But if they weren't planning to take Apollo and Trucy to Khura'in once Lamiroir returned, what were they talking about? He almost wanted to cry in frustration.

"I'm fine," Apollo muttered, pressing his gloved hands over his eyes. "My name's Apollo Wright and I'm fine." He didn't move a muscle from where he lay for a long time.

It was only when he woke to the sound of voices outside his door Apollo realised he had dozed off. Rubbing at his eyes, he sat up; Listening carefully, he could make out Trucy and Pearl, and there was Machi, and Luke... even Iris. They must have finished their tour. I hope they didn't worry when I never caught up to them."

Footsteps came close, followed by a gentle knock on the door. "Apollo?"
Apollo held back a sigh as he recognised his brother's voice, swinging his legs over the edge of the bed. "I'm here."

The door opened only a little, and Luke's head soon appeared in the gap, giving Apollo a worried smile. "Hey. Did you talk to Papa?"

Sighing for real this time, Apollo shook his head. "He was talking with Mom. I didn't want to disturb him."

"Oh." Luke paused a second in thought, then redirected his gaze to Apollo, an undisguised look of concern on his face. "Well, if you need us, we'll be over in the living room, okay?"

A part of Apollo was surprised Luke wasn't chasing up whatever was bothering the elder brother (he knew for a fact he wasn't hiding it very well), but he didn't question it, nodding with a smile. "Yeah. Thanks."

Luke smiled back, then gently closed the door. A few moments later, the voices of the group faded away down the corridor, and were gone.

Left alone again, Apollo lay back down on the bed, his hand rubbing at his bracelet. 'What am I doing? Worrying over literally nothing like this... I need to just forget what I heard, go back and spend time with my family, since we've never had so many of us together like this...' Despite his own internal objections however, Apollo couldn't make himself move to get up, or stop dwelling on the strange conversation.

Those tears were threatening again. 'Family doesn't abandon each other,' he repeated to himself. 'This is my family now. We don't abandon each other.'

Apollo didn't know how long it had been since Luke left, too wrapped up in his thoughts to be paying attention to the time. It was only the sound of footsteps in the hallway that dragged him back to his surroundings once more, and he quickly sat up when the approaching feet were followed by another knock at his door. "What?" he called.

"It's me," Phoenix called. "Luke tells me you wanted to talk to me?"

Apollo winced as he turned to place his feet on the floor; He was starting to regret that snap decision to go talk to Phoenix after seeing Iris in the garden. "Uh, yeah, I did."

There was a short pause, then the door opened, Phoenix standing in the doorway and watching Apollo with a smile. "Well, I'm free now. What was it you wanted?"

Sighing, Apollo looked away. He wasn't exactly in the mood anymore for the teasing remarks he'd originally been planning to make... and he didn't think he could handle asking about whatever it was he'd overheard. "It doesn't matter."

This time, the pause was longer. Apollo heard Phoenix enter the room, closing the door behind him. "You overheard Maya and I talking, didn't you?"

Apollo tried his best not to react, but couldn't help tensing up a little. He didn't reply.

Phoenix lowered himself onto the bed at Apollo's side. "I can't think of any other reason you'd be acting this way, considering you apparently wanted to talk to me, told Luke you didn't because Maya and I were busy discussing something, and now you're locked up in your room sulking. You've got everyone worrying about you now."

"I'm just tired," Apollo insisted, hands tightening into fists in his lap. "I didn't want to bother you."

Phoenix sighed. "Apollo, don't lie to me. I know when you're hiding something."

Apollo stubbornly remained silent. He refused to meet his father's gaze.

There was a long pause before Phoenix accepted there would be no reply. He shifted in his seat a little, making Apollo wonder if he might just up and leave, but didn't get up. "Alright," he finally said, "given the circumstances, I don't think Maya will mind if I tell you. You just have to promise not to share this with the others just yet, okay?"

Apollo frowned, tempted to chance a look up at Phoenix's face, but didn't dare move. "Tell me what?"

Phoenix took a moment or two to reply. "Maya is being pushed into attending a two-year training course overseas."

At that, Apollo froze. 'That... was not what I was expecting to hear.'

"She's been pushing back and putting it off," Phoenix continued, "because you and Trucy just located your mother, and she doesn't want to disappear for two years at a time when she feels you need her the most; Once she leaves, she won't be able to come back and visit until she's done."

Slowly, Apollo turned and looked up to meet Phoenix's concerned gaze. "Mom's been doing that... for us?"

Phoenix nodded, giving his son a small smile. "She didn't want us to worry, so she's been keeping it a secret. I didn't know myself until today." He chuckled. "Let me guess, you heard us saying your name and jumped to conclusions?"

Apollo turned red, looking away again.

Laughing, Phoenix patted his son's back. "I'm just teasing," he assured him. "This country she's going to... I assume you heard us talking about it?"

A part of Apollo wanted to snap an emphatic 'no' and avoid the subject... but after all the stress he'd just put himself through, and the secret he'd just been let in on, he decided his father deserved to be trusted with the truth, a truth Apollo himself had been denying for a very long time. He nodded. "I can tell her what I remember, but it's been a long time since I was in Khura'in," he whispered. "It's probably changed a lot."

Phoenix only nodded. He didn't speak.

After a short pause, Apollo sighed and leaned over to rest against his father; Phoenix responded by moving his hand to rest on his son's opposite shoulder. "Honestly, I've spent... eleven or twelve years trying my best to forget it," Apollo continued. "That's why I've never talked about it. There's no-one there I'm interested in seeing again, and nowhere I'd want to revisit. I'd miss Mom - it's two years, after all - but I don't ever want to go back to Khura'in. Not for anyone."

"I understand," Phoenix said, his hand rubbing Apollo's shoulder through the cape covering it. "We won't ask you to."

Apollo sat still, leaning against his father, the comforting pressure of Phoenix's grip on his arm. He could feel all the anxiety that had been building these past couple of hours float off into the ether, his concerns fading away with them. Finally, after all the stress that morning had brought him, a smile came to his face. "Hey, Dad?"

"Mm?"

"Y'know your secret mission? The one you ran off on just before Machi's trial?"

Phoenix's hand stopped its comforting motion. He'd shared that story with Apollo in a private moment shortly after Machi joined their household, though it wasn't all that exciting to anyone other than lawyers like them. "The initial planning sessions to get the Jurist System approved for testing? What about it?"

Apollo grinned, resisting the urge to laugh. "When you have everything ready, and get the perfect case to test it with... Are you going to include Iris in the jury?"

Phoenix sighed, and Apollo bit back giggles. "I'm going to be professional about it, Apollo. Not everyone on that jury will be friends, and I'm certainly not going to ask family."

"Not your ex-girlfriend, then?" Apollo pressed. "She's more than just a friend, and she's not close family. Are you asking her?"

Groaning, Phoenix pushed his laughing son off his shoulder, making a show of being disgusted as he got to his feet. "If you're only going to mock me..."

Apollo made no attempt to stifle his amusement as he also stood. "Aw, I'm only teasing, Dad!"

Phoenix scoffed, but didn't hide the small smile on his face. When he reached out to ruffle his son's hair in payback, Apollo didn't object. "C'mon," Phoenix said, jerking his head to the door, "let's go catch up with everyone else."

As they walked through the hallways towards the living room, Apollo heard the familiar sounds of Machi on the piano, and sighed in relief through the massive grin still on his face.

After all, family didn't abandon each other.

View the Court Record
Post-Tour Family Reunion

Chapter Notes

Potential minor spoilers for SOJ in this chapter, but nothing new if you read 363 a.k.a. Phoenix and Maya's conversation.

August 8, 10:47AM
Fey Manor
Living Room

Phoenix led his eldest son back through the hallways to the living room, following the sound of the piano. It was a relief after his earlier conversation with Luke to know that all was well.

Maya had been the first to enter the living room, hearing the laughter of the children ahead of them. She clapped her hands, Phoenix behind her closing the door at his back, and told the quintet around the table, "Aha, we found you!"

"Hi, Mommy!" Trucy called, giving her a wave. "We finished showing Machi around!"

"Your house is very big," Machi added.

Maya laughed, moving to join the group. "You can blame my ancestors for that. It's handy when we've got a lot of people hanging around, though." She shot him a wink.

As Phoenix approached the table, it was hard to miss the round eyes of Iris focussing on him, and he gave her a friendly smile and wave, remembering their conversation when last they met. "Iris."

Iris nodded. "Hello, Fe-Phoenix." Her eyes glanced at Maya, then looked firmly away, cheeks flushing.

"Ah, Papa," Luke spoke up, "Apollo was looking for you earlier."

Phoenix paused, surprised. "He was?" He shared a look with Maya, both equally confused. "We haven't seen him since you all ran off together."

"He didn't come on our tour," Pearl explained, chewing a thumbnail.

"Yeah, he just ran off after saying hello to Pearly and Iris," Trucy agreed, crossing her arms with an air of frustration that didn't do much to hide her concern, "and now he's hiding away in his room."

Luke nodded. "He told me he heard you two talking and didn't want to disturb you."

At that, Phoenix felt his worries solidify into an iron ball in his stomach, sharing a startled look with Maya. Had Apollo overheard...? "I'll... go talk to him," he decided. Tapping Maya reassuringly on the arm, he turned and hurried to the bedrooms.
And now, only five minutes later, Apollo was in on Maya's secret about Khura'in and back to his usual cheerful self. Phoenix would have to tell Maya what had transpired, but the smile on his son's face was enough of a boost to his mood that he wasn't worried about it.

Phoenix grinned as he slid open the living room door, watching the group circled around the piano in the far corner of the room. It was strange how that piece of furniture disappeared so easily into the background until someone moved to play it, and Maya kept it in much better condition than Phoenix did his. Right now, Machi was sat on the piano stool, playing some kind of classical piece from memory as everyone else listened intently in their circle around the corner of the room the instrument sat in. Phoenix turned behind him, holding a finger to his lips as a signal to Apollo, then gestured for him to enter.

Apollo bit back snickers, slipping inside behind Phoenix. His eyes quickly locked on to the group in the corner, and he looked up at his father, an eyebrow raised in question.

Still grinning, Phoenix gave his son a nearly imperceptible nod, then gently closed the door behind them and ventured forward. The pair tip-toed ever closer to the piano, the melody helping to mask any sound they might have made. Phoenix was only a metre away from where Maya stood at Machi's back, he held up a hand to signal Apollo...

"Hey, Nick. Apollo."

Phoenix started, then laughed, slipping his hands into his pockets.

Apollo groaned as the music came to a surprised halt, the group around the piano turning to face the two intruders. "How'd you know we were here!? We weren't making a single sound!"

Maya laughed, the only person of the group at the piano not surprised to see the pair. She gave Apollo a wink. "Simple: I'm a spirit medium!"

At that, Apollo shot her a glare. "That doesn't answer the question!"

Phoenix eyed the shiny surface of the piano behind Maya, and smirked. Turning to Apollo, he shrugged. "Ah well, I guess we'll never know."

Apollo's glare turned towards his father. "Dad."

Laughing, Phoenix turned and casually walked away.

"Polly!" Trucy cried, jumping on her oldest brother with a hug, only to then step back and give him a stern look. "Were you trying to scare us?"

Apollo's anger disappeared as he shot his sister a smirk. "Why, were you scared?"

Trucy whacked his arm in reply.

Phoenix hadn't gotten very far before Maya caught up to him, holding his arm as they separated themselves from everyone else in the room. Shooting a worried look at the group around the piano, she whispered, "Did he...?"

"He did," Phoenix replied, keeping his voice low. He returned Maya's gesture, their arms wound around each other as they each gripped the other's elbow. "Considering what exactly he heard, I told him all about it. Sorry."
Maya just smiled, relieved. "As long as he's not spreading it around. We should check the door next time we do that."

Phoenix chuckled, leaning in close. "I made him promise. But really, they should know better than to listen in on us."

"Are you implying something, Phoenix Wright?" Maya replied, smirking. Her free hand pressed against his chest, though it acted more to move him closer than to push him away; In response, his other hand moved to rest on her obi, right above Maya's hip. "Is there something we should be doing in private that we're not already?"

"Hmm, let me think," Phoenix muttered, his face so close to Maya's their noses were nearly touching. "I'm sure something will come to-"

"Mom, Dad!" Apollo shouted. "Time and place, please!"

Phoenix and Maya looked up to find the group at the piano had taken notice of their private conversation (truthfully, they'd both forgotten they were even there). While Apollo, Luke, and Trucy were all fixing them with various intensities of a disgusted look, Machi and Iris simply looked confused; Pearl, the odd one out, seemed about as surprised as Phoenix and Maya.

Maya was quick to recover, crossing her arms as she turned to face the 'kids' with a smirk. "What about the time and place? I thought it was pretty good, myself."

Apollo rolled his eyes. "You know what I mean."

Luke was much more reasonable: "Didn't you two get that out of your system before? You've spent almost an hour together already today."

"What, talking?" Phoenix replied, resting an arm across Maya's shoulders. "Cause that's all we've been doing. I didn't know there was a time limit on talking now." He gave Maya a smirk. "Did you know there was a limit on talking, Maya?"

Maya shook her head, playing along. "Nope, I've never heard of a time limit on talking."

Trucy took a deep breath, as though psyching herself up for something. "Mommy, Daddy, we love you, and we're glad you're together..." Her calm demeanour flipped like a switch, shaking a finger at the pair. "But you need to stop being so mushy and gross right in front of us! Go do that in your room!"

"Is that an invitation?" Maya asked, unphased. She held a hand up towards Phoenix, and he high-fived it without a thought, neither of the pair breaking their gazes on Trucy.

"Don't you dare high-five that!" Apollo demanded. "That wasn't clever, that's the exact same line you always say!"

A soft giggling from behind him drew everyone's attention to Iris, stood next to Machi and Pearl by the piano. "Oh, Trucy," she said, giving the teen a warm smile, "you must not have very much experience with the world at all if you think that was 'mushy'."

Trucy cocked her head to one side. "What do you mean?"

Maya gasped, excited. "Ooh, yeah, I heard all about that from Sis!" She giggled, elbowing Phoenix as she shot him a wink. "Nick doesn't look it, but he can be very mushy."
Phoenix stepped back from his girlfriend warily, his face turning red. "Um... we really don't need to discuss this... I was never that bad."

Apollo burst into badly hidden snickering. "I've read the trial transcript, Dad. You were hopeless."

"I was a kid!" Phoenix argued.

"You were my age!"

Phoenix shot his son a stern look, pointing a finger. "You're a kid."

"I'm twenty-two!"

"He has a point, old man," Maya added, giving Phoenix a cheeky wink.

"And you were twenty-one at the time, Feenie," Iris pointed out, equally amused.

Phoenix shot them both unamused looks. "You're not helping."

"We're not trying to!" Maya gleefully replied.

By the piano, Machi leaned towards Pearl, who was standing next to him, and whispered, "Is this... normal?"

Pearly nodded. "Oh, sure. They play this game at least once every time the six of us are together."

"Game...?" Machi repeated, eyebrows raised. This was by far the strangest 'game' he'd ever witnessed in his life.

Trucy squeaked, having noticed Machi's quiet conversation (if not having heard the words). "Oh, that reminds me!" She turned to Apollo, tugging on his cape. "Polly, you still need to tell Machi that story, remember?"

Apollo blinked. "Me? Why me?"

"Exactly," Luke agreed with his brother, gesturing to the woman stood nearby. "Why not ask Iris?"

"Ask me what?" Iris asked, surprised.

Apollo didn't seem to have heard her: "Yeah, and Dad, Mom, and Pearly were actually there; I'm like the least qualified person to tell that story."

Pearl gasped, a hand to her mouth. "Oh, are you talking about...?"

"Now now, don't sell yourself short, Apollo," Phoenix cut in, recovered from his earlier embarrassment. "You were there for that trial, too... and on the day I wasn't, no less."

"I wasn't even there until the last five minutes!" Maya cheerfully pointed out. "And Pearly was channelling my sis most of the time!"

"You both know full well that's not what I mean!" Apollo shot back.

Iris's hand lingered near her mouth, eyes uncomfortably avoiding everyone's gazes. "Oh... You mean Dahlia's story."

Phoenix's cheeky gaze faded to a sympathetic look. "We can handle it if you're still uncomfortable" discussing her, Iris."

Iris paused only half a second before shaking her head, her hand settling on the purple magatama hanging around her neck. She gave Phoenix a determined stare. "No. I can't avoid that subject forever... nor should I pretend I never had a twin. If anyone is going to tell Dahlia's story now, it should be me."

Phoenix nodded with a proud smile.

View the Court Record
Machi had listened intently, enraptured by Iris's tale. The story started out so sad, with the two sisters taken from their mother by their father, and said father then giving Iris away to be raised as a nun, separating the girls purely because he was re-marrying and acquiring a step-daughter. Through Iris's eyes, Dahlia sounded so confident, and Iris clearly admired her despite all she had done... even if she sounded so ashamed talking of how she had assisted with whatever her sister asked, starved of any other kind of contact with the outside world and desperate to keep her only remaining family member close. She described how she had first seen the danger signs when, at fourteen, Dahlia presented her plan to leave the Hawthorne family and steal their father's most precious diamond, with the help of her step-sister, now a police officer, and a tutor she had charmed, who she wanted to take the fall. The plan hadn't gone well, the diamond vanishing into Eagle River, but Dahlia's 'murder' stood firm; Despite her fury at Iris, Dahlia stayed in the area, and eventually her journey led her to Ivy University. As a direct result of the failed plan, Dahlia later murdered her step-sister, and the former tutor when he escaped from prison, but didn't escape notice from a pair of defence attorneys by the names of Mia Fey and Diego Armando. Armando's attempt to question her in a public library resulted in him being poisoned, left in a coma, and she successfully hid the incriminating evidence by charming one Phoenix Wright who had been studying nearby.

"I think you can tell I had no experience with romance," Phoenix muttered as an excuse, blushing madly.

"I begged Dahlia that there be no more death," Iris continued. "I told her I could get that necklace back, that Feenie would never even know... and she reluctantly agreed. I started taking her place at Ivy University, meeting Feenie and trying to convince him to give the necklace up willingly."

Phoenix's face got even redder, and he hid behind a hand.

Surprisingly to Machi, Phoenix had never agreed to return the necklace, and Iris grew too fond of him to force the issue by stealing it and thus removing herself from his life... so Dahlia lost all patience, meeting Phoenix behind Iris's back with a plan to poison his cold medicine. As it turned out, Dahlia's former boyfriend, from whom she had stolen the poison, realised what was happening and tried to warn Phoenix, resulting in the boyfriend's death and Phoenix facing the punishment. By chance, Mia Fey, Armando's partner and Maya's older sister, took up Phoenix's defence and finally managed to convict Dahlia for murder. She was sentenced to execution five years later, and Iris never saw her again.

But that wasn't the end of the story.
Machi had had 'spirit channelling' explained to him by Trucy, less than a week ago, and he still wasn't sure if he could completely believe it... though the way everyone else treated it as such a matter-of-fact truth was very convincing. Phoenix's embarrassment spread to Pearl and even Maya as Iris described Armando's return, his discovery of the plan to murder Maya and his counter-plan to foil it, which resulted in the murder of Maya's mother and Iris taking the fall. Despite all the odds, Phoenix unravelled the complicated story, confronted Dahlia for the last time, and finally learned the truth about the woman he had dated five years earlier. Iris had gone to jail for accessory to murder, and Armando's poor health gave him a life sentence all on its own.

"I didn't get the choice of probation like you did," Iris told Machi, giving him a warm smile. "But, then again, I willingly aided trying to cover up that murder, and you were just smuggling drugs, weren't you?"

Machi nodded, hands fidgeting. "I didn't kill manager," he mumbled.

"We know you didn't," Apollo assured him, patting the teen's shoulder. "That's why we defended you, remember?"

After they had eaten lunch, the various members of the family split up into smaller groups, separating out around the manor on their own individual pass-times; Machi elected not to join any of them, returning to the living room to play the piano and muse on his day so far.

If he was being honest, Machi still found the whole 'spirit channelling' thing hard to swallow... but he wasn't going to demand proof from people who were kind enough to take him into their family. Iris's story was also very out there, but Machi found himself more inclined to take it as truth, with Phoenix, Maya, and Pearl still harbouring sorrow over the events and Apollo telling Machi afterwards of how he'd watched the ongoing trial from the gallery, and found it massively confusing at the time (he'd even promised to dig out Phoenix's case files to show Machi later if he was interested - Machi still wasn't sure if he'd take Apollo up on that though). All said, Machi couldn't help but identify with Iris: She was very quiet, like him, and had stood in court falsely accused of murder, also like him. Iris was much older than Machi, around Phoenix's age, and came across as so wise... much like Phoenix himself had appeared to be when Machi first met him, before getting to know the teasing fatherly goofball underneath. Would he find Iris was the same way once he got to know her? Or maybe it was only thanks to the rather goofy and teasing Maya that Phoenix was the way he was; His isa had certainly sounded like a completely different person when he was dating Iris, although he was much more familiar by the time of the incident at this Hazakura Temple place Iris worked at.

Machi's thoughts stilled as his fingers relaxed from the closing notes of Für Elise. Although he could think of plenty of pieces to play next, he found himself craving something new, and his eyes flickered to a box of books sitting on top of the piano. Maya had told him earlier it housed all the music books the Feys had collected over the years, cheerfully adding, "And you're a member of the family now! Feel free to take a look, see if there's anything you're interested in playing."

Machi smiled. Maya really was like a second aska, and just as welcoming as the Wrights. He slid off the stool to his feet and reached up on his tip-toes for the box.

"Do you need help?"

The boy jumped, spinning around. Only a metre or two away stood Iris, one hand reaching out as if to take down the box on top of the piano herself.

"I'm sorry, I didn't mean to startle you," Iris continued, hands clutching together in front of her. "I was listening to your music... Pearly told me that you performed professionally with Lamiroir; Is that right?"

Machi paused, then nodded. He had already guessed the story of his trial had been passed on to the three Feys, likely by the Wrights. "I like play piano. I play since I was little."

Iris smiled. After a pause, she stepped forward, again gesturing to the box. "Were you wanting to look at Mystic Maya's music?"

"Yes, thank you," Machi mumbled, stepping aside sheepishly.

Without a word, Iris moved to the piano, reaching up to grasp the box and take it down, resting it by the edge on a corner of the wooden frame around the keys. "I hope there's something interesting in here for you."

Machi nodded in agreement, stepping forward to page through the contents of the box. Much as Maya had said, it mostly looked old, with books that had long fallen apart lingering at the bottom, while the top was more instruction books for learners to hone their skills. Right on top though was the most interesting item, immediately grabbing Machi's attention: A hand-written piece of music on a lined piece of notebook paper. He put it aside at first, wanting to evaluate what else was there, but his focus soon returned to the odd page. Who had written it? And when? He picked it up, eyes running over the fading pencil lines that marked out the notes of a simple tune. Letters were scrawled below, and Machi quickly realised they indicated chords for the left hand, in the absence of any space for another bar.

"What's that?" Iris asked.

Machi shrugged, then placed the paper on the stand. He dropped back onto the stool, his feet jumping to the pedals; Iris disappeared somewhere behind him with the box, he guessed taking it to the table to put down. It was hard to make out the scribbled notes and five bar lines around the blue ones designed for words, but Machi studied carefully what he could see to commit it to memory before his hands once more rested on the keys.

On the first go around, Machi played only the right hand, getting used to his best guess of how the author had intended their melody to go. Once he had it down, then he added the left hand's bass line, fleshing out the simple tune to the best of its author's ability.

"That's very pretty," Iris said from behind him. "I wonder who wrote it?"

Machi shrugged again, pausing in his playing. "Maybe we ask Maya?"

"True," Iris agreed. She moved around to Machi's side, studying the paper. "I suppose it must have been one of the Feys who lived here... probably recent, since it was right on top. Or at least recently used."

Machi nodded in agreement, his hands resting in his lap. Truthfully, with no clue to the melody's author, he had already put the issue out of his mind for later, instead turning his eyes curiously to Iris. "Um... may I ask a question?"

Iris blinked in surprise, looking at the boy. "Of course. What is it?"

"How long... you in jail?"

Iris paused only a moment, then she smiled. "Three years. How long is your probation?"
Machi tried not to look too relieved she hadn't been offended by his question. "One year. Was hard? In jail?"

"No," Iris replied, shaking her head. "I kept to myself... and three years isn't all that long in the grand scheme of things, especially once you get to my age." She laughed, brushing a lock of hair behind an ear. "Even so, I think we can both agree standing in court accused of murder isn't a pleasant experience. All we can do is learn and move on."

Machi nodded, hands fiddling in his lap.

After a long pause, Iris continued, "I did what I did because I was faced with the choice of family or justice. I always chose family, first for Dahlia and then for Pearly. Maybe, if I had chosen justice much earlier, I could have stopped all that pain sooner... before so many people died."

Machi frowned, running a hand through his hair. "I... also chose bad," he admitted.

Iris looked surprised. "Oh?"

On the day of his trial, Machi didn't have the words to explain his situation in English, why he'd agreed to smuggle that cocoon for money. In the weeks after, he'd become determined to share the story with his new family, and spent a night arranging how he'd tell the Wrights what had happened; It was this same speech that came back to his mind as he prepared to pass the story on to this new member of his family. "I grew up in orphanage, in Borgia. We were like family, before I go to Lamiroir." He paused, biting his lip. "But orphanage in small town, and government want to break up, send everyone to other towns. They always looking for money, send letters to Lamiroir asking... but I not tell her." Machi hugged himself tightly, ashamed; He could remember how tightly Trucy had hugged him when he admitted this to the Wrights. "I not want her to worry. I send them my own money, but I not have much, and I can not get more as I pretend be blind. Then Lamiroir get email from overseas, friend of Mister Gavin, and he offer lot of money." He sighed, unable to meet Iris's eyes. "I not want family home to be broken, so I accept. I no tell Lamiroir."

There was a long pause, then Machi felt a hand on his shoulder and looked up to see Iris giving him an empathetic smile. "I understand exactly what you mean," she said. He free hand reached into her robes and pulled out a small purple phone. "If you want to talk more with someone who knows what it's like and won't judge you... maybe we could exchange numbers?"

Machi smiled, reaching to pull out his own phone. "Thank you. I like that very much."
It was the Tuesday after the Wrights' weekend in Kurain Village. Despite having to return to the Agency with Apollo over the night, Machi had greatly enjoyed himself up in the mountains, playing piano with Maya, exploring Pearl's collection of board games, and looking around the garden and extensive house with Iris; As he had told them before leaving on the second day, Machi was greatly looking forward to whenever he and his new family could see them again.

In the meantime, life had returned to normal. As was usual for a Tuesday, Luke wouldn't be in until after lunch; Unusually, Trucy had decided today was the perfect day to try out a recipe Flora had sent them. She had asked Machi to help, but, knowing his English was nowhere near up to the task of handling the unique language of cooking, he had declined. Luckily, Phoenix had been happy to step in, so father and daughter were now all-but locked up in the kitchen, testing to see if their cooking skills were up to the task of achieving Flora's suggestions.

(Machi highly doubted it, after everything he'd heard about how amazing Flora's food was, and the fact that he'd never seen any kind of significant cooking going on in the Wrights' kitchen.)

In the office next door, Apollo was sat at Phoenix's desk, using the office computer to do some unspecified work of his own. Nearby, Machi sat on one of the sofas with his workbook and the sheets of paper Luke had printed off at the library especially for him. The sounds coming from the kitchen were cheerful, but loud enough that Apollo ended up closing the door, and Machi made sure to thank him; It was much easier to concentrate in the silence.

They worked quietly. Machi had quickly filled out a page's worth of his exercises - this particular one focussed on correct word order - and was already exhausted. Normally he would pass on what he had to Luke, and if Luke was not around to Phoenix... but Phoenix was busy. Who could he ask for help? His gaze turned up to Apollo, seeing him totally focussed on the computer monitor. He didn't look like he had the time. Machi wondered what else he could do if not his English practise.

"You okay, Machi?"

Machi blinked in surprise, turning his eyes back to the desk, where Apollo was watching him in concern. Immediately he felt guilty. "Um... I finished my homework."

Apollo smiled. "Well, seeing as Luke's not here and Dad's busy... You want me to check it over for you?"

Blushing, Machi nodded.

Apollo laughed, setting a piece of paper off to one side in front of him as he beckoned the boy to join him at the desk. "C'mon, bring it here." His free hand jumped to the computer mouse, obviously closing windows on the monitor.

Machi picked his workbook off the coffee table and left the sofa, running around behind the desk to hand it over to Apollo. He watched the young lawyer lay the book down to read it... but, as much as he knew he shouldn't, his attention was quickly drawn to the piece of paper lying nearby, the one Apollo had put to the side and directly in front of where Machi now stood. It was clearly rather old, lined with thick creases where it had been folded again and again, bends in the paper marking where hands had firmly gripped it to read the short blurb of text below the faded picture. Despite it having been folded when Apollo moved it aside, some kind of lingering tension in the greying fibres was slowly opening it again, showing its contents to the world.

Machi cast a wary glance at Apollo. He still seemed wrapped up in going over Machi's English exercise, the monitor behind him displaying the default beach cave of the empty desktop; Apollo hadn't noticed the discarded paper, nor was paying any attention to Machi right now. If Machi was going to snoop, this would be his one and only chance. But did he dare to take such a brazen peek at whatever it was Apollo was working on?

Yes. Yes, he dared.

Casting a final wary glance at Apollo to ensure he was still busy with the assignment, Machi leaned over slightly to give the paper a closer inspection; It appeared to be some kind of newspaper article, the headline prominently displaying the word 'Gramarye' next to 'daughter' (Wasn't the correct phrasing 'Gramarye's daughter'? English was so confusing...) and then 'leaves'... although 'Troupe' at the end was not one as familiar to Machi as the other three were. The unfamiliar word didn't do much for Machi's confidence in understanding the article itself, so he instead turned his attention to the picture, his eyes jumping instinctively to the face of the young woman sat front and centre.

It was Lamiroir.

Machi didn't believe his eyes for a moment, staring at the young face in front of him... but it was impossible he was mistaken. He knew his aska's face better than any other, and age had not changed her features at all, save for a few small lines here and there. She was even wearing that old bracelet of hers... and, apparently, a second identical one on her other wrist.

The teen's gaze flicked briefly back to Apollo; He had always thought it strange that his new brother had a bracelet just like Lamiroir's.

Blue eyes scanned the article itself for a reference to the photo, and he soon spotted a small italicised caption at the bottom, beginning with the word 'pictured'. Although a good chuck of the sentence was beyond Machi's understanding, he knew enough to see that it was labelling the woman with a name, a name that was most decidedly not 'Lamiroir'. Further searching of the text located a date, the year 2003, long before Machi was born.

Hand shaking, Machi reached out and picked up the paper. "A-Apollo... What is this...?"

"Hmm?" Apollo tore his eyes from the worksheet, looking up to Machi before suddenly going pale, eyes wide. "D-don't-!" He grabbed at the paper, tearing it from Machi's grip and hurriedly folding it up along its well-worn crease lines. "I-it's nothing," he insisted, shoving the small bundle somewhere in the direction of the bag at his hip, but his own hands were shaking so much he kept missing.

"Nothing!?!" Machi repeated, making a swipe to reclaim the article. "That is not 'nothing'! That is photo of Lamiroir! That is Lamiroir's name!" Apollo had by now managed to hide the paper in his hip pouch, but Machi didn't let that stop him from fighting to claim it, pushing against Apollo's hands as the lawyer stood, Apollo covering the bag's opening with one hand and twisting his posture so said bag was harder to reach from Machi's position. With the desk on one side and the chair on the other, Machi was forced to shove his weight against Apollo himself, straining to shove a hand into the heart-shaped bag to retrieve the article within. "You knew Lamiroir's name and you not say!"
"How long you know this!?"

"M-Machi, please," Apollo begged, holding the boy back much better than Machi thought he should be able to. "It's not what you think, I promise!"

"How not what I think!?" Machi asked, shoving Apollo with all his strength before reluctantly stepping back, abandoning the fight for the article. He could feel his heart pounding in his ears, his face red from the stress and exertion, and he was pretty sure those mutinous tears were streaming down his cheeks again. "You knew Lamiroir's name and you not tell her! You not tell me!" He spun around, intending to run (he didn't know where, just wanted to get out, to get away), but only got a step or two before a gloved hand clamped down on his arm.

"Machi, please," Apollo sighed, "will you at least hear me out before you jump to conclusions?"

Machi fruitlessly tried to pull out of Apollo's grasp, but soon gave up, wiping the angry tears from his face. He didn't understand Apollo's exact phrasing, but he could easily guess it meant something like 'passing judgement'. He wanted to tell Apollo 'no', to run and hide in his room; How could he have held something back like this? Wasn't he Machi's isoveli? How could he have betrayed him like this? Betrayed Lamiroir like this? What gave him the right to dig up Lamiroir's true identity and then hide it from her? All thoughts of running faded, Machi shaking with rage where he stood... but even then, he couldn't make himself take it out on Apollo; Not even when the other person deserved it did Machi like to shout at people.

After a long pause, Apollo sighed again, and his hand released Machi's arm. A moment later, Machi heard rustling paper, and turned to see Apollo holding out the folded article for Machi to take, the lawyer's face utterly miserable. "If we'd told you before," Apollo quietly said, "you wouldn't have believed us."

Machi stared back for a second or two before hesitantly reaching for the lump of paper and clutching it gingerly between his fingers. He watched Apollo with narrowed eyes. "Why not?"

"Because... a lot of reasons," Apollo muttered, lowering himself back down into the chair, where he slouched forward, his elbows on his knees. "She... You're right, her real name is Thalassa. I've been piecing together her story for a long time now."

Although he wanted to be angry about it, the fact Apollo was clearly upset kept Machi from reacting to the implication the lawyer had known who Lamiroir was from the very start. Instead, he stood still and silent, holding the old article tight in his hands as he waited to hear Lamiroir's... Thalassa's... story.

View the Court Record
"Thalassa's dad was a famous magician," Apollo explained. "He travelled the world, impressing everyone with his abilities, and he passed his trade on to his daughter. She performed with him, and with his apprentices, as she grew up." He sat up in his chair, though his gaze remained on the floor. "When she was eighteen, or maybe even younger, her father contracted a performer as a guest on their show; His name was... well, I don't really know, except that it ended in 'Justice'." He shook his head, his hands resting on his knees. "Thalassa and Mister Justice fell in love, got married, and left on their own travels. They even had a kid, a son... and, only a year later, Mister Justice took their baby son off to perform for royalty... on the very night someone assassinated the queen, setting fire to the building. They never came back. Her husband died an anonymous musician."

Machi's eyebrows shot up. Was this... true? He unfolded the paper in his hands to look at the picture within; Growing up travelling the world explained how Lamiroir knew English so well... and it was certainly fitting that she had been a mother before taking in Machi. Surely this one tragedy could not be the reason she was so scared of her own past though... right?

"Alone and grieving, Thalassa had no choice but to return to her father," Apollo continued. "Eventually, she was able to move on from the deaths of her husband and son, and fell in love again, this time with one of her father's apprentices; His name was Shadi Enigmar." His hands clutched his knees, knuckles white. "She married again, had another kid... but this time, she stayed with her father, and the baby was a girl. Everything went pretty great for about five years, until..." Apollo's eyes screwed shut, pained.

Machi's grip on the article tightened. "Until...?"

Apollo sighed, face turned away. "They had a trick, a famous one. They were in rehearsal, maybe trying a new spin on it to make it more impressive for the audience... but something went wrong. Thalassa got hit by a bullet."

"Bullet!?!" Machi repeated, face pale. "She got shot!?!"

"Guns were part of the trick," Apollo admitted. "The whole point was that they appeared to hit her, but didn't. Even so, her husband, the other apprentice, even her own daughter were led to believe she'd died. One of the two men holding those guns had hit her, and it's impossible to ever know which of them it was."
Machi pressed a hand to his mouth. Was it this that had Lamiroir scared of her past?

"But her father knew she was alive. He must have known," Apollo said, eyes glaring a hole in the bookcase at his side. "He let everyone think she was dead, but she was instead spirited away, out of the Troupe, away from her family... and that's all we knew about her for a long time." Apollo suddenly spun around in his chair, facing the computer, where he re-opened the minimised internet browser: Another article, this one a machine-translated overview of Lamiroir's career, from a Borginian newspaper Machi recognised. "But a year or so later, Lamiroir shows up at this restaurant, still performing on stage. She's just singing now instead of doing magic... and her sight is gone anyway, so she'd find it hard even if she wanted to."

Machi's hand lowered from his mouth. The amount of research Apollo had done was staggering... but... "If you know this from start... why you not tell her?"

Apollo didn't reply at first, staring at the computer monitor. "You remember the night of the concert? When Trucy and I came to see you after Mister LeTouse died?"

After a second of thought, Machi nodded. "Yes, I remember. I left room."

"You did," Apollo quietly agreed. "That was when we recognised Lamiroir as Thalassa... but, with everything going on with the murder, we didn't think it was the right time to tell her."

Machi had to admit Apollo had a point there. This was a lot for him to take in now, and it would have been even harder to hear in the middle of the chaos at the concert. He returned his gaze to the article in his hands. "How you know? Why you try find her?"

A muffled laugh escaped Apollo's throat. Leaving the computer, he turned his chair to look at Machi with a sad half-smile, his left fist held in the air; The bracelet on his wrist glittered in the reflected light from outside. "There are only two of these in the world, Machi. I have one, and I knew Thalassa had the other. That's how I recognised her."

Machi's eyebrows shot up. He'd always known Lamiroir's bracelet was special, but to think it was so unique only two existed? In fact... how had the other one ended up with Apollo?

"As for why I was looking for her..." Apollo continued, the sad smile growing as he lowered his hand. "Well, you remember her first husband, and their baby son? Actually, although Mister Justice died in the fire, he was able to save the baby. The problem was, the country was in such turmoil over the murder of the queen that no-one was trying to find this baby's mother, nor help Thalassa find her husband and son. Unknown to her, the baby was still alive. That was twenty-one years ago now."

His hand rubbed at the bracelet in his lap, his eyes far away.

Machi gasped. Was Apollo saying...?

"After Thalassa vanished, once Lamiroir was performing in Borginia, her father suddenly died," Apollo continued, his expression hardening. "After that, her second husband got into a spot of trouble: Mister Enigmar decided the only way to escape was to 'disappear' in front of crowds of witnesses, leaving his and Thalassa's daughter behind." He turned in his chair, giving the door to the kitchen a fond smile. "And that was how Dad came to adopt Trucy."

He was saying. Machi looked down at the picture in his hands, seeing it now in a new light.

"Dad found that article not long after," Apollo gestured to the paper Machi was holding, "while he was looking into Trucy's family... the Gramaryes. He heard that Thalassa Gramarye had only one bracelet after this photo was taken... and that was how he recognised me, when we happened to meet a few months later. It's how Trucy and I know we have the same mother." He sighed, rubbing at his bracelet. "We searched for her for years, but we never thought we'd actually find her, certainly not the way we did. How could we tell her we were her children? She wasn't going to believe us, and it wasn't fair to dump all that on her right after she'd heard her manager being murdered. It was enough of a shock for us."

Machi had to agree with that. "So... you send her to Professor Layton? Wait for her to find out on her own?"

Apollo nodded, a sad look on his face. "If anyone could uncover her past without the advantage of our prior knowledge, it's Professor Layton," he said. "She'd believe him over us, too. Once her amnesia and blindness became public thanks to the trial, I'm sure there were people lining up, hoping to trick their way into her life; If she didn't recognise her own surname Gramarye, her former stage partner Valant, how could we expect her to recognise the names Apollo Justice and Trucy Enigmar, her children?" He shook his head, wilting in his chair. Quietly, he ended his rant with, "How could we expect to be treated with anything other than suspicion?"

Machi mused to himself, placing the article down on the desk, where he'd found it. So Lamiroir was Apollo's and Trucy's mother... His aska was their aska, even if she didn't know it. In fact... "You knew all this since concert?"

Apollo nodded, meeting Machi's eyes.

"So," Machi continued, one foot shyly kicking at the carpet, "you knew... we were brothers. You defend me and you call me 'little bro' because you knew."

At that, Apollo blushed. "Oh, um... Yeah, I knew you were my little brother. But," he grinned, ruffling Machi's hair, "I defended you because I knew you weren't a murderer. There was no way I was going to let Herr Diva send an innocent kid like you to prison."

Machi giggled. "And you let me live here, as family."

Apollo laughed. "That was all Dad's doing," he pointed out. "But, y'know, none of us are going to complain about getting to know you, little brother."

The pair chuckled together for a moment. Now he knew the full story, Machi's heart felt light as a cloud, his anxieties and anger blown away into nothingness. "I never had on perhe before," he admitted. "Now I have Aška, Isa, du isovelet, on sisko, and so many serkuset..."

Apollo blinked, then his eyes widened. "All those Borginian words you call us... they're family words."

Machi nodded. "You say in English, 'a family', 'Mum', 'Dad', 'two big brothers', 'a sister', and 'cousins'." He giggled, cheeks red. "I always want a family, so I pretend... I was too embarrassed to tell you."

At that, Apollo laughed, getting up from his chair. "Well, you don't need to pretend anymore. We're family for real, and family doesn't abandon each other." He pulled Machi into a hug, which the teen was happy to return. "I'll always love you, little bro. We can wait together for Mom to return."

Machi grinned, giggling as he clung tightly to Apollo's vest. "I love you too, isoveli," he whispered back. "Thank you."
When Luke arrived at the agency an hour or two later, Trucy was quick to drag him through into the kitchen, calling for Apollo and Machi to follow. The recipe she had been attempting turned out to be lasagne, though it was a little crisp at the edges, and fell apart easily on their plates. No one really minded though, happily talking and jokingly calling the dish "the best meat cake we've ever had".

As the conversation fell into silence, Apollo swallowed his mouthful and lazily waved his fork around the table. "By the way, I told Machi about Mom," he nonchalantly announced. "Mom Thalassa, I mean."

Everyone looked up in surprise, and Machi saw their gazes flicker between him and Apollo. Were they going to be upset...?

After a few seconds of silence, Luke shrugged, smiling. "Okay then. It's good we're all aware who Lamiroir is." He immediately continued eating.

Phoenix chuckled, giving Machi a nod. "Shouldn't be too much longer 'til you three have your mom back, huh?"

Trucy squealed, leaning over to pull Machi into a one-armed hug. "Don't you worry, baby brother. We've got each other until then; We can wait together!"

Machi allowed himself to relax, giggling. "Yes, we can wait together!" he agreed. Now more than ever, he was looking forward to life with the Wrights... and it turned out they'd been looking forward to it just as much as him.

View the Court Record
A Successful Surgery

August 13, 4:16PM
Theia Hospital

The first thing Lamiroir saw when she opened her eyes was a blinding brightness. 'White... and a hint of orange...'. Amazed that the names of colours thought long-forgotten had returned so easily, she lay there staring upwards for several minutes before she realised her eyes had adjusted to the light. Although she still felt a little groggy from the aftermath of the surgery, she lifted her head to look around the room.

The walls are white too. More yellow than orange. There's the door, brown, and it seems to be made of wood. I think I can make out the grain. All that medical equipment... I couldn't possibly name any of them. It's all clustered around my bed, against the walls. My blanket is green... or is that blue? I like blue. Wasn't it my favourite colour...? Oh, and there's the window. It looks like the orange on the ceiling came from those curtains. Whose decision was it to put orange curtains in a hospital? Can't say that would be my first choice... Oh, look at me, I've had my sight back for less than a minute and I'm already criticising colour choices... They should have gone with blue.'

It took an hour for her post-surgery check-ups to complete, her doctor confirming she had, indeed, regained her sight... though to what extent they would have to wait to determine exactly. Lamiroir hoped her eyes had not deteriorated in the years since she last used them, not to the point that she would need glasses. Regardless, she was allowed to receive visitors once more, so she hoisted her bed up and waited for that familiar, eager knock at her door:

KNOCKKNOCKKNOCKKNOCKKNOCK

Lamiroir bit back a grin, feeling the excitement shivering up and down her skin. "Come in."

The door burst open, a red and blue blur dashing inside and bouncing at the side of her bed. "Lamiroir! Lamiroir! Did it work? Can you see? Do you still have ammy-knees-ah? We're still going on an investigation, right?"

Unable to resist a laugh, Lamiroir gestured for the seven-year-old boy to slow down, taking in his appearance. "And that must be little Alfendi Layton. You look just as I imagined you might."

Alfendi grinned, slowing his bouncing as he obediently stood still, his hands on the edge of the bed. "Really?"

"Really," Lamiroir assured him. "That wild, unkempt hair, a flaming blood red... That sharp little nose and chin." She poked at the boy's nose, causing him to giggle. "I couldn't imagine you looking any different."

Alfendi took a deep breath, letting it all out with an extended, "Well, it's not really 'blood' red." He picked at a clump of hair hanging in front of his face, examining it carefully. "It's, like, if the blood's been left to dry, but not too long, cuz it goes brown after a while..."

Lamiroir heard chuckling, and looked up to see two adults standing at the foot of her bed, watching the boy with amusement; One was a brunette woman, streaks of red in her curls and ponytail, while the other was a man in a suit and turtleneck, a top hat in his hands. Lamiroir smiled, looking between the pair. "And you must be Flora and Professor Layton."
Flora giggled, curtseying. "That's us, ma'am."

Hershel gave a short bow. "Are you feeling well? I see you've regained your sight."

Lamiroir laughed, nodding. "Yes, thank you. I'm still a little tired from the anaesthetic, but mostly I am just happy to be able to see."

Flora chewed her lip as she rounded the bed, standing opposite Alfendi at Lamiroir's side. "Have... you started remembering things now? Or is the amnesia still in effect?"

"That's what I said!" Alfendi cried, pouting.

Lamiroir frowned in thought. Frankly, she had also hoped the simple act of being able to see would start opening the floodgates to her locked memories, but so far there had been little more than a trickle. The doctor had warned her this would happen though, so she couldn't be too disappointed; She would just have to go chasing her past, find something more concrete to kick down those locked doors in her head. "I'm afraid not," she told Flora. "Nothing more than colours."

"What's your favourite?" Alfendi immediately asked. "Mine's blue!"

"Mine too," Lamiroir replied, smiling at the boy. "I like a light cyan - that's a shade of blue."

Alfendi thought a moment, then grinned, pointing to his blue shirt. "I like dark blue!"

"Ah, yes," Lamiroir said, playing along with a smile as she made a show of studying his shirt, "that looks like an azure. The colour of the sky on a clear night."

Hershel laughed, stepping up behind his son and patting the grinning boy on the head. "Colours are a start," he said. "Anything that comes to mind, however small, could act as a lead in our investigation."

Lamiroir nodded, though she didn't see how knowing her favourite colour could possibly aid them. "I should probably ask... have you had any luck since we last spoke?"

Just as Lamiroir expected, Hershel replied with a shake of his head. "No new leads, I'm afraid... or at least, nothing concrete." Exactly the same words he had used every other time Lamiroir had asked after his progress. "We shall just have to see what happens when we go to Borginia."

After all the frank discussions they'd had about this investigation since Lamiroir arrived in London, she couldn't bring herself to be mad at the Professor even if she wanted to; From here, all he could do was consult the results of other people's investigations into Lamiroir's past, and they both knew that if anyone else had ever uncovered a good lead, it would have found its way back to her long ago. Their only hope was to return to the restaurant she debuted in, the Restaurant de Chanson, and see what happened from there.

"Although, that reminds me," Hershel continued, reaching into an inner pocket of his jacket, "I did bring this along, just in case." He pulled out a small box, as wide as his hand was long.

Lamiroir studied the box thoughtfully. "Is that...?"

"Your bracelet," Flora confirmed with a smile. "We promised we'd look after it, didn't we?"

Indeed they had. As the item on her wrist would have only gotten in the way during her surgery, Lamiroir had entrusted her precious bracelet to the Laytons during her stay in hospital. It had been very strange at first not having the familiar metal ring on her arm, but she had comforted herself with the knowledge it was only temporary, that she would have it back the moment she was released. "I think it is still too early for me to wear it again," she pointed out.

Hershel shook his head. "No, I brought it along for a different reason." He paused, examining the box in his hand. "You told us this is your only physical connection to your life before your amnesia. Wearing it for so long has clearly not affected you, but maybe seeing it..." He met her eyes again. "If you feel you are prepared, of course. We can always wait to-"

"I will try now," Lamiroir insisted, holding out a hand to take the box. "If seeing it might give us a lead, I want to get it over with quickly."

Hershel paused a moment in surprise before nodding, handing the box over without a word. Lamiroir rested the cardboard cube in her lap, taking a deep breath. Although she was determined to face her past, to take hold of any clue and not let go... she couldn't help but feel a little apprehensive. Steeling herself with thoughts of her son, she flipped open the lid and grabbed at the item hidden underneath.

The bracelet felt cool to the touch, separated from Lamiroir's body heat for longer than she had ever before allowed (in her memory, anyway). As it rose out of the shadow of the box, it glittered in the sunlight from the window, a bright white that faded to soft yellow and then to a deep gold that was almost brown. Her thumb brushed over the patterns she had studied with her fingers so many times over the past years, seeing now that they were eyes, staring unblinking in every direction. She clutched the metal ring tightly in both hands, feeling it slowly warm, and intently studied the object, hoping, praying, that it might tell her its secrets.

bright wrapping paper ripping apart a box torn open squealing as she beheld her gift a tight hug cold metal on her wrists as she slipped them over her hands for the first time pushing warm metal into tiny hands that grasped with pudgy fingers "far too big for his wrist" "it's more of a crown" tucking the bracelet into wrapped linen so it would never be lost

Lamiroir frowned, holding the bracelet closer to her face, close enough that she could smell the lingering hints of her own perfume on it.

Were these... memories?

"Lamiroir?" Flora asked, hands tightly grasped together with worry. "Have you remembered anything?"

Sighing, Lamiroir leaned back against her raised bed, the bracelet in her grip falling to her lap. "Nothing substantial. Nothing that would help."

"Nothing substantial. Nothing that would help." Hershel's fingers tightened around the top hat in his hands. "As small as it is, it may still help. We can only know if we try."

Although she was still frustrated with herself, Lamiroir had to accept that. "I remembered playing with a baby," she admitted. "Nothing else about it, just playing with him and the bracelet." She turned her gaze back to the item itself, frowning intently. "The only other thing is the memory of receiving them, putting them on for the first time... but not who gave them to me."

Alfendi looked confused, his eyes flicking between Lamiroir and the bracelet. "Them? But you only have one..."

At that, Lamiroir blinked in surprise, staring at the lone bracelet in her grasp. "Oh. I meant 'it'. 'Why did I say 'them'? Of course I only have one.'"

Hershel had shoved his top hat under an arm, then pulled out a small notebook that he was now writing in, brow furrowed with concentration. "Colours, a baby... and your bracelet was a gift," he muttered, then looked up at the singer with a smile. "For your first day, that's quite an impressive list of memories you've regained."

Lamiroir didn't think so, but decided to accept the compliment, slotting her beloved bracelet back into its box. She looked forward to getting out of this hospital already, impatient to slip her bracelet back on her wrist and go to Borginia to chase down her past... but at the same time, all she wanted to do was lie down and sleep the week away.

"That reminds me, there is one more thing I must do before we leave," Hershel continued, slipping his notebook and pen back into a pocket.

Alfendi groaned. "Aw, do we have to leave already?"

Flora rested her hands on her hips, giving the boy a stern look. "Lamiroir is recovering from surgery, Alfendi. She needs to rest."

"I'm alright for now," Lamiroir insisted, though she had to admit she was tired. She handed the box containing the bracelet back to Hershel. "What else did you need?"

Hershel chuckled as he returned the box to another of the pockets inside his jacket. "Nothing at all, actually; Quite the opposite." As his hand emerged once more, he had in his grasp a slip of paper, lightly creased. "Luke sent this to me a few weeks ago, to pass on to you once your sight had returned."

Alfendi gasped as his father held the paper out for the singer to take. "Oh! I remember that photo!" He bounced in place, grinning. "You'll love this, Lamiroir!"

Lamiroir raised a curious eyebrow, then reached out to take the paper. Noting there was indeed an image printed on it, she held it close to study... then gasped. "This is...?"

Flora and Alfendi both giggled, but it was Flora who answered, reaching out to tap the centre of the picture. "That's Machi, as of a few weeks ago. Either side of him is Trucy in blue, and Apollo in red."

Lamiroir had to force herself to resume breathing, her eyes locked on the happy boy in the middle of the picture. It had not occurred to her, in the excitement of regaining her sight, that she wouldn't know what her own son looked like until she returned to California... but it seemed it had occurred to someone else, someone else who had been sure to supply her with a photo. She didn't spare a glance for the two faces on either side, instead brushing a finger along the edge of the blond head grinning up at her from the paper. "Machi... pokani..." He had bright blue eyes, shining with the kindness he had shown her so many times, his arms wrapped around the figures either side as though pulling himself up by their shoulders; They similarly had their gloved hands on his back, all clinging together as a trio. Blinking away tears, Lamiroir folded the sides of the paper back, so that only Machi was visible. "Thank you, Professor... And be sure to thank Luke for me." She wiped at her eyes, wondering how long it had been since she last cried. "This means more than I can possibly say."

Hershel chuckled, bowing his head as he replaced his top hat there. "I shall pass on the message."

View Layton's Notebook
It was the last day of the summer term at Gressenheller University, a week since Lamiroir's surgery had been regarded a success. Her eyes had not deteriorated significantly after the years of disuse, to her endless relief, and she had been released from the hospital to recover on her own and get used to using a sense she had lived without for as far back as she could remember.

The memories still came slowly. The Laytons had been very encouraging and helpful, Flora and Alfendi in particular showing Lamiroir around London, to see all the tourist destinations and the more local personal favourite hangouts they used (almost entirely centred around the university their father worked at). Flashes of images in her head told Lamiroir she had been to London before, and with someone else, but she couldn't extract anything more than that; Hershel had quietly mused to himself upon hearing this, and silently wrote it down in his notepad along with everything else.

With the end of term, Hershel was suddenly much more available, and Lamiroir requested to see him that very afternoon to discuss their upcoming trip to Borginia; It would be another couple of weeks before she was well enough to travel again, but she disliked waiting and was eager to see some progress. She was now once again used to using her eyes to navigate her surroundings, and had regained her sense of depth perception after a few days of bumping into things and knocking objects off tables, so she was confident in her ability to find her way to the address he had given her: the Layton family's home.

From the street below, Lamiroir looked up from the tiny slip of paper to the apartment building above. It looked so nondescript, identical to all the buildings lining the street around it... but it was definitely the right place. Placing the paper in the pocket alongside her photo of Machi, she stepped forward to push through the green doors and into the building's interior.

A flight or two of stairs later, and Lamiroir found the door matching the number of the Layton's. She reached out to gingerly knock on the wood, listening carefully for a reply.

She only had to wait a few seconds for the distant shout: "Coming!" Not more than half a minute later, the lock shifted, and the door swung open to reveal a smiling Flora. "Hello, Lamiroir!"

Lamiroir nodded, smiling back. "Good afternoon, Flora. Is your father in?"

"He got back from the uni not too long ago," Flora replied, stepping aside to wave the woman in. "Please, come inside."

"Thank you." Lamiroir slipped into the narrow hallway, then through an open doorway behind Flora, where she remembered the living room was; Although she had been here before, it had been before her surgery, so this was the first time she'd lain eyes on the apartment's interior. The room was longer than it was wide, a window at the far end that looked out over the street, and a pair of sofas against the walls by the door. A small television sat on a table at her left, a radio on the shelf underneath. The floor, covered by an orange rug, was littered with small toys, a mess she didn't doubt was the handiwork of young Alfendi.
"Feel free to sit down," Flora told her, pausing in the doorway. "I'll go get the Professor." She promptly disappeared down the hall.

Lamiroir took her time walking across the room, sitting down on the sofa at the opposite wall. 'I wonder where Alfendi is? I suppose they must frequently have clients meeting them here, given how practised Flora is at directing people in. Actually, she lives elsewhere, doesn’t she? She must have decided to stay here after taking Alfendi home, for the meeting I requested today.'

Flora returned not long after, Hershel at her side. He gave Lamiroir a smile as he entered the room, his hand reaching automatically to tip a hat he wasn't wearing. "Lamiroir, always a pleasure to see you," he called, crossing the floor to shake her hand. "You wanted to discuss our investigation?" He moved to sit on the other sofa, Flora following to take the seat at his side.

Lamiroir nodded. "We went over the basics when I hired you for my case, but I don't believe we have the details set in stone." She paused. "I'm... rather impatient to get my memories back in full."

"That's understandable," Hershel replied, though he seemed a little amused. "And we do indeed still have details to organise; I believe we were waiting to decide on a date until after your surgery, for example."

"We were," Lamiroir agreed, but as she opened her mouth to continue, a loud and rapid knocking at the door interrupted her, all three people in the room snapping their attention towards the sound.

After a pause, Hershel and Flora exchanged confused looks, evidently as surprised by the interruption as Lamiroir. "I'll go see who it is," Flora decided, getting to her feet and speed-walking out of the room.

Lamiroir watched the girl go. Would it be appropriate to continue her conversation?

"Did you have a date in mind?" Hershel asked, answering her unspoken question. "When has your doctor said you will be well enough to travel?"

"In two or three weeks," Lamiroir replied. "I'm not sure how that might fit with your timetable."

Hershel closed his eyes, thinking. "Alfendi will be back at school. It should be easy enough for us to arrange time off for both myself and him." He looked up at Lamiroir, smiling. "They are quite used to arranging sudden absences for us by now."

"Alfendi is coming too?" Lamiroir asked, surprised.

"He has no-one else to watch out for him while we are away," Hershel explained. "You needn't worry; He has been on many of my investigations by now, so he knows what to expect." He chuckled. "Flora will be accompanying us as well, and Emmy and my brother plan to act as our translator and transportation respectively; All told, we will have quite the sizable party."

Lamiroir nodded, musing over the information. She didn't have any objections to it.

"Professor!" came a feminine shout from the hall, and a teenage woman appeared in the doorway with a flash of yellow, her orange hair spiralling down from a bow on the side of her head. "I just! Oh!" She paused, noticing Lamiroir with a blink of her large blue eyes. "I'm sorry, I didn't know you had a client."

Hershel got to his feet. "Miss Cykes?"

Flora appeared at the teen's back, brushing a lock of hair behind her ear sheepishly. "Athena, I tried to tell you..."

"I could come back later?" the girl continued, watching Hershel. "Will you be done in one hour, or two? Or, wait," she moved to fiddle with a small device hanging around her neck, which generated a small holographic screen that she studied with a gloved hand, "it's almost six, so I'd better just come back tomorrow..."

Lamiroir stood. "Miss Cykes, was it?"

The teen paused, shutting down her screen with a click of the device around her neck. "'Athena' is fine, ma'am." She frowned, suddenly seeming to take in who she was talking to. "Aren't you... Lamiroir?"

"I go by that name, yes," Lamiroir agreed. "Are you one of the Professor's students?"

"Oh, um, no," Athena admitted, running her fingers through her ponytail. "I, um..." She pulled her hands from her hair forcefully, looking sheepish. "I'm actually no-one's student as of forty minutes ago. And... I'm a friend of Luke's." She fixed Lamiroir with a grin. "He told me all about how he and Apollo defended your son for murder last month! You must be planning to fix your amnesia right now, huh? I'll get out of your way."

Lamiroir held up a hand before Athena could turn to go, shaking her head. "No, that's alright," she insisted. It was surprising to hear this girl was a friend of the Wrights, though that they would run into each other while at Professor Layton's house was not. "We have two, three weeks to plan. I don't mind waiting a few minutes, if your business is quick."

Athena blushed, her hands back to her ponytail. "Oh, yeah, I just..." She stepped into the room, looking to Hershel. "Like I said, I've handed in my final assignments, and all my exams are done. My professors don't think I'm likely to fail, so my time at Gressenheller is over."

"Congratulations, Athena!" Flora said, rushing to the teen's side with a grin. "You've worked so hard at this; You'll do brilliant!"

Hershel smiled. "Indeed, you deserve congratulations. A student as hard-working as you is rare."

Athena blushed harder. "I... just wanted to thank you, Professor. I never would've gotten as far as I have without you."

At that, Hershel chuckled, shaking his head. "Nonsense. All I did was convince your professors to give you a chance; All your academic achievements since have been by your own hard work alone."

"He's right," Flora added, patting Athena's shoulder. "How many people take on two full-time courses at once? And at such a young age, too!"

Lamiroir couldn't help but be impressed, hearing that. This young woman couldn't be older than seventeen or eighteen, and she had earned two university degrees simultaneously? "What did you study?"

"Psychology and law," Athena replied, still blushing from the compliments the Laytons had already paid her. "I was too busy with both courses to take any internships, but..." She flexed her hands into fists, grinning determinedly. "Once I get my results back, I'm going to apply to take the Californian bar exam! Before you know it, I'll be over there with Luke and Apollo and Mister Wright, and I'll get all the practical experience I need with them! And, in the meantime, Professor Cattell's hooked me up with a mentor who'll let me work under her until I'm ready to go, so I can hone my psychologist skills!"
"Wow, really?" Flora asked, surprised. "I didn't realise you'd be gone so soon..."

Lamiroir nodded in agreement, though she was mostly surprised Athena had been working so hard only to apply for work in a separate country entirely. Why not stay in America if that was the case?

Hershel chuckled. "If I recall, Apollo's badge took a month or so to arrive, and it will be a while before your final results are released... Let's not get into how much time arranging to take the Californian bar exam from here would swallow up on its own." His smile faded as he rubbed his chin in thought, watching the girl. "Are you planning to attend the graduation ceremony?"

Athena shook her head. "Nah. Aunt Eury will probably kill me, but I'll be eighteen in January, so she can't stop me going back to America. I'll be long gone by next year's ceremony."

Hershel nodded. "That is a good point."

Again, Lamiroir was impressed; Apparently there was more to Athena's story than she'd realised. "I should give you my congratulations also," she told the young woman, smiling. "Once you are working with the Wrights, maybe we will run into each other again."

"Oh, really?" Athena replied, and grinned. "I'd like that. Can't let Luke and Apollo have all the fun meeting the celebrities, after all!"

Lamiroir laughed. "I suppose not."

View the Court Record
The Siren's Secret, Prologue

September 12, 5:02PM
The Bostonius

Lamiroir started, blinking as the arm of the memory became the arm lying across her lap, bracelet glinting in the light. She looked up to find Flora standing with a small tray, watching the singer with a worried frown.

"Are you alright?"

The Bostonius had been in the air since early that morning, winding its way across Northern Europe towards Borginia. Although Lamiroir had offered to put Professor Layton and his investigative team up in a hotel there at her own expense, it didn't change that the journey was long, and the plane rather small, as luxurious as its cabin was. She couldn't deny she was still a little worried about returning to the country after Machi's trial; Although she had nothing to do with the smuggling, LeTouse had not been assigned as her manager for no reason... Borginian Customs had demanded the Bostonius stop by the international airport in Poma, Borginia's capital, on their way both in and out of the country, for the staff there to thoroughly investigate the plane top to bottom. She had no doubt that the reason had been her.

"Yes, of course," Lamiroir insisted to Flora, her hand brushing against the bracelet on her wrist. "I was just trying to see if I could remember anything more."

It was now ten minutes since they left Poma, headed to the small town that had served as her home as far back as she could remember. Lamiroir sat in the soft lounge chair that encircled the lower floor of the cabin, desperately trying to drag something useful out of that locked part of her brain that steadfastly refused to co-operate. Just as before, just as she had since regaining her sight, all she was able to catch were flashes of feeling, quick pictures or thoughts, and never with context or any kind of explanation that made sense to her. She felt useless, like a burden to her own investigation... She could only hope that, despite her inability to be of any help, Professor Layton was still able to find some clue that no-one else ever had.

Flora forced a smile, taking a small step towards where Lamiroir sat. She held out her tray, indicating the cups of black liquid sitting in their saucers. "Tea?"

Lamiroir nodded back, reaching for a cup. "Thank you."

As the older woman sipped at her drink, Flora placed the saucer on the table, then sat down opposite, the tray resting on the cushion at her side. "Have... you had any luck?"

At that, Lamiroir had to pause. Eventually, she shook her head. "No luck." With a sigh, she placed her cup back on its saucer. "I am beginning to regret not taking Machi's advice the day he first presented it to me..." Almost on autopilot, she reached into her pocket, pulling out the photo within of the blond boy, smiling so cheerfully at the camera. "He would not have had to resort to such desperate measures... and maybe it would have been easier to recall anything with so much less of my new life in the way."

"You mustn't speak like there's no hope, Lamiroir," Flora pointed out, perched on the edge of her cushion to be as close to the older woman as possible. "To dwell on the past, on regrets of things you didn't do... All that does is take away from the present. You can't change what's been done; We all just have to deal with things as they are."

Lamiroir regarded the young woman with surprise. "A very wise observation."

Flora blushed. "Oh, the Professor taught me that. I'm not sure if he came up with it himself, or..."

"Oh hey, is that Luke's photo the Professor was telling us about?"

Lamiroir looked up to see Emmy leaning over her shoulder with a grin, her gaze on the photo in the singer's hand. "Yes, this is the one he sent me," she replied, holding it up for Emmy to see more clearly. "If it were not for this, I would not know what Machi looked like."

Emmy reached out to gently take the photo, giving it a critical look. "Why is it folded up like that?"

As she spoke, she was already unfolding it to reveal the picture in its entirety.

"For convenience," Lamiroir explained. "I need to fold it so it will fit in my pocket."

At that, Emmy nodded. "Yeah, it makes sense you'd arrange it to be just Machi then," she agreed, then turned to the unfolded picture in its entirety, regarding it with a frown. "Huh. That's odd."

"I know, right!?" Flora agreed, waving her hands with a frustrated look. "It's so unlike him!"

Lamiroir raised an eyebrow, looking between the two. "I'm sorry?"

Emmy didn't seem to have heard, giving Flora a curious look and gesturing with the photo. "You mean how it's just Machi, Apollo, and Trucy, right? No Mister Wright or Luke?"

"That's exactly what I mean!" Flora replied, her voice audibly pulled back from the brink of a shout. "The Professor just said," she crossed her arms, putting on a deep voice similar to Hershel's, "I'm sure Luke had his reasons, it's nothing to worry about, Flora," she dropped the impression with a groan, "and Alfendi agreed with him! I thought I was going mad!"

"Really!?" Emmy whispered, eyes wide. "The Professor dismissed this?"

As Flora nodded energetically, Lamiroir reached out to take her photo back. "May I ask what you are talking about?"

Emmy jumped as she registered the singer was still there, handing the picture to her with an embarrassed smile. "Sorry, it's just... It's weird, for Luke to have taken that photo. It's not like him."

Lamiroir looked over the photo, still confused. "What about it is so odd?"

"If Luke was taking a photo of Machi, it would just be of Machi," Flora explained, looking calmer now she had someone on her side. "If he was taking a photo of his family and Machi, it would be his entire family and Machi. But instead it's Machi and just Apollo and Trucy."

"Mister Wright isn't there," Emmy added. "And neither is Luke. You only need one person to take a picture, so one of them should be there."

Lamiroir still wasn't sure what the problem was. "Maybe Mister Wright was simply not there when he took the photo," she pointed out.

Flora shook her head. "Luke had an entire month to plan this picture and get it to you in time for your surgery," she said. "If Mister Wright wasn't there, he'd wait to take it until he was."

"Which means Luke must have intended for only Apollo and Trucy to be in this," Emmy added, pointing to the paper in Lamiroir's hand. "The question is, why?"

Sighing, Flora leaned back in her chair. "Luke really is the Professor's apprentice; He's grown to be just as infuriatingly mysterious when he wants to be."

Lamiroir looked over the photo. She would just have to bow to the greater experience these two had with Luke Wright... although surely there was no cause for concern if the famous Hershel Layton wasn't as worried about it as his daughter or friend?

In the end, it had nothing to do with her. Lamiroir folded the photo back up so only Machi was visible, and dismissed the question from her mind.

Sycamore paced back and forth along the deck, hands clasped behind his back as his mouth moved in muted mutterings. Even so, it was his constant movement more than any sound that made him stand out so much, his speech and the sound of his shoes on the wooden floor silent under the deafening buzz of the propeller nearby.

Hershel restrained a sigh, leaning on the railing. Although he had started out trying to ignore his brother's inability to stay still, the constant pacing was becoming increasingly difficult to keep himself from noticing. "Do you have a problem?"

Sycamore paused, his brother's voice only just above the sound of the rushing wind around them. "Not a 'problem', per se," he insisted, sheepishly shoving his hands in his pockets. "More... concerns."

"Concerns?" Hershel repeated, turning to face the older man. "Such as?"

Sighing, Sycamore rocked on his feet a moment, then stepped over to stand at Hershel's side, leaning on the railing. "What's your plan?" he asked. "Go to this tiny town and just ask the locals questions? You do realise you're far from the first to try that, surely?"

Hershel nodded, turning back to the railing to look out over the mountains below. "I'm aware," he admitted.

"So then, what's your plan?" Sycamore pushed. "When you don't get anything new, what are-?"

"Who says we won't find anything new?" Hershel interrupted, a knowing smile on his face. "We will have Lamiroir herself with us; If anything, that will make people more open to sharing what they know than with a complete stranger."

Sycamore paused, conceding the point, but he was still unconvinced. "And what if there's nothing more to learn? What if there are no leads in Kopunchiville?"

Hershel didn't reply, staring out at the view with a neutral expression.

After a long pause, Sycamore sighed. "At least tell me you spoke to Luke."

"I spoke to him," Hershel replied, a smile twitching at the corners of his lips. "What he doesn't want to share, I won't force out of him."

Sycamore stared incredulously at his brother. "He...? Are you telling me Luke Triton refused to tell you what he knew about your current investigation?"

Hershel chuckled. "I'm sure he has his reasons. Besides, we will soon have more than enough information simply asking around the town."

"Asking around...!?" The incredulous look on Sycamore's face grew stronger. "Have you not been listening to a word I've said!? This whole thing will be dead in the water if you can't find a lead in this middle-of-nowhere village! You don't have a plan!??"

"You don't have to come if you object so strongly."

Sycamore instantly quietened, chewing his lip as he stared out at the orange sky. The silence stretched out between them, broken only by the rushing wind and the buzz of the plane's propeller. Finally, Sycamore sighed. "I can't exactly leave you all alone to get into trouble, can I? You've proven you can't look after yourself."

Hershel didn't react except for the small smile on his lips.

"Papa! Uncle!"

The brothers turned to see a seven-year-old boy charging towards them with a grin, the wind blowing his already wild hair every which way. "What is it, Alfendi?" Hershel called.

"Mister Raymond says we're 'beginning our descent'," Alfendi told them. "That means we're landing soon!"

"Indeed it does," Sycamore agreed with a chuckle.

"Thank you for informing us," Hershel told the boy with a warm smile. "We'll be in shortly."

Alfendi giggled, nodded, then raced off back to the cabin.

Sycamore grunted to himself, shoving his hands in his pockets. "It will be dark by the time we land."

Hershel nodded, moving to follow his son. "The investigation starts bright and early tomorrow."
Madame Noisette, or 'Rose' as she preferred, spoke only minimal English, so mostly Emmy took charge when anyone in the group needed to communicate with her (Unfortunately, Rose was more often than not too star-struck by Lamiroir to remember to reply to her questions). But, Kopunchiville was a very small town, and Rose's bed and breakfast was the only (private) lodgings Lamiroir had been able to find. If anything, it was at least much more able to accommodate the six of them than the Bostonius was (not that that had stopped Sycamore 'threatening' several times to go back to his precious plane rather than stay the night in the unfamiliar house of a stranger), and wasn't as public as the local hostel.

It had been dark when they landed on the unmanned airstrip just outside town, parking the Bostonius somewhere out of the way before the investigation team headed off together to find their lodgings. Alfendi was practically falling asleep on his feet, and it was difficult enough to navigate in the dark; Lamiroir was forced to admit that she'd had little idea of the town's layout when she lived there, and regaining her sight, if anything, only seemed to make her feel even more lost. Regardless, they'd finally come across their destination and stumbled into their beds; The largest room went to Hershel and Alfendi, the second to Emmy and Flora. Sycamore and Lamiroir had their own rooms to themselves, and it was likely for that reason alone that Sycamore didn't immediately turn around to return to his plane.

Lamiroir was woken the next morning by a cheerful cry of "Breakfast is served!" from Rose, promptly followed by the patterning of Alfendi's excited feet down the stairs, shouting, "Papa, it's breakfast!"

It didn't take long for everyone to gather at the dining room table, Alfendi full of energy as he wolfed down everything that was put in front of him (except for the bacon, which he deemed 'too crunchy' and promptly picked out of his sandwich with great care). Hershel held up a hand, quietening any conversations, and announced, "We should discuss our plans for today while we are all together."

Sycamore huffed. "Finding locals to question? I don't imagine that requires much discussion."

"And we could easily split up for that," Emmy added. "There are two of us here who speak Borginian, after all."

Flora shook her head. "But we don't even know our way around," she pointed out, and looked to Lamiroir. "Didn't you say last night you never went anywhere without a guide?"

The singer nodded. "I more-or-less knew the path from the restaurant to my cottage," she explained, "but that was it. If I ever needed to go anywhere else, I always had Machi with me."

"Even groceries?" Sycamore asked.

Lamiroir smiled. "I had my groceries delivered to me; A special deal, considering I couldn't shop alone."

Emmy frowned. "So... it wasn't a secret you were blind?"
"Only after I gained fame," Lamiroir replied. "I had no reason to keep it hidden, but even so only people in regular contact with me would have known."

Hershel had his hand curled around his chin, frowning in thought. "That will have all changed after the murder trial, of course," he pointed out, then gave the woman a smile. "Doubtless most everyone we meet will still be expecting you to be without sight."

Lamiroir nodded; She hadn't exactly advertised her plans to the world, and it would have been enough of a shock to Borginia to learn she was blind. She almost laughed at the thought of giving the country a second shock by announcing her blindness had been cured only weeks later, essentially reverting their image of her back to 'normal'.

"Regardless," Hershel continued, turning to the rest of the table with a serious look, "Flora is right that we don't know our way around, so it would be best that we stick together for now."

"Ah, I see," Sycamore muttered, his own hand on his chin. "Our first task is simply to learn the town layout, become familiar with the area?"

Hershel smiled, giving his brother a nod. "Exactly."

"A reasonable idea," Sycamore agreed.

"And we could find the Restaurant de Chanson while we're at it," Emmy added, grinning. "As the first place Lamiroir performed, it'll be our best lead."

Lamiroir frowned. "I'm not sure Monsieur Salinen will be of much help," she admitted. "I... rather, Machi, asked him about my past multiple times, but he always said he knew nothing about it."

"Monsieur Salinen is the manager?" Flora asked.

"He is," the singer confirmed.

Emmy scoffed, slamming a fist into her other hand. "I'm sure we can persuade him to tell us the full truth."

Hershel gave her a glare. "Emmy, please. We are not going to threaten anyone with violence."

"Of course, Professor," Emmy replied, a smile on her face. "I'm not going to hurt anyone except in self-defence; I know the rules."

Lamiroir found herself wondering exactly what had happened in the past that there existed a rule of 'non-violence' specifically for Emmy. Across the table, she noticed Alfendi looking a little disappointed at his father's proclamation, but he said nothing.

Sycamore chuckled, tidying up his empty plate and dirty cutlery as he got to his feet. "I shall start getting ready to leave then. We have a busy day of information-gathering ahead of us."

Alfendi gasped, bouncing in his seat. "Uncle! Uncle! Can we wear our capes!?"

The man laughed, reaching out to ruffle his nephew's hair. "That's why we brought them, isn't it?"

"Finish your breakfast and we can leave all the sooner," Hershel reminded the boy with a knowing smile.

"Yes, Papa!" Alfendi chirped, practically vibrating in excitement as he shoved the entire rest of his sandwich in his mouth at once.
Flora squeaked, horrified. "Alfendi, chew your food!"

Kopunchiville was only a small town, so they took their time exploring it, chatting to the occasional curious local. There was a library in the centre of town, opposite the town hall. To the immediate south, between the town centre and the river, was the 'shopping district', a handful of streets full of small shops of various different specialities, while to the west was the more 'artsy/food district', restaurants, a museum and even a games centre. Beyond that centre circle, expanding out in rings, was the residential slash industrial slash rural space; Across the river they left alone, informed by Madame Noisette that it only contained a single street.

After coming across a signboard outside the town hall with a map, Alfendi happily scribbled out a copy of it, which he passed to Lamiroir with a cheerful, "You can use this now, Lamiroir!"

The singer smiled, taking the piece of paper. "Oh, thank you so much, Alfendi."

"No problem!" the boy chirped, and pointed at the pencil-scrawled map. "See, there's the river, and down here is the forest. I wrote what they are because it's hard to tell."

Lamiroir nodded. "Yes, I can see they're clearly labelled. Is this the library here?"

Alfendi grinned, seeing her finger pointing to a small book he had drawn in the centre of town, labelled with an 'L'. "Uh-huh! And that's the town hall above it, with the 'TH'!" He frowned. "Papa said town halls have bells, so I tried to draw one, but it didn't turn out good."

"Ah yes, I can see the bell," Lamiroir assured him, then turned her finger to a large box with the word 'SHOPS' written inside. "And there are the shops."

"And that house is where we're staying," the boy added, pointing to a house on the eastern side of town, drawn on its side with 'BNB' scribbled above it. Beyond was a tiny drawing of a plane, with a large 'B' below. "And there's the airport, where the Bostonius is!"

Lamiroir laughed. "I thought that's what that was." She gave the boy a smile, folding the paper up to place in her pocket. "I'm sure this will be very useful."

Alfendi grinned in pride.
The people they spoke to were the kind of unique, colourful characters Lamiroir remembered from her own time in the town, those few short years ago. Although none of them spoke English, they did speak the universal language of ‘puzzles’, which the Laytons were very happy to communicate with; Lamiroir herself watched with amusement, having never been able to engage in this subset of Borginian culture in the years she was without her sight. She and Emmy handled all the actual speaking to everyone, and Lamiroir was quite happy when the sun began to set and only three people that day had recognised her.
Hershel hummed in thought as they headed towards the food district. "I think it's time..."

"Time?" Flora repeated. "For what?"

Sycamore chuckled, his two-tone grey cape fluttering as his arms crossed underneath. "Time to bite this investigation where it really hurts."

Alfendi skipped at his uncle's side, his own miniature blue version of Sycamore's cape flapping from his shoulders. "Yeah!"

"I wouldn't have put it in such a colourful term, but yes," Hershel replied. "It's time we sought out the Restaurant de Chanson."

Lamiroir nodded. "I won't be able to direct you, I'm afraid."

"Don't worry," Emmy replied, shooting the singer a wink. "We'll find our way soon enough!" With that, she dashed to the front of the group. "I'll start asking for directions, Professor."

At the back of the group, Lamiroir sighed in relief, happy to leave that chore to Emmy and give herself time to think; She had never seen her former workplace after all, and had no idea what to expect. From the shadowed depths of her mind, her thoughts kept dredging mismatching images of fancy tables, rickety chairs, a stained spoon, a row of sparkling forks of varying sizes, a napkin folded into a swan, lights that flickered uncertainly above her head... Half of her wondered which of these were lived experiences and which exaggerated fantasies of a younger her, while the other half tried to sort through and connect the pictures to her blind memories of the restaurant. Distracted as she was by her own musings, she followed Flora ahead of her without even thinking, not noticing the various corners they turned or the roads they crossed. She doubted the Restaurant de Chanson was overly fancy, but was equally sure it wasn't some hole-in-the-wall, barely clean dirt pit either. It was probably in the middle of the road between the two... but was it a gaudy place, or plain? Large or small? Dark or brightly lit?

"Lamiroir? We're here."
The Siren's Secret, Restaurant of Song

September 13, 6:12PM
Restaurant de Chanson

A clean white building on a corner, not too large but not overly small either... exceedingly average. An equally average sign hung over the entrance doors: music notes and a stylised microphone around the Borginian text that spelled out the business's name. A menu hung on the wall of the small porch over the double doors, lights fashioned into fake candles either side of it.

This was not what Lamiroir had imagined... but somehow it fit.

"So this is the Restaurant de Chanson?" Flora asked.

"Says so on the sign," Emmy replied, pointing. She grinned at the group, gesturing to the door. "Shall we?"

Inside, the floor was packed, every table filled by people. Waitresses dashed about with notebooks and trays, worker bees buzzing back and forth between their kitchen hive and flower tables. The ceiling sloped up from the entrance, reaching its peak directly above the stage at the far wall, a large wooden box with a single microphone in its stand. A middle-aged man stood up there, crooning a warbled melody into the mic while a group of his buddies at a table below cheered him on.

Alfendi made a disgusted noise, covering his ears with his hands as he pressed up against his father. "It's loud in here."

Hershel patted Alfendi's shoulder, holding the boy close at his side. "We'll find somewhere quiet to sit."

"I must say, I'd rather not listen to that performer myself," Sycamore added, arms crossed. "He's not exactly talented."

"That'll be because it's karaoke night," Emmy remarked.

Sycamore raised an eyebrow, turning to look at her. "I know what I just said, but just because he isn't a singer, it doesn't mean-"

Emmy snorted, pointing to a poster on the wall. "It says so right here, Desmond." Indeed, among the Borginian script of the paper sign was the romanised word 'KARAOKE' in large letters, understandable by even the English-speaking Laytons; The text below, Lamiroir read, added that this was a Sunday night tradition for the restaurant, and even how to join the queue to perform.

Sycamore regarded the poster with wide eyes for a moment, then sighed and turned away with a glare. "Right."

Flora looked to Lamiroir, curious. "Is this how you got discovered, Lamiroir?"

Lamiroir searched her mind for dusty memories from her earliest days without sight, but found nothing. "I'm afraid I have no idea," she admitted. "Although I can't say I recall this kind of festivity happening before, I don't think I ever sung on Sundays; This may have been going on and no-one ever mentioned it to me."
Hershel nodded, a hand on his hat. "Let's find somewhere free, and quiet, to sit down and eat," he said. "Then, we will need to ask after the manager."

Lamiroir had eaten at the restaurant regularly back in her days performing there, meals provided as part of her contract before she was 'discovered' and she and Machi left for pastures unknown. To her relief, the quality of the food had not decreased in the slightest, being exactly the way she remembered... though now she could admire the artistic appearance of her salad and calamari just as much as its enticing aroma. Everyone else in their party seemed to enjoy their food too, with the exception of young Alfendi: After complaining about there being 'nothing good' and being forced to settle for fish and chips, he promptly picked any trace of greenery off his food and ate only the battered fish.

Up on stage, the festivities continued, with a steady stream of singers of varying skills taking their turns at carrying a tune. Most picked local songs in their native Borginian, but a brave few picked foreign songs, usually in English, and the results were nearly incomprehensible to the group at Lamiroir's table... as well as to the rest of the audience, who generally only clapped politely; The younger members of the Layton family mostly reacted by hiding hysterical giggles.

In a pause between songs, Emmy called over their waitress, asking in Borginian, "Excuse me? Do you know if Monsieur Salinen is around?"

The waitress looked a little shocked. "Y-yes, he is. Did you want to talk to him?"

Emmy nodded, gesturing to Hershel. "If he's in the building, we would like to speak to him in private. Is that okay?"

"Y-yes, that should be okay," the waitress muttered, then dashed off.

Lamiroir chuckled, saying in English, "You needn't worry about being turned down; Monsieur Salinen always loved talking to customers. I believe he even has his own table in the audience."

Hershel looked surprised. "Has he agreed to speak to us?"

"I just asked the waitress," Emmy explained, shrugging. "She said he's around, and we should be okay talking to him."

"I'm looking forward to this," Sycamore said, smirking. He turned to his brother. "Mind if I join you and Emmy?"

Hershel thought a moment, then nodded. "I suppose so."

"Can I come too?" Alfendi asked, picking at the crumbs on his plate.

"Better not; We should keep our group small," Sycamore explained.

"Agreed," Hershel added, and gave his son an apologetic smile. "We don't want to overwhelm him with too many people. You stay here with Flora and Lamiroir."

Alfendi pouted, but didn't complain.

The waitress returned, clutching her notebook as she said in Borginian, "Madame? Monsieur Salinen will speak with you now." She beckoned for Emmy and Hershel to follow, then turned to weave her way back through the tables. Emmy, Hershel and Sycamore got up to follow her.
Lamiroir carefully watched as the trio were led across the room. She wanted - no, needed - to know the moment anything happened.

Hershel paused as the waitress left them at a booth in the corner of the room, opposite from where they had sat to eat. Sitting at the table within, closing a book in front of him, was an aging man in green, glasses perched on a round nose as he regarded his visitors with a polite smile. Hershel made sure to smile back, tipping his hat. "Thank you for agreeing to meet with us, Monsieur Salinen."

Emmy brushed her hair behind her shoulder, speaking to the man in Borginian. She asked a question, gesturing to the round bench of the booth, and he replied affirmatively with a nod. Shooting her friends a grin, Emmy explained, "I've told him we have business to discuss; He's invited us to sit down."

"Thank you very much," Sycamore replied to the man, and the trio slipped into the booth, Emmy and Sycamore on one side and Hershel on the other.

"Minkalanen de liketominta tila on minun kansani?" Salinen asked, hands clutched together on the table in front of him.

"What kind of business do you have with me?" Emmy translated, looking to Hershel.

Hershel thought only a moment before turning to Salinen with a stern expression. "My name is Hershel Layton, and these are my colleagues Desmond Sycamore and Emmy Altava. We are here on behalf of Lamiroir."

Emmy gestured between the three of them, repeating their names. "Oleme tala pulesta de Lamiroir."

Salinen's eyes widened, and his face went pale. "Lamiroir?" he repeated.

"We are investigating her life before this restaurant," Hershel continued. "Her earliest memories are here, so we hoped to ask you what you might know."

The man stared at Hershel as Emmy translated. As her words came to an end, Salinen's eyes flickered out to the restaurant floor, locking on to something Hershel could only guess at; The archaeologist kept his gaze steadfastly on the manager, not backing down to glance back and confirm what Salinen had found out there. After several moments of silence, Salinen looked away from the view of his restaurant. "Mina en tida mitan."

Emmy blinked, surprised, and shot back a quick question in Borginian. Salinen nodded as he replied. "What did he say?" Sycamore asked, watching Emmy.

"He..." Emmy shook her head, baffled. "He said he doesn't know anything. We've come to the wrong place."

Hershel and Sycamore shared a confused look. "Is he sure?" Hershel asked.

Emmy nodded. "That's what he said."

Frowning, Hershel pressed a hand to his chin. "Hmm..."

"How can you not know anything?" Sycamore picked up, shooting Salinen an incredulous glare. "You hired her to work here, at a time she was highly unlikely to be capable of taking care of herself!"
"You must know something!"

Emmy nodded in agreement, turning back to Salinen to translate. In reply, Salinen only laughed, waving them off with a lengthy explanation in Borginian that left Emmy glaring, red-faced.

"What did he say?" Sycamore demanded, looking between Emmy and Salinen.

"He said we don't know anything." Emmy muttered through gritted teeth. "Lamiroir applied to perform here alone, and looked after herself just fine."

Sycamore's eyebrows shot up, then he joined Emmy's glare. "Is that so."

"Let's not call anyone a liar," Hershel gently reminded them, arms crossed. "We shall just have to-"

"Poppycock!" Sycamore cried, waving his brother off as he kept his attention on Salinen. "If Lamiroir was mentally functioning normally when she began work here, that must have been before the accident that caused her blindness, and her memory issues. Am I correct, Monsieur?"

Emmy crossed her arms as she translated, fixing Salinen with a stern glare as she barked something in Borginian. "Miten han meneti nakonsa ja mustin?"

Salinen blinked, blankly. "Nakonsa?"

Her demeanour unchanged, Emmy nodded. "Mita tapatu, Monsieur Salinen?"

Face paling, Salinen's eyes once more darted out across the floor of the restaurant, only to widen as he apparently failed to find what he was looking for. "Eh... Mi...

The amateur performer on stage reached the end of their song to a smattering of applause, and silence fell over the restaurant. A scant few seconds later, the quiet gave way to cheering, and the entire building was soon being shaken by rapturous clapping.

Hershel spun in his seat, looking up to the stage. Sycamore, Emmy, and even Salinen were quick to follow.

"Talus, kaki," Lamiroir announced from the stage microphone with a smile that cut through the noise like a knife.
At their table, Lamiroir intently watched Hershel, Sycamore and Emmy slip into the booth. That man there... That was Lalu Salinen? She wasn't sure what she had been expecting her former manager to look like, but a grey-haired man with a spider-web of wrinkles across his face was not it. Although, now she thought about it, she could picture all those pauses in his speech being filled with the fiddling of those glasses, taking them off to clean, or simply pushing them up his nose under the hot lights of the stage.

The conversation began in earnest, and Salinen's eyes widened, quickly moving to scan the audience before locking on to Lamiroir at her table. She returned the stare calmly, hoping her presence, even at this distance, would smooth the discussion out to its destination much sooner.

Salinen seemed to be sweating as he returned his gaze to his visitors... or was that Lamiroir's imagination, misinterpreting the shine of the lights on his skin? Emmy looked shocked, the others confused, then Sycamore threw up a fist, barely restraining himself from slamming it on the table. Salinen laughed as he spoke again, and this time Lamiroir was sure she wasn't imagining the perspiration of a liar. Her bracelet felt tight on her wrist, and she reflexively moved to rub at it. Her eyes pricked as she instinctively focused on the man at the table, all else becoming non-existent. Salinen was sweating. His easy smile was tight on his face, twitching at the corners. Although the movements were minute and far away, she could see them clear as day, could see the intentions behind them to hide and to confuse. In fact, they were all she could see right now.

This strange sensation... This was a part of her. Just as much as the memories. This was important, what allowed her to read what people were thinking, all without them having to say a word.

Salinen was lying.

Lamiroir's focus broke with a gasp, her surroundings swarming back into her awareness all in a rush. She knew Salinen was lying to them. How had she known that? The moment the question occurred to her, the explanation popped into her head as though it had always been there, 'it runs in my family, I'm unconsciously copying body language, I have the ability to hyper-focus on the tiniest details, my bracelet just tells me when,' and she didn't doubt it always had been there, hidden under the same veil that covered everything else about her life 'before'. Suddenly, looking back on her years of blindness, she felt even more lost; Hadn't she relied so much on this 'ability' to understand the hidden depths of everyone she met, whether to play them on stage or simply in everyday life to form a first impression?

...

Wait, 'play them on stage'?

"Lamiroir? Are you okay?"

The singer blinked, looking down at young Alfendi, who had moved into the now-unoccupied chair at her side. "I'm alright," she insisted, forcing a smile. "I... just remembered something, actually."

"Really?" Flora asked, curiosity piqued. "What did you remember?"
Instead of replying, Lamiroir returned her gaze to the distant table. Salinen was still engaged in conversation, faking confidence that Lamiroir could see right through. "I'll tell you later," she told Flora, getting to her feet. "I'm afraid I have something I need to do first."

"Can I come?" Alfendi called.

Lamiroir shook her head, patting the boy's shoulder. "Next time," she promised, then ran off through the sea of tables before she had to see Alfendi's disappointed face.

She would have to impart this 'stage' clue to Hershel later... but, right now, she had more important business to conduct with it.

Lamiroir rode the high of her discoveries all the way to the corner of the stage, where she found a young woman sat at a desk, staring lazily at a computer screen and tapping her fingers on a clipboard at her side. Nearby, a teenage girl stood, equally bored, waiting impatiently for the current singer two short metres away to finish up. As she approached, Lamiroir cleared her throat, then called in Borginian, "Excuse me?"

"Current queue is about twelve minutes," the young woman automatically replied, "if you want to- HOLY-!" She cut herself off with a stream of loud curse words as she finally turned her gaze up to see who her latest 'customer' was, jumping in her chair. "You're Lamiroir!"

The girl nearby squeaked as she also turned to look, eyes wide.

At first, Lamiroir wasn't quite sure how to respond, used to the serene nature of her 'image' stilling people's foul mouths in her presence. "Language, young lady."

The woman blushed, shrinking in her seat. "I-I'm so sorry, madame! D-did you...?" She feebly pointed to the stage. "Were you wanting to sing, or something...?"

"Or something," Lamiroir replied, giving the younger woman a polite smile. "You said it was a twelve minute wait...?"

The woman nodded. "Yes, that's-"

"I'm up next!" the girl stood nearby cut in, her grin threatening to split her face in half. "But you can take my spot, Lamiroir!"

"That's very kind of you," Lamiroir replied, "but I don't want to cut in front of the queue."

"It's no problem, madame!" the girl insisted, and Lamiroir began to fear she was in danger of hyperventilating from the excitement of giving up her spot in line to a celebrity. "You can go ahead!"

The woman at the desk surveyed her computer and clipboard. "That... shouldn't be a problem," she decided. "Did you have a preference for what to sing, madame?"

Lamiroir paused. She hadn't thought this far ahead. "I'm rather new to karaoke," she admitted. "Perhaps something easy... Do you have any of my songs in there?"

The woman nodded, clicking madly at her computer. "We just got 'Guitar's Serenade' in; That one's very popular."

"Maybe not that one," Lamiroir quickly decided, restraining a wince. "It's too soon." And it was in "Veil of Time!" Lamiroir cried, grinning as the song crossed her mind once more. "That one would be perfect!"

The woman nodded, clicking something on her computer. "We can certainly do that, madame." She glanced up at Lamiroir's eyes. "The lyrics will be running on the little screen behind the microphone stand. They're programmed to follow the timing of the recorded instrumental."

"Thank you," Lamiroir replied. "I will appreciate having the reminder on hand."

"You'll be up shortly," the woman added, returning the singer's smile as the music of the ongoing performance faded out into silence. "Good luck... and thank you for coming back, Lamiroir."

It was only as Lamiroir left the desk and climbed onstage she recognised the young woman's voice as that of a teenage waitress from years past.

The silence of the restaurant gave way to cheering and loud applause as the crowd, many of them likely regulars since her earliest days as a singer, recognised Lamiroir approaching the microphone onstage. She gave them a cursory smile as she adjusted the stand, taking stock of the small monitor at her feet and the sheer size of the restaurant floor before her; Just as always since before she could remember, the size of her audience didn't phase her in the slightest. "Hello everyone," Lamiroir announced into the mic, her words finally calming the sheer noise of the excited crowd. "Please, go easy on me: This is my first time doing karaoke... as far as I can remember, anyway."

The audience tittered in amusement, then fell silent. A moment later, the speakers around the building began to emit the familiar opening piano chords of Veil of Time, exactly the way Machi would have played them had he not been on the other side of the world at that moment... In fact, that was Machi playing them, but from three years before, in a recording studio back in Poma. But Lamiroir couldn't spare any further time musing on her son; Instead, she cast her eyes across the still crowd, searching the sea of tables. There was Flora and Alfendi over there... and there was Salinen's booth. He and his three visitors were all watching her intently, the same as the rest of the crowd, though she couldn't miss the vaguely confused looks on the Laytons' faces. Naturally, they would be the only ones to miss the subtext of her song, not speaking any Borginian... Another thing she would have to explain to them later. For now though, she fixed a determined stare on Lalu Salinen, just in time for the intro to end and the words to begin.
"Ja kaki on menetety laverho de ajan..."

Lamiroir's final notes echoed across the restaurant for a moment or two before the applause started, the crowd giving her a standing ovation as their cheers drowned out the end of the music. She smiled serenely, curtseying and saying "Kitos," into her microphone.

"Bis! Bis!" came the cries from the crowd.

Lamiroir shook her head, turning down the calls for an encore. She curtsied one final time, shot the booth in the corner a look, then ventured down off the stage, back the way she had came.

"What was that about?" Sycamore muttered, fingers tapping on the table. "I thought she wasn't interested in karaoke?"

Emmy sniffed, frantically wiping at her eyes. "That's... one of her songs," she hurriedly explained. "The Veil of Time, I think it's called. Very moving."

Hershel raised an eyebrow. "I see." He then turned his attention to the man with them, who was staring up at the empty stage with wide eyes, lost in thought. "Monsieur Salinen?"

The man jumped, looking between the three, then sighed, staring down at the closed book in front of him. "Mina tulen puhuman."

Emmy gasped, jumping back into business as she asked him a question in rapid Borginian.

Salinen nodded, morosely adding to his earlier statement.

"He's going to tell us what he knows!" Emmy happily translated.

Hershel and Sycamore exchanged surprised looks. Had it been Lamiroir getting up to sing that had changed his mind?

Salinen slowly began to explain in Borginian, his tone low and his gaze unmoving from the table in front of him. Every few sentences, he would pause, and Emmy would translate for Hershel and Sycamore, the full sad tale of what he knew of Lamiroir's past:

"Nine years ago, a man came to see me in my restaurant. He had business to conduct, a potential act for my stage, and begged for me to come and see 'her'. He told me 'she' was his niece, blind since birth, and a brilliant singer, but she had suffered a car accident recently and had no memories in her head. She couldn't even count past twenty before forgetting what she was doing, but she would always finish a song. Naturally, I agreed to see her, and he took me to her house, where he was looking after her."

At this point, Salinen began to rub at his eyes, gesturing beyond the stage.
"She lived just over there, in a house on the street behind the restaurant. Her voice was so beautiful, and she reminded me so much of someone I knew when I was a child. I had to accept her, and gave her Saturdays to sing. I would go to her house, collect her from the front door, and keep an eye on her as she performed. She always did so well, and the audience loved her. I think it was even the routine that helped her start to retain things again."

Sycamore frowned, arms crossed. "She suffered from short-term memory loss as well as long-term?" he mused. "I wonder how long that lasted before she recovered it?"

"I never saw her uncle again," Salinen continued, through Emmy's translations. "I asked after him once, but Lamiroir had no idea who I was talking about; She looked after herself. She always had, in her memory."

Hershel rubbed his chin, deep in thought. "May I ask, where did Lamiroir's name come from? Did this uncle give it to her?"

Emmy translated, and Salinen took a moment to reply. "I gave it to her, on her first night singing," Emmy replied on Salinen's behalf. "I suddenly realised I hadn't been told her name, and she couldn't remember one, so I just called her 'The Siren' and it stuck."

"What about this uncle?" Sycamore picked up. "Did you ever get his name?"

Salinen sighed once Emmy had translated. "Geary," he said. "Hanen nimensa oli Geary."

"Geary?" Hershel repeated, under his breath.

The manager nodded. "Se on kaki mita tidan," he said. "Lupan."

"That's all he knows," Emmy sighed. "He promises."

"Where was this uncle staying?" Sycamore asked. "With Lamiroir, I presume?"

"Oli Geary asu latalosa Lamiroir?" Emmy translated.

Salinen nodded. "Lamiroir asu sina talosa kunes han lahti kapunkin. En tida misa Geary meni."

"Lamiroir lived there until she left town," Emmy explained. "He doesn't know what happened to Geary."

Hershel closed his eyes, musing on the information. After a long pause, he opened them again to give the old manager a smile. "Thank you for your help, Monsieur. You've been a great aid to our investigation." He stood, slipping out of the booth.

Emmy gave Salinen a polite grin as she translated, moving to follow. She added something of her own in Borginian, and Salinen nodded as he briefly replied, waving a goodbye.

As the trio walked away from the booth, the warbling sounds of the current karaoke singer ringing out from the stage over their heads, Sycamore poked his brother's arm with a glare. "No, he wasn't."

Hershel raised an eyebrow. "Wasn't what?"

"Wasn't any help," Sycamore clarified. "This 'Geary' disappeared nine years ago. He'll be long gone. If that was all Salinen truly knew, what hope do we have for finding out anything else?"

"Don't be such a misery guts, Desmond," Emmy gently chided him. "Surely someone else will have heard of him."
Hershel nodded. "We still have avenues to explore before we can declare Kopunchiville out of information for us," he agreed, then gestured ahead of them to their table, where Flora, Alfendi and Lamiroir sat together waiting for them. "Speaking of..."

Alfendi noticed the approaching group with a gasp, bouncing in his chair as he waved to them. "Papa! Did you see Lamiroir singing?"

"It was beautiful, wasn't it?" Flora added, shooting a grin at the proud singer at Alfendi's side.

"It was indeed," Hershel agreed, quickly moving to his seat and turning his attention on Lamiroir. "I imagine you were attempting to help us?"

Lamiroir nodded, only barely biting back a grin. "I could see Monsieur Salinen was lying to you, so I thought a reminder of who it was behind those questions might convince him to tell the truth."

Emmy laughed, dropping into her chair. "Well, it worked! And what a perfect song to choose too; Did you originally write that about your amnesia?"

"And my blindness," Lamiroir replied, smiling. "By then, I had my 'image', so I was careful to keep the lyrics vague."

Sycamore frowned in thought, sitting at Alfendi's other side. "You said... you could 'see' Monsieur Salinen was lying to us?" he said, watching Lamiroir closely. "How could you know? We were quite a distance away, and you've never seen Salinen before this evening."

At that, Lamiroir laughed. "I suppose I must confess... I've remembered something else about myself." Her cheer faded a little as she added, "Not that it will help the investigation, I fear."

"Whether it helps the investigation or not, returned memories are always a good thing," Hershel insisted with a smile.

Emmy nodded in agreement, leaning forward eagerly. "What did you remember?"

Lamiroir's smile grew again, her hand on the golden ring at her right wrist. "The purpose of my bracelet! I can use it to more accurately read body language, to see what people are thinking!"

The rest of the table exchanged surprised looks. "Your... bracelet? How does it do that?" Emmy asked.

"You don't have to believe me," Lamiroir sighed, "but this is a part of me I had no use for when I was blind... A very important part of me, something that runs in my family." She closed her eyes, her hand held to her chest. "I have a very unique ability to focus completely on something, to see the smallest twitch or movement in perfect clarity; My bracelet was specially made for me, and it helps me know when someone tenses up, so I can focus to see what is wrong... If they are lying, I can usually tell what about." She looked up again, proud. "I used to use my ability all the time... on stage."

Hershel raised an eyebrow.

Flora gasped, grinning as she reached over to pat Lamiroir's arm. "Oh, that's brilliant! So you were a performer before you lost your memories, just like you thought!"

Lamiroir nodded. "The stage has always been a home to me; I couldn't imagine my old life any other way."
"What did you used to do?" Alfendi asked. "Did you still sing?"

"I'm not quite sure," Lamiroir admitted. "It probably doesn't matter; Surely if I was well-known, someone else would have discovered my past identity long ago."

Sycamore shot Hershel a look. "Very true."

Hershel ignored him. "Any little thing can help. This family ability could be a vital clue." He gestured towards Salinen's booth. "In fact, Monsieur Salinen mentioned you were in the care of a family member when he first hired you to work here: Do you remember an uncle by the name of 'Geary'?"

Lamiroir frowned, thinking hard. "An uncle Geary...?" she mused aloud. After a few moments, she sighed, shaking her head. "It's vaguely familiar, but nothing is coming to mind. I'm sorry."

"Don't worry, we'll find another clue to follow," Emmy assured her. "We aren't done with this town yet."

"Emmy is right," Hershel agreed, ignoring his brother's subtle eye-rolling. "If we're all ready to finish up here, we can start with a look at this house you stayed in when you lived in town. Do you think you could find it?"

Lamiroir thought a moment, then nodded. "If we walk around to the back door, I should be able to locate it. It wasn't far away."

The Restaurant de Chanson was ringed on three sides by road, though it had very few neighbours in this outskirts area of the small town. Out the back, the western wall, was a small car park that extended to the south, dotted with employees' and tourists' vehicles and a row of bikes locked to a rack along the wall. The car park itself was well-lit and the bikes nearby hid a line of colourful signs directing visitors around to the front door on the eastern side of the building. To the north, across the road, was a small cottage, looming out of the darkness with the rolling, empty hill behind it. To the west, across the battered local road, were two long buildings, one small and the other a little larger.

Lamiroir walked straight to the back door, where a yellow, long-haired retriever was tied to the wall. Seeing someone approaching, it jumped to its paws, tail wagging, and sniffed in her direction. Lamiroir smiled, waving to the animal. "Talus, Keltanen." The dog smiled in reply.

Putting Salinen's dog out of her mind, Lamiroir turned her back to the door; Although she wanted to close her eyes, she worried about tripping over without the guide she was used to following, so she simply focussed her mind on her ears and her feet. "Let's see if I can..." She stepped forward gingerly, holding a hand out as though to grasp the arm of her guide of old; It had always been Salinen to escort her between home and the restaurant in the old days, before she and Machi were 'discovered' and left for good. From what she remembered of her route, it involved walking straight ahead from the back door, dodging cars and drifting to the right; She tried to follow that now, her eyes watching the ground in front of her as she followed the mental path as best she recalled. As she reached the road, the Laytons behind her, she paused only to check both ways for any approaching traffic before hurrying across the aging tarmac, dodging a pot-hole along the way (although she heard Alfendi gleefully bounce into it, splashing a little in the puddle that lingered inside). Once on the grass on the other side, she looked up at the building looming before them, judging the distance to its neighbour to the south.

Nodding once, Lamiroir turned to Hershel, gesturing to the small house. "This was it. I used to live
Emmy looked between the house and the restaurant across the road with wide eyes. "Wow, that's not far at all..."

"If it had been any further away," Lamiroir replied with a smile, "I would not have been able to find it so easily."

Sycamore pointed to the neighbouring building, its windows as unlit as the one in front of them. "Do you know who lives there?"

"I know it was unoccupied at first," Lamiroir explained. "Shortly before I left, a young couple moved in; I've no idea if they still live here, though."

"Understandable," Sycamore admitted with a sigh, crossing his arms.

"What about over there?" Flora added, pointing to the house to the north. "Do you know who lives there?"

Lamiroir nodded, smiling. "Monsieur Salinen. He likes to be close to his restaurant at all times."

Hershel hummed in thought, pulling out a notebook that he began to write in. "Something we can look into tomorrow..."

Alfendi fidgeted at his father's side, looking around. "There's so few people living here..."

"That's Kopunchiville," Lamiroir laughed. "It's like this around the house we're staying in too, remember?"

Hershel finished his note-taking, replacing the book in his jacket. "Speaking of, I think it's high time we returned there," he announced. "We can pick this investigation up again tomorrow."

Sycamore sighed heavily, but said nothing as the group moved to cross the road once more.

View Layton's Notebook
The rising sun on the morning of the fourteenth of September saw the Laytons heading south to the Magi Joki, the river that ran alongside, and partly through, the town. Their information gathering the previous day had told them it was this river that had allowed the settlement to thrive the way it did: With the town itself, ringed by a horseshoe of farms on the northern banks, serving as a meeting point for similar small farming settlements in the surrounding mountains, trade with the wider world sprung up at the docks lining the riverside (the southern bank was too shallow and rocky for boats to safely approach, thus so little of the town had spread in that direction). The river also had what the locals called a 'little sister', the Rapi Joki, a faster and more furious stream of about equal size that raced through the southern foothills, straight down from the slopes of the nearby mountains; Its icy rapids made it nearly impossible to traverse, so it stayed in the wild forests where it belonged, meeting up with its tamer 'big sister' further downstream. Up in Kopunchiville however, there were two bridges across the Magi Joki, the western Valka Silta and the eastern Musta Silta, the latter of which was directly south of the crossroads their bed and breakfast sat by; It wasn't such a great distance to traverse for a little exploring of the tiny section of town on the other side.

And Alfendi and Flora were very eager to see the Magi Joki at least once before they left.

Faced with the shameless begging from his children, Hershel had quickly agreed to explore the other side of the river before the group threw themselves back into their investigation; Emmy and Sycamore had laughed before deciding to wait for the family at the library in the town centre, while Lamiroir had instead offered to join the three Laytons, just in case they found themselves needing a Borginian translator.

Alfendi ripped his hand from his father's grip as they reached Musta Silta, blue cape flapping behind him as he ran to the wire fence that lined the edge. "Papa, look!" he cried over the sound of the rushing stream, grinning down at the black water beneath. "Isn't it amazing?"

Hershel chuckled as he followed. "A remarkable river," he agreed, then gripped his son under the arms to lift him up with a grunt, allowing Alfendi to look over the fence. "Very different to the Thames."

Flora meanwhile was looking in the opposite direction, directly up to a large mechanism over the bridge, and an identical one on its neighbour to the west. "It looks like they can open up these bridges to let boats pass... though I can't see how they'd do it."

Lamiroir looked around, peering across the river to where a small hut sat on the river's edge, exactly between the two bridges; It even had two short and wide windows on its corners, one facing upstream and the other downstream. She gently poked Flora's arm and pointed to it. "That looks like the control room over there."

"Oh, so it does," Flora agreed, then frowned as her attention turned to the great grassy green beyond, where a dip in the landscape was barely visible. Over the top of the hill, the tops of heads kept poking up, the sound of distant shouts was just audible over the river below them. "What's that behind it?"
Hershel looked up from where he was still holding Alfendi securely against the fence, scanning the opposite bank.

Lamiroir thought a moment, then smiled. "Ah! That must be the old arena!"

"Arena?" Flora repeated.

"Yes, I completely forgot about it." Lamiroir continued, chuckling to herself. "It's not been used since before I lived here, but I'm told it's been there since the town was founded: A public area to perform, make others laugh... or simply an open area to hold a festival, separate from the farmland and any crops to ruin or livestock to scare."

Flora snorted at that, images of drunk vandals tramping through a wheat field or trying to ride bulls crossing her mind. "Very true."

Clearly not paying any attention to the conversation, Alfendi cooed at the rushing river from where he was leaning over the wire fence, held firm by his father's grip under his armpits. "I wonder how long it'd take to drown if you fell in..."

Hershel paused a moment before laughing, lowering Alfendi from the fence rather quickly. "Let's not find out right now, shall we?" He held out his hand for his son to take. "We can look it up in the library later if you want."

Alfendi grinned and nodded, taking his father's hand. "Yeah!"

Just as Rose had told them, the buildings were sparse on this side of the river, giving Lamiroir and the Laytons peeks of the grassy arena as they progressed down the road, turning right at the first crossroads they came to (of the other two paths, one backtracked to the river and the other left the town and followed the river upstream). The arena itself didn't seem all that exciting, a dip in the grassy field ringed by stone; To one side was a small cottage, made of the same grey rock and looking worse for wear in its age. The heads they had glimpsed earlier appeared to belong to a gaggle of children, though it was still hard to make out anything else from around the few houses dotted around the road.

"Lamiroir, I need to add to my map!" Alfendi announced as they approached the arena, and, the moment the singer handed him the folded paper from her pocket, he was scribbling away to add the stone circle and its nearby building. While he was at it, he also scrawled in the Restaurant de Chanson and two of its neighbouring houses.
"Done!" the boy announced as he handed it back. "I tried to write 'Lamiroir' by your old house, but I ran out of space."

"Ah yes, I see," Lamiroir replied, giving Alfendi a smile as she looked over the paper. "A very good job."

Alfendi giggled with pride.
Finally, the quartet rounded the final building, coming into full view of Kopunchiville's arena. It sat like a bowl in the landscape, at a slight angle in the top and side of the hill, its rim the single row of stone seating circling the centre. On the far side, the small cottage perched in the grass, its lone window boarded and wooden door firmly shut. Within the fairy ring of stone frolicked six or so children, ranging in age from a toddler to a boy about ten years old. In the seats sat an old woman, a book in her lap, casting the occasional glance up at her charges before returning her attention to the pages in front of her.

"Oh look, some of those kids are your age, Alfendi," Flora exclaimed, poking her little brother's arm with a grin. "You should go and play with them!"

Alfendi suddenly looked wary, clunging to his father's hand. "But they don't speak English," he pointed out.

"I don't imagine that should matter," Hershel replied. "They appear to be playing tag; I'm sure they wouldn't mind you joining in."

The boy's face grimaced in disbelief, but he said nothing.

Flora giggled, holding her brother's shoulders and walking him forward, pulling his hand from the safety net of his father's loose grip. "Now come on, don't be shy! Don't you want to make friends?"

"No..." Alfendi mumbled, but his protests were ignored as his sister marched him towards the gaggle of children ahead.

Leaving the boy in his sister's care, Lamiroir turned her attention to the old woman with the book. "Maybe she will know more about this area of town, Professor," she offered.

Hershel nodded. "More information is always useful," he agreed, and the two headed towards her.

Lamiroir waved as they approached the elderly woman, calling in Borginian, "Hello there, Madame. I hope we are not disturbing you?"

The woman looked up, and smiled as she saw the pair, closing her book. "Good afternoon, Lamiroir. Long time, no see! I heard you were back in town!"

"Ah, yes, I forget word always travels quickly here," Lamiroir laughed to herself. Remembering what had dragged her up on the Restaurant de Chanson's stage the previous night, she glanced back at Hershel and found Flora had rejoined them, grinning proudly and with Alfendi notably now absent; The father and daughter were now quietly talking between themselves, so Lamiroir decided to leave them to it. Turning back to the woman in front of her, it occurred to the singer that her voice was very familiar. "It's... Madame Bonte, isn't it? From the orphanage?" Which would make the nearby kids, as Lamiroir had suspected, the younger batch of orphans enjoying a day out.

"That's me, indeed," the woman chuckled, but her expression quickly turned serious. "We got your messages. How is Machi doing after that nasty business in America?"

Lamiroir sighed, instinctively reaching for the photo in her pocket. "As well as he can be." On impulse, she took the photo out to show Bonte, sitting at the woman's side. "He's serving out his punishment for the smuggling, staying with some new friends we made there. Once I'm done here, I plan to join him."

Bonte cooed as she regarded the photo. "The little dear... or, not so little now I suppose. Look at that smile!"
To run into Madame Bonte was a stroke of good luck for Lamiroir. The older woman ran the orphanage near the northern edge of town, where Machi had lived for a not-insignificant portion of his life. She had raised him, alongside his similarly orphaned brothers and sisters, from the age of three to when Machi had finally moved in with Lamiroir at ten, the start of their career together. It had been Bonte who had encouraged Machi to play the aging piano in the orphanage's living room, had personally tried to teach him when she could and left him alone with her old learner's books when she couldn't, and Lamiroir suspected it was a joint decision of Bonte's and Salinen's that had led to the young pianist first performing with the amnesiac singer oh so long ago. Before, Lamiroir had only known Bonte through those performances, as the elder lady had always made sure to escort Machi to and from the restaurant personally. The two women had been close friends before Lamiroir's career took her and Machi out of Kopunchiville and into stardom... but Lamiroir never heard another word from her after they left. Once the murder trial was done, after LeTouse's death, she learned this was only because Machi had been hiding the letters Bonte sent, not wanting his aska to worry about their old friends struggling to keep their 'family' together in the face of lowered funds and threats to send them to larger towns, away from their home and from each other; For Bonte and the other orphanage parents, such an act would surely mean unemployment, not to mention the unspoken pain of tearing them away from their children. After regaining her sight, and rediscovering her ability to read and write, the first thing Lamiroir had done was write a letter to her old friend, explaining the situation on her end... and a few other things she wanted to take care of once she was back in town, in addition to her missing memory.

"I'm afraid you'll have to come by the orphanage later for that all-important paperwork we have to do," Bonte quietly pointed out, returning the photo to its owner. "Monsieur Lomake is there; He'll be able to sort it all out in a heartbeat."

"I'll make sure to," Lamiroir promised, noting to herself an additional mental reminder to do so before leaving. "I actually came here - specifically, south of the river - simply to explore the town, since I have never seen any of it before I arrived the day before yesterday." She gestured around the arena. "Would you happen to know anything about this place?"

"Oh, naturally," Bonte replied, nodding sagely. "Sit tight, and I'll tell you the whole sad tale."
"I've seen this place rise and fall, you know," Bonte explained, pointing emphatically at the arena. "This very spot was the pride of Borginia, the home of Troupe Gramarye itself!"

Lamiroir frowned in thought. "Gramarye... I believe I performed with one of them in my recent concert. They're magicians, aren't they?"

"Mm-hmm," Bonte replied. "Or at least they were. The Gramaryes haven't performed here in decades, not since Magnifi revoked his citizenship... and the troupe broke up when he died, poor soul."

"Revoked his citizenship?" Lamiroir repeated, confused. "I assume Magnifi was...?"

"The head of the clan, you could call him," Bonte sighed, her eyes on the cloudy sky above. "He wasn't Borginian by birth, but his wife was; She was a classmate of mine too, in fact. When she died, he never came back here, not to Kopunchiville; The rest of the town saw it as a snub, hated the Gramaryes ever after, but I can't blame him for not wanting to be reminded of his wife." She gestured to the arena again. "This place was so associated with the Gramaryes that people actively avoided it after... even the caretaker abandoned it, left the old hut to fall to ruin." She bitterly laughed, looking towards the road. "They can't even comprehend that our quiet Gaia is buried almost next door!"

Lamiroir could remember hearing a mention of the town's graveyard on the southern bank, and wondered if it would be worth a visit. Out loud, she chuckled, "Gaia Gramarye... What a name!"

Bonte laughed in agreement. "Oh, Gaia wasn't her real name of course, just what everyone called her: Gaia Takala. Her real name was..." She paused, and her smile slowly faded into a frown. "Hm. I can't remember." She shook her head. "You'd have to ask Lalu Salinen. He and Gaia were thick as thieves back in the day."

At that, Lamiroir's amusement died. "Salinen? Monsieur Salinen, who owns the Restaurant de Chanson?"

"That's the one," Bonte replied. "He was much younger than us, though; Lalu and Gaia were brother and sister, the first two of the orphanage kids."

"Really?"

Bonte nodded sagely. "Gaia broke his heart when she left to seek her fortune. She came back with the Troupe a few times over the years... but I hear she got very sick near the end, and she never even told Lalu she was in town. Didn't want him to see her dying."

Lamiroir frowned, musing over the gossip she had just been given, and it was definitely gossip. To think her former manager had a past that was connected, however tenuously, to Valant Gramarye, who had so boasted of how he would bring Troupe Gramarye back to its former glory... and thus also connected to young Apollo and Trucy Wright, who had come from that same troupe. She didn't think she was likely to ever meet Valant again, but maybe, if she mentioned Gaia's name when she returned to America, the Wrights might know who she was talking about?

A shout cut through Lamiroir's thoughts, a high-pitched shriek in English: "Hey! Get away from there!" Lamiroir looked up across the arena, and the first thing she noticed was a red-faced Flora stomping across the grass at high speed. "What do you think you're doing!?" Before her, gathered around the tiny cottage on the other side of the stone ring, the gaggle of kids looked back at her curiously, eyes wide; Two of the older ones were stood under the window, its boards pulled off, and a terrified Alfendi was perched on their shoulders.

Bonte lifted herself from her seat with a roar, charging at surprising speed after Flora, her eyes locked on the children around the cabin. Hearing her coming, the group instantly scattered, Alfendi dropped to the grass as his supports fled from underneath him. "Come back here!!" Bonte ordered in Borginian, turning to make for the nearest group of her charges. "I have told you so many times...!"

Lamiroir jumped to her feet, following Hershel as he rushed after Flora to where Alfendi lay below the window of the cabin. Flora hung back as she got close, looking around worriedly at the spread of running children and their angry caretaker around them, but Hershel didn't pause, running straight to his son's side and dropping down into the grass, pulling Alfendi into a hug. Now she was closer, Lamiroir could see the boy's breathing was shallow, his hands pressed hard to his forehead; As he willingly leaned into his father's embrace, a faint whine of restrained tears could be heard in the air. Hershel stroked the back of his son's head, rocking back and forth and muttering calming noises in Alfendi's ear. "It's alright. You're safe now. It's all over." Flora wiped away tears of her own as she stood nearby, gazing down at her brother with a parental worry.

Lamiroir turned her attention back to the arena. Bonte had by now managed to herd the younger children into the centre of the arena, where she was shouting a brief lecture about respecting other people's boundaries inbetween ordering the older stragglers to join the group already. Giving up, she sighed in frustration, then cried, "I expect to see you all right here by the time I get back in two minutes!" and spun around, stamping across the grass towards the cabin. Lamiroir stepped towards her, holding out a hand and opening her mouth to talk, but Bonte waved her off, sharply ordering "Not now!" as she walked straight past and towards the Laytons.

Hershel looked up, holding Alfendi tighter as he watched Bonte curiously. "Madame?"

"That one's yours?" Bonte asked in Borginian as she jerked a hand in Alfendi's direction, huffing from the after-effects of her rage, though Lamiroir could see she wasn't angry at the trio of tourists, only wary... though to the average onlooker, especially one who couldn't comprehend her words, that wasn't exactly easy to make out. "He should know better than to try climbing into an abandoned building! You not learn that where you come from?"

Although it was obvious neither of the older Laytons had understood a word of the woman's tirade, that didn't stop Flora from stepping forward with a glare, shouting, "Don't you dare try and pin that on Alfendi! He was clearly being egged on by those other kids!" She waved a hand accusingly at the group sitting in the arena. "He never would have-!"

"Flora!" Hershel snapped, shooting her a stern look. "Shouting isn't necessary. We can explain this misunderstanding calmly."

"Flora!" Hershel snapped, shooting her a stern look. "Shouting isn't necessary. We can explain this misunderstanding calmly."

Lamiroir started as she belatedly realised she was the only option of communication open between Bonte and the Laytons; Racing forward, she first looked to her English friends to explain, "Bonte didn't mean to come across as angry, she was just worried," and then to her Borginian friend, "Alfendi is a quiet boy; He would not have tried to climb in that window without prompting."

The trio stood in silence for a moment, the Laytons still watching the elder woman warily while Bonte looked a little surprised to hear them speaking in English. Finally, Bonte recovered, nodding decisively. "I didn't mean to accuse the boy," she explained. "I can certainly believe he was pushed into helping them." At that, she shot a glare at the gathered children behind her - It appeared, in her absence, the entire group had finally congregated together again, fidgeting in the grass.

"She didn't mean to accuse him of anything," Lamiroir translated for the Laytons. "She can believe he was pushed into it."

Flora looked to Hershel, who smiled appreciatively and replied, "Thank you for your concerns. We'll keep a closer eye on him in future."

Lamiroir again translated for Bonte, who shot the Laytons a smile, then nodded to the singer, "Until next time," and returned to her children, shouting orders as she marched in their direction. "Right, you lot are returning home right now! Don't groan at me like that, you've just proven you can't be trusted to be out and about, so we are going home!" The gathered children muttered amongst themselves as they got to their feet and were promptly led down to the road, heading off towards the western bridge over the river.

As the sound of the group faded into the distance, Hershel returned his attention to Alfendi, pulling out of the hug and brushing the boy's hair from his face. "Alfendi, what happened?"

Alfendi sniffed, reluctantly lowering his hands from his face. He mumbled something, but it was incomprehensible from where Lamiroir was standing.

"I know you didn't mean to," Hershel quietly assured him. "I want to know what those other boys and girls said to you."

"Nothing!" Alfendi declared, breaking into a fresh wave of tears. "They didn't say anything! They don't speak English, Papa!"

Lamiroir noticed Flora go pale, looking away guiltily as she tightly hugged herself.

"Alright, alright," Hershel muttered, calming Alfendi again remarkably quickly. "In that case, what did they do?"

Alfendi sniffed for a moment or two. "I told them my name... then they grabbed my arm and were talking a lot. Then they were pulling off the boards up there," he briefly pointed to the window above him, "and started lifting me up. I thought maybe they were allowed to, like they'd lost something inside and wanted me to get it...

Hershel nodded, pulling Alfendi back into the hug. "It's alright, it's over now. Besides, you know better than to wander into an abandoned building like this; I know you would never have tried to go in there on your own."

Alfendi nodded, sniffed, then was silent.

Flora suddenly let out a loud whine, shaking her head. "This is all my fault, Professor!" she cried. "If I'd just seen those kids were trouble-makers, I wouldn't have pushed Alfendi to play with them and they wouldn't've-!"

"Flora, please," Hershel interrupted, looking up at the young woman fondly, "this was no more your fault than Alfendi's. No one could be expected to accurately judge the character of a group of children so quickly." He held out a hand towards her, and Flora smiled through her fears as she took it, kneeling at his side to join in the hug with her little brother.
Lamiroir watched the family bonding moment with a warm smile... then turned and softly walked away. She missed Machi more than ever.
August 8, 5:12PM
Train Carriage

'I wonder how Lamiroir's doing?'

Machi shook the thought from his head with a frown, leaning his cheek against the vibrating glass of the train window as they trundled down the mountain. On this day, a day he had been given three cousins for his new family, he refused to dampen his mood worrying about his aska. He had Iris' number if he wanted to vent or just talk about their experiences as law-breakers who faced justice, and Maya's number if he wanted someone to share his love of the piano with (the knowledge it had been her who wrote that melody he and Iris found still blew his mind a little), and even Pearl's number if he wanted to... well, talk to Pearl. He already loved the girl like an older sister, but he didn't have a specific shared interest with her yet, not the way he did with Maya and Iris.

The train's wheels clacked as it exited a copse of trees, emerging onto a bridge over a steep valley. Below them was a sea of green treetops, and above two towering mountain peaks, barely visible from the very limited view of the train window Machi's face was currently pressed against.

Opposite the teen sat Apollo, taking no notice at all of his surroundings as he fiddled with his Court Record tablet computer. His eyebrows were pressed together in concentration, brown eyes utterly focussed on the computer screen under his fingers. Machi was a little amazed that his isoveli was apparently so used to this trip down from Kurain Village that he didn't even pay attention to it anymore... or maybe he was a little bitter about having to leave his family and return home with Machi?

The teen shook his head, turning back to the window. Apollo had offered to be the one to take him home, after all... but there was only one way to know for sure. Machi screwed up his courage.

"Apollo?"

Apollo blinked as he looked up to meet the teen's eyes. "Mm?"

"Are you okay?"

To Machi's surprise, Apollo smiled at that. "Sure, I'm fine. A little bored, maybe. We've got an hour and a half until we get home."

Machi raised an eyebrow; It had been barely five minutes since they left Kurain Village's station.

Apollo snorted in laughter, pointing out the window as the train barrelled off the bridge and into the trees of the neighbouring mountain. "Hey, looks like we're on Mitama already. If we didn't have a deadline to get home, I could have shown you the caves."

At that, Machi looked out the window in surprise, searching the wall of rocks they were currently passing. "Caves?"

"Yup," Apollo chuckled, slipping his computer into his bag. " Didn't we mention that earlier? That's why we're forbidden to go up there." Seeing Machi still searching for them, he laughed loudly.
"You'd have to climb a fair way to find the cave entrance; You can't see it from here."

Machi frowned in disappointment, reluctantly tearing his gaze from the window. "Why you...
'forbidden'?" he asked, hoping to guess the meaning of the word from the answer.

Apollo grinned. "The four of us went exploring once," he said. "A bit of a long story. When we got back, Mom made us promise never to go in there ever again. "The smile turned nostalgic as he looked out at the trees, not really seeing them. "Man, that would have been... six years ago? She was just 'Maya' then... wasn't even dating Dad yet."

Machi found himself looking back on his own life: At that time, his eight-year-old self was still living at the Kopunchiville orphanage, though he performed with Lamiroir most nights in the nearby restaurant; He wouldn't move in with her, wouldn't start thinking of her as his aska, until later. "We have time for long story," he pointed out. "What happened?"

"S'pose we do," Apollo agreed, shooting the teen a grin. "Why not?" He shifted in his seat, getting comfortable, and began: "Like I said, all this was six years ago. I don't think we'd been a family for a single year at that point, even... Trucy would've been eight, Luke fifteen and I was probably seventeen. Dad took us up here for Pearly's birthday - she would've been turning nine I think, maybe ten - and, just like you did, Trucy first noticed Mount Mitama on the horizon..."

- Six Years Earlier-

As they stepped off the bus, sixteen-year-old Apollo sighed in relief, glad the lengthy journey up the mountain was finally over. At his side, eight-year-old Trucy looked around at the village in wonder, admiring the summer view just as she had the winter view on their first visit there six months before.
This visit wasn’t as frantic as that one, but just as mysterious; Phoenix had suddenly announced it after all, just over a week ago, and now here they were, ostensibly to celebrate Pearl's tenth birthday.

Fourteen-year-old Luke sighed, leaning against the back of the bus shelter. In his arms, he was tightly hugging the lone photo album that had been returned to him after the car accident, an item
Maya had very specifically insisted he bring, though for what reason Apollo couldn't possibly guess.
Even so, Luke was understandably a bit possessive of the book, and even more so after he’d bailed on watching the fireworks with them on Independence Day. Apollo hoped he was okay, but he felt a bit awkward asking.

Phoenix chuckled as the bus drove off down the road, leaving their path to Fey Manor wide open.
"Ah, Kurain Village. It never changes." Picking up his bag, he casually crossed the road, waving for his kids to follow. "C'mon, we can just go right in. Maya and Pearls will be waiting."

Apollo, Luke and Trucy obediently followed, but Trucy paused halfway across, lingering to watch the back of the bus as it disappeared from view. Apollo, noticing her distraction, stopped to keep an eye on his little sister, seeing her gaze slowly turning upwards to the sky as their brother and father disappeared into the manor behind them. "Wow!" she cried. "There wasn't this nice a view last time we were here!"

Raising an eyebrow, Apollo took a look himself; Indeed, the winter clouds and their associated fog were gone, a clear summer day spread out before them. In the distance, he could even make out the blue-green silhouette of the neighbouring mountain, looming high over the village. "Wow. Didn't realise the next peak over was so close."

Trucy gasped as she turned her attention to it. "Oh yeah, it is! That's so cool!"

A laugh rang out behind them, and the siblings turned to see Maya descending the stairs from Fey Manor's entrance to meet them. "So that's what was holding you two up? Mount Mitama?"

Apollo grinned sheepishly, waving at the woman. "Hello, Maya. Sorry, it's just that it was really cloudy last time we were here."

"Miss Maya, you have an amazing view!" Trucy cried, pointing in the rough direction of the distant peak. "Why didn't you mention that before!?"

Maya laughed, joining the pair and promptly poking the girl in the cheek. "Well, I guess when you see it every morning, you kinda forget about that kind of thing."

Apollo nodded to himself, then quickly stifled the thought process his mind was attempting to follow. "So, uh, it's called Mount Mitama?" he asked, gesturing to the distant mountain, and then to the ground beneath their feet as he added, "What's this mountain called, then?"

Maya snorted. "Depends on who you ask."

"I'm asking you," Apollo pointed out with a smirk.

Before the young woman could reply, a squeal came from behind them, and they turned to see a blur of pink just before Pearl collided with Trucy, the two girls bouncing up and down in glee, shouting "Pearly!" and "Trucy!" as they spun in circles around each other. Behind Pearl, Phoenix and Luke appeared in the doorway, watching the proceedings curiously (in Luke's case) or with great amusement (in Phoenix's case). Although they had both removed their shoes and lost their bags, Luke still hugged his family photo album to his chest.

"Hey, speaking of Mount Mitama," Maya called with a grin, waving to Luke, "it's got your favourite type of moss up there, Luke!"

Luke frowned. "My favourite...? Oh!" Face red, he looked away. "J-just because I know what it's called, doesn't make it my-"

"We're talking about Mount Mitama?" Pearl realised, pausing in her reunion with Trucy to look out at the mountain in the distance. She then turned her grin on the two nearest Wrights. "Did you know the sea is just on the other side?"

"Really?" Apollo asked.

Maya gasped, running towards Phoenix and Luke at the entrance to the manor. "Luke, is that your photo album!?"

Luke hugged the book tighter, twisting to keep it from Maya's grasping fingers. "Yes, this is it," he admitted. "I can show you inside." With that, he turned and went back in, Phoenix and Maya at his
"Oh, I want to see too!" Pearl cried, running after the group. Apollo and Trucy shrugged at each other before following.

We didn't think much of that conversation until later. Pearly's birthday itself the next day was a bit... 'busy'. Let's just say we found out why Mom was so eager to see those photos of Luke's parents, and I showed her the photo we had of Trucy's and my mom too, since that was our first visit after we found out we were half-siblings. By the end of the morning, Mom and Dad had disappeared together somewhere in the manor - and, I'll remind you, they weren't dating yet at this point - and Pearly came looking for where the rest of us had ended up...

Despite the air of hope as they had all promised to search together for their missing mothers, it was hard to deny the three Wright children were feeling down after all the revelations that morning had brought them. They still sat in their row along the raised walkway of the Winding Way, Apollo in the middle with his siblings huddled close on either side, Luke still paging through his photo album. Trucy strained to see Luke's photos as he leisurely mused aloud on the memories associated with them; He was much more relaxed talking about them now, having rushed through a little at Maya's and Pearl's constant questions the previous night, and been distracted by other things on his birthday, leaving his siblings to look through his family photos on their own. Apollo himself sat back and listened, happy for the moment of calm after the rush of finding out their mothers still lived while Luke's father had died... as much as he wished the general mood was much happier, for the sake of his younger siblings; He hated knowing they were sad and there was nothing he could do for them.

Their quiet was interrupted when the nearby door to the Meditation Room slid open, and Pearl poked her head out, smiling as she spotted her cousins nearby. "I found you!" she cried in triumph, cutting off Luke's musings as she padded in her bare feet across the wooden walkway to meet them. She paused in concern as she noticed the trio's solemn expressions. "Are you all doing okay?"

Apollo nodded, one arm around Trucy and the other hand resting on Luke's shoulder. "We're fine, Pearly," he insisted.

Luke forced a smile. "We'll be alright."

Pearl still looked worried, and her eyes drifted away as she silently mused over their response. Apollo would never know the train of thought she followed in that moment, but eventually she grinned and turned her attention back to her cousins. "Hey, remember how you guys were curious about Mount Mitama when you arrived yesterday?"

Apollo blinked at her, thrown by the sudden change of subject; He'd completely forgotten about that conversation after their busy morning... and so had Luke, who frowned in confusion.

Trucy instantly cheered up with a gasp, pushing away from where she'd been leaning against Apollo. "Oh yeah! Didn't Miss Maya say something about Luke's favourite kind of moss?"

At that, Luke paled, hands tightening around his photo album. "U-uh..."

"That's right, she did say something like that," Apollo agreed, turning to Luke with a teasing grin. "I didn't know you had a favourite type of moss, Luke!"

Luke groaned, closing his album. "It's nothing like that," he mumbled, not meeting their eyes. "It's..."
from when we were in Labyrinthia together."

Pearl chewed a thumbnail, frowning in thought. "I don't remember anyone ever mentioning moss in that story before..."

"It wasn't anything important," Luke explained, hugging his book to his chest. "There was phosphorescent moss growing in the ruins. That's what she was referring to."

"Foss-fer-ess-ent?" Pearl repeated, still chewing her thumbnail.

"That means 'glowing', right?" Apollo spoke up.

Pearl gasped. "Oh! Glowing moss!" She grinned. "That grows in the Mount Mitama caves too! Mystic Maya and I used to go down there to look at it when I was little!"

Trucy gasped in excitement, pulling herself to her feet. "Really?!" She dashed around her brothers to join Pearl, grabbing her hands. "Can we see the glowing moss too?"

"If you want, I could take you," Pearl agreed.

"Really?" Apollo asked, pulling himself up to join them; He couldn't deny he was as intrigued as his sister. "It's possible for you to take us off to a neighbouring mountain to explore some caves?"

Pearl nodded, smiling proudly. "It's easy! Mount Mitama is the next train stop over from ours!"

"Cool!" Trucy cried, bouncing on her heels. "Let's go look while Miss Maya and Daddy are busy!"

"Sounds fun," Apollo agreed, grinning. "Shall we?"

The trio were about to run off towards the manor's front door before Luke called "Wait!", pulling himself to his feet. He looked between the three with a worried frown, hugging his photo album to his chest. "Are you sure that's safe? Exploring caves on our own, without even telling anyone?"

Apollo snorted. "Of course it's safe. Pearly said she and Maya used to go there all the time!"

Pearl nodded in agreement. "We only stopped going because we got so busy with training," she said. "Besides, I know the path down to where the glowing moss is; We'll go in, look at it, then come right back out."

"Exactly!" Trucy chirped. "We'll be back before anyone even knows we're gone!"

Apollo and the girls turned to continue their path through into the Meditation Room. They had gotten as far as pulling on their shoes by the front door before they heard hurried footsteps behind them and turned to see Luke running to catch up, carefully placing his photo album on top of the cubby shelves before reaching for his own strapped court shoes. "As the only other one of us who's ever been in a cave," he explained, "I'd better come along to keep an eye on you..."

Apollo hid a smirk, but decided not to comment.
We slipped out of the house, down to the train station, and took the next one headed to the city. Pearly took us off at the next stop over - that station we just passed, actually - and led us up the path there that leads to a lookout over the ocean. Halfway up, there's a smaller path leading into the forest, though there was a sign telling people it was dangerous to follow.

I remember thinking how annoying Luke was being when we saw that sign. "It's dangerous! We shouldn't be doing this! What is wrong with you three!?!" We just laughed at him, told him to stay behind if he was so scared, but he refused to leave us, so he kept following along where Pearly was leading.

I don't remember how long the hike took. It was much easier with Pearly guiding us, since she knew the way. I remember there being a flat area right at the cave entrance, dropping off fast down the slope, kinda like a stage... not that that would have occurred to me at the time - I wasn't a magician yet, though Trucy was teaching me. Anyway, despite Luke's objections, Pearly brought us inside.

