you're interested."

Apollo paused, thinking for a moment. "It would help me stay awake," he admitted, "and it sounds interesting. I'll be right back."

"Great!" Clay cried. "I'll see how far back I can rewind live TV on this thing!" With that, he was reaching for his laptop on the floor beside him.

Chuckling to himself, Apollo moved on down the hall and into the nearest bedroom, shoving open the door with an elbow.

The first impression Apollo's bedroom gave off was usually "surprisingly neat"; Unlike Phoenix and Trucy, who kept their spaces messy and seemed to like it that way, Apollo preferred keeping things clean and organised. Part of it was because he had a learned ability to emotionally disconnect from objects, keeping his belongings light at all times, but mostly he liked to blame the years he shared a bedroom with Luke, witnessing and even helping his younger brother neaten and organise his books and various belongings. Sure, there would be places in the neatness where Apollo would allow a mess to develop, but mostly he liked to keep everything in a certain order: Bed against the wall, a small table next to it, desk on the opposite wall, floor kept clear at all times. Next to the desk was even a special closet specifically for his magicians' gear, which was kept padlocked if its owner was away from it for any reason or length of time. The cupboard for his regular clothes was across the room, by the foot of the bed.

Dumping his bag by his cupboard to unpack later, Apollo unpinned his cape and draped the garment over his desk chair, his eyes glued to his bed. Sure enough, Clay had left a small pile of mail on Apollo's pillow; Most of it was plain regular letters, but one in particular caught Apollo's attention: a padded envelope. Gasping in surprise, Apollo almost jumped at his bed, grabbing the yellow piece of mail and running to his desk for a pair of scissors. A minute later, he had opened the troublesome envelope, and was excitedly emptying it onto a clear space on his desk (where his laptop normally sat). After a few shakes, a small round object fell onto the wood with a _plink_, its golden sheen glinting in the light as it came to rest on the smooth surface of the desk: A tiny sunflower, the scales of justice proudly displayed between its circle of petrified petals.

Apollo stared in disbelief, frozen for several moments. 'Th... That's my badge... My defence attorney's badge...’ A slow smile spread across his face, and he reached out to pick up the small object, letting the envelope in his hand fall to the floor. _This is mine! My badge! What I've worked so hard to earn since I graduated from school!_ He found himself laughing semi-hysterically, still unable to believe the round badge clutched in his fingers was real. How long had he been waiting to hold his very own attorney's badge in his hand? As he spun it around, staring at it from every angle, he quickly noticed a number etched into the back, above the screw and fitting. _Two-nine-zero-zero-three, huh? Guess that's me!_

"Hey, dude, you planning on coming back this century?" Clay called from the front room. "The bad guy's fallen in love with the fake American girl, and I think this might be the last episode of this story!"

Apollo restrained his excited giggles, clutching his new badge tightly in his fist. "Y-yeah, coming!" he called, then looked down at his waistcoat. _Now, where did Trucy and I decide it would go?_ After a moment, he tapped at the top button on his right. _I wonder if...?_ Still grinning to himself, Apollo slipped off the garment, grabbed the spare sewing kit Trucy had given him a few years ago, and headed back out into the living room.

Still stretched out on the sofa, Clay sighed in relief as he saw his friend appear, Apollo easily sitting on the floor by the coffee table. "Finally!" he said, setting the episode to play again, only to then notice the massive grin on Apollo's face and the waistcoat and sewing kit being laid out on the table before them. "Dude?" he asked, the TV forgotten as he watched his friend in confusion. "What are you doing?"

Apollo laughed, grabbing a small pair of scissors from the kit and beginning to pick at almost-invisible threads around the top left button of his suit. "I guess you could say I'm redecorating my costume!" he said, unable to turn down his excited grin.

Clay stared at his friend for several seconds, then noticed a small, golden-coloured object sitting by the sewing kit, similar in design to Apollo's round buttons but much smaller in size. He frowned at it, examining the 'button' from a distance before giving his friend an unamused look. "Your badge came while you were away," he realised.

Apollo nodded, his grin finally beginning to fade. "It's kinda annoying," he said. "I wanted to show it off to everyone in London, but it arrived too late for that. And now I've just come back, and I'm all jet-lagged, and so's my family, so everyone's gonna be too tired to really appreciate that it's finally here."

Clay gave his friend a cheeky smile. "Including you?"

Although he was still smiling, Apollo shot Clay a glare. "Ha ha," he deadpanned, quickly returning to his work as he carefully freed the button from his waistcoat. "I'm thinking I'll get this attached to my costume, then take it home tomorrow to show Dad and Trucy and Luke. We'll all be awake enough then to actually appreciate it." He grinned as a thought occurred to him. "Hey, I should just not mention it and see how long it takes for them to notice!"

Clay laughed. "You think you'd be able to?" he pointed out.
"Shut up," Apollo replied, though he still smiled, knowing his friend was right.

August 12, 11:31AM
Wright Talent Agency
Phoenix's Office

Apollo could barely keep his hand away from the new addition to his waistcoat, still unable to dial down his excited grin at the reminder it was there. It had taken him a while but, finally, he had managed to replace the round button with the smaller attorney's badge the previous evening. He doubted he would have got any sleep at all that night if it weren't for the fact that he was so jet-lagged from the trip to England. Even then, he had snapped awake come morning, and had had to slowly pull on his complete magician's outfit (sans hat) because the prospect of finally wearing his eagerly-awaited license to defend was making him giddy.

After tearing his hand away from his new badge, Apollo shakily unlocked the front door of his former home and slipped into the reception. Instinctively locking the door again behind him, he peered through into the neighbouring office. "Anyone home?"

"Come on in, Apollo," came Phoenix's voice from the office.

Catching the vague shadow of a waving hand through the open door, Apollo took a deep breath to calm himself and walked through as casually as he could, though he couldn't hide the excited grin on his face. "Hey, Dad!"

Phoenix looked up with a smile from his desk, where he was looking through some papers. "Couldn't wait to-?" he started to joke, only to pause and frown in confusion as he recognised Apollo's immense restraint in not bouncing off the walls. "Something happen?"

Apollo shrugged, forcing himself to stay silent as he stood in the centre of the room, continuing to fail in hiding his grin.

There was a long silence as Phoenix stared at Apollo, then, finally, he smiled knowingly, abandoning his papers and leaning on his desk. "So where is it, then?"

Giggling in excitement, Apollo practically leapt forward to his father's desk, throwing one side of his cape over his shoulder to show off the right side of his chest, where his waistcoat buttoned up. "I spent all of yesterday afternoon working out how to attach it!" he boasted, tapping at the small badge once to show where it was before gently pulling it out of a special mechanism he'd constructed to make it easily removable, holding out the badge for Phoenix to see. "It was waiting for me when I got home!"

Phoenix slowly reached out for the golden object, frowning in thought. He didn't seem to react at all as Apollo eagerly pushed the badge into his hand, staring at the tiny sunflower as it rolled around his fingers. After a long moment, he smiled. "Looks familiar," he joked, though Apollo could hear a strain in his voice of barely-hidden emotion. "Can't imagine why."

Apollo chuckled, guessing it must be very nostalgic for Phoenix to have an actual attorney's badge in his hands again, six long years after his disbarment. "With any luck," he quietly said, "I'll be maybe half as good a lawyer as you were, Dad."

At that, Phoenix broke into a laugh, tears beginning to appear in his eyes. "Apollo, really, why would you want luck to bring you down that far?"

Apollo blushed, running a hand through his hair.

Clutching the badge in his fist, Phoenix got up from his chair and circled his desk, pulling Apollo into a tight hug. "I'm so proud of you, son," he said, feeling the tears ("Liquid pride!") falling down his cheeks and finding he didn't care at all. "You're going to be amazing, I know you will."

"Man, you're making me want to cry!" Blinking rapidly, Apollo hugged his father back, putting aside his usual awkwardness as the least sappy member of his family. "Thanks, Dad," he whispered.
Apollo left the right side of his cape flipped up over his shoulder as he climbed the stairs to locate his siblings, unable to resist making his badge more visible in the hope they'd notice it quicker. "Luke? Trucy?" he called as he reached the landing, heading to the open door to Trucy's room as he checked his sister wasn't inside.

A moment later, he heard a happy shout, and looked down the hallway at exactly the right moment to catch sight of a blue blur dashing out of Luke's room. He had just enough time to brace himself before his little sister slammed into him in a hug of greeting, her cape flapping behind her. "Polly!" she shouted, then jumped back to grin up at him. "You came to hear the end of the story!"

Apollo had been opening his mouth to greet his sister when her words registered, and he paused to stare at her in confusion. "Huh?"

"She means 'Azran Legacy'," Luke explained as he appeared in the hall with a smile, approaching his siblings at a much more relaxed pace. "You promised to hear the end of it when we got home."

"O-oh," Apollo muttered, sighing as he remembered the argument in the restaurant after Luke's graduation. "Yeah, I did promise that, didn't I?"

Trucy looked up at him with a frown. "If you didn't come to hear the story, then why are you...?" Her words trailed off, the oddness of his cape's positioning leading her eyes down to his waistcoat, where she stared as she noticed the much smaller 'button' not far below her eye line. "Wait, is that...?"

Apollo grinned, realising she'd noticed it. "Oh, this?" he casually asked, tapping proudly at his new badge. "It arrived while we were away! Added it on last night!"

Luke hurried closer to curiously look over Trucy's shoulder at what Apollo was indicating, and broke into a smile. "Oh, your attorney's badge!" he cried. "Congratulations, Apollo!"

Before Apollo could reply, Trucy squealed, bouncing up and down. "Polly's a lawyer!" she shrieked, giving her oldest brother another hug before excitedly spinning to give Luke one too. "Just like Daddy was, too!" She turned back to Apollo with a grin. "Can I look at it?"

"Sure!" Apollo replied, grinning back as he easily pulled the badge from its new home on his waistcoat and handed it to his sister. "Be careful with it, though."

"I will!" Trucy promised, taking the small badge with an awed look as she examined it. "It's so shiny!"

Luke hid a smile, suddenly remembering an almost identical exchange he'd had with Phoenix seven years previous.

"It's brand new!" Apollo pointed out with a laugh. "Of course it's shiny!"
"Do they tell you what the symbols stand for?" Luke asked.

Apollo frowned in thought, while Trucy was preoccupied still looking over every millimetre of the golden object in her hand. "Of the badge?" he asked. "Well, the scales are the obvious 'justice' symbol... is there something else about it?"

Luke smiled. "Papa told me when we first met that they're modelled after a sunflower. Sunflowers symbolise freedom and justice, because they're always facing the sun."

Trucy looked up at the younger of her brothers with a surprised look. "Oh yeah, you actually got to see Daddy's badge before he lost it!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow at her. "So did you," he pointed out.

"No, I didn't!" Trucy shot back with a frown. "I barely talked to Daddy before my other Daddy's trial, and then he didn't have it anymore!"

Luke watched the badge in her hands, still smiling nostalgically. "It looks pretty much the same as I remember Papa's being like," he assured his sister. "They probably still use the same moulds to make them as they did when Papa got his."

Trucy nodded, looking at the badge's back. "Why is there a number here?" she asked.

"It's an ID number," Apollo explained. "I think it's to identify the owner if it gets lost or something."

"Security, actually," came a voice from nearby, and the trio looked up in surprise to see Phoenix standing at the top of the stairs, watching them with a faint smile as he rested an arm on the handrail. "They're supposed to be unique so the bailiffs can ensure only the proper people are using them in court... not that that stopped a couple of notable exceptions of course."

"What do you mean, Papa?" Luke asked, confused.

Apollo frowned in thought. "Wait, didn't Uncle Edgeworth defend Iris on the first day of her trial?" he cut in. "You mean like that?"

Phoenix nodded. "He borrowed my badge while I was in the hospital," he explained. "A few months before that, someone successfully pretended to be me with a cardboard replica." He shrugged, his smile fading. "I hope they've improved their methods since then."

Trucy looked back to the badge in thought. "What was your number, Daddy?" she asked curiously.

Phoenix had to shake his head. "I'm afraid I don't remember," he admitted, a vaguely sad expression flitting across his brow. "It was a long time ago, Truce."

"Aw," Trucy sighed with disappointment, then handed the badge back to Apollo.

As Apollo re-attached his badge to his waistcoat, Luke tapped his goatee in thought. "How long did you have your badge, Papa?" he asked. "It was at least a couple of years, wasn't it?"

"Three, actually," Phoenix replied with a smile, then turned and headed back down the stairs, continuing, "Not that long at all in the grand scheme of things."

The Wright kids looked at each other in concern before following their father down into the kitchen.

"That would have been nine years ago now," Phoenix mused to himself, coming to a thoughtful halt near the middle of the room. "Almost a whole decade since my own badge arrived in the mail. Huh."
Luke frowned in thought as he tried to remember what he had been doing in the summer nine years ago (nothing much - he'd been moving from Misthallery to London with his parents, having appointed himself the brand new apprentice of Professor Hershel Layton). Apollo, however, was doing some quick maths in his head, and approached his father with a concerned look. "You were... twenty-three?" he asked.

Phoenix seemed surprised that the three had followed him, or was simply shocked out of his train of thought, and turned to face them. After a short pause, he nodded. "A little older than you," he confirmed, then smiled. "I wasted some time on that art degree I never finished."

Apollo laughed. "You must've been pretty excited!"

Phoenix shrugged, though his nostalgic smile gave away that Apollo was right. "I only had the one person to show it off to, though."

Trucy grinned. "You mean Auntie Mia?"

Laughing, Phoenix nodded. "Yep, Auntie Mia!" he confirmed. "She had to put it on my lapel for me, I was shaking too hard with excitement!"

Everyone laughed for a few moments at the mental image of a young Phoenix jittering with glee as Mia calmly attached his badge to his suit for him.

"Speaking of," Phoenix continued, waving a finger at his eldest son, "you'll need to tell Maya and Pearls if you haven't already."

"Yeah, of course," Apollo agreed with a grin. "I'll go up on the weekend, if Maya's free!"

Trucy jumped to Apollo's side, tugging on his arm. "Okay, now you've shown us your badge," she demanded, "it's time to finish the story!"

Apollo sighed, his excitement draining. "Do we have to?"

"Yup!" Trucy insisted, pulling her brother towards the stairs.

Phoenix watched with a raised eyebrow. "I thought you were busy making something for Luke?" he asked.

Luke nodded, smiling. "She's making me a vest, or waistcoat, to wear for my new job!" he explained, glancing to Apollo. "I think we were done measuring though."

"Uh-huh!" Trucy agreed with a bright grin and a nod. "I can start work on it while you tell the story!"

Apollo sighed, resigning himself to his fate as he obediently followed Trucy back up the stairs, Luke behind him. "Great, wonderful. I've been looking forward to this."

"Don't sound so excited!" Phoenix joked, calling after them with a grin. "I'll be down here when you're done!" With that, he headed back into his office.

Luke's room was, as always, in tip-top condition, with everything neat, orderly and exactly where it was supposed to be. The side that had been Luke's from the start was almost entirely unchanged from how it had been since the moment the brothers moved in, but the side that had been Apollo's until he moved out had changed quite a bit: The small desk that had once sat on the landing by the stairs (intended for homework until they'd all gotten individual desks in reception) had been moved into the corner the elder brother's bed had once occupied. The wall around it had also been covered with things taped all over, ranging from temporary notes and to-do lists to seemingly random lists and diagrams to photos both old and new. Apollo even noticed a copy of the Agency's current, now-outdated, flyer at the edges. The desk itself, normally kept almost entirely clear, currently carried the framed graduation photo of Luke's parents and the album he had received from Emmy, neither having found their proper places yet.

Letting go of Apollo's arm, Trucy dashed to Luke's bed, where she quickly scooped up a notebook, pen and measuring tape she'd been using before Apollo arrived. "I'll be right back!" she cried, then ran back out of the room and down the hall.

Luke gave Apollo a shrug, then headed over to his desk and pulled out the chair. "You can sit wherever you want, Apollo," he offered, gesturing to the chair and the bed. "I was thinking, since you've only heard 'Azran Legacy' just the once, I'd start from the beginning again to refresh your memory."

"Sure," Apollo agreed with a non-committal shrug, then headed over to the bed. He was going to need a comfortable seat to get through this.

Luke lowered himself into his chair, watching Apollo with concern. "I know you think I exaggerate most of my stories, but-"

"I know, I know," Apollo interrupted, waving a gloved hand, "you promise you aren't lying."

At that, Luke frowned. "You should know full well I'm not," he pointed out, glancing at Apollo's bracelet as his face fell. "That's... why it hurts so much when you don't believe me."

Apollo felt his other hand going to his left wrist. "Y-yeah," he mumbled, staring at the carpeted floor. After a long pause, he added. "I guess it's just in my nature to doubt things. S'why I became a lawyer, right?"

Luke thought a moment. "Papa would say it the other way around," he pointed out, but gave his brother a smile. "I'm glad you're hearing me out, at least. You can claim I'm lying all you like, just as long as you've heard the whole thing."

Apollo resisted a guilty wince. "Y-yeah," he mumbled again.

With an excited giggle, Trucy burst back into the room, her arms full of fabric, paper and various other sewing supplies. "I'm ready!" she announced, then dropped everything on the floor and plopped herself down in the middle of it all, sorting through her pile of things to pull out the notebook, where she began immediately sketching and making various notes. "Go ahead, Luke!" she ordered, her eyes glued to her writing.

Apollo rolled his eyes with a smile, and Luke chuckled to himself, then the younger brother took a deep breath and began the story: "It all happened back when I was eleven years old. The Professor, Emmy and I had been through a number of adventures together already, but this one was the grandest of them all..."

Apollo adjusted his blue tie as he entered his workplace, smiling at the thought of the new badge sitting on his chest. 'I don't think I'll ever get over that!' Like most everyone else Apollo knew, Kristoph was well aware of the young man's impatience for the arrival of his badge, although Apollo had been careful to tone down his excitement in front of his boss... not that he was going to find it any easier to do now said badge had finally arrived.

Resisting the urge to skip, Apollo headed over to the closed door into his mentor's office, knocking twice and announcing, "I'm here, Mister Gavin! Good morning!"

A moment later, the door opened, and Kristoph Gavin stood in the doorway, smiling down at his employee. "Good morning, Wright. On time as usual." As Apollo grinned proudly, Kristoph continued, "How was your trip to London?"

"Good," Apollo automatically responded. "We didn't have much time to look around, just being there for Luke's graduation and all."

Kristoph nodded and, noticing Apollo didn't appear to be heading to his desk, raised an eyebrow. "Was there something else you wanted?"

Apollo paused a moment, then smiled, pointing to the badge on his waistcoat. "My badge arrived, sir!"

"So it has," Kristoph replied, looking over the new addition with what Apollo hoped was pride. "It appears you are now legally capable of defending in court."

Although he was widely grinning with glee, Apollo found himself glancing at Kristoph's badge on his lapel, and wondered if his boss had felt excited when his own badge had arrived. 'Nah,' he decided. 'Mister Gavin's the 'Coolest Defence in the West' - he probably just put it on and got to work!'

"I suppose," Kristoph continued with the same calm smile, "that means it's time I promoted you." With that, he turned and headed to the desk in his office.

Apollo blinked in surprise. "Huh?" He carefully followed his boss inside, watching Kristoph sit down and pull open a nearby drawer to remove a single piece of paper. "What do you mean, sir?"

Kristoph chuckled, shaking his head. "It's time you were hired on as a junior partner, rather than just an office assistant," he said.

Apollo stared for several moments in shock. "J-jun...?"

"If you're willing to, of course," Kristoph added.

His face breaking into a wide grin, Apollo nodded emphatically. "Y-yes, sir! I'd love to be your junior partner, sir!"
Kristoph continued to smile. "I'm glad to hear it," he said, then his expression turned stern. "Keep in mind however, a badge doesn't suddenly make you ready to lead a case. I will be expecting you to act as my assistant in court for at least a year or two before you can begin to take cases of your own."

Apollo nodded, his hands balling into determined fists to match his mirrored frown. "I understand, sir," he said. "I'll work hard so I don't disappoint you!"

"I'd expect nothing less," Kristoph replied, his smile returning. "You will likely turn out to be a, as you put it, 'fine' young defence attorney, Wright."

Apollo blushed. "Y-yes, sir," he said. 'As long as you don't ever say that in front of Dad or Trucy... I think I might be.'

August 13, 10:30AM
Warren Street Animal Shelter
Reception

Luke adjusted the brand new vest over his shirt, still getting used to the fit. 'I wish Trucy hadn't suddenly decided to do this at the last minute... I can't help but feel she rushed it.' Shaking his head and assuring himself he looked perfectly fine, the young man pushed open the door and entered into the animal shelter's reception, calling, "Hello!" to whoever might be inside.

Behind the desk were two familiar faces, who looked up as Luke entered and smiled, instantly recognising him. "Northpaw!" the woman with an orange mane of hair called, waving to her friend. "Long time, no see!"

Luke grinned, approaching the pair. "Hi Kitty, Duck!"

Duck nodded from his seat behind the desk, idly clicking something on the computer. "I'm afraid the boss isn't in today - got himself injured again."

Luke paused in surprise. "What happened this time?"

"Clocked himself on the back of the head," Kitty explained, crossing her arms and failing to hide a small smile of amusement. "Apparently he was reaching for something on the back of the shelf in the supermarket and stood up too fast."

"I heard he dropped something under his trolley," Duck interrupted with a confused frown.

"Whatever happened, he bumped the back of his head, knocked himself out and got himself in the hospital," Kitty continued with a shrug. "He says he'll be out soon, but we can't say anything for sure until the doctors release him."

Luke thought for a moment, concerned for his friend. 'Poor Mister Pound. He can't go more than a few months without another injury for his collection...'

"Speaking of," Duck continued with a smile, "I understand you've got a doctorate now, haven't you?"

Blushing, Luke nodded. "Vets become doctors in the UK," he explained. "I've read we're allowed the keep the title in the US if we want to."
"Well then, Doctor Northpaw," Kitty said with a cheeky wink, "fancy coming to work for our little shelter here?"

Luke giggled. "If you'll have me!" he said, then gave Duck a worried look. "Um, does Mister Pound want me...?"

Duck laughed. "There've been lots of discussions about it over the past year," he replied. "Reindeer... should probably tell you himself, but everyone wants you to come in as one of the paid employees."

Despite Duck's reassuring words, Luke's worry only heightened. "What about Reindeer!!?" he asked, eyes widening.

Before Duck or Kitty could reply, the door from the dog enclosures slammed open, and a young woman around Luke's age stormed out, raven hair sticking straight up and falling over her face, barely hiding her angry glare. "WHERE IS HE!?" she shouted.

Luke jumped back in fright, although the other two were merely surprised. "M-me!!" he cried.

The teen looked up, her one visible eye locking on to Luke with shock. "Northpaw!?" she replied, straightening up. "What are you...?" She shook her head, returning to her more angry glare as she turned to Duck and Kitty. "Did Bee come by here!? I can't find him!"

Luke sighed in relief. The teen girl, only a year younger than him, had been volunteering at the shelter almost as long as Luke, and the pair had worked together on many a shift over the years. Her nickname around the shelter was Poe, and she certainly seemed to embody some of the famous poet's darker nature... especially when she got angry.

Kitty smiled knowingly, seeming unconcerned. "Slacking off again?"

"What do you think!?" Poe cried, groaning in frustration as she pressed the palm of a fingerless glove to the side of her head, brushing past the ring in her one visible eyebrow. "Why is the boss even letting him stay!? He never does the work he's assigned to do!"

"Who's Bee?" Luke asked.

"New guy, signed on last week," Poe explained, waving a hand dismissively. "You haven't met him yet."

Duck smiled. "We call him 'Busybee' because he hides rather than actually work."

Luke frowned in confusion. "If he doesn't want to work, why is he volunteering here?"

"Who can say!?" Kitty answered with a laugh, then turned to Poe. "I'd help ya look, girl, but I'll have to man reception while Duck here deals with Northpaw."

Poe seemed confused for a moment, then smiled in understanding, giving Luke an excited look. "Aw, they're gonna pay you now, Paw!" she realised. "Congrats!"

"That's Doctor Paw!" Kitty cut in with a wink.

Duck chuckled to himself as he got up from the reception desk's chair, waving for Luke to follow him. "As usual, I'm standing in for Mister Pound until he gets back," he explained, heading past Poe to the dog side of the building. "We'll have to wait for him to get back to sign anything, but we can work everything else out for now."

Luke nodded, giving Kitty and Poe a wave as he headed after Duck, the tall man taking his usual slow pace down the hallways. Once he was sure the door behind them had closed, and it was clear Poe wasn't following them, Luke gave Duck a curious look. "So, why is Bee allowed to stay if he doesn't work?"

"I can't say for sure," Duck replied, "but my suspicion is because there's one thing he can always be relied on to do, and Pound obviously thinks it's important enough to keep the kid on."

Luke frowned in thought, but couldn't think of any one possible chore that stood out as requiring less work than the other chores. "What?"

Duck looked down at Luke with a grin. "Socialising the animals, of course."

"You really didn't need to do this," Phoenix insisted as he waved his friends in. "There are better things you could have done with your weekend than help me."

"Nonsense," Edgeworth shot back, shooting a quick glare at Kay to leave the pile of Samurai tapes by the TV alone. "Something clearly went wrong with the handling of this case, and I intend to keep my promise to help you see it through."

Phoenix sighed, crossing his arms as he leaned on his desk, half-feeling like he wanted to just lie down on its top and forget the world outside his small apartment existed.

Gumshoe nervously fidgeted from near the window, where he seemed to have taken up an unneeded post as 'look-out' (though for what, Phoenix had no idea). "So, uh, pal," he quietly asked, one hand rubbing at the back of his head, "how've you been doing since... um..."

"Since I lost my badge?" Phoenix bitterly spat, glaring at the nearest wall. "Just fine, thanks."

Gumshoe winced, sadly looking out the window.

"Hey!" Kay cried, crossing her arms as she gave Phoenix an angry look. "He was just asking if you were alright!"

"Kay," Edgeworth growled in warning, and the girl sighed as she dropped onto the single sofa, giving up on hounding Phoenix any further.

It had been only three days since Zak Gramarye had vanished from the courtroom and Phoenix Wright, Ace Attorney had subsequently been disbarred. To Phoenix, the passing days still felt like a nightmare that might end any minute... that he hoped would end any minute. Despite the moments of hope his friends kept giving him, he was struggling every second not to retreat into his bed, curl up into a tight ball and just... stay there until the outside world sorted itself out. It felt like the world had been out to get him since February, when he not only nearly lost his best friend through fire, freezing and murder, but began the slow descent into the much more torturous losing her to her home village's culture. Most of it had been self-inflicted, but the thought of dragging Maya, Pearl and Kurain down with him had Phoenix firmly convinced they were better off now with him as far away as possible.

Edgeworth, on the other hand...

The red-suited prosecutor stepped towards his friend, arms at his sides. "What about your investigation?" he asked. "You said you would look up this forger; Have you made any progress?"

Phoenix sighed, though he was secretly grateful to be distracted from his wallowing in self-pity. "Not really," he admitted. "I... haven't found him yet."
Edgeworth hummed to himself in thought, crossing his arms and tapping distractedly on his arm. "We haven't gotten far either," he replied. "Prosecutor Gavin was very possessive of what secrets he did have."

As Phoenix gave his friend a confused look, Kay nodded knowingly from the sofa. "We're pretty sure he didn't have anything to do with it, though."

"I highly doubt that," Phoenix darkly mumbled, glaring at the wall. "It seems to be the case, however," Edgeworth calmly insisted, having expected Phoenix's response. "He didn't want to talk about it. The whole thing made him uncomfortable, and he was forceful about his information coming from an anonymous source." He closed his eyes in thought. "I suspect he also knows that trial was not entirely just, but something is keeping him from admitting it."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, watching his friend curiously. "What do you mean?"

Edgeworth had to think for a few moments to formulate a reply. "He was very evasive," he explained. "Given how insistent he was when we pressed him on it, I doubt he was lying when he said he knew as much about that forged page as we do. Someone definitely tipped him off, but he seems prepared to go to the grave with the secret of who exactly it was."

Shaking his head, Phoenix rounded his desk and fell more than sat in the chair behind it. "So we know even less now than we did before," he sighed. "Perfect."

Gumshoe looked even more miserable. "I-if I'd known what he was plannin' to do in court, pal, I swear I'd've told you!"

"That's probably exactly why he didn't let you know," Edgeworth pointed out, waving a finger at the detective. "Gavin is a prodigy for a reason. He would certainly have done his research and known you have worked on many cases with Wright, thus he could not trust you not to inform Wright of his plans."

"Yeah, it's really weird," Kay piped up, crossing her arms and legs as she frowned at the ceiling in thought, leaning back in her seat. "Most of the bad guys we corner are real jerks, but Prosecutor Gavin seems like a really nice guy." She grinned. "He kept calling me 'Fraulein!'"

Phoenix rolled his eyes. "Doesn't surprise me."

Edgeworth just glared off into the distance. "To be honest, I would find it easier to trust him if he weren't pretending so hard to be what he clearly isn't."

"What do you mean, sir?" Gumshoe asked, scratching his face with a curious look. "He's a German rock-star prosecutor, what's he pretending to be?"

"German," Edgeworth bluntly replied.

Everyone else looked up at the prosecutor in surprise. "He's... pretending to be German?" Phoenix asked in disbelief.

"No native German speaker uses the word 'Fraulein' anymore," Edgeworth explained, "especially not one his age. And it is more natural to end a sentence in German with 'nicht', not 'ja.'" He tapped a finger against his arm, looking annoyed. "I understand it is part of his stage persona along with the ridiculous name, but I wish it would stay his stage persona, and not become his entire life."

While Kay and Gumshoe looked surprised, Phoenix burst into laughter. "You mean the kid that cost me my badge... that prodigy prosecutor... is PRETENDING TO BE GERMAN!?" he cried, almost falling off his chair with sudden delight.

Kay sat up on the sofa, watching the former lawyer with concern. "Are... you okay, Mister Wright?"

With a loud sigh as his laughter slowly died, Phoenix planted his head face-first on his desk, on top of some old papers cluttering it. "Nope!" he announced in a cheerful tone. "I am not okay at all!

Edgeworth sighed, approaching the desk. He uncrossed his arms and seemed about to reach out to pat his friend's back to offer comfort, but paused mid-movement and awkwardly crossed his arms again. "You said you hadn't located this forger yet," he said, changing the subject. "Maybe we can assist you in locating him."

"Nah, I'm pretty sure I can do it on my own," Phoenix insisted, gently pushing himself back up into a sitting position, his face returning to a morose look as he brushed off a piece of paper that had attached itself to his forehead. "I've just... been distracted by something else."

Edgeworth raised an eyebrow. "And what is this 'something else'?

Phoenix didn't answer immediately, thinking to himself for a moment before turning to Gumshoe, still stood by the window. "You remember that little girl, don't you?" he asked. "Trucy Enigmar?"

Gumshoe blinked. "You mean Zak Gramarye's daughter?"

Kay gasped in surprise. "Zak Gramarye had a daughter!?"

"The state will be taking care of her," Edgeworth pointed out, one eyebrow raised as he suspiciously stared at Phoenix. "What is so important about the girl, Wright?"

Phoenix shrugged, trying not to look uncomfortable at his friend's question. "I... feel responsible for her, I guess," he admitted. "If I'd done my job properly, her father wouldn't have vanished, and-"

"Nonsense," Edgeworth interrupted, shaking his head. "Enigmar would have known full well he would be leaving his daughter behind. If he was any kind of loving father, he would have made plans for her."

"That's just it," Phoenix sighed, resting his elbows on the desk and interlocking his fingers thoughtfully, resting his hands against the lower half of his face. "He was... probably the least helpful client I've ever had." He paused, frowning. "Well, excepting Ron DeLite, anyway." He shook his head. "I-it was like... he wanted me to do a terrible job. It didn't matter, because he was planning on leaving anyway, without answering a single question about what actually happened."

"And?" Edgeworth asked, wondering what Phoenix's ramblings had to do with Trucy.

"He hired me after I beat him in a game of poker," Phoenix continued, frowning in thought. "Said only his former mentor had beaten him before."

Kay looked confused. "Poker? Like, the thing you poke fires with?"

"'Poker' as in the game of cards," Edgeworth explained, then turned back to Phoenix with a thoughtful look. "I seem to recall the three of us taught ourselves poker as children. You always won then, too."

Phoenix smiled proudly and shrugged. "Eh, you and Larry are both terrible at poker."
"So, uh, what's this got to do with the kid?" Gumshoe asked.

"I've been researching her family," Phoenix finally explained. "Shadi Enigmar, Zak Gramarye, was an orphan, with no family to speak of. Her mother, as far as I can tell, was raised by only a father, and was an only child too." He shook his head. "Also, said mother vanished a few years ago... and the grandfather on that side was our unfortunate victim, Magnifi Gramarye."

"Wow," Kay mumbled, crossing her arms. "She's got an awesome pedigree!"

"So you're saying she has no living relatives?" Edgeworth realised.

Phoenix nodded. "She's in foster care, yes, but she shouldn't be. Nothing's been prepared, there's no one to take care of her... I..." He looked away, a little embarrassed to be admitting this to his friends. "I want to help her. I want to look after her until her father gets back. I... have to."

"You want to adopt her, pal?" Gumshoe asked, seeming confused at first before smiling. "Well hey, I always thought you were pretty much already a dad to little Pearl!"

Phoenix seemed a little surprised at the unexpected support, but pressed on. "Yeah, except I don't have a job anymore to support her," he pointed out with a sigh, running a hand through his spiky hair. "I'd hate for her to spend longer alone than she has to, but I have no idea what to do with myself so I can give her a decent living..."

Edgeworth thought for a long moment, fingers tapping on his arms. "I'll help you," he said.

Everyone looked up at the prosecutor in surprise. "You'll what?" Phoenix asked.

"I'll help you," Edgeworth repeated. "I know you, Wright; You need someone to protect. Without your badge, you're even more vulnerable. Someone to look after could be just what you need, and I intend to ensure you have a decent life together."

Phoenix continued to stare for a long moment before giving his friend a grateful smile. "You're the best, Edgeworth. Though I don't know what you could do to help..."

"Trust me," Edgeworth replied, giving Phoenix a rare, confident smile. "We will ensure young Trucy's safety, then put all our focus into this investigation. It shouldn't be too hard at all."

The ominous thumping suddenly assaulting the tower had made poor Flora shriek in surprise and fear, and Luke couldn't blame her at all. Out the window, Don Paolo was hovering in a copter-like contraption of his own, three spiked metal balls swinging every which way as the copter careened towards the little house on the tower. The next strike threw Luke and Flora to the floor, and the Professor shouted "Follow me!" as he dashed to the door, stopping only to help Flora back to her feet. Outside, the trio could see the plumes of smoke and brick dust from the damaged building below as they raced to the path downstairs, but more worrying was that Don Paolo's machine seemed to have disappeared, and the ground was rhythmically shaking under their feet.

"What now!?" Luke cried, with a frustration that belied his inner panic. He didn't receive or expect an answer, as they were already on the stairs back inside, running as fast as they could without falling. It seemed only a moment later that the roof above them began to break apart, and before Luke had the time to react, the stairs in front of him were gone, crushed by a falling block of concrete.

The shaking that had brought the Sanctuary out from under the mountain by Froenborg was nothing compared to the shaking that was bringing it back down. Most of Luke was still physically and emotionally numb from the lingering pain of stopping the golems, not to mention the subsequent loss of Aurora, but he still managed to make himself move through the unstable structure, wiping away the tears still streaming down his cheeks. Following at the Professor's side, he was vaguely aware of Descole, Emmy and Bronev waiting for them, before the five all ran out together into the sub-arctic sunlight. The ground again shifted beneath their feet, knocking Luke down to his knees, but there wasn't any time to waste, and he forced himself to concentrate on one thing and one thing only: follow the Professor to safety.

He was still too numb to muster a reaction when, a few moments later, Descole disappeared in the falling rubble.

With a clinking of snapping chains, the massive chandelier hanging in the manor's expansive front hall came free of its moorings, crashing down into the floor below and bringing much of the roof with it. Luke looked up and could see the rapidly growing cracks in the walls all around them, parts of the building coming loose every direction he turned his eyes. Katia ran to her grandfather, and Luke thought for a moment both she and the Professor had been crushed as the top-hatted man pushed her out of the way of some falling rubble. Luke was finding it hard to breathe as he ran around where the floor was still stable, finding Katia, the Professor and Anton safe on the other side. "We have to go!" he shouted, trying to quell the rising fear that, this time, they wouldn't be so lucky to get out alive. "Hurry up!"
Luke awoke with a scream and no idea where he was. Folsense? The Azran Sanctuary? Saint Mystere? His hands automatically clung to whatever was nearest, and he quickly realised the shaking wracking his body was not his own; He was lying on a carpeted floor, one hand clinging to the soft beige while the other clutched an old and battered teddy bear already in his arms. The whole building around him was vibrating, and Luke's eyes widened, knowing from experience this meant it must be falling down. He pushed himself to his feet, only vaguely registering the bed he had been lying next to, peacefully napping before the almost audible rumbling knocked him to the ground.

Just as Luke made a lunge for the door, the movement stopped, throwing the young man to the floor as he again lost his balance. 'What's going on!?' Still half-asleep, Luke was finding it hard to concentrate on his surroundings, not even noticing as he shakily pushed himself back to his feet that he'd managed to drop his beloved teddy despite the vice-like grip he'd had on it. Although the rumbling had stopped and there was no sign of falling rubble, he didn't stop to think, the residual panic from his waking nightmare forcing the young man out his bedroom door, running down the hallway and into the kitchen below.

Trucy was grinning from beside the kitchen counter, looking around before noticing her approaching brother. "Did you feel that!?!" she excitedly cried.

"W-we have to get out!" Luke shouted, rushing to grab his sister's arm and dragging her towards the office door.

They had only gotten a few steps before Trucy ripped her arm out of Luke's grip, giving him a confused glare. "Why?!" she asked.

"Because!" Luke hurriedly replied, too terrified for their safety to formulate a longer answer, and he made another attempt to grab Trucy's arm, only for the teen to dodge him, ducking under his flailing hand and running around into the open room behind him. Luke, deciding she must be heading for the back exit, let her go and ran for the door to the office, only to find himself colliding with a taller figure in a black hoodie.

"Luke?" Phoenix asked, his frown somewhere between confused and worried.

"Papa!" Luke shouted, grabbing the fabric at his father's chest in his panic. "We have to get out of here! Quickly!"

As Luke tried to push past to make a run for the front door, Phoenix grabbed his shoulders, keeping Luke stock still. "Luke!" he cried with a stern gaze, commanding the young man's attention. "We're perfectly safe where we are. It was just an earthquake."

At that, Luke's panic finally began to subside. "A-an... earthquake?"

Phoenix's gaze softened a little, visibly concerned for his son. "And only a little one, too. This building's made to withstand worse than that."

Luke could only stand in shock for several moments as the truth of the situation sank in. Nothing was collapsing. There was never any danger of being trapped underneath a pile of rubble. All that Luke had accomplished was scaring his family and making a scene, neither of which was an appropriate, gentlemanly reaction to a simple earthquake. Full of shame, he buried his face in his hands with a squeak of repressed tears, and soon found himself gently pulled into Phoenix's comforting embrace.

"It's okay," Phoenix whispered into Luke's ear, one hand patting the back of Luke's head where it rested against his shoulder. "You're alright."

Luke felt shaking again, but this time it was only his own body, the relief that was replacing his fear only making the tears in his eyes stronger. Despite that, he managed to repress any sobs, keeping his distress silent. A hand to his back made him jump, but, after whipping his head around in shock, he saw it was only Trucy, watching him in concern although his reaction to her touch had made her retreat back a few steps. Luke sighed, feeling even worse, but Phoenix patted his back reassuringly.

"Come sit down in the office," Phoenix told Luke, gently guiding him in with the firm hand resting on his back.

Lacking the energy to protest, Luke allowed his father to lead him through into the next room. He kept his gaze strictly on the floor, watching the carpet below his feet as Phoenix guided him to one of the two red sofas near the piano, where he sat down, hugging himself tightly and screwing his eyes shut.

"Are you alright, Luke?" came a weary voice from not far away.

Luke almost jumped in surprise again, looking up to see his unofficial uncle sitting on the other sofa, leaning heavily on one side as though he had been lying down and was just getting up. "Oh, Mister Edgeworth, you're still here!" Luke said, trying to force a smile. "I thought you would have gone home by now..."

Edgeworth shook his head, giving Luke his own small smile (Did he look paler than usual, or was Luke imagining it?). "I thought I'd stay and catch up with your father for a while. Maybe I should have gone home, however; Pess might have warned me of the earthquake before it struck."

Luke nodded at the attempt to lighten the mood, then returned to staring at the floor. It was hard to think now that he had had such a good morning, having been graciously allowed to borrow Edgeworth's car (the only manual, or as they called them here 'stick-shift', any of the Wright family's friends owned) to practise his results from, so far, only two weeks of driving lessons. It had been made even better when Edgeworth took Luke to his home for a break and the young man had once again been allowed to visit the prosecutor's golden retriever, Pess, which was a chance four times as rare as Edgeworth's own visits. It had been such a busy morning, Luke had elected to go straight to his room to have a nap when they got home, which, to his great displeasure, had led to this whole mess.

"We should be asking how you are, Edgeworth," Phoenix asked, still standing by Luke's side and watching his friend with a concerned look.

"I am perfectly fine," Edgeworth insisted, shifting slightly in his seat to be more upright. "Given a few minutes to recover, I think I shall be alright to drive home... given there are no aftershocks on the way, of course."

Trucy leaned over the back of the sofa beside Luke (an impressive feat considering the pile of magic props she and Apollo had accumulated behind it) and looked between her brother and Edgeworth with a small smile. "You want some hot chocolate?" she asked, then shrugged apologetically. "I don't know how to make tea on my own, so..."

"That would be most agreeable," Edgeworth replied, giving her a grateful smile. "Thank you, Trucy."

Luke, still feeling guilty and not trusting himself to talk, gave her only a smile and a silent nod.
Trucy grinned. "Two hot chocolates, coming right up!" she cried, then bounced off the back of the sofa and rushed off to the kitchen.

Phoenix sat at Luke's side, rubbing his son's back comfortingly with one hand. "I suppose, given your reaction, you should count yourself lucky it took this long for an earthquake to strike while you were here," he told the young man. "You've never mentioned being in one before."

"Because I haven't," Luke replied, still staring morosely at the floor. "I had no idea that was an earthquake until you told me. It woke me up and I thought the building was falling down."

There was a short pause as the other two men thought to themselves. "That can happen," Edgeworth admitted, "but most if not all buildings here are specially designed not to."

Phoenix frowned, not seeming to have heard Edgeworth. "Of course, your stories," he muttered, more to himself than to his friend or Luke. "You know first-hand what it's like inside a collapsing building, don't you?"

Luke nodded, still avoiding eye contact. "The Herzen Manor, the tower in Saint Mystere, the Azran Sanctuary... somehow, we always managed to run fast enough to get out before anyone got hurt, but every time I honestly thought we wouldn't all make it... probably because, one time, we didn't..."

Edgeworth crossed his arms, reflecting on Luke's words. "Flight is a natural reaction to fear," he assured the young man, then smiled to himself. "Certainly a more useful one than simply fainting."

Phoenix couldn't resist a short laugh, while Luke looked up in confusion. "I guess that's another similarity you two have: " he said, looking between the pair, "A fear of earthquakes!"

Edgeworth seemed amused, although Luke took a moment to connect the dots and realise what they were talking about. Although surprised to learn the random fact about his unofficial uncle, he forced a smile and looked up at his father. "I'm sure if I'd been awake I would have realised what was going on much sooner," he insisted. "I wouldn't have... tried to evacuate everyone. I kind of woke up in the middle of it after all."

"There's no need to explain," Edgeworth replied. "We react how we react, and there's nothing more to it."

"You can count on us always being there to help you, too," Phoenix added, pulling Luke close in a one-armed hug and giving his son a comforting smile. "We're family, after all."

Finally, Luke was able to give a genuine smile and leaned against his father. "I know, Papa," he quietly replied. "That's what family's all about."

Aunt Eury and I still have Thanksgiving, but it's not the same when we're the only people in the continent doing it.

Plus we're kinda celebrating some questionable things, which every single person I mention it to here will point out :/

I don't much see the point of it myself, especially since we don't particularly have the money to buy a feast.

Papa always tries, but this year especially is a bit small because everyone came to visit me in England.

You've been over here for Thanksgiving the last few years, though! I should have invited you last year, actually. Aunt Eury would LOVE you!

Haha! Like I said, I'm kinda neutral on the whole thing. November was always busy enough, with my birthday, Remembrance Day, Emmy and Mr Sycamore visiting, the Labyrinthian Anniversary...

Oh yeah, I always forget that's a thing. :/ I was so sheltered in the space center, I've only heard stories of what happens.

It's not pretty. We're doing something for it at the shelter though: Black Fur Friday! Costs for adopting pets are reduced! Mr Pound says it's been a rising trend across shelters all over the country, and it helps all sorts of animals find homes.

Sounds fun! :) I hope it's nothing like the sales everywhere else. Will you be there?

All three of us vets will be, yes. Mr Pound didn't want to put the burden of dealing with a crowd purely on volunteers.

Well, good luck! :D

Thanks! I'd better get to work now. Talk to you tomorrow, Athena! :

Seeya, Luke! :D

Reception

"Next year, let's not do 'Black Fur Friday'," Fox sighed, stretching her arms and back as she led the trio down the hallway to reception. "Or at least only do it in the morning."

Luke nodded in agreement. "No-one showed up after lunch," he agreed. "I think it's a great idea to get more animals out to loving homes, though."

Reindeer playfully scoffed. "Screw the animals! All that matters is our own comfort, right?"

Fox shot her mentor a glare. "You know that's not what I meant."
Finally, they reached the reception door, and Fox pushed it open, Luke and Reindeer right behind her. Sat behind reception was Simba, speaking in hushed, angry tones with Pound, standing at her side. As the pair registered the three vets' arrival, Pound stepped away from Simba, rubbing his hands together nervously. "We'll discuss this later, Gatti," he quietly told the upset receptionist, then turned to the trio with a forced grin. "Ah, leaving, are you? I think it's safe to say today was a success!"

"Of course!" Luke immediately agreed. "We actually have empty enclosures now! How long has it been since we had that?"

"I do think we properly need all hands on deck if we do it again," Fox added, giving her boss a concerned look. "The three of us were run off our feet all morning."

"I didn't mind," Reindeer insisted with a grin. "Got my old-man nap in once everyone vanished in the afternoon!"

Luke giggled. "We all know you weren't napping," he said. "We could hear you talking to the animals!"

"Better than hearing you talking to them!" Reindeer shot back with a wink.

While everyone else was giving the older man confused looks, Pound rolled his eyes, giving the three a grateful smile. "Well, thank you all for sticking around anyway. See you all Monday?"

"I'll be staying in for a while, actually," Luke replied, pointing a finger into the air.

Fox gave him a frown. "Seriously?" she asked. "We actually had a longer workday today, the sun set over an hour ago, and you still want to stay after-hours?"

"No-one can say Northpaw don't love those critters," Reindeer said with a grin, shooting Luke another wink as the young man giggled again.

"Well, as usual, let me know when you leave so I can shut everything down," Pound told Luke, then looked to the other two. "I'll see you two Monday!"

"Monday!" Fox repeated, giving Pound a grin and a wave as she headed on to the front door.

Reindeer scoffed to himself as he followed the young woman. "Yeah, if I haven't died before then!"

Pound shook his head at the old vet's joke, watching Fox and Reindeer walking off down the dark road through the glass doors. Chuckling, he then patted Luke on the shoulder as the two headed back into the hallway behind reception. "The day that old coot finally meets Death, Death is getting a stern talking-to, I'm telling you."

Luke giggled in agreement. Behind them, Simba rolled her eyes as she moved to lock the doors.

November 28, 6:45PM
Warren Street Animal Shelter
Hallway

"I'll see you another time!" Luke called to the dog he had been cuddling in the recuperation room, carefully closing the door behind him. It was a ritual he cherished, spending time with the dogs and cats that especially needed care when everyone else had gone home for the day, and even a day as busy (and infamous) as Black Friday was no exception. I'd better go drop in on Mister Pound, then I can head home, Luke reminded himself, and headed off to the end of the building opposite reception, where there was a room exactly between the dog and cat enclosures, only steps away from the exits to the yard out the back. Like a number of the more important rooms, the otherwise nondescript door was fitted with a large lock, which required a key-card to open, and a small sign that simply read 'OFFICE'.

As he arrived at the room's often looked-over entrance, Luke reached out his hand to knock before catching himself with a giggle. Of course, I keep forgetting I have a key card now! He easily pulled the small plastic card from a pocket, then pushed it into the slot on the lock under the doorhandle. A small green light flashed, and Luke heard the lock clicking open, grabbing the handle to open the door. "Mister Pound!" he called, walking in. "I'm done for the-" He stopped in his tracks, staring at the scene before him.

Phelan Pound was dead.

Luke stared for several moments, unable to breathe with the sheer shock of the scene before him. Finally, his lungs forced a shuddering inhale, and Luke's legs hurriedly back-pedalled, pulling him out of the room and against the wall of the corridor outside. 'M-Mister Pound...! I... What do I...?' he asked himself, breathing heavily as he pressed against the smooth brick at his back, slowly sliding down to sit on the cold, concrete floor. 'C-call the police! Of course!' Reaching back into his pocket, Luke grabbed his mobile phone, and was already dialling triple-nine before catching himself and restarting with nine-one-one. The perils of moving so frequently between two different systems recently... I'm pretty sure they wouldn't redirect that number here. Oddly enough, the familiar musings on cultural differences helped to calm Luke down, so when he heard a voice from his tinny phone speaker say, "Emergency. What do you need?", he was able to concentrate on what he needed to do.

"I need the police," Luke calmly told the operator. "Someone's been murdered."

"Luke?"

"Hi, Papa."

"Hey. You on your way home?"
"Not yet, I'm afraid. There's... been a murder."

"A what!? Are you alright?"

"Y-yeah, I'm fine. Mister Pound's... I-I've already called the police, so they're on their way."

"Okay, good... In that case, you'd better make sure you're prepared for the detective and prosecutor when they arrive. You'll have to show them where the scene is, and be ready to tell them everything you know."

"Alright... I don't know much, but I can tell them a little..."

"You'll know more than they do. Is anyone else there?"

"N-no, just me."

"... In that case... Your phone has a camera, right?"

"Yeah, of course it does. Why?"

"Once you've finished talking to me, fire up that camera and take pictures of everything, no matter how insignificant it seems. Don't get too close to the murder scene itself, just stand back and take some photos."

"Wh... why am I taking photos?"

"... Whichever detective and prosecutor you end up with is going to be a lottery. Should you end up with a bad pair..."

"Papa... this doesn't have anything to do with this 'Dark Age of the Law' Mister Edgeworth mentioned... does it?"

"..."

"Papa?"

"I don't want you getting caught up in something you didn't do. I want you to be safe."

"... I will be, Papa."

"Good. Keep me updated on what you're doing, okay?"

"Y-yeah. I promise."

"We'll save you some dinner for when you get home. I love you."

"Love you, Papa."

View the Court Record
As much as he'd tried, Luke couldn't bring himself to take more than a handful of photos of the inside of the office. The adventures he'd had in his youth as Professor Layton's apprentice had, thankfully, never exposed him to any (truly) dead bodies; His lone point of reference was Professor Rains, who he had not unexpectedly discovered and whose accidental death had reunited him with Athena for the first time. Even then, he'd had his family and friends all around to distract him from the body, which had been remarkably clean except for the trail of blood in her red hair... entirely unlike the mess left by Phelan Pound in the shelter's manager's office four years later. To distract himself, Luke wandered throughout the shelter, taking a photo with his phone every ten steps, carefully counting as he walked the halls, taking stops in various side rooms and taking pictures of the animal food, the surgery tools and even of the toilet. It was almost spooky, wandering the halls in the dark of night, the only living human sharing a building with the bloody corpse of his boss... and the numerous cats and dogs, of course. Luke shook his head to remove the memory of the body before it appeared in front of his eyes again, trying to ignore the occasional curious meows or worried whines from the animals he walked past. He wasn't in the mood for talking yet.

Eventually, Luke heard knocking from the direction of the front door, and ran to reception. On the other side of the locked glass doors was a tall man in a white suit, blonde hair sweeping down the back of his head, curling at the ends to form a triangle-like silhouette. Behind him, Luke noticed a small swarm of police officers, all in their uniforms and hanging around nervously behind what was clearly the detective Luke had been waiting for.

As the detective spotted Luke coming into reception, he grinned widely and gave the young man a salute with a gloved hand. "Good evening!" he boomed. "Justice has arrived!" With a swift movement of his arm, he pulled out a small black wallet, which he held close to the glass as it flipped open to show off his police badge and ID card. "And it requests you let us in!"

Although Luke wasn't sure what to make of the man, especially after what Phoenix had told him, he knew better than to disobey, so he ran forward to pull open the door. "Thank you for finally coming!" he said as the detective and most of the police began to file in. "I-it's this way..." Before anyone could reply, he waved for them to follow him and led the small crowd down the nearest hallway, past the evermore curious pets to the very back of the building.

As they arrived in the tiny corridor by the back exits, the detective looked around sternly, pushing his sunglasses (Why was he wearing sunglasses at night!?) up his nose. "Quite a distance from the nearest helpful ear," he mused aloud.

Luke nodded, pulling out his employee keycard again to open the office door. "I last saw him alive at six o'clock. The animals have been especially noisy today, so I didn't hear a thing." As the tiny light next to the handle flashed, he pushed the door open and, firmly looking away from the room beyond, held it open, silently watching as the detective approached, holding the door himself as he peered at the situation beyond. Luke, deciding he wasn't needed, slipped out under the taller man's arm and leaned against the wall next to the door, replacing his keycard in his pocket and watching the detective's eyes behind his sunglasses darting all around the office, taking everything in with a note of horror that Luke was almost relieved to see.
After a moment, the detective waved to the group of police officers, who jumped at his signal and filed in to the room. The detective himself turned to Luke, giving him a grin. "Our many thanks for reporting this heinous crime, citizen!" he cried, then his smile faded into a sympathetic look. "It is always distressing when a criminal such as this commits the unthinkable. But not to worry!" He brightly grinned again, giving Luke another salute. "In justice we trust! Justice will always prevail!"

Luke smiled at the detective's enthusiasm. It looked like, despite Phoenix's worries, he'd ended up with one of the good detectives. "I hope so," he said, holding out a hand. "My name's Luke Wright. I work here."

"A pleasure!" the detective boomed in reply, grabbing Luke's hand and shaking it wildly. The moment he let go, Luke found himself nursing his hand, wishing the other man hadn't gripped it quite so hard, while the detective again reached into what Luke could now see looked like a gun holster under his left arm. Instead of a gun however, he pulled out the small black wallet from before, which he held out before him with a grin as it flipped open. "Bobby Fulbright!" he announced. "Heroic detective and champion of justice! In justice we trust!"

Luke simply stared at the man for several moments, unsure how to respond.

Fulbright didn't seem to notice how intimidated Luke was, pulling his ID back in the sling under his arm and resting his fists on his hips. "So! You reported the crime, Mister Wright?"

Luke nodded, silently thanking his father for warning him to be prepared for this conversation. "Yes, I did."

"You know the victim?" Fulbright continued.

Again, Luke nodded. "Phelan Pound. He's my boss, the owner and manager of this shelter." He mentally kicked himself for stuttering, the prepared explanations leaving his lips only reminding him that his friend was lying dead in the neighbouring room. "Like I said, I last saw him alive at six; We were closing up, so the other vets and I think the receptionist were leaving at the time."

Fulbright thought to himself, pushing on his sunglasses with a frown. "You stayed behind?"

"I always do," Luke explained. "I like to spend some extra time with the animals before I go home."

"And it was just you and him in here until you called us?"

Luke thought a moment, then shrugged. "I thought so at the time. I guess not though, considering..." He glanced to the door at his side, hearing the hubbub of the working officers within as they documented every inch of the small office.

Fulbright thought to himself for a very long moment, then, still frowning, pointed to the door. "That door. You need a card to open it?"

"Yes," Luke quickly replied, pulling out his keycard again to show the taller man. "The volunteers don't get one, only paid employees. We have locks like that on the surgery, the front door... various places." He thought a moment, then added, "Well, most paid employees. The receptionists don't need them, so most of them don't have one."

There was another very long pause as Fulbright mused over the information. Finally, he turned to the door, a hand to his mouth as he called, "Cooper!" When a middle-aged woman with hair dyed bright pink emerged, watching the detective obediently, Fulbright gestured to Luke. "Take him in."

Luke's eyes widened in disbelief as the woman, Cooper, pulled a pair of hand-cuffs from her belt and approached him, grabbing his hands with an almost business-like roughness as she attached the cuffs around his wrists. "B-but wait!" Luke cried. "I didn't kill him!"

"You were the only one here and you had the perfect opportunity to corner him in his office," Fulbright explained, barely even looking at Luke as he fixed his gaze on the office nearby. "I think we're done here."

Before Luke could further protest, Cooper had finished cuffing him and grabbed his arm, dragging the young man back towards reception. "B-but I didn't kill him!" Luke protested, only to be ignored as he was pulled around the corner and out of sight. "It wasn't me!"

Phoenix couldn't help but pace nervously, hands locked behind his back and eyes staring at the carpet below his feet. 'It shouldn't take this long for them to question Luke and let him go,' he told himself. 'He should have called back by now!'

"It's almost been two hours," Trucy pointed out, sitting on one of the sofas nearby and wringing her hands with worry. "Has something happened to his phone?"

Phoenix almost jumped as Trucy spoke up, and forced his best comforting smile for her. "Y-yeah, I'm almost certain that's what's happened. It's probably run flat from all the photos I told him to take! He'll be on the bus headed home right now."

Trucy stared back at him for a moment or two before slowly smiling, grateful for his attempt to reassure her although she knew it was a lie.

The silence was broken by the sudden unmistakable sound of the Steel Samurai theme, and Phoenix and Trucy spun around towards his desk, where the old blue phone was happily singing from atop a pile of paper. Phoenix didn't hesitate, lunging across the room and snapping up the phone, answering it with a loud "Luke!" that he hoped didn't sound too panicked.

"P-Papa?" came Luke's meek voice from the speaker.

"I'm so relieved you finally called, we were starting to-!" Phoenix cried, before cutting himself off with a frown as he realised he could hear Luke trying to hide sniffs... and he hadn't exactly greeted them with the kind of tone Phoenix had expected. "Is everything alright?"

Trucy's eyes widened from the sofa as she watched Phoenix's half of the conversation.

Luke seemed to stop hiding, and began to more obviously sob. "Papa... they think I did it!"

"What?!" Phoenix had to restrain himself from shouting. "Why do they...?" His question trailed off. He should have expected this. Since when did the police ever get the culprit right the first time round?

"I was... the only other person in the building," Luke began to explain, having to pause occasionally to take a deep breath in an effort to quell his audible tears, "and Mister Pound was in a room you... need a keycard like mine to get into..."
Phoenix shook his head, rubbing the bridge of his nose as he held back a sigh. "No no, you don't have to explain. I... I can get this sorted out." He looked up, finding himself standing by the window and looking out at the street beyond. He levelled a glare at the hotel opposite, as though it had personally accused his son of murder and had him locked away in the cold, heartless detention centre. "I promise you, we're going to get you out of there. We're going to find that killer and we're going to prove your innocence."

Luke was silent for a few moments, listening to his father's passionate announcement. "H-how?" he asked. "You don't-"

"I may not be legally able to do so myself anymore," Phoenix said with a smug smirk, "but I do happen to know the best defence attorney in the region... and you and I both are very well acquainted with his apprentice."

At that, Luke gasped. "O-oh! Will he...?"

"Don't you worry about a thing," Phoenix continued, assuring his son with a smile. "Besides... at least no-one's accusing you of being a witch!"

Phoenix was glad to hear Luke give a tearful laugh at the other end of the phone line. "I guess so," he agreed. "Thank you, Papa."

"We'll come visit you tomorrow," Phoenix promised. "Love you, Luke."

"Love you, Papa."

With that, the phone hung up, and Phoenix lowered his hand to stare at the device in his grip, concern overtaking his confident demeanour all over again.

"Daddy?" came a meek voice from the sofa, and Phoenix looked around to see Trucy still watching him, her hands pulling nervously at the neck of her nightie. "Is Luke going to be okay?"

Phoenix smiled, walking over to sit at Trucy's side and pulling his daughter into a hug. "Of course he will be," he promised her, feeling confident nonetheless that the upcoming battle would be one he had faced and won many times before, though never quite like this. "He's just going to stay in the detention center for a few days, then he'll be back home with us, you'll see."

Trucy didn't reply immediately, hugging her father tightly and burying her face in his chest. "I hope you're right, Daddy," she whispered.

Phoenix held his daughter tightly so she couldn't see his worried expression. 'So am I.'

"Mister Gavin?"

"Wright, I'm glad you're still awake... although I suppose I shouldn't expect otherwise, given the situation."

"What's the matter, sir? Why are you calling me so late at night?"

"... You aren't aware?"

"Aware of what?"

"Hm... No matter. You'll be finding out soon enough."

"....?"

"We have a case. Meet me at the detention center tomorrow morning, ten o'clock."

"O-oh, a case! Yes sir, I'll see you at ten, sir!"

"Don't be late, Wright."

November 29, 10:01AM
Detention Center
Visitor's Room

Kristoph had said nothing more than "Good morning, Wright," as Apollo came racing up to him outside the detention centre. Despite his burning curiosity as to the brand new case he had taken (he'd barely been able to restrain his excitement to boast to anyone other than Clay, not wanting to disturb his family in the middle of the night), Apollo managed to keep himself silent, bouncing on his heels as he followed Kristoph inside.

At the front desk, while Kristoph was talking to the guard on duty, Apollo was distracted looking around. It was very plainly decorated, all for function over any kind of pleasing form; The walls were a smooth purplish-grey, and lined with various posters, most advertising Gatewater Land and it's latest Blue Badger-related attraction. After a minute or so, Kristoph and the guard walked across to a door on the other side of the room, which the guard opened as he waved the two defence attorneys in. Kristoph walked on ahead, and Apollo rushed to catch up as he realised his boss wasn't going to wait for him.

The room beyond was a medium size, though it seemed smaller, thanks to the low wall and large glass window splitting it in two. The door on their side, which the guard had closed behind them, was in the middle of the wall, with the corners on either side occupied by small desks, one of which had a chair. At the centre of the brick-and-glass partition was a second chair, which Kristoph headed to. "Pull up the other chair, Wright," he ordered as he sat down.

Apollo nodded, pulling the green, fold-up chair across the laminated floor and sitting at his mentor's side. He took a moment to look around the other side of the room, finding it bare of anything more than a barred window, a security camera, and a green door. "Where's our client?" he asked.

"On his way," Kristoph assured him with a small smile of amusement. "The guards will be fetching him from his holding cell."

As if on cue, the door to the other half of the room opened and, to Apollo's amazement and sheer disbelief, Luke walked in, followed by another guard, who closed the door behind them and stood at attention in front of it. Luke's hopeful look turned into a wide grin as he saw who his visitors were, and he nearly flung himself at the chair on the other side of the glass, shouting, "Apollo! Mister Gavin!"

"Luke!" Apollo shouted back in return, barely noticing he was cutting off his mentor's own greeting. "What the hell are you doing here!?"

Kristoph gave Apollo a smile, while Luke just looked puzzled. "He's our client," the elder attorney explained. "Your father gave me a call last night asking us to take him on, and, naturally, I accepted."

Apollo spluttered for a moment, looking between Luke and Kristoph. "B-b-but... I...!"

"Papa didn't tell you?" Luke asked, seeming a little down at Apollo's confusion.

"Obviously not!" Apollo pointed out, frustrated. "Why did Dad think my brother being in jail wasn't a big enough issue to tell me about!?"

Kristoph shook his head. "Although this building contains a jail, Luke is only in the detention center," he explained. "Should we fail in properly defending him, then he will be in jail."

"I guess Papa just didn't want you to worry about me," Luke said, giving his brother a reassuring smile, though it seemed he was trying to reassure himself at the same time. "I'll bet he and Trucy got about as much sleep as I did last night."

Apollo tried to not look too guilty at the thought he was getting a peaceful, though excited, eight hour's sleep while the rest of his family was tossing and turning with worry all night.

"Back to business," Kristoph continued, pushing at his glasses, "you should tell us exactly what happened, Luke, from shortly before the murder to discovering the body."

"You're accused of murder?" Apollo cried to his brother in astonishment.

Luke nodded, looked morose. "My boss, Mister Pound," he explained. "You know we were all-hands-on-deck for Black Friday, right?"

Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead in thought. "Um... yeah, I think I remember you talking about it on Thursday."

"We were pretty busy that morning," Luke explained with a smile, "though everything calmed down in the afternoon. We were closing at six, and Reindeer, Fox and I all headed out to reception together."
Kristoph frowned. "'Reindeer' and 'Fox'?" he asked.

"Mm-hmm," Luke replied with a nod. "They're the other two vets; We use nicknames around the shelter. Hang on..." He reached into a pocket inside his vest and pulled out his notebook, flipping through until he landed on a specific page, grinning in triumph. "Here we go! Real names that I've picked up over the years!"

Kristoph did no more than nod at Apollo, but the young man had been working at his boss's side for long enough to know he was being asked to take notes. Pulling his Court Record from one of the many hiding places in his suit, he readied himself to oblige.

"Reindeer's real name is Rudolf Wildgrube," Luke began, "and Fox is Vixen Bagley." He paused, noticing Apollo frantically typing everything onto the touch-screen keyboard of his tablet, and smiled sympathetically. "Maybe I should just show you the list and you can copy it?" he offered.

Apollo grinned guiltily. "Uh, yeah, thanks," he replied.

Luke pressed the page he'd been reading to the glass with a smile, and Apollo gratefully began to copy it to his Court Record. Kristoph gave the list a glance, then returned his gaze to Luke. "You and the other vets left together?"

Nodding, Luke continued, "Reindeer - um, Mister Wildgrube and Miss Bagley went home together, but I always stay a little longer to spend some time with the animals."

Apollo, still copying the list, couldn't resist a quiet scoff of amusement, knowing that, by 'spend some time', Luke really meant 'chat'.

"The receptionist that day was Simba-," Luke explained, cutting himself off as he attempted to correct himself with Simba's real name. "Um, something Gatti..."

"Leo Gatti," Apollo filled in, looking over the notes on his Court Record. "I'm done with the list now, by the way."

Luke nodded with a smile, taking back his notebook. "She was... actually, I think she was arguing with Mister Pound about something, but they stopped when we came in." He shrugged. "Then Reindeer, Mister Wildgrube and Miss Bagley left, Mister Pound and I went back inside, and Miss Gatti started locking up. She would have left once she was done."

"Would have' left?" Kristoph repeated. "You don't know when exactly she went home?"

Luke shook his head. "I saw her locking up, and there wasn't really any reason for her to stay after that," he explained. "She would have gone home almost immediately."

Kristoph seemed to accept that answer, continuing with, "And what did you and Mister Pound do once you were alone?"

"Mister Pound went back to his office," Luke replied, seeming down again. "I went to the recuperation room next to the surgery. When I came out... it was around six-forty-five. Mister Pound always asks me to let him know when I'm leaving, so I went to find him..."

Apollo gave his brother a sympathetic look. "And you didn't even hear a thing?"

Luke couldn't resist a short, almost bitter, laugh. "We're an animal shelter," he pointed out. "There's a lot of background noise when the animals are riled up, even with the thick walls, and the doors are pretty good noise-blockers when they're closed." That said, he sighed, staring at the laminated
Kristoph frowned, still thinking. "Surely they didn't accuse you merely because you were the only other person in the building," he said. "Any passer-by could have forced their way in, could they not?"

"No," Luke replied with a sigh, shaking his head. "Mister Pound's office, and a couple other rooms around the shelter, have a keycard lock. Only Mister Pound, us vets and Duck -" he paused to look at his list, "Drake Gagnon, the assistant manager - have them. Mister Pound was in his office, and, since I have a keycard, they decided I did it."

Apollo opened up his notes again. "Might the specific rooms be important to know, sir?" he asked Kristoph.

Kristoph took a moment to reply. "Potentially," he admitted. "To clarify, this Mister Pound is the owner and manager of your animal shelter, correct?"

Luke nodded. "He's always the first to arrive and the last to leave," he explained. "The front door and two back doors have keycard locks, which he turns off when he comes in, and the surgery and recuperation room have them too." He paused to think. "I think the inner storage room is keycarded as well... the one that has the valuable stuff in it, not just food for the animals."

Apollo noted down what Luke said, while Kristoph remained silent, deep in thought. Once Apollo was done, he looked back up at his brother curiously. "How do those keycard locks work?" Apollo asked.

"Simple:" Luke replied with a smile, "They have a slot on the outside, you push in the card, and it unlocks just long enough for you to open the door!"

"The 'outside'?' Kristoph mused. "Outside of the casing?"

"Outside of the room," Luke clarified. "They're one-sided. If you want to get in, you have to have a keycard, but to get out you can just open the door and leave."

Kristoph smiled to himself. "Take a note of that, Wright; It's almost certainly important."

Apollo nodded as he did so.

"Oh, and if you see the detective," Luke spoke up, looking sheepish, "could you ask if he's done yet with my phone? They took it away to copy all the pictures I took..."

Apollo gave his brother a frown. "Why were you taking pictures?"

"Clearly it was," Kristoph pointed out with a smirk, then assured the young man, "We shall ask after your phone once we visit the crime scene. I'm sure we'll run into the detective there."

"Oh, that reminds me!" Luke cried, and he reached into his pocket, pulling out a small green card. "If you want to look around the shelter, you'll probably need one of these!" He slid the card into a small opening at the bottom of the glass, just large enough to stick a hand through, and Apollo reached to grab it. "I can't use it while I'm in here anyway," Luke continued with a sheepish smile.

Apollo looked at the card, realising from the printed label (which read only 'Wright, L.') what it was,
and gasped. "You're giving us your employee keycard!"

"If the police are an obstruction, I'm sure it will be useful," Kristoph pointed out, giving Luke a grateful smile as he stood. "We will return if we have any more questions for you."

Luke nodded, seeming nervous as he watched Apollo jump to his feet after his mentor, secreting his Court Record and Luke's keycard somewhere on his person with his usual expert magician's handling. "Thank you, Mister Gavin," the younger brother said, looking between the elder attorney and Apollo. "Good luck."

Apollo gave Luke a confident grin as he slowly followed Kristoph out of the room. "Don't you worry!" he called, flashing two thumbs-up in an imitation of Clay. "We'll have you out of there before you know it!"

Luke watched them disappear, waiting until they had gone to drop his smile and sigh. "I hope so," he mumbled.

Turnabout Shelter, Day 1: Part 2

Why the hell did you not tell me!? .

About Luke?

No, about Maya. YES ABOUT LUKE .

I understand you're upset, but I didn't want to worry you. You're going to need all the sleep you can get to focus on this case. Call it being cruel to be kind

That strategy has never worked ever .

Probably. I'm sorry for not telling you, by the way
I was half expecting Kristoph to pass it on. Can never really tell with him
Last night was pretty busy for me. After Luke told me what was going on, I had to call your boss, force Trucy into bed, then I made a couple calls to some old friends in high places. I have yet to hear back from them

You'll let me know what they say? .

If its important
Trucy and I are going in to see Luke. I assume his questioning is over for now?

We just left. He should be free .

Then I'll let you go and focus on your case. I'll be in touch if I find anything useful Alright. Thanks Dad .

No problem. Now go be a lawyer and make me proud, huh? :)

Warren Street

As Kristoph's car pulled up to the curb on the street Luke's shelter was on, the elder attorney looked to his assistant in the passenger seat. "Would you happen to have ever visited your brother's workplace before today?"

Apollo sighed, shaking his head. "No, actually," he admitted. He paused as the two exited the car, Kristoph locking it as he joined Apollo on the pavement and they began walking down the road. "Trucy came here a few years ago," Apollo continued, "but I decided at the time I wasn't interested."

"Fair enough," Kristoph agreed. "You couldn't have predicted this unfortunate turn of events, after all." He frowned in thought, pushing at the bridge of his glasses. "It would have been an advantage had you any prior knowledge of the crime scene, but we work with what we have."

It was hard to miss the animal shelter when the pair arrived, firstly because of the large sign of a cartoony dog and cat pointing the way in, and secondly because the road outside the building was swarming with police officers and their cars, all exchanging information and ferrying notes, professional cameras and bits of what seemed to be evidence back and forth. The large, friendly sign advertising the building had also had a piece of paper hastily taped to it, assuring any potential customers that the shelter would be open for business as usual on Monday.

Apollo frowned. "Isn't the trial on Monday?" he asked.

Kristoph nodded. "It is," he confirmed. "Although the crime scene itself will still be out-of-bounds to staff, the police investigation is generally finished by the time a trial starts."

"O-oh," Apollo mumbled, blushing as he saw his mentor's small smirk of amusement. "That makes sense..."

Although the police at first tried to turn the pair away, once Kristoph showed them his badge, they allowed the two attorneys through. Kristoph pushed open the glass front door and led Apollo through into reception, where the two were forced to pause as they noticed, either side of the empty reception desk, two sets of double doors leading in different directions - one labelled 'CATS' and the other 'DOGS' - and both with streams of police coming in and out.

Out of one door came a policewoman with bright pink hair, carrying a box of what looked like files, and at her back was a tall man in more casual dress, black hair swept up into a point at the side of his head that vaguely reminded Apollo of a duck's tail. "Please, you can't take those!" the man was pleading. "Those are our finances, we need them to keep the shelter running!"

"Not my problem," the policewoman shot back. "Detective Fulbright ordered us to take these as potentially significant - go talk to him if you need them that badly!"

Apollo jumped out of the way as the pair walked past, only to feel a scraping of something under his shoe.

"But-! Wait, please!" the tall man was calling, only to be left bereft in reception as the policewoman strode outside.

Leaning down, Apollo moved his foot and found underneath what appeared to be a clean disc of metal - a coin with no face or markings. He looked around, but the single coin appeared to be alone.

'That's odd...' Picking it up, he spun the coin between his fingers, noticing that, not only was it blank on both sides, it had a small hole stamped near the edge. 'Was this a part of someone's jewellery? What's it doing here?'

Kristoph, not seeming to notice his assistant's distraction, waved to the tall man with a smile. "Excuse me, do you work here?"

The man turned to the pair of attorneys with surprise, eyes wide. After a short pause, during which he noticed neither was in a police uniform, he sighed and shook his head. "I'm sorry - I don't know how you got in here, but we're closed for the weekend. Come back on Monday."