The quartet filed in a line down into the depths of the Mitama cave. Pearl was at the head, her hand trailing along the rough wall at their left as she strode confidently into the darkness. Behind her was Trucy, then Apollo, and finally Luke at the back, wringing his hands nervously in the absence of his satchel to grip. "Are you sure you know the way, Pearl? We didn't even bring a torch..."

"Of course I know the way," Pearl happily called over her shoulder. "Once we get deep enough, we won't need a flashlight, because then the moss will be lighting the path."

"I can't wait!" Trucy squeaked.

They wandered in silence for a minute or two, descending deep enough that the light from outside was almost gone. Pearl turned to her left at a dip in the wall, only to stop suddenly, sending Trucy thudding into her back and Apollo very nearly running into Trucy. "Oh," Pearl muttered.

"Oh!?" Luke repeated. "What does that mean!?"
"This passageway has gone," Pearl admitted.

"Gone?" Trucy asked, reaching out a hand into the dark to feel the rough stone in front of her cousin. "How can it be gone?"

Apollo peered through the dim light. He could definitely see the faint outline of what was once another passage, now filled in with long-settled rocks and stones. "Did it... cave in?"

"Cave in!?" Luke squeaked, jumping forward and clinging to the back of Apollo's t-shirt. "Are you saying these caves are unstable!?"

Ignoring the niggling at the back of his neck, Apollo firmly shook his head. "C'mon, we have no idea how long ago this cave-in happened. It could've been ages ago."

"This was the path Mystic Maya and I took to see the moss," Pearl admitted. "This is recent."

That niggling at the back of Apollo's neck was getting harder to ignore.

Trucy scoffed, arms crossing as she turned to Pearl. "You know another way, right? You came down here loads of times!"

Pearl nodded. "Oh, I'm sure we could find a way around," she agreed.

"Th-that's a bad idea!" Luke cried, his voice jumping up an octave. "If this cave has collapsed recently, it's really, seriously unsafe to explore it, especially without anyone knowing where we are!"

"Don't be such a baby, Luke," Trucy replied, waving her brother's concerns off. She turned to Pearl, gesturing down into the pitch-black pathway of the cave. "C'mon, let's keep going! I'm not turning back until I see some glowing moss!"

"Alright," Pearl said, and continued down the path, Trucy at her back.

Apollo paused a moment before following the girls. "Go back if you want to, Luke," he shot over his shoulder, quietly so the girls wouldn't hear him.

Luke fretted to himself for a few seconds more before hurrying after them without a word.

Soon it got too dark to see, and we all ended up having to hold on to the person in front of us so we didn't lose each other. In retrospect, I should have gotten out my phone to light the way, but I guess that just didn't occur to us. Pearly kept us against the wall at all times, telling us when our path ahead was clear, or if some other cave-in had sealed it. Luke got more and more frantic, but he kept quiet, pulling on the back of my shirt. In contrast, Trucy just got irritated, managing to talk Pearly into going on ahead despite all the rest of us having growing reservations about it. Stupidly, I kept telling myself nothing was going to happen, we'd come across the moss any minute now and then we could turn around and get out... and I guess I was as excited about wanting to see it as Trucy. After all, apart from that first cave-in we came across, we had no idea when all those other passages got closed up.

Even so, we really should have listened to Luke's greater experience when it came to exploring caves.
Finally, Pearl stopped in her tracks with a sigh. "Guys? I think I'm lost."

"Lost!" Luke squeaked, pulling his brother's shirt.

"That's fine," Apollo was quick to choke out, his grip on Trucy's cape falling loose to pull the collar of his shirt away from his neck. "We'll just turn around and follow the wall back out." His brother's tugging on his shirt stopped, and Apollo reached out a hand in an attempt to find his sister's cape once more. "We didn't switch sides, did we, Pearly?"

Trucy groaned loudly, and Apollo could tell by where her voice was coming from that she had moved since he'd let go of her. "We're not turning back!" she demanded. "We haven't seen the moss yet!"

"B-but Trucy, we're lost," Pearl pointed out. "What use would it be seeing the moss if we never get back out?"

"We'd find our way out eventually!" Trucy argued, and the trio could hear her boots stomping away from them. "It's a maze, and mazes are puzzles, and Luke's really good with-!"

Trucy's ranting was cut off by a scream and the scraping of stone, echoing around some large, unseen space.

"Trucy!" Apollo and Luke cried in unison, jumping forward towards where they'd heard their sister last.

"H-help!" Trucy replied, fortunately still somewhere close by. "Th-there's a ledge!"

Apollo dropped to his knees on the cold stone, hands stretched out before him as he inched forward. "Keep talking, Truce. Just hang on."

"I'm hanging on as hard as I can already!" Trucy shrieked, beginning to sob in sheer terror. "I don't wanna fall!" Her voice was magnified by the invisible open space behind her, hitting Apollo's heart like a mallet.

"I've got you!" came Luke's voice, from the same direction as Trucy's crying. "Apollo, there's a cliff here. She's hanging on the edge, but I've got her left arm."

Apollo nodded before remembering none of them could see a thing in the pitch-blackness, hence their current predicament. "Right." He moved faster towards the sound of his siblings, and quickly located, in order, Luke's elbow, the cliff edge, and Trucy's right hand barely clinging on to it. Much like he suspected Luke was doing, he lay down on his front over the sheer drop, reaching down to grasp his sister's shoulder with one hand and her arm with the other. "We pull her up on three," he ordered. "You count."

Luke shifted at Apollo's side for a moment, then began: "One... two... three!" With a great heave, they both pulled their sister up by the arms, shifting their hands to under her armpits and pulling themselves up into sitting positions to haul her the rest of the way. The three Wrights ended up in a pile on the floor, the boys on their backs and Trucy belly-down on top of them, and the girl only cried louder, throwing her arms around their necks as she let out the aftermath of her brush with death. Apollo reacted quickly, sitting up again to hug her tight, and Luke did the same; It was only now, with a hand on his sister's head, that Apollo noticed her top hat had fallen off somewhere in the darkness.

A careful shuffling of sandals marked Pearl's approach, and her searching hands quickly collided with the back of Apollo's head before she rested a hand on his shoulder and sat down at their side,
"I'm so sorry... I shouldn't have offered to take you here."

"It's my fault," Luke insisted. "I've been in plenty of caves like this, I should have stopped you coming."

Apollo shook his head. "It's not your fault we didn't listen," he pointed out. "Let's just... get back to Kurain, okay?"

Trucy sniffed, nodding firmly against Apollo's shoulder.

After that scare, we got out of there as quick as we could. I can only guess Truce lost her hat when she slipped off that cliff, and it's a miracle she was able to grab the edge; We never confirmed how far the fall was, but the sound of that echo... That said it all.

Once we emerged back into the light, my phone suddenly started buzzing with a million text messages from Mom and Dad. They'd figured out we'd disappeared, and when we didn't answer, just got scared... understandably. I told them we were safe and heading back, and we'd meet them at Fey Manor real soon; They accepted that at least. The four of us didn't talk amongst ourselves much on the way down the mountain, or on the train... but we had a nasty surprise awaiting us when we got off it at Kurain Station.

"I knew it!"

The quartet nearly recoiled back under the archway as they spotted the angry young woman in purple robes standing near the bus stop outside the train station, hands balled into fists at her hips. "M-Maya!" Apollo cried instinctively; Behind him, Trucy suddenly clung to his shirt, hiding her face in the small of his back.

"M-Mystic Maya, what are you doing here?" Pearl asked, lingering close to Apollo's side, much as Luke was doing opposite her.

"You went to the Mitama caves, didn't you?" Maya barked in reply. "What the hell possessed you to go up there!?"

Apollo didn't even think as he opened his mouth to respond. "This is my fault. Pearly told us about the caves and I wanted to see the glowing moss. The others just tagged along."

To her credit, Maya gave him a disbelieving glare. "Did Pearly tell you why we stopped going there?"

Pearl blinked, confused. "Because... we didn't have the time?"

At that, Maya's anger faded as she stared at her young cousin, her wide eyes giving way to a sympathetic frown. "Oh, Pearly... Aunt Morgan never told you? That wasn't why we stopped."

"It... wasn't?" Pearly asked.

"No," Maya softly replied, shaking her head. Stepping towards the quartet, she sighed. "Aunt Morgan found out what we were doing and gave me a huge talking-to. She made me promise never to take you back up there, then gave me heaps more training to do as punishment. There's a reason that cave was abandoned."
"Abandoned?" Luke repeated. "What do you mean?"

Maya almost laughed, crossing her arms. "Mount Mitama is owned by the Fey family. When Kurain Village was founded, a small temple was set up deep inside the mountain, where all the moss grows... but then a cave-in happened or something, and it was abandoned. The ruins are still in there somewhere."

Luke gazed up through the trees at the neighbouring peak, thoughtful. "Ruins, huh?"

"You got in trouble because it was dangerous?" Apollo asked, noticing Pearl at his side staring guiltily at the ground, her hair-loops drooping. "The caves might collapse?"

Maya nodded, her gaze again turning stern. "And when you lot vanished like that, not answering your phones... What was I supposed to think had happened? You're lucky I remembered we were talking about Mount Mitama yesterday, or I'd've never figured it out!"

Apollo winced. At his back, he felt Trucy's hands shift to his side, peeking out under his arm to whisper, "Does Daddy know?"

"I haven't told him anything," Maya answered. "I didn't want him to worry if I didn't know for sure." She then frowned, leaning over slightly to get a better look at the brown head. "Trucy, where's your hat? Did you lose it in the caves?"

Trucy began to tear up, then pressed tight against her brother.

"It was my fault," Apollo again insisted, quickly speaking up before anyone else could. "I didn't keep hold of her in the darkness and Trucy nearly fell off a ledge. We came right back out, though."

"N-no, it was my fault!" Luke cried. "I knew the caves were dangerous, but I didn't try harder to stop them all going in!"

"The whole thing was my idea anyway!" Pearl added, hands pressed to her face as she held back tears. "I just wanted to cheer everyone up after this morning!"

Eyes wide, Maya quickly stepped forward, pulling Trucy out from behind Apollo and drawing her, then the other four, into a hug. "No, no, don't all take the blame yourselves..." She looked down at Trucy, held tight under one arm. "Are you hurt at all?"

Trucy sniffed, shaking her head against Maya's obi.

Maya sighed in relief, then looked between the other three with a stern gaze. "Alright, I'm going to cut a deal with you. Do you all promise never to go into those caves ever again? Not even for a second?"

At that, Maya's face softened into a smile. "Then I promise not to mention this to Nick. We don't want him worrying, and no-one got hurt after all."

The four kids laughed in relieved agreement, then all pressed together for one more hug. Trucy's tears had finally dried.

- Six Years Later -
Apollo grinned as his story came to an end. "I joke, but I'm sorry to say I have no intention of taking you into those caves. It's too dangerous, and I promised Mom I'd never go back." His smile faded as he turned to Machi. "But that's no kind of cue for you to try and wander in there alone. There's no guarantee you won't get trapped, or badly hurt, like Trucy almost was."

Machi hurriedly shook his head. "I won't go to cave," he promised.

Apollo stared a moment, then smiled, satisfied. "Mom told Dad we'd been exploring in the forest and wandered out of cell-phone range. I'm pretty sure he still doesn't know... and he never will. We'll never give him a reason to."

Machi nodded in agreement.

View the Court Record
Despite the allure of a cemetery to the west, Alfendi decided upon being asked that he wanted to go back over the eastern bridge and go the long way around to the library; Madame Bonte had taken the orphans towards the western bridge after all, and he was obviously wary about going in the same direction as them.

As they walked, Lamiroir passed on who Madame Bonte was, and everything she’d told of the arena and its connection to the Gramaryes.

"How strange," Flora pointed out. "I mean, we're friends with Apollo and Trucy - Magnifi was their grandfather, which I suppose makes Gaia their grandmother - and we happen across a town so closely connected to their family?"

"And Valant Gramarye planned the illusion in my last concert," Lamiroir added. "It's almost a shame I can't contact him to ask what he knows."

"Likely nothing," Hershel said, holding his son's hand tighter as they crossed the bridge. "I must confess, I've done some research into the Gramaryes myself, and Magnifi was already a single father by the time he took on apprentices. I don't imagine the Wrights will know much about their ties to Borginia either."

Flora held her arms behind her back as they ambled down the pavement. "So... this was a total coincidence? Happening across their grandmother's hometown?"

"Obviously," Alfendi said, rolling his eyes; Despite his attitude, all else present were happy to see him somewhat returning to normal after the incident earlier. "This doesn't even have anything to do with Lamiroir's past!"

Hershel chuckled. "It would seem so," he agreed. "Let's hurry to the library then, and refocus on our investigation."

As they had established yesterday, Kopunchiville's library was in the centre of town, opposite the town hall. It wasn't a particularly grand building - certainly not when compared to the one immediately across the road - but it was very big, made of rough local stone and clearly well kept over the decades it had existed. A handful of people were dotted around outside, several with books in their hands, but two in particular shifted as they noticed the family approaching, moving to join them with a wave.

"Hey everyone!" Emmy called. "How was south of the river?"

Sycamore's smile faded as he saw the awkward looks cross everyone's faces, their eyes glancing at Alfendi as the boy pressed close to Hershel's side. "Did something happen?"

"We had a small upset," Hershel explained. "Learned a few interesting things. Maybe we will take you down there later to see for yourselves."
"I ran into an old friend," Lamiroir picked up. "She was telling me about the old grass arena there, how this town used to be closely associated with the Gramaryes."

Emmy's eyebrows shot up. "Oh yes, I forgot all about that!"

Flora frowned. "You already knew?"

Chuckling in embarrassment, Emmy nodded. "I was looking into all those Borginian articles about Kopunchiville, remember? I came across a few mentions of the Gramaryes performing here; This was their hometown or something, right?"

"In a sense," Lamiroir replied.

Sycamore shook his head. "Well, we've been doing our own research, looking into this 'Geary' person," he said, shooting a glare at nothing in particular.

"Any luck?" Hershel asked.

"Unfortunately, no," Sycamore growled. "We were able to extract permission to go through the town records, but there's no trace of anyone by that name ever living here."

"We even looked up the house Lamiroir used to live in, and its history," Emmy added. "It was registered under her name in 2017, but before that it was owned by an Ami Ystava."

Lamiroir frowned. "Ami Ystava?"

Emmy nodded, watching her closely. "It it familiar?"

After a short pause, Lamiroir shook her head. "I'm sorry, no."

Hershel hummed in thought, his free hand on his chin. "Could this Miss or Missus Ystava be related to Geary? A wife perhaps, or a sister?"

"It could be Lamiroir's name," Flora suggested, shrugging as she turned to the singer. "I know you didn't find it familiar, but..."

"It is possible, yes," Lamiroir agreed. "It's certainly not a terrible name. I wouldn't object to it."

Hershel was unconvinced. "I want to do some more research before we make any decisions."

"Agreed," Sycamore added, gesturing to the library doors. "We'll take you in."

The second storey of the building was open to view as they came in under the entrance archway just beyond the doors inside. Tall bookshelves lined the walls, separating both floors into sections and hallways that hid the sheer length of the library's space. Sycamore led the group in to the reception desk on one side, waving politely at the woman behind the desk. "Us again."

Emmy scoffed at him, stepping forward. In Borginian, she struck up conversation with the librarian. "We're back. Could you kindly let us back into the records room, Madame?"

The woman sniffed, regarding the group. "I'm afraid I can't let all of you in at once, and especially not any children. Those records are fragile."

"Oh, we understand that," Emmy replied, shooting a glance back at Alfendi standing by his father's side. "How many of us specifically can come in, then?"

The librarian thought a moment. "Three."

Emmy nodded, turning back to the group. She took a deep breath, wondering how to break the news.

Lamiroir decided to come to her rescue. "Obviously Professor Layton should be one of the three she is allowing in," she said. "Either yourself or Mister Sycamore should be the second, Emmy."

"Only three of us are allowed in?" Flora asked.

Sycamore sighed, arms crossed. "Naturally, they didn't tell us that earlier."

Hershel thought a moment, then turned to Alfendi with a smile. "You'll have to stay with your sister for a while, Alfendi. Would that be alright?"

The boy gave the proposition great thought, then nodded, releasing his father's hand from his grip. "Okay, Papa." Flora smiled as she rested a hand on his shoulder.

"And I think you are the vital third person who should join us, Lamiroir," Hershel continued. "This is all about you, and anything we find I should like to be able to present to you immediately."

"In which case, I'd better come to show you where we found what we have," Sycamore added, then turned to Emmy. "I imagine Flora and Alfendi will be needing someone who speaks Borginian with them."

Emmy grinned. "Sounds like a plan!"

As the two women wandered off with Alfendi to find any books in English, the librarian led Lamiroir and the two men to a dark corner of the library, where a single locked door stood in a nondescript wall. She unlocked it for them and then left, leaving it to Sycamore to take the lead inside; He flipped on a light switch and waved for his brother and the singer to follow him down one of the lines of drawers, to one that had been left slightly ajar. "Here are the property files for that area of town," he explained, pulling it open fully. "I'm not so good with written Borginian myself, but I can at least read names on forms."

Hershel nodded. "I imagine you and Emmy were going to look for anything else owned by Ami Ystava before you came out to meet us?"

Sycamore smirked. "Of course we were; You know us too well."

Lamiroir stepped forward, peering down into the folders of files in the drawer. "There is a lot to go through..."

"Indeed there is," Sycamore agreed. "We were just finishing going through this when we left off."

As Hershel had trouble with Borginian script, he couldn't do much to look through the files himself, so he ended up sitting back and directing the other two as they went through the drawers, searching for any trace of either 'Geary' or 'Ami Ystava'; Leaving Sycamore to the property registers, Hershel took Lamiroir across to another row of shelves, stacked with old newspapers.

"We need to find around 2001 or so, and work backwards from there. There's an item that would have been reported on I want to check; An obituary."
"Obituary?" Lamiroir repeated, eyeing the numbers on the shelves to find the requested date. "Of who?"

"Gaia Gramarye," Hershel replied, a small smile on his lips. "Call it a hunch, but I think she may be important."

Lamiroir soon fell into the monotony of flipping through the old papers, scanning the endless names, and the back of her mind began to wander: Was Ami Ystava her real name? She didn't think she could be sure either way, but something told her it wasn't. Surely something as big as her name would trigger something, wouldn't it? But, then again, 'Uncle Geary' had not triggered anything either (as 'right' as the phrase felt to say), and neither had years of idly studying the bracelet on her wrist with her fingers. Was it only her sight that could break down the steel door to her memories? And why did Hershel think Gaia Gramarye was important? What did the Gramaryes have to do with anything?

Finally, Lamiroir's eyes stopped their roving, jumping back to a name at the top of the page. "Gaelle Gramarye," she read aloud.

Hershel paused from his slow pacing of the hallway, looking back. "You found her?"

"December, 1990," Lamiroir replied, glancing up to see the date. She pulled the article closer, translating the text to continue, "Gaelle Gramarye, nee Takala, passed away last week in her home in Kopunchiville of complications from cancer. Known to her friends as Gaia, she grew up in Kopunchiville Orphanage and left town to seek her fortune, but Gaia's hometown was always close to her heart and she frequently returned as part of Troupe Gramarye before being forced to retire when her health became poor, and finally failed. Her funeral was held yesterday in the Etelaranta Cemetery. She is survived by her family, husband Magnifi and daughter Thalassa, and her closest friends, Winfred and Lalu."

Hershel concentrated on Lamiroir's words as she spoke, frowning. Once she had finished, he paused, then his expression turned to a smile. "Thank you for your help, Lamiroir."

Before Lamiroir could reply, ask him if the obituary was at all helpful, a shout came from above the shelves: "I found something!" She and Hershel exchanged shocked looks before rushing around the shelves to find their way back to the property registers.

Sycamore was clutching a form tightly in his hands, and looked up triumphantly as the pair arrived. "Ami Ystava owns another building," he announced, holding the form out for them to see.

Hershel gave it only a cursory glance, unable to read the script. "Where is it?"

"Ru Pojinen," Sycamore replied. "Not too far away."

"Pojinen?" Lamiroir repeated, eyes wide as she took the form to study herself. "At... number ten?"

The brothers watched her closely. "You know it?" Hershel asked.

Lamiroir nodded. "It's right across from the orphanage. Machi used to speak of it: the haunted house."

Sycamore scoffed. "Childish rumours, no doubt."

Hershel shot him a glare, a signal to be quiet, then returned his gaze to the singer. "Do you know anything else about it?"
"Only that it's supposed to be abandoned," Lamiroir replied, handing the form back to Sycamore. "The children would talk of hearing wailing at night or seeing faces at the windows, and would dare each other to break in... but the windows were all barred and the door had a puzzle-lock they couldn't solve."

Sycamore chuckled, giving Hershel a knowing look. "Sounds like just our cup of tea."

"There was one more thing," Lamiroir added. "The word was that the ghosts there came from the arena."

"The arena?" HersHEL repeated, holding a hand to his chin in thought. "And you said earlier the last caretaker abandoned it..." His gaze turned to the shelves around them. "Might there be a way to identify him?"

Sycamore rolled his eyes. "I hardly think this is a lead worth chasing."

"I respectfully disagree," Hershel replied with a smile. "Every lead is worth chasing."

Sycamore huffed, moving to replace the property form in its drawer.

Lamiroir turned her attention to the drawers around them. On a hunch, she moved to one yet untouched by Sycamore and pulled it open, scanning the files within.

"Lamiroir?" Hershel called.

A moment later, the singer smiled. "Here we are." She pulled out a form, showing it to the two men. "The arena is owned by its caretaker, as I thought."

Hershel adjusted his hat, looking proud.

Sycamore raised a sceptical eyebrow as he took the form to examine. "Alright then, this arena is owned by..." His face paled, his eyes wide as he turned towards his brother in disbelief. "How did you...!?"

The other man only blinked blankly. "How did I what?"

"It's..." Sycamore shook the paper in his hand. "It's owned by Ami Ystava."

Lamiroir gasped, a hand to her mouth. "It is?"

Hershel slowly smiled. "That's not what I was expecting, but it's very convenient."

Sycamore gave him a dark look. "Convenient," he repeated with a haughty air. "How is this convenient?"

"I was hoping to ask the caretaker if they knew Ystava or Geary," Hershel explained with a smile. "Obviously, as said caretaker is Ystava, they do."

Groaning in disgust, Sycamore tossed the form into the air, where Lamiroir hurriedly caught it. "And how did you know to ask the caretaker?"

Hershel chuckled. "The children of the orphanage believed Ten Ru Pojinen was tied to the arena. I doubted they would have come up with that idea for no reason."
Lamiroir thought as she carefully returned the form to its place in the drawer. "I suppose one of them recognised a face in the window from seeing Ystava at the arena."

"My thoughts exactly," Hershel agreed.

Sycamore groaned again, rolling his eyes. Finally, with a flutter of his cape, he pushed past them towards the door. "Let's just get on with this investigation, shall we?"
The Siren's Secret, Running

Chapter Notes

Okay guys, a certain important event is coming up soon (I think we all know what), so I'm just gonna warn you:

In one week from now, I will no longer be marking potential spoilers for Spirit of Justice.

The chapter going up exactly a week from this one's uploading will be the last to feature a warning. I'm sorry to anyone who has yet to finish the game and still wants to go in knowing nothing, but continuing to mark spoilers for individual chapters after that point would just be unfeasible, and I do have to stop marking them eventually anyway.

September 14, 8:53AM
Kopunchiville Library

Flora held her brother's hand tight as they followed Emmy up the stairs to the second floor of the library. According to the signs, the foreign-language section was supposed to be up here, and she hoped there would be something interesting for them to read while they waited... Maybe some kids books for Alfendi, or at least a murder mystery or two (a genre the both of them adored). An encyclopaedia would do in a pinch, especially if it was illustrated. If all else failed, they could just pick out some picture books from the regular children's section to look at.

At the top of the stairs, Flora noticed on her right a cosy corner had been set up, with chest-height shelves and several beanbags dotting the floor. "That looks comfy, doesn't it?"

Emmy paused, looking over to see what had caught Flora's eye. "Oh, that must be the kids books." Alfendi pulled out of his sister's hand, running across the carpet and throwing himself with a laugh on top of the nearest beanbag.

The girls giggled, shooting each other amused looks. "Y'know, I always did the same thing when I was his age," Emmy whispered. "Uncle Leon used to get so mad..."

"We didn't have beanbags in Saint Mystere," Flora mused, her smile fading. "I kind of feel like I missed out, now..."

"They're not all that exciting; The fun wears off after a minute or two," Emmy assured her, patting her friend's shoulder. "They are comfortable, though."

Alfendi's giggling, and the sound of his bouncing around on the beanbag, came to a sudden halt, and Flora instantly turned her attention to see why: A small face had appeared around the corner of the nearest shelf, followed by a small body... a little girl in a green dress, watching Alfendi with a grin as he stared back at her with wide eyes. She giggled, waving. "Talus!"

Flora smiled; 'Talus' was the one and only Borginian word she knew, the all-purpose 'hello' and 'goodbye' of the language. Leaning forward, she gestured to her brother. "Say 'talus' back, Alfendi."

Alfendi only continued to stare, lying as he was with his belly on the beanbag.

The girl's grin faded into a concerned frown. "Sopiko?"

Flora and Emmy exchanged worried glances, wondering if they should step forward, but their wondering was cut short by the rustle of the sack of styrofoam as Alfendi rolled off the beanbag and took off, running right past his sister and into the nearest row of shelves. "Alfendi!" Flora cried, making a failed grab for the boy as he passed before running off after him. "Alfendi, come back!"

Alfendi didn't pause, and Flora found to her surprise that he was incredibly speedy when he put his mind to it, weaving between rows and even doubling back with u-turns in clear attempts to lose his pursuer; Flora would have been impressed if she weren't so concerned about catching him as soon as possible. She ran until her lungs burned for air, until she rounded a corner and could see no trace of where her little brother had disappeared, until she looked around and realised she had no idea how to make her way back to the stairs where she'd left Emmy behind.

Flora was lost.

Biting back the fear that Alfendi was all alone somewhere in that suddenly-enormous building, Flora leaned against one of the heavy shelves of books, pulling out her phone.

"Emmy? I've lost Alfendi and now I'm lost too ;_;.

Hold on, we'll come find you
I've teamed up with that little girl who scared Alfendi. Her name's Ihana. She's offered to help us look for him

She knows where he might be? .

Says she hangs out here all the time and knows all the best places to hide :) We'll find him in no time.
And you too, of course
Just stay put, we'll be there in a flash

Thank you Emmy :) .

It took about five minutes for the cavalry to arrive and rescue Flora, who greeted Emmy with a hug. With her was the girl in the green dress, Ihana, although the only way Flora could talk to her was through Emmy. She seemed a nice girl though, and she promptly led the two women through the books to an open space between sections, where there were railings set up for a big heavy curtain of some kind, likely designed to form a temporary wall if one was needed. It was stowed away at the moment against a bookshelf, and, chattering in her native Borginian, Ihana ran straight there to pull aside the mass of crimson fabric and reveal a boy in a blue cape huddled within.

Alfendi noticed Ihana with a squeak and ran off again without a word.

Emmy grabbed Flora's arm before the younger woman had a chance to get lost once again, and Flora had to blink back tears as she saw her friend's questioning look. Even Ihana looked a little guilty as she led the women on to her next hiding place, a seating area in the next section, where they found Alfendi hiding under a bench.
This time, Alfendi saw the group coming and ran off before Flora could even begin to try and chase him.

Emmy's frown deepened. "Flora. I don't think he's going to stop running." She turned her intense reporter's glare on the younger woman. "What happened this morning?"

Flora winced; She hadn't wanted to be the one to explain this. "It was my fault... There were some kids there, from the orphanage, and I pushed Alfendi to go play with them, but they just grabbed him and tried to shove him in this old abandoned hut there..." She pressed her hands to her eyes, holding back tears. "This is all my fault..."

A hand rested on Flora's shoulder, Emmy's, and she heard her friend quietly talking to the young girl in Borginian. None of the words made sense, but their exchange continued for maybe a minute or so before Flora finally moved her hands away from her eyes to watch them.

Emmy looked up with a small smile. "Ihana was actually telling me earlier about one of the boys at the orphanage: Brutus. Apparently he has a reputation as a bit of a bully, and he's a little older than Alfendi too, so he'd have no trouble pushing the kid around." She paused then grimaced apologetically as she realised the implications of what she said, hurriedly moving on to gesture in the direction said child had disappeared. "As for Alfendi... we have a plan for him."

Ihana grinned proudly as she skipped off into the shelves, beckoning for Flora to follow. "Sera mina!"

This time, the girl led the two women to the end of a row leading to another between-sections seating area. She tugged on Emmy's sleeve, signalling the reporter to lean down, then whispered something in her ear. Emmy shot her a grin and whispered a reply, then straightened and turned to Flora. "C'mon, he's probably over here." Waving for her friend to follow, Emmy went on ahead, while Ihana waved encouragingly from where she stood, making no move to join them.

This particular seating area had a ring of large plants in equally large pots right in the centre; In between them was a tiny gap, and as Flora got closer, she spotted a familiar mess of red hair hiding within. Squeaking in shock, Flora left Emmy behind as she dashed to the pots, peering through the greenery to her little brother. "Alfendi?"

Yellow eyes shone in Flora's direction for a moment or two, then an azure blur dashed out of the white pots and latched on to her waist. "Flora!"

Clinging tight to her brother, Flora sank to the carpeted floor, Alfendi almost in her lap. "Oh 'Fendi, you scared me so much, running off like that! Why didn't you stay with us?"

Alfendi sniffed, burying his face in her shoulder. "'M sorry... I thought that girl..."

"There wasn't any girl in a green dress at the arena, was there?" Flora gently pointed out. "She's been here at the library the whole time, same as Emmy and Uncle." She paused, a worrying thought occurring to her. "All this running away... It wasn't because of those kids from the orphanage, was it?"

The boy was quiet for a long moment. "No one ever wants to play with me," he whimpered into her dress. "I'm never going to get any friends because no one likes me."

Flora froze, unable to speak. Her own words from back at the arena echoed in her head.

"Now come on, don't be shy! Don't you want to make friends?"
The possibility that Alfendi, just being who he was, would be unable to connect to other children his age was a fear Flora and Hershel had endlessly and privately fretted about when first sending him to school. In the end though, despite the occasional confrontation with a teacher who misinterpreted the boy's passions as disrespect or some sign of an unstable mind (one had tried to accuse Hershel to his face of abuse, but luckily the charges were quickly blown off for the exaggeration they were), he never seemed to have any problems with the other children. Even though Alfendi still had yet to make any close friends, he never stopped being his happy self at home. Flora and Hershel had dismissed their own concerns as without merit, but had that happiness been a mask this whole time? Had Alfendi, just like Hershel, hid the pain of rejection at school behind a grin and buried himself in the things he loved to suppress his problems? He had just started a new year of school two weeks ago; Had something happened that cemented these issues in his mind? It broke Flora's heart that she had never even considered this possibility before. Blinking back tears, she hugged her brother tighter.

"Oh, 'Fendi, that's not true. Papa and I like you, and Uncle, and Emmy, and Luke-"

"You don't count, you have to like me," Alfendi muttered with sniff. "And you're all old. No one my age ever likes me."

Flora blinked back tears as she pressed a kiss to her little brother's forehead. She couldn't think of anything to say in reply.

Footsteps nearby make the young Laytons look up, and they saw Emmy and Ihana standing hand in hand about a metre or so away; To his credit, Alfendi made no move to run this time. "Alfendi, this is Ihana," Emmy said, gesturing to the girl. "She wanted to say sorry for scaring you."

Alfendi studied the girl carefully, then sniffed, rubbing at his nose. "Thank you."

Emmy translated for the girl, who nodded. Letting go of the older woman's hand, Ihana cheerily gave Emmy a reply, then skipped off, waving to the group as she called, "Talus!"

"She says she hopes things get better for you," Emmy explained, her eyes flicking to Flora. "Both of you."

Flora felt fresh tears spilling down her cheeks as she hugged her brother tight. "Me too." Once all this was over, she and Alfendi had a very serious discussion with their father to organise.
Lamiroir, Hershel and Sycamore had to wait a while at the library reception before Emmy, Flora and Alfendi came down to meet them. Hershel gave his children a concerned look as they approached, hands tightly clinging together, but Alfendi seemed as muted as he had before and Flora only gave them a cheery smile; He ultimately said nothing.

The group headed out to the streets; It wasn't too hard to get to Ru Pojinen, requiring a turn to the left then to the right, and a straight walk to find number ten. Hershel and Sycamore filled the girls in on what they had found in the library as they walked, so everyone was caught up on the investigation... although Flora remained rather quiet, the polite smile still pasted on her face. Alfendi seemed equally silent until he tugged on Lamiroir's dress a little way along their journey.

"Lamiroir? I need to update my map for you again."

"Of course," the singer told him, handing over the paper of pencil scribbles.

A few blocks north of the town centre, Lamiroir noticed a large building on the other side of the road, coming ever nearer to them as they stopped at the quiet intersection it was nestled by. A young teenager sat on the step, a sketchbook in her lap and a pencil in hand. The building itself looked like a converted house, additions made over the years to extend it as the number of charges it took on grew; The white paint peeled a bit on the older sections, but the wood panelling was otherwise kept neat, if a little patchwork, and brightly coloured curtains were visible in the windows, tied back with cheerful bows.

Their group crossed the road, and Hershel called them all to a halt. "Number ten should be coming up," he announced. "Naturally, no matter what we may find, it would be unwise for all of to try and go in."

"Agreed," Sycamore replied. "Ystava or Geary may be inside, and we can make no guess on their mental states or willingness to co-operate... There is still this connection with the arena to worry about as well."

Emmy turned to Lamiroir. "Shall I act as translator again, or would you rather do that yourself, Lamiroir?"

The singer pondered for a moment, her gaze turning to the building across the road. "Actually, I have other business I need to attend to, at the orphanage." She bowed her head. "My apologies."

"None necessary, ma'am," Hershel replied, shaking his head with a smile.

Alfendi cried in surprise, handing the singer back his hand-drawn map. "Here you go, Lamiroir! I'm done!"

"Thank you, Alfendi," Lamiroir told the boy, smiling as she took the paper. "I'm sure it will be a lot of help."

"You have business to attend to?" Flora repeated, watching Lamiroir curiously. "What kind of “business?”

Lamiroir shook her head. "I'm afraid it's personal... something I've been unable to do for a long time." Once Flora made an 'oh' with her mouth, the singer promptly turned and made to cross the road. "I'll be in touch when I am done, Professor Layton."

"We'll see you later!" Emmy called after her.

Flora's grip on Alfendi's hand tightened a little, and she couldn't help checking that the road was indeed clear as Lamiroir crossed, heading straight for the large building opposite. Her own feet were moving on autopilot at the tug of her brother's hand in hers, following the rest of their family as they proceeded to finding number ten. After what had happened at the arena, and in the library, Flora couldn't help but feel a spike of fear at their group splitting up yet again... and what was Lamiroir planning to do at the orphanage, anyway? She could only watch as the woman in the white dress spoke to the teenager on the step, then pushed open the door and disappeared inside.

"Did you see that!?"

Flora's head abruptly spun back to the ongoing conversation at Alfendi's shout, seeing her brother pointing excitedly up at the two-storey house they were now stood in front of; It was probably about as old as the oldest section of the orphanage opposite, but lacked the additions or the care and upkeep of the aging mansion. Its wooden outer walls were unpainted, a vine growing steadily up one side, and the windows were all grimy and dark, barred with iron on the ground floor. A mailbox sat near the road, tipping over at a severe angle; On its side were the rusted numbers '1' and '0'.

Number ten.
Ystava's house.

Everyone else was looking up at the house too, eyes searching for whatever Alfendi was pointing at. "See what?" Sycamore asked.

"In the window!" Alfendi cried, pointing more insistently at the upper floor. "There was an old man there!"

Hershel and Sycamore reacted instantly, eyebrows shooting up as they gave each other a look.

"It must be Geary," Emmy said, and charged down the overgrown path to the front door of the house. Before anyone could object, she had thrown up one leg in a roundhouse kick and firmly landed the sole of her boot next to the steel doorhandle. Despite the loud thud, the door did nothing more than shake in its frame, the hinges and large lock rattling from the attack. Emmy huffed as she registered her failure, examining the doorhandle more carefully as Hershel and Sycamore ran up behind her; Flora kept Alfendi by the mailbox, where it was safe. "Looks like a puzzle-lock," Emmy announced. "A sliding-block one, move this bit over here to open it... It's built into the door, so we'd have to solve it to get in."

Hershel wasn't so sure, pulling at the brim of his top hat as he looked up to the top floor windows. "We know this house isn't as abandoned as we'd heard," he said. "It would be poor form to just break in without even attempting to get the attention of its resident."

Sycamore scoffed. "He would have seen us through the window, and I think it would have been hard to miss Emmy's unique knock just now." Leaning down, he turned his attention to the lock. "If he was going to let us in, he'd have alerted us so already."

Hershel still looked unsure.

"He has a point, Professor," Emmy said. "Geary and Ystava are clearly running some kind of underground life here, keeping themselves so separate from the rest of the town. The only way we're going to talk to them is if we fight for it."

Flora looked around to the nearby intersection, at the road that ran perpendicular to Ru Pojinen. "Isn't the Restaurant de Chanson down that street?"

Alfendi shook his head, pointing back towards the town centre. "Next one down." He grinned. "I'll show you on Lamiroir's map when she gets back!"

"No, that's alright," Flora replied. "I was just thinking, if it's so close... Why did they have to buy another house for Lamiroir? They just dumped her on Mister Salinen."

Hershel nodded in agreement. "A very good question, Flora. We shall have to ask Geary that when we meet him."

A few moments later, the lock in Sycamore's hands opened with a click, and he straightened up, gesturing to the lock with a proud grin. "Thank you, thank you, I'm here all week."

Ignoring his brother's preening, Hershel stepped forwards, resting a hand on the handle. After a short pause, he pushed it down and the door swung open.

An empty hallway. On one side, stairs led up to the first floor, while doorways to other rooms lined the walls either side. It was surprisingly clean and dust-free, the one indication the house was being actively lived in. There was no sign of the man Alfendi had seen in the window.

Without a word, Emmy dashed past Hershel into the house, giving the doorways around her cautious glances before disappearing up the stairs. A few moments later, she hopped back down, looking confused. "There's no-one here."

Hershel and Sycamore shared another glance, then both entered after her, giving the ground floor a sweep of their own.

Flora nervously approached the door, Alfendi's hand in hers, unsure if she should follow them in or not. "Did he slip out the back?"

Emmy shrugged. "Upstairs is empty, and he's unlikely to have gone out a window."

"Then where is he?" Alfendi asked, confused. "Magic isn't real, so he can't have disappeared!"

Sycamore and Hershel returned to the hallway, faces stern. "He's definitely not here, and there's no back door," Sycamore agreed, meeting his brother's gaze. "Shall I head to the arena?"

Hershel nodded. "A good idea. Emmy, Flora," he turned to face the two women, "you two go with him. Alfendi, you stay here with me."

Flora and Emmy shared a surprised look.

"O-k-o-kay," Alfendi hurriedly responded, pulling out of Flora's grip to run to his father's side. "But, um, isn't this house abandoned, Papa?"

"Maybe so," Hershel admitted, taking his son's hand with a small smile. "But, with the two of us together, for the cause of an investigation... we can break that rule just this once."

Alfendi thought a moment, then nodded.

Sycamore gave the boy a proud smile. "We shall meet up later, my bravest little nephew," he said, then turned a more serious look to Hershel. "But we should hurry to the arena. Contact us if you find anything."

"The same to you," Hershel replied.

"Naturally, Professor," Emmy said, grinning widely as she gave her friend a mock salute.

Sycamore waved towards the door. "Ladies?" With that, he strode out, his cape flapping behind him.

Flora gave her family a nervous wave before following the much-more-confident Emmy back to the road, heading back down south towards the river. Memory of the town's layout told her going straight would take them to the western bridge, and across to the arena there... though she wasn't sure why they were going. After what had happened that morning, she wasn't particularly wary about going back there, not like Alfendi was, but she hated the idea of leaving either her father or brother behind, for any reason... and her protective instinct over Alfendi after all the pain he'd suffered that morning wasn't helping.

"Are you alright, Flora?"

Flora blinked, looking up to meet the concerned gaze of her uncle. She opened her mouth to answer, but couldn't bring herself to lie, so just stared guiltily at her feet.

"If you're worried about Alfendi," Emmy spoke up, "I don't think you need to. The Professor will
"I know he will," Flora replied, "it's just..." She sighed, shaking her head as the real cause of her shock occurred to her. "I thought the Professor had outgrown sending me away when he thought it was too dangerous..."

To Flora's surprise, Sycamore responded with a laugh, resting a hand on her shoulder; she turned her gaze from her shoes to see him giving her a fond look. "Flora, if my brother was trying to keep you out of danger, he'd have told you to stay with him."

Flora blinked in surprise. "He... would?"

Emmy gasped in sudden realisation. "Of course! Desmond's got his sword, and I'm pretty good at physical combat..." She mimed a few punches, grinning with pride. "That's why we're heading to the arena, because Geary might have fled there after we broke into his house!"

"Exactly," Sycamore replied. "My brother and nephew will look for clues in the house, and the three of us will hopefully cut Geary or Ystava off at the pass, before they can get too far away."

Flora couldn't help but smile at that. "Maybe without having to threaten anyone with violence, though."

"Oh, of course," Emmy replied, waving off Flora's concern. "That's just a back-up, if they don't co-operate." She shot her friend a grin.

Giggling, Flora nodded. Her worries about her little brother weren't entirely gone, but she was glad in the meantime that she could be useful to her father in some other way.
"Where are we looking first, Papa?"

Hershel considered as the footsteps of Sycamore, Emmy and Flora disappeared down the road. "We may as well start at the top, I suppose," he decided, "and work our way down." Turning to the door, he fiddled with the handle, confirming it was much easier to unlock from the inside than the outside. "And we'd better close the door; Don't want anyone else wandering in, after all."

Alfendi nodded, a serious frown on his face. "But it's their own fault if they break the rule about going into an abandoned house," he said. "It's dangerous."

"Indeed," Hershel agreed, a small smile on his face; He was glad that particular rule had been instilled in Alfendi at an early age, given how many hazardous archaeological sites the boy had ended up visiting before the age of five. He closed the front door, then reached out to take his son's hand. "Upstairs first."

Alfendi nodded, happily leading the way up the nearby staircase.

There was less floor-space upstairs than downstairs, though wasn't immediately obvious just looking at the three doorways visible at the top of the stairs. The first led to a bedroom, sparse except for an old mattress on a rusted bed-frame, and dusty enough to make Alfendi cough as they peeked their heads in the door; It was clear whoever lived here didn't use the room, so they moved on. The second door led to a bathroom, a rather large one that had clearly been designed for use by someone who was wheelchair-bound, given the low sink, the railing by the toilet, and the lack of a lip at the shower entrance.

"Do you think that old man I saw uses a wheelchair, Papa?" Alfendi asked.

"He might," Hershel admitted.

Alfendi frowned, looking back towards the front door. "Then how does he get up and down the stairs?"

Hershel also looked back, and smiled. "A good point. I suppose he doesn't, then."

"Then why is the bathroom set up like that?" Alfendi continued, gesturing at the room in question. "How'd anyone in a wheelchair get up and down the stairs to use this?"

"I imagine there used to be a wheelchair lift," Hershel reasoned, examining the wall alongside the stairs for any marks of a removed contraption and finding none. "Whoever it was may have also had a friend to help them."

Alfendi frowned, but didn't have any more questions.

The last of the three doors on the top floor led to a second bedroom, a little smaller than the first. This one was also a lot cleaner, mostly free of dust and regularly used. The bed was neatly made, and a desk in the corner featured a pair of photo frames sitting against the wall, and a small remote control of some kind. Alfendi immediately ran to investigate the desk, and Hershel wasn't far behind him, both turning their attention to the two photos the owner of the house had thought to display.

On the left, the smaller frame held an old photo, black and white, of two pre-teen boys sitting on a low wall, arms slung over each other's shoulders as they grinned wide for the camera. The format was not kind to one of the boys, who sported a dark skin tone that almost silhouetted his face around his eyes and mouth; He was dressed in a cape, a stark contrast to the other boy's more casual wear. At his best guess, looking at the photo itself and the style of the lighter-skinned boy within it, Hershel had to say it was from the fifties or sixties... somewhere between sixty and seventy years old.

The photograph on the right was much newer, bright colours and bold styles marking it as from the mid-eighties, only forty years old. It appeared to feature the same two boys from the other photo, now grown men in their thirties, their arms slung over a younger woman stood between them, holding a baby in her arms. The darker-skinned man was still in a dark cape, though now sported a thick pair of sideburns, and the lighter-skinned man was loosely holding a screwdriver in one hand, a hammer visible sticking out of a pocket. All three gave the camera happy grins, the baby in the woman's arms sucking on a fist.

Alfendi pointed at the photo on the right. "She looks familiar."

"You think so?" Hershel asked.

"Yep." Alfendi held a hand to his chin, almost a perfect imitation of his father. "I think she looks like Lamiroir. Maybe she's related."

Hershel smiled. "A logical deduction. I was thinking the same thing."

Alfendi grinned at that response.

"And what about this man?" Hershel asked, pointing to the lighter-skinned figure with the screwdriver. "Does he look anything like the face you saw in the window?"

The boy frowned, studying the photo silently for several moments. "I... don't know," he eventually admitted, looking unsure. "The guy I saw was super old."

"This photo is itself rather old," Hershel pointed out. "It could very well be the same man."

Alfendi made a whining noise, rocking on his heels, and shook his head. "I don't know."

"It's alright if you don't." Hershel patted his son's back, deciding to drop the subject with a calm smile. "Let's go downstairs, shall we?"

The ground floor was probably about a third bigger than the top floor, by Hershel's best estimation. On the side Sycamore had examined was a kitchen and laundry, a small table with a chair or two serving as the dining area, with access to a cupboard under the stairs. On the side Hershel had examined was an open space with a ratty old sofa, and beyond it a dark room that Alfendi was quick to shy away from, pressing his face into Hershel's arm and clinging tightly to the sleeve to keep it there... a room Hershel had kept to himself when he first saw it. The archaeologist used his free arm to search the nearby wall, flicking the light-switch the moment he located it under his searching fingers.

Although there were windows, this room was hidden from sunlight by thick curtains stapled to the wall around the frames. It was empty of furniture, with only a few boxes in one corner gathering dust. Against the back wall, a staircase descended into the ground, lit by a row of caged lights following the path downwards and out of sight.
Alfendi's hands around his father's arm tightened their grip. "P-Papa... Did the man I saw go down there?"

Hershel tugged at the brim of his top hat. "I'd say he did."

There was a short pause as Alfendi considered this. "Are we going to follow him?"

"We are."

It was more spacious underground than Hershel was expecting, though not by much. At the bottom of the stairs, with just enough clearance for Hershel's hat, was not a basement but a tunnel, a series of concrete archways mined out in the rock, stretching out on a downwards slope into the distance to the south. The caged lights continued in regular intervals along the wall, their wires dangling loosely between them; Inbetween were thick doorways, left open and swinging on their hinges.

Father and son stood at the foot of the stairs for maybe half a minute, holding each other's hand tightly as they surveyed the path ahead. Alfendi was the first to break the silence, crouching down and out of his father's grip to examine the floor. "There's marks here."

Hershel turned his gaze downwards, kneeling at his son's side. "So there are." He brushed a finger against the black streaks of rubber on the concrete floor. "Tyre tracks."

Alfendi gave his father an incredulous look. "A car can't fit down here, Papa!"

"I didn't say they were car tyres, did I?" Hershel replied, giving his son a smile. "All sorts of things in the world have tyres, not just cars."

The boy stared at the tracks, deep in thought. "A bicycle?" he suggested.

"Maybe." Hershel pointed to the identical tracks not far away. "Although it looks more like a four wheeled contraption from this."

"So what is it, then?"

Hershel thought a moment, then stood. "I'm afraid I can't say for sure." He waited until Alfendi had also returned to his feet, then took his son's hand. "Are you ready to do a little exploring?"

Alfendi's fingers tightened around his father's, and he grinned. "Yeah!" He then paused, frowning. "But, you won't leave me behind, will you, Papa?"

"Of course not," Hershel chuckled, tugging at his hat. "What kind of gentleman would leave his child alone in a place like this?"

The pair walked down the path slowly, venturing through archway after archway and past light after light, descending gently down to whatever hideaway the secret passage led to; Hershel greatly doubted anyone other than its builder was even aware of it. Hershel wasn't sure how much time passed, the monotonous beat of his shoes on the concrete turning his attention to his hearing, ever wary of what else might be down in that tunnel; He refused to let anything get the drop on them, not in a place as confined, or as echo-y, as this.

Finally, Alfendi tugged on his father's hand, pointing ahead of them. "Papa! The tunnel's ending!"

Hershel looked up with surprise, his attention snapping back to his eyes. "So it is." At Alfendi's pull, their pace towards that final archway sped up, bringing the room beyond it into view, bathed as it was in artificial light. Something was in there, something large and covered in cloth, and as they finally reached the doorway to the area beyond, Hershel was able to see the unmistakable limbs of some giant machine; Whatever it was, it took up the entire ceiling, a great metal bowl hanging imposingly over their heads.

Alfendi pressed against his father's side. "What's that?"

"I don't know," Hershel replied. Turning his gaze from the ceiling, his eyes landed on another doorway, a dark shaft and a single cage lift inside. "Let's see if we can find out..."

Hershel suspected the cage lift was recovered from a mine, as it looked well-used, the yellow paint chipped from years of being banged and brushed against. He guided his son inside, then closed the mesh door and gently pulled the nearby lever. The cage shuddered and groaned (sending Alfendi clinging tighter to his father), then slowly began to rise into the darkness. A few metres up, Hershel saw a second lift lowering opposite them in the dim light. "The two must be connected," he mused aloud as it passed them, distracting Alfendi from the darkness.

Finally, the lift they stood in reached the top of the shaft and groaned to a shuddering stop. Hershel waited for the cage to stop swinging on its cable before opening the mesh door, and Alfendi didn't waste any time jumping straight out. This room was much smaller, another concrete box; On one side was a doorway leading to a metal corridor half-hidden behind a roller door, while on the other was a ladder leading to a trap-door in the ceiling. The corridor was unlit and quickly disappeared into pitch black shadow, but the trap-door was ringed by distant sunlight. Alfendi made the choice of where they were to go, running to the ladder and pointing straight up. "This way, Papa?"

Hershel gave the dark corridor one final look, then turned his attention back to his son with a smile. "Above ground it is," he replied. "Let's find where we've ended up..."

Flora sat on the stone steps circling the arena, twiddling her thumbs. On her right sat Emmy, reading a pocket-sized book. In front of them, Sycamore paced back and forth across the grass, his flapping cape and hushed mutterings making her warm, kindly uncle surprisingly imposing; She knew he was simply worried about her father and brother, but there was enough bubbling anger in him that she found herself too scared to offer any comfort.

"This... pa...?"

Flora perked up, looking around the arena. "Did you hear that?"

Emmy looked up from her book. "Hear what?"

Sycamore's pacing halted, watching his niece carefully.

"I thought I heard Alfendi." Flora got to her feet, looking around the windy plain. Her eyes quickly locked on the caretaker's cottage, not far away from where they had settled as a group.

Sycamore immediately noticed her gaze, striding towards the door. "From here...?"

"Let's... end..."
"That sounded like the Professor!" Flora cried, running after her uncle towards the cottage.

A thud rang out from inside the cottage, following by a boyish cry of "It's a shack!", much clearer and closer than what they'd heard before.

Emmy snapped her book closed, jumping to her feet. "That is Alfendi!"

Sycamore and Flora, standing outside the cottage's door, shot each other a quick look before moving as one to the handle. To their surprise, it was not locked, and they were easily able to tug the wooden board open with their combined strength. Inside, they found a very surprised Alfendi standing next to a trapdoor, but his face broke into a wide grin as he recognised his family. "Uncle! Flora!"

Flora smiled as she watched her brother race for their uncle to give him a quick hug before turning his attention to his sister. "Hello, Alfendi."

"What are you doing here?" Alfendi asked, bouncing in place as he looked between them. "How'd you know where we'd come out of the tunnel?"

"There's a tunnel?" Emmy asked from behind them, critically examining the hill they stood on. "Is that how Geary escaped?"

"Presumably," came Hershel's answer as he climbed the ladder and exited the trapdoor Alfendi had been standing by earlier. Around him, Flora noticed the rest of the cottage looked as run-down as its exterior suggested, cluttered with the miscellany of a garden shed and covered in dust and cobwebs.

Emmy waved as the signature top hat came into view. "Nice to see you again, Professor."

Alfendi finally peered out into the world outside the cottage, and looked a little taken aback as he recognised the grassy plain and stone ring. "Oh... We're here..."

"There's been no-one around but us since we arrived," Sycamore said, half assuring Alfendi and half informing Hershel, his hand resting on his nephew's head. "But the existence of a tunnel does explain why Ystava owns both properties, and how Geary vanished so easily."

Hershel closed the trapdoor behind him, briefly considering pulling a nearby rug over it before leaving it alone. "I suspect this was his one and only trick. He may know better than to try it again."

Sycamore scoffed, pushing at his glasses. "I can certainly believe Geary is simple-minded enough to think his 'one trick' would be sufficient to escape capture. It would be child's play to catch him this time."

"This time?" Flora repeated.

"Of course," Sycamore chuckled, turning his smirk on his brother. "You do plan on heading back to that house to see if he has returned, don't you?"

Before Hershel could reply, a loud buzz rang from his pocket, startling everyone into silence. Quickly reaching into his jacket, Hershel pulled out the source of the noise, a mobile phone, and pressed it to his ear. "Hello?" After a pause, he smiled. "Lamiroir, a pleasure to hear your voice. Naturally, we shall come to meet you shortly. There's something in particular I want to show you."
"Is Madame Bonte free, if you know?" Lamiroir asked the teen on the step as she approached the orphanage door.

The girl grunted, giving the woman little more than a glance as she attended to filling up her sketchbook. "Got back a while ago. The littlies are in trouble again."

"I gathered," Lamiroir chuckled as she walked in, feeling the teen's confused gaze on her back.

It was a very unique pleasure, to be able to enter an unfamiliar building and immediately form a personal opinion of its decor, a mental map of its layout. It was something she'd taken for granted her whole life, and then she lost her sight and her memory and never even knew what it was she had lost. It was with a smile she looked around the well-loved room, the muddy trail of shoe-prints leading up the nearby stairs, the old desk with the wobbly leg held up by an old doorstop, the array of half-open doorways that marked the passage of a bored teen or an over-excited child. A house that belonged to the fifteen-or-so children who lived in it so much more than the two caretakers who watched over them.

As the singer stepped forward, one of the half-open doors tentatively opened, and a middle-aged man peered out, his face lighting up as he spotted the woman outside. "Lamiroir! Bonte said you were coming by!"

Lamiroir laughed, giving the man a wave. "Monsieur Lomake, I assume? It's a pleasure to finally meet you in person."

Lomake grinned. "That's me, Madame. Why don't you come in," he gestured to the room behind him, opening the door wide, "and we can get started?"

"Of course," she replied, heading in to what she quickly realised was the office, bulging with filing cabinets and paper. "I've been looking forward to this moment for a long time."

When Lamiroir had first met Machi, he was seven, already considered a talented pianist and with several years playing under his child's belt. She had been singing covers before then, limited to her voice in her instrumentation, but after Machi's beautiful piano began to play its own melodies behind her, Salinen or maybe Bonte (she couldn't remember which) had suggested the pair try something original, gifting Lamiroir with a cheap keyboard to keep at home for Machi to use.

Their first composing session together had been rather awkward, the pair still getting to know each other and never having worked musically with anyone else before. Eventually they settled into a routine, one of the pair making a tune and the other joining in; Mostly Lamiroir herself wrote the lyrics, but Machi frequently gave his own inputs that she valued even if they didn't make it into the final song. They started out meeting before performances, Machi escorted by Bonte, then he was entrusted to make the trip there on his own, then finally he began to make his own way unannounced to Lamiroir's little house to make music with her on any day of the week. The shy and quiet boy she barely knew except through his music became the kind and endlessly generous Machi, who finally opened up to share many conversations with the blind woman he had befriended... and he was her closest friend in the world. There was something about this boy that connected to her, and not just because he was one of only three real friends she had in their small town. He reminded her of something, a lost part of herself from 'before'. She was, in return, the closest he had ever had to a parent since being brought to the orphanage, and she was all too aware of that... But, scared of what change might bring, she made no move to step forward with their relationship, and kept the status quo.

Machi was ten when everything changed. Salinen came to Lamiroir's house the day after a performance, bouncing excitement in his voice.

"We had a man in the audience last night, a very important man!" he explained, the sound of his shoes on the kitchen tiles underlining his glee. "He's offered you a contract, Lamiroir! You could go out into the wider world, share your voice and your marvellous songs with... well, with all the people out there, who've never heard of Kopunchiville's siren and never will until you go out and show them!" He paused, breathless. "The whole world, Lamiroir! Think of how many people you could make happy with your music! You could...! Well, not see the sights, but travel the world, eat exotic foods..."

Her manager's ramblings faded into the background. Sat in her chair, Lamiroir felt uncertain. To leave Kopunchiville, leave all she had ever known? Immediately, her heart hardened. "I cannot go," she told him, bringing his ongoing speech to a halt, along with his pacing of the kitchen.

"You... You're turning this down? B-but, Lamiroir, this is an opportunity for you! Why won't you take it?"

"I won't leave Machi behind," Lamiroir firmly replied, surprising herself as she realised the truth in her words. "I... I cannot leave him behind." Something nudged at the back of her mind, a deep chasm of loss she could not comprehend, and neither did she want to; She shoved it deep into her subconscious and slammed the door, not wanting to know what it might reveal.

There was a long pause before Salinen responded. "I understand," he said. "I'll talk to Bonte."

Lamiroir frowned, confused. "To Bonte?"

Salinen chuckled. "Well, I'll see if this guy will extend the offer to Machi too, but if you're serious about wanting to stay with the kid..." He paused. "You're practically his mother already. He's not gonna say 'no'."

After that, everything moved so quickly. Her new manager had agreed to hire Machi too, and Machi, just as predicted, immediately said yes to travelling the world with Lamiroir. The only hurdle was in their last goodbye to Bonte, the last day in that small village.

"I brought over all the paperwork for this adoption," Bonte explained once Machi had finished bouncing off the walls in his excitement to be leaving (only two hours and counting). "Lamiroir, should we sit down?"

Machi, ever the kind soul, pulled out the singer's chair for her, taking her hand to guide her to its back. "Here you go, Lamiroir."

"Thank you, Machi." Lamiroir sat down, wishing now she had more than two chairs at her table for Machi to join them. "What do we need to do for this paperwork?"

There was a ruffling of paper as Bonte laid it out on the small table. "I've filled in all the particulars..."
although there are many details I couldn't account for. I... presume 'Lamiroir' is your legal name?"

"I assume so," Lamiroir agreed. "That is what my contract is written out to."

"Alright." A pen scratched against paper. "And your birthdate?"

Lamiroir paused. "I'm afraid I don't know. At my best guess, my age is somewhere in the mid-thirties. My birthday, I have no idea."

"You can have my birthday," Machi offered. "Seventeenth of February. We can share it."

At that, Lamiroir smiled. "Machi, you are too kind."

Bonte chuckled, writing in the form. "For age, I'd say you're about thirty-six, which puts your birth-year as... nineteen-eighty-six. Nice and neat."

There were other details that needed writing down, and then the entire 'contract' of sorts had to be read aloud, so they could be certain Lamiroir understood it fully in her inability to read it. Once that was done, Bonte arranged the final sheet of paper in front of Lamiroir, and Machi placed the pen in the singer's hand before guiding it to the line she had to sign on. She marked it with a cross.

"Once the approval gets back," Machi whispered as Bonte left, "can I... Can I call you 'Aska'?"

Lamiroir smiled. "Of course you may, pokani."

Mother and son. It felt like it was meant to be...

... but then it wasn't.

In the weeks after, 'Lamiroir, Landscape Painter of Sound' became an overnight sensation across the country. The mix-up with her overeager new producer not realising she was blind before marketing her first album (a series of home-recordings of her and Machi in the Restaurant de Chanson) had somehow extended to not only the public but whatever government office handled Machi's adoption papers: Seeing only a cross on the signature line, and no place that officially recorded her blindness, they had returned the papers to Bonte as a hoax. Any chance of an official relationship between Lamiroir and Machi was dead in the water, and the memory of the boy's sudden tears as he read the rejection still tore at Lamiroir's heart. They were both heartbroken, but, unable to challenge the image their contract dictated, there was nothing they could do.

Machi never took up calling Lamiroir 'Aska', 'mother', as he had asked.

In return, Lamiroir kept 'pokani', 'my son', to the confines of her head.

On the day she left America, Lamiroir knew what she must do before she saw Machi again. As she reached out to take his teenage face in her hands, she had finally broken that unspoken rule between them:

"I will miss you terribly... pokani."

"I-I will miss you too, Aska."

The trial had outed her as blind to not only Borginia, but the entire world. The attempt on her life had prompted enough of a medical examination to discover her blindness was curable. The determination of the Wrights to fight for Machi's innocence against all odds was inspiring. This time, Lamiroir wouldn't let anything stop this paperwork from being accepted. The moment she had left the hospital in London, she had written to Bonte to detail her plans, and sent the letter to Kopunchiville's orphanage post-haste... a much longer and more detailed message than the short notes she had asked Machi to help her write in California.

As they arrived in the small office by the orphanage's entrance, Lomake didn't take long to pull out the file from the desk sandwiched between the tall cabinets. "Here it is," he said, laying it out for Lamiroir to see as she sat in the free chair. "We've been preparing it since your letter. All Machi's details are in, we just need yours."

Lamiroir found herself pausing before reaching out to take it. "My details...?" Sure enough, just as before, the form was complete except for the details she remembered Bonte filling out for her on that long ago day she left Kopunchiville with Machi.

"Do you need help?" Lomake asked, pulling a pen from a nearby cup jammed full of them.

"No, I... I'm sure I'm fine," Lamiroir replied, still looking over the form. "It's only... I'm trying to recover my memories, but I still don't have enough of a hold on my past life to be able to answer those questions."

Lomake paused in thought, tapping the pen in his hand on the desk. "Well... if you want to take the form away with you to fill out once you know the answers, that's fine." He shrugged. "Or, you could just put in whatever you wrote on the last form. Bonte said the only reason they rejected it was your signature."

As Lamiroir examined the papers, she noticed the empty space at the end, for the signatures of the applicant (that was her), the child's guardian (either Bonte or Lomake, currently left blank) and the child themself, marked 'if applicable'. "Machi will have to sign this?"

"Yep," Lomake replied. "Once we send it in, they'll forward a copy to the embassy in America; They'll handle Machi's side."

Lamiroir nodded absently. "I think... If it is alright, may I take this with me, and return it to you before I leave?"

Lomake grinned. "Sure. As long as everything's all filled out to send in by then, we'll arrange for it to go through for you."

Sighing in relief, the singer clutched the paper in her hands. "Thank you."

Before she left, Lamiroir wanted to see Bonte again, to explain what had happened out at the arena that morning. A quick visit turned rapidly into a lengthy stay, as the teenager who witnessed her entrance had, it turned out, recognised her and spread the word among the children that 'Lamiroir, Landscape Painter of Sound' was in the building. Bonte had apologised, but Lamiroir quite liked the attention of the young ones, even a boy named Brutus who, Bonte noted, had been the one to orchestrate the bullying of Alfendi at the arena; At Lamiroir's stern stare, he had promised he was sorry and wouldn't do it again, though Lamiroir suspected he was anything but genuine.

By the time the children and teenagers had finally let her go, Lamiroir noted with surprise over an hour had passed. She quickly moved to call Hershel.

"Hello?"
"Hello, Professor," Lamiroir greeted him, standing out on the street as her eyes searched the nearby 'ghost house' for any activity. "I'm sorry for taking so long."

"Lamiroir, a pleasure to hear your voice," Hershel cheerfully replied. "Naturally, we shall come to meet you shortly. There's something in particular I want to show you."

Lamiroir blinked, confused. "Show me?"

Hershel chuckled. "If you are still outside the orphanage, wait right there. We may have found something you will recognise."
When Hershel arrived from the south, only Sycamore was accompanying him, their combined top hat and grey cape making the pair stand out all the more from Kopunchiville's regular citizens. Lamiroir waved as she crossed the road to join them, achingly curious to know what they had been doing since she departed the group earlier. "Professor Layton, Mister Sycamore!"

"Lamiroir," Sycamore replied, waving back. "A pleasure to see you again."

The singer nodded, turning to Hershel. "You said you had something to show me?"

Hershel smiled, tugging on the brim of his hat. "Indeed. We believe we have located Geary."

The two men lead her to the supposed 'ghost house', where Sycamore made short work of the puzzle-lock on the door - "Was there ever any doubt?" - and led her inside. Hershel took the lead up the stairs, only to pause halfway and signal the others with a finger to his lips, pointing upwards. They were not alone. Sycamore gently took Lamiroir's wrist and motioned for her to stay back as he and his brother continued ahead up the stairs.

Hershel was the first to reach the top, turning to the door he remembered led to the room with the photos inside. The door was ajar, so he gently pushed it open. Beyond, stood at the desk, was a man in his mid-seventies, crouched over the now-empty picture frames that lay discarded on the nearby floor. Although he was distracted shoving papers into a satchel, the slight creak of the opening door still managed to catch his attention. Pausing, the man turned, his wide eyes meeting Hershel's wary gaze.

Sycamore joined his brother, casting brown eyes around the room before settling on the man inside. "Monsieur Geary, I assume?"

"Or perhaps you prefer," Hershel picked up, "Ami Ystava?"

It was impossible to miss the man's sudden intake of breath, nor Sycamore's briefly confused glance his brother's way before returning to watching the elder man before them. Geary clutched his satchel close to his chest, one arm flung out behind him...

... and suddenly a blast of stinging air from the sides of the door-frame assaulted Hershel's eyeballs, sending him staggering back as he flung his hands protectively to his face. At his side, he heard Sycamore also stepping back, then felt a firm hand on his midsection shoving him aside; Geary was escaping.

Lamiroir gasped as she saw the man coming into view, shoving aside the brothers - Hershel clutching his eyes in pain while Sycamore's glasses were merely fogged up, taking the brunt of the stinging spray - and ran for the stairs. That face coming towards her, Geary, Ystava, her mysterious 'uncle'... There was no doubt she knew that face.

"Stop!" Sycamore cried, wiping his glasses with a sleeve.

"Wait!" Lamiroir shouted, holding out a hand as she searched Geary's expression, hoping to trigger... something more concrete from the back of her mind. Geary paused only half a second, studying her with grey eyes, then lunged forward and grabbed Lamiroir's arm, ducking into a nearby doorway. She couldn't help but cry out in surprise. "What are you-?" Although she could easily pull herself out of his rather feeble grasp if need be, she found herself deciding to go along with him; She knew that face, knew that gentle grip on her arm... If anyone held the answers to her past, it was this man.

"Come back here!" Sycamore's hand similarly clamped down on Hershel's arm, and the archaeologist found himself being dragged back down the stairs and into a side-room; Despite the stinging in his eyes, he made himself open them long enough to register what was going on, and pulled himself out of his brother's grip to run without aid.

Geary ignored the shout, pulling Lamiroir into a dark room and down a staircase beyond into some kind of hand-carved tunnel. He paused to kick a section of wall on the stairs, then tugged Lamiroir to one side, where a wheelchair sat, a massive motor under the seat and a platform at the back. "Don't you dare follow me!" he shouted up the stairs, gesturing Lamiroir towards the chair. "I warn you!"

The brothers reached the entrance to the tunnel, and Hershel noticed Sycamore's hand stray inside his jacket as he dashed down the steps. "If you touch one hair on her head-!"

"Mister Sycamore," came Lamiroir's cry, "don't harm him!"

As they arrived underground, Hershel heard a high-pitched revving, and glimpsed a motorised wheelchair speeding away from them, Lamiroir sat in the chair and Geary standing on a small platform at the back, just before the nearest set of heavy doors slammed shut. Moments later, they heard the distant bangs of every other door in the tunnel closing one by one, each thud more distant than the last.

Sycamore growled as he sprang to the blocked passageway. "More puzzle-locks!" he declared, moving to solve them. "Let's get this over with..."

Hershel frowned, a hand on his hat. "No," he said. "At this point it would be faster to follow him above ground."

The other man paused, abandoning the puzzle in his hands. "Good point."

As the brothers ran south on Ru Pojinen, dodging passing pedestrians and stopping only to cross a busy road, Sycamore nudged his brother's arm. "So, how did you work out Geary and Ystava were the same person?" he asked. "I thought we were assuming Ystava was a woman."

Hershel smiled from underneath his grip on his hat. "Because in English, we would be correct in assuming 'Ami' was the name of a woman. We neglected to consider that, in many foreign languages, names that sound feminine to us are actually considered to be masculine." He chuckled. "It seemed unlikely to me that there would be only one person in that house if there were indeed two people behind this secret of Lamiroir's."

"So you kept this a secret yourself?" Sycamore asked, raising an eyebrow.

"Nonsense," Hershel replied, pausing to circle a woman with a pram. "I simply waited to confirm my theory before wasting anyone else's time with it."

Sycamore scoffed and rolled his eyes, but his smile betrayed that he wasn't as annoyed as he pretended to be.
Hershel couldn’t see much of the arena as they dashed across the western bridge to the river’s south. They cut the corner of the road ahead as much as they dared, sprinting the last stretch onto the green grass. There, clustered around the caretaker's hut, was some kind of small commotion, loud shouting between three women and one elderly man.

"Why won't you leave me alone!??" the man shouted.

"Oh, I don't know, why did you kidnap Lamiroir!??" Emmy replied, a fist raised threateningly in the air.

"Don't hurt him!" Lamiroir demanded of Emmy, standing between them.

Flora, Alfendi huddled at her back, nodded in agreement. "Mister Geary, please calm down! We only want to talk!"

Although his lungs were burning in protest, Hershel didn't dare slow down, pushing his aching legs to run towards the hut. "Mister Ystava!"

Geary looked up from his argument with the women, face paling as he saw Hershel and Sycamore approaching. "You again!" He didn't waste a moment spinning around and disappearing back into the hut, slamming the door shut behind him.

Hershel fought not to collapse as they joined the group, panting from the sprint across town and leaning heavily on his knees. Flora and Alfendi rushed to his side, Flora trying to help take his weight.

Sycamore wordlessly shouted in frustration, smacking at his cape. "I am not running all the way back to that house!" he declared, then pushed past Emmy and Lamiroir to the door of the hut. With Emmy's help, it was quickly pulled open again, and the pair disappeared inside.

"We'd better stop them using excessive force," Flora pointed out, leaving Hershel's side to follow them.

Hershel nodded in agreement, and was about to add something to Alfendi when Lamiroir stepped forward, taking the boy's hand herself.

"We will stay here where it's safe," she said. "Please, don't let Uncle Geary come to any harm."

"Of course," Hershel promised, giving the singer then his son a warm smile before running inside.

The room beyond the trapdoor and down the ladder was much the same as it had been the last time Hershel was there, except that, this time, the corridor with its metal walls and floor was lit-up, the roller door pushed open. Sycamore was sprawled on the floor nearby, Emmy and Flora busy pulling him to his feet. He brushed the two off in irritation the moment he'd regained his bearings; Hershel could only guess his brother had slipped off the ladder in his exhaustion from the sprint across town.

"Don't waste time," Sycamore growled, flapping his cape. "He went this way!"

The quartet followed Sycamore's lead and raced into the metal corridor. Now it was lit (and by the same caged bulbs that lined the tunnel below), Hershel could see it extended forward maybe twenty metres before making a sharp left turn out of sight. Around them, they could hear the faint groaning of machinery... and suddenly Hershel remembered the enormous contraption hanging from the ceiling of the underground chamber. "Wait-!"

A crackling overheard interrupted his warning: "I told you all to leave me alone!" The group paused, locating a speaker on the wall nearby. "Why couldn't you let me live out my life in peace!?"

Sycamore huffed, hands curled into fists. "Geary, where are-?"

The corridor groaned, then shifted, knocking everyone off their feet and tumbling to the floor. Hershel managed to glance back long enough to see the doorway they had come in by disappear, replaced by a concrete wall; Whatever that machinery had been, they were currently inside it... and it was moving. "Everybody hold on!" he cried, making a grab for the nearest limb - Emmy's arm.

The floor angled forward, moving them down the corridor, a great ripping sound of grass and tumbling dirt echoed above, then a great light flooded the area, blinding them all momentarily before they could register it was sunlight. The floor tipped back, and Hershel's attempts to grab on to any section of the corridor, anything other than Emmy's arm, proved to be fruitless: In moments, he found himself tumbling several metres down onto grassy terrain.

"Papa!"

Hershel shook his head, barely registering his hat had come off in the rough landing, and looked up. Before them was, unmistakably, a mecha, standing on four stout legs as it rose at a steep angle out from the gaping hole that had emerged in the middle of the arena. At its back, directly above, was the doorway leading to the corridor they had been in moments before; Flora clung tightly to its edge, fighting for a foothold to drag herself back inside lest she fall into the gaping chasm of concrete below. Above, on the steeply sloped flat top of the bowl-shaped body, Lamiroir clung to a gap in the metal sheeting between the large clumps of dirt and grass, her arm held tight around young Alfendi.

Hershel wasted no time dragging himself to his feet, worry for his son gripping tightly at his heart. "Alfendi!"

"Papa!" Alfendi shrieked in terror, then the mecha began to level out as it climbed out of the hole in the arena, and singer and child disappeared over the lip of the bowl-shaped body. The mecha itself began to creak and grow as its legs moved to propel it south, towards the road.

At Hershel's sides, Sycamore and Emmy also stood. "Lamiroir!" Emmy added.

Now the corridor they had fallen from was once again at a reasonable angle, Flora pulled herself up inside the mecha and waved to the trio on the ground. "Don't worry Professor, I'll go talk Mister Geary down!"

"Flora-!" Hershel tried to protest, but the young woman only pulled the roller door shut and disappeared inside. By now, the mecha had reached the road and was continuing south to the forest. It was rapidly picking up speed, and would soon be too fast to catch on foot.

"In the meantime, let's shut that thing down!" Emmy declared, grinning determinedly as she dashed off towards the mecha.

Once again, Hershel only had time to shout "Emmy-!" before she was out of reach.

"They won't be fast enough," Sycamore grumbled to himself, fiddling underneath his cape. "I'll get Alfendi." With that, he dashed off, pulling out a rapier from somewhere underneath his suit.

"Wait-!"
The following moment, Emmy leapt onto the rearmost leg of the moving contraption, fiddling to uncover whatever mechanisms its sheeting hid. It didn’t take long for Sycamore to copy her, using his sword and his bare hands to climb beyond the legs and onto the body, making rapid progress towards the flat roof.

Hershel’s eyes strayed to the forest, studying the lay of the land beneath the treetops and recalling the official map he had picked up the previous day. ‘Maybe if I...’ He stepped forward to follow the rapidly disappearing mecha, only to kick something on the ground, and paused to find it was his forgotten top hat. With a small smile, he bent to retrieve it. ‘Claire, if there was ever a time I needed your help, it’s now. Keep an eye on Alfendi and Flora for me.’

Top hat firmly pressed on his temple, Hershel Layton made a run for the forest, heading south-east.
When Hershel had followed Sycamore, Emmy and Flora into the hut, Lamiroir had thought she was out of danger. With Alfendi’s hand in her's, she took him out to the centre of the arena, and they both watched the hut intently, fully expecting any moment to see Geary come back out, their friends surrounding him, all calm and finally ready to talk to Lamiroir about what she most wanted to know.

And then the ground had begun to shake, metal creaked from far below, and Lamiroir had only enough time to grab the boy tightly before the thing had torn through the grass, throwing them off their feet and lifting them high into the air. Alfendi had shrieked for his father and began to cry, but his panic only seemed to strengthen Lamiroir's calm; She clung ever tighter to the boy, her free hand finding the first handhold it could in the metal beast underneath them before they fell whatever insurmountable distance had erupted between them and the concrete chasm below. She caught only a few fleeting glances of Hershel, Sycamore and Emmy before the platform they clung to levelled out and began heavily stomping south, into the forest at the foothills of the nearby mountain range.

Although they were now able to stand, Lamiroir didn't dare let go of her handhold, lying on the cold metal and holding Alfendi tightly. He was outright crying now, clinging to her dress and sobbing into the fabric. The groaning of the metal echoed around them, and Lamiroir found herself with a sudden desire to oil the offending joints; Even a beast of this size could be made to run silently, something told her. Looking around, she quickly noticed a bulge in the otherwise flat roof, at what she could only guess was the ‘front’. It was probably some kind of cockpit, though any glass to see out of was on the opposite side to where they lay.

There was a clang of metal on metal, then a grunt, then another clang. As Lamiroir watched, Sycamore vaulted over the edge of the platform, a sword in hand. His face lit up as he spotted the pair, running to meet them.

Sighing in relief, Lamiroir finally released her grip on the sheeting, sitting up and gently prodding Alfendi. "Look, it's Mister Sycamore."

Alfendi gasped, running to meet their rescuer with a loud cry of "Uncle!"

Sycamore returned the boy's hug only briefly, looking around the roof. "We need to get you two off this thing. Is there some kind of hatch around, or a ladder?"

Lamiroir got to her feet, searching for a sign of something between the clumps of dirt still littering what used to be the arena floor. "Nothing that I've seen but... Might that do?"

The man grinned as he spotted the handle of a hatchdoor she was pointing to. "Perfect!" The trio ran towards it, Sycamore bending down to clear the dirt from around it. It took a few seconds to open the hatch, revealing a metal corridor below that extended both ways at a slight slope before turning off in unseen directions. After checking the coast was clear, Sycamore directed Lamiroir inside before handing Alfendi to her through the opening. "You should be safe in there," he told them.

"Aren't you coming?" Lamiroir asked, lowering the boy to the ground and shooting confused looks up through the door.
Sycamore shook his head, frowning. "I need to convince Geary to bring this thing to a stop."

Before Lamiroir could object, the hatch door had slammed closed.

Alfendi squeaked as he clung to the singer. "W-w-what did Uncle mean?" he asked, sounding panicked again now his rescuer had left as quickly as he arrived. "Why didn't he come with us?"

"I-I don't know," Lamiroir lied, hugging the boy. Concern gripped at her chest for her Uncle Geary.

"Alfendi! Lamiroir!"

Alfendi squeaked again, pulling himself out of Lamiroir's hug to run for his sister as she rounded the corner of the corridor. "Flora!"

Flora held her brother tight, looking around in surprise. "I thought you were outside?"

"Mister Sycamore found us a way in," Lamiroir explained, hurrying to join the pair. "He's... gone to find Geary."

The younger woman's eyes widened. "O-oh, um..." Her gaze soon returned to her brother, who was clinging to her chest as though his life depended on it... and very likely it did. "Let's get you two out of here first. I'm sure Uncle won't do anything drastic."

Lamiroir suspected Flora's doubts on that statement equalled her own.

The trio descended through the small maze of corridors, following the trail of lipstick arrows on the walls, marks Flora had left behind her to track her path. Lamiroir counted four levels of sloping floors before they turned a corner and collided with Emmy, who knocked herself, Flora and Alfendi to the ground.

Emmy grinned as she recognised the trio, pulling herself to her feet. "Hey, you're all safe!"

"What are you doing here!?” Flora demanded as she followed suit. "Both you and Uncle fell out into the arena; I saw you!"

"Climbed back up," Emmy said with a shrug. "Desmond went up the outside, but I was trying to shut down the legs." She gestured behind her, where Lamiroir saw a panel missing in the wall, sunlight glinting through it. "I got one, but the other three aren't as easy to get to as they look."

Flora, having helped Alfendi back into a standing position, sighed as she handed her brother off to their friend. "If you have a way out, get Alfendi and Lamiroir back on solid ground. I need to go stop Uncle before he does something he'll regret."

"Wait, what?" Emmy said, taking Alfendi's hand more by instinct than anything else.

"Please be quick," Lamiroir called as Flora dashed back up the corridor.

Flora paused only to shoot the singer a grin. "I'll try," she promised, then disappeared around the corner.

Alfendi whimpered, his grip on Emmy's hand tightening. "Flora..."

"D-don't worry, kiddo," Emmy assured him, forcing a smile. "She'll be back before you know it."

Turning around, she led the pair down the passageway towards the open panel.
Halfway there, the entire mechanism around them shuddered and rocked back and forth, throwing everyone to the ground once more before resuming its thudding across the outside terrain, now at a greater speed than before.

"That's not a good sign," Emmy mumbled, trying to extricate the seven-year-old from her waist so she could stand up again.

Lamiroir threw herself to the open panel, sticking her head into the opening. Below her, she could see a sea of wires and pulleys, the great iron bones of the beast and the heavy-duty pistons that served as its muscles, desperately in need of oiling.

...!

How many times, from childhood to adulthood, had she helped set up and put away that complicated stage equipment? They never entrusted that vital task to stage-hands; Dad said they didn't care as much about the lives of the magicians using it, and doing it themselves helped keep their tricks a secret. For years, it was her and Dad, then her and Zak and Valant, setting up the pulleys, wires, mechanical beasts of the backstage and side-stage and under-stage and over-stage, so their show would always go off without a hitch, whether it was a false balancing act or her favourite of all: floating through the air on her invisible harness. She never turned down the chance to fly, after all.

Lamiroir shook her head as the memory fled from her eyes. Comparing what she could see of the machinery below her to her intimate knowledge of all the old stage equipment, she could easily put together how the leg worked, and exactly how Emmy had managed to disable it in her path of destruction from bottom to top. With no power flowing through its veins, the dead limb bobbed and bounced off the ground as the mechanical beast above sped through the open forest outside.

"We're going too fast," Emmy said from behind her, and Lamiroir noticed the woman had managed to stand despite Alfendi clinging to her coat. "There's no way we can safely go back down there, and it would be suicide to jump from this height."

Behind Emmy, Lamiroir noticed the corridor they stood in ended with a rolling door, of the kind used in garages; Sunlight peeked through from underneath, where it had not been fully closed. An idea forming in her mind, she turned back to the wires in the disabled leg, reaching out to test their elasticity.

"Lamiroir?" Alfendi quietly asked.

"Help me disconnect these," Lamiroir instructed the pair. "I think I know how we can get out."

For the third time since chasing Geary underground, Flora found herself climbing the inside of his unstable mecha. The half-hearted maze of corridors wasn't at all hard to navigate, especially not with the help of her improvised trail markings. Not even the sudden jump in speed after she left her brother and Lamiroir with Emmy had injured her resolve, fighting back to her feet and running up the sloped floors all the harder.

Once she passed the point where she had first found the distressed pair, Flora knew she must be close. The corridor's floor levelled out, directly beneath the flat roof of the mecha's top, and she found herself facing a T-intersection at the edge. Further down, Flora had always gone right first, but here, so close to her destination, she paused and listened, silently marking the wall with her lipstick in case she needed to turn back once more.

Smashing glass echoed from her right. She hurried to follow it.

"Stop this madness right now!"

"Get out, leave me alone!"

"You gave that right up when you put an innocent child in danger!"

"What are you talking about!?"

Finally, Flora reached a door, and threw it open to find a small cockpit, closer to a plane's than any other mecha she had seen. Cowering in a chair behind a bank of switches and levers was Geary; Standing above him, the only thing not covered in broken glass, was Sycamore, eyes wide in rage and a rapier in hand as he perched on the shattered remains of the cabin's window. Flora didn't even think, leaping into the room towards the man with the sword. "Uncle, stop!"

Sycamore blinked, coming out of his anger long enough to notice his niece. "Flora?"

Just as she reached Sycamore, grabbing for the sword in his grip, Geary lunged at the controls in front of him, slamming a bank of levers that sent the entire mecha swinging to one side, once more throwing Flora and Sycamore to the ground.

"Now what are you doing!?" Sycamore growled, fighting to get back up.

"Uncle, put that down!" Flora ordered, ignoring the broken glass pressing into her cheek as she clung to Sycamore's arm.

A crunching sound echoed from below, then the mecha began to tip forward. Flora became very aware of running water rippling ever closer.

"The Rapi Joki!" Geary shouted, jumping out of his chair.

Before Flora could make any further move to react, the mecha landed nose first in the icy river with a gigantic splash.
The Siren's Secret, Confrontation

September 14, 11:06AM
Riverside

Flora wasn't quite sure how she got out of the mecha's cockpit, whether she was thrown out in the impact of the fall, was pulled out by one of the other two men (likely Sycamore in that case), or somehow managed to swim out on her own and forgot in the shock of the impact with the icy rapids below. All she knew was that she found herself shivering on the banks of the Rapi Joki, coughing up water as she dragged herself along the shore, then flipped onto her back.

The sky above was a little cloudy, enough to dull the harsh sunlight of the midday. The rushing water was accompanied by the rustling leaves of early autumn, which she could see above her if she moved her head a little. With an idea of where she was, she quickly took a mental tally of herself, establishing she was whole and mostly uninjured: The cuts on her hands and face from the glass stung with river water, and she seemed to have a bruise developing on her right shin, but otherwise she was perfectly healthy.

Grunts from nearby pressed into Flora's consciousness, and she forced herself onto her side; From here, she could see Sycamore, his normally immaculate curls limp on his head and his glasses askew, dragging a half-conscious Geary out of the water. In his hand, Flora saw her uncle was still gripping his rapier.

Footsteps approached from the tree line, and Flora shifted onto her front to see Lamiroir, Emmy and Alfendi arriving, the three tied up in a makeshift harness of wires that trailed behind them; Each was idly disentangling themselves as they walked. "Are you all okay?" Emmy asked.

Flora nodded, running her eyes over the trio to check they were all unharmed.

"By some miracle, we all seem to be alive," Sycamore said, shoving Geary onto the grass before standing over him, rapier tight in his grip. "No thanks to the man who put us through that ridiculous farce to begin with."

Geary whimpered, pushing himself onto his hands and knees. "I-I didn't think-"

"Clearly not!" Sycamore interrupted, beginning to gesture wildly with his rapier. "There's been enough death in this world without you adding to it! There's been enough death in my family without you adding Alfendi's name to it!" His hand swung up with a roar, the sword ready to fall down on Geary's head.

Flora threw herself between Sycamore and Geary, arms held out wide. "Uncle, stop!"

Sycamore paused, surprised, then lowered his rapier to give his niece a glare. "Flora, get out of the "No!" Flora shot back. "I heard what he said to you back in the cockpit: He had no idea Alfendi and Lamiroir were in danger. Scaring him half to death was never going to calm him down enough to stop that thing before we crashed into the river, never mind answering our questions about Lamiroir!" Seeing her uncle's disbelieving look, she huffed and gestured to the prone man behind her. "There's enough death in this world without you adding Mister Geary's name to it, Uncle!"

"She has a point..."

The rustling of bushes attracted Flora's attention to the tree line once more, away from where Emmy's group stood. Out from the foliage came Hershel, a hand on the brim of his top hat as he fixed Sycamore with a stern glare.

"... Descole."

Sycamore sharply inhaled, staring at his brother with wide eyes.

Alfendi, hiding behind Lamiroir, wailed and ran to Hershel immediately, clinging to his father's chest. "Papa!"

"Professor!" Emmy cried, sighing in relief. "How'd you catch up to us?"

Hershel, patting his son's head, gave her a quick smile, though his attention was mostly on Alfendi. "I took a short-cut. I'm glad to see you're all alright."

Flora returned her attention to her uncle, watching Sycamore shift guiltily from foot to foot, a range of expressions flitting across his face. Finally, he walked around her, stopping at Geary's other side. "Count yourself lucky, Mister Geary." He slammed his rapier blade-first into the mud, where it stuck straight up like a silver tree. "You've just been saved by a Layton." With that, he stalked off into the forest.

Something about Sycamore's final words felt directed specifically at Flora... and she couldn't help but feel a swell of pride in her chest.

Emmy jumped forward to retrieve the sword, casting nervous glances at Geary; The way she carefully and uncomfortably balanced the rapier blade-down in her hands, it was clear she didn't intend to use it.

As Emmy stepped back, Lamiroir stepped forward, watching Geary carefully. He squirmed a little under her gaze, pushing himself up on his knees and rubbing mud from his hands into his pants as he brushed against them to still his nerves.

Lamiroir took a deep breath, perhaps steadying her own nervousness. "You are my Uncle Geary, aren't you? The real 'Ami Ystava'?"

Geary paused, then nodded. "Yes," he quietly admitted. "On both counts. You... recognised me?"

"Sort of," Lamiroir replied, wincing. She turned her attention to the mecha, half sunken in the river behind him. "That... contraption of yours: It's made up of stage equipment. Just like all the stage equipment we used to use."

Again, Geary nodded. "I built it all, generally," he explained. "I was always much more mechanically minded than your father." He bitterly laughed, rubbing his eyes with the back of a hand. "But of course you recognised my work before you recognised me. You were only five..."
"If I might interrupt for a moment," Hershel spoke up, "you were Lamiroir's caretaker after she lost her memory, correct?"

"Yes, that was me," Geary sighed. He turned to Lamiroir. "I'm sorry, Thalassa... I wasn't able to take care of you like I'd promised your father. The whole situation just..." He shook his head, voice wavering. "It reminded me too much of Gaia. Then, after what happened to Magnifi..." He sniffed, pressing the back of his hand to his nose. "It wouldn't have been fair to anyone to just send you back to people you didn't and couldn't remember. I set you up with a new life to live, then I ducked out of it like a coward. If your parents were alive, I know how ashamed of me they would be..."

Flora couldn't help but feel sorry for the man immediately. Something about him reminded her of Bruno.

Lamiroir didn't reply, her eyes staring off to one side as she frowned in thought.

"We used to travel together, remember?" Geary continued. "Before Gaia got sick... before I was just an 'uncle' to you." He shook his head. "I suppose we were both under Magnifi's 'spell' in a way..."

Alfendi emerged from where he clung to his father, nose wrinkled in disgust. "'Magnifi' is a weird name."

"'Fendi!" Flora hissed in warning.

Geary only laughed. "Ah, yes, but it's a magician's name; When we were kids, he used to be known as the extremely ordinary 'Magnus Grammar'."

"Grammar?" Emmy repeated, frowning. "Magni-... You're not saying your friend was Magnifi Gramarye, are you?"

"That's him," Geary sighed.

"But that's impossible!" Emmy argued. "If Lamiroir's father was Magnifi Gramarye, that would make her..." She shot confused glances at the singer, who wasn't visibly reacting to the ongoing conversation around her. "That would make her..."

Flora shook her head. "That's definitely not it," she insisted. "Lamiroir performed with Valant Gramarye very recently; He would have recognised Magnifi's daughter, wouldn't he? And Apollo and Trucy!" She threw her hands up. "They were such massive fans of yours, Lamiroir; Surely they would have recognised if you were their...!"

Flora had barely registered it was Lamiroir lying in the contrabass case before Trucy had screamed, dropped her phone and leapt to Apollo's side. Apollo himself just stood in shock, clinging to his sister. It was up to Luke to take charge, sending for the detective and doing his best to care for the unconscious singer, and his distracted siblings, until the paramedics arrived. The two Gramaryes were so beside themselves with fear, they did everything that afternoon as a pair, and Flora doubted they took any notice of what was going on outside the small circle of Lamiroir's still form on the floor. After learning which hospital the singer was going to, they had raced off so fast, Flora worried they would run under a car or something and be in need of emergency treatment themselves. The day after, Trucy had attended to Lamiroir's every need in the courthouse, guiding her everywhere and entertaining her with stories of her brothers; Flora had simply smiled as she watched, happy on Trucy's behalf the teen was getting to spend so much time with an idol. She had seen the longing looks both Trucy and Apollo gave Lamiroir when they thought no-one was looking, the sheer rapidity with which they jumped to her defence, the way they had grinned like they were sharing a secret as they praised Lamiroir's song the day after the concert. It was beyond obvious they were fans, even if they hid just how deep their admiration went; After all, that was only the logical assumption to make... wasn't it?

Flora's eyes widened, her hands flying to her mouth as she gasped in sudden realisation. "Oh... Oh no."

Finally, Lamiroir moved from her still pose, her eyes meeting Flora's. The singer's expression was unreadable, too many emotions vying for attention. One hand rested on the pocket where Flora knew Lamiroir kept her photo of Machi, the one Luke had prepared that had so confusingly included Apollo and Trucy. After a moment or two of silence, the singer turned and walked off into the trees without a word.

Of all the faces Flora could see around the clearing... the only one to not be shocked or confused was Hershel's.
"I'm sorry, Thalassa... I wasn't able to take care of you like I'd promised your father."

The moment Geary said it, she'd known that was her name. It had been Mama's idea, she was told, the name of an ancient Greek incarnation of the sea. She had loved hearing that story as a little girl, and it had fuelled her love of the colour blue. Even after she grew out of such child-like reasoning, she kept her fondness of the colour her whole life, and an appreciation for the oldest of the old Greek myths. It was on her suggestion that Jove took the name 'Hyperion' while with the troupe, that their son was named 'Apollo'.

"The whole situation just... It reminded me too much of Gaia."

She had been very young when her mother died... 'only five', Geary said, and as Gaia's caretaker in her final years he would know that better than most. She could remember getting to visit being a special occasion, Mama's bald head hidden under a thick woollen hat as she lay in bed, or struggled into a wheelchair. She particularly recalled one painful day, when Mama tried to sing to her, but was overcome with coughing; Dad had dragged her away so quickly, she feared she had killed the fragile older woman there and then.

"It wouldn't have been fair to anyone to just send you back to people you didn't and couldn't remember."

Even now, she couldn't recall the accident entirely clearly, and doubted she ever would. They were practising Zak and Valant's Quick-Draw Shoot'em, a variant where she would go into the air instead of remaining on the ground. All she could bring to mind was the sensation of spinning wildly, her feet leaving the floor, the bangs of the guns... She could only guess she had been shot. She didn't know what her mental condition had been like in the aftermath, but she hesitated to believe returning to her father, to Zak, to Trucy, wouldn't have helped her recover quicker.

"We used to travel together, remember? Before Gaia got sick... before I was just an 'uncle' to you."

She didn't know exactly when Dad had first told her it was Uncle Geary who built their stage equipment. She'd been told he used to travel with them, like Mama did, before Mama got sick and he left to look after her. Only a baby at the time, she had gone with Dad as he continued travelling the world and performing his magic. After Mama died, after that cold day in the cemetery of a country she didn't know, Uncle Geary never rejoined them, staying away to build his equipment elsewhere, on his own. Dad told her he had no idea why. Even now, she didn't know if he'd been telling the truth.

"You're not saying your friend was Magnifi Gramarye, are you?"

No-one had the courage to voice it, but the unspoken words still echoed in her head.

"If Lamiroir's father was Magnifi Gramarye, that would make her Thalassa Gramarye. That would make her Zak's wife, Jove's wife, the object of Valant's badly hidden affections he never acted on."

"Apollo and Trucy were such massive fans of yours, Lamiroir; Surely they would have recognised if you were their mother, the woman who abandoned her children twice over, who left her son for dead."

So she fled.

She blinked back the threatening tears in her eyes, needing her vision more than ever to dodge trees. She didn't dare stop moving, had to keep herself occupied so the full force of what she had recovered didn't knock her down with the sheer weight of it all.

This was why she'd been so scared of her past. Somehow, despite the iron door she had built to keep it all away, she had always known it would hurt this much to go back to who she used to be, and the shame of knowing on some level exactly what she was doing had only grown heavier by the day; She had ten long years of guilt built-up for her daughter, and twenty-two years worth for her son... though, for her first-born, it felt like so much more. That the two of them were, after all these years, alive and together as siblings was some kind of miracle, but it did little to soothe her pain at the knowledge they had grown up without their mother.

Her father was dead. This was news, and brought a pain all its own. What had happened to him? Why wasn't she there for it?

Her son wasn't dead. What had truly happened to her baby in Khura'in that she never found him, that had kept them apart? How had he ended up in California, with Trucy?

On that note, where was Zak? Why was he no longer with Trucy? Had something happened to him too, just as with Jove before him?

Had Valant recognised Thalassa during the rehearsals of the concert? She remembered him being very friendly to her, but nothing that specifically hinted either way that he'd known Lamiroir's face.

Speaking of Valant, she remembered him boasting about how he was going to 'bring back Troupe Gramarye'; Whatever had happened after the death of her father, whatever had caused Zak's mysterious disappearance, it had clearly torn the Troupe apart. She couldn't resist thinking it was a shame that it had been left to Valant to rebuild it (though he was certainly a better option than Reus would have been), especially when Trucy and Apollo were out there proving themselves as worthy successors to their grandfather's name. She felt a brief surge of pride at the memory of how well they had played off each other on stage, even if she hadn't been able to understand all of it, and couldn't see the tricks they were no doubt performing with the professional air expected of a Gramarye.

Finally, her feet stilled. As she had been longing to do since Flora said their names, she pulled the folded photo from her pocket, and gazed upon the smiling face of Machi looking up at her. Slowly, she straightened out the right and then the left folds, truly looking for the first time at the figures in "L-Lamiroir... your bracelet... May I... ask where you came by it?"

"I... I'm afraid to say I do not know. I remember nothing of the time before I was given it. I hold on to it because it gives me comfort... even if I do not remember why."

"Then we won't press you. We're sorry for bringing it up."

Apollo, in red. The resemblance he bore to his father was uncanny... even more so now he had surpassed the age Jove had been when he died. His left hand was held up to wave at the camera, the bracelet she had given him proudly displayed for all to see.

"Hi, Lamiroir! Are you doing okay on your own?"

"I am surviving. Were you worried about me?"

"Of course we were worried! Do you have someone to show you around the courthouse? It's real easy to get lost around here if you don't know the way."

Trucy, in blue. Ten years had not altered that gleeful grin, that spark of innocence in Trucy's eyes that echoed the four-year-old who used to bounce on her mother's knee. Although Trucy and Machi were indeed the same age, the girl was a little taller than her younger brother, and proud of it.

"We can get something in the restaurant. We'll manage until after, right Truce?"

"A professional magician can perform even on an empty stomach!"

"Ah yes, I forgot you two were magicians. I'm told magic is a very visual medium... but, truthfully, it has always intrigued me. If you don't mind, I would quite like to hear your show."

"Really!?"

"That would be amazing! We'll be extra noise-y today, just for you!"

They looked so at home in their magician costumes. Trucy's was clearly patterned after her mother's, the same teal blue of her eyes. Apollo's was a bright crimson red, much brighter than Zak's pinkish shade, and featured a high collar all the men in Troupe Gramarye sported. Their capes were pinned around their necks with some kind of symbol she couldn't make out, only that it was a golden colour. Although Trucy's scarf was a crimson red similar to her mother's, Apollo wore a tie that was a very distinct teal... the same colour as his sister's cape.
"Lamiroir, tell him! Tell him what you decided!"

"I am going to England, and having an eye operation."

"You mean, you'll be able to see again?"

"If the light returns to my eyes, I think I will take up painting."

"Really!? Like, become an actual landscape painter, not just of sound?"

"I will paint the three of you. I promise... Apollo, Luke, Trucy... I hope that we will meet again someday soon."

"Y-you bet! Me too!"

"We'll be waiting."

Thalassa let her tears freely stream down her cheeks as the voices in her head merged with the smiling faces in front of her eyes. Flora was right; They had recognised her almost immediately. They had seen how scared she was of her past self and they had kept that truth to themselves. No wonder Apollo and Trucy in particular had sounded so emotional as they said goodbye to her after Machi's first trial. For all they knew, that could have been the last time they saw their mother, ever. Her tears only strengthened as she wondered how much pain they had suffered, hiding that part of themselves (for the identity of their mother was surely a part of them, as much as the identities of her own parents were a part of Thalassa) and defending a brother who had that childhood with her they had missed out on... although, she doubted Apollo and Trucy were jealous of Machi, not after how strongly they had fought for his freedom. Had they let him in on their secret? Judging by the photo in her hands, all three of her children had accepted each other as family. Really, that was all she could ask for right now.

"Lamiroir?"

Thalassa jumped, clutching the picture tight in her hands as she spun around, blinking the water from her eyes. Sycamore was standing nearby, still sopping wet from the river and with his cape draped over one arm, dripping into the grass below. He watched her carefully, confused and concerned.

"Are you alright?"

Thalassa nodded; Naturally, Sycamore had left before Geary started to talk, so he was still ignorant of all they had learned from him... of all she had learned from him. "I'm... I'm fine." She sighed, looking back at the photo in her hands. "This is... the first time I've lain eyes on all three of my children." Sniffing, she wiped the water from her cheeks, struggling not to descend into sobs out in the middle of nowhere.

There was a long silence. Footsteps crunched through the grass towards her, and Sycamore's hand rested on her shoulder. "Listen, by now, the authorities will have noticed something happened at the arena, and will be gathered there waiting for us. If we take a slightly longer route, I think we can avoid them by going through the cemetery and taking the western bridge." He paused slightly before he continued: "If you'd prefer, I can take you back to the Bostonius instead of the bed and breakfast. It will be quieter there."

The smile on Thalassa's face fought with the grimace of her restrained tears. "Thank you, Mister Sycamore. I appreciate your help." She pressed the photo of her children to her chest, as if it might send her love for them straight to their hearts halfway across the world. 'Just a little longer, my dears. I have a few more things to do first.' "However, if we are passing through Etelaranta Cemetery, I believe there's someone there I need to visit."

Sycamore looked confused, but didn't comment. He shook his cape out in an attempt to dry it before draping the wet fabric over his shoulders and securing it there. With a wave of his arm, he directed Thalassa to follow his lead. "This way, then. To the cemetery."
Hershel tugged on his hat as he watched Lamiroir - or was that Missus Gramarye, now? - walk off into the trees. As gratifying as it was to know his theory had been correct from the beginning, he hoped the singer would be able to cope with what she had relearned all at once.

Alfendi clung tight to his father's jacket. "Is Lamiroir okay?"

Before Hershel could assure his son, Geary sighed, slumping in the dirt. "She's right. I don't deserve forgiveness."

"She has just recovered thirty years worth of memories all at once," Hershel pointed out, resting a hand on Alfendi's unruly red mop. "She will need some time alone to recover from that. I'm sure she will be wanting to talk to you more then, Mister Geary... Or do you prefer Mister Ystava?"

Geary scoffed bitterly. "I've been running for so long... Whether she forgives me or not, maybe Thalassa coming back is a sign." He moved to stand, and Flora hurried to help, pulling the old man to his feet. "Running from her, running from Magnus... Magnifi... Even running from Gaia. That's enough for me." He looked up to Hershel with a tired smile. "Winfred Geary... though perhaps better known as Varlous Gramarye, one of the founders of Troupe Gramarye."

Flora patted his arm, giving the man a warm look. "It's a pleasure to meet you, Mister Gramarye. My name is Flora."

Geary chuckled. "I owe you my thanks in particular, Flora. I've... never been threatened with a sword before."

"And we'll be telling Desmond off for that later," Emmy promised, shooting a glare into the trees behind her. "Honestly, I thought he'd got over that anger that drove him to try and kill people..."

"And yet you knew he was carrying his rapier," Hershel pointed out, though he gave Emmy a small smile when she wheeled round in shock. "You weren't at all surprised when you saw him using it to climb Mister Gramarye's contraption back at the arena."

Emmy blushed, fiddling with the sword in her hands. "W-well... Speaking of the arena, do you think anyone will have noticed the giant gaping hole that's suddenly appeared there?"

Geary sighed. "Oh... that definitely goes against my contract as caretaker..."

Hershel thought a moment, then held out his hand. "Give that to me, Emmy. We had best return to town and explain what happened."

Emmy handed over the sword, looking concerned. "Are you sure that's a good idea, Professor?" She shot a noticeable glance at Geary.

"It's certainly not a good idea to just leave the entire town in the dark," Hershel pointed out. "They need to be given an explanation for the destruction of their ancient ruin."
"But won't Mister Gramarye get in trouble?" Alfendi asked, sticking to his father's side.

Geary chuckled. "I will indeed," he replied. "As I should. If I had been less paranoid, less scared of facing Thalassa, I would have stopped and talked to you all when you first showed up... This never would have happened." He shook his head. "I need to face responsibility for this. I am too old for running."

Flora moved to his side, taking the man's arm. "We'll help you, Mister Gramarye. It's quite a way back to town from here, after all."

Emmy snorted, hiding a smile. "You can say that again."

Hershel only smiled as the group moved away from the river and into the forest. If only all his cases wrapped up as nicely as Geary had described.

Just as Sycamore had said, Thalassa was certain she could see a commotion over at the arena as they skirted the edge of town towards the western bridge. The old cemetery south of it was ringed by a low stone wall, and, instead of going around to find the gate and idling uncomfortably close to the circled vehicles at the nearby arena, Sycamore decided they should just climb over. It was difficult with Lamiroir's long skirt, and one of her hands still desperately clutching the photo of her children she refused to put back in her pocket just yet, but with Sycamore's help she was able to swing her legs over the worn stone and enter the graveyard on the other side.

"You said there was someone here you needed to visit?" Sycamore prompted as they walked through the graves, passing under the occasional trees that littered their autumn leaves on the grass below.

Thalassa nodded. "Gaëlle Gramarye. She was buried here in... December, 1990."

Sycamore raised an eyebrow. "Magnifi Gramarye's wife? I don't mean to be rude, but... whysyever for?"

Instead of responding, Thalassa turned her eyes to the graves, looking for any sign of her mother's name. She didn't feel she could face having to say her reasons aloud. "I don't remember where exactly she is. I'll need help looking, if it's alright with you, Mister Sycamore."

The man didn't react for a few moments, then finally nodded. "Of course."

Together, the pair wound their way through the cemetery, until Sycamore called Thalassa to a stop with a hand on her arm, pointing behind her without a word. When she turned to look, it didn't take her long to spot the older man crouched in the grass, laying flowers at the foot of a well-manicured grave site. The stone in front of him was clean and stood out from the much older gravestones closer to the road, the leaves from the nearby tree cleared into piles all around the rectangle of clear grass that marked the grave itself. Silently, Thalassa held up a hand, signalling for Sycamore to wait where he was, then walked down the path to where the man sat.

Hearing the crunching of the leaves behind him, the man at the grave jerked and looked around, wide eyes flitting between Thalassa and the still-damp Sycamore behind her. "L-Lamiroir?" Salinen asked.
Thalassa gave him a smile. "Actually... it's Thalassa," she told him in Bordinian, then turned her gaze to the gravestone behind him. "Thalassa Gramarye."

Salinen stared at her a moment, then sighed, returning his attention to the grave. "Of course it is," he muttered, the tone of his voice more sad than bitter. "You always looked so much like her..."

After a moment, Thalassa moved to sit at the man's side, reading the words on the stone in front of them: 'Gaelle Gramarye' was spread across the top, then 'Takala' in brackets below it. Underneath it all were the dates of her birth and death - 'Only thirty-three when she died?' Thalassa mused - then at the very bottom a quote that was attributed to Gaia herself: "Live magnificent and live marvellous, for Mother Earth watches over you". Considering how long it had taken her mother to die, Thalassa wondered if Gaia had planned the layout of her gravestone herself, lying in that cold bed day after day as her strength slowly sapped away.

"She was a singer too," Salinen muttered. "My isosisko... She left to seek her fortunes, and fell in with those magicians instead. Came back a few times over the years, then just disappeared off the face of the earth, not long before I finally founded the Restaurant de Chanson." He sighed, shaking his head. "I never knew what had happened until her letter arrived, after she died. She hadn't wanted me to worry about her, and didn't want me to see her when she was sick... Said I had to remember her as she was, when she was full of life."

Thalassa nodded. "I remember she loved singing. I don't recall much about her, but I do remember she loved to sing."

"I always hoped she'd sing on my stage one day," Salinen continued. "When you showed up, you reminded me of her so much, I couldn't bring myself to ask too many questions and spoil the fantasy. 'Lamiroir', the name, was hers originally. We came up with it, as the name she'd use on stage when she became a famous singer... but that never happened."

"It happened through me," Thalassa pointed out. "And, from what I remember of her, Mama never regretted taking up magic as her career. She was happy with how her life turned out, even though it was cut short."

Salinen sighed, then looked up at Thalassa. "That man who used to look after you... You found him?"

Thalassa nodded, returning his gaze with a stern stare. "Yes. Why did you try to lie when my friends asked you what you knew?"

At that, Salinen flinched guiltily, looking away. "He... I saw Geary a few times after hiring you at the Restaurant," he admitted. "Although he refused to answer any of my questions, he did tell me one thing, and made me promise I wouldn't share it with you, for your own safety."

"Safety?" Thalassa repeated.

"He said your life before had been in an evil place," Salinen explained. "That a new identity was the perfect escape you needed and you couldn't be allowed to go back."

Thalassa wrinkled her nose.

Salinen chuckled as he saw her disgusted expression. "Exactly my thoughts. He was insistent, though. Eventually, against my better judgement, I agreed not to tell you anything should you ever ask, or anyone else ever ask on your behalf. That was relatively easy, since I knew so little already... especially after I realised you'd forgotten about Geary once your short-term memory came back."
"Even so," Thalassa said, "I deserved to know... and I shouldn't have had to sing you a song to convince you of that."

At that, Salinen laughed. "True. And I apologise, Lamer, Thalassa."

Thalassa smiled. "Everything is forgiven, Monsieur Salinen." After a pause, she held up the photo still in her hand. "So, you must have a clearer memory of her than me: Do you think my mother would approve of her grandchildren?"

Salinen's eyebrows shot up in surprise as he looked over the photo. "You have two others?" When Thalassa only laughed in response, he shook his head. "Ah, she loved kids. I'm sure she'd be thrilled." He chuckled. "We were the hippie generation, you know. All about life and love." He gestured to the quote at the bottom of the gravestone. "Maybe it's time I followed her advice: Live for the moment, because Gaia is watching. She'd be terribly disappointed in her pikuveli if I showed up at the Pearly Gates with a sub-par life of misery behind me."

Thalassa laughed a second time, staring at the photo of her children in her hands. "A good idea," she agreed. "It's time I started living my life to the fullest, too. I have a lot to catch up on, after all."

Salinen smiled as he patted the singer's back. They didn't need to exchange any further words.

View Layton's Notebook
Thalassa said her goodbyes to Salinen and left the cemetery, heading north across the river. To protect her precious photo of her children, she was forced to return it to her pocket, but it was still too big to go in unfolded; She compromised by re-using the existing fold-lines, but this time folding Apollo and Trucy towards her, so she could open the picture like a book to reveal all three at once. At her side, Sycamore remained silent, having not said a word since their brief conversation in the cemetery; Thalassa could see he was burning with curiosity about what had happened in his absence, casting frequent glances at her and hiding annoyed frowns behind concerned smiles. Although she still felt unready to fully talk about it all - Where would she even start? And wouldn't she have to say it all over again for everyone else anyway? - she decided there was one way to at least catch him up to what everyone else had heard, and take care of her own burning questions at the same time.

As they left the town square behind them, heading east towards the airport, Thalassa turned to Sycamore. "May I ask you something?"

Sycamore blinked in surprise, meeting the singer's eyes. "Of course, Lamiroir. What is it?"

"Do you know anything about Troupe Gramarye?"

The man paused, pressing his glasses to his face. "W-well, I know a little, but not as much as Emmy. She did quite a bit of research into the troupe while we were in America; At their request, she was writing an article on the young Wrights... or Gramaryes, I should say."

Thalassa nodded, frowning in thought. "So, she would know how the troupe broke up? And what happened to Magnifi, and Zak?"

Sycamore watched her carefully. "Magnifi, I believe, is long dead," he said, surprisingly bluntly. "If I remember correctly, he was murdered. They couldn't make the evidence stick to Valant, and Zak vanished, so the culprit was never determined."

"He vanished," Thalassa repeated, a barely audible whisper. It broke her heart to think that Zak and Valant both had been accused of her father's murder... and that said accusation had driven Zak into hiding. "And Trucy?"

"Was left behind," Sycamore confirmed. "Mister Wright adopted her not long after."

Thalassa mutely nodded. She couldn't help thinking she should have been there for her daughter... though it did seem Phoenix had a habit of taking in her children when she could not, first with Trucy and now with Machi... "And Apollo?"

"He and Luke were adopted a short time later," Sycamore replied. "Although I wasn't in touch with the Wrights at the time, so I'm not too familiar with the details." He watched her a moment more, concerned. "Are you alright, Lamiroir?"

It took Thalassa a moment before she decided how to respond. "Actually... my name is Thalassa," she told him. "Thalassa Gramarye."
To his credit, Sycamore's stride faltered only half a step, sticking close to Thalassa's side. He didn't say anything, staring back at her with wide eyes before returning his attention to the path before them, his expression somewhere between a resigned frustration and awe... but mostly just thoughtful. Finally, he turned back to Thalassa with a smile. "The Bostonius isn't far ahead, Missus Gramarye. We can talk more there... if you feel up to it."

Thalassa nodded gratefully.

By the time the red plane came back into sight on the horizon, Thalassa felt she had finally recovered from the shock of rediscovering her past... although the pain of knowing what she had done to her children, even unintentionally, still stung deep. She let Sycamore lead her up the ladder to the open door and into the Bostonius' cabin.

"I'm sure Emmy won't mind you taking her bed tonight, if you'd rather not return to Madame Rose's."

Thalassa nodded. "Yes, thank you. Your offer is very kind."

Sycamore took her to a small bedroom on the lower level of the plane's back rooms, telling Thalassa to seek out either him or Raymond in the main cabin if she needed anything, then left her be.

Sitting on the bed, finally alone in the quiet, Thalassa felt the wave of grief building up at the back of her eyes, threatening to overwhelm her. She reached into her pocket, emptying it of the three pieces of paper within: First, Alfendi's hand-drawn map of the town; Second, Machi's adoption form, only half filled in; Third and last, the photo of her children. The map and adoption form she placed to the side for now, hugging the photo to her chest as she lay on her side, finally letting out her tears for the listening pillow.

It was a few hours before she felt anything close to normal again.

When Thalassa finally felt ready to face the outside world once more, the first thing she did was locate the plane's bathroom to wash her face. The second thing she did was head to the main cabin.

"Mister Sycamore?" she asked of the now-dry man, who was standing at an ironing board that had his suit jacket draped over it. "May I borrow a pen?"

Sycamore returned her gaze blankly for a moment. "Of course, Missus Gramarye," he agreed, placing the iron down and heading to a nearby chest of drawers, opening one to dig around inside. "Emmy keeps them all over the place. Can I ask why you need one?"

Thalassa smiled as she took the offered pen. "Something I've been meaning to do for a long time." From her pocket, she pulled out Machi's adoption form and settled down on the sofa to fill it out.

With the gentle sounds of Sycamore drying out his wet clothing nearby, Raymond doing maintenance in the cockpit, and Keats purring from the other end of the lounge, Thalassa crouched over the adoption form to dig out long-forgotten minutiae about herself that would finally satisfy the Borginian officials in Poma that she was worthy of Machi. Her birthdate in particular made her laugh, realising she had accidentally made herself a year younger than she actually was when they filled in the first form four years previous... though her birthday was only four months off, which was certainly closer to the truth than it could have been.

Once Sycamore had finished with his suit jacket and put away the iron and board, he approached the singer, slipping his jacket back on and finally looking back to normal - What had happened to his cape, Thalassa had no idea, only that it had vanished sometime during her self-exile in Emmy's room. With an overly practised air, he pulled the frills of his shirt from his sleeves, looking over the paper on the table curiously. "Is that some kind of government form?"

Thalassa nodded. "So I can adopt Machi," she explained. "I've been trying for years, but my blindness always got in the way."

Sycamore hummed in thought, slowly lowering himself to sit at her side. "Apollo and Trucy would love that, I'm sure," he mused. "They get their mother back, and a new brother."

At that, Thalassa had to laugh, pulling her photo of the three from her pocket to show him. "Do you think they might have told Machi? He's getting a brother and sister out of this deal, after all."

"Possibly," Sycamore admitted, smiling. "In any case, he'll know when he signs that." He gestured to the form on the table. "You've given your name as 'Thalassa Gramarye'; He'll have to guess that means 'Lamiroir'."

Thalassa smiled. "Then I will consider it permission for Apollo and Trucy to tell him," she decided. "If they haven't already, of course."

Raymond cleared his throat from the cockpit above, attracting the pair's attention. "Master, Emmy is returning... along with the Layton family."

Sycamore sighed. "Thank you, Raymond." He turned to Thalassa with an apologetic grimace. "I had to tell them where we'd gone; I can only assume my insistences we were alright have been ignored."

"I understand," Thalassa replied. "I'm sure they have many questions for me... and I have questions for them." She turned her eyes to the photo in her hands. "You said Emmy was the expert on Troupe Gramarye, didn't you?"

After a short pause, Sycamore nodded. "Yes, that's right." He groaned as he pushed himself to his feet. "I'll go let them in, then. I'm quite looking forward to asking my brother to explain himself."

Thalassa raised an eyebrow, but the man didn't elaborate, instead turning around and heading off to the closed door on the far wall of the cabin. Deciding to leave him be, she turned back to the form on the table, folding it up to return to her pocket.

A meow from the end of the sofa brought Thalassa's attention to the plane's resident cat, padding along the cushions towards her. He bumped his head against her arm, then curled up at her side, lanky limbs neatly folded up underneath him as he quickly dropped off to sleep, purring against her leg.

Thalassa smiled. "Me too, Keats." She held up the photo of her children, smoothing out the creases. "Unfortunately, I have a lot more to do before I can rest today."
The Siren's Secret, The Story Comes Together

September 14, 1:32PM
Kopunchiville Airport

It had been a very strange morning, Flora mused to herself, even when taking into account that it was one of her father's investigations. After Varlous Gramarye had told them who both he and Lamiroir were and apologised for all the trouble he caused, they had escorted him back to the arena, which they found crawling with officials and curious bystanders. Needless to say, their odd group emerging from the forest attracted attention, two of them still dripping wet from their dip in the Rapi Joki and Hershel visibly holding an unsheathed sword in one hand, Alfendi clinging to his side. Emmy and Varlous handled talking to the officials; Using them as translators, Hershel insisted with a smile that the sword was his, and that he'd been practising fencing in the woods. Once their story was out, Varlous left in a police car to be questioned at the station.

With Varlous taken care of, Hershel turned his attention to Flora, still standing in her soaked dress. The group promptly hurried back to Madame Rose's, to allow her to dry off and change; Madame Rose had cried in shock when she saw the state the young woman was in, and spent the next few hours fussing over Flora, even inviting her into the kitchen to make lunch together. In that time, Sycamore gave Hershel a call, explaining he was with Lamiroir at the Bostonius; Despite his insistences they were both okay, none of the group really believed it.

Thus, after lunch, they headed straight for the airport.

It was Alfendi who spotted the flapping cape on the railing of the Bostonius' upper deck, where it had apparently been secured to dry off in the wind. The retractable ladder that only came out in the absence of airport stairs was missing, likely folded back into its cubby-hole below the plane's closed door.

"Well, just like Desmond said, they're in there," Emmy said, leading the wary group closer to the plane.

Flora held the paper bag in her hands tight. "Do you think Uncle...?"

"He's had plenty of time to calm down," Hershel pointed out, the rapier in his grip swinging loosely as he walked. "I'm sure he's been taking excellent care of Lamiroir."

Alfendi said nothing, but pressed a little tighter to his father's side.

As the quartet reached the shadow of the plane's wing, the door in the fuselage above swung open, revealing Sycamore glaring down at them. "I thought I told you we didn't require assistance."

"Who said we didn't believe you?" Hershel replied with a smooth smile, and held up the sword in his hand. "I merely intended to return this."

"-and Madame Rose gave us some food for Lamiroir," Flora added, holding up the paper bag. "In... case she hadn't had lunch?"

Alfendi was less subtle about their true intentions: "Are you and Lamiroir okay, Uncle?"

Sycamore sighed, deciding not to react to their claims. "Well, the four of you are in luck," he said.
"Missus Gramarye happens to be willing to take visitors right now." He leaned down, fiddling with the panel directly under the door, and a moment later the retractable ladder popped out of the fuselage with a clunk, snapping noisily into place. As he stood up, Sycamore singled out Emmy with a glare. "She has questions in particular for you, Miss Reporter."

Emmy blinked, confused. "Me?"

"You're the expert on Troupe Gramarye, aren't you?" Sycamore replied with a raised eyebrow, then stepped back into the plane and out of sight.

It didn't take long for them all to climb the ladder and enter the Bostonius' cabin. Hershel was quick to hand the rapier back to its owner, and Sycamore took it with averted eyes before disappearing into the back rooms. With the rest of them still awkwardly standing around the door as Emmy closed it behind them, Flora decided to take the lead, approaching Thalassa on the sofa. "Lamiroir?"

Thalassa looked up with a smile, moving a piece of paper from her lap to the table; As Flora got closer, she noticed the paper was the unfolded photo of Machi, Apollo and Trucy, and a familiar ball of purple fluff was curled up against the woman's side. "Please, 'Missus Gramarye' is fine."

Hershel chuckled as he joined his daughter, taking off his hat. "I'm glad to see you're doing better, Missus Gramarye."

Flora nodded, then held out the paper bag in her hand. "We told Madame Rose you weren't feeling well, so she gave us something to pass on... if you haven't eaten lunch yet."

Thalassa looked a little surprised, then took the bag gratefully. "I shall have to thank her later. I've been so... distracted these past couple of hours, I didn't even notice the time."

It was then Flora noticed Emmy and Alfendi joining them, the young boy racing to Thalassa's side with a worried look. "Are you okay, Lami- um, Missus Gramarye?"

"I'm doing better than I was earlier," Thalassa admitted with a kind smile, placing the paper bag on the table. "Though I've certainly felt happier."

Alfendi nodded solemnly. "I get Papa to read me a story when I'm feeling sad," he said. "Maybe we could tell you a story and you'll feel better?"

Thalassa laughed. "Well, there was something I did have in mind to ask." Her smile died as she looked up to where Emmy stood behind Hershel. "I'm told you know what happened to Troupe Gramarye in my absence."

Emmy looked uncomfortable, glancing behind her to where Sycamore had reappeared from the back rooms. "Y-yeah, I guess I know more about that than anyone else here," she agreed.

Without a word, everyone settled down on the horseshoe of purple couches; Alfendi sat at Thalassa's side, opposite from where Keats was still curled up, and Hershel sat next to his son, placing his hat on the empty cushion beside him. On the other side of the table, Flora, Emmy and Sycamore filed in, Emmy facing Thalassa with a determined frown.

"You disappeared... in 2016, right?" Emmy asked.

Thalassa nodded. "An accident in rehearsal," she explained. "I don't remember the exact details, but I'm sure that's what happened."
Emmy thought for a moment. "It wasn't long after that Magnifi got sick," she began. "It was liver cancer, I think."

At that, Thalassa sighed. "Of course it was cancer."

"The troupe settled around L.A. while he was in the hospital," Emmy continued. "He was bedridden, and, one day, he sent letters to his two apprentices; That night, he asked them to come to his room and shoot him in the head."

Flora gasped, while Thalassa simply gave Emmy a horrified look. "Why did he do that!?!" Flora asked.

Emmy shook her head. "No-one knows... but, for some equally unknown reason, neither Zak nor Valant disobeyed him."

Thalassa stared for a moment before her gaze turned down, glaring at the table. "Dad, you didn't..." she whispered.

"Zak went first, then Valant," Emmy continued. "Magnifi was shot in the head, just like he asked. And the police arrested Zak for the murder." She paused, brushing at her hair. "When the case went to court, Zak's attorney brought up the possibility that Valant had rearranged the crime scene... but it wasn't enough to remove suspicion from Zak. Right as the judge was about to call his verdict, instead of taking it quietly, Zak called the trial to a halt and... disappeared in a cloud of smoke."

"He vanished," Thalassa quietly repeated to herself, remembering Sycamore's words.

"Gone from the courthouse, just like that," Emmy replied with a nod. "Nobody ever saw him again. The police turned to Valant next, but the evidence stuck to him even less than Zak, so they ended up just letting him go. The troupe was broken."

Sycamore sighed, pushing his glasses up his nose. "And thus Trucy was left behind," he pointed out.

Flora found herself thinking back to the yellow-caped man they had so briefly met in the Wrights' home, so enthusiastic and professional, just like the honorary niece he was so proud of. Speaking of... "Wait, Valant seemed pretty close to Trucy. Why didn't he adopt her instead of Mister Wright?"

"The police suspected him of murder," Sycamore pointed out. "Trucy was likely the last thing on his mind... and even if she wasn't, he couldn’t adopt a child while facing a charge as serious as that."

Thalassa tapped at her bracelet idly. "I wonder if it was for similar reasons to why Uncle Geary left..."

"Why didn't Trucy mention her uncle before?" Alfendi asked. "He visited her, didn't he?"

Hershel shook his head. "I'm afraid not. Luke mentioned in his last letter that this concert was the first time he and Valant had ever crossed paths; If Valant had ever visited Trucy, it was before either of the other Wrights were adopted."

Thalassa gave him a curious look. "When was that?"

"2019. October, specifically," Hershel replied. "The whole mess with Magnifi was in April or May, if I recall correctly."

At that, Thalassa nodded thoughtfully, her gaze returning to the table.
Sycamore scoffed, giving his brother a humourless smirk. "You knew the whole time, didn't you? Who Missus Gramarye here really was?" He crossed his arms. "This is what Luke was hiding. He told you all about it."

Hershel just smiled.

"Wait, really?" Emmy asked.

Flora sighed. "Of course Luke knew. Apollo and Trucy knew. They would have told him!" She huffed. "So why'd they hide it from us? And why didn't you tell us, Professor!? Why'd we come to Borginia at all!?"

Instead of answering his daughter, Hershel turned to Thalassa. "Apologies if I'm wrong, Missus Gramarye," he said, "but you hired me to recover your memories, correct?"

Thalassa smiled. "I did. And I'm sure simply telling me my name wouldn't have done much to help in that regard."

Hershel nodded, turning to Flora. "And, despite all the evidence for it, I was reluctant to say anything for sure until said memories were recovered in full."

Sycamore rolled his eyes. "Of course you were."

Flora felt she had no choice but to reluctantly accept that. "W-well... Then, why did the Wrights insist she come to us instead of just telling her themselves?" she asked. "They knew for sure!"

"I can't blame them," Thalassa spoke up. "At the time, Apollo and I had just witnessed a murder. It was the worst possible time for a revelation as big as that."

"Ooh, yeah!" Alfendi chirped. "You had to find the murderer first before he killed again!" He giggled, wriggling his fingers by his face. "Like by hitting someone with his hair."

Thalassa raised an eyebrow; It took Flora a moment to remember she had never seen Daryan Crescend's unusual hairstyle.

"But how did they recognise you at all, Missus Gramarye?" Sycamore wondered aloud. "Trucy would have been very young when you disappeared, and I'm sure I've heard Apollo couldn't remember anything at all about his birth parents. With that veil you were wearing, I doubt anyone got a good enough look at your face to remember it."

Thalassa smiled, her hand resting on the bracelet around her right wrist. "They saw my bracelet," she explained, and looked to the photo resting on the table in front of her. "I see Apollo still wears his, too."

"That's how I realised who you were, myself," Hershel replied with a knowing smile. "Or, at least, it helped raise my suspicions."

Hershel chuckled. "I said no such thing," he said. "Luke kept everything he knew firmly to himself."

Sycamore grumbled, "So you weren't lying when you said he kept quiet..."
"He didn't hide it very well, but hide it he did," Hershel continued. "I suspected the only reason he would make such efforts would be on behalf of his family, and my suspicions were only strengthened when that photo arrived." He gestured to the photo on the table. "I saw Apollo's bracelet was similar to Lamiroir's, and that Apollo and Trucy were in this photo while Mister Wright and Luke were not. I'm sure they were very careful to plan all that, specifically for when Missus Gramarye remembered them."

Flora huffed. "And you said that photo didn't mean anything!"

Hershel chuckled. "I said Luke had his reasons," he gently corrected her. "I never said it didn't mean anything."

Although she grumbled, Flora had to admit he was telling the truth there.

Thalassa had stopped paying attention to the conversation, sad eyes turned on the photo of her children. "I have missed so much of their lives," she quietly spoke up. "Apollo is grown... Trucy is a teenager..."

"All the more reason not to miss anything more," Hershel assured her, shifting in his seat to face the singer. "To dwell on what you've lost in the past is only to lose the present as well. It's the hardest thing you'll ever do, but you must learn to forgive yourself, and move past it."

Flora felt her anger at Hershel instantly fade away. When he kept secrets like this, it was always for a good reason... and if anyone knew how to deal with the pain of loss, a pain Thalassa was clearly drowning in right now, it was her father.

Thalassa thought for a long moment, then slowly smiled. "Thank you, Professor Layton. I will certainly try."

Hershel smiled back, then reached into his jacket. "In the meantime, maybe these will help." He took out a closed envelope, stuffed full. "Every photo of his family Luke has sent me over the years; It took a while to make all these copies, but I thought you might be interested."

Thalassa hesitated before taking the envelope, and paused before meeting Hershel's eyes. "Thank you." As Hershel nodded in reply, she gently pulled open the flap and grabbed the small pile of paper within. Placing the envelope down, she frowned in confusion at the photo on top. "Is that...?"

Alfendi grinned, peering over at the photo from her side. "That's Luke," he told her, then his smile faded. "Is his arm broken there? That looks like a cast..."

"He broke his arm just after he moved to America," Flora explained. "That's probably from around the time he was adopted."

Thalassa softly laughed to herself, staring at the photo. "They all look so young..." Her gaze turned back to Hershel, looking slightly teary. "Thank you so much, Professor."

Hershel only smiled. "It was no problem at all, ma'am."

View Layton's Notebook
It was quiet when Thalassa pushed open the door to the orphanage... probably, she mused, because she had waited until all the kids were likely to be in school. If she was right, only Madame Bonte and Monsieur Lomake were going to be in the building, and she looked around for any sign of where they were as she gingerly approached the front desk.

A chair scuffed across carpet in the next room, and a moment later Bonte poked her head around the door to the cramped office. "Ah, Lamiroir!" she cried as she spotted the visitor, quickly emerging to circle the desk and shake her friend's hand. "What are you doing back here so soon? We just saw you yesterday!"

Thalassa laughed. "Actually, I'm leaving town today; I just had a couple of errands to run, then I'm heading back to England."

Bonte paused, staring at the singer with wide eyes. "You're leaving already? But you only just arrived!"

"That is true," Thalassa admitted, her smile fading. "But, my business here is done. I would be heading straight back to America if I could, but I still have health check-ups to attend after my operation."

"Ah, yes, back to Machi," Bonte realised, nodding. "He'll be waiting for you indeed." She rested a hand on the nearby desk. "Did you come to say goodbye?"

"Actually, I had some business," Thalassa replied, grinning again as she reached into her pocket. A moment later, she had pulled out a piece of paper, holding it out for Bonte to take. "I've filled in Machi's adoption form."

Bonte gasped, smiling wide as she took the paper. "Oh, Lamiroir, that's perfect!" She scuttled around the desk, laying the form down on the wooden surface and flattening it out to peruse. "Yes, yes, looks like we've got everything we need!" She paused, then pointed to one of the answers Thalassa had filled in. "Didn't you have Machi's birthday on the last one?" she asked. "On account of your missing memory?"

Thalassa hid a smile. "I did," she agreed. "I think Machi will still know it is me, though... even with my real name on it."

Bonte blinked, giving Thalassa a confused look, then turned her gaze back to the form. She gasped as she saw the name at the top, eyes wide. "G-Gr-Gra...! L-Lamiroir!" She pointed at the name. "That's your real name!?"

At that, Thalassa couldn't help but laugh. "Who'd've thought? And neither one of us suspected when you so happily told me all about my mother and father at the arena yesterday."

Bonte stood in silent amazement for a few moments before sighing and laughing herself. "My my... You really are a siren of many secrets, aren't you?" She picked the form off the desk, folding it back up again. "I'll finish filling in our details, and send this off later today."
"You have my endless thanks, Madame Bonte," Thalassa replied. "You've been so much help over the years, to both me and Machi."

"Oh, dear, I'm just doing my job," Bonte insisted, but she blushed with pride. Circling the desk, she held out her arms. "Come here; Let me give Gaia's daughter one last hug goodbye before she heads off for her new life."

Thalassa didn't hesitate to accept the offer.

The officers at the police station, just as Thalassa had hoped, were all too eager to assist the famous Lamiroir when she came to them for help... even if they clearly questioned why a celebrity such as her was wanting to speak to the hermit who had destroyed the town's ancient arena only the previous day. To their credit, they said nothing to her face, leading her through to his holding cell at the back of the building.

It was a sparse room, cut in two by a row of metal bars. On the near side was a messy desk and a couple of chairs. On the far side, an old man lay on a lone bed, staring with wide eyes at the women coming through the door.

"Just call if you need us, Madame," the young officer told Thalassa.

"Of course," Thalassa replied. "I'll come get you when I'm done."

The officer nodded once, then left, gently pulling the door closed behind her.

Geary got up from where he'd been lying on the thin mattress, sitting on the end of the bed. "Th... Thalassa?"

Without a word, Thalassa grabbed the nearest chair and pulled it over opposite to where the man sat, sitting down to face him. She took a deep breath as she settled, then asked, "Are you alright in here, Uncle Geary?"

"Of course, of course," Geary insisted, nodding. "I... did a pretty terrible thing, so I need to face punishment. Mostly they're still figuring out what it's going to be, though."

Thalassa paused. "I've recovered everything I could of my life before the accident, but there's still a year or so in the middle that's just blackness. I was... hoping you could shed some light on it."

Geary gave her a tight smile, tears pricking at the corners of his eyes. "Magnifi told me you were shot."

"I think I was," Thalassa admitted. "The last thing I remember is rehearsals for one of Zak and Valant's gun tricks, and the doctors told me it was an injury to my head that caused my blindness."

The old man absorbed that information silently. "The troupe was in Poma at the time. It looked like you were going to die, so Magnifi sent you to me. He was distraught... but he had his apprentices to look after, or at least that was what he told me." He ran a hand through his thinning hair. "I think he couldn't bear to see you fade away like Gaia, or maybe he thought you'd want to go to the same place she did... maybe both."
"But I didn't die," Thalassa pointed out. "Did he never send for me back?"

Geary shook his head. "When you woke up, you couldn't see, and needed to stay in one place to adjust... but you'd also lost both your existing memories and any ability to make new ones. A human goldfish. You weren't fit to be going back to the troupe, even if you were alive."

Thalassa sighed; She had to admit that was a good point. "But I adjusted to my blindness. My short-term memory came back. You sent me to Monsieur Salinen to set me up as a singer like Mama. I know I had recovered that much by the time Dad died."

Geary winced, looking away. "Don't get me wrong, Thalassa, I kept Magnifi up-to-date on your condition. He... He thought you'd be happier in one place, somewhere safe to recover all your memories." His eyes closed. "Failing that... we both agreed giving you a new life of your own to live was the kind thing to do. If you remembered who we were, you'd come looking for us."

"And I did," Thalassa pointed out.

"You did," Geary agreed, nodding. "And I ran, because I had given myself a new life, and I had long put you in the past as... as yet another someone who was better off without me around to ruin everything."

Thalassa stared at him for a moment, pondering over his choice of words. "When I was young, Dad told me you used to travel with us, before Mama got sick," she said. "Why didn't you come back after she died?"

Geary didn't meet her eyes for a long moment. "Did you know Magnifi and I became friends as children?"

Although she wasn't sure why he was asking, Thalassa nodded. "I think I remember being told that."

"Our names were next to each other on the class roster, so we were sat together in school," Geary continued. "Geary and Grammar, Winfred and Magnus. We became friends, and did everything together. I found my talents in building things, and Magnus was always fond of acting and tricks, so it all got combined into magic shows we'd perform for our families and friends." A nostalgic smile settled on his lips. "'Y'know, it's generally accepted nowadays, but back then homosexual relationships were frowned upon greatly."

Thalassa's eyebrows shot up at the sudden change of subject. "Were you two...!?"

Geary laughed, shaking his head. "No, no; As far as I know, Magnifi was always straight. I harboured such love for him for so many years, but I was too terrified to voice it, so I kept it to myself and settled for merely being his back-up, his brother in all but blood. We left home as young men, changed our names to Magnifi and Varlous Gramarye, and took our act on the road. We travelled all over Europe, looking for work, and endlessly improving our act. Eventually, it got to the point we needed a second person on stage."

At that, Thalassa frowned. "But weren't you...?"

"No, I've always hated being the centre of attention," Geary explained with a smile. "I made my contraptions and left it to Magnifi to be the star. When we simply couldn't do without someone to assist him up there, we decided to audition for a third member of our act."

Thalassa gasped. "Oh, I think I know this part... Isn't this how Mama joined you?"

Geary nodded. "Yep, that was when we met Gaia, and she became a Gramarye." He chuckled to himself. "I remember thinking, when I first saw her, what a hippie she was... This was the late-seventies, and she still acted like it was the mid-sixties!" His laughter faded. "She was such a free soul. Not even we could contain her, though we wanted to; She caught both our eyes, and I think she knew the moment it happened."

Thalassa felt a frown tugging at her lips. Two Gramarye men, both in love with a younger Gramarye woman? The entire situation was far too familiar for comfort.

"But, to her credit, Gaia truly believed in all that hippie stuff about free love," Geary continued. "She sat us down and told us she refused to let our friendship be ruined out of a rivalry for her affections; She loved us both equally, and she wanted it to stay that way." He paused, then gave Thalassa a concerned look. "He never told you about any of this, did he?"

Thalassa shook her head. "I was told how Dad and Mama met, and that they fell in love after," she replied. "This is the first I've heard of any 'free love'..."

Geary snorted bitterly. "I don't think it ever fully sat well with Magnifi. He went along with it for Gaia, and I'd like to think he did it for our friendship too... but he was always such a good actor. Neither of us suspected...." He sighed, dismissing the subject with a wave of his hand. "Anyway. When Gaia became pregnant with you, she was adamant that it mattered not one bit whether you were mine or Magnifi's, that you belonged to all three of us equally; Gaia was Mama, Magnifi was Daddy... and I was Papa."

Thalassa blinked in surprise. "You... You weren't always my uncle." Just like he'd said the previous morning. No wonder this solution had never been proposed between her, Zak and Valant. It was hard enough learning to love again after Jove's and Apollo's deaths (or supposed death in Apollo's case, as it turned out)... Even if she had known it was a possibility, she doubted she could have allowed both men into her heart at once the way her mother had for Magnifi and Geary.

Geary only nodded. "You were a couple of years old at the time Gaia was diagnosed with cancer," he continued. "She couldn't continue travelling, not in her condition and with all the treatments she had to undergo... but, at the same time, we couldn't afford all those treatments with all four of us staying put for so long. After a lot of discussion, we came up with a plan: Magnifi would continue travelling, performing on his own; I would stay with Gaia to look after her and provide support, building the props and set-pieces Magnifi needed and sending them to him to put up himself; Gaia, obviously, would stay put for her treatments, and wanted to return to her hometown - here in Kopunchiville - to do that." He paused a moment. "Gaia was in no state to look after a two-year-old, and I was going to be too busy with her to keep an eye on you myself. You ended up going with Magnifi."

Thalassa bit her lip in thought. Her earliest memories were of the days she travelled alone with her father, while her mother slowly withered in a place far away.

"I think you had just turned five when I learned you were no longer mine," Geary quietly said. "You and Magnifi were visiting, and before running in to see Gaia, you gave me a big smile and said 'Hello, Uncle Geary...'" He sighed, eyes closed. "I was too stunned to reply. Once you ran off, Magnifi told me he'd discovered you had his eyes, his ability to read body language and perceive what people were thinking... and that meant you were his. Not mine." The old man paused, holding back tears. "It wasn't just that I wasn't your Papa anymore, it was that the new name Magnifi had taught you... Uncle Geary. I wasn't even a Gramarye anymore." He pressed a hand to his eyes. "I'm sorry, I..."

"No, it's alright," Thalassa insisted. She couldn't help but feel sorry for the man, despite barely remembering him; If there was anything she could sympathise with, it was the simultaneous loss of a child and a spouse. That was the kind of pain that never truly got better.

Geary took a few moments to regain control of himself. "I never told Gaia, though I'm sure she heard you calling me by my new name; She was so weak by then, needing a wheelchair to get around. I practically rebuilt the entire house for her as her condition deteriorated... not that it helped. She still died." He sighed. "After her funeral, Magnifi and I didn't even discuss it. I stayed in that house, building my contraptions... and he continued travelling with you."

Thalassa wished they were close enough to reach out a comforting hand. "So, where does 'Ami Ystava' come into this?" she asked. "And that walking tank under the arena?"

Geary snorted. "'Ami Ystava' was an invention of Gaia's," he explained. "We didn't want to use the Gramarye name, to keep ourselves secret, so she gave me an alias to use while I was out and about." He smiled. "The arena came on sale a few years after she passed. We'd performed there so often, I started to feel like I owed it to Gaia to keep it intact. Eventually, I gave in and bought it, took over as caretaker." The smile died. "I built the underground tunnel to connect the two and travel between them secretly, since I dreaded having to walk the streets. There wasn't much space for building things in the house, so the large room under the arena came about as a workshop for all the grand ideas Magnifi sent me to make. After he died..."

"You didn't have anything to make anymore," Thalassa realised. "That's why you build the tank?"

After a moment's pause, Geary nodded. "I always had it in the back of my mind that I could use it to flee if anyone came looking for me," he admitted. "I was... very ready to leave everything about the Gramaryes behind by then."

Thalassa felt she couldn't blame him; After everything that had happened, she was starting to think the Gramarye name was cursed... and maybe she wasn't alone. "You told Monsieur Salinen I had come from an 'evil place', that it was better I didn't remember it. Did you truly believe that?"

Geary winced. "Maybe," he admitted. "My relationship with Magnifi certainly never recovered after Gaia's death... Maybe I was just wanting revenge. Maybe I was still bitter deep down that he took you from me, and I didn't want to send you back." He sighed, shaking his head, and his voice wavered as he added, "I don't know anymore."

Thalassa stared at the old man. He had lost two spouses, a child, and his life as a Gramarye... He had briefly kidnapped her, twice, but had never intended to hurt anyone. There was only one thing she needed to say, that he needed to hear: "I forgive you, Papa. For everything."

Geary looked up at her in surprise. A moment later, tears began to spill down his cheeks, a smile on his face. "Thank you, Thalassa."
"I haven't laughed this hard in so long!" Thalassa cried, leaning back against the sofa to keep from looking at the spread of photos from the past seven years arranged on the table in front of her, caught in a fit of hysterical laughter. "Of all the things to dress up as, they picked Troupe Gramarye!"

Alfendi scrunched up his nose. "It's not that funny..."

Opposite them, Flora hid giggles of her own. "Actually, I know the story behind that one," she said. "Trucy was using Halloween as an excuse to make Apollo a magician's costume, to convince him to join her on stage."

"She had to convince him?" Emmy asked in surprise, sitting next to Flora. "Apollo's such a natural up there; I'd've thought he'd jump at the chance to perform."

Flora shrugged. "From what I remember, Luke said Apollo was a little reluctant to learn magic, and he always grumbled when Trucy pulled him up on stage." She tapped a finger against her cheek in thought. "I can't recall exactly what made him change his mind, though. It was years ago."

Thalassa's laughter finally calmed, and she was able to look back down at the old photo of the young Wrights in their Gramarye costumes without being attacked by another round of giggles: Apollo was dressed in something nearly identical to Zak's outfit, standing with feet spread apart and his fists on his hips... although, the forced half-smile on his face diminished the confident pose somewhat. In front of him, short enough that her top hat didn't even reach her brother's chin, was Trucy; Her blue outfit was similarly a replica of Thalassa's own costume, the identical pose topped off with a wide grin undoubtedly taught to her by her father. Next to them, closer to Apollo's height than Trucy's, was Luke in the banana-yellow outfit of Valant's, complete with black streamers to imitate the man's hair; He was clearly hiding giggles, waving to the camera as he gave his siblings room to pose. Opposite Luke was the man the Laytons had introduced to her as Phoenix Wright, clad in a recreation of Magnifi's suit, complete with a fake beard that completely obscured his face; He gave the camera a smirk, shrugging and clearly making no attempt to 'get into character' like his children were. Although he similarly made her laugh, Thalassa returned her attention to her son. "I trust Apollo stopped looking so grumpy about wearing that eventually."

Flora nodded with a grin. "By the time I first met Apollo in person, he was as enthusiastic about it as Trucy!" She leaned forward, paging through some of the newer photos before picking one up to show to Thalassa: Apollo and Trucy, the latter now tall enough that she had to stand at her brother's side to keep from obscuring his chin with her hat, both of the pair posing much more confidently in outfits very like the ones they wore in the photo with Machi. In fact, the only difference Thalassa could see was that they wore different brooches to pin their capes together. "Here, this is one Luke brought back after Christmas holidays while he was at Gressenheller!"

Thalassa took the offered picture to compare to the Halloween one. Now she had the direct comparisons, she suddenly noticed how the newer outfits lacked the card suits on the cape ends, as well as numerous much smaller details that made Apollo’s magician get-up more distinctive to him... and even a few that moved Trucy's ever-so-slighter closer to her brother's crimson colour scheme. Already she found herself looking forward to asking the pair about their careers once she reunited
"We don't really do Halloween in England," Alfendi said, distracting Thalassa from her train of thought. "Did you ever do Halloween, Missus Gramarye?"

"A few times, yes," Thalassa replied, placing the photos in her hands back on the table. "If we were in America at the end of October, my father would let me dress up and take me trick-or-treating. We did the same thing for Trucy, too." She resisted the urge to wince. "We only managed it once for her, before the accident."

Emmy bit her lip in thought. "Magnifi Gramarye was originally American, wasn't he?" she asked. "I'm sure I read that somewhere."

Thalassa nodded. "I think so, yes. We travelled all over North America and Europe, but we seemed to spend the most time in the states." She paused, tapping a finger against her bracelet. "Considering how much he missed my mother, I'm a little surprised Dad took us back to Borginia as often as he did. We never went back to Kopunchiville, at least."

"That's how you knew the language?" Flora asked. "You said you were five when she died, so I assume you didn't keep it up after...?"

At that, Thalassa laughed. "My mother did teach me Borginian, yes," she agreed. "Maybe that was why Dad kept going back; It was only in Borginia we ever spoke Borginian to each other... the last link to Mama."

Alfendi huffed. "Mums are overrated," he declared. "Me and Flora don't have one, and Luke doesn't have one, and Uncle didn't have one either."

Emmy looked uncomfortable, scratching the back of her neck.

Flora gave her brother a disapproving look. "Alfendi..."

Thalassa patted the boy's back, hiding her amusement. "Maybe so," she agreed. "But I am Apollo and Trucy's mother, and even if they don't want a relationship with me, I still want them to know I care about them."

Alfendi thought her statement over a moment, then nodded. "That's okay then," he decided. "You can tell them that."

"Thank you, Alfendi," Thalassa replied, being sure to give the boy her warmest smile. "I can promise I will."

Outside, on the upper deck, Hershel and Sycamore stood in silence side by side, their hands resting on the railing as the massive propeller of the plane beat out its deep rhythm nearby. Below them, the Borginian countryside flowed past, green hills dotted with brown and grey settlements and the occasional flash of sunlight reflected off a river or lake.

"I feel like I should admonish you for keeping secrets," Sycamore said.

Hershel looked up with surprise at the silence abruptly being broken. "You're still upset?"
Sycamore sighed. "Not really," he admitted. "I suppose you had no reason to trust we could keep that secret also; You didn't want her to know because you didn't want her inventing false memories, correct?"

"Correct... but to your earlier point, no, I know you're capable of keeping secrets," Hershel pointed out, then smiled. "Isn't that right, Descole?"

Groaning, Sycamore rolled his eyes, ignoring his brother's amused chuckles as he stared out to the countryside below. "You're very fond of throwing that in my face lately."

Hershel shook his head, though his smile didn't fade. "Not really. Yesterday you needed something to snap you back to normal, but a few moments ago? I was just teasing you."

"I noticed."

It was hard for Hershel not to laugh again hearing his brother's dark tone. He paused before responding, the smile on his face fading away. "On a more serious note... that is the only name I've really called you by since we got back in touch."

Sycamore's stormy expression calmed. "That is true," he quietly agreed. "We've both been avoiding calling each other by name, haven't we?"

Hershel briefly managed to smile, but it quickly died. "The time never felt right to ask what you'd prefer," he admitted. "It felt overly familiar to call you 'Desmond' like Emmy, and you weren't a professor anymore, so falling back on 'Professor Sycamore' was out of the question... and I felt it would be an insult to call you 'Descole' when you were out of that mask."

"And 'Mister Sycamore' felt overly formal?" Sycamore picked up, giving his brother an empathetic smile. "That's why I stopped calling you just 'Layton', or even 'Professor Layton'... and only your closest friends called you 'Hershel', so..."

Hershel nodded, looking away. "I was also concerned... if I asked, your answer might have been to use our birth names."

At that, Sycamore scoffed. "Really? You honestly thought I'd want to take back the most important thing I ever gave you?" Before Hershel could do more than give him a stunned look, Sycamore laughed. "It was the name 'Hershel' that ensured you had a safe and happy life; I gave it away gladly. And I haven't gone by that name since I was seven, so it's not like I respond to it anymore." He snickered, shaking his head. "I mean, you'd never respond to 'Teddy' if anyone called you that either. I might as well ask to call you 'Bartholomew'!"

Hershel slowly smiled; To hear his secret fear dismissed so firmly was a great relief. "I thought my birth name was 'Theodore'?"

"Yes, well, that was what our father called you," Sycamore admitted, pushing his glasses up his nose with an embarrassed look. "To me, and to Mum, you were always Teddy."

With nothing to say in reply, Hershel looked out at the countryside below, deep in thought. When he heard details of his young life from Leon Bronev - and rarely had he ever asked for them - it had always felt like they were being forced on him... but from Sycamore, they were only brought up when requested, pure statements of facts intended to be looked at from a distance with none of the desire to return there that Bronev harboured; Hershel never had to feel guilty that he remembered only the barest of facts from that time, and that none of them were happy.

"Let's make an agreement, here and now," Sycamore offered, eyes sparkling with an excitement that reminded Hershel of Alfendi somehow. "You call me Desmond from now on. No awkwardness."

Hershel smiled, then gave his brother a nod. "And you call me Hershel."

"It's a deal," Sycamore replied, holding out his hand with a grin. Hershel didn't hesitate to shake it.

View Layton's Notebook
It had been a very long time since Machi had attended a regular school... and he was very quickly finding out just how different this large American 'High School' was to the tiny Kopunchiville Ekole that had maybe forty students total at any given time. To have so many students they had to be separated into birth years at all was intimidating enough; His old school had mostly informal groups of maybe ten to twenty students, with his former Kopunchiville classmates varying in age from four to eleven at the time he left. Here, he was beyond grateful to have been placed in the same classes as Trucy, and that she was extroverted enough to distract any unwanted attention away from him while also somehow being entirely focussed on making sure her brother understood what was going on. The only times they were really separated was during the more English-intensive requirements (English itself, History, and a few others he could never remember the English names for); While Machi went to a special ESL class, Trucy joined the rest of their classmates to do something far more complicated for the young Borginian to comprehend. Machi had only a month of American schooling under his belt, and though he felt much more confident in his English, he knew it was nowhere near good enough to take on the kinds of things Trucy did for homework.

This day in particular had been like any other: Machi and Trucy got up early for school, quietly ate and got dressed, kissed the sleeping Phoenix goodbye, and headed off alone to the bus-stop, as they did every school morning. Once there, they hung out with Trucy's friend Jinxie until the bell rang, and they all had to hurry to class. Recess and lunchtime were also spent as a trio, talking about their teachers and their homework and whatever other topics the girls had on their minds that day - Today had been all about a supernatural-themed TV show Jinxie had come across, and she had seemingly ranted all day about "the stuff they got wrong". Trucy and Machi had mostly just amused her, and once school ended she even apologised for her unusual talkativeness.

"Don't worry about it, Jinxie," Trucy assured her friend, arm slung over her shoulder.

Machi nodded in agreement. "We all do that sometimes. It good to let out."

Jinxie fidgeted for a moment before managing a small smile. "Thank you," she said. "I'll let you guys do the talking tomorrow."

Giggling, Machi shook his head. "You mean Trucy," he said. "She does talking for all three of us!"

Trucy only playfully scoffed as the pair laughed.

After a few minutes talking to Jinxie outside the school gates, Trucy and Machi finally headed off to the bus-stop to return home. It wasn't too long a journey, especially when they passed the time talking between themselves, and soon they were back on the street outside the agency, heading for that familiar flight of stairs.

"Today is Wednesday," Machi mused aloud. "Luke will be home."

"Ooh, yeah!" Trucy squeaked, bouncing at his side. "Think we should run to see him quicker?"

They saw Luke two afternoons of every school-week, and very often on the weekends too, but Trucy and Machi both were always excited to spend time with him regardless. Machi grinned, then elbowed his sister. "Race you!" He didn't even wait for his words to finish leaving his mouth before charging off down the street, laughing loudly.

"Hey, no fair!" Trucy shouted after him, running to catch up.

Bag bouncing against his back, Machi paid little heed to his sister's protests, shoes skidding on the concrete as he spun on his heel and moved to dashing up the stairs. "I'm winning!" he called over his shoulder, then charged through the unlocked front door and into the Agency's reception. "I won!" Jumping up and down on the carpet, Machi made sure to give Trucy a big grin as she finally caught up, pointing as he triumphantly told her, "I won race!"

"You cheated!" Trucy protested, face red from exertion as she closed the door behind her. "You didn't give me any time!"

"But if I did that, it would be you cheating?" Machi innocently pointed out.

Trucy was thrown for a moment, then shook her head, slipping her bag off her back. "That's not what I meant! I demand a do-over! I'm telling on you to Daddy!"

Machi grinned. "Isa!" he shouted. "Trucy is lying!"

"No, I'm not!" Trucy immediately shouted back, pushing past her laughing brother to charge past into the office, bag dangling from her hand. "Daddy!"

Slipping his bag off his back and hugging it to his chest, Machi turned to follow, only to notice Trucy had frozen in the doorway, one hand on the door and the other holding the handle of her school-bag. His own laughter gone, Machi stepped forward to her side to see what she was staring at.

Around the small table, sat in the twin red sofas, sat Trucy and Machi's older brothers and father, along with a strange man with tawny hair. He stared back at the pair in the doorway, one hand fiddling with his thin glasses, his dark suit crisp and clean on his lean figure.

"Ah, there you two are!" Phoenix cheerfully cried, giving the two a wave as Apollo and Luke hid giggles. "We thought that might be you making all that racket."

The strange man got to his feet, holding out a hand. "Machi Tobaye."

Machi stared for a moment before hurriedly nodding and running around to shake the man's hand. "Y-yes, that is me."

"My name is Halinto Byrokrata," the man said, and Machi was surprised to register it was in Borginian. "I'm from the Embassy."

"Oh, y-yes, I remember talking to you," Machi stuttered in the same language, recognising Byrokrata's name and voice from the person on the other end of the scratchy phone line of the detention centre. "Why are you here? D-did I do something wrong?"

Byrokrata shook his head and sat back down on the sofa, pulling a nearby suitcase into his lap. Opposite the man, Machi noticed Apollo and Luke moving aside to leave a space, and he decided to sit at Apollo's side, opposite where Byrokrata was now pulling a small sheaf of paper from his things. As the man arranged the paper on the table, he continued, "Actually, this arrived for you, Monsieur Tobaye. Take your time reading it over."

Machi moved his bag from his lap to the floor, then reached over to pull the paper towards him.
Trucy dropped her bag and fell into the empty space next to Phoenix, on the other end of the sofa from Byrokrata. "What's going on?"

"Mister Byrokrata here is from the Borginian Embassy," Phoenix explained. "Said something about paperwork for Machi, but wouldn't tell us anything else." He looked up, shooting Apollo a grin. "Even though Machi's lawyer is here and everything."

Apollo pretended he hadn't just been peering at the paper over Machi's shoulder and rolled his eyes. "Dad." Luke pressed a hand to his mouth to hide giggles.

Machi slowly smiled as he read through the form on the table in front of him. It was written in Borginian, the government seal at the top, and he didn't need to read its title to see what its purpose was: "This is... adoption form!"

"It is!?” Luke cried in surprise.

Apollo slapped a hand on Machi's back with a grin. "Hey, congratulations! Finally making it official!"

Trucy bounced in her seat at Phoenix's side with a loud squeal, making their father cover his ears with a wince. "Machi, that's so cool!” she cried. "Are you gonna change your name?"

Machi shrugged, still looking through the papers. Sure enough, the entry for 'child name change' had been left blank. He remembered, the first time they filled this out in that tiny kitchen back in Kopunchiville, how unsure he'd been about whether he could adopt 'Lamiroir' as a surname; 'Machi The Siren' had just sounded silly, and Lamiroir hadn't any other name to give him, so in the end he'd opted to just keep 'Tobaye'. He hadn't mentioned anything to her of course, letting Lamiroir and Bonte go through everything else on that form, and telling Bonte his decision in private.

"By the way," Byrokrata muttered in Borginian, giving Machi a sympathetic look, "I'm sorry this isn't from Lamiroir."

At that, Machi's smile turned to a grin. In English, he replied, "What do you mean? Of course this from Lamiroir." He pointed to the bottom of the final page, right next to where it asked for his signature. "It says 'Thalassa Gramarye' right here."

"It does!?” came identical shouts from Apollo and Trucy, the latter jumping out of her seat to run around to Machi's side while Apollo just leaned over his brother's shoulder to peer down at the indicated signature. "He's right, it does!" Apollo added.

"She got her memory back!" Trucy squealed at the top of her lungs, jumping once before dropping to the floor, hands held over her mouth as she stared at the form lying on the table. "You think she remembers us, too?"

"I'm sure she does," Luke promised her with a sympathetic look. "She's probably getting everything ready as quickly as she can to meet up with the three of you again."

Trucy squeaked, wiping away tears. "I hope so..."

Byrokrata looked between the Wright children with a confused look, but didn't say anything.

"Then I guess you'd better sign that so she can get here sooner," Phoenix told Machi with a warm smile, picking up a loose pen from the table and holding it out for the teen to take. "So, what's it gonna be: Machi Tobaye, or Machi Gramarye?"
Machi grinned as he took the pen; This choice was an easy one. "Machi Gramarye." He only giggled in pride as Apollo and Trucy gave him wordless hugs.

This time, when the response arrived in the mail a week later, the Borginian government accepted his request.

View the Court Record
Phoenix resisted the urge to pace as he stood at the edge of the small crowd that always seemed to exist outside the doors from the baggage claim. This was a moment he'd been anticipating equally as much as dreading for three months now, and it was finally time to face it. Would she hate him for stealing her children? For not telling her what they'd found out about her before she left? The message she'd sent him about today didn't sound angry, but that didn't mean she wasn't. Maybe she planned to tell him off in private and take Trucy and Machi back by force, and Apollo would go where they went despite being an adult and capable of making his own decisions; This was the beginning of the end for him, he just knew it. And calling her by the wrong name would only make it worse for sure: Was it 'Lamiroir' or 'Ms Gramarye' that she would prefer?

The sharp elbow to his arm caused Phoenix to yelp and spin around, coming face-to-face with a short woman wearing a Pink Princess cap and a half-hidden smirk. She rolled her eyes behind the large sunglasses on her nose and said, "Nick, calm down. We're meeting someone at the airport, not waiting for a public execution."

"I-I know that, Maya," Phoenix muttered, pushing his hands deeper into the pockets at the front of his hoodie. "It's just... I need to get along with her if I want any kind of relationship with Apollo, Trucy or Machi in the future."

Maya scoffed, crossing her arms over the red purse hanging off her shoulder. "They already love you, you dork. Having their mom around isn't going to change that, and you know that full well."

Phoenix shifted his weight from foot to foot. "But it won't help if she resents me for-"

"Mister Wright?"

Although it was only a softly-spoken question, Phoenix still cried out in shock as he leapt away from it, eyes wide; To his surprise, all he found at the source was a concerned-looking woman in a white dress, watching him with the same blue eyes as his daughter and gripping two large travel suitcases in her hands. He laughed nervously, giving the woman a wave. "Ah, s-sorry, I-"

"Thank goodness I found you!" Thalassa cried with a grin, leaving her bags to jump forward and shake Phoenix's hand. "I was afraid I wouldn't recognise you and be forced to start asking strangers!" Before Phoenix could do more than smile back, Thalassa had turned to Maya. "And... You're Ms Fey, aren't you? Their mother?"

Maya paled at that. "U-uh... I'm Maya Fey, yes." She forced a grin. "It's a pleasure to finally meet you... um... you."

Thalassa quietly laughed, and Phoenix noted she seemed as nervous as them; She certainly shared Apollo and Trucy's tendency to hide fear behind a smile. "Well, as we are all Apollo and Trucy's parents, it feels like we should use first names with each other; I'm happy to be called Thalassa."

"Then Thalassa it is," Maya cheerfully replied, holding out her hand to shake. "You can call me Maya, Thalassa."
"A pleasure, Maya," Thalassa said as they shook, looking relieved.

"Then I guess it's 'Phoenix' for me," Phoenix added, scratching at the back of his head. "And it looks like your disguise skills need work, Maya." He shot his girlfriend a grin, eyes running up and down her sky-blue blouse and black ankle-length skirt. "She recognised you straight away!"

Maya stuck her tongue out at him. "Remind me whose idea the dumb 'disguise' was again, Nick?"

Phoenix snickered, then turned back to Thalassa sheepishly. "Um, sorry for not having a sign. I wasn't sure what I could write on it that wouldn't attract attention."

Thalassa shook her head. "No, no, I understand. I wasn't expecting one for the same reasons." She forced a smile, still looking uncertain. "It's a good thing Professor Layton showed me all those photos of you, or I never would have known what to look for."

Maya blinked, nonplussed. "Photos?"

"Copies of ones Luke sent him over the years," Thalassa explained, and reached behind her to pull forward her bags. "I have them somewhere in my luggage still."

Phoenix nodded, smiling; That made sense, now he thought about it. She hadn't exactly seen what he looked like before she left, and had never met Maya before now at all. "Well, welcome back to LA anyway," he said, then reached forward to take one of her suitcases; Opposite, Maya did the same with the remaining one. "We'd better head to the bus station."

As they left the arrivals hall, Maya and Thalassa engaged in small talk, comparing the recent weather in California, England and Borginia. Phoenix left them to it, happy that the two women seemed to be becoming friends already, and ended up taking the lead as they headed for the buses. He waited until they were standing in front of the signboard indicating what buses went where to finally interrupt them: "Thalassa, where are we headed? Did you take my advice about the Gatewater?"

Thalassa paused, then nodded. "I did, yes," she replied. "Let me get out the address of the hotel I chose..."

Soon they were settled on the bus, Thalassa's bags around their legs as they sat in the circle of four seats they had managed to snag. The two woman had the window seats, Phoenix at Maya's side. "So, Nick warned you away from the Gatewater to keep you a secret, right?" Maya asked, watching Thalassa with concern as the bus started moving underneath them. "You don't want them to know you're here?"

Phoenix nodded. "She asked me not to tell the kids she was coming back." He shot his girlfriend a small smile. "Though I figured it was safe to tell you, even if you act like one sometimes."

Maya whacked his arm as Phoenix hid giggles.

Thalassa briefly smiled at their antics, a hand petting her hair where it lay over her shoulder. "This will be the first time I've seen Apollo since he was a baby... and it's been ten years since Trucy and I were last together. If I am to rebuild my relationship with them, the first impression is going to be the most important."

"But that's already happened, hasn't it?" Maya asked with a frown. "You met them at the concert."

"They met Lamiroir," Thalassa explained. "They still haven't met me. Not even Machi has met the real me." She sighed. "I can't let this one chance I have be ruined by anything, least of all myself. This has to go well."

"You told me you wanted to get settled here in LA first," Phoenix said.

Thalassa nodded. "I know I have a lot of questions for them, and they surely have a lot for me, too. I don't want to disappoint them by being too busy to give them the time they deserve."

"You could never disappoint them," Maya insisted. "They've been waiting for you for years, they'd understand if you were a little busy moving in!"

Thalassa didn't reply, only staring out the window.

Phoenix patted Maya's leg on the cramped seat, a silent signal of reassurance. "Thalassa," he said. "I understand this is hard, and that we can't know what this is like for you... but the simple truth is that there will never be a 'perfect' moment for a reunion. If you put this off now, you'll just keep putting it off and it will never happen."

"Yes, that's probably true," Thalassa quietly admitted, still staring out the window.

"Apollo, Trucy and Machi already know who they are to each other, and who you are as the person that connects them," Phoenix continued. "It's not fair to them to keep yourself hidden away. But." He closed his eyes, sighing. "If you want some time to settle in first, we will give you that time."

Opening his eyes, he gave Thalassa a smile. "How about next Saturday?"

Thalassa blinked, turning her eyes to Phoenix in surprise. "Saturday?"

Maya gasped. "That's perfect!" she cried. "Today's Friday, right? That gives you a week to settle in, the kids won't have to wait long to meet you, and they'll be off work and school 'cause it's the weekend so you'll have all day to spend together!" She then paused. "Oh. And, speaking of putting things off... I should probably start making plans to leave, too."

Phoenix gave her a sympathetic look, taking hold of her hand.

"Leave?" Thalassa asked.

"For... well, for my 'job'," Maya reluctantly explained. "I have to go overseas to do a training course, and I can't come home for two years." She sighed. "I've been putting it off for the better part of a year... Actually," she forced a smile, "I was waiting for you to come back first. Apollo and Trucy were so shaken when you just appeared out of nowhere like that... I couldn't leave until they were okay."

Thalassa returned her gaze out the window, her hand resting on the bracelet on her right wrist.

"The sooner you go, the sooner you come back," Phoenix gently reminded Maya, giving her hand a squeeze. "We'll all be here waiting for you."

"I know, I know," Maya whispered, gripping Phoenix's hand with both of hers. "But can I... Can I at least wait a couple weeks? Just to be sure they'll be okay?"

Phoenix sighed, but nodded. "I'm holding you to that."

"Then I suppose that's our plan," Thalassa said, giving them a smile. "I will meet them on Saturday... and then maybe I can get started repaying the both of you for everything you have done."
Chuckling, Phoenix shook his head. "Thalassa, your children, in the time they've been my children, have already repaid that debt a million times over. You don't owe us anything."

Thalassa's eyes subtly narrowed in the same way Apollo's did when he suspected a lie. "They are still your children now I am back," she insisted. "The last thing I want to do is take them away from a family they love and who love them in return." Her eyes turned sadly to her lap. "The two of you have been Apollo and Trucy's parents far longer than I have."

"That's... not quite true," Maya mumbled sheepishly. "Apollo's only been calling me his mom since May..."

Thalassa looked up. "And Trucy?"

Maya blushed. "Oh, well, Trucy tried that when she first met me, but-"

"Five years," Phoenix answered for her, smiling fondly at his girlfriend. "After two years of planning to get us together."

Although she mumbled protests, Maya didn't add anything to that, hiding her red cheeks behind a sudden interest in fiddling with Phoenix's hand in her lap.

Thalassa smiled. "Well, regardless of whether they called you one or not, even five months is more than enough time to be considered a mother... That's how long I had with Apollo, before we were separated: May to October. And five years is also how long I had with Trucy."

Maya looked up in surprise. "O-oh, I'm so sorry..."

"It's alright," Thalassa insisted. "What use is dwelling on what I've lost? I have years ahead of me to get to know my children all over again... to spend the time with them that has been robbed from all three of us."

Phoenix slowly frowned, looking between the two women. "It will be up to Apollo, Trucy and Machi what happens after this reunion," he said. "Whether Trucy and Machi go to live with you, how often the three of them visit... even if they want to keep working at the agency. Apollo always preferred the idea of working in a law office to an 'anything agency' anyway."

"You'll work it out," Maya promised. "I mean, I live two hours away, and I still manage to see you all often enough; That's the important thing here, right?" She reached into her red purse, pulling out a small locket pendant, its golden chain detached from its usual home on her obi. She shook the object pointedly in Phoenix's direction. "The kids didn't give us these with the intention of ditching us once they found their mom, Nick."

Phoenix rested a hand on the identical locket hanging around his neck, and couldn't resist a small smile. "Guess not," he agreed.

Thalassa nodded in agreement. "This new family we are making together is certainly unusual," she said, "but that is nothing new. We will make it work." She grinned, even looking a little excited. "I'm quite looking forward to it, actually."

_View the Court Record_
Phoenix was just finishing putting Trucy and Machi to bed when the call came:

"Wright? Drew Misham has just been murdered."

Paling, Phoenix dropped into the nearest chair at the dining table, glad he'd thought to go downstairs and away from the kids to answer. "You're kidding."

"As much as we might like that, I'm not," Edgeworth continued. "I've taken control of the investigation, but as the chair it's up to you to call the next step. I'm sure you realise, whether we are ready or not, this will be our one chance to get the truth of that case out there."

Phoenix couldn't reply for several moments, sat still in his seat. "Y-yes, that's true," he mumbled, then shook his head, trying to pull himself together. "Then I guess we're moving ahead... A little quicker than anticipated, but we would have lost out entirely if it had been any earlier."

"A good point," Edgeworth agreed. "Apollo will still be the attorney?"

Phoenix nodded, forgetting his friend couldn't see him. "Apollo is going to hate me for this, I know, but I'll need you to sort out my choice for the prosecutor. I'm sorry to say, for this case in particular, there's a certain someone who deserves it more than you."

Edgeworth chuckled. "If we're thinking of the same man, I whole-heartedly agree."

After hearing the details of the case and finalising who was doing what, Phoenix checked his youngest two children were in bed and raced out the door.

In the four days since Thalassa's arrival back in the country, she had managed to narrow down existing options found in her search online and bought an apartment not too far from the agency: A penthouse overlooking People Park itself. Phoenix couldn't help but internally envy the kind of money Lamiroir had been able to accumulate over her short career, especially that first time he'd visited the apartment only yesterday, helping Thalassa move in her minimal belongings from Borginia. Although she was so close, she had told him when they last spoke earlier that day that she was too scared to go into the park, or even to take a single step in the direction of the agency once out on the street; With all the careful plans she, Phoenix, and Maya had been making about the planned reunion with her children on Saturday, she was more fearful than ever of accidentally running into one of the three by chance and ruining the whole thing... and Phoenix's assurances she wouldn't 'ruin' anything were failing to comfort her. On his end of things, Phoenix had been throwing off the kids by blaming his 'secret mission' for his frequent departures from the office that past week - After all, he told himself, that was technically true, even if it was unrelated to the Jurist Trial system.

Using his spare key, Phoenix entered the apartment building across from the entrance to People Park and took the elevator to the top-most floor it could access, then charged for the final flight of stairs.
separating him from Thalassa's apartment above. He checked the time with a wince as he ran across the hall, then pressed a finger to the doorbell, hoping it wasn't too late at night for a home visit.
"Thalassa?" he called as loudly as he dared. "Are you available, or...?"

"Phoenix?" came a muffled call from inside, then the door opened to reveal Thalassa, a dressing gown wrapped tightly around her body and her tawny hair piled in a towel on top of her head. She gave Phoenix a cursory examination from his beanie to his worn sandals with a concerned frown.
"What is it?"

"I'm sorry for coming by so late," Phoenix said with a grimace, hands pressed together, "but something really important just came up and it's something I need to ask you in person." He paused half a second. "I'm almost certain you'll be interested to hear it."

Thalassa watched him in confusion for a moment more before nodding and stepping back. "Alright, come in then."

The living room was unchanged since Phoenix had been there earlier that day, helping Thalassa transport boxes of flat-pack furniture that still filled the otherwise empty and echoing room. He followed Thalassa to stand somewhere away from the door, a rare free space amongst the boxes, and she turned to him with a concerned frown, her arms tightly crossed. "What's going on? Is this about the children?"

Phoenix paused. "Sort of. But not really." Seeing Thalassa giving him a vaguely frustrated look, he shook his head and started again. "I'm sure you noticed, watching Machi's trial back in July, that our current system of law here isn't the best equipped for finding the truth when evidence is minimal."

Thalassa slowly nodded. "Yes... Why?"

"I've been working on plans for an alternate system that might work better," Phoenix explained, almost breathless with excitement. "It's been a few years, and, finally, we've gotten to the point where we've been approved to test it out, on this coming Thursday." He took a deep breath. "The verdict will be real. Apollo is defending. All I need now, for this 'test' of the Jurist Trial system, are the six volunteer jurists who'll be casting the vote."

Thalassa's eyes widened. "You want me to be part of a jury...?"

"To be a jurist, yes," Phoenix clarified, grinning. "You and five other people would be watching the trial, then we will call a vote from the six of you on whether the defendant is guilty or not guilty based on common sense. The judge will use the outcome of the vote to call the verdict. The life of Apollo's client is going to depend on it."

Thalassa frowned, a hand reaching up to where her hair usually rested on her shoulder.

"I can trust you'd make the right decision regardless," Phoenix told her. "And, think of it this way:
You get to watch Apollo, Trucy, and very probably Machi too, working together in court without any chance of being seen yourself. It could be a warm-up to the reunion on Saturday... provided this doesn't get stretched out to three days and we have to delay that to Sunday or something."

Although she had yet to say anything, Phoenix could tell his wheedling was starting to convince Thalassa. Finally, she sighed. "Alright, I'll do it."

"Yes!" Phoenix cheered, grabbing her hand to enthusiastically shake. "Thank you so much, Thalassa!" With that, he spun around and headed for the door.

"Wait, Phoenix!" Thalassa called, running after him as he paused, his hand on the door handle.
"What exactly is this trial even about?"

Phoenix resisted the urge to laugh. "Thalassa, the most important thing about this trial is that everyone is going into it on Thursday knowing as little as possible. I don't want preconceptions getting in the way here."

Thalassa gave him a disbelieving look.

"Just trust me," Phoenix told her. "I know what I'm doing."

---

We have a go on the new jurist.

Good. She will be a much better option than Kay, providing you aren't lying about her trustworthiness.

My two contacts have replied with positives. That leaves the last three to you.

They'll say yes. I'm calling them now.

Don't give me their answers until AFTER you've contacted them, Wright. This is important.

You're telling me?.

Just be quick. It is far too late to be calling people out of bed for this.

---

"I don't know why you're so reluctant about this," Apollo said, hands busy redoing a popped seam on his vest. "You've always enjoyed our magic show."

"Your magic show," Clay pointedly replied, lounging on the small sofa in their apartment's living room. "Honestly, I don't know why you're so excited about going to someone else's; You do that kind of stuff every single day! You were literally doing exactly that only an hour ago!"

Apollo scoffed, eyes on the vest in his lap so he wouldn't accidentally stab himself with the needle in his hand. "Not this kind of stuff. These are tricks no-one's seen in seven years, 'cause they've been locked up in performance rights issues. We might not get another chance to see them first-hand."

Clay groaned, leaning back so hard he began to slip off the seat. "Dude, I get it's your grandfather's stuff, but-"

A series of space-themed beeps and bips filled the air, and Apollo paused in his sewing only long enough to register it was his friend's phone. Clay took a moment longer to react, sitting up and digging in his pocket to retrieve the offending device. He frowned at the screen for a moment, shooting Apollo a glance, then stood and pressed the phone to his ear. "Yello?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, watching his friend stepping away. Pulling the last stitch on his vest tight, he set about securing the new seam.
"Really?" Clay was saying. "That soon? No, no, I'm still happy to do it. It's just short notice, is all."

Apollo cut the spare thread with his teeth, wrapping it around his hand to return it and the needle to his sewing kit. He still kept a curious eye on his friend's conversation.

"Nah, don't worry about it," Clay continued, grinning as he shot a look at Apollo over his shoulder. "I'll tell Director Cosmos tomorrow and see ya on Thursday." He paused, listening to the reply, then laughed. "You got it, sir!" With that, he hung up the phone and turned back to face his friend.

Apollo raised an eyebrow, arms crossed. "What was that about?"

Clay scoffed, waving off the question. "Secret, dude. I am capable of keeping them."

"You are not," Apollo replied. "Who's calling you at this time of night? What are they asking you to do?"

"It's just some guy I know," Clay insisted with a shrug. Turning, he headed off towards his room. "We're doing something on Thursday. He was just checking I was ready."

"Somehow I don't believe you," Apollo said, clutching the repaired vest in his lap, but Clay only laughed as he disappeared. Apollo was forced to drop the subject with a sigh.

View the Court Record
Apollo stopped as he arrived at the bottom of the stairs leading up to the front door of his childhood home, watching the street with a smile. A small blue car was neatly parking itself in a free space, and, once it had stopped, he could see his brother slipping out of the driver's seat, dodging traffic to circle around to the pavement.

"Good morning, Apollo!" Luke called, giving his brother a wave as he approached. "Not often we arrive at the same time, huh?"

Apollo laughed, nodding in agreement as he waved back. "You're late," he joked. "Normally you get here at least five minutes early."

Luke scoffed. "Which is more than I can say for you," he retorted. "You're usually five minutes late."

Shrugging, Apollo brushed the comment off, his amusement fading. He held up a hand, keeping his brother from heading inside just yet. "Oh, um... Have you spoken to Clay since last night?"

After a moment of thought, Luke shook his head. "No, not since... Monday, I think. Why?"

"He got a weird call last night," Apollo explained, "something about Director Cosmos and a thing tomorrow... but he won't say what, and now he's acting all strange about it."

"I know," Apollo muttered, glad to have someone agree with him on that point. "He just keeps smiling at me, hinting at whatever it is he's doing without saying what... Actually laughed at how frustrated I was getting as he headed off to work this morning."

"Hmmm." Luke shook his head. "There's not much we can do about it now. How about I come home with you after your show tonight, and we ask him together?"

Apollo sighed, then nodded, giving his brother a grateful smile. "Sure."

The brothers headed up the stairs and through into reception without a word. Closing the front door behind them, they could hear the murmur of the television in the office, and shot each other grins as they imagined their father conked out on the sofa watching it, as he sometimes was when they arrived in the mornings.

But it was not Phoenix they found on the twin red sofas when they entered the office.

"Hi Polly, hi Luke!" Trucy called, waving enthusiastically as her brothers paused in the doorway. At her side, Machi smiled and gave his own small wave.

Apollo and Luke gave each other confused looks, taking in the two teenagers on the sofa facing the TV, lounging in their casual dress (for Trucy, this meant her magician's outfit, while Machi was in a t-shirt and pants). "Why aren't you two in school?" Luke asked. "You're not even in your uniforms."

Machi nodded. "Isa was awake early this morning. He said we have rest of week off."

"Then he had to go out for his secret mission," Trucy added, frowning. "He wouldn't tell us why, though. Or what exactly he was doing."

"Likely boring paperwork," Apollo told her, moving to sit opposite his youngest siblings; Luke copied him, sitting at his side. "He told me everything's wrapping up soon, so it'd just be minutiae at this point."

"Min-oo-sha?" Machi repeated, confused.

"Little details," Luke explained. Once Machi had nodded in understanding, Luke then turned to Apollo. "But why has Papa taken Trucy and Machi off school? We're not doing anything today, are we?"

Apollo shook his head, frowning. "Not to my knowledge. 'First Clay acting strangely, now Dad. What's going on with everyone all of a sudden?'

"There's nothing happening at school either," Trucy added, arms crossed. "We were hoping you guys might know why. Not that we're complaining, of course." She grinned. "We could use the extra time to do all sorts of things, like go up to Kurain, practise a new trick-"

"Catch up on your school work," Apollo interrupted with a knowing smirk.

Trucy glared, sticking out her tongue.

Luke laughed. "Well, for now, let's just stick around the office. Once Papa gets back, we can ask him what's going on and see if he'll talk with all four of us here."

An hour and a half later, the four Wright kids were arranged on the floor and sofas, transfixed by a dazzling yellow figure on the television screen. "Look, look, look!" Trucy cried from the front, pointing excitedly as the man bounced into the air and floated above the stage with no apparent effort. "Isn't it amazing?"

"He's certainly loving the attention!" Apollo laughed, lying across the sofa with his elbows planted on the arm rest.

Luke sat opposite, his notebook lying open and forgotten on his lap. "I'm surprised he came back so soon; I thought the incident at the concert would have scared him off for much longer than this."

Machi, sat at Trucy's side, hurriedly shushed him: A female voice had started speaking over the footage: "What you're now seeing is a rehearsal for the greatest magic show on Earth, happening right here at our very own Sunshine Coliseum!"

"Where the concert was?" Luke noted with surprise.

"Only three more days until miracles happen here, right before your unbelieving eyes!" the announcer continued, and the clip of Valant faded into a still grey-scale image, a much younger Valant standing with Zak at his side and Thalassa in front of them both. "The legendary Troupe Gramarye is performing for the first time in seven years!"

Apollo felt a pang in his heart; He wasn't sure if it was longing to be a part of it himself, as Valant had asked them three months previous, or jealousy fate had decided it was Valant and not any of Magnifi's descendants that were continuing the Troupe's name. After all, Valant had warned them of his plans, and even generously offered a place in the reborn Troupe to 'Apollo and Artemis' once Trucy was old enough. Maybe, now he thought about it, part of that ache in his chest was simply the reminder that the first fifteen years of his life, the years he should have been under the Troupe Gramarye banner already, had been taken from him by circumstances beyond anyone's control... the lost childhood with Thalassa and with Trucy - and even Magnifi, Zak, and Valant - that he would have happily traded in the one he ended up with for.

"This is going to be so great!" Trucy squealed, bouncing on the floor, and Apollo dragged himself out of his thoughts to plant a wide grin on his face. "We're so there!" She turned expectantly to her eldest brother. "Right, Polly?"

Seeing his brothers give him confused looks, Apollo laughed, reaching into his bag. "Ah yes, I was wondering what this strange letter was that arrived this morning."

Squeaking in excitement, Trucy jumped to her feet. "They arrived already!?"

"What arrived?" Machi asked.

Apollo produced the opened envelope from his bag with a flourish, then pulled out a small stack of pink-and-purple pieces of card hidden inside. "I happen to have five tickets to see the Troupe Gramarye Grand Magic Show on Sunday."

Luke's eyebrows shot up. "Five?"

"One for each of us and Isa?" Machi realised. After a moment, his growing smile froze, then faded. "Um... When is this show?"

Apollo hid a sympathetic laugh, returning the tickets to the envelope. "The Sunday show ends at five," he explained. "Plenty of time to get back here before your curfew."

"Don't worry, baby brother," Trucy said, gently elbowing Machi with a smile. "We made sure you wouldn't be left out of this one."

Machi blushed. "Th-thank you."

The door to reception suddenly opened, distracting the kids from the conversation as Luke automatically moved to silence the television. "Ah, you are here. Working hard or hardly working?"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "That joke is old, Dad."

Phoenix laughed, waving off Apollo's complaint as he strode past, headed towards his desk. A plastic bag hung from the crook of his elbow, and his hands were clutching a collection of papers held close to his chest.

"Hi there, stranger!" Trucy cheerfully replied, following him across the room. Machi tagged along at her heels.

Luke got up to follow his younger siblings. "Papa, what's going on? Where've you been all morning?"
"To the store!" Phoenix proclaimed, placing his papers face-down on his desk and pulling the plastic bag off his arm. "I got a little something for the four of you."

"Ooh! Ooh! What is it?" Trucy demanded, bouncing on her heels. When Phoenix held out the bag, she grabbed it from his hand and looked inside with a gasp. "Yay! Pudding!" She grabbed one and held it out to the curious Machi with a grin. "You'll love these, Machi! They're even farm-fresh!"

Machi still looked confused, but took the offered cup anyway.

Trucy returned to digging around in the bag, pulling out a second she held out to Luke. "We've got one each!" she announced as Luke took his.

Apollo sighed, finally crossing the room to join his family... and definitely not because he wanted to make sure he got his promised pudding cup. "I get the feeling you're trying to butter us up," he told Phoenix as he gripped the treat tight in his hand.

"Oh, of course not," Phoenix insisted with a grin, dropping into his chair. "You four are just 'pudding' up with me."

"I get it!" Machi cried with a grin. Luke and Apollo only rolled their eyes.

"Just until you 'egg-splain' everything, Daddy," Trucy fired back with a smile.

Machi frowned. "I not get that one."

Phoenix shook his head. "Mm. I did come here to explain a few things, didn't I?"

The elder three looked surprised. "Really?" Trucy asked.

"You're going to tell us what this whole 'secret mission' thing is?" Luke added.

"I think it's time," Phoenix confirmed, leaning his elbows on the desk and interlocking his fingers together in a way that screamed 'mastermind'. "It has something to do with you, anyway."

Apollo raised an eyebrow; He couldn't work out which of them exactly Phoenix had been looking at when he said that.

"And telling you about it is why I dropped by," Phoenix added, then looked between the three youngest of his children. "You three... You won't have heard of the Jurist System yet."

Trucy and Machi shot each other confused looks. "The what?" Trucy asked.

Luke frowned, a hand at his chin. "Is... this a different system of court? With a jury, like in England?"

"There's six Jurists instead of twelve," Apollo explained. "They analyse the case from different angles, and help the judge decide on the verdict."

Apollo's siblings all turned to face him with confused looks. "You knew already?" Machi asked.

Phoenix chuckled. "Apollo's agreed to help, yes."

"But why'd Polly get to know about it and not us!?" Trucy demanded.
"Would you have seriously cared?" Apollo pointed out, gently teasing his sister. "This is all boring legal stuff; Only lawyers like me - or former lawyers like Dad - find it interesting."

Trucy just stuck her tongue out at him in reply.
"So this 'Jurist System'," Luke spoke up, stroking his goatee. "That's your 'secret mission'? The one you've been hiding for years?"

Phoenix shrugged. "More or less. New ideas like this are always risky, so it needed a lot of preparation... and a lot of negotiation. We're going to give it a shot, anyway."

"Is it finally ready?" Apollo asked. "No more secrets?"

"It's as ready as it'll ever be," Phoenix replied, smiling enigmatically. "At long last, the Jurist System is getting a trial: I'm acting as chair of the Jurist System Simulated Court Committee, constructing the ideal situation... choosing the case, the jurist candidates..." He paused, chuckling. "Even the judge and the courtroom."

Trucy snorted. "Wow, it's like you have a real job."

Phoenix only grinned. "I was never that good at the piano, to be honest."

"Definitely not compared to Machi here," Luke added with a laugh, and Machi blushed as Trucy promptly pulled him into a side-hug.

"When's the trial?" Apollo asked Phoenix, bouncing in anticipation. "It's all ready to go now, right? That's why you're telling them?"

Phoenix chuckled. "I picked out a simple case to start with. This will be the first run through of a new system, after all."

"That makes sense," Trucy said. "No point wearing yourself out on something too serious."

"True," Phoenix agreed. "It's a murder."

Apollo froze, staring at his father. "Dad, that's not simple at all!!"

"Simple?" Luke repeated, thoughtful. "You're saying the defendant is guilty?"

"Most likely, yes," Phoenix said, watching Apollo with a grin. "Good luck tomorrow."

"Tomorrow!?!" Apollo cried, paling.

Luke, Trucy, and Machi gave each other confused looks. "I-isoveli... What is happening?" Machi asked.

Apollo groaned. "I agreed to help out with this thing by being the defence attorney," he explained, shooting a glare at Phoenix. "What kind of warning is this, Dad!? A single day, and with a guilty client!?"

Trucy scoffed. "C'mon Polly, it's just a test case. No sweat!"

"There's still a verdict to be decided!" Apollo shot back.

"And a potentially serious sentence," Phoenix agreed, smile gone. "The most serious, in a worst-case scenario."

Machi gasped, his free hand over his mouth. "This is real trial!?"

"I can't mount a proper investigation on this little warning, Dad!" Apollo was continuing. "What if my client is innocent and I run out of time to put together a case!?"

"We did have a bit of an upset last night," Phoenix admitted, shrugging. "Had to make a last-minute change. But, all the forms have been filed. The trial begins tomorrow at ten. There's no turning back now." He shot his eldest son a grin. "Besides, I know you can pull this off, Apollo."

Apollo sighed, pressing a hand to his face.

"Oh! I almost forgot!" Trucy cried, changing the subject as she clung to the edge of the desk and bounced on the spot with a grin. "Daddy! The tickets for Uncle Valant's show arrived this morning!"

Phoenix leaned back in his chair, looking interested. "Oh, really? That starts on Saturday, right?"

"We're going on Sunday," Luke added, shooting Machi a grin. "The Saturday show runs too late."

Humming in thought, Phoenix nodded.

"It's at Sunshine Coliseum!" Trucy continued, and turned towards Apollo. "Let's go today! We can say hi to Uncle Valant!"

Apollo paled. "Truce, we have an investigation! I'm excited too, but we don't have the time to-!"

"Nonsense," Phoenix chuckled, the teasing grin back on his face. "Go ahead and drop by to see him. Don't worry about the case; You'll hear all about it tomorrow, regardless."

Apollo's eyes narrowed. The hell are you hiding, Dad?

Trucy whooped, jumping on the spot. "We're going to the Coliseum!" She spun around to give Machi a hug. "We can introduce you properly to Uncle Valant!"

Machi nervously laughed. "Yes... It will be nice to meet him again."

"Ah, that reminds me," Phoenix said, snapping his fingers. He straightened up in his seat, then reached into a pocket and pulled out a pink envelope, the flap at the back neatly tucked inside without any sign of having been glued closed. As the older man flipped it between his fingers, Apollo noticed a highly simplistic and unreadable signature on the back; On the front, a large symbol resembling a man in profile, wearing a distinctive silk hat.

Trucy leaned forward, examining the item with a frown. "Isn't that the Gramarye seal?"

"The official Gramarye seal," Apollo quickly explained. "Troupe Gramarye used it on all their official stuff."

"Consider it a birthday present, Trucy," Phoenix told his daughter, handing the letter over to the confused teen.

"Thanks," Trucy replied, but her usual enthusiasm was oddly muted. "But today isn't my birthday; That was two months ago."

Apollo leaned over his sister's shoulder, examining the envelope himself. "Who signed this? How'd you get a hold of it?"

"What is it, Isa?" Machi asked, turning to Phoenix. "Is it something to do with our mother?"

Phoenix sat unmoving for a moment or two. "Don't open it yet," he instructed his daughter. "You'll need it someday soon. You can open it then."

Trucy regarded the envelope with wide eyes, and Apollo felt his protective instinct kick in as he shot their father a glare. "If she doesn't need it now, why'd you give it to her!?"

"It's something to do with Troupe Gramarye," Luke mused aloud, "and yet you've given it specifically to Trucy...?"

Phoenix didn't immediately reply, eyes closed. A few moments later, he looked up towards Apollo. "About your case tomorrow: I want everyone to start without preconceptions. A blank slate, as it were... but, if you are so desperate for information, I can give you permission to examine the scene of the crime."

Apollo stared back at his father. 'Changing the subject...? Alright, I'll bite.' "Thanks, I guess."

"But you can't talk to anyone involved with the case."

"What!?" Apollo shook his head, unable to believe his ears. "How is that supposed to help!?!"

Phoenix ignored his middle son, keeping his attention on Apollo: "You let me worry about the details. Remember, I'm in charge of this trial. All of it. The entire affair is my responsibility, for good or for bad."

Apollo couldn't argue with that, though he still thought the situation a little unfair.

"Just do what you can, and don't worry," Phoenix continued. "I know what I'm doing."

Sighing, Apollo nodded. "Alright."

Trucy was still staring worriedly at the envelope in her grip. After a moment, she slipped it into her bag, along with the pudding cup still in her other hand.

"I'd recommend going down to the detention centre," Phoenix said, a lighter tone to his voice. "Your client's waiting for you. You can ask about the scene there; Just ask the guards about the Misham case."

"Misham, right," Apollo muttered. "But didn't you just say I couldn't talk to anyone involved?"

At that, Phoenix smiled. "Oh, you can talk to your client... if you can get her to talk."

Apollo raised an eyebrow at that.

"Well, time's a-wasting!" Trucy cried, dashing around her brothers and into the kitchen. "Let's hurry up and go, and we can eat our pudding on the way!"

Machi sighed, shaking his head as he clutched the plastic cup in his hands. "I'm still confused..."

Apollo patted his youngest brother's shoulder. "Don't worry about it. We all are."

"That's usually how all our cases start, isn't it?" Luke wryly pointed out, raising an eyebrow in Phoenix's direction. "It's just that usually the mysteriousness isn't coming from within our own ranks..."

At that, Apollo couldn't help a snort. "Luke, you do this all the time; You can't talk."

"I'm back!" Trucy announced, running from the kitchen with four spoons in her grip. She headed straight for her brothers, handing the cutlery around between them. "Let's go already!"

Apollo nodded. "To the detention centre." Putting his pudding and spoon in his bag, he turned and headed towards reception, his younger siblings at his back. "You don't mind us eating in your car, Luke?"

"As long as you don't spill anything," Luke replied, slipping his own desert and cutlery into his satchel. "I'm not sure how I'd get it out if it were to-"

"Ah, Luke?"

The quartet paused, turning back to the desk to see Phoenix standing behind it, one hand raised. He had a smile on his face that, infuriatingly, Apollo couldn't quite read.

"Yes, Papa?" Luke replied.

"I actually have an important job for you," Phoenix explained, leaning on his desk. "I'm afraid you can't go with Apollo this time."

The two elder brothers paused, shooting each other confused looks. "You what?" Apollo muttered to their father.

"You're perfectly capable of conducting an investigation without him, Apollo," Phoenix promised, a small smile on his lips, then waved for him to leave. "You head off to the detention centre."

Apollo turned to Luke. "Will you be...?"

"I'll be fine," Luke immediately insisted, giving his brother a smile that failed to hide how uncertain he was. "He's right, just go on ahead. I'll catch up when I'm done."

Apollo nodded, then waved for Trucy and Machi to follow him. The trio headed out the door as Luke returned to the desk to speak with Phoenix.

The last thing Apollo saw of his father and brother was Phoenix flipping over the papers on his desk as the two leaned over to discuss whatever was on them.

View the Court Record
"The whole court descended into chaos... except for you. You stood there, still, eyes calmly watching... It... made quite the impression."

"... I'm used to finding myself in outrageous situations."

As Drew Misham shuffled his daughter into the room, Phoenix felt himself involuntarily tensing up. This was the creator of the forgery that had cost him his career? She was so... young. Older than Trucy, or Pearl, but still young regardless. He almost sighed; Why were there so many small girls attached to this awful case?

"Vera, this is Phoenix Wright," Drew told the twelve-year-old, who had planted herself firmly next to a small desk to peer at Phoenix from behind the chair. Just as Drew had warned, she seemed too scared to approach any further. "He's nice. He just wants to talk."

Phoenix couldn't blame the paint-covered Drew for not fighting the girl; In only two days, he would be taking young Trucy Enigmar - or rather Trucy Wright - into his own home, and he was already terrified of taking on the new moniker of 'Daddy'. The entire purpose of this overdue visit to his forger had been as a distraction; The last thing he'd been expecting to find out was that the forger himself was a forgery...

Drew sighed, leaving his daughter where she was, then moved over to the table Phoenix was still sitting by. "Be gentle with her."

Phoenix nodded. "I know how to talk to kids." Carefully getting to his feet, he took a few steps across the room, closer to the girl. "Vera, was it?" he asked her. "How about a friendly chat, huh?"

Vera stared, wide blue eyes not dissimilar in shade to her hair. In her arms, she clutched a sketchbook that was in the shape of a teddy bear head. She made no move to react to his question.

"Uh oh. This could be tough." Phoenix took another few steps forward to the desk. "My name's Phoenix Wright," he said. "I used to be a lawyer, actually... But, if you want, you can call me Nick; It's much easier to say."

Although she didn't run away, Vera still didn't reply. A hand raised to her mouth, and she began to nervously chew on her thumb.

Phoenix refused to give up; After Drew had mentioned her unique connection to their mysterious 'client', he knew it was more important than ever that he find some way to get through to young Vera. Kneeling down into a crouch, he cast an eye over the desk she was hiding behind: A small family photo, a familiar-looking bottle of nail polish... and was that a stamp in that tiny brown frame?

"D-don't touch those," Drew called from behind. "That's all Vera's - She doesn't like anyone else going near them."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, turning towards the man. "Isn't that nail polish Ariadoney?" he asked. "A friend of mine wears that. It's supposed to be very expensive."

Drew shrugged. "I wouldn't know," he admitted. "It was a gift from the client."

At that, Phoenix gave the crystal bottle another once-over, grateful one of the subjects presented to him as a distraction over the past week had been, of all things, nail polish; He'd have to ask Kristoph for more information later. For now though, he returned his attention to the two photo frames, and specifically to the stamp. "And that stamp... is that the Gramaryes?"

"A commemorative stamp, yes," Drew explained, nodding. "The post office issued it last year, when they were at the height of their popularity." He forced a smile, but it didn't stick. "Vera's been a dedicated fan since I took her to one of their shows, many years ago; Watched them every time they were on TV... right up to the end."

Phoenix tried not to show any bitterness in his expression; Whatever Zak or Valant had done, it was unrelated to the Mishams.

"I'm not sure where she got it though," Drew added, a hand running through his hair in the exact location of a yellow stripe of paint. "It's supposed to be hard to come by."

It was then Phoenix noticed the photo in the tiny stamp was of more than just Zak and Valant: Between them, dressed in blue, was a woman, a hand gripping one of two brown plaits that draped over her shoulders. 'That must be the mysterious Thalassa,' Phoenix realised. 'Trucy's mother. I can see the similarity.' But he had no time to muse on the girl who would be his daughter soon; He turned his attention back to Vera, giving her his best smile. "So, you're a fan of Troupe Gramarye, huh?"

Vera blinked, staring up at him. "Ah..."

'Well, that's a start.' "They're amazing, right? My favourites are Zak and Valant. They're, uh," he paused, racking his brain for anything else Trucy had said to him about her family business. "They're just so magical!" 'And that was lame. You can do better, Phoenix."

Regardless, Phoenix's imitation of Trucy seemed to be working, as Vera slowly smiled. "Aren't they?" she said.

Phoenix nodded. "Yeah! Whenever I go to one of their shows, I'm like..." He waved his hands, as if to imitate an explosion. "Whoa! Magic! You know?"

"Me too, me too!" Vera cried, bouncing a little in her growing enthusiasm. "I love them! They're so cool!" She grinned, shyly hugging her sketchbook. "I went and saw them with Father the other day... The opening ceremony at the Gramarye Museum of Magic!"

"The Gramarye M-museum?" Phoenix repeated, thrown. "They have a...?" Shaking his head, he decided to leave it; He could ask Trucy later. "So, you've been to their show?"

"Just once, when I was little," Vera replied, looking wistful. "It was like a dream! Disappearing, reappearing, cutting apart, putting back together... they do it all!"

Phoenix nodded. 'Okay, she's talking. Now to change the subject without scaring her off again.' "Did... you never go see them when you were older? To... paint them, maybe?"
Vera grimaced, looking away. "I... don't go outside much," she admitted. "There's bad people out there."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "Well, true, but there're lots of good people too."

Drew cleared his throat, and Phoenix turned to face him. "Actually, I should tell you," the painter admitted, "Vera was almost kidnapped once." Seeing Phoenix's shocked expression, he hurriedly continued, "After that, she refused to ever leave the house again."

"But she said she went to the Gramarye Museum the other day," Phoenix pointed out, gesturing to the girl. "With you."

Drew blushed, hand brushing at the paint streak in his hair. "Y-yes, she was quite insistent on that... the first and last time she's expressed such a desire, to my knowledge."

"That person gave me a good luck charm," Vera quietly explained. "For when I absolutely had to go outside."

"Oh?" Phoenix asked. "What person?"

"The client, actually," Drew filled in. "She won't say what it was."

"Father!" Vera cried accusingly, giving the man a glare. "I told you to keep that a secret!"

Drew winced, his hand in his hair. "S-sorry..."

Phoenix frowned, going back over the objects on the desk. Hadn't the nail polish also been a gift from the client? And Drew hadn't known where the supposedly-rare stamp came from either. "Your father tells me you're good at all kinds of paintings," he said. "Is that true?"

Vera nodded. "I really like painting. Father is always very happy when I paint them exactly the same."

Phoenix paused, musing on the girl's words. She had no idea what it was she was doing. His heart dropping, he pulled out his Court Record from the front pocket of his hoodie and brought up the image of the page from his final trial. "So... you did this, too?"

Vera leaned over to see the picture, and her face lit up. "Oh! Yes! That was so much fun!" She giggled. "All I used to do was paint the same thing I saw, but this was totally different!" She swayed back and forth, her expression wistful. "The way the pen slips, the way the writer held it, the pressure on the nib... I had to use a microscope and analyse it on the computer!"

She really didn't know what it was she was doing... and Phoenix found his eyes drifting back to the stamp on the desk. He wasn't going to be the one to break it to her that her 'work' had been the final nail in the Gramarye coffin.

"They're the best in the world."

"Huh?" Phoenix looked up, and found Vera had rounded the chair to step closer to him, watching Phoenix with a smile. He realised she must have noticed his gaze on the stamp, and quickly forced an embarrassed grimace. "Oh, Troupe Gramarye. Of course."

"Father gave it to me," Vera whispered, grinning.

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, shoving his tablet computer back in his hoodie pocket. "Oh really?" he asked, bluffing his best conspiratorial smile. "He told me he didn't know where you got that, though."

Vera blushed, her grin fading. "Oh, um... I guess I just took it," she admitted.

"'Took' it?"

"Father got a letter, from that person," she whispered, then grinned again. "We talked about the Gramaryes forever that day! I'm sure that's why I was sent that stamp!" She blushed again, shooting her father a guilty look. "I didn't want to just send it back... so I took it."

Phoenix slowly nodded, and gave her a small smile. "Your secret's safe with me," he promised. 'Which makes both the stamp and nail polish gifts from the mysterious client. They're a sneaky one, alright.' “They gave you a 'good luck charm' too, didn't they?”

Vera stepped back towards the chair, chewing on her thumb again. "I can't talk about it."

Recognising she was on the verge of running away, Phoenix leaned back a little, keeping his distance. "Why not?"

"They said, if I do, it won't work anymore!"

Phoenix felt a pang of sympathy for the girl. "I'm sorry Vera, but I really, really have to know."

Vera firmly looked away, at the exact same moment Phoenix saw the spiritual chains and twin psyche-locks rattle into existence around her. He sighed, one hand already gripping the magatama in his pocket.

"I can't," the girl whispered, blinking rapidly. "I really can't."

This was going to hurt.

"Vera, you trust this client a lot, don't you?" Phoenix asked. "Because they gave you that stamp?"

"N-no," Vera replied, shaking her head. "Because they listened to me... to my problem..." She sniffed, rubbing at her eyes. "They said, 'Don't go outside if you don't want to'... but, when I absolutely have to, all I had to do was use a good luck charm."

Phoenix's gaze returned to the desk. If the charm wasn't the stamp, and Vera received two gifts from her client... Well, the answer was obvious... and the implications were massive. "It's your nail polish."

Vera's eyes widened, the psyche-locks smashing into pieces and fading away.

"The bottle on your desk," Phoenix elaborated, his heart sinking. "That's your good luck charm?"

The girl blushed, looking away with a distinctly uncomfortable expression. "I heard somewhere, cosmetics were once thought to ward off evil." She turned back to Phoenix, forcefully whispering, "That's a magic bottle. It has the power."

Phoenix just nodded. "Of course it does. And the person who gave it to you..." He pulled out his Court Record, pulling up a photo he had taken only a few short days ago. "Is this him?"

As the computer spun to face her, Vera gasped, eyes wide. She didn't speak.

"He's a friend of mine," Phoenix continued, fighting to keep the bitterness out of his tone. "A lawyer by the name of Kristoph Gavin."

"I-I promised!" Vera cried, stepping back almost in a panic and hitting the chair, her momentum knocking her onto the seat. She quickly pulled her legs up, hugging her sketchbook tight and biting hard on her thumb. "I promised not to tell!"

"V-Vera?" Drew called from the table behind Phoenix, sounding worried as he stood, the scraping of his chair against the wooden floorboards punctuating his concern.

Phoenix slowly got to his feet, putting his computer back in his pocket. He couldn't make himself meet Vera's eyes.

"I'm sorry," Vera mumbled, looking away.

"I understand," Phoenix quietly replied. "You can't break the spell of your good luck charm."

There was a long silence, none of the three in the room daring to move. Finally, Vera sniffed, rubbing at her nose with a sleeve. "I think... they might be the Devil," she said. "Or maybe an angel."

Phoenix frowned, taking a careful step towards her and leaning forward on his knees. "What do you mean?"

"I saw the Devil's face," Vera whispered, meeting Phoenix's eyes again. "Or, I think I saw it, when they gave me my charm."

Phoenix paused, thinking. "Your client looked like the Devil?"

"No!" Vera insisted, shaking her head with a frown. "The client was... gentle. With a gentle smile."

'That's definitely a more apt description of Kristoph,' Phoenix mused. 'Although... I'm not so sure anymore he's as 'gentle' as he appears...’ "Where'd you see this 'devil' then?"

Vera bit her lip, clutching her sketchbook. "I don't remember," she admitted. "I saw it so quick... but, when I did, I knew that person wasn't like other people. That's how I know my good luck charm works."

Phoenix couldn't reply for a long moment, doubts on his case both old and new pricking at the back of his mind. Finally, he straightened up. "That's all I wanted to know," he softly announced, and turned towards the door.

Drew, much closer, got to the entrance first, pausing with his hand on the door handle and, intentionally or not, blocking Phoenix's path. "I... am sorry for what happened."

Phoenix tried and failed to keep himself from giving the man a glare. "If you want to apologise, try my client, Zak Gramarye," he hissed.

The painter stepped back, wincing. He said nothing.

"Um..."

Hearing the small voice so close, Phoenix turned in surprise, finding Vera had followed him, nervously chewing her thumb.

"Did I... do something bad?" the girl asked.
Phoenix hid a wince behind a smile, leaning down closer to her height. "What makes you think that?"

Vera returned his gaze, studying it intensely. After a moment, she removed her thumb from her mouth. "Your eyes are sad," she said. "Very sad."

Phoenix froze at hearing that, the false smile fading. It was true, he'd not been taking the loss of his badge well... hence his visit. He hadn't known it was quite so obvious, though. He sighed, dropping the act; it was suddenly a lot harder to hold himself together. "I'll... put on my smile next time I visit. I promise." He paused only to blink back the itch in his eyes. "I hope to see you smile then too, Vera."

Vera thought a moment, then gave him a small smile of her own. "Okay."

The corner of Phoenix's mouth twitched upwards in a half-smile. "Take care." As he straightened up, he pulled the hood of his jumper over his distinctive spikes - the best defence against being recognised he'd been able to scrape together - and turned to leave. He refused to give Drew even a second glance.

View the Court Record
I'm sorry Apollo, it looks like I won't have the time to help you at all for this one... and I'll have to cancel the offer to help talk to Clay tonight. This job Papa's given me is bigger than I thought.

No, don't worry about it, I understand. It's not your fault Dad's acting weird.

Thanks. I am sorry though. Good luck tomorrow, and I'll catch up to you once the trial's over. :)

Sure. Seeya then.

October 7, 11:40AM
Detention Center
Reception

Apollo tried not to fidget as he led his younger siblings into the drab grey building of the detention centre. First Clay was acting strangely, then Phoenix... And now Luke, his closest ally against all the suspicious behaviour, had turned on him and essentially fled. The prospect of pulling off a difficult case without help from his brother also terrified Apollo more than he wanted to admit; After locking his own employer up for murder back in April, he'd never taken on a case without Luke at his side, picking up the slack where the elder brother faltered. Even when Luke knew more than he was letting on, Apollo had always been able to trust he would share what they needed to know, would speak up and fight for the points Apollo couldn't, whether Apollo had missed them or simply not seen them at all. None of that was going to happen this time, when it was more important than ever that they get the right verdict... and it was forcing Apollo to admit he'd been relying much more than he should on his younger brother's help.

'This case is going to be way more difficult than I thought...'

The young man at reception smiled as he spotted the newcomers. "Well, if it isn't Apollo Wright! Long time no see!"

Apollo forced a smile for his former classmate, approaching the desk. "Hey, Ernest. I'm just here for a client... The defendant on the Misham case?"

Ernest stared at Apollo a moment. "Wow, you're here to talk to her?" Shaking his head, he looked down at his computer. "Good luck..."

"Your tone isn't exactly inspiring confidence," Apollo muttered with a frown.

"Do you know anything about the case?" Trucy asked, leaning on the desk with a hopeful smile.

"I never do unless I'm working on them myself," Ernest replied. "All I know about this one is that it's so special only a small number of officers with way higher ranks than me are working on it, and even they had to be passed by higher-ups. No idea why, though."

Trucy huffed, disappointed.

Ernest finished his work at his computer and looked up, noticing Machi with a frown. "You're familiar. I've never seen you hanging out with the Wrights before, though.

Machi tensed up, stepping closer to his siblings.

"This is our new little brother, Machi," Apollo explained, resting a hand on the teen's shoulder. "That's all you need to know."

"Oh yeah, is it okay for us to eat in the visitor's room?" Trucy asked, putting a hand into her bag and promptly pulling out her pudding cup to show off. "Polly wouldn't let us eat these on the bus."

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Excuse me for not risking Machi's probation status on freaking pudding...'

Ernest thought a moment, then shrugged. "Sure, there's no rule against food in there. Go ahead."

"Yes!" Trucy cried, fist-pumping triumphantly.

Apollo hid a laugh as he waved his sister through into the next room. "C'mon you little glutton, let's go wait for our client."

As they entered the visitor's room, Apollo pulled over the second chair without thinking, sitting down and pulling out his Court Record. Trucy and Machi followed him, only to both stand awkwardly by the one remaining chair.

"You sit down," Trucy said.

Machi shook his head. "No, you sit. I am happy to stand."

Trucy scoffed. "You have to sit down to eat!"

"Then sit down," Machi replied. "I will eat later."

Apollo rolled his eyes. "If you can't decide who's sitting down, either share the seat or stand."

"Oh, that's a good idea!" Trucy chirped, grabbing Machi's arm. "We'll share it... The share-chair!"

Apollo sighed as his sister giggled madly at her own joke.

It took only a few minutes for the two teenagers, squeezed into the single fold-up chair, to work their way through their individual puddings. Apollo didn't bother with his, wanting to be ready for his client when they came in... though, by the time his siblings were scraping the last bits of food from their plastic cups, he was starting to wonder why he'd bothered.

"Now we jutht gowwa fin' a trath can," Trucy mumbled through her spoon.

Rolling his eyes, Apollo reached into his bag and produced two small evidence baggies. "One for the trash, one for the dirty spoons," he told her, holding them out.

"Thank you, isoveli!" Machi chirped, taking the bags.

As the pair busied themselves cleaning up, Apollo checked the time on his computer. 'Ten minutes. We've been sitting here ten minutes and still no sign of my client.' Resisting the urge to grumble, he turned his gaze through the window into the other half of the room, only to jump in shock. "Augh! Wh-where'd you come from?!?"

Trucy and Machi gasped as they also saw what Apollo had noticed: Standing in the shadows, next to the door, was a young woman with long, blue hair, dressed in a pink striped turtle-neck and clutching a large sketchbook in her arms. She stared across the room at the three Wrights, eyes wide.

How this woman had entered the room without any of them noticing, Apollo had no idea, but he wasn't going to let her odd silence unnerve him. "Anyway... Please, have a seat." He gestured to the chair on the other side of the glass.

The woman stared a little longer... then slowly stepped forward and gingerly lowered herself into the chair. She still didn't speak.

Apollo could feel the suspense of the continued silence building... and if there was one thing being a magician had taught him, it was how to handle suspense. "Well, my name's Apollo, and these are my little siblings, Trucy and Machi," he said, gesturing to the pair at his side. "I'm your defence attorney, actually." With a grin, he waved his hand and produced one of his business cards from thin air, slipping it through the small gap under the glass. "Here!"

The woman minutely gasped, a hand at her mouth. She continued to silently stare at Apollo, making no move to take the card.

"Did you want a bigger trick?" Trucy asked, jumping out of her seat with a wide grin. "C'mon, I'll introduce you to the third member of our act!" Before anyone could reply, Trucy's cape was fluttering with the movement of a hidden contraption underneath, a wooden puppet in a cape of its own spinning out into the air before grabbing the top hat off the teenager's head and placing it firmly above its own painted face.

"Hello there!" the puppet 'said', clattering up and down with the movement of its jaw. "I'm the Amazing Mister Hat!"

The woman fainted.

Shrieking, Trucy quickly withdrew the puppet, knocking her hat to the floor in her panic to retrieve it. "I'm sorry!"

Apollo had jumped to his feet, pressing his forehead to the glass in an effort to check on his unconscious client. "Miss!?"

The guard, an older woman with pink hair, quickly noticed what had happened, running over and dropping out of sight below the desk. "She's fine," she called.

Sighing in relief, Apollo sat back down in his chair. "Well, that was fruitless..."

Clutching her hat, Trucy sank into the free space on the other chair, muttering, "I'm sorry..." Machi quickly pulled her into a hug.

"It's not your fault," Apollo assured her. "I guess she's just... super skittish." He had to admit, it hurt a little that she didn't appear to be much of a fan of magic; He wasn't sure how else to get the woman to talk.

The guard helped the younger woman back into the chair, where the blue-haired girl busied herself looking through her pockets. A moment later, she pulled something out, fiddling around in her lap. The guard had returned to her post.

"Is she... painting her nails?" Machi whispered.

Apollo sighed, realising what the light pink colour of the mysterious object had been. 'Well, she obviously won't, or can't, speak to us... This was a complete waste of time.' "Let's go," he said, getting to his feet.

"Excuse me..."

Apollo paused, his siblings already half off their chair. Did his client just... talk to them?

The young woman reached out to take Apollo's business card from the gap under the glass, leaving a second business card in its place. "C-could you... Could you read this?"

"Um, sure." Feeling almost like he was passing notes in class, Apollo reached out to take the business card. He had just raised it to his face to study when his siblings slammed into his sides, both eagerly wanting a look themselves.

"It's so pretty!" Trucy cooed. "Almost looks like a postcard!"

Machi pointed at the name and address on the front. "Vera... Misham? Is 'Drew Studio' where you work?"

The woman, Vera, didn't reply, in the middle of putting away her nail polish. A moment later, she was getting up from her chair and heading back towards the guard.

Apollo sighed, lowering the business card. "Well, looks like we're finished here."

Trucy snatched the card from his hand with a giggle, dashing out of the room.

Machi stepped towards the glass. "Thank you for your help, Ms Misham," he called. "Don't worry, Apollo will find truth in trial!"

Vera gave Machi only a tiny glance, then hurried out the door.

Apollo tapped his brother's shoulder, directing him to leave, but paused in the doorway, watching the guard disappearing into the hallway behind their client. 'Vera... Misham? Why is that name vaguely familiar...?'

Back in reception, Trucy had already pulled Machi into a new conversation, pointing to the back of Vera's business card. "Then people would remember what you look like, too!" she said.

Machi nodded. "That is good idea," he agreed.

Seeing Apollo approaching, Trucy waved him over with a grin. "Polly! Give me one of your business cards so we can put a portrait of you on the back!"

Apollo just waved off her request. "The address on that is for a 'Drew Studio', right?"

Machi nodded. "That is what it says." He pointed at the card, reading, "Fifty-seven Cape Rivers... D. R.?"

"Drive," Trucy told him. "They live in Yachtsville, not too far from here!" She turned her grin on Apollo. "You think it might be the scene of the crime?"

Apollo only smirked, taking the card from his sister. "Let's go find out."

[View the Court Record]
As he led his siblings back towards the bus-stop, eyes on his phone, Apollo heard his siblings chattering away behind him.

"Anyway, she seemed really nice! Her name was Vera, wasn't it?"

"Mm-hmm. She is not seem like murderer."

"Nope. I think Daddy was just teasing us when he said she was."

"That is good. Apollo can prove she not kill anyone."

"Yeah! We'll find all sorts of evidence at the crime scene, and get her off tomorrow! Won't we, Polly?"

It took Apollo a moment to register his sister was addressing him. "Huh? Oh, yeah, if we can." He kept his eyes on his phone, reading the bus route it displayed.

Hurried steps marked the appearance of his siblings at his sides, Trucy on his left and Machi on his right. "What do you mean, Polly? Of course you're gonna win," Trucy said.

Apollo sighed, putting away his phone. "If Luke was there, he would have convinced Vera to talk."

The two teenagers shot each other confused looks. "I don't think he would," Trucy hesitantly argued. "She was just too scared of us. Not even Luke could have made her open up."

"You can't know that," Apollo replied, shoving his hands in the belt of his hip-bag. "Luke's not here, and he's not going to be here. It's always been Luke who found the clues that really shook everything up; How am I supposed to fight in this trial without him!?"

Trucy scoffed. "Well, that's not true. You helped Luke and Daddy when they got accused of murder! And it was you who found all the missing panties in Wocky's case! A-and, in Machi's case, you worked out how Uncle Valant's illusion worked, and how it tied in to the murder!"

"It was Mister Gavin who defended Luke, not me," Apollo corrected, rolling his eyes. "And he was helping me for Dad's case, before Dad helped me himself. For Wocky's case, Luke outright took over the investigation, and..." He sighed. "What better example is there of how good he is at this than the fact that he saw through Machi's 'blind' act immediately?"

Machi flinched. "I-I'm sorry..."

"N-no, I didn't mean anything by that, little brother," Apollo quickly added, resting a hand on Machi's shoulder. Shaking his head, he turned back to Trucy. "If it wasn't for my badge, what reason would I even have to appear in court? Even Herr Diva has said Luke would be a better lawyer than me."

Trucy glared up at her eldest brother for a long moment. "Polly, Luke doesn't want to be a lawyer," she forcefully replied. "He never has! Even when we were little, he thought of being an archaeologist before being a vet!"

Apollo huffed. "That doesn't change the fact he's better at it than me."

"Yes it does!" Trucy argued, grabbing Apollo's arm and pulling them to a halt in the middle of the pavement. "You've always wanted to be a lawyer, long before you ever met Daddy! You wanted it so much, you kept pursuing it, even though we had our magic career to keep us busy!"

'And you never stopped bugging me about 'wasting my time' with it, too...’ Out loud, Apollo said nothing, avoiding his sister's determined gaze.

"You're better at card tricks than I am," Trucy continued. "And you're the only one of us who can go into the zigzag boxes. Do you think I should quit because I'm not as good as you? Let you replace me?"

"That" got his attention. "What!?" He wheeled on his sister with wide eyes. "Truce, of course not, you've wanted to be a magician since you were a kid! I only became a magician because-!"

"Because you wanted to help me?" Trucy filled in. "Because I asked you to? Because it's a family tradition?" She crossed her arms. "That's why Luke has been helping you. He never wanted to replace you; He helped because he wanted to make sure you did your best, that you lived up to Daddy's name, and you asked him to do it!"

Apollo could only stare blankly back at his sister. He wanted to argue the help he got from Luke wasn't the same thing as the help he gave Trucy, but the order wasn't making it to his mouth.

"Yeah, Luke's super-good at investigating, but he's no lawyer," Trucy softly continued, eyes sad. "Not like you are, Polly."

A hand rested on Apollo's arm where it hung at his side, and he turned to see Machi watching him nervously. "You are great lawyer, isoveli," he said. "If not for you, I not have told truth in trial... and Aska not have courage to go to England. I love Luke, but... it not him to do that."

Apollo stared at his youngest brother for a long moment before reaching out and pulling both his siblings into a hug. "I'm such an idiot. You two are so right... I'm sorry."

"S'okay," Trucy mumbled, hugging him back.

Machi nodded, his golden hair tickling Apollo's cheek. "We love you, isoveli."

"I love you guys too," Apollo replied, giving them one final squeeze before releasing them from his grip. As they stepped back, he gave them a sheepish smile, hands resting on their shoulders. "So... would you both be okay with helping me out in Luke's place? Just until he gets back?"

Trucy scoffed. "Duh. We came with you to the detention centre, didn't we?"

Machi giggled, nodding. "We will do our best to help you do your best."

Apollo laughed. "Can't ask for more than that," he pointed out, then patted the pair's shoulders once and headed off down path. "C'mon, we've got a possible crime scene to look at!"
The address on Vera's business card turned out to lead to an old house near Gourd Lake. The single-floor building sat low to the ground and close to the road. Nearby a public bench, a short path led to the green front door, and next to that was a bright red metal box, the number '57' painted on its front. Above, Apollo could see a large window on the lower half of the roof, likely streaming in the midday sun. Leading his siblings across the paving stones, Apollo hesitated only a moment before reaching out to the yellow door handle and giving it a firm tug. To his surprise, the door turned out to be unlocked, pulling open easily. Shooting a surprised glance at his siblings, the trio slipped inside.

As Apollo looked around, he said the first thing that came to mind: "Wow, this looks like... It looks like a studio."

Soft yellow walls and lemon-coloured floorboards highlighted the bright sun rays falling from above, through the wooden beams that formed the building's structure. Multiple small paintings hung, dotted against the plaster in whatever free space remained around the tall cupboards and shelves containing supplies of paint and empty canvasses. The near half of the room was dominated by three easels, each holding a large painting. Nearby, a table constructed from half a tree trunk sat with two cups on top; On one side was a simple chair, and on the other an upturned stool, next to an outline marked in white tape and surrounded by plastic numbered cards.

"It's like life imitating art, or maybe the other way around," Trucy said, and pointed to the shape of a body marked on the ground. "But that is a bit jarring."

Machi pressed close to Apollo's side. "So this is crime scene?"

Apollo nodded. "Looks like it."

Trucy cooed, jumping over the tape outline towards the line of paintings. "Polly, Machi, look at all of these!"

"Hey, don't touch those," Apollo warned, following his sister.

"It's okay, I'm just looking," Trucy said over her shoulder, waving off her brother's concern. A moment later, her attention was captured by one of the end paintings, a landscape partly obscured by a well-used artist's palette resting on the easel in front of it. "Hey, Polly, look at this one."

Apollo frowned as he gave the landscape a second look. Above the palette, where there was clearly supposed to be blue sky, was a mass of grey pencil scribblings on bare canvas... a spot that lacked any of the paint that covered the rest. "Looks half finished."

Trucy nodded. "And the rough sketch doesn't look like the rest of the painting at all."

Indeed, the pencil sketch appeared to be of dark, rolling clouds, lit from below; A stark contrast to the sunny sky next to it. "Yeah, good point."

Machi joined them, looking between the three paintings. After a moment, he pointed at the one closest to the door, an abstract piece of mostly black lines on white. "That looks like a person... thinking about something."

"Maybe they're worried," Trucy suggested. She pointed to the middle painting, a photo-real painting of a seascape. "I like the porcupine-fish in this one! It's so spiky!"

Apollo still stared at the unfinished landscape, a surreal impressionist piece of a giant peach floating down a river. "They're all different styles," he realised. 'What's going on here?'

Footsteps echoed from somewhere else in the apartment, and Apollo peered through a gap between the paintings, past a small desk littered with bits and bobs. Through an open door wandered a woman in a lab coat, her distinctive red-lens glasses perched in front of her brown ponytail. As she spotted Apollo watching, she frowned, moving to join them. "Ah, I thought I might find you three here."

Trucy grinned, waving at the scientist as she rounded the line of paintings. "Ema! Long time no see!"

"Oh? Seems like I run into you far too oft-" Ema's grumbling was cut short as she noticed Machi standing next to Apollo. "Wait, aren't you Lamiroir's pianist, the smuggler? What are you doing here? And where's Luke?"

Machi grabbed Apollo's arm, hiding behind him.

Apollo shot Ema a glare. "There's nothing in Machi's probation that says he can't be here."

"Yeah!" Trucy added, arms crossed. "And he's officially our little brother now, so you gotta be nice to him!"

Ema stepped back a little in surprise. "He's...?" After a moment of complete bafflement, she shook her head with a sigh. "Whatever. You're here about the test trial tomorrow, aren't you?"

Apollo nodded, relaxing out of his glare. "We don't know much about it, though. Just that it's a murder."

"Yep, the artist who owns this studio," Ema replied. "Mister Drew Misham."

Trucy gasped, hands to her mouth. "Misham?"

Machi peeked out from behind Apollo. "Like Vera Misham...?"

Ema nodded. "His daughter. You've met her?"

"We just saw her at the detention centre," Apollo explained, frowning. 'I guess Dad was calling this the 'Misham' case... I should have noticed that earlier.' He stifled the thought Luke would have noticed immediately.

"It was funny though," Trucy continued, tapping her chin in thought. "She seemed more like a victim than the kind of person who could commit murder."

Ema shifted her stance, hand on her hip. "You don't say. Not even by poisoning?"

Machi tilted his head to one side. "Poyz-ning...?"

"Poisoning's a common way to get the job done, when the murderer is a woman."

Apollo shivered. Maybe that was why Phoenix had chosen this case; He knew how much their father hated that tactic. Even so, he still didn't think Vera was capable of murder.

Trucy stepped over to Machi's side. "I can type it into your phone for you," she offered. "I don't know how to explain it."

Machi nodded, pulling out his phone to hand over to his sister.

"Anyway, Mister Wright told me you'd be coming," Ema continued to Apollo, ignoring his younger siblings. She gestured around the room. "Feel free to look around. I'll just be over here. With my Snackoos." She promptly spun on her high heels and moved over to the chair at the tree-trunk table, which Apollo suddenly noticed had a small pile of equipment hidden behind it. Once Ema had navigated around the pile and sat down, she pulled out a bag of chocolate and quickly started munching away.

Apollo set his shoulders as he pulled out his Court Record, deciding to leave the detective be for now; With Phoenix's proclamation they couldn't talk to anyone related to the case, it was unlikely they'd get much help from Ema this time... which made their examination of the scene more important than ever. And he didn't intend on letting anyone down.

[View the Court Record]
'Myrkytys..." Machi muttered to himself. "That is terrible way to die..."

Trucy nodded sagely. "Our last two cases were people getting shot," she said. "No matter how you die, it's awful."

"At least Meraktis died instantly," Apollo muttered. He finished taking his photos of the three paintings, then gestured around the room. "C'mon, let's investigate. And don't touch anything."

"We won't," Machi promised.

"Of course we won't!" Trucy scoffed. "What do you take us for, Polly? We're not children!"

Apollo just rolled his eyes. 'Could've fooled me.'

Trucy grabbed Machi's hand, pulling him around Apollo and towards the table Ema was sat at. "Well, if Mister Misham was poisoned, I bet these cups have something to do with it! Right, Machi?"

Machi shrugged. "I guess?"

"What do you mean, you 'guess'?’" Trucy cried, offended. "There's no food around, so it must have been something he drank!" She gasped. "Unless he was eating the paint!"

Ema failed to hide a snort as she shoved a handful of Snackoos into her mouth.

"Why would he be eating paint?" Apollo pointed out. "Nobody eats paint."

Trucy shrugged. "Maybe it was special edible paint," she said. "You know, like the kind you put in food."

"That is called 'food colouring', yes?’" Machi asked. "We used that in Home Ec. class just last week."

"He's right," Apollo agreed, shooting his scoffing sister a smirk. "It's nothing like paint."

Ema put down her bag of food and gestured to the cups, barely hiding a smile. "The blue one is the victim's coffee mug," she explained, apparently deciding to help after hearing Trucy's outlandish theory.

"Aha!" Trucy cried. "So the poison was in here!" She leaned down, examining the piece of pottery with a grin. "This is my first time seeing a real poisoned mug of coffee!"

"I would hope so," Apollo muttered, raising his tablet computer to take a picture.

Finally released from Trucy's grip, Machi hugged himself tightly, shooting Ema nervous looks as he stepped back behind his siblings. Apollo decided to let him be, knowing the boy was uncomfortable being so close to one of the detectives who had arrested him for murder.

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What do you mean?"

"No traces of poison were found in the coffee," Ema explained.

Trucy straightened up with a gasp. "What!?"

Ema shook her head. "You'll have to figure out the rest yourself. I'm officially not on your side, after all." She tossed a chocolate stick into her mouth.

Apollo resisted the urge to point out she never had been, and it had never stopped her before.

"What about this?" Trucy pointed to the pristine white cup and saucer sitting near the mug.

"I imagine that one was for guests to use," Ema said.

"Did the police analyse the cup too?" Apollo asked, arms crossed.

Ema scoffed. "Not a trace of poison was found on that cup."

Apollo couldn't help but feel annoyed by her smug tone. 'So the killer was after Drew Misham alone.'

Meanwhile, Trucy had returned her attention to the mug. "Hey, Polly, look! That stain doesn't look too healthy."

Turning his gaze to what his sister was looking at, Apollo found a bright blue mark on the lip of the mug. "Um, Ema...? What's this?"

Ema's eyes widened. "Ah, th-that! Yes!" She cleared her throat, fiddling with the glasses on her head. "It's just a rumour, but I've heard there's a kind of coffee called 'Blue Mountain'!"

"Ooh, I've heard of that too!" Trucy cried.

Apollo shot the detective a glare. "I'm pretty sure it isn't actually blue, Ema."

Ema blushed, looking away. "R-right. Okay, you got me." She sighed. "That's left over from my testing spray."

"Forensic science!" Trucy cried triumphantly, then giggled. "I knew your hobby was behind this somehow, Ema!"

"It's not a 'hobby'!" Ema protested.

Trucy ignored her. "So, what kind of scientific stuff were you up to?"

Instead of continuing to complain, Ema proudly pulled a small spray-bottle from her pocket, showing it off. "This spray, that's what. It turns blue when it touches poison."

Apollo frowned, staring at the mug. "So, the poison that killed the victim was on this mug?"

Ema nodded. "See? It wasn't in the coffee. The killer applied it to the rim of the mug itself!"

"Wow!" Trucy said. "Science is amazing!"

'It's certainly helpful,' Apollo privately agreed. 'Maybe if we butter her up, Ema would be more willing to help us out a bit more...'} Dragged from his musings, Apollo looked up to see Machi had wandered off at some point during the conversation, and was now standing by a small chest of drawers next to the front door. "What is it, Machi?"

Machi pointed between the drawers and the wall behind them. "There is other painting here."

Apollo and Trucy shot each other surprised looks before hurrying to Machi’s side. Sure enough, hidden behind the drawers and against the wall was a fourth canvas, the same size as the three on the easels. "Hey, you're right," Apollo muttered. Putting away his Court Record for now, he got down on his knees to see if he could extricate the extra painting from its hiding place.

"What if it's embarrassing somehow, and he didn't want anyone to see it?" Trucy suggested.

Apollo shot his sister a look over his shoulder. "You certainly seem pleased by the possibility."

"If he want to hide it," Machi mused aloud, "why not find place harder to see? It is easy to find next to front door."

"That’s a good point t-," Apollo said, only for his words to fail him as he pulled the painting into the light with one last tug. This canvas wasn’t just the same size as the ones on display: The impressionist-style scene painted across it was a surreal image of a giant peach floating down a river, a farmer watching on from underneath a sweeping blue sky.

"Huh," Trucy mumbled, disappointed. "It's so... normal."

Apollo could only stare at it. The sky covered the top of the canvas, and there was more detail and colour in general across the entire piece, but... Was he the only one seeing the similarity here?

"I think I know that story, though," Trucy continued. "You remember, right Polly? The one where the old woman is doing the wash in the river, and this giant peach comes a-floatin' on down." She giggled. "I'm pretty sure that's how it went."

Apollo didn't reply, not even to tell his sister off for her strange story.

"Is something wrong, Isoveli?" Machi asked.

Steeling himself, Apollo got to his feet and swept past his siblings, rounding on the detective sat at the table. "Ema, what's going on here?"

Ema stared back, wide-eyed. "Ah, th-that painting back there? What about it?"

"What about it!?" Apollo repeated in disbelief.

"Yeah, what about it, Polly?" Trucy added, hands on her hips.

Behind her, Machi was looking back and forth between the new painting and the ones on display with a frown. "It's... the same."

"Wait, what?" Trucy cried, following her younger brother's gaze.

Apollo nodded, and pointed to the landscape on the easel. "That hidden painting is exactly the same as this one, only complete. Surely you noticed that, Ema."

Ema winced, looking away sheepishly. "I was hoping you wouldn't find that," she admitted. "You're right, though. Drew Misham was copying this painting."

"What for?" Apollo asked, eyes narrowed.

Ema only looked away, shrugging, and shoved another handful of Snackoos into her mouth.

"It's pretty good," Trucy said, admiring the unfinished painting on the easel. "For a copy."

Sighing, Apollo turned his back on Ema; It was clear she wasn't going to share anything else without a fight, and they still had a room to examine. "C'mon, let's look over here." He directed his siblings to the other side of the room, behind the three displayed paintings. "We can't afford to miss anything."

The back half of the room was very different from the entrance: An iron beam above them blocked the light from the high windows, casting a dark shadow over the already-dark walls and making the lights of the electronic equipment stand out all the sharper. On the wall was a light-box, several x-ray-like images hung on it, and a green hook hung from a contraption on the iron beam. A table circled the wall in the corner, holding what Apollo could only guess was some kind of x-ray machine, and a purple barrel bolted to the wall hid something else equally complicated behind it. All over were small sticky notes and intricate plans for more machinery. Below the light-box were all the components one would need for developing images, and nearby a metal cart with two large gas bottles and a Bunsen burner. In the opposite corner, blocking the view of the door further into the apartment, was a drafting table, a microscope, and a surprisingly normal (though old) desktop computer.

Trucy was quick to examine the complicated-looking equipment on their left. "What's all this for?" she asked. "It doesn't look very artistic, really."

"Victim was painter, yes?" Machi added, warily watching the gas bottles on the cart. "Why would he need this?"

"He had everything from a lathe to a laser cutter," Ema filled in, and Apollo spun around to see she had got up from her chair and followed them, still munching on her Snackoos. "Looks like he was ready to work on metals and wood too... Though his equipment's a bit old, to tell the truth."

Apollo gave the equipment another once-over: Now he was looking closer, he could see it was mostly covered in dust. "Had he even used any of it recently?"

Trucy squeaked as she dropped to the floor, pulling open a drawer on the cart. When she jumped back to her feet, she was holding a deadly-looking lathe. "Can I borrow this? I want to cut a quarter in half to make a trick coin!"

"No, Trucy!" Apollo ordered, gesturing a request to put the lathe back. "This is a crime scene! You can buy a trick coin if you want one that bad!"

"But they cost like fifty bucks!" Trucy whined. Regardless, she put the lathe away.

Machi patted his sister's shoulder. "Maybe you could ask Aska when she come back," he offered. "She could buy one as late birthday present."

Trucy chewed her lip in thought. "Yeah, I guess."

Ema scoffed, throwing another handful of Snackoos in her mouth.

As he spun around to ask Ema what she was even doing, Apollo noticed the small desk near where she was standing, the one he'd seen earlier as she greeted them. Deciding to leave the detective be, he waved to his siblings, pointing them to the table. "Guys? Let's take a closer look at this."

Trucy and Machi shot each other a confused look, and hurried to Apollo's side, looking over the small desk. In the corner, replacing the sunlight blocked by the paintings, was a table lamp, yellow bulb shining within. Next to it were two picture frames, one tiny and seemingly empty, and the other larger, with a photo of a small girl and a man in his forties.

"So this is Drew Misham?" Apollo realised, pointing to the man in the photo.

"And the little girl must be Vera!" Trucy added.

Machi frowned. "She is young here," he pointed out.

"Yes, they took that some years ago," Ema said. "They look close. A happy little family."

Apollo shot her a glare. "Until you arrested his daughter."

Ema jumped with a squawk, and sputtered out, "L-look, I was personally against that, okay?" She huffed, brushing down her lab coat. "She just didn't seem very suspicious. Scientifically speaking."

"Uh huh," Apollo muttered, rolling his eyes. "Right."

Meanwhile, Machi had picked up a feather that was lying on the other side of the desk. "Is this pen?"

Trucy shook her head. "It doesn't have a pointy end."

"That was most likely for sweeping detritus off the desk," Ema explained, making a sweeping motion with her hand.

"Wow, you sure know a lot, Ema," Trucy said, shooting the detective a smile.

Ema grinned proudly. "Bold and scientific, that's my motto."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. 'Exactly what about that was 'bold' or 'scientific'?' His internal snarking was interrupted by Machi's giggles, and the teen began wagging the feather in Apollo's face, causing the elder brother to sputter and close his eyes. Unable to resist laughing in response, waving his little brother off. "Bro, please, this is a crime scene!" Still grinning proudly, Machi put the feather back where he'd found it. Now Apollo could see again, he noticed Ema had wandered off while he'd been distracted.

"Ooh, Polly, look!" Trucy cried, directing her brothers' attention to a wooden artist's figure near the lamp. "It's you, making one of your flamboyant gestures!"

Apollo grinned, making a show of brushing a hand through his hair. "Please, I'm a professional." As his siblings giggled, he gave the figure a closer look: Just as Trucy said, it was arranged into the same pose he used when pointing in court... but it wasn't like that particular pose was unique to him, or even to lawyers as a whole. 'I wonder why it's posed like that? Coincidence?'

Machi turned to a green book, flipping through the pages. "This is... empty. Why buy book if you not write in it?"

"I guess it was new," Apollo said.

"Aw, cute!" Trucy cried, and pointed to the small frame next to the family photo. "Look at that! It's tiny!"
Machi gasped. "It is!" he agreed. "You would need photo two, maybe three centimetres wide to fit!"

Apollo nodded. True. The frame as a whole is barely two inches high. "And there's no glass in it... What do you suppose was in there?"

"Probably nothing," Trucy sagely decided. "Let this serve as a lesson for us all: Be sure to check the size when you buy frames!"

[View the Court Record]
Apollo noticed a small drawer underneath the top of the desk that was sitting ajar. Shooting a glance up at Ema to check she wasn’t watching, he gently slid it open, finding inside only a bright crimson envelope. It lay with the flap facing upwards, and Apollo could see at a glance that it had been ripped open in the past, then taped shut. "This envelope's been opened and resealed," he told his siblings, knowing they couldn't see the inside of the drawer from where they stood. As he spoke, he took a picture with his Court Record.

Machi looked confused. "How would you...?"

"I know how to do that!" Trucy gleefully told him. "You take a pot of boiling water, and hold the envelope up to the steam. The glue melts and it opens! Cool, huh?"

"Mm," Machi muttered, looking thoughtful.

"You can do it with stamps, too," Trucy added, clearly angling for the enthusiastic reaction she had yet to elicit. "Luke used to let me take the stamps Uncle Professor sent him, but they were all the same, so I gave it up."

Machi frowned in thought, then pulled out his phone.

"Anyway," Apollo spoke up, taking the envelope out of the drawer, "whoever opened this thing first wasn't nearly as delicate as that." Trucy gasped as she spotted the ripped flap, and Apollo turned the object around to examine the front. Above the studio's address was an ordinary stamp and the postmark; He almost double-taked as he read the latter. "April twenty-nineteen!? The postmark on this is from seven years ago!"

"Really!?" Trucy cried, a hand over her mouth. "Why keep a letter that long!?

"Ah!" Machi looked up from his phone with a grin. "I read somewhere, when you lick back of stamp, you eat one tenth of calorie!"

Trucy wrinkled her nose at him, shooting a brief glare at his phone. "You looked that up!"

Machi shook his head, showing off his phone screen: His translation app, with an unreadable (to them) string of Borginian characters in the top box and ‘calorie’ in the bottom.

In response, Trucy's eyes narrowed. "You win this time..."

Apollo rolled his eyes and left them to it, making sure to take a picture of the envelope's front before slipping it into his bag.

"What now, isovel?" Machi asked.

"I have some questions for our detective friend," Apollo replied, and gestured for his siblings to follow him as he headed back to the other side of the room.

As the three Wrights slipped past the displayed paintings, Ema looked up from her chair at the table.
"Done already?"

Apollo nodded, stepping over the taped outline on the floor. "You said Drew Misham is an artist?"

"Apparently," Ema replied. "Did a lot of illustrations for books, I hear. Had a lot of female fans too, for what it's worth."

"Oh?" Trucy blinked in surprise, looking over the displayed paintings. "Well, I guess his stuff is kinda pretty."

Ema shrugged. "He was an odd bird, Misham. Hadn't shown his face to anyone until the end."

"To anyone?" Machi repeated. "He... did not go out?"

"Nope. He was always locked up here in this studio, apparently." Ema pointed to the red letter box mounted on the wall next to the door. "His only connection to the outside world was through letters he'd put in that letter box."

"Yeah, wouldn't email be easier?" Trucy added.

"Personally, I agree with you," Ema said, "but it seems Mister Misham couldn't stand technology. He did everything through physical mail: Put his letters in the letter box, and the postman took them away from outside."

Machi nodded thoughtfully. "There is nothing like physical letter. Maybe he just like feel of paper."

Trucy shrugged. "It's impressive just to find someone who still writes letters in this day and age," she said. "Or wrote, rather."

"In any case, the only person besides him allowed in here was his daughter, Vera," Ema continued. "We took some fingerprints of course; The only ones found in the room were Mister Misham's and Vera's, basically."

"Basically?" Apollo repeated, giving her a suspicious look.

Ema wriggled uncomfortably, avoiding his gaze. "Actually, last night... Mister Misham gave an interview to a reporter for the first time," she admitted. "It happened during the interview, apparently."

Trucy looked like she wasn't sure whether to believe that or not. "His first interview ever...?"

Ema shrugged. "I guess mysterious painters who never go outside make for good articles."

Apollo narrowed his eyes at the detective. "And it just so happened that he died the night of his first interview?"

Ema shot Apollo a brief glare. "At around nine PM every night, Vera always made him a cup of coffee. Last night, he drank his usual coffee, and suddenly became violently ill."

"And died?" Trucy picked up, in disbelief. "She poisoned him on the night of his interview!? Wouldn't the reporter see?"

"He wasn't near Mister Misham when she brought her father the coffee," Ema explained, arms crossed. "He was checking out the equipment in the back of the room." She looked off beyond the paintings. "Supposedly, that's why she didn't notice he was there. It was the reporter who called the police, in fact."

Machi looked as confused as Apollo felt. "But, why is Vera suspect?"

Apollo nodded. "Exactly! If anyone is suspicious, it's the reporter!"

"Yet the reporter never got near Mister Misham's coffee," Ema replied. "Even Vera acknowledges that."

Apollo just watched the detective carefully. 'Regardless, I want to know more about this 'reporter'...' Shaking his head, he decided to move on for now. "Alright then, what about Vera? Was she as closed off from the outside world as her father?"

"She did kind of give off a withdrawn sort of aura," Trucy muttered.

"Yep," Ema said, nodding. "A real sickly girl, ever since she was little. She was home-schooled by her father, apparently."

"No wonder she not like people," Machi commented.

"It was quite a scene when they took her to the detention centre," Ema continued. "She was screaming about how she'd die 'if they took her outside'." Apollo's eyes widened. "That... does sound like a scene."

Ema only nodded in agreement. "In the end, she agreed to leave if she was allowed her 'good luck charm' for company."

"Her 'good luck charm'?” Trucy asked.

Ema huffed, waving a hand dismissively. "Apparently, she has this charm that magically gives her the courage to go outside."

Apollo glared at Ema for mocking the teenager's coping mechanism... though he did wonder how such a strong fear developed in the first place.

"But if she was scared of outside," Machi asked, "why kill her dad? She would have to go out then, yes?"

Ema shrugged. "Don't look at me."

Crossing his arms, Apollo set his gaze on the mug on the table. Drew Misham had died after drinking his coffee, and they could see the results of Ema's tests proving there was poison on the mug, not in the coffee itself... but why would the killer have done that? Wouldn't it be easier to poison the coffee itself? And then there was that mysterious identical painting Machi found, the one Drew had been copying. Maybe it was time they worked their Gramarye charms on Ema's favourite hobby.

Fixing the detective with a grin, Apollo innocently grasped his hands behind his back. "Hey, Ema... What is it we always do when we meet up at a crime scene? You know... scientifically?"

It was impossible to miss the sparkling in Ema's eyes as the question was posed to her. She resisted for a moment or two, then finally broke out into a wide grin. "Aw, you know me too well!" Jumping to her feet, she snapped her fingers at the trio. "Okay, just this once! Bring me anything you find suspicious and we'll check it out!"

"Yay!" Trucy cheered, bouncing on the spot. "I knew we could trust in you, Ema!"

Machi just looked confused.

Apollo hid an amused snort, and pointed to the coffee mug. "So, we may as well start here: The poison analysis?"

Ema's grin turned to a pursed frown. "I was afraid you were going to ask about that." With a sigh, she retrieved her small spray bottle from her pocket. "See, this solution is used to test for atroquinine."

"At-ro-ki...?" Machi muttered, counting the syllables on his fingers.

"Atroquinine!" Ema repeated, the spark of excitement returning to her eyes. "The deadly poison found in the autopsy! It's one of the most virulent poisons, but is absorbed into the body astonishingly slowly. It takes at least fifteen minutes from the time of ingestion for adverse effects to show." She squeaked, clutching her spray bottle tight. "Oh, and guess what!? Recent research has shown-!"

"Th-that's fine, really," Apollo interrupted, holding up his hands in surrender. "We don't need to know all the gory details..." Maybe it was a mistake to tease her like that...'

"I think I get it," Trucy picked up. "You just spray this stuff on something you want to test, right?"

"Precisely!" Ema replied, proudly showing off her bottle. "You can find even the slightest trace of poison with this!"

Squealing herself, Trucy ran around the table to Ema's side, holding out her hand. "I wanna try too, Ema! Pretty please?"

Ema laughed. "You don't have to ask twice!" She placed the spray bottle in Trucy's hand. "I already used it on everything suspicious, of course."

"Yay!" Trucy cheered, and immediately set about spraying the substance in the bottle on whatever was within reach... including her brothers.

"Hey!" Machi cried, hiding his face behind his hands.

"What are you doing, Truce!?!" Apollo added, flapping his cape to clear the air and giving his sister a disapproving look.

"I was just seeing if I got a reaction off of you," Trucy innocently explained, a grin on her face.

Apollo glared. "How's this for a reaction: Never do that again!"

Trucy froze, her smile fading. "Oh... I'm sorry, Polly."

"It's fine," Apollo muttered, brushing off his suit and avoiding his sister's eyes; Even though it was a genuine accident, and Trucy had immediately apologised, he couldn't help feeling guilty at upsetting his sister. "Why don't you and Machi go looking for any other trace of poison, huh?"

The two teens looked at each other and nodded, then turned back to Apollo. "Where should first we look, isoveli?"
Apollo hummed in thought, casting his eyes over the room. Ema had likely already checked all the obvious places, hence finding the traces on the mug. With a smile, he directed his siblings back to the other side of the room, behind the line of paintings. "How about over here?"

"Over there?" Trucy repeated, following her eldest brother across the room. "Why?"

Meanwhile, Machi was looking around at the equipment, then across the drafting table and to the small desk they had examined earlier. He held out his hand to Trucy. "Can I try?"

Trucy thought a moment, then handed over the spray bottle with a grin. "Go ahead. It's fun!"

Apollo smiled as he watched the teenager make a beeline for the desk, spraying it carefully with the substance in the small bottle. Even Ema seemed to have drifted closer, though she was pretending not to. Trucy stuck close to Machi's side, looking over his work and occasionally directing him to a spot she thought he'd missed.

As Machi turned the spray over the two frames by the lamp, Trucy suddenly shrieked, jumping on the spot and waving to her eldest brother. "Polly, we got a reaction!"

Ema shouted in surprise, racing around the paintings towards the desk. "Where, where!?"

"Here!" Machi proudly announced, pointing to the tiny frame.

"Well, would you look at that," Ema muttered, studying it intensely. She shot Machi a grin. "Nice going, kid."

Machi giggled, blushing.

As Apollo came up behind them, Court Record in hand, Trucy turned to him with a suspicious look. "Polly, how'd you know we'd find poison there!?"

Apollo shrugged, though he couldn't resist a proud smile; From here, he was able to see the blue stain that was the cause of the excitement, a rough square right in the middle of the tiny, glass-less frame. "I didn't," he told his sister. "I just figured we'd be more likely to find something in a spot that didn't seem suspicious."

Trucy glared at him a moment more, then sighed and gave up.

As Ema wandered away, madly scribbling in her notepad, Machi turned his attention to his siblings. "Why would killer put poison here?" he asked. "It... not make sense."

"No, it doesn't," Apollo agreed, snapping a picture of the small frame. "Just another mystery we gotta find the answer to."

View the Court Record
Apollo led his siblings back to the table, where Ema had resettled in the chair, still writing her notes. "Ema?"

"Mm?" the detective replied, glancing up.

Hiding a smile, Apollo pulled the red envelope out of his bag. "We found this in the desk."

Ema froze, staring with wide eyes. "Oh! Th-that!" She quickly looked away. "My lips are sealed."

Machi watched her carefully. "Did... you open it?"

"What!?" Ema cried, a hand on her hip as she shot the teen a glare. "Please. I would have steamed it open."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "But you know what's inside?"

Ema grinned. "Sure. I read it, after all."

"How?" Trucy asked. "You just said you didn't open it!"

Smugly fiddling with her glasses, Ema only gave a haughty laugh. "I have a powerful weapon on my side."

Machi paled a little, stepping behind Apollo. "Weapon!?"

"Yes!" Ema replied, apparently not noticing the boy had taken her literally. "The use of tools! Highly specialised tools for information gathering."

Apollo patted Machi's shoulder to reassure him, then returned his attention to the detective. "Could we take a look at it?"

"Sure!" Still grinning proudly, Ema reached down next to her chair, out of sight. A moment later, she stood up, lifting a machine about the size and shape of a printer onto the table. "Here it is! My X-Ray Analyser!"

Trucy cooed in amazement. "Like the x-rays you get at the dentist?"

"That's right!" Ema replied, pulling open a large lid that uncovered a panel more reminiscent of a scanner than a printer. "At least, that's what I call it; It has a real name, but it's much more complicated."

Machi seemed to have regained his courage, stepping closer to the table with Trucy to admire the machine. "What is its real name?"

Ema paused, thinking for a moment. "The X-Ray Spectralization... something," she replied, then shrugged. "How am I supposed to remember all that?"
"So, basically, it lets you see inside things?" Trucy realised. "Like envelopes?"

Nodding, Ema patted the machine with pride. "That's right. You're sharp, Trucy!" As the girl preened at the compliment, Ema frowned. "But it's a bit more complicated than that in practise, of course. Actually, to tell the truth, I'm not really sure how it works, scientifically."

Apollo couldn't blame her, though, at his best guess, he would assume it was probably more similar to ultrasounds than x-rays... however they worked.

"Can we try it out, Ema?" Trucy asked, bouncing on the spot. "Please?"

"Yes, that sounds fun!" Machi agreed, grinning at Ema. "Would that be alright?"

Ema waved a hand dismissively, but couldn't hide the smile on her face. "Oh, I suppose. Of course, I've already checked out everything suspicious myself."

Trucy and Machi cheered, then Trucy immediately rounded on Apollo, grabbing the envelope from his hand. "C'mon Polly, let's give it a spin!"

Apollo rolled his eyes, then resigned himself to sitting back and watching his siblings having fun.

After showing them how her machine worked with a lottery ticket she had on hand, Ema placed the red envelope inside her machine and closed the lid. While Machi handled the dials that controlled the microscopic layer of card displayed on the smaller screen, Trucy worked at putting together the images it gave them on the larger screen, constructing a copy of the letter inside the suspicious envelope; Apollo wasn't sure exactly how, but it seemed to involve a lot of rubbing at the touchscreen as it picked up seemingly random traces of carbon from the microscopic layers of paper. It turned out there were two pages for the teens to gleefully reconstruct, and Apollo quickly learned when they were done that their machine's resemblance to a printer wasn't coincidental: Once Trucy had gleefully announced "We're done!", Ema set her machine to print off their hard-earned results... but, the moment the detective was holding both pages in hand, she bypassed the excitable teens and instead handed the paper to Apollo with a solemn expression.

"Here."

Apollo took the papers with some trepidation, recognising there was something Ema knew about the contents of this letter she wasn't telling them. Once he'd turned his attention to the letter itself, he couldn't resist a gasp.

"What is it, Polly?" Trucy cried. "What's it say!?"

Machi fixed his sister with a confused stare. "Did you not read earlier?"

"I was busy fixing the image!" Trucy argued. "I didn't have time to read it!"

Apollo sighed. "Here, I'll just read it out loud," he offered.

"Mr. Drew Misham
"I've deposited the $100,000 in the designated account. Please send a receipt once you've confirmed the transfer."
He flipped to the second page.

"Sign the papers and send in the enclosed envelope with the enclosed stamp within 3 days. I need not remind you to speak of this to no one."

"That's all it says," Apollo muttered. "Not even a name of the sender."

Trucy and Machi were silent for a long moment. "Wow, Mister Misham's paintings must be really valuable," Trucy mumbled.

"So," Machi ventured, "letter was about pay for painting?"

"Guess so," Apollo agreed. "But, in that case, why all the secrecy? And..." He paused, staring at the letter. "Why was this letter the only one there? It's seven years old, right?"

The trio thought the problem over for a few moments. "Maybe was special painting?" Machi suggested.

"That's probably it," Trucy decided, and turned to Ema with a grin. "Well, Ema?"

"Well indeed," Ema muttered, her eyes firmly pointed away from the Wrights.

Apollo watched the detective carefully, but it seemed clear that, whatever she was hiding, they weren't going to worm it out of her just yet. He folded up the copy of the letter to place in his bag. "So, Ema, I was wondering: What's the story about this reporter that came here for a story the night of the crime?"

Ema's attention was dragged back to the three with a gasp, and she sighed in resigned sorrow. "I'm afraid I can't tell you, because he's going to be a witness tomorrow, I hear."

Trucy nodded sagely. "I thought so."

"I'll never forget that face, but what was his name...?" Ema continued, a hand digging around in her purse. A moment later, she pulled out a small white card with a triumphant expression, which faded as she read it. "Oh, right. Brushel."

Apollo raised an eyebrow as he noticed a cartoonish drawing of a grinning head on the back, a speech bubble reading 'Top dollar for information' above it.

Not noticing the card, Trucy and Machi shared a confused look. "Brushel?" Machi asked.

"He's after a scoop to sell to the papers," Ema explained, rolling her eyes.

Apollo frowned. "So a reporter comes for an interview with a painter, his first interview ever, and that night he's killed. Seem strange to you?"

Trucy and Machi nodded in agreement. "Really strange," Trucy said.

To Apollo's surprise, Ema didn't argue, admitting, "It does raise a few questions."
Glad they were on the same page, Apollo decided to push his luck: "I'd like to speak with this reporter if I could."

"Well, I hear he's on the beat today too," Ema readily replied, shrugging. "He said something about covering a magician."

Apollo and Trucy's eyes widened, shooting each other a look. "Magician?"

"D-do you know," Machi picked up, giving Ema a similarly intense gaze, "was it Valant Gramarye?"

Ema thought a moment, then nodded. "Yeah, something like that. He's got some big show lined up, I hear."

Apollo almost laughed in amazement that Ema apparently didn't remember Valant from the incident at the Coliseum... or perhaps simply never even knew he was there.

"Here, I'll give you that reporter's card if you want," Ema continued, holding out the business card for Apollo.

"Thank you," Apollo managed to force out, taking the offered item. "You've been a lot of help, Ema."

Ema grunted in reply, sitting back down in the chair. "Don't mention it. Especially not to Mister Wright."

Trucy forced a carefree giggle. "Don't worry, we won't tell Daddy."

Machi nodded. "Your secret safe with us."

As they headed back to the bus stop, Apollo took the chance to examine the business card Ema had given them. "Spark Brushel, Freelance Journalist," he read aloud. "A journalist can be freelance?"

Trucy and Machi leaned over his shoulders to take a look themselves. Trucy hummed in thought, saying, "Well, he's got a good business card anyway."

Machi frowned, pointing to a symmetrical pattern behind the name. "Is this... camera?"

"Looks like one," Trucy said. "Do reporters take photos too?"

Apollo shrugged. "I guess if he's freelance, he'd have to. A bit like how we do whatever job people have for us at the agency."

Trucy didn't reply, only nodding in thought.

Apollo slipped the card into his bag, and the trio continued down the street in silence. It was only as they approached the bus stop Machi finally broke it:

"So we are going to Coliseum now?"

"Oh yeah!" Trucy cried, grinning. "We get to go visit Uncle Valant after all!"

"We will be there on business," Apollo sternly reminded her. "We're just after this reporter guy; By some co-incidence, he happens to be trying to interview someone we know."
Trucy just giggled, ignoring him. "And we can introduce you properly, Machi! Uncle Valant doesn't know you're officially our brother now!"

Machi grimaced, hugging himself. "Will... he mind?"

Apollo resisted the urge to laugh, ruffling the teen's hair. "Of course not, little bro. I think he'll be happy to see you safe."

"Yeah!" Trucy enthusiastically agreed, pouncing on her younger brother with a tight hug. "You're family, after all!"

Machi just blushed. "Th-thank you."

View the Court Record
After a brief stop in Twilight Station to grab lunch, the three Wrights headed down Dawning Street to the square that held Sunshine Coliseum. It was quieter now than it had been after the concert, though not by much; The large billboard was now an intense pink-purple, and an orange hot-air balloon hovered above, both proudly displaying the Gramarye seal to boast of the Troupe's long-awaited return, and below there was a line of people at the front doors, attended to by workers with bunches of balloons. The love of balloons seemed to be a theme, Apollo mused, noticing there seemed to be far more giant ones holding signs over the Coliseum's curved façade... and this time they were advertising the show, not just the nearby mall.

Machi clung to Apollo's arm, pressed to his side. "There is lot of people here..."

"Don't you worry, baby brother, Polly and I are here to protect you!" Trucy assured him, flexing an arm. "Besides, no-one's gonna hurt you here: This is the place where magic and dreams converge!"

Apollo hid a smirk. "Just three months ago it was the place where murder and nightmares converged."

Trucy smacked his arm with a glare. "Polly!"

Machi giggled, his grip on Apollo's other arm loosening.

Seeing their brother's reaction, Trucy paused in surprise, then brushed off Apollo's comment and skipped ahead of them. "C'mon, let's go find Uncle Valant!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow as he and Machi moved to follow. "How, exactly? All those workers are busy, and they're not going to believe a couple of strangers who say they're related to the Valant Gramarye."

"We'll just go find him ourselves then!" Trucy announced, pointing to the fenced-off car park.

Machi gasped. "Just go in back way!?!"

"Truce, we don't have backstage passes this time," Apollo sternly reminded her. "Just regular tickets, remember?"

Trucy scoffed. "Details, shmetails! Uncle Valant won't mind!" With a giggle, she sped up and dashed off ahead.

Machi hugged himself worriedly. "Are we going to be in trouble?"

"Hopefully not," Apollo sighed. "We should run into this reporter before that happens... either him or Valant." He then grinned, ruffling his brother's hair. "C'mon, let's introduce you properly to your new uncle."

The brothers caught up to Trucy alongside the fencing separating the Coliseum's entrance area from... the backstage car park. She had paused to wait for them, shifting from foot to foot impatiently, and beckoned them to follow with a loud "Hurry up!" as she hopped backwards towards the gate.

"I still think this is a bad idea, Truce," Apollo called. "Machi especially can't afford getting into trouble if we're caught."

Machi mutely nodded, clinging to Apollo's hand.

Trucy scoffed, and was about to reply when the trio heard loud, pompous laughter echoing from somewhere nearby. Trucy frowned in thought, then smiled. "Only a performer laughs like that!"

Apollo sighed in relief. "Oh thank goodness... It's-

"The Marvellous Valant Gramarye!" As if waiting for its cue, the nearby gate through to the car park flew open with a bang; In the gap stood a triumphant man in a yellow cape and matching top hat, waving his cane with a grin. "If it isn't the young Miss Trucy and Sir Apollo!" he called. "How often I hoped we'd meet again only to tell myself it was an impossible dream!"

"Uncle Valant!" Trucy cried, running to meet him. "How's it going? We're glad to see you, too!"

Valant laughed again as Apollo and Machi followed their sister. "Of course you are!"

Apollo could only smile at the man's boasting. "It's always a pleasure, sir."

The elder magician's eyes then turned curiously to the golden-haired boy at Apollo's side. "Hm? And is this not the premier pianist whose honour you fought for last we met?"

Machi nodded, nervously stepping closer to Apollo.

"Machi's our new baby brother!" Trucy announced. "He's staying with us until Lamiroir gets back from overseas!"

"She officially adopted him a couple weeks ago," Apollo added, shooting his brother a warm smile. "Why don't you tell him your new name, little bro?"

Machi hesitated, but, seeing his siblings' encouraging looks, gave Valant a small wave. "Hello Mister Gramarye. It is nice to see you again." He paused. "I... My name is Machi Gramarye. I'm sorry."

Valant stared for a moment, then laughed. "Ah, wonderful! So our serene siren has secured her forgotten history! That is good news indeed!"

Machi's eyes widened. "You not mind?"

Trucy's jaw dropped. "You're not surprised!?"

Valant chuckled, looking between the two. "Well, of course I'm not surprised! Who wouldn't want a name as grand as 'Gramarye'?" He turned specifically to Machi, raising an amused eyebrow. "And I'm certainly not going to argue against anyone passing on their name to their children."

The pair stared in shock for a moment more, then Trucy sputtered out, "You knew?"

Apollo snorted. "Of course he knew. You think Uncle Valant wouldn't have recognised someone he worked with for years?"

Trucy only rounded on her brother with a glare. "And you knew he knew!??"
Machi gasped, giving Apollo a smile. "Oh! That is why... you knew he not mind!"

Valant laughed, spinning his cane in his hand. "Ah, Sir Apollo... You have been keeping secrets from your partner?"

"Only the fun ones," Apollo replied, shrugging.

"Why didn't you say!?" Trucy demanded of her eldest brother. "I wanted Mommy coming back to be a surprise!"

"In that case, I must apologise dear Trucy," Valant said, bowing to the girl. "Though your mother's reappearing act was indeed a grand one."

Trucy sighed, arms crossed. "Yeah, I guess..." She shook her head, putting on a bright smile that everyone watching knew was false. "Oh yeah, we came here to congratulate you on your big magic show, Uncle Valant, and to wish you luck!"

Valant grinned, a twinkle in his eye. "Oh? But it is I who wish to congratulate you!" He threw his arms out wide. "Not everyone is so lucky as to witness miracles as I shall perform!"

Apollo hid a snort of amusement.

Machi frowned in confusion. "Congratu-?" He turned to Apollo. "I don't understand."

Trucy immediately moved to her younger brother's side, sandwiching him between his siblings. "You know what 'congratulate' means, right? Like 'congratulations'?"

"Y-yes?" Machi muttered. "Maybe?" After a short pause, he reached for his phone.

Apollo chuckled, patting his brother's shoulder. "Don't worry about it; It's in a magician's nature to be deliberately obtuse at times."

Valant tipped his hat proudly. "Indeed!"

Machi only looked confused, staring at Apollo. "To be...?"

"Hard to understand," Trucy translated.

"The world will watch in wonderment as Magnifi's illusions are reborn!" Valant boasted. "Here, on stage! By my hand!"

Apollo smiled. "We're looking forward to it."

"You bet we are!" Trucy added, fists held high in excitement. "We got tickets the moment we heard about it! Who could miss the return of the 'Gramarye Miracle' after seven years?"

Valant paused, giving Trucy a mournful look. "Miss Trucy, I must apologise; This show, and this honour, should have been his."

Trucy stared for a moment before she realised what the man meant, and her glee faded.

Machi looked between the two, clutching his phone in his hands. "'His' who?"

"Zak Gramarye," Apollo explained, watching his sister with concern. "I told you about him, remember? Shadi Enigmar, Trucy's father."
Gasping, Machi spun to face the girl. "T-Trucy...!"

"He was my co-magician-in-training," Valant added. "If that terrible thing hadn't..."

"It's okay," Trucy insisted, though she didn't meet anyone's eyes.

Machi quickly slipped his phone back into his pocket and gave his sister a hug. She gratefully returned it.

"Your father was a great magician, Trucy," Valant continued. "If he were alive, then I, Valant Gramarye, would have been proud to stand upon this stage as his assistant."

Apollo briefly panicked that Valant had heard of Zak's death, before remembering Zak was officially declared deceased regardless and mentally kicking himself for forgetting; That was a part of their story he hadn't told Valant about... or Machi, now he thought of it.

"Thanks, Uncle Valant," Trucy quietly said, then pulled away from Machi to give the older man a smile. "You know, I'm happy you're doing the show. To think, we get to see the Great Magnifi's illusions again!"

Valant laughed proudly, jumping back into character as easily as Trucy. "Ah, my mentor! The Magnificent Magnifi Gramarye was a true deity among magicians! A creator-god who gave birth to magic and illusions that defied our very imaginations!"

"Yeah, yeah!" Trucy agreed, bouncing on the spot as she turned to her brothers. "You two are gonna love it! I was so little when I last saw one, but I still remember his shows! He did wheelies in a sports car through the air above the audience! A-and then sped off to outer space, faster than the speed of sound!"

Apollo hid a snort; Every time Trucy told him about what she remembered of their grandfather's shows, the story got more and more embellished.

"For seven long years, the world has been waiting for a miracle to match his," Valant continued, giving a determined stare to the sky. "As heir to the Gramarye Troupe's secrets, it falls to me to provide one. It is my god-given destiny!"

"Oh, I want ask," Machi spoke up, looking around at everyone nervously, "why is there gap? Why wait seven years do show again?"

Apollo tried not to wince. "That's... complicated."

Valant nodded. "It appears the lad is uninformed." He turned to the teenage boy, gripping his cane. "Perhaps you have heard of the magic known as 'law' which governs our land?"

Machi just frowned, looking confused.

Sighing, Apollo waved Valant back and turned to Machi himself; Legal issues were best explained by lawyers, after all. "You remember how I was explaining copyright a few weeks ago?"

"Yes?"

"Well, Magnifi had a copyright on his magic tricks," Apollo continued. "When he died, the right to perform them was passed to..." He paused, then turned to Valant. "Was it just Zak, or the both of you as a pair?"
"Just Zak," Valant confirmed, looking away with an uncomfortable expression. "He was the lone inheritor of the Gramarye Miracle."

Machi gasped, looking to Trucy. "Really?"

Trucy only looked confused. "I... guess?" She shot Apollo a suspicious look.

Apollo decided to hurry his explanation along: "But, after Magnifi died, Zak vanished. He was classified 'missing', and, after seven years' time, missing persons are considered legally deceased." Noticing Machi looking puzzled again, Apollo quickly clarified, "They're dead."

Machi sharply inhaled, eyes wide. At his side, Trucy was avoiding eye contact with anyone, a thoughtful frown on her face.

"It pains me to say it, Miss Trucy," Valant picked up, "but this past spring, April to be precise, my former partner was legally declared deceased." He bowed his head solemnly. "In the absence of a formal will, the secrets of our mighty mentor Magnifi passed to me. This was, in fact, stipulated in the will by Magnifi himself."

Trucy was silent, staring at nothing in particular. "Is... that how it works, Polly?"

Apollo nodded. "Valant and I discussed it a bit already; You and me are alright using the Gramarye name, we just can't form a troupe with it or encroach on Valant's rights to Magnifi's tricks."

Trucy only continued to stare into the distance. "Okay."

"But, hey, we only have to work hard for four years at our own stuff," Apollo continued, trying to look nonchalant as he turned his eyes to Valant. "That is... if you still want us...?"

There was a short pause, then Valant once again laughed. "Ah, but of course! I am carrying the Troupe all on my little lonesome! And," he shot a wink to the caped siblings, "'twould be rather fitting for Magnifi's grandchildren to be a part of his legacy, wouldn't you agree?"

Finally, Trucy turned her eyes towards her uncle, giving him a smile. "You bet, Uncle Valant!"

Machi giggled. "I will come and see you when you do!"

"You'd better," Apollo said, jokingly punching the boy's arm.

[View the Court Record]
"Oh yeah, I almost forgot..." Trucy reached into the bag at her hip, rifling through its contents. "Do you possibly know what this is, Uncle Valant?" Out came a purple-pink envelope, which she held out to the older man.

Apollo held his breath; As much as he trusted Valant wasn't a murderer... he wasn't sure he could trust the magician with an item as precious as that.

"Aha!" Valant cried, taking the object. "Why, that bears the Gramarye Seal!" As quickly as he'd said it, the man paused, face falling.

"What is it?" Machi asked, looking between Trucy and Valant in concern. "Is something wrong?"

Valant stared at the envelope in silence a moment more. "Trucy. Where... did you get this?"

Trucy shrugged, avoiding her eldest brother's disapproving stare. "Daddy gave it to me."

At that, Valant paled, jumping back in shock. "Y-y-your D-D-D-Daddy!?!?" He pressed his cane to his chest, holding the envelope in his other hand at a distance, as though it might burn him. "My partner, Zak Gramar-!?!"

"No, no, no," Trucy interrupted, shaking her head. "My other daddy, Phoenix Wright!"

Apollo found himself wanting to see how much they could have scared Valant by not correcting him, but kept that thought private.

Valant sighed, but didn't look very relieved, giving the envelope a closer look. "Why now... Why would your Lord Daddy...?!?"

"Lord Daddy...?!" Machi quietly repeated, looking confused.

"This signature upon the back; Do you recognise it?" Valant asked, showing it to Trucy. When she only shook her head, he explained, "That belongs to none other than Zak Gramarye!"

Trucy and Machi both gasped, but Apollo restrained himself to no more than a subtle widening of his eyes, keeping his gaze firmly on Valant and the purple-pink object in his hand.

"Might I be so bold," Valant continued, his other hand reaching for the envelope, "as to open it?"

"No!" Apollo didn't hesitate to snatch the item from Valant's grip, shooting him a glare. "No-one is opening it, not yet!" As Valant visibly recoiled with a grunt, Apollo quickly turned to his sister, holding the envelope towards her. "Trucy, put this away and don't take it out again until Dad says you can open it, okay?"

Trucy looked a little scared in the face of her eldest brother's intensity, but nodded, silently taking the purple-pink paper to return to her bag.

Apollo resisted a sigh of relief that that little episode was over; His suspicions of what might be in that letter were growing stronger by the minute, and he dreaded to think of what Valant might do with its contents... Nevertheless, the man was now almost cowering in the opening of the fence they stood by, and Apollo found himself doubting Valant wanted anything more than to just confirm his fears; If Phoenix hadn't instructed so sternly that they were to leave it closed, Apollo would probably have opened it himself, just to put the elder magician out of his misery.

Shaking his head, Apollo reached into his own bag, and said in a gentler tone, "Actually, we didn't come here just to wish you luck with the show." Pulling the business card Ema gave him from his bag, he held it out for Valant to see. "We're looking for someone: A journalist we believe was here on a story, by the name of Brushel."

Valant leaned forward, examining the card. "Brushel... Brushel..." He frowned, tapping his cane against his head. "That cloying smell of mint when he smiles, yes..."

"You remember?" Machi asked.

Grimacing, Valant nodded. "A man by that name called on me just now."

"Just now!?" Apollo repeated, looking behind them. Had they walked right past their reporter as they approached the Coliseum?

"You just finished up your interview with him?" Trucy asked, deceptively bright after the earlier altercation over the envelope. "How'd it go?"

Valant was shooting a glare somewhere over the trio's shoulders. "I am to perform a big magic show, yes?" he asked. "I wanted someone to cover it... Yet, he had ears only for that incident."

Machi scratched the side of his head. "Incident? What incident?"

The teen was only ignored: "In any case, I requested that the rapacious reporter remove himself."

Huffing, Valant spun his cane around his forearm with a scowl. "So a painter has died; What of it!? It is but a footnote in the footlights compared to the magic of Gramarye!"

Apollo frowned to himself in thought; Why was this Brushel character bringing the Misham murder case to Valant? Was there some kind of connection between the two that Apollo didn't know about?

"Uncle Valant, do you know where the reporter went?" Trucy asked.

Valant fumed for a moment. "I recommended he visit that place popular with penalised perpetrators."

"Huh?" Machi muttered, confused.

"He was a rude individual," Valant continued, then turned to Apollo, holding out his hand. "Might I see that card?"

Not seeing any harm in it, Apollo shrugged and handed it over.

Immediately, Valant ripped the card in half. "He would tear apart my respectability? I will tear apart him!" Very quickly, the card was shredded into scraps of paper, almost unrecognisable had they not seen it destroyed right in front of them.

Trucy grinned, elbowing Machi. "Ooh, ooh, here it comes, Machi! Uncle Valant's big trick!"

Apollo eyed the small pile of shreds as they collected on the ground at Valant's feet. Somehow he doubted the elder magician had a spare. Valant himself only stood proudly where he was, one arm twirling his cane while the other rested on his hip.

Machi ran a hand through his hair. "Uh... Is card... fixed?"

Trucy's face fell. "What happened to the big magic?"

Valant laughed. "Is it not more miraculous for it to stay ripped?"

'It's a good thing we didn't need that anymore,' Apollo mused. 'He must've really hated that journalist...'

"Now," Valant continued, snapping his arm out as he halted the spinning of his cane, "the time has come when I must return to make my prestidigitation preparations!" He bowed deeply. "By your leave, Miss Trucy, Sir Apollo."

Trucy waved with a bright smile. "Thanks, Uncle Valant!"

Apollo nodded in agreement. "You've been a lot of help. Good luck for your show!"

Valant winked. "Three days from now... make ready for a miracle!" With that, he pulled the gate closed and sauntered off into the car park behind the Coliseum.

Machi frowned as he watched the man through the mesh fencing. "So... where we go now? Is he okay?"

"He'll be fine," Apollo assured the teen, patting his back and turning away from the building. "He has a big show to prepare, so he's probably just a little stressed out from that."

Trucy nodded, elbowing her little brother as the trio headed back across the square at the Coliseum's entrance. "Yeah! And we've still got a reporter to find, right? It's time to pay the detention centre another visit!"