As Apollo stood back up, slipping the coin into a pocket, Kristoph chuckled good-naturedly. "Ah, we're aware," he replied. "We are actually defence attorneys. The defendant in this case, Luke Wright, is our client."

The man's eyes widened again. "Oh, you're Northpaw's lawyers!?" he cried, then seemed to relax, giving them a smile as he stepped forward, holding out his hand to shake Kristoph's. "I'm Gagnon, Drake Gagnon... Assistant manager, I guess would be my title. They call me Duck around here." He briefly shook hands with Apollo, then stepped out of the way of another stream of police officers, hands shoved under his armpits as he glanced at them uncomfortably.
"Gavin," Kristoph introduced himself, then gestured to Apollo. "This is my assistant, Apollo Wright."

"Pleasure," Duck replied with a nod, giving them a forced smile. "What do you need?" he asked the attorneys.

Kristoph thought a moment. "First of all," he began, "do you happen to have any maps of this place?"

Duck frowned, then shook his head. "No, sorry," he said. "The layout's pretty simple, especially if you're only here to adopt someone." He gestured to the right door, labelled 'DOGS'. "Behind the dog enclosures are the storerooms, bathroom, grooming area." He then pointed to the left door, labelled 'CATS'. "Behind the cat cages is the veterinary surgery and recuperation room." He crossed his arms. "The central hallways are entirely dedicated to the animal enclosures, except for the office at the very back. Beyond that is just the outside enclosure and the shed."

Kristoph looked at the police going to and fro through both doors. "So the crime scene, this office, is accessible from either door?"

Duck nodded. "Mister Pound liked being central to the entire 'operation', you could say."

"That reminds me," Apollo spoke up with a frown, arms crossed, "Luke - Northpaw - gave us a list of everyone who works here and their nicknames... Mister Pound didn't have one?"

At that, Duck laughed. "Oh, no," he replied. "He said he thought the whole 'nickname' thing was dumb, but he always warmed up to them eventually." He sighed, looking off into the distance with a faraway smile. "It took him a few years, but once you earned his trust, you earned your right to be called by your nickname by the boss himself." The tall man shook his head, dragging himself out of his own memories. "We mostly called him either 'Boss' or just 'Mister Pound'. That was the way he liked it."

Kristoph thought a moment. "I believe Wright said you were not working here yesterday?"

Duck opened his mouth to respond, then closed it again, frowning in thought. "Actually, I was," he eventually answered. "Only in the morning, though; Once the crowds died down, I decided there wasn't any point in hanging around and went back home to my family." He shrugged. "I told the boss to call me if we got a late resurgence, but he never did. I guess it was just quiet the rest of the day."

After another long moment of thought, Kristoph nodded. "I don't believe we have any more questions for now. Wright?"

"Um, just one," Apollo answered as his boss looked to him expectantly. "Is there anyone else working today, Mister Gagnon?"

Duck smiled. "Just me, Fox and Crow," he replied. "We've told volunteers not to come in until the police are gone, so it's just us receptionists and poor Fox."

Apollo and Kristoph glanced at each other. "'Fox' being one of the veterinarians on duty before the murder?" Kristoph asked.

Duck nodded, looking uncomfortable again. "The detective was questioning her earlier, so I think she's holed herself up in the recuperation room. Crow's handling all the chores single-handedly, and I'm trying to make sure this police investigation doesn't make off with all our valuable paperwork." He shot a glare at the police cars outside.
"And this 'recuperation room' is beyond the cat enclosures?" Kristoph clarified, looking to the doors again.

"Yep," Duck said with a nod. "Just head straight through that door, take an immediate left, and it'll be the door hidden away in the corner. If you knock, she'll probably open it for you."

"Thank you," Kristoph replied with another of his serene smiles. "We'll come find you if we have any more questions."

Duck shrugged, looking sheepish. "Well, anything to try and get the real killer found." He watched as Kristoph waved to Apollo, and the pair headed off towards the left set of doors leading further inside. "Hey, um," Duck called, stopping the pair in their tracks, and the tall man gave Apollo a thoughtful look. "Did you say your name was Wright?"

Duck stared at Apollo for a moment. "Huh." He then gave the young man a smile. "Should've guessed. He did say you were a lawyer."

Apollo smiled back at the man for a moment or two, before Kristoph turned and headed through the doors to the cat enclosures. Eager not to be left behind, Apollo hurried after him.

View the Court Record
Just as Duck had promised, hidden to the left upon entry to the cat enclosures was a blue door, labelled ‘STAFF ONLY’ in large letters. A black contraption was bolted around its handle, signifying it needed a keycard to pass and preventing access to anyone but the vets and other key-holders who worked at the animal shelter. Kristoph gave Apollo a glance, then headed straight for the almost imposing door, knocking gently with the back of his hand. "Ms Bagley?" he called.

"Go away!" came an immediate cry from within.

Kristoph’s surprise at the response, to Apollo's amusement, actually managed to break through his calm demeanour, and he stood shocked for a second before frowning and knocking again. "Ms Bagley, we just want to ask you a few questions."

"If you idiots have something else to bring up to make my day worse,” the voice shot back angrily, "you can get the bloody detective or that moron prosecutor to do it!" There was a pause, then she added accusingly, "And now you've gone and upset Patsey! I hope you're very proud of yourself!"

Kristoph's glare looked like it might have been able to set fire to the door with the frustration evident across his face. Apollo, despite being a little scared of his mentor's wrath, was equally angry at the woman, and shouted back, "If making 'Patsey' upset will prove my brother didn't murder anyone, then so be it! I'll upset Patsey a million times if it means getting Luke out of jail! Now will you frigging talk to us or not!?"

Kristoph, having regained his composure, gave Apollo a disapproving look as the young man panted heavily at the end of his speech. "No need be so loud, Wright."

Apollo rubbed the back of his head sheepishly. "Sorry, sir..." 'He's probably right. Better tone down the Chords of Steel...'

To the pair's surprise, the thick handle shifted with a click, and the door moved inward, revealing a pale face looking out at them warily in the small opening. Blue eyes locked onto Apollo from behind an unruly mop of red hair. "You're Northpaw's brother?" she asked.

Apollo nodded, giving her a small smile.

"We're Luke Wright's defence attorneys," Kristoph explained, again sporting his serene smile. "May we please ask you a few questions about last night, Ms Bagley?"

Fox thought only a moment before stepping back, opening the door to let the pair in.

The Recuperation Room was longer than it was wide, the walls lined with cages, almost all of which contained a solitary dog or cat, although Apollo could see a few that appeared to have a handful of puppies or kittens, and occasionally their mother with them. At the far end was another door, lacking a handle and appearing to be capable of opening both ways. Apollo supposed it led to the surgery itself.
Fox walked about halfway down the room, hugging herself tightly, before turning and staring sadly at the attorneys who had followed her. "Northpaw didn't do it, did he?" she quietly asked.

"Of course he didn't!" Apollo cried, offended. "He's spent his whole friggin' life helping people, he wouldn't hurt a fly!"

"Wright," Kristoph interrupted, shooting the young man a warning glare that made Apollo wince apologetically.

Surprisingly, Fox giggled. "I was hoping he hadn't," she said, staring at the floor as her smile faded. "With the way the detective and prosecutor were carrying on, though..." She looked back up to Apollo, giving him a grin that seemed happy despite her depressed demeanour. "You're exactly the way Northpaw's always described you, Apollo. Or should I call you 'Southpaw'?"

Apollo blushed. "Uh, just 'Apollo' is fine," he mumbled, rubbing the back of his head with a grin.

Kristoph pushed at the bridge of his glasses. "Since you two are acquainted, my name is Gavin," he said as introduction. "We're sorry to have to disturb you, Ms Bagley, but there are a few things we need to know to help our client."

Fox nodded, a serious look on her face although one hand was nervously playing with the loose ponytail hanging over her shoulder. "You want to know what happened last night?"

"If it's not too much trouble," Kristoph replied, putting on his serene smile again. "Wright said you were working with him until around six, correct?"

Staring at the floor, Fox thought for a moment in silence. "Yeah, I think that was the time we left," she agreed. "We packed up, then Reindeer and I went home together and Northpaw stayed behind... the usual routine, though a little later than normal."

"The receptionist, 'Simba' was it?" Apollo spoke up. "Did you see her go home?"

Fox shook her head. "She would have locked up as we left, but I didn't see anything," she explained. "Reindeer might have seen her go, though."

Kristoph and Apollo glanced at each other, surprised. "He would?" Kristoph prompted.

"He forgot his keys," Fox continued with a shrug. "We were only a couple minutes from here, so he went back to find them, and I went on home."

The two attorneys stared at her for a moment, then Kristoph hurriedly regained his composure, frowning in thought. "Have you seen him since?"

Again, Fox shook her head. "Sorry, I can't tell you how to find him," she said. "I think the prosecutor or detective has questioned him by now, though. You could ask them?"

Apollo looked up to his mentor curiously. "Would they tell us?" he asked.

Kristoph closed his eyes, thinking. "They are unlikely to," he replied. "No doubt Mister Wildgrube will be a witness in court, and prosecutors are very protective of their witnesses."

Fox sighed, looking away. "I'm sorry I can't be of any more help..."

"It is through no fault of yours, Ms Bagley," Kristoph assured her. "If we have any more questions, we'll-"
"Actually," Apollo interrupted, turning to Fox and pulling the small coin out of his pocket, "Ms Fox, is this yours?"

Fox looked at the coin curiously, and frowned as she shook her head. "No," she hesitantly said, still staring at it. "It can't have come off anything of mine; That kind of thing gets in the way, working with dogs and cats."

Kristoph raised an eyebrow, examining the odd disc of metal in his junior partner's hand. "Where did you find that?" he asked.

"It was on the floor," Apollo explained, "in reception."

"Then a customer likely dropped it," Kristoph pointed out. "It won't have anything to do with our case."

Fox was still staring at the coin, frowning in thought. "Actually, I think it might be Simba's," she said. "She has a necklace with coins like that on it, and she was working in reception yesterday."

"In which case it definitely doesn't have anything to do with our case," Kristoph added, waving to Apollo as he turned and began to leave the room. "It's time we examined the crime scene, Wright."

Apollo sighed, slipping the coin back into a pocket. "I'll return it to her later, then," he told Fox, then hurried after his mentor.

November 29, 11:22AM
Warren Street Animal Shelter
Hallway

Beyond the cat enclosures, Kristoph and Apollo exited into a hallway, at the back of the building as they had been told. To their right, it didn't take long to spot a tall man in a white suit arguing with the equally tall Duck, both standing by an open doorway that had a strip of yellow police tape across it at chest level. As Kristoph led Apollo towards the pair, Duck noticed them approaching and gave them a wave. "Guys!" he called, looking somewhat frustrated, "would you please tell him," he gestured to the white-suited man, "that we're happy for copies to be made, but not if it means we lose all our vital files of information!"

The other man scoffed, pushing his sunglasses up his nose. "You'll have them all back soon enough! Besides, what kind of vital information could an animal shelter have that it can't do without for a few days?"

"Oh, I don't know," Duck sarcastically shot back, "how about medical records of our in-house cats!? I just caught one of your goons making off with them! And!" He pointed at the open office door. "I asked you hours ago to ensure our storeroom, funding and employee files were retrieved and safe so I could make sure the money and resources were still flowing to keep this place afloat, and I have not seen a lick of evidence that you actually listened to me! In fact, I caught another of your goons very specifically taking our financial records, so I have every reason to believe you're deliberately spiting me at this point!"

The other man thought for a moment, starting to look uncomfortable. "Well... I suppose I didn't realise how important those were," he admitted, his hand moving down from his glasses to rub at his other arm. After another moment of thought, he seemed to come to a decision and gave Duck a confident grin. "In justice we trust! We will make this right for you, Mister Gagnon!" He turned to look into the office, calling, "Cooper!"

A policewoman with pink hair, the same one they had seen in reception before, ducked under the tape and out into the hallway with a sigh. "Detective Fulbright, sir?"

"Escort Mister Gagnon to the store of files," the detective ordered, "and allow him to retrieve anything he believes this shelter cannot do without!"

The policewoman looked to Duck with wide eyes, seeming scared of the triumphant smirk he was giving her. "Y-yes, sir," she replied, then walked off towards the dog enclosures.

Following his escort, Duck waved to the attorneys, still watching in silence. "Thanks, guys!" he called, then disappeared around the corner.

Kristoph and Apollo gave each other equally puzzled looks. "We didn't even do anything," Apollo quietly pointed out.

"Best to leave it," Kristoph sighed.

View the Court Record
"You two more employees?" the detective asked, turning to the pair of attorneys with a wide grin. "Here to give us your alibis?"

"Not so, I'm afraid," Kristoph replied, smirking serenely. "We are defence attorneys - specifically, Luke Wright's."

The tall man seemed surprised. "Ah," he said, then gave them a salute. "Of course, then I, Detective Bobby Fulbright, shall be happy to assist and ensure justice is done!" He laughed. "Although I doubt you'll get too far with this one!"

"Spare us your commentary, detective," Kristoph interrupted, pressing his glasses tight to his face. "Has an autopsy report been completed yet?"

"Yes, sir!" Fulbright saluted once more, then reached down to a large satchel leaning against the wall and pulled out a file, which he handed over with a grin. "Phelan Pound, aged thirty-three. Died from blunt force trauma to the head and neck, though there were bruises all over his upper body. Estimated time of death is six-o-five PM last night."

Apollo looked over Kristoph's shoulder as the elder attorney pulled out the report to study himself, finding the detective's summary matched it quite closely, except that the time of death was a lot more vague. "My thanks," he said, slipping the file into an inner pocket of his suit jacket. "Is there a reason you can be so exact with the time of death?"

"Naturally!" Fulbright boasted, pointing to the office behind him. "As long as you don't touch anything, you can go see for yourself!"

Before Kristoph could take the detective up on his offer, Apollo jumped in with a pleading look. "Oh, but one other thing: Have you finished with the defendant's cell phone? He'd kinda like it back."

Fulbright laughed. "Yep, we're done with that!" he assured Apollo, pulling the blue phone out of a pocket and handing it off to the young man. "Quite a lot of pictures he's got there. Almost didn't need to take any of our own!"

Apollo just smiled, quickly secreting his brother's phone away in his pocket.

"We've also checked it for any kind of call records," Fulbright continued. "Nothing suspicious, but he doesn't have any recording software, so we've no idea on the specific content of them."

Kristoph nodded. "Then we would like the opportunity to examine the crime scene, if you please."

"Of course!" Fulbright brightly replied, stepping aside to wave them into the small room. "Look all you like!"

Not waiting for the detective to change his mind, Kristoph ducked under the tape to enter the office,
Apollo followed close at his heels. The first thing the young attorney noticed was the doorstop jammed under the door to keep it from closing ('I guess because none of them have an employee keycard,' Apollo reasoned), and his eyes followed the hideous green carpet to a large brown stain in the centre of the room, still half-covered with a small pile of books, over which Kristoph stood, looking at the scene critically. Against the wall nearby was an empty bookcase, positioned carefully between a pair of filing cabinets, and at the back a small desk was pushed against the wall, its chair barely visible from where it was trapped in between the two. Like the bookcase, there was nothing atop the desk except for a small analogue clock, whose cracked face showed it had been damaged and was no longer running.

Kristoph smiled, pointing to the clock. "That would be why time of death is so accurate," he said, and Apollo realised upon closer inspection that it displayed about five minutes past six, exactly the time Fulbright had given them. "This clock must have been on the bookcase when it fell."

Apollo nodded, taking out his Court Record to take a photo and trying not to think about the prominent blood stain on the carpet below his feet.

Kristoph crouched down, running a hand through the air just above the carpet, tracing the outline of the stain. "It looks like the killer was trying to cover their tracks; The blood here is smeared."

Finished with his photo, Apollo steeled himself to look down at what his mentor was pointing to. "Smeared?" He kneeled at Kristoph's side to examine the area more closely.

"See? Right here." Kristoph waved a finger around some uneven marks, outlining circles around each of them with a finger. "No doubt the forensic team has already noted this down themselves, but it looks as though something small and circular was resting here. The killer took it away with them, but tried to mask its existence by covering where it protected the carpet."

'Several small and circular somethings,' Apollo thought, quickly taking photos of each scuffed patch of carpet he could see: five in total. "Coins, maybe?" he asked.

"Or keys," Kristoph suggested. "A contact lens, shot glasses... even a watch could fit the profile." He stood back up, crossing his arms as he surveyed the room. "But it does us no good to guess. What else is there to find here, Wright?"

As Apollo stood up, his eyes landed on the broken clock on the desk. "If they have time of death matched with when the bookcase fell over," he said, "does that mean they think the falling books killed him?"

"A good thought," Kristoph complimented him with a smile. "Were it not for his injuries not being consistent with purely that, they may have written this death off as an accident."

'I do remember Luke saying his boss was tremendously clumsy...’ "What doesn't match with the books falling?" he asked.

Kristoph pulled the autopsy report out again, opening it to read the file within. "His bruising was primarily on the front of his body, and Pound was discovered lying on his front under the pile of books, none of which were underneath him. If he wasn't dead when they fell, he didn't survive long enough to move afterwards."

Apollo winced, wondering at how horrified Luke must have been to walk in on that with no warning.

"We didn't find any fingerprints, before you ask," Fulbright suddenly chimed in from the doorway, watching them with a smile. "The killer knew enough to wipe the place down. Didn't leave a trace behind."

"Really?" Apollo asked, frowning. "You didn't find anything?"

Fulbright shrugged, fiddling with his sunglasses again to badly hide a smug grin. "Well, we found the defendant's prints on the door handle, but we were expecting that."

"Speaking of," Kristoph said, gesturing to the door, "are there any records of who opened these doors and when? If anything would be damning of our client's innocence, it would be that."

At that, Fulbright's smugness disappeared, and he avoided their gazes. "I was hoping you wouldn't ask about that," he mumbled.

Kristoph smiled, arms crossed. "Ah, so there are records. And they support our side of the case?"

Fulbright sighed, then gave the pair of attorneys a glare. "Keep in mind, it's only because Prosecutor Debeste ordered I help you that I'm even letting you know about this!" he said, then reached back into the satchel on the floor.

"Debeste?" Kristoph repeated, frowning in thought. "So he's our opponent, then."

Apollo couldn't resist a smirk. "Ah, he may be 'the best'," he said, crossing his arms with a proud grin, "but is he always Wright?"

Kristoph gave Apollo a disapproving glare. "No puns, Wright," he ordered.

Fulbright laughed as he straightened up, a piece of paper in his hand. "I wouldn't call him that to his face, though," he warned the younger attorney. "I've heard Prosecutor Debeste doesn't like it too much." He held the paper out to Kristoph, surprising the elder attorney out of a train of thought. "Your copy of the keycard records," he explained.

Kristoph smiled as he took it. "My thanks, Detective." He quickly scanned the document, locking on to the very bottom of the chart within. "Ah, very interesting."

"What's it say?" Apollo asked, bouncing to his mentor's side.

Handing the paper to Apollo to read, Kristoph explained, "As I thought it might, it only records when a keycard is used, not every time a door is opened. Have a look here, around the time of the murder."

Apollo ran his eyes over where Kristoph indicated, right at the end of the day. A 'Wright L' was labelled as entering 'Recup. Room' around six, then 'Office' forty-five minutes later, just as Luke had described. Also, just as Fox had told them, a 'Wildgrube R' was shown to have used the 'Entrance' door, only a couple of minutes after six. Aside from Luke, a 'Pound P' was the only person to have entered the office, at around six, the same time Luke had gone into the Recuperation Room. Apollo frowned. "There was time for Mister Wildgrube to have committed the murder," he realised. "I bet Luke wouldn't believe it was his beloved Reindeer, though."

"There's something else interesting this document tells us, however," Kristoph pointed out with a smile. "Have you spotted it, Wright?"

Initially confused, Apollo studied the chart a little longer, then spotted the problem. "The murderer didn't use a keycard to get into the office!" he realised with a gasp.
"Which widens the possibilities of who committed this murder quite a bit," Kristoph added. "Pound would have opened the door for them from inside."

"But it still has to have been someone with a keycard!" Fulbright argued, childishly pouting at having to share the biggest weakness in their case against Luke. "After all, the outside doors were all locked! The building was empty!"

"That still means Mister Wildgrube could have done it as easily as Luke!" Apollo shot back with a glare.

"Enough," Kristoph ordered, looking between the two like an annoyed parent (despite being slightly shorter than Fulbright). "Let's save the arguing for court, shall we? That is what it's for, after all."

Fulbright and Apollo looked away sheepishly. "Sorry, sir," Apollo muttered.
Having failed to find anything else at the crime scene, and unable to tease any more information out of Detective Fulbright, Kristoph and Apollo decided to thoroughly examine the other rooms at the back of the shelter building. When a cursory examination of the first storeroom and the toilet within came up blank, Apollo pushed Luke’s keycard into the door on the side wall, and led his mentor into the second storeroom. Much like the first storeroom, it was a reasonably sized space, with large bags of dog food, cat food and cat litter piled high all around, interspersed with various boxes full of large amounts of the various other things needed for the regular care of so many animals at once. Unlike the first storeroom, there was a corner that appeared to be dedicated to some computer towers and a large safe.

While Kristoph moved to examine the safe, Apollo ran to a small window high on the wall, jumping up and clinging to the sill to study the window. After a few moments of hanging by his fingers, he dropped back down, wiping any dust from the wall off the front of his suit. "This window doesn't open, and it's a bit high and too small for someone to climb in," he decided. He paused as he thought he'd heard a jingling sound behind him, but saw when he turned around only Kristoph, standing with his back to Apollo by the safe as he examined the computer towers.

"I didn't think someone would," Kristoph replied, slowly turning to give Apollo a smile as he tore his gaze away from his search. "I doubt the police have been in here; Those keycard records show this room hadn't been opened since mid-afternoon, up until your brother came in here after the murder."

Apollo nodded. Luke really had gone everywhere in the main building while waiting for the police to arrive, as the keycard records showed him visiting and re-visiting rooms in-between his two visits to the crime scene that night. "Mightn't the police think he dumped something in here, then?"

"I don't think so," Kristoph explained, frowning in thought. "All those pictures on his phone are perhaps proof enough that, whatever they think he did, he had long finished with it by the time he called the police."

Sighing, Apollo decided to accept that explanation, though he wasn't happy about it. "So, what next? Go back to Ms Bagley and look around the vet area?"

Kristoph shook his head. "Let's head through the dog enclosures and find this grooming area Gagnon mentioned," he suggested.

As they emerged back into the hallway, the two attorneys noticed that the police presence seemed to be finally dying down; Even Duck looked a lot more relaxed when they glimpsed him rushing past them on his way to the sheds outside, a box of files in his arms. Fulbright was still hanging around outside the office, but was preoccupied with something and didn't notice Kristoph and Apollo as they left the hallway and turned into the central corridor they had missed on their way down, lined with enclosures that housed dogs of all shapes and sizes. To their surprise, it was not empty, as a short man with black hair in a mohawk-like style was crouching in an open gate, apparently fussing over the happy dog within. As he spotted the two men entering from the hallway door, he hurriedly gave the canine a pat goodbye and backed out of the enclosure, closing the gate and directing a sheepish smile at the attorneys. "You must be Northpaw's lawyers!" he called.

"Indeed we are," Kristoph replied, smiling in the direction of the somewhat baffled looking retriever in the enclosure. "Did you have some information for us?"

The man grimaced and shook his head. "Sorry," he said. "I wasn't in yesterday. Don't have a keycard, anyway."

Apollo frowned in thought, then gave the man a smile. "Are you Crow?" he asked.

"That's me!" Crow replied, grinning at Apollo. "And you must be Northpaw's brother?"

"Yep!" The young attorney crossed his arms proudly. "I guess Mister Duck told you who we were?"

Crow shrugged, still grinning. "Well, he told me Northpaw's lawyers were around. As for the brother thing," he paused to giggle, "I actually heard you shouting at Fox earlier."

At that, Apollo's pride instantly vanished, and he looked away as his face flushed red. "Oh..."

"Good luck, though," Crow continued, giving the pair a serious look. "I don't think any of us believed for a second Northpaw killed Mister Pound. None of us could do that."

"I'm sorry to point out the obvious," Kristoph replied, "but one of you must have. There's nowhere for a customer to have hidden away, and it must have been someone he knew for Pound to have opened the door to them." Crow seemed unconvinced, but before he could object, Kristoph had continued down the corridor to an alcove identical to the one in the neighbouring corridor. "Come along, Wright."

Apollo looked between Crow and Kristoph for a few moments, then made a decision. "I'll catch up in a minute," he called to his mentor.

Kristoph paused in surprise, looking back at the young man. "Are you sure?" Apollo nodded with a determined look, so Kristoph shrugged in acceptance. "When you're ready, then." A moment later, he had left the room.

Crow stared at Apollo with a confused look. "What is it?"

"I just wanted to check something," Apollo explained, pressing a finger to his forehead in thought. "My dad's always saying to think outside the norm on this kind of thing, so... is it possible a customer hid away somewhere? There were a lot of people here that day."

"Sorry, not really," Crow replied, seeming slightly disappointed. "It's evening routine: Lock the front door, dim all the lights, check the grooming area, the open storeroom, and the bathroom for 'stowaways', then knock on Mister Pound's door and let him know you're leaving." He shrugged. "Then, y'know, leave."

Apollo thought for a few more moments. "Just those rooms?"
"They're the only ones you can access without a keycard," Crow pointed out with a smile. "Oh, and you have to make sure to peek in the dog and cat enclosures to check they're empty, too. Of people, I mean."

'And only select employees have a keycard, bringing us back to Luke,' Apollo thought with a frown. "So, Ms Simba would have done that on the night of the murder?"

Crow nodded. "It only takes about five minutes," he said.

Apollo blinked, then stared at Crow with wide eyes, the image of the broken clock sticking in his mind. "Exactly five minutes?"

The other man seemed surprised at Apollo's sudden intensity, though he shrugged, looking back at the young man with a confused frown. "Probably less. Depends on the day, I s'pose."

'And our receptionist Ms Gatti was starting that process at six, putting her on the list of potential culprits!' Apollo almost cheered in triumph, but restrained himself in front of the wary Crow. More calmly, he continued, "So, just to check, there's no way someone with a keycard could have hidden someone else away in a locked room, either?"

Crow had to think for a few moments. "I... think that's possible, actually," he admitted. "Like, if they were in the storeroom, and no-one else came in. Even on the weekends, there's too much activity in the vet area for someone to hide for long."

Restraining another triumphant cheer, Apollo pulled out his Court Record and checked the digital copy he had made of the keycard records... only to pause as he found the name attached to the mid-morning visit to the storeroom, the last person to go in before the murder: 'Pound P'. "Oh. I think Mister Pound is unlikely to have planned his own violent, painful death... and there's nowhere to hide in that storeroom, so..." "I guess there's no way at all it was anyone but an employee," he quietly admitted.

Crow sighed, looking away with a sad frown. After a pause, he began to mutter, "I've always thought of us as a family. We have special names for each other, we bicker and fight, but through it all we were always united by our love and care for the dogs and cats here." He looked around at the dogs surrounding them. "How could someone... anyone... break that? Just... come in and murder our father figure, then slip back into the crowd like nothing happened! We're just supposed to point fingers at our brothers and sisters until, if, the real culprit is found?"

Apollo wasn't sure how to react to Crow's rant, standing in silence for several seconds and staring uncomfortably at the tablet computer in his hands. "I'm sorry," he whispered.

"S'not your fault," Crow sighed, crossing his arms and still avoiding Apollo's gaze. After another pause, he added, "Say hi to Northpaw for me." With that, he pushed past Apollo and left the hallway.

Making any progress?

Some. Two other possible suspects but they aren't around to talk to. I still say everything they have on Luke is circumstantial.
That sounds pretty usual for a murder investigation unfortunately

I got back Luke’s phone at least.

I’ll let him know

Did you find anything interesting?

Your Uncle Edgeworth thinks the prosecutor is a trustworthy guy. Both he and Gumshoe also say the detective has his heart in the right place

We’ve met the detective. He wasn’t too keen on helping out. Don’t think we’ll see the prosecutor until court tho.

Thanks anyway Dad.

Np. Good luck :)

When Apollo caught up to his mentor, he elected to quietly join the casual examination of the large room, set up with baths, various high tables and a handful of cages all ready to keep the resident animals clean. Kristoph eyed the young attorney curiously, then cleared his throat to attract Apollo's attention. "Is something the matter, Wright?"

Apollo sighed. "I thought I had a lead, but..." He shook his head. "It doesn't matter. I wasn't expecting it to go anywhere, not until we can question the other people who were here last night."

"That is true," Kristoph agreed, solemnly pushing at his glasses. "Although we still have the veterinarians' rooms to investigate, I doubt we will be finding anything more useful here today. Wildgrube and Gatti are the keys, and the prosecution will have likely sent them home."

An idea popping into his head, Apollo tapped his forehead, thinking it over before bringing it up. "So, maybe we could find them, then? Look up their addresses?"

Kristoph smiled, the closest to a laugh Apollo had ever seen him get. "You are certainly welcome to try," he agreed.

Apollo grinned, beginning to regain his confidence. "Yeah!" he cried. "Once we get back to the office, I'll look up where they live and we can go pay 'em a visit!" He slammed a fist into his other hand. "And once we've talked to 'em a little, we'll know who did it and nail 'em in court! This'll be easy!"

Kristoph's smile faded. "I wouldn't get your hopes up, Wright. Proving your brother innocent is still going to be a monumental task, even if we do manage to talk to our missing witnesses."

"What do you mean, sir?" Apollo asked, frowning in confusion.

"It's all about evidence," Kristoph explained, arms crossed. "What the prosecution has, or at least what we know they have, is mostly circumstantial, true, but the judge will still side with them unless we have the evidence to prove it wasn't Luke who killed Pound. Evidence is everything in court."

Apollo stared for a moment, frowning. "But... that's not fair!" he objected. "It wasn't Luke!"

"Court isn't fair," Kristoph replied, frowning in disapproval of the younger attorney's childish outburst, "and I'm sorry to burst your bubble if you honestly believed it was. Surely you've heard the general public's opinion on the state of the law around here in recent years?"

"Y-yeah," Apollo mumbled, looking away as he tightly crossed his arms. "Everyone says we're in a 'Dark Age of the Law'."

Kristoph sighed. "As much as I detest the over-dramatic term," he continued, his gaze softening, "it has an element of truth to it. Over the past five years, there has been a substantial increase in dirty tricks and underhand deals throughout the entire system." He shook his head. "Nothing provable of course, but the general air in court seems to be that the prosecution will do anything to win, and, sadly, so will a fair number of attorneys."

Apollo thought a moment, piecing together his mentor's view with the bits and pieces he'd heard from his father and Uncle Edgeworth over the years. "So... what can we do?" he asked.

"Our best," Kristoph replied. "As I said, evidence is everything in court. We need to evaluate what we have and piece together the proof that will absolve your brother of suspicion." He gave Apollo a stern stare. "The judge will accept nothing less than definitive proof from incontrovertible evidence."

"O-okay," Apollo said, a little dazed from the sudden harsh lesson on how court had changed for the worse since his father's day. "The testimonies don't matter?"

"They will be swayed to the prosecution's side," Kristoph explained. "They only call witnesses who agree with them, after all." He frowned darkly. "It's also not unusual for them to make deals. We cannot rely on witnesses, Wright."

Apollo didn't reply, starting to feel drained. They really did have a slog of work to get through before they were ready for court, and it was looking less likely now than ever that they'd be able to free Luke on Monday.

Kristoph paused a moment, then briefly patted a hand on Apollo's shoulder and walked off to the door. "Come along, Wright. Let's examine the veterinarians' rooms and we can return to the office."

November 29, 6:12PM
Apollo and Clay's Apartment
Living Room

Apollo hung his head as he carefully closed the front door of his apartment behind him. 'And new to the list of 'days I never want to have to think about again ever'...' He sighed as he automatically locked the door behind him, shoving his hands in his pockets as he moped towards his room.

A head appeared out of another of the doorways nearby, grinning. "You're back! How'd it go?"

"Not now, Clay," Apollo mumbled, turning towards his bedroom.

"What's that supposed to mean?" Clay called in reply, but Apollo was ignoring him, falling back-first onto his bed and staring at the ceiling. "Dude?" After a moment, Clay appeared in Apollo's doorway, watching his friend with concern. "What happened?" he quietly asked. "You were so excited this morning."

Apollo sighed, running a hand along his face. "A lot happened today," he explained. "Our case is hopeless, the entire police department and prosecutor's office is apparently out to get us, and, worst of all, my brother is going to jail."

Clay's eyes widened as he shouted, "What!?" He shook his head, laughing uncomfortably. "I think I misheard you there! Did you say something about Luke going to jail!?"

Apollo only nodded, his blank gaze still locked to the ceiling.

"You can't just leave it at that!" Clay protested, stomping into Apollo's room and standing over his bed, hands on his hips as he gave his friend a stern glare. "What's going on!? Why is Luke in jail!?"
"He's not in jail," Apollo quietly explained, turning his head away to stare at the wall. "Not yet. He's been accused of murder, but it doesn't look like Mister Gavin will be able to help him."

Clay stared at Apollo in disbelief for a moment before his gaze turned fierce, and he grabbed his friend's arm, pulling him off the bed. "Hey!" Apollo objected as he was dragged to his feet. "What's the big deal!?"

"Come on!" Clay ordered, tightly gripping Apollo's right wrist as he pulled his friend out into the living room. "You are in desperate need of an emergency training session, buddy!"

Apollo groaned as he realised what his friend was doing. "Clay, I don't need-"

"No excuses!" Clay insisted, throwing his friend somewhere in the vicinity of their small TV and standing so he blocked any kind of escape into the hall or kitchen. Feet held apart, he clenched his fists and gave Apollo a stern stare. "Position, dude!" he ordered.

Rolling his eyes, Apollo lazily separated his feet a little, then shrugged at Clay with a raised eyebrow, as if to say 'good enough for you?'.

Clay seemed annoyed, but decided to let it go. "Me first!" he said, then pointed his head upwards and shouted at the top of his lungs, "I'M CLAY TERRAN AND I'M FINE!"

Apollo sighed, staring at the floor. "I'm..." he muttered.

"C'mon!" Clay ordered, giving his friend a confident grin. "Top of your lungs, Apollo!"

"I'm," Apollo started again, a little louder, then screwed up his face, clenched his fists, and shouted, "I'M APOLLO WRIGHT AND I'M FINE!"

"YOU'RE FINE!" Clay added, throwing his fists into the air in triumph.

"I'M FINE!" Apollo repeated, beginning to smile as his confidence and energy slowly returned.

There was a rapid knocking from the ceiling above, and a muffled voice screeched, "COULD APOLLO WRIGHT AND CLAY TERRAN BE FINE IN SILENCE!?"

The two young men grinned sheepishly at each other, then fell about laughing, dropping onto the sofa at each other's side. Once their laughter died down, Clay looked to Apollo with a bright, though solemn, smile. "So, what happened today?"

Apollo sighed, though, this time, he found he had the energy to answer Clay's question.

It took a long time, and Apollo frequently had to pause to gather his thoughts, but slowly he explained to Clay how he had met Kristoph and Luke at the detention centre, of how he and Kristoph had ventured to the animal shelter and met all the colourful characters there, of what little and vague evidence they had found, and of Kristoph's harsh but true speech on the realities of the trial ahead.

"When we got back to the office," Apollo told his friend, "I thought I'd be able to find this receptionist and vet easy, but apparently not! I spent all afternoon looking, and Mister Gavin had to send me home because I couldn't find hide nor hair of 'em!" He groaned in frustration, burying his face in his hands.

Clay hid a smirk, patting Apollo's shoulder sympathetically. "Well, think about it, dude: Not many people nowadays like any old random person being able to look up their address just like that."

"But 'Gatti' and 'Wildgrube' are such uncommon names!" Apollo cried, only to sigh as he let the subject go, falling against the back of the couch. "At least Mister Gavin said he's making progress on the argument we're gonna use in court."

"That's good," Clay pointed out with a smile. "So rescuing Luke's not so hopeless after all, huh?"

Apollo just shrugged. "I dunno... Mister Gavin told me not to go in tomorrow. Just take the day off and prepare for Monday."

Clay thought for a few moments, nodding absently. "So, if you're not doing anything tomorrow, and I'm not doing anything tomorrow, and Luke's not doing anything tomorrow-

"Luke's busy being stuck in the detention center," Apollo interrupted, shooting his friend a glare.

"I know, I know!" Clay hurriedly replied, rolling his eyes. "I was gonna suggest we go visit him, you dweeb!"

Apollo blinked in surprise. "Oh." After a pause, he smiled and agreed, "Why not? Let's do that."

Hey! How was Black Fur Friday? :P

Luke? You there?

Ok guess you slept in. Reply when you see this huh? :)

What's going on over there? You don't usually take an entire day to reply. :(

You there yet Luke?

Hi Athena, this is Apollo. Luke's gonna be away from his phone for a few days but I'll let him know you've been texting him.

Apollo! Hello! :D What happened? Why do you have Luke's phone?

It's complicated. Short version is they frown on detention center inmates having their cells with them.

Wait what!?

He's fine I promise. Mr Gavin and I are defending him in court tomorrow.

Phew! He must be pretty relieved to know a talented defence attorney huh? :)

Flattery will get you everywhere Ms Cykes ;) We're doing our best but Mr Gavin is doing the bulk of the work.

Good luck anyway Apollo! I know you can do it! What's he been accused of?

Thanks Athena :) Murder unfortunately, but I think we have just enough evidence to clear him.

:O Sounds nasty! Tell Luke good luck and I'll talk to him once he's out!

Will do.

November 30, 9:19AM
Detention Center
Visitor's Room

"Did you tell her I'm okay?" Luke asked from behind the glass, a worried tone to his voice as his clutched at the edges of his work labcoat.

"Of course I did," Apollo assured his brother with a smile, sitting in one of the two chairs on the visiting side of the room. "Like I said, she wished you good luck and said she'll talk to you once you're out."

As Luke sighed in relief, Clay laughed, relaxing in the chair next to Apollo. "See? Even a girl who barely knows Apollo knows he'll get you out of here, dude!"
Luke giggled, though his brow remained creased with worry. "And she's training to be a lawyer herself!" he added. "You might get to meet her in a year or two!"

"Dad and Trucy came by yesterday, right?" Apollo asked, noting the new addition of Luke's hat since the previous morning.

Nodding, Luke tapped the brim of his cap with a smile. "Yep!" he said. "Brought me my hat, a deck of cards to entertain myself back in my cell... Tried to sit with me all day, but the guards always kicked them out after an hour or two."

Clay laughed, while Apollo just grinned, saying, "I'll bet that didn't put them off, though!"

Luke shook his head, giggling. "They came back later, of course," he agreed. "The guards kicked them out again another hour or two later!"

The three friends laughed together for a few moments as, behind Luke, the door softly opened and the guard on duty switched with his replacement, waiting outside.

"How's the investigation going?" Luke asked, giving Apollo a bright smile, his spirits lifted by the assurances of his friends. "Were you able to find much back at the shelter?"

Apollo's smile quickly faded, though he tried to force a cheerful attitude. "Oh, yeah, sure. The detective let us look at the crime scene, so there was a lot of useful information there, and we spoke to Duck, Fox and Crow too."

"Are they okay?" Luke asked, looking worried again.

"They're fine," Apollo promised, managing a small smile, "though naturally they're upset by Mister Pound's death. I'm sure they'll be okay, though."

Luke nodded in agreement.

"I bet they'll feel much better once you and Mister Gavin find the culprit, huh?" Clay pointed out, elbowing Apollo with a grin.

"If we find the culprit," Apollo shot back with a glare. "I'll settle just for proving it wasn't Luke. Maybe then the police will do their job and arrest someone on more than circumstantial evidence."

Apollo hadn't meant his impassioned statement as a dig at the guard on duty, so was surprised and ashamed when the man suddenly spoke up in response: "It's more than circumstantial already, actually."

The three looked up to the young man, Luke spinning in his seat, and quickly registered a familiar face below the police cap, hidden by a wave of black hair. Clay was the first to gasp in recognition.

"Ernest Holmes, is that you!?"

Ernest gave the trio a nervous smile and a small wave. "Hi," he quietly replied. "I guess you remember me?"

Luke gave him a friendly smile. "How could we not?" he said. "We were classmates for-!" He paused, frowning in thought. "Three years?"

"More like five or six for us!" Apollo added, shooting a smile to Clay. "You're on your way to becoming a detective, Ernest!"
Ernest blushed, scratching at an ear sheepishly. "A bit, yeah," he admitted. "Just a regular officer at the mo'."

"Hey, that's great!" Luke replied, giving their old friend an encouraging smile. "You can practise your deductive skills, and you'll be going up the ranks in no time at all!"

The young policeman gave Luke a strange look. "You're about to be given a death sentence!" he cried. "How are you being so cheerful?"

"Yeah!" Apollo cried, crossing his arms and shooting a glare at Ernest. "All your evidence is circumstantial at best, and we're gonna clear Luke's name in court tomorrow!"

Ernest winced a little, looking incredibly guilty as he shot wary glances at the doors on either end of the room. "I really shouldn't be talking to you guys at all," he admitted, stepping forward to Luke's side and addressing the Wright brothers, specifically Luke, with a solemn glare, "but I was assigned to help Prosecutor Debeste yesterday and there's more than just evidence implicating you."

Luke's eyes widened for a moment, then narrowed suspiciously, and Apollo instantly recognised the signs of his brother beginning to lose his temper. "You're lying."

"I'm not!" Ernest insisted with an angry frown.

As Luke opened his mouth to respond, looking likely to jump out of his seat and shout in the young policeman's face, Apollo slammed his fists into the counter in front of him, shooting to his feet and staring his younger brother down. "Luke, calm down! At least hear him out!"

"There's nothing to hear!" Luke protested, waving a hand at Ernest with a frustrated air. "If they don't have evidence, that means they have testimony, and that means he's claiming someone at the shelter is lying to say I did it!" He stood up, glaring right back at Apollo and managing to look fierce with his superior height. "None of us would ever do that, just like none of us would have killed Mister Pound!"

"Well, I hate to have to break it to you, Luke," Apollo shot back, "but someone did! Either Simba or Reindeer murdered him and is blaming it on you, and you have to face reality on this!"

Luke's face was starting to turn red as he leaned on the counter opposite his brother. "But neither of them has any reason to kill him!"

"And how do you know that!?" Apollo pointed out. "You can't read minds! You aren't privy to the private relationships your boss had with either of them!"

"I-!" Luke started to protest, only to halt as his glare turned into a grimace, his face down-turned as he fought tears. "But... they wouldn't!"

Clay also got to his feet, placing a hand on the glass as he worried for his friend. "Luke, everything's going to be okay," he said.

"No it's not!" Luke replied, quiet tears starting to drip down his cheeks. "I might be locked up and killed for a crime I didn't commit, and even if I'm not, Simba or Reindeer will! It's bad enough losing Mister Pound... I can't accept that it was one of us!"

Clay pressed his hand tighter to the glass. "Don't you worry, dude," he assured his friend. "Apollo and Mister Gavin'll find out what really happened." Apollo stayed silent, knowing that trying to reiterate Simba or Reindeer's guilt would only upset his brother further.

Ernest, who had taken a few uncomfortable steps back when the brothers started shouting at each other, sighed, one hand rubbing his other arm nervously. "I... I'm sorry, I shouldn't have said anything..."

"No, you shouldn't," Apollo agreed, raising an unamused eyebrow in the young policeman's direction. "You've always been pretty terrible at keeping your mouth shut though, so I'm not surprised."

The statement seemed to surprise Ernest, who looked between the trio with his mouth hanging open. "W-what do you mean?"

Luke sank back down into his seat, and Clay, still concerned for his friend, mirrored him. "You don't remember?" the young vet asked, still staring downwards as he clutched his hands together in his lap. "I'd just lost my parents in a car crash when we first met. You jumped me and made some proud speech about how it was 'so obvious' I'd injured myself in some grand falling out with them and was sent to Turner's as a punishment."

Ernest looked horrified. "I-I said that...?"

"But hey!" Clay interjected, trying to look cheerful. "If 'Pollo and I hadn't had to save you from Ernest, we might never have become friends, huh? And you two," he waved a hand between Luke and Apollo, the latter of which was standing by his chair with his arms tightly crossed, "wouldn't have been adopted together and become brothers! Everything turned out okay in the end!"

Neither of the brothers visibly reacted to Clay's short speech, Luke still staring at his lap and Apollo at the wall, both seemingly deep in thought. Ernest simply looked guilty, and, after a very long moment of silence, sighed again, shaking his head. "Look, I really really shouldn't be doing this," he said, "but I wanna help you guys. You... probably deserve it for putting up with me when I was being an idiot kid."

"Everyone's an idiot kid at some point," Apollo quietly replied, waiting until he had finished talking to turn to Ernest and give their old classmate a small smile. "Any help would be appreciated, though. Thank you."

Ernest momentarily blushed, then put on a determined expression and stood by the glass, close to Apollo. "Okay, first of all, right at the end of the day we had a new piece of evidence handed in: A passer-by found a labcoat with massive bloodstains on it just flying around in the wind not far from the crime scene, and we matched it as from the shelter with the victim's blood."

Apollo frowned, tapping his forehead in thought. "A blood-stained labcoat...?" he repeated. "Was there anything else forensics picked up?"

Ernest shook his head. "It had been washed, apparently," he explained. "Whoever it was hadn't got all the blood off it, so they just dumped it. Got everything incriminating, though."

Apollo nodded. "Anything else?"

"No more evidence," Ernest replied. "Though if either of the witnesses was lying, I'd put my money on the old man, with the way he had us running around in circles all day."

"What do you mean?" Clay asked Ernest curiously.

The policeman sighed, looking frustrated already. "What didn't he do?" he said. "It was like some terrible comedy sketch! First he was claiming to not be him, then he insisted he hadn't been working the day of the crime, then he claimed he'd gone straight home... We had to keep proving he was lying to get him to finally admit he'd been there at the time of murder! The bastard never stopped smiling at us!" He groaned, shaking his head. "Even Prosecutor Debeste looked about ready to hang the guy by the end of the day!"

Luke giggled, and it felt like his amusement despite his situation was giving his friends permission to also smile at the humour of the story. "Reindeer loves being difficult," he explained. "Especially with people he doesn't know."

"What about the other one?" Apollo asked Ernest. "The receptionist, Ms Gatti?"

The dark-haired young man had to think for a moment. "She was very co-operative," he eventually said, "though she did seem very uninterested in the whole thing. You'd almost think she had no idea it was a murder investigation."

"That's Simba," Luke explained, finally looking up at his friends with a smile on his tear-stained face. "She acts all distant and aloof, but you should see her with the animals; She has a heart of gold."

Clay frowned in thought. "So, are both of them being called as witnesses in court tomorrow?"

"As far as I know," Ernest admitted with a shrug.

"Cool!" Clay replied, grinning. "I'll finally get to meet some of Luke's work friends!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow at his friend, smirking in amusement. "You mean you're actually coming to watch the trial?" he asked. "I thought you hated court!"

Clay playfully scoffed, crossing his arms. "C'mon dude, I'm not gonna miss seeing you prove Luke didn't do it!"

"I'm not proving it, Mister Gavin is!" Apollo corrected his friend with a smile. "I'm just helping!" He turned to Ernest. "What about Prosecutor Debeste? I've been told he's 'trustworthy', but that's all I know about him."

"Aw, Prosecutor Debeste is a great guy!" Ernest immediately boasted. "He asked a few of us newer guys to go around with him, and was always asking us our opinions and thoughts!" He paused to laugh. "He said finding the truth is a group effort, so he wanted everyone to pull their weight and not be afraid to contradict him if we disagreed! He's the best!" Ernest suddenly paused, looking embarrassed. "Oh, but, don't say that to his face. I think I really upset him doing that."

Clay seemed amused. "Man, he must've been teased about his name a lot growing up!"

"I've only met him the twice, but he does seem like a good-hearted prosecutor," Luke agreed, ignoring Clay as he gave Ernest a smile. "It's all I can ask for that he be more interested in finding the truth than just convicting me."

Ernest grinned proudly.

"That is a rarity nowadays!" Clay laughed. "If you believe the media, of course!"
"And there's no reason to," Apollo insisted with a glare, noting out the corner of his eyes that Ernest also looked annoyed at the implication on his profession. "We'll have a fair trial tomorrow, find the true culprit, and Luke can go back home. I won't let it happen any other way."

Kristoph looked up from his quiet re-reading of the case-file with a small smile. "I'm impressed," he told the young man sitting at his side.

Apollo almost jumped in fright, looking up at his mentor. "Sir?"

"Before a trial, most attorneys are busy relieving tension," Kristoph explained, "especially so early in their careers."

Apollo laughed, rubbing the back of his head sheepishly. "Eh, I can handle stage fright," he explained, looking away as his smile faded. "It's disappointing Luke that's worrying me more. Plus, I didn't want to distract you by doing the Chords of Steel routine right here and now... Clay and I did enough of that before I left home this morning."

Kristoph chuckled to himself. "You needn't worry," he assured the young man. "I have everything in hand." When Apollo only nodded in response, the elder attorney thought a moment, then closed his case-file. "Would you like me to prove it to you?"

"N-no, that's okay, sir," Apollo insisted, giving Kristoph a sheepish smile. "Just... we don't know what to expect from the witness testimonies, so..."

"We will need to think on our feet, I admit," Kristoph said, "but this won't be the first time I've had to do so. I've faced unscrupulous prosecutors before."

Apollo wasn't sure if that description applied to the supposedly 'trustworthy' Debeste, but wasn't about to passionately defend someone he'd never met to his mentor.

The doors of the lobby opened, and in walked two bailiffs, escorting between them a tired-looking Luke, still wearing his labcoat from the night he'd been arrested. As Apollo got to his feet to greet his brother, the bailiffs closed the doors behind them, released Luke, then stood guard either side of the lone exit.

Apollo barely restrained himself from running to check his younger brother was okay, instead merely stepping towards him with a worried look on his face. "You alright, Luke?" he asked.

Taking a few steps forward to meet his brother halfway, Luke nodded, forcing a reassuring smile. "I'm fine," he insisted. "It's... been a while since I was last in a trial, but I'll be alright once it's started. I know what to expect... sort of."

Replacing his case-file in his satchel, Kristoph got to his feet, approaching the brothers with a smile. "Good morning, Luke," he greeted the taller of the pair, hands clasped behind his back. "I assure you, there's no need to worry. Your brother and I have this case well in hand."

"Y-yeah!" Apollo added, forcing a cheerful grin and rushing to stand at Luke's side, a hand gripping his shoulder tightly. "Remember what Ernest said yesterday? We got this in the bag!"
Luke relaxed a little, nodding at Apollo with a grateful smile.

There was a knock at the door, and one of the bailiffs opened it, letting in Phoenix, Trucy and Clay. Trucy ran straight to Luke, clinging tightly to his side as Apollo stepped out of her way with an unsurprised smile. "You're gonna be okay!" the teenage girl cried, face screwed up tightly as she pressed it to his shoulder, and it was obvious she was trying to convince herself more than Luke. "I know you will be!"

Luke nodded, moving to hug his little sister. "Of course I will," he replied, seeming a lot calmer now there was someone more upset than him to comfort.

"Right!" Clay added with a confident grin, slapping Apollo's shoulder and almost knocking the lawyer aside, to Apollo's annoyance. "'Pollo here is gonna wipe the floor with this case!"

"For the last time, I am not!" Apollo objected, pushing his friend off with a glare. "I'm just assisting Mister Gavin!"

Phoenix laughed as he joined his children, and Kristoph seemed equally amused. "Maybe a less colourful metaphor would be a more accurate description," Kristoph said, crossing his arms and giving Clay a friendly smile. "I assume you are a friend of Apollo's?"

"This is Clay Terran, Apollo and Luke's friend," Phoenix explained, gesturing to the young man, who waved happily at Kristoph. "Clay, I believe Apollo has told you all about Kristoph here?"

"Yep!" Clay replied, nodding eagerly as he draped an arm over Apollo's shoulder, to his friend's annoyance. "Nice to meet you, Mister Gavin!"

"A pleasure," Kristoph replied, pushing at his glasses.

"The three of us just dropped by to wish you three luck before the trial," Phoenix explained, looking solemnly between the two lawyers and Luke. "We're going to be in the gallery cheering for you."

Apollo's eyes widened in fear as an idea occurred to him. "I hope you don't mean literally."

Phoenix laughed. "No, don't worry," he promised with a grin. "We'll be quiet."

Although his father's grin did nothing to diminish Apollo's worry, he decided to accept that answer, crossing his arms with a frown.

"We'll be here to bring you home once they let you off, Luke!" Clay added, giving his friend a thumbs-up.

Luke giggled, hugging his sister tighter in appreciation. "Don't you worry, I'll be back home tonight. Apollo and Mister Gavin will make sure of it," he looked up at them with an expectant smile, "won't you?"

"Of course!" Apollo cried, clenching his fists with determination. "We'll be doing our best out there, right Mister Gavin?"

Kristoph nodded. "Naturally," he calmly replied.

"Then we'd better head to the courtroom if we want good seats," Phoenix announced, waving towards the door and giving significant looks to Clay and Trucy.

Clay obediently nodded, finally leaving Apollo alone and heading to the door, waving to his friends. "See you guys later!" he called.

Trucy gave Luke one last hug, then let go and wordlessly ran to join Clay, staying silent and avoiding her brothers' gazes. The door creaked as it closed behind them, one of the bailiffs ensuring it latched behind the pair.

Before joining them, Phoenix gave Luke a worried look. "You'll be okay?" he asked. "Keep in mind, the courtroom here is, in theory, much nicer than Labyrinthia's, but it's always a lot worse for the defendant than a witness."

"I'll be fine, Papa," Luke promised, managing to show him a small smile. "After all, Maya's survived both just fine. If she can do it, I can do it."

Phoenix seemed unconvinced for a moment, then fixed Luke with a sad smile, pulling him into a hug. "You bet," he replied, letting his younger son go with a fond look. "We'll be waiting once it's all over," he assured both his sons, glancing between them before turning to leave.

Apollo and Luke only quietly watched as the door closed behind Phoenix, then turned to each other with encouraging, though worried, looks. Kristoph closed his eyes, pushing at his glasses with an unreadable expression on his face.

December 1, 10:00AM
District Court
Courtroom No. 7

As he walked to the defence bench behind his mentor, Apollo looked around at the slowly filling stands in which the crowds had gathered to watch today's trial. It was a little disconcerting being able to see every individual so clearly, Apollo being more used to having his audience obscured behind a row of stage lights, but he was sure that, once the trial got started, he'd be able to focus and entertain the gallery with his performance. 'Perhaps 'entertain' is the wrong word, though. And 'performance'. Just... gotta focus on saving Luke. That's the important thing.'

Kristoph idly laid out his case-file and physical evidence on the desk before them, then pulled out his Court Record tablet computer. After a few moments of digging, he located a cord hidden underneath a small panel, and plugged in the device, giving Apollo a wry look as he explained, "I will have to replace this before long. They prefer us to go wireless these days."

Apollo nodded. "We could have used mine," he suggested. "It's configured for that."

"It doesn't matter," Kristoph replied, laying the tablet down where he could see an overview of their digital list of evidence.

A loud rapping of a gavel silenced the hubbub of the courtroom, and Apollo looked up to his right, where the tall podium at the head of the room stood, at its top a bald man with a magnificent white beard, black robes adorning what little of his body was visible underneath. "This court is now in session," the old man announced to the now-quiet room.

"The prosecution is ready, Your Honour," came a voice from the other side of the room, and Apollo almost jumped as he noticed the young man, only a few years older than him, standing at the prosecutor's bench.

The prosecutor's hair, a caramel brown, seemed to wave out around his head like a mushroom, except for one strand that stuck up in a curve almost like a question mark. His clothes Apollo found vaguely reminiscent of Edgeworth in style, with a blue-black, frilly dress shirt, over which was draped a crimson blazer. Matching the shirt was a long scarf, wrapped around the man's neck and pinned together at the front with what Apollo quickly recognised was a prosecutor's badge. 'Don't see those on display often.' The final additions to the man's outfit were a pair of simple white gloves, and he idly tapped an extendible baton against the palm of one hand.

"The defence is ready, Your Honour," Kristoph announced, pulling Apollo out of his thoughts.

The judge nodded. "Your opening statement, Prosecutor Debeste?"

Debeste slammed his hand against the end of the baton, closing it. "Of course, Your Honour."
Placing the baton down, he waved to the courtroom doors, where a pair of bailiffs were escorting in Luke, leading him to the witness stand. Apollo met his brother's eyes only briefly, before Luke solemnly turned his attention to the prosecutor. "Our victim was one Phelan Pound, aged thirty-three," Debeste explained, "the owner and manager of a small animal shelter on Warren Street."

"Ah, I do so love animals!" the judge mused to himself with a smile.

Apollo raised an eyebrow.

"He was found dead on the floor of his office late Friday night," Debeste continued, brushing off the judge's comment. "The only other worker in the building at the time, which we will prove today, was our defendant, Doctor Luke Wright, the only possible culprit of this crime." He gestured to the witness stand, and Luke almost flinched away from the attention.

"A doctor?" the judge replied with surprise, and turned to Luke. "What is a doctor doing in an animal shelter? Don't you have patients to see?"

At that, Apollo noticed Debeste seemed to give the smallest sigh. "Not that kind of doctor, Your Honour," he replied, eyes closed.

"I-I'm not a doctor of medicine," Luke began to explain, holding up a finger before catching himself and adding, "w-well, I am a doctor of medicine, but of animal medicine, specifically cats and dogs, not of human medicine." He coughed awkwardly, staring at the floor.

"Ah, a veterinarian!" the judge asked, smiling as he understood. "I didn't think those became doctors!"

"Generally they don't." Debeste admitted, looking mildly frustrated. "The defendant, however, trained in Europe, and they do become doctors there."

"I see, I see!" the judge cheerfully replied, nodding.

Apollo found himself sympathising with Debeste as the other man hid a brief facepalm behind the motion of brushing hair out of his eyes. "Cause of death was blunt-force trauma," he continued, "but I'll leave it to the detective to fully explain."

The judge nodded thoughtfully, looking solemn as they returned to business. "Then you wish to call your first witness?"
"I do," Debeste replied, snatching his baton and extending it again, pointing it with a snap of his arm to the courtroom doors. "The prosecution calls Detective Fulbright to the stand!"

View the Court Record
Fulbright saluted the judge proudly as he arrived at the witness stand, Luke having been escorted to a side room on the defence's side by the bailiffs. "In justice we trust!” he cried.

"Name and occupation please, witness,” Debeste requested, having returned to idly tapping his baton against his other hand.

Fulbright laughed. "Naturally, I'm the detective assigned to this case!” he announced, pulling out his ID from the holster under his arm with a grin. "Bobby Fulbright, at your service, sirs! Champion of justice and defender of the peace!"

"Thank you, detective," the judge said with a nod. "Would you give the court your testimony, please?"

Slipping his ID back into the holster, Fulbright grinned proudly. "I would be honoured to, Your Honour!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, wondering if the pun was deliberate. He heard Kristoph softly sighing at his side and guessed his mentor was thinking the same.

"The victim was last seen alive by a small group of his employees at six PM on Friday evening," Fulbright explained. "Two of them left the building at that time, while another left a few minutes later, leaving only the victim and defendant in the building. The defendant himself reported the murder at six forty-five, probably hoping to divert suspicion from him!” He laughed.

"Objection,” Kristoph calmly called, hands clasped behind his back. "Would the prosecution please refrain from putting words in the defendant's mouth? It's just as, if not more, likely he called out of a duty to report the murder, not to divert suspicion."

Fulbright seemed like he was about to shoot back a response, but Debeste nodded in agreement. "Of course; This testimony should be bare facts only, Detective Fulbright.” He waved his baton at the witness stand with a piercing look. "Or would you like me to reflect your error of judgement in the next review of your salary?"

The detective pushed at his sunglasses, apparently choosing to bite his lip rather than reply. After a moment, he cleared his throat and continued, "The victim suffered multiple blows to his head and upper body, as reviewed in the autopsy report." He held up a small document identical to the copy he had given the defence team on Saturday, which a bailiff grabbed to rush up to the judge. "The primary murder weapon was found in the grass outside the shelter building, below the bathroom window. It had been cleaned of fingerprints and all but a few traces of blood, but it did still have hair fragments of a colour that matched the victim's."

"Specifically," Debeste spoke up reaching under his desk, "this baseball bat.” He held up a plain wooden bat for the court to see, and Apollo held back a gasp as he noticed one side of the business end looked rather battered, splintering a little from the aftermath of a powerful hit.
The judge seemed a little horrified himself, eyes widening at the sight of the newly-submitted evidence. "Goodness! The victim must have had a hard head!"

"I don't think that damage was from the murder, Your Honour," Kristoph spoke up, thoughtfully pushing on his glasses.

"It wasn't," Debeste confirmed, giving the attorney opposite a relieved smile. "We believe this damage to be pre-existing; Employees confirmed this was one of the victim's possessions that he kept on display in his office, which I will remind the court was our crime scene." Placing the bat down on his bench, he flicked at a tablet resting nearby.

The holograms of the courtroom sprung to life, four blue-tinted screens around the central aisle of the court: One in front of the judge, a small window especially for him; Twin medium-sized screens flickered into being in front of the opposing prosecutor and defence benches, large enough for the sections of the gallery behind them to see; And, lastly, one massive screen high in the air above the witness stand, where the largest part of the gallery either side of the entrance doors could see. Apollo couldn't help a grin as he turned his attention to the defence team's window, excited to finally be seeing the technology that had amazed him as a child so close. 'Huh, is that a map of the shelter?'

Fulbright pointed to the massive map above him, not so different from Apollo's own. "As you can see," he explained, "this office at the back was the crime scene. The bathroom is just down the hall, where the murderer cleaned and disposed of the weapon."

"And what are these tiny key symbols?" the judge asked, peering at his small screen as he ran his fingers through his beard curiously. "Did the victim drop his keys there?"

"No, Your Honour," Fulbright replied, giving the old man a grin. "Those doors are special! They automatically lock when they are closed, and require an employee keycard to open!"
"Ah!" the judge cried, smiling to himself. "Of course!"

"But only on one side," Debeste picked up. "You need a card to go in, but the doors will always remain open for you going the other way." He tapped at his screen, and the front door and two back doors were all circled by flashing red rings. "These doors are unlocked for customers during the day, but are locked at night. They had been specifically locked shortly before the murder, so no-one without a keycard could have entered the building."

Fulbright laughed. "And every time those doors are opened, it's logged into the computer!" he boasted, producing a sheet of paper that he held out for the bailiff to take, watching the young officer scurry the important item off to the judge. Apollo noticed Debeste hide an eye-roll, then the prosecutor flicked at his tablet and brought the keycard log up on the hologram monitors. "Every keycard and the door it was used in!" Fulbright pointed out, not skipping a beat as he gestured to the three-columned table above him. "Only the relevant portion, of course!"

Debeste took down the logs from the holograms, causing them to flicker as they closed down their display. The judge, busy perusing his physical copy, didn't seem to notice. "And the condition of the crime scene?" Debeste prompted his witness. "Would you report on that, detective?"

"Naturally!" Fulbright boasted, giving the prosecutor a salute. "The victim and murderer engaged in a scuffle which almost destroyed the room!" As if on cue, Debeste activated the holograms again, bringing up a photo that immediately made the gallery, and judge, gasp loudly. "Audience members with weak stomachs may want to look away," the detective added, almost cheekily, to the crowds behind him.

Apollo's eyes widened as he recognised the subject of the photo: Phelan Pound, lying face-down on the hideous green carpet of his office floor, a puddle of blood leaking through his dark hair down into the rug below. Above him, propped against the oddly-angled desk (presumably shoved backwards in the fight), was the empty bookcase, its contents dumped in a pile on the body below. Apollo could even see the small, white clock between a box of files and a few large books. 'Geeze, no wonder Luke couldn't make himself take photos of it...'

"As you can see in this photo of the scene as we discovered it," Fulbright brightly continued, "the fight ended with the victim underneath the contents of his bookcase! Analysis indicates he was most likely killed by the avalanche of books," Debeste took this moment to switch the photo to one of the broken clock on its own, "and this clock that fell with them tells us time of death was almost certainly six-oh-five!"

Debeste then produced the clock itself, resting it next to the baseball bat on his bench. "The defendant had a keycard, thus access to the crime scene, and was the only other person in the building at the time," he announced to the court at large, "but one more piece of evidence also ties him to this crime."

Fulbright laughed. "You may have noticed earlier Your Honour, a certain piece of clothing the defendant is wearing today?"

The judge thought for a moment, then ventured, "I did think he had a rather nice hat..."

"His labcoat, Your Honour," Debeste pointed out, then flicked at his tablet and brought up on the holograms a picture of a labcoat laid out on what Apollo could only guess was the floor of the police station where the item had been handed in. He was briefly glad they'd been warned of its existence through Ernest. "This coat is identical to the one the defendant was wearing when he was arrested," the prosecutor continued. "It matches the labcoats kept at the shelter, and in fact their stores are one short; This one was dumped on the streets and handed in by a passer-by. As you can see, there are prominent bloodstains all over it. It appears the murderer attempted to wash it, but failed to clean off the blood completely."

The judge thought to himself for a long moment. "I see, I see," he muttered. "This does seem like some very compelling evidence."

"Not as compelling as it might appear, Your Honour," Kristoph finally spoke up, and tapped at his Court Record to bring up the keycard records on the holographic screens. "For one thing, the defendant owning a keycard is irrelevant, as the logs do not tell us on their own who committed this crime."

Soft discussion rippled through the gallery as they studied the logs themselves and realised Kristoph was right: The only people to have entered the office that night were the victim himself and Luke, the latter of which was clearly shown to be in a totally different room shortly before the murder, not entering the office himself until forty minutes afterwards. Between the two, the only other door logged was the entrance, by a third person yet to be introduced to the court. "So it does!" the judge realised. "There's even a third person listed here! What does it mean?"

"The records themselves are still highly relevant to solving this murder," Debeste spoke up, seeming to decide to let Kristoph's point stand mostly unopposed, "although I can promise the third person you mention will be addressed in a moment. As previously mentioned, the building was locked. Only employees had access to the crime scene, whether or not they opened the door themselves." He gestured with his baton, pointing to the judge. "My next witness can answer all your related questions, I assure you."

"Ah, then you'd better call them," the judge agreed.

Fulbright saluted. "We will fetch them immediately, Your Honour!" he boasted, then rushed off towards a side-room near the prosecutor's bench.
"Name and occupation please, witness," Debeste announced as the bailiffs finished escorting the young woman to the stand.

Apollo's first impression of the blonde woman busy adjusting her pointy glasses was 'nervousness', although he supposed he couldn't blame her. She seemed to be trying to hide, pushing her blue-tinted glasses close to her eyes, the shawl tightly wrapped over her shoulders and around her neck brushing against her bottom lip, which she seemed to be anxiously chewing. "Leo," she quietly said. "Leo Gatti. I'm a receptionist at the Warren Street Animal Shelter."

'So this is the heart-of-gold, unconcerned-about-the-murder Simba, huh?' Apollo asked himself. 'Not how I imagined her, I have to admit.'

"And you were working on the night of the murder, were you not?" Debeste continued.

Simba nodded. "I went home just before it happened," she elaborated. "Locked everything up myself."

"There's no need to worry, Ms Gatti," the judge told the young woman, a paternal smile on his face. "I can promise the defence won't bite!" After a short laugh, during which Apollo noticed a disapproving frown flit across Kristoph's face, the judge continued, "Could you testify in more detail?"

After a pause, Simba nodded, taking a few moments to breathe deeply and calm herself down a little. "I was the last to leave," she began. "It was the end of the day, so I had to lock the front door and the two back doors, and check there wasn't anyone still hanging around looking at the animals." She paused, twirling a finger through a lock of her hair. "I knocked on the boss's door maybe a minute after he went back to his office... Y'know, around the time the vets all left. Then I went home."

The courtroom was quiet for a moment as everyone slowly realised the young woman had stopped talking. "You... were the last to leave?" the judge repeated, sounding confused. "What about the victim and defendant?"

"Not counting those two, Your Honour," Debeste pointed out, and Apollo noticed one of his eyebrows twitching in annoyance.

"I didn't see either of them," Simba explained, staring off to the side. "They were behind locked doors, anyway. I couldn't get to them even if I wanted to."

The judge frowned to himself. "But aren't you an employee?" he asked. "Don't you have a keycard?"

"Not every employee does," Simba sighed, vaguely annoyed. "I just man reception and feed the animals. I don't need a keycard to do that, so I don't have one."

"Although Ms Gatti was tasked with locking the outside doors," Debeste picked up, "it was Mister Pound himself who opened everything in the morning. In fact, it's because of this we can safely eliminate Ms Gatti from any suspicion."

"I wouldn't say that just yet," Kristoph spoke up, a small smile on his lips. "The defence hasn't cross-examined her, after all."

The judge nodded. "Then go ahead, Mister Gavin. But be mindful of the young lady, is that understood?"

"Of course, Your Honour." Kristoph tapped on his Court Record for a moment to access the updating transcript, then turned to Simba with his serene smile. "Ms Gatti, you say you knocked on the victim's door before you left. Did he not reply to you at all?"

Simba didn't react for a moment, then moved a hand to press her glasses closer to her face. "I don't remember," she said.

Apollo's hand flew to his bracelet as he felt it tighten around his wrist. "Mister Gavin!" he hissed. "She's lying!"

Kristoph's eyes glanced briefly to his assistant, only to return their focus to Simba. "Are you sure?" he asked her. "It would have been the last time he spoke to you if he did. I was under the impression the staff of the shelter think of each other as family. Wouldn't you remember your last interaction with him?"

Again, Simba didn't react for several moments. Eventually, she responded, "I guess he didn't, then."

Apollo noticed Kristoph looking to him, and was forced to give his mentor a shrug; It was impossible to discern the truth from such a vague statement. Kristoph seemed to get the message and returned his gaze to the witness stand. "You still don't sound certain, Ms Gatti," he pointed out.

"I think it's obvious the witness doesn't remember, Mister Gavin," Debeste interjected, tapping his baton a little harder into the palm of his other hand. "Is it really all that relevant if he replied or not?"

"Naturally it is," Kristoph said, smiling with an almost smug air. "If he did reply, we would know without a doubt that Ms Gatti left before the murder. As it stands, she cannot prove the time she left."

"He wasn't dead when I left!" Simba suddenly cried, her nervousness giving way to anger as she glared at Kristoph, her glasses slipping down her nose to reveal her eyes beneath. "I knocked on his door and I went home!"

Apollo almost jumped back with the ferocity of Simba's proclamation, his bracelet almost painful on his wrist. "Sir...!"

Kristoph minutely nodded, and Apollo realised he had picked up on his own that Simba's reaction was off. "And how can you be so certain of that, Ms Gatti, if he didn't reply?"

Simba seemed caught off guard for a second or two, then returned to being withdrawn, pushing at her glasses to again hide her eyes while shoving her chin behind her shawl. "I... I think he did reply," she quietly admitted. "He called out to me when I knocked. He was still alive when I left."

'Convenient for her to remember that NOW,' Apollo was in the middle of thinking when his bracelet once again tightened on his wrist. 'Wait, which part of that was the lie!?’ In his brief moment of panic and not wanting the moment to slip past him, he forgot about his mentor at his side and called, "Ms Gatti, could you repeat that, please?"
Kristoph shot Apollo a stern stare of disapproval, while Simba simply sighed loudly. "I said he replied when I knocked!" she cried.

"I don't think we need to have it repeated," Kristoph interrupted, then turned to Apollo and whispered, "If you didn't hear her, we have the transcript for a reason."

"Sir, she was lying!" Apollo hissed back. "I just needed to work out exactly what the lie was!"

Kristoph opened his mouth to reply, then closed it, frowning in thought.

"Has the defence finished its cross-examination?" the judge asked.

"We still need to ask her about her argument with the victim!" Apollo whispered in reminder to his boss. "The one Luke mentioned!"

Kristoph nodded, then looked up to the judge. "Not yet, Your Honour." He returned his attention to Simba. "I had something I wanted to question, if the court would allow it."

The judge shrugged to himself. "Well, if Prosecutor Debeste doesn't mind, the court will allow it. Mister Gavin?"

"Thank you, Your Honour," Kristoph replied with a small bow, and turned to Simba. "If I may, Ms Gatti... we understand you had a rather... let's say 'rocky', relationship with the victim."

Apollo glimpsed Simba's eyes narrowing behind her glasses.

"She did?" Debeste asked, curious. "Why do you say that, Mister Gavin?"

"On the night of the murder," Kristoph continued, "she was seen arguing with Mister Pound before her co-workers left the building."

"She was!?!" the judge cried, eyes wide in shock. "That does sound suspicious!"

Simba didn't immediately reply, but then laughed with an airy tone, shaking her head. "Wow, you guys love to blow things out of proportion, don't you?"

Debeste looked unimpressed. "You're saying it's true, then?" he asked, fists tightening around his baton, though he was careful not to bend it. "Something as suspicious as that should have been passed on to me! Why didn't you tell me about it!?"

Simba shrugged. "You didn't ask," she said, still sounding amused.

"Well, we're asking now," the judge pointed out with a stern stare. "Testify to the court about this argument you had with the victim!"

Although she scoffed, Simba seemed willing to co-operate. "Honestly, it's nothing," she insisted. "We have high standards of care for the animals at our shelter, although it can be hard to keep up with so many heartless people dumping their cats and dogs on our doorstep and overcrowding us." She shot a glare into the gallery. "I was merely campaigning for our standards to be raised even higher; Larger enclosures for the animals, phasing out the use of the outdoor kennels and such." She gave Kristoph a smug smile, a hand lingering near her face. "See? Nothing to do with the murder."

Apollo frowned as he rubbed at his bracelet, then leaned towards his mentor. "She's lying again," he whispered. "On that last part. That argument was definitely related to the murder."
Not noticing the discussion at the defence bench, the judge nodded thoughtfully, stroking his beard. "Ah, I see," he said. "Indeed, it sounds like it was unrelated." He gave the witness a smile. "You should be commended for fighting so passionately for animal rights in your workplace, Ms Gatti!"

Kristoph hid his mouth behind a hand, standing closer to Apollo. "And how can you tell?" he asked.

"Her hand," Apollo explained, minutely gesturing to where Simba was again pushing at her glasses. "She keeps tugging at that shawl whenever she talks about the murder."

Simba smirked up at the judge. "Thank you," she chirped, one arm crossed across her torso while the other tugged at the coil around her neck with her ring finger and pinkie. "I would never have let a disagreement like that get in the way of my work."