Machi thought a moment. "To see Vera?"

Apollo shook his head. "That's what this Brushel guy is doing; We're going to see Brushel himself..."

It was a short trip back to the detention centre, and they found their quarry the moment they walked in the door.

"I think I hear what you're saying. 'We're All Doing It For The Money', end quote."

"No no no no! Not at all!"

Apollo paused just inside the doorway, Trucy and Machi at his sides. Standing at the front desk, scribbling on his arm and talking to a red-faced Ernest, was a tall, unshaven man with a short mohawk, a creased shirt hanging loosely off his lean frame. He paused, fiddling with the thick glasses on his nose, and turned towards the trio at the door as he heard it close, nostrils flaring dramatically. Apollo couldn't help but notice the small shirt pocket on the man's front was stuffed full of odds and ends, including a large feather, a toothbrush, and a ruler; In fact, the only thing missing from his person was an actual notebook.
Somehow, Apollo found himself strongly reminded of the cartoonish portrait on the back of Brushel's business card.

"Oh, it's you," Ernest sighed in relief, also noticing the visitors. "Could you-?"

"Hey there!" the stranger interrupted, jumping forward with a big grin and enveloping the trio in a strong minty aura that Apollo had to fight not to choke on. "How ya doing? Who might you be?"

Apollo felt his siblings gripping his arms, and had to agree the man confronting them right now was certainly unnerving. "Uh... I'm an attorney. Apollo Wright."

"You?" the man cried, looking Apollo up and down in surprise. "You're Apollo Gramarye!? You!?"

For a moment, Apollo wasn't sure how to respond. "You... know me?"

The man scoffed. "Do I know you? Of course I know you! 'Magician-Attorney Tricks People On Stand And On Stage', end quote." He snorted in some kind of half-laugh, then returned to scribbling on his arm.

"Th-that's not true!" Apollo cried, paling. "N-not in that way!"

Trucy gingerly stepped forward, loosening her grip on Apollo's arm. "Are you a reporter by any chance?"

The man jerked back in surprise, grinning once more as he spotted the girl. "Woo! You!" He pointed his pen at her. "You're Trucy!"

Hearing her real name coming out of the stranger's mouth clearly shocked the girl a little, her hand tightening on Apollo's elbow. Regardless, she pushed through with a smile. "Am I famous?"

"Oh yeah, oh yeah!" the man laughed. "'Artemis Gramarye Hates Carrying A Bag: Puts Everything She Owns In Her Panties', end quote."

Trucy squeaked, face turning red. "That's so not true!"

Before Apollo could stop him, the man had turned to Machi, slipping his pen behind an ear. "Now you're certainly familiar," he said, not seeming to notice how the object of his examination promptly hid his face behind Apollo's shoulder. "Ooh, I know! 'Siren's Smuggler Gets Off Scott-Free, Escorted Everywhere By Attorney', end quote!"

"That's not true, either!" Apollo cried, only barely holding himself back from punching the man in his over-large nose. "And if I ever catch a whiff of your lies making it to print, I swear to god-!"

"Just hold on to your breeches, there," the man interrupted, nonchalantly waving a hand as he turned back towards the reception desk. "I'll wrap this interview up in a jiffy."

Apollo caught a glimpse of Ernest's face falling and felt a wave of pity for his former classmate.

"So, guard, I think I know what's going on here," the reporter continued to the young policeman, his pen back in hand. "'Guarding Rooms Is My Life, What Else Could I Possibly Need?', end quote."

"No!" Ernest cried, looking about as fed up as Apollo felt. "How many times do I have to tell you this?" He groaned, turning to Apollo. "Look, I've got work to do. You deal with him." Before Apollo could object, Ernest had fled into a back room.

Apollo resisted the urge to sigh. All in all, he really couldn't blame him.
Trucy was the first to regain the courage to speak, emerging from behind her brother to confront the baffled newsman. "Um... Did you come here to interview the guards?"

"Ooh wee, what a pickle!" the man sighed, turning to face them again. "'Accused Wouldn't Talk, Had To Interview Someone Or Go Plum Crazy', end quote."

"Huh," Trucy muttered.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "I should've guessed."

The man suddenly laughed. "Where're my manners!?" He held out a hand towards Apollo, which the young lawyer only reluctantly shook. "Name's Brushel. Spark Brushel. I'm Not Picky - Journalist Just Closes Eyes, Writes', end quote." The moment Apollo's hand left his, he was already scribbling on his arm again, his eyes remaining almost constantly on Apollo. "Until you've been interviewed by me, you don't know what thrilling is! 'Wild Romp Through Crossroads of Mayhem, Madness', end quote."

Although still unnerved by the reporter, Apollo tried to cheer up now he knew for certain they'd found their quarry. "I can see that."

'No wonder Valant was so upset at the reminder of this guy...'

He couldn't resist subtly stepping a little more firmly in front of Machi, who still clung fearfully to his arm.

"So, Mister Brushel," Trucy spoke up, pushing through with her usual professional cheerfulness, "you're a journalist?"

"Ah, me?" Brushel chuckled, shaking his head. "Look, let me state one thing for the record: I'm the interviewer. You understand, yeah? 'I'm The One Asking Questions Here', end quote."

Trucy's grin held fast despite her uncomprehending eyes. "Okay..."

"For instance!" Brushel continued, holding his pen high. "You think a movie director watches movies?"

Trucy only looked more confused. "Well, I think he probably does."

Brushel nodded. "Exactly! I knew you'd understand."

Apollo could have sworn he could see his sister blue-screening in that moment. Undaunted, she shook off her confusion and tried again: "So, the night of the murder, you were at Drew Studio?"

"Who? Me?" Brushel asked. "Look, let me state one thing for the record: I may look calm and collected, but I'm busy. Real busy. Always on the road. 'Journalist Always Buys One-Way Tickets, Never Looks Back', end quote."

"I can understand that philosophy," Trucy gamely replied, "but-"

"You want to know the thing about one-way tickets?" Brushel interrupted, not even seeming to notice she'd spoken. "Once you use them, they're gone. All because you have to give them to the guy at the airport."

Apollo saw Trucy's eye twitching a little at the corner. 'You've got this, Truce. Don't give up yet.'

"True enough," the young magician said. "But don't they give normal tickets away too?"

Brushel grinned, the nauseating smell of mint growing stronger. "Exactly! See? It's the same thing!"
Trucy was struggling to keep up her smile over her blank expression. "What is?"

Apollo resisted the urge to sigh.

Behind Apollo, Machi was gradually inching his way back out of hiding, watching the verbal tennis match between Brushel and his sister. Perhaps noticing her younger brother's growing bravery, Trucy gathered up her courage for one last attempt: "So, you went to do a story on Drew Misham, and he'd never had a story done about him before?"

"That's right!" Brushel announced. "Look, let me state one thing for the record here: I'm sure you're going to want to know about my source. What tipped me off to Drew? Why do the interview in the first place?"

'Why ask Valant about it when he died?' Apollo resisted adding aloud.

Trucy only meekly nodded. "Well... yes."

"Look, it's like," Brushel continued, only to pause, tapping his pen against his head. After a few moments, he grinned again. "Oh! I've got it! Say there's this burger joint with fabulous ketchup. You think the burger guy's going to tell me where he got it?"

"At the supermarket, maybe?" Trucy guessed, shrugging.

"Exactly!" Brushel cried. "See? That's what I'm talking about."

Apollo almost surprised himself at the realisation that that analogy actually made sense.

"Well, there's nothing I can talk about really," Brushel almost sheepishly added, nervously throwing a glance at the empty reception desk over his shoulder. "'Walls Have Ears, Eyes - Especially Ones In Penitentiaries', end quote."

Apollo nodded, placing a protective hand on his sister's shoulder. "Right. Guess we'll leave then."

"Ah, but since you're here," Brushel interrupted, slipping his pen back behind his ear, "might as well tell you a tidbit of news I saw. Just for the heck of it."

Trucy brightened up instantly. "Sure, tell us! Just for the heck of it!"

Apollo was suspicious, but kept quiet, figuring there was no harm in hearing the strange man out.

"I remember it like it was yesterday," Brushel said, pulling the toothbrush from his shirt pocket. "I'd seen a movie on a trip, and wandered into this burger place with amazing ketchup, when an article in a tabloid caught my eye. "'Famous Oil Painting Stolen From Art Dealer's Gallery', end quote, I believe it was."

Apollo frowned. "An oil painting...?"

Brushel snorted. "Happens every day, right? But, I thought I'd seen that painting somewhere before."

He paused, his eyes firmly on Apollo's. "A painting of a giant peach floating down a river."

It took a second or two of wondering why someone would steal a painting of a giant peach before Apollo made the connection.

Seeing the lawyer's wide eyes, Brushel nodded sagely, nostrils flaring. "'Journalist Can Smell Scoop Better Than Burgers', end quote. With that, he spun around and returned to the reception desk.
"A painting of a peach...?" Trucy muttered, confused.

Machi emerged from his hiding place, tugging on his brother's arm. "Isoveli, did he mean...?"

Apollo nodded, a determined frown on his face. "C'mon, you two; We need to talk to Ema."

[View the Court Record]
Once back at Drew Studio, Apollo let the way up the stairs, throwing open the door and storming into the crowded room. "Ema!"

A moment later, the detective peered out from behind the three paintings, smiling as she saw the three Wrights filing in. "Well, how'd it go?" she asked, emerging properly into view. "Find anything out?"

"Actually, there was one thing I wanted to check with you," Apollo sternly replied, taking a stand in the centre of the room, arms crossed. Behind him, he heard his siblings carefully latching the door shut.

Ema glanced away nervously. "Wh-what's with that scary face you're making?"

Apollo didn't let up his glare, pointing to the drawers near the door. "The painting we found behind that dresser; It was stolen, wasn't it?"

Ema winced, sheepishly fingering her bag of Snackoos. "I was hoping you wouldn't figure that out."

"So, painting was stolen?" came Machi's nervous voice from near the door.

Apollo kept his gaze on Ema, but tried to lessen the intensity. "Do you think you could tell us a bit about it?"

Ema sighed, moving towards the chair at the table. "I suppose." She lowered herself down, hand already in her Snackoos bag. "It's what you think: Drew Misham... was a forger."

A sharp intake of breath went up Apollo's nose.

"A forger?" Trucy repeated, she and Machi approaching the pair at the table. The two teens exchanged confused glances, and Apollo suspected it was for her own sake as much as Machi's that she then asked, "What exactly is a forger?"

Ema sighed, shaking her head. "Well, basically, it's someone who makes forgeries. Fakes, in other words."

Machi was examining the three displayed paintings, still looking confused. "Fakes?"

"Copies of an original," Ema elaborated. "Exact copies, so precise, you can't tell them apart."

"Well, why not just photocopy them?" Trucy asked with a shrug.

Ema paused a moment before answering. "The big problem with forgeries, is that people try to sell them as the real article. It's a crime, of course."

Machi gasped, arms held tight across his chest. "So, Drew Misham is...?"

"A criminal?" Ema filled in. "I'm afraid so. He received money to create elaborate forgeries," she indicated the displayed paintings, "to... supplement his work in illustration, I guess."

Apollo looked away, frowning. "I see."

"Actually..." Ema leaned forward, patting the bulky machine still sitting on the table. "That's why I brought this here in the first place."

Turning back to the detective, Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What do you mean?"

Ema grinned. "When you're trying to determine if a painting is a forgery, the rough sketch underneath can be a valuable clue."

Trucy gasped, a grin on her face. "So the rough sketch is like practise for the real thing!" She turned to Machi. "Like doing a magic trick in front of a mirror, or playing a song again and again before you go on stage!"

"But not in the case of a forgery," Ema added, one finger held in the air. "Not necessarily, anyway. You know what the finished product is going to look like, after all."

"Oh, yeah," Trucy muttered, tapping her chin in thought. "I guess you would."

"That's why I brought this," Ema continued, patting the x-ray analyser with a proud grin. "I was going to use it to see what's under the paint of the finished pieces." She shrugged, her enthusiasm fading. "Not that I really needed to go to such lengths, seeing as how one of the paintings was only half-finished anyway." She gestured to the half-finished painting, its half-visible sketch clearly different from the finished product.

Machi studied the painting curiously. "It would interesting to see, though. 'Rough sketch'."

Trucy grinned, nodding in agreement. "Yeah, kind of like what he was drawing when he thought no one was looking!"

'True,' Apollo mused. 'And potentially valuable for our case, too... ' Clearing his throat, he put on a charming smile. "So, Ema, if you were planning on doing it anyway... Mind if we have a look at them?"

Ema waved a hand with an exaggerated sigh. "Oh, fine. Fine!" Jumping to her feet, she made her way over to the trio of paintings. "Just this time, though."

Trucy and Machi cheered, dashing around the table to where the analyser sat. Before long, Ema had inserted the half-finished landscape inside, and the pair were once more at work.

Apollo couldn't resist a smile as he saw how excited his younger siblings were to play around with Ema's machine. Even Ema herself seemed to be having a good time, standing at Machi's side and occasionally guiding him with the dials, while Trucy rubbed her hands all over the screen to 'fix' whatever part of the underlying sketch each layer of canvas gave them. Feeling a little like he was missing out, Apollo moved around behind his sister, watching over her shoulder. Slowly, an image began to take shape on the screen: Black, rolling clouds formed a dramatic looking background, coming into more and more detail as the pair worked, but a large white area in the centre stood in stark contrast. A high, narrow platform of metal girders formed, atop it a silhouetted figure with long hair, holding a guitar. Strangely, as it came into focus, Apollo realised the white area was actually a halo of fire.

"That... looks pretty much complete," Apollo pointed out.
Ema gave the screen a critical look, then nodded, satisfied. "Okay, let's print this one out."

Trucy and Machi gathered around the printer as it ejected its results, Trucy snatching it up before Ema could even try. "Wow, he really blows!" the girl declared. "The finished painting isn't anything like the rough!"

"Devices like mine didn't exist until recently," Ema boasted. "He probably thought he could draw any sort of thing he wanted to for the rough."

Machi gave her a curious look. "What do you mean?"

"Well, in the past, you could only analyse the composition of a rough sketch," Ema explained. "In other words, the traces of charcoal between paint and canvas. So, you could tell if there had been a rough sketch, but not what it looked like."

"Ah, I think I follow you," Apollo replied, pressing a finger to his forehead. "So, in essence, it wouldn't matter what was underneath the finished painting."

Ema nodded. "Some pros would actually paint out a rough sketch entirely, then do a completely new painting on top of that."

Trucy frowned at the image of the rough sketch in her hands. "So Mister Misham was drawing whatever he wanted before painting over them...?"

"Possibly," Ema replied. "Is there a problem with that?"

The girl looked up, first at the vaguely uncomfortable Machi, then to the solemn Apollo. "Um..."

Apollo shook his head; Undoubtedly his younger siblings had noticed the similarity between the picture and the painful incident that had brought them together. "Could we look at one of the other paintings, Ema?"

Although she seemed confused, Ema nodded. "Sure." She opened the machine to remove the unfinished landscape, shooting Apollo a smirk over her shoulder. "You like this detection stuff, don't you?" Chuckling, she moved to replace the canvas on its stand.

Trucy handed the paper she was holding to Apollo. "It's just a coincidence," she said, to both of her brothers.

Apollo forced a smile. "Sure."

Machi reluctantly nodded.

Before long, Ema had placed the second painting, the acrylic seascape, into the machine and closed the lid, and the two teenagers returned to their posts. While Machi turned the dial to scroll through the layers of paint and charcoal, Trucy rubbed at the larger screen to 'fix' the emerging image; Looking over her shoulder, Apollo gradually saw the outline of a pointed roof taking shape against a clear sky, the black blobs around it forming into trees. The house-like structure in the centre soon attracted a tall flag at its back and two wheels at its sides, a skeletal figure at its front pulling on a tow-bar. In the foreground, a single bowl rolled towards a lone footprint in the mud.

Apollo felt himself go pale.

"It's done!" Trucy cheerfully announced.
"Then let's print it out," Ema replied with a smile, pressing a button and waiting at the printer end of the machine.

Machi noticed Apollo's silence with a worried look. "Isoveli?" Apollo could only bite his lip, watching Trucy retrieve the printed page from Ema.

Trucy examined the image for a moment, then skipped over to show it to her brothers. "Look, this one's nothing like...!" She paused, frowning. "Polly, you okay?"

Taking the paper, Apollo turned to Ema. "And can we look at the last one, too?"

"Fine by me," Ema said with a shrug, already retrieving the seascape from the machine. "Knock yourself out."

With the final painting, the abstract portrait, in place, Trucy and Machi got back to work. Apollo stood behind his sister, the first two rough sketches clutched firmly in his hands as he stared at the larger screen. This time, the focus of the image took shape quickly: A spread of five playing cards, two of them aces. In the gloom behind them, a table, a glass bottle, and a figure in shadow, indistinct apart from a hat and the cards in his hand.

Painfully aware of his two younger siblings, Apollo fought not to immediately demand an explanation, standing back as Trucy once more cheerfully announced her reconstructed image was complete. She and Ema waited for the image to print, but Machi hesitated, his eyes watching Apollo with concern. Apollo himself felt in too much of a daze to try and reassure the teen, fighting to keep himself calm until suddenly he realised Trucy was standing in front of him, holding out the paper and giving him a concerned look.

"Polly, are you sure you're okay?"

Ema was watching from a distance, one eyebrow raised. "You're white as a sheet. What's going on?"

Still fighting to keep himself calm, Apollo took the print-out of the final sketch from his sister, waving it at Ema with a stern glare. "What the heck is this?"

The detective only looked confused. "It's the rough sketch of the final painting; What about it?"

"What about it!?" Apollo repeated in disbelief, then turned to his sister. "Trucy, you noticed, didn't you?"

Trucy slowly shook her head, a little scared. "N-noticed what?"

Resisting the urge to scream, Apollo reshuffled the papers in his hand, showing off the first. "Okay, we all noticed this one is reminiscent of when Gavin's guitar caught fire at the concert, right?"

Machi winced a little as he nodded. Trucy frowned, deep in thought.

Apollo switched to the second sheet. "And this one, a dead man pulling a noodle stand in a park; Remind you of anything, Truce? Ema?"

Ema's eyes widened. "Wait..."

Trucy remained silent, her head down-turned to hide her face behind the brim of her hat.

"And this one!" Now on a roll, Apollo held up the third and final sheet of paper. "This is clearly the murder over a poker game at the Borscht Bowl Club, from back in April! These are my cases, all three of them!"

Machi gasped. "Th-they are!?!"

Ema shook her head in disbelief. "But... what could it mean? How could he have painted those things... and why?!"

"That's what I want to know!" Apollo cried, waving the three papers in his hand. "Has this guy been watching me!? There's no possible way this is just a co-incidence!"

"Oh!" Ema gasped, turning to Apollo with an inquisitive gaze. "Is Drew Misham... your real father?"

Apollo fought not to be offended at that question, growling, "My 'real' father is Phoenix Wright. And in what world is me being related to Misham even remotely possible?"

Ema sheepishly shrugged, stepping back. "S-sorry."

Trucy still stood silently, having not moved at all since making the connection between the three sketches. "Polly..."

The single, quiet word from his sister was enough to reign in Apollo's rage. Ema clearly didn't know what was going on, and neither did his young siblings; It was pointless getting mad at them. Despite seemingly-everyone's best efforts to stall them, they'd discovered quite a lot today... none of it really helpful to his case, but enough that he could at least prepare for whatever he'd face in court tomorrow. There was nothing left to look into, nothing to do except prepare his case for trial. Sighing, he folded up the papers in his hand and shoved them in his bag. "Machi, Truce... I think we're done for today. Let's go home, huh?"

Machi gave Trucy a worried look and meekly nodded. Trucy only wordlessly followed her brothers out of the room.

View the Court Record
Apollo puzzled over Drew Misham the entire way home. This painter, a man moonlighting as a professional forger, had been spying on him, drawing pictures based on his cases? Was he some kind of crazed stalker like that university student obsessed with Trucy's Magic Panties had been? They'd seen an old picture of him, and he didn't look familiar from their audience, but what if that was only because he'd grown older since then? The name 'Misham' was still bugging Apollo as something vaguely familiar, but he couldn't place it at all... Where had he heard it before? Why had Brushel immediately gone to ask Valant about Zak's disappearance when Misham died? Why had Phoenix given them an envelope with Zak's signature and the Gramarye Seal but forbidden them to open it?

... Was this why Phoenix chose this case for the Jurist Trial?

All three Wrights filed silently into the agency's office as they arrived, finding it empty.

"Daddy! Luke!" Trucy called, hands cupped around her mouth. "Are you here?"

Machi shook his head. "I not think they are."

Apollo made a beeline for Phoenix's desk. "Dad'll be busy with preparations for the trial," he said, eyes on the drawers behind it. "Luke... well, he'll be busy with whatever job it is Dad gave him."

The younger pair exchanged a worried look. "Polly, are you still upset about those paintings?"

Apollo sighed and leaned against the edge of the desk, his back to his siblings. "It's not just that. Dad chose this case for a reason. Something big is going on here, bigger than just a simple murder."

There was a short silence. Finally, Machi stepped forward. "Um... Maybe I miss something, but... I don't understand, um, everything. There... are so many problems, i-it is hard to keep track."

"Yeah, it's really confusing," Trucy agreed, arms crossed. "Like you said, just... everything about today. Nothing's making sense."

Turning to face the pair, Apollo sat on the edge of Phoenix's desk. "That's true. First Dad takes you two out of school for no apparent reason, then he dumps the Jurist Trial on us, runs off with Luke to do god-knows-what, gives Trucy a mysterious envelope we're not allowed to open..." Shaking his head, he pressed a hand to his face. "And that's not even getting into this case..."

"So this Drew Misham guy is a painter, right?" Trucy said. "He forges paintings on the side, and he's real secretive... then that reporter guy comes along and gets him to agree to an interview."

Machi nodded. "And Mister Misham has daughter, Vera. She not know reporter there, and brings coffee that has poison on mug."

"And then he dies," Apollo picked up with a frown. "And Brushel goes to ask Valant about it for some reason... and, equally strangely, all of Misham's original sketches were of my cases." He glared out the window. "This case ties to us, as both Wrights and Gramaryes, and Dad knows that."

Trucy shook her head. "Nah. I bet it's just a co-incidence." She gave her older brother a bright smile. "That Brushel guy was probably asking everyone about his big scoop, and maybe Mister Misham was a fan of our show! That'd explain it, huh?"

Apollo thought a moment more, then silently turned and knelt down behind the desk; Tucked away in the drawers down here was where they kept the agency's case-files, from Mia's first trial after opening the Law Office to Apollo's defence of Machi back in July. Over the years, he'd read through all of the older cases multiple times, and knew his own three by heart... but there was one Apollo had studied more than the rest, and it was this one he searched for now, paging through the labels that stuck out near the very front of the drawer.

Somewhere behind him, Trucy huffed. "He's not even listening to me," she decided. "Well Machi, it's obvious Vera didn't do it, right?"

"Right," Machi replied.

His hands in the drawer, Apollo paused, eyeing a suspicious gap between two files labelled "FEB '19" and "APR '26". 'Wait... What the...?' Spinning on his heels, he pulled open the desk drawers to search there.

"So, therefore, it must've been the reporter!" Trucy continued. "There wasn't anyone else there, after all!"

Machi hummed in thought. "But detective said reporter didn't go near coffee."

Trucy sighed. "Oh yeah... Well... It can't have been Vera. She would never have killed her dad. She would never have killed anyone."

Apollo frowned as he came up with nothing from his investigation of the drawers. Standing up, he turned his attention to the bookcase behind the desk. "Where the hell is it!?"

The two teens paused, their attention back on their elder brother. "Polly?" Trucy called.

"He's deliberately hidden it!" Apollo cried, running his hands fruitlessly along the bent spines of the aging law books. "He knows it's related to this murder and he's taken it away to make my job even harder!"

"I-isoveli?" Machi stuttered, edging closer to Trucy. "What's the matter?"

Although he felt he was at the end of his rope, Apollo fought to calm down, not wanting to scare his siblings. "It's..." He sighed, running a hand through his hair. "One of Dad's case-files is missing."

Trucy blinked in surprise. "Really?" Without waiting for an answer, she dashed around the desk and took a peek in the drawer that Apollo had left open. "Huh. That's weird." She shrugged, giving her brothers a grin. "It doesn't really matter anyway; You've got a new one to write, Polly!"

Apollo glared at her for a moment before pressing a hand to his face, all his pent-up rage of the day's injustices fading away. "Yeah... Yeah, I do." Sighing, he leaned against the bookcase behind him. 'No point getting worked up about it now. I'll ask Dad about the missing file when he gets back."

"Good," Trucy replied with a nod, then skipped over, took Apollo's hand, and dragged him over to Machi. "Now, I've been thinking..."
At that, Apollo couldn't resist a smirk, obediently following his sister across the room. "Now now Artemis, we all know what happens when you think."

Machi giggled, hiding behind a hand.

Trucy just stuck her tongue out at her eldest brother and continued, "Luke's not around to help you out in court, and Daddy's busy too... So, y'know," she shrugged, "since me and Machi don't have school tomorrow, maybe we could help you out!"

At that, Machi gasped, turning to Apollo. "Oh, yes, I would love to help!"

"See?" Trucy replied, grinning as though it was decided already.

Apollo wasn't sure how to respond for a moment, seeing his siblings' excited grins. "I... uh..." He shook his head, then sighed; As much as he hated the idea of taking his youngest siblings into court with him, it was true he didn't have anyone else to turn to... and being his assistant in court was something Trucy had been wanting to do for many months now. "I... guess there's no reason to turn you down."

Before he could say anything else, Trucy tossed her hat into the air and cheered, already bounding around the room.

Apollo turned to his younger brother, who was laughing at their sister's antics. "Will you be okay with that, Machi? Going into a courtroom again?"

Machi frowned, puzzled for a moment, then realised the reason behind his brother's question and gave him a wide smile. "I will be okay," he said. "You will be there to look after me, Isoveli."

Apollo couldn't help a fond look hearing that. He ruffled his brother's hair with a smile, opening his mouth to reply...

... Only for Trucy to slam into them both with a tight hug. "We'll be the best helpers you ever had!" she cried. "That courtroom'll never know what hit it when we take the stage!"

"This isn't the Wonder Bar," Apollo gently reminded her, unable to shake off the glow of her enthusiasm. "You two will have to listen to me, okay? I'm the lawyer, so I'll be the one doing the talking; You two can talk to me, but otherwise you have to keep quiet."

Machi obediently nodded, but Trucy scowled. "Luke gets to talk!" she pointed out.

"Only when he has to," Apollo replied. "Luke talks if he knows more about the subject than I do, and I'm sure even he agrees he probably speaks up more than he should. "The incident where he lost his temper at Herr Diva comes to mind..." "Unless you have expertise in something I'm not aware of, I'm expecting you to do what Luke normally does and talk only to me. Do you understand?"

Trucy mused over that tidbit for a moment before reluctantly nodding in agreement. "Okay, I'll be quiet..."

Apollo grinned, ruffling his sister's hair. "Thanks, Truce." The teen giggled, and Apollo gestured to the sofas. "Now, why don't you two settle down and relax? I've got a case to prepare for court, and I'll need my two assistants rested and alert to help me out."

"We will do best to help tomorrow!" Machi promised, fists held up in determination.

"Yeah!" Trucy agreed. "You can count on us, Polly!"
The hours passed in a bit of a blur, and before Apollo knew it, his and Trucy's nightly act at the Wonder Bar was over and he was heading down the final stretch to the front door of his apartment. Phoenix had failed to reappear at the Agency. None of them had heard a peep from Luke. Trucy had even tried calling Maya at one point, but Maya had regretfully told them she, Pearl and Iris were all very busy this week and would call them back when they were able... which clearly wasn't going to be today. He couldn't help but think they were facing this case completely alone, and at even more of a disadvantage than had become usual.

Apollo noted with some surprise that there was no sign of Clay in the living room as he entered, with everything shut off and closed up for the night already. His phone confirmed his suspicion it was only eight twenty. Even when they'd been at college, Clay had never gone to bed sooner than midnight, no matter how early the next day's class was; It was a bad habit that he'd started when they were at Turner's, but, without the everpresent eye of Nanny K outside their doors, Clay's night-owl tendencies had only gotten worse over the years. Here at the end of a very confusing day where everyone was acting oddly already, that this unnatural act followed Clay's strange phone call the previous night only heightened Apollo's fears; He regretted more than ever that Luke had ultimately been unavailable to question their friend as he'd offered.

Tugging the brim of his top hat nervously, Apollo locked the front door behind him and ventured inside towards the hallway, finding Clay's bedroom door closed. He only briefly allowed himself relief as he noted the ring of light around its edges, and rapped his gloved knuckles against the painted wood. "Clay? You alright?"

There was a pause, then the door opened a crack, just enough for Apollo's room-mate to show his grinning face and characteristic cracked visor. "Yo, dude! What is it?"

Apollo gave his friend an incredulous look. "'What is it'!? It's not even nine and you're hiding away in your room!"

Clay snorted, waving off Apollo's concerns. "Did you forget? I've got something very important on tomorrow that I need to be ready for... hence me turning in a little early."

Belatedly, Apollo remembered Clay's call being about something on Thursday - tomorrow - and his eyes narrowed. "Are you going to tell me what it is?"

"Course not, it's a secret!" Clay laughed, and he retreated into his room. "I might not see you tomorrow, so later, 'Pollo!" With that, he closed the door.

Apollo was left staring at the painted wood in the dim light of the apartment. "I've got something important on tomorrow, too," he muttered dejectedly, then turned and headed in to his own room.

This was going to be a very tough week.
A good night's rest had not improved Apollo's outlook on the remainder of his week.

Clay had been awake far earlier than usual, and in smart-ish clothes that were very much not the blue jumpsuit and jacket he normally wore to work at the Space Center. He had given Apollo a grin and a wave before charging out the door; Whatever he was up to, he still refused to say.

As Apollo headed out, a text arrived from Luke: "Good luck on your trial today! I wish I could help you, but I'm still very busy. I know you'll do just fine, though." Similar messages of luck had come to him over the online forum, with Maggey and Adrian replying astonishingly fast with promises to watch from the gallery (although they added they would be unable to meet up with anyone until after the trial was over); Everyone else had too short notice to make it, though there were offers to clear their schedules if the trial extended to two or even three days. Of Pearl, there had been no answer, and Apollo could only guess she was still 'busy' with Maya and Iris... and probably had school to attend to boot.

'And speaking of school-goers...' Apollo found Trucy and Machi waiting for him outside the courthouse; Trucy, perhaps to imitate her eldest brother, was in her regular magician's outfit only up to the diamond earring, the blue top hat she normally wore with pride conspicuously missing. Next to her was Machi, out of the casual wear Phoenix had bought for him after he moved in, and not in his school uniform either; No, Machi was wearing his white frilly outfit from the concert back in July, replacing the blue heels and sunglasses with his black school shoes and a nervous look. They both perked up as they spotted their brother approaching, Trucy waving a gloved hand with a wide grin.

"Hey Polly!"

Apollo hesitantly waved back, watching Machi with a raised eyebrow. "I thought you said that outfit was uncomfortable."

"It is," Machi replied, one hand fiddling with the frills on his sleeves. "I not wear heels, though."

"We have to look good for our performance in court today!" Trucy argued, then crossed her arms to pout at her younger brother. "'Cept Machi didn't want to. And his shoes don't go with his outfit!"

"I not wear heels," Machi insisted, looking annoyed. "I wear this make you happy, but I not wear heels!"

Apollo resisted the urge to laugh. "Well, there's no time to go back and change anyway," he told the pair. "Let's go inside and find our lobby."

A few minutes later, the trio filed into Defendant Lobby Number Six, where they ended up sitting on the couch, Apollo going over his case one final time while Trucy and Machi idly watched over his shoulders.

"By the way, did either of you see Dad yesterday or today?" Apollo casually asked.
The younger pair shook their heads. "Haven't seen him at all," Trucy replied.

Apollo hid his disappointment behind a firmer study of his case-file.

It didn't take long for the bailiffs to arrive, escorting Vera into the room. She still clutched her sketchbook tight in her arms, one fist held tight around what looked like a short pencil, and she stared at the three Wrights with wide eyes, only a handful of steps away from the door.

Apollo quickly stood up, slipping his case-file into his bag. "Good morning." At his sides, Trucy and Machi also got to their feet, though they stuck close to their eldest brother.

Vera continued to stare, unmoving.

Trucy cleared her throat, then skipped around the table, closer to where the young woman stood. "So! You're Vera, right? I'm Trucy!" She gestured behind her. "And these are my brothers, Apollo and Machi! We're the Wrights; That's 'Wright' with a 'W', but without an 'e'... right?"

Machi rushed over to rescue his sister from her quickly floundering monologue. "It is nice to meet you, Vera," he added. "I am not so good at English, but you can trust our big brother Apollo to find truth of murder... And, Trucy and I help you too, okay?"

Trucy nodded. "We're on your side," she said. "You can tell us anything!"

Apollo slowly rounded the table, standing behind his siblings as he watched their client. Vera seemed to be thinking over what they had told her, fingers fiddling with the pencil in her hand... and, finally, she gave them a small nod and said, "Good morning."

Machi broke out into a wide grin. "Hello!" he enthusiastically replied.

Apollo bit back giggles as he rested a hand on his brother's shoulder, pulling him back a little. "You said that already, Machi." Mostly he was just thankful they seemed to have convinced Vera to talk... The trick now would be to keep her comfortable enough with them that it was no longer an issue, and he and Trucy had enough experience doing that on stage that he didn't think it would be a major problem.

Trucy tapped her chin thoughtfully as she watched the young woman. "Hmm, not bad, not bad. But I think you'd do better with a little smile, you know?" She grinned, fanning her hands next to her face as though to show off her teeth, demonstrating what to do. "You're so pretty! You need to sell yourself!"

"Sell yourself?" Machi repeated, confused. "As in, promote? In courtroom?"

"Yes, 'in courtroom'," Apollo replied with a smile. "In fact, it's more important than ever today."

Vera seemed to think on their words for a few moments, then flipped open her sketchbook and drew something very quickly on a blank page. As she flipped it around to show them, Apollo noted with some surprise that it was a large smiley face, that even sported a 'Misham' signature in the corner. Her own face as expressionless as always, Vera said, "Thank you for taking my case."

"Sell yourself?" Machi repeated, confused. "As in, promote? In courtroom?"

"Yes, 'in courtroom'," Apollo replied with a smile. "In fact, it's more important than ever today."

Vera seemed to think on their words for a few moments, then flipped open her sketchbook and drew something very quickly on a blank page. As she flipped it around to show them, Apollo noted with some surprise that it was a large smiley face, that even sported a 'Misham' signature in the corner. Her own face as expressionless as always, Vera said, "Thank you for taking my case."

The Wrights weren't quite sure how to respond to that, staring in shock at the young woman's sketchbook. Apollo was the first to recover, and gave her an encouraging grin. "Well, that wasn't quite what Trucy meant, but it's still a pretty smile! And, hey, no thanks necessary! We'll figure out what happened and get you out of here as soon as we can."

Vera stared back at him for a few moments before she shoved her sketchbook under an arm and reached into the pocket of her overalls. Out came a small crystalline bottle of pink nail polish, and Vera was quick to unscrew the hand-shaped bottle cap and use the brush within to begin painting the ends of her fingers.

Apollo tried not to look as put off as he felt. What is it with her and this nail po-... Wait... Isn't that the same kind of bottle that...?

"That's great, really!" Trucy was telling Vera. "It's so cultured!"

Machi nodded. "Very pretty."

Vera looked between them for a moment, then placed the brush back in its bottle, using her free hand to hold up her sketchbook with the smiling face on it. "Want to try?"

Trucy gasped, excited. "Really!?"

"Th-that is... very kind of you!" Machi agreed.

As Apollo watched, Vera tucked the sketchbook back under her arm, and within moments was painting Machi's nails. Trucy hurriedly pulled off her gloves to join in, and the siblings were soon excitedly showing off the progression of shiny pink polish across their hands. Apollo stayed back from it all, leaving the three to their fun (at least, he assumed Vera was having fun...). *There's more than one person in the world who buys that kind of nail polish,' he reassured himself. I'll just leave those three to be friends with each other. In the meantime... I have a case to prove.

Enough time had passed when the bailiffs summoned them to Courtroom Number Three that the pink polish covering the younger Wrights' nails had dried, and Trucy forced herself to stop admiring them and pull on her gloves once more. They left Vera in the waiting room with their further assurances they would do everything they could, and filed through into the court itself. Apollo didn't miss how Machi drifted ever closer once they entered that wide expanse, and he couldn't blame the teen for being nervous after what he had gone through the last time he was in a courtroom.

As always, Apollo readied himself behind the defence bench. Machi took up a position on his right, where Luke had always stood for Apollo's previous trials, while Trucy bounced excitedly at his left, where she typically placed herself during their shows. Apollo paused as his Court Record connected to the network, giving both his siblings a careful look. "Either of you can still sit this out if you want," he offered, more for the nervous Machi than Trucy. "I'm sure Vera would appreciate having a friend with her."

"No way!" Trucy cried, nodding decisively. "We're helping you, and you can't stop us!"

Machi thought a moment, then also gave Apollo a decisive nod. "I will stay. I want to help, Isoveli."

Apollo smiled. "Thanks."

Machi's attention was suddenly grabbed by something across the room, and he pointed with wide eyes. "Th-that is... That is prosecutor! From other trial!"

"Ooh, yeah!" Trucy agreed. "Are we seriously facing Prosecutor Gavin again?"
Apollo snorted, watching the man in question casually stride behind the prosecutor's bench, attention on his own Court Record as he undoubtedly busied himself connecting it to the network. "Yeah, didn't you realise earlier? Ema's assigned to him, remember?"

Machi took this new information in his stride, but Trucy sighed, saying, "But I thought Daddy was controlling everything about this trial? Doesn't he not like Mister Gavin? Don't you not like him?"

"Of course I don't like him," Apollo replied, huffing a bit. "Personally, I'd prefer not to be facing him again either, but at least this is a foe we know rather than one we don't."

Trucy just pouted. "Daddy could have got Uncle Edgeworth to face us," she pointed out. "He's a prosecutor."

At that, Apollo paused, frowning. "Well... Dad was going to put me against Uncle Edgeworth," he admitted. "But, I guess he was just too busy today to do it in the end."

Trucy mused over this information. "That's too bad."

Suddenly Machi pressed against Apollo's side, and the elder Wright turned to his brother with a concerned look, asking, "Machi?" The boy said nothing, gazing fearfully across the room, and Apollo looked up to see what had scared the young pianist: Klavier had finished setting up his tablet computer, and was watching the Wrights with a slight frown. Noticing Apollo's attention on him, the prosecutor raised a questioning brow, eyes flicking to Machi. Apollo only glared in return. 'Mind your own damn business, Herr Diva.'

Trucy had her eyes on the raised gallery above, watching the crowds filing in. "Where's the jury?"

"They'll be in another room," Apollo explained, tearing his eyes away from Klavier. "They're going to watch the trial through the cameras."

"Cameras?" Machi repeated, looking around the room. "But I not see any cameras..."

Trucy squeaked, pointing above the double doors at the back of the courtroom. "Look, there are two above the door!"

Sure enough, there were a pair of small cameras mounted above the door frame, one pointed straight ahead and the other tilted upwards.

"All the way over there?" Machi asked.

Apollo chuckled, turning his attention to the judge's podium opposite. "There's the last one," he said, pointing to a small black hemisphere mounted at eye-level. "That's for the witness stand, and maybe the benches as well; The other two are for the judge and probably a general overview of the courtroom." He gave them both a teasing grin. "Did you not notice them before? Those cameras have always been there."

Trucy stuck her tongue out at him. "We didn't even know there were cameras here before, Polly!" She paused, frowning in confusion. "Actually, why are there already cameras set up?"

Apollo shrugged. "Dunno. They generally aren't used, as far as I know." Although he didn't point it out to his siblings, he noticed with a glance at their bench that the tiny microphone set up in a corner was also unchanged; It was a little strange to think that it, along with the similar hidden pieces of equipment on the witness stand and judge's podium, was potentially already recording their discussion. He would have to keep the extra audience in mind for his 'performance' today.
Machi stared at the nearest camera. "Are cameras on?"

Apollo grinned. "Probably. Wanna give the jurists a wave?"

Machi shook his head, shrinking back.

"Ooh, maybe we could do a trick for them!" Trucy suggested. "They must be bored stiff waiting for the trial to start!"

"No, Truce," Apollo firmly told her. "No magic in the courtroom." He paused. "Unless absolutely necessary."

Trucy huffed. "You do magic all the time..."

'That's different; I'm using it to present evidence,' Apollo replied, but kept the thought in his head so as not to encourage her. "Let's wait to perform for an invisible audience another time, huh?"

Above them, the babble of the gallery quietened; The judge had entered the courtroom.

View the Court Record
The judge banged his gavel as he settled atop his podium. "Well, we will now... er..." He coughed, clearing his throat, and his eyes flitted around the room nervously. "Begin the, er, trial of... V-v-v-... Vera Misham!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow.

"Is judge okay?" Machi whispered, voicing their thoughts.

"Yeah, his voice is all raspy," Trucy agreed. "Like you when you used to overdo your Chords of Steel, Polly!"

Apollo quickly shushed her.

Above, the judge cleared his throat. "The repercussions of today's trial will, most likely, be felt for a long time." He took a deep breath. "And may, indeed, alter our legal system forever."

'If it goes well,' Apollo mentally added.

Opposite them, Klavier nodded. "Today is a test of the Jurist System," he announced for the gallery, "and the first step toward a new order in our courts."

"Daddy's secret mission!" Trucy quietly reminded her brothers.

"The jurists will function like a jury," Klavier continued. "It is hoped their inclusion will help the courts to better reflect the people's will." The gallery began to mutter amongst themselves, so Klavier held up a hand, instantly silencing them. "Three closed-circuit cameras watch this courtroom at all times. The jurists have access to everything that transpires." Lowering his hand, he curled it into a fist and slammed it against the wall at his back, shooting a stern look at the camera on the judge's podium. "Jurists! Judge well, and judge cool."

"N-now see here, Prosecutor Gavin!" the judge complained. "I-I was going to say that!"

Klavier gave the old man an easy grin. "Ah, my apologies, Herr Judge."

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Same old Herr Diva.'

Above, the judge cleared his throat, turning his focus to the cameras on the wall opposite him. "Jurists! Today, er..." He shook his head, then tried again. "Judge today's trial 'coolly', if you would be so kind." He nodded, satisfied with the borrowed wording, then turned to Klavier. "Very well, Prosecutor Gavin. The details of the case, if you would."

Klavier brushed at his fringe, a stern expression on his face. "The victim is the painter Drew Misham. He was killed in his own studio. His coffee... was poisoned. By whom, you ask?" He pointed towards the waiting room behind the defence bench. "By none other than the defendant, Vera Misham."
Apollo slammed his fists on his bench. "Objection! There wasn't any poison in the coffee!"

Klavier only smirked. "Achtung, someone has been doing their homework!" He chuckled. "Indeed, poison was not present in the coffee... but on the mug itself."

"The mug...?" the judge repeated, looking through files. After a moment, he paused. "Ah, residue was found on the rim, I see."

"The autopsy report describes the manner of our victim's death," Klavier continued, a hand at his computer as he briefly tossed the file up on the holograms.

The judge nodded. "The court accepts this as evidence."

Apollo saw the file download to his Court Record, and gave it a quick look; Aside from a more recent photo of Misham, all he learned that was new was that the man had been fifty-two and had died between nine and nine-thirty at night.

The judge hummed as he examined his own copy of the file. "According to this report, the victim's death was caused by 'atroquinine' poisoning."

Klavier nodded. "A chemical compound that does not occur naturally. Lethal dosage is a mere point-zero-zero-two milligrams." He flicked at his hair, thoughtful. "A touch of atroquinine in the body is the touch of the Reaper's scythe."

Machi shivered. "That is such tiny amount," he pointed out. "Almost nothing."

The judge hummed in thought. "Very well, Prosecutor Gavin. You may present your witness."

Klavier grinned. "I have for you today a simple man, for a simple case... A man who witnessed the murder in its entirety." He gestured to the witness' waiting room, where a bailiff promptly emerged, doing her best to escort the fidgety Brushel through to the witness stand. Once he was in place, scribbling on his arm, the woman promptly fled.

'A simple man, yes,' Apollo mused. 'A simple case, though? The jury's still out on that.'

Klavier brushed at his hair proudly. "The witness will state his name and occupation."

Brushel jumped, jamming his pen back into his shirt pocket. "Ah! Right!" He grinned, and the strong mint smell instantly permeated the courtroom. "Well, for starters, my name's Spark Brushel! My job is... a lone observer of the world!"

"In other words, a freelance journalist," Apollo explained, fighting not to choke on the minty aura.

The man only cleared his throat in response. "If you don't mind, I'd like to state something here for the record."

The judge raised an eyebrow. "Yes, Mister Brushel?"

"I dislike conclusions, specifically, the 'jumping to' aspect of conclusions," Brushel explained, pulling the toothbrush from his pocket and tapping it against his head. "'Preconceptions Make Park Sandbox of Endless Desert Waste', end quote."

Now Apollo was fighting not to roll his eyes. "But you are a journalist. You said so yourself yesterday."

Brushel paused. "Well, that's true, yes," he admitted, before hurriedly continuing with an excited grin, nostrils flaring, "But you must understand, I stand before you today a man with a dream! I'm offering you my testimony in exchange for exclusive rights to the story! 'Scoop Turns Mister Brushel Into That Mister Brushel!', end quote."

The courtroom stared at him in silence for several moments.

"Let's hear your testimony then, shall we?" the judge asked, and lightly banged his gavel.

Brushel jumped with a sharp cry, then fidgeted for a moment cleaning his glasses with his toothbrush. Once he was satisfied, he fixed the courtroom with another nauseating grin. "I visited the studio around nine o'clock that night to do the interview. The first outsider to enter the atelier! 'Journalistic History Made', end quote!" He chuckled proudly. "His daughter brought us coffee right after we started... And you know what happened next: 'Star Falls!', end quote. No one else entered the room besides her the whole time."

The judge hummed in thought. "That does sound like a simple case. Unless..." He fixed a stern glare on Brushel, "you were the one who poisoned him!"

Brushel shrieked, jumping on the spot and flailing his arms wildly. "W-w-w-what are you saying!?" he spat out in flurry of sound. "Judge!"

The judge hid a smile, clearing his throat. "Need I remind you, the cameras are rolling today." The smile grew. "I felt the need to be a bit dramatic."

Apollo resisted the urge to laugh; At his sides, his siblings were hiding giggles of their own.

Klavier shook his head, turning his attention to the witness. "You didn't do it, did you?"

Brushel madly shook his head. "M-m-m-m-medaotinglikethat!?" he shrieked, before getting enough of a hold of himself to slow down, laughing nervously. "Come on! That's like... 'Newsmaker Making the News', end quote. Or even 'Contemporary Witch-Hunt', end quote!" He took a deep breath, eyes still wide, before another idea occurred to him: "I know! 'Wild Accusations Rock Courtroom', end quote."

Klavier laughed. "'Rock', indeed."

"Prosecutor Gavin sure looks like he's having fun," Trucy pointed out.

"I'm so happy for him," Apollo muttered, rolling his eyes. 'At least the judge's joke was actually funny.'

"You not look happy," Machi pointed out.

Apollo shushed him.

"Very well, Mister Wright," the judge announced, turning to the defence bench, "your cross-examination, please."

Nodding, Apollo loaded up the updating transcript on his Court Record. "Mister Brushel, you said you went to the studio at nine that night," he said. "Isn't that a little late for an interview?"

Brushel shrugged. "If the great painter Drew Misham says 'come at nine', believe you me, I go at nine! The first, and as it turned out, last interview with such a prolific painter!"

Apollo crossed his arms, musing over the information. "And you were the first reporter ever in 'Drew "Studio'?"

The man nodded eagerly. "Posterity will look back on that night as a turning point in journalistic history! 'A Basically Insignificant Step For All Mankind, But a Giant Step For That Brushel Guy', end quote."

Klavier smirked. "If no one on the outside ever had access to the studio, then it would serve to reason that the deed was done by an 'insider'."

Shooting the prosecutor a glare, Apollo continued to Brushel, "And you can say for sure no one but Vera entered the room the whole time?"

"For sure?" Brushel repeated. "Sure! I'm sure." He snorted, the combination of large nose and large grin making the stench of mint stronger. "Drew Studio isn't a big place, kiddo. I'd know it if someone else had come in!"

"What if they had been hiding in there from before!?" Apollo pressed.

Immediately an "Objection!" rang from across the room. "Even if someone had been hiding in the studio, they hardly could have poisoned that mug without anyone noticing," Klavier pointed out, still giving the Wrights that infuriatingly smug smile that so made Apollo want to punch his lights out.

"You think I, Spark Brushel, would miss something as obvious as that?" Brushel picked up, huffing a little. "Nooooo way."

Apollo sighed, deciding to leave that line of questioning alone. "Alright then, you said Vera took out coffee after you started. Would you mind being a little more specific?"

Brushel whistled proudly. "Ooowee, let me tell you, I enjoy a cuppa! In fact, it all began when I was in third grade, no wait, fourth grade-"

"That's not what I meant!" Apollo interrupted, frantically waving an arm at the man to stop. 'Why do all my witnesses either never shut up or never open up at all!?'

Klavier chuckled. "I believe I know what Herr Forehead is driving at: This coffee the victim was served... Did anyone other than the victim touch it?"

Apollo nodded, his frustration only growing that it had to be Klavier who bailed him out. "Right, that."

Brushel scoffed, waving his toothbrush disapprovingly. "Well, now, if you've got a question to ask, you'd best straight up ask it! That's what I tell all the new recruits. Several times, if necessary. 'Write for a grade-schooler', that's my motto." He paused, eyes widening. "W-which isn't to say I can only write grade school level stuff, mind you-"

Apollo cut him off with a slam of his bench. "Who touched the coffee!?"

"Dunno," Brushel replied with a shrug. "I was in the back, looking at the studio's equipment, when she served it."

Apollo resisted the urge to sigh. He felt Machi's hand gently patting his back in sympathy.

"And what happened next?" Klavier asked. "I believe you put it as 'Star Falls', correct?"

Trucy giggled, not bothering to be quiet. "That sounds like an old telegram! 'Send Money, Over'!"
Apollo shot his sister a warning glare.

"Zowie!" Brushel cried. "You don't know? That's like a journalism code word. An important personage passes away... a star falls. Get it?"

"But there's no gravity in space, not like that," Trucy pointed out. "Stars don't 'fall', not really."

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'Mental note: Tell Trucy off once trial is over. Also, kill Clay.' "Does this matter?"

Brushel thought a moment, then replaced the toothbrush in his hand with the pen from his pocket. "Hoo boy, this is good stuff, good stuff!" He began tapping it against his arm. "How about 'Star Breaks'... Nah, lacks punch. I know, I know: 'Star Dies'! Nah, lacks imagination." He frowned. "Of course, you could go with 'Drew Dies'. Straight, to the point." He grinned again. "I like it." He began scribbling on his arm.

Machi tapped Apollo's arm. "Was there point to that question?"

Apollo couldn't answer; He was too irritated at Trucy to remember whatever the last question had even been. 'Time to come up with something a little more substantial...' "Hold on," he told his brother, then turned back to Brushel. "Mister Brushel, you say Mister Misham had the coffee too, but did you actually see him drink it?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Yet?"

"I guess I can't say I 'saw' him drink it, really," Brushel sheepishly admitted. "He had one so-called 'sip', if that. 'Man Puts Lips To Mug, Drinks?', end quote."

The judge hummed in thought, tugging on his beard. "That poison is quite virulent, I hear."

"My stomach did a so-called 'somersault'," Brushel continued, slipping his pen back into his shirt pocket. "Since I'd gulped down that coffee without so much as a second glance at it." He paused, eyes wide. "Wait, maybe something's there! Some kind of so-called 'trick'!" In an instant, his pen was back in his hand, and he was giving Apollo a hopeful look, nostrils flaring. "Anyone want to venture a guess? For the record?"

Apollo narrowed his eyes at the reporter. He hated to be doing what Brushel was telling him to, but it was an important question to consider. "Give me a second." He pressed a finger to his forehead. 'Misham put his coffee to his lips, then immediately fell over. Brushel doesn't seem to be lying, which means it must be true. And it was definitely atroquinine that killed him, which means...'

"Do you have a problem with the witness's testimony or not, Mister Wright?" the judge asked.

Apollo slowly smiled, turning his eyes up to the judge's podium. "Actually... yes, I do."
"Mister Misham was killed by atroquinine, correct?" Apollo asked, snapping his fingers. He kept his gaze firmly on Klavier, but the prosecutor refused to meet it, staying silent. "I have an objection to a specific property of that particular poison, Prosecutor Gavin." 'Damn, that alliteration! Valant would be proud.'

The judge nodded. "He was quite clear about it, I thought: A lethal dosage of just point-naught-naught-two milligrams paralyses the central nervous system. If you drank that, even you would be reduced to a quivering pile, Mister Wright."

Apollo tried not to be offended at being used as an example. "Unfortunately, he didn't tell us everything. There was a vital omission in his information!"

Klavier was still avoiding eye contact.

"An omission?" the judge prompted.

Apollo nodded. "Atroquinine is as virulent as he says... but death doesn't come upon ingestion, not immediately: Atroquinine is slow-acting."

The courtroom gasped in shock, and Brushel even jumped at the stand, shouting, "Whatwhatwhatwhat!?!"

"According to one forensic scientist," Apollo continued, leaning forward on the bench, "it takes at least fifteen minutes for adverse effects to show after ingestion! If we suppose that the moment Mister Misham sipped the coffee was when he sealed his fate, then he would still have had time left to enjoy his last cup of joe!"

The gallery abruptly began talking amongst themselves at the revelation, forcing the judge to bang his gavel. "Order! Order!" He huffed to himself as the courtroom quietened. "What's the meaning of this!? If what the defence says is correct... Why, that contradicts the entire testimony we've just heard!"

Apollo turned to the witness stand with a smug smile. "Well, Mister Brushel? Anything to say, 'on the record'?"

Brushel stared back for a moment before jamming his pen against his arm, muttering, "Slow-acting, S, L, O, W, A, C, T... It was virulent, alright. Even then, it had already begun digging its claws into the journalist..."

"I think he is not listening," Machi whispered.

Apollo sighed, pressing a hand to his face.

"Objection!" came a call from across the room, and Klavier fixed a stern gaze on the man at the witness stand. "It's 'Brushel', ja!?" He grinned. "Herr Brushel, let's take a trip back down memory
Brushel looked up from his notes, blinking owlishly at the prosecutor. "Huh?"

Apollo narrowed his eyes in Klavier's direction. 'What are you doing now, Diva?'

"Did the victim really die the instant he took a sip?" Klavier asked, serious despite his smile. "Think it over. This is vital."

The reporter mused over the question for a few moments. "You know what I think? I think that was... 'A Not-So-Subliminal Suggestion'... end quote."

Klavier grinned, flipping his hair. "I admit, it does cause a problem if he died when you say he died. I would be forced to say auf Wiedersehen to my simple case... and you would be forced to say farewell to your article."

Brushel blinked. "Come again?"

"You can't write a story based on conjecture, can you?" Klavier pointed out. "And, as the case drags on, other reporters will pick up the scent... and you'll be forced to kiss your exclusive scoop goodbye."

"Scoop, scoop," the reporter muttered to himself, spinning his pen in his hand. The silence dragged on, long enough that Apollo wished he could just shout at the man to be done with it... and, finally, Brushel jolted, dropping his pen. "Look, wait. Just wait a second. Just one second."

"We're waiting, we're waiting!" the judge cried, clearly as impatient as Apollo to get this question over with. "Out with it!"

Brushel squeaked, madly scrabbling for his pen on the floor. "I think I just recalled a so-called 'important detail'! 'A Revival of Recollection', end quote! 'A Story's Survival', end quote!"

"'Attorney Utterly Confused', end quote," Apollo muttered to his siblings.

"Actually, I did notice something when I visited the studio," Brushel continued. "I'd heard of poison that 'takes its sweet time', see!"

Klavier smirked. "But not what I've been saying for the last few minutes, apparently."

The judge gave the witness a stern look. "Mister Brushel! Are you saying you noticed something that explains what happened?"

"You bet I am!" Brushel proudly replied. "The 'Antidote For A Poisonous Contradiction', end quote, you might say."

"Or 'I Still Have No Idea What You're Talking About', end quote, I might say," Apollo muttered. His siblings bit back giggles.

"I figured it out, but only after an in-depth interview! See, thanks to my journalism skills, I know who poisoned that coffee!"

The courtroom once more exploded with noise, forcing the judge to slam his gavel and call for order. Klavier sighed. "As far as I can tell, the witness is standing by his testimony; That Mister Misham died the instant after he drank."
"Of course I'm standing by my testimony!" Brushel cried. "And my dream of exclusive rights to this story!"

"Ach," Klavier muttered, turning away from his witness. "I suppose it was too much to hope for... Of course he wouldn't choose a simple case, not him..."

Apollo's eyebrows shot up. Was Klavier saying...?

The judge also gave Klavier a curious look. "Him?"

"Phoenix Wright, who else?" Klavier almost spat.

At that, Apollo bit back a laugh. "Aw, you didn't believe him, did you? Don't you know we Wrights attract complicated cases?"

Klavier shot a glare in return. "I don't need to hear it from you, Herr Forehead." Ignoring Apollo's amused snort, he turned his attention back to the witness stand. "Achtung, Herr Brushel! Report for us, if you would: What is it that you noticed?"

Brushel had once more swapped his pen for his toothbrush, and was nervously passing it back and forth in his hands as he avoided eye contact.

"This court is a critical trial of the Jurist System," the judge ominously reminded him. "I'm afraid no room for doubt is permissible. You will testify to the court about what you noticed!"

Brushel jolted a little, then seemed to give up resisting. Reluctantly, he explained, "When I arrived at the studio, Mister Misham was at his desk. He seemed to be writing a letter... but he quickly sealed the envelope. I thought nothing of it at the time, of course." He perked up. "Now that I think about it, what if he was writing a suicide note?"

The judge hummed in thought, tugging at his beard. "A suicide note?"

Brushel nodded. "Yes, he had this look on his face. 'Man's Face Inscrutable As A Quadratic Equation', end quote."

"Suicide?" Trucy repeated with a gasp. "Poor Mister Misham..."

"In-scroo-ta...?" Machi muttered to himself.

"Inscrutable; Hard to read, basically," Apollo explained. "Besides, I think it's unlikely Mister Misham would have killed himself in the middle of an interview."

Trucy tapped her chin in thought. "Oh yeah..."

The judge shook his head and turned to Apollo. "Very well, you may begin your cross-examination."

Apollo nodded, focussing his attention on the reporter at the witness stand. "This letter Mister Misham was writing... When you arrived, he put it away?"

"'Early Reporter Gets Worm', end quote," Brushel replied, grinning. "That's my secret!"

The Wrights shared a confused look. "I'm not sure I follow," Apollo said.

"It's the night of the interview," Brushel explained, excited. "I arrive fifteen minutes ahead of schedule! The handle turns, the door opens, and I barge in!"
Apollo narrowed his eyes. "Isn't that unlawful entry?"

Brushel only snorted. "Mister Misham sure seemed to think so! You shoulda seen him! He crammed his letter into that yellow envelope as fast as he could." He tapped his toothbrush against his head. "I know a secret when I spot one, and that was one!"

The judge nodded in agreement. "It does seem significant."

"I heard it was left at the crime scene," Brushel added.

Apollo frowned, staring at Brushel. "And you saw him seal this yellow envelope with the letter?"

"Hey, don't look at me like that!" Brushel complained. "I saw what I saw!"

Machi gasped. "Isoveli!"

"This is our big break!" Trucy agreed with a giggle.

Apollo smiled, one hand already flipping through the images stored in his Court Record. "As it just so happens, there was a single letter in a desk drawer at the scene," he said, then tossed up on the holograms the picture of the open desk drawer from the previous day. "In a red envelope!"

The gallery muttered in shock, and Brushel jumped with a loud of shriek of "What!?"

Apollo kept his attention on the bench opposite. "Prosecutor Gavin!"

Klavier looked reluctant to reply. "Yes?"

"Was a yellow envelope found at the scene of the crime?"

"Unfortunately, no," Klavier said, shaking his head. "But, Herr Forehead," he grinned, "it's easy to mistake the colour of an envelope."

"I guess," Apollo conceded, "but not this envelope." He switched the picture to the photo he'd taken of the front. "You see, it was postmarked already: April, twenty-nineteen. Seven years ago."

Klavier's smile died.

"Well, Mister Brushel?" the judge asked.

Brushel thought a moment, tapping his toothbrush against his head. "I can explain that," he said, and waved his toothbrush knowingly. "Drew, right, he wanted to get that letter in an envelope, pronto! Get it out of sight of my beady eyes, right?" He grinned proudly. "So he grabbed the nearest envelope and crammed away!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow, arms crossed. 'It won't be that easy to just explain away this contradiction, chump."

"Well, Mister Wright?" the judge added, turning towards the defence. "Have you anything to say to the witness's claim?"

Apollo smirked, shaking his head. "That's impossible."

Klavier chuckled. "Ah, I like your expression. So full of confidence."

"It's simple, really," Apollo continued, hands moving to his Court Record. "As it just so happens, the defence team investigated the contents of this envelope." He paused. "With, erm, the assistance of a forensic scientist."

"What...?" Klavier muttered, giving the Wrights a suspicious look.

Apollo threw up on the holograms a photo he'd taken the previous night, of the two print-outs Ema had given them, side-by-side. "Note that this letter is addressed to 'Drew Misham'," he pointed out. "Why would he address a letter to himself? Let alone send a suicide note to himself!"

Brushel stared with wide eyes. "I... I've been scooped!"

The gallery was already muttering loudly, so the judge banged his gavel. "Order! Order! Order!" He grumbled to himself as the crowds quietened, then turned to the witness stand. "Mister Brushel! Can you explain this to the court?"

"Oh, my, my, my, how could I have forgotten?" Brushel was muttering to himself, pulling at his tie. He gave the court a sheepish grin. "I suppose this happens to the best of us! 'Reporter Gets Old, Forgets Lots', end quote."

The judge's eyes narrowed. "I'm still waiting for an explanation, Mister Brushel."

"Well, that's the thing, see: After he put his letter in that envelope, Mister Misham sat there searching his desk drawer for something!"

Apollo frowned, thinking. "His desk drawer...?"

Brushel nodded. "Yes! A stamp! A so-called 'Postage Stamp', end quote!"

Trucy shrugged. "He coulda had one of mine."

"I don't think you can re-use stamps, Truce," Apollo whispered in reply.

"No; They are fattening," Machi joked, eliciting an eye-roll from his sister.

The judge's attention was still on Brushel. "A stamp? Whatever for?"

"To mail his letter, what else?" Brushel replied, toothbrush tapping against his scalp. "And then, why yes, I think I saw him put it in his letter box." He grinned. "Yes, it was a yellow envelope, and he put it in that box!"

The judge sighed. "Well, apparently, this yellow letter has nothing to do with this case."

"Oh, how I wish it did!" Brushel crowed. "Just think if that were a suicide note... What a story! 'Star Writes Suicide Note In Front of Reporter, Falls', end quote."

"I thought we agreed stars don't fall!" Trucy protested.

The judge cleared his throat. "As I was saying, that has nothing to do with this case." He frowned at the small hologram screen atop his podium. "That said... It makes me wonder about the contents of this red envelope. A hundred thousand dollars is quite a good deal of money!"

Klavier was regarding the letter with a much sterner air. "So this was from April, twenty-nineteen, ja...?"

Apollo watched the prosecutor carefully, but gave him only a nod. His suspicions from the previous day circled at the back of his mind.
Brushel thought a moment, then his eyes widened, his nostrils flaring dramatically. Grinning nervously, he looked around the courtroom. "So am I finished? Here, I mean. Am I finished here?" He began to hop from foot to foot, anxious to leave. "I was thinking of, you know, going home, to start writing..."

Apollo narrowed his eyes at the reporter. "Mister Brushel... You know something about this letter, don't you?"

"Ack!" Brushel shook his head, sweating. "C-c'mon! 'Magician-Attorney Has Active Imagination, Little Else', end quote."

"It's beyond obvious," Apollo replied, arms crossed. "You have a very unique expression you always pull when you catch the scent of a story."

Brushel sputtered wordlessly, but any reply was cut off by the judge, who proclaimed "Even I noticed something, and my eyes aren't what they used to be." The old man chuckled proudly. "You know, I'm starting to understand what all this 'perceiving' stuff is about!"

Apollo gave the judge a half-lidded stare.

"Please, continue with your testimony," the judge ordered Brushel. "Tell us about the scent of a story!"

Brushel seemed reluctant, but stayed put. "Hey... I'm the one asking the questions here. Usually." Regardless, he began his next testimony.

View the Court Record
"Actually, it took a bit of work to get a thumbs-up on the interview," Brushel explained. "'Reporter Leverages Story, Gets His Interview', end quote. The story concerned a certain case from seven years ago; That red envelope probably had something to do with it." He shook his head. "Say what you will, but Drew's talent was without compare."

Apollo's suspicions only strengthened, as much from the words as the pinch at his wrist. 'A case seven years ago...?'

"So you threatened to go to press with this 'story'?'" the judge asked, unimpressed. "That's how you got your interview? Blackmail?"

"Well, yes," Brushel automatically replied, before the judge's words sank in and he hurriedly added, "I mean no! No, no, no, no! It wasn't exactly black-, I mean, I'm not..." He gurgled, his panicky tugging of his tie causing the strip of fabric to tighten considerably around his neck.

The judge raised an eyebrow. "Something wrong, Mister Brushel?"

The reporter pulled his tie loose again, sweating. "L-look! This is my story! My tidbit! 'Journalist's Info Is Livelihood', end quote."

"I see."

"While you have me chatting away in here, what's going on out there?" Brushel continued, gesticulating wildly. "What if some Wally Wordsworth or Sally Scooper gets wind of my story? They could be going to press while I'm going to waste!"

The judge shook his head. "The court feels your pain, Mister Brushel." His expression failing to show any kind of empathy for the journalist, the old man turned to Apollo. "Mister Wright, let's pick up the pace."

Apollo nodded; He wanted this case to be over with already too. As much as he dreaded the answer, he only had one question in mind: "Mister Brushel, could you... tell us about this case, from seven years ago?"

Brushel scoffed, waving the question off. "Let me state one thing, Mister Magician, and you can quote me on this: I... can't talk about that case!"

Instantly Apollo's hackles were up. "Why not!?"

"It's about journalistic pride, and staunchness, and credibility, and connections! 'Journalist Reveals Sources Only Over His Dead Body', end quote," Brushel argued, watching Apollo with determined eyes. "So what'll it be? Gonna cut me in half? Dead men don't tell tales, not even for magicians!"

'They do for spirit mediums,' Apollo resisted from shouting back.
Trucy hummed in thought, tapping her chin. "Our chances of breaking his will aren't looking good."

"We could break his story," Machi suggested. "Mister Prosecutor did."

Apollo thought a moment. "I've got a better idea." Turning his attention to Brushel, he called, "So, on the one hand we have your 'story', and on the other, this letter." He gestured to the picture still displayed on the holograms. "What makes you think the two are related?"

Brushel's eyes widened, and he started cleaning the collecting sweat off his glasses with the toothbrush in his hand. "Ah, er, I was just saying it's possible. Call it 'Reporter's Intuition', end quote." He laughed nervously. "Hey, I say a lot of things. You going to pick all of them apart? Be my guest!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. 'All of them? No, just the incredibly suspicious ones.' "Alright then, we'll change the subject: Mister Misham was incredibly talented, you said?"

The new topic didn't do anything for Brushel's nervousness, though he did laugh harder to hide it. "Was he? Hoowee, boy. I mean, hey! He's a star, man, a star! The flow of his brush is like a great, undulating river across the canvas! 'Artist's Paints Light Up Studio Like Sun', end quote."

Feeling the pinch at his wrist, Apollo's hand flew to his bracelet, and he grimaced at what it was he'd spotted this time around.

"You see anything, Polly?" Trucy asked.

"See what?" Machi added, confused.

Apollo sighed. "Unfortunately." He turned to the reporter with a glare. "Sweat much, Mister Brushel?"

Brushel's nervous tugging of his tie pulled it tight around his neck again, and he fought to loosen it. "Er, yeah, well..." He shoved his hands under his arms, as if to hide them. "A man can't help his glands, you know!"

"It's more than that," Apollo replied, shaking his head. "I could see your disgusting pit stains growing ever time Mister Misham's 'talent' was mentioned." He leaned forward on his bench, angry just as much for spotting the man's tell as for the lie it gave away. "You knew, didn't you? That's what you were blackmailing him about: His real talent!"

Brushel shrieked, his panicked flailing pulling his tie tight around his neck again. "Th-th-th-that's r-r-r-ridiculous!"

"Real talent?" the judge asked, looking between the two as the gallery muttered quietly. "What are you talking about, Mister Wright?"

"I'm sure the prosecution knows what I'm talking about," Apollo continued, shooting a glance across the courtroom: Klavier didn't reply, though he did raise an eyebrow. Apollo ignored him anyway, and, with a flick at his Court Record, he pulled up on the holograms the photo of the painting Machi had found. "This painting was found in Mister Misham's studio."

Brushel went pale, but said nothing.

"There are two problems with it," Apollo continued. "The first is, Mister Misham didn't paint it. The second?" He switched out the photo for the unfinished one that had been on display. "He did paint this one."
The gallery's mutterings grew louder. Likely they were starting to connect the dots.

"Then we have this letter." Apollo switched out the photo on the holograms back to the copy of the red envelope's contents. "A payment of a hundred thousand dollars suggests a certain business operation, doesn't it? Specifically, the business of making forgeries.

Brushel howled, his flailing managing to throw him to the ground. The gallery gasped and muttered louder.

Apollo crossed his arms, standing tall behind his bench. "That is all, Your Honour."

At the witness stand, Brushel was pulling himself to his feet. "Everyone! Please, everyone! Can we keep this private?" he begged. "Please!? This is my story! My scoop!"

"Forgery," the judge repeated to himself in wonder. "That's a serious crime!"

Apollo looked across the courtroom and noticed Klavier was still quiet, though now his eyes were closed and he was frowning deeply; Apollo could only guess whether or not Ema had told him about Misham the forger.

Brushel whimpered, then seemed to give up on his 'exclusive'. "Drew Misham is known as an artist these days," he explained, "but there were rumours he dabbled in another kind of art until a few years back."

"'Another art' meaning... forgery?" the judge asked.

Brushel nodded. "Drew Misham was talented, alright: Talented at making precise, detailed fakes... a fact that certain criminal elements were quick to discover."

Apollo felt a shiver go up his spine and tried not to muse on exactly what Brushel meant.

"The rumours he was forging evidence started circulating about seven years ago, incidentally," Brushel continued.

"Forging evidence!?!" the judge cried, jumping in his seat with shock. "A-are we to understand this letter... this payment of a hundred thousand, from seven years ago...?"

Brushel nodded. "Exactly. 'Forged Evidence Nets Tidy Profit', end quote."

As the noise of the gallery increased, the judge paused to bang his gavel, calling for order.

Apollo felt a tap on his arm and turned to see Machi watching him with a concerned look. "Isoveli, are you okay?"

"I'm fine," Apollo insisted, giving his brother a smile. "Don't worry about me."

Once the unruly crowd was back under control, the judge sighed. "Why, it's like our victim was living a double life..."

Apollo quickly pulled himself together, unwilling to let this chance slip through his fingers. Slamming his fists against his bench, he announced, "So the victim had ties to the criminal world, right? He could have had plenty of enemies we know nothing about!"

"Objection!" came a shout from across the room, as Klavier finally sprang back to life. "This is my first time hearing of this 'criminal world'," he said, fixing Apollo with a glare. "We certainly found no criminal connections when we conducted our investigation."
Apollo couldn't believe his ears at that, but decided not to argue if Ema had failed to mention it to her 'boss'. He threw out an arm to point at the prosecution. "Objection! How do you explain all this money, then? Even you have to admit there's a possibility of illegal activity here, Herr Diva!"

"Objection!" Klavier shot back, pausing a moment before pointing out, "But there is no proof tying this letter to our case."

Apollo paused, arm lowering. 'That... is a good point.'

"Our case was, and remains, simple from the beginning," Klavier continued, hands in his pockets. "Only the defendant could have poisoned that mug that night." He grinned, shooting a look at Brushel. "And you, of course."

"Hey, hey, hey, the only thing I poison is my pen," Brushel protested, "when I'm writing reviews!"

Klavier just shook his head, amused.

"Mister Brushel, your testimony to this point has been quite unreliable," the judge spoke up, giving the man a disapproving look. "It doesn't speak well of your reporting acumen."

Brushel sputtered for a moment, clearly offended. "What're you talking about!? My journalism is rock solid! 'Journalism So Solid, You Could Stand An Elephant On It,' end quote."

The judge shook his head. "In any case, let's hear a summarised recap of your testimony. If we can ascertain the situation in that studio from the recap, the trial is over." He tapped his gavel decisively. "Mister Brushel, your testimony please!"

"Wh-what he talking about?" Machi asked, hands picking at the frills around his neck. "Trial end already!?"

Apollo sighed. "The cross-examination showed Mister Brushel didn't have reason or means to poison Misham," he explained. "As long as there's no other suspects, then the killer had to be Vera. This next testimony is our last chance."

Trucy gasped, and fixed her brothers with a determined glare. "We can't let that happen!" she declared. "Not yet!"

"Don't worry," Apollo told the pair, smiling. "I've still got one trick up my sleeve, and I'm not letting this trial end before I pull it off."

At the witness stand, Brushel finished his fidgeting and began his final testimony: "The only other person in the studio that night was the defendant. It was Vera who poured the coffee; She admitted as much herself. The only thing that touched Drew's lips during the interview was that mug, and nothing left that studio after he died, nothing." He nodded, proud of himself. "Clearly, the only one who could have poisoned him was his daughter!"

"A nice testimony," Klavier said, watching with an easy smile. "Clear, succinct... and without room for doubt."

"Aw, shucks, you really think so?" Brushel asked with a wide grin.

The judge thought a moment. "I believe this clarifies the situation that night," he decided, then turned to the defence. "Mister Wright, you may begin your final cross-examination."

Apollo nodded. 'You heard him, Wright. Time to pull off that 'trick' you were talking about... and save Vera from an unlawful end!

[View the Court Record]
"Nothing left the studio after Mister Misham's death?" Apollo sternly asked. "You're sure?"

Brushel nodded enthusiastically. "Yep, sure as sure can be." He paused, tapping his toothbrush against his head. "Well, with one exception."

The judge perked up. "One exception? What?"

The reporter grinned. "'Journalist Spark Brushel Does Interview, Leaves Studio', end quote." He promptly burst into loud laughter, slapping his knee and leaning on the witness stand. "C'mon! It's a joke! Get it?" When the courtroom still failed to join in, he calmed down, waving off the non-reaction. "Not funny, I know, but still!"

Apollo paused. 'But... No, I'm certain! There was something else!'

The judge sniffed. "Now that we've proven our witness is a comedian of sorts, I'd like to turn to our defence attorney." He raised an eyebrow at Apollo. "Do you have any idea what, if anything, might have left the studio that night?"

Apollo nodded. "I think one thing might very well have left the studio that night, actually: A certain something that has vanished from the crime scene."

"By which you mean something other than our witness?" the judge clarified.

Although he hated he had to answer, Apollo bit back a groan and replied, "Of course."

Klavier chuckled, brushing the hair from his eyes. "Don't tell me: 'Vera Misham'?"

Apollo narrowed his eyes at the prosecutor. "I save my comedy for the stage, Herr Diva; If I was trying to be funny, believe me, you'd know."

"Then let's see what you've got for us, Mister Wright," the judge said, gesturing to the holograms; It was clear he was expecting to literally see whatever it was Apollo had in mind, and the young lawyer was almost sad to disappoint him.

"Unfortunately, this thing wasn't at the scene of the crime, so I can't show it to you," Apollo explained, "but, I do have evidence that shows how it could have been taken from the scene!" With a flourish and a loud "Take that!", he threw up on the holograms a photo he'd taken the previous day, of the bright red box just inside the studio's entrance. "This letter box is the only link between that studio and the outside world."

The judge only seemed confused. "A letter box?"

"What did Mister Brushel just tell us?" Apollo explained. "When he entered the studio on the night of the murder, the victim had just finished writing a letter!"

Brushel happily nodded. "Yeah, I said that. And yeah, it was true."
"Furthermore," Apollo said, "you went on to tell us that he put the letter in a yellow envelope and put it in the letter box."

The judge gasped as he realised what Apollo was getting at.

"But that very same letter box was empty! In other words, that night, the 'yellow envelope' disappeared!"

"Objection!" came a shout, and Klavier chuckled as he shot an easy grin across the room. "Ah, yes, intriguing. So an envelope has disappeared from the scene of the crime." He shook his head. "Of course... this changes nothing."

Apollo blinked as the wind abruptly left his sails. "Huh...?"

"He has a point, Mister Wright," the judge agreed. "What we're trying to figure out here is how the poison got into Mister Misham. Is it really important that this envelope the witness says he saw disappeared?"

"Nothing could be more serious than an envelope disappearing from the studio that night!" Apollo argued. "That seems very important to me!"

Klavier softly scoffed, shaking his head. "I don't argue the possibility that a letter disappeared from that studio... But, Herr Forehead, isn't there a much more serious question before us?" He chuckled. "I still think this fails to change anything."

Apollo could only glare across the room, too angry to allow himself to talk. Suddenly he wished Luke was there, just to see his little brother launch into one of his trademark justified tirades... hopefully this situation would have been enough to warrant one.

The judge mused over the exchange. "Well, we will have this correction added to the testimony," he decided. "You may continue with your cross-examination, Mister Wright."

"Isoveli?" Machi whispered. "Was that your 'trick'?"

"I haven't even started yet," Apollo quietly replied. "This isn't a problem, I can still do this... Just gotta do what Luke does, right? Organise my argument in a flash and lay it out passionately enough they can't deny it!" He turned his glare on the man at the witness stand. "Mister Brushel! You said the only thing that touched Mister Misham's lips was the mug. You're sure about that?"

Brushel thought a moment, tapping his toothbrush against his head. "Well, to be really, really precise... I was busy gobbling mint candies the whole time." He grinned, sending his aura once more across the courtroom.

Klavier chuckled, brushing at his hair. "Don't tell me you're still trying to prove this," he called to Apollo. "You think the victim ate, drank, or otherwise ingested something other than coffee?"

"Naturally," Apollo shot back with a confident smirk. "And not 'trying' - I can prove it."

"Oh really?" the judge asked, surprised.

Klavier's eyes narrowed, as if he didn't seem sure whether or not to believe the young attorney. "How, may I ask?"

Apollo threw out his arm in a dramatic pointing pose. "I have proof of the disappearing envelope!"
Brushel perked up. "I saw him writing a letter, I did!"

"Which was picked up by the mailman, I assume?" the judge asked.

"Of course," Apollo replied, arms crossed, "which means... that envelope had a stamp on it."

"A stamp..." the judge mused aloud, then gasped.

Apollo grinned, sending a silent 'thank you' to his missing brother. "I'm sure we all know stamps come with dried glue on the back, right? In the old days, you would have to lick this glue to stick a stamp to a letter."

"Old days!?" the judge repeated, offended. "I'll have you know the postal industry is still alive and kicking, young man! Complete with stamps!"

"You misunderstand, Your Honour," Apollo replied, shaking his head. "Nowadays, stamps are self-adhesive; Just press them to the paper, and they'll stick on their own, no licking necessary."

The judge paused, confused. "They... do? For how long has this been the case?"

Apollo couldn't immediately reply. "I, uh, don't know for sure," he admitted, "but at least since twenty-nineteen. Regardless, case in point," he turned to Klavier with a smirk, "how many people of Mister Misham's generation, let alone a reclusive shut-in like him, actually know that?"

Klavier was leaning forward on his bench, sweating. Pressing his weight on a clenched fist, he pushed himself up and shouted, "Objection! Okay, I'll accept he licked this stamp... but how does that explain the atroquinine on the rim of the coffee mug!?"

"Objection!" Apollo shouted back. "Haven't you heard you consume a tenth of a calorie when you lick the back of a stamp?"

Machi softly gasped, almost glowing with pride at hearing his factoid from the previous day being repeated.

"The poison got on his tongue, and then he put that coffee mug to his mouth." Apollo crossed his arms with a confident smirk as Klavier winced. "You tell me how those traces got on the mug."

The judge watched with wide eyes. "What!?"

"The coffee mug didn't poison Mister Misham," Apollo explained. "Mister Misham poisoned the coffee mug!"

Immediately, the gallery erupted into noise, and the judge pulled himself out of his own shock to bang his gavel and call for order.

"You listened!" Machi squeaked in awe. Too shy to outright hug his elder brother in court, he made do with pressing against Apollo's side, clinging to his arm. "Yesterday, you listened!"

Apollo snorted, biting back a laugh. "Of course I listened," he quietly replied. "You were giving me valuable information."

"You've helped put the other guy on the ropes, Machi!" Trucy added, miming a few punches.

"I wouldn't say that yet, Truce," Apollo more solemnly told her.

Finally, the judge managed to calm the gallery, and looked between the sweating Klavier and the stern Apollo with a frustrated look. "B-but that doesn't add up... Does it?"

Apollo decided to lay his point out a bit more clearly for the old man: "Recall, if you would: Atroquinine is a slow-acting poison, yes? The poison entered his body when he put the stamp on that envelope, but his time wasn't up until the very moment he touched his lips to that cup of joe."

The judge thought a moment, then looked down to the witness stand. "You have something to add, Mister Brushel?"

Brushel was back to scribbling on his arm, nostrils flaring. Noticing the court's attention on him, he looked up and grinned, quickly shoving his pen back in his shirt pocket. "As I believe I mentioned earlier, Drew was searching his desk drawer for a stamp for the letter he stuffed in that envelope?" He paused to snicker to himself, then frowned thoughtfully. "But you know, I don't seem to remember him ever finding one."

"Maybe he'd just run out?" the judge suggested.

Klavier had calmed down from his earlier upset, and was now merely frowning deeply. "Incidentally, we searched the desk drawer at the scene of the crime. There were no stamps. Not a single one."

Apollo was a little surprised to hear that.

"Hmm, that does pose a problem," the judge mused, tugging at his beard. He turned to Apollo. "How will you prove that the stamp was coated with poison?"

It took only half a second for Apollo to give the man a confident smile. "Actually, I'm glad no other stamps were found; It makes proving the stamp he used was poisoned possible!"

Klavier broke into loud laughter, giving the defence a slow clap. "Good show, good show." He shook his head, making no effort to hide his amused smile. "You can't even prove there was a stamp at the scene in the first place!"

Apollo snorted, rolling his eyes.

The judge only looked thoughtful. "Well, let's hear what the defence has to say anyway." He turned to Apollo. "Where's your evidence that proves the existence of this poisoned stamp?"

His hands at his Court Record, Apollo grinned and made to locate his photo of the tiny frame from the desk, complete with the blue smear of the atroquinine reaction. With a loud "Take that!", he dramatically flicked upwards on his screen to call it up on the holograms without another word.

The judge leaned forward, interested in the picture. "Well, that certainly is a cute little frame. And by little, I mean really little."

"It was on the victim's desk, Your Honour," Apollo explained. "Quite empty, as you can see for yourself."

Klavier frowned at the picture. "I noticed that too during my investigation," he said. "But... that stain... That was not there before."

Apollo smirked, shaking his head. "No, it wasn't. That pale bluish stain... is atroquinine residue."

The gallery begun to mutter loudly.
"What!?” Klavier cried, jerking backwards. "Why wasn't I told about this!?

"The frame is only two inches square,” Apollo continued. "The face of the frame is even smaller, maybe an inch wide at most."

Klavier glared across the room. "You aren't saying...

"Oh, but I am," Apollo replied, relishing in the opportunity to be the condescending one for once. "Tell me: What fits in such a small frame? A commemorative stamp, perhaps?"

The noise of the gallery began to overtake the entire room, forcing the judge to take action, banging his gavel. "Order! Order! Order!"

"So that what was there!” Machi gasped.

The judge finally calmed the crowd, sighing to himself. "The poisoned stamp was in this frame...!?”

"Impossible!” Klavier shouted, slamming his fist against the wall behind him with a scowl. "Why would he put something like that on his desk? Don't tell me he had it there so he could commit suicide if the mood struck!"

Brushel was fidgeting madly at the witness stand. "You know, can I say something? I had a thought, see!"

"What, Mister Brushel?” the judge asked with a world-weary look. "And please stop jittering around like that!

"The victim was a forger, right?” Brushel cried, no sign of calming his movements. "There's a lot of money in that line of work. 'Forger Forges Friends, Makes Enemies Too', end quote."

"So the poisoned stamp might have been a murder weapon," Apollo picked up, pointing dramatically at the courtroom at large, "aimed at him!"

Klavier promptly imitated with a shout of "Objection!" He shook his head, making a noise somewhere between a sigh and a groan. "Oh, rich. That's rich. Leave the ridiculous flights of fancy to your stage act, please."

Apollo rolled his eyes. "I don't make fun of your songs," he pointed out.

"The stamp was a 'murder weapon'?" Klavier continued, scoffing. "Nonsense! Murder is a simple business. Who would go to such lengths? No one." At that, Apollo couldn't help but laugh. "Oh, I disagree."

Klavier winced. "C-come again...?"

"Recall, if you would, the victim's reclusive lifestyle," Apollo explained, snapping his fingers with the same air of presenting a magic trick on stage. "Drew Misham hid from the world. He avoided meetings. His only contact with the outside world... was the mail." He heard the judge gasping in realisation, but didn't pause to let the man interrupt. "Now, if you wanted to kill someone you couldn't meet, but you knew read letters, a person at the right age to have formed a life-long habit of licking things he didn't need to... a stamp would be the perfect weapon!"

"Ridiculous!” Klavier shouted, slamming his fist against the wall a second time. "Where's your proof? I want proof! Show us evidence that this poisoned stamp was sent to him as a murder weapon!

Apollo had to take a moment to breathe, as much as he would have liked to call out his opponent's childish demand; The answers had come to him in such a rush as he spoke that he had to curl his hands into fists at his sides to keep from trembling, throwing on his stage persona all the harder to cover. He felt a tap on his arm and turned to see his sister giving him a worried look.

"You okay, Polly?" Trucy asked.

He gave his sister a quick and subtle nod, then turned his attention back to the courtroom. "Luckily for you... I can do exactly that."

The judge gestured impatiently to the holograms. "Well, fill us in, Mister Wright!"

Apollo nodded, hands already at his tablet computer on the bench to prepare. "A certain piece of evidence points to the truth, Your Honour," he said. "Someone with the intent to kill sent Mister Misham the stamp of death... through this!"

[View the Court Record]
The gallery muttered loudly as the image of the red envelope once more appeared on the holograms above them. The judge frowned in confusion, asking, "Isn't this the envelope...? The seven-year-old one from twenty-nineteen?"

Apollo nodded. "Think about the text of the letter again." He swapped out the image of the envelope for the one of its contents. "Right here, at the top of the second page: 'Send in the enclosed envelope with the enclosed stamp within three days'. The enclosed stamp, Your Honour."

The judge gasped in shock. On the other side of the room, Klavier watched with a glare.

"In other words," Brushel spoke up, "if I have this straight... 'The Stamp! Poison! On The Stamp! Lick, Lick, Gasp...' end quote!"

Apollo just smiled. "Now, what if he had done exactly as the letter asked?"

"He would sign the document," Trucy picked up, "put it in the envelope, and put the stamp on it, right? And he'd lick it, because he didn't know he didn't need to!"

"A-and then put in letter box!" Machi added.

"Fifteen minutes wouldn't have elapsed between affixing the stamp and mailing the letter," Apollo continued, unable to feel upset this time that his siblings were speaking up. "But the clock started ticking, and when the time came, he drew his last breath... and the murder weapon would be taken away from the scene."

The judge nodded to himself. "Quite conveniently, thanks to the postal system."

But, before Apollo could dare to consider his case won, Klavier laughed, shaking his head. "Such a splendid imagination you have, Herr Forehead!" Ignoring Apollo's wordless glare, he waved a hand dismissively. "Let me confirm one thing with you, if I might: This 'poisoned stamp' was inside this seven-year-old envelope, ja? Is that what you'd have us believe? Really?"

Hearing it worded that way, Apollo felt his confidence draining quickly. "W-well..."

"Alright, so it's a little bit of a stretch," Trucy cried, and pointed across the room in an imitation of her eldest brother, "but it's still possible!"

Klavier almost laughed again, brushing the hair over his eyes. "Yes, there's a small chance it may be possible... But how small a chance, I wonder?"

Trucy wilted a little at that, looking to Apollo for support. "Um..."

"A poisoned stamp in this envelope?" Klavier continued. "A stamp that then became the murder weapon? How do you intend to prove this seeming coincidence?"

"W-well," Trucy muttered, stepping back from the bench and avoiding eye contact.
"Hey!" Apollo slammed his bench, shooting a glare at the prosecutor. "You leave her out of this!"

Klavier just softly chuckled, flipping his hair. "I was simply asking a question, Herr Forehead."

"Then you ask your question to me," Apollo pressed, leaning forward on the bench. "I'm the defence attorney here, Herr Diva... Or did you forget that already?"

The prosecutor was unfazed. "Then I ask you: How are you intending to prove your case here, defence attorney? What evidence is there that your 'poisoned stamp' was in that letter?"

Apollo said nothing, only glaring across the room. As much as he might have wished otherwise, he had no answer to give; After all, the envelope lacked a return address, or any other indication of the identity of its sender, and was now seven years old, long past any reasonable time-frame that might have let them track its path.

Klavier smirked, shaking his head. "All that bluster and your answer is silence." He moved to shut down the holograms, standing tall behind his bench. "In that case, I move to-

"It's not nice to pick on a Fraulein and not apologise, Klavier."

Opposite them, Klavier jumped a little, a confused look on his face. Apollo similarly jerked in surprise, his eyes jumping to Klavier's right and finding a familiar silhouette half-hiding by the corner of the gallery box. Half confused, half surprised, Apollo called out, "Ema!"

The lab-coated detective was grinning widely, and emerged from her hiding place with a confident posture. "Well? Like my Kristoph Gavin impression? Did I sound like him?"

'Nothing at all, actually...' Instead of saying his first thought aloud, Apollo hesitantly replied, "Don't quit your day job."

Klavier merely gave her a disapproving look. "Don't you have a crime scene to be looking after, Fraulein Detective?"

Ema shrugged. "Someone had to come dig you all out of the mess you're making of this case."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Mess?"

"Y'know, none of this would happen if you just trusted in science a little more," Ema continued, her heels clicking on the floor as she strode out into the courtroom. "You can find out if that stamp was in that envelope, easy."

Klavier gave her a stern stare. "Care to explain yourself, Fraulein Detective?"

"Glare at me all you want, but science is on my side." Still smirking, Ema lowered her red-lensed glasses over her eyes, then turned to Apollo, pulling from her purse a familiar-looking red envelope in a plastic evidence bag. "It's all in the residue, right?"

Apollo had to think a moment, but grinned and snapped his fingers as he realised what she meant. "That's right! The poison detection spray!" He immediately turned his attention to his bag to dig the small item out.

The judge tapped his gavel decisively. "Extract that envelope at once! You can open it on the authority of the court!"

"Can I try it this time?" Trucy immediately asked. "Please, Polly?"
Apollo almost laughed as he pulled out the spray. "Just don't spray it on us again, okay?"

"I won't!" the teen promised, snatching the small bottle and dashing around towards Ema.

Machi leaned in close to his older brother with a smile. "Next time is your turn," he said.

Apollo snorted. "Guess so, huh?" Truthfully, he couldn't think of how that small bottle would ever be useful again after this.

To Klavier's great displeasure, Ema commandeered the prosecutor's bench to prepare the red envelope for testing: She pulled from her purse a tiny pair of scissors to cut open the flap, then carefully removed the two sheets of paper inside and unfolded them across the wooden surface. Shooting a grin at the impatient Trucy, she waved the teen forward and gestured to the waiting letter.

Trucy squeaked in excitement, rushing forward with the spray bottle clutched tight. She pulled off the cap in one swift motion, then, frowning hard in concentration, began to spray the substance inside evenly across the paper. Above her, the courtroom fell into total silence, all attention completely focussed on the young magician. Even Klavier, who had retreated from his bench in disgust, stepped closer to watch.

Although Apollo and Machi had stayed at the defence bench, they kept their eyes on their sister, eager for whatever results she might turn up: It was impossible to miss when Trucy stepped back triumphantly from her work, capping the spray in her hands once more. At her side, Ema was grinning widely, and behind them Klavier deeply frowned. Without a word, Ema took hold of one of the sheets of paper that made up the letter and held it up high to show off to the courtroom: Right next to the words "you've confirmed the transfer" was a clear blue stain... exactly the size of a stamp.

The gallery gasped and quietly muttered amongst themselves. Apollo couldn't blame them, sharing a look with Machi that was somewhere between 'proud of their case' and 'sad someone had to die over this'.

"Well! Would you look at that!" the judge breathed in amazement.

Ema nodded decisively, lowering her arm to replace the paper on the prosecutor's bench. "No mistaking it. That's atroquinine residue."

Trucy skipped happily back to her brothers at the defence bench, taking her place once more on Apollo's left. "Easy as pie!" she declared.

"I-I don't believe it," the judge was muttering to himself. "A murder weapon from the past... Now, seven years later, it bares its fangs at last!"

Apollo frowned; Had the judge intended to rhyme, there?

"Objection!" Klavier shouted, banging a fist against the wall behind him and glaring at the paper in front of him. "Absolutely outrageous!" He paused for a moment to breathe, Ema nearby standing to one side to keep out of his way. "Tell me why!" the prosecutor demanded. "Why didn't this murder take place seven years ago!?"

Apollo opened his mouth to reply, then stopped, closing it again. That was a good question. "Well, um..."

"There's one possibility," Ema suggested. "Maybe Mister Misham figured it out."

"Figured what out?" the judge asked.
"He realised the person who sent that letter wanted him dead," Ema explained, "so he sent his reply with a different stamp."

The judge tugged at his beard, musing over her words. "And put his decisive evidence in a frame."

"Hold it!" came a shriek from the witness stand, throwing the entire courtroom into a sudden and stunned silence.

Apollo jumped in shock, turning his eyes to the reporter stood there. "You're still here!?

"C-can I make a statement here, on the record?" Brushel asked, nostrils flaring as he fidgeted with the pen in his hand. "I, Spark 'Razortooth' Brushel, claim this scoop as mine! 'Drew Misham Killed In Cold Blood By Sender Of Seven-Year-Old Letter!', end quote." He frowned, tapping his pen against his head. "Hmm, no, maybe something more succinct. 'Star Falls After Seven Year Delay', end quote."

The courtroom fell into loud chatter. Behind the defence bench, Trucy pouted, arms crossed. "Seriously? Still going with 'star falls'?"

Apollo sighed, pressing a hand to his face.

"Order! Order! Order!" the judge called, banging his gavel.

Ema rolled her eyes, then rounded on the reporter with a glare. Brushel yelped once, then allowed himself, finally, to be herded from the room and out of sight.

With the courtroom was quiet once more, the judge hummed in thought. "I see no room for further argument here... though, I admit, this is all coming as quite a shock. To think that the murder weapon reached his mouth after seven years...! 'Stamp Is Ticket Straight to Afterlife', end quote!"

"Uh oh, I think the witness is a bad influence on our judge," Trucy whispered. Apollo silently nodded back.

"I see no need for further debate on this matter," the judge continued. "The sender of that letter seven years ago could hardly have been our defendant!"

Machi gasped, turning to his brother with a smile. "I-isoveli...!"

"I think we just won!" Trucy chimed in.

"Very well!" the judge announced. "This court finds the defendant..." He raised his gavel, ready to slam it down as he spoke his next words.

Apollo himself stood in shock, unable to believe they'd reached a verdict so quickly...

"Objection!"

... and, indeed, it was too good a feeling to last.

Klavier huffed behind his bench, seeming somewhat at the end of his rope. "Is this the bright future of our legal system?"

The judge raised an eyebrow, having dropped his gavel at the shout from his right. "Prosecutor Gavin?"

"A ticket to the afterlife from seven years ago?" Klavier paraphrased, scoffing. "Tickets for Gavinners shows are invalid after two weeks."

"B-but it doesn't make sense any other way!" the judge pointed out.

Klavier shook his head, laughing under his breath. "It boggles my mind that so many people haven't noticed this." He pointed across the room. "There's a fatal contradiction in Herr Forehead's claim!"

Apollo's eyes widened as the courtroom gasped. "A c-contradiction?"

"A poisoned stamp was placed in this envelope seven years ago, whereupon it was framed, until now," Klavier explained. "If that's the case, then why would Drew Misham have done what he did?"

"Ema explained that!" Apollo cried, leaning on his bench and trying not to look as desperate as he felt. "He must have realised it was poisoned!"

Klavier only shook his head. "Therein lies the rub."

Apollo remained silent, too scared to reply; What on earth was this 'contradiction' Klavier was angling at...?

"Seven years ago, the forger Drew Misham sensed a trap, and put the stamp in a frame; I do not debate this," Klavier continued. "But this begs the question: Why, seven years later, did he use that stamp on the night of the murder?"

At Apollo's sides, Trucy and Machi gasped. Apollo himself was frozen in place, a cold sweat forming on the back of his neck.

Now he was in his stride, Klavier shot a smug look across the room. "Surely you don't mean to suggest that Mister Misham simply forgot? He put the murder weapon in a frame on his desk for seven years... and forgot? You expect us to believe he sprang the trap on himself?"

Apollo had to fight not to say anything, lest he only end up stuttering nonsense. He staggered back from his bench, eyes wide and face pale.

"While I admit this is all quite shocking myself," the judge spoke up, "it does seem highly unlikely that he would fall afoul of a trap that had been sitting on his desk for seven years."

"I-isoveli...!" Machi squeaked in alarm.

"I don't think we're winning anymore..." Trucy whispered.

Klavier laughed, holding his arms out wide. "Ah, I'm glad to see we're all back in the real world now! Welcome back to reality! We've been waiting for you!"

Seeing the prosecutor's smug attitude sparked Apollo back into action, and he slammed his fists on his bench with a loud shout of "Objection! Okay, then how do you explain the poisoned stamp that was in the envelope?"

"The 'poisoned stamp'?” Klavier chuckled. "Where exactly is this poisoned stamp again? Have you brought it to court for us?” He shook his head. "I see no proof that such a thing existed."

"Objection!" Apollo shouted back. "What about the atroquinine residue, huh!?"

"Oh, I agree, that does seem to be atroquinine residue," Klavier readily agreed, still grinning. "But, Herr Forehead, it's certainly no stamp."
Apollo was lost for words for a moment or two. "Y-yeah, but-!"

"Even if your precious poisoned stamp did exist," Klavier interrupted, a stern look overtaking his usual easy grin, "Drew Misham never would have used it." He brushed at his hair for a moment or two, eyes closed. "That is all."

As much as he might have wanted to... Apollo couldn't deny Klavier's argument.

View the Court Record
The judge shook his head, disappointed. "I believe we've come to a conclusion," he said. "Again."
"W-wait!"
Apollo's own forming objections were called to a halt as he heard the shout from his right. "Machi?"
"That not fair!" the teen cried in Klavier's direction, face red. He slammed on his bench, a slightly weaker imitation of Apollo. "Everything make sense, you not just say 'no' and ignore!"
Klavier continued to give the defence an easy grin. "I'm afraid your English still needs work, little pianist," he said. "I don't know what you're trying to say."
Machi fumed for a moment, as angry as he'd been the day he learned Lamiroir's real name. Banging the bench again, he shrieked, "Sanon et kuntele, sina... sina alio!"
"Machi!" Apollo hissed. "Please, calm down!"
"And neither is my Borginian any better than it was last time," Klavier laughed. "At least, I hope I am misunderstanding what you called me just now."
"Wow, what'd you say?" Trucy asked, giving Machi an impressed look.
Apollo hurriedly shushed his sister, placing a hand on his brother's shoulder to guide the red-faced Machi away from the bench. "Maybe you should go keep Vera company," he quietly suggested.
Machi shook his head, glaring at his feet. "I stay here."
Nodding, Apollo left his brother be to calm down, and turned his attention to the judge's podium. "Your Honour, with all due respect, the defence refuses to believe all those traces of poison match up only by co-incidence. There has to be something we're missing here!"
The judge thought a moment. "I'd like to bring some closure to this issue, sometime this year. Mister Wright, let's review the facts, and see where we stand." He leaned back a little in his chair, stroking his beard. "Seven years ago, late April twenty-nineteen, Drew Misham received a red envelope. There were traces of the poison atroquinine on the document inside that envelope. A similar trace was also found at the crime scene," he paused to fiddle with something on his desk, and Apollo's photo of the frame returned to the holograms, "on this tiny picture frame. The defence has indicated the possibility of a yellow envelope, an envelope that left the scene of the crime with the poisoned stamp on it."
Klavier scoffed, brushing at his hair. "Yes, but even if this envelope contained a poison stamp - and Drew Misham, knowing this, put it in a frame - he never would have used that stamp!"
The judge nodded. "I'm afraid you're right... which means there is a fatal flaw in the defence's case."
'No need to rub it in...' Frowning, Apollo crossed his arms and pressed a finger to his forehead.
"There's no way we're on the wrong track with this. There has to be a reason he framed that stamp, a reason that led to why he finally used it so many years later... Man, if only Luke was here. He'd figure it out in a snap."

With a wince, he banished that thought from his head - He was here just as much to prove he could do this alone, wasn't he? 'Well, time to pull out Mia's best advice, I guess: Let's turn this sucker around. Assume your theory is right; What else has to be true? Well, for one thing, Drew Misham didn't know about the trap, so... it wasn't him who framed it? The only other person who could is...!' He froze, mind racing. 'But... but that means...!'

"Well, Mister Wright?" the judge asked, interrupting the young attorney's train of thought. "Do you have a conclusion for us?"

Apollo took a deep breath, processing the option that had just come to mind. "I do, Your Honour. I think I've just figured this whole thing out."

"Oh, I'm looking forward to this," Klavier replied, grinning. "And whatever you've 'figured out' will prove your wild fantasies quite reasonable, ja?"

Apollo smirked. "You have no idea." He slammed his fists against the bench, announcing to the court, "Drew Misham was not the forger!"

There was a short pause as the courtroom stared at Apollo in silence. Eventually, the judge cried, "Excuse me!? The victim wasn't...?" He sighed, shaking his head. "I'm afraid I don't understand."

"I'll explain," Apollo agreed, having expected the multitude of blank looks pointed in his direction. "April, twenty-nineteen, our forger sniffed a trap and stepped aside. Seven years later, October, twenty-twenty-six, the forger stumbles into that very same trap and dies. Why?"

"Because the forger who was killed was a fake!" Apollo announced.

Klavier blinked, nonplussed. "Come again?"

Apollo held up a single finger. "One forger smelled the trap." He held up a second finger on the same hand. "One forger fell into the trap. That's two forgers! And one of them was a fake!"

The gallery buzzed with activity, forcing the judge to start banging his gavel and call for order.

Klavier fixed the young man opposite him with a glare, not caring for the sound of the gallery above. "So you are telling us that Drew Misham, the victim, was a fake?" he asked, then threw a hand into the air in exasperation. "Well, if he was the fake, who was the real forger? You'd better not be claiming there was some kind of switcheroo!"

Having calmed the crowd, the judge nodded in agreement. "I'm afraid you're going to have to back up your story, Mister Wright. If not our victim, who is the real Drew Misham?"

Apollo crossed his arms, standing proud behind his bench. "There can only be one explanation, Your Honour: The real forger behind that name is none other than his only daughter," he swung his arm out to point at the courtroom, "Vera Misham!"

The crowds immediately burst into noise again, and the increasingly-irritated judge rapped his gavel madly to quiet them. "Order! Order! Order!" As the chaos died down, he turned to Apollo with a sigh. "Mister Wright, this is going out on a limb, even for you!"

"I kinda agree," Trucy whispered, giving her eldest brother a concerned look. "I mean, Vera, a
"I think it make sense," Machi replied, idly tugging on the frills at the end of his sleeve. "She draw. She paint. Only other person in studio is her."

Apollo decided not to point out painting one's nails wasn't the same thing as painting with paint. "Let's consider it before you write it off entirely," he told the court, and moved his hands to his Court Record. A moment later, the three paintings on display at the crime scene came up on the holograms. "If you look at the paintings in the studio, one fact becomes quite clear: Forgery had been taking place in that studio for quite some time." He pulled the photos down, not needing them anymore. "The forger wasn't caught in the trap seven years ago; This can only mean that the one who was caught in the trap wasn't the forger!"

The judge blinked, eyes wide. "Well... Actually, that does make a certain kind of sense."

"One more thing!" Apollo added, holding up two fingers. "Only two sets of fingerprints were found in the forger's studio: Drew Misham's... and Vera Misham's. If we know that Drew Misham isn't the forger, that leaves only one possibility, by process of elimination: The forger was Vera Misham." He crossed his arms, proudly eyeing his silent opponent. "Well?"

Klavier stared for a long moment, a slight frown on his face. "Fascinating..."

The judge rapped his gavel, waving for a bailiff. "Bring the defendant in here immediately!"

As the young bailiff dashed off into the defence waiting room, the gallery above broke into quiet murmuring, and Apollo turned around with a sigh to face his siblings, leaning against the bench at his back. "Well. Can't say I started this trial expecting that."

"You're telling us?" Trucy pointed out, an eyebrow raised.

Machi was looking worried, staring in the direction the bailiff had run off to. "Vera will be okay?"

Apollo frowned, following his brother's gaze. "I hope so. She was opening up to us this morning..."

"Being on trial's different, though," Trucy pointed out. "What if she faints again?"

"Don't bring out Mister Hat and she won't," Apollo muttered.

"Do you see a hat on my head right now!?" Trucy hissed in response, pointing at her bare head. "And I didn't mean to scare her, anyway!"

Machi was still staring past his siblings with a worried look. Without a word, he slipped past the older pair, leaving the defence bench behind.

"Machi?" Apollo asked, watching his brother in concern.

The bailiff had returned to the courtroom, doing his best to guide the meek Vera forward. She still hugged her sketchbook tight, and her emotionless eyes were locked on her own feet as she slowly took step after step towards the witness stand. Machi approached her carefully from the side, giving her a friendly smile and holding out a hand, and she stopped her trek to turn her gaze towards his face, studying him curiously. Machi said a few quiet words to her, though they were too far away for Apollo to hear exactly what. Vera mutely considered for a few moments, then nodded. The bailiff stepped back, and Machi led the cautious young woman over to the witness stand, where he stood at her side to offer the nervous Vera comfort.
Apollo couldn't help a proud smile for his youngest sibling.

The judge peered down at the silent defendant as the courtroom quietened once more. "Vera Misham?"

Vera paused, her gaze very briefly flicking up towards the judge from her stare at the floor.

"You've been paying attention to the trial so far?" the judge asked, a grandfatherly tone in his voice.

Vera's fingers twitched where they gripped her sketchbook. She made no move to reply.

Klavier sighed, brushing his hair. "Let's just ask her and be done with it, shall we?" He leaned casually against his bench, fixing the young woman with a stern look. "Who are you? Who is the forger Drew Misham?"

For a moment, it almost looked like Vera would continue her long silence, but her eyes flicked up towards Klavier... and double-taked, widening ever so slightly as she fixated on the prosecutor's face, cowering a little from the glare he was giving her. Apollo was almost too surprised to register that it was the first hint of an emotion he'd seen Vera express; She didn't even react when Machi patted her arm, whispering words of comfort.

Klavier took the extra attention in his stride with a practised rock star's smirk. "I'm used to being stared at by Frauleins, believe me... though they usually talk to me, too." He shot a group of cooing women in the gallery a grin, then returned a business-like look to Vera. "Tell us: Were you the one who forged those works of art?"

Vera continued to mutely stare for a long moment, then, finally, turned her attention away and flipped open her sketchbook, spinning it in her hands to show the smiling face she had drawn earlier for the Wrights. "Yes."

"So... So the forger, Drew Misham," the judge hesitantly asked, "was you?"

Vera stared for a long moment, then spun her notebook back around and flipped to a new page. She retrieved her pencil from a pocket, quickly sketching something on the paper, then turned her sketchbook around again to show the court a second emoticon, this one with a wibbly line for a mouth and a massive teardrop that covered one eye and dripped down over half of the face. "Yes, it was me."

The judge jerked back in his seat. "Wha... What!?"

The gallery burst into uproar, sounds of disbelief and shock echoing above. Vera hugged her sketchbook tight to her chest, stepping away from the witness stand, and Machi stuck to her side, trying to offer her comfort despite his own nervousness.

"Order! Order!" the judge called from his podium, fruitlessly banging his gavel. When the crowd failed to react, he was forced to wave a hand in exasperation. "This court will break for a ten minute recess!" With that, he promptly got up and descended from his podium.

Apollo didn't waste any time, shoving his Court Record in his bag with one hand while he kept the other gripping Trucy. "Machi!" he called, leaving the bench. His youngest brother's head perked up at the sound of his name, and the teen quickly realised what was going on, turning his attention to Vera to lead her away from the witness stand.
Together, the Wrights and Vera fled in the direction of the lobby.
When they arrived in the lobby, Apollo herded everyone in and closed the door behind them, resting his head against the wood with a sigh. Behind him, Machi guided Vera to the brown couch, sitting her down with a few quiet reassuring words.

"Polly?" Trucy called.

Apollo took a deep breath to steady himself before pushing off the door and turning to give his sister a forced smile. "Hey. Still confused about the case?"

Trucy thought a moment. "Well... I guess I understand what... just not why."

Apollo decided he had to agree there. He turned his attention to the couch, finding Vera sitting there with her sketchbook on her lap. In her hands was her crystal bottle of nail polish, reapplying the pink paint to her fingers.

Machi stood at Vera's side, watching his siblings. "When we go back... They ask Vera to stand again?"

"They will ask her to the stand, yes," Apollo replied, nodding as he and Trucy moved to join their brother. "We've asked Brushel everything we can, so it's up to her now."

Vera briefly paused in her appliance of her nail polish, then resumed her work in silence, ignoring the eyes of the Wrights on her.

Apollo sighed. "Vera... You made all those forgeries?"

The young woman paused, then slowly put away her bottle. She carefully picked up the sketchbook to show the sad face she had drawn in court, her own down-turned. "Yes... For Father." She lowered the sketchbook. "I know it was wrong."

"Could you tell us how it happened?" Trucy asked.

Vera sat in silence, and Apollo worried for a moment she wouldn't reply... but, as always, the trick with Vera was to be patient for her reply: "My father was a painter. I've loved painting ever since I was a child." Her fingers twitched nervously. "One day, Father saw it in me... He saw that I had the 'talent'."

"Talent?" Machi repeated. "You mean... make forgeries?"

Vera almost nodded, but stopped mid-motion. "How should I say it? It was not only paintings I made. Given the materials, I could make... anything."

Apollo felt his suspicions from the previous day rearing its ugly head at the back of his mind. "Anything?"

The young woman flipped her sketchbook to the happy face, propping it up on her knees. "Father was so proud, and I, so happy..." She paused, then flipped to the sad face. "But, in the end, I was making... those..."

"The forgeries," Apollo filled in, looking away.

"I've never had a good constitution, nor... personality," Vera continued, laying the sketchbook down again.

"Th-that not true!" Machi insisted. "You have wonderful personality! You just... quiet, and shy. I quiet and shy, too. That not mean you not have one!"

Vera didn't react outwardly to the teen's short speech, but, by now, they expected that from her. She looked away. "I know very little of the world outside my door," she told them. She paused, taking a deep breath, and even sounding a little choked up. "Now, because of me... Father... is..."

Machi patted her arm. "It okay to cry if need."

She made no move to react, but Vera did seem to calm down at that.

Trucy and Apollo exchanged worried looks before returning their gazes to the young woman. "So, um," Trucy spoke up, "did you know about the red envelope?"

Vera didn't immediately reply. "I remember the envelope. It was some time ago."

'A full seven years,' Apollo mused. 'Hard to think it's been that long I've had Dad, Luke and Trucy.' Aloud, he asked, "You were already a, um... You were already creating your 'works' back then?"

Vera nodded. "I started when I was only twelve years old."

"So the one who figured out the stamp was poisoned," Apollo continued, "that was-?"

"Mister Wright!"

All four jumped as the doors opened, and a bailiff poked his head in.

"It's time! To the courtroom, please!"

Apollo hurriedly gave the man a wave of acknowledgement. "R-right!"

The bailiff nodded, then was gone.

Machi frowned and pulled out his phone. "Ten minutes already...?"

Apollo sighed, mentally preparing to herd his siblings and client back to the courtroom. "C'mon, let's get going."

"Wait!" Trucy ordered, holding up a hand, then turned to Vera. "Just one more thing, please! Those three paintings in the studio..."

Vera hugged her sketchbook tight as she stood up, eyes on Trucy. "I painted those, as part of my work."

"Right," Trucy replied, nodding. "See, we checked them out and we saw what was underneath..." She shot her brothers a nervous look. "We... saw the rough sketches, underneath the three finished paintings..."
Apollo nearly kicked himself. 'Oh, right... I almost forgot about those. There are so many other strange things going on, I lost track...'

"I see." Vera thought a long moment, then finally turned her eyes to Apollo. "Mister Wright... Father knew of you. Your family."

"He... did?" Apollo muttered. Somehow, he wasn't surprised; It was the only connection, the only explanation for the three specific sketches they'd seen... and those suspicions about why Phoenix had chosen this case still prickled at the back of his head, ignoring his half-hearted attempts to quash them.

Vera nodded. "He was watching, gathering information... All about the 'Wright And Co Law Offices'."

Apollo's eyes widened, and he shared a surprised look with Trucy; How long had it been since they'd had someone coming to them with that name on their lips?

"B-but, we don't just do law," Trucy pointed out with a nervous laugh. "I mean, we've got Polly doing it now, but only since this year...!"

Vera nodded again. "Yes... You do tricks, gags to amuse... and play piano, and violin."

Trucy looked a little put out by that description of their magic show, pouting as she muttered, "Well, they're not really 'gags'..."

Although he privately agreed, Apollo whispered, "It's not important, Truce."

"Yet when Father heard you had resumed the legal business..." Vera pulled up her sketchbook, opening it to the happy face. "How pleased he was."

Apollo stared back at her for a long moment, unable to think of anything to say in response. Those suspicions at the back of his head were getting stronger.

The long silence was finally broken when Machi reached up and hesitantly tapped Vera's arm. "Um... You okay at stand? I still go with you if you want."

Vera hugged her sketchbook to her chest. "Yes... That is very kind of you."

Trucy frowned, head cocked to one side. "So, you do want him with you, or...?"

Vera nodded.

"I am happy to help," Machi assured her with a smile, then looked to Apollo. "We go back to court now?"

"Yeah, we should do that," Apollo muttered, and waved his siblings and client towards the door. "C'mon, let's go."

The defence team were, again, the first to arrive in the courtroom, bar members of the gallery; Apollo suspected the bailiff hadn't bothered waiting anything near the full ten minutes before summoning them back. Machi once again escorted Vera to the stand, staying by her side in his self-appointed support role... not too dissimilar to what he'd done for Lamiroir now Apollo thought about it. Apollo and Trucy returned to the defence bench, and Apollo quickly moved to set up his Court Record, more for something to do with his hands than because it was vital he go through the trouble of disconnecting and reconnecting it to the courtroom's network. His mind was buzzing with what Vera had told them in the lobby, and the possibilities of what more she might say once the trial started up again. Vera was a forger, under her father's name. Said father was aware of Phoenix, of the agency, and was happy that Apollo had picked up Phoenix's law career after it was torn so thoroughly to ruin. Why? Somehow Apollo doubted it was merely because Drew was a fan... As much as he was awful with names, he was beginning to suspect he'd been wrong to dismiss the feeling of familiarity when he'd first heard 'Vera Misham'. If only Dad hadn't run off with that case file...'

"Polly?"

Dragging himself back to reality, Apollo looked up to meet his sister's worried eyes. "Mm?"

"Why do you think Mister Misham was watching us?" Trucy quietly asked. "Maybe... he was a fan of Daddy? Like you?"

Apollo opened his mouth to insist she surely had exactly the answer, but couldn't make himself believably lie, not with his little sister's fearful eyes on him. "I... I don't think that's it. Whatever's going on..." He sighed. "I don't know, Truce. I wish I did."

Trucy stared a moment, then nodded. Silently, she reached a hand out for his, and the pair leaned against each other in a kind of semi-hug, Apollo's head resting atop Trucy's.

The noise of the gallery stilled, and Apollo looked up to see that, not only was Klavier finally in place at the bench opposite them, but the judge was sitting down atop his podium. The young magician was loathe to let go of his sister's hand just yet, so he merely lifted his head, the pair sticking close together as the trial resumed.

View the Court Record
"Court is now back in session," the judge announced, and banged his gavel, the courtroom silent.

Apollo, like the rest of the court, turned his attention to the witness stand: Machi was a little nervous, but stood proudly as Vera's support regardless, steadfast at her side. Vera herself was clearly tense, the fingers of one hand rubbing against her lips as she fought not to chew on them.

"Perhaps you could begin by telling us how it all worked," Klavier asked, watching Vera carefully.

"How did you set up this 'Drew Misham forger' persona?"

Vera blinked once, her eyes jumping up from the floor to the prosecutor's face. As before, her only reply was a cower and a silent stare.

Apollo and Trucy shared a worried look.

The judge shook his head, recognising Klavier's question was never going to be answered. "Very well, miss, if you would." He leaned forward, giving her a stern stare. "Did you really make those detestable forgeries?"

Vera's eyes shot up to the judge with a slight jump. She still made no move to speak.

"Perhaps you'd rather answer my question," Klavier suggested, a friendly smile on his face. "Were you the one who painted that painting? The remarkably similar one?"

Finally, Vera's mouth opened, and for a reason other than to stick her hand in. "Ah... Yes..." She pulled up her notebook, opening it to the smiling face that she showed the court. "I painted it, yes."

The notebook lowered. "Father praised me quite highly for it."

A murmur spread across the gallery.

"So," the judge sighed. "She was the one who made the forgeries."

"Yet, she did not wish to reveal the truth of their operation," Klavier replied, a frown tugging at his lips as he snapped his fingers in thought. "So the victim was a stand-in, a decoy. To the world at large, he was the forger, not her."

Vera looked between the prosecutor and the judge for a moment before her eyes turned back down to the floor. "I've done... a bad thing. I have, haven't I?"

Machi patted her arm, silently offering comfort.

Klavier shook his head. "Regardless, we need a little more information. About, for instance, this."

He picked up the red envelope from where it still lay on his bench, holding it high for the court to see, and watched Vera carefully. "You have seen this before, ja?"

Vera studied the envelope for a moment, then reluctantly nodded. "Y-yes. It was in the desk drawer."
The judge nodded. "Very well, you may proceed with your testimony," he ordered. "Tell us everything you know about this envelope."

Vera shrank away at first, clearly not wanting to speak, but turned at the gentle touch of Machi's hand on her arm. His smile seemed to give her the courage to face the court again, and, although still scared, she gave her hesitant testimony: "I created things, and Father sold them. This envelope," she looked to the red paper visible lying on Klavier's bench, "came after my first work... that was other than a painting. Father handled the deal, all of it." She paused, then pulled open her sketchbook and a pencil; In a few moments, she had finished her new illustration and spun the book in her hands to show a stamp, the silhouettes of three people taking up most of the picture... though the only detail she had given them was a hat on the tall figure in the middle. "I received the stamp that was in that envelope," Vera explained, then looked away. "It was after that job that we moved to the current studio."

The judge hummed in thought. "There certainly was much of great interest in your testimony."

Klavier had a hand in his hair, looking away with a frown. "Not that the witness realises it."

The judge didn't seem to notice the comment, turning to Apollo. "Very well, please begin the cross-examination!"

"Right!" Apollo replied, and looked to Vera. Her attention was back on the floor, her thumb in her mouth as she ground her teeth against the nail. 'Poor Vera... but the show must go on.' He shot a look to Machi, who smiled back. 'I can trust my little brother to keep her spirits up, though.' "So, Vera... These 'things' you were making were, um, paintings identical to other paintings, right?"

Vera nodded. "The closer they were, the happier Father was." She paused, then opened her sketchbook and flipped to the smiling face. "I was happy too."

"Still, you're quite young now," the judge pointed out. "When did you begin this work?"

Vera thought a moment, pulling her sketchbook back to her chest. "My first painting sold when I was twelve."

Apollo quickly did the maths in his head. 'Seven years ago? Surely that means...' He turned to the judge. "Your Honour! She had no idea what she was doing was illegal!"

"Objection!" came a cry from across the room, and Klavier gave Apollo an amused look. "Easy there, little attorney; You're not here to defend her for the crime of forgery."

The judge nodded, humming in agreement. "True."

Apollo tried not to blush. 'Can't blame me for trying... What's next to ask?' He returned his attention to his client. "Okay, Vera... You said the red envelope came after your first work that wasn't a painting? So, you'd only done paintings up to that point?"

Vera nodded. "Yes... But Father had a realisation. He noticed my talent extended to making things other than paintings."

Apollo felt those suspicions prickling at the back of his mind again. "For instance?"

"For instance..." Vera thought a moment. "A letter someone had written... or a fingerprint left upon a cup... or a signature on a document... a seal upon a letter..."

"And the hundred thousand dollars promised in this letter was the start," Klavier added, mercifully bringing Vera's incriminating list to a halt as he held up the papers that had been inside the envelope. "The beginning of a new industry for Drew Misham."

The judge frowned. "A new... 'industry'?”

"The creation of items to be used in criminal proceedings," Klavier darkly explained, replacing the letter on his bench and shooting Apollo a look. "Forging evidence, in other words."

Atop his podium, the judge gasped.

Apollo merely bit his lip, thinking 'You don't need to tell me twice...' before returning his attention to Vera. "You didn't know how the things you were making were being used?"

Vera didn't immediately reply, opening her sketchbook to the smiling face again. "I enjoy painting very much."

Klavier nodded to himself. "I think I understand. The Fraulein has lived in an... unusual little world."

Ignoring Klavier, Apollo continued, "Can you tell us what happened to the 'papers' that were in that red envelope?" He gestured to the letter on the prosecutor's bench.

Her sketchbook lowered, Vera thought a moment. "Father signed them and sent them back I believe."

"But... he didn't follow the instructions, did he?" Apollo pointed out. "'Send in the enclosed envelope with the enclosed stamp'... You took that stamp, right?"

Vera stared at Apollo before returning to her sketchbook, this time showing the crying face. "Did I do something wrong...?"

Apollo stopped himself short from hounding her for an answer, feeling a bit panicked as it became increasingly clear she had no idea what he was talking about. "You... realised it had the poison on the back, right? Th-that's why you took it, and put it in the frame!"

"Herr Forehead, you can't force an answer upon the witness," Klavier called across the room, a small smile on his face.

Apollo glared in silent reply.

"Now then," Klavier continued, turning to Vera, "perhaps you would tell me, Fraulein Vera? Why did you 'receive' this stamp?"

Vera hugged her sketchbook close, her thumb back in her mouth as she cowered behind the stand, staring silently at Klavier. Machi patted her arm, but she didn't react to the offered comfort.

The judge raised an eyebrow. "Is something wrong?"

Finally, Vera moved, flipping open her sketchbook and showing the court her picture of the stamp. "It was... beautiful," she gave as explanation.

After a moment of thought, the judge smiled. "Ah, you mean it was one of those commemorative stamps?"

Vera stood silently for a second or two. "Yes, I think it was."
"So... you didn't know about the poison?" Apollo quietly asked.

Vera stared at him for a moment before flipping to a new page of her sketchbook and taking to it with her pencil. Once she spun the book back around, the frowning face with a small black cloud billowing from its forehead said it all.

Apollo sighed, mentally throwing up his hands. 'I guess not!'

"So the trap failed by chance," Klavier mused aloud. "By mistake... Thanks to this commemorative stamp."

The judge hummed in agreement. "Quite the close call!"

Apollo decided not to grumble, reviewing the transcript of Vera's testimony on his Court Record. "Vera... You say you moved to where the current Drew Studio is?"

Vera nodded, hugging her sketchbook. "Yes... We saw very few people there. I began drawing picture books..."

"This single job had tied them to the criminal underworld," Klavier pointed out to the court. "I'd think Mister Misham wished to reduce their visibility in the world at large."

"When we had to meet someone for some reason," Vera continued, "Father posed as the creator of the work."

Apollo crossed his arms, frowning. "So that was the real essence of the artist, 'Drew Misham'. You did the work, and he supplied the face."

The judge nodded, giving Vera a sympathetic look. "So... you really didn't know anything, did you? You had no idea how much danger you were in."

Vera flipped open her sketchbook, showing the judge her drawing of the crying face.

"Apparently not," Klavier filled in.

View the Court Record
Apollo was still stuck on the stamp, wondering why it was kept if not because Vera knew about the poison. "About this 'commemorative stamp'... could you tell us more about it?"

Vera stared at Apollo for a long moment before opening her sketchbook to the drawing of the stamp. "It was very pretty. And, more than that..." She paused, until Machi's hand at her arm prompted her to continue. "It was a picture of people I liked at the time."

Apollo's eyes widened. 'That's new...'

Klavier chuckled, and briefly mimed some air guitar. "Apparently we've got some testimony yet ahead of us," he pointed out. "If you would be so kind as to tell us more, Fraulein."

Vera stood still for a moment, still holding up her picture of the stamp. "The stamp was a picture of my favourite magicians... so I kept it."

"Hold it!" Apollo shouted, eyes wide in surprise as his fists banged against the bench. "M-magicians!?"

Vera nodded, lowering her notebook as her hand strayed to her mouth. "I love mysterious things, I always have."

Trucy turned to her elder brother with a raised eyebrow. "Even though she fainted when she saw Mister Hat...?"

Apollo shrugged.

"Father took me when I was very young," Vera continued, nibbling at her thumbnail. "It was a great magic show. I loved it so much."

Quickly getting over her shock, Trucy scoffed, moving to pose with her hand on her hat. "Well, obviously!" She briefly fumbled as she realised too late she wasn't wearing her usual top hat, and quickly shifted to put both hands on her hips instead. "Magic is the best, after all!"

Although he moved to shush his sister, Apollo couldn't help a smile in agreement.

Vera didn't respond, eyes down-turned as she flipped through her sketchbook. "But the magic troupe we saw disbanded soon after." She lifted the book, showing the crying face. "I was quite sad."

Apollo's smile fell in an instant, face pale. "D-dis-!?" He paused only half a second, then turned his attention to his Court Record, navigating through to his older files.

Trucy watched her older brother was a concerned expression. "Polly...?"

"Vera, th-those magicians you liked," Apollo called, finding the folder he was looking for in his search. He paused briefly to debate whether to use a photo of the poster that hung in their dressing room at the Wonder Bar, but ultimately decided to go for a slightly later promotional picture that more closely matched the image Vera had drawn on her stamp. "Was... Was this them?" Hand shaking, he tossed the image of Valant, Zak and Thalassa up on screen, the Gramarye Seal partly visible behind them.

Vera stared at the picture a few moments, then flipped over the pages of her sketchbook to show the court her drawing of a smiling face.

To his intense disappointment, Apollo was not surprised.

The gallery was murmuring to themselves above their heads. At Apollo's side, Trucy gasped, mouth opening in a wide grin. "Really!?" she squeaked.

Vera hugged her sketchbook to her chest, her hand once more moving to her mouth.

"Hmm, I see!" the judge said, nodding to himself. "Still, I have to wonder... Why include a commemorative stamp like that in a business letter?"

"Good question," Apollo muttered, too shaken to do much else other than stare at the image on his computer screen.

Trucy scoffed, waving a hand. "Well, pretty stamps are always better," she declared, "and you can't beat Troupe Gramarye!" She grinned, turning to her brother. "Right, Apollo?"

Apollo blinked in surprise as he realised he was being addressed, and hurriedly nodded. "Uh, y-yeah, right... That's right, Artemis."

Trucy frowned, watching him carefully.

"But, the whole murder plan was a failure because of it," the judge continued, no longer paying attention to the defence. "Ironic, don't you think...?" He turned to the prosecutor's bench, only to pause, confused. "Prosecutor Gavin?"

It was only as he heard the man's name Apollo thought to check on his opponent, the only other person in the courtroom who had a chance of being on the same page as him: Klavier was leaning on his bench, a tense grimace on his face as sweat poured down his brow. He was breathing heavily, and his hands were curled into tight fists, the skin pale where his fingers dug into the palm.

The lack of a response only make the judge visibly concerned. "Prosecutor Gavin?"

Klavier didn't immediately reply. "Gr... Gram... Gramarye..." His eyes locked on Vera, he asked with a laboured tone, "Might I ask just one question of this witness?"

Vera looked back at him blankly. No-one objected to the request.

"In your testimony just now," Klavier forced out, "you stated this was your 'first work that was other than a painting'..."

Vera nodded, nibbling on her thumbnail.

Klavier was looking more and more pained. "Please tell me... what exactly did you make?"

There was a very long silence as Vera stared back at the prosecutor. "Can I ask why-"

"No! Answer the question!" Klavier shouted, and banged a fist against the wall behind him. "Now!"

Vera shrieked, jumping back, and Machi was quick to comfort her, pulling the young woman into a loose hug.

"P-prosecutor Gavin!" the judge cried in surprise, giving the man a disapproving frown. "You're usually not the one whose volume concerns me!"

Klavier seemed unable to keep still, turning back and forth and running a hand through his hair. "Yes, it is unbecoming of me," he hurriedly agreed. "I apologise. But... I must know." He leaned on the bench again, staring intensely at Vera and begging, "Please, Ms Misham, tell me."

Vera stared back with wide eyes, and it took her a long moment to regain the courage to leave Machi's embrace and return to the stand. "It was... a book," she hesitantly explained, her eyes flicking between Klavier and the floor as she chewed on her thumb. "A single page... in a 'book'..."

"A 'book'?' Klavier repeated. "Please be more specific."

Vera thought for another long moment. "It was a handwritten book. Like... like a diary."

Apollo felt his insides turn icy cold.

Klavier took a moment to react to Vera's answer, his normally orange skin going deathly pale. "N... no!" he shouted, spinning around to punch and then kick the wall behind him, startling the members of the gallery directly above. "I don't... No!" His outburst over, he stood with his back to the court, his head in his hands.

"Wh-what's wrong?" Trucy asked, worried eyes jumping between Klavier and Apollo. "Polly, what's going on?"

Before Apollo could formulate an answer, Klavier spun around again, leaning on his bench with a pained grimace directed at Vera; His right hand was being handled very gingerly, and had likely been bruised from the prosecutor's assault on the wall. "Ms Misham, this 'book': Was there a picture of a man's head wearing a top hat on the back cover?" he demanded. "Yes or no!?"

Vera's eyes widened as she stared at Klavier, her thumb finally leaving her mouth. "How... How did you know...?"

Before Klavier could reply, Apollo slammed his fists against his bench, shouting, "Objection!" The moment he had the attention of the court, he shot a stern look at the attorney across the room. "Prosecutor Gavin, calm down! She's answering all your questions, stop badgering her!"

Klavier held his injured hand to his chest, still leaning on his bench with the other arm as he stared at Apollo in distraught disbelief. "He's told you nothing, has he? Your soiled, sullied father? Nothing!?"

Trucy was looking even more worried. "D-Daddy...?"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "Don't be ridiculous. As if I'd let my dad pull a move as stupid as that." Before Klavier could reply, he turned his attention to the witness stand. "Vera, that page you made was used as evidence in a trial seven years ago, and ultimately cost one man a fair verdict and another his career as a lawyer." A small gasp rang through the crowds above, and Trucy squeaked at his side, but Apollo ignored them. "It's very important you tell us who it was that asked you to make it."

The gallery muttered amongst themselves, but were quickly silenced by a tap of the judge's gavel; Although he looked confused, the old man on the podium seemed curious to hear where the two attorneys below him were going with their questioning.
Vera stared at Apollo for a long moment, chewing on her thumb. "We... only met once."

Apollo dared to let his hopes rise, but was careful to stay calm and treat the young woman gently. "You met the client? Who was it?"

"It was..." Vera's gaze returned to Klavier, taking a small step back. "It was..."

Machi jumped to comfort her, a hand on the woman's back.

Still cradling his injured hand, Klavier gave Vera a puzzled look. "Yes, what? Is there something about me?"

Vera didn't reply. After a long silence, her eyes never straying from the prosecutor, she continued, "I remember clearly... I remember who gave me the book... the diary..." She trailed off again, her breathing starting to quicken.

"Vera?" Apollo prompted, fighting to stay calm. "Who was it?"

The young woman didn't reply, standing in silence. Finally, she coughed, choking on something in her throat. Before everyone's stunned gazes, her eyes rolled up in her head and Vera tipped backwards.

"Vera!" Machi shouted, jumping to catch her, but Vera's weight was too much for him and they both fell to the floor with a loud thump.

Pushing his sister behind him, Apollo dashed out from behind the bench and ducked under the ropes towards the witness stand. "Vera!" He reached the collapsed woman in a flash, where Machi was crouched at her side, trying to keep Vera awake, and was just in time to hear her final words:

"The... De... vil..."

With that, Vera's eyes closed and she fell unconscious.

View the Court Record
"Vera! Vera!" Machi cried, shaking the woman's shoulders in increasing panic, tears spilling from his baby-blue eyes. "Vera, wake up!"

"Machi, stop," Apollo firmly ordered, gripping his brother's arms. With a glance up, he saw Ema running for them, a first-aid official at her heels, and gently began to pull Machi backwards, away from their unconscious client. "C'mon, let's get out the way."

Machi stumbled as he followed his brother's guiding hands, mute except for the sobs escaping through the hands pressed to his mouth. Once they were far enough away that Apollo stopped moving, the teen spun around and clung to his brother's vest, burying his face in the crimson cape that was draped over Apollo's shoulder.

Apollo instinctively wrapped his arms around Machi, one hand on the back of the boy's golden bob as he whispered comforting words into his chest; His eyes, however, were on the young woman still lying on the floor. While his attention had been on Machi, the courtroom around them had erupted into a ruckus, calls for the first-aid crew, orders for the gallery to calm down, demands to know what was going on. At the witness stand, Ema was radioing for more help between helping the first aid worker look Vera over. The young woman's collapse was replaying over and over in Apollo's mind... They were so close to finally answering the question of who'd been responsible for the loss of Phoenix's badge once and for all; Was it Kristoph as they'd always suspected? From what Apollo remembered of Phoenix's notes (If only he'd reread them more recently!), the identity of the forger's client had been a secret under the care of 'a little girl'... which, considering Vera was a few years younger than him, would certainly match who she'd been in 2019.

Apollo frowned. So this was why the Jurist System's test trial was so last minute, why Phoenix had chosen this case specifically. Without ever letting slip to them the full importance of what was hanging over their heads, Phoenix had assigned Apollo their one and only chance to clear his name. Drew's life had been forfeit, and now Vera's hung in the balance... and Phoenix's name as a lawyer was now tied to her.

Footsteps nearby broke Apollo from his musing, and he saw Trucy dash around behind Machi, giving her brother a worried look as she pressed against his back. Apollo moved his own arms to Machi's shoulders, then gently stepped back to check on his brother's state. Machi seemed to have calmed down, rubbing at his eyes as he looked up at Apollo silently.

"You okay?" Apollo asked.

Machi nodded.

"Good." Apollo chanced another look at Vera; A couple more first aid officers had arrived by now with a stretcher in tow, and were carefully lifting Vera onto it... a scenario Apollo couldn't help but mentally compare to when they'd found Lamiroir unconscious in the contrabass case. He resisted a shudder at the memory. The sooner Vera recovered and pointed the finger at someone, whether it was Kristoph or not-
Wait.

Finger. Kristoph.

Nail polish.

Apollo's head spun to face his siblings, eyes wide. "Truce, could you get out that poison spray Ema lent us?"

Trucy frowned in confusion, but reluctantly reached into the bag at her hip regardless. "Okaaay..."

"And take off your gloves, too."

The girl double-taked, her hand already half out of the bag, and gave her eldest brother an incredulous look. "What? Why?!"

Apollo leaned forward to snatch the small spray-bottle from her hand, shooting his sister a stern glare as he snapped, "Just do it, okay!?" With Trucy hesitantly pulling at the white fabric that covered her hands, he turned to his other sibling, who was watching them worriedly. "Machi, hold out your hands for me." Apollo held up his free hand, fingers together and nails facing the ceiling, to demonstrate. "Like this."

Machi stared a moment, then copied his brother without a word.

Apollo popped off the bottle's cap, then, biting his lip, carefully sprayed across the ends of his youngest brother's fingers. To his horror, Machi's nails turned from pale pink to a bright blue.

Machi squeaked in surprise, face paling as he stepped back. "I-isovelie...!"