"See?" Apollo quickly hissed to Kristoph. "She did it again!"

Kristoph seemed reluctant to act on Apollo's insistences for a moment, but finally clasped his hands behind his back and turned to her with an unreadable expression. "Ms Gatti, the defence believes you are lying to the court."

While everyone else looked to Kristoph in silent astonishment, Simba only laughed at the attorney. "Why would you say that?" she asked, and Apollo almost had to commend her for sounding so unconcerned in the face of a murder accusation. "Sure, I didn't mention the argument, but that was only so you guys didn't have to waste your time on it. You have 'bad guys' to find, don't you? No time for silly stories about petty disagreements, right?"

"A-and a very thoughtful action it was!" the judge cried as he regained his ability to speak. "After all, this is a court of law! We must focus on finding and punishing criminals above all else!"

Debeste shot a glare in the vague direction of the podium, clutching his baton.

"Your shawl," Kristoph pointed out, remaining calm. "Would you mind removing it for a moment?"

"No way!" Simba cried with a glare, both hands clutching at the item as though she feared Kristoph would remove it himself. "It's friggin' cold in here!"

"We will only need a moment," Kristoph assured her with a smile. "I am sure your neck will not freeze in that time."

Debeste raised an eyebrow at the defence team across from him. "And why is this so important?" he asked.

Apollo was dying to explain what he had discovered himself, but forced his mouth to stay closed.

Kristoph paused a moment, then seemed to softly sigh to himself. "When Ms Gatti mentions the murder," he reluctantly explained, "she pulls at her shawl. I was curious if the two were related somehow."

"But they are!" Apollo resisted shouting, looking up at his mentor with disappointment. 'She definitely knows more than she claims!'

Simba scoffed, waving a hand dismissively at the defence bench as she restrained laughter. "Really? You see me fiddling with my shawl and decide that means I did it? Get real! I'm fiddling with it because I don't usually wear a shawl, moron!"

Apollo bit his lip to keep from shouting at the woman, then noticed to his horror that Kristoph at his side was pushing at his glasses, eyes closed and a chastened look on his face. "M-Mister Gavin...?" the young attorney whispered.

Debeste, however, looked thoughtful, tapping his baton against his head. "Actually, that sounds like a good idea," he said, only to blink in shock at his own words and look up with an embarrassed smile, hurriedly correcting himself with, "I-I mean, removing the shawl, of course!"

Simba's laughter died as she gave him an incredulous look.

"You agree with the defence's request, Prosecutor Debeste?" the judge asked.

Debeste nodded, looking thoughtful again. "That's a poker trick, isn't it? Watching your opponents for 'tells' that give away their hand?"

"Ah, poker!" the judge said to himself with a nostalgic smile. "I played that game in my youth! They used to call me the 'Poker Head of Courtroom 3', you know!"

Apollo looked up at the judge in confusion. 'Don't you mean 'poker face', Your Honour?'

Ignoring the judge, Debeste turned to Simba. "This will only take a moment, Ms Gatti. Please remove your shawl for the court."

"You're serious?" Simba muttered, still giving the prosecutor an incredulous stare as mutterings began to spread through the gallery. "You really wanna go along with that nonsense?"

"When murder is involved, I'm always serious," Debeste replied with an even stare, then he slammed his baton down on his desk with a loud THWACK that instantly silenced the courtroom. "Now remove your shawl, Ms Gatti!"

Although she huffed to herself in disagreement, Simba reluctantly unlooped her shawl from around her neck and pulled it off with a final tug. Her neck, now laid bare for the entire room to see, was covered in red scratches, standing out against her pale skin as the lines stretched across her collarbone and up towards her chin. Her hand hovered not far away, wanting to continue covering up the injuries even as the gallery gasped and muttered amongst themselves at the unexpected sight. "There," she muttered. "Happy now?"

The gallery continued to mutter amongst themselves as all attention was locked to Simba's scratched neck, the injuries plain to see even from a distance.

Kristoph smiled to himself. "Ah, looks like your hunch was right after all," he quietly told Apollo, who grinned with pride in response.

The judge rapped his gavel a few times, calling, "Order! Order!" as the discussion in the gallery slowly quietened back down. Sighing, he sternly looked down at Simba. "And how exactly did you come by such injuries, Ms Gatti?"

"Exactly!" Debeste cried in agreement, angry tears threatening in his eyes as he clung to his baton so hard Apollo worried it might snap in half. "Why didn't you mention that, witness!?"

After a moment, Simba's small smile returned to her face, and she shrugged. "There you go again, making a mountain out of a molehill," she said. "You're really gonna kick yourselves when you hear the truth this time."

Debeste seemed furious, but Apollo thought he was doing an admirable job holding it in, taking a deep breath to calm himself down and, just for good measure, slamming his baton against the desk again. "Testify, Ms Gatti!" the prosecutor ordered. "Why did you keep those injuries a secret!?"

Simba scoffed, idly waving a hand disinterestedly. "I have a cat," she said. "Her name's Servalan; Haughty little white fluffball, like her namesake. She doesn't like baths, and, y'know, she kinda needed one the other night." She shot a smirk at the defence bench. "Do I need to say any more?"

The courtroom stared at her in shocked silence for several moments. Apollo was lost for words, unable to see any sign she was lying, but unwilling to believe every nervous twitch he had been chasing to this point had been simply because of an upset cat.

Kristoph's eyes narrowed. "And you say this happened the night of the murder?"

"Mm-hmm," Simba replied, smiling like the cat who got the cream. "Tore my favourite necklace to pieces while she was at it. And now I can't go out without looking like someone tried to strangle me!"

"That's quite the co-incidence," Kristoph pointed out.

Simba rolled her eyes. "Y'see why I didn't bother mentioning it? Some asshole like you would insist I'm lying."

Apollo shook his head, his hand resting on his bracelet. "She has to be lying!" he hissed. "I know she was covering up something to do with the murder!"

Kristoph shot Apollo a glare. "I think you've said enough, Wright."
Shocked at his mentor's angry stare, Apollo jumped back a step. "B-but...!" he protested, only for Kristoph's continued disapproving look to quieten the younger attorney.

Debeste sighed, looking just as unhappy with the situation as Apollo. "It would be impossible to prove whether or not Ms Gatti gave her cat a bath on the night of the murder," he pointed out to the court. "I suppose, if the defence has no objections, we have no choice but to end her testimony here."

"I should hope the defence has no more objections!" the judge proclaimed, more on the 'angry' side of the 'upset' scale. "We wasted all that time establishing nothing more than that Ms Gatti loves animals and owns a cat!" Kristoph seemed slightly shaken at the disapproval, pushing at his glasses to avoid meeting anyone's gazes. "Prosecutor Debeste, do you have another witness to call?"

Debeste nodded. "I do, Your Honour."

"Then prepare your next witness!" the judge ordered. "In the meantime, this court will take a recess!" With that, he slammed down his gavel with a decisive whack.

December 1, 10:31PM
District Court
Defendant Lobby No. 6

"I'm glad you pointed out that shawl, at least," Luke told Apollo as they sat together on the sofa in the lobby. "Simba doesn't normally wear that. She has a necklace, a blue one with coins on it, that she's always had on, before today anyway."

Apollo nodded. "Ms Fox mentioned it, I think," he said, though he couldn't recall in the moment why or exactly what the other woman had said. "But she honestly didn't seem suspicious at all to you? You know her better than us!"

Luke meekly smiled. "She doesn't look it, but Simba's really shy. She always gives a bad first impression because she deals with it by acting... well, like she did on the stand."

"Seriously!?!" Apollo cried, then ran a hand over his face in frustration, leaning forward on his knees. "She has to be hiding something about the murder!"

"I'm pretty sure she isn't," Luke assured his brother, patting his shoulder. "Simba's not the best at social stuff. She's argumentative and haughty," he paused to giggle, "like her cat Servalan, actually! She has a heart of gold, though. It's just... not very many people get to see it. I don't think she has many friends outside us at the shelter."

'I can see why,' Apollo darkly thought, but decided not to upset his brother by saying so out loud. Instead, he just sighed. "I hope you're right," he quietly replied.

Not far away, Kristoph was standing alone, rereading through his case-file. "I imagine the next witness will be Mister Wildgrube," he said, casting a glance at Luke. "Anything you could share about him?"

Luke thought for a moment, his hand still resting on Apollo's shoulder. "He'll... probably be doing his best to give you all a hard time," he reluctantly admitted with a wince.

Apollo looked up at his brother, raising an eyebrow. "Why? Does he want you to be found guilty?!"
Suddenly seeming disheartened, Luke looked away, clutching his hands together. "I hope not..." he muttered.

"The prosecution wouldn't be calling him as a witness unless he was beneficial to their case," Kristoph pointed out, giving Apollo a hard look. "We already know he was in the building at the time of the murder. He could have all manner of things to say that would harm our case, very little of which I have confidence we can disprove."

"But if Reindeer does lie," Luke said, turning to Apollo with a hopeful smile, "you'll point it out, won't you?"

"Of course!" Apollo instantly replied with a determined look. "I'm not letting what he has to say convict you of murder!"

Kristoph shook his head with a disapproving gaze. "I'd rather you didn't," he told the younger attorney. "Not after that debacle with Ms Gatti. Keep your 'poker tricks' to your father's games in future, Wright."

Apollo and Luke were both too shocked to respond for a moment. "But, sir-!" Apollo cried.

"No 'buts'," Kristoph interrupted with a stern frown. "Unless you have the evidence to prove you have a lead, something as vague as 'the witness's eye twitched' is no more than simply bluffing." He briefly paused to push at his glasses, then turned back to Apollo with a softened gaze. "I do understand bluffing was your father's strategy in the courtroom, but it was that same unplanned conducting of his cases that resulted in his disbarment. I won't have you falling into the same pitfalls, Apollo."

Apollo found he couldn't object, and meekly looked away. 'I... guess he has a point, there...'

Luke thought to himself for a moment. "What about the prosecutor?" he asked. "Couldn't we ask him to help us?"

"He's supposed to be trustworthy," Apollo explained, reasoning Luke had likely been told the same thing by Phoenix while in the detention centre, not to mention also having heard Ernest's glowing praise the previous day. "Focused on finding the truth, rather than just convicting the first person the police arrest."

Kristoph scoffed, pressing at his glasses. "Sebastian Debeste, trustworthy?" He shook his head. "I'm sure you heard that from certain contacts of your father's in the prosecutor's office, did you not?"

"Debeste' is possibly the least trustworthy name to have ever entered that office," Kristoph continued, smiling. "His father, Blaise Debeste, was the Chief Prosecutor in his day, not to mention the Chairman of the P.I.C.; Today, he's more well-known as a convicted murderer and forger, amongst other things."

"Prosecutorial Investigation Committee," Apollo explained. "It's the prosecution's version of the Bar Association." As Luke nodded in understanding, Apollo turned to Kristoph with a puzzled look.
"But what does his father have to do with anything? This Debeste seems pretty focussed on the right things to me."

Kristoph shook his head dismissively. "A prosecutor can appear to be many things, but by their very nature they can never be focussed on the 'right' thing."

Luke frowned, looking somewhat offended. "What's that supposed to mean?"

"The prosecutor's job is to find the defendant, in this case you, guilty," Kristoph pointed out. "The defence attorney's is to find you not guilty. Being in such total opposition, it would be... unnatural were one to join the other's side." As Luke tapped his chin thoughtfully, Kristoph brushed at his fringe, continuing, "Besides, if there is one thing this Debeste is known for other than his father, it would be his rather disastrous first year in the field." He smiled. "He graduated from Themis Legal Academy in the same year as my brother, the top of their class. He was called a prodigy... until it came out that his 'top marks' were all falsified."

Luke gasped, while Apollo's eyes widened in surprise. "What!?" the younger attorney cried. "He... cheated!?!"

"You didn't know?" Kristoph replied, clearly enjoying being the one to tell the brothers the story. "It was only because of his father's influence he didn't have his badge stripped from him immediately." He shrugged nonchalantly, though his amused smile remained. "It's like I said before, Wright; You can never trust a prosecutor, no matter their first impression."

With that, Kristoph turned and left the brothers to mull over his words, Luke looking almost as scared as he had been before the trial while Apollo was simply confused. 'Who do I trust?' he asked himself. 'Mister Gavin, or Uncle Edgeworth?' He sighed, putting a comforting arm over his brother at his side. 'For now, I guess I have no choice but to trust Mister Gavin. I'll... have to ask Uncle Edgeworth for the full story another day...'

[View the Court Record]
The gavel banging from the podium instantly quietened the crowds in the gallery, and the judge, seeming calmer than he had been before he left, announced, "Court is now back in session!"

Apollo, stood next to his mentor behind the defence bench, cast a wary glance to the prosecutor opposite them. Although Sebastian Debeste didn't look any different than he had before, the young attorney couldn't help seeing him in a different light; Phoenix had passed on from Edgeworth that the man in the dark scarf was someone they could trust to ensure a correct verdict, but, despite Ernest's high praise, Debeste was still here in court pushing for Luke's conviction. Apollo was starting to suspect Kristoph might be correct to not put any faith in their opponent... but, on the other hand, wasn't putting faith in their opponent what had allowed Phoenix and Edgeworth to become such good friends?

The judge turned to the prosecutor. "Your witness is prepared, Prosecutor Debeste?"

Debeste nodded. "Yes, Your Honour."

"Then go ahead and call them to the stand," the judge requested.

A minute later, the bailiffs escorted to the stand a grey-haired man in a labcoat, face wrinkled with age and long hair dangling over his shoulder in a loose ponytail. As he arrived at their destination, he somewhat impatiently waved away the guards on either side, lounging on the stand almost cockily as he looked around the courtroom. "Man, what a dump!" he cried.

Apollo noticed Debeste immediately sigh and bury his face in his hands.

"E-excuse me?" the judge muttered, eyes wide with shock before they quickly narrowed. "My courtroom is not a... dump!"

"That so?" the man at the witness stand replied, shooting a smirk at the top of the podium. "Could've fooled me."

Kristoph frowned at the witness, whispering to Apollo, "I see what your brother means about him giving us a hard time." Apollo simply nodded in agreement.

"Ignore his taunts, Your Honour," Debeste advised, already looking tired of the elderly man's antics. He pointed his baton at the witness stand. "Witness, please state your name and occupation for the court. Quickly."

The witness scoffed, idly brushing a long lock of loose hair from his face. "Doctor Dolittle," he said with a grin. "Veterinarian."

Instantly there was a loud THWACK as Debeste slammed his baton against his desk, glaring at the witness. "Your real name!" he ordered. "Do not waste the court's time!"

"What, you don't believe me?" the grey-haired man replied with a teasing look, jerking a thumb behind him. "Got a pushmi-pullyu in the back I can show off if you like!"

Debeste ran a hand over his face, barely restraining a frustrated groan.

Apollo found himself feeling sympathetic for the prosecutor. 'Luke really wasn't kidding... Poor guy. ' "I refuse to play these games with you a second time!" Debeste cried, angrily pointing his baton at the veterinarian. "Introduce yourself to this court, Mister Wildgrube!"

Reindeer shrugged, the smug grin on his face. "Sounds to me like you just did," he pointed out, then paused to laugh as Debeste groaned again. "Wow, you're really wound up, law-boy. You oughta learn to take a joke."

Apollo could have sworn he saw Debeste's eye twitching in barely contained rage.

Reindeer laughed, then waved dismissively in the direction of the judge. "Rudolf Wildgrube," he announced, apparently deciding to finally take pity on the prosecutor. "I'm a pretty good veterinarian, if I do say so myself. And I do." He chuckled at his own joke. "They call me 'Reindeer' 'round the shelter, 'cause I got a nose for trouble."

The judge gave the witness a disapproving look. "Mister Wildgrube, surely even you have better things to do than make puns and cause trouble in this court."

"Maybe," Reindeer admitted with a shrug, his smirk unchanging, "but what do you expect from an old man? I gotta get my kicks somewhere!"

Still disapproving of the witness's antics, the judge turned to the prosecutor's bench. "Prosecutor Debeste, why exactly is this witness here?"

With great effort, Debeste managed to calm himself down. "If you'll recall those keycard records we submitted at the beginning of this trial," he explained, "there was a name on them other than the victim and defendant." He flicked at his tablet, and the holograms activated to display the mentioned logs.

The judge peered at his screen, quickly finding the extra name between Pound's and Luke's. "Wildgrube?" he read. "I thought you said only the victim and defendant were in the shelter at the time of the murder."

"And that is why Mister Wildgrube is on the stand," Debeste explained with a sigh, apparently not wanting to bring up they'd discussed Reindeer's presence at the beginning of the trial. "To explain that he was already gone by the time of the murder."

The judge thought for a moment, then turned to Reindeer with a stern look. "Alright then, Mister Wildgrube: Testify to this court about the night of the murder."

Reindeer looked thoughtful for a moment, one hand rubbing at his nose, and Apollo almost believed he was about to answer seriously until he noticed the hint of a smile on the old man's face. "The what now?"

The entire courtroom seemed to sigh in frustration. Debeste pressed his hand to his face for a moment before running it through his hair, and stared Reindeer down. "Mister Wildgrube," he ordered, "just tell the court what you told me on Saturday night."

"Hmm, Saturday?" Reindeer repeated, again hiding a small smile behind a thoughtful frown. "Nope, I've plum forgotten Saturday." He smirked at Debeste as the prosecutor's face fell. "'Fraid you'll have to remind me, bright spark."

Lost for words, Debeste leaned forward onto his desk, hiding his face in his arms in silent despair.

The judge gave Reindeer a stern glare. "Mister Wildgrube, if you do not co-operate, I will be forced to find you in contempt of court," he explained.

"I do not think that would help, Your Honour," Kristoph spoke up, hands calmly clasped behind his back. "Mister Wildgrube seems content to cause chaos regardless of the outcome." He paused to push at his glasses, hiding a smile that Apollo only saw due to his position at his mentor's side. "After all, if he was truly as close to the defendant as we had been told, he would be fighting to have him exonerated, not convicted."

Reindeer's joking façade finally seemed to fall as he fixed Kristoph with a glare. "I'm not fighting for Northpaw to be convicted," he said, deceptively calmly given the anger in his expression. "Why should I trust you lot to find the right person, anyway? You're all corrupt as hell."

Murmurs spread throughout the gallery, and the judge looked shocked for a moment before frowning at the accusation. "I will choose to ignore your wild allegations for the moment, witness," he growled, only to then look confused. "Who is 'Northpaw'?"

"Your ruddy 'defendant'!" Reindeer shot back. "Luke Wright! You got wool in your ears, Santa!?"

"I do not!" the judge replied offended. "And kindly refrain from that kind of reference when there might be children in the gallery!"

"For a murder trial?" Reindeer pointed out, eyebrow raised.

"Mister Wildgrube!" Debeste interrupted, having returned to his feet. "Will you now testify properly for this court or not?"

Reindeer was silent for several moments, then finally sighed, staring off to the side. "Sure, whatever."

"Then go ahead, witness," the judge ordered, looking relieved. "The night of the murder, if you please."

"Alright, alright," Reindeer muttered, rolling his eyes. "Keep your beard on." He shifted behind the stand for a few moments, running a hand through the hair hanging at the side of his face, then looked up. "We packed everything up around six. Fox and me, Fox being our other vet, we were heading home, but Northpaw and the boss were hanging around a while longer." He paused in thought. "Simba, the receptionist, she were about to go, but I couldn't say exactly when. I'd left my keys behind, actually. I didn't see her when I went back for 'em."

The judge's eyebrows shot up. "Ah! So you were back in the building looking for your keys!" he proclaimed, then smiled. "I've lost my keys more times than I can count, myself! Always in the last place you look, you know!"

"And you found your keys, correct?" Debeste interrupted, watching Reindeer sternly.

"Of course I did," Reindeer snapped. "Couldn't get back into my house without 'em, could I!?"

Apollo felt his bracelet tighten, and shot a wary glance up at the unsuspecting Kristoph at his side. 'Mister Gavin would kill me if I spoke up now... But what can I do?'
"So Ms Gatti had gone when you came back for your keys?" the judge asked. "Where were they, by the way?"

"Sitting on the front desk," Reindeer replied, and Apollo had to bite his lip to keep from calling out the lie. "I guess Simba found them on her rounds." He paused, rubbing at the back of his neck. "I guess she must have left if her rounds were completed, but she might have still been finishing up somewhere."

The judge nodded. "I see nothing to argue with there."

"That may be so," Kristoph spoke up with a smile, "but the defence is still entitled to a cross-examination, Your Honour. May I proceed?"

"I-I guess so," the judge agreed, seeming surprised, then gave Kristoph a stern stare. "Be warned, Mister Gavin; I see little reason to drag this trial out much further when the defendant's guilt is this clear."

Kristoph nodded in understanding, then turned to Reindeer, who watched with a wary frown. "Mister Wildgrube," he began, "am I to understand you have only your own word as evidence you were not even aware of the murder until the next day?"

"Of course I wasn't!" Reindeer shot back, almost offended. "Didn't see no-one, didn't hear nothing! I found my keys and I got out of there!"

'Argh, we're getting nowhere with this!' In a fit of righteous anger on his brother's behalf at the man's lies, Apollo slammed his fists into the bench in front of him, giving the old witness a furious glare. "Tell the truth, Mister Reindeer!" he shouted. "Don't you realise what will happen to Luke if you keep lying like that!?"

Reindeer looked surprised, as did most of the court, staring at Apollo with wide eyes as though only just noticing him. "Huh?" he cried.

"You didn't find your keys, did you!?" Apollo continued. "You saw or heard something in the shelter that night, something important!"

Kristoph stared down at his assistant in anger. "Wright! Enough!"

As Apollo fixed a glare on the bench in front of him, fists shaking at his sides, the judge rapped his gavel to call the suddenly-noisy court back to order. "Is the defence making the claim that Mister Wildgrube did not, in fact, recover his keys and return home that night?" he asked, frowning at the pair on his left. "I hope you have evidence of this if you are."

Debeste waved his baton with an almost smug smile. "I should warn the defence, we have proof he returned home that night," he said. "How could he have done so without his keys?"

Being so ridiculed by the court had visibly upset Kristoph, who couldn't keep his frown off his face as he glared wide-eyed at the judge and prosecutor. "The defence... guarantees there will be no more unruly outbursts," he announced through gritted teeth, firmly avoiding even acknowledging the equally upset young man at his side.

The judge nodded. "Good," he said, then held up his gavel, ready to bang on his desk at a moment's notice. "Is your cross-examination over?" His stern look made it painfully clear he was asking a rhetorical question.

Kristoph almost jumped in visible horror. "N-no, Your Honour, we're not done yet!"
"Wait, no!" Apollo cried, forgetting his fear of his mentor in the face of his brother's terrifyingly close conviction.

"I am ready to call my verdict," the judge announced, eyes closed. "I find the defendant, Luke Wright-"

"STOP!"
As the shout rang through the silent courtroom, everyone turned in shock to stare in the direction of the witness stand, where Reindeer stood tall, a hand reaching out towards the judge's podium and a fearful look on his face. "You can't find him guilty, not yet!" he called. "I'm not done talking!"

Debeste narrowed his eyes at the old man, gripping his baton tightly. "Don't tell me there was something else significant you've been hiding... unless this is just another one of your ridiculous time-wasting tricks!"

"It's not!" Reindeer promised, looking more serious than Apollo had ever seen him. "I...!" He sighed, and Apollo thought he glimpsed the man glancing in the direction of the defence bench. "I guess I was wrong not to trust the courts... or Northpaw, enough to tell the whole truth." He looked up, meeting a surprised Apollo's eyes. "Sorry about that, Southpaw."

Apollo could only stare back at the man, lost for words. At his side, he heard Kristoph softly sighing in relief at the momentary reprieve from Luke's sentencing.

Debeste gritted his teeth, bending his baton for a several long moments before seeming to regain control of himself with a sigh, apparently too tired to keep up his anger at the troublesome witness. "Alright then, Mister Wildgrube," he agreed, pointing the metal stick at the man. "Your full testimony, if you please. Nothing left out this time."

Reindeer nodded, arms hanging at his sides as he thought. "I... didn't find my keys," he admitted. "I had to borrow the spare from the landlord to get into my apartment." He closed his eyes, crossing his arms and frowning to himself. "I didn't see anyone while I was in the building. I guessed Northpaw was in the recuperation room, as always, the boss would've been in his office, and Simba was either on her rounds or had gone home... probably gone home, because I didn't run into her. I looked around the reception, then the dog enclosures, and the grooming area." He paused, then shook his head. "After that, I went home. Thought I'd come back the next day to try again in the sunlight."

Apollo rubbed at his bracelet, a part of him pleased it hadn't reacted at all, but most of him simply sad to see the man his brother had often spoken so highly of over the years so melancholy.

Debeste glared at his witness, but ultimately decided not to ask why it was only now the old vet had finally stopped messing around. Sighing, he toyed with the baton in his hands. "Alright then. Defence, your cross-examination?"

The judge blinked in surprise. "That's my job!" he pointed out. Debeste simply whacked his baton on his desk, causing the old man to jump. "Um, go ahead," he continued.

Kristoph calmly nodded, pushing at his glasses before giving the witness a neutral stare. "Mister Wildgrube, you say you halted your search after already looking through a number of rooms," he pointed out. "Why exactly did you decide to stop then, instead of continuing your search?"

Reindeer looked vaguely uncomfortable, shrugging in response. "It was dark," he eventually explained. "The building felt totally empty of other people, though I knew Northpaw and the boss were there at the very least. I..." He paused, glaring into the distance. "I can't believe I'm about to admit this, but..." Sighing, he shook his head. "I got scared. I ran out of there with my tail between my legs."

Apollo wasn't quite sure how to take the old man's admission, turning to his mentor to whisper, "He's not lying." Kristoph didn't reply, concentrating on his own thoughts.

"And was it something in particular that unnerved you?" Debeste asked, seeming curious at the new information. "A scream, a howling dog...?"

Reindeer barked a short laugh at the prosecutor's suggestion. "There ain't nothing unnerving about a regular ol' dog howl," he answered with a grin. "Especially after such a busy day! Nuh-uh, this were more than that." His smile faded back into a serious frown. "I heard something crashing. It sounded like... I dunno, a slamming door and a small avalanche of hard objects. Could've been from inside the building, or just outside on the street somewhere." He shrugged. "I'm an old man, so I'd be pretty terrible in a fight. Didn't help that it was dark. I got paranoid there was a gang waiting for me outside or something, so I left."

"Goodness, a gang!?" the judge cried.

"Yep," Reindeer replied, smiling. "Never had anything to do with one in reality, and it's not like the shelter's in a bad neighbourhood or anything, but you can't exactly reason with irrational paranoia."

The judge thought for a moment, then nodded in understanding. "Very true," he agreed.

Kristoph simply smiled to himself. "And this testimony alone debunks the prosecution's claim that the defendant was the only other person in the building at the time of the murder," he pointed out.

Debeste frowned. "How?" he asked.

"The sound Mister Wildgrube described," Kristoph pointed out. "That would easily match a falling bookcase, would it not?"

The courtroom seemed to gasp in surprise at the new fact, but the judge seemed confused. "Yes, but it doesn't effect anything else regarding this case, does it?" he reasoned. "The evidence still overwhelmingly points to Mister Wright."

Apollo glared up at the bearded man, hands curling into fists. Then we'll have to persuade him to get Ms Simba back out here! This time we'll break her for sure! Kristoph shook his head, his smile almost smug. "In that case, it appears the defence finally has some evidence for the court that will change its mind," he announced.

Everyone turned to look at Kristoph in surprise, including Apollo. Wait, we do? he wondered.

The elder attorney reached into his suitcase under the bench, retrieving a small plastic bag that Apollo could hear jingling. "I believe," he continued, looking to Reindeer as he held the bag high for all to see, "we recovered your keys, Mister Wildgrube."

The gallery murmured in confusion, and, out of the corner of his eye, Apollo noticed Debeste frowning at the defence team, the prosecutor's baton idly tapping against his other hand. Reindeer, however, peered across the courtroom to the clear plastic bag, a handful of loose keys inside. After a moment, his eyes widened in vague surprise. "Huh," he muttered. "Those do look like mine."

Kristoph continued to smile. "Then you confirm they are indeed yours, Mister Wildgrube?"
Reindeer thought a moment more before nodding, giving Kristoph a smile. "Yep. Guess I should thank you, then. Where'd you find 'em?"

The judge gave Kristoph a disapproving frown. "And how exactly is this relevant to the murder, Mister Gavin?" he asked. "If you wished to return the witness's missing keys-!"

"Ah, the location is the most important part," Kristoph continued, apparently choosing to ignore the judge as his attention remained on Reindeer. "As you might have noticed, there are five keys here." Lowering the bag in his grip, he used his other hand to tap at the screen of his Court Record, bringing up on the holograms the picture he and Apollo had taken of the smudged bloodstain on the floor of the office. "This is a series of unusual markings the culprit left in the blood of his victim, five in total. As you can see, he tried to hide them, but the original outlines left in the pooling blood are still very clear."

"Goodness!" the judge cried, leaning towards his screen as he took in the image. "This was left on the floor of the crime scene? This looks like important evidence!" He turned to his right with a stern frown. "Why did the prosecution not bring it up earlier?"

Debeste looked sheepish. "I-it was a loose end," he admitted. "We found no trace of what had been there, nor what the defendant might have done with them afterwards."

"Allow me to fill in the dots, then," Kristoph almost cheerfully replied, again holding up his bag of Reindeer's keys. "As you might have noticed, Mister Wildgrube's keys are all loose. They lack a keyring of any kind to tie them together."

Reindeer nodded, flicking at the long hair in his face with an embarrassed look. "Yeah, I was keepin' 'em on a string. I can't deal with regular keyrings; They're just impossible to get things on or off..." He frowned. "Actually, what happened to the string?"

"I imagine it broke in the struggle," Kristoph suggested, still smiling as he held the bag high for all to see. "After all, if you'll look, these keys still bear the markings of blood on them."

"What!?" Reindeer cried as he realised what Kristoph was suggesting, and the rest of the courtroom seemed to gasp with him, including Apollo. "What are you...!?" The gallery quickly erupted into discussion, giving Reindeer suspicious looks as the old man slowly began to glare at the elder attorney. "You can't be serious!"

Although looking shocked himself, the judge slammed his gavel a few times to bring the court to order. "Bailiff!!" he ordered. "Fetch me those keys!" As one of the court officials quickly complied, the judge turned his attention to the prosecutor's bench, where Debeste had gone pale, gripping his baton so hard it looked like it was about to either snap or fly into his face. "Prosecutor Debeste, I'm sure you can arrange for these items to be tested to ensure this is the victim's blood." The prosecutor meekly nodded, and the judge was again distracted as the bailiff arrived at his side with Kristoph's bag of keys. Taking it, the bearded official studied the evidence and, after a long moment, nodded. "This does indeed look like blood." He handed it back to the bailiff, who quickly rushed the bag out of the room, presumably to forensics.

"I don't believe this!" Reindeer shouted, by now giving Kristoph a full-on angry glare, leaning heavily on the witness stand in front of him. "You cannot be claiming-!"

"It appears you did indeed find your keys," Kristoph interrupted, cool as a cucumber in contrast to Reindeer's barely contained rage, "if they'd ever been lost in the first place. Regardless, you did drop them in the struggle with your employer, leaving those marks in his blood. But you were too smart to leave them where they were, where they could tie the murder back to you." He paused, pushing on his glasses with a triumphant look. "You collected them up and tried to hide where they had been, only to finally lose them all in the process of cleaning up the rest of your mess." The attorney flicked at his tablet, changing the holograms back to the map of the shelter, on which he quickly highlighted the first storeroom and the toilet within, just down the hall from the office. "You cleaned the murder weapon in the bathroom, and threw it out the window there. I found three on the floor of that room: one behind the toilet, one underneath the sink and another behind the door. The other two were dropped out in the storeroom, lodged under some of the boxes there." Switching off the holograms, Kristoph smiled serenely at the witness stand. "It's not hard to imagine you kicked them under those stores in your rush to clean up. By the time you noticed you'd left them behind, it was too late; The murder had been discovered, and there was no way for you to safely retrieve them."

Apollo stared wide-eyed between his mentor and the man at the witness stand, too overwhelmed by the sudden rising situation to even form coherent thoughts. His bracelet clung tighter to his wrist with every word Kristoph said.

"You bastard!" Reindeer shouted, shaking a fist in the defence's direction. "I trusted you to get Northpaw off, and this is how you repay me!"

"Is the defence formally accusing Mister Wildgrube of the crime in question?" the judge asked, gavel in hand.

Kristoph nodded. "We are."

"NO!" came a shout from somewhere behind the gallery, and Luke came dashing, panicked, out of the small side-room he'd been placed in when not on the stand. "YOU CAN'T!" Before the young man got very far, a pair of bailiffs sprinted into his path, colliding with Luke and just barely avoiding knocking him to the ground as the labcoated vet struggled in their tight grip. "REINDEER DIDN'T DO IT!"

The courtroom seemed to erupt into chaotic noise, the judge fruitlessly banging his gavel as he called for order. Apollo, concerned for his brother, slid past his mentor to run for him, only for a hissed warning from Kristoph, "Wright!", to call him to a halt. On second thought, Apollo wasn't even sure what he planned to do once he reached Luke; Calm him down, or free him from the bailiffs to help him object to the clear violation of justice going on with Kristoph's accusation?

"Say I did it!" Luke continued to shout, starting to tire in his fight against the bailiffs. "I'll be guilty! Just don't say it was Reindeer!"

Reindeer watched the whole thing with a stunned expression, above all else listening to Luke's cries. Above the chaos rose a single shout: "I did it! I murdered him!"

View the Court Record
Finally, the commotion in the courtroom began to die down as, one by one, everyone heard the passionate declarations from the centre of the room: "I did it! It was me, okay? I admit I killed him!"

Luke was frozen in shock, staring wide-eyed at his friend at the witness stand. "Reindeer...!"

"Everything that idiot," Reindeer gestured to a smug Kristoph, "said about my keys was true! I'm a damn dirty murderer and I tried to pin it on Northpaw!"

"Mister Wildgrube!" the judge cried in shock. "Are you... confessing?"

Apollo couldn't believe his eyes, his hand gripping his bracelet as it tightened on his wrist at the old vet's words. 'Mister Reindeer, no!'

Reindeer scoffed. "Of course I am!" he insisted. "You think I was happy about those two young things taking my job?"

Debeste looked uncertain, his baton shaking in his hand. "W-wait, Mister Wildgrube-!"

"So I killed the boss to get back at him!" Reindeer continued, arms crossed as he glared up at the judge, daring someone to contradict him. "He cut my wages to chase me into retirement in favour of them, so it was never going to work out anyway!"

"Reindeer, no!" Luke shouted, seeming to regain some energy in his struggle with the bailiffs. "The wage cut was your suggestion, don't lie for my sake!"

"And who told you it was my suggestion, huh?" Reindeer snapped, only half turning towards Luke as he glared at nothing in particular, avoiding meeting the young man's gaze. "Face it, kid; You were an idiot if you ever looked up to me. Aren't you supposed to be the smart one with that fancy doctorate of yours? You should've guessed this was coming a long time ago."

Luke couldn't speak for a moment, shaking his head as he stared at his friend, no longer struggling against the bailiffs. "N-no..." His legs seemed to give out suddenly, and the bailiffs, instead of holding him back, were now struggling to hold the young man up.

Debeste frowned in thought, minimising his baton. "I guess that makes sense," he agreed, then placed his baton on his desk as he tapped at his tablet, bringing up the image of the bloodstained coat. "After all, this labcoat here could just as easily be the witness's as the defendant's."

"Exactly!" Reindeer cried, then turned his glare to the judge. "Hurry up and name me guilty already!"

The judge sighed. "I'm afraid that would have to wait for another trial," he pointed out. "This one specifically pertains only to Mister Wright." Looking to Debeste, he continued, "Is the prosecution lifting the charges against the defendant to agree with the defence's claim?"
"Of course it is!" Reindeer cut in. "It's the truth, isn't it?"

Debeste looked uncertain for a moment, then strengthened his resolve and gave the judge a firm nod. "It is, Your Honour."

"About time!" Reindeer cried.

Ignoring the witness, Debeste gestured to the side room near the prosecutor's desk, and Fulbright, followed by a policeman, emerged. They approached the man at the stand, who waved off their attempts to grab him as he proudly strode off in the direction they had come from. Although slightly confused, the pair rushed after him.

With the witness stand now free, the two bailiffs supporting Luke dragged him back to his feet and escorted him to the stand, where the young vet meekly stood, leaning heavily on the object as he stared at the floor in shock. Apollo longed to run to his brother and comfort him, but, knowing that was impossible just yet, instead quietly slunk back behind the defence bench, Kristoph giving his assistant no more than a glance as he reappeared at his side.

"I suppose that leaves us with only the verdict," the judge announced to the all-too-quiet courtroom. He took up his gavel. "This court finds the defendant, Luke Wright, not guilty." With that, he banged his gavel, and hidden cannons throughout the room exploded, sending confetti everywhere as the gallery cheered.

Kristoph smiled as he looked up at the falling pieces of brightly coloured paper. "All in all, a successful trial, was it not?"

Apollo couldn't make himself reply.

December 1, 11:07AM
District Court
Defendant Lobby No. 6

Luke hadn't said a word since Reindeer's arrest, mutely following his brother back to the defendant lobby and sinking into the sofa, staring straight ahead. Apollo sat at his side, patting his brother's back comfortingly.

"I'll admit, most of that trial could have gone a lot better," Kristoph mused aloud as he went over the case file one last time. "Although it wasn't an ideal situation, we did manage to achieve our goal of proving Luke's innocence."

Apollo idly nodded in agreement, keeping his attention primarily on his brother. He wanted to comfort him, but was stuck on how. Saying 'it's okay' just rang false, neither of them truly believing it, and 'you're fine' sounded plain selfish, focussing on Luke's acquittal over Reindeer's potential death sentence for a crime he didn't commit. Not to mention, the one thing Apollo couldn't allow himself to do was display distrust of his mentor, not if he wanted to help Phoenix's long term plans, and now more than ever those plans were clashing with his loyalty to his siblings. In the end, the young lawyer was forced to sit silently at his brother's side, patting his back in an imitation of their father.

The door of the lobby opened, and the trio inside looked up to see, to their surprise, Sebastian Debeste entering the room, hands in his pockets. Apollo jumped to his feet, protectively standing in front of his brother, but Kristoph held up a hand to signal for his assistant to stay calm. Debeste seemed unsurprised by their reactions, looking between Apollo and Luke with a sympathetic gaze. "I promise I don't mean any harm. I just want to apologise."

Apollo blinked in surprise, unsure how to react. Luke, watching the prosecutor from behind his brother's protective stance, quickly came to his own decision, standing up and gently pushing Apollo aside to approach the taller man. "Reindeer didn't do it," he told Debeste with a stern gaze.

Debeste nodded. "You've made your thoughts quite clear on that," he agreed, "but the evidence does seem to say otherwise."

"The evidence is wrong, then," Luke calmly insisted. "None of us would have killed Mister Pound for any reason. It had to have been someone else trying to frame us!"

"Luke!" Apollo hissed, nudging his brother's back as he ran around to his side, where Luke sent him a glare. "We discussed this, it had to have been an employee!"

Gently clearing his throat, Debeste called the brothers' attention back to him, looking between the two with a surprisingly understanding gaze. "Mister Wildgrube's guilt will be determined later," he pointed out. "I came here because I wanted to apologise for the false arrest."

Apollo blinked in surprise, but Luke frowned suspiciously. "For me or for Reindeer?" the younger of the pair asked.

Debeste smiled a little. "The verdict is still out on Mister Wildgrube, I'm afraid," he replied, before his smile faded. "I am sorry about him, by the way. Was he your mentor?"

Now it was Luke's turn to be surprised, and he had to think for several long moments. "I... guess so," he admitted. "One of... a few, actually. I... never really thought about it like that before."

"Even so," Debeste continued, still watching Luke with a sympathetic stare, "I know what it feels like... when you find out someone you've idolised for so long, never really deserved it. It's... hard to accept, and it feels absolutely awful to even consider it, but... in the end, no amount of denial can change the truth."

As Luke stared at the floor in thought, Apollo found himself watching the prosecutor curiously. 'Wait... this is the guy who used his father to get his badge...? A-and managed to keep it even after everyone found out he hadn't earned it?'

"I'll look over all the evidence a few extra times before taking Mister Wildgrube to court," Debeste promised. "This time, I'll make sure we have the right person before taking them before a judge."

Luke mutely nodded, still staring at the floor, and Apollo noticed the tell-tale signs of his brother beginning to tear up. 'Not surprising, I was waiting for that.' He rested a hand on Luke's shoulder, squeezing to offer comfort, and Luke lifted his other hand to rest on Apollo's in silent appreciation.

"Again, I am sorry about what happened," Debeste elected to continue in the face of Luke's silence, looking somewhat embarrassed. "I'll... be the first to admit I'm not exactly the brightest spark, but I always do my best to make sure I have the right person when I take a case to court."

Luke's shoulders began to visibly shake, a single tear spilling down his cheek. "Everyone who's ever betrayed me in the past... they've never really meant it, not if they were really my friend!"

"Then I suppose Mister Wildgrube wasn't," Debeste gently pointed out.
Apollo watched his brother cry for only a moment more before gently pulling him away from the prosecutor. "Thank you for your concern, Mister Debeste," he told the taller man. "It means a lot to us."

Debeste nodded once, giving the crying Luke a sympathetic glance before turning and leaving the room.

View the Court Record
It was a disparate group that wafted around aimlessly in the hallway outside the defendant lobby. Although most of them stood against the wall, several had taken to pacing the corridor, none venturing too far from the door marked '6'. Finally, the doors they watched opened, and two young men exited into the hallway; The taller of the two stared at his feet, hiding his eyes behind the brim of his blue cap, his white labcoat finally removed and draped over an arm, while the shorter of the pair, still in his black vest and odd-looking sleeveless shirt, guided his brother away from the doors, a hand firmly gripping the younger's shoulder.

One of the watching groups from the wall instantly reacted to the sight, a teenage girl in matching blue top hat and cape tearing herself away from a middle-aged man in a dark hoodie and cyan beanie, racing across the hallway to launch herself at the younger of her brothers. Although surprised at first, Luke smiled appreciatively as he realised who it was burying her face in his chest, and hugged her back, Apollo hiding a sad smile as he finally released his grip on his brother. It took only another moment for Phoenix to catch up, and he exchanged a concerned look with Luke before pulling both his sons into a family hug, Trucy in the centre as her taller brothers and father encircled her. As far as the Wrights were concerned, no words needed to be said.

The last to leave the defendant lobby was Kristoph, gently closing the door behind him as the guards slowly disbanded, their job over. He gave a cursory nod to Clay, standing not far away after following Phoenix and Trucy, then turned to the Wrights as the family finished their hug, Phoenix looking to the attorney with a grateful smile. "Kristoph, thank you," he called as the other man approached, the three younger Wrights noticing his presence though Trucy refused to pull away from Luke, an arm tightly wrapped around his back as she clung to his side. Although he wouldn't admit it, Luke returned her gesture, draping his arm over her sister in a less-noticeable grip on her shoulder, keeping her close by.

Kristoph smiled, arms crossed. "It was my pleasure, Wright," he replied. "I won't argue with you on that," Kristoph agreed, giving his assistant a nod. "Although the net result of your... meddlings seemed to level out: You helped us get the full story out of Ms Gatti, though it turned out irrelevant to the murder, and your outburst to Mister Wildgrube gave us more information, even if it did nearly cost us the whole case first."

"Y-yeah," Apollo mumbled, now feeling even worse as he rubbed an arm with one hand. "Sorry, sir."

Kristoph only continued to smile. "No matter," he assured the young man. "This was a highly emotional case for you already; Handling trials in general will become easier with experience." His piece said, he returned his gaze to Phoenix. "We can discuss payment another time. Maybe you could come by my office sometime this week."
Phoenix laughed, his hands in the pocket at the front of his hoodie. "Of course, I can drop in on Apollo while I'm at it!" He gave his elder son a grin, getting only a sigh in return.

Kristoph nodded once. "Until then," he agreed with a smile, then turned to Apollo. "I don't expect you to return to the office now, Apollo," he pointed out. "I'll see you at the usual time tomorrow."

"Yes, sir," Apollo agreed.

Their conversation over, Kristoph walked off down the hallway, quickly disappearing from sight.

With the older man gone, Clay took the chance to jump at the Wrights, grinning enthusiastically as he gave Luke's shoulder a friendly shove. "Luke, congrats, dude!" He gave Trucy a knowing wink. "See? I told you 'Pollo would get him off!"

As Trucy giggled, Apollo rolled his eyes. "Clay, for the last time-!"

Luke raised an eyebrow at their friend. "Out of context, that sounds really suggestive," he pointed out, causing Phoenix to also burst into laughter as Clay paused, embarrassed. "We know what you mean though," he added, assuring his friend with a smile. "Thank you for coming, by the way."

Clay scoffed, waving off Luke's comment. "How could I not?" he replied. "One of my best friends is helping with a case in court, and the other is the guy accused of the murder? It's a no-brainer, c'mon."

Phoenix glanced behind Clay at the slowly forming group nearby, and gave his younger son a smile. "Luke, I think there are some other people here who want to talk to you."

"Hm?" Luke asked, and, as Clay jumped to the side, he finally looked out at the hallway and saw the group of six gathered nearby, most patiently waiting for their friend to finish greeting his family. "Oh!" he cried, gently pushing Trucy away as he stepped forward, walking towards the group before pausing, frowning uncertainly as his free hand played with the labcoat draped over his other arm. "H-have... you guys seen...?"

Duck sighed, shoving his hands in his pockets. "Seen Reindeer?" he filled in. "Not since they dragged him out of court." He jerked his head behind him, where Luke noticed Simba was standing, holding her shawl tight around her neck as she stared blankly off to one side. "Simba found out where you were, so we thought we'd check in with you first."

"You're okay, aren't you!?!" Poe burst in, jumping towards Luke with her visible eye wide in concern. "They didn't hurt you in jail, did they!?!"

Luke blinked at his friend in surprise. "I wasn't in jail," he explained. "That's what the trial was for!"

At the back of the group, Fox gasped, her hands flying to her face as she already looked close to tears. "You mean they're taking Reindeer to jail!?!"

"Of course not!" Kitty assured the younger woman, patting her shoulder comfortingly. "They'll have another trial for Reindeer. Maybe we could go watch that one, too!"

The tall woman's words reminded Luke of something, and he quickly cast his eyes over the assembled group, counting who was there. "Wait, the only missing person here is Bee," he pointed out, eyes wide. "Who's manning the shelter!?!"

Crow waved a hand, giving Luke an assuring look. "Don't worry about it; We fed everyone early, then locked up." He shrugged. "None of us wanted to miss out on this trial, not even Bee."
"He had school though," Duck explained, crossing his arms. "I told him under no circumstances was he to come. Haven't seen him today, so I think he listened to me."

Fox was tightly hugging herself as Kitty continued to comfort the younger woman. "W-what are we going to do?" she asked. "Mister Pound's dead, Reindeer's..." She pressed a hand to her mouth, muffling a sob.

"What else can we do?" Duck replied, turning to face the vet with a sad frown. "We carry on. It's what both of them would want, isn't it?"

"Without the boss?" Kitty asked, waving her free arm with eyes wide in disbelief. "He was the soul of our entire operation! How can we go on without him? Even grumpy old Reindeer's an indispensable member of the family!"

Luke turned his face to the floor. "You saw him in there," he quietly pointed out. "He was determined to make his confession. No-one could have stopped him."

Duck nodded, hands on his hips. "Reindeer was planning to retire soon, anyway. Fox and Northpaw can handle the veterinary business on their own. As for replacing the boss, well..." He shrugged, moving one hand to rub at the back of his neck in thought. "I was always standing in for him anyway, so I guess that job falls to me. What with me still being Winona's primary caretaker, I can't be in every day, not until she's old enough for preschool or something... I'd have to quit any front desk duties, too." Pausing, he looked around to Simba, who was still staring blankly off to the side. "Simba, you've been wanting to go full-time for a while. I know it's short notice, but you don't mind doing that immediately, do you?"

Surprised to be addressed, Simba stared up at Duck for a moment before shyly looking away again. Instead of speaking up, she stayed silent, only nodding in response.

Fox shook her head, still suppressing sobs. "If only I'd stopped him from going back!" she cried. "I should've made sure all three of us left together! Mister Pound might still be alive!"

Luke was the first to react, running to his co-worker with a determined frown, fists at his side and feet apart in the stance normally reserved for Chords of Steel sessions with his brother and best friend. "Don't say that!" he ordered, surprising Fox into staring back at him with wide eyes, her sobs halted. "Don't you dare dwell on what-ifs, not when there's work to be done! We want Mister Pound and Reindeer to be proud of us, don't we!?"

Although still in shock at his aggressive, unexpected pep-talk, Fox meekly nodded.

"Then there's no time to waste thinking about what-ifs!" Luke loudly continued, almost on the verge of shouting. "No matter how terrible the situation, how dark the circumstances, good things will always come! We've just got to keep our heads up until they do! Right, Fox?"

After a short pause, Fox nodded again, a small smile on her face. "R-right," she agreed. "Of course we do."

"Don't you worry!" Luke told her, a wide grin on his face as he added with a loud shout, "WE'RE FINE!"

Apollo smiled proudly, elbowing Clay at his side. "I taught him that," he said, only to get a playful glare and a punch in the arm in return.

Thread: My brother's trial

steeljusticelover, 12/01/2025 05:08:39PM
I know you guys have been waiting for an update, and I just got away from my family so Good news, we got my brother the 'not guilty' verdict.

Thunderdome, 12/01/2025 05:44:43PM
Congratulations, Steel! Is it just me, or do you not sound all that happy about it?

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN], 12/01/2025 05:46:30PM
I'm so sorry I could get there to support you in person, Steel! :( Is he okay!? How were the detective and prosecutor? I've never met them, but I've heard they're supposed to be pretty good...

steeljusticelover, 12/01/2025 05:51:24PM
You mean "couldn't", Blackbird? ;) He's fine. Detective Fulbright and Prosecutor Debeste do seem like nice people, though it was hard to see that when they were convinced they had the right person on trial.
It's more how the trial ended that has me bummed. My brother was especially upset because the actual culprit was a co-worker he admired an awful lot, and his workplace is such a small family thing that all of them were kinda in shock. Any kind of celebrating feels bittersweet.

Liztropical, 12/01/2025 06:14:04PM
That sounds absolutely awful! I'm so sorry, Steel! Do you want to talk about it with someone in private?

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN], 12/01/2025 06:15:22PM
Oh, yes, "couldn't", sorry :( You knew what I meant at least. I guess my brain's all screwy with the excitement of the move and the engagement and everything!

Precious-Fairy, 12/01/2025 06:50:53PM
SteelJusticeLover isn't even telling the whole truth! He thinks he made mistakes in the trial that almost got his brother convicted, but everything turned out okay in the end, so they obviously weren't that bad! He was probably as amazing in the courtroom as Mr Nick always was!

steeljusticelover, 12/01/2025 06:55:27PM
This was my first time actually trying to help instead of just assisting my boss, and I sucked at it. My first attempt was probably always going to suck. And don't you dare compare me to Mr Wright when you weren't even in court to see me screw up, because you were supposed to be in school!

Precious-Fairy, 12/01/2025 07:01:25PM, EDITED 12/01/2025 07:08:35PM
You-know-who wasn't in school, either! Why was she allowed to go to the trial and I wasn't?
Edit: Oops, sorry SteelJusticeLover...

steeljusticelover, 12/01/2025 07:06:27PM
You know that full well and I thought we already discussed NO REAL NAMES PRECIOUS

Drewby, 12/01/2025 07:08:22PM

QUOTE: Precious-Fairy, 12/01/2025 07:01:25PM
Trucy wasn't in school, either! Why was she allowed to go to Luke's trial and I wasn't?

Ooh, who's Trucy? ;D You got a girlfriend, Precious? Or is she attached to this 'Luke'?
Also, I've always meant to ask, why do you keep calling Mr Wright "Mr Nick"? That's kinda weird.

Liztropical, 12/01/2025 07:15:30PM
I think it's safe to assume they're not in a relationship, Drewby. Even if they were, it's not really any of our business.
As for the "Mr Nick" thing... I think Precious said once that it was a nickname she's just always called him since she was young.

Precious-Fairy, 12/01/2025 07:35:27PM
Please forget you saw that, Drewby. I didn't mean to post it, I'd just forgotten about the 'no real names' agreement I made with SteelJusticeLover. All I'll say is that 'you-know-who' is a friend, like a sister to me, and that's all she is to the other person you mention too.
Um, yes, I call Mr Wright that sometimes because it's what I've always called him. It feels wrong to call him anything else, even here.

steeljusticelover, 12/01/2025 07:47:36PM
Well then, cat's out of the bag. */ Trucy and Luke are my siblings. Happy?

Drewby, 12/01/2025 08:35:23PM
Too late, I'm looking up these names! >D
(I'm VERY happy, thank you ;D)
Wow, I looked up this trial myself by the prosecutor name, and it does look like it was rough. By the by, we're your friends here, Steel. If you have anything you want to tell us about, we won't judge you for it.

Do I have to shut this thread down? No prying into personal lives, Drewby!

Sigh... Why not, today was hard enough with that trial. And I should be going to bed now to be ready for work tomorrow morning...

Don't worry, I'm not sharing anything I find ;)
This is some interesting stuff I've uncovered! I'm almost tempted to blackmail you with it, Steel ;)

You have no idea how not-funny that is, Drewby.
Or, really, you should have every idea how not-funny that is.

Steel is a defense attorney, Drewby, remember? That kind of thing is serious business for them.

Pfft, okay. Your getting off lightly, Mr JusticeLover. ;)

Okay I think we need to start holding interventions for people who keep prying into personal lives. ;)
First Dime, now Steel? When will the madness end!
Sorry to hear about your brother, Steel. I hope everything going better now that ordeal is over, at least?

Everything's going much better now, thank you Pocky. ;)
I actually have an uncle in the prosecutor's office that I spoke to on my lunch break today. He's promised to keep an eye on what's going on too.
BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN], 12/02/2025 06:14:55PM
Ooh, I know who you mean by that! You can definitely trust what that particular uncle of yours says, pal. ;)

---

Drewby, 12/02/2025 07:46:12PM
Wait now I'm confused...
Unrelated, does Mr Wright have any siblings?

---

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN], 12/02/2025 08:00:41PM
This is a public warning, Drewby. I've sent you a PM. Please reply to it.

---

steeljusticelover, 12/02/2025 08:12:06PM
I think this particular question is okay to answer, though: He's an only child, but he has a few close friends that his kids refer to as 'Aunt' or 'Uncle'. ;) It's totally unrelated to this thread of course, but I think it's an interesting fact on the subject of uncles.

Should we be worried about Drewby? :(

I don't think so. I highly doubt she's figured out who you are, and I think most of the forum already knows who I am by now anyway. The secrecy's just tradition at this point. You'd think, being a member of the forum and knowing who my dad is, she'd remember the Engarde trial and the one reason Dad was involved with it to begin with.

It's my fault she found out if she has. I'm so sorry I forgot about the no-names thing! D:

Don't blame yourself, Pearl. We all make mistakes. I made plenty in court the other day :) .

Stop saying that, I'm sure you were great!

You weren't there, so you can't insist I was. Everyone except you seems to have accepted I did some stupid things I regret and am resolving never to do them again.

:(

Oh fine, just for you: I was really amazing in that courtroom, just like Dad used to be :/ .

:)

By the way, if Drewby ever does try anything, you still have Blackbirds number don't you? .

Yes, I still have that. I should contact her then?

Yep. If you can't by phone, just PM her on the forum. She's pretty good at responding.
Okay, I will. Talk to you later, Apollo!

You're getting pretty careless with that secret of yours, Steel ;)
How'd your meeting with Mr Edgeworth go?

C'mon, we all know by now it's practically open knowledge... not that I'd feel comfortable discussing it openly just yet.

It wasn't really much of a meeting. I just had some questions for him that he answered, and I didn't have much time away from work to waste.

You couldn't tell your boss it was work-related? Given it was about Luke's case I assume

Not really. It's a long story, but I didn't want my boss to know about it. Uncle Edgeworth isn't someone he thinks highly of, let's just say.

Oh geeze, better not introduce him to Dick then. ;) You let me know if you need anything too, okay?

Haha, sure, Blackbird :).
An Uncle's Advice

Uncle Edgeworth, I know you're busy, but will you be free to talk over lunch? I need to talk to you about something and I'd rather do it in person.

I can make time for you, Apollo. I assume this is about the trial yesterday?

Yes, sort of. I... need advice, and I don't think I can talk my dad about it.

I understand. My office is on the 12th floor of the prosecutors building, room 1202. It shouldn't be too hard to find me.

December 2, 12:45PM
High Prosecutors' Offices
Room 1202

The reaction to the timid knocking on the door was a prompt call of "Enter," and it took only a moment longer for said door to creak open, the person behind hesitantly peeking in.

Miles Edgeworth smiled as he saw the familiar face, standing from his desk. "Ah, Apollo, I thought it might be you. Come in, then."

Apollo Wright nervously grinned as he entered the office, pausing to close the door behind him. "Thank you for agreeing to see me, Uncle Edgeworth. I-I know you're busy and everything..."

"Nonsense," the prosecutor insisted, walking to the sofa against the wall and gesturing for the younger man to join him. "Something is clearly troubling you, and it's something you cannot talk to either Gavin or your father about." He smiled as he sat down, Apollo blushing as he rushed to join him. "I would assume in that case that it is regarding your father's suspicions of your current employer?"

Apollo rubbed at the back of his neck, making himself comfortable on the red sofa beside his uncle. "I thought Dad had probably told you about that," he replied. "I told Mister Gavin I was meeting with my friend Clay for lunch, so I don't have a lot of time, but I did have a couple of questions I wanted to ask you..." He paused, shrugging as he looked away, and admitted, "ones I don't think I could ask Dad about."

Edgeworth thought a moment, then nodded, arms crossed as he faced his nephew. "Go ahead."

Apollo paused, frowning to himself. "Um, this is probably a dumb question," he quietly admitted, "but... Mister Gavin was telling us about Prosecutor Debeste, and..."

"What did he tell you?" Edgeworth asked, no kind of judgement on the question in his expression.

"That his father was a Chief Prosecutor," Apollo answered, beginning to finally relax a little, "and the Chairman of the P.I.C., and got convicted for, um, murder and forgery." He held up a hand, mentally counting off the information he'd been given. "Prosecutor Debeste used his father's influence to cheat the system, getting high grades he didn't earn and even his badge, and when the truth came out, it was because of his father they didn't take away any of that, letting him keep prosecuting like nothing had happened." He sheepishly looked up at Edgeworth. "Mister Gavin seemed to think it was true, but..."

As Apollo trailed off, Edgeworth smiled. "And you had to ask me this because it was me who told your father Sebastian was trustworthy," he realised. When Apollo blushed and nodded, Edgeworth leaned back in his seat, thinking to himself. "As you likely suspected, Gavin only told you half the story, and the facts have become a little twisted in the retelling. Blaise Debeste did indeed use his influence as Chief Prosecutor and Chairman of the P.I.C. to get away with a lot of illegal doings, including the inflating of his son's grades, and the P.I.C. likely used their knowledge of him in their decision to not take Sebastian's badge once the whole terrible truth came out... but poor Sebastian wasn't aware of any of it."

Apollo's eyebrows shot up. "What?"

Edgeworth directed a gentle smile at his surprised nephew, continuing, "If you'd ever seen the two of them interacting back then, you'd know how much the elder Debeste walked all over his son, endlessly mocking his intelligence and only driving Sebastian to try ever harder to earn his father's respect." He shook his head, frowning at the memory. "He was heartbroken when he learned his father had instructed his teachers to inflate his grades behind his back. Not even Sebastian thought he should keep his badge once Blaise Debeste was finally put away."

"So," Apollo asked, frowning in confusion, "why'd they let him keep it?"

"Most of the P.I.C.'s members had known Sebastian since he was young, and were well aware of his relationship with his father," Edgeworth replied with a smile. "I believe they pitied him, in part. Perhaps they thought any raw knowledge he hadn't truly picked up from his schooling was adequately made up for with experience." He chuckled. "Regardless of their decision, Sebastian did not prosecute any more cases for a number of years."

Apollo crossed his arms, thinking. "He... took a study break?" he realised.

"Correct," Edgeworth said, resting a hand on the sofa cushions beneath them. "He returned to Themis and retook his classes and exams, so he felt he had truly earned the badge he so proudly wears. That red blazer of his, I believe that came from his original years of study; A gift given to the top scorer of each class."

"And he still wears it?" Apollo asked, finding himself impressed. "Even though those marks were faked? What, is it a self-reminder or something?"

Edgeworth shrugged. "You'd have to ask him," he admitted. "When he returned to the Prosecutor's Office, he was reluctant to take on any cases alone for a long time. Franziska and myself mentored him when we were able, but eventually he weaned himself off our support."

Apollo couldn't resist a smile at the thought of his 'Auntie Franziska' as a teacher, complete with whip, though did muse to himself that many of Sebastian's gestures with his baton had been reminiscent of her use of said weapon. He could still remember the echoing crack around the courtroom from the few of Franziska's trials against Phoenix he'd witnessed as a teenager. "Mister Debeste came by to see Luke after the trial," Apollo admitted, the smile fading as he recalled the conversation. "Said he knew what it was like to... how did he put it? Find out someone you idolised for a long time didn't deserve it."

Edgeworth nodded. "He would have been referring to his father, I imagine," he agreed.

"He also said he'd look over the evidence again to make sure he had the right person," Apollo continued, staring at the floor in thought, "just for Luke." His frown deepened. 'If only there was something I could do...'

In the long pause that followed, Edgeworth studied his nephew's face carefully. "You don't think he does," he stated more than asked.

Apollo almost jumped at being read so easily, and meekly nodded. "That was my other question," he admitted. "The... evidence that Mister Gavin presented, that incriminated Mister Rei-, um, Mister Wildgrube." He frowned for a moment, pondering how best to present his concerns. "I'm pretty sure Dad suspects this too, but he would almost definitely say to hang on to my proof and wait. I guess I find it harder to see Luke so distraught over this than he does."

Edgeworth closed his eyes, a serious expression on his face as he picked up on the young man's choice of words. "You can prove he forged that evidence."

Apollo nodded. "Mister Gavin said he found those keys in the bathroom. This morning he told me he went back the day after we investigated together, which was why I didn't know about it." He paused a moment. "After Luke found the body, he rang Dad to ask what to do, and Dad told him to take photos... so, he kinda took a tonne of them, all over the shelter." As Edgeworth looked up curiously, Apollo pulled out his phone, flicking at the screen to bring up the one in particular he was thinking of. "I spent a few hours copying them the day before the trial, but I didn't have the time to look at them closely until last night." He held up the phone, showing his uncle one photo in particular of the shelter's small toilet. "Mister Gavin said there was a key behind the toilet, and one under the sink, but this photo Luke took shows there was nothing there on the night of the murder!"

The prosecutor shook his head. "That's not proof on its own," he pointed out.

"I know," Apollo agreed, flicking through to another photo, this one of the second storeroom, hidden behind a locked door. "Then I found this photo. See that safe in the far corner?" Edgeworth was beginning to nod when he registered that the large, black safe in the photo had something small and silver sitting on top, and frowned. Apollo grinned as he saw his uncle had noticed. "It's the keys!" he explained. "Mister Gavin must have noticed and grabbed them when we went in there the day after the murder!"

"Have the police seen these photos of Luke's?" Edgeworth asked, still frowning in thought.

"Supposedly," Apollo replied, putting his phone away again. "Luke handed his phone over to them before he was arrested, then I had to get it back for him the next day. Detective Fulbright said something about not needing to take many pictures themselves, though Luke didn't take a single one of the crime scene. I don't think he could bear to look at it."

Edgeworth didn't reply for a long moment, deep in thought. "You are correct that your father would say to hold on to this," he eventually said. "Although this is very convincing proof, it's not enough that we could say any kind of definite result... other than you being fired and Gavin cutting himself off from your family entirely."

"If not worse, the way Dad sees it," Apollo added, gesturing with one arm. "But on the other hand, bringing it forward would prove it wasn't Mister Wildgrube who killed Mister Pound!"

"And put the suspicion back on Luke," Edgeworth pointed out, an eyebrow raised at his nephew. "Proof of forged evidence would be enough to declare a mistrial and put him back in front of that judge. Your family would have little choice but to rely on a third party to defend him, given your lack of experience, and I doubt things would go any better for you a second time around."
Although shocked at the frank statement, Apollo had to admit Edgeworth was telling the truth. "But I know we could work it out if we were able to question Ms Gatti!" he insisted, hands tightening into fists. "She was lying through her teeth on the stand, but we couldn't prove anything, so she just got away with it!" He frowned in thought, looking away. "Actually, I bet it was her. It wasn't Luke and it wasn't Mister Wildgrube, so it had to be her."

Edgeworth crossed his arms, thinking carefully. "I would advise you have more evidence than that before confronting anyone," he said, then gave Apollo a serious look. "Regardless, what you do next is your decision. Either hide this evidence and leave Gatti be at the cost of Wildgrube's freedom, or release it to the courts and lose Gavin's trust, as well as, should things go wrong, Luke's freedom and any hope of justice for your father." He closed his eyes. "Either path will be a hard one to take; Unfortunately, life has a tendency to not be so easy."

Apollo wasn't sure how to react, staring back at his uncle in a long moment of silence. With his options, and the potential consequences, laid out so frankly, it felt like he was stuck between a rock and a hard place... nowhere to turn, and no happy ending in sight. "There's... no third option?" he quietly asked.

Edgeworth shook his head, giving Apollo a sympathetic look. "Not unless the police happen to discover this on their own," he told his nephew. "Even then, all they would do is declare a mistrial and put Luke back under suspicion. They wouldn't permit Gavin to defend him a second time in that case."

Apollo sighed, his eyes falling to the floor. The more he heard, the more bleak his, and Luke's, future was looking.

"My door will always be open for you if you wish to talk again," Edgeworth softly continued. "I hope what we've discussed today has been of help."

"Y-yeah," Apollo quickly replied, giving his uncle a nod and a forced smile of gratitude. "It has. Thanks, Uncle Edgeworth."

At that moment, there was a rapid knock on the office door, which was promptly opened by a familiar young man with brown hair, his attention on a handful of papers in his hands. "Mister Edgeworth, I was hoping to-" As he looked up, his movement stopped dead, and he stared wide-eyed at the pair standing up from the sofa, looking back at him. "O-oh, I didn't realise you had company..."

Edgeworth chuckled, stepping forward and seeming not to notice Apollo's shocked staring at the visitor. "It's no trouble, Sebastian. I believe the two of you are acquainted already?"

The two stared at each other for a moment before Apollo looked away, rubbing the back of his neck. "I-it's okay, I was about to go anyway." He looked up at his uncle. "Thanks again, Uncle Edgeworth."

"It was no problem, Apollo," Edgeworth insisted with a smile. "Pass my congratulations on to Luke, would you? And my regards to your father and sister, as well."

Grinning, Apollo nodded. "Sure," he agreed. With that, he headed towards the door, pausing only as Debeste stepped aside to let him pass.

"It was 'Wright', wasn't it?" Debeste asked as Apollo was moving to the door.

"Yeah," the young attorney replied with a nod, pausing. "Apollo Wright." He looked away, again rubbing at the back of his neck. "Um, thank you, for what you said to my brother after the trial yesterday. It really meant a lot to him."

Debeste also looked away, clutching at his papers awkwardly. "N-no problem," he insisted, nevertheless hiding a smile. "Anything to make up for wrongfully arresting him like that."

Apollo nodded, staring at the floor, but made no move to leave just yet. After a moment, he bit his lip to hide a grin, looking up at the young prosecutor. "Y'know, I guess even Debeste turns out to not always be Wright, huh?"

Edgeworth scoffed in disapproval, rolling his eyes, but Debeste, after a second or two of shocked staring, slowly smiled and laughed. "Yeah," he agreed with a grateful grin. "I guess so!"

Debeste waved to the three junior police officers he'd personally picked out, silently instructing they stick close as the small group approached the apartment. "Thirty-nine," the prosecutor read aloud, gesturing to the number on the door. "This is the address on file." With that, he reached out with his gloved hand and rapped his knuckles on the wooden surface. After a moment or two, one of the police officers pointed out the doorbell on the neighbouring wall, and Debeste sheepishly pressed the button, listening to the distant buzzing as it rang somewhere inside.

"Awright, awright, I'm comin'!" came a muffled call from within, and the thudding of approaching feet echoed through the floor. After a short moment of silence, they could hear clinking of small chains, then the door was abruptly pulled open, revealing a surly old man beyond, who glared out at the prosecutor and the three police officers fanned behind him. "Whaddaya want?" he grunted.

Although a little taken aback by the man's attitude, Debeste steeled himself and asked, "Mister Wildgrube?"

"No," the old man snapped, and slammed the door in their faces.

The group of four stood in shocked silence for a very long moment. Eventually, one of the three police officers nervously raised a hand. "Uh, Prosecutor Debeste...?" he asked. "What do we do now?"

Debeste frowned, unsure how to answer. After a second of thought, he knocked again on the door, hoping the rude occupant of the apartment hadn't ventured too far. "Do you at least know where Mister Wildgrube lives?" he called.

"No!" the old man repeated, shouting from somewhere inside. "Go away!"

As Debeste stared blankly at the door, the three police officers behind him exchanged confused glances. One of them, a young man with black hair sweeping down over his face, nervously raised a hand. "Maybe the shelter had the wrong address on file...?" he suggested.

The prosecutor looked back at the uniformed man behind him, taking a moment to recall his name. "A good point, Holmes," he admitted. "If the occupant of this house won't help us, I suppose we'll have to call Detective Fulbright and ask him to check with Gagnon for us." With that, he turned and walked back towards the elevator, his red jacket sweeping dramatically behind him as it hung over his shoulders. "In the meantime, we can move on to the other person on our list..."
Debeste glared at the door number as he approached, his three uniformed lackeys (for lack of a better word) behind him. "Mister Wildgrube!" he cried, pressing his finger firmly to the doorbell as he listened to it ring. "We know it's you in there!"

A stomping echoed from within, followed by the clinking of tiny chains, and the old man again opened the door, looking out at the prosecutor and three police officers with an unsurprised glare. "How many times do I have to tell you people to leave me alone!?"

"I know we have the right place!" Debeste continued, ignoring the man's protests. "Don't deny that you know what the name 'Rudolf Wildgrube' means!"

The old man paused, glancing away as he bit back a laugh, failing to hide a smirk. "Well, I know 'Rudolf' means 'famous wolf'. 'Wildgrube' means somethin' like 'lives by an animal den', but I'd have to look it up to be sure."

Debeste tried not to glare at the man. "Lying to police is a punishable offence!" he loudly announced. He wasn't entirely sure how true his claim was, but no-one was about to contradict him. "Now are you Rudolf Wildgrube or not!?"

The man scoffed as he leaned against the door-frame. "Good thing I wasn't lying to police then, just to you," he pointed out with a grin. Before Debeste could do more than tense up in anger, the old man continued, "Yeah, that's me. They call me 'Reindeer' 'round the shelter, though. Did you want somethin', kid?"

Sighing in relief to finally have the man's co-operation, Debeste decided to let the old vet's remarks slide. "Mister Wildgrube," he continued, "I'm sure by now you've heard of this murder we're investigating."

Reindeer frowned, the suddenly serious look almost unnerving Debeste more than the joking one, though he wasn't sure why. "Yeah, I got that call. They found the boss bludgeoned to death in his office, right?"

Debeste nodded. "We understand you were at the shelter yesterday," he said. "Could you tell us about it?"

"Nope," the old man immediately replied.

Debeste wasn't sure how to react to the total opposite of what he'd been expecting to hear. "Uh...!?"

"Wasn't working yesterday," Reindeer clarified, the corners of his lips beginning to twitch upwards in a smile. "Can't help ya, sorry."

"B-but!" Debeste tried to object.

With a totally unapologetic smile, Reindeer brightly cried, "Come again!" and closed his front door with a bang.

The prosecutor and police officers all stood in shock for several seconds, before one of the officers, a blonde woman, scoffed to herself. "But we have two testimonies saying he was! What does he think he's doing!?"
"E-exactly!" Debeste agreed, glancing back at the officer as he briefly struggled to remember her name. "Th-that's true, Truman!" Spinning back to the door, he banged his fist on the wood with a glare, reasoning the man inside couldn't have gone far. "We have testimonies saying you were at work yesterday, Mister Wildgrube!" he shouted. "Come out and talk to us!"

He could hear Reindeer scoffing inside, not far from the door. "And who said that, huh?" he asked. "How d'you know they weren't mistaken?"

"Because three separate people agreeing on something generally means it's the truth!" Debeste shot back. "And it was exactly three other people, not including the victim, who were with you yesterday evening! Now come out and talk!"

"My other question?" Reindeer only cockily replied, prompting for more information. "Who says I was at the shelter yesterday?"

Debeste shot a disbelieving glance at the officers behind him. One of them, apparently taking the look as a call for help, pulled out his notebook. "Wright, Bagley and Gatti all agreed you were," he explained. "Also, I believe Gagnon added he had seen you at the shelter that morning."

"Never heard of 'em!" Reindeer called back, much too quickly for Debeste's liking.

"Thank you, Gunnar," the prosecutor muttered in the young officer's direction, then returned his glare to the vet's door. "How can you not recognise the names of your colleagues!?" he cried. "You've worked alongside them for... who knows how long!" He hadn't actually asked, the information having not come to mind before now, but he made a mental note to check later.

Reindeer laughed. "Wow, you really are an idiot!" he cried.

Debeste froze, his hands clutching his baton. A familiar voice echoed in his thoughts, "Honestly, you really are a useless idiot." He shook his head to clear the voice from his mind, but the pain of the memory lingered.

"They won't recognise my name either!" Reindeer continued, unnoticing of the prosecutor's reaction on the other side of the door. "We use nicknames!" He paused to laugh again. "Come back with something more... provable. Then we can talk."

Debeste stared at the door for several long moments, but didn't see it. Behind him, the three police officers exchanged worried looks. "Prosecutor Debeste, sir?" Ernest Holmes meekly spoke up. "Are you alright?"

The prosecutor nodded, avoiding the trio's gazes as he struggled to blink back tears, only the knowledge that the vet behind the door had no connection to Blaise Debeste keeping him calm. "I suppose we'll need written proof to present to him before he'll agree to talk to us again..." Sebastian quietly announced, then turned and walked away.