Looking over her brother's shoulder, Trucy gasped, clasping her removed gloves in one hand. "But... but that means..."

Apollo didn't waste any time, turning to his sister with a beckoning gesture. "Trucy, hands!"

Trucy stepped around Machi, shoving her gloves in her bag, and obediently held out her own fingers for testing. She only stared with wide eyes as the atroquinine spray did its work, confirming with its blue tinge that the poison coated her nails as much as her brother's.

Apollo's heart was pounding in his ears as he stared at the spread before him of nails painted blue. Never before had anything, let alone a simple colour, scared him so much, shaken him so thoroughly to his core that he almost couldn't move with fear. This was more than Vera's fate, more than Phoenix's reputation; This was the lives of his teenage siblings, two children who should have had nothing to do with this case, who were only here and only in danger because Apollo had put them there... and it was only because of that he was able to stir himself back into action, clumsily shoving the cap back on the spray-bottle in his hand before shoving the whole thing in the bag at his hip, freeing his hands to grip his siblings' wrists. "Ema!"

"Geeze!" came a cry from the other side of the witness stand, where Ema was standing with Klavier, shooting the Wrights an annoyed glare from between the hands on her ears; Even the first aid officials nearby flinched at the sound of Apollo's shriek as they rolled Vera out of the room on her stretcher. "I'm right here, no need to shout!"

Apollo didn't have the time to feel guilty, dragging his siblings across to the witness stand. "Ema! Vera's been poisoned with atroquinine in her nail polish!"
Klavier raised an eyebrow. "Herr Forehead, atroquinine doesn't absorb through the skin, and especially not through nails; It needs to be ingested to work. And who in their right mind eats nail polish?"

"Oh, for goodness' sake, Diva!" Apollo cried, rolling his eyes. "Even you must have noticed Vera bites her nails when she's nervous! She was practically chewing them off during her entire testimony!"

"But how do you know it was atroquinine in her nail polish?" Ema interrupted before Klavier could reply. "She's only just collapsed."

Apollo was shaking so hard he almost couldn't reply for a moment. "Because she's been constantly applying that stuff over the past two days," he explained, feeling like he was about to burst into tears. "And, before the trial, she put that same nail polish on my brother and sister." He shoved forward the hands of Trucy and Machi, whose wrists he still held tightly in his grasp.

Ema and Klavier gasped as they both saw the blue on the teens' fingers. Klavier quietly swore in German, but Ema jumped forward, saying, "Well, that's good enough for me," and giving the two worried teens a smile. "I have some acetone to get all that off; Why don't you two come up to the first aid office with me?"

Trucy gripped Apollo's hand with her free one, giving him a smile that failed to hide her fear. "Polly, you can let go of us now."

Too late, Apollo realised both Trucy and Machi sported pained grimaces, and released his hold on their arms. Immediately, Machi began rubbing his wrist, blinking away tears that were as much the result of fear as pain... or, at least, Apollo hoped that was the case.

Ema stepped forward to guide the young pair towards the doors at the back of the room, where Vera's stretcher had disappeared, and Apollo was moving to follow when a hand suddenly gripped his arm.

"Not you, Herr Forehead."

Everyone paused, looking to Klavier. "Why not!?" Apollo demanded.

"The judge hasn't yet called an end to today's proceedings," the prosecutor pointed out. "Neither of us can leave until then."

As much as he wanted to, Apollo couldn't debate that. "B-but..."

"We'll be okay, Polly," Trucy said, smiling at Apollo strong enough to mask her concern from all but him, then turned to her younger brother. "Won't we, Machi?"

Machi was still cradling his left wrist, looking pale and avoiding eye contact. Regardless, he managed a quick nod.

Trucy turned back to Apollo. "We'll see you later, 'kay?"

Apollo still hated the idea of letting his siblings out of his sight while they were in so much danger, but forced himself to nod. "Mm-hm."

Ema opened her mouth to say something, but reconsidered, giving Apollo only a small smile before returning her attention to Trucy and Machi. "C'mon, kiddos." A hand each on their backs, she guided the pair through the double doors and out of sight.
Although they were gone, Apollo couldn't tear his eyes from the spot where he'd last seen his siblings. He barely registered Klavier's hand loosening its grip on his arm, his mind laser-focused on the well-being of the sister he'd only had for seven years and the brother he'd only had for three months. This wasn't fair. He couldn't lose them, not to something that wasn't even their fault. Why hadn't he stopped them from playing with that nail polish the moment he recognised the bottle? Why hadn't he insisted they stay home, or at least in the gallery, and faced this trial alone? Why hadn't he been enough on his own to protect them?

A banging from behind him jerked Apollo from his thoughts, and he blinked back tears as he spun around to see the judge calling the room to silence from atop his podium, flanked on one side by a bailiff and on the other by a familiar young man in a blue vest and paper-boy cap.

The judge's eyes swept across the room before coming to rest on Apollo and Klavier below, still stood either side of the empty witness stand. "With the defendant on her way to the hospital, I see no way we can continue this trial today," he announced. "We will resume proceedings tomorrow." With a final bang of his gavel, the courtroom was dismissed.

Apollo barely gave the old man a glance, his eyes focussed on his brother, the younger man who was now heading down the stairs at the side of the judge's podium. Waving, he ran for the wooden barrier that blocked off the passage between the bottom of the stairs and the door out the back of the room. "Luke!"

A few steps from the bottom, Luke paused, one hand on the stair railing while the other clutched his laptop securely in the crook of his arm. His eyes quickly found the caped attorney running towards him, and he grimaced. "Apollo, I'm really sorry, I'm not supposed to talk to you until-"

"Until the trial's over, I know," Apollo interrupted, giving his brother a relieved smile. "Why else would Dad have sent you off on another project instead of helping us? I don't blame you for that."

Luke minutely sighed, and managed a small smile. "Thank you."

For a few moments, Apollo could only stare at his younger brother, savouring the knowledge that at least one of his younger siblings was safe, that he hadn't screwed up so badly all three of them had been dragged into danger. He tried to speak, but there was nothing he could really say; He had only just acknowledged the subject of the trial was off-limits, and the weight of the situation made any attempt at small talk feel out of place. He could tell Luke about what had happened to Trucy and Machi, but... where would he even start?

Luke frowned with concern. "Are you okay, Apollo?"

"Y-yeah, I'm fine," Apollo insisted, trying to force a laugh and ending up making a sound more like heavy breathing. "L-listen, um..." He ran a hand through his hair, briefly glancing back at the empty defence bench behind him. "When you next see Dad... Tell him I'm looking after Trucy and Machi no matter what, okay?"

"Well, of course you are," Luke replied, confused. "Why would...?" He paused, eyes widening as he hugged his laptop to his chest. "Apollo, what happened?"

Apollo shook his head, not wanting his brother to worry. "They'll be fine. I'm looking after them." He smiled. "We can tell you all about it once the trial's over." His calm exterior nearly snapped at the thought that, with Vera downed from atroquinine poisoning, the trial might be over already, but he shoved the thought aside, refusing to fall to despair.
Luke stared back at Apollo a few moments before reluctantly nodding, taking the last few steps down to ground level. "A-alright." He paused, clutching his laptop tightly, then shoved the computer under an arm and stepped right up to the barrier. Without a word, he reached over and pulled his brother into a hug, and Apollo didn't hesitate to return it.

The two brothers stood for a long moment clutching each other tightly, then mutually let go and stepped back. Luke forced a smile, then turned and hurried out the nearby door.

Apollo watched his brother disappear in silence, his own smile fading. All that self-assuredness for Luke had just been a front; He still wasn't entirely sure he could keep to his promise that Trucy and Machi would be okay... And that was before bringing Vera or Phoenix into it too. He felt numb, separated from his younger siblings, from his father, from both of his mothers... not even his cousins or best friend was there for him right now. He was all alone.

"Herr Wright?"

Blinking back tears, Apollo glanced at the rapidly emptying room behind him and noticed Klavier watching, only a short distance away; Clearly the prosecutor had followed the younger attorney as he'd hurried to greet his brother.

"Do you know the way to the first aid office?"

Apollo had to think. I'm sure I've seen it on a map of the courthouse... But, which floor is it on? It's near the library, isn't it? Or is that the cafe I'm thinking of? I'm sure I remember something about turning left off the stairs, so... but is that going up or going down?

Apparently his silence was enough of an answer, as Klavier smiled enigmatically. "I will take you there myself. But first..." He gestured to the defence bench, still littered with Apollo's Court Record and case files. "We had better clean up, ja? We are not the only ones using this courtroom today."

Unable to make his mouth move - neither to thank Klavier nor to agree with his statement, both of which he wanted to do - Apollo simply nodded, and moved to collect his things without a word.

View the Court Record
Apollo's arms were tightly crossed as he trudged down the corridor, half a step behind Klavier. He hadn't spoken a word since his discussion with Luke, answering questions with a nod or a shake of his head, and found it hard to summon the energy to be interested in the path they were taking. No matter how much he worried, he was almost certain Trucy and Machi would be okay; His case, on the other hand, was truly a fate that hung precariously in the balance, right along with Vera's and Phoenix's.

As they exited a flight of stairs, Klavier gently cleared his throat. "Herr Wright, if I may... Were you aware beforehand?"

Apollo frowned, his gaze moving from his feet to the man at his side. "Of what?"

Klavier avoided eye contact, shrugging uncomfortably. "Of... Of exactly how deep the rabbit hole went, you could say."

It took a moment, but eventually Apollo realised Klavier was referring to the Mishams, and how intrinsically they were tied to the Gramarye case back in 2019. He almost smiled. "I suspected," he admitted. "A forger, and a letter about a payment dated to the same month and year of that trial? I figured it had to be more than just a co-incidence."

Klavier nodded, his stern eyes still on the path ahead. "I see."

"And you, Prosecutor Gavin?" Apollo found himself asking. "I've read my dad's notes enough times that I thought 'Misham' was a familiar name. Did you not recognise them at all?"

The prosecutor sighed. "It has been seven years, Herr Wright," he pointed out. "I have made no such efforts to keep the lowest point of my career in my memory."

Apollo watched the older man in shock, almost stopping in his tracks; Klavier Gavin, openly admitting the Gramarye case was a low point of his past? Was... Was he dreaming!?

"Once I have refreshed said memory and court reconvenes tomorrow..." Klavier shook his head, expression distant. "I must admit, I would appreciate finally knowing for sure what happened."

It took Apollo a moment to get over his surprise to register the comment, and he nodded in agreement. "If it helps... my grandfather committed suicide."

Klavier stopped walking, bringing the pair to a halt, and finally turned to look at the younger man with a raised eyebrow. "Excuse me?"

"My grandfather; He shot himself," Apollo repeated. When Klavier's confused expression didn't change, he realised what the prosecutor's actual question was and smiled. "My biological grandfather, Prosecutor Gavin. Magnifi Gramarye?"

Klavier's eyes widened. "Your...?" He then frowned, irritated, and looked away, hurriedly heading Apollo laughed as he followed. "You didn't know that? I'm Trucy's older brother, I perform with her onstage, and you didn't realise we're the only two people in the Wright family who are biologically related?"

"Your family dynamics aren't nearly as obvious as you think they are, Herr Forehead," Klavier shot back, flicking at his hair. "Besides, however you believe your grandfather died, there isn't any evidence either way."

"True," Apollo admitted, shrugging. "I mean, not even Dad trusts Valant's word... but it's not like we have a legal way of asking Zak anymore. Or Grandpa Magnifi, either."

Klavier frowned in thought. "If the dead could talk, my job would be a lot easier," he mused aloud.

Apollo stared at the side of Klavier's face for a long moment. "The only reason they don't talk is because no-one asks them to, Prosecutor Gavin... and there's a very good reason for that."

The older man paused only half a second, looking back at Apollo curiously. "You speak of the infamous DL-6 Incident, I assume?"

Although surprised, Apollo nodded. "Yeah... You know about it?"

"Every budding attorney at the time did," Klavier replied, smirking. "A case as strange as that, with a prosecutor as famous as Miles Edgeworth wrapped up in it, unexpectedly solved in the middle of a separate murder case on the day its statute of limitations was up? It was the talk of Themis Academy for months."

Apollo softly laughed, shaking his head. "Good point... Although," he grinned proudly, "you don't know the full story until you've heard it from both my mom and dad and my Uncle Edgew-..." He paused, eyes widening as he spotted a door ahead of them, a nondescript sign hanging nonchalantly at its side.

'First Aid Office'.

Not wanting to waste a single moment, Apollo ran for the door, any thoughts of the previous conversation dismissed for a fresh wave of concern for his youngest siblings. The door didn't immediately budge as he landed against it, forcing Apollo to fumble with the handle for a few moments before finally pushing through into the office within.

The room wasn't all that big, just enough for three beds wrapped in white blankets and a plain desk littered with paper. Sitting on two of the beds, facing each other, were Trucy and Machi, Ema stood between them. They all looked up at the sound of the door opening, but had no time to react as Apollo was already running to meet them.

"Trucy! Machi!"

"Polly!"

"Isoveli!"

The teens had just enough time to get to their feet, and Ema enough time to jump to one side, before Apollo was upon them, pulling his siblings into a hug. "Oh, please tell me you two are okay!"

"Of course we are!" Trucy laughed, returning her eldest brother's hug. "You don't need to cry,
"Polly!"

"I'm not crying!" Apollo insisted through a sob, wiping his eyes.

Machi patted Apollo's back under his cape. "There there, isoveli."

"We've removed all traces of atroquinine from their hands," Ema explained from behind Apollo. "I'd suggest keeping a close eye on them for another ten to fifteen minutes just in case, but I don't think any of it got into their systems."

Apollo just nodded, hugging his siblings tighter. He was afraid he'd start sobbing again if he opened his mouth, and was having enough trouble keeping the tears from spilling down his cheeks.

"Have you heard anything on the defendant?" came Klavier's voice, followed by the gentle closing of the door.

There was a short pause; Apollo assumed Ema shook her head. "She'll still be on her way to the hospital," the detective explained. "I told them she's been hit with atroquinine though, and I'm sure they'd let us know immediately if she'd... you know."

"So she's still alive," Klavier sighed. "A small comfort, but at least it's something."

Apollo gave his siblings one last squeeze, then pulled back out of the hug, keeping his attention on them. "You're sure you're fine?"

Trucy groaned in exaggerated frustration. "Duh!"

Machi giggled, nodding. "We are fine, isoveli."

"Good," Apollo replied, giving them a watery smile. "I'd hate to break my promise to Dad and Luke." He pulled them into another brief hug out of pure relief.

"Um... I have question," Machi meekly said as they pulled away for a second time. "Before we left... You ask Vera about other trial?"

Apollo glanced behind him, where Klavier and Ema stood silently watching, their expressions betraying nothing. "Yeah," he told his brother. "You're... asking for more details, aren't you?"

Machi nodded. "Way you ask her... It sound important."

Trying not to wince, Apollo nodded. "It is." At their side, he noticed Trucy was solemnly avoiding eye contact, and couldn't blame her. Sighing, he returned his attention to his brother. "It's a long story, Machi."

"Okay." Machi promptly turned and sat down on the edge of the nearest bed, watching Apollo expectantly. "Ema said have ten minutes."

Ema looked at the pink watch on her wrist. "Closer to five now," she said, "but go ahead. I'm very curious to hear this."

Apollo tried not to grumble under both Ema's and Machi's expectant gazes, but, with nothing to distract them with, decided to just give in to their demands. Reluctantly, he moved to sit at his brother's side, and Trucy followed, sandwiching Apollo between his youngest siblings. "Seven years ago, there was this really important trial about to happen," Apollo explained. "The victim and defendant were both world-famous celebrities, so there was an awful lot of people watching." He paused, frowning in thought. "In a way, the prosecutor and defence attorney were celebrities, too. There weren't many people not watching this thing."

Out of the corner of his eye, Apollo noticed Klavier shuffle uncomfortably, looking away.

"Before the trial, someone asked Vera to make a fake page from the victim's diary," Apollo continued. "They then slipped the page to the defence attorney... and Vera's work was so good, the attorney thought it was real, and presented it in the trial." He screwed his eyes shut, minutely sighing. "But it wasn't. And the prosecution already knew that."

"How?" Machi asked, and Apollo opened his eyes to see the teen's head cocked to one side curiously. "Did Vera's client tell them?" He then gasped. "Was prosecution Vera's client?"

The attorney glanced at Klavier, but the prosecutor was frowning to himself, thoughts unreadable. "I can't say," Apollo admitted to his brother. "All I know is that the prosecutor called out the forgery the very instant it appeared; He said someone had warned him, and put him in touch with Vera's father. The defence attorney immediately lost his case, and, because everyone thought he was Vera's client, he lost his badge too." His own hand moved to the attorney's badge on his vest, an idea forming in his mind of how much it would hurt to lose it. "Instead of waiting to be declared guilty, the defendant simply vanished into thin air, and ran away. The police never found him, and no-one ever heard from him again. The victim's murder is unsolved to this day."

Machi's eyes were wide as he listened. "That sound awful," he sympathised, then frowned in thought. "So... You ask Vera who client was, and attorney is innocent... and then defendant come back? Have fair trial?"

Apollo winced. "I'm afraid this defendant won't be coming back, Machi. He's been gone too long; He's dead."

"Possible he still come back," Machi insisted. "Like Trucy's father. He is also disappeared and 'dead'."

"Machi, my daddy's not coming back," Trucy suddenly spoke up, glaring at the floor. There was a harsh tone to her voice that slowly faded as she continued, "Whether they solve Grandpa Magnifi's death or not... Daddy isn't coming back."

Apollo wordlessly wrapped an arm behind his sister, holding her close to his side.

Machi just looked confused. "Wait... You are saying-?"

"You're Magnifi Gramarye's granddaughter!?" Ema cried from across the room, one hand pressed to her cheek as she stared at Trucy with wide eyes. Next to her, Klavier was giving the detective an incredulous look. "Are you kidding me!?!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Did you seriously not know? We call ourselves 'Gramarye' and everything."

"What!?" Ema shot back, glaring. "Of course you don't! You're the Wrights! You've always called yourselves that!"

"Only since we got adopted!" Apollo pointed out, crossing his arms. "Before that, our family name was-!" He paused, thinking. "Well, technically, we were 'Enigmar' and 'Justice' respectively, but..."

Trucy got to her feet, watching Ema carefully. "Our mommy's name is Gramarye," she explained. "We perform with her name, like my daddy did, because she and Grandpa Magnifi were magicians too." She briefly gestured to Apollo with her head. "Just like how we use our daddy's name for Polly's lawyer stuff because Daddy was a lawyer..." Her eyes turned down to the floor. "At least, he was until Grandpa Magnifi died, anyway..."

Ema was staring at the pair with wide eyes. Apollo didn't doubt she believed them now.

"I don't understand," Machi quietly said from his seat at Apollo's side, looking worried. "Defendant in trial was Trucy's father? And attorney was Isa?"

Apollo nodded with a sigh. "You'd recognise the name of the prosecutor, too." Without any further word, he turned his gaze beyond his brother, to the man standing at Ema's side.

Klavier didn't react, his eyes on the nearby wall and arms crossed.

Machi only gasped, staring at the man with wide eyes. "M-mister Prosecutor...?"

"He speaks the truth," Klavier muttered, making a show of nonchalantly brushing his hair from his face. "That was my very first trial, against the famous Phoenix Wright, to solve the murder of the even more famous Magnifi Gramarye... and his apprentice Zak Gramarye was the one on trial. Much like Miss Misham's, his should have been a very simple case." He shook his head, still looking away. "Alas, it was not to be."

Machi leaned against Apollo, and the young lawyer was quick to pull him into a half-hug. With his other hand, he reached out to take his sister's grip in his.

The room rang silent for a long time.
The opening door interrupted the quiet contemplation of the five people within, who all looked up to see one, then two figures appear in the doorway; One wore a blue vest and cap, while the other was in a grey hoodie and cyan beanie.

"Trucy! Machi!" Luke cried, dashing inside without pause towards his siblings; Much like they had with Apollo, the teens both smiled at him, Machi getting to his feet and giving Luke a hug as the vet arrived at their side. "We were so worried about you!"

Trucy giggled, removing the hand Luke had placed on her shoulder to pat it sympathetically. "Don't you worry about us, Luke; We're fine, just like you and Polly are always saying!" She reached into her bag and pulled out the small bottle of atroquinine spray, which she pressed into Luke's hand so the young vet could examine it himself. "See, we even used the poison detecting spray, so we know for sure there's not a drop left on us!"

Machi nodded, stepping back to give their worried brother a grin, assuring him, "We okay, Luke. Isoveli is look after us."

"Oh, yes, I know that," Luke hurriedly replied, giving Apollo an embarrassed look as he held the small spray-bottle close to his chest.

Apollo just laughed.

Phoenix closed the door as he entered the room, giving his children a warm smile. "We're just glad to see you all in good spirits. Can't let you two get yourselves killed before your mother gets back, can we?"

Trucy and Machi giggled, shaking their heads. Luke bit his lip, badly hiding a grin.

Ema waved at the older man as he approached. "Mister Wright! You got my message?"

"I did; Thank you Ema," Phoenix replied, giving her a grateful nod. He walked slightly past her and Klavier, standing at the end of the beds his children were arranged between. "You've all done very well today. That was very kind of you to try and look after your client the way you did, Machi."

Machi blushed. "Thank you, Isa."

"And I did a good job helping out Polly, right Daddy?" Trucy asked, giving their father a bright and innocent grin.

"Oh, of course," Phoenix readily replied, playing along with her blatant fishing for compliments. "I'm sure he appreciated the help. Didn't you, Apollo?"

Apollo frowned, deep in thought. Slowly, he slid off the bed and got to his feet, eyes on Phoenix. "It would have been a lot easier if you'd given me more information from the start, Dad."
Phoenix's smile faded a little. "Now now, the whole point of this was no preconceptions," he reminded his son.

"Yes, I get that," Apollo replied, holding up a hand, "really, I do... but, did you honestly think I wouldn't notice a certain case file of yours has gone missing?" He rested his hands by his sides, curled into angry fists. "I would have recognised who Vera was a lot quicker if you hadn't gone and hidden it."

Phoenix closed his eyes, expression unreadable. At Apollo's sides, his two youngest siblings were looking uncomfortable (though not nearly as much as Klavier had been since Phoenix's arrival), while Luke had scrunched up his shoulders, staring guiltily at the floor; Ema simply watched with a curious look, saying nothing.

"If I'd known who she was sooner," Apollo continued, "I might have realised there was something up with her nail polish, and managed to keep her from putting it all over her hands and..." He paused, unsure how to mention her current condition considering how up in the air it was right now. "This case would be solved already. What if Vera doesn't recover before telling us what she knows?"

Finally, Phoenix responded: "This trial is my responsibility, no matter what happens." He looked up, giving his eldest a stern look. "It's my job to worry about it. You just focus on your case."

"If Vera dies, I won't have a case to focus on!" Apollo pointed out with a frustrated wave of his arm. Regardless, he gave up on the topic with a sigh. "At least tell me where you hid the Gramarye case file, Dad. If Vera survives... I'm gonna need it for tomorrow."

Phoenix looked away, deep in thought... and Apollo didn't miss how his father's eyes briefly rested on Klavier, who was still pressed uncomfortably against the wall as he watched the conversation. "I'd suggest heading to the archives before you leave the courthouse today," Phoenix suggested, his gaze somewhere between the young attorney and prosecutor. "They have video records there; Argue your case well enough, and they'll give you a copy of Zak Gramarye's trial to watch. Unlike the public transcripts, those things aren't censored."

"Video...?" Trucy quietly repeated, shocked. Luke, standing at her side, slipped the bottle in his hand into a pocket and wrapped his arm around his sister's back in a half-hug.

"And what would I have to gain, doing that?" Klavier asked through a pained grimace, one hand in his hair. "Who would want to relive such a horrid trial?"

Phoenix finally turned to face the prosecutor, his expression unchanged. "As I recall, you didn't think it was quite so 'horrid' at the time."

Klavier flinched at that, looking away.

But Phoenix wasn't done, continuing in a gentle voice, "The change of perspective alone might show you something new."

Surprised, Klavier looked up again, meeting Phoenix's eyes.

Without waiting for any kind of response to his unexpected advice for the young prosecutor, Phoenix turned back towards Apollo. Until now, his hands had been firmly stuck in the pockets of his hoodie, but he finally removed them, emerging with a familiar case file that he held out for Apollo to take. "State versus Shadi Enigmar, as requested."

Eyes wide, Apollo quickly took the offered file, bulging with all the handwritten notes and much-examined court documents that he had read countless times over the years... the same case file he had always been told was never to be removed from the office under any circumstances. "Th... Thank you."

"Good luck tomorrow," Phoenix said, then gave Klavier one final look. "Both of you." With that, he turned and began to leave, beckoning over one shoulder. "Luke, we have work to do."

"C-coming, Papa!" Luke called, then quickly gave his siblings one last smile. "We'll see you after the trial. I know you'll do great!" As Apollo, Trucy and Machi watched, the vet hurried off after their father, disappearing into the hallway. The door closed behind them with an almost ominous click.

Apollo stared at the mass of papers in his hands. As upset as he'd been at Phoenix, it was still a little shocking to just be handed the missing case file and watch his father immediately walk out again. There hadn't even been an apology for keeping information from them, or for the fact that doing so may have led to Vera's current situation and Trucy and Machi's near-brush with death themselves... but Apollo's attempt to blame Phoenix for that was just a distraction from blaming himself, and he knew that. Sighing, he turned his gaze off to one side, away from the others. Maybe an apology was in order when he saw his father next.

Trucy pouted at her eldest brother. "You seriously need to stop fighting with Daddy."

Apollo gave his sister an incredulous look. "Dad seriously needs to stop sabotaging his own efforts to clear his name!"

Machi had instead turned to Ema. "We are safe to go now?"

"Oh, sure," Ema replied, glancing at her watch. "If you'd been poisoned, we'd definitely know by now."

"Good." Machi nodded, then turned to his siblings. "We go get video like Isa said?"

Apollo sighed, hugging the case file to his chest. "Yeah, I guess we should. I must admit, a video of that trial would be interesting to see... I didn't even know there was one."

"Every trial is recorded," Klavier explained, his expression still distant. "The recordings are kept under secure lock and key however; Only those who can prove they need access to a specific trial tape are permitted it."

Apollo remembered Phoenix's instruction to 'argue their case well enough' and realised what it meant. Any hopes he'd be able to pull it off were conflicting with the new knowledge that all three of his previous trials existed as video files somewhere in the building, and he had to resist the urge to ask for access to them too, purely to see how well he'd performed in the past.

"What about Vera?" Trucy asked, concerned. "Will she be okay?"

There was a short silence as everyone mused on the impossible question. Finally, Ema stepped forward. "Apollo, I don't have your number, do I?"

Apollo thought a moment, then shook his head. "No, I don't think so. Why?"

"I'll keep you updated on anything I hear about the defendant," the detective promised, holding out her hand. "I'm guessing Mister Wright wouldn't be able to pass that on if I just told him, huh?"

"N-no, he wouldn't," Apollo muttered in agreement, pulling out his phone. He quickly navigated to display his phone number, then handed it over.
In the resulting silence, Machi turned to Trucy, stood next to him. "I not wear this outfit tomorrow."

"Why not!?" Trucy demanded. "You look cute!"

"It unlucky," Machi muttered. "People try kill me when I wear it."

Trucy whined. "Aw, but... But you still have to wear it for Mommy when she gets back!"

"He doesn't have to wear it if he doesn't want to," Apollo sternly told his sister. "Mom has pictures to look at... and we still have that video from the concert, remember?"

The teen huffed. "It's not the same..." she sighed. Instead of arguing further, she reached into her bag and pulled out her gloves, which she busied herself putting back on her hands.

Ema finished copying Apollo's number, returning his phone. "I'll let you know the moment I hear anything."

"Thanks," Apollo replied, giving her a grateful nod.

"I trust that counts for me too, Fraulein Detective," Klavier said, managing a small smile Ema's way.

Ema's open expression instantly hardened, shooting the prosecutor a glare. "Sure."

Klavier just laughed, passing Ema and heading to the door. "Well, I had best head to the archives then. Until tomorrow, Herr Wright." He waved over his shoulder.

"Until then, Prosecutor Gavin," Apollo replied.

The door closed with a click.

Apollo suspected it was going to be a very tense twenty-or-so hours until court resumed tomorrow.

View the Court Record
A loud gasp rang through the room as they saw Vera collapsing on the live feed from the courtroom. Phoenix, sat at his small table next to the screen, stared with wide eyes, putting down his Court Record in shock. Across the room, at his own small desk opposite the larger table with the six jurists, Luke leapt from his workstation, slamming his laptop closed with a clatter.

"Papa, I can go check on her if you need me to!"

Phoenix shook his head, getting to his feet and circling the table to approach his son. "We'll learn her condition faster through the live feed... but there is something I'd like the judge to know."

Luke nodded, a determined frown on his face. "You can count on me!"

The young man had dashed off with his message only moments before a new development came to light in the chaotic courtroom:

"Ema!"

"Geeze! I'm right here, no need to shout!"

"Ema! Vera's been poisoned with atroquinine in her nail polish!"

"Herr Forehead, atroquinine doesn't absorb through the skin, and especially not through nails; It needs to be ingested to work. And who in their right mind eats nail polish?"

"Oh, for goodness' sake, Diva! Even you must have noticed Vera bites her nails when she's nervous! She was practically chewing them off during her entire testimony!"

"But how do you know it was atroquinine in her nail polish? She's only just collapsed."

"Because she's been constantly applying that stuff over the past two days, and, before the trial, she put that same nail polish on my brother and sister."

Phoenix's heart skipped a beat as he listened to the words coming through the microphone on the witness stand. He didn't need to be able to see Apollo's pale face to know how panicked he was, how scared Trucy and Machi were as they huddled at their eldest brother's side. Phoenix felt trapped, unable to leave thanks to his duties as chair, incapable of doing anything but simply watch the unfolding situation on the screen as Ema hurried the two teens out of the room after Vera, leaving a reluctant Apollo behind.

"Mister Wright?"

The voice of the nearest jurist - Number 5 if he remembered correctly - shocked Phoenix back into the chamber, and he turned to face the young man; Despite his best efforts, he couldn't effectively bluff a calm exterior. "D-don't worry, I'm sure they'll be alright..."

A worried look crossed Jurist 5's face, but he quickly gave Phoenix a grin. "Hey, of course they'll be fine! They've got 'Pollo, right?"

The assurances didn't do much for Phoenix's brewing panic, but he forced an appreciative smile regardless. "Right." Getting back to business, he headed back towards the screen, on the other end of the table.

The judge was banging his gavel to attract the court's attention, and Phoenix didn't miss the unmistakable figure of his middle son at the man's side.

"With the defendant on her way to the hospital, I see no way we can continue this trial today. We will resume proceedings tomorrow."

"Luke!"

On the screen, Apollo was running to meet his brother, Klavier at his back, while the judge simply left the courtroom. With the trial dismissed, Phoenix shakily ran back to where he'd left his Court Record, and cut off the live feed. Behind him, a good chunk of his jurists were already talking.

"Mister Wright, what's going on?"

"Is the trial over...?"

"Phoenix, are you okay?"

Spinning around, Phoenix held up a hand to silence them, trying not to snap, "I'm not a judge, so I don't call for order!" That seemed to be enough to silence them, though he still felt guilty for being unable to completely hide his fear. Sighing, he ran a hand down his face, forcing himself to calm down. "The trial is over for today. We're going to have to ask you to come back tomorrow."

Next to Jurist 5, a blonde woman - Jurist Number 4, if Phoenix remembered right - placed a hand to her mouth, eyes wide. "Tomorrow? But..."

"I've said from the start that this trial would probably extend to two or three days, so you can't say you weren't warned," Phoenix continued, standing at the head of the table to stare down at the six jurists sat before him.

"Adrian has a point, though," Jurist Number 3, sitting opposite Jurist 5, spoke up, getting to her feet and giving Phoenix a concerned look. "We just heard the defendant's been poisoned. It's been made abundantly clear today how virulent atroquinine is. And..." She paused, adjusting her glasses. "We all have personal investments in the safety of the kids, too."

Phoenix bit back any kind of emotional response. He wasn't here as these people's friend, or a lawyer, or even as a father; He was here as the Chair of the Jurist System Simulated Court Committee. As much as it hurt to be cold and brush aside the very real fear of what might happen to Vera, Trucy and Machi, he was going to have to in order to do his job. It wasn't like there was anyone else to pick up the pieces if he failed.
To Phoenix's surprise, the woman on his immediate left - Jurist Number 1 herself - got to her feet and gave the table a stern look. "Well, obviously, the Committee will be in touch if anything changes before trial resumes tomorrow." She turned her stare on the woman opposite - Jurist Number 6 - then to Phoenix. "And the kids will be just fine. Won't they?"

Jurist 6 quietly squeaked, a hand pressed to her mouth as she blinked back tears. She mutely nodded.

The sound of Jurist 1's voice alone nearly broke Phoenix's resolve, but he managed to keep himself together for her sake, choking out, "Yes. That. Exactly."

Although they were still uncertain, finally the jurists agreed to end the trial for the day and slowly began to file out of the room. Phoenix lagged behind, struggling to hold on to his professionalism despite, finally, putting his job aside for now. Sat at his small table in the corner, he pretended not to watch how Jurist 6 remained in her seat out of lingering shock, or Jurist 1 quietly talking with her neighbour, Jurist 2.

"You go meet up with Pearly and I'll catch up at the hotel later, okay?" She continued to talk, her voice quavering. "Alright, Mystic Maya. You'll... let us know if anything happens, won't you?"

"Of course. I'll see you later."

Jurists 3 and 4 had a much quieter discussion at the other end of the table, then Jurist 3 dashed to Phoenix's side. "You promise you'll keep us updated, Mister Wright?"

Phoenix forced a wry smile. "Don't you have a baby to get home to and a husband to rescue, Missus Gumshoe?"

Maggey rolled her eyes, then sighed. "I'm just saying, as a mother... I know how much it'd hurt if something like that happened to Felicia. Look after yourself, okay?"

Phoenix's smile turned genuine, and he nodded. "Of course."

With a final warm look, Maggey dashed back to where Adrian was waiting, and the pair left the room together. Iris wasn't far behind them, shooting Phoenix a worried look over her shoulder.

Instead of following the women, Clay stubbornly headed to Phoenix's table. "Mister Wright, you're going to visit Truce and Machi after this, right?"

"Naturally!" Maya cut in, standing tall next to her seat with arms crossed. "We've gotta check they're okay, don't we?"

"We?" Phoenix repeated with a raised eyebrow, getting to his feet. "Maya, there's no 'we'; You're supposed to be busy up in Kurain, remember?"

Maya huffed, hands on her hips. "I'm not lying to them, Nick!"

"I'm not asking you to lie to them," Phoenix retorted. "Just stay away like you're supposed to, and they'll draw their own conclusions."

"Wh-!? Draw their own conclusions!?!" Maya repeated indignantly, cheeks puffing out in anger. "What, that I don't love them enough to be there when they need me!?!"

Phoenix hurriedly shook his head, holding up his hands in surrender. "No, no, of course not! Why would they have any reason to think that when they don't even know you know what happened!?!"
"But I do know what happened!"

"And they can't be allowed to know that!"

"So you're going to go in there and lie on my behalf!?"

"Maya, the topic of what you're doing isn't even going to come up!"

Maya was opening her mouth to shout something colourful in reply when a high-pitched series of beeps cut her off, and she paused in confusion. "Is that...?"

Phoenix didn't hesitate to pull out his phone, checking it quickly before sighing in relief. "It's a text from Ema," he explained. "Trucy and Machi are in the clear. They're safe."

Everyone else in the room visibly wilted in relief, and none more so than Thalassa, who dropped her face to the table in front of her with a sob. "Oh, thank goodness! If something had happened to them, I..."

Her anger gone, Maya rushed to the older woman's side, crouching down to give her a somewhat awkward side-hug. "Don't worry, Thalassa; Those two have an awful lot of people looking out for them. There's no way they won't survive to see you on Saturday."

Phoenix nodded, leaning on the table to be a little closer to Thalassa's eye line. "Maya's right. In fact, I'll head down to check on them myself; You can trust I'd made sure they're okay, can't you?"

There was a short pause, then Thalassa nodded.

"Actually... I think I get it now."

Phoenix turned around, Maya and Thalassa also looking up to fix Clay with a curious stare. "Get what?"

"Why we can't visit Truce and Machi," Clay explained, and shrugged. "We're jurists. Checking on them would be talking about the case, and talking about the case is grounds for ineligibility, so we'd need to be replaced, and the trial would be invalid, and 'Pollo would have to do all of that all over again..."

Phoenix thought a second or two, then nodded. Clay's conclusion wasn't entirely correct, but it was close enough. "More or less. It's safer you three stay away for now, and maintain no contact."

It was at that exact moment the door was thrown open and Luke jumped in with a panicked look. "Papa, I think something's happened to Trucy and Machi!" He skidded forward enough from pure momentum that the door closed behind him, and was talking again in a rush before anyone could interrupt. "I ran into Apollo in the courtroom and I swear we didn't talk about anything but he was acting strange and said something about looking after Trucy and Machi so I think something bad has happened to them!"

There was a long pause as the four people in the room stared back at the slightly panicked vet, before, finally, Luke looked around the room, rubbing the back of his head.

"Did... Did I miss something?"
As they headed down the courthouse's long corridors back towards the room set aside as the Jurists' Chambers, not half an hour since they left, Phoenix remained silent. All in all, he was glad he'd decided to take Ema up on her offer to personally check on Trucy and Machi, even if it had led to the blow-up with Apollo. In the end, he'd been given the perfect opportunity to impart some advice on both his eldest son and young Klavier, and had handed over the Gramarye case file as he'd been intending to do anyway. He was pretty sure he could trust the young attorneys to do the right thing when court resumed tomorrow.

If court resumed tomorrow.

"Apollo didn't mean any of that," Luke said, keeping pace at his father's left. "He was just upset because Trucy and Machi were in danger."

"No, he had a point," Phoenix muttered. "If I'd known that stamp or that nail polish had been poisoned... I could have stopped both of the Mishams from being hurt years ago."

Phoenix just sighed, his eyes on the floor ahead of his feet.

"And even Apollo understands the reasons for your 'no preconceptions' rule," Luke continued. "He knows you couldn't have broken that for him. Like I said, he was just upset. And Trucy and Machi are fine, so it all turned out okay, didn't it?"

"You're forgetting someone there," Phoenix reminded his son with a hollow smile.

Luke frowned, opening his mouth to ask who... only to suddenly remember and close it again with a blush. "Oh... B-but, I'm sure Vera will be fine too. She has to be."

Phoenix didn't speak. He couldn't think of anything positive to say in return.

Luke dejectedly moved his hands into his pockets, only to suddenly cry out in shock. "I completely forgot!" He pulled out a small spray bottle, which he showed to Phoenix. "The poison detection spray! I was going to give this back to Trucy!"

Phoenix frowned in thought, then held out a hand. "It probably belongs to Ema. I'll get it back to her."

Luke nodded gratefully and handed the object over. "I hope they were done with it back there..."

"I'm sure they were," Phoenix assured him, slipping the bottle into a pocket.

Their destination, the re-purposed room serving at the Jurists' Chambers, was right around the corner.

View the Court Record
The first of the group outside the Jurists' Chambers to look up as Phoenix and Luke came into sight was Thalassa. Blinking back tears, she ran to meet the pair, hands tightly clutched together. Predictably, the first words out of her mouth were, "Are they alright?"

Luke immediately smiled and tipped his cap like a true gentleman. "Of course they are, Missus Gramarye. Apollo's looking after them, just like he promised."

Thalassa sighed in relief, then chuckled at the young man. "Luke, please... You may call me Thalassa."

Before Luke could do more than blush in reply, Clay arrived on the scene with a "WHOOP!", crashing into the young vet and throwing his arms around his friend's neck. "I knew our 'Pollo would pull through! He's, like, a genius at this law stuff, right?"

"Clay-!" Luke choked, pulling at the astronaut's arms. "Careful, please!"

Phoenix snorted, shaking his head. "As proud as I am of him, Apollo's no genius, not yet."

"Very true." Edgeworth pushed his glasses up his nose as he joined the group, Maya at his side. "He needs another year or two of experience before he can hope to reach that level."

"And obviously he will," Maya boasted, heading straight to Phoenix's side, the pair automatically pressing their arms against each other's backs. "He's all set to take after his dad, right, Nick?"

Phoenix laughed. "Oh, naturally. Better than me, if he keeps a good eye on his evidence."

"I don't know very much about law," Thalassa said, a faraway smile on her face, "but Apollo seems very good at his job to me."

Edgeworth nodded. "Speaking of, its time we made said job, and the jobs of everyone else in that courtroom, easier." He reached into a pocket, pulling out a small memory stick. "Once I heard what happened, I took the liberty of procuring the video recording of a certain case whose connection to this one has just come to light." He held it out for his friend to take. "I trust you don't mind, Wright."

"Ah, I did wonder what you were doing here, Edgeworth," Phoenix gently teased his friend, reaching forward to take the small item, which he quickly placed in a pocket. "Thanks, though. We'll need it to use the Mason System effectively."

"The what system?" Clay asked, face contorted in confusion as he continued to lean heavily on Luke.

"The Mason System," Luke explained, pointing a finger into the air with a knowing smile. "It's a new program we're putting together to help Jurists go over past cases and even follow prosecutors and defence attorneys on recreations of their investigations!"
Clay’s eyebrows shot up, impressed. "Huh. That actually sounds kinda cool."

Phoenix huffed, pretending to be offended. "Kinda?"

"Is it not ready?" Thalassa asked.

"Not yet," Luke admitted with a bashful grimace. "I should have it ready this afternoon, though."

Maya cooed in excitement. "Will we get to play with it, then?"

"We'll see," Phoenix replied, and turned to Luke with a serious look. "I'm afraid you might end up with an entire extra section to program, Luke; I have some people to see today."

"Oh?" Edgeworth asked, eyebrow raised. "I hope you know what you're doing, Wright."

Phoenix scoffed, waving his free hand. "Please. I always know what I'm doing."

"Past experience with you says otherwise," Edgeworth replied, a small smile on his lips. "Regardless, I have other things to attend to, so I must be going. Keep me informed, Wright." With that, he stepped around the group and continued down the hallway behind them.

"Talk to you later, Edgeworth," Phoenix promised, giving his friend a wave.

Luke sighed, crossing his arms. "I hope this isn't too much more you plan to add, Papa... I'm only just finishing up what you already gave me!"

"It doesn't need to be too complicated," Phoenix assured him. "I'll be quick, then we can write it out together, huh?"

"Alright," Luke quietly replied, looking away in a poor attempt to hide the concern still written across his face.

"Hey, cheer up, dude," Clay told his friend with a grin. "Even if it's unfinished, this program of yours is gonna be awesome to play with!" He paused, frowning. "When are we going to play with it?"

"Hopefully, before the trial tomorrow," Phoenix replied, then gave the two women apologetic looks. "I'm afraid I'll have to hammer out the details later; For now, you three should really get back to the hotel."

Maya sighed, pouting. "If we have to."

Thalassa nodded. "We'll wait for news, then." She turned to the younger men. "It was... Clay, wasn't it?"

"That's me, Missus Gramarye!" Clay chirped, a hand adjusting his visor. He giggled at the back of his throat, nudging Luke. "And you two say I can't keep secrets; 'Pollo isn't hearing this one from me!"

"That's because you're literally not talking to him until after the trial," Luke pointed out with a wry smile.

Thalassa hid a laugh behind a hand. "Clay. I hope we will have more of a chance to talk while we wait for tomorrow."
"Oh, sure!" Clay happily agreed, his arm finally falling from around Luke's neck. "That sounds awesome!"

Maya gave an exaggerated sigh, pressing tighter against Phoenix. "Well, if we have to go, I guess we gotta..."

Phoenix smiled and nodded. "Yup. We'll see you tomorrow."

Maya huffed. "You're such a slave-driver, Nick." Ignoring Phoenix's laughter, she pushed away from him and beckoned Thalassa and Clay, heading off down the hallway. "C'mon, we have a hotel to get to." She paused only to shoot a wave over her shoulder. "See you tomorrow, Luke."

"Bye, Maya!" Luke called, waving back. "Until tomorrow!"

Thalassa shot the Wrights a friendly smile, then moved to follow Maya.

Clay giggled as the women left, elbowing Luke and whispering, "I am so gonna get all the dirt on baby 'Pollo!"

Luke rolled his eyes, pushing his friend away and hiding his own smile. "I'll see you tomorrow, Clay."

The young astronaut laughed as he ran to join Maya and Thalassa, and the trio soon disappeared around a corner.

With the Wrights left alone, Phoenix turned to face his son. "We'd better get going too; We've both got work to do."

Luke sighed and nodded. "Yeah. I'll try and keep in mind we're adding stuff later... Leave options open to add in whatever you bring back."

"Good idea." Phoenix rested a hand on Luke's shoulder, then began a slow walk down the hallway. "They can fit in with the Zak scene. Split the entire thing into 'past' and 'present'."

"Mm." There was a short pause, then Luke looked up, his eyes on the round badge sitting above Phoenix's left eye. "How long does that typically take to download footage?"

Phoenix shrugged. "I don't babysit it," he admitted, then shot his son a grin. "Your computer might even do the job quicker! Can't exactly drop by the office today, can we?"

At that, Phoenix finally chuckled. "Yeah, I guess so." The smile died. "I hope the others will be okay... I don't think we ever told Machi any details about how you used to be a lawyer, and Apollo seemed really upset about... you know. I bet it was a shock to Trucy to discover this all tied in to her father and grandfather's deaths, too."

"They'll be alright." Phoenix moved to pull Luke into a half-hug. "They've got each other. And it's only temporary; Once Apollo wraps this up tomorrow, we can talk it all out as a family."

"If it doesn't take him another day," Luke mumbled. "If Vera even survives long enough for this trial to end."

At that, Phoenix laughed. "Now what was it you were saying to me literally ten minutes ago? 'Vera will be fine'?"

Luke's face turned red, and he looked away. "I-I'm sure she..." he mumbled, then scrunched up his face and firmly shook his head. "I'm fine! Apollo's fine! The trial's fine! Vera will be fine, too!"

"That's the spirit!" Phoenix cried, hugging his son closer. "All that shouting you boys love to do!"

"Chords of Steel, Papa!" Luke proudly reminded him, a smile finally back on his face. "Never leave home without them!"

With that, the pair left the courthouse, happy for the brief moment in each other's company.

"Ah, Mister Wright, I'm glad you picked up!"

"Do you have news?"

"Yes, actually: We've received word from the hospital."

"... And?"

"The dosage was just under lethal. She's alive, but unconscious, in intensive care... and not to be disturbed for any reason."

"..."

"Mister Wright?"

"Thank you, Ema. Be sure to tell Apollo and Prosecutor Gavin, will you?"

"Of course... and the trial?"

"I'll work it out... I always work it out."

It's been a long seven years since I carried an attorney's badge. The world has moved on. Laws have changed. A new generation is stepping forward, finding their place, doing the job I couldn't... and Apollo will be just brilliant one day, I know it. But, that leaves me with one very important question:

... Am I even meant to pick up a badge again?
Phoenix self-consciously adjusted his beanie as the security guard led him through the prison hallway. Before today, he'd only ever done visits to prisoners in the jail attached to the detention centre. To be in an actual, dedicated prison, and one as large as this, was incredibly intimidating... Not to mention, the person he was here to see, the suspicious man who had slowly become increasingly dangerous as the year progressed, was someone he hadn't seen for a full six months now. Was he still the 'Coolest Defence In the West', or had his time in prison eroded that image away? How would he react to seeing the man who orchestrated the uncovering of his crimes?

They heard the violin long before they arrived. Down a long, white hallway the guard took Phoenix, until finally they reached a room on the left, enclosed by metal bars. The far wall was dominated by an ornate bookcase, several large novels on display between the occasional space filled with ornate crockery, or a mechanical bird in a cage, or even a statue of some kind of goat on a rock. In front of the bookshelf was a large purple chair (complete with cushion) and a small side-table. Nearby, his back to the bars, was a man in a blue suit, playing a violin on his shoulder and standing in the patch of light shining in from a high window on the wall above.

The guard pulled out an ID card, swiping it through a panel on the wall. The machinery beeped, and he pushed the barred door open, calling, "Kristoph Gavin, you have a visitor."

Kristoph didn't visibly react, still running his bow over the strings. It was only as Phoenix entered the cell and the guard closed the door behind him that the music came to a stop, and Kristoph turned to look at Phoenix with his usual cool smile. "Well well, isn't this an unexpected surprise?" He promptly turned around again, busying himself replacing the violin in an empty space on the bookcase. "What errand brings you down to my cramped confines?"

Phoenix didn't allow himself to feel any relief at Kristoph's civility, still watching the man carefully. At the forefront of his mind, he was seeing his children... and then Vera, collapsing on the stand. Trying to sound neutral, he could only say, "Gavin..."

The violin back in its place, Kristoph turned to face Phoenix, arms crossed. He looked his visitor up and down for a moment. "You look well, Phoenix Wright."

"You too... Gavin," Phoenix replied, giving the man a curt nod.

Kristoph grunted to himself and sat in his chair. "I'd offer you a seat, but I'm afraid I only have the one," he explained. "I don't regularly receive guests, you see."

Phoenix didn't reply. After a moment, his eyes drifted to the small side-table at Kristoph's elbow. A yellow envelope, resting against a thick red tome.

"Mister Misham sure seemed to think so! You shoulda seen him! He crammed his letter into that yellow envelope as fast as he could."
Phoenix didn't allow himself to gasp, eyes back on Kristoph. He couldn't check it out while the owner of said letter was right next to it. He needed a distraction...

Kristoph chuckled, gesturing to the bookcase behind him. "It's strange, you know? Here I am in solitary, and yet the books keep piling up."

Again, Phoenix refused to react - He half-wondered if Kristoph thought he'd been looking at the book, not the envelope. That thing is pretty massive, I guess.' He nodded, briefly pointing to the violin. "Looks like you've got more than books up there."

"Ah, yes, my 'collection'," Kristoph replied, a proud smile on his face. "I've a few friends on the prison staff. They show me a little kindness."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, examining the items on display more carefully. After a moment, he recognised the entire bookcase and contents as having come from Kristoph's own home; Was that what he meant? He did recall thinking any one of Kristoph's elaborate choices in home decor was more valuable than the entirety of the Agency... but, considering where Kristoph, and his furniture, now resided, he couldn't let himself feel jealous anymore. Looking around, he confirmed his theory by recognising a chest of drawers behind him, complete with a small photo and a vase. Aha, flowers. Not sunflowers, not tulips... Are they roses? I'm going with roses.' He gestured to the two red flowers, turning his attention back to Kristoph. "You taking care of this one here?"

Kristoph smiled, getting to his feet. "Ah, yes, she's surprisingly delicate, you know. Requires careful tending." He walked past Phoenix, towards the drawers, and the visitor never let his eyes leave the prisoner. "But, she is my 'best friend', as they say."

"Best?" Phoenix repeated, eyebrow raised. He shot the other man a grin. "Come on, now I'm starting to feel bad for you."

"Oh?" Kristoph replied, giving Phoenix an amused look. "Of course, she's known to bite if handled roughly."

"Y-your rose bites?" Phoenix paused, eyes wide. "Oh? Kristoph replied, giving Phoenix an amused look. "Of course, she's known to bite if handled roughly."

Phoenix paused, eyes wide. "Y-your rose bites?"

Kristoph stared back at his visitor for a long moment. "I was speaking of the photo. Surely you remember my retriever, Vongole?"

'Ooh, right...' Too late, Phoenix noticed the small frame did indeed contain a photo of the former attorney's beloved dog. The Wrights hadn't met the animal often - If anyone was sure to remember her, it would be Luke - so Phoenix only allowed himself a guilty shrug in response. Wonder what happened to her after her owner got arrested? Eh, even Gavin here wouldn't let a dog be abandoned without care. Wherever she is, she's fine. ' His eyes drifted from the photo back up to the flowers. Hey, whaddaya know... I was right! Those are roses! Or, at least, Gavin didn't correct me, anyway.' He resisted the urge to study the flowers carefully, so as to imprint what a rose looked like in his mind and up his list of flower identification to three.

Kristoph grunted to himself, turning his back on Phoenix to examine his photo. "Life has been full of surprises... for both of us."

Phoenix didn't reply, watching the man carefully.

"I've no doubt you never expected to lose that attorney's badge of yours."
"And I'll bet you never expected to wind up here," Phoenix quietly replied, tossing all thoughts of flowers and dogs from his mind to get back to business. Although he knew the answer he would get, he had one question in particular he had to ask. "Shadi Smith... the man you killed. Did you know who he really was?"

Kristoph looked over his shoulder, watching Phoenix with an expression that exuded carefully composed curiosity. "Who he was?"

Phoenix's frown deepened. "Zak Gramarye. You know, the defendant."

Kristoph stared for a long moment in silence, then turned away again. "I remember him, of course. But you say Smith was Zak? Impossible."

"Don't even try to tell me it was a coincidence."

"What did I just say?" Kristoph shot Phoenix a smile. "Life is full of surprises. Don't you think?"

Phoenix refused to drop the issue just yet. "You were found guilty of his murder, but your motive was never made clear... A mistake I plan to remedy."

Kristoph chuckled, turning to face Phoenix properly. "You're not an attorney anymore, Phoenix Wright. What possible conclusion do you think this 'investigation' of yours can lead to?" He waved a hand in the air. "I killed a man named 'Smith' because I am an evil human being. Isn't that enough?"

He moved past Phoenix, back towards his chair. 'Not for me, it isn't.' Phoenix paused only briefly to calm himself before following the man with his eyes, watching Kristoph again sit in his chair. "You recall that case, back in twenty-nineteen?"

The other man thought a moment. "Ah, yes, the trial where Zak Gramarye pulled his famous vanishing act!" He chuckled, shaking his head. "My brother won his fair share of praise and adoration for that trial, as I recall. 'Genius Prosecutor Reveals Crooked Attorney', was it?"

Phoenix refused to rise to that bait - He'd had seven years practise, after all. "That was when I met you, wasn't it?"

Kristoph didn't meet Phoenix's eyes, pressing his glasses up his nose. "Was it now."

He knew he didn't need to, but if Kristoph was feigning ignorance, Phoenix was going to explain: "The Bar Association review board voted unanimously for the 'strictest punishment'... Well, unanimous save for one dissenting opinion: Yours."

Again, Kristoph took a long time to respond, still avoiding Phoenix's gaze. "It was my brother who was responsible for putting you in that position, after all."

Phoenix could only watch the other man with confusion, studying him carefully. "For seven years we've been friends... and yet I still don't understand you."

Kristoph chuckled, finally looking Phoenix in the eye. "But Wright, your 'friendship' toward me was never pure... and likely your son's relationship with me was equally poisoned from the start." He stood from his chair. "You suspected me then as you still do now, don't you?"

Phoenix stared back, the mention of Apollo making him long to reach for the locket hanging around his neck. It was true, he had suspected Kristoph nearly from the start, and had believed several scary things in the chaos his mind was in post-badge... but seven years was a long time. Although he'd never let his guard down, he'd spent a lot of it doubting himself when it came to Kristoph... and Apollo's skills, the pain on his face as he'd argued his case against his former mentor back in April, were testament to how good the man could be when he wanted to. Phoenix sighed, eyes downturned. "Honestly, right now, I'm not sure what I think."

Kristoph huffed, then walked around his chair to study his bookshelves.

'Now's as good a time as any.' With the other man's attention elsewhere, Phoenix casually walked forward towards the chair, within reach of the side-table. As Kristoph still seemed occupied, he dared to look down, picking the yellow envelope up off the book it was perched on.

"It's not nice to peek at other people's mail."

Phoenix dropped the letter with a jerk, stepping back. Panicked, he threw out the first thing that came to mind: "You get mail here in jail?" Immediately, he mentally kicked himself. 'Of course he does, even people in solitary get the basic human right of letters!'

Kristoph chuckled, turning around. "That I do, though they read it first, apparently. Still," he shook his head, moving back around his chair, "I am allowed the pleasure of correspondence. Packages and the like are a different matter, however."

Phoenix nodded as though he didn't already know all that.

Kristoph stared at him for a few moments. "But that's not why you're here."

Instead of replying, Phoenix shook his head. He took only half a second to psyche himself up, then glared Kristoph right in the eyes. "You didn't just brain a guy with a juice bottle for no reason. Tell me why you did it."

Kristoph raised an eyebrow. "Persistent, aren't you?"

"I came here... because I remembered something," Phoenix explained; It was a half-lie, but, technically, it was correct. "The night of our 'game', Zak Gramarye mentioned your name, Gavin. After that, he was killed, and I asked you to help me because I remembered your kindness back when everyone had turned on me." A little exaggerated from the truth, but, again, close enough. "I have to know: Why did you kill Shadi Smith?" He paused, then shook his head. "No... Zak Gramarye?"

Kristoph stared back, a hand on the bridge of his glasses. After a long moment of silence, five Psyche-Locks shimmered into being with a rattling of non-existent chains.

Five black Psyche-Locks.

Phoenix couldn't help jumping back in surprise, eyes wide. Unlike normal red Psyche-Locks, these black ones seemed to exude an aura of despair, of a coldness so thick he didn't think it was even possible to unlock them lest he lose himself in the darkness. What were they? And what made Kristoph's secret so different from every other he had encountered over the years? One hand reached into his pocket, clutching the magatama within. Pearl had never mentioned the possibility of different colours back when she first explained all this to him nine years ago.

"Something wrong, Wright?"

Dragged back to reality, Phoenix rapidly blinked, the image of the chains and locks vanishing from his eyes. "N-no, it's nothing."

Kristoph dismissed the curious expression on his face with a shrug. "You shouldn't push yourself so hard. Life is to be taken easy, you know.” With that, he circled Phoenix and returned to his drawers, where the roses and photo of Vongole rested. As Phoenix watched, Kristoph pulled a familiar bottle of nail polish out of his pocket, resting it next to the vase while he began to apply it to his nails.

"You're thinking, 'What self-respecting man would use nail polish'?"

Phoenix looked up from where he was crumpled on the floor, still dressed in the remains of his beloved suit and with a hand on his empty lapel... It had been two days now and he still hadn’t taken it off, a disgraced lawyer hiding in his disgraced law office in between the too-brief bouts of determination that were the only thing getting him doing anything right now. "Oh, no, of course not.Appearances seem to be a big thing with you." His voice was barely more than a whisper, and he suspected Kristoph was only putting those words in his mouth purely to drag the now-former lawyer out of his depressed shell.

Kristoph smiled, sat with legs neatly crossed on the black leather lounge. "You know what I say? One cannot live a beautiful life without beautiful nails. First rate, in all things. Accept nothing less."

Phoenix managed a half-smile, watching the man work on his hands. "That certainly does look like first rate nail polish. I like the sparkly bottle."

"It's crystal," Kristoph replied. "I'd offer you one to keep, but I don't have a spare on me currently, I'm afraid."

"No, it's alright," Phoenix insisted, shaking his head. "I wouldn't have a use for it anyway... since Maya and Pearls aren't..." He flinched, looking away; Not even now could he make himself voice that, if only for the well-being of their village, he might never see either of the Feys ever again. The pain of everything he had lost, including them, was still too fresh.

Kristoph stared at Phoenix for a moment, then nodded and returned to his nails. "If you insist."

The memory of the conversation echoed in Phoenix's head. Although he gave the small bottle a long look, he said nothing, and made to leave.

Kristoph gave no indication he even noticed his visitor go.

View the Court Record
Turnabout Succession, Day 2: Investigation, Part 2

Any idea where that reporter ran off to after the trial? .

Last I heard he was bugging my people at the crime scene. Why do you want to know? We've got everything we can from him

Thanks Ema. Long story short, I have a few questions only he can answer .

Alright. Good luck Mr Wright

October 8, 3:16PM
Cape Rivers Drive

It didn't take Phoenix long, as he approached the small building that housed Drew Studio, to spot the fidgety reporter lingering outside. The man was circling the bench that faced the park opposite, twirling a toothbrush in his hand and muttering to himself, eyes flicking every which way... Naturally, he noticed the approaching Phoenix equally quickly, and dashed down the concrete path to meet him.

"Well well well, what do we have here?"

Phoenix paused, waiting for Brushel to join him. "Remember me?"

Brushel scoffed. "Of course I remember you! 'Journalist Meets Ex-Attorney In Bar', end quote." He grinned widely, the strong smell of mint exuding from his blindingly white teeth.

'You know more about me than I do about you, then...'. Phoenix gestured to the nearby building, resolving to put up with the smell without comment. "Can I ask what you're doing here? Mister Misham was poisoned, and his daughter's..."

"Oh, yes, I know," Brushel explained, nodding. "Oh, how I know! Yes. It's caused me no end of grief, to be honest." He turned, headed for the bench he'd been circling. "'Journalist Wishes He'd Tracked Down Case Just A Little Quicker', end quote."

Phoenix frowned in thought, following the reporter. "Were you on the trail of this case the whole time?"

Brushel nodded, lowering himself onto the bench. "Zak Gramarye... was a good friend."

"He said something to that effect back at the Borscht Bowl Club," Phoenix mused aloud, settling at the man's side.

"What a character, what a man!" Brushel crowed, reaching behind his thick glasses to rub at his eyes. "If a little... No, a lot... No, extremely rough around the edges!"

Phoenix decided not to comment; He could recall clearly how Zak had so casually punched Brushel out when his role in the events that night was done. "Do you think I could ask you a few questions?"

Brushel turned to Phoenix with an incredulous look. "Oh? You serious? I mean, I'm usually the interviewer, not interviewee! 'Journalist Asks Questions, Not Other Way Around', end quote."

Phoenix just raised an eyebrow at the man.

Sighing heavily, Brushel waved a hand. "Fine, shoot, I don't care!" Leaning back on the bench, he crossed his arms, fingers tapping in a frustrated sulk. "People have been asking me all sorts of things lately."

Hiding a smile, Phoenix nodded. He turned his gaze to the forest of Gourd Lake across the road, half-hidden behind its high brick wall. "It was tragic what happened to Drew Misham and his daughter."

"Forgery is a serious crime, and they paid the price," Brushel muttered. He cocked his head to one side, watching Phoenix carefully. "You know what really did them in though, don't you?"

Phoenix didn't move his gaze from the trees. "Yes: A forged diary page."

Brushel leaned forward, whispering, "The night I 'interviewed' him, I found out something about Mister Misham I hadn't known."

Intrigued, Phoenix finally turned to face the reporter. "What's that?"

"You know, he always felt like he was being watched?" Brushel continued, an excited gleam in his eyes. "Every day, for seven years. 'Walls Have Ears, Potatoes Have Eyes', end quote."

Phoenix frowned. "Being watched...? You mean, he felt guilty?"

"Nerves?" Brushel scoffed. "No, it's nothing so mundane... I stopped paying attention to my nerves a long time ago!" He nervously looked around again, lowering his voice back to a whisper. "But I felt it too; 'Journalist Sure He Is Being Watched', end quote." He fixed a determined gaze on Phoenix's. "Don't you wonder why Zak Gramarye got rubbed out after seven years, right after coming into contact with me!?"

At that, Phoenix's eyes widened.

"He completely vanishes from that courtroom," Brushel continued, "then, for seven years, he talks to no one. Not a soul! Then, just as the 'remaining time' was almost up, he contacts me in order to have that rights transferral of his made."

"And then he dies," Phoenix muttered, his gaze moving to the ground.

"Starting to put the pieces together, are we?" Brushel asked, a smug tone in his voice.

Phoenix ignored him, studying the reporter carefully. "And you were being 'watched' this whole time?"
"Maybe not just me," Brushel suggested with a shrug. "Maybe you were, too!"

Phoenix paled, looking away. He'd been faking his friendship with Kristoph for seven long years in order to keep a close eye on the man... Had Kristoph been doing the exact same thing with him? Suddenly he remembered the week after he and Maya finally sorted out their mutual attraction, how Kristoph had immediately known Pearl was hanging out in the city with her cousins. Had their visits to Kurain truly been as secret as he'd thought? And what about the night of Zak's murder; Had Kristoph visited that day knowing full well who would be dropping by later? Just how much danger had the Wrights and their extended family been in without ever even knowing?

Brushel sat up in his seat, twirling the brush in his hands. "I met Zak through that case, actually."

Phoenix dragged himself back to the present; Whatever Kristoph might have done, he was firmly in jail now, and couldn't harm them anymore... Although, just in case, he made a mental note to check they didn't have any 'gifts' from the former attorney lying around anywhere. "You mean the shooting of Magnifi Gramarye?" he asked Brushel.

"No, before that," Brushel replied, shaking his head. "It's not widely known."

Phoenix thought a moment, then a story Thalassa had told him in the past week sprang to mind. "You mean the accident? During the Quick-Draw Shoo'em practise?"

The toothbrush in Brushel's hand ceased its spinning as the reporter gave Phoenix an impressed look. "My my my, you're well informed!" He chuckled, grinning proudly. "You should've seen me back then; I'd dug up quite the scoop. I wanted it all: Money, fame, women, a little puppy... all for me!" He sighed longingly, clutching his toothbrush with both hands. "I was younger then, and my days and nights smelled of fresher mint than they do now.... In fact, I was on close speaking terms with Magnifi Gramarye at the time." He paused, thinking. "I knew his daughter too, of course. Thalassa, was it?"

At that, Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "Really..." He couldn't help but wonder if Thalassa remembered Brushel at all... Regardless, although he knew her side of this story, and Zak's side of this story, Brushel's might prove to be a different matter.

"Then Thalassa disappeared," Brushel sighed, contemplative. "Quite suddenly, at that. And Magnifi wouldn't say a word about it." He shrugged, giving Phoenix a sheepish look. "Yeah, my evil habit got the better of me. 'Journalist Catches Scent Of A Scoop, Goes On Feeding Frenzy', end quote. I set up a one-on-one interview with Thalassa's husband, see."

"You mean Zak Gramarye," Phoenix filled in. 'As opposed to her first husband, Apollo's father. He was long dead by then, I suppose.'

Brushel nodded, his eyes intense. "Something strange was in the air over at Troupe Gramarye in those days. The whole screwy mentor-controlling-disciples scene'd started by then, I'm guessing." He grinned. "Thalassa, she was part of it all, right? C'mon, you can tell me, off the record!"

It was very easy for Phoenix to bluff a blank look, shaking his head. "Sorry, I don't know."

Brushel studied him for a moment before giving up with a sigh. "Anyway. I kept prying, and eventually became friends with Zak." He shrugged, looking a little beleaguered. "Sure, he punched me once or twice... or five times..." He perked up with a grin. "But, over time, he came to see me as his confidant."

'It doesn't sound worth it to me,' Phoenix mused.
Brushel was tapping his toothbrush against his head again, frowning in thought. "Y'know, Valant's been waiting this whole time. Seven years, eh?"

Phoenix blinked in confusion, thrown by the change of subject. "Waiting...?"

"For his big comeback, of course!" Brushel laughed. "A big 'revival of the Magnifi Miracle'..." His smile faded. "Course, it was all a dream."

"The performance rights," Phoenix muttered. His mind flew to his daughter, certainly at home by now, and the purple envelope he'd left in her possession; Had Apollo worked out what it was? Phoenix was starting to wonder if he'd made the right choice, waiting so long to pass the document on, only to make its recipient wait even longer before allowing her to read it. Thalassa didn't know about the rights yet either... though he doubted she would have the kind of issues with it Valant might.

"In the absence of any official documents, he was golden," Brushel elaborated. "Who's to say the old man didn't give his rights to both Zak and Valant?"

'Zak would have, if Valant had tried this stunt any earlier... Not that it really matters, now he's dead both literally and legally.'

"The time finally comes," the reporter continued, "and Valant's like a kid on Christmas morning!"

Phoenix stared contemplatively at the forest across the road. "He's getting ready for his show at the Sunshine Coliseum, you know."

Brushel nodded. "If that document sees the legal light of day, it's going to put a bit of a damper on the big show." He sighed. "He's a sorry one, that Valant Gramarye. Lost out to his partner at work, and in love, too."

Raising an eyebrow, Phoenix returned his attention to the reporter. "Love?"

"It's the same old story, really," Brushel explained, waving his toothbrush in the air. "Two disciples, and their mentor's only daughter. What has three sides, and all of 'em pointy? A love triangle."

Phoenix hummed in thought. "That is pretty classic. 'I should really stop this gossip right here, but I'm actually curious if Thalassa knew about this.'"

"When you're in a performing troupe, that's your world," Brushel continued. "It's like family... One with an entire high school's worth of drama, intrigue, and backstabbing."

His frown deepening, Phoenix looked away. The few words Thalassa had given him on her time in the troupe seemed happy enough, and Trucy certainly looked back on those days fondly... but the both of them had grown up in it, hadn't known anything else until Thalassa's accident and Trucy's 'orphaning'. He'd worked out a long time ago that Magnifi had been using the guilt of Thalassa's 'death' to control his two apprentices and goad them into killing him - a heavily disapproving Thalassa had only supported the theory since her return to America - and the whole mess had been the root cause of Zak going on trial in the first place, the catalyst to his death that past April. Maybe Zak was right to decide not to see Trucy again; Kristoph likely would have killed them both.

"You know about Thalassa's first husband, right?"

Phoenix blinked as he was abruptly dragged back to reality, looking over to see Brushel's curious eyes on him. "O-oh, uh... You know about him?"
Brushel scoffed, grinning. "Course I do! Tragic story, really: They were only married one year, then he goes and dies in an accident on stage."

"That's not quite the story I heard, but okay."

"Then Thalassa married Zak and had Trucy - I've known her since she was a little thing, too - and the kid she had with her first husband had vanished off the face of the earth! Another orphan, slipped through the cracks!"

Phoenix couldn't help a smile hearing that. "Did he now."

Brushel giggled at the back of his throat, rolling his eyes sheepishly as he realised Phoenix already knew whatever he might say. "Yeah... It's tough to figure out which got the better deal, really. They've got each other now at least, eh?"

Chuckling quietly, Phoenix looked out at the forest across the road. "Family is more than just blood relations; They've both understood that from the start. All I want to do right now is give what's left of the Gramaryes the answers they deserve."

Brushel sighed, leaning back on the bench. "People and events all get tangled together and get bigger and bigger... don'tcha think? Sometimes, you just gotta accept that you won't be able to untangle it all, I think."

Phoenix smiled. "Maybe so," he admitted. "But still, I have to do what I can... and tell what I find to those who come next."

Brushel twirled his toothbrush thoughtfully. "'Next', you say?"

"I'm not the one who will close the curtain on this little play," Phoenix explained, staring hard at the rainbow of leaves behind the brick wall. "Apparently, that's not my role anymore."

Humming in thought, Brushel followed his gaze. "I wonder what Magnifi would think of all this."

"What do you mean?"

"Haven't you seen it in Trucy?" Brushel asked, the hint of a laugh in his voice. "She's got his power."

At that, Phoenix smiled. "Ah, the Gramarye perception... Apollo has it, too. And Thalassa before them."

"Magnifi told me once, back when Zak married Thalassa," Brushel continued. "He said Zak had good 'eyes', but not good like a Gramarye's eyes. Not that good."

Phoenix just nodded, staring out at the treetops. "Maybe those Gramarye eyes will be what solves this case once and for all."

Brushel didn't reply, for once simply sitting in silence at his side.

It was a long while before either felt ready to leave.

View the Court Record
It had taken a great deal of patience, and more than a little persuading, but finally Phoenix had wormed his way through the small crowds permanently surrounding the Coliseum's entrance and found his way to an actual staff-member. With a bit of serious talk and flashing an official-looking paper signed by top prosecutor Miles Edgeworth, he convinced them to let him through immediately to speak to the star of the upcoming show.

"As you can see, this is a very important police investigation. If I don't speak to him right now, there may indeed be dire consequences for anyone who stands in my way. Specifically... have you ever heard of 'obstruction of justice'?

"... We'll let you in right away, sir."

Through the dark and quiet foyer, Phoenix was led through a side-door and into a small office, empty except for a large table and a circle of chairs, and the large whiteboard that hung on a wall.

"Mister Gramarye will be along shortly, sir."

With that, he'd been left alone. Not that Phoenix minded, really. He wasted some time idly searching for markers for the whiteboard, found them hidden under a chair, then took to doodling on the smooth surface provided.

"Funny I find myself drawing when I was doing so much of that yesterday. And I'm pretty sure I'll find even more to do once I get back to Luke. Ah well. I could use the practise."

Halfway through a rough impression of his eldest son under the red marker, Phoenix heard the door of the room opening behind him.

"Well, this is a blast from the distant past."

Grinning, Phoenix turned to face the magician, capping the marker. "Long time no see, Mister Valant."

Valant didn't look impressed, closing the door behind him and staying put next to it, gripping his cane tightly at his side. "Seven years, has it been? Frankly, I didn't think I'd ever see you again."

Phoenix stepped forward, depositing his small collection of whiteboard markers on the table and lowering himself casually into a chair. "I should apologise; I always meant to talk to you again before the police released you, but..." He couldn't help a small smile. "Something came up."

Valant's expression didn't change. "I've spoken to the press. I've nothing more to say."

"I've spoken to a lot of people myself," Phoenix replied, shrugging, "and come to some conclusions. But then I realised..." He paused, leaning forward to rest his arms on the table and fixing Valant with a stern look. "I needed to hear it from you. Not from Apollo."

Valant stared back for a long moment, then, finally, looked away guiltily. Sighing, he stepped forward and sat in the nearest chair. "I have walked a difficult road these past seven years."

Phoenix didn't allow himself to feel relieved at making the man talk. "Because you couldn't perform Magnifi's repertoire?"

"Do not be deceived!" Valant cried, holding up a finger in a revival of his usual theatrics. "Valant's skill is the 'real deal'. I do not require my mentor's hand-me-downs." He lowered his hand. "No, it was my partner who slowed me on my way."

Phoenix looked away, thinking. "Zak Gramarye."

Valant nodded. "His rather well-performed disappearing act in twenty-nine was the end... or so I thought."

"'Zak Gramarye murdered our mentor and fled to escape punishment for his crime'," Phoenix said, returning his stern gaze to Valant. "You said something to that effect at the time, didn't you?"

The magician only chuckled, shrugging almost sheepishly. "I remember it as if 'twere only yesterday." He sighed, anger forming on his face as his gaze flicked to the doorway. "Yet, that was not the way of it, in the end. For while he vanished, the suspicions upon my own person never did! 'His partner Zak vanished to protect him'... That's what those thieving magpies of a press said!"

Phoenix closed his eyes in a silent acceptance of the truth. To be honest, the pervasive rumours were probably thanks to his own tearing apart of Valant's testimony in the trial... but Phoenix was never going to apologise for seeking out the truth, especially not when it came to the case that had cost him so much.

"Yet that very same press comes to me now, feigning interest," Valant continued, waving an arm with a glare. "They cover the greatest magic show in history as if it were a vaudevillian distraction! And here must I stand, smiling at them all. What am I, if not a player in some fiendish farce!?"

Phoenix gave the man a wry look. "Might I suggest it's because you never made it clear what happened? Magnifi's death is still a mystery to this day... which is why I came here to get the answer from you."

Valant shot Phoenix a brief glare before returning his gaze to the door, arms crossed. "I already told Apollo."

"I don't want to hear it from Apollo," Phoenix patiently repeated. "After everything that's happened over the years... I need to hear this from you."

The magician didn't react. Around him, Phoenix saw spiritual chains rattling into existence, a pair of chunky red padlocks hanging off them.

Phoenix almost sighed in relief; He'd been expecting to see Psyche-Locks, but the worry had never left him that they might turn up as dark and cold as Kristoph's had been. Thank goodness these ones are normal...'

"The audience has no business stepping upon the stage," Valant said. "They must be content to sit and stare at the spotlight."

'Funny, Trucy's always said exactly the opposite.'
"Ask what you will, you'll get nothing from me."

Phoenix shook his head, one hand in his pocket to grip his magatama. "I'm as much a part of this affair as you are now. I have to know what happened."

"For seven long years, I have endured," Valant continued, seemingly ignoring the former attorney. His arms unfolded, one hand reaching out as if to grab hold of the thin air. "Now, finally, the curtain lifts on my new golden age! All the miracles of our troupe, within my grasp!"

'No need to be quite so literal.' Despite his internal snark, Phoenix couldn't help but feel sorry for the magician opposite him. As much as he'd hated and blamed the man for being one of the many causes of the loss of his badge... ultimately, he couldn't ignore how much affection Apollo and Trucy had for him. He trusted Apollo's word that Valant was innocent of Magnifi's murder. 'Sorry to do this, Valant... but right now, I need answers, and you're not giving them to me.' With a sigh, Phoenix gave the man a stern look, pulling out his Court Record. "Valant, I wouldn't be so sure about those miracles. Not as long as I have this." The appropriate photo set to display on his screen, he slid the tablet computer across the table.

Finally, Valant returned a curious gaze to Phoenix. Silently, he reached out for the computer, studying the image on the screen: a white sheet of lined paper, embossed with a familiar symbol of a man's head wearing a top hat. "And what might this be? I see it bears the Gramarye seal..."

"I should have brought this to your attention sooner," Phoenix said, a half-apology, "but I didn't imagine you'd be planning your comeback quite so fast."

As Valant read the contract on the screen, his eyes widened. "What is this...?"

"A document showing the true recipient of the performance rights to Magnifi's miracles," Phoenix explained. "Or, at least, a photo of it."

"Wh-what!?" Valant choked, jumping to his feet as he stared at the computer in his hands. "Zak... He wrote this! What!?" He fell forward, leaning on the table as his breathing came in gasps. "He passed everything to his daughter!?"

Phoenix just nodded, though he spared a glance of concern for his precious Court Record. "To Trucy, yes... though she's officially my daughter these days."

"Preposterous!" Valant spat, whacking the computer to slide it back towards its owner, who he glared at. "Zak's... Zak is gone! Vanished into the void!"

"This is the genuine article, an unaltered photo," Phoenix repeated, keeping his eyes on the magician even as he moved to rescue his tablet computer. "Zak was alive when he wrote this. Both myself and the notary can testify to this... and the document itself is safely in the hands of the person he wrote it for."

Valant stared, face pale, for a long moment, then, finally, squeaked, his whole body shaking. With a long, loud cry of despair, he spun around and fell to the floor with a twirl of his cape, his cane clattering to the floor at his side. "Why...!? Why does Fate toy with me so!? Why must my life be lived in thrall to the dead!??"

Any pity Phoenix had for the man quickly dried up at the theatrics. "You're not the only one with that problem," he muttered as he got to his feet, slipping his Court Record back into his pocket.

Turning around, Valant poked his head up over the edge of the table, gloved hands clinging to the wooden surface. "But he shot Magnifi!" he insisted. "Yes! It was Zak! It was! And then he left..."
He slipped down, bumping his forehead against the tabletop. "And my career as a magician fell into darkness..."
Despite Valant’s over-the-top display on the floor of the small room, it was clear his emotions were real. Phoenix tried not to roll his eyes, stepping away from his chair on the other side of the table. For the sake of his children, it was time he showed the man some kindness. "Did you think there might be some way out of it?" he asked. "Say, if you could prove Zak Gramarye shot Magnifi? Was that why you testified?"

"Yes!" Valant cried from below the table. "My way out... It should have been my way out!"

Slowly, Phoenix approached the sobbing magician, keeping his tone and expression neutral. "Well, it might not be too late, Mister Valant. All you need is a way to prove your case... and I believe I have the answers to your prayers right here."

Valant paused, peering out from his self-made hidey-hole and watching the former attorney silently. Phoenix dug around in his pocket for a moment. "Who really killed Magnifi Gramarye?" He pulled out a folded piece of purple paper, holding it up for only a moment before dropping it to the floor in front of the crumpled magician. "Zak Gramarye wrote one more thing before passing on." His piece said, he turned and headed back to his seat.

Valant gingerly retrieved the paper, pulling himself into a chair as he unfolded it to examine the contents. "To whom it may concern: April 2019, I, Zak Gramarye, murdered my mentor, Magnifi... Gramarye..." He sputtered, shaking his head. "This... But this is a confession!"

Phoenix nodded, leaning back in his seat as though he might fall asleep there. "In which he admits to the killing of Magnifi Gramarye," he pointed out, not bothering to hide the bitterness. "See? All according to your plan."

Valant stared at Phoenix for a long moment before returning his gaze to the paper in his hands. "I am... a magician by trade," he whispered. "Deception is my life's work. I fool the audience, give them a fleeting dream..." He paused, pulling the brim of his hat down over his eyes with a sigh. When he continued, it was with more confidence in his voice: "Yet, it seems the tables have turned. Now I am the audience, believing in the deceptions I have wrought upon myself."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, studying the sullen man opposite. "Zak wrote that right in front of me... after I explained your situation to him."

Valant looked up in surprise, then smiled sadly, his attention back on the letter. "Allakazam..." The smile faded, and he met Phoenix's eyes with a serious look. "You do know that this 'confession' is nothing but lies?"

"Yes." Phoenix kept an even stare on the magician. "It's my opinion that Zak Gramarye killed no one."

Valant chuckled. "Then you must be thinking the truth is a simple matter of elimination. Two received instructions to kill, but if one is innocent? Then the one who remains is guilty."
Phoenix nodded, preparing himself for an assertion he knew was coming. "That would be the logical conclusion, yes."

"So he vanished to protect me, his partner..." After a short pause, Valant broke into laughter, his usual pomposity returning. "A stirring tale, 'tis true."

Leaning forward in his seat, Phoenix watched the magician closely. 'I know what he told Apollo, but I have to ask this myself.' "Did you shoot Magnifi Gramarye in the forehead?"

Valant stared back, his performer's grin fading. "If I had, and I told you, what would you do? Run to the police, perchance?"

Although the reply was unexpected, Phoenix didn't react, staying silent. 'I suppose I did get this meeting with him under the pretence of being with said police...'

Sighing, Valant tossed Zak's confession onto the table in front of him. Unlike his earlier theatrics, he seemed, simply, spent. Tired. "Do as you will. There is nothing left for me now."

Phoenix blinked, frowning slightly in confusion. He still said nothing.

"It is true, after all," Valant quietly continued, his eyes somewhere far away. "I have little talent. I needed my mentor Magnifi's repertoire." He paused, thoughtful. "It was... as if a little demon grabbed hold of me..."

'Is... Is this a confession!?' At hearing the exact opposite of what he'd been expecting, Phoenix finally broke his silence: "But... you told Apollo..."

Valant chuckled, returning his gaze to the former attorney. "I did indeed... and I didn't lie to him: It was not I who shot my mentor."

'Ah, there it is. A return to making sense.' "So, Magnifi...?"

The magician slowly nodded, his face deadly serious despite the smile. "Yes. The Great Magnifi Gramarye himself was the shooter."

Phoenix couldn't reply, looking away. 'So Apollo was right. It was a suicide, all along... and I'm still not sure how I feel about that.'

"When I arrived that night," Valant explained, dragging Phoenix's attention back to him, "the old man was still alive. He appeared to be asleep. I..." He sighed, almost frustrated with himself. "I could not shoot him. But when I turned and made to leave the room... the old man called out to me."

Phoenix was a little surprised to hear that. "So you spoke with Magnifi that night?"

Valant nodded. "And this is why I knew what he had done; Magnifi transferred the rights to his repertoire to my partner, Zak Gramarye. Not me."

"I see." Phoenix thought to himself for a long moment, then got to his feet. "Then I guess I owe you an apology. I always thought you were the one who did it."

Chuckling, Valant shook his head, looking away. "You owe me no apology."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "Huh?"

"My crime was, in a way, more serious than that of murder."
"W-what!?" Phoenix cried. 'What could possibly be more serious than murder!?'

Valant waited a long moment before explaining: "You see, I knew that two letters had been sent. There are no secrets between partners. It was easy to find out... That was when I understood Magnifi's plan."

Already, Phoenix was connecting the dots in his head. "He wanted to die by one of your hands...?"

"Little did I expect it had anything to do with the rights to his repertoire!" Valant laughed. "That was when I heard it: The little demon whispering inside my heart." He shook his head, then, seeing Phoenix's confused look, continued, "Let me confess: I had intended to shoot Magnifi. And... I planned on framing my partner for the crime."

Phoenix's expression hardened as he nodded. 'Just as I've always thought you did... before you revealed the whole thing was a suicide."

"That night, I prepared something before going to Magnifi's hospital room."

"Which was...?"

Valant chuckled. "IV fluid, of course. I'd seen it on an earlier visit. If Zak did not shoot, I would do the deed!" He waved a determined fist in the air. "Then, I would use the IV liquid to place the murder on his hands. That was my plan."

Phoenix stared, musing on the new information. "But... you didn't shoot him."

Sighing, Valant nodded. "I could not. The demon in my heart fled when the moment came. But then Magnifi called me back. He said he was giving his magic to Zak, that I still lacked the draw he had... and asked me to help my partner, if I could." His eyes closed in pain, facing away. "I left the room... and then I stopped. The shock of what I had just been told consumed me. That is when I heard that fateful gunshot."

"Magnifi Gramarye... killing himself," Phoenix muttered.

"Then, the demon awoke anew within me!" Valant continued, eyes opened with a determined gaze. "Zak killed him, he was the one... Frame him, and the magic will be yours... I..." The pained look returned. "I altered the scene of his suicide. I took the pistol from his hand, wiped off the prints, then used the syringe to add the IV liquid I'd brought."

Phoenix simply nodded, having worked out the story as Valant spoke. "So in the end, things happened pretty much as planned," he pointed out. "Magnifi died, and you framed Zak for his murder."

Valant didn't reply for a long moment. "'As planned', indeed. Of course, the outcome was somewhat different than I had anticipated." He sighed, then got to his feet, watching Phoenix with a smile. "Well, what do you think? Do you believe my story? Can it be believed, truly?"

Phoenix took his time mulling the question over, eyes elsewhere. "That was seven years ago. I don't know what to believe." He took a deep breath. "But..."

Valant waited expectantly. "Yes?"

"I'm glad I heard it from you, Mister Valant," Phoenix said, meeting the magician's gaze. He even managed a smile. "Thank you."
Chuckling, Valant shook his head. "It is I who should be thanking you, Mister Wright. Only when I had lost everything could I make my decision." He turned and leaned down, retrieving his dropped cane.

Phoenix was almost too shocked to speak. "You're going to turn yourself in?"

"My partner may have vanished, but not so my guilt," Valant explained rather matter-of-factly, also grabbing the dropped confession as he straightened up. "And as my guilt stays, all else begins to leave me: My friends, my performance rights, my magic..." He sighed, shoving the paper in a pocket in his costume. "I've had enough of vanishing acts."

At that, Phoenix could only nod in agreement. "I understand."

The magician stood still, eyes far away. "I thought my life was ruled by a dead man, but I find I was wrong... for Zak Gramarye was alive..."

'Well, not anymore.'

"Just as his wife was."

At that, Phoenix smiled. "Ah, yes... Apollo mentioned you knew about Thalassa."

Valant chuckled, meeting Phoenix's eyes. "We never saw proof of her demise... Her body, I mean. Truthfully, were it not for a certain conversation I overheard, I may not have realised it myself."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. 'Does that mean I should take back that you're smarter then you look?'

Shaking his head, Valant began to twirl his cane around his arm, heading for the door. "I can only hope that the day will come when I again meet my partner, Zak Gramarye, or our mentor's dear daughter, Thalassa... then I shall apologise for my terrible mistake." He paused, ceasing the twirling to reach for the doorhandle, but didn't yet open it, instead looking over his shoulder to Phoenix. "I am glad we had this chance to talk. Thank you."

Phoenix nodded, unable to reply.

Valant exited the room with a flash of his yellow cape, and left Phoenix's sight.
Is it possible to arrange a search of Gavin's cell while he's not there?

Wright, what are you planning?

He has a yellow envelope on his table but I can't take a look while he's right there.
You WERE watching the trial weren't you?

... I'll see what I can do. I can't promise anything, though.

Yes! You're the best Edgeworth!

Don't thank me yet. I certainly can drop hints to certain people to pull Gavin out for a while, but I can't do anything about the guards. You're on your own there.

Thanks anyway buddy :) I'll tell you later how it goes.

Please don't. I'd prefer not to know how many laws you're breaking.

Cmon, you know me better than that don't you?

And that's exactly why I don't want to know.
I'll talk to you later, Wright.

October 8, 5:15PM
Central Prison
Solitary Cell 13

'There's only one person left to see...'

Just as before, one of the prison guards led Phoenix down the white hallways of the Solitary wing, headed for Kristoph's cell. And, just like last time, Phoenix could feel his stomach churning with worry. He was taking a gamble coming back. He didn't have anything else to ask the man himself about, he was just hoping to create a better distraction this time. After all, Edgeworth gave him no guarantee that Kristoph wouldn't be waiting there for him when he showed up.

There was no sound of a violin this time as they approached their destination, and, when they reached the cell, the guard ahead of Phoenix paused. "Um..." Turning, she stepped aside, revealing the empty room and wide-open door. "Sorry sir. Prisoner Kristoph Gavin is currently 'occupied'..."

Phoenix nodded, pretending not to see the flash of worry on the young woman's face. "I see. Do you know when he'll be finished?"

The guard shifted from foot to foot, stuttering. "Erm, well..."
Raising his eyebrows, Phoenix put on the look of an important and annoyed superior. "Could you go find out?"

"Ah..." The guard hurriedly nodded. "Certainly, sir. Please wait here a moment." She promptly turned and fled down a nearby hallway.

Phoenix waited until she was long gone to smile. 'Poor thing... I'll apologise to her when she gets back.' Checking one final time he was alone in the hallway, he slipped into the cell and made a beeline for the table by the large chair.

'Bingo.'

Just as he had left it, the yellow envelope sat propped up against the thick red tome Kristoph was likely reading. Making one last paranoid check that he was alone, Phoenix picked the item up and examined the return address written on the back of the sealed flap, right below where it had been torn open.

'And the sender is Drew Misham. Just as I thought. This is his final letter.'

Without wasting another moment, Phoenix spun the letter around in his hands, looking for the commemorative Troupe Gramarye stamp he remembered seeing on Vera's desk all those years ago. Indeed, it hadn't changed from his memory, though it was somewhat obscured now by the postmark. Although a quick glance at the address told him it wasn't directly for Kristoph, he didn't bother worrying about that; It was only to be expected after Drew had told them so many years ago he never knew his client's true name.

'And since this is Drew Misham's final letter, then there's only one final thing I need to do.'

From his pocket, Phoenix pulled out the atroquinine spray, popping off the cap. 'Here goes.' A click or two of the bottle got enough of the substance on the envelope to see a reaction, and Phoenix almost felt a little sorry to see the faces of Thalassa, Zak and Valant disappear below a blue stain.

"Well, there's no mistaking that," Phoenix muttered.

After shoving the cap back on the spray and returning it to his pocket, Phoenix turned his attention to the letter inside, pulling it from the envelope and holding the pair together as he read.

"The interview request came, like you said it would, and they're looking into the case. I swear on my life I won't tell them about you. So please, release the "spell" you've put on my daughter. I'll write later with a report.
"Drew Misham"

Phoenix couldn't resist a grin. "Gotcha."

"What's this? A burglar, in jail?"

Phoenix jumped, automatically hiding the letter and envelope behind his back as he spun around; Kristoph was entering the cell, a guard behind him closing the barred door. "Gavin!"

Kristoph smiled, stepping towards his drawers. His eyes never left Phoenix. "I didn't know you moonlighted in larceny, Wright."
Shrugging, Phoenix tried to look casual. 'Quick, distraction!' "Gavin... There's something I have to ask you."

"Can I steal your stuff?" Kristoph suggested, eyebrows raised in amusement. "The answer is 'no'." He shook his head, turning his attention to his roses. "My apologies, but there's not much I care to discuss."

Phoenix made no move to leave just yet, staring at the other man. "Vera Misham hasn't received her verdict yet," he said. "You follow me, Gavin?"

"There are no known survivors of atroquinine poisoning," Kristoph pointed out, idly picking up the photo of his dog. "But it never hurts to hope."

Phoenix stared for another moment or two of silence, then nodded. "Okay, I'll be leaving now." He moved towards the door, the guard on the other side already reaching to open it for him.

"Wright. Wait."

Pausing, Phoenix turned, seeing Kristoph replacing his photo on the drawers. "Yeah, Gavin?"

Kristoph looked over his shoulder, his expression unreadable. "Would you mind leaving that letter? It's private."

Phoenix's grip on the paper in his hand tightened, and he plastered a sheepish look on his face. "Oh, sorry. Forgot I had it." Reluctantly, he stepped back to lay the envelope and letter back on the side table.

"Many thanks." His piece said, Kristoph returned his attention to his photo, his back to the door.

Hiding his frustration, Phoenix headed for where the guard was pulling open the bars to let him out. He gave the letter one last longing look before walking out.

'Seven long years... and that's all the clues I'm going to get on this case. I think it's time. Every story has an ending, after all. We need to get this final chapter underway...'
Finally, Luke turned, peering at the screen over his shoulder. "Looks great, Papa." He turned back to his laptop.

Phoenix paused, raising an eyebrow at his son's muted reactions. "Luke? Are you okay?"

"I'm fine."

At that, Phoenix frowned, placing his Court Record on the bed beside him. "Well, now I definitely know something's wrong." He shifted as close as he could without getting up - he briefly cursed there wasn't anywhere else to sit but the bed - and watched Luke carefully. "Are you still worried about Vera?"

Luke took a moment to respond, eyes still on his computer. "N-no, I know she'll be alright... probably." He sighed, shaking his head, then reached for an item on his desk. "I... was watching this earlier." Still keeping his gaze forward, he held up a small memory stick for his father to see.

Phoenix's eyes widened as he recognised the same item Edgeworth had handed them after the trial, and he turned a concerned gaze to what little he could see of his son's face. "Luke..."

"I just had it on as background noise, while I was working on other stuff," the vet continued, placing the USB device next to his computer, where a similar device - a yellow round object with a shocked face on the front - was currently plugged in. "I thought, sure, I've only ever glanced at the transcript, but I already knew what was going to happen, so all I was doing was checking the video played correctly while I was busy writing... but..." He sniffed, rubbing at his nose. "I guess it just... got me thinking and... hit me harder than I thought..."

"Oh, Luke..." Finally abandoning the bed, Phoenix got up to stand by Luke's chair, leaning down to hug his son as best he could. "It was a long time ago. You know I'm alright now, huh?"

Luke nodded, pulling off his hat. "You were hurt so bad... and I didn't even know for three months. It took you two to tell the Professor. And it just..." He sniffed, leaning against Phoenix's chest. "The look on your face... reminded me of Labyrinthia."

Phoenix blinked, surprised. "Labyrinthia?" He stepped back, trying to get a good look at Luke's face. "Why Labyrinthia? That was," he paused to count in his head, "an entire six months earlier."

Luke avoided eye contact, wringing the hat in his hands. "I... I never told you this, but..." He sniffed. "The night we thought Maya was dead, when we were staying in Rouge's tavern..."

The reminder of that terrible night no longer brought a spike of anxiety to Phoenix's chest as it once had, but he still couldn't help a small wince. Certainly, if the loss of his badge could be compared to anything, it was to the loss of Maya. However, curiosity burned at the first thing out of Luke's mouth. "Never told me what?"

Luke was silent for a moment, facing away from his father. "I couldn't sleep that night. When I woke up, you weren't there."

Phoenix nodded, deciding not to interrupt; He remembered clearly how he had found Luke awake and waiting for him when he returned from his brief outing down to the bar. Had something else happened while he was out of the room?

For a long moment, Phoenix could only stare. After all these years, he only vaguely remembered the pep talk Rouge had given him that night; His own breakdown, and the calm of accepting the grief so he could move ahead for Luke's and Espella's sakes, stuck out far stronger. The thought that one of the worst moments of his life had been covertly watched by a third party, though? "You... heard all that?"

Luke nodded, only briefly glancing up to Phoenix's eyes. "I didn't want to upset you more, so I went back to the room. And later... well, I guess I didn't want to upset everyone else by telling them how hard you took it... thinking Maya was gone."

"Well, I... I can certainly understand that," Phoenix mumbled. After a moment or two, he gave his son a smile, and moved to ruffle his hair. "Thank you for telling me. You must've been really worried, huh?"

Blushing, Luke again nodded. "You're not mad?"

"Of course not," Phoenix replied, chuckling as he left his hand to rest on top of Luke's head. "Why would I be? That was an awful time for both of us, and I think you did the right thing." He pulled his son into a hug. "I'm proud of you, Luke. I always have been."

Seeing how awkward a position they were in, Luke got up from his chair to return the embrace.
"Thank you, Papa."

The pair stood in silence for a long moment.

"We should probably get back to work," Luke pointed out.

"Probably," Phoenix agreed.

Neither of them moved for a good while after that.

View the Court Record

Chapter End Notes

The night Luke and Phoenix spent at Rouge's Tavern was previously covered way back in Chapter 33, for the curious. :)
"You're sure that set-up will work?"

"Of course it will... As long as the Mason System is ready in time, of course."

"It'll be ready, trust me. I'm just not comfortable with a time delay."

"If you hadn't insisted on one last 'quick investigation'..."

"C'mon Edgeworth, I never would have got that final evidence we need if we went ahead with Luke's work as-is."

"I'm aware. My point is, you have made your bed and must now lie in it. There is little use complaining."

Phoenix sighed as he and his friend walked through the shining hallways of the high-class hotel. Given the Gatewater Group's 'special' relationship with the police, and the Imperial Hotel's proximity to the courthouse, he supposed he shouldn't have been surprised it was here Edgeworth had arranged for their six jurists (and one hanger-on) to stay during the trial. With groups of rooms closed off from each other in order to give the hotel's guests privacy along with their luxury, it was actually surprisingly perfect... a thought Phoenix never expected he could have after what had happened the last time he set foot in this particular branch of the Gatewater Group's hotels.

'At least Maya and Pearls weren't fazed coming back here, which is a blessing.'

Pearl was a last-minute addition to the party of jurists; Although she was perfectly capable of looking after herself up in Kurain, the teen refused to sit back up on the mountain and not come down to the city herself to watch such an important trial. Not wanting to ask Pearl to keep so many of the secrets Phoenix had decided were necessary, and not wanting to burden Apollo with yet another head to keep track of in addition to Trucy and Machi, it had been arranged for her to stay with and be subject to the same contract of secrecy as the jurists... although she watched the trial in the courtroom itself instead of from the Jurists' Chambers, and wasn't going to be voting on the verdict; Not only would her presence up the count from six to seven, she was too young to be allowed the responsibility of someone's life in her hands.

Speaking of, it seemed to Phoenix that every last-minute change involved with taking on the case they had was causing its own unique avalanche of problems as a result. Pearl tagging along with the Jurists was the smallest one, easy enough to brush off with a lie or two about exactly how dependant she was on her sister and cousin, but by far the largest was the issue of bias: There was no system set up to automatically assign six strangers from the city at large to a case, not yet, and Phoenix and Edgeworth both were long resigned to the fact that the test trial would by necessity have a jury of six of their friends. Their solution, the one they had pitched to the Bar Association and the Prosecutorial Investigation Committee and every other organisation involved in the criminal trial system as it stood before them, was that the six jurists of admittedly biased individuals would be biased towards both the defence attorney - Phoenix's son, Apollo - and the prosecutor - Edgeworth himself - thus cancelling each other out and, the theory went, ensuring a fair trial. Klavier wasn't exactly unknown to them (what kind of world-famous rock star would he be otherwise?) but the only member of the jury to have ever met him was Thalassa, and her ties to Apollo cancelled out any kind of casual friendship she may have struck up with Klavier during their concert together. It had been out of a kindness to her that Phoenix had suggested she be added as a jurist, swapping out the rebellious Kay that Edgeworth had repeatedly suggested was likely to break all the rules they gave her 'just because'. Edgeworth was happy to have an alternative and, despite his doubts about Thalassa, he kept to his promise to trust Phoenix on her ability to be impartial. Anyone outside their immediate circle, though? Well, Phoenix refused just yet to dwell on how the various associations and committees would take all the last-minute changes... Not until this whole stressful trial was over.

Outside the final pair of doors in the hotel's hallways stood two police officers, who saluted Edgeworth on sight and waved the two men through. Phoenix would have huffed about not being recognised - He was the one in charge, after all! - but he didn't feel in the mood for kidding around. Instead, he turned his attention to the hallway beyond, quickly finding one of the doors propped open, the sound of conversation echoing from inside.

"Ah good, looks like they're together already," Phoenix pointed out with a grin, nudging his friend. Without waiting for any kind of reply Edgeworth might be preparing to accompany his raised eyebrow, the former lawyer headed straight for the open room.

Just as lavishly set up as any other Gatewater establishment, this room was identical to its neighbours, with a large king bed, a wide-screen TV, a soft lounge, and even both a desk and small table, each with their own chair... though it appeared an extra had been dragged in from one of the surrounding rooms. Spread out between chairs and bed were five adult women, a single young man, and a teenage girl, happily chatting between themselves.

"Because Truce is impossible to embarrass," the young man was announcing, lounging in a chair. "Talk about her as a baby, she'd just own it and go on about how 'cute' she was. Now, 'Pollo on the other hand? Talk about him as a baby, and he'll go red as a lobster!"

"I still think it's a little mean to tease him like that," the teenager muttered, watching disapprovingly from where she was sandwiched on the bed between two dark-haired older women. Everyone else simply laughed.

Half-lying on the lounge chair, a brunette woman looked up as Phoenix entered, giving him a tired smile. "Mister Wright, Mister Edgeworth."

"Ladies," Phoenix replied with a grin, stepping forward to where the group could see him and only then giving the young man a nod. "Clay." The chatter had died down, all attention now directed to his battered hoodie and Edgeworth's spotless white cravat.

Maya grinned, giving them a wave. "Yo."

"Aw, c'mon, I was just about to get all the hot gossip from Missus Gramarye!" Clay complained. Thalassa chuckled from her chair at his side. "Maybe later," she promised, a twinkle in her eye.

"Ready for bed, Maggey?" Phoenix asked the brunette in the lounge chair.

"I'm recovering," Maggey insisted, propping herself up on an elbow. "This is the longest I've been away from Felicia and, honestly, I love her to death, but she's been having trouble sleeping more than two hours at a time an’...” She moaned, lying back down against the armrest.

Thalassa gave her a sympathetic look. "The things we give up to become a mother."

"Yep," Maggey darkly chuckled.

"We only require a few minutes of your time," Edgeworth assured her. "With any luck, you'll be home with your family by this time tomorrow."

Next to Thalassa, Adrian perked up on her chair. "This is about the trial?"

"Is the defendant alright?" Iris added, a hand playing with the magatama hanging around her neck.

"Miss Misham is recovering in hospital," Edgeworth explained, pushing his glasses up his nose. "Given our dire situation, we have decided the trial will continue as scheduled without her, in the hopes we can call a satisfactory verdict before her condition worsens... should it do so."

"In other words," Phoenix picked up, "we're going to ask you to come to the courthouse as it opens tomorrow; There are some things we want to test out before the trial starts, and we'd like to get moving as soon as possible."

Maya narrowed her eyes at Phoenix, crossing her arms in such exaggerated fashion it was clear she was mostly intending to mock him. "And what 'things' are we talking about here, Nick?"

Refusing to rise to the bait, Phoenix only returned a small smile. "It's called the Mason System. Luke and I have been working very hard on it over the past few days, and we think it will give you all the missing details you'll need to accurately judge this case." He didn't miss the slightly surprised look that crossed Maya's face, as well as the faces of Thalassa and Clay, the only three who had heard the name before.

"The 'Mason' System?" Maggey repeated thoughtfully, sitting up a little in her chair. "Sounds interesting."

"Why's it called that?" Pearl asked.

"No real reason," Phoenix admitted with a grin. "Just thought it sounded catchy."

Edgeworth hid a roll of his eyes behind a sudden need to fiddle with his glasses.

"It's in two parts, actually," Phoenix continued, pretending not to notice his friend's reaction. "As I'm sure you all noticed, it turns out this case is intricately tied to a much older, unsolved, case from seven years ago." He pulled a CD from his pocket, showing it off to the group. "To save time tomorrow morning, we'd appreciate it if you could all give this a watch tonight. The prosecutor and defence attorney will be doing the same thing, and everything you learn from this will be relevant in the Mason System and how this trial continues."

The jurists briefly exchanged glances, then Adrian got up to retrieve the CD. "We'll be sure to watch it, Mister Wright. Mister Edgeworth."

"Our thanks, Ms Andrews," Edgeworth replied with a polite nod.

Phoenix gave her a grateful smile. "That's all we wanted to tell you," he added to the group. "The friendly officers outside will want you all ready before nine... Except for you, Pearls. You can take your time."
Pearl blushed, pressing her hands to her face.

"Wait, is that it?" Clay asked, confused. "That's all you had to say?"

"It's still important, even if it isn't much," Adrian pointed out, returning to her seat.

Maggey nodded, getting up from her chair. "Exactly. In fact, if that's all you had for us, let's get this video out of the way right now. I'm dying for a nap." With that, she moved to the TV, searching for the manual.

As Adrian moved to help the tired brunette set up the television, Phoenix turned his attention to the Feys sitting on the bed. "Actually, I also had something I wanted to ask you three about, if you have a moment." Giving them a serious look, he turned and headed back out to the hallway.

Once out of the room, Phoenix made sure he was a small distance from the doorway before he stopped walking, not wanting the upcoming delicate conversation to be overheard by the other jurists. The first thing he spotted as he spun on his heel was Maya exiting the doorway he had just come through, watching him curiously. "What is this about, Nick?"

Before Phoenix could reply, Edgeworth had emerged from the room, Iris and Pearl at his heels. While Iris paused to close the door behind them, Edgeworth approached his friend with loosely crossed arms. "Do be sure your project is actually ready tomorrow morning, Wright. We're too late to back out now if it isn't."

Phoenix scoffed. "It will be," he insisted. "C'mon, trust Luke a little, won't you?"

"Luke I trust implicitly," Edgeworth retorted, a small smile on his lips. "You, however, I know far too well to make that mistake."

"Oh ha ha," Phoenix muttered sarcastically, rolling his eyes. He pretended he couldn't hear Pearl giggling nearby. "Some friend you are."

Maya snorted. "Don't you have very important prosecutor work to get back to, Mister Edgeworth?"

"Other than this? Regrettably, indeed I do, Ms Fey," Edgeworth replied, pushing at his glasses to hide his smile. "Give Luke my regards, Wright. Until tomorrow." He turned and headed back into the main building.

Once Edgeworth had gone, the two elder Feys both rounded on Phoenix with concerned gazes. "Phoenix, what's going on?" Iris asked.

"It's nothing serious," Phoenix assured her, only to pause and frown in thought. "Well, I don't think it is. Regardless," he shook his head with a sigh, "like I said, I have a question and, if none of you three can answer it..." He shrugged. "Well, in that case I'm just screwed."

Maya huffed, whacking his arm. "Get to the point, Nick. What is this important question only one of us can answer?"

Phoenix paused in thought, then pulled his magatama from his pocket and turned to the teenage girl. "Pearls, you were the one who taught me how to use this."
Pearl nodded, smiling proudly. "Did you want a refresher, Mister Nick?"

"No, thank you," Phoenix chuckled, then turned to the older women, who were both frowning in thought. "I shouldn't need to re-state what we all already know: People hide secrets behind Psyche-Locks, and this," he briefly brandished the faintly glowing stone in his grip, "allows me to see and break them to uncover the truth... Psyche-Locks being, usually, red in colour."

Maya shrugged. "I guess so. We don't bother with them, usually. Wearing a glowing magatama around your neck is just irritating, and attracts the wrong kind of attention more often than not..."

"The colour is important, isn't it?" Iris asked. "I remember reading about the colour of the locks we had in Hazakura, that they had something to do with Psyche-Locks."

"In this case, the colour is immensely important," Phoenix replied, and met the Feys' gazes with a stern look. "What do you three know about black Psyche-Locks?"

The trio stared back with wide eyes, momentarily stunned by the question. "Black?" Pearl repeated.

Maya sighed, resting her head against a hand. "I really don't know anything about strange Psyche-Locks off the top of my head... You've got the most experience with them out of us four, Nick."

Iris was biting her lip, fist pressed to her chin. "I... know where I could look up the information..." She shook her head, huffing in frustration before giving Phoenix a sorrowful look. "But I can't remember anything either. I'm sorry, Phoenix."

"That's fine," Phoenix insisted, though he had to admit he was a little disappointed. "You can look it up after the trial, I guess. 'Not that it'll be of any help by then, but at least I'll know.'"

Pearl suddenly perked up, giving everyone a wide grin. "I'll go look it up!"

"You'll what?" Iris replied, stunned.

"But Pearly, you were so excited to stay with us here in the hotel!" Maya pointed out. "If you head up to Kurain now, you'll be too late to come back to the city tonight!"

Phoenix nodded, hand on his chin. "And if you leave tomorrow, you'll miss the trial. You sure you're okay with doing that?"

Pearl pressed her hands together, bowing cheerfully. "I'm always happy to help, Mister Nick!" she insisted. "Sure, I was excited to spend time with Iris and Mystic Maya in the hotel, but it's not like I completely missed out on that. If I go now, I can come back tomorrow morning and watch the trial like I planned."

"That's true," Iris agreed, patting her sister's shoulder. "If you're alright with it, I am too."

Maya sighed, but gave the girl a smile. "It's your choice, Pearly. And it's very kind of you to give up a night in a swanky hotel like this just to help out old Nick here." She elbowed the man with a smirk.

"Hey," Phoenix muttered in reply, though he didn't bother hiding his smile.

Pearl blushed, hands pressed to her cheeks. "Oh, I don't mind," she insisted, then looked up to her sister. "Where do you keep your books on Psyche-Locks, Iris? I'll go find them right away!"
"Mister Wright. You have just presented illegal evidence to this court. My court."

"..."

"Mister Wright?"

"Yes."

"Do you have an explanation for yourself?"

"If I did, would the court hear it?"

"... Probably not. Forging evidence is a serious crime. And presenting it in court, a serious mistake. A fatal mistake, for an attorney."

"Fatal, too, perhaps, for your client, I fear."

Phoenix paused at the inner door into the office, listening to the familiar voices echoing from inside. He'd specifically waited to return home with the thought that the errand he had advised his kids to go on would be long over by now. In fact, Apollo and Trucy were supposed to be at the Wonder Bar at this very moment, getting ready for their show... and he hoped to be gone again before they got back, hiding out with Luke or the Jurists until it was time for him to head off to the Borscht Bowl Club. Only Machi should be in their small apartment... and Phoenix fought not to run as he realised what the boy was doing. Screwing up his courage, he took a deep breath and quietly opened the office door.

"Tell me, what kind of defendant relies on forged evidence? The answer is quite clear: A guilty one!"

"Objection! Your Honour, wait! I understand that presenting forged evidence in court is a serious crime, but you cannot hold my client responsible for actions I undertook as an individual!"

"... I am sorry, Mister Wright."

"Your Honour?"

"Another close call, I dare say. If the prosecutor's office hadn't received that hot tip, everything would have gone the way you wanted it to, ja?"

"..."

"I even gave you a chance. Too bad you decided not to think before embarrassing yourself."
Machi sat curled up in a ball on the carpet, his eyes glued to their old TV. Playing on the lower half of the screen was a cross-section of a courtroom, as they had looked seven long years ago. In the top half, an image of the judge; On one side was an overview of the room from the camera above the doors, while on the other was an image of a ripped page with simple handwriting in pen, the piece of evidence displayed on the holograms. Below, a grey-haired man covered in paint stood behind the witness stand. On the right, a teenage man in a leather jacket wearing sunglasses and a boastful grin. On the left, an older (but still young) man with spiky black hair dressed in an immaculate blue suit, leaning forward on his desk with a haunted look.

"Mister Attorney?"

"Yes?"

"Could I... ask your name?"

"... Phoenix Wright."

"Mister Wright... I have seen and studied many people, but none like you. I'll remember you, Mister Wright."

"Isa!"

Phoenix didn't react immediately, taking his time to move his gaze down to the shocked teenager in front of the television, watching him with wide eyes. He waited a moment, then wordlessly moved towards the two couches; Spread across the table between them, he quickly recognised the contents of his seven-year investigation into Zak's disappearance... including all the papers from the ill-fated trial playing on the TV nearby.

Machi scrambled to his feet, turning to watch Phoenix. "I-isa... I did not know you return today."

"I won't be here long," Phoenix said, eyes on a page detailing his visit to the Mishams, complete with a small doodle of the stamp and bottle of nail polish he had seen there. "Apollo's looking after you?"

"Yes," Machi replied with a nod, one hand nervously straying to his opposite elbow in a self-comforting hug. "Apollo and Trucy at work now."

Phoenix smiled. "I figured they would be." He turned to finally meet the boy's eyes, giving the television a noticeable look. "I can't imagine this is the first time you're watching that."

Machi blushed, shaking his head. "I... I'm sorry..."

"There's nothing to be sorry about," Phoenix insisted. On the screen, he couldn't help noticing the cocky look on young Klavier's face, nor how his past self simply stood behind his desk, looking far more... together than Phoenix remembered feeling at the time. 'You'd think even the master of bluffing would look more broken with his life shattering around him...'

Machi seemed to notice where the man's gaze had gone, and glanced back at the screen. "No, I... I am sorry for what happen. Apollo told me... that was your last trial."

"It was." Phoenix tore his gaze from the television, looking back at the papers on the table. "I made a mistake and I faced the consequences." His hand itched to reach for the spot on his chest where his badge used to sit on the lapel of his suit, a gesture Phoenix had not felt the urge to do for years. "That's all there is to say about it."

"N-no!"

At that, Phoenix turned back to Machi in surprise, finding the teen watching with a determined gaze. "No?"

"That not all!" Machi insisted, eyes shining. "Prosecutor so mean, for no reason, and set up trap! Not your fault!"

Phoenix almost smiled. "Apollo's caught you up, then."

Machi blushed, backing down a little, but still pressed his lips together as though biting back something harsher.

On the television behind the boy, the brief recess to call the gallery back into the courtroom had ended. Behind the witness stand stood a man in a pale red cape and top hat, a bright bow-tie at his neck.

"Though I deeply regret having to declare a verdict in this way... This trial is over. You have the right to find a new attorney and make an appeal. However, this court must-"

"Ah, Your Honour?"

"Y-yes, Mister Zak?"

"There is one thing I wish to make clear: Today, in this courtroom, you cannot declare me 'guilty'. It is impossible."

At the sound of voices from the TV, Machi turned to look, transfixed by what they both knew was due to happen next.

"I'm afraid the defendant is quite mistaken. I most certainly have the authority to declare a verdict on you."

"Except... tell me, how do you plan on announcing your verdict... when your defendant does not exist?"

"Doesn't exist'...? What are you talking about?"

"I am talking... about this!"

A blast of smoke erupted from Zak's hands, quickly enveloping the witness stand and a good chunk of the courtroom, forcing the two attorneys and some of the gallery into coughing fits. It was quick to clear, making the suddenly empty space at the stand blatantly visible.

"M-Mister Enigmar!"
"The defendant's escaped! Find him! Quick!"
"Bailiff! Close all exits from the building! On the double! He must not be allowed to escape!"

The noise of the gallery grew loud enough to be heard even through the short-range microphones. Klavier had left the prosecutor's bench, waiting impatiently by the back doors where Zak had escaped. Phoenix simply leaned forward on his elbows, head down and held tightly in his hands. When the doors once more opened, the hapless bailiff beyond almost shivered with fear, hands grappling with a megaphone hanging off his shoulder as he found himself face-to-face with an angry seventeen-year-old.

"Well? Where is he!?"
"U-uh, Mister Prosecutor sir, I-!"
"Where's the defendant!?"
"H-he... he vanished, sir! Right in front of my eyes, he did!"
"What!?"
"Bailiff, are you saying...?"
"I saw him running into the lobby sir... but he wasn't there when I followed him! He's... he's gone!"

Klavier seemed too shocked for words, turning to look up at the equally shocked judge helplessly. Even Phoenix had lifted his head from his hands to watch.

"V... Very well. I suppose I have no choice but to end the trial here. We will pick this up once the defendant is found."

With the rapping of the judge's gavel, the screen turned black, the recording coming to an end. 'Too bad the trial itself never did...'

Machi sniffed, rubbing at his nose. "It not fair," he mumbled. "Prosecutor Gavin... He cheat."

Phoenix shook his head. "No, he didn't. The cheater was whoever asked Vera to make that page."

Machi thought over Phoenix's words for a moment, then turned to face him, his back to the TV.
"Isa... Why you go home now?"

"You mean come home?" Phoenix gently corrected him with a smile. "I just had a few things to pick up. I thought it would be better if I avoided Apollo for the moment; He'll be able to focus on his case without me around to distract him."

Although he clearly didn't like the answer, Machi accepted the reply with a sad nod. "Is... Is Vera okay? Apollo said she...

"Still unconscious," Phoenix explained. "Sleeping. I think she'll be alright, with time."

Machi thought a moment, then stepped forward and pressed against Phoenix's chest, clinging to his hoodie. "Everyone hurt... I can not help..." he muttered, the strain in his voice betraying his fear.

Phoenix was a little surprised to hear that, only to immediately mentally kick himself for not realising it was in Machi's nature to try and help everyone he saw who was in pain. "Oh, Machi, of course you're helping," he replied with a soothing tone, hugging the boy. "You're Apollo's assistant in this case. The whole reason everyone is hurting is because it hasn't been solved yet. You are helping by being there for Apollo, to bring out the truth of what happened and bring an end to everyone's pain. Do you understand?"

The teen didn't immediately reply, sniffing to himself. After a long moment, he mumbled a quiet "Y-yes," into Phoenix's chest. "I... I help by helping Apollo..."

"Exactly," Phoenix said, ruffling the boy's hair. "You helped Vera be brave enough to stand in that courtroom and tell Apollo what she knew. And, from what I hear, you've been helping a lot on the investigation too."

Machi pulled away, rubbing at his nose; The gesture hid a small smile on his face. "I... I found frame with poison. And told Apollo fact about stamp. I helping."

Phoenix chuckled, resting his hands on the teen's shoulders. "Feeling better?"

"Y-yes," Machi said, giving Phoenix a much brighter smile. "Thank you."

"No problem." Shoving one hand back in his hoodie pocket, he patted the boy's arm. "Want to help me grab my things? We've got an entire hour before Apollo and Trucy get back."

Machi thought a moment, then nodded. "Okay, Isa. I will help."

"Good boy." Ruffling Machi's hair one final time, to the boy's giggles, Phoenix headed towards the kitchen. 'Maybe some quality time with Lamiroir's son will help me feel better, too.'
FLASHBACK: Forged

- Seven Years Ago -

April 19, 9:28AM
District Court
Defendant Lobby No. 2

The first thing Phoenix ever heard out of Trucy Enigmar's mouth was a squeal of delight as she opened the door into the lobby.

"Morning, Daddy!"

Zak grinned and got down on one knee, holding his arms out wide as his daughter ran in for a hug. "Ah, I'm so glad you came!"

After squeezing her father's neck firmly, the little girl leaned back, giving the magician a stern look. "You okay, Daddy? They picking on you?"

Laughing, Zak shook his head. "I am fine, as always." He gestured to the lawyer stood nearby. "This old boy is here to help me, after all."

Although initially confused by the sudden arrival of a child (and wearing an outfit identical to his client's), it didn't take long for Phoenix Wright, ace attorney, to put two and two together. Brushing aside his annoyance at being referred to as an 'old boy' - 'That's 'young man' to you.' - he also leaned down to give the girl a friendly smile. "Good morning. That's a cute outfit you have on." 'She can't be any older than Pearls. Another reason to try my hardest today.'

The girl giggled, preening proudly. "Thanks! My first show's today, after all!"

Despite having no idea what she was talking about, Phoenix decided to be polite and just roll with it. "Oh, I'm sure it is!"

Suddenly the girl gasped, and bounced towards the lawyer with a determined look. "Oh! Old boy!"

"Huh? Me?" Phoenix asked, pointing at himself. 'Great, now she's calling me that, too...'

The girl muttered under her breath, digging around in a small bag hanging off her hip. After a moment, she pulled out a folded piece of paper, which she held up with a wide grin. "Here."

Warily, Phoenix took the paper. "What's this...?"

"I dunno!" the girl admitted with a shrug, then gestured to the door. "I just got it over there in the hall. They told me to give it to the 'old boy in the blue suit with the spiky hair'. They said it was really important!"

Phoenix hummed in thought, straightening up as he unfolded the paper to give it a look. It was ripped down one side, as though torn from a book, and handwriting in pen covered the front. 'What...? It seems fate's clock will make me wait a little longer... From a diary, maybe? It's signed 'Magnifi Gramarye'. Is this related to the case?'
Zak watched curiously. "What's this? A memo for you or some such?"

"Not from the looks of it," Phoenix admitted, then shook his head and folded the paper back up, slipping it into a pocket of his jacket. "I'll give it a read later."

The trial had proceeded as all trials did for Phoenix. After the small personal rivalry involved in taking down as many points in Gumshoe's testimony as he could, it was time for the teenager serving the role of the latest in a long line of prodigies from the Prosecutor's Office to bring out his 'decisive' witness: Zak's stage partner, Valant Gramarye.

"The doctor examined the body before the police arrived... He was quite clear about the time of death: Ten past eleven at night. And the one in the room at the time was my partner... not me."

It was easy enough to prove Valant was suspicious, with his 'lucky colour' nonsense about the green-not-yellow IV liquid and the clearly washed syringe. The rookie prosecutor, one Klavier Gavin, was even thrown for a moment; There was no substitute for experience and Phoenix was happy to show it.

"As you pointed out yourself, the IV liquid makes the perfect clock... One that you could manipulate at will!"

Just as Phoenix was daring to hope he could drag the trial out another day to do some much-needed investigation work, Klavier had decided to get cocky.

"Truly, there's no substitute for experience. Nothing blinds one to the truth so effectively. A word to the wise: Underestimate the young, and they'll sweep your feet out from under you, in a way you never, ever expected."

There was no proof either way Valant falsified the time of death, and both experienced attorney and first-time prosecutor admitted that. Claiming he had decisive evidence, Klavier produced a book, a diary, which the victim had written in on the night of his death. He even read aloud the final page, with no small amount of delight.

"Tonight's IV is in. Maybe the last. I leave the rest to them. The first should come soon. This journal may end here or it may go on... but not long. That depends on his hand. All that is left to mine is to lay down this pen."

Phoenix just stared back calmly as the teen continued with his argument. Sure, what Klavier was saying made sense... but he refused to believe even a rookie like the teenager across the room could miss the major issue with his so-called 'decisive' evidence.

"Well, how do you like me now, Herr Wright? Still too 'green' for your tastes? Hmm?"

Phoenix just narrowed his eyes at the teenager.

"Well, Mister Wright?" the judge asked. "The witness's testimony we heard was lacking, but, put together with this evidence, it seems quite sufficient for a case."

Sighing, Phoenix knew to stay silent any longer was to lose his case. "I'm left with no choice but to show my own evidence."
The judge jerked in surprise. "What!? You have some evidence that overturns this diary!?"

Klavier's grin only seemed to widen as he hummed in thought. "It's not too late to rethink this and avoid more... embarrassment."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow at that.

"Very well," the judge continued. "Please show us your evidence, Mister Wright."

"Incidentally, don't even think of showing us this diary I've just shown the court," Klavier added. "Now that we've come this far, I hope you have something a little more... decisive. Show us evidence that proves the victim continued writing his diary!"

Phoenix refused to give away his annoyance at hearing the ultimatum; So Klavier had noticed the torn page - it was impossible to miss! - and was dismissing it as yet another 'could have' or 'might have' that Phoenix had been reduced to throwing out to make up for his client's refusal to testify. Luckily, he was pretty sure he had something else on hand that would make up for the sudden handicap... despite how suspicious the circumstances of how he'd obtained it had been. "Alright. I'd be happy to." With one hand, he pointed up at the holograms, while the other reached into his jacket pocket for the small paper within. "First, take a close look at this diary. Note that a page has clearly been ripped out."

"What's this!?" the judge cried, leaning back in his chair in surprise. "I hadn't noticed that at all!"

'Seriously!?!' Keeping his incredulousness to himself, Phoenix carried on: "As it just so happens, I have here what I believe to be the missing page." He held up the small paper, unfolding it to show the handwriting all down one side. Even the pattern of the rip matched the image above him.

At the witness stand, Valant's eyes were wide with shock as he clutched his cane tightly. "Allaka-I-don't-believe-it."

"Looking at this page," Phoenix continued, "it's hard to imagine that the first visitor that night shot Magnifi Gramarye. That's the defence's position."

The judge beckoned furiously at the defence bench. "W-wait, let me see that!"

Happy to oblige, Phoenix quickly located in his Court Record the photo he'd taken of the suspicious page during the last recess, and threw it up on the holograms to replace the diary. "Note the torn edge of the page," he pointed out. "It's a perfect match with the torn remains of the last page in Magnifi's diary!"

Valant was frozen in place, still staring at the physical page in Phoenix's hand. "Quite... remarkable..."

Klavier stood behind his bench, still smiling as if nothing was wrong. "Would you care to explain what all this means, Herr Attorney?"

Dropping the page, Phoenix leaned palms-down on his desk, feeling like he was stating the obvious to a particularly dim child. "The diary continued after his first visitor came, which means that the victim was still alive after Zak Gramarye left, leaving no one to take his life but the second visitor, Valant Gramarye!"

"N... No...!" Valant cried, jumping back from the stand, his face white as a sheet.

The judge, meanwhile, was still examining the image on the screens, flicking between the page and the diary. "The handwriting too matches that on the other pages," he added. "This is, without a doubt, the genuine article!" The court promptly erupted into a noisy clamour, forcing the judge to repeatedly call for order so proceedings could continue.

"But, but wait!" Valant protested, his gaze finally on the holograms above. "This is... That's impossible! That old man couldn't have written that..."

Klavier smirked from behind the prosecutor's bench, and threw out his arm dramatically in Phoenix's direction. "Objection!" he called, then relaxed and laughed to himself. "Finally. You just couldn't resist, could you, Herr Wright?"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, still leaning forward on the defence bench. "Resist what?" he asked, an almost patronising tone to his voice. "Presenting solid evidence?" 'We'll just ignore for now that I wasn't nearly as sure about it five minutes ago...' Klavier smiled cockily at the attorney for a few moments before turning towards the tall podium to his left. "Herr Judge?"

"Y-yes, Prosecutor Gavin?" the judge replied.

"Might I request we put the current cross-examination on hold? The prosecution would like to call a new witness."

"B-but, Prosecutor Gavin," the judge weakly protested, "this evidence overturns the current witness's-

"I ask only to put it on hold," Klavier repeated, a stern glint in his eyes. "Please. My new witness has a very, very important piece of testimony to give."

There was a short pause. The judge still looked wary.

"Five minutes," Klavier continued. "No more. I promise, Your Honour."

Finally, the judge relented. "W-well, if you put it that way..." He turned towards the defence, ignoring Klavier's relieved smile. "Mister Wright, what's your take on this?"

Phoenix studied the young prosecutor carefully, trying to ignore the triumphant smirk the teen was currently giving him. 'Oh, what the hell. Can't deny I'm intrigued.' "Well, Your Honour, judging from his enthusiasm, we'll have to hear this new testimony sooner or later anyway." He shrugged. "So it might as well be sooner."

Sighing, the judge nodded. "Then, though this is highly, highly irregular... we will put the current cross-examination on hold. The witness may step down."

Valant didn't stop staring at the image of the page on the holograms as he was escorted out of the room.

The sudden bad feeling in Phoenix's gut increased with the wait, the gallery above them being cleared from the room as part of a judiciary deal with whoever was to replace Valant at the stand. Klavier had been expecting to see that page, Phoenix couldn't deny that. His true purpose behind putting the diary itself off the table was to goad Phoenix into presenting it, and he fallen right into the trap. 'Just what does he have planned, though? What is it about this ripped-out page that's so special?'
The grey-haired man in the green suit, and covered head-to-toe in paint, was not the kind of person Phoenix expected to see once the room around them was emptied.

"Erm... My name's Drew Misham. I'm... a painter."

While both Phoenix and the judge watched him in confusion, Klavier only pointed to the image on the holograms above them.

"Mister... Misham, was it? Do you know what this is?"

Drew nodded. "Oh, yeah. I know it well."

Phoenix frowned. "How's that possible? Have you seen this diary page somewhere before?"

"Oh, yeah," Drew meekly muttered, running a hand through his hair. "I mean... I made it."

"You... what?" Phoenix replied, feeling his insides go cold. "You made it!?"

Drew nodded. "Yes. You might call it one of my 'works'."

"The regional prosecutor's office received a tip-off yesterday," Klavier explained, grinning as he fiddled with his hair. "'Illegal evidence has been prepared for the trial of Zak Gramarye'."

The judge frowned. "Illegal... evidence?"

"I initiated an investigation," Klavier continued, gesturing to the nervous man at the witness stand, "and found this witness. A painter to the world at large, Drew Misham has another side, you might say. He is skilled in making perfect reproductions of certain things." He paused, smirking at Phoenix. "Forgeries, in other words."

Phoenix blinked, mind still reeling as a part of him realised what was going on. "F-forgeries!?"

"W-well!" the judge cried, looking rather nervous himself. "So, we are to understand that this page here is..."

"A fake," Klavier answered, smugly resting his hands in his pants pockets. "Prepared by a certain defence attorney."

At the direct accusation, Phoenix finally managed to spring into action, throwing out an arm and shouting "Objection! Hold it! I didn't 'prepare' this evidence!"

"Objection!" came a responding shout from the other side of the courtroom. Klavier clapped his hands together, leaning forward as he grinned at the attorney opposite him. "Ah, the attorney speaks!" he almost sang in delight. "Something about this page, I presume." As he stood tall again, he began to play with his fringe, a patronising tone to his voice. "But what is he saying? It makes no sense! After all," his tone suddenly became dark as he threw out his arm to point at the defence bench, "it was you who presented this evidence to us, Phoenix Wright!"

The sudden memory of the trial of Lana Skye, and how Edgeworth had barely survived his own accusations of forged evidence, was enough to quieten Phoenix on its own, leaving him staring at the bench under his hands.

The judge turned to the stand. "Witness! Er, Mister Misham, was it? Who requested this forgery!? Who was your client!?"

Drew winced. "That... I don't know."
Phoenix looked up at that. "What...!?"

"Most of my clients prefer to remain anonymous, even to me," Drew explained. "I make the items they want, and receive my payment. That's the extent of my contact with them."

Seeing his chance, Phoenix slammed his bench. "Objection! B-but...!" He grabbed the page and waved it in the air. "There's no proof this is a fake!"

"It's a fake."

Phoenix halted at that, his eyes on the witness.

"To avoid just this sort of problem, I always put a special mark on my 'works'," Drew continued. "I can say, without a doubt, this is mine."

Unable to argue, Phoenix's hands lowered back to the bench, releasing the page.

The judge looked down at the defence with a stern frown. "Mister Wright. You have just presented illegal evidence to this court. My court."

Phoenix barely heard him, his mind racing. 'It was careless of me, that's all I can say. I knew from the beginning there was something up with that thing... It was all a trap. A fatal trap.'

"Mister Wright?"

Finally, Phoenix croaked out a "Yes," his eyes on the wooden bench he was leaning so heavily on.

"Do you have an explanation for yourself?"

"If I did, would the court hear it?"

Sighing, the judge shook his head. "Probably not. Forging evidence is a serious crime. And presenting it in court, a serious mistake. A fatal mistake, for an attorney."

Across the room, Klavier was still grinning. "Fatal, too, perhaps, for your client, I fear."

Had Phoenix not been feeling the weight of the broken evidence law on his back, he might have snapped his attention to Klavier instantly. Instead, all he could manage was a glance upwards.

"Tell me, what kind of defendant relies on forged evidence?" Klavier asked, almost mockingly. "The answer is quite clear: A guilty one!"

That snapped Phoenix back into action, throwing out an arm to point across the room. "Objection! Your Honour, wait!" He slammed his palms against the bench. "I understand that presenting forged evidence in court is a serious crime, but you cannot hold my client responsible for actions I undertook as an individual!"

The judge thought for a long moment, then shook his head with a sad look. "I am sorry, Mister Wright."

Phoenix blinked, staring up at the judge's podium in disbelief. "Your Honour?"

Klavier chuckled, playing with his hair. "Another close call, I dare say. If the prosecutor's office hadn't received that hot tip, everything would have gone the way you wanted it to, ja?"

Unable to fight back, Phoenix could only stare at the smug teen. 'No... I fell into the trap, and everything went just the way you wanted it to...

"I even gave you a chance," Klavier continued, a boastful grin on his face. "Too bad you decided not to think before embarrassing yourself."

The judge kept his gaze firmly away from the defence bench. "I see no need for further discussion on this matter. Special witness dismissed!"

And, just like that... the illustrious career of Phoenix Wright, Ace Attorney, was over.

View the Court Record
If you've been following this AU's tumblr blog, you'll already know this, but for those who don't, I'm currently in the process of re-uploading this story in smaller, more manageable chunks. Since the first few chapters are nearly two years old now, the first step of that process is updating them so I'm not cringing at them anymore, which involves heavily rewriting and expanding at least the first two (which have stretched to four so far). Right now, I'm taking turns between the rewrite and continuing the existing story, so entirely new chapters won't stop coming but they will slow down a bit. I'll mention here when the re-upload starts happening so you can bookmark or subscribe to the series the new stories will all be going up under. Until then, updates will, as always, be faster on Tumblr.

SUBJECT: URGENT: For the trial
SENDER: "Phoenix Wright" RECIPIENT: "Apollo Wright"

Apollo,

Some evidence I uncovered after we last spoke... in the cell of one Kristoph Gavin. They're small and a little grainy, but these pictures should do well enough for court. They're taken from a small video camera I happened to have on me at the time, actually. I've tried to reproduce what it said and, though I think we both know how presenting that in a trial might turn out, it's worth a try. These are all I have, so they will have to do.

Do you remember Kristoph giving Trucy some of his nail polish after she cooed over the pretty bottle, years and years ago? I still have it in my room, and she's still forbidden from using it (though I doubt he'd be so stupid to have poisoned this one). I left it on my bedside table for you. It might come in handy during the trial.

Another interesting tidbit: Spark Brushel was a friend of Zak Gramarye's. I didn't mention it at the time, but I met him on the night of Zak's death, the first time Brushel had seen Zak since his disappearance. Brushel told me he and Drew Misham both felt 'watched' these past seven years... and not out of guilt, they were genuinely being watched by someone. He thinks it was no coincidence Zak died right after coming back into contact with his old friend. And, keep in mind, we've been close friends with Kristoph Gavin in that time, too. Anyway, do with that what you will.

That's all I have for you right now. Whatever happens next, I'm proud of you, son.

Good luck.

Dad

ATTACHED: envelope.png, stamp.png, address.png, letter1.png, letter2.png, letter3.png, reproduction.docx
By some stroke of luck, all six jurists were at the courthouse in good time to get the Mason System up and running. Even with the time saved watching the Gramarye trial the previous night, they wouldn't finish Phoenix's little 'game' before court reconvened; Luke's estimation was that it would take about an hour and fifteen minutes, though he made sure to warn that he could be off and it might take much longer should a jurist have difficulty with some of the puzzles. Regardless, Phoenix trusted Luke's ability to tell a truthful story as well as his ability to craft a fun yet easily solvable puzzle; Paired with Phoenix's own artwork and the design software Edgeworth had commissioned from a local gaming company, it made quite a formidable little program in Phoenix's opinion. He was certain it would inform as well as it entertained... and it hewed pretty close to reality, outside of the heavy simplifying and the time-travelling paradoxes involved in Luke's puzzles. Regardless, the trial would be already running once the game was done; The plan was then to queue up the livestream on a time-delay, and hopefully catch up during a recess.

All the pieces were in place. It was time for Phoenix's longest running case to finally come to an end.

"That trial seven years ago was the beginning of it all, this I know beyond a doubt. The mysteries of the past work their magic on the present... but you'll soon be finding all of this out for yourself. Which of Magnifi Gramarye's disciples pulled that trigger? Where did the vanishing defendant, Zak Gramarye, go? What dark truth lurks behind the forged diary page? And what about the girl who was left behind? The past left us these four 'keys' to unlocking the truth. But that's not all: There are four 'keys' in the present, as well. And when all the questions have found their answers, the final trial will begin. But first, you must chase the truth through then and now. Think of it... as a game."

Although not much of a programmer, Luke had familiarised himself with how the software worked very well in the two days he'd been totally absorbed in its inner workings. With the six jurists sitting around the table, their borrowed tablets laying in front of them, the young vet slowly circled, acting as tech support as he repeatedly checked each copy of the Mason System's program was working as intended. Phoenix himself sat back and watched from his table in the corner, idly checking his phone for updates from the world outside the Jurists' Chambers' locked door.

I got your email Dad. Thanks. I'll try and give you a reason to be proud today <3

Morning Mr Wright. No change in the defendants condition overnight. I'll let you know the moment anything changes tho

Are you at the courthouse, Mr Nick? I'm back in the city and I looked into those special sike locks you mentioned
At the last one, Phoenix smiled and quickly tapped out a reply.