Debeste felt much calmer as he approached his witness's door, even though it was now for the third time in one day with still no new information from the man. In fact, he was even able to calmly smile as he pressed the doorbell, waiting for Reindeer to appear with a curious look before brandishing the piece of paper in his hands. "A written statement from one Vixen Bagley," he announced. "We have similar statements from Drake Gagnon and Luke Wright too, if you wish to inspect them." He decided not to mention that they had not gotten one from their other witness, as they had been unable to contact Simba since her questioning earlier that day. With the three officers he had grabbed at random standing close behind him, he felt a lot more confident in his case now than he had only a few hours before.

Reindeer frowned. "So?"

Debeste smirked. "So, three pieces of proof that you were indeed working the night of the crime." He held out Fox's statement, which Reindeer snatched out of his hands to read. "Will you answer our questions now?"

It took a moment for the old man to respond, sternly reading over the statement before sighing in defeat, clutching to the paper in his hands. "Guess so. Sure, I was working last night. What about it?"

Not allowing himself to feel relieved just yet, Debeste instructed, "Please tell us everything you saw and heard that night in the shelter, from about six o'clock onwards." He had prepared his request to be very specific, knowing the old man was likely to twist his words and further inhibit their fight for justice. He could only hope it was enough.

Reindeer thought a moment, looking away, then reluctantly nodded, solemnly looking Debeste in the eye. "I'm sure Northpaw, Fox and Simba already told you about how we all met up in reception around that time." Debeste quickly nodded, hoping the three nicknames were indeed the three witnesses he was thinking of, though he couldn't attach the names to specific individuals. "Northpaw always stays a little late, though we weren't sure if he would yesterday. Way too big a heart for those critters, I tell you," Reindeer continued, arms crossed and eyes closed as he mused on the previous night. "The boss has to leave last, since he locks up. Simba, she weren't far from leaving herself, since she was closin' up reception and turning off the lights." He paused, seeming to ponder on his next words, then opened his eyes again, looking up to the ceiling. "Fox and I both head to the bus stop after work, so we usually walk together, for safety."

Debeste nodded, waiting to hear the follow-up he had been most desperate to question the vet about. "And then?"

"Went home," Reindeer said, once again giving the young prosecutor that same infuriating smile.

The three officers and lone prosecutor stared at Reindeer in shock. "N-no, you didn't!" Gunnar sputtered.

Reindeer laughed. "Course I did!" he replied, gesturing to the domicile behind him. "I'm home right now, ain't I?"

Debeste's shocked expression hardened into a glare. "But you went back to the shelter first!" he explained, pointing angrily at the paper still in Reindeer's hand. "Bagley said so right there in her statement!"

"What statement?" Reindeer asked with a grin, staring Debeste dead in the eye as he tossed the paper over his shoulder, the breeze blowing it slowly down the hall at the vet's back and well out of the prosecutor's reach. "I don't see a statement! Guess she must've been mistaken!"

Debeste could feel his eye starting to twitch.
"Welp!" Reindeer cried with a cheerful grin and wave. "See you nuts later!" With that, he closed his door.

The three officers watched their superior shake in rage for a long awkward moment. "S-sir?" Ernest spoke up. "What now, sir?"

Debeste said nothing as he spun on his heel and stalked away. "I'll show you," he growled. "Right as soon as I work it out."

It had taken longer than Debeste would have liked to find the piece of definitive evidence that Reindeer couldn't argue away, but, paper in hand and moon rising in the dark sky, he led Ernest, Gunnar and Truman right back to the old vet's door, banging on it with a fist and a triumphant grin. "Wildgrube!" he called. "Come out and tell us the truth, under pain of the law!"

"Geeze!" came a cry from inside, and the door was opened by a rather frazzled-looking Reindeer, who glared out at the four in surprise. "There's no need to shout! You could wake the dead with that racket!" "Tell us the truth, Wildgrube!" Debeste repeated, waving the paper in his hand at the man. "Do you know what this is?"

For a moment, Reindeer appeared to be contemplating the smart answer of 'a piece of paper', but seemed to reconsider once he gingerly took it from the young prosecutor, his eyes widening in surprise.

"The records show you used your keycard to return to the shelter after closing," Debeste explained, gloating his hard-won win over the troublesome witness. "Anything you saw or heard would be extremely vital to this case, so I suggest you tell us the whole truth, right now."

Reindeer stared at the keycard records for a long moment before sighing, only looking sad as he handed the paper back to Debeste, although the prosecutor found it hard to feel sorry for the man after spending all day chasing this moment up. "Sure," the vet admitted. "I... left my keys behind, somewhere in the shelter." He rubbed at the back of his neck, staring at the floor. "I realised once Fox and I left, so I went back for 'em. Didn't see anyone, though; Northpaw would've been with the animals still, and the boss in his office, and Simba... probably had gone home already, since I didn't see her."

Debeste nodded, briefly glancing behind him to check Gunnar was taking notes as asked. "What else did you see?" he prompted the vet.

Reindeer didn't answer immediately. "Nothing, actually," he admitted, then looked up with a smile. "'Cept my keys, of course. They were in reception, so I picked 'em up and headed off again." He shrugged. "Fox's bus had come while I was grabbin' 'em, so I missed seeing her before I got home."

Behind Debeste, Truman gave Reindeer a suspicious glare. "Are you sure you found them there?" she asked.
Reindeer just laughed. "Course I found them!" he replied, gesturing to his home. "How could I open my front door without my keys?"

Truman crossed her arms. "Could've had a spare, or asked the landlord," she pointed out.

"Well, I didn't need to," Reindeer insisted, frowning at the young woman. "Besides, I went back specifically looking for my keys. Why would I have left without them?"

"He has a point," Debeste said, folding up the keycard records still in his grip, then turning around and handing them to Ernest for safe-keeping, Truman looking away guiltily. "Although it's a shame to not have anything more definitive, there's nothing we can do if Mister Wildgrube didn't see anything." He turned to the old man with a grateful smile. "Thank you for finally telling us the truth."

Reindeer shrugged, carefully avoiding eye contact. "Whatever," he mumbled.

It would be another two days before Reindeer finally regretted not admitting the entire truth that evening.
Apollo gingerly opened the door to his brother's room, unsure exactly what he'd find within but driven regardless by the concern that had only heightened when Phoenix and Trucy told him where the middle child of the family was upon his arrival that night. "Luke?" he whispered, and quickly spotted the tall young man sprawled across his bed against the wall, his back to the door and his head buried under his pillow. Softly sighing, Apollo stepped into the room and gently closed the door, tip-toeing to the bed. "Are you okay?" he asked, a little louder.

Luke suddenly jerked up with a cry, sending his pillow and a teddy bear Apollo hadn't previously noticed flying as the young man sat up, looking around with wide eyes before spotting his older brother and, after a moment to register what had happened, relaxing. "Oh, it's just you," he said, reaching down for the pillow that had landed on the floor. "You surprised me."

Apollo smiled, walking over to sit at Luke's side as his younger brother moved into a comfortable sitting position, busying himself rearranging his pillow. "How've you been doing?" he asked.

Luke sighed, still facing away from his brother. "I'm fine," he quietly insisted. "I'm not in jail. The shelter is still in business. I have my job to go back to tomorrow."

Frowning in concern, Apollo rested a hand on Luke's shoulder. "It's okay," he said. "You're allowed to still be upset about Mister Reindeer."

Luke suddenly choked, and Apollo briefly worried the twenty-year-old would burst into sobs. "I-it's not just that," he whispered, and slowly turned to look at his older brother with eyes shining with barely restrained tears. "I... I went to the detention centre this morning."

"You did?" Apollo asked, surprised. "To visit Mister Reindeer?"

Luke nodded, turning his head towards the floor as he squeezed his eyes shut, beginning to restrain sobs. "He... he didn't want to see me! The guards said he didn't want to talk to me... I wasn't let into the visitor's room, or anything!"

Apollo watched Luke in surprise for a moment, then moved a little closer to pat his crying brother's back. "I'm sure he just didn't want you to worry about him," he told the younger man.

"But it's not fair!" Luke cried, turning to his brother with eyes red from tears. "You know he's innocent, don't you?" he asked, a desperate plea for reassurance. "Reindeer would never kill anyone, not for any reason! The evidence is wrong!"
Apollo sadly stared back at his brother's tear-stained face. Knowing how much pain his brother was in, he couldn't bring himself to lie and say Reindeer was the murderer, but he also knew to even imply Luke's offhand claim was correct right now would only make the situation worse for all of them: Luke would demand the entire truth, then shout it from the rooftops, shoving it in everyone's faces with no regards for his own safety until Reindeer was exonerated. The young vet would go to jail, and cut the Wright family off from Kristoph with his proof the attorney had forged the evidence that had incriminated Luke's friend.

Apollo was suddenly glad he had deleted those photos off Luke's phone in the process of copying them for his files.

In the face of his brother's long silence, Luke's resolve faltered, and he looked away with a sigh, drying his tears on the teddy bear in his arms. "S-sorry," he muttered. "I know, he..." He shook his head, turning away from Apollo. "I just want to be alone right now," he quietly told his brother. "I'm sorry."

Unable to make himself speak, Apollo only mutely nodded. He got to his feet and slowly walked across to the door, leaving as quietly as he had entered. Once out in the hallway, he leaned against the bedroom door, staring across at the wall opposite. All he could see in his mind's eye was his little brother hiding his tears in that battered teddy bear, and he had to fight the urge to turn around and comfort the heartbroken young man in the room behind him with the truth that his beloved mentor was indeed as innocent as he thought... It was only the contrasting image of Luke back in the detention centre that kept him where he was.

Apollo heard the thudding of slow, heavy footsteps coming up the stairs, and quickly recognised the rhythm as belonging to Phoenix. He waited until the footsteps had entered the hallway, then looked up into his father's concerned face.

"Is he okay?" Phoenix asked, his eyes flicking to the door behind his eldest son.

Apollo nodded, hugging himself as he took a few steps towards his father. "A-are... W-we're doing the right thing, aren't we?" he quietly asked, almost feeling like he might take Luke's lead and cry himself.

Phoenix watched him for a moment or two, worry for both of his sons evident in his face. "We are," he whispered in reply, stepping forward and resting a hand on Apollo's shoulder. "It may not feel like it, but we are."

After a moment or two, Apollo nodded, then stepped forward and wrapped his arms around Phoenix in a meek request for a hug. Phoenix didn't waste any time in returning it.

A minute later, Apollo found himself sitting on the bed in his father's room, Phoenix checking one last time that Trucy was still downstairs before closing the door and sitting at Apollo's side. "Edgeworth filled me in on this proof of forged evidence you have," he quietly told the young man, arms crossed nonchalantly.

Apollo resisted a wince, looking away guiltily. "O-oh," he mumbled.

"To be honest, I suspected those keys were faked somehow," Phoenix continued. "It was too perfect... and the look on your face in court, that pretty much said it all."
Apollo nodded. After a pause, he looked up to give his father an apologetic look. "I-I was planning on telling you-

"Of course you were," Phoenix interrupted, giving Apollo an understanding smile. "A young attorney needing advice, it's only logical to go to someone who still has a badge." When Apollo still looked guilty, Phoenix chuckled. "Believe me, I know first-hand you don't always feel comfortable talking to your parents about certain things. I'm just glad you made sure to go to someone who was already in on the secret."

After some effort, Apollo managed a half-smile. "I looked over my evidence some more on the way over," he said, pulling his tablet computer out of his vest. "If the police work out on their own that Mister Gavin forged those keys, I think we could still get Luke off."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, watching the tablet's screen as his son began to flick through it. "Luke's photos prove the keys were faked, right?" he asked.

Apollo nodded, grinning as he realised Edgeworth had apparently filled Phoenix in on the details, saving Apollo the trouble of explaining it all again twice in one day. "Yep," he replied, then landed on the photo he had taken of the smudged bloodstain on the office floor. "You remember this?" he asked his father, and, upon receiving a nod in answer, reached into his pocket and pulled out the small coin he had found on the reception floor, having totally forgotten about the object in the stress of the then-upcoming trial. "Ms Fox told me that receptionist, Simba, had several coins just like these on her necklace, then, when she appears in court, she claims her cat destroyed that necklace, scratching up her neck in the process. And on the same night as the murder, too!"

Phoenix rubbed his chin, deep in thought. "That could still just be a co-incidence," he pointed out. "An unlikely one, but still. Where did that one you have come from, anyway?"

"I stepped on it," Apollo replied with a smile. "It was on the shelter floor."

"Hmm," Phoenix hummed to himself in thought. "So you think it was Mister Pound who scratched up her neck, destroyed the necklace, and scattered coins like this on the floor?"

Apollo nodded, glad his train of thought wasn't an unreasonable one to follow. "She collected them up, tried to hide they'd been there, probably cleaned them in the bathroom at the same time as the bat, but she was smart enough then to try and take them home with her." He grinned, holding up the lone coin he had discovered. "This one she probably dropped accidentally on her way out. Plus, I went through Luke's photos again, and I'm pretty sure I can see it still on the floor in reception!"

Phoenix stared at the coin for a moment, then smiled. "Alright then, let's check for blood, shall we?"

Before Apollo could ask what he meant, his father had stood up and gone to a small cupboard in the corner of the room, which he searched for a moment or two before emerging with a white spray-bottle and two pairs of red-tinted glasses.

Apollo gasped as he recognised the items, placing the coin and Court Record down on the bed as he eagerly got to his feet, taking one of the glasses with glee. "The blood-testing stuff!" he cried with an excited grin. "I totally forgot you had that!"

Chuckling, Phoenix slipped the extra pair of glasses on his face. "It's called 'Luminol'," he reminded his son. "Go get that coin ready, huh? And don't forget we'll need to take a picture of what we find."

Not wanting to spray the chemical in his bottle needlessly around his room, Phoenix led Apollo through his side door into the bathroom, which they locked to keep Luke or Trucy from barging in on their secret experiment. Apollo put on the red-tinted glasses his father had given him, and, after a moment of thought, laid the coin down on the floor, not wanting to risk losing it down the sink or shower drain. Their target readied, the pair knelt down on the floor and Phoenix aimed the spray-bottle, gently pulling the blue lever to evenly spread the luminol across the small disc of metal.

Apollo stared wide-eyed at the tiny coin as the substance landed, readying his tablet computer. After a very long moment of concentration... absolutely nothing happened. He blinked, leaning back in shock. "H-huh!?" He pressed at the glasses on his face, checking he was indeed wearing them. "B-but... if there's no blood on this... My theory was wrong...?"

Phoenix rubbed his chin in thought, staring at the coin. "Maybe... or maybe we're looking at this from the wrong angle."

Apollo frowned at his father. "What do you mean?"

"It's very good advice," Phoenix continued, looking up to give his elder son a grin. "Mia was always telling me that, and it saved more cases than I could count." He glanced back down at the coin, then gestured to it with his free hand. "Before we call this a lost cause, there's one more thing we can try. Following Mia's advice, thinking outside the box... what would you suggest?"

The young lawyer wasn't sure how to answer, turning his gaze back down to the coin on the floor. 'I have to "think outside the box"...? But what does that even mean, what 'box' is there here to think outside-' His train of thought came to a halt as he recalled his father's exact wording. 'Wait... "maybe we're looking at this from the wrong angle"?' Frowning in thought, he hesitantly reached forward and, after only a short pause, flipped the coin over to the other side. "Maybe it's... the wrong way round?" he sheepishly suggested.

Phoenix only smiled, readying the Luminol bottle and again spraying the coin. This time, after only a second or two, the upwards-pointing face of the blank coin began to glow a brilliant blue, the clear sign that it still carried traces of blood.

Apollo gasped, a grin spreading across his face. "I was right!" he cried.

"Picture!" Phoenix interrupted, pointing to his son's forgotten tablet computer. "Quick, before the glow fades!"

"O-oh, right!" Unable to wipe away his grin, Apollo pointed his Court Record at the coin and snapped a photo, staring at the image as it appeared on his screen. "My theory was right!" he continued. "It was her, and I can prove it without a doubt!"

"Ssshhhh!" Phoenix hissed, glaring at Apollo and glancing noticeably at the locked door to the hallway behind him. "Do you want your siblings to hear!?!" Apollo snapped his mouth closed, giving his father an apologetic look, and Phoenix sighed in relief. "Let's get this stuff away," he said, getting to his feet and pulling the glasses off his face. "This doesn't change our immediate plans, but it is a relief to know we have some good evidence to protect Luke should the worst happen."

Apollo nodded, pulling out a small plastic evidence bag to put the coin in. "So we're still not doing anything about Mister Reindeer?" he asked.

Phoenix shook his head, interrupting Apollo only briefly as he retrieved the glasses his son was still wearing. "There's nothing we can do," he insisted. "You put that coin away somewhere safe, securely file all your evidence from Luke's trial... and then we wait."

Luke's decision to move out had come surprisingly quickly to Phoenix.

After Rudolf Wildgrube's conviction in early December last year, things had been very quiet at Warren Street Animal Shelter, the middle Wright child told his family. His lone remaining co-worker in the veterinarian department, known as Fox, had found her relationship with her boyfriend turning sour, and, a few short months later, the pair had split up. Having been renting out a room in his apartment, she had little choice but to move out, and quickly, finding another apartment to call home not too much further from work. However, her salary alone wasn't enough to pay rent, so she was seeking a room-mate. Luke, to his family's surprise, had elected to take her up on her offer; After all, he pointed out, Apollo and Clay had been nineteen when they left home, so, in a sense, twenty-year-old Luke was already late on making the next big step in his life.

Apollo had immediately supported his brother, offering to help him move and even drag Clay into helping too.

Trucy had been disappointed, but plastered a smile on her face that didn't fool anyone and agreed to do her best to help as well… as long as Luke promised to come home and see her regularly.

Phoenix, a lot more adept at hiding his feelings than his children, gave Luke an assuring smile and suggested they arrange the big move for the following weekend, when everyone would be available to help.

After a Saturday spent in Kurain, visiting Maya on her birthday, Luke, Apollo and Trucy headed off early Sunday morning to pick up Clay; As Fox had been unable to secure the place without Luke, she was also moving in today, and the assembled team had decided hers was the more important job to complete first. Phoenix, deciding he would just be in the way, was staying at the Agency, though he had promised to join them if they desperately needed his help. Thus, Phoenix found himself that morning sitting at his desk, idly doodling design ideas on a spare piece of paper. He sighed. That's two gone now... how long 'til Trucy follows their lead?

A bang echoed from the front room, causing Phoenix to jerk his head up in surprise. "MISTER WRIGHT!" came a feminine shout.

Dropping his pencil, Phoenix shot to his feet, rounding his desk as he rushed to the office door. 'What the hell is going on!?' Before he could reach it, however, the door into the front room slammed open, knocking Charley behind it and slapping the plant against the wall it lived by. In the doorway stood a young woman around Apollo's height, brown hair sitting on the top of her head in a curled ponytail above a pair of white-rimmed glasses with red lenses. The rest of her hair spilled down over her shoulders, where the straps of a very full shoulder-bag hung over a long, white labcoat. Quickly spotting Phoenix not far in front of her, the woman gave the taller man a glare. "*There you are!" she cried, throwing up her hands as she stomped into the office. "Finally!"

Phoenix took a few steps backward, watching the woman with concern.
"What on earth were you thinking!?!" the woman continued, surprisingly gently closing the door behind her and mildly jumping in shock as she seemed to register the appearance of the office around her. "And you've gone and redecorated everything in here too!? How long has it been!? Did you even manage three years!?!"

Phoenix gave her a quick glance up and down, trying to work out if he was supposed to know her or not... although he only learned she was wearing high-heels, probably making her truly closer to Maya in height. "Um, who are you?" he asked, now the woman had finally quietened down.

Again, the woman seemed surprised, looking Phoenix up and down as though also trying to recognise a stranger. "Wait, you... you are the famous defence attorney Phoenix Wright, aren't you?"

Phoenix wasn't quite sure how to react to that, the pair staring at each other in a long silence. 'How long has it been since I heard those words in sequence?' he wondered.

The woman sighed sadly, seeming to deflate. "Please tell me that's you, Mister Wright," she quietly asked.

"W-well," Phoenix hesitantly replied, "I'm... not a defence attorney anymore, but-"

"So it is you!" the woman cried, looking up with a smile and pouncing on Phoenix to give him a quick hug before the man had a chance to react. She bounced back, giving him an excited grin. "Don't you recognise me, Mister Wright? It's been nine years to the day since we first met, but I haven't changed that much!"

Phoenix blinked, looking over the woman again before his eyes finally locked on to the glasses sitting on her head, then the labcoat, then a large badge with a surprised face pinned to her bag. He sighed, shaking his head with a smile as he wondered how he'd overlooked the clues before, especially given how familiar their conversation had turned out so far. "It's nice to see you again, Ema."

Ema Skye giggled. "Man, it's such a relief I had the right place after all!" she cried, strolling over to the twin red sofas and picking one at random to sit on, carefully arranging her bag at her side so as to keep it as close to her as possible. "I was worried when you didn't recognise me!"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, moving to sit opposite his old friend. "You weren't even sure it was me, but you were going to chew me out anyway?" he asked.

Ema shrugged sheepishly. "W-well, to be fair, you look like a totally different person with your hair covered up." She paused, looking him up and down critically. "And with that hobo stubble. And that ratty old sweater."

"It's not ratty!" Phoenix complained, picking at the old hoodie defensively, and decided to change the subject before she started mocking his sandals too. "What are you doing back in America? Last we met, you were off to Europe to stay with a relative, weren't you?"

Crossing her arms, Ema scoffed, giving Phoenix a smile. "I'm twenty-five, Mister Wright," she pointed out. "I've done all the studying I can; Now it's time to return to Los Angeles and fulfil all the promises I made as a teenager!" She then frowned, giving him another glare. "Or I could, if I hadn't got here and suddenly found out you weren't a defence attorney anymore!"

Phoenix winced a little, both unreasonably guilty at the accusation and, he had to admit, still stinging a little from the now-distant loss. "That was six years ago," he pointed out in return. "I've... long moved on from that part of my life."
Ema didn't lighten her glare, narrowing her eyes as she studied the man. "Mister Edgeworth told me," she explained, though Phoenix hadn't asked. "Lana was still in prison at the time, so she didn't hear anything about it. When I got back, Mister Edgeworth was first on my list to see... after Lana, of course."

Phoenix tried not to roll his eyes, wondering if the crush Ema had on her prosecutor idol had anything to do with that.

"He said, even though you didn't have your badge anymore," Ema continued, her glare beginning to soften, "I might still be able to help. Even..." She looked away guiltily. "Even though I wasn't good enough to be a forensic scientist."

At that, Phoenix blinked in surprise, staring at the young woman. "You... what?" he asked. "Did you just say...?"

Ema sighed, crossed arms tightening in a self-comforting hug. "I applied, don't get me wrong. I did everything right... everything except pass the test, apparently."

Phoenix could do little more than stare at the woman with a sympathetic gaze. "Oh, Ema..."

The young woman closed her eyes, frowning bitterly. "It's not a total loss," she insisted. "They've hired me as a detective. I get to investigate, just..." She shrugged, then looked up at Phoenix with a small smile. "But hey, at least I got a little bit of first-hand experience in forensic investigation, right? Investigating with you, nine years ago?"

Phoenix was only able to give her a confused shrug in return. "But being a forensic scientist was your dream, Ema!"

"Just like being a defence attorney was yours, right?" Ema shot back, a stern frown on her face. "I've told my story; I'm not where I wanted to be, but I can still help you, or at least Mister Edgeworth said I could." She glanced around the room critically. "Just what are you doing now, anyway?"

Phoenix stared at Ema for a long while, remembering the sixteen-year-old who'd burst into his office one day begging for his help to save her sister. She was right; Ema had grown up since then, and deserved to hear the truth. If nothing else, he told himself, she was older than Apollo, and Phoenix's eldest was still the youngest to be in on the secret. Solemnly, he got up from the sofa opposite Ema, looking around just to double-check none of his children (or, heaven forbid, a stray customer) had wandered in before moving to sit at Ema's side. As she gave him a confused look, he lowered his voice, staying close to her. "If Edgeworth thinks you can help," he explained, "then you deserve the full story... but be warned, everything I'm about to tell you stays between us."

Ema's eyebrows shot up, surprised. "Oh?"

Phoenix nodded. "How much has Edgeworth told you about how I lost my badge?"

Ema leaned back in her seat, arms crossed, as she absorbed the information Phoenix had given her: Klavier Gavin, the frontman of the Gavinners rock band that so many of her classmates were fans of, used to be a prosecutor, and had been the one to accuse Phoenix of forgery, thus kick-starting the loss of his badge? She had been a little surprised but, given she wasn't fond of the Gavinners' music in the first place, easily agreed it seemed plausible; What was more surprising was the revelation that Gavin had an older brother, a defence attorney, who was supposed to be the real mastermind that Phoenix was still attempting to pin down despite the years that had passed since the incident. "So you've just been collecting evidence for six years?" she asked. "Continuing your investigation?"

"Edgeworth's been helping me, since he point-blank refused not to," Phoenix replied with a shrug. "My only other direct helper is Apollo, though you haven't met him yet."

Ema turned to the man with a curious frown. "Who's Apollo? Another friend?"

Chuckling, Phoenix looked away, a hand reaching into a pocket. "Ah, that's something else that's happened while you've been in Europe," he said, being cryptic if only for the amusement of seeing Ema's bemused look. "I suppose 'friend' works. He's a little younger than you. Qualified as a defence attorney last year, though he hasn't taken any cases alone yet. Works under Kristoph Gavin, actually."

Ema's eyebrows shot up in surprise. "And he's in on your plan?" she asked, a little awed.

"He's a brave kid," Phoenix replied, closing his eyes as a proud smile flitted across his face. "He's got a rough journey ahead of him, but he wouldn't turn away from it for the world."

"He obviously means a lot to you," Ema pointed out, idly looking around the room as her thoughts drifted elsewhere. "So, uh, how is your search for evidence going, anyway?"

Phoenix shrugged, rubbing his face as he returned his attention to his guest. "Only bits and pieces, unfortunately," he admitted. "We have a back-up plan, but Edgeworth can only do so much alone; The current court system is highly flawed anyway, so he thinks we might achieve justice by finding a way to hold a fairer trial."

Ema thought for a moment. "Spy cameras can count as good evidence in a pinch, can't they?" she asked.

Phoenix was thrown for a second, having not expected that concern to ever cross his mind. "Uh..." He shook his head to organise his thoughts, hoping maybe to shake loose the long-hidden details of his law studies a full decade earlier. "If it's relevant to the case... I don't see why not," he hesitantly decided.

"Good!" Ema cried, then pulled her bag into her lap and firmly gripped the badge pinned to the front, unclipping it with a triumphant grin. "This thing'll finally be useful!"

"What thing?" Phoenix asked, watching her warily as she removed the badge, sticking one hand into her bag as she searched for something inside. "Ema, what are you doing?"

With a cry of "Aha!", Ema pulled out a short cable from her bag, getting to her feet and inspecting Phoenix carefully, a finger tapping her mouth. "I think we should put it... here!" With a grin, she grabbed the beanie on Phoenix's head, ignoring the ex-lawyer's objections as she pinned the badge to the brim, right above his left eye. "Now it can see everything you see!" she announced as she stepped back, proudly surveying her work.

Phoenix frowned at the young woman, wondering if he was going to have to get used to the feeling of the surprisingly-heavy badge on his beanie and hoping it wouldn't tear apart the knitting of the well-loved garment. "I should warn you, there's a girl out there who'll be very upset if you've ruined this hat just for a badge..."

Ema giggled, sitting down again as she grinned at her friend. "It's a spy camera!" she explained. "Lana gave it to me when I was just a kid, but I've never really had a use for it. It still works, though!" She pushed the cable into Phoenix's hands as he gave her a confused look. "You'll need this, too! I find it best to leave it connected to the computer every night, to free up the disk space of everything it captured and let it charge for the next day!"

Phoenix looked over the black cable, recognising the USB port on one end, though he couldn't name the metal connection on the other. "S... spy camera...?" he muttered, still stuck on processing what he had just been given.

"Yep!" Ema cried, then frowned in thought as she stared at the yellow badge on Phoenix's beanie. "I never worked out how to turn it on and off, though. Don't think it even has that kind of switch. Kinda ruins the 'secret' if you're seen fiddling with it, I guess. Oh!" She pointed at it, giving her friend a grin. "I should warn you, the footage it gets isn't exactly in HD, and the framerate is pretty low, and the sound can be a little grainy. Trade-off for such a small, busy device being on twenty-four-seven!"

"E-Ema," Phoenix stuttered, shaking his head emphatically as he tried to hand back the short cable, "I can't accept this!"

"Yes, you can!" Ema insisted with a grin, shoving Phoenix's hands back towards him. "Besides, it goes with your cute hat! I bet you can't say that about this 'Apollo's' outfit, can you?"

Phoenix had to agree she had a point there; He couldn't shake the image of Apollo with a very obvious childish badge on his vest and Kristoph ordering him to take it off immediately. He quickly banished the picture from his mind to return his attention to Ema, saying, "Ema, you already gave me that luminol and fingerprint powder the last-"

"You still have them!?" Ema interrupted, looking excited.

"Y-yes," Phoenix struggled to quickly reply, thrown off by the sudden change of subject, "I-"

"That's so cool!" the young woman cried, dancing in her seat before fixing her friend with a sheepish smile. "I was kinda worried you'd thrown them out or something. They're neat little mementos of our time together, right?"

Phoenix sighed, giving her a reluctant nod, to Ema's glee. He couldn't argue they were reminders of the hectic few days of Lana's trial, though only the luminol had proven to ever be useful; In fact, he distinctly remembered, a week or two after adopting Trucy, the young girl finding the fingerprint powder and trying to eat it, apparently believing it to be sugar. He'd had to hide the small jar after that, warily keeping it well out of sight for all three of his children as they came into, and, for two of them, eventually moved out of, his household. "I have to admit," he told her, "the luminol has come in handy. The fingerprint powder, however..."

Ema scoffed, waving a hand dismissively. "Give to this 'Apollo' of yours! He's a defence attorney, right? I'm sure he'll find a use for it. Oh!" She grinned. "If he's ever working on a case with me, I can show him how it works!"

Phoenix chuckled at the offer. "I'm sure he'd like that, actually," he agreed. "And..." He pointed to the badge on his beanie. "I suppose I should thank you for this."

"No problem!" Ema replied, crossing her arms proudly. After a moment, she then reached into her purse and pulled out a plastic food bag, which she popped open and offered to Phoenix. "Snackoo?" As Phoenix looked at the bag with confusion, she added, "They're delicious! Can't get 'em here, though. Have to import them from Europe!"

Shrugging, Phoenix reached into the bag and grabbed one of the chocolate sticks within, examining it for a moment before tossing it into his mouth. After a few moments spent chewing, he nodded, giving Ema a smile. "It's good," he agreed.

Ema grinned. "Awesome!" she replied. "I can get you a bag of your own the next time I have a spare!"

Moving in Fox's stuff is taking longer than we thought. It looks like we'll have to move my stuff tomorrow.

Alright. I'm sure Trucy's disappointed to miss out on that ;) .

Haha! Actually, Fox has just pointed out we both work on Mondays, so we'll probably end up having to do it all slowly over the week. Trucy wants to help out, but Apollo's had to tell her it would conflict with their show and now the subject has changed and I've totally lost the conversation thread.

That happens when you're talking to me instead of paying attention ;) So you'll be coming home tonight with Trucy? .

Yes, until we get my new bed set up. I think the others have decided we're going to hang out here, then go to the Wonder Bar, so you'll be seeing Trucy soon. I'll go home with her afterwards.

Okay. Let me know if your plan changes .

Will do, Papa!

That afternoon, Trucy sighed in exhaustion as she trudged through her front door. "Daddy, I'm
"Hey, kiddo," Phoenix called, giving his daughter a smile as she crossed the room to meet him, though a part of him was still melancholy at the thought he would have to get used to seeing her come home alone like this. "Getting set for your show tonight?"

Trucy nodded, smiling as she remembered the restriction of 'no shows on school nights' finally being lifted almost a full month ago, allowing her and Apollo to turn their three weekly shows into a daily performance... at the trade-off of quitting the matinee they'd been doing on Sundays. Even though today was a weekend, she was still excited at the thought of getting to perform so much more regularly. "We're all gonna meet up at Eldoon's before we get to the Wonder Bar," she explained. "Luke's friend Ms Fox said she'd come to see the show tonight!"

Phoenix chuckled, nodding. "I guess I'd better come along and meet her properly, then," he said, standing up. "This move was so rushed, I haven't had the chance yet."

Trucy was about to agree when she suddenly noticed the yellow badge gleaming from Phoenix's beanie, a pinkish-red outline forming the image of a shocked face. She frowned, pointing at it. "Daddy, when'd you get that badge?"

Phoenix grinned cheekily. "What badge?"

"That one!" Trucy cried with a pout, pointing more firmly at his beanie. "On the hat I made you!"

"Oh, this one?" Phoenix asked, still grinning as he gestured to the disguised spy camera, then gave her a dismissive wave as he walked into the next room. "That's not a badge!"

Trucy crossed her arms, glaring at her father as she followed him. "Daddy, it's clearly a badge! Where'd it come from?"

Phoenix almost had to fight not to laugh as he continued to mess with his daughter, turning to give her a wink as he tapped the side of his nose. "Secret," he said.

"That's not fair!" Trucy complained, grumpily following him into the kitchen as he got himself a glass of grape juice. "Why won't you tell me!?"

"Secret!" Phoenix repeated, almost singing the word as he ignored Trucy's cloying for details.

"Argh!" Throwing up her hands in frustrated defeat, Trucy rushed off up the stairs. "I don't have time for this, I have to get ready!" she shouted as she went, pausing halfway up the stairs to turn back and call accusingly, "You're being really unfair, Daddy!"

Phoenix just laughed as he ignored her.
The strange man smiled. "You still do not know who I am?"

Sat at his piano, Phoenix took a swig from the bottle of grape juice in his hand, and placed it back on the ground, giving the man a frown the entire time. "Have we... met?" It was then the penny suddenly dropped.

"Today, in this courtroom... you cannot declare me guilty."
"What are you talking about?"
"I am talking... about this!"
"M-Mister Enigmar!"
"The defendant's escaped! Find him! Quick!"
"Bailiff! Close all exits from the building! On the double! He must not be allowed to escape!"

Phoenix stared, wide-eyed, at the person in front of him, the echoes of the long-ago trial still ringing in his head. "Z... Zak Gramarye!?" he whispered in awe.

"Yes," the man replied with a nod, looking quite proud of himself as he was finally recognised. "The reincarnation act of the century. Pity I have only an audience of one."

'Just me?' Phoenix shot a quick glance at the odd-looking newsman scribbling away on a notepad at the other side of the table, paying the pair little attention as Zak studiously ignored him.

Looking around, Zak noticed a nearby waitress (a new hire Phoenix didn't know very well) and ordered her to prepare the Hydeout. Wrapped up in her warm furs, she meekly agreed and scurried off without another word, and Phoenix supposed he couldn't blame her; Zak Gramarye was quite a fearsome presence, even when he was 'dead'.

"It's really you?" Phoenix asked the moment the waitress was out of sight. "Shadi Enigmar?"

Zak held up a single finger, correcting Phoenix, "Now I am Shadi Smith. Remember this."

Phoenix stared at him a few seconds more, then sighed, leaning on his knees. "How many years has it been now?" he asked, mostly to himself. "Six?" Wow, when was it I stopped keeping track of the anniversary of that trial?"

"In exactly three days from now, it will be seven," Zak replied, one hand brushing idly at the front of his white suit as he put on a vaguely sorrowful look, avoiding Phoenix's gaze. "I have caused you much inconvenience, I fear."

At that, Phoenix could barely keep a glare off his face. "Yeah," he muttered darkly. "You could say that.

Zak seemed not to notice, still staring off into the distance. He looked almost... vulnerable. "Is... she well? Trucy, I mean."

Phoenix didn't want to give the man an answer out of spite, but the thought that Trucy would have wanted him to answer persuaded him otherwise. "She's fine," he curtly replied, deciding that, if Zak wanted more than the bare minimum, he could talk to his daughter himself. "I've got her working already. Hope you don't mind."

Zak gave Phoenix a faraway smile, apparently unsurprised. "I hardly need express my gratitude, but you have it." He nodded to himself as the smile faded. "This is why I have come." The smile turned into a fearsome look, one Phoenix had seen many times in the eyes of potential challengers... people who believed themselves the best, and who could not bear to be the losing party. "That, and to settle a matter of cards."

"By which you mean poker," Phoenix replied, keeping his voice and expression calm; He was more practised than he'd like to admit with how to handle the kind of competitors who came to him with a look like that in their eyes.

"I despise losing above all else," Zak continued. "And so, I have decided that I will win tonight, no matter what it takes."

Phoenix narrowed his eyes as he noticed a small smile flickering at the corners of Zak's mouth. That was a kind of confidence that said 'I have a plan that can't fail', that shouted 'danger' from the rooftops and did not care what would happen to Phoenix in the fallout it would create.

Suddenly Phoenix wondered if Zak had anything to do with the mysterious Five of Hearts he'd found in his pocket earlier.

Finally, Zak's expression softened, and he gave Phoenix an almost friendly smile. "Perhaps we should take this time to talk, before we play. I know you have much to ask me... and I, you."

'An opportunity to finally get the answers to questions I've held for seven years? Who could resist that?' Phoenix closed his eyes for a moment, pondering which of his questions was most important. "Why not start from our first meeting?" he eventually asked, looking up at Zak. "We competed that day seven years ago, too."

"Ah, yes," Zak replied, smiling in thought at the memory. "You must have been surprised! Called to the detention centre out of the blue."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "You choose your defence attorneys by playing poker."

Zak shrugged, admitting as much without saying so. "Some are hired, others fired," he said. "When you compete, you see a man's true nature." Before Phoenix could get distracted thinking about how unnerved Zak had made him in their long-ago poker bout, the man was giving him a secretive smile. "You know what I speak of. I know that you do."

At first, Phoenix had no idea what he was referring to, until he recalled how he had unwittingly discovered Trucy's ability to detect lies... whether in speech, or implied as in poker. "Trucy's 'power'?"

"Trucy?" Zak chuckled. "She is in a class of her own."

'Her's and Apollo's,' Phoenix corrected, but kept the thought to himself. "Can you tell me what her "power is?"

Zak nodded. "Judging a person's thoughts by reading their reactions is a staple of performance magic," he explained, "but those of Trucy's line possess far greater skill."

'So it is genetic. Not that it could have been a co-incidence she and Apollo had the same unique ability.' Phoenix resisted a smile, deciding to feign ignorance for now. "Her 'line'?"

"Recall," Zak said, looking away with a harsh expression, "you were the second man to whom I've lost."

Nothing needed to be said: Phoenix only nodded as he remembered Zak telling him seven years ago that the other person he shared that honour with was Trucy and Apollo's grandfather, Magnifi Gramarye. 'I suppose it was him they ultimately inherited it from, then... via their mother, obviously.'

"That was the first time I learned of this 'power', as you call it," Zak continued.

"It's genetic?" Phoenix asked, his best confused look on his face. "Just 'in' the Gramarye blood or something?"

Zak seemed thoughtful... distracted by the past. After a moment, his expression hardened, but Phoenix almost missed it as he suddenly became very aware of the magatama sitting in his pocket; Three Psyche-Locks shimmered into being before his eyes, hanging from the spiritual chains the former magician had wound so tightly around himself. It was only Phoenix's practised poker face that kept him from crying out in shock before Zak finally answered, "I am sorry, but it is not something told lightly to outsiders. And it is nothing you need to know at this time."

'Need to know!? I became a father to two of them seven years ago, thanks to you! How could I be any more 'need to know' than I already am!?' Despite his inner rage, Phoenix managed to stay outwardly calm and cool, very aware of the need to not lose his temper during so critical a meeting. He'd leave that to Apollo and Luke if the ex-magician ever deigned to show his face to his daughter.

Zak, however, didn't seem to notice Phoenix's reaction, distracted again by his past as the Psyche-Locks faded. "She's... fifteen this year?"

Phoenix nodded, deciding not to point out Trucy's next birthday wasn't until the end of September. "She's still trying her best to follow in your footsteps, you know," he instead said, half-hoping the statement would pain the man across from him in some obvious way.

"I... see," Zak carefully replied, and Phoenix couldn't help but feel happiness to see the guilt settle in the man's expression. "When I planned my disappearing act, it was the thought of her alone that gave me pause."

"Wait," Phoenix suddenly realised, distracted from his own dark musings on whether or not Zak deserved better, "you were planning on vanishing from the get-go? Even if I'd managed to clear your name!?"

Zak nodded. "Yes, and for that, I must apologise." He sighed, reaching into a pocket. "However, I could not be found guilty that day... because of this." He pulled out a small piece of paper, which he held out to Phoenix. The ex-lawyer took it gingerly, reading a short, hand-written message neatly crossing the page. "A transferral of rights," Zak explained, seeing Phoenix's confused expression. "You see the signature?"

Sure enough, Zak seemed to be correct; The handwritten contract officially passed on the "secrets, staging and performance" of Magnifi Gramarye's magic to "the recipient named below". Right beneath that, all in what Phoenix presumed was Magnifi himself's handwriting, was Zak's name, followed by Magnifi's signature. What caught Phoenix's attention most, however, was the fact that the left edge of the paper was torn all the way down... like the page had been pulled out of a book. "This... is torn," Phoenix muttered, running a finger along the rough edge with a thoughtful frown.

"You recall the diary, yes?" Zak replied, a vaguely sad smile on his face.

Phoenix glared at the page as his suspicions were being confirmed. "How could I forget?" He handed it back to Zak, the memory of the falsified paper flashing in front of his eyes. "That scrap of paper lost me my attorney's badge."

"This is the real page that was torn from the book," Zak explained, though even he realised Phoenix had already guessed that. "Magnifi gave it to me that night."

The ex-lawyer could not meet Zak's eyes for a long moment, trying to calm himself down from the newly ignited rage on the indignity of his lost badge. Eventually, he snapped his glare towards Zak. "You could have told me this earlier. Like, seven years earlier."

Zak nodded in calm agreement. "Once again, I must apologize. It was all I could do to prepare for my escape from that courtroom." When Phoenix only looked away, continuing to quietly huff to himself, Zak changed the subject: "The greatest of Magnifi Gramarye's illusions are true art. As such, they are well protected... by this document." He gestured with the handwritten contract in his hand. "Only its bearer may perform his illusions on stage."

Phoenix forced himself to calm down, helped with the distraction of Zak discussing the Gramarye contract. If it was likely to involve Trucy, he wasn't going to allow himself to lose control.

"As the rightful heir to his art," Zak continued, "I, too, wanted a rightful heir." He smiled. "I'm sure you know who I chose as my successor."

"Your daughter," Phoenix said. 'Poor Apollo... if this... man had done any kind of looking in to how Trucy was doing, he'd know you'd found each other.'

Zak nodded. "That is why I have risked all to come here tonight." He turned to the forgotten newsman still lingering on the other side of the table. "Brushel."

Brushel jerked his head up in surprise. "Sir!" he cried, then jumped to his feet and scurried around the table, pulling out a piece of paper from a bag and laying it between Zak and Phoenix, pulling the pen from behind his ear and holding it out to Phoenix. "Here you go!"

Phoenix looked between the man and the paper in confusion, carefully taking the pen. "What's this?" he asked the ex-magician.

"A letter passing the rights I have inherited to Trucy," Zak explained, leaning forward to tap the bottom of the paper, where lines had been drawn out for three signatures. "I would have you sign here, as a witness."

"B-but," Phoenix cried, "I'm not a lawyer anymore! And you need a public notary, besides!"

"Ah," Brushel interrupted with a proud smile, "I may not look it, but I'm a certified notary!"

Phoenix stared at him in surprise. "You are...?"

"By day, I wear a notary's glasses and hunt for news!" Brushel went on, an apparently rehearsed speech of pride. "Also by day, I wear a reporter's glasses and notarise! When I take off the glasses," he paused, fiddling with his thick eyewear, "I can't see very well."

"Your signature, please," Zak interrupted to Phoenix, shooting a glare at Brushel. "This is the first reason I have come here tonight."

View the Court Record
It took only a minute for all three men to sign the document, officially passing Magnifi’s tricks down to his granddaughter. Although Phoenix hoped Trucy would immediately share them with her brother once she received them, he continued to keep Apollo's existence to himself for now, unwilling to give more information to Zak than he was getting.

Zak folded up the paper, solemnly passing it to Phoenix. "Pass this on to Trucy," he asked, "when the time is right." Once Phoenix had taken the document, the ex-magician then turned to the third man of their group. "Brushel," he called, waving away the newsman. "You may leave."

"Ah, but it's your last game!" Brushel argued, clinging eagerly to his pen and notepad. "I mean, what a scoop-!"

Without pausing to even think, Zak stood and punched Brushel below the chin, knocking the spindly reporter to the floor, where he quickly scrambled to right himself. Zak himself calmly sat back down, returning his gaze to a shocked Phoenix. "I punch and I punch," he explained with a shrug, "but still, it is not enough."

Brushel finally regained his footing, adjusting his glasses with a nervous smile as he got back up. "Er, I just remembered a future, er, prior engagement!" he muttered. "Toodles, gentlemen!" He quickly gathered up his things, giving Phoenix a nod. "Oh, and nice meeting you, piano man!" With that, he spun around and rushed out of the restaurant as fast as his legs could carry him.

Zak seemed proud to finally be alone to talk, though Phoenix was still unnerved by the casual act of violence. 'I'm glad Trucy didn't inherit that...' To distract himself, Phoenix changed the subject, turning to Zak with a curious look as he examined the document in his hands. "It's... been seven years, you said?"

The former magician smiled, probably guessing what Phoenix was thinking about. "Precisely."

'Seven years... the time limit on missing persons. When 'missing' becomes outright 'deceased', legally...’ After a moment to carefully place the paper in his bag, Phoenix continued, "Three days from now, Sunday, is when you become 'deceased' in the eyes of the law. Everything you own would pass to Trucy."

"Exactly," Zak replied. "I risk showing my face in public for the sake of that document." He gestured to Phoenix's bag, then smiled. "You might say, I am securing my daughter's inheritance."

"But do you really need it?" Phoenix asked, also gesturing to the document hidden in his bag. "Wouldn't Trucy inherit your estate automatically?"

Zak frowned, thinking a moment. "Not in this case, I'm afraid." At Phoenix's confused look, he continued, "I received the performance rights from Magnifi Gramarye, however, this was done in secret, without witnesses." He pointed a finger into the air. "Before Magnifi died, only two potential successors to his repertoire were named: Myself, Zak Gramarye... and Valant Gramarye." He lowered his hand, a solemn frown on his face. "Not Trucy."
'And not Apollo either,' Phoenix silently added, grimacing to himself. 'I suppose Thalassa was thought to be dead, which explains why they weren't passed on to her.' "So you do need the document."

Zak glanced in the direction Brushel had disappeared. "I have known Brushel since before I vanished," he said, finally explaining the man's presence with a smile. "Now, only three know of my 'rebirth'."

Phoenix mentally counted himself and Brushel, wondering who the 'third' was. 'I suppose it doesn't really matter. Perhaps... it's time I pressed him for a little more information.' "I... took the liberty of looking into Trucy's background," he told the ex-magician. "You have no other close kin?"

It took a few moments for Zak to reply, sternly returning Phoenix's curious gaze. "It is as you say." A very long pause followed.

Phoenix resisted the urge to sigh in frustration. 'Okay, I know I've been withholding some stuff, but...' As the awkward silence continued, the ex-lawyer decided he had no choice but to be direct; He reached into his bag for his old computer tablet, still kept on him at all times purely by force of habit, and flicked through to find where he had copied the picture of Thalassa. "This, I believe," he said, showing the photo to Zak, "is Trucy's mother?"

Zak's posture stiffened, though Phoenix wasn't sure if he was scared or simply angry... possibly both. "How did you come by this!?"

"Well, Trucy showed me her locket," Phoenix explained with a shrug. "It took a lot of digging to find this, though." He smirked. "I just said I was looking into Trucy's background, didn't I?" When Zak only looked away, still not offering information, Phoenix added, "Trucy said her mother was 'gone'?"

"Then it is so," Zak curtly replied, still looking away.

Phoenix frowned in frustration. "Um...?"

"She is gone," Zak insisted. "What more is there to say?"

"How about lots?" Phoenix shot back. "For one thing, she's Magnifi's only child, correct?"

Zak's expression darkened. "This discussion is over, Mister Wright."

Phoenix bit back a sharp reply, deciding it wasn't worth it. 'Clearly, I have to give a little to get any more info here.' He reached a hand into his pocket, clutching at the green magatama within. 'Now, what was it that set them off earlier? Trucy and Apollo's 'power', I think.' "Then let's change the subject a bit," he suggested. "Trucy's 'power' allows her to almost see right into other people's minds." He smiled, almost laughing at the memory of the first time he'd brought her in to 'work'. "Certainly she blew mine when I first saw her do it."

Zak raised an eyebrow, unaware of the three Psyche-Locks shimmering into existence around him. "And after you were done having your mind blown, you took her to play cards with you."

Phoenix blushed, wondering how Zak knew about that... or had it been a guess? "Er... gotta use the resources at hand, I always say," he muttered as an excuse. "A-anyway... You haven't admitted to sharing this power, so... she got it from her mother, then?"

The other man's expression again darkened, and he glared at Phoenix. "I will not speak of that," he said in a warning tone.
"Why not?" Phoenix asked, waving a hand. "Because you were a team once?" While Zak seemed to struggle not to sputter in anger, Phoenix returned his attention to his Court Record, flicking through to an old photo from his early investigation into the Gramarye trial. It only took a moment to locate the picture he'd taken of young Vera's stamp, showing two young men and a younger woman in their full magician gear, and he turned the old computer around to 'present his evidence' to Zak. "You, Valant and Thalassa were a trio. No-one in the entire country hadn't heard of Troupe Gramarye at its peak. But then tragedy struck, didn't it?" Zak firmly looked away, which Phoenix took as permission to continue. "Not many people know this, of course, 'and even less seem to know it isn't true, judging by the rumour mill I found it on,' "but Thalassa lost her life during a rehearsal... to you and Valant's bullets."

With the shattering of one of his Psyche-Locks, Zak seemed to break, pressing a hand to his mouth as he doubled over. "It was an accident!" he cried. "How could I shoot my dear Thalassa!"

"I'm sure Valant would say the same thing," Phoenix pointed out, unable to resist rubbing a little salt in the wound as he added, "Why, it's just like another murder I might mention."

Zak shot Phoenix a glare. "Damn you!" He took a moment to compose himself, lost in the memory of his wife. "Her eyes... I love Thalassa's eyes. To think they could read my mind was frightening, yet there was a warmth in them that... felt like an embrace." He silently sighed, shaking his head. "She is dead, and Magnifi Gramarye has joined her."

Phoenix closed his eyes. As much as he'd liked the dark joy in torturing Zak with his wife's 'death', perhaps it was time he let the man in on the truth... If nothing else, Trucy would want it that way. "I'm afraid," he sighed, opening his eyes to meet the ex-magician's gaze, "that's not quite the entire story." Zak frowned, confused. "What are you talking about, Mister Wright?"

Phoenix lost his nerve for a moment, looking away before he could steel himself to look Zak in the eye again. "I already know you were Thalassa Gramarye's second husband." Zak's eyes subtly widened in surprise. "Trucy isn't the only one she passed her ability on to. Isn't that right?"

After a half-second of silence, Zak laughed, though he couldn't keep away a nervous tone. "Hah! You're gonna be difficult about this, huh?" Without a word, Phoenix returned to his Court Record, flipping through to a photo he'd taken of Apollo over a year ago now, during Christmas celebrations at Edgeworth's place. He'd snapped it while Apollo was distracted showing off to Franziska and Adrian, catching the young man off-guard mid-trick; As a result, it wasn't the most flattering picture of his eldest son, but, being both recent and including his everpresent bracelet, he picked it now, displaying the photo on the tablet screen and again presenting it to Zak. "Just a wild guess, but I'd say he fits the bill."

Zak raised an eyebrow, taking the tablet computer and staring at the photo in disbelief. "This... boy?"

"That's 'young man' to you!" "His name is Apollo," Phoenix explained, keeping his gaze on Zak stern. "Seven years ago, he carried the surname 'Justice', just as Trucy carried 'Enigmar'. They've both changed that now, for mostly the same reasons."

Perhaps beginning to suspect Phoenix's meaning, Zak gave the other man a glare, returning the Court Record to its owner. "And who could he be?"

Phoenix couldn't resist a smile at the somewhat vague wording of Zak's question. "He could be any number of things," he replied. "Although most of the world would probably first think of him as..." 'best not bring up the 'magician' thing just yet,' "well, I suppose 'an attorney'."

"A-attorney!" Zak repeated, angry surprise in his eyes, before he narrowed his glare. "So what are we to make of this, O Great Ex-Attorney?" When Phoenix only frowned in response, the former magician continued, "You can show me pictures of strange boys all you like, but you could at least say something like 'I'm this boy!' I could use a laugh!"

"Perhaps you wouldn't laugh if you knew the facts," Phoenix shot back, pleased to see Zak looking unnerved at the confident and immediate reply. "This might not be a hundred percent proof, but it's certainly close... and as good as 'true' to all else involved. There's a link between Apollo and Thalassa." He paused, looking down at the picture still displayed on the computer screen, and smiled. "Actually, it's more of a 'ring'."

Again, Zak seemed confused. "A ring?"

Phoenix smiled, showing the Court Record to Zak. "On his wrist. You didn't notice?" As Zak leaned forward to look, Phoenix added, "Surely I don't need to bring up the picture of Thalassa again to refresh your memory."

Although Zak remained silent, Phoenix noticed a barely hidden gasp, and the second of the Psyche-Locks shattered.

"Thalassa's first husband died a year after they were wed, yes?" Phoenix quietly asked. "About... twenty-one, twenty-two years ago?"

Zak took a moment to reply, continuing to stare at the picture of Apollo. "He was a performer." he admitted, tearing his gaze away to stare off into the distance at his side. "They met when he joined us Gramaryes as a guest in our show. After Thalassa wed him, she left the Troupe for a while." He closed his eyes, again pausing. "And you say she had a child then?"

Phoenix paused a moment before replying. "It was a miracle I ever ran into Apollo," he said, smiling at the memory of the starstruck fifteen-year-old he'd been introduced to outside Turner School. "I recognised his bracelet instantly, from that photo of Thalassa I found. They... really stand out, those things."

"They are a Gramarye family heirloom," Zak explained, opening his eyes only to sadly gaze at Apollo's picture. "I always suspected something more had happened, but..." He sighed, passing the Court Record back to Phoenix and turning his head as though he couldn't stand to look at it anymore. "That photo you have of Thalassa; I took it, before she left us. When she returned... she wore only one bracelet."

Phoenix was so distracted looking at the image of his eldest son in his hands that he almost missed seeing Zak's final Psyche-Lock shatter, the spiritual chains around him fading away into nothingness.

"She gave it to this boy," Zak continued in a whisper, voice laden with emotion. "Her son."

Nodding, Phoenix powered down his computer, returning it to his backpack. He suspected it was seeing so much of Zak's vulnerable side that was finally turning his opinion on the man, that he no longer wanted to torture him the way he had been. "You should also know, although I have no evidence that you would believe, Thalassa isn't dead," he told him. "Trucy and Apollo have been keeping half-an-eye out in the hope she might reappear, like you have."

Zak shook his head. "You are all mistaken, then," he quietly replied. "Thalassa is dead. There is little point keeping hope otherwise." He slowly looked up to meet Phoenix's eyes. "And I am afraid I will not be able to reappear to Trucy. It is... simply too risky, even for her." Before Phoenix could do anything more than frown in disapproval, Zak continued, "They know they are brother and sister?"

Sighing, Phoenix decided not to push why Zak wasn't seeing Trucy. "I told them... probably six years ago now," he said in answer. "Didn't think they deserved being left in the dark."

Zak nodded, looking more relaxed. "I... am in your debt. Once again."

"No kidding," Phoenix replied, only half-joking. "The madness of the Wright family is nothing compared to you Gramaryes... Quite an accomplishment considering two of us are both."

Chuckling in reply, Zak paused a moment, then gave Phoenix a determined look. "I have made a decision," he announced. "I will tell you all I know. Consider it a gift."

Luke snorted into his pillow as he reluctantly regained consciousness, still half-asleep. He could hear something buzzing insistently on his bedside table, where a bright light was shining straight into his eyes. 'Is... that my phone? Oh yeah, it's set to silent overnight... Who's calling me at, um, whatever time it is right now?' Pushing himself up with a groan, the young man reached out a hand and blindly patted along the surface of his bedside table until he landed on the mobile phone, which he grabbed and brought to his face, answering it with eyes still squeezed shut against the bright light of the screen. "Mmm... 'ello?"

There was a relieved sigh from the other end of the line. "Luke, it's Papa. Sorry to wake you up, but I'm glad you answered."

Luke frowned in confusion, blearily rubbing at his eyes to keep himself awake as he lay back in bed. "Papa? Why are you calling in the middle of the night?" He glanced around his room, wishing he had some kind of luminescent clock handy.

Slowly, the gears turned in Luke's head, and he shot awake as he realised what had happened, throwing off his covers as he pressed his feet to the carpet below, his free hand clutching at his pillow as he sat up. "Papa! They think...!? What happened!?"

"I'll explain later," Phoenix promised. "I've already got Kristoph and Apollo on my case, so I shouldn't be away from home for more than a few days. I'm calling you because I need to ask you to do something for me."

Luke paused a moment, wondering what his father could need other than a defence attorney. "What is it?"

Phoenix sighed, sounding suddenly sad. "Look after Trucy. I'm sure she can handle herself for a few days, but I'd feel more comfortable if there was someone at home keeping an eye on her."

"Still there," Phoenix replied, a smile evident in his voice, "though I would've thought you'd want to use your old bed over that old thing!" As Luke blushed at the forgotten fact, the older man continued, "I doubt Trucy will want to go to school today, by the way. Sorry to have to ask you to take time off work."

"It's fine," Luke promised, grinning as he stood up and started to circle his room, making a mental list of essentials to grab. "Duck will understand, and Fox can handle herself on the job alone. I can call Trucy's school later too, if you want."
Phoenix chuckled. "I'd appreciate it," he said. "The both of you come to the detention centre later today and I'll explain everything... Or, at least as much as I can."

"Love you," Phoenix repeated, and the phone disconnected.

Luke paused a moment before trying to put his phone in his pocket, belatedly realising as his attempt failed that he was still in his pajamas. 'Okay then. First port of call: Get dressed.' He stepped towards where he knew his dresser was, only to hit something at hip-level that he quickly registered must have been his desk. 'Ow... Scratch that: Lights first.'

"Mister Gavin?"

"Good morning, Wright. Have you heard from your father?"

"Um... not since our show last night, no. Did something happen?"

"Hmm... Once again, he leaves it to me to pass on the unpleasant news."

"...?"

"There was a murder at the Borscht Bowl Club early this morning, in the Hydeout. Your father has been arrested as the suspect."

"What!?"

"Not to worry, he has already hired us as his defence. Come straight to the crime scene and we can get to work."

"Y-yes, sir! I'll see you there!"

April 17, 10:02AM
Borscht Bowl Club
Outside

Apollo paced nervously across the pavement in front of the Russian restaurant. After getting the call from his mentor as he was getting ready that morning, he'd been finding it hard to focus. 'It's Luke's arrest all over again!' He'd been able to shoot off a quick text to Luke asking what his younger brother knew about the situation, but had yet to receive a reply. He was unwilling just yet to contact Trucy, as she was supposed to be at school and he didn't want to accidentally break the news to her if she was still unaware. More than anything, he wanted to run to the detention centre to check on his father, but after the disaster of what had happened the last time a member of his family was arrested, he didn't want to argue with his mentor on anything work-related. He could only hope this case would run smoother than Luke's did.

"Wright," came a call from nearby, and Apollo looked up to see Kristoph approaching, his everpresent calm smile on his face. "I hope you didn't rush here," he said.

Apollo shrugged, trying not to blush. 'I knew I should have at least waited to explain what was happening to Clay... I kinda left him in the dark a bit.’ In fact, all he had told Clay as he rushed to leave the apartment that morning was that he had a case, phone already in hand texting Luke.

"No matter," Kristoph continued, looking around. "The police appear to have finished their examination here. Do you think they'll let us in?" Without waiting for an answer, he walked over to the front door and pushed it open.

Almost immediately there was a thud as the door's movement was halted, and a face appeared in the doorway, hidden behind a wave of black hair. "Restaurant's closed!" he shouted, irritation evident in his voice.

Kristoph sighed. "We are defence attorneys," he explained, pointing to the badge on his lapel. "Our client is the one accused of the murder here."

Apollo, meanwhile, was smiling in recognition at the officer just inside the door. "Ernest Holmes?"

The officer paused in confusion, looking over to Apollo before grinning. "Whoa, hey Apollo! What are the chances we'd be on the same case again, huh?"

"Yeah!" Apollo agreed with a laugh. "So, uh, can we have a look around?"

Ernest paused, biting his lip as he glanced around the room behind him. "Uh..." He hesitated, then sighed loudly, stepping back to open the door. "The detective'll kill me if he finds out," he said, "so be quick."

Kristoph smiled as he walked in, giving Ernest a grateful nod. "Our thanks, officer," he said.

Apollo grinned as he slipped in behind his mentor, helping Ernest close the door. "Thank you so much!" he said, hoping he sounded more sincere than the words alone felt. Despite his old friend's kindness, he couldn't resist adding, "Who's the detective and prosecutor? Do you know?"

Sighing again, Ernest crossed his arms and leaned against the door, watching Kristoph cast his gaze around the unchanged main room of the restaurant. "I gotta say, we both had it good with Fulbright and Debeste," he admitted. "Detective Slingsby really doesn't seem to care, and the prosecutor... well, I hate to make the obvious joke, but he's a real pain."

Apollo raised an eyebrow, but Kristoph gave a rare laugh, turning to the pair. "Ah, but which one? There are two 'pains' in the prosecutor's office."

Ernest gave a weak smile. "I don't know his first name, sorry."

"No matter," Kristoph assured him. "Our client will know when we talk to him later today."

Although he was still confused over what the pair were talking about, Apollo most wanted to ask that they not refer to Phoenix as their 'client'. It felt... wrong. Impersonal. Exactly the opposite of taking the defendant's side in a case when no-one else would.
Kristoph turned and headed towards the door down into the Hydeout, Apollo rushing to stay on his heel and Ernest hurriedly locking the front door before following them. "I imagine the police investigation has concluded already?" the elder attorney asked.

"Y-yeah, it has," Ernest replied. "It was a very open-and-shut case..." He paused as Apollo halted and shot a glare up the stairs at his former classmate. "S-sorry," the young officer muttered.

Entering the room below, Kristoph crossed his arms, looking around the room with a stern expression. "Indeed it has," he muttered to himself.

Curious at the odd statement, Apollo hurried down into the basement, coming to a halt in shock as he looked around the familiar room. "What the-!?"

The tiny basement was unusually clean: The three swivel chairs were neatly tucked under the poker table, anything that might have sat atop it removed to leave the wooden surface bare. On the floor, it was clear cards had been strewn everywhere, as the impressions they left were surrounded by innumerable bootprints of passing officers from their investigation of the crime scene. Apollo found himself wondering if the cards were okay; The last time a deck of poker cards had been destroyed (a handful ended up down a drain in circumstances he couldn't even guess at), the remainder had gone to him and Trucy, on the excuse that "cards are your trade, after all". Trucy kept the incomplete deck as a back-up for some of their magic tricks, though they rarely used it. 'I guess someone was playing fifty-two-card-pick-up the night of the murder? I wonder if they were using red or blue that night...'

Kristoph grunted to himself, turning to face Ernest behind them in the doorway to the room. "They took everything."

Ernest nodded sheepishly. "Y-yeah..."

"Do you know what was here?" Apollo asked, spinning to face his friend with a desperate look. "Did you see the crime scene!?!"

"S-sorry, no," Ernest mumbled in reply, staring at his boots. "I only know the real basics because I overheard the prosecutor talking to the detective before they gave me guard-duty."

Kristoph shook his head with a sigh, one hand brushing at his hair. "The bare bones of the prosecution's argument will be better than nothing," he pointed out.

After a short pause, Ernest nodded in agreement, looking up to meet Kristoph's gaze. "Apparently there's a witness," he said. "Also it happened during a poker game. The victim was a customer."

Apollo nodded. "No offence, but I could've worked out the last bit on my own." Gesturing to the room behind him, he explained, "This room is reserved only for poker, and people come here to challenge my dad. At most, it was probably just him, the customer and the dealer in here last night."

Ernest crossed his arms, sighing. "I figured it was your dad," he muttered. "Your family must be cursed or something."

"So the dealer would be the witness then," Kristoph continued, looking back at the poker table. "A waitress at the restaurant, I assume?"

Apollo nodded. "Usually," he agreed. "Occasionally the owner will deal, but he hasn't done that in ages."

Kristoph stared at the poker table in silence for several moments.
"I'm really sorry I couldn't help more," Ernest muttered, hugging himself as he returned to staring at his boots. "I mean, after what happened with Luke..."

Apollo gave his friend a reassuring smile, wondering if it was only because Phoenix was the father of two of Ernest's former classmates that the young officer had bent the rules and let them in at all... although Luke's near-conviction six months previous probably had a lot to do with it too. "You're fine, Ernest. We'll go talk to my dad and work out a battle plan. There's nothing to worry about."

'Okay, there is, but I'm not telling Ernest that."

Ernest nodded, giving Apollo a smile. "Thanks," he said. "Good luck."

Turnabout Trump, Day 1: Part 2

Have you heard about my dad?.

No? Something wrong?

He got arrested early this morning. Murder apparently.

Oh no! D: What happened!? I'm trying to work that out, with my boss obviously. We're just waiting to see him now.

Did you want me to mention it on the forum, or keep this quiet?

... Actually, the guys on the forum probably deserve to hear about it. Don't mention me, just say Phoenix Wright has been arrested.

Will do, pal. :) You let me know once the court date's announced, k?

Alright. Thanks Blackbird :).

Detention Center
Visitor's Room

Apollo fidgeted in his chair as they waited for the guards to escort Phoenix in. He was feeling more nervous than ever since their brief investigation had yielded nothing of use. 'At this point in Luke's investigation, at least we had a shortlist of possible suspects! We don't have anything for Dad! How can we possibly find the real culprit!?'

"Calm down, Wright," ordered Kristoph from the chair next to him. "Our client will be out momentarily."

Nodding, Apollo forced himself to stop fidgeting, tightly clutching his hands together and pressing his feet to the floor. It still felt wrong to refer to his father as 'our client', but he wasn't going to fight Kristoph on terminology, especially when their case was this hopeless.

Finally, the door on the other side of the glass opened, and in came a middle-aged man in a grey hoodie and cyan beanie. He smiled as he spotted his visitors, casually pulling out the chair and sitting down with a grin. "Hey."

Apollo could bite his lip no longer, leaning forward and crying, "Are you okay, Dad!? They're not mistreating you, are they!?"

Phoenix laughed, looking as relaxed as he would be on any usual day at home. "Don't you worry, this isn't the first time I've been falsely accused of murder." He gave his eldest son a wink. "I'm very used to this by now."

Groaning in frustration, Apollo lowered his head to the small desk under the glass window.

"I wouldn't look so relaxed about that if I were you," Kristoph warned Phoenix, giving him a stern look. "Multiple arrests for violent crimes, even if proven false, don't look good in the public eye... and can be used against you in court if the prosecutor finds a way to."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, still smiling. "Now is that really the kind of attitude you want to show your clients, Kristoph?"

"I don't believe in giving false hope," Kristoph pointedly replied.

As Phoenix simply shrugged, still smiling, Apollo lifted his head off the table, giving his father a curious look. "What exactly happened?" he asked. "All we got from the crime scene was that it was during a poker game."

"You don't have the autopsy report?" Phoenix asked, looking a little surprised.

"Surely as a witness and an ex-attorney," Kristoph interrupted, "you would have some idea of how he died." He closed his eyes, looking thoughtful. "You said someone hit him, if I recall correctly."

Phoenix just gave them a non-committal shrug.

It was then Apollo noticed something gleaming at his father's collar, and found a very familiar-looking locket hanging around Phoenix's neck. Frowning in confusion, he glanced between the locket and Phoenix's eyes. "Dad... why are you wearing Trucy's locket?"

After a moment of surprised confusion, Phoenix grinned, tapping at the pendant. "Good luck charm," he said. "Trucy and Luke were in here this morning."

Apollo raised an eyebrow at the thought of Trucy handing over her prized locket as a 'good luck charm', then realised it was probably exactly what she would do and decided to let it go with a sigh. "At least they both know, I s'pose. Trucy isn't in school?"

Phoenix shook his head. "Luke called her in sick. He's looking after her while I'm in here, and you, he grinned proudly, "are getting me out."

"Trying to," Apollo corrected, looking away with a glare.

"If you weren't listening earlier," Kristoph cut in, "we didn't get much information from the crime scene. As a result, you should know very well how vital your testimony is going to be to our case."

"Aw, I know you can do it!" Phoenix replied with a bright smile. "You're the best attorney in town, aren't you?"

Kristoph was starting to look annoyed. "Even the best attorney can only work with what he has," he pointed out. "You might at least tell us who the victim was!"

Phoenix put on a thoughtful look, staring blankly off into space, and Apollo recognised it as being the kind of expression his father would wear while joking around with his children... minus the smile. "A traveller, I think," he muttered. "New customer, never seen 'im before."

Alarm bells started going off in Apollo's head.

Kristoph gave a long-suffering sigh, pushing on his glasses. "What about the prosecutor? I presume you've met him by now."

"Old Winston?" Phoenix laughed. "That's why I'm so confident you'll win this thing!" He gave Apollo a wink. "That guy's a pushover, believe me."
Before Apollo could do more than smile bemusedly, Kristoph had crossed his arms, giving Phoenix a glare. "If you refuse to help us, we will be forced to work a miracle in that trial." He shook his head. "And I regret to inform you, that will be nearly impossible, regardless of who the prosecutor is."

"'Nearly'?" Phoenix repeated with a bright smile. "Ah, so you can do it!"

Kristoph simply glared at Phoenix, then got up without a word and stalked out of the room.

For a moment, Apollo was torn over following his mentor and talking to his father privately now he had the chance... then Phoenix made the choice for him, turning to his son with a serious look. "Apollo, I'd get started on your case plan if I were you."

"Case plan?" Apollo muttered in surprise. "What do you mean? Mister Gavin's heading the-!"

"Do it for practice if nothing else," Phoenix interrupted with a warm smile. "Don't you worry about Luke and Trucy, or about me. Just focus on your job, okay?"

Apollo felt his face fall. "But Dad, you are my j-!"

"Forget that," Phoenix told him, face somewhere between stern and sad. "Right now, I'm just your client. Focus on your trial, and I know you can win it."

At that, Apollo frowned, giving his father a suspicious look. "Dad, you're talking like I'm defending you instead of Mister Gavin. Are..." He paled as a terrifying thought came to mind of what was going on. "Are you planning something?"

Phoenix didn't reply for a long moment, staring back at Apollo. "You'd better catch up to Kristoph," he advised. "You've both got a lot of work to do." Before Apollo could reply, the ex-lawyer had stood from his chair and approached the guard, who escorted the man out of the room without a word.

Apollo sighed as he stood up, moving to go find his mentor. 'Whatever Dad's planning... it better not backfire.'

---

Have you heard what's going on with Dad? .

DAMMIT LUKE WHERE ARE YOU!? .

Oops, sorry, Apollo! I was asleep! Papa woke me up in the early hours of the morning, so I didn't get much sleep last night... also I left my phone at home.

There you are. :/ Yeah, Dad mentioned you're looking after Trucy atm? .

Yes, I am. Trucy sort of locked herself away once I told her what had happened, and I called her in sick... I sort of fell asleep after that, then Trucy woke me up to go visit Papa. Once we got back, she locked herself away in her room again.
I'm really sorry, Apollo, but I should stop there; Papa said we shouldn't talk to you at all so you can concentrate on the case. I've already broken that promise.

Yeah, he said something similar to me :/ I understand, don't worry. Talk to you after the trial? .

Sure. :) We'll both see you then, me and Trucy.

See you then...

Apollo and Clay's Apartment
Front Room

Apollo sighed as he closed his front door behind him, wondering just what was going on and what he was supposed to do about it. If Dad were even trying to be helpful, it would be a different story... but to even forbid Luke and Trucy from talking to me? It's not like I was planning to screw this trial up like I did Luke's! Nevertheless, he had quietly prepared his own case plan as Phoenix had instructed... purely for practise, of course. He wasn't nearly experienced enough, or confident enough, to lead a case yet, and Phoenix knew that... right?

There was a thud from somewhere inside, and Clay poked his head out of his bedroom doorway down the hall, smiling at he spotted his friend. "Yo, 'Pollo!" he called, waving. "How'd your case go?"

Apollo half-heartedly waved back, trying not to look as down as he felt. "Uh, alright, I guess. It's... going."

Clay raised an eyebrow, stepping out into the hallway. "Wow, that bad, huh?"

Unable to formulate a reply, Apollo simply stepped through into the kitchen, deciding to leave the conversation at that.

Clay wasn't so willing to let the subject go, frowning in concern as he followed his friend. "You don't want to talk about it?" he asked.

Apollo tried to ignore his friend, grabbing a glass and heading to the sink. "Don't you have studying to do?" he asked, perhaps more harshly than he intended.

"I need a break anyway," Clay replied with a shrug, watching Apollo with a grin. "What happened, dude? Gimme the details!"

Sighing, Apollo finished filling his glass with water, then turned around, leaning against the counter as he took a sip. "It's... Our client. And... I guess the police and prosecutor, too... Nothing concrete, and... y'know."

"You're not making any sense there, dude," Clay pointed out with a sympathetic smile. "Rough day, then?"

Apollo nodded, taking another quick sip of water to buy time as he wondered how to begin. "Ernest's on this case, too," he eventually explained.

"Oh, cool!" Clay replied, grinning. "How is he? Any help?"
"Not really," Apollo admitted. "He didn’t see the crime scene, and though he let us look at it, the detective's already cleared it of anything useful."

"Bummer," Clay sympathised, crossing his arms and leaning sideways against the fridge. "What about the prosecutor?"

Apollo sighed again, staring at his glass. "Dad says he's a pushover, which is good I suppose," he explained. "We'll need all we can get on a murder case."

Clay nodded. "And your client? What's their story?"

Apollo would have laughed then, had he not so strongly wanted to punch his father. Instead, he merely frowned bitterly. "Well, for starters, he's an ex-lawyer turned pianist-slash-poker-champion with three adopted kids, and this is apparently the third time he's been accused of murder."

Clay stared back at Apollo blankly.