You're a great help Pearls. Meet me in the 4th floor lobby

Slipping his phone into his pocket, he got up from his seat and casually approached Luke, who was watching over Iris' shoulder as the nun tapped through dialogue. Keeping his voice low, Phoenix called, "Luke."

The vet jumped a little, but quickly smiled as he recognised his father. "Papa?" he whispered in reply.

"I'm heading out for a bit. Will you be okay handling things on your own?"

Phoenix chuckled. "It's complicated. I'll explain later."

Although clearly unhappy with that answer, Luke reluctantly nodded. "Alright. I'll let you know if something goes wrong."

It was only as he approached the lobby it occurred to Phoenix that there was a chance, however small, that he or Pearl might run into Apollo there. 'Damn. I hope he's either not here yet or already in the defendant lobby... That would be hard to explain if he runs into me talking to Pearls... and there's no way Pearls could lie effectively if she's alone.' His pace quickened, eyes scanning the room for any sign of either a crimson cape or a soft pink kimono.

By some stroke of luck, it was the latter he spotted first.

Pearl grinned as she saw the man in the grey hoodie rapidly approaching. "Mister Nick!" Waving, she dashed forward to meet him.

"Good morning, Pearls," Phoenix replied. Although he smiled in greeting, he was still quick to place a hand on her shoulder and guide her away from the lobby, somewhere they would be out of sight if Apollo happened to pass by. Once they were down the hallway a little and partially hidden behind a plant, he gave the lobby once last check for red capes then turned his full attention on the teen before him. "You researched those Psyche-Locks?"

Pearl nodded, a serious expression on her face. "According to Iris's books, a red Psyche-Lock protects a secret a person is consciously trying to hide," she explained. "If the person folds under questioning, the lock breaks and the truth comes out."

"Yup," Phoenix agreed. "That's how it's always worked for me."

"But a black Psyche-Lock," Pearl continued, "protects a secret from the deepest place in a person's heart... A secret that that person isn't even consciously aware of."

Phoenix paused, frowning as he mused on the information. "So even they don't know it's there... "I guess this explains how cold and dark they felt... They must have been reflecting Gavin's heart.'"

Pearl nodded. "Whoever it is you saw with this kind of Psyche-Lock, they weren't trying to keep anything from you on purpose. For some reason, they've locked off part of their heart and memories even from themself." She gave Phoenix a worried look. "Is it... Is it someone we know?"

Phoenix didn't immediately reply, biting his lip as he pondered the question. Finally, he sighed. "Since you went to so much trouble on my behalf... It was Kristoph Gavin."

Pearl gasped, a hand to her mouth.

"Thank you again for doing all that research for me," Phoenix continued, before she could speak. "These Psyche-Locks can be broken just like any other, right?"

"Oh, n-no," Pearl hurriedly replied, shaking her head with wide eyes. "No, they can't! According to Iris's books, a black Psyche-Lock is like a heavy chain wrapped directly around one's heart. If they are ripped off by force, it could cause permanent damage to a person's soul!"

Phoenix stared for a moment as he absorbed that information, then sighed. "In other words, if I'm not careful, even someone as soulless as Gavin could be traumatised breaking those things." He pressed a hand to his face with a frustrated groan. "I guess it's a good thing I didn't use my chance to take a crack at them yesterday. At least he's capable of standing in court to answer for his crimes."

"I'm sorry, Mister Nick," Pearl muttered, downcast. "I guess I wasn't much help after all."

"What?" Phoenix cried in surprise. "No, of course you helped, Pearls! I mean..." He shrugged. "Well, admittedly, I don't think I'll be able to break those Psyche-Locks, but that's not exactly your fault, is it?" He gave her an encouraging smile. "At least now I know what it means if I ever see black Psyche-Locks again."

Pearl thought a moment. "I suppose so," she agreed, and sighed. "I wish there was more I could tell you."

"You were a lot of help," Phoenix repeated. "No matter what you told me, I don't think I'd've had a chance to break them anyway." He sighed. "Whatever Gavin's motive is... the only chance we have of learning it is in court."

Pearl mutely nodded. "Do... Do you think Apollo would be able to bring out the truth? Without hurting him?"

After a short pause, Phoenix was only able to shrug. "I really can't say. I'm sorry, Pearls."

"It's okay," the teen muttered, fiddling with the bead in her hair.

There was a long pause. Finally, Phoenix broke it: "I should probably be getting back to the Jurists' Chambers now."

"Okay, Mister Nick," Pearl replied.

"And you'd better head in to the courtroom and get a good seat," Phoenix continued, gesturing back towards the lobby with a grin. As Pearl giggled, he added, "We'll see you after the trial."

"Sure." Looking much more cheerful, Pearl left their hideout behind the plant and headed off down the hallway, waving over her shoulder. "See you later!"

Phoenix waved back. He waited a moment longer before leaving himself. 'I have a job to get back to.'
'It's all up to you now, Apollo.'

View the Court Record
It had been a very tense twenty-or-so hours since Apollo last saw Phoenix in person.

After picking up the video file from the archives, Apollo took his youngest siblings straight back to the Agency. Once Machi had, happily, changed out of his 'unlucky' concert outfit into something more casual, they stuck the CD they'd requested into their aging DVD player. The entire afternoon, they'd played that final trial of their father's on repeat, practically memorising Phoenix's arguments, Klavier's rebuttals, Valant's lies, Drew's explanations... and Zak's disappearance. Apollo hadn't been able to look the first time around, at the moment when Phoenix presented the diary page, though morbid fascination finally turned his head the second time it came around, and he was able to watch it every time after that. Trucy always went silent at that moment, and usually made excuses to leave the room at the same time as Drew left the screen, clearly not wanting to see the trick she had helped pull off despite her false cheer as she boasted to Machi about her 'debut act'. Machi himself mostly absorbed all the information they gave him with a thoughtful quiet that Apollo almost found soothing; Although clearly worried for his family, the Borginian teen was a lot calmer about the whole thing than his siblings... or, at least, he looked calmer than Apollo felt.

With the trial in the background, Apollo spread out Phoenix's case file across the glass table between the sofas, going through every page of notes in a kind of meticulous detail he hadn't given them since the first time he saw them nearly four years ago. The transcript they mostly skipped, though Machi used it a few times to help practise his English, reading along with the trial on screen. Aside from official courtroom files, everything else was meticulous notes Phoenix had made after the trial, everything from recounting his brief meetings with Zak, when and how he'd been given the forged page, his questioning sessions with Valant in the detention centre, a breakdown of the trick Zak had used to escape, and his meeting with the Mishams. Between the words were some of Phoenix's characteristic doodles, sketches of notable items such as Vera's stamp and nail polish, or Mister Hat. There was even a page of notes on the Gramarye family, Phoenix musing to himself on the mystery of Thalassa and who had killed Magnifi and why neither Zak nor Valant could refuse an order to shoot him; This one Apollo had looked at fondly, eyes on a brief sketch Phoenix had made of Thalassa's bracelets - Clearly, this was one of the older files in the collection, from before Luke's parents died and Phoenix first met Apollo, bringing the two boys into the Wright family. "It's been seven years," he muttered.

Trucy looked over from the TV with a raised eyebrow. "Yeah, we know."

"N-no, I'm not talking about the trial," Apollo replied, staring at the paper with a growing smile. "October fourth, twenty-nineteen. The date Dad adopted me and Luke."

Machi's eyes widened. "Seven years and four days!"

Trucy hummed in thought, arms crossed. "True. Last Sunday was the anniversary."

Apollo chuckled, placing the paper in his hands down on the table. "We never do anything special to mark it, but... I could never forget that date." He paused, smile fading a little. "Or thank Dad enough for taking me in... Even clearing his name feels like it wouldn't do that."
Trucy gave him a funny look. "Who says Daddy wants us to thank him? We're family. We try to help each other anyway."

At that, Apollo laughed. "True."

It was as he'd dropped back by his apartment to pick up his magic props before their show Apollo decided he couldn't leave his young siblings alone that night. With Clay still out, he had to resort to sending his friend a text, still wondering what it was that had the astronaut acting so strangely.

_I'm staying at the agency tonight jsyk ._

_Cool. I won't be home either. This thing I'm doing involves a sleepover you could say ;) might even extend to tmrw ;)_

_Clay ._

_I'm not saying a word ;) seeya whenever law boy_

Maybe it was because of the stress of what had almost happened to Trucy and Machi, but once Apollo curled up on Phoenix's bed that night, he'd dropped right off to sleep. Not that sleeping seemed to have helped: It was a restless night for Apollo, punctuated with nightmares of trials past and present replaying in his mind, merging together all the worst moments as predictions for what might happen the following day's trial.

He was missing Luke's help more than ever.

"You two should watch from the gallery today."

Trucy and Machi looked up in surprise, standing in the hallway outside their assigned lobby. "Polly?" Trucy asked. "W... Why can't we...?"

Apollo sighed, taking his hand off the doorhandle and turning to face the two teenagers behind him. "I don't want you two at the bench today. Not after yesterday."

The pair's eyes widened, though Trucy was quick to adopt a scowl. "What!?(""

"B-but isoveli, we want to help!" Machi protested.

"What does yesterday have to do with anything!?" Trucy demanded, stomping a foot. "It wasn't because we were with you that we got in trouble, and it's not like what happened yesterday is something that could ever happen again!"

"That doesn't matter!" Apollo argued. "After what happened, I don't want you two in the firing line at the bench! You're safer in the gallery!"

The only word that Apollo could think of to describe Machi's expression was 'heartbroken'. "But-that's not fair!" Trucy interrupted, face turning red. "Why aren't you letting us help you!? We're
"Because I can't risk that you're not!" Apollo cried, and he didn't even register his own words until after they had shocked his siblings into silence. "I... There's enough riding on this trial already," he forced out around the sudden lump in his throat. "I-if something happens and Vera dies, o-or I can't prove Dad was framed... If something else unexpected happens and you two end up in danger again, I'd... never be able to forgive myself." He choked back a sob, quickly rubbing at his eyes with an arm. "The witness I want to call today is dangerous. I don't want him anywhere near you."

Machi was the first to react, stepping forward and hugging Apollo tightly around the middle. "We want to help you, isoveli," he said. "We know you look after us. We safe with you."

Trucy nodded, her anger gone. "You're being as stubborn as Daddy with his 'secret mission'," she sadly pointed out. "Honestly, we'll be safe with you. Why won't you let us help, Polly?"

"Please, Apollo. I promise I have a reason for keeping this to myself for now. Trust me."

"You promised me, six years ago now, that I could help you. That you'd include me in your investigation. You obviously didn't want to, you've never wanted to, but you let me in, you let me help. Why are you cutting me out of this, Dad?"

Apollo sighed as the three-month-old conversation echoed in his head - 'We were talking about Machi... and I didn't even know it yet.' - and he hugged his youngest brother tight. "I..."

"Please, isoveli," Machi mumbled into Apollo's vest. "No want you hurting. Want to help."

Trucy wordlessly stepped forward, placing a hand on her eldest brother's arm. The words of a much older conversation, one from less than a year after his adoption, rang in Apollo's head:

"As much as I love your sister, she's incapable of keeping a secret that doesn't involve magic. You and Luke I can trust on that, but Trucy would quite rightly demand to know the details if I told you both, and this is a secret that's too dangerous to allow to get out."

"Dangerous? More dangerous than you being accused of forgery?"

"I was led into a trap, my last day in a courtroom. I foolishly walked into it, but I'm not allowing the same mistake to happen a second time. No one else can do this but me."

"I'll keep the secret. Let me help you, Dad."

"... I knew I could count on you."

Blinking back tears, Apollo reached out and pulled his sister into the hug. It had been a long six years since then - he'd been the same age Trucy was now - and he knew she had grown into someone he'd trust with his life. Maybe it was time he proved it. "Alright," he relented. "You can help me."
The pair looked up at him with surprised grins, then held Apollo tight. "We will!" Machi promised.

"We'll be the best help ever!" Trucy added. "Even better than Luke!"

Apollo couldn't help a laugh. "I doubt that," he quietly pointed out, "but... I'll be glad to have someone with me today."

The teens both giggled, pressing their faces into his shoulders. "You couldn't drag us away if our lives depended on it!" Trucy boasted.

Resisting the urge to point out they very well could, Apollo just weakly laughed and held the pair tighter. "I knew I could count on you."

View the Court Record
Apollo stood tall behind the defence bench as he had the previous day, with Trucy on his right and Machi on his left. Were it not for Machi's casual clothing, it would have looked like no time had passed for them at all, though they each felt like it had been a lifetime since the atroquinine scare that had chased them out the previous day. Opposite them, Klavier waited behind the prosecutor's bench, idly going through his files with a terse frown. Apollo wondered if, just like him, he had the Gramarye case file sitting alongside the Misham files on the desk in front of him.

The gallery was calmed by the rapping of the judge's gavel, the old man sitting comfortably at the top of his podium. "Court is now in session for the trial of Vera Misham."

Apollo nodded. "The defence is ready, Your Honour."

Klavier's eyes didn't leave his files, though he arranged them neatly one final time. "Prosecution's ready to rock."

The judge turned his attention to the distracted blond. "Prosecutor Gavin. How is the defendant-Vera Misham's condition?"

"Acute atroquinine poisoning." Klavier flipped his hair with one hand, and Apollo caught the flash of a disgusted expression before the man carefully covered it with a business-like frown. "According to her physician, she could die at any time... thus, her absence from the courtroom today."

"What!?" Trucy muttered, crossing her arms with an offended look. "They can't put her on trial without her being here!"

"It is unusual," Apollo quietly admitted. Truthfully, he'd been expecting this: Last he'd heard, Vera was still hospitalised and in a coma, so she was unlikely to be well enough to attend anything for a while. This was a trial too important to put off, and waiting for Vera to recover was more likely to result in her death than a verdict.

Trucy huffed. "They should wait for her to get better and do it then. It's so bureaucratic of them!"

"It is unusual," Apollo quietly admitted. Truthfully, he'd been expecting this: Last he'd heard, Vera was still hospitalised and in a coma, so she was unlikely to be well enough to attend anything for a while. This was a trial too important to put off, and waiting for Vera to recover was more likely to result in her death than a verdict.

Machi simply looked worried, rubbing his arm with his other hand. "I think it make sense..."

Whether Klavier had heard Trucy, Apollo couldn't say, but the prosecutor did continue, "A trial without a verdict can only cause grief... The records of this case, and experience, tell us this."

'That's the truest thing I've heard all day...'

"Apologies to the defendant," Klavier said with a solemn nod to the empty witness stand, "but the show must go on."

The judge thought a moment, then nodded. "Very well. Your opening statement, Prosecutor Gavin."

With a quiet sigh, Klavier stood tall behind his bench, putting on a stern expression. "The prosecution's case is unchanged by recent events. Why did Vera Misham succumb to poison? Because she couldn't live with the guilt of what she'd done."

Although Apollo knew Klavier was only doing his job, he couldn't let that stand without a loud "Objection!", pointing across the room. "But Vera was poisoned with atroquinine! The exact same poison that took her father's life!"

Although he didn't make eye contact with the defence, Klavier managed a small smirk. "What better confession could you ask for? Being the killer, she would have had access to the poison. Significant, since it's rather hard to come by."

The judge hummed in thought. "That is true."

"In other words," Klavier continued, "I see no need for further discussion. We could have had our verdict yesterday."

Apollo heard Machi gasp in surprise at his side. True, they disagreed with his words... but after what had happened yesterday, Apollo knew not even Klavier truly agreed with what he was saying.

"Well, Mister Wright?" the judge asked, turning to the defence bench. "If you have no objections, I see no reason to postpone a verdict."

Apollo shook his head. "What we need to worry about isn't the verdict, but the trial itself," he proclaimed. "The defence holds that Vera Misham is the victim, not the killer!"

Klavier's eyes were closed, and he ran a hand through his hair. "The poison that felled our defendant was in her nail polish," he explained.

The judge looked confused. "Nail polish...?"

Apollo couldn't help raising an eyebrow at the old man.

"Paint for nails, Herr Judge," Klavier briefly explained, looking up at the podium. "Know any women with red nails?"

"Ah! My wife has red nails!" the judge cried, eyes wide. "I see... So she's been painting them all this time!"

Apollo screwed up his nose in complete confusion. 'How do you miss your own wife painting her nails every day?'

Klavier didn't react, closing his eyes again. "During her testimony yesterday, the defendant bit into her painted nails and ingested the poison right in front of us. The defence itself informs us she put that polish there of her own volition. How, then, do they propose her poisoning was caused by anyone else but her?"

The judge nodded in agreement. "The prosecution's objection is sustained. I ask the defence to prove its claims to this court."

Apollo took a deep breath. "Vera Misham was poisoned through nail polish she applied herself. I can't argue that. But." He pointed across the room, deciding to be dramatic even though Klavier had yet to even glance at the attorney opposite him. "She had no idea that poison was there! Someone else saw her nervous habit of biting her nails and planted that nail polish just as they planted the stamp that killed her father!"
The gallery muttered to itself, silenced by a tap of the judge's gavel. "Mister Wright. Am I to understand you are about to accuse someone of this poisoning? I hope you realise the weight of such an accusation."

Apollo nodded. "I understand, Your Honour," he replied. 'Don't worry, I know exactly what I'm doing.' He turned towards Klavier. "Did the prosecution find the bottle of nail polish that was poisoned?"

Klavier didn't immediately reply, though Apollo spotted a wince crossing his face. "We did." He reached under his desk and produced a very familiar-looking bottle: Blue crystal, with a curled hand extending upwards from the lid. Inside was a faint tinge of pink from the liquid within.

"What's this...?" the judge muttered, leaning forward. His eyes widened as he saw the object, and he smiled. "My, what a beautiful bottle. I'd like to give whoever designed that a hand." He frowned, turning to Apollo. "But what does this bottle have to do with the defence's culprit?"

"Because of this." Holding his hand up in the air, Apollo showed off for the courtroom a small bottle of nail polish, identical to the one in Klavier's hand... except for the lack of pink from the colourless liquid inside. 'Thanks Dad for keeping this thing on hand and telling me where to find it...'

Trucy gasped from Apollo's side. "Oh! Isn't that...?"

"Know someone else who might have owned this bottle?" Apollo prompted Klavier. "A someone who gave it to my family, several years ago?"

Klavier gave the bottle in Apollo's hand only a glance, lowering the one in his hand to his bench. He said nothing.

"Who was it?" the judge asked, perked up with undeniable excitement. "Do you have a name?"

Apollo nodded, placing the bottle on the bench in front of him. "On the matter of both Drew Misham's murder and Vera Misham's poisoning... the defence accuses Kristoph Gavin."

The judge only had enough time to gasp in shock before Klavier was slamming a fist against the wall behind him, shouting, "Objection! There's no way he could do a thing like that!" He took a shuddering breath, subtly shaking his hand - the same one he had injured the previous day - and Apollo didn't miss the pained look on his face as Klavier finally met his opponent's eyes. "You should know that better than anyone else!"

The judge nodded, concerned. "Indeed. He is behind bars."

"I know," Apollo calmly replied, keeping his focus on Klavier. "However, that doesn't mean it was impossible to do what he did."

Klavier stared back, silent, eyebrows furrowed in a mixture of suspicion and what Apollo could only assume was denial.

"Ask yourself when he put the poison in the bottle," Apollo continued, giving Klavier a pointed look. "It could have been yesterday. It could have been a month ago. Maybe it was a year ago. Or, perhaps... it was seven years ago."

"B-but," the judge muttered, confused, "Kristoph Gavin had no motive for killing this poor girl! It's simply inconceivable!"

Apollo kept his eyes on Klavier, who was sweating mutely behind his bench. "Prosecutor Gavin doesn't seem to think so." Klavier looked away, pained, and Apollo sent him a silent apology as he pointed a finger at the prosecutor, turning to look up at the judge. "That face tells me one thing: Kristoph Gavin's own younger brother doesn't find it inconceivable at all."

The judge hummed in thought, watching Klavier with a concerned look. "Well, Prosecutor Gavin? If you feel there is a clear and pressing need, then we may have to summon Kristoph Gavin from jail as a special witness."

For a long moment, Klavier didn't respond, leaning forward on his bench with his face hidden from view. "Fine," he finally muttered, voice hoarse. "I've known for some time that an impenetrable darkness lurked at the bottom of this... a darkness that has swallowed even myself."

Apollo couldn't help but feel a wave of pity for Klavier in that moment. 'It's funny... I'd've thought watching the video of how he took down Dad would have made me hate him more... but it's only made me realise just how much he's changed since then. He's a totally different person now.'

Klavier sighed, standing tall and running a hand through his hair. He avoided any kind of eye contact with anyone else. "Okay. The defence's wish is granted. Let prisoner Kristoph Gavin take the stand."

The judge nodded once before waving to the nearest court official. "Bailiff, begin proceedings to call a special witness: Kristoph Gavin, currently residing in Solitary Cell Thirteen at Central Prison!"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. 'How does the judge know that offhand?'

The bailiff scurried away, out of the courtroom. At the prosecutor's bench, Klavier turned around to lean on his desk; It was clear he needed some time to process what was going on... although Apollo suspected he'd had an idea of what might happen today the moment he laid eyes on Vera's bottle of nail polish.

"Court will reconvene once the special witness arrives," the judge announced, and banged his gavel once before getting up and wandering off.

As the gallery muttered above them, gradually filing out of the room, Machi turned towards Apollo in vague confusion. "Isoveli... This is dangerous witness?"

Apollo nodded, shooting Trucy a glance only to see she was looking away, fingers playing with her brooch. Keeping his eyes between the pair, he explained, "He was my mentor for over a year; I know better than most what he's really like." He sighed. "This is your last chance to sit out. You two can still go watch from the gallery if you've changed your minds."

Trucy's eyes shot up to meet his with a glare. "We're not leaving you."

Machi nodded in agreement, equally determined. "We stay and we help, isoveli. We help you and we help Isa."

Apollo could help a smile. "The best helpers I could ever ask for." Patting their shoulders, he led them back out of the courtroom to wait for the inevitable.

"You bet we are," Trucy replied with a proud grin. Machi just giggled.
Central Prison wasn't far from the courthouse, so Apollo was confident as they entered the lobby that the wait for Kristoph to arrive wouldn't be too long. Even so, he tapped at his bracelet nervously as he wandered ahead of his siblings. Although he had never known when it would come, or how it would happen, this was the moment he had been preparing himself for for six years now. It was finally time to confront Kristoph on his forgery, and clear Phoenix's name. If only it didn't involve actually questioning Kristoph...

Behind him, Trucy sighed loudly as she closed the lobby door behind herself and Machi. "Boy, I hope this doesn't take too long," she said. "It'll be weird seeing Mister Gavin again, though."

"You said used to be friend?" Machi asked.

"Mm-hmm," Trucy replied. "Like we said yesterday, he made friends with Daddy after that trial. We used to see him all the time, until..." She trailed off, just as she had yesterday whenever the subject of her father's murder loomed its ugly head over the conversation.

Apollo glanced back at his siblings, seeing Machi patting Trucy's shoulder sympathetically. The previous day, he'd ended up waiting until Trucy was out of the room to explain to Machi what had happened to Zak, and he wished once more the pair had agreed to go wait in the gallery for this upcoming cross-examination... but they'd made their stance quite clear that they wanted to help. He looked away, his fingers still tapping against his bracelet. 'Actually... there is one way they could help...'

Trucy dismissed the previous conversation with a shake of her head. "Well. He's in jail now. There'll be guards and everything... and he'll be all the way over on the witness stand, so it's not like he can do anything. We didn't eat his nail polish, after all."

Machi bit his lip. "Vera did."

"Yeah," Trucy admitted with a sigh. "She'll be okay, though. She didn't eat enough to kill her, so she'll get better, right? She just needs to wake up." She grinned. "And when she does, we can tell her the good news of how we proved her innocent and found her dad's killer!"

Machi thought a moment, then nodded with a smile.

"You're sure you want to help?"

The pair looked over to Apollo with surprise, seeing him still standing with his back to them... though he seemed to be fiddling with something out of sight. Trucy shot him a glare, arms crossed. "Um, duh? We've already told you like five times, we're not leaving you!"

"I just wanted to check," Apollo replied, sounding a little distracted. He turned with a flutter of his cape, then held out his left hand, the glove missing and clutched in his right; Said glove-less hand was holding his bracelet, removed from its home on his wrist. "While I'm asking him questions, you can watch for tells. It'll be a lot easier if I'm not trying to do both at once."
Trucy's eyes widened, stepping backwards. "P-Polly..." Her hands twitched, torn between reaching out for the bracelet or staying at her sides.

"You said you wanted to help," Apollo pointed out, "and you've always been jealous Mom gave me this instead of you, I know you have." He smiled, though it didn't reach his eyes. "This is your chance. You can try it out while I'm questioning Mister Gavin."

Machi's eyes flicked between the two, uncertain on what to do. The importance of Apollo's bracelet as both an heirloom and an aid for his siblings' perceiving ability had been explained to him many weeks previously; He knew enough to know he had no place in this discussion, but he still hated to see any of his loved ones in pain.

"B-but I don't know to use it," Trucy pointed out.

"It's easy," Apollo assured her. "The moment you mirror any tension from the witness, it feels tighter on your wrist; I find it's easier to concentrate on what it's telling me if I'm also touching it with my other hand."

Trucy squirmed on the spot for a moment, still visibly torn. "B-but I don't know Mister Gavin as well as you do. I won't know what to look for."

"And who says I do?" Apollo replied with a shrug; He was finding it harder to keep up his false smile. "Mister Gavin's always been a master of keeping calm... I've only once or twice sensed he's lying, and I've yet to notice the source for that. It'll be easier for you, because I'll be the one actually talking to him; You just have to watch, like in Dad's poker games."

Trucy said nothing, still staring uncertainly at the bracelet in her brother's hand.

Apollo sighed. "Truce, just take it. My arm is getting tired."

Finally, Trucy screwed up her courage, stepped forward... and shoved her brother's bracelet into his chest. "I'm not taking it."

Machi gasped, his hands to his mouth. Apollo, shocked by the force of his sister's push, took half a step back. "Truce...?"

"Mommy gave it to you," Trucy insisted, glaring intensely into Apollo's wide eyes. "I don't know how to use it and I don't know what to look for. Mommy gave it to you and I don't want it."

Machi looked between the two rapidly, unsure what to do. His siblings stood in silence before him, staring at each other in a long silence that he wasn't sure he was able to break.

Finally, Trucy's glare faded. "Mommy gave it to you," she whispered. "I'll watch for tells if you want me to, but using your bracelet isn't going to help me do that."

Apollo stared for a long moment before wordlessly slipping his bracelet and then his glove back on his hand.

Trucy sighed in relief. "Thank you, Polly."

When Apollo finished pulling on his glove, he gave his sister a smile that rang more genuine than any they'd seen since the trial started.
Twenty minutes after the judge sent his request to the prison, court reconvened as though it had never had a recess in the first place. The gathered crowds watched in silence from the gallery as a pair of very scary prison guards escorted in through the double doors a tall, blond man in an impeccable blue suit, idly adjusting his glasses as he strode to the witness stand.

Even after all this time, and without his badge, Kristoph Gavin looked every inch the sophisticated attorney who had earned the nickname of The Coolest Defence in the West.

Kristoph looked up at the judge's podium with a calm smile. "Ah, Your Honour. How nice to see you again."

"I-it's been quite a while, hasn't it?" the judge replied, adjusting some papers awkwardly as he avoided eye contact.

"To what do I owe the pleasure of your company?" Kristoph asked, ignoring the almost fearful reaction as he kept up the friendly and polite façade he wore so easily. "It's not every day I'm summoned from my solitary cell. In fact, it's never."

Apollo had to admit... even he was still scared of Kristoph. He'd been wary enough back when he only suspected the man of forgery and deceit, but knowing he had killed someone, suspecting that he had attempted to kill two others and succeeded at least once... He screwed up his courage and called across the room, "I think you already know, Mister Kristoph Gavin."

Kristoph's gaze turned towards the defence bench, and his head followed soon after. "Ah, Mister Apollo Wright. I hear you've been doing quite well for yourself."

Apollo tried not to wince guiltily at the subtle dig in his former boss's words. Somehow, he still felt like the student intern under the gaze of the senior partner who had mentored him. He'd never really had the courage to disagree with Kristoph on anything, not without his father backing him up... How could he have expected to be able to fight this alone?

Machi patted his brother's arm with a smile. "You can do this, isoveli," he whispered. "I believe in you!"

Trucy shot him a quick grin in agreement, before returning her attention to watching Kristoph carefully; Just as Apollo had asked her, she was already spotting for the man's tells.

At the teens' encouragement, Apollo managed to retrieve his bravery from wherever it had fled. 'That's right... I may not have back-up this time, but I do have someone to protect.' Keeping his siblings close to the forefront of his mind, he grabbed the nail polish from his bench and held it high. "Does this bottle look familiar?"

"Ariadoney nail polish?" Kristoph asked, still smiling as though he was only there for a friendly visit. "Why yes, I use it myself. As did the late defendant, I hear."

"She's not dead yet!" Apollo immediately objected, nearly slamming the nail polish back on the bench as he shot the man a glare.

"And?" Kristoph continued, paying no attention to his former mentee's words. "Was there something concerning this bottle you wished to ask me about?" He waved a hand with a chuckle. "I admit, I respect her for her taste in nail polish."

Apollo almost bit his tongue as he spat out, "Her taste indeed!" He gestured across the room, barely noticing the meekly withdrawn stance of the prosecutor as he focussed on indicating the bottle on the desk there. "This nail polish was how Vera Misham was poisoned!"

Kristoph gave the bottle on the prosecutor's bench only a glance. "Atroquinine, was it?"

The judge was watching suspiciously from atop his podium. "You're well informed about the case, Mister Gavin."

"Even in solitary, much comes to my desk," Kristoph explained, shrugging nonchalantly, "and I have nothing to do but read." Finally, he turned his attention to the lone figure of the courtroom he had yet to address, still smiling serenely. "Well, Klavier?"

Klavier subtly flinched, a hand picking at his hair as he stared at the bench in front of him. Apollo was sure he could see a thin coating of sweat under the prosecutor's pale fringe.

Kristoph didn't seem to notice his brother's uncharacteristic silence. "Maybe you can explain this?"

Kristoph remained quiet and unmoving for long enough, Apollo began to worry he was completely shutting down. 'C'mon Diva, you're the prosecutor! You're allowed to take your brother's side on this! I certainly wouldn't blame you!' Regardless, he kept his support in his head, chewing his lip nervously.

Finally, though he stayed very still, Klavier spoke up: "You're being accused again." His usual German accent was oddly muted, more like the 'Konrad' who had dropped by the Wonder Bar three months earlier. "By him. Again."

Kristoph slowly nodded. "Ahh." He then raised an eyebrow, watching Klavier like a stern parent. "And? You agree with his accusation, do you?"

Klavier didn't reply.

Machi leaned close to Apollo with a worried look. "Is prosecutor okay...?"

Apollo could only wince in response.

"Let's hold a proper trial, shall we?" the judge announced, tapping his gavel. "Kristoph Gavin, your testimony, please."

Kristoph only smiled, though it didn't quite reach his eyes. "I'd be delighted."

The judge glared back. "The charges against you are quite severe, Mister Gavin. You are suspected of the poisoning of the defendant, Vera Misham. Please testify on this matter to the court!" With that, he tapped his gavel.

Apollo gripped his bracelet tightly. Kristoph had always disapproved of him using his perception during a trial... but, then again, he hadn't played by Kristoph's rules in a long time. He certainly wasn't going to start again now.

In the resulting silence, the entire room's attention on him, Kristoph began to chuckle to himself, then shook his head. "Owning the same nail polish does not a murderer make," he pointed out. "I have been in solitary confinement for half a year. How could I poison her?" He shrugged nonchalantly.
"Her father died of the same poison... the meaning of which should be clear. The prosecution's case holds: She poisoned her father, then attempted to poison herself." He scoffed, pushing his glasses up his nose. "Surely, you aren't going to suggest I was responsible for poisoning her father, too?"

His bracelet twitched on Apollo's wrist, and he almost gasped as he caught a glimpse of a ghostly face over Kristoph's. 'W-was that...? What was that!?'

The judge suddenly looked very unsure of himself. "Well... I'm afraid the defence's claim is sounding rather unlikely."

"Naturally," Kristoph replied, smiling warmly despite the ice in his tone. "For one, I don't even know the Mishams. Isn't that so, Mister Wright?"

Apollo could only stare in silence, his hand still gripping his bracelet.

"Very well," the judge sighed, and tapped his gavel. "Mister Wright, begin your cross-examination."

The young defence attorney gave the old man a quick nod. Instead of turning his attention to the witness stand, he instead leaned close to his sister: "See anything?"

Trucy looked up, an uncertain frown on her face. "I thought I did," she admitted. "I... saw a face. Right when he said 'her father too'."

Apollo nodded again, biting his lip in thought. "Me too." 'Dad's notes mentioned Vera saw 'the devil' when she spoke with her client, didn't they? Is this what she meant?' He took a deep breath and returned his attention to the rest of the court. 'No more second-guessing myself. It's time to go.'
"Kristoph Gavin, it was you who killed Drew Misham."

Kristoph scoffed at Apollo's confident accusation. "A bluff worthy of your father."

"Thank you," Apollo replied, crossing his arms with a glare. "But I'm not bluffing."

Kristoph raised an eyebrow.

"I know you've never liked the idea of me using my perception during a trial," Apollo continued. "It's a crap-shoot, tense witnesses aren't necessarily guilty witnesses, it's not evidence and evidence is everything in court..." He shook his head. "I listened to you, don't get me wrong... but over the past six months, I've found exactly the opposite: Being able to tell when someone is lying is the most useful skill an attorney can have, in and out of court."

"And?" Kristoph asked, unfazed.

"And I finally spotted your tell!" Gaining confidence, Apollo threw out his hand to point at the witness stand. "Right when you said 'her father too'. That little demonic face Vera saw during her only face-to-face meeting with her client, with a man who hid his identity behind a mask! It was on the back of your hand the entire time!"

Kristoph only shook his head, chuckling at his former apprentice. "Alright, Apollo: Let's assume, for the sake of argument, that you 'saw' some proof of a lie. Tell me, was Drew Misham fond of nail polish too?"

"Sorry, but there's more than one way to poison a man," Apollo replied, leaning on his bench. "You don't need nail polish to get to someone's mouth."

"Ah, then I must be very talented indeed." Kristoph crossed his arms, reminding Apollo strongly of all the times the man had ever given him advice in the past. "You see, Drew Misham was killed on October six, while I was already in my solitary confinement cell at Central Prison." He shook his head, brushing at his hair with a smug laugh. "If that's not an alibi, then I don't know what is."

Apollo nodded, conceding the point. "But you found a way, all the same. And I found it, too."

Kristoph pushed his glasses up his nose, watching Apollo closely.

One hand at his Court Record, Apollo activated the courtroom's holograms and tossed up the old image of Vera's prized stamp Phoenix had sent him. "This is how you poisoned Mister Misham!" He crossed his arms with a stern glare as the gallery broke into mutters above them. "I'm sure it requires no introduction."

Kristoph didn't react, simply staring in reply.

"The night Mister Misham died, he was seen writing a letter," Apollo explained. "Atroquinine was found on this stamp, Mister Gavin."

As cool as ever, Kristoph only looked up at the displayed picture thoughtfully. "So am I to understand this stamp was the murder weapon?"

"Yes, you are. Oh, and yes," Apollo switched out the crisp photo for a blurry one of the stamp on a yellow envelope, "this stamp was found in your prison cell!"

He didn't outwardly react, but Apollo caught a glimpse of Kristoph's eyes subtly widening. Above, the mutterings of the gallery grew steadily louder.

Apollo turned to the judge. "That is all, Your Honour."

On top of his podium, the old man was banging his gavel, shooting glares at the gathered crowds. "Order! Order! Order!" Huffing to himself, he then turned to Apollo. "P-poison on the back of that stamp!?"

Apollo nodded. "After the trial yesterday, someone paid a visit to this witness's cell! Phoenix Wright, in fact."

"There, he found this stamp," Apollo continued, moving his gaze from the judge to the witness stand. "You made Drew Misham write you a letter! That's how you killed him!"

Across the room, Klavier looked up from his sullen stare at his desk. "What...!?"

"My my." Kristoph gestured to the prosecutors' bench, his eyes on the young man opposite. "You've upset my poor brother to the point of uselessness." He crossed his arms, smiling smugly. "Allow me to clarify this matter, Wright: All you need to do is recall witness Spark Brushel's testimony."

Apollo frowned. "You didn't know what we'd figured out about the stamp, but you do know what Brushel told us?"

"He said Mister Misham put his letter in an envelope and began 'looking for a stamp',' Kristoph explained, and pointed to the holograms. "Ergo, he had no intention of using this stamp."

Apollo remained suspicious. "What are you getting at?"

"What I'm arriving at is that this commemorative stamp was in a frame!" Kristoph almost laughed. "It was mere coincidence that he used it that night."

The judge frowned in thought. "That would... seem to be the case."

"Or perhaps you mean to suggest that I can somehow manipulate coincidence?" Kristoph continued, eyes turned on Apollo. He raised a single eyebrow to emphasise his point.

Apollo paused. Any retort he might have had stuck in his throat and refused to go any further.

"He does have a point," the judge agreed. "How would this witness know if the victim was going to use that stamp?" He shook his head. "Without that, he couldn't have planned the murder!"

"W-what!?” Apollo cried, looking up at the man in disbelief.

Kristoph scoffed, turning to the prosecutor's bench. "Really, Klavier. You should be seeing through these weak-spined bluffs by now."

Klavier only stared mutely at the floor.

Apollo tried to speak up and defend himself, but still found himself unable to conjure the words. 'He's right... How could anyone have known Mister Misham would use that stamp that night? Least of all Kristoph Gavin locked away in his cell...' He leaned forward on his bench. 'Now what do I do?'

"Isoveli?" Machi whispered, looking worried.

Trucy remained silent, eyes on Kristoph as she stood tall at her brother's side.

"Well, it seems that the defence has run out of things to say," the judge pointed out.

Kristoph scoffed. "You assume he had something to say in the first place. I believe Mister Wright's bluff," he pushed his glasses up his nose with a smirk, "has been called."

"Mister Wright's bluff?"

Apollo looked up in surprise, seeing Klavier's eyes moving from the floor to the elder Gavin with a glare.

"I'm not sure I agree with you there, Kristoph."

Kristoph's eyes widened, staring back at his brother. "K-Klavier?"

"Honestly, I wanted to believe you." Klavier shifted behind his bench, turning to more firmly face the witness stand. "But Mister Wright wasn't the one trying to get away with a bluff. You were, Kristoph!" As he spoke, the German accent that had drifted out of his voice returned in full force.

"W-what are you saying?" the judge asked, looking between the Gavins in shock. "Prosecutor Gavin!"

Klavier turned to the defence bench, snapping his fingers at Apollo. "Herr Forehead. What was your accusation again?"

Apollo was too surprised to reply for a moment. "Uh, it was that-

" 'This poisoned stamp killed Drew Misham', ja?" Klavier gestured briefly to the holograms above them. "To which my brother responded thusly: 'There was no way to know when Misham would use the stamp'."

The judge nodded. "Yes, that's right. Which is why it couldn't have been planned."

Klavier shook his head, a hard frown of disappointment on his face. Apollo found himself reminded of the end of Machi's trial, how Klavier had looked at Daryan as the guitarist was incriminated. "Tell me: It needs to be 'planned'... why?"

Apollo blinked. That's... a good point."

"Why couldn't it have been a 'coincidence'? The defence's case is simply that Drew Misham died by that stamp. That's all." Pointedly staring his brother in the eyes, Klavier slammed a fist against the wall behind him. "Kristoph, you tried to slip out from under his accusation by changing the subject! If that's not bluffing, what is it?"
Kristoph simply stared right back, eyes narrowed. "What are you up to, Klavier?"

"I could ask you the same question, Kristoph."

In response, Kristoph simply smiled. "I silenced the defence with the fewest words possible. It's called 'efficiency'."

Finally, the judge spoke up: "B-but Mister Gavin, that's impermissible testimony!"

Kristoph shrugged. "Very well. I shall take his claim head-on, then." He turned to the defence bench. "Wright."

Apollo tried not to flinch, standing tall. "What?"

"You accuse me of Drew Misham's murder, yes?" Kristoph chuckled, shaking his head. "Then, allow me to ask you: What possible reason could I have to kill a painter?"

Trucy gasped, then leaned behind Apollo towards Machi. "He's talking about a motive!"

The judge hummed in thought. "Indeed. It's hard to see how an attorney could come to want to kill a painter."

Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead. 'Now here's something: Why didn't he bring up the motive from the very beginning? Unless he was afraid it was a battle he might lose...'

"What does that mean?" Machi asked, looking between his siblings. "What we do now?"

"It means we have a weak spot to find," Apollo replied, a grin spreading across his face. "And we probably have the evidence to prove it, too."

Up on his podium, the judge was tugging idly at his beard with a stern frown. "A motive for murder. This is a vital, if not the most vital element in this case." He turned to Apollo. "Please consider this when making your statement, Mister Wright."

Apollo nodded, standing tall and confident behind his bench. It was hard to miss just how much was riding on his next move. "Understood, Your Honour. I'd like to present evidence."

Kristoph's expression didn't change, but he seemed to be watching Apollo very carefully regardless.

"Then let's see what you have for us," the judge said. "What reason did Kristoph Gavin have for wanting to murder Drew Misham?"

Apollo turned his gaze to one of the two case files sitting on the bench in front of him. With a determined frown, he opened the older of the two, resting his hand on the scrap of paper resting on top. "Kristoph Gavin's motive becomes clear... when we consider why the stamp came to Drew Misham's studio in the first place."

The judge's eyes widened. "And why was that?"

Apollo's gaze snapped up to the podium. " Forgery, Your Honour. Go back seven years. Drew Misham accepts his first job," holding the scrap of paper tight in his hand, he held it high to show the court, "creating forged evidence."

"I've... seen that before!" the judge cried with a gasp. "A page from a diary, wasn't it? Magnifi Gramarye's diary!"
Kristoph chuckled. "Ah, when attorney Phoenix Wright lost his badge, yes." He gestured to the paper in Apollo's hand. "This was the 'evidence' he presented... to his loss."

Apollo nodded, placing the scrap back on his bench. "This evidence is a fake, yes. But did Phoenix Wright request the forgery be made?" He pointed accusingly at Kristoph. "That was never proven!"

"Objection!" Klavier cried, slamming the wall behind him as he gave Apollo a stern glare. "He was the defence attorney on that case. Who, other than him, drunk with the prospect of victory, could have done it? And why would they?"

As Apollo looked, he could see the thin film of sweat still coating the prosecutor's face. It was hard not to take an accusation against his father personally... but Klavier was likely fighting the same battle when it came to Kristoph, and that thought kept the young magician's temper in check. "Just out of curiosity..." He flicked at his Court Record, recalling the contents of the red envelope to the holograms. "Do you remember this letter?"

The judge nodded. "That was presented in court yesterday. It was sent to Drew Misham by the client who requested that forgery."

"The 'enclosed stamp' was none other than the poisoned commemorative stamp!" Apollo pointed out. "Drew Misham drew his final breath just last Tuesday, however, the motive for his murder was already seven years old!"

Klavier was watching Apollo suspiciously. "Seven years old...?"

"The client who requested this forgery was very cautious," Apollo continued, getting into the swing of his explanation. "He tried to erase anything, and anyone, with connections to the forgery!"

The judge frowned in thought. "To keep them from talking?"

Apollo nodded. "But he made a mistake. The stamp he sent was a rare commemorative stamp of Troupe Gramarye, and Vera, a loyal fan, loved it too much to allow her father to return it." He snapped his fingers, emphasising his point. "The killer's 'time bomb' was delayed. The poisoned stamp was sealed within a glass frame, where it sat for seven whole years."

Klavier was still watching Apollo suspiciously. "Herr Forehead. Do you understand what you're telling us?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow.

"The one who schemed up the forged diary page was the one who poisoned the stamp, and it was Phoenix Wright who presented the forged evidence seven years ago." Klavier snapped his fingers, imitating Apollo. "Adding the two statements together, the one who schemed to kill Drew Misham was none other than Phoenix Wright!"

"Objection!" Apollo cried, interrupting any kind of reaction from the gallery as he slammed his fists into his bench with a glare across the room. "Sorry, but that's not how this is going to go down."

Klavier's suspicious look only deepened. "Oh? Then how will it 'go down'?"

"I believe I said this yesterday, in your hearing: The person who requested the forgery had it given to Phoenix Wright, with not an inkling to him of what it truly was."

"And I heard you," Klavier replied, though he didn't look convinced. "But my question is this: who exactly does Phoenix Wright claim 'gave' it to him? The forger's client? The forger herself?"
Apollo shook his head, trying not to look as nervous as he felt about being made to answer that question. "Neither. That person is unrelated to this-"

"I did."

View the Court Record
The courtroom's attention immediately turned to the teenage girl at Apollo's side, standing tall with a determined frown.

Apollo's eyes widened. "Truce! What are you doing?" he hissed. On his other side, Machi looked between his siblings with a worried grimace.

"You, Fraulein?" Klavier asked, confused.

"I was going to visit my daddy in the defendant's lobby, before the trial," Trucy explained. "Then somebody stopped me... wearing a Blue Badger mask. I thought they were some kind of official courthouse person or something..." She shrugged. "They gave me a piece of paper and told me to pass it on to the 'old boy in the blue suit with the spiky hair'... so I did." Her frown faded as her eyes turned to the scrap of paper sitting on the bench in front of them. "They just said it was really important... They wouldn't tell me what it was."

Klavier watched Trucy in silence, an unreadable expression on his face.

The gallery above them was muttering loudly, so Apollo decided to silence them, slamming his fists against the bench. "Keep in mind, Trucy was only seven or eight at that time," he announced to the crowds. "All she knew was that her grandfather was dead and her father was on trial." He turned his gaze on Klavier. "Like I said: Unrelated."

"Your point is accepted," Klavier replied with a neutral tone. His eyes lingered on Trucy a moment longer before looking away.

Machi slipped behind his brother to pat his sister's back. She gave him a small smile in return.

"And one other thing," Apollo continued, fiercely pointing a single finger into the air. "Phoenix Wright wasn't hired for that case until the day before the trial. He didn't have time to request a forgery!"

"The day before...?" Klavier muttered, eyes wide.

But Apollo wasn't done. "Now here's a question: Just who was Shadi Enigmar's previous defence attorney?"

Face pale, Klavier's gaze moved to the man at the witness stand. "N-no..."

Kristoph stood unmoving, arms crossed and expression neutral. If it weren't for his lack of eye contact, Apollo would have sworn he hadn't even heard anything they'd been discussing.

Klavier was shaking his head, expression pained. "Th-this can't all be..."

"But it is all true," Apollo said, keeping his attention, for now, on the younger Gavin. "There was another man, a defence attorney with a badge on his collar." For the sake of the gallery, he took a dramatic swing of his arm to point firmly at the witness stand. "It was you, Kristoph Gavin!"

The gallery immediately erupted into noise, forcing the judge to start banging his gavel and call for order.

"I'm sorry, Polly."

Lowering his arm, Apollo turned to his sister. "Hm?"

"I'm sorry for speaking up like that," Trucy muttered, one hand fiddling with her brooch. Behind her, Machi continued to pat her back.

"It's fine," Apollo assured her, giving the teen a smile. "You didn't do anything wrong, then or now."

Trucy tried to return the smile, but it came out as more of a grimace. "Are... Are you going to bring up how Daddy...?"

Apollo nodded, smile fading. "Probably."

The determined look returned to his sister's face. "Alright."

Finally, the judge calmed the crowds, and huffed as he turned his attention to the witness stand. "What is the meaning of this, witness? I mean, defendant! Er," he shook his head, confused, "former lawyer?"

Kristoph stood calm for a long moment, pressing his glasses up his nose. "Let me begin by denying this. As I'm sure the defence is aware, attorneys are registered with the court the day before the trial begins. In other words, no record of this 'previous defence attorney' remains in the court." He turned to Apollo with a smile. "How exactly did you intend to prove Phoenix Wright's claim?"

Apollo tried not to wince. After all, he'd known for six years that they couldn't prove this particular problem; If Kristoph wouldn't confess, there was nothing they could do.

The judge hummed in agreement. "That would be difficult. I'm afraid this line of inquiry won't yield."

"Objection!" came a shout from the other side of the room, where Klavier was leaning on his bench, sweat covering his face. His eyes were focussed firmly on Apollo's. "Herr Forehead. Are you sure you don't have evidence?"

Apollo stared back at the prosecutor in confusion.

"What is wrong with...?" Machi whispered from behind.

"Evidence!" Klavier repeated, slamming his fist against the wall behind him. "Evidence that shows this man, Kristoph Gavin," he gestured to his brother, "requested that forgery seven years ago!"

A surprised look managed to break through Kristoph's calm exterior. "Klavier...?"

"Just... prove it!" Klavier demanded, attention on Apollo. "Clear up these doubts now, or I swear, I'm off this case!" He swung an arm wildly, his breathing heavy under the emotional roller-coaster he was going through.

Machi gasped, running behind Apollo to retake his place on the attorney's right. "He must know of evidence!"
"That's right!" Trucy agreed. "You know what he means, Polly?"

Apollo could only stare back at the distressed prosecutor opposite him. Is Machi right? Does Diva know of something we could use to prove this? His gaze hardened, turning to his Court Record as he reviewed his evidence. Dad, Zak Gramarye, both Drew and Vera Misham... They're all victims of this case. Who'd've thought I'd ever be so tempted to add the Diva to that list?

"Well, Mister Wright?" the judge called. "You claim Kristoph Gavin requested a forgery of Drew Misham seven years ago. Prove it."

Near the end of his list, Apollo's eyes landed on a group of photos he had not taken, that had been sent to him the previous night. He gave the pictures only a stern look before meeting the judge's gaze. "It can be proven."

Kristoph stared at Apollo for a moment before scoffing. "Simply ridiculous. Why even discuss it? This 'evidence' does not-"

"Objection!" Klavier interrupted, eyes firmly on the attorney at the defence bench. "Are you... telling the truth, Apollo Wright?"

Apollo met the prosecutor's pained gaze with a confident nod. "I am."

Klavier minutely sighed in relief, straightening a little behind his bench. "Then... I say we give him the benefit of the doubt."

"Very well," the judge agreed, and turned to Apollo. "Mister Wright, show us the link between our witness and Drew Misham."

Taking only a deep breath to prepare himself, Apollo placed a single finger on his computer's screen and flicked it upwards. "Take that!" On the holograms above, a fuzzy image formed of a handwritten letter, held in someone's hand with the yellow tinge of its envelope peeking out behind it.

The courtroom only had enough time to gasp before there was a shout from the witness stand: "Objection!" Krishoph was glaring at the defence, sternly enough that Apollo almost recoiled at the sight of it. "That... blurry piece of nothing? I'm afraid I can't let you submit that."

"It's still readable," Apollo insisted, and turned to his Court Record to swap out the displayed photo for the other two he had been given. "These are of a real letter, sent by Drew Misham, and we even have a reproduction of what it says!" He threw on the display the typed file, detailing the words obscured by the low-quality images.

"Reproduction?" the judge repeated, suspicious.

Kristoph's glare faded, replaced with a disarming smile. "Ah, I see now. Yes, of course."

The judge turned his frown on Krishoph. "What do you mean 'of course'?"

"I just remembered I had a visitor yesterday," Kristoph explained. "Phoenix Wright came to my cell... except I wasn't there."

Klavier mouthed Phoenix's name, watching his brother carefully.

"When I returned, I saw he had something of mine in his possession." Kristoph chuckled. "Of course, I had no intention of letting him get away with reading my personal mail."
"Mail?" The judge gasped. "You mean, this letter was in your cell?"

Kristoph only shook his head. "It appears Phoenix Wright has yet to be cured of his bad forging habit."

"We have the photos!" Apollo protested, banging his fists on his bench, then gestured to the holograms. "And I stated outright this was only a reproduction of what that letter said!"

"You have unreadable images," Kristoph corrected. "And a reproduction cannot be submitted as proof."

Apollo huffed as he pulled the text file from the screens. "Fine then, forget the reproduction!" He threw up the clearest of the three photos. "We still have these images Dad took when he visited you yesterday! He recorded your entire conversation, Mister Gavin, and the contents of your 'personal' mail, with a small video camera he brought with him!"

Kristoph's eyes widened. "What...?" He shook off the shock, glaring at the young magician. "Regardless, this mockery of a piece of unreadable evidence will never be accepted by the court. He gestured to the photo on display. "Evidence taken from a 'video' a man with no authority whatsoever 'claims' he took? A man who happens to be an ex-attorney suspected of forgery?"

Apollo opened his mouth to object, only to pull himself back at the last minute, barely reining in his rage. Looking up at the holograms, he had to admit even the clearest image of the three was still small and blurry enough that it was borderline impossible to decipher. With the reproduction off the table... Phoenix's photos meant absolutely nothing. And that only made Apollo even angrier.

Machi patted his brother's arm, looking worried. "Isoveli?"

The judge hummed in thought, then turned to the other side of the courtroom, only to pause in surprise. "Prosecutor Gavin?"

One arm propped against his bench, Klavier had turned away from the witness stand, his back to his brother. Even his head was clearly facing away from the defence opposite. He made no move to react to the judge's call.

Apollo held back a gasp. "Herr Diva?"

Kristoph only smiled, shaking his head. "As embarrassing as this is for me to say, I'm afraid my brother is incapable of making rational judgements at the moment." He held out an expectant hand towards the judge's podium. "Your Honour, your decision, please."

The judge leaned back in his chair, tugging at his beard. After a long moment, he shook his head. "The defence's claim is denied."

"What!?!" Trucy shouted.

"Only actual, readable, evidence is permitted in a court of law." The judge tapped his gavel. "Please remove the defence's 'evidence' from the record."

Apollo felt his face turn even redder as he watched his photos disappear from the holograms. 'B-but... all of Dad's work, for seven years... It can't just end like that! I won't let it!'

Kristoph smirked. "Better luck next time, Wright."

Apollo turned his glare on the ex-attorney at the stand. He didn't dare open his mouth to reply.
"Well, we've certainly taken a detour from our cross-examination," the judge continued, "but the defence appears to be lacking proof. I'm forced to end the cross-examination of Kristoph Gavin at this point."

Trucy turned to her eldest brother with a fearful look. "P-Polly, do something!"

"I'm thinking!" Apollo snapped, turning his glare on his computer as he flipped through his evidence list.

"We... can't do anything," Machi whispered, stepping back with a solemn look. He knew as well as Apollo did that there was no other evidence they could present to change the judge's mind.

The sound of a banging gavel brought the panic at the defence bench to a halt. "Very well," the judge called. "This ends the special witness's cross-examination."

"Objection!"

View the Court Record
Klavier slowly turned to face the courtroom, one hand pointing firmly at his brother though his eyes didn't follow it. His expression was torn, somewhere between a determined frown and a painful grimace. "The show's over, yet the crowd screams for more. Only now do I understand why."

The judge looked as confused as Apollo felt. "Prosecutor Gavin?"

"Frankly, I'm relieved." Klavier's hand lowered to the bench, and he leaned his weight against it with a sigh. "This has been bothering me for seven whole years... and I'm tired of the whole youthful angst scene." He looked to the witness stand, eyes narrowed in a tired glare. "Now's our chance.
Let's clean out the family closet, eh, Kristoph?"

Kristoph wasn't impressed. "Klavier, you're spinning out of control. Calm yourself before you say something you'll regret."

"Spinning out of whose control?" Klavier pointedly replied, rounding on his brother. "Mine? Or yours?"

"Take a moment to consider everything you've built, your reputation as a prosecutor, your fame with the masses." Kristoph's gaze hardened. "You could lose it all, Klavier."

Machi gasped, tugging Apollo's cape. "He is trying press prosecutor!"

Apollo nodded. 'Hopefully Diva will do the right thing regardless... It can be tough to stand up to your older brother, but I know I've always tried to listen if my little siblings need me to.'

Trucy huffed, lacking the same trust in Klavier as her eldest brother. She bounced up against the defence bench, calling out, "Prosecutor Gavin! Try to remember what's really important to you, okay?"

Klavier's eyes moved to the teen, his glare softening into a laugh. "Please, Fraulein. I couldn't forget what's really important to me, even if I tried. In fact, I haven't. Not even once." As the Wrights watched, his smile faded to a distant look. "That trial, seven years ago... There's something else you mentioned yesterday, Herr Forehead. A certain something that has been hanging over our heads since the very moment we met, and keeps coming up again and again without fail. A certain something we've always avoided more than touching on."

Apollo felt his gaze hardening, and turned his eyes to the scrap of paper sitting on the bench in front of him.

The moment they were alone, Apollo glared at Klavier. "Just so you know, I don't trust you," he spat. "You try anything else on my family, I'll make sure to take you down like you took down our dad."
The prosecutor stared evenly for several long moments. "Your wariness is reasonable, Herr Wright," he replied in a neutral tone, nodding in acknowledgement as he stepped back. "I won't argue you on that."

Luke shoved Apollo's hand off his shoulder with a glare. "I am perfectly capable of keeping calm. There is no way you can talk me out of supporting you; Isn't it you who's always talking about what happened the last time Gavin faced one of us alone?"

Klavier grunted from behind Apollo. "Low blow, Doktor..."

Apollo hid a laugh. "If only you'd brought your Prosecutor's Badge, maybe we could have done a disappearing trick tonight."

Klavier frowned. "Low blow."

"Nonsense, that joke has like a million layers to it," Apollo shot back, his smirk growing. "Besides, it'd be more than fair for the five minutes it would be gone."

"I think it's time we stopped avoiding it, ja?"

Apollo's hands tightened into fists as he felt the familiar disgust bubbling in his gut, the burning anger at the injustice served to Phoenix seven years ago. It was all too easy to brush aside the relationship he had reluctantly forged with Klavier in the months since they met, to superimpose that image of the haughty seventeen-year-old from the tape over the solemn young man opposite him. When his gaze snapped up to meet the prosecutor, it was with a tight glare. "You knew," he hissed. "From the very beginning, you knew." He snatched the forged diary page from his bench, waving it in the air as he continued, "You knew Dad had this thing, and what it was!" It took a great amount of self-control to not roughly slam the item back down, enough that his voice slipped and gained volume in his growing rage. "You baited him into presenting it, didn't give him any choice! It was because of you he was falsely accused of forgery, convicted in the court of public opinion and stripped of his badge! You wouldn't even let his client have a retrial with a new attorney, directly causing his decision to run away, and leaving that entire case unsolved to this day!" By now, his face was red, and Apollo was only barely aware of exactly how loud his Chords of Steel were projecting. "If it weren't for you, Zak would still be around, and Dad would still have his badge, and Magnifi's death would be solved! Everything goes back to that damn forgery, goes back to you," he slammed his fists into the bench, "because. You. KNEW!"

The courtroom was deathly quiet as Apollo panted heavily in the aftermath of his outburst, leaning on the defence bench. He felt strangely calm getting that off his chest, though he had never planned on losing his temper to that extent in court, especially not to Klavier, the one person in the room who wasn't currently staring at the young attorney in shock. 'Is this how Luke feels whenever he does this?'

At the prosecutor's bench, Klavier stood with his eyes closed, having listened to the tirade in total calm. "You are correct." His eyes opened, a sad look on his face as the court's attention snapped across the room. "I did know."

Kristoph's eyes narrowed. "Don't do this, Klavier."
"What!?" the judge cried above them. The gallery was already muttering in agreement, though Apollo wasn't at all surprised. At his sides, Trucy and Machi were exchanging shocked looks.

"It was the night before the trial," Klavier explained, eyes firmly on Kristoph. "You came to the prosecutor's office and informed me we would no longer be facing each other for my courtroom debut... but in exchange, you had information for me." He snapped his fingers in the air. "The attorney who takes my place is not to be trusted, I believe were your exact words. 'Don't even give him the benefit of your respect'. And I listened." He leaned on his bench. "I called in your special witness, I pressed and played for time until that forged page finally showed up. I carried out your plan exactly the way you gave it to me." He sighed, shaking his head as he finally broke the stare-down with his brother. "I wondered about it at the time. 'How did Kristoph know so much'?"

Machi pressed his hands to his mouth with a sympathetic sigh. "Poor prosecutor..."

"Kristoph!" Klavier shouted, slamming his fist against the wall behind him. "We were supposed to face each other in that trial! A fair fight, brother to brother! I deserved that much!" He shook his head, though Apollo thought he seemed more disappointed than angry. "You let me borrow the victim's belongings... You showed me all your research on the case."

Trucy frowned, thoughtful. "The victim's... belongings?"

"Grandpa Magnifi's things," Apollo clarified for his sister, then returned his attention to the Gavins. "Which would've included his diary, wouldn't it?"

The judge looked down at the man behind the witness stand, who had yet to react to Klavier's short speech. "Mister Gavin?"

Finally, Kristoph chuckled. "My my, Klavier. You disappoint me. You find trees, yet miss the forest!"

Apollo shook his head. "You're the one missing the forest, Mister Gavin."

Kristoph only pushed his glasses up his nose, looking away.

"You can't sweep this under the rug, not anymore!" Klavier threw out an arm to point at the witness stand. "Tell me what was going on behind that trial!"

For a long moment, there was no reply. Finally, Kristoph shrugged, still smiling. "Why not? I've achieved what I came here to do. I see no harm in reminiscing."

Machi laid a hand on his brother's arm, eyes wide. "Isoveli, do this mean...?" Opposite him, Trucy watched with similar concern.

Apollo took a deep breath, resting his hands on his siblings' backs. "I think we've done all we can at this point," he whispered. "I hope it's enough."

"April, twenty-nineteen," Kristoph announced, contemplative. "The day before the trial. I visited the detention centre at the request of my client, Zak Gramarye."

'At least he's admitting to that now...'

"He didn't want to talk about his case. He only wanted to play poker... and won." A glare flickered across Kristoph's face, but it was quickly gone. "To be honest, I don't know what his reasons were to this day. As far as I could tell, he dismissed me as his representation because I lost in a game of poker. He scoffed, frowning. "I can come to no other conclusion."

"Daddy used to say something," Trucy said, just loud enough for the court to hear. "If you want to know a man, you have to compete."

Apollo rubbed his hand against her back to comfort her. Zak was never watching the cards. He was watching the man across the table.

Kristoph didn't seem to have heard the girl, huffing as his attempts to cover his anger behind his usual serene façade gradually faded. "I couldn't believe it. Phoenix Wright? A second rate attorney who relies on luck and bluffs? He dismissed me and went with that pitiful excuse for a man?"

Apollo only barely retained the self-control not to shout something at that, making do with death glares and a tight grip on his siblings' shoulders.

Kristoph shook his head. "He deserved to die for that error alone."

'Right, that's it!' Moving away from his siblings, Apollo slammed his fists against his bench, shouting, "Hold it!" He kept his focus firmly on the witness stand. "So you confess to requesting that forgery?"

Smirking, Kristoph raised an eyebrow at the young attorney. "Oh, I'm not admitting to anything. My point is," his expression abruptly returned to a glare, "these two men shamed me, and I could not forgive that. Phoenix Wright and Zak Gramarye both deserved what they got."

Apollo bit back a demand to take back the insults against his family. Much like when he had argued for Lamiroir's second testimony, he was finding himself feeling dangerously calm. "So you asked Mister Misham to forge that evidence, so you could 'win'. But then, when you were dismissed as Zak Gramarye's attorney, you used your forged evidence as a trap."

"You fed me information about the forgery you made," Klavier picked up, giving his brother a glare similar to Apollo's. "Then you gave your dirty evidence to him."

Kristoph shrugged, again planting a smile on his face. "You're free to imagine what you will. My point is that all I had imagined came to pass. Everything went perfectly."

There was a short pause, barely long enough for Apollo to do more than mentally swear incoherently, then a snort sounded from the other side of the room.

Klavier was laughing.

Machi leaned close to Apollo. "I do not think he is okay..."

"He's fine," Apollo whispered back. Honestly, I kinda agree with that reaction.

"Incredible." Doubled over on his bench, the young prosecutor shook his head, a hand running through his hair. "If I wasn't laughing, I'd weep."

The judge watched with a mixture of confusion and concern. "Prosecutor Gavin?"

"Perfectly?" Klavier didn't seem to have noticed the judge's question, still laughing as he looked up at his brother. "You're mad, Kristoph. Stop fooling yourself."

Kristoph watched with narrowed eyes. "What are you talking about, Klavier?"
Klavier stood tall, keeping his eyes on the witness stand, and snapped his fingers in the direction of the judge's podium. "Tell me, how did that trial end?"

"Cancelled, when the defendant vanished," the judge replied.

"Precisely." Klavier's laughter had faded, though he still smiled. "Kristoph... you've been living in fear ever since."

Kristoph's eyes widened, a hand on his glasses. "What...?"

"You were afraid your forgery would be revealed, and your reputation trashed," Apollo picked up. Another instance of Kristoph forging evidence sprung to mind, but he hurriedly quashed the thought. "You couldn't leave things to chance, so you watched everyone involved with the case, for seven long years." He threw out an arm to point at the witness stand. "That's the only reason you ever became my dad's friend, isn't it? Why you took me as an apprentice? You've spent all this time gloating as we struggled to make ends meet, getting nowhere into Dad's investigation into what happened!" He slammed his fists on the bench. "Not to mention, Drew Misham mentioned in his final interview that he'd felt 'watched', and you know who else agreed with him? A certain friend of Zak Gramarye's, by the name of Spark Brushel. Can you honestly tell me it was a coincidence that it was only after getting back in touch with him seven years later that Zak was murdered?"

"W-wait just a minute!" the judge interrupted, jumping in his seat. "Zak Gramarye was seen by this reporter? How is that possible? Was he alive after being gone for so long?"

Apollo opened his mouth to reply before pausing, listening to the confusion in the gallery. Even Klavier seemed to be throwing them a confused look. Apollo simply turned to his younger sister, finding her standing solemnly at his side. The two locked eyes, and Trucy subtly nodded, biting her lip. Just as on stage, they didn't need to exchange any words, locking hands silently behind the defence bench. With the permission and support from his sister, Apollo returned his attention to the courtroom. "Allow me to refresh the court's memory: Six months ago, Kristoph Gavin was charged with murdering a 'mysterious traveller'."

"I remember him quite well," the judge replied. "Shadi Smith, was it? Poisoned in a Chinese restaurant." He shook his head with a sad look. "Tragic."

Apollo bit back an incredulous reply. "Th-the details don't really matter right now. What matters is," he slipped his left hand out of Trucy's to point across the room, and felt his sister at his back doing the same... just as they always did together on stage, minus the wands. "That traveller was Zak Gramarye!"

View the Court Record
The gallery was muttering loudly, repeating Apollo's assertion between themselves. He had no idea how many of them were aware of Kristoph's trial back in April, but, as he'd told the judge, the details didn't really matter. The important thing was that Zak Gramarye was dead, and Kristoph Gavin had killed him. As he and Trucy lowered their hands, he gave her a quick glance, noting the determined look on her face, and felt the twitch of a proud smile at his lips. 'Don't you worry, Truce. We're getting justice for both of your dads here.' Once their hands were once more behind the bench, he was quick to resume their mutual tight grip on each other, fingers interlocked.

At the witness stand, Kristoph stood unmoved, as Apollo had, sadly, expected. Klavier had his eyes on the defence bench, watching the Wrights with an unreadable look.

"Someone please explain this!" the judge demanded. "Mister Wright! Can you explain this?"

Apollo nodded. "It all started seven years ago, with the death of the Grand Magician, Magnifi Gramarye. His student, Zak Gramarye, was the suspect. Whoever defended Zak in court successfully would be famous beyond belief." He wanted to snap his fingers, but, with his left hand still tightly gripping his sister's, he instead made do with gesturing with his right. "Thinking that, Kristoph Gavin did the unthinkable: He forged evidence."

The judge frowned in thought. "Drew Misham?"

"Actually, it was his daughter, Vera, who really did the work," Apollo reminded him, then turned to Kristoph. "You took precautions when you had that forgery made, didn't you, Mister Gavin?"

"Of course," Klavier picked up, running a hand through his hair. "To keep people from talking. The Mishams knew everything, or at least enough to identify him. Left alive, they might 'cause trouble'."

Apollo nodded. "That's when you planned to poison them."

"Atroquinine, applied to a commemorative stamp." Klavier threw the picture of the stamp - the clearer of the two - onto the holograms.

"But luck was on Mister Misham's side. The bomb didn't go off."

The judge gasped. "His daughter...! She saved him by taking the stamp, I see!"

Kristoph simmered at the stand, eyes locked on the two attorneys in front of him.

"But that wasn't the only bomb he set up," Apollo continued.

Klavier picked up the pink-tinged crystal bottle still sitting on his bench. "This Ariadoney nail polish."

Apollo returned his gaze to Kristoph. "You noticed something when you requested that forgery: When Vera Misham is nervous, she has a bad habit, a tendency to bite her nails." Although it felt wrong to do so with his off hand, he pointed his right index finger firmly at the bottle in Klavier's hand. "That nail polish was her 'good luck charm'. She is intensely agoraphobic - terrified of the outside world - and couldn't bring herself to leave her house without the protection she imagined that nail polish gave her... A bottle which, by the way, happens to have been a gift from the client who requested that forged page!" He lowered his arm, glaring at Kristoph though his words were for the court at large. "It was his insurance."

"Insurance?" the judge asked.

Apollo turned his gaze to the judge's podium. "As long as she lived quietly at home, there was no danger to her. But what if she had to go outside?"

"If she ran into any trouble, she'd become nervous," Klavier picked up, "and the nail polish would do the rest."

"His time bombs sat there for seven years," Apollo continued, "and then they went off almost simultaneously."

The courtroom sat in silence as Apollo's story reached its conclusion. Across the room, Klavier was frowning as he placed the bottle of nail polish back on his bench. Apollo simply brushed his free hand against Machi's arm, briefly checking on his youngest brother; Machi glanced up in acknowledgement, so Apollo assumed he was doing okay.

Finally, Kristoph sighed. "If you're finished, may I return to my cell now? I'm not accustomed to standing for such long periods of time."

Apollo scoffed, rolling his eyes. "Mister Gavin, have you heard a single thing we've said?"

"Oh, I listened quite closely to your little tale," Kristoph replied, smiling. "Quite an entertaining piece of fiction."

At that, Apollo's eyes widened in both rage and shock. "What...?"

Ignoring his former mentee, Kristoph turned towards the prosecutor's bench. "Klavier. Surely you understand."

Klavier's eyes were closed, his hands in his pockets. "We're back to the evidence. The lacking evidence. Nothing proves a link between him and the atroquinine that took Drew Misham's life."

Apollo pulled his hand from his sister's grip, smacking his fists against his bench with a glare at the witness stand. "Objection! What about the Borscht Bowl Club? You killed Zak Gramarye! Was that to keep him from talking, too? Did he know about your forgery? Have you had murder plans for everyone ever connected to the forged evidence you've used in the past!? Including me? Including Luke!?"

Trucy and Machi almost jumped in surprise as they gave their eldest brother shocked looks. "Luke?"

Machi repeated.

Kristoph chuckled, shaking his head. "I have never knowingly touched a piece of evidence that was forged, and neither did I kill a man of that name. Read over the report again, if you like." He waved a hand, every inch the teacher Apollo had once respected for his knowledge. "The victim was a traveller by the name of Shadi Smith, about whom we know little else. You can't seriously think I knew he was that particular fugitive." He scoffed, adjusting his glasses.

Apollo had to bite his lip for a moment to reign in his temper, siphoning some of it off into another smack of the bench under his fists. "Objection! Okay then, why did you kill him?"

Kristoph thought a moment. "I plead my right to remain silent. Remember, this court did not convene to put me on trial. The defendant's name is 'Vera Misham', suspected in the murder of her father." He grinned, and the way he raised his head made the light fall across his face quite unnaturally. "My trial's been finished for six months now."

The judge leaned back in his chair, tugging on his beard with a soft hum. "I'm afraid we have strayed considerably from our purpose here." He nodded, sitting tall. "This court concurs with the witness. It is defendant Vera Misham who is on trial here."

Trucy groaned in frustration. "But you were doing so good, Polly!"

"As long as there is no evidence to support the accusation against him, this course of inquiry cannot find Vera Misham innocent."

Apollo felt a cold shiver of panic up his spine, and nearly leapt over his bench. "Objection! Your Honour, my dad spent seven years collecting this evidence-!"

"Objection," Kristoph interrupted, and laughed. "You still don't get it, do you? Let us assume there was poison in the nail polish."

"There was," Apollo grumbled.

Kristoph ignored him. "Who then, was responsible for causing Vera Misham to bite her nails? It wasn't me, I know that much." He scoffed, casually brushing hair from his eyes. "The one who brought that poison to her lips was you."

Apollo paled. "Wh-what?"

"No!" came a shout from Apollo's right, and Machi stepped forward with a glare. "Vera bite nails, yes... but should not have been problem! If not for poison, Vera would be fine! It is fault of person who put poison there in first place, not Apollo!"

Kristoph tsked, waving off the boy's complaint. "Not that it matters. Evidence is everything in court. There is nothing more."

The sound of the gavel attracted everyone's attention back to the judge atop his podium. "I believe this discussion has reached its conclusion."

'No no no no no!' Apollo had to hold himself back from again attempting to jump the bench, feeling cold sweat pricking at his brow. "Y-your Honour-!"

"Mister Wright." The old man turned to the young attorney with an expression Apollo suspected he often showed his oft-mentioned grandchildren. "You have performed admirably well for a novice attorney. And I respect your father's determination as well. You certainly take after him a great deal."

Apollo was too panicked at feeling the trial slipping through his fingers to be able to reply.

"However, without direct proof, you have nothing," Kristoph added with no small amount of smugness. "Isn't that right, Klavier?"

Klavier was standing behind his bench, eyes closed. "Unfortunately, yes, Kristoph. You're right." His eyes then opened, watching his brother with a disappointed look. "That is, you would have been right, until now."
Apollo's gaze instantly snapped to the prosecutor. You mean... there's still hope?

Kristoph was openly shooting Klavier a warning glare. "What?"

"Did the news not reach your desk in solitary?" Klavier asked, sounding incredibly tired... much like he had by the end of Machi's trial. "The eyes of the nation are on this courtroom today. This is the trial case for a new judicial system."

'Of course! How did I forget that? Apollo grinned, turning his attention to Kristoph. "That's right! The Jurist System!"

Kristoph blinked, his eyes flicking warily between the two attorneys. "Jurists, you say?"

"The current judicial system has been deemed too 'closed off' from society," the judge explained. "This new system attempts to inject the wisdom of common citizens into the law."

It suddenly struck Apollo that the judge hadn't once forgotten their trial today was anything but normal. I guess that explains why he was looking at me like that earlier...'

"Common citizens? Wisdom?" Kristoph nearly spat, disgusted. "Is this some kind of a joke? What could we possibly gain by entrusting our judicial system to a mindless, emotional mob of irrational mouth-breathers?"

"Common citizens have something called 'common sense'," the judge calmly replied. "Common sense is not restricted by the law."

Kristoph was beginning to sweat, arms crossed so tightly Apollo thought he was in danger of tearing the fabric of his suit. "Nonsense! There is only room for two in this court: Me, and the law!" Any remnants of his calm façade were long gone, the former attorney shooting death glares into the gallery on either side of the courtroom. "Keep the riff-raff out! Out, I say!"

The crowd recoiled and were silent at the direct attack, and Apollo couldn't blame them. He shook his head, almost feeling sorry for his old mentor. "They're not in the court, actually. They're watching everything by video camera." He turned to look at the tiny twin cameras over the back doors, and noticed his siblings and even Klavier following his gaze with smiles of their own.

Kristoph glanced behind him in a panic. "H-how can you... allow this?"

"Incidentally, the one responsible for making this happen," Apollo crossed his arms, facing the witness stand with a proud smirk, "was Phoenix Wright."

Kristoph stared back, eyes wide. "Phoe... Phoenix Wright...?" He leaned forward over the stand, slowly raising one fist into the air before slamming it hard on the wooden structure with a loud bang that echoed in the quiet room. "So... Everything was leading to this. Of course." His hand moved to grip the stand, knuckles white. "Right... Wright..." With an almighty scream, Kristoph threw his head back, fingers curled into claws at his chest as his hair blew in an invisible wind, coming loose out of its carefully styled curl and hanging in limp waves over his face and shoulders.

Apollo jumped back, arms held protectively in front of his younger siblings. Is he shouting our name, or...?'

"I won't accept... I can't accept!" Kristoph shrieked, clutching his shoulders as he hunched behind the stand, his previously perfect posture gone as he glared through his fringe at the various members of the court staff in front of him. "This is no court! Law... The law is everything! Law is absolute! You'd let ignorant swine soil your courts?"
At the prosecutor's bench, Klavier's head was leaning back, facing the ceiling, though his eyes were closed. "Kristoph... It's over."

Kristoph's gaze snapped to his brother. "K-Kla-!

"The law is 'absolute'?" Klavier continued, apparently ignoring Kristoph. "You can't be serious."

"W-what...?"

"Odd. I thought you spent your life looking for loopholes. The law isn't 'absolute'." Klavier lowered his head, watching his brother with a sad look, an expression that conveyed perfectly how ready he was to see the back of this trial. "It's filled with contradictions."

The judge nodded. "The law is the end product of many years of history, the fruit of human knowledge. Like a gem, polished to a gleam through trials... and errors." He sighed, regret in his face. "It is this fruit we receive, and pass on, and face in our time, and it is always changing, growing. Nurturing it is our task as human beings."

"That's what this whole trial was about," Apollo picked up, though he felt every bit the novice next to the years of experience the judge - and even Klavier to an extent - boasted. "Because our trial system hasn't been this way forever, it was changed to how it is now just over a decade ago! The purpose of a trial is to find the truth, and being able to do that with evidence is fantastic in theory, but what about when there isn't any evidence? There has to be some other way to make sure justice is served to the right person, to make sure innocent parties don't end up with a punishment they don't deserve." He gave his young brother a smile. "Because that seems to happen a lot more often than you might think, and you can't always be lucky enough to find another way."

Machi was a little surprised to have Apollo's eyes turn on him, and blushed as he realised what Apollo was referring to.

"And yet you haven't changed, Kristoph," Klavier picked up. "Not once, since the moment you received your badge. You've stopped. You're not needed anymore."

Kristoph stared back at his brother, breathing heavily. He made no move to reply.

"I see no need to further prolong this trial," the judge announced. "This began as the trial of Vera Misham, accused of murdering her father, the painter Drew Misham." He sighed. "However, several other incidents were reviewed, and we seem to have reached a conclusion." There was a long pause, and he directed his attention with a stern frown at the small camera pointed at his podium. "Before this court declares a verdict, I await your decision, Jurists of the court. For the death of Drew Misham, how do you find the defendant, Vera Misham? Innocent... or guilty? I turn to you now to consider this matter." Closing his eyes, he leaned back in his chair.

Now, all that was left to do was wait.

[View the Court Record]
Phoenix stepped in front of the screen as the live feed to the courtroom switched off. In the corner, Luke sat with his father's Court Record, tapping away at the screen as he underwent the final and most important technological step of the trial: setting up the voting system. At the door, Edgeworth flipped on the light, bringing the room out of the darkness. The six jurists sat at their table, their assigned computer tablets lying in front of them, screens flashing as Luke adjusted their displays.

"This ends the trial for this case. Only the verdict remains to be decided. Defendant Vera Misham is currently in intensive care. If a decision cannot be reached today, it may never be reached." Phoenix was sure to look each of the five women and single young man in the eye as he gave his short speech. "The factors involved are simple: Did the defendant poison her father that night? If so, she is guilty. Or, was there another reason for Mister Misham's death? Did another person poison him? If so, she is innocent." He pointed to the six computer tablets on the table. "A panel has been provided for each of you to input your decisions."

Five of the six reached out to take their tablets, the screens displaying large buttons saying 'Guilty' on one side and 'Not Guilty' on the other, with a smaller 'Confirm' at the top. Only Jurist 6 hesitated, looking up at Phoenix as if about to ask something. She looked over to Jurist 1 opposite, the younger woman giving her a small smile that encouraged Jurist 6 to dismiss her doubts, taking her assigned computer from the pile.

"It's time for your verdicts. Make your decision in the case against Vera Misham. After seven years, the truth is ready to be heard." Phoenix took a deep breath, letting it out in a quiet sigh, then turned a stern eye on the six people in front of him. "Judge wisely. Judge well." With that, he turned and walked over to where Luke sat, hoping he'd come off more impressive than he felt.

Luke gave his father a smile as he approached. Phoenix only gave him a quick smile back, then the pair together headed to the door. Edgeworth, waiting there, joined them as they all left the room. It was going to be a long wait before the verdict was called.

Phoenix's method for trying not to think about what the jurists were voting on was to pace back and forth in the hallway outside. Luke and Edgeworth stood far more calmly either side of the door, essentially acting as the guards to ensure there was no interfering with the vote. Although he wasn't surprised, Phoenix wondered how they managed it. This was the true conclusion of the Gramarye case, the trial that had cost him so much, that he had been fighting to solve for seven long years. Regardless of whether Vera lived long enough to see it, this verdict would send ripples across the entire state, sealing not only her own fate but Phoenix's and Kristoph's and everyone else involved with this trial. If she was guilty (not at all unlikely given the complete lack of approved evidence otherwise), Kristoph would face his execution as only a murderer, and Phoenix was out of options. If she was innocent... Well, Phoenix hesitated to say all their problems would be solved, but it would certainly be a step in the right direction. If only the letter he'd sent Apollo had been approved, at least then they would have evidence of the connection between Kristoph and the Mishams.
Phoenix briefly paused to acknowledge his son had spoken, only to resume his slightly panicked walk. "I know."

"We can certainly trust that the right decision will be made today," Edgeworth added, arms crossed. "The whole point of a Jurist Trial is to judge the actions of the witnesses and defendant emotionally as well as logically. Following the evidence is just as correct as following the arguments of the attorneys."

Luke nodded. "Even Prosecutor Gavin agreed Vera wasn't the person to kill Mister Misham, and no-one knows his brother better than him. I don't think we have anything to worry about, really."

Phoenix wanted to reply, but he was too busy hearing all the potential arguments in his head calling the entire trial a fraud. Emotions aren't proof. Just because someone acts suspicious, doesn't mean they are. If you can't prove it with evidence, who's to say your argument has any basis in reality, any resemblance to the truth? He was sure he'd be seeing every one in the headlines over the next few weeks, regardless of what happened... give or take an all-new smear campaign against his credibility.

"Are you even listening to us, Wright?"

"Of course I am," Phoenix muttered.

Edgeworth narrowed his eyes at the other man, his gaze never leaving Phoenix. "I haven't seen you this on-edge since you lost your badge."

"For good reason," Phoenix bitterly laughed. "This is the same trial, after all."

Luke squirmed uncomfortably, clutching his father's computer tight in his arms. "Well... no matter what happens... You have us this time, Papa. We're not going anywhere."

Finally, Phoenix's pacing slowed to a stop, and he was able to meet his son's eyes. After a moment, he even added a warm smile.

Luke blushed, looking away. "You really meant what you wrote in the Mason System, didn't you? Saying we were your 'light' after you lost your badge?"

Phoenix chuckled. "Why wouldn't I have meant it? You three gave me a reason to keep going, and keep fighting."

"I hope that wasn't the only reason you adopted them," Edgeworth remarked, hiding a smirk behind a sudden need to push his glasses up his nose.

Phoenix only snorted at his friend, waving off his comment.

Luke giggled, but his smile was quick to fade, replaced with a thoughtful frown. "That reminds me... Apollo suggested Mister Gavin had murder plans for everyone connected to his forgery, right?"

"I doubt it," Edgeworth assured him. "Zak Gramarye had no reason to even suspect Gavin forged evidence, so the motive behind that murder won't be the same as the Mishams."

Phoenix bit his lip about the transferral of rights - There's no way Zak would have told Kristoph about that in four days when it took him seven years to tell Phoenix.

Luke was still frowning in confusion, staring at the floor. "But then... Apollo thought he might have had plans to kill his own apprentice... and to kill me. What kind of connection do we have to that forgery, aside from being related to Papa?"

Phoenix and Edgeworth's eyes met for only a moment before returning to Luke. "You two are the oldest," Phoenix suggested. "Apollo probably thought he would have seen you two as a threat the same way he saw me."

"Not that he had plans to kill anyone else, I suspect," Edgeworth quickly added. "If he'd been planning to murder anyone in your family, he would have done it years ago."

Luke's frown deepened, and he reluctantly nodded.

"It's just a shame we couldn't dig up a motive for why he killed Zak Gramarye," Phoenix sighed. "I knew it was unlikely, but I doubt we'll ever have another chance to."

"Another mystery for the ages," Edgeworth mused. "My best guess would be the humiliation he said he suffered when Mister Enigmar let him go."

Luke looked up. "Not much of a motive, is it?"

Phoenix shook his head. "Kristoph's always been intensely private. The Psycho-Locks that are hiding his motivations won't be easily broken, probably not even by his brother."

Edgeworth scoffed. "You and your Psycho-Locks."

"These aren't usual ones, either," Phoenix continued, adamant. "Pearls went and did some research for me overnight, and she says, whatever this motive is, Kristoph's keeping it a secret even from himself."

Humming in thought, Luke stroked his goatee. "Interesting... Not even Mister Gavin knows why he killed Shadi Enigmar?"

Edgeworth just rolled his eyes. "Not that it matters. He's already been convicted of that murder, as he himself pointed out. Only his connection to the Mishams matters here."

"Maybe," Phoenix reluctantly agreed. "It still bothers me that we'll never know, though."

Apollo had no idea where the prison guards took Kristoph after the courtroom emptied. He knew Klavier hadn't gone with them - Who could blame him, really? - as he'd seen the prosecutor slinking into his assigned defendant's lobby as the two opposing teams escaped the crowds. Apollo had simply wrapped his arms around his younger siblings, and they stuck close to his side as he led them back to their lobby.

Once through the doors, Machi leapt past his brother to latch on to Trucy with a tight hug. "I so sorry about your father!"

Trucy smiled, returning the embrace. "I'm alright, Machi. He's been gone six months now. Up until then... I always knew he was alive."

Machi jumped back, giving her a surprised look. "You did?"
Nodding, Trucy giggled. "He promised me, the day he went away... 'We may not meet again for some time, but I will always be watching, and one day I'll return. You're the next Gramarye, after all.'"

Wincing in sympathy, Apollo patted his sister's back. They never met again, though he did return... but I think we both know he certainly wasn't watching, not if he didn't know about me.'

"But it's okay. I have my new family now." Trucy gave her brothers a wide grin. "Not just you two, but Daddy Phoenix, and Luke, and Mommy Maya... and Mommy Thalassa, when she comes back. And Pearly and Iris too."

"I'm glad we make your list," Apollo joked.

Machi just gripped his sister tight in another hug. "You sure you okay?"

Trucy nodded, patting her little brother's back and blinking away tears. "I'm fine, baby brother. Just like Polly and Luke are always saying. At the tops of their voices." She shot her eldest brother a cheeky grin. "At five in the morning."

"I get your point," Apollo muttered, failing to hide his smile. As the two teens giggled, pulling out of their hug, he directed them to the nearby couch. "C'mon, we've got a long wait ahead of us for the verdict. May as well get comfortable and find something to occupy ourselves until they call us back..."

View the Court Record
In the end, the three Wrights had enough time to go down to the cafe and get lunch, and were back in their lobby long before a bailiff came to fetch them with the news the verdict had been decided. This time, Apollo hadn't the heart to ask his siblings to not follow him, so Machi and Trucy stuck close to his sides as they once more entered the courtroom and took their place behind the defence bench. Opposite them, Klavier wasted no time doing the same at the prosecutor's bench. Apollo couldn't help but worry for the young rock star, seeing him keeping his eyes down and clearly hiding the emotional turmoil of having to essentially prosecute his own brother. I hope he didn't spend the break crying...

The prison guards entered the room with Kristoph in tow, escorting him to the witness stand in the absence of the trial's defendant. He was still in pieces from his breakdown earlier, the former attorney's hair a complete mess and his normally immaculate suit crumpled in the grip of his clawing fingers. He glared up at the judge's podium with wide eyes behind his glasses, sparing not even a glance for either his brother or his former mentee. For the latter, Apollo was very glad.

The murmuring gallery quietened as the judge sat down in his seat, tapping his gavel. "This court is ready to announce its verdict." He studied a piece of paper in his hands. "The Jurists have unanimously reached a decision, and, on the charge against Vera Misham of the murder of Drew Misham, they call for a verdict of not guilty."

Apollo took a sharp breath in, his hands clutching his siblings' as the three anxiously watched the judge.

"Taking their decision into consideration, I have also come to my own verdict." The judge readied his gavel. "Regarding the aforementioned charge of murder, this court finds the defendant, Vera Misham... not guilty."

The second tap of the gavel was quickly lost among the roar of the gallery and the bangs of the confetti guns. Apollo couldn't help a sigh of relief, letting out the breath he hadn't noticed he was holding.

"We did it, Polly!" Trucy cried, grabbing at Machi's arm while her other hand gripped the back of Apollo's cape.

"Vera is innocent!" Machi gleefully added, bouncing against Apollo's right and making similar grabs at his sister.

"You bet," Apollo chuckled, and hugged his giggling siblings tight.

Across the room, Klavier simply closed his eyes, leaning on one arm against his bench.

A soft laughter broke through the cheering, and Apollo looked up to see Kristoph doubled over behind the witness stand, his entire body shaking. The former attorney spoke no words, only continued to laugh, louder and louder, as the confetti settled on the ground around him. Even the gallery was silenced as his voice overpowered their celebration, the entire courtroom watching in silent wonder at the true culprit of Drew Misham's murder mindlessly cackling in front of them. After a few moments, the prison guards stepped forward to escort him away, one at each arm. Kristoph never once stopped as he was led out of the room and out of everyone's hearing.

Even with the source gone, Apollo heard that laughter echoing through the courthouse for the entire rest of the day.

Phoenix could only close his eyes as the verdict was announced, leaning against the nearby wall with a quiet sigh. Seated at their table, the six jurists were joining in the celebrations of the courtroom, with Clay, Maggey and Adrian actively cheering while Iris clapped. Luke rushed to his friend, the vet and astronaut loudly congratulating each other as Clay resumed his customary hanging off his friend's neck. Nearby, Thalassa grinned widely, her eyes firmly on the live feed of the courtroom. Opposite her, Maya similarly grinned, getting up from her seat and turning towards Phoenix, who was stood behind her chair. He barely had the time to raise his eyebrows before she had pounced, hands on his shoulders and lips on his. He was so surprised by the rush of endorphins in his brain, his hands already moving to her hips, that it took him a moment to register when she pulled away, cheekily waving a familiar blue beanie in her grip.

"Won't be needing this anymore, old man!"

Although Phoenix agreed, a part of him was still doubtful, stuck in the entrenched habit and the fear that had led him to make the cyan hat such an integral part of his daily wear. "Maya..." He reached out to take the item back, but Maya only moved it behind her back and deftly switched hands, shoving the beanie deep underneath her obi.

"Nuh-uh, Nick." Maya gave Phoenix a wink. "No more hiding."

Phoenix couldn't do more than look at Maya with an expression somewhere between fond and irritated exasperation, shoving his hands back in his pockets.

The laughter at the witness stand brought the Jurists' Chambers to silence just as quickly as it did the courtroom, attracting everyone's attention to the man in the centre of the screen. Phoenix's hands curled into fists, and he kept a stern gaze on the screen. 'You lost, Kristoph. It's over.'

The screen abruptly flickered and turned off, killing Kristoph's cackles from the speakers. Confused, Phoenix spun around to where his son stood by Clay's chair, tablet computer in his hands.

Luke looked around the room with a proud and determined look, his eyes landing on his father's. "I don't think we need to hear whatever Kristoph Gavin has to say."

Phoenix could only smile back.

Edgeworth stepped forward from where he'd been lingering by the door, clapping his hands once to attract the room's attention. "On behalf of the committee, I would like to thank you all for participating in our little experiment today." He adjusted his glasses, half-hiding the smile he had directed at the six jurists. "Even if nothing comes of this in the long term... You have all chosen to save an innocent life, and should be very proud."

Clay punched the air with a loud "WHOOP!"
Luke dodged his friend's fists with a laugh. "I think they are, Mister Edgeworth!"

"We're just doing our duty to see justice done," Maggey insisted, sitting back in her chair with a relaxed grin. "We wouldn't have agreed to this otherwise."

"I imagine this is what you all live for as attorneys," Adrian added, staring up at the ceiling thoughtfully. "Franziska's right. You really have to experience it yourself, don't you?"

Iris brushed her fingers against her chin, eyes down. "I'm not so sure I'd want to be in the actual courtroom, though."

Maya clapped her hands together with a grin. "Well, I thought we all did good today! And I'm sure the chair of the committee agrees, don't you?"

Phoenix grunted as the spirit medium shoved an elbow in his gut, and nodded. "Yup. Sure."

"So let's party, huh?" Giggling, Maya ran to Thalassa's side, giving the older woman a hug.

The room once more sparked with conversation, the jurists all getting to their feet and talking between themselves. Phoenix stood back against the wall, watching the small groups and how they split off to intermingle. Iris moved to join Maya and Thalassa, while Luke and Clay similarly stuck together, and Maggey and Adrian passed through both before gravitating to Edgeworth. Luke then moved towards Thalassa and the Feys, Clay joining him, and the five seemed, to Phoenix, very enthusiastic as they discussed whatever it was they were talking about. Phoenix couldn't help a smile, proud to see his family happy.

"Mister Wright?"

The voice to his left surprised Phoenix from his train of thought, and he turned to see Maggey standing nearby, Adrian and Edgeworth not far behind her. He gave them a polite smile. "Missus Gumshoe?"

Maggey crossed her arms, a single eyebrow raised. "You knew this case tied to your disbarment from the start, didn't you?"

"Oh, no, of course not," Phoenix readily replied, grinning widely. "Learning what Drew Misham really was was a complete surprise."

"So switching to this case at the last minute was a total coincidence?"

"Yup."

Maggey stared at him a moment longer, then sighed, shaking her head. "Well. I'll be sure to tell Dick everything that happened over the past couple of days. He'll be happy to know there really was nothing he could have done... He still feels guilty about it, you know."

Phoenix blinked. "Really? But Gumshoe had nothing to do with it."

"Neither did you," Maggey pointed out. "Didn't stop you blaming yourself. And don't say you didn't, because it was written all over your little 'Mason System'."

Trying not to wince, Phoenix turned away, running a hand through his hair. It still felt a little weird not wearing his beanie, but at least his spikes would be somewhat neater now. "Technically, Luke wrote that."
"And who'd know you better than your own kid?" Maggey chuckled. "Doesn't matter. That's all I had to say. Oh, and congratulations."

Phoenix looked back at her with a raised eyebrow. "Congratulations...? For what, exactly?"

Adrian giggled. "What do you think? Like Apollo was saying today, the court of public opinion is a very different beast to the court we just sat through, and I think you've been proven innocent after all this."

"Oh, uh, maybe," Phoenix muttered, shrugging as he tried not to blush. "I suppose so."

"Nothing was ever officially proven in the first place," Edgeworth pointed out with a smile. "I agree with Adrian. After all the work we've put into this, we seem to have emerged with at least one of our goals met."

Phoenix bit back a twitch at the corners of his lips. "I guess so."

"No need to hide the infuriatingly smug grin, either," Edgeworth added, though his smile didn't fade. "For once, you have every right to be proud of yourself."

"Why, Edgeworth, that's not like you," Phoenix joked, letting the grin spread across his face.

Adrian laughed. "So, when are you getting your badge back, Mister Wright?"

Phoenix froze, his cheerful expression fading. "Uh..."

"I'm sure you won't wait a moment to retake the bar exam, huh?" Maggey snickered, then turned to Adrian. "Actually, I need to get going. You wanna drop in on Apollo with me before I head home?"

"Sure!" Adrian chirped. "We gotta congratulate him, too!"

Edgeworth nodded as he waved the women towards the door. "I'll accompany you. I have my own work to get back to as well."

"See ya later, Mister Wright!" Maggey called, and the trio headed to the door.

Phoenix only sighed as they left the room.

View the Court Record
It was Machi who led the charge towards the defendant lobbies, hurrying after the figure in purple who was scurrying away ahead of them. They caught up just inside the doors into the private hallway outside.

"Mister Prosecutor!"

His hand already reaching for the door into his assigned lobby, Klavier paused and looked around, though it was abundantly clear he had to force the thin smile as he saw the three Wrights approaching him. "Ah, our victorious defence team. Greetings."

"Are you alright?" Apollo asked. "I mean, we just watched your brother get hauled off in chains..." He paused, shrugging uncomfortably. "Again..."

Klavier shook his head. "You were just doing your job to see justice done... as was I. Kristoph must face the punishment for his crimes." He sighed. "I would hope, were the situation reversed, you would still fight for the right outcome." A smile twitched at his lips as he turned to Machi. "Am I correct, Monsieur Tobaye?"

Machi blushed, gripping his elbow tight. "Oh, um, that is not..."

"I heard you were under probation, but I never imagined you had been taken in by the Wrights." Klavier chuckled, then turned to Trucy. "And you, Fraulein? Discussing your father's death can't have been easy."

Trucy subtly winced, quick enough that Apollo was sure only he had noticed. "I'm alright," she insisted through a forced smile. "I already knew he was gone. And he disappeared a long time ago."

Apollo rested a hand on her shoulder in silent support. To Klavier, he continued, "Talking about that case can't have been easy for you, either. I..." His mouth felt dry, and Apollo had to mentally kick himself to get the words out. "I'm sorry for blaming you all this time. I guess you really did have nothing to do with it."

Klavier laughed, surprising the young attorney. "On the contrary, my failure to think and my inexperience condemned an innocent man. Potentially two innocent men, if you tell the truth about your grandfather."

Apollo noticed his siblings shooting him confused looks out of the corner of his eyes.

"It was the least I could do to correct the mistakes made in my youth." Klavier ran a hand through his hair, smile fading. "He must have known from the beginning. That's why Prosecutor Edgeworth personally asked me to take this case at the last minute."

"Oh! Uncle Edgeworth!" Trucy turned to her eldest brother. "Didn't you say he was supposed to prosecute this trial?"
Apollo nodded. "I was actually looking forward to it, too. They used to call him Dad's rival, and Dad said he was once known as the Demon Prosecutor. I probably would've lost, given my skills right now, but it would have been interesting to face off against him."

Unnoticed, Klavier's gaze focussed behind the Wrights, eyes wide.

"Maybe will still happen one day," Machi suggested. "On other case."

"Maybe," Apollo agreed, giving his brother a smile. "Maybe I'll be good enough by then to have a chance, too."

"As long as your client is innocent, I don't think you'd have anything to worry about."

Apollo paled, spinning on his heel to find the source of the voice: A smirking man in a burgundy suit, standing by the hallway door behind them, and flanked by two shorter women. Apollo could barely contain his surprise. "Uncle Edgeworth!?"

Trucy squeaked, also turning to face the three new arrivals. "Maggey! Auntie Adrian!"

"Hi!" Adrian chirped, giving the girl a wave.

"Hello!" Machi replied, waving back.

"W-what are you three doing here!?" Apollo cried, eyes wide.

Maggey snorted in laughter. "We were watching the trial, weren't we?" She poked Apollo's arm with a wink. "We even told you we were!"

Apollo blushed, running a hand through his hair.

"Congratulations on the trial, both of you," Adrian added, looking between Apollo and Klavier. "I'm sure Franziska would say the same, were she here."

Trucy giggled. "She'd just say it wasn't perfect enough."

"I agree with Trucy," Edgeworth added, smiling. "I think that would have been more of a nightmare trial for Franziska."

"It was a nightmare trial for us," Apollo muttered, arms crossed. He noticed Klavier nodding behind him.

Maggey snorted, waving off the complaint. "Well, if I could stick around and discuss it, I would, but I have to get going. Congrats again, huh?" She patted Apollo's shoulder. "We'll talk later, won't we?"

Apollo nodded, giving her a smile. "Sure."

"Until later, Maggey," Adrian added, waving as the other woman turned and walked away.

"Say hi to little Felicia for us!" Trucy called, bouncing on her heels.

"I will!" Laughing, Maggey slipped through the doors and left the hallway.

Apollo turned to Edgeworth, scratching the back of his head nervously. "So, um... Did you mean what you said earlier? That I wouldn't have had anything to worry about?"
The prosecutor smiled, his eyes lost in thought. "You've learned your courtroom tactics from your father... which isn't surprising. Or, should I say he's taught you the tactics he learned from the great Mia Fey?" He chuckled, pushing his glasses up his nose. "She would have been before your time, Prosecutor Gavin. I'd look her up if I were you. Truly a legend of her era."

Klavier quickly nodded, and Apollo noticed he was staring at Edgeworth with something closely resembling awe. "O-of course, Prosecutor Edgeworth."

"I criticise, but Ms Fey and Wright were both highly accomplished and widely respected defence attorneys over their careers... before said careers were suddenly cut short, anyway. It's not a bad idea to emulate their methods," Edgeworth then looked between Apollo and Klavier with a stern gaze. "However, what made Wright and I such a good team when we faced each other had nothing to do with that. We attorneys fight to find the truth, yes, but the only way to ensure that happens is to give your all doing so... and to trust your opponent is doing the same. As long as the truth is on your side, you should always be able to shoot down any arguments to the contrary."

Apollo nodded. He'd heard that speech before from Phoenix, but a glance at the closely listening Klavier told him this was all new to the young prosecutor. Klavier's eyes certainly seemed to say he was taking this direct advice to heart.

"In theory, anyway." Edgeworth smiled, then turned specifically to Apollo. "One last thing before I go: With suspicions raised against Kristoph Gavin as a forger, doubtless there will be investigations at the prosecutor's office into all his past cases. If he's had anyone else falsely convicted or acquitted, we need to know."

Klavier frowned, pained, and looked away. Apollo tried and failed to not tense up in response.

Machi gasped. "You think he do that to someone else too?"

"Really?" Adrian gave the eldest Wright a concerned frown. "You worked with him, didn't you, Apollo? Did you suspect him of forgery before?"

Apollo couldn't reply, avoiding everyone's gazes. The chaos of that trial the previous year still haunted him for a reason... and, somehow, he was hearing Kristoph's unhinged laughter weaving through it.

Trucy watched her eldest brother carefully. "Polly?"

"If I am required for these investigations," Klavier said to Edgeworth, interrupting the two, "I must ask-"

"There's no need for you to be involved," Edgeworth assured him. "I think the prosecutors who faced him should be handling the responsibility of their own trials... although we shall have to improvise for any he faced who are no longer working in this district." He returned his attention to Apollo. "In any case, I'm sure you made notes on all the cases you assisted him with. I'd advise you go over them. You know how to contact me if you find anything even the slightest bit suspicious."

Apollo remembered his first visit to the prosecutor's office nearly a year ago, and smiled, meeting his uncle's gaze. "Yeah. Thanks, Uncle Edgeworth."

Edgeworth only smiled and gave his nephew a nod. "I'm sure I'll see you three again soon at some or other kind of family get-together."

"Oh yes, Mister Wright will be wanting to get his badge back!" Adrian laughed. "We'll probably see each other for some kind of celebration then, huh? Franziska can threaten to defeat him in court in Trucy giggled, bouncing on her heels. "Daddy will love that!"

"You sure, Truce?" Apollo asked her, not bothering to hide his smirk.

Edgeworth shook his head, similarly failing to hide his amusement. "Until then." With that, he turned and left.

"See you three later!" Adrian added, and moved to follow.

"Bye, Auntie Adrian! Bye, Uncle Edgeworth!" Trucy called, waving. Machi waved with her.

As the pair disappeared out the door, Klavier sighed, a dreamy look on his face that Apollo had never seen before. "Prosecutor Edgeworth gave me advice..."

Apollo and Trucy hid snickers. Machi just looked confused.

View the Court Record
"Papa!"

Phoenix grinned as he approached his son, joining the excited group that had formed from the remaining members of the jury and committee. "Yo."

"Your name's been cleared, Feenie!" Iris cheered, much more energetic than Phoenix had been expecting. "You can be an attorney again!"

"Ooh, yeah!" Clay laughed boisterously, arm looped over Luke's shoulders. "The way 'Pollo used to talk about you, the fact that you had a fan club? There'll be a ton of people happy to see you with a badge again!"

Phoenix hid an uncomfortable grimace behind a grin. "Ah, yes, I'm... sure they would be."

"That reminds me, we should probably go find Pearl and congratulate Apollo," Luke said, elbowing Clay with a grin.

Iris gasped. "That's right! I promised Pearly we'd meet up right after the trial so I could ask about the research she was doing!" She hummed uncertainly, twirling a finger in her hair. "I hope she found all my books okay..."

"She did, don't worry," Phoenix was quick to assure her. "She was a lot of help."

Maya waved at the three, pressing against Phoenix's side with a hand pressed to his back. "You guys go ahead, we'll catch up. And don't forget," she held a finger to her mouth with a conspiratorial grin, "not a word about our new friend here, 'kay?"

Thalassa chuckled, self-consciously brushing at her hair.

Clay laughed loudly. "Aw, don't worry, Ms Fey! I've not told 'Pollo anything so far, right?"

Luke gave him an unamused look. "You literally haven't spoken to him since you found out."

Clay just snorted, shoving his friend and heading for the door. Luke sighed, gave his father a wave, and followed.

"We'll see you later then, Mystic Maya," Iris said, rushing after the boys.

Left alone with Maya and Thalassa, Phoenix took a deep breath and let it out with a loud exhale. "Well. That was certainly a trial, huh?"

Maya giggled. "Yeah, your name's been cleared and everything!" She nudged him with her hip. "So no more excuses about your reputation ruining Kurain, huh?"

Phoenix rolled his eyes. "Sure, sure." He gave her a tired but genuine smile. "You're just dying to show me off up in the village, aren't you?"
"Duh." Maya pressed tighter to his side, winking. "So, five years dating. When are you planning on marrying me?"

Thalassa's eyes widened. "You two have proposed?"

"I guess so!" Phoenix laughed, but then he paused to think, rubbing his chin. "Which would make the wedding... the day you get back from Khura'in?"

Maya's smile died, and she stepped back. "Oh. Yeah."

Phoenix winced. "S-sorry."

"N-no, it's fine." Maya sighed, shaking her head. "It's true, after all."

Thalassa gave the two a sympathetic look. "You do have until Maya leaves, don't you?"

Phoenix and Maya could only look at each other for a long moment, their hands silently reaching out and clinging tight. Phoenix quietly asked, "Have you decided on a date? Booked your plane?"

Maya shook her head.

Phoenix forced a small smile. "Well... It's not the end yet."

Releasing a quiet whine at the back of her throat, Maya leaned forward to press her forehead against Phoenix's shoulder. "I hate this, Nick..."

Although he was trying not to laugh, Phoenix patted his partner's back. "I know. Maybe we should catch up to the kids?"

"I'll walk with you a little way," Thalassa offered.

Maya quickly pulled herself together, forcing a smile for the older woman. "That's nice of you, Thalassa. We can keep the kids occupied while you sneak out, and meet up again for the reunion tomorrow."

Phoenix nodded. "A good idea. We need to go talk to them, anyway."

"Apollo!"

The young defence attorney looked up from his snickering at Klavier, surprised to see the door into the hallway once more opening to admit a small group of people. "Is that-?"

"Luke!" Machi cried, running to meet the first through the door and immediately clinging to the vet's middle. "We won!"

Luke laughed, hugging the boy back. "Of course you did! Vera didn't kill anyone, did she?"

Coming in at Luke's back, Clay made a beeline for Apollo, slapping the shorter man's shoulder. "Y'know... that really wasn't that bad, 'Pollo. Well done."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "The hell are you doing here? Weren't you busy?"
Clay snorted, tapping the side of his nose. "Told you I could keep a secret if I wanted to."

"Mister Nick said it was a very important case, so I had to come." Pearl gave her cousin a tight hug. "He also told me not to tell you so you wouldn't worry about me. He said you had a lot to worry about without me hanging around as well."

Apollo winced, rubbing the back of his head. "Y-yeah, he... Dad probably had a point there."

"You came too, Iris?" Machi asked. "Does that mean Maya is here?"

Apollo sighed, then rounded on Clay with a whack from the back of a hand. "If you were so 'busy' because you were watching my trial, why was it such a secret? And how'd you know it was happening before I even got assigned to it? Dad didn't tell me anything until the day after you got that call!"

Klavier hummed in thought, snapping his fingers. "Tell me, Herr Forehead... Did this call you mention happen to be after nine this past Tuesday evening?"

Apollo frowned, tapping a finger against his forehead. "Um... Yeah, it was after Trucy's and my show at the Wonder Bar, on Tuesday, and it wasn't until Wednesday Dad put me on the case."

Klavier grinned. "I also wasn't assigned to this case until Wednesday. Tell me, aside from Herr Wright and Prosecutor Edgeworth, who else unrelated to the case would have known about the trial almost immediately after Drew Misham's death, before even us attorneys?"

Apollo could only shrug, nothing coming to mind. "Um...?"

"Phoenix asked us to be jurists," Iris explained, gesturing between herself and Clay with a smile. "He actually asked us weeks ago, though we didn't know when the trial was happening until Tuesday evening."

"You WHAT!?"

Clay laughed, shaking his red-faced friend via his grip on Apollo's shoulder. "You oughta thank us, 'Pollo. Making us sit through a boring trial? We did that for you, you know." Before Apollo could sputter a reply, the astronaut had turned his grin to Klavier. "I was actually going to vote for you, too. Like your music, man."

"Danke," Klavier replied, returning a small nod of his head. "Though I'd hope you'd vote for the truth rather than a person, Herr... whatever your name is."

"Clay Terran." The astronaut grinned widely. "Nice to meet you, Mister Gavinner."

"'Gavin', actually."

Apollo finally regained his ability to speak, gesticulating wildly towards the prosecutor as he shot his friend a glare. "You were going to vote for him!? Why!?"

"Hey, I can't vote for you just cuz you're my friend, can I?" Clay pointed out with an innocent grin. "Gotta follow the evidence and witnesses and stuff, like Mister Wright said. 'Sides, we all voted for
"That's true," Iris agreed. "It was a unanimous 'Not Guilty'."

"So you can't be mad at me." Clay leaned heavily on his friend's caped shoulder, tapping Apollo's chest with one pointed finger. "Cuz I did vote to free Vera. We all did."

Apollo grumbled, arms tightly crossed, but said nothing.

"Maya was a jurist too," Luke explained. "And I was helping out behind the scenes with the technical side of things. You know how awful Papa is with that stuff."

Trucy let out a slightly exaggerated gasp. "That's what you were doing!" She firmly tapped her brother's elbow with a stern look. "We really missed having you around for the investigation, you know!"

Luke waved her off with a good-natured scoff. "Oh, I knew you'd be just fine without me. Papa needed my expertise more than you did."

Apollo sighed, shoving the laughing Clay off his shoulder. "Still missed having your help..." He frowned. "Wait, were Maggey and Adrian...?"

"They were jurists," Luke giggled. "Papa told me everyone was picked to have equal bias between you and Mister Edgeworth," he shrugged, "even though that kinda got messed up by the change of prosecutor."

Apollo pressed a hand to his face. "Great."

Klavier laughed. "As long as the right verdict was reached, I suppose it doesn't matter who they were." He turned to Clay. "Speaking of, if you are a fan of the Gaviners, Herr Terran, I'd advise you keep an eye on the news over the next few days."

Clay shrugged. "Well, I wouldn't really say I'm a 'fan'. I just like good music."

Trucy gasped, jumping to Klavier's side with a grin. "News? You mean you're finally working on a new album?"

"I'm afraid not, Fraulein. We haven't officially announced it yet only because I was waiting for the right time... to see if I would change my mind." Klavier sighed, shaking his head. "It's not every day you get a trial that rocks harder than one of our gigs, ja? That's why it's over. The Gaviners are breaking up."

Clay's eyebrows shot up. "Huh. That's a shame."

"What?" Trucy squeaked, already blinking back tears. "But you can't be... You can't be breaking up!"

Apollo was shocked for an entirely different reason. "Huh. I thought you already did that after Detective Crescend's arrest."

"Polly!" Trucy slapped her brother's arm, ignoring his quiet "Ow," as he took a step back. "I really liked their music! I was even going to buy some of their stuff now we know Prosecutor Gavin didn't deliberately take Daddy's badge!"

"Trucy, there's no need to hit anyone," Luke softly pointed out, stepping forward and gently guiding his sister away from their elder brother. "Besides, I thought Athena already gave us all their music."

"We didn't get any of their tour videos!" Trucy protested, spinning around to face Luke. "Or their other merchandise! And there was a CD she missed! Um... I forget its name right now, but it was from around the same time she sent us those!"

Luke shrugged, then gave his sister a smile. "Well, why don't we go look for them on the way home? I'll buy some for you."

Trucy sniffed, rubbing at her nose, but was undeniably intrigued. "You will?"

Apollo scoffed. "At least make her get them with her own pocket money..."

Klavier laughed. "Ah, Fraulein, I do apologise. Perhaps I can come by your office some day and sign your CDs, in return for all the help you have given us over this past year."

Trucy's awed gaze turned to the prosecutor. "R-really?" She grinned. "Thank you, Prosecutor Gavin. I'd really like that!"

Apollo rolled his eyes, but decided not to ruin his little sister's dream with a snide comment.

View the Court Record
"Ooh, I hope we're not late for the party!"

Apollo looked up from his grumbling, seeing Maya coming through into the hallway like she owned the place, shooting everyone a cheerful grin. Behind her, Phoenix was carefully closing the door into the third floor lobby. Apollo sighed. "Mom. Dad. Always a pleasure."

"Mommy!" Trucy ran to give Maya a hug. "Luke said you were a jurist!"

"Aw, Nick was begging me to help out," Maya said with a grin, hugging the teenage girl back. "I just couldn't say no!"

"Objection, I didn't 'beg'."

While Maya was laughing at the response, Apollo turned his attention to his father, eyes widening. More than hearing the word 'objection' coming from his father's lips again, there was something else that had changed since their brief meeting the previous day. "Dad... You're not wearing your hat. In public."

Everyone's attentions turned to the former lawyer sheepishly running a hand through his spiky black hair. Pearl gasped, "Oh yes! I didn't even notice!"

Phoenix chuckled, his cheeks a little pink. "Ah, well... I figured it's kinda warm in this courthouse, so I may as well take it off and-"

"Oh, you mean this hat?" Grinning, Maya pulled the familiar cyan beanie from her robes, waving it triumphantly. Immediately, Phoenix lunged for it, but Maya only continued to hold it out of his reach, cackling. "Nuh-uh, Nick! You don't need this anymore!"

Undeterred, Phoenix continued to make grabs for the hat. "At least give it back!" Sighing, he stepped back and gestured to the giggling Trucy nearby, changing his tactic with a smirk. "Trucy here made that thing for me! Don't you think it would upset her if I stopped wearing it so suddenly?"

Trucy broke into hysterical laughter, while Luke bit his lip to hide laughter of his own. Apollo just shook his head with a chuckle. "Dad... By far, that is the worst decision in bluffing you've ever made."

Phoenix raised an eyebrow at his eldest son. "Ha ha. Believe me, it's not."

By now, Trucy had managed to calm herself, and shook her head with crossed arms and a knowing look. "Daddy, I made you that beanie to wear because everyone was being so mean to you after everything that happened with that trial. You weren't going to change your hair, so covering it to hide who you were was the only thing left to do."

Luke nodded. "Exactly. It wasn't hard to figure out why you were so attached to wearing it even in the summer, Papa. And we don't blame you for being so terrified of being recognised."
"I wasn't terrified," Phoenix muttered, running a hand self-consciously through his hair.

Apollo scoffed. "Yes you were. You're always readjusting it on your head, constantly trying to hide underneath it." As he spoke, he mimed the actions he had seen Phoenix do countless times over the years, though not as much in more recent years. "I'm pretty sure even Luke noticed eventually."

"Hey, what about me?" Clay asked, faking offence. "I noticed, too!"

"Sure you did," Apollo shot back with a smirk.

Maya shoved the beanie back into the depths of her kimono, while her other arm elbowed the badly blushing Phoenix. "Look, you trained him well! Now he's using his 'nervous habit spotting' on you, Nick!"

Phoenix hadn't moved the hand from his hair, glaring off to one side. "I didn't come down here to be mocked."

Machi stepped around to Phoenix's side, a hand on his arm. "B-but Isa, is not trial over? You not forger, so people not hate you now."

"Exactly!" Apollo laughed, gesturing to his youngest brother. "Why do you think we were fighting so hard for you all this time?"

Luke nodded. "What happened seven years ago wasn't fair to anyone. Not any of the Gramaryes - let alone Trucy - certainly not you," he gestured to Klavier, "and not even the prosecutor."

Apollo noticed Klavier blush heavily and take a step back. 'Man, I totally forgot he was even here. It's true though, what Luke said.'

"Speaking of," Maya took a few steps towards the prosecutor, giving him a concerned look, "I hope Nick didn't put you through more than you can handle, Prosecutor Gavin. He probably didn't warn you, huh?"

Klavier shook his head, managing a gentle chuckle despite his clear distress. "Do not worry, Fraulein. I did not warn Herr Wright of my plans for our trial seven years ago, either." The smile quickly faded as he turned his attention to Phoenix. "And... I cannot apologise enough for that. If I had given even the slightest bit of thought to Kristoph's plan, I wouldn't have-"

"Don't beat yourself up about it." Phoenix gave the younger man a smile, his hands in the front pocket of his hoodie. "Mistakes made in our youth, right? I made a few in my time too, thinking I was doing the right thing." He shrugged, grinning. "Probably."

"What do you mean 'probably'?" Maya muttered with a smirk.

Phoenix ignored her. "I'll admit, I was reluctant to fully believe Edgeworth when he said we could trust you after I lost my badge... but finally knowing what really happened after all these years is... heartening." He stepped past Maya, then held his hand out towards the young prosecutor with a smile. "No hard feelings, Klavier Gavin."

Klavier ran a hand through his hair, eyebrows pressed together as though he couldn't believe what was happening. "Herr Wright..." Finally, a genuine grin spread across his face, and he grabbed Phoenix's hand to enthusiastically shake. "Thank you, so much. Once your badge is returned, perhaps we can face each other in court again, ja? This time, we shall have a fair fight!"

Phoenix laughed. "After all this time, I'd have to retake the bar exam first."
Klavier held back a gleeful giggle, then released Phoenix's hand and turned to offer it to Apollo.
"And Herr Forehead, the same goes for you! We must face each other once more in a courtroom, just as Prosecutor Edgeworth said, ja?"

Apollo grinned, happily taking the prosecutor's hand to shake. "I look forward to it, Herr Diva. 'And a part of me still doesn't believe I actually mean that, but I do.' "And if you ever decide to go back into performing, Trucy and I will always be happy to help if you need a magician handy." Out of the corner of his eye, he noticed said sister restraining excited gasps, and knew he'd made the right choice on what to say on her behalf.

"I shall keep your kind offer in mind," Klavier replied, still smiling hard enough to stun a Gavinners fangirl at twenty metres. Releasing Apollo's hand, he turned his gaze over to Trucy, Luke and even Machi. "You're the real stars, now. I look forward to our next jam session, however it may happen."

"Us too!" Trucy bounced on the spot, barely restraining her excitement.

Luke gave a calm nod. "Until we meet again, Prosecutor Gavin."

"Thank you," Machi added. "For everything."

Klavier gave them all one final grateful look, then headed out of the hallway with only a confident rock star wink as his goodbye.

Apollo stared at the door, a smile lingering on his face. "You know... he wasn't such a bad guy in the end. Prosecutor Gavin."

"We always knew that," Luke pointed out. "Circumstances just made it difficult to accept."

"Plus, you're kinda naturally suspicious of people, 'Pollo," Clay added. He only snorted with laughter when Apollo replied by whacking his friend on the arm.

Iris nodded, looking out over the assembled Fey-Wright family. "At least it's all over now. Kristoph Gavin's crimes will face justice, and Phoenix can get his badge back. The nightmare is over."

"It is," Phoenix agreed, his voice sounding far away. After a moment, he turned to Apollo with a smile. "I almost forgot. You did really well in there today. Congratulations."

Apollo blushed, shrugging. "Well... It was something I'd been preparing myself to do for six years. I had to be at my best for you, Dad."

Phoenix stared back at his son, his expression full of pride and fatherly adoration. He pulled Apollo into a hug, which the young lawyer gladly returned. "You're always at your best, in my opinion. I knew you wouldn't let me down."

Apollo had to squeeze his eyes shut to hold back the happy tears. "Thanks, Dad."

"Aw, we're so proud of you, kiddo!" With a thud, Apollo felt Maya slam against their side, joining in the hug, and as Apollo opened his eyes, he saw Trucy, Machi, Luke and Pearl all hurrying to join in, thoroughly sandwiching the two eldest Wrights in the middle. Only Iris and Clay stayed away, the former hiding a laugh while the latter linked his hands behind his head, grinning widely.

"Today's like... the end of an era!" Trucy cried, from somewhere in the vicinity of Apollo's left shoulder. "We're friends with Prosecutor Gavin, the secret mission is over, Vera is innocent... and Daddy can get his badge back!"
"Everything's looking up!" Pearl agreed.

With a laugh, the group broke the hug, and Apollo stepped back to wrap his arms around Trucy and Machi, who had ended up either side of him. Around him, all he could see were the smiles of his friends and family shining back at him, and he couldn't keep his own grin off his face. "You know what? That's what this trial was really about in the end: Hope. We were fighting to find the hope we'd lost seven years ago. And I think we found it."

Phoenix chuckled, placing his hands on the backs of Maya and Pearl, who had also ended up either side of him. "That we did."

Luke giggled, similarly linking Pearl and Trucy at his sides. "So, we're heading home now?"

"Yes!" Trucy enthusiastically agreed. "We need to celebrate Polly's win!"

"You kids have fun!" Maya leaned against Phoenix's side, not noticing the confused look he was giving her. "Pearly, would you be okay staying with your sister or cousins tonight?"

Pearl's and Trucy's eyes met, excited grins spreading across their faces. "Sure, Mystic Maya!" The young spirit medium leaned forward to achieve eye contact with her sister outside the circle. "Iris, would it be okay if I stayed with Trucy tonight?"

Iris smiled, nodding her head. "That's fine with me."

Phoenix was still frowning at Maya. "Why? What are you planning?"

Maya rolled her eyes. "Duh. Your reputation's been cleared. I'm taking you up to Kurain for the night, Nick." She poked his chest, smirking at the former lawyer. "We're in desperate need of some private time to 'celebrate', ourselves."

"I don't like the way you said 'celebrate' there," Phoenix muttered.

Apollo and Luke shared an amused look. "We'll see you when you get back, then," Luke offered.

"Have fun," Apollo added.

Phoenix sighed, but gave in to his partner's demands without further complaint. "Alright. You kids will be okay tonight?"

Machi rapidly nodded. "We will, Isao!"

"I'll look after them," Apollo promised.

"Good." Finally, Phoenix dropped his hand from Pearl's back and turned to Maya with a smile. "Shall we go, then?"

Clay snorted as he waved at the pair. "Seeya tomorrow, then? For the thing?"

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "What 'thing'?"

"Clay's just joking," Luke hurriedly explained, his grin forced. "Y'know, all the secrets we've been keeping from you over the past few days."

Apollo didn't miss Phoenix, Maya, Iris and Pearl shooting Clay various levels of disapproving frowns. Although he was still suspicious, the young lawyer decided to let it go. "Fine. Whatever. I've had enough of secrets for one week.'
They wasted no time leaving the courthouse together.
After leaving the rest of their family at the courthouse (Iris stayed behind, planning to return to Kurain alone at a later time), Phoenix and Maya ventured up to the small village in the mountains and on to Fey Manor. Maya took the lead, though Phoenix didn't mind so much, focussed on the lingering nervousness inherent in being hatless in public for the first time in seven years. Despite the pep-talk from his children and the comforting knowledge that word would quickly spread of his cleared name, he was still fighting the urge to pull up his hood or keep a hand over his spikes to hide them from view. In a way, it was a good thing Maya had physically taken his beanie away, because he was pretty sure he'd've kept wearing it otherwise. It didn't matter that it had been seven years since he'd last been at the receiving end of a bad reaction to someone recognising him, he'd been dwelling on the possibility for long enough it was habit to do so. Having Maya so close, her hand in his, helped distract him.

The nervousness of his missing hat faded once Phoenix got off the bus in Kurain Village, and Maya wasted no time in dragging him straight into Fey Manor.

"Well, that wasn't so bad, was it?"

Phoenix scoffed good-naturedly, pulling off his sandals to throw in the cubby-holes by the front door. "I dunno, I saw at least four different people looking our way."

Maya gasped, giving Phoenix a scandalised look. "Ooh, you should have told me! If it were another woman, I could have slapped her for staring at my man!"

Laughing, Phoenix shoved his hands in his hoodie pocket. "I didn't take you for the jealous type. Besides, what if this other woman was gay?"

"Then it's your job to slap her for looking at your woman, isn't it?" Maya stuck out her tongue, shooting Phoenix a wink. As he chuckled at her reply, she flounced off into the house. "Now come in here. I've got limited time with you tonight and I want to make the most of it."

Phoenix shook his head. "Impatient, aren't you?" Regardless, he followed his partner through to the hallway.

Maya was first to the master bedroom, pulling the tie and beads from her hair as she hurried to her desk. She wasted no time in dumping the hair decorations and her necklace with it, sighing as she turned to piling up the loose papers littered nearby. "Man, I forgot about all this stuff..."

Phoenix smiled, leaning against the door-frame as he watched her from behind. After everything that had happened that day, and knowing they were completely alone in her large mansion, he simply couldn't resist a chance to admire the woman he loved. How long had it been since they'd last had a truly private moment like this between them? Already he didn't want it to end.

"Sorry, I'll have to sort it out properly later." Maya shoved her papers into a drawer, then paused. She reached into her obi, pulling out Phoenix's beanie and turning it until she found the shocked-face badge pinned to its front, studying it carefully. "So... this is a spy camera?"

Phoenix pulled his eyes up from Maya's legs. "Uh, yep. Yes, it is." He wandered into the room, closing the door behind him purely out of habit. "Ema gave it to me when she came back to America at the beginning of the year."

Maya stared at it a moment longer. "How do you turn it off?"

"Can't." Phoenix shrugged. "It just records everything until its battery runs out. Or it gets plugged in to a computer."

Maya snorted, turning to Phoenix with a grin and waving the beanie. "Is that why you've always been such a prude? 'Cause you had this in your pocket the whole time?"

Phoenix shot her a smirk, making a grab for the beanie. As he expected, Maya immediately moved it out of his reach. He sighed, shoving his hands in the front pocket of his hoodie. "Would you believe me if I told you I honestly forgot about it most of the time?"

Laughing, Maya flipped the beanie inside-out in her hands. "Well, I certainly don't want it spying on us tonight!" With that, she pulled open another drawer of her desk and tossed the item inside, then slammed it closed again. "There!"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "Well, I guess that would be enough to muffle our voices." He narrowed his eyes at her. "You are planning on giving it back eventually, aren't you?"

"Maybe." Grinning, Maya skipped to the bed and dropped onto the mattress, patting the blankets next to where she sat.

Rolling his eyes, Phoenix moved to sit at his girlfriend's side. "So, when was the last time we had this entire house to ourselves? Five years ago?"

"Nah, we've had the kids out a few times over the years." Maya snickered. "Is that why you've always been such a prude? Worried about the kids listening in?"

"After Apollo overheard our discussion a month or two back, that's a legitimate concern." After a pause, Phoenix shot her a confused look. "Is there a reason you've asked me that 'prude' question twice in two minutes?"

Maya just laughed, then slipped off the outer jacket of her traditional outfit. "For a former ace attorney, you're remarkably dense sometimes, Nick." She tossed the purple fabric unceremoniously on the floor. "What did you think we were planning to do up here tonight?"

Phoenix's eyes were on the abandoned jacket on the floor. "I... think I have an idea on what you're planning. 'To be fair, your flirting today isn't all that stronger than your usual level, Maya.'"

Maya fell back on the bed, badly hiding her giggles. "You honestly didn't suspect until now, did "You?" Her hands were on her obi, unclipping the sash from around her waist. "You thinking of joining me, or am I relegated to having fun on my own again?"

"I guess I can't stop you." Phoenix sat back, watching with amusement as Maya struggled to pull her obi out from underneath her without sitting up, and she did finally extract the sash to toss on the floor with her jacket. The golden chain of her locket sparkled in the light as it moved, but Maya made no move to rescue it. Phoenix grinned. "Shall I wait outside, or did you want me to pose for you?"

Maya sighed, the smile fading from her face. She pushed herself back up into a sitting position, her hands holding the final layer of her robes closed over what Phoenix knew was only her bra and underwear underneath. "Nick... How long have we known each other?"

Phoenix frowned, eyes far away. "I'd say it's been... ten years now, huh? Ten years and just over a month since Mia died." The image of his mentor's crumpled body under the office window flashed across his mind, and he whispered, "I didn't even realise it had been that long."

Maya nodded, looking away. "We decided to be a couple in secret five years ago. Now your name's been cleared, so there's no need to be secretive." She turned her stern gaze to meet Phoenix's eyes. "You know that, don't you."

Phoenix just nodded, returning the solemn expression.

A smile twitched at Maya's lips, but quickly vanished. "Well then. I've been throwing myself at you for an entire decade now." She pressed a hand to his chest, clenching a fist around the grey fabric of his hoodie. "If you don't stop being a prude and give in now, today of all days... I am seriously going to explode."

Phoenix could only stare for a moment, surprised by his partner's intensity. After a few seconds' pause, he pulled his hands from his pocket and gently removed Maya's grip on his hoodie. As he tugged on the zipper, he pretended he couldn't see the small secret smile on Maya's face, taking off his beloved grey jumper and carefully placing it out of the way on the floor. "Don't step on it or anything."

Maya hid a snort. "I won't forget." To show how serious she was taking the request, she followed it up with a warm smile. "Thanks, Nick."

Phoenix smiled back, then shot her a cheeky look. "You were throwing yourself at me when you were a teenager?"

"Nick!" Maya gently whacked the giggling man with the back of a hand. "How could I not? My sister had just died and then this handsome stranger in a suit came out of nowhere and stopped at nothing to defend me against the entire world! Of course I had a crush on you!"

"So you've said." Phoenix crossed his arms, still grinning. "Y'know, if I'd given in back then, it would've been highly illegal."

Maya rolled her eyes. "I know that now. You honestly think a seventeen-year-old with a crush cares about a paedophilia law? Besides, when I came back from training, I was eighteen!"

"Still would've been creepy."

Maya just glared at Phoenix.

In return, Phoenix's grin faded. "I'm serious. You haven't heard of the 'creepy' rule?"
Confused, Maya shook her head.

"It's to calculate how much of an age-gap there can be in a romantic relationship before it gets creepy: Half the older person's age plus seven." Phoenix pointed at himself. "I was twenty-three when we met. The youngest my romantic partner could be before it was creepy would have been eighteen. You," he pointed at Maya, "were younger than that at the time, even ignoring that us dating would have been illegal then."

Maya frowned. "But then I did turn eighteen."

"Ah, but then I turned twenty-four. The lowest acceptable age went up to nineteen then."

Maya crossed her arms. "Nick, that was nearly an entire year. Our birthdays are three months apart! Are you saying those three months are when it's 'creepy' for you to date me!?"

Phoenix laughed. "No, of course not. The acceptable age goes up six months for every year, so it was still nineteen when I was twenty-five, and you turned twenty right after that. Once you were nineteen, it was officially not creepy. For the rest of our lives."

Maya stared in confusion a moment longer, then smiled. "Ah, I see. You were keeping track, weren't you? Waiting for it to not be 'creepy' that you liked me that way."

Phoenix grinned. "Possibly." Before Maya could do more than snort in amusement, he reached a hand into his pants pocket. "Oh yeah, almost forgot about this." He pulled out a small box, passing it casually into Maya's curious hands. "We were friends five years, dating another five... Let's not wait five more to take the next step, huh?"

Maya took her time carefully looking over the item. "Is... Is this...?" She pried open the box, only to gasp as she saw the simple silver ring inside. "Nick...!"

"I've had that hiding away in my room since my mother gave it to me when I was twenty," Phoenix explained. "Planned on proposing to Dollie with it, too. We both know how that turned out."

Squealing, Maya pulled the ring from the box to shove on her hand, only to huff when she found it too big to fit her finger. Ignoring Phoenix's chuckling, she put the ring back in the box and jumped to her feet to deliver the precious item to the desk across the room. "We'll have to get it resized before I go. And I think there's some traditional Main Family rings somewhere, too. We can pretend you proposed with those."

"Does it really matter?" Phoenix laughed. "Besides, you already asked me after the trial when we were getting married, so wasn't it you who proposed?"

"Details, schmetails." Maya waved off the comment, then dashed back across the room and leapt on Phoenix, pinning him to the mattress with a cheeky grin. Phoenix couldn't help noticing how the new position allowed her kimono to fall open, giving him a pleasantly enjoyable view of the lacy bra and bare skin underneath. "The important thing is, we both said yes. Shall we get to celebrating?"

Phoenix bit back a snort. "A bit of an uncomfortable position, and I can't get my clothes off at this angle, but sure, we can try."

Maya leaned down closer, lying on Phoenix's chest with their noses nearly touching. "I've been waiting ten years for this," she purred. "I want to savour every moment."

Phoenix could only smile, his eyes closing as Maya tilted her head and pressed her lips to his. Whatever she wanted to do tonight, he was open to follow Maya's lead.
View the Court Record
You may or may not have noticed, but the revised re-upload I mentioned has started going up over here! It's called 'Turnabout Adoption', specifically focussing on 2019 and heavily rewritten because those chapters are nearly 2 years old and desperately need it. xD

As for this version, it will continue until a good natural stopping point between Turnabout Succession and the next major storyline, then I will be moving updates to a new story under the same series as 'Turnabout Adoption'. I don't know yet where that point is, but you guys will know once I've figured it out. In any case, bookmark or subscribe to the Luke and Apollo Wright series if you want to be notified once this story stops.

"Mister Wright!"

"Hey, Ema... Any particular reason you woke us up from our well-deserved sleep-in this fine morning?"

"Us...? Ugh, never mind, I actually had some news for you about the defen-, well, Vera Misham!"

"Oh?"

"I knew you'd want to hear this! It's good news: She woke up!"

"She did? That's great news!"

"Eight-thirty on the dot, according to the doctors! She's in Hickfield Clinic actually. I'm on my way to give her the good news of her trial."

"Ah, a good idea. I'll want to see her myself, but the trip back into the city would take about an hour."

"You're outside the city?"

"Yeah, I... I decided to spend the night in the fresh mountain air. Vera shouldn't have to wait for me to hear the outcome of her trial, though. You go ahead and let her know that, and I'll see her as soon as I can."

"Sure. Did you want me to tell Apollo while I'm at it?"

"... Nah, I'll pass the message on. You can tell Prosecutor Gavin, though. I don't have his contact details."

"Eh, if I have to... Sure, I'll let the fop know. And I'll tell Vera you'll be dropping by, Mister Wright."

"Thanks a bunch, Ema. Talk to you later."
Once Phoenix had passed on Ema's message to Maya, the spirit medium hadn't wasted any time collecting up the piles of Steel Samurai DVDs Phoenix had only recently returned to her, shoving them into bags and dumping half into Phoenix's arms.

"Maya-!"

"C'mon Nick, you should know personally how mind-numbingly boring a hospital is to stay in!"

"True, but-"

"Then help me get these down to that hospital! Besides, I want to congratulate her personally."

Grinning, Maya managed to juggle her bags long enough to elbow Phoenix. "If she hadn't opened up, you'd never have cleared your name."

Phoenix could only laugh and shake his head.

"Oh!" Maya paused in her mad dash, running to her desk and pulling a blue pile of wool from a drawer. "Almost forgot!" She tossed it at Phoenix, warning him, "I better not see that on your head!"

It was a struggle not to drop the bags of DVDs, but Phoenix was able to catch his old beanie, giving the item a nostalgic smile. "Don't worry. I don't need it anymore." He didn't hesitate to stuff it in his hoodie pocket.

It was only as they saw the city outskirts flying past the train window Maya suggested they contact Thalassa.

_Vera woke up this morning so Maya and I are going to visit her. Did you want to join us?_

_That sounds like a good idea. Where is she?_

Hickfield clinic, walking distance from People park, though I'd go through the park itself and down Kitaki Ave if I were you. We'll be there in about 20 min. See you outside?

_I'll see you there_

The three-strong group - Phoenix couldn't help mentally referring to themselves as 'the Wright parents' despite only him bearing that name - entered the hospital reception together just as a much younger woman entered from the opposite side. She grinned as she spotted them, waving and rushing to meet them.

"Mister Wright!"

Phoenix smiled, his hands still full with plastic bags. "Ema. How's she doing?"

"Pretty good." The detective met them in the corner where the path from the door met the path into the wards, and shot an apologetic grin at the surly nurse manning the nearby reception desk. "She's stable, so they've moved her out of intensive care. I told her she's clear of suspicion and gave her a
... so she'll know the full story of what happened once she finishes with those. Obviously this isn't the end of her troubles, but at least she's free to mourn her father now." She then turned to Maya at Phoenix's side. "I don't believe we've met."

"Nope!" Maya carefully placed one of her bags on the floor, then stuck out a hand. "Maya Fey. Nick here's my fiancé. You must be Detective Ema Skye! I've heard a lot about you."

Ema smiled, though her eyes frowned in confusion. She hesitantly shook the offered hand. "I guess he told you about when he defended my sister, then? I wasn't aware he had a fiancée, though."

Maya snorted, rolling her eyes. "Yeah, hard to believe anyone would want to marry him, huh?"

"Hey..."

Ignoring Phoenix, Maya continued, "Anyway, I did hear that story from him, but mostly I've heard about you from the kids." She shot the younger woman a wink. "They never leave the detective out when they talk about one of Apollo's cases!"

Ema shrugged, blushing. "Aw, well, I do my best, despite the glimmerous fop they assigned me to." Releasing Maya's hand, she then turned to the woman next to her. "And yo-?" The moment her gaze took in the face in front of her, she jumped back, eyes wide. "Y-you're Lam-!"

Thalassa smiled. "Not so loud, if you could? I'd prefer not to attract attention." She held out a hand. "It's been a while, Detective Skye. I never expected to be blessed with the knowledge of what you looked like."

Ema managed a proud grin as she shook Thalassa's hand. "Oh, then, congratulations on getting your sight back! I never expected to see you again myself, especially not here of all places." She gestured to the room around them with a nervous laugh. "The very hospital we took you to after you got attacked back in July?"

"That was here?" Thalassa looked around curiously.

"It's a pretty big place, despite appearances," Phoenix cut in. At his side, Maya was picking up her dropped bags. "So, Vera?"

"Yes! Of course!" Clapping her hands, Ema gestured for the three to follow her, heading further into the building. "Right this way!"

Down the corridor Ema led them, to an otherwise inconsequential door on their left, a room Phoenix recognised as the same one he'd been stuck with following his run-in with Doctor Meraktis' car in June. Inside, sitting on her lonesome with her eyes glued to the TV on the neighbouring shelf, was young Vera Misham, hugging her knees. On the bed in front of her was her open sketchbook, a pencil lying on the blank surface of the paper.

"This is most unusual... Exactly what was going on with you folks? What exactly was your 'Troupe Gramarye' up to?"

"... By which you mean?"
"I'm just having trouble envisioning a man who would ask his students to kill him. Both of them, no less!"

"It's just my opinion, Herr Judge, but from these letters, I'd say he was coercing them, not asking them."

"We walked the magician's path together, and in so doing, shared much of our lives. When people are so close, there is strain; A warping of relations, you might say... Yet this has nothing to do with the case at hand."

The image of his younger self on the screen, staring suspicious holes in Valant's head, didn't bother Phoenix as much as he thought it might... though it occurred to him as he glanced at the frowning Thalassa that it might not be the best point of that trial for her to walk in on, whether she'd already seen this tape or not. With Ema waiting outside, he took the lead and strode towards the teen's bed, placing his bags on the floor. "Vera."

The young woman jumped, television forgotten as her wide eyes turned to her visitors. Her hands clenched tighter around her legs, knuckles white.

Phoenix kept up the friendly smile, standing beside the small table at the end of the bed and shoving his hands into his hoodie pocket. "My name's Phoenix Wright. I came to visit you and your father seven years ago. Do you remember that?"

Vera studied Phoenix's face for a long moment. Slowly, her tenseness eased. "I remember you." She turned away, fiddling with the TV remote to turn the device off, though she took her time returning it to the side table, the entire time keeping her eyes away from Phoenix. "The man with the sad eyes. You asked me a lot of questions... and promised to smile the next time we met."

"And I hoped to see you smile in return." Phoenix cocked his head to one side, watching the young woman with concern. "I'm just sorry it had to be under these circumstances."

At first, Vera didn't seem to have heard him, but finally she looked up again, meeting Phoenix's gaze. When he gave her a small smile, she was able to return a hesitant one of her own. "I think I'll be okay," she said. "I still don't fully understand what happened... but once I finish watching the videos the detective gave me... I will understand then."

Phoenix nodded. "It's all over now, at least. As much as we might like otherwise, we can't go back and change any of it."

Vera carefully considered his words, then nodded, another small smile flitting at the corners of her mouth.

"But, when you're done with the boring trial videos..." Maya bounced forward with a grin, holding up her plastic bags. "Nick and I brought something exciting for you to watch!" She laughed as she placed them on the table at the end of the bed. "Sure, it's not Troupe Gramarye, but it's at least as exciting as one of their shows!"

Vera grabbed at her sketchbook and pencil, hugging them to her chest as she stared warily at Maya. Phoenix hurriedly gestured between them. "Vera, this is Maya. She's-"

"Nick here's my fiancé," Maya boasted, then patted the plastic bag. "I lent him these when he was stuck here himself with a sprained ankle. They're perfect for staving off the boredom of a hospital
Vera looked at the bag a long moment before returning her gaze to Maya. "Thank you." Although she still seemed a little wary, she relaxed enough to loosen her grip on the sketchbook pressed to her chest.

Phoenix noticed with a glance behind him that the other two women of their group had also entered the room, Ema hanging back and watching as Thalassa stepped forward. The elder woman rounded Phoenix, headed to Vera's bedside. "Miss Misham, it's a pleasure to meet you." She held out a hand for the teen to shake. "My name is Thalassa Gramarye."

Ema suddenly descended into a coughing fit that sounded suspiciously like the word 'Gramarye'.

"I understand you were a fan of my father's troupe many years ago," Thalassa continued, ignoring the detective. "I can only apologise for how we ultimately failed you with that commemorative stamp."

Vera thought a moment, studying Thalassa's face. "That wasn't your fault." She bit her lip a moment, glancing away. "I... I recognise you. From the stamp. I used to stare at your faces... if I felt lonely."

Thalassa smiled, quietly withdrawing her unshaken hand without comment. "Then I'm glad our presence was of some help to you in a difficult time. As were my three children, from what I saw."

The choking sounds from Ema suddenly got louder. Maya left Vera's bedside to go attend to her. Vera spared only a glance for the detective in the doorway before returning her gaze to Thalassa. "Your... children?"

"Apollo, Trucy and Machi. My three treasures." Thalassa chuckled at the thought of the trio, seeing them in place of the hospital ward she stood in. "They don't know I'm here yet. I've been away for a while." The focus returned to her eyes, and she renewed her fading smile. "But if you still appreciate magic as an art form, Apollo and Trucy have followed in my family's footsteps and are rather accomplished in their craft now." She shrugged. "Admittedly I've not seen their act, but, from what I could hear, it was quite remarkable."

Vera thought in silence, nodding absently.

Phoenix chanced a look behind him, seeing Maya guiding a red-faced Ema out of the room. Hiding a smile, he returned his attention to Vera and Thalassa. "Y'know, it's a real miracle the both of you are alive today." He held a hand towards Vera, "Surviving atroquinine poisoning," then towards Thalassa, "and that bullet only giving you blindness and memory loss instead of killing you."

Thalassa laughed. "Fate is a strange thing, isn't it? Sometimes a life is taken, sometimes a life is spared." She frowned, pressing a hand to her chest. "Though, in a way, I didn't 'survive' that bullet. I left the troupe. My father used my 'death' against my husband and my 'brother'. Lamiroir was born in my place." She looked up towards Phoenix. "'Thalassa' was dead... right up until just last month."

Humming thoughtfully, Phoenix rubbed his chin. "You know what I've been thinking? People don't die that easily, really." He looked to Vera with a smile. "As long as they've got something worth living for."

While Thalassa nodded, Vera mused on Phoenix's words for a long moment. Finally, she looked up at the man with a smile that quickly turned into a grin. "Thank you, Mister Wright." She turned to Thalassa. "And thank you, Ms Thalassa. Even if you didn't do much... you tried to help me. Taking my good luck charm... and being an inspiration when I most needed one."
“Mister Wright helped organise your trial,” Thalassa was quick to point out, gesturing proudly to the man at her side. “He's done a lot on your behalf.”

"Ah, but it was you and the other jurists who ultimately gave Vera the not guilty verdict,” Phoenix shot back with a smirk.

Thalassa laughed. "And we made our decisions based on the arguments presented to us in the trial. If anyone deserves credit for that, it's Apollo and Prosecutor Gavin."

Vera placed her sketchbook back on the bed in front of her. "I knew those costumes. If Apollo and Trucy come from the same magic act I loved... Now I understand why."

"They'll probably come by to visit you themselves later." Phoenix grinned. "Maybe you could ask them to show you some of their tricks? They always love to show off."

Vera giggled and nodded.

"But do remember not to mention me to them," Thalassa added, holding a finger to her lips. "I'm surprising them later today."

"I won't. I promise." Vera then turned to Phoenix, reaching for the bag Maya had left on her bed. "Mister Wright? Please thank your fiancée for these. I appreciate it a lot."

Phoenix smiled. "I will, don't worry. And it wasn't any trouble."

[View the Court Record]
Chapter Notes

Make sure you haven't missed yesterday's chapter, guys! It went up eleven hours later than usual thanks to the AO3 outage.

October 10, 9:53AM
Hickfield Clinic

"You've got to be kidding me! All this time, Lamiroir was not only actually a member of Troupe Gramarye, but Apollo and Trucy's mother!?!"

Maya grinned. "Got it in one."

Phoenix copied her, also giving the stunned detective a nod. "That's a pretty good summary, yeah."

Thalassa was more sympathetic. "I'm sorry for surprising you. I was quite surprised myself, to be honest."

Ema huffed, clearly struggling not to pace the hallway and shooting furtive glances towards the bustle of the reception area. "Well. I guess it makes sense. They were telling me just the other day their mother was in Troupe Gramarye... and something about Machi being 'officially' their little brother." She chewed her lip for a moment. "They know, then?"

"As I understand, they figured it out the night of that concert," Phoenix explained, shrugging. "Apollo told Machi about a month later. Thalassa here knew once she regained her memory back in Borginia."

"They don't know she's back in the country yet, though." Maya winked, still grinning. "We're planning to surprise them later today."

Ema nodded. She seemed to have calmed down now, frowning in thought as she rested a hand on her hip.

"That reminds me." Phoenix pulled out his phone, idly composing a text. "I was waiting 'til we were done to tell Apollo Vera was awake. The kids'll probably want to come by themselves, after that trial."

Thalassa cast a fearful glance towards reception. "Are we meeting them here?"

"Oh no, don't panic," Maya was quick to assure, resting a hand on Thalassa's arm. "We'll be out of here before the kids arrive. There's no way we'll make you do this reunion in public. Okay?"

Sighing in relief, Thalassa gave Maya a grateful nod. "Yes... Thank you, Maya."

"Don't worry," Phoenix added, though he only glanced up from his phone. "We can go hide in the park or something until the kids are back in the office. I'll ask Luke to keep us updated on what they're doing so we know a good time to drop in." He looked up at Thalassa with a grin. "They're gonna be ecstatic you're back for good, y'know."

Thalassa tried to smile, though she still looked worried, running her fingers through the hair laying over her shoulder. "I hope so."

"Oi!" Maya held her fists straight down from her shoulders with an offended glare. "Do you need me to give you another pep-talk? I'm gonna give you another pep-talk!"

Thalassa had to fight to restrain a laugh. "Maybe once we've left here? You both go to so much trouble helping me."

Maya rolled her eyes, crossing her arms. "Duh. That's what family does."

Phoenix hid a smile, slipping his phone back into his pocket as he turned to the quietly watching detective. "Thank you for all your help, Ema. We'll get out of your hair now."

Ema grinned. "That's fine, Mister Wright. I won't mention you were even here."

---

Veras awake. She's in hickfield if you want to visit her.

She is? Awesome! We'll go and see her then!

_Btw when are you and Mom coming back into the city?_

We'll work it out. Sometime today maybe :) .

Alright just let us know when you do. Pearly can't stay here forever yknow :)

---

_I'm assuming you're with the others so if they ask I'm telling you Vera's awake and where she is. I'm headed to the park with Maya and Thalassa rn. Could you keep me updated on your movements?_

Sure. Are we getting ready for the reunion, then?

Got it in one ;) .

_I'll let you know once we arrive at Hickfield. We're heading there now._

You're a godsend :) .

---

October 10, 9:51AM

Wright Anything Agency
Even though it was a Saturday, and the office wasn't technically open, Luke still showed up that morning at nine on the dot to check on his siblings and cousin after the emotional roller-coaster of the previous week. The leftover glee from the win in court had yet to fade, Trucy and Pearl still giggling together as they had for most of the night, enjoying their 'sleepover' in Trucy's room. Machi, having turned down joining the pair, showed no regret in doing so, and was happy to simply absorb the cheerful atmosphere with whoever he was standing closest to. Even Apollo was finding it hard to stifle his grin, still riding the high of finally fulfilling his promise to clear Phoenix's name. The five milled about the office and apartment almost aimlessly, waiting for news from Phoenix and Maya, so it wasn't hard for Apollo to call everyone to attention when the important text arrived on his phone.

"Guys! Vera's awake!"

The group was ready and out the door in a flash, though Luke lingered at the back, pausing to pull out his phone in the middle of locking up. He frowned as he read the message, then smiled as he tapped out a reply.

Apollo, waiting at the bottom of the stairs and ready to herd his younger siblings and cousin down the road, watched his brother curiously. "Luke? What is it?"

The vet jumped as he was addressed, and gave his brother a smile as he quickly finished locking the door. "Oh, nothing. Papa was just telling me about Vera."

Trucy scoffed and rolled her eyes. "Did Daddy not realise you would be with us while we waited for him and Mommy to get back?"

Pearl hid giggles, pressing her hands to her cheeks. "Oh, I hope they had fun!"

Luke chuckled as he hopped down the stairs. "I'm sure they're having so much fun, the thought I'd be with you guys slipped their minds." With one hand, he finished up the message he was typing and sent it off, stuffing his phone quickly back into his pocket. "Let's go see Vera, huh?"

Machi nodded impatiently, tugging on Apollo's arm. "Yes! We must hurry!"

It didn't take long to reach the clinic, despite Apollo's care to walk slowly so he could ensure none of his teenage charges were likely to run off out of sight. Once inside, Apollo headed straight for reception to ask after Vera, Trucy and Machi at his heels. Luke hung back a metre or two, a hand on Pearl's shoulder.

Pearl looked back in confusion as she was prevented from following the others. "Luke?"

"I think too many of us in there at once is more likely to scare Vera than anything else." Luke kept his voice low, eyes watching his siblings. "We should let the others go in, and wait out here. She already knows them, after all." He met Pearl's eyes with a smile. "Besides, there's something else important happening today, isn't there?"

Pearl glanced to her cousins at the reception desk. Hiding giggles, she kept her reply to a simple nod.

Apollo came running back, Trucy and Machi bouncing behind him. "Okay guys, I know you haven't met Vera in person, but did you want to come in too?"

"No, thank you." Pearl didn't bother hiding her grin, hands held tightly behind her back. "I think Luke and I will just scare her."

Trucy pouted. "Why would she be scared of you?"

"I think that a good idea," Machi chimed in, and began to tug on Apollo's cape. "Isoveli, we go in to see her now?"

Apollo laughed, waving his youngest siblings in the direction of the wards. "Alright, c'mon then." He waved at Luke and Pearl as he left, promising, "We'll be back soon!"

Luke and Pearl exchanged a grin as they waved back, watching the trio disappear down the corridor.

Apollo couldn't deny the rising tension the closer they got to Vera, from the moment they'd heard she was awake. The trial over the past two days had been primarily for her, after all: Clearing Phoenix's name, laying out the truth of not only Zak's and Drew's deaths but Kristoph's entire seven-year plot... all that had been a bonus, technically. The worry she wouldn't wake had plagued Apollo throughout the final day and a half of the trial, and, once the verdict was called, hadn't lessened but had dimmed in comparison to the sheer delight of everything that had finally, after all these years, gone right.

Trucy gasped as she spotted the door ahead, the number on the side matching the one the nurse at the desk had given them. "There it is! The same room Daddy was in!"

"Vera!" Machi left his siblings behind, rushing for the door, only for it to open in front of him, and the teen collided with a woman in a lab coat coming out. The pair grunted in surprise, stepping away from the door as it swung closed on its own. "S-sorry!"

The woman smiled as she noticed who her unwitting assailant was. "Oh, no problem, kiddo. Mistakes happen."

"Ema!" Apollo almost laughed in relief as he recognised their friend.

"What are you doing here?" Trucy added.

"I came to catch up your client on what happened while she was unconscious," Ema explained, looking very proud of herself. "Just finished summarising everything, since she isn't too big on watching those super-long court videos right now."

Apollo frowned. "You... told her everything?"

Ema nodded, her grin fading. "She has a right to know. And she wanted to know. That 'work' of hers caused a lot of pain, even if she wasn't aware of what she was really doing. Besides," she shrugged, "she has to face criminal charges for the forgery, too."

Trucy gasped, hands over her mouth. "B-but... she didn't know!"

"I don't think there's anything to worry about, Truce," Apollo was quick to assure her. "She was a minor at the time and had no idea what she was doing. They won't be able to make anything stick."

"Not to mention her severe agoraphobia," Ema added. "Worst she'll get is a fine."

Machi frowned. "A 'fine'?

"She'll have to pay the court money," Apollo explained. "It probably won't be a problem, since the Mishams were apparently rather well-off anyway."
Ema shrugged. "That's for the judge of her next trial to decide." She stepped forward, gesturing into the room with a smile. "Go ahead and talk to her about it yourselves if you want."

"Great!" Trucy cried.

Machi quickly nodded. "Thank you!" The pair didn't waste any time charging through into the room.

"Thanks for everything, Ema," Apollo added, giving the detective a wave. He didn't wait for a reply before following his siblings inside.

[View the Court Record]
"Vera!"

Apollo entered the room just in time to see his youngest brother collapse against the bed at the stunned Vera's side, tears streaming down his cheeks. 'Can't blame ya, little bro.'

"Y-you are okay! I... I so worried you..."

"Don't cry, Machi!" Trucy called, pulling her brother off the bed and into her arms. "I'm happy, too. And proud. We were right there helping Polly, and," she sniffed, rubbing her eyes, "and when I thought about... what if Vera..."

Apollo almost sighed, rushing forward to pull his sobbing siblings into a hug and accidentally knocking off Trucy's hat in the process. "Hey now, don't both of you start." He blinked back his own happy tears, determined to stay strong for his siblings and the quietly watching Vera, who he gave an apologetic smile. "Sorry you had to see us like this."

Machi and Trucy both sniffed, rubbing at their eyes and noses. "S-sorry," Machi mumbled.

"Don't worry about it," Apollo insisted. He could see the relieved smiles on their faces, and he wasn't going to tell them off for that. 'Besides, I would've burst into tears myself if you two hadn't beaten me to it.'

Vera stared at the three for a long time, as silent as she'd always been. Then... she smiled. "Thank you so much. Apollo, thank you."

Apollo was almost too stunned to reply, hands clinging to his equally-frozen siblings. "Uh..." He shook his head. "N-no, I'm sorry... I shouldn't have pressed you like that. If... If I hadn't, you never would have bitten your nails."

"That not your fault!" Machi stepped back from where he'd been pressed to his brother's side, giving Apollo a stern look. "You cannot listen to evil man when he say that, isoveli! It not true!"

Vera shook her head, sad eyes on the sketchbook lying on her lap. "It was me who was wrong. Staying locked inside like that... clinging to my 'good luck charm'..."

Trucy sniffed, wiping away the last of her tears. "Vera..."

"When I opened my eyes, and saw you... I finally understood. It's important to be a part of the world." Vera looked up, meeting Apollo's gaze with another smile. "To see things with your own eyes."

Apollo slowly smiled back. 'I guess that poison had some effect after all. It's killed off whatever was holding her back.'

"I knew you'd pull through, Vera!" Trucy boasted, finally pulling away from her eldest brother. "I mean, that's what Polly was fighting for the whole time: Your future!"
Vera giggled. "I won't forget it. Here, let me thank you!" She grabbed her sketchbook, flipping it open with her pencil already in hand.

Apollo tried to protest, "No, really, it's okay...", but recognised the determined look on Vera's face above her smile, and couldn't put his heart into it.

With a flurry of pencil scratches, Vera finished her drawing, gently pulling the paper from the sketchbook and handing it to Trucy. The teen took it with an excited gasp, showing the picture off to her brothers: A simplified caricature of her face beneath a top hat, winking as she stuck her tongue out the corner of her mouth. "Look! It's me!" Trucy loudly cried, bouncing up and down as she turned to Vera. "I love it! Thanks!"

Vera didn't seem to notice, already working on her second picture. Before long, she was pulling the second sheet from her book, handing it to Machi.

"Th-thank you," Machi was already saying as he took the paper. He examined it carefully, a growing smile on his face. Apollo had to lean over his brother's shoulder to see what Vera had drawn for him: The exaggerated swirl of Machi's hair over a similarly simplified caricature with large eyes and the boy's kindly smiling face, the collar of his old concert outfit sticking out underneath his chin like a blooming flower.

"Machi loves his, too," Trucy informed Vera with a wink. "It looks just like him!"

Vera smiled, already pulling the third drawing from her sketchbook and handing it to Apollo.

"Thanks." Apollo almost took his warily, worried about what he would find. It turned out to be, just like his siblings, the exaggerated spikes of his hair above a confident expression that Apollo only recognised as his from their own promotional material. She had even included the high collar of his cape, the brooch that held it together, and the hint of his tie behind it. He smiled, looking to the young woman in front of him. "Actually... Yeah. Thank you, Vera. Really."

Vera's smile twitched larger, only to fade. "That reminds me... do you know where the other lawyer is?"

"Other lawyer?" Apollo scratched at the back of his head. "You mean Prosecutor Gavin?"

Trucy gasped at Apollo's side. "You mean Daddy! 'Cept he's not a lawyer anymore." She shrugged nonchalantly.

Apollo raised an eyebrow. 'Hasn't been for seven years. It wasn't exactly recent.'

Vera hugged her sketchbook to her chest. "It's my fault, isn't it? I'm sorry."

"Oh! No, no, no, that's not what I meant!" Trucy hurriedly continued, clutching her drawing carefully.

"No, it's okay." Vera sighed, laying the sketchbook back down in her lap and pressing her hands against the cardboard cover. "I'm through looking away from the things I've done. I hope I can look him in the eyes again someday and apologise."

Apollo cast another glance at the drawing in his hands, then to his siblings on either side. With a smile, he told Vera, "He understands it wasn't your fault. I can promise you that."

Vera seemed relieved, but looked away to the other side of her bed, where Apollo noticed a small pile of plastic bags were sitting. "He... His fiancée... brought all those things for me... when they Machi frowned, studying them from a distance. "What is they?"

"Are they," Apollo automatically corrected, also eyeing the bags. "And I think they're... Mom's Steel Samurai collection?"

Trucy snorted, pressing a hand to her mouth to hide a laugh. "Mommy and Daddy must've come straight here to deliver them!"

"That was nice of them," Machi said.

Apollo frowned, pulling his phone from his pocket and quickly reopening his conversation with Phoenix. "But... if Dad's already been here with Mom..." He reread the words on the screen, then groaned. "'Sometime today maybe'. In other words, 'We're already here, but I didn't want to tell you'." He shoved the phone back in his pocket with a glare.

"Wait wait wait!" Trucy squealed, a wide grin on her face. "Vera, you just said 'Daddy's fiancée'!"

She turned to her brothers, free hand in a vice-grip on Apollo's arm. "That means Daddy proposed!"

"Really!?" Machi cried, eyes wide.

Apollo had to pause and absorb the news. "Huh. Finally." He looked down to his sister with a smirk. "But c'mon Truce, we both know it would've been Mom who proposed."

"But Daddy's name was cleared yesterday!" Trucy crossed her arms, careful not to damage the sheet of paper still in her grip. "He would've been so happy, of course he'd be the one to ask Mommy to marry him!" She turned to their younger brother. "You agree with me, right Machi?"

Machi hummed in thought, carefully considering his choices. "I think... Maya was one to propose."

Apollo grinned triumphantly. "Thank you."

Trucy huffed. "Well. I guess we'll just have to ask them when they come back to the agency."

Vera hid laughter.

"I don't think they were expecting us to find out from Vera anyway," Apollo pointed out, shooting the young woman an apologetic look before eyeing his siblings. "Why don't we pretend we didn't hear it so they can surprise us later?"

Vera's smile faded. "I'm sorry."

"No, it's okay." Trucy waved off the woman's concerns. "They probably didn't realise they had to ask you to keep it secret."

"Maya probably very excitement about it," Machi added, then frowned in thought. "I wonder if they wait for Aska to come back before wedding?"

"Ooh, that'd be nice!" Trucy cooed, already fantasising. "Mommy comes back from Borginia, then Mommy and Daddy get married! Maybe Mommy could ask Mommy to be a bridesmaid, and they could be really good friends!"

Apollo noticed a confused look on Vera's face and laughed. "Truce, maybe try specifying between Mom Thalassa and Mom Maya next time you start on a monster sentence like that?"
Trucy just shrugged, grinning.

Vera giggled. "Oh, Trucy?"

The teen turned to Vera with a smile. "Mm? Yes?"

"I was wondering... Could you show him to me once more?" Vera nervously fingered the corners of her sketchbook despite the smile on her face. "Sir Hat, was it?"

Trucy grinned. "Oh, he's not been knighted. Yet." Handing off her prized drawing to Apollo, she ducked down to retrieve her hat from the floor, placing it carefully on her head. She kept her eyes on Vera as she slipped easily into her usual magician pose, one hand on the hidden mechanism built into her bag. It was only thanks to his extensive experience performing with her Apollo could tell she was still nervous about facing rejection. "Here goes!" With a flurry of movement, the wooden puppet sprung from underneath her cape, snatching the top hat off her head and coming to rest at her side.

Vera smiled, an awed twinkle in her eye. "Oh...!"

Trucy's sigh of relief was so small, Apollo didn't think anyone else had seen it. She plastered a smile on her face that appeared for all the world to be perfectly casual, though Apollo knew how much work had gone into the carefully controlled expression his sister currently sported. "Do us an impersonation, Mister Hat!"

The puppet clattered up and down with the movement of its mouth. "Objection! Ahem."

Apollo scoffed, quietly handing the two drawings in his hand to Machi. "Mister Hat, that was just pitiful. You call that an impression?"

"If you have any complaints, you can give them to my secretary," the puppet 'argued'. "But I don't not impersonate someone just because they ask."

Apollo would have laughed at his sister's audacity if they weren't both already in performing mode. "Oh, I don't mind you trying to be me. Who wouldn't, after all?" He shook his head with a pompous air, an (in his opinion, at least) flawless impression of Klavier. "No, that was just a terrible impersonation. You weren't nearly loud enough."

Trucy just barely bit back a giggle. "Your impersonation of Prosecutor Gavin just now wasn't much better, Apollo."

"She's right, you know," Mister Hat clattered.

Apollo waved off their comments, though he had to remind himself not to preen at the giggles from Machi and Vera. "You can't talk, Artemis. You taught Mister Hat everything he knows, after all."

"And I know everything there is to know!" Trucy boasted, bouncing once on her toes. "It's a perfect combination!"

"As long as by 'everything' you mean 'everything except how to do an impression'!"

Trucy put on an offended look. "Well, keep up that attitude, and you won't be learning anything from me."

Mister Hat clattered at Trucy's side. "Please, Mama, Uncle, don't fight!"

Vera laughed, hands pressed together in delight. "If this is what your show is like... I look forward to seeing it myself!"

Apollo and Trucy didn't bother to hide their triumphant smiles.

View the Court Record
Surprises

They're coming out now.

Great. Let me know when you're all back at the office

October 10, 10:25AM
Hickfield Clinic

When Apollo led his youngest siblings back out to reception, they found Luke and Pearl sitting in the chairs near the TV, giggling over Luke's phone. Before anyone could ask what they were doing, Luke had put the device back in his pocket, the pair getting to their feet with identical grins.

"How was Vera?" Pearl asked.

"We were talking to Clay," Luke added, gesturing to his phone. "He wanted to know how she's going, too."

Apollo rolled his eyes. That explains it. "She's fine. Doing really well, actually."

"She's going to come and see our show!" Trucy stuck out her chest with no small amount of pride. "She's not scared of Mister Hat anymore!"

"I hope we're not seriously planning to knight him, though," Apollo snickered.

Trucy shrugged, grinning. "Maybe."

Luke and Pearl shot each other confused looks.

Machi tugged on Apollo's cape. "We should visit again soon, once Vera out of hospital."

"Oh yeah, we know where she lives and everything!" Trucy agreed.

"Why don't we just get back to the agency for now?" Luke suggested, holding up his hands. "Papa and Maya should be getting back soon."

Apollo snapped his fingers. "Oh yeah, apparently they were here earlier, so they're back in the city already."

Pearl looked surprised. "They are?"

"Oh yes!" Machi squealed, bouncing towards Pearl. "And Vera said they've-!"

Trucy hurriedly shushed him, hiding a giggle. "Don't tell them! It's a surprise!"

Apollo scoffed, waving off the question. "Ask Mom and Dad when they finally deign to show up."
We're back at the agency. Apparently Vera told them you and Maya are here, and I think she also told them something else, but they won't say what.

She did? Actually if she mentioned Maya I think I know what it is. We won't be too long. Just keep the others busy in the office and we'll be there soon

Got it.

Even from the street below, they could hear the music.

It wasn't hard to identify the three instruments and their players: Machi's bouncing rhythm at the piano, the rapid melody of Luke's violin, and Trucy's jaunty (though indistinct) words bringing the two together. There was even clapping to the beat, though it was harder to tell who was doing it from down here.

"I know that song," Thalassa muttered, pausing below the window. "But those are not my words."

Maya sighed wistfully. "Aw, I forgot they were translating the Lamiroir songs! I wanted to hear 'em for the first time up in Kurain..."

Phoenix snorted, patting his fiancée's shoulder. "I'm sure they'll be more than happy to play for you later." He moved on to the stairs, where he paused, facing the two women. "Maya, you'd better wait down here. Thalassa... You ready?"

Thalassa took a deep breath, calming herself. After a moment, she nodded, a determined frown on her face. "As I'll ever be, I suspect." She smiled, looking between the two. "Thank you for pushing me into this. I'd have never had the courage otherwise."

Maya shook her head, hiding a grin. "Don't waste time thanking us." She pointed to the stairs. "Go meet your kids, Thalassa."

Phoenix held out his hand, similarly hiding a knowing smirk. After another deep breath or two,
Thalassa took it.

Phoenix didn't think he'd ever been more careful to be quiet as he entered the front door of the apartment that had been his home for nearly a decade now. As usual, the door had been left unlocked, and he pressed down on the handle with both hands to unlatch it without a squeak from the mechanism. With only a glance behind to check Thalassa was at his back, Phoenix tip-toed across reception to the door into the office itself. It had been left ajar, so he made less of an effort to be quiet and careful as he pushed it open, stepping through into the room beyond.

Just as they had surmised from the street below, there was a small group around the piano, playing an energetic tune that was fun enough to dance to. Machi was sat on the stool with a big grin, his hands at the keys, though their view of him was obscured by the teenage girl stood at his side, her back to them as she loudly sang the English words to the Borgiaian song. She eagerly bounced to the rhythm, making her cyan cape flap behind her, and alternated holding the brim of her top hat and clapping to the music. Beyond the two teens, Luke had his violin resting on his shoulder, his bow moving back and forth in front of his face. His eyes lifted to the door with a smile as he saw the visitors, but he didn't pause in his playing.

It took Phoenix a second to find the missing two members of the family: Apollo and Pearl were sat on one of the red sofas, the one facing the piano and thus with its back to the reception door. Pearl was watching the piano with hands clapping along like Trucy's, but Apollo was bent over some papers resting on the table in front of them. He also noticed the door opening behind them, chuckling to himself as he glanced up.

"Hey Dad, nice of you to finall- WAH!?"

With a loud cry of shock, Apollo double-taked hard enough to throw himself off the sofa, falling with a crash to the floor and tossing his papers into the air in a fluttering white cloud. In an instant, the music was silenced, everyone looking to the eldest Wright with shocked concern... but it didn't take long for their eyes to lock on to what had caused the kerfuffle in the first place.

Phoenix didn't need to look to know Thalassa was sheepishly standing just behind him, in full view of the four younger members of the extended family.

Trucy gasped, stepping away from the piano with her hands over her mouth.

Behind his sister, Machi found himself suddenly with a clear view of the door, and his face lit up as he recognised their visitor. "Aska!" Slipping off the piano stool, he raced past Trucy to circle the sofas, and Thalassa moved to meet him, the pair slamming into each other halfway. "Aska! Olet tala!"

Luke quickly and quietly put his violin back in its case, which was resting on the edge of Phoenix's desk, then stepped forward behind his sister, placing his hands on her shoulders. Trucy's eyes were still locked on Thalassa, but she reacted to her brother's touch, pressing against him and moving her hands from her mouth to grab one of his in her grip.

Thalassa and Machi both were laughing in relief as they conversed in Borginian together. Her hands rested on his cheeks, her eyes drinking the teen in as though she had never seen him before... and, outside of photos and video footage, this was the first time she had really seen him. Thalassa was even blinking back tears as she brushed back her youngest son's golden hair with one hand, planting kisses on his forehead, unable to keep herself from touching the boy she had been separated from for three months.

With Pearl's help, Apollo finally recovered enough to get to his feet, his papers forgotten on the floor. Although he watched Thalassa with wide eyes, he cast continued glances towards Trucy, stepping warily away from Thalassa. Behind him, Pearl tried to accommodate her cousin's clear desire to run to his sister, pressing herself into the small pathway between the sofa and the staircase bookshelf that housed their magic display. Finally, Apollo made his move, dashing through the thin gap between sofas and piano to stand at his siblings' side.

Machi noticed the movement out of the corner of his eye, glancing back at the trio by the piano. He paused only half a second, then returned his focus fully to Thalassa and stepped back with an excited grin, holding her hands tightly in his. "Aska, you need meet my big brother and sister!"

Pearl clapped her hands, an equally large grin on her face. "Yes! And I need to go find Mystic Maya!"

"Coming, Papa!" Cheerfully ignoring Apollo's incredulous look, Luke placed Trucy's hands on their elder brother's arm, dashing off towards the door.

"Hey..." Apollo muttered. At his side, Trucy clung to his hand, eyes flicking between her siblings and Thalassa.

Machi giggled, bouncing away from Thalassa to follow Pearl and Luke out the door. "I help too, Isa!"

"If you insist." With a grin, Phoenix waved the boy through into reception, then moved to follow, pulling the door along with him. "Have fun, you three!" With that, the door closed with a decisive click, leaving Thalassa, Apollo, and Trucy alone in the office.

There was a very long moment of silence.

Thalassa kept her eyes on her children, unease written across her face. One hand played with the hair draped over her shoulder.

Trucy gripped the brooch at her neck, gaze moving from the door to her mother. Her other hand still clung to Apollo's, her eyes wide as she stared silently at the woman watching them.

Apollo continued to give the door an incredulous look for many seconds. Finally, he groaned and rolled his eyes. "Is it even possible for what they were doing to have been any more blatantly obvious...?"

View the Court Record
"I mean, seriously, you'd think a walking dictionary like Luke would know the meaning of 'subtlety'!"

Once Apollo had started complaining, he suddenly found himself loathe to stop, keeping a glare on the reception door they had just watched the rest of their family disappear through and waving a hand indignantly.

"And, no surprise, of course Dad was keeping this one last secret from us, because he just can't resist once he's latched on to one of his 'secret missions'!"

Keeping his mouth moving delayed having to acknowledge the situation, having to acknowledge the identity of the woman only a scant two metres away from them. Despite knowing for three months that this day would come, Apollo had never come up with a plan for what to do when it finally happened. Personally, he'd always imagined this reunion would happen at the airport, and they would keep up the charade of 'Lamiroir' until... well, he hadn't thought that far ahead.

"He just let it slip he and Mom Maya were engaged so we wouldn't see this coming. I know he did. I bet Luke and Pearly were in on it, too. Remember how they were giggling over Luke's phone when we got back from seeing Vera? I knew they were being suspic-"

"Mommy?"

Apollo froze as his sister spoke up, finally turning his attention to her. The teenage girl was still staring at Thalassa, her eyes shining as her free hand clutched tightly at the brooch on her cape.

Thalassa was still blinking away the tears leftover from her reunion with Machi, but was clearly on the verge of shedding even more. She opened her mouth to talk, but quickly changed her mind and instead nodded, biting her lip and forcing a smile.

Trucy's hand slipped from Apollo's, and she didn't hesitate to run across the room. "Mommy!" With enough force to knock her top hat to the floor, the girl enveloped Thalassa in a tight hug.

That was all Thalassa needed to open the floodgates a second time, clutching her daughter tight. "Oh, Trucy, my baby girl... My little baby girl..."

Apollo's feet felt nailed to the carpet. Of course Trucy had taken the lead. She actually remembered her time with their biological mother. Apollo didn't think he could exactly follow her example, and was still at a complete loss on how to react to the ongoing situation. All he was able to do was shove his hands inside the belt of his bag (to keep from grabbing at his bracelet) and awkwardly watch from a distance.

Thalassa and Trucy finally pulled apart, Thalassa caressing Trucy's face and leaning down to match her height, the same way she had done for Machi. "You have grown so much... I have missed so much of your life..." She planted a quick kiss on her daughter's forehead, her thumbs brushing away the tears at the teen's cheeks.
"S’okay, Mommy," Trucy giggled, though she sniffed loudly. "It wasn't your fault. Same with Polly. We always knew you'd never have left us behind by choice." She turned to her brother with a grin. "Right, Polly?"

Shifting slightly from foot to foot, intensely awkward, Apollo managed a quick nod and a small smile. He tried not to think about the fact his mother was looking directly at him.

Thalassa straightened, one hand petting the top of Trucy's head. "Apollo?"

Apollo could only manage brief glances to maintain eye contact with his mother. "H-hi." He couldn't deny it: He was frankly terrified right now.

Leaving Trucy behind, Thalassa stepped forward towards Apollo, standing right in front of him. They were the same height, so there was no need for her to lean down like she did with his younger siblings. Instead, she simply placed her hands on his cheeks, like with Machi and Trucy before him, and Apollo could no longer make himself avoid his mother's gaze. She was intensely studying her eldest child's face with those blue eyes that Apollo knew so well from his sister. "My Apollo," she breathed, and her expression tightened as she failed to hold back even more tears. "I didn't look for you nearly as hard as I should have... All these years, I thought you were dead." She shook her head, eyes locked on Apollo's. "Your entire life, I wasn't there for you... Is it even possible for you to forgive me for that?"

For a moment, Apollo was unable to breathe, his left hand reaching up to grip the back of his mother's right. "Of course I do. From what I've heard, everything was pretty chaotic when we got separated. No-one's ever blamed you for assuming the worst and leaving. It..." He took a shuddering breath, finding himself struggling to hold back tears of his own. "It wasn't your fault, Mom."

Thalassa made a noise somewhere between a sob and a laugh, using her left hand to push Apollo's head forward so she could kiss his forehead as she had for his siblings. "My precious baby boy..."

Hiding an amused smile, Apollo decided to just let her attempt to comfort him, unsure how else he could respond to his mother being far more distressed by this reunion than he was. His eyes landed on her right hand, still clutched in his left, and he waved it in his grip, making their identical bracelets brush against each other with a clack. "Hey, at least you left me a way to find you again, huh?"

Thalassa noticed the bracelets and laughed. "I very nearly didn't. Jove thought I was mad for insisting you had it that night, but I wanted you to have something fancy for an audience with the Queen."

In the corner of his eye, Apollo saw Trucy giving them a confused look, slowly approaching the pair, but he had no time to wonder what had caught her attention. It was hard to miss a certain word he'd just heard coming from Thalassa's lips: "Jove?"

"Your father. Birth father, I mean." Thalassa stepped back, looking Apollo up and down with a large smile. "You look so much like him... though you're older now than he was. He would have loved to see how you turned out."

In the corner of his eye, Apollo saw Trucy giving them a confused look, slowly approaching the pair, but he had no time to wonder what had caught her attention. It was hard to miss a certain word he'd just heard coming from Thalassa's lips: "Jove?"

"Your father. Birth father, I mean." Thalassa stepped back, looking Apollo up and down with a large smile. "You look so much like him... though you're older now than he was. He would have loved to see how you turned out."

Apollo couldn't resist looking down at himself. "I... look like my father?" From the day he'd learned Trucy was his half-sister, Apollo had heard many comments saying they looked alike, and the occasional remark comparing them both to their mother. Even more often had people compared him to Phoenix, especially in court... but never before had he heard anything about his biological father, a man he still knew practically nothing about. "His name was Jove?"

Thalassa nodded. "Jove Justice. Oh, there is so much I could tell you about him..." She laughed, looking between the still confused Trucy and the stunned Apollo, and placing a hand on each of their shoulders. "I think all three of us have a lot to explain and share with each other, of our lives since we were separated. I want to know everything."

They sat down on one of the red couches, Thalassa in the middle and her two children either side, the pair perched on the very edge of the cushion so they could face both each other and the woman between them. As the youngest, and most eager, Trucy started them off, describing how her mother had simply not come back from rehearsal one day, and how she was told it was a disappearing trick gone wrong. Magnifi fell ill and was confined to hospital, pinning the Troupe to California, and then the whole terrible drama of his death, Trucy hesitantly described, ripped her from her birth father and uncle all in one fell swoop.

"Lucky Daddy Phoenix was there. He adopted me and promised to look after me until Daddy Zak came back." She shrugged, managing a smile despite the subject matter. "And then we got Luke and Polly, and even Machi, so it all turned out okay in the end."

Thalassa brushed a lock of Trucy's hair behind her ear. "I heard about Zak. He didn't deserve any of what happened to him."

Trucy leaned against her mother with a pout. "Well. Daddy and Polly got Mister Gavin convicted at least. I... never got around to asking Mommy Maya to channel him, though." She sighed. "He told Daddy he wasn't planning to come see me before he died..."

"He probably knew Mister Gavin was watching him." Apollo wished he was close enough to physically comfort his sister, but was forced to make do with simply giving her a sympathetic look. "He knew how dangerous he was... He just didn't want you possibly getting hurt, Truce."

Trucy nodded, but didn't meet either her brother or her mother's eyes.

Thalassa brought her hand up to rest on top of Trucy's head, patting the teen's hair. She turned her head towards her son. "And you, Apollo? How did you end up here, when we parted in Khura'in?"

Apollo shrugged, and was opening his mouth to reply when Trucy suddenly sat up, calling, "I have a question!"

Thalassa and Apollo both looked at Trucy, glanced at each other in confusion, then turned back to the teen. "What is it, Trucy?" Thalassa asked.

"What do you mean by 'koora-een'"?" Trucy crossed her arms, pouting. "It sounds like you're just saying 'Kurain' weird... And weren't you overseas when Polly's daddy died?"

Apollo snorted. "Truce, haven't I told you this before? My dad took me to visit the queen of the country we were visiting, but someone set fire to the palace and he died rescuing me."

Trucy frowned, musing over his words. "I don't remember."

"Well, I know I've told you at least that much," Apollo replied. "Back when we first found out we were related, remember? We went to the library with Luke and Clay and did all that research."

Trucy's gaze drifted away, focussed on whatever she was seeing in her mind's eye.

Apollo shook his head, turning his attention back to Thalassa. "Apparently, before he died, my dad... Jove befriended a local man, by the name of Dhurke." He felt a twitch in his brain at the name that had just left his lips, a name he had promised himself so many years ago he would never even think, let alone say aloud. 'Well, I never thought I'd find my mother, so I guess a lot of old promises are being broken today... and Mom deserves to know all this, anyway.' "He didn't tell Dhurke very much about himself... 'Jangly Justice from California' was pretty much it, I'm told."

Thalassa laughed. "He always had a talent for making fast friends with people... and somehow without ever exchanging very much information at all."

Apollo snorted. In a way, he supposed that would be a good description for Dhurke, too. "Well, after the fire, Dhurke took me in. He had a son of his own, a little older than me... Nahyuta. I think he and my dad mostly discussed us when they met, honestly." He shrugged, taking enough confidence from Thalassa's amused reaction to continue. "Dhurke told me he tried to find you. All of Khura'in was in turmoil, and you would definitely have heard what happened to my dad... It just... Without knowing your name, or Jove's name, or even having a picture of him to show around..."

Thalassa rested a hand on Apollo's shoulder. "This Dhurke couldn't be blamed for not being able to find me."

Apollo decided not to reply to that, hiding that he was more torn on the topic than he let on. "He said he had no choice eventually. He had to leave the city and go up into the mountains with me and Nahyuta, and abandon the search. He always made sure I knew you had only left me behind because of that fire, because you'd more than likely thought I'd died with my dad. Even though he didn't know anything about you, he said he never stopped trying." He sighed, looking away. "My earliest memories are of Khura'in... growing up in the mountains with Nahyuta and Dhurke. The only family I'd ever known. I thought we were happy."

Although he was studiously avoiding eye contact, Apollo noticed Trucy cock her head to one side, watching her brother curiously. "Were you not?"

The memories of what happened next still infuriated Apollo even all these years later, enough that he had to pause to calm himself down before speaking again. "When I was eight years old, Dhurke sat me down and told me I was a foreigner, that I didn't 'belong' in Khura'in. It was too dangerous for me to stay, he said, so he was sending me to California, where my dad came from... where I 'belonged'." He paused again, hands gripping his knees hard enough he was sure he'd see white knuckles even if he weren't wearing gloves. "He sent me away with the empty promise he'd come back for me once it wasn't 'dangerous' anymore. Nahyuta got to stay. I never heard anything from either of them ever again."

There was a very long pause. Apollo felt Thalassa's hand move from his shoulder to his back, rubbing small circles of comfort.

Trucy's hands were pressed to her mouth. "Oh, Polly..." She lowered her hands, curling them into fists, then leaned forward and slapped her brother's arm.

"Hey!" Apollo recoiled, clutching his forearm and watching his sister incredulously. Thalassa's hand fell from his back out of sheer shock, wide eyes on her daughter.

Trucy crossed her arms with a glare. "Why didn't you ever tell us this!? You went through something so awful, and just kept it to yourself?" She huffed, stomping a boot on the carpet. "I've told you all about my life before Daddy adopted me, and Luke's told us so much about his life in England, and even Machi told us stuff about Borginia, and he's only been living with us for three months! All this time, seven entire years, and you never told us anything?"

"Because I didn't want to remember it!" Apollo snapped. "Don't you understand? Dhurke never wanted me! I even tried running back to Khura’in all on my own when he didn’t write, and it took me three years to realise he was never going to write, he was never coming for me! I never wanted to think about that part of my life ever again, because every moment I spent in that place, every memory I have of it... I wasn't wanted, Trucy!" He paused for breath, surprised to find himself panting, blinking back tears of mixed frustration and despair for his lost childhood. "I was nothing but a burden to Dhurke, and he was glad to see the back of me."

Trucy's glare had faded, her expression more one of surprise as she stared back at her brother. "Polly..."

Thalassa reached out and pulled Apollo towards her, his head ending up pressed against her neck as her arms wrapped around his shoulders. "Oh, Apollo... If only I'd known, I would have run to fetch you in an instant. You were always wanted by me."

Apollo took a deep, shuddering breath. "Yeah... Yeah, I know. Thanks, Mom."

One of Thalassa's hands moved to Apollo's head, patting his hair a few times before she released him, allowing the young man to sit up again. "And where does Phoenix come into your story? I've heard you were adopted some time after Trucy, but I don't know much else."

Apollo quickly wiped his eyes and nose with the back of a hand. "Dad? Oh, I knew of Dad as a famous defence attorney for ages before I ever met him."

Trucy snickered. "Polly was a fan!"

Apollo shushed her, hiding a smile. "After his disbarment, I thought that was it for any chance I had of getting to meet him. I was fifteen at the time, or thereabouts. Phoenix Wright was all over the news, the 'Forgin' Attorney' who'd tried to defend a disappearing client. I was heartbroken, but there wasn't exactly anything I could do about it." He shrugged. After a short pause, he chuckled, looking off into the distance with a nostalgic smile. "Later that year, once summer had passed, a new student transferred to my boarding school: This kid from England, with a broken arm and a blue hat..."
The story of how Apollo met Luke turned into how the pair were adopted by Phoenix turned into how Phoenix had recognised Apollo and Trucy were siblings turned into how Trucy had first dragged Apollo on stage to perform with her and the beginning of their partnership. After that came many brief and disconnected tales as the Gramarye siblings jumped back and forth in time, searching for ever more interesting stories to impart on their mother from the past seven years.

"There was this time we had a small earthquake, and Luke totally freaked out and thought the building was collapsing!"

"Oh man, the first time Dad took me to the Borscht Bowl Club to teach me how to spot tells the way Trucy did..."

"Daddy got so mad when Polly took me to get my ears pierced. That was probably the biggest fight we ever had."

"We never do much for Fathers Day, but I always remember how Luke talked us into making simple cards that first year, and how much Dad loved them."

"And there was that time Mommy Maya tried channelling Luke's mom and dad, and then you, and we found out you and Luke's mommy were still alive!"

"I should have told Machi what we knew about you much sooner than I did. He was pretty upset when he first found out."

"You should've seen the look on Polly's face when he realised Mister Sycamore from Luke's stories was a real person!"

"You gotta see Trucy around Halloween. She always makes all of us the most ridiculous and tenuously 'themed' costumes, even though we're all way too old now to go trick-or-treating."

"This one time, Polly was meant to be watching us and lost my friend Jinxie at a fair. She was telling Machi about it a week or two back."

"Oh yes, and I was telling Machi not too long ago about that time Trucy here nearly got herself killed exploring a cave."

Their descent into bickering was broken only by Thalassa's laughter, which was enough to rein the pair in. Thalassa patted their shoulders as they settled sheepishly back into their places at her sides.

"Oh, my darlings... I love you both, but maybe that is enough for now. You have long answered all of my questions for you."

Apollo blushed, and was glad to see the same reaction on Trucy. It took him a moment to properly register their mother's wording. "Wait, so... now we can ask you questions?"

Thalassa nodded. "I'm sure you have plenty. You deserve to have them answered."
Trucy hummed in thought. "Well... How about..." She cocked her head to one side, watching Thalassa with a look somewhere between sheepish and curious. "I've kinda always wondered how you met Polly's daddy, honestly. I know you met Daddy Zak because he was Grandpa Magnifi's apprentice, but..."

Apollo frowned. "Wasn't my dad a guest performer in Troupe Gramarye? That would've been how they met."

"It was," Thalassa sighed, and she leaned back in her seat, a hand at her chest. "But, like all stories, it gets more complicated below the surface."

Apollo and Trucy shared a glance, both intensely curious to hear whatever would be next out of their mother's mouth.

Thalassa closed her eyes, deep in thought. After a long pause, she began to explain: "I was very sheltered growing up. My mother died when I was five, and had been bedridden since I was a toddler. All I knew was the endless travel across the globe at my father's side, watching him perform magic for never-ending streams of delighted audiences. It was expected of me to follow in his footsteps, though I was never passionate about magic... not that I had the life experience to recognise that at the time. I think my father always knew, though." Her eyes flickered open, though she didn't meet either of her children's gazes. "I was sixteen when all of that changed. My father was nearly fifty. I think he worried about the future of his craft, knowing I would eventually realise I had no interest, and go off on my own. He began advertising for hopefuls to come try out and potentially become his apprentices. Eventually, he hired Zak and Valant, and suddenly all his time was devoted to them instead of me."

"Oh, but, you knew Grandpa Magnifi still loved you, right?" Trucy gripped her mother's leg, eyes intently on Thalassa's face. "Even if he wasn't around as much?"

Thalassa laughed. "I'm sure I did, but that didn't make getting used to it any easier. His new apprentices were three and six years older than me, and I wasn't interested in socialising with them. All they wanted to talk about was work, anyway. It was much easier, as a grumpy teenager, to just lock myself up in our caravan and pretend they didn't exist."

Apollo pressed a hand to his mouth, failing to hide a snort. "You... weren't interested in Zak and Valant? At all?"

Trucy looked confused. "So... did Polly's daddy not join up with them?"

"No." Thalassa smiled. "He wasn't interested in magic... but he did think to take advantage of the Troupe." She turned to Apollo. "Jove did come from here. California, I mean. We were camping in a small town here for a show. I was alone in the caravan while everyone else was rehearsing at the venue... and someone knocked on the door."

- Twenty-Five Years Earlier -

Sixteen-year-old Thalassa Gramarye froze for all of two seconds before flinging her Walkman at the bed. She could still hear her music from the headphones (her dad would kill her if he knew she'd turned the volume up so high again), but she had no inclination to go and turn it down, her ears focussed on the noise she was sure she'd just heard reverberating through their small caravan.
Knock knock knock

There it was again! She definitely wasn't imagining it. 'Who would seriously be knocking on our door? Dad would just come straight in, and Whack and Gallant are with him.' She sneered at the names of her father's apprentices, enjoying the rush of mocking their stage names without being told off for once. She had no idea what their real names were. Magnifi had never told her. Thalassa suspected he knew full well she would actually use them.

"C'mon, I know someone's in there!" came a loud voice from outside. "I heard singing!"

Thalassa huffed, crossing her arms. "How dare you listen to my singing without permission!" Truthfully, she didn't actually mind being listened to - Magnifi had always praised her tendency to sing as they went about their daily chores together, and she shared his love of performing - but this was a stranger on what amounted to their front porch and it was the principle of the thing. She stomped towards the front door, intent on telling the stranger off to their face. "I only perform for paying audiences," she flung open the door, shooting the person on the other side a glare, "and people line up to-!"

It was then she actually registered what she was looking at.

A teenage boy, or potentially a young man... certainly much closer to her in age than her father's apprentices. He had dark brown hair that hung limply in front of his face in two long spikes, flattened by the most battered old cowboy hat she had ever seen in her life. His hands sported worn black gloves, and held protectively in their grip a shiny new guitar, hugged tight to his chest. His fingers twitched at the wood, betraying his nervousness and cementing his attachment to the instrument above all else. Hanging off his shoulders was a red jacket, at least two sizes too big by her estimation, and a scruffy backpack that rested so far down his back only its shoulder straps were visible. His dark brown eyes were wide, staring up at her from the dirt ground outside the caravan door. If it weren't for the elevation the caravan gave her, Thalassa suspected they'd be the same height.

Thalassa nearly gasped. 'He... He's cute...!' She quickly assessed her own outfit: Her black strapless dress she performed in, and knee-length teal socks on her feet. It was her usual casual outfit after a show or dress rehearsal, intended purely for lounging around their small caravan. 'Ugh, I guess I don't look too awful. Why did I clean off all my make-up!?!'

The boy recovered first, clearing his throat and looking rather conspicuously pink in the cheeks. "Uh, miss, is Mister Gramarye in? M-Magnifi Gramarye, I mean?"

Thalassa was almost hurt he was there to talk to her father. Everyone wanted to talk to her father. She sighed, leaning against the door frame and crossing her arms. "Why?"

The boy recovered some of his courage, puffing out his chest. "I'm a musician, miss. I sing, and I play the guitar, and I want to do so with Troupe Gramarye."

Thalassa raised an eyebrow. "Do you have a name, Mister Musician?"

"Jove Justice, miss."

Immediately, Thalassa was intrigued all over again. "Jove? Like... Jupiter-Jove? Zeus-Jupiter-Jove?"

Jove's confidence drained. "Uh...?"

Thalassa thought he looked like a lost puppy, and had to bite back a giggle. "Sorry. You probably hear that a lot."
"N-no, actually." Jove shook his head, still looking confused. "I've... never heard that before."

"Really?" Thalassa found that hard to believe, but decided not to pursue it. She pushed off the door-frame, clutching one of her bracelets with her other hand. "So, um... my dad's out rehearsing right now. You'll have to come back to talk to him."

Jove sighed, shifting his guitar under an arm. "Right... When might he be back?"

"He won't be long," Thalassa lied, her smile growing as she reached behind her for her stage boots. "What kind of music do you play?"

Jove hesitantly began to move his guitar back into place. "Well... I can do Wonderwall."

Thalassa barely noticed the time passing after that, perched on a couple of crates they had found around the lot the caravan was parked in, while Jove played any and every song he could on his guitar. It wasn't hard to figure out he was new to the instrument, learning covers and arrangements by ear. Thalassa suspected he'd used all his savings on it, judging by the hand-me-down, falling-apart nature of his clothes and bag compared to the sheen of the fresh wood that made up the guitar. He was very cheerful once he got past his nervousness, and had a booming singing voice that matched better with some songs than others. Thalassa tried to sing along with him if he was playing something she knew, and Jove seemed happy to let her, sometimes even silencing himself to grin and listen to her over the sound of his strings.

It had been after one such song that Thalassa and Jove's playtime was abruptly called to a halt: Thalassa had forgotten the words halfway through a song and been forced to make up her own, mostly just babbling half-remembered syllables and whatever strings of words she could pull together about her plight.

"And something, something, oh no I've, forgotten the words, and something something love you, This song is, out of my range anyway, and why is every popular song always a love song?"

Eventually, the silliness proved to be too much for both, so Jove had pulled his fingers from the strings with a discordant chord, the pair allowing themselves to fully descend into giggles at last. When Thalassa looked up... There was Magnifi, staring at them from beneath the brim of his dark hat. Behind him, the red and yellow capes of his apprentices flapped nervously in the still air.

Thalassa and Jove got to their feet with a gasp. Thalassa spoke first: "Dad! You're back already!"

Magnifi turned towards his apprentices, snapping his fingers. "Zak. Valant. Inside."

The two young men exchanged a glance, then scurried off without another word, straight to their own caravan on the other side of the lot.

Thalassa stuck her nose into the air. Judging by the stern look on Magnifi's face, she was about to face a verbal thrashing, and she refused to let it bother her.

Magnifi sighed as he returned his eyes to his daughter. "Thalassa... no strange boys in the lot. We've discussed this."

"He's not strange, Dad!" Thalassa huffed. "His name's Jove Justice! He was auditioning!"

Jove gave her a blank look. "I was?"
Magnifi raised an eyebrow, turning his attention to the boy. "You're a guitarist."

Thalassa noticed Jove's fingers twitching on the neck of his guitar again. She hoped he would be able to work past his nervousness without her help.

Magnifi merely gave the boy a long, hard stare.

"I could be your opening act. Warm up the crowd for you." Jove shrugged, shifting from foot to foot. "You... You wouldn't have to pay me much. If you don't want to. I'll just... tag along, and-"

Magnifi cut Jove off with a wave of his hand. "How old are you, boy?"

"Sixteen, sir."

Thalassa bit back a gasp. 'He's the same age as me after all?'

Magnifi's eyes flitted to his daughter, but quickly regained their focus on Jove. "Where are your parents?"

Jove's eyes hardened. "I live alone, sir."

"So on the streets, then."

Jove flinched, his grip on his guitar tightening. "I get by just fine. I busk."

Magnifi looked less than impressed, and Thalassa resisted the urge to speak up in Jove's defence (she had no idea what she would say, anyway). "Go home, boy. This is a magician troupe, not a boy band." With that, he spun on his heel and stalked towards the caravan he shared with his daughter. "Thalassa, come."

Thalassa was fuming. Ignoring her father, she turned to Jove, and found him sticking his guitar back under an arm, trudging back out towards the street. "Hey!" She leapt after him, halting the surprised teen with a hand on his arm. "Don't listen to him. I think you were great."

Jove smiled. "Thank you. I knew he'd say no. I just wanted to ask."

Thalassa tightened her grip, keeping the boy from trying to leave. "But... You can't go! Not because my dad is being a moron!"

Jove gave Thalassa a strange look. "He has a point: Troupe Gramarye is a magic act. I knew it was a long shot before I ever knocked on your door."

"But...!" Thalassa huffed, cursing the unfair situation. She liked Jove. She liked his music, even if he needed practise with that guitar. "Well... You should come back anyway. You can..." She looked out at the street, then grinned. "You can busk out there! I'll come and listen to you!"

Jove glanced in the direction she was pointing, the gears turning in his head. "Actually... Yeah, I'd like that." He gave her a grin.

Thalassa giggled, trying not to look too touched at his sweetness.

"Thalassa!" came a roar from the caravan behind her. "I hope you weren't wearing those headphones at that volume!"
Paling, Thalassa quickly began to drag Jove towards the street. "C'mon, let's start right now."

Jove cast concerned glances at the caravan. "Is your dad-?"

"He's fine," Thalassa insisted, quickening her pace. "I just want to finish that song already. He won't mind."

View the Court Record
"Grandpa Magnifi turned him down?" Apollo could barely believe what he was hearing, and had to restrain himself from laughing.

Trucy crossed her arms, humming in thought. "It makes sense, though. I never really thought about it before, but why was a musician performing with a magic troupe?"

Thalassa chuckled, eyes shining with the memories playing across them. "I think my father tolerated his presence more than anything. Jove had stuck to his promise to stay nearby, and I snuck out every moment I could to meet with him in the town, the two of us getting to know each other. I tried to talk my father around in the evenings, but he wouldn't hear it, just gave me his usual disapproving look whenever I deigned to return to the caravan." Her smile faded. "But eventually the week ended. It was time for us to move on."

- Twenty-Five Years Earlier -

"This is so unfair!"

Jove jumped as the young woman dropped onto the pavement next to him, her arms crossed and her back pressed to the brick wall behind them. "Thalassa? Something wrong?"

Thalassa continued to pout, glaring at the street. Fresh off a performance, she was still in the trademark Gramarye cape and top hat that were her favourite shade of teal, a crimson neckerchief visible under her copper hair. "We're leaving tonight!"

Jove stared for a moment before looking away, trying to hide his disappointment under the brim of his dying hat. "Oh."

Thalassa bit her lip, quickly wiping at her eyes with a gloved hand. "This isn't fair. You deserve to come with us."

"It's alright." Jove's fingers were tightening on his guitar again, though Thalassa didn't need her perception to know he was lying. "I'll... get a job somehow."

There was a very long pause as the two teenagers considered their futures ahead of them... their separate futures. Thalassa was torn between rage at her father and sorrow at having to say goodbye to her new friend. Sure, she'd said goodbye to many friends over the years, but that never made parting with them any easier. In fact, it only made it harder that Jove was cute, and sweet, and he was far more fun and paid far more attention to her than Magnifi had in weeks. Plus, even if he wasn't very good at the guitar, he shared the same passion for music and singing that she did, and loved to perform just like everyone else in the troupe. After all the time she'd spent that week on the streets with Jove, singing over his guitar to help attract money to his battered, falling-apart-at-the-seams hat... she was starting to think she had more things in common with Jove than with the troupe.

Thalassa pounded her fists against the concrete they sat on. "I'll stay with you."

Jove blinked, looking up at her blankly. "Huh?"

"I'm staying with you." Thalassa grinned as her plan began to formulate in her mind. "We'll change our names so Dad can't find us: I'll be Theia Gaelle, and you can be Hyperion Reylu! We'll busk together, and travel the country, and sing for everyone!"

Jove stared with wide eyes for a long moment before shaking his head. "Th-Thalassa... We can't do that."

"Why not?"

"Because!" Jove sighed, pressing a hand to his face. "Thalassa, I'm not letting you throw away everything you have just to stay with me."

Thalassa's excited smile turned to a glare. "What!?"

"Life on the street isn't easy." He patted the guitar in his lap. "This gets me only just enough money to support me, and I still go to sleep hungry more often than not. Even together, there's no way we'd make enough busking to get by."

Thalassa shrugged. "Well, I'll get a job then!"

Jove scoffed. "If it was that easy for someone our age to get a job, I'd have one. What did you think I was doing going to your dad?" He looked away with a sigh. "I mean this in the best possible way, but... you have no idea, Thalassa."

For a long moment, Thalassa could only stare at Jove, eyes wide. Finally, she got to her feet and stalked off.

"Thalassa, wait! I didn't mean that in a bad way!"

She ignored Jove's calls.

It was a good thing the Gramaryes rarely locked their caravan, as, had the door been jammed closed, it might have given way after the pounding Thalassa gave it while stomping inside. She paid no heed to her father sitting in their makeshift living room, having partially undressed from his stage-suit down to his shirt and trousers, socked feet crossed under a newspaper in his hands. He looked up curiously as Thalassa headed past him and straight through into the bedroom, slamming the door closed behind her. Once alone in the small room, she wasted no time climbing up the ladder into her bunk above Magnifi's. It wasn't as dramatic an action as throwing herself straight onto the mattress, but she had to make do with what she had. Shoving her beloved Walkman aside and tossing her top hat to the floor, she shoved her face into her pillow, fruitlessly trying to calm her shaking body.

The small door creaked open, followed by the deep rumble of Magnifi's voice. "Thalassa?"

Thalassa tried to ignore him. She'd run all the way straight into her bed without taking off her stage boots, a massive no-no since she'd been very young. Likely her father would have something to say about her unceremonious ditching of her hat, too. 'Get it over with, Dad... I feel awful enough already...'
There was another pause, then the bunk creaked as Magnifi climbed the ladder, squeezing himself into the space between his daughter's mattress and the caravan's roof. "Thalassa." His hand rested on her shoulder. "Tell me what's wrong."

Thalassa choked out a sob into her pillow. "What do you think, Dad? We're leaving tonight, and I won't ever get to see Jove again!"

Magnifi didn't immediately reply, unmoving from where he was awkwardly stretched out across her bunk. "That's it? You're upset over... this boy?"

Offended, Thalassa pulled her face out of the soft mass of her pillow to glare at her father's baffled expression. "His name is Jove, Dad. And it's your fault he can't come with us." She promptly buried her face into the pillow again.

There was another long pause, Magnifi removing his hand from his daughter's shoulder. "Thalassa, why does it matter so much that this bo- Jove cannot join the troupe? He's no different from any other of your friends you made over the years. Besides, we only just took on Zak and Valant, and they are actual magicians."

Thalassa snorted at the mention of her father's apprentices. "Blackjack and Gallivant are all you care about anymore."

"Come now, that doesn't even sound anything like their names."

The teen scoffed. "Why do you get to bring friends along and I don't? You spend all day 'teaching' them now, and I'm stuck in this boring caravan with nothing to do and no-one to talk to... not even you anymore."

The silence stretched out between them. Thalassa's tears had dried, but she was still angry enough at her father that she refused to look up from her pillow, the occasional sniff being her only movement. Finally, the wood creaked, signalling Magnifi pulling himself off the bunk to descend the ladder. Thalassa listened carefully to the sound of his socked feet meeting the floor, then Magnifi paused. A moment later, he left the room, the door creaking softly at his back.

Only then did Thalassa dare to look up. Over the edge of her bunk, she found her hat had been moved from the floor to a side table (the reason for her father's pause before he left), and the door was pulled to a close. Confused, she waited and listened, wondering why Magnifi had left so abruptly and without a word. She heard a series of shuffling in the next room (likely Magnifi pulling on some shoes), followed by, to her surprise, the sound of the caravan's front door closing.

'Oh no."

She slipped off her bed, falling to the floor with a thud. "Dad!" She stumbled only a second, then threw herself through into the living area. As expected, she found it empty. 'What's Dad doing? Is he going to fire Crack and Extant?' She shook her head. 'No way. He's too in love with them to do that. So he must be going to...' She squeaked in fear as her father's destination popped into her head, and ran for the door. "Dad, wait!"

Outside the caravan, standing in the dying sunlight, Thalassa paused to regain her bearings. Across the square, she could see Zak and Valant sitting on crates outside their own caravan, in idle conversation. They stopped as they spotted her, the trio staring at each other across the way for many long seconds. On one side, a sixteen-year-old girl, and on the other, two men, one nineteen and one twenty-two years old.

Well. Thalassa had never socialised with those two before and she certainly wasn't going to start now. Shooting them a glare, she ran for the street, teal cape flapping behind her.

It was lucky Jove wasn't busking too far away, as Thalassa only had to look to her left as she arrived on the pavement to find the spot he'd claimed not long after they met the previous week. Jove was right where she'd left him, though now on his feet, holding his guitar under one arm with his eyes wide. In front of Jove, his back to his daughter, was Magnifi, arms crossed.

Thalassa bit back a gasp, forcing her feet to move already. "Dad!"

Man and teenager paused, Magnifi turning to face his daughter with an amused look. "Thalassa? You object?"

"Dad, you can't send him away!" Thalassa stomped one of her white boots for good measure. "We're about to leave anyway, so-!"

Magnifi chuckled deep in his throat. "I'm doing what now?"

Thalassa paused, staring at her father. "Uh... You're... telling him to go away, aren't you?"

Jove still looked stunned, but a small smile spread across his face as he watched the girl. "Thalassa, he... He's offered to let me join the troupe. As a guest performer."

Thalassa could only stare right back at him. "He...?" Thalassa turned to her father. "Dad?"

Magnifi was still chuckling, and gave his daughter only a simple nod.

Squealing, Thalassa pounced on her father with a tight hug, clinging to the back of his white shirt. "Oh Dad, you're the best! Thank you so much!"

The man laughed, patting the cape hanging around his daughter's neck. After a few moments, he moved his hands to her shoulders, gently pulling her away to look Thalassa in the eyes. "I think we have been travelling alone for too long. Zak and Valant upset the balance, and I fear I left you out in the cold as a result. It's only fair you have someone else around to be there for you, someone to be a friend, for when I cannot." He gestured to Jove with a smile. "And we can even send him out on stage to earn his keep, too."

Thalassa giggled, seeing Jove's face flush bright red. "You won't regret this, Dad! Jove's a great musician! He'll be pulling in crowds of his own one day!"

Magnifi snorted, and, despite his good humour, Thalassa could see from the twitches on his face that he doubted that. "We've all heard his music, dear. He's been 'auditioning' out here all week."

"I-I'm sorry, sir," Jove mumbled, fidgeting with his guitar. "I know you sent me away the first time we met, but-"

"All forgotten, boy." Magnifi waved a hand, dismissing the apology. "Collect your things, and I will find you somewhere to sleep until we can sort out something more permanent."

Jove grinned despite his red face, and leaned down to collect the small bag he always kept on him. Thalassa dashed forward to help, taking the bag as she knew her friend would prefer to hold on to his precious guitar. She giggled, saying "Y'know, if you're staying with us now, you need a good stage name."
"A stage name?" Jove frowned, confused. "What's wrong with my real name?"

Thalassa scoffed. "No-one in Troupe Gramarye uses their real name around here." She paused. "Well, except me, but that's only because mine is too good to replace."

Magnifi hid another snort.

"And we already have the perfect one for you to use: Hyperion Reylu!"

Jove's face scrunched in thought. "That again? Why do you like that name so much?"

Thalassa grinned. "'Reylu' is Borginian for 'justice', and Hyperion was a Greek Titan, the father of the god of the sun and the goddesses of the moon and dawn!" She decided not to mention the Titaness who had given Hyperion said children happened to be Theia. It wasn't a name she was going to need anymore, anyway. "Don't you like it? It's less pompous and in-your-face as a name than 'Zeus' would be."

Jove still looked confused. "Well, okay for Hyperion, I guess... though I've never heard of a language called 'Borginian' before."

"The native language of Borginia, a small country in Northern Europe," Magnifi explained. "I'm sure we'll travel through it again one day." He stepped forward to firmly pat Jove's shoulder. "Welcome to Troupe Gramarye, Hyperion Reylu. I'm sure we'll enjoy having you around."

Jove still seemed unsure for a moment, but then shrugged and gave the man a grin. "Thank you, sir. I won't let you down!"

Thalassa bounced on her heels, grabbing Jove's arm. "C'mon Hyperion, I wanna introduce you to Knack and Talent!"

View the Court Record
"And that's why Valant didn't know his real name..." Apollo hummed in thought, fingers brushing against the grooves of his bracelet. "And why that article we found didn't know it either."

Trucy kept her attention on the woman sat between them, her hands resting on Thalassa's knee. "So then you and Polly's daddy fell in love and got married and had Polly, right?"

"More or less," Thalassa laughed, laying a hand on top of her daughter's. "Jove travelled with us for two years as Hyperion, and we were certainly very close. He had to share a trailer with the props for a few days, then my father bought a third caravan for him to stay in. I spent nearly all my free time there, helping Jove practise, or just talking. I offered to fix up that old hat of his, but it just fell apart, so I simply bought him a new one. He got a new bag, new clothes... That jacket survived, and he eventually grew into it." She smiled, her eyes far away. "We spent so much time together... and, perhaps because of the isolation we had from the outside world, it was a genuine surprise when I fell pregnant at only eighteen."

Apollo gave her a surprised look. "What, you never got the sex talk?"

"No." Thalassa shook her head with a chuckle. "My father was so embarrassed when we found out what was going on. He sat Jove and I down and we had a long talk. Jove and I loved each other, we knew that, and we certainly both looked forward to becoming parents. We were both adults, so when Jove admitted he wanted to break away from the troupe, and I wanted to go with him... My father gave us his blessing. We left and got married in Borginia, the birthplace of my mother."

"So Polly came first, then you got married." Trucy grinned with pride over her concise summary.

Apollo frowned in thought. "Our grandmother was Borginian? Is that why so much of our family history is tied to there?"

Thalassa nodded. "It's because of her my father made sure I learned Borginian growing up, even though she was gone and we rarely went back there. I think my giving Jove the name 'Reylu' also spread rumours he was Borginian, though he'd never heard of the place before meeting me." She smiled. "Of course, he was never very attached to that name. Once we left the troupe, he changed it to Jangly Justice."

Trucy snorted, pressing a hand to her mouth. "Did he seriously choose Jangly Justice himself?"

Thalassa nodded. "Yes, he did. He promised me it was only temporary at the time, but he never came up with anything better... and he always brushed off my suggestions." She turned to her son. "He never had any complaints about 'Apollo' though. He always liked that one."

Apollo felt his face turn red, and sheepishly rubbed the back of his neck with one hand.

Thalassa rested a hand on her son's shoulder, watching him fondly. "We travelled all over, and especially to places Troupe Gramarye had never gone. Jove and I performed in cafes and bars, taking turns looking after you when we had to be separated. That was how we came to be in Khura'in when you were five months old."

Trucy nodded, thinking. "So then Polly's daddy took Polly to this queen... and died in a fire?"

Thalassa was quiet, a pained look on her face. After a long pause, she explained, "I fell ill when we arrived. Food poisoning from the plane, we guessed. To give me a chance to rest, Jove took Apollo out to look for work. I spent the day alone, sleeping through my sickness and waiting for their return..."

- Twenty-Two Years Earlier -

Thalassa stirred as she heard the clatter of a key in the lock of their door. "Jove?" She pushed herself up from where she'd been sleeping on the bed, arranging herself into a sitting position just as the door opened.

The first thing to appear to Thalassa in the doorway was Jove's grin, the young man slipping through into the room. "Hey, 'Lassa. Hope we didn't wake you." Nestled in one arm was the bundle of white sheets containing their son, brown eyes wide as he silently watched his surroundings.

Thalassa shook her head, holding out her arms. "How was it?"

Jove shrugged as he quickly delivered the baby to his mother. "Pretty good pickings, actually. They love their music, these Khura'inese."

Absently nodding, Thalassa focussed on Apollo, pulling him into her lap and placing a hand on his belly, where her fingers were quickly claimed by tiny claws. "That's good."

Jove chuckled, brushing Apollo's cheek with the back of a hand. After a moment, he stepped back, shooting Thalassa a grin as he wandered over to where they kept their suitcases in a far corner of the room. "The little man and me have to head out again, though. Got a pretty big gig tonight." Placing his guitar to one side, Jove dumped his backpack on the floor to go through its contents.

Thalassa turned to watch him over her shoulder with a confused frown, barely registering the baby in her arm beginning to suck on her fingers. "You do?"

Jove laughed, swapping out some random objects in his backpack for a small set of clothes from his suitcase. "You'll never guess, so I'll just tell you: Apollo and I got invited to the royal palace for the night. To play for the queen."

"What!?" Thalassa almost fell off the bed trying to spin around to face her husband, stopping at the last moment only thanks to the reminder of Apollo in her lap. "How on earth did you manage that?"

"Aw, and ruin the surprise?" Jove laughed, securing his belongings in his bag. He got to his feet, swinging the backpack over his shoulder. "I've got my guide waiting outside, but I told him you were performing elsewhere, so you don't have to show your gross face to anyone if you don't want to."

Thalassa tried to snort at that - she had described her pale, sickly demeanour as exactly that while chasing him out earlier that day - but was interrupted by a tickle in her throat that instead resulted in a cough, which she was forced to direct into her shoulder to avoid spraying her son with germs. Once she recovered, she shook her head and returned her attention to her husband. "So you'll be staying the night in the palace? With Apollo?"

Jove was busy securing his guitar underneath his backpack, but gave his wife a nod regardless. "I didn't want to stick you with him overnight if you're not up to it. Also, there's apparently another little boy a little older than Apollo there, so he'll have a playmate while I'm busy."

Thalassa turned her attention to the baby in her arm, to his pudgy little hands gripping her fingers tightly. He seemed to have tired of trying to suck on them, and looked up to meet his mother's eyes curiously. She could only smile at him. "What kind of mother would I be to deny my son a rare play-date?" She giggled, raising the baby to her face to rub their noses together. Apollo promptly laughed with her, reaching his tiny hands up to press against her cheeks. Despite the awkward angle she was holding him in, Thalassa was loathe to break the physical contact, keeping her son where he was as she got to her feet. "You'd just love having another baby around to play with, wouldn't you, Apollo?"

The baby babbled happily, still patting his hands clumsily against her cheeks.

Jove hid a snort of amusement, watching Thalassa carry Apollo across to the table they'd designated as the baby's changing area. "I think Apollo missed his mama." He followed the pair, standing nearby as mother laid son down on the waiting blanket. "Actually, that's a good idea. I've got his changing supplies and diapers if you need them."

Thalassa shook her head, indicating the spares sitting by Apollo's head. Her hands were busy unwrapping the baby from his bundle, and she paused only to tickle his bare tummy before busying herself changing his nappy. It didn't take long (it helped she and Jove had plenty of practise by now), and she was about to wrap the wriggling baby back into his bundle before stopping in her tracks. "Actually..." She grabbed one of her bracelets at random - the one on her left arm - and pulled it against her wrist until the metal adjusted, slipping it off easily. She placed the object, still warm from her body heat, on Apollo's chest, and the baby didn't hesitate to reach out and grab it as best he could with his pudgy hands, attempting to pull the new plaything directly into his mouth.

"What...?" Jove scratched his head under his hat, and Thalassa could almost feel the wave of confusion from him. "Thalassa, are you serious? That thing's far too big for his wrist."

Thalassa hummed in agreement, holding the bracelet in place as she waited for Apollo to tire of trying to taste it. "It's more of a crown." She grinned, using her free hand to start wrapping the baby back into his bundle. "Very fitting, in my opinion. He needs something fancy to show off if he's going to see a queen, Jove. Besides, he was always going to get one of them eventually."

Jove snorted. "Can't it wait until he's old enough to wear it, at least?"

"Too late, it's Apollo's now." Thalassa scooped the giggling baby, tightly contained in wrapped linen, into her arms, showing him off to his father. "He's ready to meet royalty."

Jove sighed and rolled his eyes, but didn't argue further, holding out his arms with a smile. "Alright, alright... I'll make sure he doesn't lose it." Once Thalassa had handed over their son, he laughed. "If your bracelet is a crown... does that make Apollo the Gramarye Prince?"

Thalassa scoffed, shoving the amused Jove in the shoulder. "Get out of here, already." She leaned down to give her son one last kiss on the forehead, cherishing every second of his quiet babbling. "I'll see you tomorrow, Apollo. Be good for Daddy, okay?"

Once Thalassa had straightened, Jove wasted no time planting a quick kiss on her lips. "You just focus on getting better. I'll be right back with Apollo before you know it."
"I know you will." Thalassa gave her husband a warm smile, holding back a threatening cough at the back of her throat. "Have fun. I'll want to hear all about it later."

Jove chuckled, holding Apollo close. "Gotcha." He winked once, then headed out the door.

Thalassa never saw him again.

View the Court Record
Trucy gave their mother a tight hug. "I'm sorry about Jove, Mommy. It wasn't your fault, though."

Apollo shook his head in agreement, gripping Thalassa's hand with both of his. "No-one ever blamed you, Mom."

Thalassa let out a shuddering sigh. "No. No-one except me." She shook her head, clutching both her children. "I slept through the night, and in the morning, I waited for Jove's return. Midday came, and I didn't worry. With such an important venue as the royal palace, it was understandable he'd be held up a little. It was only as the sun began to set I realised something must have happened. Despite my illness, I headed out to the street, looking for anyone who could speak English to ask them if they'd seen a foreign man with a guitar and a baby. Every single one of them just brushed me off with a 'no'." She frowned. "At first, I thought I was only imagining that everyone on the street seemed as frantic and confused as me. I couldn't possibly imagine why I wouldn't be... and besides, I had Jove and Apollo to find, and no worry to spare for the strangers around me." She closed her eyes, seeing the dark night of so long ago projected against her eyelids. "I don't remember exactly how I found out anymore. Maybe someone eventually took pity on me that night. Maybe it was the next day I heard, when I saw that photo of the burning palace on a newspaper. Either way, someone told me a musician had died in the fire. Not that anyone cared, so focussed on looking for the arsonist that had killed the queen." Her eyes opened once more, looking up to meet Apollo's concerned gaze. "I stayed in Khura'in for as long as our savings would allow, fighting through my illness, looking for you. It was only a week, but it was the longest week of my life." Blinking back tears, she reached up to cup her son's cheek. "Being forced to leave, to return to my father, simply because I couldn't afford to stay any longer... That was the absolute hardest thing I ever had to do. I regretted it the moment I decided to do it."

Apollo found himself having to hold back tears of his own, placing his hand over Thalassa's. "You did your best, Mom."

Thalassa stared at him for a long moment before taking a deep breath, pulling Apollo into the hug she was already sharing with Trucy. "Oh, the words my father had for me when I showed up at his caravan, deathly pale, completely hysterical, begging for help to return to Khura'in to find my baby... or just to prove for sure whether it had really been Jove who died in the fire... He had to be harsh to make me understand you were both gone. Running off on that wild goose chase would only end in me working myself to death along with you, and he couldn't allow me to do that."

"Why didn't he help you, though?" Trucy still clung to her mother's torso. "Nobody'd said Polly was dead!"

"But my dad was dead," Apollo pointed out, pressed against Thalassa's side where her arm was holding him. "I was only a baby, Truce. If no-one knew I even existed to tell Mom I was okay, what else was she supposed to think had happened to me?"

Thalassa leaned over to kiss her son's forehead. "My father had also suffered the loss of a spouse when my mother died. His experience helped convince me to stay put, to let myself grieve and recover. I didn't leave the caravan for a long time... I certainly never sang again, not as much as I used to... but eventually I talked myself into rejoining the act. I became the assistant to Zak and Valant, as I had always been for my father before them."

Trucy grinned. "And then you fell in love with my daddy!"

Thalassa chuckled. "Eventually. It took a long time to not feel like I was betraying Jove and Apollo by trying to move on." She looked off into the distance. "Jove would never have wanted me to waste the rest of my life looking back at our time together. It was just hard to make myself stop."

Apollo noted his mother's hand clinging to his other arm, holding him in place at her side, and twisted one of his own hands around to hold it and offer comfort.

"My father was already getting too old to perform, not that he ever stopped entirely," Thalassa continued with a sigh. "The three of us gradually took over. Valant was too shy to socialise much with me, but Zak was persistent enough that eventually I agreed to start leaving the lot with him, and explore the places we visited like I used to before. He was... very charming. And I was grateful for all his efforts, even if it took years to stop putting Jove and Apollo between us. He never knew I was doing that, though. It hurt too much to ever talk about them."

"That makes sense. He didn't know about me, after all," Apollo mumbled, frowning in thought. "Except Valant did, or at least suspected. He thought it was just wishful thinking for Zak."

Thalassa gave her son a thoughtful look. "It may have been. Zak highly valued honesty and loyalty, and had more than enough pride in his convictions that you could always trust he would tell the truth, even if it was only to admit he couldn't say. He would never have made an assumption as large as that without first hearing confirmation from me or my father." She smiled, turning to Trucy. "That's part of what I loved about him. He had such great passion for magic, rivalled only by his love for poker. So often he thought he could use his poker tricks to hide something from me, but it never worked. He'd get all flustered every time, then laugh and promise to slip one past me one day. He knew he never would, of course."

Trucy giggled, huddling closer to her mother, only for her smile to turn sad. "You said you heard what happened to him, right? To Daddy Zak?"

Thalassa nodded. "Phoenix brought me up to speed, before Vera's trial. He asked me to be a jurist for that, actually."

Apollo jumped out of her grip, perching on the edge of the seat to face his mother with an incredulous look. "What!? You were on the jury, too!?"

Thalassa chuckled as she nodded. "I thought you were very impressive. Just like when you defended Machi."

Apollo turned red as his cape, looking away.

Laughing, Trucy leaned forward to tug her brother's arm. "See, Polly? It's a good thing you had us helping you in court, huh?"

Apollo waved off the teen, returning his attention to their mother and counting off on his fingers. "So... Luke knew about you because he was helping with the jurists. Mom Maya and Iris knew about you because they were jurists, and they probably told Pearly while they were at it."

"I met Pearl and Iris during the trial, yes," Thalassa replied, smiling. "Maya I met when I arrived last week. She and Phoenix came to collect me from the airport. I couldn't have asked for a lovelier woman to be your mother in my absence."

Trucy wiped imaginary sweat off her forehead with a grin. "Phew! I'm glad Mommy Thalassa and Mommy Maya are friends already, right, Polly?"

Apollo gave his sister a quick nod (he could see Trucy had worried about that, and he was happy to hear it too), but his focus remained on Thalassa. "So that means Clay knew about you, too. How on earth did you get him to not talk about you?"

Thalassa laughed. "Apparently your friend is more trustworthy than either you or Luke think." She ignored Apollo's huffing, shifting in her seat to be closer to both her children. "Either way, it seems we were so careful keeping me a secret, there's a certain something else we neglected to ask Vera not to mention."

Apollo and Trucy's eyes met, the girl gasping loudly. Although it was a surprise to hear Thalassa had been with Phoenix and Maya at the hospital that morning, the reminder that their adoptive parents had finally proposed was what they mutually decided to concentrate on. Trucy giggled, bouncing in her seat. "Oh, it's so awesome they're finally going to get married! Do you think they've told the others yet?"

Apollo scoffed. "Please, it's not like it's a surprise. Those two were already married when Dad adopted us. They've just finally decided to make it official."

"Oh really?" Trucy snorted, arms crossed as she raised a knowing eyebrow at her brother. "You were the only one of us who didn't believe they were a couple at first. You told us off for trying to get them together."

"Um, duh?" Apollo rolled his eyes. "Because it's not a group of kids' place to interfere in other people's love lives? Luke even tried to talk you out of it, but you wouldn't listen."

"Ah, but if it wasn't for me and Pearly, Mommy and Daddy would never have admitted they liked each other." Trucy nodded, chest puffed out with pride. "So, really, you could say this whole wedding was thanks to us."

"It hasn't even happened yet. You can't just take credit like that!"

"Sure I can!"

Thalassa laughed, breaking the pair from their bickering. "Speaking of, I think it's high time we caught up with the joyous couple. I want Machi here to talk about my trip back to Borginia." She pushed herself to her feet.

"Oh yeah!" Trucy sprung up at her mother's side. "He ran off with everyone else!"

Apollo hummed in thought as he stood. "Where are they, though? They said something about going to find Mom Maya, but..."

Thalassa grinned, placing her hands on her children's shoulders. "Just follow me. They're not far."
Apollo was a little surprised when Thalassa led them across the road and down the street to the nearby park. A glance at his phone told him it had been over an hour since everyone else left the office, so that they'd been hanging out so close for that long was impressive.

"Ooh, People Park!" Trucy bounced excitedly at Thalassa's side. "Mommy, we need to show you where Polly found those-!"

"That's enough of that," Apollo hurriedly interrupted, shoving a hand over his sister's mouth. "We can talk about the murder of Doctor Meraktis another time."

Trucy complained through his hand. Thalassa laughed.

They found the rest of their family on a small hill, sitting below a tree that Apollo recognised as the same place the Wright family had had their first picnic, shortly before he and Luke were adopted. They saw Phoenix and Maya first, their backs to the approaching trio and heads leaning against the other. Phoenix even had his arm around Maya, pinning them even closer together. Beyond, a little further down the slope, Luke, Pearl and Machi were sat in more of a circle, apparently busy trading around puzzles written in the back of Luke's notebook.

Trucy squealed loudly, running up and falling on top of Phoenix and Maya in her efforts to hug them, surprising the pair into jumping apart. "And now my whole family is together! Thank you, Daddy!" She planted a kiss on her surprised father's face, then did the same for Maya. "Thank you, Mommy!"

Phoenix and Maya laughed, glancing at each other. "No need to thank us, kiddo," Maya said, turning her gaze up to Thalassa and Apollo. "You three found each other."

"That's a lie and you know it." Apollo crossed his arms, pretending he wasn't smiling.

Luke, Pearl and Machi had also noticed the new arrivals by now, and Machi got to his feet with a grin. "You are back!" He dashed up the hill, bypassing where Trucy was still hugging Phoenix and Maya to head for Thalassa and Apollo. "Did you have nice talk?"

Apollo immediately pulled his youngest brother into a headlock, ruffling the giggling Machi's mop of golden hair. "You are a devious little brat!" He released the boy, crossing his arms again. "Did you know, too?"

Machi shook his head, still grinning.

Phoenix gently detached Trucy from his neck, gesturing between Thalassa's children. "The whole point of keeping it a surprise was that all three of you didn't know. Machi deciding to leave surprised us just as much as you."

"I think you and Trucy deserve time with Aska more than I," Machi explained with a shrug. He turned to Thalassa. "I am glad you are back, Aska."
"I am, too," Thalassa chuckled, running her hand through her youngest's hair. She turned her smile then on the nearby couple. "Though, if not for Phoenix and Maya here pushing me so hard, I may never have worked up the courage to see the three of you again."

Maya grinned. "You're glad you did though, huh?"

Thalassa laughed, nodding. "Indeed I am. Very much so."

"That reminds me." Apollo headed past his parents, down towards where Pearl and Luke were still sat in the grass. "How the hell did you manage to keep Clay quiet about all this?"

"I know, right?" Luke jumped to his feet, eyes wide. "I mean, he nearly spoiled the surprise after the trial yesterday, but apart from that, he actually kept himself in check!"

Apollo laughed as he approached. "Oh yeah, he did say something weird, didn't he? Good thing you were there to cover for him, huh? Y'know," he tapped his brother's arm, "aside from the fact you're a terrible liar."

Luke shrugged with a chuckle, replacing his notebook in his pocket. "To be fair, that doesn't exactly mean much coming from the living lie detector."

Trucy giggled loudly, skipping down to envelop the younger of her older brothers in a hug. "Aw, you've always been an awful liar, Luke! Don't worry, though. We like that about you."

Luke just grinned as he hugged his sister back.

Thalassa, her hand in Machi's, moved around to sit on the grass not far below where Phoenix and Maya had settled at the top of the hill, Machi remaining at her side. "Well, that's one of today's surprises out of the way. Was there another one anyone wanted to share?" She directed her grin up at the nearby couple, and Machi, Trucy and Apollo all copied her, hiding giggles.

Luke and Pearl exchanged a confused look. "I don't understand," Pearl said. "What do you mean, Missus Gramarye?"

Phoenix and Maya glanced at each other sheepishly, shifting closer together. "Well, we can't agree on who asked who," Maya explained, waving a hand, "but it looks like... Nick and I are engaged now."

Pearl's eyes widened dramatically, her hands held over her mouth as it dropped open. "You are?"

Luke gasped, but quickly covered his surprise with a laugh. "Wow... Congratulations!"

Trucy squealed, gripping Luke's arm tightly. "That's such a surprise! Who'd've thought Mommy and Daddy would finally decide to get married now?"

"That is so good to hear!" Machi badly hid a giggle. "I have always known you were close, Isa!"

Phoenix gave a good-hearted scoff. "We know Vera let slip. You don't have to pretend, you two."

Luke turned to the grinning Apollo. "Oh, that's what you three were talking about earlier."

Apollo gave his brother a shrug, then moved his attention to his adoptive parents. "It's about time you two finally made a move. Dad's already on the brink of elderly."

"Hey, objection," Phoenix called with a frown. Maya just laughed.
"So when's the wedding?" Pearl asked, hands pressed to pink cheeks. "It's so long overdue, Mister Nick! You and Mystic Maya deserve such a romantic one after all the time you've wasted!"

The pair's expressions fell, Phoenix watching Maya with concern. "It's... not that easy, Pearly," Maya mumbled, pulling her legs up to hug her knees.

Phoenix patted his fiancée's back, turning his eyes to the children. "Before she can do the test to be recognised as the Master of the Kurain Channelling Technique, Maya has to go do a very important training course overseas. She's been putting it off all year."

Apollo held back a gasp. He was remembering a certain conversation between the pair he'd overheard by accident only two months previous.

Pearl frowned, pressing her thumbnail to her lips. "Oh, I think I heard the Elders talking about that. The trip to Khura'in, right?"

"To where!?" Trucy's eyes widened, her gaze flicking towards Apollo and Thalassa.

Apollo studiously ignored his sister's eyes, though he noticed Thalassa giving her a warning look.

Machi and Luke both looked confused, though it was Luke who spoke next: "So, how long is this trip?"

"Two years," Maya mumbled.

"Two years!?!" Machi looked around at his family, clearly hoping he had misheard. "But... That cannot be true!"

Trucy forced a smile. "Oh, that's not too bad. You'll be coming back for breaks and stuff, right?"

Maya shook her head. "No breaks. It's ascetic training, so the whole point is I do it all in one go."

Trucy's smile fell. She was too shocked for words.

Pearl similarly looked heartbroken. "We... We won't see you for that long?"

Luke frowned, deep in thought. "That's awful. No wonder you were putting it off..." He looked up, watching Maya curiously. "When are you going?"

"That's a good point," Phoenix agreed, eyes on his fiancée. "Have you picked out a date yet?"

Maya nodded, meeting his gaze sheepishly. "I'm thinking the twenty-fourth. It's exactly two weeks from now."

Phoenix almost laughed, giving her a fond look. "Of course it is."

"But that's not fair!" Trucy cried, blinking back tears as her voice increased in both volume and pitch. "You can't go away! Not just as Mommy Thalassa finally comes back!"

Luke reached out to comfort his sister, placing his hands on her shoulders. "Trucy..."

Trucy shook her head, eyes watering. "You're supposed to be friends! I'm supposed to have two mommies now! Why can't you stay!?"

Apollo had had enough, glaring at his sister as he snapped, "Don't you think if Mom had any choice in this, she would be staying? This is something she has to do, Truce! All you're doing by complaining is making her feel even worse about it!"

Trucy paused, returning her attention to Maya and finally noticing how withdrawn the woman was, hugging her knees tight as Phoenix comforted her. Trucy remained silent.

Luke kept a firm grip on Trucy's shoulders, frowning at Apollo. "Did you already know about this?"

Apollo winced, looking away guiltily.

"Apollo overheard us discussing it a couple of months ago," Phoenix filled in.

Pearl glanced at Machi and then Apollo. "A couple of months...? You mean, the time you came up to Kurain right after Iris moved in? The first time you brought Machi?"

Apollo just nodded. He couldn't maintain eye contact with any of his family.

Machi fidgeted, turning to Maya. "I only just meet you, Maya. It is sad you have to go. We will miss you." He gave her a smile. "But we stay in touch while you are gone? And we spend lot of time together before you go."

Maya managed to perk up enough to nod, wiping her eyes with a grateful look. "That would be great, Machi."

Barely holding back tears, Trucy ran back to fall on her adoptive mother with a tight hug. "I'll miss you, Mommy..."

Hugging the girl back, Maya lowered her knees, laughing through her own restrained sobs. "I'll miss you too, sweetie."

"It's only two years." Phoenix shifted closer to the pair, rubbing his daughter's back to offer comfort. "It'll be over with in a flash, you'll see."

Luke and Apollo barely needed to even glance at each other before they were walking over to add themselves to the group, sitting around Maya to place her in the centre of the family circle. Maya laughed again through her tears as she reached out to include the pair, her arms slung over Trucy and Apollo. "I'll miss you three so much. You'll be good for your dad and... and your mom while I'm gone, won't you?"

"Other mom," Apollo corrected with a smile.

"We'll miss you while you're away," Luke said, his forehead pressed to Maya's while his hands rested on his siblings' backs. "But we have two weeks until then. If we make the most of them, the wait until we next see each other won't be so bad."

Maya just grinned, firmly hugging the three. "You kids are angels."

View the Court Record
It took a while for the hug between the Wright children and Maya to end, none of the four quite ready to leave each other's touch just yet. Even when they did finally pull back, they remained in their close circle, hands still resting on each other to share comfort and reassurance. Apollo was surprised to notice when he next looked up that the intimate moment seemed to have tightened the entire family group, Pearl having shifted herself up the hill and near Phoenix while Thalassa and Machi were equally close on Maya's side, the Borginian teen pressed tight next to his mother.

Trucy wiped her eyes, a determined frown covering the raw pain of the unpleasant surprise. "Well, school's off on Monday for the public holiday. We have today, tomorrow, Monday, and then next weekend too, and you're leaving the Saturday after."

Maya nodded. "That's pretty much it, yeah."

"Then, if that's all the time we have left before you go," Trucy declared, "we're spending it with you! If you can't come down to the city, we'll go up to Kurain! We can stay the night, so we don't waste a single moment!"

Maya laughed, glancing at Thalassa. "Thank you, honey... but you're sure you don't want to spend any time with Thalassa, now she's back?"

Trucy faltered only a moment, looking between her mothers with horror before regaining her resolve. "We have the rest of the week for that, and the two years you're away." The fear returned as she looked to Thalassa. "Th-that's okay, Mommy?"

"Of course." Thalassa smiled. "Who am I to deny you time with your other mother?"

Trucy sighed, relieved. "R-right."

Luke patted his sister's back, hiding a smile. "Everything will turn out fine, Trucy."

"I don't have any objections to this plan," Phoenix added, grinning. "Of course, I am planning to go with her, stay a week or two in Khura'in to help her settle in."

Apollo snorted, restraining laughter. "Of course you are, Dad."

"Now now, it was very gentlemanly of Nick to insist like that." Maya badly hid a snicker. "Really out-of-character for him, I know."

Phoenix narrowed his eyes at the giggling pair, and the three teens who had joined them. "Now I have an objection."

Apollo waved his father off, calming his amusement. "I guess I'm on babysitting duty again while you're gone. Feels like I've spent barely any time in my apartment this past week."

"Oh, that remind me!" Machi waved to attract everyone's attention, waiting until all eyes were on him until he continued, "What we do now? I stay in agency?"
Thalassa frowned in thought. "I did want to discuss that with you today. I've put a lot of thought into it this past week."

Apollo noticed Trucy looking worried, and wished he was sitting closer so he could take her hand.

"I think it might be easier if you stayed with Phoenix for now."

Trucy blinked, surprised. "Really?"

Machi turned his head to one side, confused. "Why is that?"

"Partly because I understand your probation is tied to there right now," Thalassa explained, smiling at her youngest son. "And partly because... as much as I hate for this to happen, it will be necessary for Lamiroir to perform in the meantime. Alone." She winced, hands clasped together. "I may have to travel across the country. I most certainly will be singing primarily after your curfew. I can't guarantee I'll be home every night to satisfy the conditions of your punishment." She sighed. "It seems needless to put you through the rigmarole - leruljansi - of reassigning guardianship to Phoenix every time I cannot be there to look after you for a night or two."

Machi frowned, thinking over Thalassa's words.

"Do you need me to explain again in Borgenian?"

Machi shook his head. "I think I understand." He looked up at her with a smile. "You must go sing, so I stay with Is,,-" his face turned red, "um, Phoenix, until probation is over?"

Thalassa chuckled, pulling the boy close to kiss his forehead. "I'm glad you understand, pokani. And you may continue to call Phoenix your father if you wish to."

Instantly, Phoenix turned as red as Machi. "What!?"

Maya and Trucy broke into identical wide grins, gasping in unison. Pearl similarly emitted a quiet squeal, her hands pressed to her cheeks. "Aw, that's adorable!" Maya breathed, then looked to Thalassa. "No wonder you wouldn't tell us what 'Isa' meant!"

Machi hid his face in his hands.

Trucy crawled over to sit at her younger brother's side, hugging him tightly. "Aw, it's okay, baby brother. You're staying with us, and he's our daddy, so that makes him your daddy too!"

"I mean I don't mind," Phoenix sputtered nearby, running a hand through his spiky hair. "It makes sense and all, and you're been calling me that for long enough. It's just... unexpected, is all."

Apollo and Luke burst into laughter, leaning on each other in their hysterics. Apollo was able to get out, "Come on, Dad! You didn't work it out?"

"What else would he logically be calling you, Papa?" Although madly laughing similarly to Apollo, Luke was able to keep himself slightly calmer, just enough to talk clearly. "You never even looked it up?"

Phoenix huffed, crossing his arms. "Well... I figured Machi didn't tell me what it meant for a reason. I was just respecting his decision by waiting for him to tell me himself."

Apollo shrugged, his laughter descending into chuckling. "Okay, yeah, I only found out what it meant 'cause Machi told me, but you gotta admit it was blindingly obvious."
"I only looked it up to confirm my suspicions," Luke agreed. "The same with that thing he calls Apollo, 'isoveli'.'

"Yeah, 'big brother'." Apollo shot his father a smirk. "What else would he call me?"

Phoenix pouted as he looked away.

Maya giggled. "I think it's cute!" She leaned forward far enough to pat Machi's knee, the closest part of him she could reach. "You don't need to be embarrassed about it, kiddo. Nick can't help being a dad to anyone younger than him."

"Hey..." Phoenix muttered.

Machi finally peeked out from behind his hands, the redness in his face having faded. "It is okay, Isa?"

Despite his annoyance at the teasing, Phoenix was able to force a smile for the boy. "Of course it's okay. Why wouldn't it be?"

Machi nodded, slowly removing his hands from his face. Trucy giggled as she hugged him tighter.

Pearl gasped, turning to Phoenix. "Oh, Mister Nick, I almost forgot! If you're a lawyer again, you should try to get another case so Mystic Maya can help you like she always used to, before she goes!"

Phoenix laughed, scratching at his cheek. "Not quite, Pearls..." He couldn't fully hide a vaguely uncomfortable look.

"All that trial did was clear his name," Luke explained. "Papa isn't an attorney again just because he's not a forger."

Pearl frowned, putting a thumbnail to her lip. "Really?"

Apollo nodded. "Dad would have to retake the bar exam, and that's not gonna happen in two weeks. Unfortunately."

Maya sighed, disappointed. "Oh well." She grinned, elbowing Phoenix. "Guess we'll have to do that when I get back, huh?"

Phoenix ran a hand through his spikes, avoiding everyone's eyes. "Uh, yeah, guess so..."

"In the meantime, you can start studying for your test, Daddy!" Trucy giggled. "We'll all help you, too! Then you can become a lawyer again even quicker!"

"That's very nice of you to offer, Trucy," Phoenix muttered, still avoiding anyone else's gaze.

Machi gave Phoenix a concerned look. "Isa? Are you okay?"

Phoenix scratched at the back of his head, frowning off into the distance. "Sure."

By now, everyone was aware of Phoenix's odd behaviour, exchanging worried glances or just watching him with undisguised concern. Apollo was the first to break the silence: "Dad, what is it?"

Phoenix didn't reply, busy pretending he hadn't heard his son's question.

Thalassa sighed, the first to accept the conclusion everyone else was too afraid to come to: "You're not planning on becoming a lawyer again."

Every other member of the group stared at Phoenix with mixtures of shock and horror, crying "What!?" in such a chaotic, mistimed mess it was hard to tell what had even been said.

"But that not make sense!" Machi cried.

"Why would you not want to be a lawyer again?" Maya demanded.

"Wasn't the whole jurist system idea about clearing your name?" Luke asked.

"You promised Prosecutor Gavin you'd face him in court again!" Trucy argued.

"But you were such a famous lawyer!" Pearl whimpered.

Apollo was too shocked to speak, simply staring with wide eyes.

Phoenix huffed, turning a stern gaze to the group as he held up a hand to silence them. "Okay, first of all." He pointed at Machi. "It makes perfect sense once you know my reasons." He pointed at Trucy. "I didn't promise anything, I just said I'd have to retake the bar exam before it was possible." He pointed at Pearl. "Just because I was well-known isn't a good enough reason to become a lawyer again." He pointed at Luke. "It was about making Kristoph pay for his crimes, and clearing my name was a side-effect of that. Mission accomplished, as far as I'm concerned." He pointed at Maya. "And, just think about it: I've been playing piano in that hole-in-the-wall restaurant for seven years. I was a professional defence attorney for three. Any skills I did have will be long gone by now, and the court system has moved on without me." He sighed, leaning back on his hands and looking away. "Who would I be kidding, trying to go back to the way things used to be?"

Apollo finally found his voice. "Dad, you've got to be joking. What kind of lame, bullsh-," he quickly glanced across at Pearl and Thalassa, "bullcrap excuse is that?" He got to his feet, staring his father down. "From the very beginning, even if you never said it outright, we could see you always intended to get your badge back once your name was cleared. Being a defence attorney was more than just what you're known for, it was your life. Even back in April, it was plain to see how much you love being in court and pinning the culprit to save an innocent life. I saw that same passion from the gallery when I was a kid, and seeing that passion, seeing you, inspired me to seriously think about becoming an attorney myself. Every moment I was studying for the bar exam, my biggest wish was to make you proud! Why..." Apollo halted, feeling tears pricking in the corners of his eyes. When he continued, it was in a quiet, defeated voice: "Why are you throwing that away, Dad?"

For a long moment, Phoenix didn't reply. Finally, he turned his gaze to meet his eldest son's. "Tell me, Apollo: What reason is there for me to retake the bar exam? To become a defence attorney again?"

Apollo frowned, recognising that expression he'd always mentally called Phoenix's 'courtroom look'. Before the trial in April, he'd known it best from the many times Phoenix had ran him through fantasy cases to test Apollo's reasoning, and he guessed this was a similar scenario. He shrugged. "Because it's what you want to do?"

"Who are you to tell me what I want to do?" Phoenix shook his head. "You'll have to do better than that, Apollo."

Apollo frowning, crossing his arms. "Because it's what you're best at?"

Phoenix nodded. "I'll admit I'm a better lawyer than pianist... but I'm a better poker player than lawyer. I've never lost a game, after all."
"That's only because you had me and Trucy to help you!"

"I had help in court, too." Phoenix pointed out. "And you two weren't there every time I had a game. I may not be that good, but I'm still good."

Apollo tried not to groan as he realised he couldn't argue that point. He thought a few moments, then snapped his fingers. "Alright: Because your name is in the agency's name, so you have to be prepared to do 'anything' for a client if they ask you to, including defending!"

Phoenix laughed. "Clients asking for defence aren't exactly common. If we get one of those, we have you, and I doubt we're likely to get more than one at a time. Besides, your name is 'Wright' too, isn't it? Can we expect you to play a musical instrument if asked?" He shook his head with a smirk. "C'mon, you knew that one was a long shot. You're out of ideas already?"

Apollo crossed his arms, tapping his forehead in thought. He had to admit, he was finding it hard to shoot down any of his father's arguments. This really is one of his mock trials... Wait a second... He met Phoenix's eyes with a frown. "Well... The fact that you're winning right now is pretty good proof."

"And yet it would vanish into meaningless words were it enough to prove your case." Phoenix smiled. "Trying to invoke a paradox as your decisive evidence is scraping the bottom of the barrel a bit, don't you think?"

Apollo shook his head. "No, that's just it. You're being a lawyer right now! Talking about my 'case' and 'decisive evidence', arguing like we're in a courtroom... How is that not proof!?"

Phoenix's smile died, replaced with a stern frown. "You're a lawyer, Apollo. I'm making my case in a way you can best understand it." He got to his feet, hands in the front pocket of his hoodie. "And since you didn't bring it up: You know how much money your cases have brought the agency over the past half-a-year. What would be the point in splitting that share between us, and taking me out of my steady job at the Borscht Bowl Club just so I can take an exam to wear a suit and a fancy sunflower pin? Any ideas there?"

Apollo stayed silent, looking away.

Phoenix sighed, his frown softening. "Believe me, I've presented myself every possible argument I can find, and I've yet to find any concrete reason to take that exam again." He shook his head. "My time as a defence attorney is long over. It's painful, I know... but it's true. You can't argue with the truth."

Apollo met his father's eyes. He couldn't shake the sudden feeling this had been an argument Phoenix had dearly hoped he would lose.

Phoenix dismissed his pain for a bright smile, sitting back down in the grass at Maya's side. "Hey, now the Jurist System trial is over and done with, I have extra time on my hands again. Maybe I should take piano lessons." He looked to Machi. "You any good as a teacher, Machi?"

Although the air was still awkward, Machi managed a small shrug and a smile. "Maybe. Maya is good, too."

"Hey, yeah, I taught you how to play in the first place!" Maya shoved her fiancé's arm, sticking out her tongue at him. "I can teach you how to not be so terrible before I go."

"In only two weeks?" Luke asked.
Trucy snickered. "That would be a miracle."

"Hey, objection," Phoenix called, though the smile on his face showed he wasn't as offended as he pretended to be.

Apollo sighed as he sat back down in the grass. As much as he wished otherwise... it seemed certain the world would never see Phoenix Wright, Ace Attorney ever again.

View the Court Record
The New Normal

October 10, 12:46PM
People Park

The time came for the group to leave the park, all getting to their feet. Thalassa offered to show her children where she was living now, so they could always come by if they needed her.

"My apartment isn't far. Just outside this park, in fact."

Trucy and Machi shared a grin, jumping either side of her. "Of course!" Trucy cried.

"That sound great, Aska!" Machi agreed.

Apollo shrugged, hiding a smile. "Sure."

Luke giggled, nudging his elder brother. "You don't have to hide that you're excited, Apollo."

Apollo shooed him away.

Pearl hid a grin, giving the Gramaryes a wave. "Have fun!"

Maya and Phoenix linked their arms, hands gripped tightly together. "We'll be back at the office when you're done," Phoenix told them.

"Oh, yeah!" Trucy bounced towards Maya. "We have to plan going up to Kurain tomorrow, and Monday, and next weekend! You have to stay in the city today, Mommy!"

"I already plan on it." Maya gave the girl a conspiratorial wink, then patted Phoenix's arm. "Can't let your dad mope because his brilliant fiancée left him all alone, huh?"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "Brilliant? 'Childish', maybe."

Maya elbowed him. "Hey! Is that any way to talk about the woman you're engaged to?"

"I'm just being honest." Phoenix shrugged, grinning. "Isn't that the backbone of any good relationship?"

"Wait!" Surprising everyone into silence, Machi sprung forward, tugging on his sister's arm. "We cannot go to Kurain tomorrow! We have magic show!"

Trucy gasped. "Uncle Valant's show!"

Pearl clapped her hands together. "Oh yes, that sounds so exciting! Mystic Maya and I shall have to come down to the city!"

"You could all get tickets too!" Trucy giggled, turning to Thalassa. "Uncle Valant was telling us how he's going to revive Grandpa Magniffi's tricks! The first time they've been performed in seven years!"
Thalassa looked intrigued. "Oh?"

Luke frowned, watching his sister. "You spoke to him?"

"We had to drop by Sunshine Coliseum during our investigation for the trial," Apollo explained. "Brushel was headed there to talk to Valant, and we were trying to catch up to him. Speaking of," he turned his attention to Trucy and Machi, "I'm afraid we're not going to the magic show."

The three teens frowned in confusion, looking between each other. Trucy quickly fixed her gaze on her eldest brother. "What are you talking about? Why wouldn't we be going?"

Apollo sighed. "I got an e-mail this morning. I don't know what happened, but the entire thing's been cancelled. Our tickets are useless, and my money's been refunded. There isn't a magic show to go to anymore."

Machi's eyes turned to the ground, disappointed. "But I not get to see actual magic show before..." Pearl patted his back sympathetically.

Trucy frowned, still staring at Apollo. "But why would it be cancelled? This is such an important show! Nothing was supposed to stop it from going on!"

Apollo held up his hands to calm his sister. "I know, I know... Honestly, I have no idea why it was called off. The e-mail didn't say. I guess we'll just have to wait to see if Valant tries again."

Trucy huffed, unimpressed. "It's not fair..."

"No, it's not," Phoenix agreed, expression carefully neutral. "I know you were all looking forward to it, but Valant wouldn't have let his big show be cancelled at such a late stage for no reason, right?"

Maya nodded. "He would have had a very good reason to put it off. Maybe he'll make an official announcement or something."

"That's a good point." Apollo crossed his arms, thinking. "I'll have to keep an eye out for that."

While Phoenix, Maya, Luke and Pearl headed back to the agency, Thalassa took her children to the tall building overlooking the park, going inside, up the elevator, up a final flight of stairs, and through her front door. It was very spacious, with an entrance hallway that opened right up to a large living room, an equally sizable balcony on the other side of wide, glass doors that made up the opposite wall. The room itself though contained only a ring of modest lounges, a coffee table, and a stand with a TV that was still in its box, a clear sign Thalassa hadn't been here long. The biggest sign of mess Apollo found was a pile of cardboard stacked in a corner near the kitchen, most of it having tipped over from where it had been placed leaning against the wall. Beyond the living area, Thalassa showed them several empty rooms, outlining her plans for them.

"A few of them I have set aside for if you three if you ever want to stay over, once Machi's probation is done. This one here is the largest, and would make a good recording studio once I outfit it with sound-proofing, get a piano. This smaller one might make a good office, I thought. I have no idea what I might do with this one over here. Maya suggested a home cinema. Phoenix thought I might turn it into a painting studio. I haven't decided yet."

Once they were done looking around and discussing ideas for the penthouse, the four sat squashed into a corner of one of the lounges, a tight circle in the middle of the massive room. Thalassa sat in the middle, holding Machi and Trucy close either side, and Apollo sat on the edge, closest to Trucy.
As Machi had been absent before, Thalassa prompted him to talk, to tell her all about his three months with the Wrights. Machi was proud to show his mother how much his English had improved, and refused to switch back to Borginian for even a single word, despite Thalassa's offers when he struggled on a term or expression. As he spoke, Trucy frequently jumped in to help, and dragged Apollo into the conversation with her, talking of their trip to Kurain, how Machi found out about Lamiroir's true past, and how he'd been faring at school with his sister.

"I think that is all my interesting things to talk about." Machi grinned up at Thalassa. "How was your trip to Borginia, Aska?"

Thalassa paused in thought, then smiled. "I think I shall start before that, in England... when I met Professor Layton."

Over the next hour, Thalassa told her children the story of how she had befriended Hershel, Flora and Alfendi, the wait for her surgery and how it was replaced by the wait to be medically fit enough to travel, and the excitement of the day Emmy and Sycamore arrived in the Bostonius to finally take them across to the mainland and to Borginia. She showed them the photo Luke had sent, explaining how suspicious of it Flora and Emmy were. She told Machi all about Kopunchiville, about their old friends and the places they had frequented together and how they had changed over the years. She spoke of the true inhabitant of the 'haunted' house across from the orphanage, how the scared old man had briefly tried to kidnap her in an effort to avoid facing his past, and the subsequent crash into the river.

"It was only then he finally agreed to talk, and I got my memories back. It turned out... he was my Papa."

She told her children the story of young Magnus Grammar and Winfred Geary, of how the two had formed the first incarnation of Troupe Gramarye as Magnifi and Varlous. Around the same time, Gaelle 'Gaia' Takala had grown up in Kopunchiville Orphanage alongside Lalu Salinen, a younger brother who had invented the nickname 'Lamiroir' for his older sister. She hesitated only briefly before talking of how Gaia met the young Troupe, how the trio of young adults had formed a three-person relationship that had resulted in her. Gaia's illness threw the fragile situation into chaos, the infant Thalassa travelling with Magnifi while Varlous, under the new name Ami Ystava, took Gaia back to her hometown, caring for her as she slowly withered away. After Gaia's death, Ystava stayed in Kopunchiville and Magnifi kept Thalassa, his biological daughter, on his travels permanently, with her former Papa now only her Uncle Geary, forever out of reach.

"I never really thought about him, outside of knowing he built all our stage equipment. I certainly forgot how close we had been once. That status quo didn't change until I was much older, when I was shot during rehearsal."

She explained how, as they had been in Borginia's capital at the time of the accident, Magnifi sent his daughter to Geary, where she had only very slowly recovered. Knowing she was unfit to return, and wanting her to be happy even if she didn't remember them, Magnifi and Geary set her up with Salinen as a singer in the restaurant, where she was given her new name. As her short-term memory returned, Geary even gave her a new house, giving her independence and keeping her firmly away from any further reminder of him. Lamiroir's career kicked off, despite her blindness, and with not a single memory of Geary or of any other part of her life before her new name.

"Thalassa Gramarye was dead, for a long ten years..."

"But you were not dead, Aska." Machi laid a hand on Thalassa's arm where it rested in her lap. "Just because you forget everything, does not mean you are not alive."
Trucy nodded, pressing against her mother's side. "Yeah! You met Machi, and travelled the world... You two had loads of fun together, didn't you?"

Thalassa frowned, watching her daughter. "But I made no effort to regain my past. I wasn't there for you or Apollo."

"So?" Apollo shrugged. "Sure, it sucks we weren't together then, but we are now."

"And we always knew we'd find you one day!" Trucy giggled. "After me and Polly found out we were blood-related, we asked Mommy Maya to try and channel you."

"I asked her, you tried to stop me."

"-and then she couldn't, so we knew you were still alive out there!" Trucy threw her arms around her mother with a proud grin. "And we have the entire future to spend together now: You, me, Polly, and Machi." She paused. "Oh yeah, and Daddy, Luke, Mommy Maya, Pearly..."

Machi laughed, imitating his sister and hugging Thalassa tight. "We have big family now. I like have big family."

"It can be a pain sometimes, but I wouldn't give it up for anything." Apollo joined in the hug, wrapping his arm behind his sister. "What can the future compare to a decade or two?"

Thalassa could only smile, returning the hug from her children. "True. I certainly intend to make the most of it."

View the Court Record
The small family had lunch together before they decided to return to the agency. Trucy seemed highly excited to go, chomping down the fancy meal Thalassa had painstakingly ordered for delivery. "It's great, Mommy!" In no time at all, she was done, and grabbing at Apollo's arm. "Hurry up, Polly! We need to get back to everyone else!"

"Let me finish eating first!"

Thalassa gave her daughter a stern look. "We'll wait for all of us to finish eating, Trucy. Then we will go."

Although the girl pouted, she reluctantly sat still.

Machi was helping Thalassa start to clean up when finally Trucy's patience ran out. "We'll go wait by the elevator, Mommy!"

Thalassa looked up from the kitchen sink. "Trucy?"

The girl had already grabbed a surprised Apollo's arm, dragging him through to the front door. "Don't take too long!"

Apollo was too surprised to object as he was dragged downstairs, only regaining his voice as Trucy tugged him towards the lift. "H-hey, Truce, wait!"

As they reached the metal doors, Trucy finally stopped, looking around the empty hallway before turning on Apollo with an accusing glare. "Machi doesn't know."

Apollo blinked. "Doesn't know what?"

"And neither does Luke. Or Pearly. And I'm pretty sure Daddy and Mommy Maya don't know either."

Sighing, Apollo shook his head. "Don't know what, Truce?"

"About Khura'in." Trucy almost hissed the words, checking the hallway around them for eavesdroppers. "You lived there for so long, and it was such an important part of your life, and you never told us!"

Apollo's eyes widened, casting a fearful glance around the room himself. "I already told you why I didn't!" he whispered. "I didn't want to remember any of it myself! And of course Dad knows I came from there, it was in my adoption papers."

Trucy frowned. "Daddy knows? What about Mommy Maya?"

Apollo shrugged. "I dunno if Dad told her or not. I told him I wanted to forget about it when I overheard them talking about her trip a couple months back, so he might have kept it to himself or he might have told Mom and asked her not to mention it. I really don't know."
Trucy contemplated this for a moment or two. "Well, Mommy's leaving for Khura'in in two weeks. If she doesn't already know, she deserves to know. So, even if you won't tell Machi and Luke and Pearly, at least tell Mommy Maya about it, okay? Before she leaves?"

Apollo bit his lip, wanting to object... but eventually sighed. "Fine, sure."

Trucy let out a relieved breath, giving her brother a smile. "Thank you, Polly."

Footsteps echoed from the nearby stairs, and Apollo turned to see Machi and Thalassa emerging into the hallway, the latter with thunder in her expression. Trucy squeaked, jumping to jab a finger on the button to summon the lift.

Thalassa crossed her arms, blue eyes glaring at her daughter. "Trucy Artemis Gramarye. What was that all about?"

Trucy grinned sheepishly. "Nothing, Mommy. Honest."

Thalassa's disapproving look only deepened.

Apollo was almost too surprised to say anything. This was the first time he'd seen Thalassa in discipline mode. I'm tempted to say she's being a parent... She's definitely serious about staying with us, huh?

Trucy wriggled in place, and gave up resisting with a sigh. "I'm sorry, Mommy... I guess I was just... impatient to get back."

Thalassa stared a moment more before nodding, her frown and arms falling away. "You're forgiven, then. But have more patience next time."

"I will." Trucy grinned.

The wall beeped, and Machi gasped, leading the family towards the opening doors. "The elevator is here!"

It was only a short distance from the building that housed Thalassa's apartment to the agency, involving following Park Street around the corner, passing the large hotel, and crossing the street to arrive at the building in which the Wrights kept their office. Trucy and Machi giggled as they dashed off ahead across the road, Thalassa and Apollo hanging back at a more sedate pace.

Thalassa chuckled. "So full of energy."

"And this is them when they're tired," Apollo muttered, hiding a smile. "They feed off each other, I swear."

Thalassa laughed.

As they approached the street-level entrance to the Wright home, the teens ahead suddenly stopped in their tracks, catching the attention of the two adults behind them. It didn't take long for everyone to see what had caused the hold-up.

Valant Gramarye was standing by the stairs, cane missing and replaced by a mid-sized, open-topped box clutched tightly in his hands via handles cut into its sides. Much like the family opposite, he was staring with wide eyes, unsure quite how to react as his eyes flickered between the four.
Trucy gasped, grinning widely. "Uncle Valant!" She moved forward to meet him, but Apollo leapt after her and grabbed the teen's arm, pulling her to a stop. She looked back with a confused frown, but Apollo only subtly shook his head, keeping his eyes on the man in front of them.

Thalassa slowly walked up behind her children, watching Valant with an expression somewhere between awe and sympathy. She mouthed his name, unable to make herself speak.

Valant grimaced as he noticed Thalassa's attention, looking away guiltily. He studied the wall at his side for a few moments, then turned his gaze to Trucy, holding up the box with a small smile. As she watched, confused, he placed the object carefully on the ground in front of him, as far forward as he could reach. He took a single step back, then gave the family of four a deep bow, tipping his top hat. Without another word, and with none of his usual attempts at theatricality, Valant Gramarye then turned around and walked away.

Trucy gasped, pulling at her brother's grip as she attempted to follow. When she spoke, it came out far too quiet for the man to hear. "Uncle Valant...?"

Apollo could only stare after the man. Seeing him outside the agency had been enough of a surprise... Somehow, Apollo felt this was related to his strange behaviour when they last spoke to him, and to the sudden cancellation of the magic show.

Thalassa was the first to move, walking forward to pick up the box Valant had left behind. She examined it for a moment, her back to her children, then turned and held it out with a sad smile. "I believe he was delivering this to you, Trucy."

Apollo frowned, dropping his hand from his sister's arm. "Why? What is it?"

Released from her brother's leash, Trucy took a few careful steps forward, eyes on the box in her mother's arms. After a moment, she gasped, running towards it. "Wait, that book!" She plucked the very top item from the box, a black journal with a strap keeping it firmly closed, held in place with a small lock. On the front, in the middle of the faint pattern bordering the cover, was a large symbol in purple: the unmistakable Gramarye Seal. "I know this book! This is...!" She frowned, then looked up at Thalassa. "Why was he giving me this?"

Machi crept up to Apollo's side, taking the elder brother's hand. Apollo could see the boy felt just as confused as he did.

Thalassa looked back at her daughter with a pained expression, full of regret. "I'm afraid there's one more final secret we have been keeping from you... something we didn't think it would be right to reveal for some time yet."

Trucy glanced back at her brothers, all three surprised.

Apollo couldn't help a groan. "There's something else?" He held up his free hand, counting on his fingers. "You came back, Mom and Dad are getting married, Mom's going away for two years, Dad's not getting his badge back... And there's something else!?"

Thalassa grimly nodded. "I think we had better go inside. Phoenix should be the one to explain."

Trucy was staring at the book in her hands, a worried frown on her face. Apollo wondered if she was even listening to the conversation anymore.

Thalassa shifted the box under an arm, then placed her other hand on her daughter's shoulder. "Come." Gently, she directed Trucy towards home, the girl mutely following.
Apollo watched the pair disappear up the stairs. He had a funny feeling about what was going on... suspicions that had been circulating in his head ever since Phoenix had handed Trucy that strange envelope, since he saw Valant’s reaction to it, getting that email about the sudden cancellation of the magic show, and now Valant’s strange behaviour as he hand-delivered a box of objects marked with the Gramarye Seal, specifically to give to Trucy... and Thalassa knew what it was all about. This all leads back to the Gramaryes... To Magnifi. Did Zak tell Dad something else back in April, that he didn’t pass on to us?

"Isoveli?"

Apollo shook himself out of his thoughts, turning to his brother. It was clear by Machi’s concerned look he was intensely worried for their sister, and Apollo gave him a smile. "Don’t worry, Trucy will be fine."

It took Machi a moment or two to believe that, and he forced a thin smile in return.

Grip on his brother's hand tightening, Apollo gently guided him towards the stairs. "C’mon, let's catch up to the others." Together, the pair headed up to join the rest of their family.

Apollo dearly hoped this last bombshell of the day would run smoothly.

[View the Court Record]
The Gramarye Wrights Return

Chapter Notes

Apologies for such a long, unexpected delay! Cyclone Debbie knocked out our power, and all the repair people were apparently elsewhere so it took 27 hours to get fixed. I'm fine though, just exhausted from such a long blackout. :)

October 10, 1:44PM
Wright Anything Agency
Phoenix's Office

Thalassa led the Gramarye family through the open door into reception and beyond into the office. Trucy lingered at her side, still staring at the book in her hands. Behind, Apollo cast worried glances at his sister, hand held tight around Machi's.

As they filed into the office, the four found Phoenix and Maya standing near the piano, and the way they looked up at the new arrivals in surprise told Apollo they'd probably interrupted a rather intense discussion. Maya even stepped back, and Apollo could only guess she'd been pushing Phoenix toward the piano in an attempt to teach him while they had the chance. Regardless, the pair quickly noticed the sombre aura. "Is everything okay?" Maya asked.

Thalassa headed to the glass coffee table, placing the box in her hands firmly on its surface. "We ran into Valant outside. He had some things to pass on to Trucy." She gave Phoenix a pointed look. "Things that previously belonged to my father."

Machi and Maya gasped in unison. Phoenix, although also surprised, grimaced and ran a hand through his hair. "Right..."

Apollo couldn't take the suspense any longer, demanding of his father, "What's going on? Those are Magnifi's things? Why is Valant giving them to Trucy? And why'd he wait so long to do it!?"

"These were Grandpa Magnifi's top secret illusion plans," Trucy mumbled, standing behind Thalassa and with her eyes still locked on the black book in her hands. "Uncle Valant needs these for his magic show..."

Thalassa placed a hand on her daughter's shoulder, offering silent comfort.

Phoenix sighed, heading towards the twin red sofas. "I think it's best you all sit down for this. I'll explain."

Apollo still watched his father suspiciously, but led his youngest brother from the office doorway and around to sit on the nearest sofa. Trucy was guided into the spot at his side, while Thalassa, Phoenix and Maya all took their place on the seats opposite.

Phoenix leaned forward on his knees and pressed his palms together, eyes on the glass surface of the table between them. "Back in April, after Zak died... I'm not sure if you two remember me mentioning it, but there were a few things that happened that night I didn't tell you about."
Apollo frowned, crossing his arms. "I... do remember you saying you weren't prepared to tell us everything just yet. I thought you just wanted to wait until it wasn't all so recent, but you never did explain, did you?" His glare deepened. "And you said in that email you sent me Brushel was there that night. If Zak knew he was in danger, why did he go to the trouble of bringing his friend to meet you?"

"Because Brushel is a certified notary." Phoenix's gaze lifted to focus on his daughter. "Trucy, that envelope I gave you on Wednesday... You can open it now."

Trucy's eyes finally snapped up from the book in her hands, meeting her father's. She stared for a moment before reluctantly placing the book on the table in front of her, turning her attention to dig through the bag at her hip.

Apollo shot suspicious glares at Phoenix, shifting to prop his left arm on top of the seat cushion at his back, allowing him to better protect his sister should she need it. The evidence was already circling in his head again, everything that had come back to him on the street combining with the new information of how it all linked back to Zak and to Magnifi's illusions... and he wasn't sure how he felt about the conclusion he was coming to.

Trucy pulled out the pink envelope with the Gramarye Seal on its front, quickly flipping open the flap from where it had been tucked closed. She reached inside, paused, then screwed up her face and pulled out two pieces of paper, each folded neatly in half. The one on top was smaller, ripped down one side, while the paper below was larger, boasting four smooth edges that almost looked sharp enough to deliver a nasty paper cut. Trucy stared at them for a long moment, then turned her head away, handing them to her brother.

Apollo blinked, surprised, but took the items regardless. Keeping a concerned eye on his sister, he flipped open the top paper, the smaller ripped one, and read its contents aloud.

"I hereby give all rights to the secrets, staging, and performance of my magic to the recipient named below.
"Recipient: Zak Gramarye.
"Magnifi Gramarye."

Apollo held his breath. This wasn't anything new. Valant had told them the rights had been passed to Zak only a matter of days ago. He cast a wary eye over the shape of the paper in his hands, thinking it familiar... but decided there was no time for such musings right now. He placed the paper in his lap, unfolding the second and similarly reading it aloud.

"I, the below signed Zak Gramarye, hereby pass on all rights to the secrets, staging, and performance of Magnifi Gramarye's magic to my daughter Trucy Enigmar.
"Signed, Zak Gramarye.
"Notary: Spark Brushel.
"Witness: Phoenix Wright."

Apollo could only stare at the paper for a long moment, the silence of the room ringing in his ears.
His suspicions had been confirmed... and the only emotion he could summon was a sense of relief that the mystery had been solved.

On Apollo's left, Trucy slowly leaned forward in her seat, pressing both hands against her face as she silently shook with unshed tears.

Machi immediately jumped up from Apollo's right, running past his oldest brother and squeezing into the narrow gap between his sister and the sofa's armrest, pulling Trucy into a hug. "Is okay. You can cry if need to."

Apollo left the two hand-written contracts in his lap, placing a hand on his sister's back and out of the way of Machi's arms. He wanted to offer further comfort, but couldn't think of the words.

A clatter erupted from the kitchen door, which promptly opened. "Papa!" Luke stepped out, looking around the room to locate Phoenix. "We're done with." He paused as he noticed the group on the sofas. "Oh, you're back."

"They are?" Another voice laughed, and a second later Clay emerged from the kitchen, greeting the Gramaryes with an enthusiastic wave. "Finally! We've only been waiting for you guys to get back for-!"

Luke held up a hand, silencing their friend. His eyes were locked on Trucy with a concerned frown. "Trucy? Are you okay?" Without waiting for an answer, he crossed the room to join them.

Apollo wanted to answer Luke's question, but couldn't say for sure how their sister was feeling right now. Not only was this news very big and equally unexpected, it had all kinds of implications big and small that would affect how Trucy reacted, and he knew even his knowledge of the girl's mind was inadequate to predict that. He wasn't even sure how to begin explaining what they had just learned. As for what Clay was doing hanging around the agency (and, for that matter, where Pearl had disappeared to), Apollo decided he could wait to find out.

As Luke arrived by the sofas, standing next to Trucy and Machi, he cast his eyes over the situation: The box of items on the table, and the book with the Gramarye Seal on the front next to it, the opened pink envelope in Trucy's lap, and the two sheets of white paper in Apollo's. Apollo could see the gears turning in his brother's head, and Luke gave their sister a sympathetic look as he crouched by Machi, resting a hand on her knee. "Oh, Trucy..."

For once, Apollo was incredibly thankful Luke had always been the quickest on the uptake out of the three of them.

Clay ran up behind Thalassa, watching the group in confusion. "What's happened?"

"Trucy's inherited the rights to Magnifi's magic," Maya quietly explained.

"Oh, that." Clay frowned, watching Trucy. "Huh, I thought that was an awesome thing, not a sad thing."

Apollo shot his friend a suspicious glare. "Did you know?"

"All the jurists knew," Luke stepped in. "Papa decided it was vital information to understanding Vera's case."

Apollo looked to the sofa opposite, finding Maya sheepishly looking away and Thalassa putting all her concentration into fiddling with her bracelet. Clay, in stark contrast, was just watching with a blank look, evidently unaware of the tension in the room. Apollo turned his focus to Phoenix, who was still leaning forward on his knees with his hands clasped together. "Dad?"

Phoenix sighed. "Those rights were the entire reason Zak ran from the courtroom rather than face a verdict. They're the reason Valant altered the scene of Magnifi's suicide. Zak risked everything to see me in April, not just for a petty poker game, but because of those performance rights. He lost his life because he was ensuring they went to Trucy instead of Valant." He turned his eyes up to meet his eldest son's. "To understand Vera's case, you would have to understand the Gramarye case first... and you couldn't hope to fully understand the Gramarye case without knowing the story of those performance rights."

Apollo decided he could understand that reasoning, but something still rang false: "But what about those of us in the courtroom? None of us knew this supposedly 'vital' information."

"You all had the next best thing: An intimate understanding of Kristoph." Phoenix flashed a wry smile. "Besides, I knew I could trust my jurists with that information, but not everyone in the courtroom was as trustworthy as the select few in the Jurists' Chambers... either that, or you weren't necessarily ready to hear it."

Apollo thought that over for a long moment. To be given this news in the middle of an already highly stressful trial would indeed have pushed the limits of what he and his siblings could bear... Finding out on a day already packed high with shocking revelations wasn't exactly ideal, but at least it was better than the alternative. His eyes landing on the box on the table, another thought occurred to Apollo. "Valant cancelled his show. He knew, didn't he? He must have only just found out."

Phoenix nodded. "He forced my hand, unfortunately." He turned his attention to Trucy. "When Zak gave me those contracts, he asked me to pass them on you when the time was right. I was going to wait until you were much older, but I couldn't ignore Valant trying to claim those performance rights for himself, not after everything Zak had given up to secure them for you."

Trucy's hands slowly lowered from her face. "Grandpa Magnifi... killed himself?"

Apollo mentally face-palmed, and, judging by the look on his face, Phoenix was doing the same. That was a detail they both completely forgot they'd been keeping from Trucy, for the exact purpose of not upsetting her. This was far from the ideal way of spilling the beans. 'Nice to keep the theme going, there.'

Thalassa shifted forward, perched on the edge of her seat. "He was dying of cancer. My mother died the same way, and I'm sure he never forgot a single moment of the years she slowly wasted away right in front of us. He wouldn't have wanted to subject anyone else to that pain, so he decided to go out on his own terms. A true performer to the last." She closed her eyes, pained. "Of all the things he did in the years I wasn't there... his reasoning behind that final action is probably the only thing I fully understand."

Trucy nodded thoughtfully, nestled in the ring of silent assurances from her three brothers. "Okay."

View the Court Record
Finally, Trucy sniffed, quickly rubbing her nose with an arm. The signal was enough for Machi to pull out of his hug, and Luke took his hand off her knee. "Well, I guess I really am the next Gramarye, like Daddy said before he left." She turned to Apollo with a frown, gesturing to the papers in his lap. "We're gonna have to write another one of those."

Apollo raised an eyebrow, taking his hand off his sister's back. "Why?"

Trucy tutted, rolling her eyes. "Apollo and Artemis Gramarye? I'm not performing these alone!"

Apollo rolled his eyes right back at her. "Obviously not, you'd be giving me permission. You're the rights holder, not the one person in the world allowed to do this stuff!"

Trucy considered his words for a moment. "Well... It's still not fair that you can't be a 'rights holder', too!"

"Truce, honestly, I don't mind." Apollo sighed, waving a hand. "It's easier legally if there's a lone rights holder than trying to share it, anyway. We're a double-act, right? It's not like we ever perform alone."

The girl pouted, crossing her arms. "Still not fair."

Phoenix laughed. "That's a lawyer for you."

"That's why I was asking him to write the new contract!" Trucy huffed.

Apollo sighed and shook his head, hiding a smile as he moved the contracts in his lap to the table.

Clay laughed, clapping his hands. "I for one can't wait to see you guys perform this stuff! 'Pollo was going on for days about seeing your uncle do it, and now you get to perform it yourself? That's awesome!"

Trucy put on a grin and shrugged, though Apollo could tell she wasn't as happy about it as she seemed.

"I can always help if you need it." Thalassa gave the pair a smile. "It's been a long time, but I helped my father develop many tricks back when it was just the two of us. I'm sure at least one of those is in his notebook there." She pointed to the black journal on the table in front of Trucy.

Trucy frowned, tossing the empty envelope on her lap on top of the two contracts near Apollo, then grabbing the book in its place. "I always wondered what was in this. He carried it around everywhere..." She poked at the lock holding the journal shut. "I guess we just have to unlock it."

Apollo quickly shooed at his brothers, only half-jokingly. "You guys can't look, you're not magicians!"

Machi pulled himself out of his narrow niche with a giggle, slipping past Luke to run around behind the other sofa. Luke similarly laughed as he got to his feet, saying "You haven't opened it yet!"

"Doesn't matter," Apollo insisted, continuing to brush off his brother. "Very important book, non-magicians shouldn't even be looking at the cover."

Luke scoffed, smiling as he retreated behind the other sofa.

"Wouldn't you have to find the key first, anyway?" Maya pointed out, raising an eyebrow with a restrained laugh.

Thalassa got to her feet. "It's probably in the box with the rest of his things." She moved closer to her children, picking through the contents of said box on the table. "I'm sure Valant will have kept them together. He was never all that good at lock-picking."

Apollo suddenly found himself curious about the grandfather he'd heard so much about, eyes on what little he could see inside the box. "What exactly is in there? It doesn't look like much."

"You don't tend to carry much with you when you live on the road," Thalassa pointed out with a smile. "These would be what little he had, trimmed to whatever he deemed worthy of leaving behind..."

Apollo could almost hear the significant pause adding how Valant may have kept an item or two as a keepsake.

Trucy jumped forward to the edge of her seat, placing the journal on top of the nearby contracts.
"Well, we have his notebook." She reached into the box and pulled out a black piece of folded fabric. "And this must be..." The fabric unfurled in Trucy's hands, revealing a pointed collar at one end and a series of white diamonds along the other, decorated with purple symbols of the four suits of cards.

Apollo gasped, having to keep himself from grabbing it. "Is that his cape!?!"

Trucy grinned, offering the item to her brother. "Yep. He wore this for all his shows."

"Whoa..." Apollo couldn't stop staring as he took the fabric in his gloved hands. It was exactly the same in every way as the one Trucy had made for Halloween oh so long ago now, but, at the same time, it couldn't have been more different. Apollo had seen this exact same cape he was now holding in so many posters and photos and old videos over the years, tightly wrapped around the shoulders of the grandfather he had never had the chance to meet. Holding something in his hands that was so intrinsically tied to the image of such a famous magician... It felt almost like seeing Magnifi himself in person.

Thalassa chuckled, then held up two more items from the box. "There's these, too."

Apollo tore his eyes from the cape to examine them: In one hand, a purple brooch in the shape of a spade. In the other hand, a black top hat with a white stripe around the brim. He blinked, then frowned. "Is his entire costume in there?"

Thalassa shook her head, returning her attention to the box. "Just these, I think." She tossed the brooch into the hat, then placed them both on top of the journal, in front of Apollo. "Oh, and this." She pulled out a bamboo stick, which had been sticking out at one of the corners, and revealed the other end featured a shorter length of bamboo attached in a T-shape, making a handle.

Trucy gasped, jumping forward to grab it. "Grandpa Magnifi's cane!" She gleefully showed it off to everyone. "He used this to walk everywhere, but really it was just for show. He used it in some of his tricks, too!"

Machi had perched himself on the armrest next to Maya, watching with interest. "What he do with it?"

"Balancing tricks, mostly." Trucy grinned. "The one that made him famous was when he used loads of smaller ones to make all sorts of animals float, right up to a massive elephant!"

"That one was when I was very young." Thalassa returned her attention to the box, then laughed. "I don't think this was originally part of my father's things." She pulled out a small and very fat photo album, which she handed to Trucy.

Squealing, Trucy placed the cane on the coffee table, taking the book. "My baby pictures!" She flipped it open to a random page, showing it off to Apollo. "Wasn't I so cute?" Without waiting for an answer from her eldest brother, or even giving him much of a chance to examine them, she looked up at her mother. "How'd Uncle Valant get these?"

Thalassa shrugged. "I'd guess Zak left them behind after his arrest," Phoenix mused, scratching a cheek. "Everything of Zak's became Valant's in his absence, so he probably made sure to include the personal stuff together when he was passing it on to you."

Trucy giggled, closing the book and placing it in the pile under Magnifi's hat.

Thalassa's nostalgic smile faded as she once more looked into the box. "Hmm." She reached in to the very bottom, lifting out a rather hefty looking small chest made of wood, decorated on all sides with carved swirls and painted flowers. "Would you look at that..."

Apollo looked to Trucy, folding his grandfather's cape in his lap. "What is it?"

Trucy shrugged, giving her brother a confused look. "I dunno. I've never seen it before."

"My father kept this in his caravan," Thalassa explained, still studying it. "He never let me see what he kept inside."

Trucy jumped to her feet, running to examine the chest. She promptly gasped again, reaching to take it from her mother. "It has a lock just like the notebook!" She dropped back into her seat, showing the bronze keyhole on the front to Apollo. "See?"

Apollo nodded, taking the surprisingly heavy chest from his sister. "Do we have the key?"

Thalassa was already back in the box, and pulled out a small piece of worn bronze with a purple spade symbol on the end: a key, just the right size for both the locks on the journal and on the chest. "The last thing in there."

Trucy squealed in excitement, taking the key. "Let's try it out!" She gleefully stuck it into the lock on the chest, but turning the key did not open the lid as they expected, nor did it result in any kind of sound that would indicate an unlatching of mechanisms deep within. Apollo even tried tugging the chest open, but it remained tightly locked. Trucy frowned, pulling the key back out to examine it. "Huh. That's weird."

"That key must be for the notebook," Luke pointed out, leaning on the back of the empty seat Thalassa had previously occupied. "Is there another way to get the chest open?"
Trucy stared at the key for a second, then tucked it into the bag at her hip. "But how can we get it open without breaking it?"

Apollo bit his lip, adjusting the chest to better look at the lock. "Dad, don't look." He reached into his bag and dug out a small metal pin he always kept hidden in a seam near the top.

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "Why me specifically?"

Clay laughed as he saw the pin in Apollo's hand. "Aw, are you picking the lock, 'Pollo?"

"Of course not." Apollo grinned, picking away at the inside of the keyhole with his little pin. "What kind of self-respecting lawyer picks locks?"

Phoenix chuckled. "We're all well aware you two have that particular skill."

Trucy giggled. "What do you mean, Daddy? We have no idea what you're talking about."

Apollo kept his eyes on the chest propped up in his lap. "Exactly. Magicians never reveal their secrets, and lawyers would never learn a skill as unsavoury as... picking... a..." He paused, frowning at the lock as his shifting of the mechanism inside failed to enact any kind of change. Pulling out his pin, he peered into the keyhole, seeing only the black depths of the lock. "Man, this thing's well made..."

"Is there other way in?" Machi asked.

Clay shrugged. "Guess you have to break it open."

Trucy forcefully shook her head. "No! It's such a pretty box! Grandpa Magnifi must have really liked it to keep it for us!"

Luke hummed, a hand stroking his goatee. "It would be a shame to break the lock just to open the chest. Is it even meant to open with a key?"

Thalassa gasped. "Of course!" She ran around behind the sofa, sitting in the empty seat next to Apollo. "It's been so long, I forgot, but the lock is only a decoy." She took the wooden box from her son, holding it carefully in her lap. "My father had a special way of opening this chest, without a key." Her thumbs pressed to the corners of the lid, bookending the lock, while her fingers wrapped around to the sides, finding specific knots in the carved swirls that she dug her nails into. A few moments later, the chest gave an audible click, then popped open.

Luke watched in amazed wonder. "It's a trick box!"

"Very fitting for a magician," Phoenix admitted.

Trucy squealed, leaning heavily on Apollo's leg as she leaned over him to look. "What's in it, Mommy? What's in it?"

Apollo winced at the pressure on his leg, belatedly slipping his lockpick back into his bag. He couldn't deny he was as curious as his sister, though.

Thalassa was torn between her own curiosity and the uncomfortable truth that whatever was inside must have been deeply personal to Magnifi if he had never told even his own daughter what was inside such a heavily secured box. She hesitated a second or two, then slowly lifted the lid, warily watching to see what they might find.
As the inside of the chest emerged into the light of day, Apollo frowned. "Are those... letters?"

"Aw, it's a memory trick box," Maya sighed, dreamily. "He must have got a lot of nice letters from fans." She paused, scratching a cheek. "Weird he'd hide them away like that, though."

Thalassa was picking the topmost envelope off the stack inside, staring at it thoughtfully. "These aren't from fans."

Machi slipped off the armrest next to Maya, rushing across to instead lean on the one by Thalassa. "Then from who?"

Thalassa didn't immediately reply, staring holes into the opened envelope in her hands. "They're from... They're from me."

View the Court Record
"From you?" Maya watched Thalassa with a sympathetic look. "Do you need us to leave?"

Thalassa shook her head, still staring at the envelope in her hand. "No, no... I just... didn't think they still existed after all this time." She began to page through the pile in the box, subtly frowning. "I wrote these every couple of weeks, the year I left the Troupe with Jove... When Apollo was born."

Apollo looked at the aged paper in surprise. "They're that old?"

"How were you able to write back?" Maya asked, scratching a cheek. "Didn't you say earlier the Troupe was always moving?"

Thalassa nodded, giving the woman a smile. "My father had a P.O. Box set up in Borginia. He'd check it himself if he was nearby. When we were away for a while, and settling down for a few weeks, he'd ask a friend to empty it for him and forward everything on."

Machi thought a moment. "Friend is your Papa, yes?"

"It must have been. He wouldn't have had to travel all that far from Kopunchiville." Thalassa returned her attention to the letters, leafing through them.

Clay leaned towards Luke, holding a hand to his mouth and not-so-subtly whispering "Did she just say her dad was writing to himself?"

"Of course not!" Trucy huffed, shooting their friend a glare. "Grandpa Magnifi was writing to Grandpa Geary, who lived in Borginia!"

Clay's eyes widened for a moment, then narrowed into a frown. "Waaaaait a minute. Magnifi is Thalassa's dad, so a second grandpa would be the dad of one of your dads, right?" He gestured between the trio around Thalassa on the opposite sofa.

"Incorrect," Phoenix informed the young man with a grin. "Thalassa has two fathers."

"Wait, what!?"

Luke grunted in mild surprise. "That's interesting." He looked to Clay with a smile. "I would have asked in a more polite fashion, though."

Clay huffed.

Maya giggled. "Me, Nick and Thalassa here had a lot of time to talk this past week, and it just happened to come up. You could call it... parent preparation group." She and Phoenix promptly high-fived with identical grins.

Apollo rolled his eyes. "That was not a quip worthy of a high-five."

"In your opinion." Phoenix winked.
Apollo sighed.

Trucy peered into the chest as best she could from her position in Apollo's lap. "Are all of those from you, Mommy?"

Thalassa opened her mouth to reply, then paused, frowning. "Actually..." She bunched up the letters she had accumulated so far, checking a few at the back before passing them to Apollo. "Hold these for a moment." Once Apollo had hesitatingly taken the bundle, she grabbed the next envelope on the remaining bottom half of the pile. "This isn't from me. And neither are any of the rest of these."

Apollo studied the new envelopes. "Most of them look even older than yours." He quickly assembled a timeline in his head, knowing his mother had been eighteen when she went off with Jove before his birth. "So... these older ones might be from when you were a kid? From Geary, maybe?"

"Now there's a thought." Shooting her son an impressed look, Thalassa gently teased the fragile and yellowed letter from the ripped envelope in her hand, unfolding it to read.

It struck Apollo as he saw the faded cursive on the letter that it was a good thing its writer had chosen to use pen. After all this time, he was fairly certain pencil would have vanished completely.

Thalassa smiled. "Correct on all points. It looks like my papa sent this shortly after my mother's death, when I was only five." She frowned, folding the letter again and staring into the pile still in the box. "These must all be from him. The newer ones will probably be from after my accident... and the older ones from when Mama fell ill and they had to stop travelling with me and Dad."

Luke pushed off his perch leaning on the back of the other sofa. "With how old most of those letters are, it would probably be a good idea to digitise them. You could keep them forever then, even after the paper has rotted away. I'd be happy to help, if you don't know how."

"That sounds good." Apollo turned to Thalassa. "We could do that later, right?"

Thalassa thought a long moment, then gave Luke a smile. "You're very kind, Luke. That would be wonderful."

Luke grinned. "It won't be a problem at all, Thalassa."

Apollo hid a grin of his own, taking a more careful hold of the stack of envelopes in his hand. He was already looking forward to copying them onto a computer, and being able to safely read the day-to-day adventures of his birth parents and, possibly, his infant self too.

Machi leaned forward, then pointed into the small chest. "Aska, there is something below letters!"

Everyone's attention returned to the wooden box. Thalassa gently re-inserted the letter in her hands back into its envelope, then bunched up the remainder of the pile just like she had with the others. Apollo held out his free hand, taking the new bundle the moment his mother finished preparing it, and Thalassa wasted no time returning her attention to the small black books left sitting at the bottom of the chest. "Now, what are these?"

"Are they notebooks?" Trucy asked, her weight concentrated on the two hands pressed into Apollo's leg as she leaned over to see.

Apollo grumbled, "Could you lean back a bit, Truce?"

"I don't think so." Thalassa picked one of the books at random, studying it in her hands. "This is... a small photo book."

Trucy gasped, leaping off her brother's leg and racing around the back of the sofa, throwing herself over the small gap between Apollo and her mother. "Let's see, let's see!"

Thalassa laughed, then pried open the slightly-sticky plastic pages to a centrefold.

Apollo was quite surprised to see the two images within. On the left was a landscape, looking out across a seemingly endless desert. On the right, a man wearing sunglasses and a proud grin stood in the shade of a building, the desert stretching out on one side, while in his arms he securely held a baby in a tiny blue dress, staring towards camera from behind sunglasses that were far too big for her open-mouthed face.

Trucy giggled, pointing at the baby. "Is that you, Mommy?"

Thalassa chuckled. "Must be. And that's my Papa."

Machi studied the man closely with a frown. "So that is ghost man."

Thalassa turned the page. On the new spread were two more photos, both prominently featuring people. On the left, a young Magnifi was posing dramatically at the desert's edge in the light of the setting sun, his pompous image broken only by one arm pressing a sleeping baby Thalassa to his shoulder. On the right, a woman who bore a significant resemblance to her daughter and granddaughter sat in the middle of a daylit bench, the baby in her arms. Either side of her sat the young Magnifi and Geary, all three grinning at the camera. Even baby Thalassa was looking up, chewing on a fist.

Apollo placed one of the stacks of envelopes carefully on top of the cape in his lap, then pointed to the left photo. "So that's Magnifi and you," he moved his finger to the right photo, "and that's Magnifi, Geary, you... and our grandmother? Gaia?"

"That's her," Thalassa breathed, still taking the image in. "The brief time we were travelling together, before she got sick." She sucked air in through her nose, firmly closing the book with a forced smile. "Let's see what the other one is, shall we?" Placing the first photo book in her lap, she reached for the second one still in the chest. Although she seemed apprehensive about exploring the contents of the second book, she didn't hesitate in similarly prying open the plastic pages to a random centrefold... only to immediately gasp, a hand to her mouth.

In the left photo, lying asleep in bed, was a young Thalassa on the cusp of adulthood, a tiny baby in her arms. In the right photo, an equally young man perched at her side, having claimed the sleepy baby for himself with an open-mouthed, slightly cheeky smile that he directed straight into the lens, his arm stretched off to one side where he was holding the camera.

Apollo's eyes widened, any words choking in his mouth. He couldn't take his eyes off that second photo.

"Is that...?" Trucy pointed at the photo book. "Is that Polly's daddy? And Polly as a baby?"

Thalassa was having as much difficulty as Apollo regaining her voice. "It is. That's Jove."

Across the room, Clay laughed. "Hey, 'Pollo, you have baby pictures!"

Apollo couldn't take his eyes off the photo book, unsure if he was more intrigued by his younger self or the first image of his father he'd ever seen. "Yeah... I do..."
Clay's laughter died, the young man rubbing his neck with an embarrassed look. Luke snickered, gently elbowing his friend.

Trucy giggled, throwing her arms around Apollo's neck from behind the sofa. "Now we have Luke's baby pictures and my baby pictures and Polly's baby pictures! We're an entire set!"

Apollo chuckled, resting his free hand on his sister's arm just in case her grip got too tight. "We don't have Machi's, though."

"Oh yeah." The girl shot an apologetic look at her younger brother. "Sorry, Machi."

Machi just grinned. "Is okay. I do not need pictures of time I don't remember. I do not think any were taken, anyway."

Trucy stuck out her bottom lip. "It's still not fair."

Thalassa wiped tears from her eyes, beginning to page through the photo book. "I sent all these back to my father in my letters. I had no idea he kept them all this time..."

Apollo kept his eyes on the pictures as they flipped past under his mother's fingers, seeing glimpses of landscapes and his infant self in the arms of his young parents.

"We could digitise the photos along with the letters," Luke offered. "I know I've done that already with the old family photo albums my parents left me."

"Ooh, yeah!" Trucy finally released her hold on Apollo's neck, bouncing behind the sofa. "Then we can take our time going through them as a family!" Her giggles paused as she looked around the room. "Speaking of family... Where's Pearly?"

Phoenix and Maya laughed, though it was the latter who explained: "She went up to Kurain to fetch my rings. We were hoping to get them fitted as soon as possible."

Clay gave the couple a surprised look. "Whoa, 'rings'? You mean you guys are engaged now?"

Luke and Apollo both hid snickers at their friend. "Did we not mention that?" Luke asked.

Thalassa smiled, finally closing the photo book in her hands. "In any case, if it is alright with you Luke, I'd like to get started with these letters. I hate to think they may fall apart at any moment."

"Of course, Thalassa." Luke gave the woman a grin. "I'm always happy to help."

View the Court Record/Luke's Notebook
A Successful Summary

The Revived PW Fan-Club Forum!
Home > The Wright Anything Agency
Thread: Different Trial than Normal

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 10/07/2026 05:23:44PM
I meant to tell you guys this much sooner but I've been very busy today with this last-minute investigation Dad threw on me.
I have a new case, and the trial is tomorrow. It's not a usual one either, it's a system with a jury Dad's been trying to test out for a while now. It should run mostly the same as a regular trial, just how the verdict's decided will be a little different.
This was short notice even for me, so I get if you guys aren't able to come.

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN] "Maggey", 10/07/2026 05:30:52PM
I'll definitely be there to cheer you on! I won't be able to hang around and meet up with anybody, not until the trial's properly over, but I can promise I'll be watching the trial. :)

CelestialImpacts "Adrian", 10/07/2026 05:41:21PM
I'm in the same boat as Maggey, I'm afraid. I'll be watching the trial, but I can't meet up with anyone afterwards if it extends another day. This new court system sounds interesting, actually. Maybe you could explain what it's about, when you're less busy preparing?

Liztropical "Liz", 10/07/2026 06:33:58PM
Wow, that's a lot more people able to make it than normal, huh?
Sorry Apollo, I'll be very busy tomorrow myself. I'm wishing you luck, though. I'm sure your dad wouldn't ask you to do something he thought you'd be bad at.

Drewby "Drew", 10/07/2026 06:56:03PM
Can't come but good luck on that. What's with the weird trial system btw?

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 10/07/2026 07:26:05PM
Thanks guys. I hope this case is over with in a single day, but I doubt it. Maggey and Adrian, I hope to see you guys once its over.
Dad's been working on it for a while now. Instead of just the judge deciding the verdict, there's a panel of jurists who watch the trial and vote on what they think the verdict should be. The idea is that they analyse the case using common sense, which can help make up the gap when there isn't much evidence.

Drewby "Drew", 10/07/2026 07:59:27PM
Ok I think I get it. If you think there'll be a second day I'll see if I can come by for it, but I'm not sure
I can get off work.

Thunderdome "Max", 10/07/2026 08:40:30PM
Good luck Apollo. I wish I could come to cheer you on, but yeah, kinda short notice. I'm all wrapped up with this work thing until the weekend.

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 10/07/2026 09:13:33PM
I understand, Max. Thanks anyway. :)
Let me know if you're able to come by, Drew.
And I'm guessing Pearly hasn't replied yet because she's busy with her family. I'd better go to bed now, so I'll catch you guys up on how the trial goes tomorrow.

---

Liztropical "Liz", 10/08/2026 01:42:19PM
Apollo, are you okay!?
Does anyone have Apollo's cell number to check on him!?

ForgetMeKnot "Knox", 10/08/2026 02:26:44PM
Why? What happened?

Liztropical "Liz", 10/08/2026 02:30:45PM
Go read the news about his trial! The defendant collapsed and there was an uproar in the court and apparently "the defence attorney's two teenage assistants were also suspected of being exposed to the poison" according this srtivle and someone just check of Apollo!!!!!

ForgetMeKnot "Knox", 10/08/2026 02:51:03PM
Wait what???? Should we call his ofice? Would anyone be there?
And did that article seriously call Luke 'teenage;?

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 10/08/2026 03:24:51PM
Don't panic, we're all fine. Luke wasn't in the courtroom at all, Trucy is fine, Machi is fine, I'm fine. Vera's being treated for the poison and is in a coma, so the outcome of the trial is still up in the air at the moment. It's up to Gavin if we continue without her or wait for her to recover.

Liztropical "Liz", 10/08/2026 03:58:57PM
You have no idea how loudly I just shouted in relief that you're all okay over there! How did your brother and sister get poison on them at all? And I know this is a bit presumptuous to ask, but did your client do that to herself or...?

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 10/08/2026 04:31:08PM
I'm not sure I can really say, since it's related to the case. It'll come up in court, if we continue tomorrow like we should.
I might be a bit slow replying again today. I have a big file related to this case I need to go through.

ForgetMeKnot "Knox", 10/08/2026 05:11:04PM
Oh right I forgot you're apparently the spawn of FRIKKIN LAMIROIR and her pianist is your little brother now. Still can't believe you have so many connections to famous people. Seriously though, I'm glad you guys are safe. Hope your trial still goes well. Actually, weren't Maggey and Adrian going to watch? You'd think they'd of popped in to let us know what was going on. Or Pearly even.

Drewby "Drew", 10/08/2026 05:37:15PM
Pearly's been missing for a few days now. I guess whatever's keeping her busy is also keeping her away from the trial?
I'm glad you're all okay btw Apollo. Say hi to Machi for me.

Liztropical "Liz", 10/08/2026 06:18:50PM
As long as no one else has their life threatened, I'm happy.
Do keep us updated whenever you can, Apollo.

Liztropical "Liz", 10/09/2026 02:23:25PM
Congrats on the NOT GUILTY verdict! :D

ForgetMeKnot "Knox", 10/09/2026 02:27:56PM
WHOO CONGRATULATIONS APOLLO AND MR WRIGHT!
awwww I was so close to beating you to it Liz xD

Liztropical "Liz", 10/09/2026 02:30:28PM
Early bird gets the worm ;)

Drewby "Drew", 10/09/2026 02:31:03PM
I knew Apollo would pull it off. Course, no one listens to me on these things but... ;)
Congratulations, Apollo and Mr. Wright! :D
Just to check, everyone else knows they proved Mr. Wright never forged anything?

How could we not? This is like the moment we've been waiting for since way back before the original forum died! Do you think if we made this place public again we'd attract back all the people who turned on us way back when?

Honestly, I don't want the people who turned on us to come back. The people who quietly left, or who weren't able to keep in touch with our core group (like Apollo couldn't, I might point out), I would happily welcome back. It's up to Maggey, though.

Aaaaand I'm back! :D Sorry for the unexplained disappearance, but Mr. Wright pulled me and Adrian into helping out with his jurist trial, so we couldn't talk to anyone about it until it was over. Who could've expected that ending though?
As for whether we'll make the forum public again... I guess we'll have to discuss that more in-depth later. I'll get a new thread started in the main chat forum. We'll need to wait for Aria to get back from her vacation and Penny's latest production to calm down for their inputs.

Thanks guys! You have no idea how much seeing the end of this trial meant to me. It wasn't just clearing Vera's name against all odds, it was clearing my dad's too, and finding out how little Gavin actually had to do with the whole forgery thing in the first place, and even getting what happened to Trucy's birth father out there... It already feels like a lifetime since Dad even gave me this case. He knew what the true purpose of this trial was from the start, and he trusted me to see it through. Dad's out 'celebrating' with Maya tonight, so I can pass on congratulations tomorrow. Pearly says she might drop by here later, too.

Ah, the party won't be ending for a while yet, my little nephew. ;) Meaning, obviously, Vera still has to wake up and hear what her verdict was. She'll be thrilled.

Yeah, I guess she will. :) There's not much point worrying about her until then, but I'm sure my dad or the detective will let us know when she comes out of the coma.
So, I've got some big news.

Maggey. Adrian. I just want you to know how much I hate you right now. ...

So, yeah, my birth mother's back in town.

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN] "Maggey", 10/10/2026 5:00:00PM

:D

Love you too, Apollo. ;)

Liztropical "Liz", 10/10/2026 5:02:33PM

Oh my goodness, congratulations! I hope you and Trucy and Machi are enjoying having her back! (Maggey, did you and Adrian know or something?)

CelestialImpacts "Adrian", 10/10/2026 5:03:09PM

Sorry for teasing you like that yesterday, but I couldn't resist. ;)

I heard Vera was awake, too. If she was such a fan of the Gramaryes, she might appreciate knowing it was Thalassa Gramarye's children defending her.

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN] "Maggey", 10/10/2026 5:13:36PM

Liz, yep, Mrs. Gramarye was helping out with the trial too. She'd only just got back and was already being dragged into the grand family affairs of the Wrights. ;) It put off her surprise reunion a bit, I think.

Precious-Fairy "Pearly", 10/10/2026 6:09:19PM

No, she was always planning to meet them today. And that's not all our big news, either! Mr Nick and Mystic Maya are engaged!!!!! :D It's so exciting!!!

BlackbirdLuck [ADMIN] "Maggey", 10/10/2026 6:23:42PM

OMIGOSH REALLY? Tell them congratulations, and IT'S ABOUT TIME. ;D

ForgetMeKnot "Knox", 10/10/2026 7:15:25PM

Oh man, congratulations all around. My congratulations muscles are getting tired after this past week. Say hi to Lamiroir for us, huh?
Drewby "Drew", 10/10/2026 7:49:48PM
Pearly you jest. Mr Wright is getting married!? And right as Lamiroir comes back too? You guys are just all trying to outshine each other now. Apollo clears Mr Wright's name, Mr Wright gets engaged, Lamiroir shows up again...
Congratulations, though. And remember to take a break. I think you've long earned it.

steeljusticelover "Apollo", 10/10/2026 9:21:31PM
Thanks everyone. I'll pass on your messages to Dad and both my moms. Don't worry, Drewby, I plan to take a VERY long break after all this. :/
After the chaos Saturday had thrown them into, it was an immense relief for the Wrights to be looking forward to a quiet Sunday up in Kurain Village. Thalassa met Phoenix and the four children at the station and they headed up the mountain together to the house she had heard so much about from the Feys over the past week. Machi and Trucy were eager to show her around, taking her off on an impromptu tour the moment they met back up with Maya and Pearl at the manor by the bus stop. Pearl had rushed to join them, while Maya had headed off with Phoenix. Apollo and Luke wandered off elsewhere on their own, though they made their younger siblings and cousin promise not to take too long.

Half an hour after their arrival, Thalassa found herself in the Winding Way, overlooking the garden from the walkway. The three teenagers, once they'd shown her every inch of the mansion, had run off on their tour's completion to find the older boys, and, as much as she loved them, she was happy to take a break from their excited noise for a few minutes and lagged behind. 'I only have myself to blame for becoming the mother to two teenagers at once. And Machi's usually so quiet, too. Trucy and Apollo have been teaching him bad habits.' She chuckled, leaning on the railing of the walkway. 'Even so, I could never be anything but glad I have them all back.'

"Aha, I thought I'd find you out here."

Thalassa looked around and soon locked eyes on the door to the nearby Meditation Room, where Maya was emerging with a smile. Thalassa gave the other woman a wave. "You perhaps have more practise than me, but I needed a short rest. Three rambunctious teenagers are a bit much for me at the moment."

Maya laughed, heading over to join Thalassa at the railing. "Why do you think we usually let the boys take care of them? Luke's a calming influence and Apollo's a master at reining them in if they go too far."

"Ah, therein lies my mistake." Thalassa restrained another chuckle. "I let the both of them stay behind instead of requesting their help."

The two women stood in shared amusement for several moments, both leaning on the railing that looked out over the garden. There was a long, but comfortable, silence before Maya again spoke.

"I actually came out here to talk to you."

Thalassa raised her eyebrows, turning to face the younger woman. "Oh?"

Maya traced the grain of the wooden railing with a finger, frowning slightly. "I've been thinking about it since you found those photos yesterday... and I only have two weeks before I go, so if I'm going to bring it up, now's my only chance." She sighed, then met Thalassa's eyes. "I told you I'm a spirit medium and can channel the spirits of the dead."

Thalassa nodded. "And I believe you. I've certainly lived through far stranger things... and no-one else in our family has even the slightest doubts about it, so why should I?"
Maya softly laughed, looking relieved. "Well... I don't remember if I mentioned this, but all our usual clients here are people saying goodbye to loved ones they missed the chance to. I realised yesterday, thanks to everything that happened... You never got to say goodbye to your father, or either of your husbands."

"No, I didn't." Thalassa's eyes turned to the garden, though all she saw were the images of her lost family members. "I was too young to understand what was happening with my mother, and then the way Dad and Papa handled my accident... I lost Dad and Zak and Jove all the same way, simply because I wasn't there when they struck hardship."

Maya nodded, waiting a few seconds before she replied. "All I need to know to channel someone is their name and their face. You have their names, and I've seen Magnifi and Zak on all Apollo and Trucy's posters... and now, because of those photos, we have Jove's and your mother's faces too. I could, over a couple of days, channel all four of them to let you - and the kids too, if they want - say goodbye properly."

Thalassa mused over the offer for a long moment. It was very tempting, she had to admit. The grief of sudden loss hadn't gotten any easier from Jove to Magnifi to Zak, and she had always been very curious about the mother she barely remembered. "Would it be very hard for you to do?"

Maya opened her mouth with a bright smile, "Not at-!", then paused, a serious expression on her face. She sighed. "Actually, to tell the truth, there are factors for every individual that make it easier or harder. How long ago they died is one, and how different they are physically from the medium. Any channeling takes a lot of energy out of you though, so I could probably only try for your family members twice in one day." Her frown deepened. "Pearly could give it a go too, up that to four attempts in one day, but I'd rather not drag her into something that was my idea."

"No, if channeling is truly so tiring, I will not ask her." Thalassa decided to keep to herself that she doubted she had the energy to confront all four so close together anyway. She could handle two at a time, though. "In that case, it would be prudent to try them in the other they died, I suppose. My mother died... thirty-six years ago. Jove twenty-one. My father seven. Zak only six months."

Maya snorted. "And split up your mom and dad? Honestly, it would be easier on me to alternate them between hard and easy. Your parents one day, Zak and Jove another?"

Thalassa met Maya's eyes with a concerned gaze. "If you are sure you wish to do this for me..."

"I wouldn't have offered if I wasn't." Maya smiled. "It's a big job, sure, but nothing I can't handle."

Thalassa thought a moment, then nodded gratefully. "It would mean a lot to me. Thank you, Maya."

They found the children with Phoenix in the living room, the older pair sat at the table quietly discussing something over Apollo's tablet computer, while the younger trio attempted to push their father into trying out some of the learn-to-play-piano books Machi had dug out of Maya's stores.

"C'mon Daddy, if you're not going back into law, you need to actually be good at something else!"

"It is not very hard, Isa. You will see if you just try."

"Do you want Mystic Maya to be the one to teach you, Mister Nick?"

Phoenix pressed a hand to his face from where he sat on the piano stool, the three teenagers surrounding him. "Y'know, when I asked if you would give me lessons, I was joking..."
Apollo and Luke hid snickers, pretending not to listen in. They noticed the arrival of the two women first, and Apollo waved. "Hey, Mom and Mom."

Phoenix groaned as he turned to give them a pleading look. "Maya, save me..."

"Save yourself." Maya shot him a cheeky wink, then beckoned to her cousin. "Pearly, I need your help in the Channelling Chamber."

Pearl grinned. "Coming, Mystic Maya!" Waving goodbye to her cousins, she raced to meet Maya at the door, and the Feys left the room.

Trucy frowned at her mother. "Why are they preparing the Channelling Chamber?"

Machi was the one person in the room to seem simply confused, stepping a little closer to Phoenix.

Thalassa rested a hand on her bracelet, rubbing a finger across the pattern engraved on the metal. "Maya has offered to give me the chance to say goodbye to various members of my family... Chances I was denied at the time they died by circumstances beyond my control."

Trucy gasped, her hands to her mouth. Phoenix was mildly surprised.

Apollo and Luke chuckled. The younger of the pair noted, "She likes to do that for her friends and family."

"She's probably told you she's done that for Luke and his dad," Apollo added. "And it was how we found out you were still alive."

Machi frowned thoughtfully. "I have never seen channelling, but everyone has told me lots about it."

Thalassa smiled. "Well... I would like you three to join me."

Trucy squeaked. "Really?"

"Really," Thalassa laughed. "We're trying my parents today. If nothing else, I would love to introduce you to them." She looked to Trucy. "I know my father would be delighted to see how much you've grown," her gaze moved to Apollo, "and that you were alive all this time." Finally, her eyes turned to her youngest. "And we were performing together before he died, so I'm sure he would be interested in meeting you too, Machi."

Machi blushed.

Trucy squealed, bouncing across the room to envelop her mother in a hug. "That would be so cool to meet Grandma Gaia, and to see Grandpa Magnifi again!"

"That... does sound kinda cool," Apollo admitted, rubbing the back of his neck as he got to his feet.

Phoenix gave his eldest son a grin. "It definitely isn't something you should be turning down. A chance like this may never come again."

Luke nodded, then picked up Apollo's Court Record to hand the tablet to its owner, a knowing smile on his face. "You'll probably need those photos from your grandfather's memory box. I know you've already copied a couple."
Apollo turned red, snatching his computer with a hushed "Shut up!" He pretended not to hear the rest of his family hiding giggles.
It didn't take long for the two Feys to prepare the special chamber. While Luke, Phoenix and Pearl waited outside, Maya led Thalassa and the Gramarye children into the small, dark room, lit only by the rows of candles lining the rug on the floor and the shelves on the walls. Apollo hung back at the entrance, keeping a tight hold on his siblings. They didn't need to exchange words to understand the look on his face, and all huddled up on the floor with their backs pressed to the thick wood of the doors. Despite the bright colours of their clothes, it was all too easy for the trio to fade into the darkness that coated the edges of the room.

Maya knelt down with her back to the simple altar set up at the end opposite the entrance. Thalassa hurried to copy her, the two women facing each other on the rug, nervous energy tingling through the air around them.

"Can I see a photo?"

Thalassa nodded, holding out the tablet computer Apollo had handed to her out in the hallway. On its screen was a picture of one of the first photos they'd seen in Magnifi's memory box: Young Magnifi, Geary and Gaia with baby Thalassa in her mother's arms.

Maya took the computer into her arms, examining the photo carefully. After a long moment, she nodded and placed it on the ground at her side. "What name would she most identify with?"

Thalassa frowned. "I'm not sure. I imagine she would answer to 'Gaia' more than 'Gaelle', but I don't know if she thought of herself more as 'Gramarye' or as 'Takala'. She never officially changed it, after all."

Maya bit her lip for a few moments. "Well, I'll try 'Gaia Gramarye' first, then if that doesn't work, I'll try 'Gaia Takala'." She adjusted her posture a little, then pressed her hands together, index fingers curled above her thumbs. "I'll need you to close your eyes for the channelling itself... Oh, and you might have to explain what's going on. She's essentially been unconscious since the moment she died, so she won't have any concept of how long it's been."

Thalassa nodded. "I'll keep that in mind." Folding her hands in her lap, she lowered her head and closed her eyes.

In the resulting silence, Thalassa found herself musing on how easy it seemed to go back to listening to the world, as she had been forced to for a long ten years. Without her sight to distract her, she could hear the soft breathing of Maya nearby, the crackling of the numerous small flames that lit the room, the subtle shifts of movement from her children behind her. Although she knew she could live this way, and be reasonably independent too, she didn't miss being blind. She couldn't forget how grateful she had felt to discover it was even curable, knowing how truly rare that kind of chance was.

Maya huffed, shifting in her seat a little and grumbling under her breath. A moment later, she fell silent again.

Not for the first time, Thalassa wondered what her mother was like as a person. She knew Gaia loved singing, had left her home village to perform the moment she was able to, had been polyromantic and adored her two partners and the daughter they raised together... She knew the story of Gaia's life, but that story, and the scant memories Thalassa still had of the dying woman in her bed, weren't enough to really form a clear picture of her personality. Was she the kind who knew what she wanted and went after it with full conviction? Or was she a quiet type who followed her dreams and tried to stay out of other people's way? Was she spiritual at all? Would she appreciate being brought back from the afterlife to say goodbyes she'd already said? Suddenly she remembered the blatant fear on Apollo's face when she had shown up unannounced on his doorstep the previous day, and sympathised even more deeply than before. At least Apollo had the chance to meet his mother as Lamiroir first, and had three months' warning she was coming back as Thalassa... and that wasn't even getting into the fact that she was still alive and as much time had passed for her as for Apollo.

Maya grunted, shifting again. "Come on, I can see you! Why are you being so difficult?"

Frowning, Thalassa looked up. Maya was glaring furiously at the inside of her eyelids, hands pressed tightly together in front of her face while sweat beaded on her brow. Thalassa gripped her bracelet. "Maya, are you okay?"

Sighing, Maya relaxed out of her carefully held pose, shaking her head. "No, I... I can't reach her." Emitting a soft whine that threatened to become something stronger, she buried her face in her hands. "I can see her, she's right there... and I can't reach her..."

Thalassa couldn't think of any words to say in reply. 'I'm... not seeing Mama after all?'

Maya took a deep breath, trying to calm herself. "I'm sorry, Thalassa..."

Something thumped against the wooden floor behind Thalassa, followed by the hurried footsteps of Trucy as she raced across the room to drop at Maya's side, hugging the woman tight. "It's okay, Mommy! You always get it in the end, right? You can just try again later!"

"No, no," Maya mumbled, wiping her eyes. "I think... I think she's been dead too long. And she died slowly, of cancer, right? So she was fully prepared for it and didn't leave behind any loose ends or regrets... Or at least none big enough to keep her close to the living world."

Thalassa hummed in thought, gaze locked on the tablet computer still lying on the floor nearby. Its screen had long gone black, but she could still see the photo it had displayed in her mind's eye.

Machi stepped over and gently moved the computer aside, sitting down in its place to join the hug Trucy had started. "Is okay, Maya. If too hard for you, we not mind."

"He's right." Apollo stepped forward, retrieving his computer to put back in his bag while keeping his eyes firmly on Maya. "If you can't do it, we don't want to push you. I mean, you're about to go off on a two-year training course, right?"

Maya sniffed and nodded. "Yeah... To fix exactly this problem." She pressed her lips into a pout, then looked up at Thalassa. "I hate to make you wait two years for me to fulfil a promise, though..."

"Promise?" Thalassa met the other woman's eyes, managing a smile. "Maya, you said from the beginning you might not manage to channel anyone. There was never any 'promise' for you to break." She took a deep breath, letting it out in a slow sigh. "And I suppose it is for the best the attempt for my mother failed. It's been thirty-five, thirty-six years. I barely remember her. What would I possibly have to say to a woman I don't know?"
Phoenix paced the Meditation Room nervously. Luke and Pearl stood nearby, watching the thick doors to the Channelling Chamber. He wanted to tell himself he had no idea how they were staying so calm, but the truth was he had every idea why he was incapable of keeping calm himself. It didn't matter that it had been nine years since the fateful day a man had been murdered in that very room, with Maya locked inside with him, and that the two perpetrators were long dead. It didn't even matter that he had similarly waited outside this door in the years since with nothing of consequence happening, whether for Luke to speak to his deceased father or for Apollo and Trucy to check there was no trace of their mother in the afterlife. It didn't exactly help that he was on the verge of having to say goodbye to his now-fiancée for two entire years. Also, Maya was his fiancée now. That latter point he was still in slight disbelief about. And, unlike previous times, she had taken the key of the Chamber inside with her, so Phoenix was robbed of the very easy way of jumping to her side should the worst happen (again). Not that he thought Thalassa or the kids were in any way likely to be murdering each other, of course. Still, he'd thought she was alone with Turner Grey too, and the events that followed had proven him very wrong indeed. Who was to say the same couldn't happen again?

"Papa, nothing's wrong."

Phoenix managed to call himself to a stop long enough to give his son a firm nod. "No, of course not. Why would anything go wrong? That's ridiculous."

Luke's concerned frown intensified. "Then why are you panicking?"

"I'm not panicking." Phoenix resumed his pacing, avoiding his son's eyes. "Why would I be panicking? There's nothing to worry about. They're all going to come out of that room just fine. Why wouldn't they?"

Pearl shared a worried look with Luke. "Mister Nick, what's the matter?"

Before Phoenix could answer, they heard the click of the door unlocking, far earlier than it should have, and Maya emerged with a down-turned expression.

"Maya!" Phoenix dashed to his fiancée, grabbing her hands. "What's the matter? Did something happen?"

Maya shook her head, mutely avoiding his concerned eyes.

From the doorway behind her came Thalassa and her children, all equally quiet and solemn. Apollo had his hands on his siblings' shoulders, all three stealing worried glances at Maya. Thalassa had a hand on her bracelet, meeting Phoenix's searching gaze. "The channelling failed."

Phoenix's eyes widened, looking back to Maya. "It what? But... You've never failed a channelling!"

Maya glared up at him with a huff. "Nick..."

"What?"

Shaking off his grip on her hands, Maya gestured towards Pearl. "You think that just because it's super easy for me and Pearly to channel Sis, it works that way every time?"

Phoenix blinked, surprised. "It... doesn't?"

Maya made a frustrated noise, then stormed off into the nearby hallway.

"Maya?" Phoenix hurried after her. "Maya, what's wrong?"

Everyone else shared various levels of confused looks. The silence was only broken when Luke finally decided to speak up, raising a finger into the air. "So, um... This doesn't answer why Papa was panicking just now."

Apollo rolled his eyes. "C'mon, when is he not panicking on some level about one of us meeting a gruesome end of some kind?"

Luke thought a moment, then nodded. "True."

View the Court Record
Phoenix caught up to Maya in her bedroom, finding her slumped over her desk with her head face-down on her folded arms. She didn't seem to be crying, but he didn't want to risk anything, so he gently pulled the door closed behind him and approached his fiancée warily. "Maya?"

"I shouldn't have snapped at you."

He was a little surprised to hear that muffled admission. "Did... something else happen? Other than the failed channelling?"

"No." Sighing, Maya pushed herself off the desk, rubbing a hand across her cheeks. "I just... I've never failed one for family before. Not one where the person I was going for was definitely dead."

Phoenix wasn't sure how to respond to that. He rested a hand on Maya's shoulder in silent support.

Maya reached up and placed one of her own hands on top of Phoenix's, gripping it tightly. "This is why I'm not Master yet. After all the training I've done over the years, pushing myself to all my limits... my success rate still isn't high enough for the final test. It won't ever be until I go to Khura'in."

Phoenix simply nodded. He had a feeling what she needed most right now was simply a sounding board.

After a pause, Maya got up from her chair and turned to face Phoenix, giving him a hug that he quickly returned. "I'm sorry, Nick. I keep not-telling you how serious things are up here. Even before we got engaged, you should have known all of this from the start." She sighed again, turning her face downwards to press into his hoodie. "I'm just not a very good girlfriend, I guess."

"Nonsense. You're a great girlfriend." Phoenix patted her back, planting a kiss on the top of her head where it rested on his chest. "And I can guarantee you're an even better fiancée."

Maya laughed, though she didn't move. "Even though I'm going away for two years?"

"It's not like you have a choice in the matter." Phoenix shrugged. "Besides, us getting engaged? That's more of a promise than anything. We're getting our lives back on track, and we're going to mark it with a wedding."

Maya hummed in thought. After a long moment, she pulled out of the hug, looking Phoenix in the eyes. "Channelling Mia is the easiest thing in the world for me. We're sisters, so we're physically very similar, she was suddenly murdered with a lot of loose ends left behind, she only very rec-" She paused, frowning. "Oh. Ten years isn't exactly 'recent', is it?" She shook her head, ignoring the small smile on Phoenix's face. "And she had a lot of spiritual power herself. All of those are, or were, points in her favour, channelling-wise."

Phoenix grinned. "Kinda funny to hear you say that, considering how much trouble you had at first."
Blushing, Maya nodded. "Yeah... That's why I only did enough training to ensure I could channel her every time before I came back. I knew that was the most you'd ever really need from me, even if I wouldn't be as good at anyone else." Her frown deepened, eyes far away. "All those girls I trained with back then... None of them are around anymore."

Phoenix blinked, smile fading. "Huh?"

"They all left." Almost in a daze, Maya turned and headed towards her bed, sitting on the edge. "A lot of them were really devoted to Aunt Morgan, and didn't like me very much, so they gave up their training pretty quickly. The rest... I guess we just couldn't make spiritual training up here sound any more exciting than a life down in the city. They wandered off just like everyone else."

Phoenix sat at her side, hands clasped in his lap. "The acolytes are leaving and the elders are dying off. You said that before, didn't you?"

Maya nodded again, hands gripping the blanket on her mattress. "But no medium has a hundred percent success rate. The Master of the Kurain Channelling Technique is supposed to be around seventy percent at the least. I'm... I'm only thirty right now."

Phoenix raised a disbelieving eyebrow. "Thirty percent? No way."

Maya snorted, shooting him a glance. "Yes way." She leaned against him, resting her head on his shoulder. "Maybe if it wasn't just me and Pearly still capable of channelling for clients - whatever clients we still get, anyway - I'd be more worried about that... Enough that I would've gone along with this trip much sooner."

Phoenix hummed in thought, wrapping an arm behind her back and holding her tight, his head leaning on hers. "For what it's worth... I am glad you were here on the day my name was cleared. And helping Thalassa this past week would've been a lot harder on my own. Maybe putting it off like this was for the best in the long run."

"Maybe." Maya chuckled in her throat, pressing harder against her fiancé's side. "Thanks, Nick."

"For what?"

"Just..." Maya giggled. "Just for being you."

Phoenix smiled. "I am very good at that."

Maya laughed in response.

It took a few hours for Maya to recover from the failed channelling, by which point everyone else had scattered all over the grounds of Fey Manor. The younger trio of Pearl, Trucy and Machi were in the garden, playing some kind of three-person ball game that looked like a mix of soccer and basketball. The elder trio of Thalassa, Apollo and Luke were sitting in the dining room, engrossed in a conversation that was cut short as Phoenix and Maya entered, seeking a midday meal.

"Hi Maya," Luke called, giving them a wave. "I hope you're feeling better."

Maya forced a grin and nodded. "Oh yeah, I'm loads better now."
Phoenix patted her on the back, then quietly wandered off towards the kitchen.

Sighing, Maya moved towards the table, sitting on the nearest cushion. To her right was Luke, with Apollo opposite him and Thalassa at Apollo's side, across from Maya. Feeling self-conscious, Maya brushed at her fringe. "I'm sorry the channelling didn't work."

Thalassa chuckled. "No need to apologise. I remember so little about my mother, I may as well have never known her. What could I possibly say to someone I don't know?"

Maya bit her lip, thinking back on the single day she had the chance to meet Misty Fey, even though she'd not known who the woman was until days later. Even with that short meeting, she had never asked Pearl or any of the other few remaining mediums of the village to channel her mother. Much like Thalassa, she hadn't known what she would say.

"Honestly, I can relate," Apollo mumbled, shrugging as he traced the grain of the wooden table with a finger. "I had fantasies all my life of finding my birth mom again, but when it finally, actually happened..." He looked up at Thalassa with a red face. "I had absolutely no idea what to do about it."

Thalassa smiled, patting her son's back.

"I'm sure you'll have much better luck with Magnifi," Luke pointed out, giving Maya a reassuring look. "He died relatively recently, and Thalassa and Trucy knew him really well, so they know how to handle him."

Thalassa nodded, a slight frown to her brows. "Yes... I have quite a lot to ask my father."

"He died suddenly, too," Maya mused. "That, and him being close to you and Trucy... Those are certainly good signs. Though suicide generally isn't." She sighed. "I just hope at least one of these channellings I promised you goes well... I'd hate to have made this offer and not manage to actually follow through on anything." She turned her eyes on the young man opposite her. "Especially not your dad, Apollo."

Apollo looked too surprised to respond.

"I made my peace with Jove's death long ago." Thalassa gave Maya an encouraging smile. "It would be lovely to say goodbye and show him how Apollo has grown, but whether or not we can doesn't impact our lives in the long run. Or even in the short run."

"R-right." Apollo nodded. "I mean, I was a baby when he died. I've always known I'd never get the chance to meet him. What would I talk to him about?"

"And it's the same with Zak, though I have questions for him just as I do for my father." Thalassa's smile faded a little as her eyes drifted away. "Something went deeply wrong in the Troupe when I had that accident... or maybe there was always something wrong, and my accident only made it more clear to see. If Valant couldn't stay and talk about it... Maybe Zak or my father will."

Apollo frowned. "I would be interested in hearing that story Geary gave you from Magnifi's perspective... Especially since we can't get Gaia's."

Maya winced. "Sorry."

Blushing, Apollo shook his head. "N-no, I didn't mean anything by that! Just... Just a statement of fact, y'know?"
Luke reached out to take Maya's hand, patting it in comfort. "Honestly Maya, we don't mind whether or not you fail a channelling. No matter which happens, we're more concerned with you. Nobody wants to see you beating yourself up about this, especially since these last two weekends together will be all we have for the years you're away."

"He's right," Apollo added, watching Maya with concern. "We won't be able to visit, not like we always can here."

Maya thought a long moment, then gave the pair a smile, blinking back tears. "You boys are so sweet."

"You know who to blame for that," Apollo quipped with a grin.

Luke held back a snort. "The foster system?"

Apollo whacked his brother's arm. Maya and Thalassa just laughed.

View the Court Record
When the Gramaryes gathered in the Channelling Chamber for the second time that day, the meeting started out much as the first: Apollo, Trucy and Machi settled down on the floor in front of the door, their backs pressed to the wood. Thalassa knelt down on the mat near the altar-like set-up at the far end of the room, and Maya sat in front of her.

"I already know pretty well what he looked like. He'd prefer 'Magnifi Gramarye', right?"

Thalassa nodded. "As far as I know, he has used no other name since becoming a magician."

"Right." Maya took a deep breath, then pressed her hands together and closed her eyes.

Thalassa folded her hands in her lap and turned her gaze to her knees. Just as she had told Maya earlier, she had a whole list of things to talk to her father about. Now she was imminently seeing him again, she found herself wondering what to bring up first. She wanted to tell him how her life had turned out, introduce him to his grandchildren, tell him how their lives had turned out... but she also wanted to ask about his own childhood, the time he spent travelling with Gaia and Varlous, and those three short years between her accident and his death. She was torn between the happiness of seeing him again and the disappointment of everything she had learned about him since. She had always known that her father had flaws, but that didn't make it easy to acknowledge their existence.

"Thalassa?"

Blinking, Thalassa returned her gaze to the figure kneeling opposite her. Although they wore Maya's clothes and sported her long black hair, the dark skin and broad build were entirely someone else's. It was tough to recognise the hairless face and focussed eyes that now stared back at her... but she knew there was only one possibility for who it could be. "Dad?"

Magnifi's surprised face relaxed into a fond smile. "You remember me..." He then frowned, confused, first looking over Thalassa and then turning his attention to the room around them. "This... cannot be the afterlife."

Thalassa couldn't help a laugh, shaking her head. "No, this is the world of the living. I happened upon a way to bring you back, momentarily. What else could I do but take that chance to talk to you one last time?"

Magnifi grunted to himself, tearing his eyes away from the candles circling them. "I suppose I am forced to believe that is true. This is certainly beyond any kind of illusion I have ever crafted." He met his daughter's gaze with concern. "You're all better. I never thought that was possible... How long has it been?"

"Since you died? Seven years." Thalassa rested a hand on her bracelet, already bracing herself for the coming conversation. "But it wouldn't have taken me so long to recover had I not been separated from my family."

Magnifi winced, looking away. "You're probably right. I must ask for your forgiveness, Thalassa. I..." thought I was doing the right thing."

Thalassa’s grip on her bracelet tightened. "I already heard the story... from 'Uncle Geary'. From Papa."

Eyes wide in shock, Magnifi met his daughter's gaze. After a moment, he relaxed again, shaking his head. "You deserved this conversation while I was still alive... but it wasn't until I was on my literal death-bed I stopped hiding it long enough to realise that." He looked up. "Of all the mistakes I made in my life, poor Varlous bore the brunt of most. He was the brother I never had, a stage partner I trusted with my life... and I let petty jealousy over Gaia and over you ruin it. That was all on me." He sighed. "I cannot blame him for finally dealing the revenge he deserves. He certainly never took it out on me in life."

Thalassa wasn't quite sure how to proceed. "He... He really loved you, you know. Even when he was apologising for how you both treated me, I don't think he could ever bring himself to blame you."

Magnifi stared back at her, eyebrows furrowed.

Shaking her head, Thalassa decided to move on. "It doesn't matter. I've made my peace with Papa, and with what happened. I just wanted to hear your side of the story."

"I see." Magnifi clasped his hands together, humming in thought. "I suppose... I know you never wanted to talk about it, but, as far as I could see, you never recovered from Jove's and Apollo's deaths."

Thalassa couldn't help a small wince at that. She wouldn't deny there was an element of truth to his deduction.

"I saw my beautiful, cheerful daughter leave to get married and travel the world, have an equally beautiful baby... and, only a year later, come back broken, alone and childless. You stopped singing, and I know how much singing was your passion." He sighed, shaking his head. "I hoped when you decided to marry Zak, and had another baby, that I would see you at least start to sing again. But you never did."

"How could I?" Thalassa almost choked out the words. "There wasn't any joy in it anymore."

"Not even for your new husband and daughter?"

Thalassa looked away. "Zak wasn't a lover of music, not like Jove was... and how could I sing for Trucy when I knew it would only give her pain eventually?"

Magnifi raised an eyebrow.

"Mama sang for me. That's all I remember about her." Thalassa ran her fingers through her hair where it lay over her shoulder, trying to calm herself. "It's because of her I fell in love with singing myself, I'm sure of it. It was singing that led me away from the troupe, and it was because we were away from the troupe that Jove died, that I lost Apollo." She frowned. "That isn't what I was consciously thinking... but I think that was why I didn't sing for her."

Magnifi nodded, frowning in thought. After a long moment, he continued, "The last thing I expected to ever happen was for Zak and Valant to come running to my caravan in a panic because you'd been shot. The one thing I'd impressed on them from the start was to always double and triple-check everything to prevent these kinds of accidents... and they'd slipped and put you in mortal danger. We all thought you were about to die." He closed his eyes, letting out a quiet exhale through his nose.
"You were in a coma at the hospital. I couldn't contain my rage at Zak and Valant for what had happened, so I simply said nothing, and avoided them. For Trucy... I couldn't bear to tell her the truth. I simply told her you'd gotten lost in a disappearing trick. I hoped, should you recover, I'd be able to tell her you found your way out."

Thalassa nodded. Although it was cruel in retrospect, she supposed the white lie seemed reasonable enough in the context it had been given. At barely five years old, Trucy wouldn't have been able to fully grasp much more.

"When you finally woke up, your memory was destroyed and your sight was gone. You weren't in any condition to rejoin us... and we needed to leave Borginia. I..." Magnifi paused. "I'd contacted Varlous when you were hurt, and he came up to Poma to meet me. When you woke up, we both agreed you would go back with him." He sighed, distress pinching at the corners of his eyes. "Part of it was that I wanted to know you were happy again, even if it was only because you couldn't remember us... but part of it was to punish Zak and Valant for what they did. That's why I let them believe you'd died. At the time, the only thing I regretted was that I had to take you from Trucy, but I told myself you'd survived just fine with only your father to raise you, and Trucy would do the same. It was worth it if Varlous could work the miracle of giving you your independence back, of letting you sing just like you'd always loved to do."

"So you let me become Lamiroir." Thalassa rested a hand on her bracelet. "I know I was performing by the time you died."

"You were." Magnifi gave his daughter a warm smile. "Varlous sent me photos every so often. Last I saw, you had a boy on the piano accompanying you."

Thalassa grinned, and was about to say her youngest son's name when muffled voices from behind interrupted her. She turned her head, both her and Magnifi's attention attracted to the noise, and listened to the hushed whispers and quiet protests from the barely-visible silhouettes at the other end of the room. Hiding a laugh, she held out a hand towards the trio. "Machi?"

The voices silenced, then one of the silhouettes stood and haltingly stepped forward into the candlelight. Machi's golden hair and fair skin popped out of the shadows quickly, bright blue eyes watching Magnifi warily as the boy edged towards Thalassa and took her hand in his.

"Pokani, come and meet Askanisa Magnifi." Thalassa guided the boy to sit at her right, resting a hand on his back as she showed him to her father with pride. "Dad, this is Machi. I finally adopted him just last month."

"H-hello," Machi muttered, then stiffly held out a hand towards the man. "I-it is nice to meet you."

Magnifi leaned back, his hands resting on his knees as he scrutinised the teen with amusement. "Well. I certainly never expected to have a grandson I got to see in person." He reached out and took Machi's hand in a hearty shake. "It's a pleasure to meet you too, young Machi. How long have you been learning English?"

"Three months?" Machi quickly returned his hands to his lap, clutching them tightly together to keep from wringing them. "Is longer exact, but... I not remember when I start."

"He learned in secret for a while," Thalassa explained, rubbing the boy's back to offer comfort. "We live here in America now, so it's easy enough to practise."

Magnifi nodded thoughtfully, giving Machi a smile. "You certainly have a good grasp of it already. I imagine Trucy has been helping you practise."
"Yes!"

Before Thalassa could turn to look, a teenage girl had catapulted herself forward from the back of the room with a squeal, her cyan cape flapping behind her as she landed on her mother's left.

"Yes, I have! We have almost all the same classes at school, so I help explain if he's having trouble, or if he has to look up a word and misses what's going on." Trucy grinned proudly. "He's doing way better than he used to," she turned to face her younger brother, "right, Machi?"

Machi turned red and hid a smile, simply nodding in reply.

Magnifi laughed. "My my Trucy, look at you. So grown up since we last spoke! Learning the family business already?"

Trucy giggled, preening. "I've been doing magic for seven years now. I'm not as good as you, but," she shrugged, "I hope I will be one day."

"Ah, it is only a matter of time before you surpass me," Magnifi chuckled. "And Zak too, I'm sure."

Trucy's giggles ceased, her expression tightening. "Oh, yeah... of course."

Thalassa felt her throat constrict, and rested a hand on her daughter's shoulder.

Magnifi frowned, his eyes glancing to the final silhouette sitting at the doorway. "Now, when I woke up here, I assumed our onlookers were to do with how you were able to bring me back from the dead, if only, as you say, momentarily. When young Machi emerged, I assumed it must be Trucy and Zak back there. Was I wrong both times?"

They sat in silence for a long moment, none of the three replying. Finally, Thalassa turned and held out a hand towards the door. "It's time. Come and meet your grandfather, Apollo."

Magnifi was already gasping before the final figure got to his feet, stepping forward. His outstretched hand was the first thing to enter the circle of light, his bracelet glinting as he gripped his mother's hand. As Thalassa had expected, he avoided having to acknowledge his grandfather's eyes on him, keeping his focus on the floor as he slowly sat down in a space Machi hurriedly made for him, the younger boy shifting aside to leave a gap on their mother's right. Apollo didn't release his grip on Thalassa's hand, kneeling on the rug and staring hard at his knees.

"Dad..." Thalassa shifted her gaze between her eldest son and her father, a nervous smile on her face. "This is Apollo... my firstborn."

View the Court Record
Magnifi could only stare for a long moment. "Apollo... You are alive."

Apollo nodded, his eyes darting up to meet his grandfather's.

The old man chuckled, eyes still locked on Apollo as he shook his head. "You're the spitting image of your father... except for the parts of you that are Thalassa's." He frowned, then turned his gaze to his daughter with an air of horror. "Thalassa, I am so sorry."

Thalassa blinked, confused. "For what?"

"I told you not to look for him." Magnifi shook his head, full of guilt. "If it weren't for me, you would have found Apollo far faster..."

"Nonsense." Thalassa huffed, her grip on Apollo's hand tightening. "You were right to tell me not to go back. I would have killed myself long before I found Apollo, the state I was in."

Apollo nodded, his eyes on his mother and sister both. "The important thing is, we found each other eventually, right?"

"Yeah, thanks to Daddy and Luke!" Trucy giggled, hands gripping her socked feet where they stuck out from underneath her crossed legs. "If it weren't for them, who knows what would have happened?"

Apollo couldn't help a laugh. "We'd still have grown up perfectly normal? Or as normal as we could be, anyway."

Trucy scoffed. "Who wants to be normal?" She stuck out her tongue in Apollo's direction, pretending she wasn't smiling. "Normal's over-rated."

Machi pressed a hand to his mouth to stifle a giggle.

Magnifi sighed in relief, watching them fondly. "I am just glad the grandson we thought was long gone was simply lost... and has since been found. It is a pleasure to finally meet you, young Apollo."

Apollo turned red, again avoiding having to look at the old man wearing Maya's kimono. "Um... Hi."

Thalassa gave her eldest son a grin, enjoying every moment of the long-forgotten fantasy from when her firstborn was still an infant: She had always intended on returning to the Troupe one day on a visit, to show off her baby boy to her father... Jove's death and Apollo's disappearance had shattered her fragile plans long before she could even begin to put them into fruition. This wasn't anything close to how she'd always imagined, but aging a baby to a grown man would do that to any situation. Trucy tutted at her elder brother. "C'mon Apollo, do you always have to be so bad at saying 'hello'?

Apollo seemed to snap out of his embarrassment, fixing his sister with a smirk. "I didn't hear you doing any kind of greeting, Artemis." Releasing Thalassa's hand from his, he crossed his arms.

Thalassa restrained a sigh as she clasped her hands together, closing her eyes. Magnifi simply looked between the pair with a baffled expression.

"That's only because we didn't need to be introduced," Trucy insisted, sticking her nose in the air. "I'm too amazing for a simple introduction."

Apollo shook his head. "A 'greeting' isn't the same as an 'introduction'. Besides, we both know it's always me who does the work greeting our audience every night. You're just lazy."

Trucy scoffed, crossing her arms to imitate him. "Me? Lazy? If you ask me, it's because you do it all the time that you're too lazy to say 'hello' properly now."

Rolling his eyes, Apollo let out an exaggerated sigh. "Oh, you are such a hypocrite..."

"Am not a hypocrite!"

"Alright, that's enough." Thalassa raised her hands towards her elder children, giving them both a stern look. "I know you two love your debates, but could we keep them to the stage, please?"

Magnifi laughed. "I guessed from your outfits. You two are partners!"

"Yep, me and Polly!" Trucy puffed out her chest in pride, then turned to Apollo. "How long have we been performing together as Apollo and Artemis? Six years?"

Apollo nodded. "Nearly. First time was our second Halloween together, though you were still going by 'Trucy' then. We made it a regular thing after the next New Years, and that was when you took up 'Artemis'."

"Right." Trucy scrunched up her face, crunching numbers in her head. "So... Five years and nine months? Yeah, I think that's right."

Machi leaned over and tapped Apollo's arm, whispering, "Isoveli? What is 'hypocrite'?"

Apollo gave his brother a grin. "Someone who tells people not to do something, but then does that thing themselves. Like Trucy being terrible at saying 'hi'."

"Am not!" the girl protested, shooting him a glare.

Machi hid giggles behind a hand.

"Why else is it always me who writes the greetings?" Apollo shrugged, though his grin indicated he wasn't entirely serious. "Clearly I'm just better at words."

Thalassa sighed, burying her face in one hand. She may not have been back with her children for long, but she had quickly picked up that, with her knowledge of the players involved, this was not a situation she could easily salvage.

"I write them too!" Trucy huffed, then reached up to her head as if to grab her hat. She faltered only when her hand grasped at nothing, then looked behind her with a frown. "Aw, we should have brought our hats."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Why? We specifically planned to pick them up before heading to the Wonder Bar tonight."
Trucy rolled her eyes. "You know why!" She subtly jerked her head in their grandfather's direction.

Apollo sighed. "Truce, we didn't know this was going to be happening until a few hours ago. And it's not like we have much room in here anyway."

Magnifi laughed. "A very logical thought, young Apollo. It is a shame I cannot see your show myself, but I trust Zak and Valant trained you both well in my absence."

The trio's smiles died. Trucy frowned at the floor, while Apollo and Machi shot her worried looks.

Thalassa raised her head slowly from her hand, watching her father. "Dad... Whatever your plans were for what would happen after you died..." She took a deep breath, shaking her head. "They didn't happen."

Magnifi frowned, looking around the group. "They were the only people I had a chance to say goodbye to. That is not why they aren't here?"

Thalassa shook her head, eyes turned downwards.

There was a long silence, no-one quite sure how to proceed. Finally, Trucy pulled herself to her knees, crawling across towards her brothers. "Polly, you need to show him!"

Apollo blinked, eyes wide. "Show him?" Before he could ask for further clarification, his sister had reached his side and started reaching under his cape, grabbing at his belt. "Hey, get off!" In return, Apollo grabbed her arms, forcing Trucy back.

Trucy huffed, pressing against her brother's clinging hands on her forearms. "Get out your thing!"

"What thing!?"

"Oh, I know!" Grinning, Machi jumped forward to the heart-shaped pouch on Apollo's belt, pulling out a tablet computer before Apollo could stop him.

"Good going, Machi!" Pulling back out of the surprised Apollo's grip, Trucy grabbed the computer and jumped to her feet.

Apollo was quick to follow, bouncing to his socked feet with a glare. "Truce, give that back!" Around him, Machi, Thalassa and even Magnifi copied him, all standing on the thick rug.

Trucy skipped to the back of the room, her brothers on her heels. "What's your password?"

"I'm not telling you!" Apollo made a grab for the tablet, only for Trucy to promptly hide it under her cape, leading to a grappling match as they fought over the object.

Thalassa stomped a foot giving them both a stern look. "Trucy. Give your brother back his computer now."

The pair paused, looking up at their mother in surprise. It took them a moment to react, Apollo stepping back and holding out a hand expectantly. Trucy pouted, but eventually produced the tablet, returning it to Apollo.

"Thank you," Apollo muttered, holding his precious Court Record close.

Trucy rounded on him with a glare. "I know you copied all the stuff from that old trial! I just wanted to show Grandpa Magnifi what happened."
Magnifi shook his head. "Show me or not, I'd like to know what has happened to Zak and Valant. Did they have nothing to do with the four of you uniting?"

Machi was the only one brave enough to shake his head. "I never meet Zak. Apollo did not, also. Valant, we only meet twice."

"Oh?" Magnifi turned his gaze to the other three, who were all avoiding him sheepishly. "Is someone planning to explain?"

There was another long pause. Finally, Apollo sighed, pulling out his computer and tapping away at the screen. "Long story short... If popular opinion had their way, one of either Zak or Valant would've gone down as your murderer."

Magnifi's eyes widened, and only Thalassa and Trucy recognised the kindling rage behind them. "What."

"Valant re-arranged the scene after you died," Thalassa picked up, holding up a hand to calm her father. "He wanted the rights to your magic for himself, so he tried to blame your death on Zak."

Magnifi stared back at her for a second or two before sighing, looking away. "I didn't wait long enough for him to leave."

Apollo approached, reading aloud from his computer: "That night, I visited the hospital room at the time Magnifi requested. The smell of gunpowder hung in the room, and my mentor had taken his final bow. I did not imagine my fellow student might have received the same instructions. Yet, a deal with the dead is still a deal. Death's sweet kiss, I gave to the clown. Then I informed the doctor and the police." He looked up to meet the man's eyes. "Valant's exact words in the murder trial."

Magnifi closed his eyes, shaking his head.

"They were going to convict Zak," Apollo continued. "Not enough evidence pointed at Valant, and no-one ever suspected suicide as an option. Just as the judge was calling the verdict, Zak pulled off his final illusion: He disappeared from the courtroom. And left Trucy behind."

"What!?" Magnifi looked ready to break down the door and hunt Zak down himself. "After all I entrusted to him, he-!?"

"But it's okay, Grandpa Magnifi." Trucy gave him a sad smile. "After Daddy Zak left, I got adopted by Daddy Phoenix. He did loads of research into the Troupe, and found out all sorts of stuff about Mommy Thalassa and Polly, so that we were able to find them."

Thalassa chuckled. "It still took a long time to find me... but I will always be glad it only took you two a matter of months."

Apollo shrugged, hiding a bashful smile. "I'm just happy I got the opportunity to have a real family while I was still young. How many lifelong foster kids get to be adopted at fifteen?"

Machi giggled, then launched himself at Apollo to hug his older brother tight around the middle. "We do! Fourteen and fifteen best age for adoption!"

Laughing, Apollo patted the boy's back. "Guess so. Luke was fourteen too, or nearly at least." With his other arm, he returned his Court Record to his bag.

"I was seven!" Trucy boasted, joining in the hug.
"Ah yes, the absolute worst age to be adopted," Apollo quipped with a grin, patting her back just as he was patting Machi's.

Trucy shoved her eldest brother in the stomach, but didn't stop hugging him or let up her own smile. Apollo only laughed.

Magnifi sighed. "And after Zak's disappearing act... May I ask what happened to him and Valant?"

Thalassa nodded. "Valant continued performing on his own... but the rumours he'd been your murderer followed him everywhere. Zak, we can only assume, left the country, and remained in hiding until this past April."

Trucy's smile died, clinging tighter to Apollo.

"He met Trucy and Apollo's adoptive father, Phoenix Wright, and entrusted him with his own will: He wished to pass on the rights to your magic, to Trucy."

"He still didn't know about me, that we were performing together," Apollo picked up. "It had been almost exactly seven years since he disappeared, so he was about to be declared legally deceased... but then he got killed anyway."

Magnifi closed his eyes, nearly flinching in pain.

Thalassa sighed. "We plan to speak to him later, the same way we are speaking to you now." She shook her head. "Regardless... When Valant learned the rights hadn't passed to him, he gave everything of yours and of Zak's that he still had to Trucy. As far as we know, he's given up magic for good."

Deep in thought, Magnifi nodded. "I can only expect as much from him. It was hard to say it to his face, but he was never as talented as the rest of us." He opened his eyes, looking to Thalassa's three children still locked in their hug. "I know I can entrust my legacy to you, my grandchildren. Though this will be our last meeting..." He grinned, holding a hand to the top of Maya's hair as if tipping his hat. "A true entertainer always keeps a smile on their face."

Apollo and Trucy held each other tighter, giving their grandfather their biggest grins. Machi giggled and nodded.

Thalassa wiped a tear from her eyes. "Thank you, Dad."

View the Court Record
"Grandpa Magnifi gave me and Polly his blessing!" Trucy proudly announced, bouncing in her seat with pure glee. "He trusts us to carry on his legacy!"

"As he should," Luke chuckled, patting his sister's shoulder. "You two will be amazing once you've sorted out what's in that book of his."

The gathered Fey-Wright-Gramarye family was seated around the square table, all eight of them in a circle on the cushions where they had placed themselves after leaving the Channelling Chamber a matter of minutes earlier. Machi sat closest to the piano, having shot it several longing glances before finally settling at Apollo's side. Opposite them sat Thalassa, while Phoenix and Maya took up a remaining side and Luke, Trucy and Pearl were lined up along the other.

Maya shot a grin at Apollo, who had ended up next to her around the corner. "And when is that happening? I'm sure you guys weren't the only ones to be disappointed Valant's revival of the famous Troupe Gramarye got cancelled."

Apollo scratched the back of his head, trying not to look too embarrassed. "Well, there's a lot in there... and we may be pretty practised with what we do, but we're not up to the Great Magnifi's level. We still do nearly all our performing in the Wonder Bar, for goodness' sake..."

Trucy scoffed. "What's wrong with the Wonder Bar!?"

"Nothing's wrong with it," Apollo insisted, waving a hand. "It's just... It's not exactly the biggest and best place to attract new audiences, is it?"

Thalassa nodded. "That's a reasonable thought. In our early days, my father usually performed in places like that restaurant of yours, but by the time we were forming the full Troupe, we played to ever larger venues and sold out every time."

Trucy pouted, but she seemed to accept their point.

Phoenix rubbed his chin thoughtfully. "That's not a problem. You two just need to work up a bit of fame before relaunching the Troupe, that's all."

Machi patted his eldest brother's shoulder. "That okay. I have to wait long time before I can perform with Aska again. Maybe we do so at same time?"

"Yes, you could all relaunch at once!" Pearl clapped her hands, gaze moving between the four Gramaryes. "Lamiroir is very famous, and people will come to see a new Troupe Gramarye, so you could both help each other!"

Trucy grinned. "Yeah, that sounds great!"

Apollo was more restrained, looking to his mother. "That gives us a deadline of about ten months, though. Will we even be ready by then?"
Thalassa clutched her hands together where they rested on the table. "A good question. Even with a boost from Lamiroir, I'm not sure you will be."

Trucy's face fell. Apollo simply nodded with a solemn look, saying "I thought so." "That doesn't mean you can't still perform together one day," Luke pointed out. "Exactly!" Maya grinned, clapping her hands together. "Maybe that could be how we celebrate me coming back!"

Trucy gasped, a wide smile returning to her face. "That's perfect, Mommy! A Gramarye reunion show, October of twenty-twenty-eight!"

Thalassa laughed. "Sounds wonderful."

Apollo just snickered, shaking his head.

Maya winked. "I'm already looking forward to it."

"Speaking of performing..." Luke turned to Thalassa, stroking his goatee. "How exactly is that working for you, Thalassa? You're living here now, but you said before you have a Borginian producer. Did you ever hire a new manager after Mister LeTouse died?"

Thalassa shook her head. "Lamiroir has neither manager nor producer right now. The Borginian producer you mentioned, we both agreed our contract was voided after the concert in July."

Trucy quietly hummed to herself, chewing her lip with a deep frown. "Voided?" Apollo glanced to Machi, who looked a little confused himself, before returning his gaze to his mother. "Why?"

"Many reasons, in the end." Thalassa glanced Machi's way, then carefully focussed her attention on the table. "For one, it specified Machi always be present, which would be impossible going forward."

Machi turned red, withdrawing into himself. "Also, I planned on leaving Borginia, and it would be difficult to maintain a working relationship so far away." Thalassa shook her head. "And we disagreed on the wisdom of admitting my blindness and amnesia to the public, despite the circumstances."

"But I didn't think you had a choice," Pearl said, pressing a thumbnail to her lips. "Wasn't it necessary to tell everyone, because of the trial?"

Apollo pressed a finger to his forehead. "Not exactly. Herr Diva just announced the amnesia before Mom testified, then Crescend let slip about the blindness later. We probably could have managed that trial without revealing any of it."

Thalassa shrugged. "No matter. What's done is done. I will simply find a new producer here in America."

Trucy perked up as Thalassa finished speaking. "Oh! And a manager, too!" She shot her mother a grin. "Managers are like agents, right? And you get agents from agencies..." She wriggled her eyebrows up and down, a blatant cue to infer what she was thinking.

Most of the table laughed at Trucy's antics, the only one not to being a slightly confused Machi.
Maya placed her hands on her hips and leaned forward over the table, giving the girl a smirk. "Am I to understand you wish to hire both members of Lamiroir to the Wright Anything Agency, Trucy Wright?"

Apollo shrugged, hiding a grin. "It's a good idea. I mean, we'd actually have a proper pianist on our books, finally."

Phoenix snorted, only managing to fake extremely mild offence.

"Oh, that is what Trucy meant?" Machi frowned, then gazed up at Thalassa with a hopeful look. "We can do that, Aska?"

Thalassa smiled. "Which are you asking: If it's possible, or if we're going to?"

Machi thought a long moment, vaguely confused. "Both?"

"It's certainly possible," Luke pointed out. "We were a talent agency long before we changed the name, after all. Music has always been one of our primary offers. The only problem I can see," he looked between the members of his family with a worried expression, "would be that Lamiroir is an international celebrity... or rather, two international celebrities. Would we be capable of handling a 'talent' that big?"

Apollo, Trucy, Pearl and Machi frowned in concern, but the three adults shared a smile. "Actually, we already discussed that," Phoenix said.

"We had a lot of time to talk about things this past week," Maya added with a wink.

Apollo rolled his eyes with a scoff, crossing his arms. "Oh really. Planning out how much about our lives you were going to change all at once?"

Thalassa chuckled. "We're very sorry my dear Apollo, but me moving here all on its own necessitated a lot of change. Everything else has been unfortunate coincidence in timing."

Although he grumbled, Apollo seemed to accept that.

"Lamiroir may be internationally known, but concerts have never attracted as much money as album sales. Not to say they are not profitable, but they have always been lesser ever since our initial producer hired us," Thalassa explained. "It does give me some leeway, however: I don't plan to perform outside the country until Machi's probation is over. When I find a new producer, hopefully as soon as possible, they will be handling the recording process and album sales, the international side of things. Concert management will be localised for a time, giving whoever else I hire plenty of time to prepare for Machi re-joining me next July, and Lamiroir returning to the international stage." She gave the four Wright children a smile. "Plus, wouldn't handling Lamiroir give you experience in handling a celebrity, for when Troupe Gramarye makes its return?"

Apollo and Trucy's eyes widened as they locked gazes for a moment, turning back to their mother. "Really!?" Trucy cried, a growing grin on her face. "You're actually joining the Agency!??"

Machi gasped, equally excited. "We are!?"

Thalassa giggled and nodded.

"You think we'd just turn down that kind of opportunity?" Phoenix snorted, gently mocking his kids, then followed it up with a gentle smile. "Seriously though, we've always made big decisions like these as a family. I'm not making anything official unless you guys-"
"Yes!" Trucy was bouncing on her cushion, her grin threatening to split her face in half. "Yes, yes, yes, they can join, yes!"

Apollo laughed, briefly sticking a hand in the air. "I'm down with this."

Luke nodded. "It's fine with me, Papa." He looked between Machi and Thalassa with a smile. "May I be the first to welcome the members of Lamiroir to the Wright Anything Agency?"

Machi giggled, on the verge of bouncing much like his sister. "Thank you! Thank you so much, Isa and Aska!"

Thalassa laughed, a hand on her chest as she gave the Wrights a warm look. "I think I speak for both of us when I say we are happy to join you."

---

Dear Professor Layton,

Thank you for the detailed description of your trip to Borginia, and thank Flora for hers too! I shall have to ask Thalassa later for her own account, and maybe write it up as part of my stories. I suppose at this point we could classify them as a full-on biography of you? I was erring on the side of 'autobiography' before, but I didn't accompany you to Borginia, which makes you (or your unnamed counterpart) the lone recurring figure now. It's a shame, because it sounds like it would have been very exciting to witness in person. I simply couldn't keep myself from reading the whole thing before writing my reply!

Speaking of Borginia, Thalassa has arrived here safe and well. Papa and Maya were keeping her return a secret to surprise the others, but the rest of us all ended up finding out first. We still managed to surprise them, luckily. I think it was a bit of a shock for Apollo and Trucy to see her appearing at the office out of nowhere, but they're all happy to be back together now. She lives around the corner from us, so she's not far away, and we've even signed 'Lamiroir' up at the Agency. With Thalassa and Machi actually working with us now, I think it's safe to say they're a permanent part of daily life around here!

I suppose I should explain why the surprise had to be ruined for everyone else. Papa's 'long game' for clearing his name unexpectedly reached a head, when the original forger whose work got him disbarred (sort of, it's complicated) was poisoned and died. He and Mr. Edgeworth had a new system of trials ready for testing, so they put the two together at the last minute. Apollo went off to defend the accused, with Trucy and Machi helping, but Papa asked me to be his technical aide handling the jurists. It was quite fun, actually. I not only was writing a story based on real events, but I was including puzzles for the jurists to solve in order to proceed. Papa did a lot of artwork for it, too. It would take a long time to explain why, but Maya, Clay and Thalassa were three of the six jurists, and the trial is how we found out she was back before the others did. Naturally, we weren't open to discussing the case with the defence, so that helped to keep the secret for a while. Prosecutor Gavin made up with Papa and Apollo in the end, after helping shine a light on what his brother did. Even though this trial was only to find a verdict for Vera, I think word of mouth will do for Kristoph Gavin what it did to Papa back in 2019. Besides, he's already serving a life sentence for Zak Gramarye's murder, so he's long out of harm's way. No, that's wrong. Mr. Gavin set up methods for murdering the Mishams that didn't activate for seven years. We just have to be careful not to set off any more.
I don't know if Papa or Maya called you to share the news themselves, but they're engaged now! I think they sort of both mutually agreed that was happening after Vera's verdict was declared. We don't know when the wedding will happen though, because Maya has to go and do some kind of special spiritual training course before she can properly be Master of the Kurain Channelling Technique. It takes two years to complete, so she's going to be out of the country a long time. We only have a fortnight until she flies out, so we're making sure to spend as much time with her as we can until then.

This letter has gotten very long already. I suppose that's what happens when a lot goes on in only a few days! I hope you're all doing well. Pass on my love to Flora and Alfendi.

Puzzles are enclosed.

Your friend,

Luke Triton-Wright

11th October, 2026

View the Court Record
Although it was Tuesday, the first school-day of the week had finally come for Trucy and Machi. Despite Maya's assurances she'd be down in the city the next day, Trucy had spent the entire Monday up in Kurain Village whining about the lost time with her adoptive mother, until Apollo had pointedly suggested she go back down into the city and into school regardless of the public holiday. She wisely kept quiet after that.

As promised, after unearthing Magnifi's trick box of memories the previous Saturday, Luke had already begun the process to make digital copies of the old letters and photos. While Apollo had secretly used his Court Record to take pictures of a few favourites in the photo-books, Luke had fetched an old, somewhat portable scanner from his apartment, setting it up alongside his laptop on Phoenix's desk (said laptop being a much more recent piece of technology than Phoenix's ancient desktop computer). However, with all the activity in the office on that day, not much progress had been done on the task, so it was only on Tuesday, with Luke, Thalassa and Apollo alone in the apartment, that work could finally begin.

The first job, which Thalassa had tackled on Saturday, was separating the letters in the box into piles based on age: The oldest were written by Geary and Gaia, from the years before Gaia's death, mostly all kept together; The newest, interspersed around all the other letters, were written by Geary alone, updates on Thalassa's health and life as 'Lamiroir' following her accident, ending shortly before Magnifi's death; The middle pile was the remainder, the letters Thalassa had sent home while travelling with Jove and baby Apollo. The two photo-books sat to one side, the least-fragile and thus last things that would be digitised for the Gramarye family's newly-founded archives.

Thalassa regarded the piles on the glass coffee table with hands on her hips. "I know we're doing the letters first... but I don't know where to start. Do we go from oldest to newest?"

Luke looked up from the desk chair, where he was setting up his laptop around the mess his father always left surrounding the old computer. "It's up to you. This won't take us more than a few days, and even the oldest letters will survive that long. The order we scan them doesn't really matter, in my opinion."

Thalassa stared at the piles a few moments more, then turned her attention to the young man sitting on the nearby sofa. "What do you think, Apollo?"

Apollo's eyes widened as he looked up at his mother. "Um." His face flushed red, gaze back on the table. "W-well, I... I was kinda curious about..." He ran a hand through his hair, then gestured to one of the piles, unable to do more than glance at the woman he was speaking to. "Th-the ones you wrote? While you were away from the troupe with my dad?"

Thalassa gave her son a warm look. "Then we'll do those first." She picked up the indicated pile to deliver to the desk.

Apollo bit his lip to hide a pleased smile as he followed. It took several minutes for the redness to leave his face.
After that, everything went very smoothly, with Thalassa extracting the letters from their envelopes, Apollo placing them one by one on the scanner, and Luke sitting at his laptop to manage settings and save the scanned images. Luckily, Thalassa had always dated her letters in the same place, so Luke made sure to read out the dates as soon as he saw them.

"This one's November, 2003. The eighth."

"Oh, back to October. The twenty-fifth.

"And this one's also from November, but the twenty-second this time."

Although the letters weren't quite in order, jumping back and forth, they seemed to roughly follow a semblance of a timeline, yet to reach the point at which the young couple became a family of three.

"And we've hit 2004. Third of January."

"Back to December. The twentieth."

"And now February? Valentine's Day."

The closer they got to the mid-point of the pile, the more Apollo felt the tension creeping up his back at what was coming.

"And twenty-seventh March."

"Ah, January again. Thirty-first."

"This one's April, the twenty-fourth."

When the next letter's image came up on Luke's screen, he stared at it in silence for a moment before smiling. "Eighth of May. The day after you were born, Apollo."

Barely withholding a gasp, Apollo jumped to his brother's side and leaned down to see the laptop screen. It wasn't a long letter, and the image was slowly sharpening as the scanner continued its work, but Apollo couldn't help trying to read the whole thing at once anyway, catching only the occasional phrase in neat cursive.

You have a grandson!

We've decided to name him Apollo amazing to think a person can be so small

I'm sure you felt like this with me

Jove's trying to teach him to sing says his lungs are clearly ready for it sure he will be musical once he's older teach him to appreciate magic too

We hope to move on soon
Hands rested on his shoulders, and Apollo looked up to see Thalassa behind him. She gave her son a warm smile, and whispered into his ear, "You can read it later."

Blushing, Apollo nodded, quickly straightening his posture. "Y-yeah, I know. I was just... curious."

Luke hid giggles as he named and saved the completed scan: '2004-05-08.jpg'. "We're halfway through, now. Not much longer to wait."

"Shut up," Apollo mumbled, trying not to turn any redder as he retrieved the paper from within the scanner.

Before Luke could laugh at him again, the door opened and Maya flounced into the office, shooting the trio at the desk a wide grin. "Guess who's officially engaged?"

Phoenix rolled his eyes as he came in behind her, closing the door. "Geeze, you're even doing that to people who already know?"

Luke waved. "Hi Maya! Hi Papa!"

Apollo snorted. "Got your ring fitted?"

Maya beamed as she crossed the room, wriggling the fingers of her left hand to show off the silver band there.

"She's been announcing it every time we walk through a door," Phoenix sighed, hands shoved in his hoodie pockets. "I'll admit, the cheers were nice, but it was just embarrassing to have entire streets stare at us, supportive or not..."

Maya scoffed. "Weren't so grumpy when the bus driver gave us a free ride because of it."

Phoenix thought a moment, then shrugged and nodded. "Yeah, that was nice of him actually."

Thalassa smiled, taking the letter Apollo had removed from the scanner and busying herself carefully replacing it in its envelope.

"Well, it looks good, Mom." Apollo shot Maya a grin as he crossed his arms. "It suits you."

Maya softly gasped, turning suddenly-teary eyes to the young man. "Aw, thank you, baby!" She leaned across the desk, grabbing Apollo's shoulders and pulling him towards her to plant kisses on his cheeks. "You're so sweet!"

Apollo laughed. Once Maya had released him, he circled the desk to approach Phoenix. "You gonna get an engagement ring too, Dad? Or just wait for the wedding?"

Phoenix snorted. "I'll wait, thanks."

Maya spun to face him with wide eyes. "What?" She huffed and waved him off, turning back to the desk with a sniff. "Fine, be boring. We've got two years to wait, after all."

Shaking his head, Phoenix simply sat down on the nearest sofa, leaning against the back cushion as if ready to take a nap.

Apollo glanced behind him to see Thalassa and Luke returning to work on the letters from the memory box, Maya chatting away about her trip to the jeweller's as she took Apollo's place at the scanner. Glad to leave them to it, Apollo continued on to sit on the sofa next to Phoenix, casting wary glances back at the desk to ensure his question wouldn't be overheard. "Dad?"

Phoenix jumped a little, lifting his head from the cushion with wide eyes. "Ah. Apollo." He shifted in his seat, turning his attention more fully to his eldest son. "Did you want something?"

Apollo nodded, biting his lip and casting another glance at the desk. He kept his voice low. "I just wanted to check... if you told Mom Maya about..." He took a deep breath. "About me and Khura'in?"

Phoenix stared back at Apollo for a few moments before his eyes drifted away with a thoughtful frown. "No, I'm pretty sure she doesn't know. It's never come up in my presence since Thalassa arrived, anyway." He looked back to the younger man with concern. "Why? I thought you said you were trying to forget it."

"I am." Apollo sighed. "But, you know, considering it was where I got separated from Mom Thalassa, it kinda came up with Trucy and... she got mad I never said anything before." He shook his head. "I promised her I'd at least tell Mom Maya about it before she leaves."

Phoenix nodded, glancing up at the commotion around the desk on the other side of the room. "Did you want me to make an excuse to get you and Maya alone? Get Luke out of the room?"

Apollo thought a long moment. Finally, he shook his head. "I'll tell both of them. If Trucy knows now, Luke deserves to know as well."

"Okay." Phoenix gave his son a smile. "Knock 'em dead."

Snorting, Apollo decided to just take the support.

View the Court Record
Maya's chattering halted as Apollo approached them, and she gave the young man a bright grin. "Sorry. Did I take your job?"

"Nah, it's fine." Apollo rubbed the back of his head, unsure quite how to proceed. "I, um... I actually wanted to talk to you. And Luke."

Luke and Maya shared a curious look, while Thalassa watched her son with concern. Luke indicated the nearby scanner, saying, "I've just set it to start on the next page. We can put everything on hold for a bit if you need our full attention."

Apollo thought a long moment, then decided making everyone move would only succeed in him putting the conversation off. He shook his head, glancing up at Maya. "No. I... I promised Trucy I'd do this before you left for Khura'in." He took a deep breath. "You guys know my dad got invited to play music for the queen of a distant country when I was a baby, but then died in a fire, and I got separated from Mom Thalassa in the aftermath."

Maya nodded, glancing at Thalassa. "That was all you ever found out about it, right? I remember you kids talking about that years ago."

"Y-yeah," Apollo muttered. "Thing is, I never told you what happened after."

Luke frowned, stroking his goatee. "I seem to remember there being some confusion back then over exactly where your birth father actually came from, if it was Borginia or California. I'm guessing he told someone 'California' before he died, so that's where you were sent when no one showed up to claim you." His frown deepened. "I never really thought about it before. I can see why you were sent away, but..." He turned a curious gaze towards his brother, suspicion lurking at the edges. "If you were a baby at the time, how did you already know so much about what happened by the time we met? I doubt that kind of information that would have been available to your foster families here."

Apollo winced, clutching his bracelet tightly. He couldn't make himself meet his brother's eyes, instead staring at the floor. "I... I wasn't sent back immediately. The guy who rescued me from the fire, he..." He choked on his words, too chicken to proceed. "He..." Apollo could feel the weight of the long-held secret tightening around his heart and lungs, making it difficult to breathe, and all he wanted to do was bail from the conversation and erase it from existence, to once more ignore the agony of the invisible scars he'd been left with.

Phoenix's shuffled steps crossed the room behind him, and Apollo felt his father's hand rest silently on his shoulder. With the touch of the older man supporting him, Apollo was able to take a deep breath and calm his rapid heart rate. He was too far in to stop now.

Apollo took another breath and forced out, "He raised me. Sort of. For eight years, anyway." He looked up to meet Luke's and Maya's shocked gazes. "He was the one who told me about the fire, and what little I knew about my dad. His son was my big brother. We used to play together, in the mountains, and..." His resolve faltered, eyes returning to the floor with a glare. "And then he sent me away. Just me, not my foster brother, because I was the 'foreigner'. Me, the eight-year-old, who considered himself just as much a native of that country as everyone else. It was 'too dangerous' for me to stay, in the only home I'd ever known." He closed his eyes, holding back tears. "I wasn't family to him. Family doesn't abandon each other. He sent me away and he promised he'd come back for me... but he never did."

There was a long pause, broken by Maya dashing around the desk and pulling Apollo into a tight hug, her chin resting on his shoulder where she'd ripped it from Phoenix's grasp. "You poor baby! I'm so sorry!" She paused, then pulled back, placing her hands on his shoulders and staring into Apollo's eyes with undisguised concern. "Why didn't you ever tell us before? That's so awful!"

Apollo shrugged, unable to look at Maya's sad eyes in fear of the hot tears threatening the back of his eyeballs. "I 'unno... I just didn't want to think about it at all. Pretend it never happened."

"Oh, baby..." Maya pulled him back into the tight hug. Apollo returned it.

Luke got up from his chair, coming around the desk on the same route their adoptive mother had taken. "I can see why you kept this to yourself. I imagine it... It probably really hurts to think about, doesn't it?"

Apollo looked up to meet his brother's worried gaze over Maya's shoulder. Unable to speak for fear of sobbing, he just nodded.

Luke returned a sympathetic smile. "If it helps, you're not the first person I've seen react that way to trauma. The Professor himself suppressed memories of his birth family because of the pain of losing them at a young age." He stepped forward to pat his brother's shoulder. "But thank you for trusting us with this. I don't think I need to tell you that you can count on us never to abandon you."

Apollo couldn't help a choked laugh. "I know you guys too well to ever think you would." He pulled back from Maya's hug, rubbing the few escaped tears from around his eyes.

Luke turned his attention to Phoenix and Thalassa. "I'm guessing you two already knew about this."

Phoenix nodded. "Most of it." His concerned gaze bore into the back of Apollo's head, the young magician acutely aware of how little he'd actually shared with his father. "I knew about this far-away country from the adoption process, but when Apollo didn't want to talk about it, I didn't ask."

Thalassa had her hand on her bracelet, hanging back from the conversation with a sorrowful look. "We discussed it when I came back. Trucy was quite shocked to hear the story."

"She made me promise that same day I'd tell you guys as well," Apollo sighed, ignoring Maya's hand running through his hair (brushing back his spikes in the process). "And... that's not the entire story yet."

Maya paused, removing her hand from Apollo's head as the fear for his wellbeing returned to her gaze. "There's more?"

Apollo nodded. "The country, the kingdom, where my dad died in a fire while performing in the palace for the queen... That was Khura'in."

Maya's mouth fell open, and she jumped back half-a-step. "What!?"

Luke stared for a long moment. "It was?" He glanced between Phoenix and Maya. "So, when Apollo overheard you two talking about Maya's trip...?"
"There was a bit of a misunderstanding at first," Phoenix admitted with a shrug. "He heard us saying 'Khura'in', presumably among other things, and must have jumped to some conclusions."

Apollo turned red, looking away. "That's why I hid in my room that day. I thought the same thing might be happening again... until Dad came to tell me what was actually going on." He met Maya's eyes. "That's partly why Trucy made me promise to tell you this before you left, since you're going to the same place I spent most of my childhood."

Maya stared with watery eyes for a second before pulling Apollo back into a hug. "You poor thing... If I knew you had such awful memories connected to Khura'in, I'd've..." She paused, then stepped back with a fierce frown. "Who was your foster father? I have half a mind to drag him out of whatever hole he's hiding in and take him hiding back here to apologise to you!"

Apollo decided to entertain Maya's offer for a few moments. It was extremely tempting, he had to admit. He could easily picture his former foster father being dragged to California by the ear, so terrified by Maya's wrath that he would fall to the floor at Apollo's feet and beg for forgiveness. At his back would be Apollo's former foster brother, also apologising on the man's behalf, though he himself was blameless of the whole affair. Maybe some of their old friends from those days would be there too, though his memories of them had been squashed along with the rest of Khura'in... But his mental eye kept returning to that man, the man who had once called Apollo his son but hadn't ever meant it. Apollo had no idea what he was doing right now, all these years later. At a guess, he was still hiding away in the mountains, still the fierce, dragon-obsessed, never-yielding leader of the rebel freedom fighters. If the regime hadn't found him by now, Maya certainly never would... and Apollo told himself it was for that reason - certainly not any lingering fondness - that he finally shook his head. "Nah. If he wants to see me again, he knows where to look. As for me... I don't need him." He gave Maya a smile. "I'm perfectly happy with my real family, here in California."

Maya's eyes shone with unshed tears of happiness. "Awww!" She pulled him back into the hug. "You're so sweet, little Apollo." She paused, then stepped back again, looking worried. "So, when I head off to Khura'in next week...?"

Apollo laughed. "You still count as real family, Mom. It doesn't matter where you are."

Maya shrugged, blowing off his comment with a flippant "I knew that," that didn't hide exactly how much it had truly concerned her.

Apollo just chuckled as he pulled her back into the hug.
It had been exactly a week since that unfortunate day in court that had resulted in Vera Misham's poisoning. Much like that unfortunate day, the Wrights found themselves waiting on Vera's health... except this time, their hopes were higher than they'd ever been.

Ema escorted the young woman out to the hospital's reception, their arms full of plastic bags containing a variety of DVDs, and Vera specifically hugging her sketchbook to her chest. The young artist paused at the point where the hall met the open room of reception, shying away from the usual small crowd beyond. It took her a second to notice Ema was moving on without her, and she jumped back into motion, keeping her eyes low and her feet close to Ema's. The detective, hearing the squeak on linoleum behind her, slowed down to check on her charge, but kept a steady pace towards the nearby desk, heels clacking a regular rhythm on the floor.

From the rows of seating nearby, Vera saw a pair of white boots approaching. Thinking them familiar, she raised her eyes across black pants, a red-and-white belt, and a red cape framing a black, double-breasted vest with shiny, round buttons. By the time she reached the face in front of the cape's high collar, she knew who had come to her aid. "Apollo..."

Apollo grinned, giving her a quick wave with a gloved hand. "Hey, Vera. We heard you were being discharged today, so we thought we'd check you were okay." He reached out and gently pried the plastic bags from her hands, carrying them in one of his.

Vera smiled, happy to hand the bags over and even happier to see a friendly face. "Thank you." She glanced down at Apollo's sides, but found them devoid of the two teenagers she expected to find there. "Where are...?"

"Oh, uh," Apollo laughed, rubbing the back of his head, "Trucy and Machi are at school." He pointed to the chairs behind him. "Our mom, Thalassa Gramarye, is here with me, and my dad. My brother Luke is here too, but I don't think you've met him."

Vera thought a moment, then shook her head.

"That's okay." Apollo gave her a bright grin. "I'll introduce you to him later. Thing is, he's the only one of us who has a car, and we figured you'd prefer a direct drive back to your home instead of having to take public transport. Less walking out in the open, less crowds..." He shrugged. "Sound good?"

Vera considered the offer for a long moment. "That is..." She gave Apollo a smile. "Very kind of you."

Ema interrupted the conversation, placing a hand on the younger woman's arm. "Vera, we just need to fill out a few forms, then you can get out of here. Okay?"

Vera was glad to have Apollo and Ema at her sides as she filled out the final pieces of paperwork discharging her from the hospital and allowing her to go home. She felt more secure, better able to pretend the room wasn't quite so big and there weren't quite so many people in it. When they turned to leave, she again kept her eyes on the floor, focussed on following Ema's black heels and Apollo's white boots. She was so busy trying not to think about the scarly open world beyond the hospital doors that she almost didn't notice when her two escorts stopped, two further pairs of feet (and one floor-length white skirt) entering her field of vision.

"Are you ready to face the outside world, Vera?"

Vera looked up. The person who had spoken, the owner of the white skirt, was indeed Thalassa. Nearby, the owner of the bare feet and sandals proved to be Phoenix. Between them both was a young man around her or Apollo's age, an oval face sandwiched between a blue paperboy cap and a pointed goatee. Like Thalassa and Phoenix, he showed Vera a smile. It didn't take much thought to realise he must be the brother Apollo mentioned earlier, and even so, given the company he was keeping, Vera decided she could trust him.

Phoenix gestured behind him, to where Vera noticed the glass doors of the hospital's entrance were. "Well, it's pretty quiet right now, and Luke's parked not far away. Even so, I'm sure he'd be happy to drive a bit closer if you're still nervous."

It was only then Vera realised she'd been so distracted studying Luke that Phoenix had spoken up to break the silence. Embarrassed, she returned her eyes to the floor, hugging her sketchbook. "Thank you... for going to so much trouble for me."

"It's no trouble, Miss Misham." Luke tipped his cap. "We're happy to help!"

Vera thought a moment, managing a small smile of her own. "I think... I would like to try the longer walk. I... need practise... being out in public."

"Of course." Luke stepped aside, holding an arm out towards the entrance. "Shall we go? I'll show you the way." He turned and headed to the glass doors, which slid open as he approached, and stood in the opening, waiting and watching for Vera to join him.

Apollo placed his free hand on Vera's arm. "Just let us know if you're having any trouble, okay?"

Vera nodded. Holding her sketchbook tight, she gathered together all her courage and forced her feet forward.

It was only a short walk to where Luke stood, but the yawning abyss of the world beyond made it feel much longer. The sun was out, casting the street outside in a bright light that took a few moments to adjust to. Vera stood on the edge for a long moment, acutely aware of the roof above her falling away to the endless void of the blue sky. She had studied that sky from behind the safety of her skylight for so long... to lose that protective cover was still a terrifying prospect. But, she had managed to keep her fear in check with her belief in the magic of her lucky charm. She just had to transfer that absolute trust to herself. Taking a deep breath, Vera put on a determined expression (her best imitation of how Apollo had looked in court while fighting on her behalf), and stepped out onto the pavement.

"This way, miss."

Luke had appeared so promptly at her side, Vera nearly jumped, but managed to restrain herself. She kept her feet moving one in front of the other mostly out of shock, but at least was now able to direct them to follow the young man in blue down the path alongside the road. 'I can do this. I can do this. I can do this.' It was less of a surprise when Vera noticed Apollo catching up to her, and she was glad for the reminder she wasn't alone. A part of her couldn't help imagining that, any second now, something would swoop down on her from the infinity above and carry her away, and she would be helpless to stop it.

Luke stepped off the path and onto the road, keys jangling in his hand. In nearly the same instant, the lights of the blue car he was standing next to flashed twice, and this time Vera did jump.

Apollo smiled, resting a hand on Vera's arm. "Don't worry, that's Luke's car. He just unlocked it so we can get in."

Luke paused, looking back at them. "Oh, sorry." He stepped back up onto the pavement, then pulled open the nearest door, leading to the passenger side of the front of the car. "You can sit here next to me, Vera. This seat gives you the most room to yourself."

Vera nodded. She only hesitantly moved forward, torn between the lingering fear of being out in the open and the usual terror of a place she'd never been before. It wasn't the first time she'd been in a car, of course: The police had shuffled her between her house, the detention centre, and the courthouse in their cars, though she'd always sat in the back, separated from anyone else by a black grill. She only dimly remembered riding in cars in her childhood, before her mother left... and certainly not enough to be able to draw on the memories for reference now. As she settled into Luke's, relieved for the feeling of a roof above her head again, she took the opportunity to quickly look around. There was no barrier at all between front and back, save the seats themselves, though she hadn't seen enough of the dashboard before to be able to compare what she saw there. The door next to her slammed closed, making her jolt in her seat, and was followed by the door behind her jerking open.

"You comfortable, Vera?" Apollo asked, slipping into the back seat. He shot Vera a grin as he shuffled into the exact middle of the cushions, dragging the bag of DVDs along the floor in front of him.

Vera nodded. "Yes... Thank you."

The other doors all opened as the rest of the group settled into the small car. Thalassa settled in the seat behind Vera's, while Phoenix pulled in on Apollo's other side with the second bag. Next to Vera, Luke slid into the driver's seat, the last to pull his door closed behind him. "Is everyone strapped in?"

There was a chorus of clicks behind her. When Vera turned to look, all she noticed was the three people in the back seat shifting around each other and getting comfortable, grey straps across their torsos and waists. Apollo laughed, gesturing at Luke with a "You're not."

Luke rolled his eyes with a smile, then reached behind him, pulling a grey strap down across his front and clicking the attached buckle into the corner of his seat. "There." He looked over to Vera, smile fading. "Oh, you need to strap in too, Vera. If the worst happens, I'd hate for you to go flying."

Vera wasn't sure exactly what he meant, but there was enough of an implication that she realised this 'strap' was a protective measure. Suddenly she retroactively felt even more fear of her time in the police cars, where she had spent the entire trip clinging to the seat every time they turned a corner. Maybe that time spent keeping herself from sliding back and forth was what Luke meant by 'go flying'. It didn't take too much searching for her to find the strap in question, hanging just behind her seat with the buckle prominent by her head; Whether or not dim memories from long ago aided her, she couldn't say. She twisted around to grab it, but found the buckle and strap didn't move all that easily, and no amount of tugging would stretch it far enough to cover her seat the way Luke's did.

Thalassa leaned forward from behind, gently taking the buckle from Vera's hand. "You must be gentle. If you pull too quickly, the mechanism thinks you are being thrown from your seat, and locks up to protect you." Sure enough, she pulled the strap forward as far as she could reach from the back seat, the strap easily loosening in her hand. "Here. Try again."

Vera took back the offered buckle. With a steady hand, this time she was able to pull the buckle down to the opposite corner of her seat, where she found the clip to hold the strap in place with a click.

"There you go," Thalassa said, a smile in her tone.

Luke grinned, then reached under the wheel. With a soft hum, the engine started up, the dashboard around Luke lighting up with all sorts of displays Vera couldn't comprehend. Before long, they were pulling out onto the road. Luke shot her a friendly look as he joined the city traffic. "Let's get you home, Vera."
When the car pulled up by the side of the road, Vera wasn't sure if she found the area familiar or not. There was a house out her window, a single-floor with a large skylight in the roof and a public bench on the path out front. She turned, and out Luke's window glimpsed the tops of trees behind a tall orange wall made of brick.

Luke smiled as he shut off the car's engine. "Welcome home, Vera."

Vera blinked, then turned to look at the house again. That was home? It had been so long since she'd seen the outside of the studio - she hadn't looked behind her when the police took her away, and not left it beforehand for a number of years now - she didn't feel any recognition for the building in front of her.

There was a chorus of clicks, then the doors all opened as the members of the Gramarye-Wright family left the car. Thalassa, having been directly behind Vera, was the first to reach the young woman's door, pulling it open with a gentle smile. "Are you ready? It's not too far from here."

Vera thought a long moment, then nodded. She moved to stand, only to be stymied by the seatbelt pressing against her chest and hips. It took her a moment to wrestle with the buckle, and she couldn't help jumping a little at the suddenness with which the strap recoiled back to its position behind her seat. Free of the restraint, she took Thalassa's offered hand and stepped out into the open.

There were less buildings and traffic, but Vera felt no difference compared to the parking lot outside the hospital: The sky was still an endless expanse of nothing hanging over her head, and the street's complete lack of comforting walls only made her feel exposed. Vera hugged her sketchbook tight, keeping a firm grip on Thalassa's hand. 'I can do this. I can do this.' With the older woman's comforting guidance, and the three Wright men all in sight around her, Vera was able to keep herself moving long enough to reach the front door, the bright red mailbox at its side cheerfully announcing hers was house number 57.

Apollo moved to the door and jiggled the handle. "Locked." He turned to Vera with a sheepish grin. "You have keys, right?"

Vera nodded.

"Good." Apollo sighed in relief and stepped back.

Releasing Thalassa's hand, Vera moved forward to the door, reaching into the pocket of her overalls. It didn't take long to fish out the house key attached to its cute puffball key-chain (an item she chose as a child, never thinking she would use it for anything other than play), and she didn't hesitate in using the key to open the door and rush through into the room beyond.

She was home.

Vera nearly collapsed out of sheer relief as the familiarity of the room enveloped her, though she settled for lowering herself into the stool at the nearby table. The studio looked exactly the way she remembered it... almost. The three paintings she'd been working on (all copies, she admitted) were gone from their easels, and the gap behind the drawers next to the door was similarly empty (not that she minded, now she knew the painting her father had shoved there was stolen from its owner). There was also a conspicuous gap on the floor at her feet where she'd last seen her father's body, the spot where he had died and lain so still before the ambulance arrived to take him away. Looking over her father's workstation at the back of the room, hidden in the shadow of the natural light from the window above, she noticed everything there looked off, as if someone had meticulously picked everything up and then put it back in only a slightly different position. On closer inspection, Vera was pretty sure someone had cleared the layer of dust off everything too. Maybe that was why it looked so wrong.

The Gramarye-Wrights filed into the room behind Vera, Phoenix gently closing the door at his back. Apollo was the first to venture forward, gesturing to the empty easels. "Aw, they took your paintings."

Vera nodded. "Yes. I suppose... because they were copies."

"She has a point." Luke joined his brother. "The police wouldn't allow forgeries to be left in private hands." He turned to Vera with a sad look. "It's a shame your drawings underneath are gone, though."

Vera had to think a long moment before she realised what Luke was referring to, and she smiled. "Those were Father's. He liked to sketch on the canvas... and I would paint something else on top." The smile faded. "He was going to sell them anyway. I have other things he made."

Luke thought a moment, then nodded. At his side, Apollo frowned to himself, then pulled out his tablet computer and busied himself tapping away at the screen.

Phoenix stepped forward, hands in the front pocket of his hoodie. "So, what are you planning to do now? Your father handled the business side of things. Will you be okay taking that up? Carrying on as just an illustrator?"

Vera sat in silence for half a minute, thinking over her answer carefully. "I want to keep painting. Originals only, of course. It will be hard to get used to... but I think I can do it." She turned her eyes to the skylight, to the distant blueness that didn't feel nearly as big when viewed through the glass. "I suppose I'll have to see a bit of the world outside to find what to paint... but I know there are good people out there now." She looked down, her eyes moving across the four guests of her house with a smile. "I've met them."

Phoenix and Thalassa gave the young woman warm smiles of their own. Apollo sheepishly bounced his computer in his hands, staring at the screen and fighting to hide his bright crimson cheeks.

Luke giggled, glancing at his brother. "Well, we'll all be happy to help you any way we can."

"Indeed." Thalassa moved over to the other chair at the table, opposite from Vera's stool. "And if you want a friend to paint with when you go out... I've been thinking of taking up painting myself. If you don't mind a beginner tagging along, of course. Oh," she turned to Phoenix, "and you are quite an artist yourself, aren't you, Phoenix? Maybe you could join us too."

Phoenix blushed, running a hand through his hair with a nervous grin. "Um, not with paints, I'm afraid. My art's... more of a hobby these days."

Apollo snorted, hiding a smirk as he returned his tablet to the pouch on his hip. "You studied art at college, Dad."
"Yeah, but that was a long time ago." Phoenix shrugged. "I mean, if you want me to, Vera, I'll tag along with a pencil and spare notebook. Only if you want me to, though."

Vera smiled, nearly laughing at the man's embarrassment. "That would be very nice. Thank you. I would love for you both to join me."

"Then it's settled." Thalassa shot Phoenix a grin, the latter sighing with a bashful smile. "We shall have to organise some art outings later. For now though, more important are your daily necessities." She turned a concerned frown to Vera. "Did your father go out shopping, or did he have everything delivered?"

Vera thought a moment. "He went out. Every two weeks."

Apollo raised an eyebrow. "Really? It's super easy to have it delivered."

"Online it is," Luke pointed out. "Mister Misham didn't trust modern technology, right? That's why he conducted all his business through the mail. He probably didn't even have a website set up."

Humming in thought, Apollo crossed his arms. "True."

Vera shook her head. "Father never liked anything to do with the computer. When I was young, Mother taught me how to go online to find art, and tutorial videos." She looked to the floor. "After she left, Father wouldn't let me use the computer very much anymore."

Apollo gave her a sympathetic look. "That's a shame."

"Well, I'm not the best with tech myself, but you can't run a business nowadays without some kind of online presence." Phoenix scoffed. "However he managed for so long without that, I'll never know..."

Thalassa chuckled, shaking her head. "We'll sort it out." She looked to Vera. "Where is your computer?"

Vera placed her sketchbook on the table, next to the cup and saucer she had left there on the night her father died, then got to her feet and crossed the room. Just as she'd left it, the old computer still sat in the corner next to her father's equipment. She pointed it out to the Gramarye-Wrights, waiting for the quartet to follow her. "Father rarely even turned it on. I always had to beg to use it for reference photos... or to learn how to design with it."

"Design?" Luke gave the computer a thoughtful frown, examining the LCD monitor and wireless mouse. "It has an art program, then?"

"Sort of. I used it to design our business cards." Vera remembered well how she had struggled with the simple images of the program she only knew as 'Publisher', using the templates it provided to make something pretty to bear her name. Not that she'd ever had a use for the cards until the day Apollo came to visit her in the detention centre. It was a good thing in retrospect she'd always kept one on her, just in case.

Apollo stepped forward to take a look himself, quickly locating the computer tower under the desk. He crouched to turn it on, then popped up and shot Phoenix a grin. "Y'know, despite the newer-looking stuff on top, I think this thing's actually even older than yours, Dad."

Phoenix rolled his eyes. "Ha ha."

Luke joined his brother. "I wonder what kind of operating system it has." He frowned at the monitor as it came to life, the start-up screen on its display. "Is that Vista!?" He slipped into the nearby office chair and grabbed the mouse to click the lone user icon on-screen. He was visibly shocked when the system immediately began logging in. "And no password!?"

Apollo chuckled, leaning over his brother's shoulder. "Shouldn't be surprised, really. He probably figured there was nothing worth protecting, if he so rarely used it."

"You'll need to update this computer, Vera," Luke muttered in the young woman's direction, eyes locked on the monitor. "Vista hasn't been supported for a very long time now, so it's vulnerable to all sorts of malware. I doubt it was still supported at the time your father bought this, assuming that was when he got all the peripherals too." He gestured between the keyboard, monitor and mouse.

Vera thought a long moment, unsure how to respond. She didn't know anything about the history of the computer, nor did she understand half the words that had just come out of Luke's mouth.

"One thing at a time." Thalassa stepped forward, standing at Vera's side and watching the young woman with a smile. "Why don't we get your necessities sorted out first, then we can let these two loose on the technical things." She leaned in close. "To tell the truth, I'm not too good with all this, either. We were always behind the times in the troupe anyway, and once I left, I soon discovered there aren't many who think to make websites accessible to the blind."

Apollo and Luke froze, eyes wide.

Phoenix laughed. "Very true. I don't think accessibility for the blind ever came up for the Agency's website, did it, boys?"

"N-no, it didn't," Apollo admitted, the brothers sharing an embarrassed look.

Thalassa giggled, holding her hand to her mouth. "Ensure that it is, and you can consider yourselves forgiven."

Vera had no idea what they were talking about, but didn't mind so much this time. She simply smiled, enjoying the company of the good people who had become her friends.

_The door is open. The world is waiting._

_Thank you._
Thalassa felt much more confident this time as she strode into the small, dark chamber with her three children and Maya. She had discussed this day with Maya on and off throughout the week, over texts more than in person, and had a concrete plan she had formulated in her alone time for what to do and say in any event. Finally, the day to execute them had come.

Just as she had the previous week, Maya knelt down on the rug in front of the altar at the back of the room, and Thalassa settled down in front of her. Unlike last time, Thalassa's three children didn't wait in the shadows around the door, instead stepping forward to join her from the beginning: Trucy sat on Thalassa's left, and Machi next to her, holding his sister's hand tight between them. Behind the two teens, Apollo settled at an angle to everyone else, a wary eye constantly on his younger siblings. Thalassa worried he was being a touch over-protective, considering who they were meeting today... but, then again, it had been at least seven years since any of them had seen the man Maya was preparing to channel. Just as Thalassa had changed in that time, so undoubtedly had Zak.

Just in case, Thalassa reached over and placed a hand on Trucy's knee.

With their eyes down-turned, none of the Gramaryes saw Maya press her hands together, or the magatama hanging around her neck beginning to glow.

Thalassa wondered as she waited, how Zak would react to what they were going to tell him. She knew how he had died; Would Zak assume when he woke that he'd just been knocked unconscious from that killing blow to the head? He'd always been very hard to convince of anything once his mind was made up. She hoped on this occasion he'd be willing to listen before doing that.

"Thalassa...?"

Hearing her name, Thalassa looked up, her children quickly following her cue. Although initially thrown by Maya's ill-fitting robes and hair, she couldn't deny the aged face looking back at her was one she knew very well. She smiled. "Zak."

Zak's shock at seeing his wife melted only a little to return the smile, then his concerned gaze moved left. "And Trucy..."

Trucy nodded, blinking rapidly and biting her lip in her efforts to keep from crying. At her side, Machi gripped her hand tighter, and Apollo watched over her from behind, casting wary glances at Zak.

Thalassa tightened her grip on her daughter's knee, keeping her eyes on her husband. "I'm sure this must be quite a shock. The last thing you'd remember is someone hitting you over the head with a bottle... Is that right?"

Zak frowned. "Yes, exactly that." Finally, he turned his attention to the room, looking all around at the candle-covered shelves and the shadows that hid the door. "Where are...?" His eyes moved to Trucy's brothers, passing over Machi and nearly doing the same to Apollo before he double-taked, a suspicious look focussed on the young man.
Apollo narrowed his eyes in return, minutely inching closer to his sister.

"You're dead, Daddy."

All eyes turned to Trucy, the teen staring up at her father with tears beginning to drip down her cheeks.

"You died, in the basement of the Borscht Bowl Club. Six months ago. But it's okay." She began to sniff, smiling despite her tears. "Daddy Phoenix an-, and Polly made sure Mister Gavin went to jail... and I got those performance rights, or whatever, that you were keeping safe..." Trucy's tears became only more prevalent as she spoke, overwhelming her words despite her attempts to wipe them away with her free hand.

Machi was quite alarmed. "Trucy!" He jumped closer to the girl, hugging her tightly. "It's okay! No need cry, okay?"

Apollo similarly moved right up against his sister's back, placing his hand on her shoulder with nothing more than a sympathetic look at the back of her ear.

Zak watched his daughter with no small amount of confusion, glancing only briefly at his brothers. "What do you mean?" He paused, then looked down at his hand, his attention caught by the twine bracelet wrapped tightly around his wrist. His gaze moved from there to the white fabric in his lap, then up to the obi and Maya's purple haori that topped the outfit off. He tapped curiously at the magatama on her necklace. "What is this... overly tight dress I've been put in?" He only then seemed to notice the hair, picking at the black tails tied at their ends with purple beads. "What...?!"

"It just like Trucy said," Thalassa explained, keeping a hand on her daughter's knee. "You died six months ago. A dear friend of ours, Maya... She summoned you back for a little while, so we could have the chance to say goodbye." Zak was watching her with wide eyes, and Thalassa saw only confusion in his face. "The hair, the robes... Those are Maya's. I'm sorry if they're tight, but she does have a much smaller frame than you."

Zak frowned, considering her explanation for a long moment. Finally, he turned his gaze back to Trucy, still sniffing and wiping her eyes while huddled in the ring of support given by her brothers. Judging by the sad look in Zak's eyes, Thalassa was pretty sure he believed them now. "Trucy, I am sorry."

Seeing the man's attention back on them, Machi released his sister from the hug, face red.

Trucy smiled despite her tears, clinging to Machi's arm so he couldn't go too far. "It's okay, Daddy. You didn't want to put me in danger. I understand." She briefly looked over her shoulder to meet Apollo's eyes, then fixed her father with a much brighter grin. "We have a lot to catch up on. Mommy and me need to introduce you to my brothers!"

Zak's gaze flicked over the pair, Apollo still wary and Machi embarrassed. "Your... brothers."

"Well, two of them." Trucy huffed. "There's Luke too, but I guess I forgot to ask him to come in with us."

"C'mon, Gramaryes only, remember?" Apollo muttered, a smirk on his lips.

Trucy snorted despite herself. "Still should've asked him in."

Thalassa decided to take charge, lifting her hand from Trucy's knee to gesture in the direction of her youngest. "This is Machi. He's Trucy's age. I adopted him while I was... away."
"Ah, I see." Zak gave the bashful boy a grin. "My guess was you were a boyfriend... but you seem a fine brother for my little girl."

Machi's face only got redder. "Th-thank you."

Trucy giggled proudly, and finally released her younger brother's arm. Machi didn't seem to notice, trying to hide his face in Trucy's cape, where it bundled at her shoulder.

Her grin growing, Thalassa moved her hand behind Trucy to point it at her eldest. "And this is Apollo. We only recently reconnected, but..." She bit her lip, wondering how best to describe him.

"He is the child you had with Hyperion," Zak filled in, watching the wary Apollo with an unreadable expression. "I didn't want to believe it at first, but... that ex-lawyer wasn't lying. About either of you." He turned to Thalassa with a small smile. "Just as he said... you are alive."

Thalassa smiled back, and was about to open her mouth to respond when she heard a quiet grumbling from her eldest son. Pausing, she directed a glare at the young man. "Apollo, did you have something you wanted to say?"

To his credit, Apollo had the decency to look ashamed as all eyes turned to him. "N-no, Mom," he mumbled, arms tightly crossed. "Well, nothing nice, anyway..."

Trucy pursed her lips with a glare, and sharply jabbed an elbow behind her, right into Apollo's side. "Ow!" Apollo leapt back, a hand where she had poked his ribs. "What was that for!?"

"Be nice, Polly!" Trucy ordered, unfolding her legs so she could spin around to face her eldest brother. "You promised you'd behave!"

"And I am." Apollo scoffed, jabbing a finger into his sister's chest. "I didn't say anything, did I?"

Trucy glared, then lifted a gloved hand and poked Apollo's chest right back. Apollo's eyes narrowed, a hand lifting to return the attack.

"Alright, that's enough." Thalassa lifted a hand towards the pair, who luckily quit their battle to look up at their mother with wide eyes. "Bickering is one thing, but I won't have you two trying to kill each other."

Apollo and Trucy sheepishly backed down, turning away from each other. Trucy muttered, "Sorry, Mommy."

Thalassa sighed, returning her gaze to the baffled Zak. "They were doing this for my father too. I think it's a sibling thing: They're too similar for their own good."

Said children looked back at her with disbelieving looks. "No we're not," they said in unison, before jerking their heads back towards each other with confused glares.

Zak raised an eyebrow. "So they are."

Trucy scoffed. "Come on, Daddy. The whole reason we're good partners on stage is because we're different!" She jerked a thumb at the young man behind her. "Polly's stuck-up and loves rules and stuff-"

"Hey, objection!"
"- and I'm fun and bubbly!" Trucy grinned, ignoring her brother's pouting. "Our adorable banter is what makes us stand out from the crowd!"

Apollo rolled his eyes. "And our magic, Truce?"

Trucy paused, surprised. "Oh, um..." She resumed her grin. "Once we get in a bit of practise with Grandpa Magnifi's magic, and work our way into the public eye a little more, naturally we'll become better known as his inheritance!"

"Inheritors," Apollo corrected. "And you're his inheritor, remember? Not me." He cast a quick glance at Zak, but made no move to further acknowledge the man.

Zak hummed in thought, and moved to rub his chin. He was a bit thrown to find no beard, but quickly brushed it off, keeping his gaze on Apollo. "You are a magician too? I was told you were an attorney."

Apollo nodded, opening his mouth to speak.

"He is!" Trucy giggled. "Polly does lawyering on the side, but mostly we're both magicians! He defended Daddy when the police thought he'd killed you, and Machi when everyone thought he'd killed Mommy's manager!"

Machi turned red again, biting his lip.

Apollo glared at his sister. "He was asking me."

Trucy turned her head towards him and stuck out her tongue with a smile.

Zak raised an eyebrow. "I see."
Thalassa chuckled. "Maybe it's time I explained what I've been doing the last ten years."

"Indeed." Zak frowned. "You died. One of us shot you. How can you be here, without the same aids I am restricted to?"

Thalassa almost winced. "I... did die, in a way. Though I was still alive, I was not myself." She sighed. "That bullet hit me in the head. I lost my memories, and I lost my sight. My father sent me away, thinking I was on my deathbed... but, against all odds, I recovered... almost." She closed her eyes, thinking back to her earliest memories after the ill-fated accident. "I didn't remember anything about my life before, so the decision was made to give me a a new one. I became a singer in Borgia." She looked up, smiling at Machi. "I met a very talented young pianist while I was there. And I took him in as my own."

Machi blushed. Trucy giggled, pulling him into a hug, while Apollo shot the boy a proud smile similar to his mother's.

Thalassa returned her gaze to Zak, smile fading. "It wasn't until after your death I came back to America, and only by pure coincidence that, on that same trip, I happened to bump into Apollo and Trucy." The warm look returned as she looked to her biological son and daughter. "Because of that chance meeting, I was able to restore not only my memories, but my sight... and finally reunited with my family." The smile died, her eyes drifting to the floor. "Or what was left of it."

Zak frowned, his thoughts flickering across his face. Finally, he leaned forward and rested a hand on Thalassa's cheek, lifting her head to face his. She saw dark eyes wet with threatening tears, and was too surprised to do anything before he began to speak: "Thalassa, it pains me to think you were just hidden from view all this time... but I couldn't be happier to have been mistaken of your death." He smiled that funny sort of half-smile Thalassa always found so charming, pulling upwards one corner of his mouth while leaving the other. "And who could I trust more to watch over our daughter in my absence?"

Thalassa laughed, placing one of her hands on his. "Zak... I appreciate the thought." She returned her eyes to her children: While Trucy was watching her father with an expression both sad and happy, and Machi was sitting back and simply watching, Apollo was glaring daggers at the man... and Thalassa knew why. "I will certainly be watching over them as any parent would... and as Phoenix and Maya are, too."

Zak raised an eyebrow. "Who?"

Apollo scoffed.

"Daddy Phoenix and Mommy Maya," Trucy decided to explain, giving her father a sheepish look. "Mommy Maya's the one channelling you, remember? And she's engaged to Daddy Phoenix."

"And don't you dare say you don't know who 'Phoenix' is," Apollo snapped. "You dumped Trucy on his doorstep when you left."
Trucy spun around to shoot her brother a glare. "It wasn't like that!"

"Apollo," Thalassa hissed in warning.

Zak sighed, removing his hand from his wife's cheek as he leaned back. "So I did. It is for the same reasons then, that both you and he have such resentment towards me."

Apollo nodded, still giving the man a death glare. "Call it growing up without one... but real family doesn't abandon each other. Especially not over a ridiculous contract dispute."

Thalassa's disapproving frown deepened. "Apollo, that's enough."

Trucy lowered her face, a hand clutching at the brooch on her cape.

"If you really cared, you'd have told Dad, you'd have told the police what was going on from the start." Apollo leaned forward on one hand, the other curled into a fist. "Dad wouldn't have lost his badge - his entire career - and you would have been found 'not guilty' no problem. There certainly would have been no reason for that forgery of Kristoph Gavin's to ever see the light of day, not with those performance rights standing as listed evidence."

"Apollo...!"

"So you say." Zak rested his hands in his lap, studying Apollo with a stern look. "That is what you would have done in my position? Lay out in the open all your darkest secrets, and condemn your closest friend to death?"

Apollo looked confused for a moment, then sighed. "If Valant found himself the lone suspect, that was his own fault for altering the scene of the crime. Besides, he would've been quick to admit what really happened when put under pressure, and neither of you would be charged with murder."

Thalassa gave up her protests, pressing a hand to her face. Apollo may have inherited her stubbornness, but Zak had plenty of his own to counter it.

"You still would have risked that he wouldn't?" Zak's eyes narrowed. "Allow someone you love to be falsely accused, all the while indirectly admitting your guilt of a different crime?"

Apollo said his next three words very deliberately: "Yes. I. Would. It's called 'facing justice'... but I guess you've never heard of that."

"Polly, please stop."

Apollo paused, his and Zak's gazes moving to the girl in surprise. "Truce?"

Trucy looked up at her brother with tearful eyes. "What's the point in being upset about what happened seven years ago? Have you even thought about what else would be different as a result?"

"I dunno, Dad would still be a lawyer?" Apollo shrugged as he spoke, looking puzzled. "You wouldn't have been abandoned, either."

"No, Daddy Phoenix would never have adopted me," Trucy agreed. "He'd never have done all that research into my family and found out about Mommy and her bracelets, either. And because of that, when Luke's parents disappeared, he wouldn't have adopted you."

Apollo winced a little, rubbing the bracelet on his left wrist. "Y-yeah... but I'd've been fine in the end anyway."
"But we never would have met," Trucy insisted. "I never would've even known you existed. And, without Daddy and you doing all that investigating of Kristoph Gavin, he probably would've killed both Vera and her daddy and gotten away with it. And Prosecutor Gavin wouldn't have been interested in us to invite us to his concert, so no-one would have been there to protect Machi when that detective killed Mister LeTouse."

Machi blushed again, picking at the sleeves of his shirt.

"Neither of us would have ever found Mommy, and she'd still be blind and amnesiac." Trucy sighed, staring into Apollo's eyes with a pleading look. "Yeah, it really sucked when Grandpa Magnifi died, and Daddy had to go away, and then my new Daddy had lost his job... but the past seven years have been really awesome, because I had you, and Luke, and Daddy. We made the best of some really bad situations together." Her voice cracked, tears spilling from her eyes. "And I'll take those bad situations, because they gave me the most awesome family I could have ever asked for... and things are only getting better now Daddy's name has been cleared, even if he won't get his badge back..."

Apollo immediately pulled his sister into a hug. "Truce, I'm so sorry," Apollo whispered into her ear. "I'll stop talking about it. You're right, I'd have to be insane to give up our family the way it is... even though we had to live through so many awful things first to get it." His eyes glanced sidewards, where Machi was perched on his knees and fingertips, ready to comfort his sister at a moment's notice. Apollo smiled, then held out an arm and pulled the boy into the hug. "And that includes you, kiddo."

Trucy giggled as she also grabbed her younger brother, cementing him in their circle. Machi grinned, resting his forehead against his sister's.

Thalassa couldn't help a warm smile at the sight of her children being so close, and the proof that, when it really mattered, they could always count on each other as support. It was only the touch of a hand on hers that distracted her from it, and she turned to see Zak's eyes on her. Much like Apollo, his anger had calmed at Trucy's words, replaced with a concern that Zak was stubbornly trying to hide behind a tight-lipped frown. Although it pained her to think it, she had never seen her husband so reluctant to display his emotions to her; The decade they had been apart had not changed him for the better.

"Thalassa," Zak whispered. "They are good children."

Thalassa almost laughed. 'That, they are.'

"I'm sorry I can't be around to help... but I know you will look after them." Finally, Zak allowed himself a small smile. "You've already done such a good job."

Thalassa screwed up her mouth in disapproval. "I didn't really have much to do with that. Just as you haven't."

Zak winced, and moved his hand away, but Thalassa reached out and grabbed it, holding his fingers firmly in hers.

"But they are good children. I will always be here for them in future, and on your behalf." She gave her husband a teasing smile. "And I'll pass on your words to Phoenix and Maya. They deserve the praise for raising them so well."

Zak blushed and looked away. Thalassa couldn't help but laugh at the undisguised embarrassment at owing Phoenix so much, especially given their history.
"Oh, speaking of Daddy!" Trucy threw off her brothers, reaching into the pouch on Apollo's waist and pulling out his Court Record. Apollo shot her an annoyed glare for all of half a second before letting his irritation go with a sigh. "We need to tell you, Daddy, what we've been doing and everything!" Trucy attempted to turn on her brother's computer, only to be instantly stumped at the log-in screen that popped up, staring at it with a frown. Apollo, watching with a smile, gently took the item and quickly tapped away at the screen, handing back the unlocked device without a word. Trucy grinned, cried "Thanks, Polly!", then scurried closer to the curious Zak. "C'mon Daddy, I'll show you...!"

Thalassa was glad to say, after that initial blow-up, there were no more tears or raised voices in their final goodbyes to Zak.
"Do you have any threes?"

"Go fish."

Phoenix watched as Pearl reached for the pile of cards on the floor, exactly between her and Luke. They'd only just started their latest game, the third since the doors to the Channelling Chamber closed an hour ago, so neither had earned a 'win' of collecting all four of a number yet. As for their previous games, Luke had won one and Pearl the other, so this one, they'd told Phoenix, would be the tie-breaker.

Luke studied his hand of cards with an intense frown. "Any jacks?"

Pearl pouted, and handed over a card from her hand.

Unlike the younger pair sitting on the floor, Phoenix was perched on the cubby-holes that housed their shoes, leaning against the wall. Normally he would stand, or just sit on the floor himself, but today he was particularly tired, so standing wasn't an option... and he wasn't physically capable of sitting on the floor right now. He'd had a series of particularly quiet nights at work, and hunching over the piano all night in that freezing cold restaurant wasn't doing wonders for his back. It had never really bothered him before - he'd reasoned he was still young and the ache always went away eventually - but it was getting to the point he might have to admit he had a problem. 'I guess I am in my thirties now. Not exactly a 'young man' anymore... And at least the lingering pain is distracting me from worrying about the others.'

"What about tens?"

Pearl grinned and shook her head. "Go fish."

Luke made a noise of mock disgust, and grabbed a card from the pile with a smirk.

Phoenix smiled. 'Them, too. They're a good distraction from the worrying and the pain.' Not that he wanted to inadvertently start down that spiralling path of fear again this week; The mere fact that they'd been in that room so long was enough of an indicator that the channelling was successful. Despite who said channelling was summoning, Phoenix was certain he could trust Thalassa and Apollo to keep themselves and young Trucy and Machi safe. 'Besides, if Zak had started a physical fight, we'd've heard it by now. Even through those doors.'

The click of the door unlocking echoed around the room, instantly alerting the three occupants. Luke and Pearl waited until they saw the door moving, then dumped their cards on the floor and scrambled to their feet. Phoenix hurriedly copied them, biting his lip to keep from groaning in pain.

Maya pushed the doors wide open, shooting the three outside it a grin before stepping aside. Behind her, Trucy stepped out first, wiping her eyes. She paused in the doorway, looking up at Luke. Giving her brother a tired smile, she walked forward to meet him and wrapped her arms around Luke's chest, pressing her face into his shoulder.
"Love you, Luke."

Although surprised, Luke made sure to return the gesture, resting his hands on his sister's shoulders. "I love you too, Trucy."

Phoenix stepped forward to join the pair, concerned for his only daughter. He looked up to see Machi and Apollo leaving the Chamber hand-in-hand, Thalassa at their back, and cast a worried glance over the solemn group. "Did everything go okay in there?"

Apollo nodded, forcing a smile. "Yep. Had a nice, long talk with him. Seven-to-ten years of catching up."

Trucy lifted her head from Luke's shoulder to look up at Phoenix, then reached out with one arm to pull him into the hug, now burying her face in her father's chest. "I love you too, Daddy."

Phoenix rested a hand on the girl's arm, near where she had just shrugged off one of Luke's. "And I love you. That's never gonna change."

"Good." Despite the shortness of her statement, Trucy sounded more tired than anything else, hugging her brother and father even tighter.

Machi dashed forward to his sister's side, pulling the equally concerned Apollo along with him. The boy was quick to attach himself to the girl, standing as close as he could and pressing an arm along her back. "We here for you, Trucy." He'd ended up on the same side as Luke, who smiled and moved his own arm to include the teen in the circle. Machi grinned, throwing an arm around Luke in return, though he kept his attention on their sister. "I love you too."

Trucy giggled, looking up from Phoenix's chest and moving her grip on Luke to Machi. "Same for you, baby brother." She turned the other way to shoot a grin at Apollo. "And for you too, Polly." She held out the arm that had previously been curled behind Phoenix, beckoning her eldest brother closer.

Apollo ran a hand through his hair, scratching at the top of his head. "You... already know how much I love you, Truce. Is there really a need to say-"

Phoenix laughed, grabbing the young man to pull him into the circle. "Join the hug, Apollo."

Pearl grinned to herself as she tidied the abandoned deck of cards off the floor, then hurried off to leave the laughing circle of the Wright family alone.

Still standing by the Channelling Chamber's doors, Thalassa leaned close to Maya. "If you feel well enough today for another channelling... I feel only Apollo and I should be present next time."

Maya turned to Thalassa in surprise, though kept her voice low to match the older woman's. "You've decided to try Apollo's father?" She glanced at the young man, still blushing red as he endured the teases of his siblings and father. "I mean, it makes sense to have the younger ones sit it out. Trucy especially needs a break."

Thalassa nodded. "I have given it a great deal of thought this past week. I don't want to force on you any undue pressure, but as long as there is even the slightest chance I may see Jove one more time, I must take it." She paused. "Even if the channelling fails... I will be content with having tried."

Maya considered this for a few moments, then smiled and patted Thalassa's arm. "I heard once that the first step to success is trying. If nothing else, we can at least do that."
The day progressed very quietly in Fey Manor. Not wanting to bother Trucy by asking how the meeting with Zak went, the extended Wright family settled in the living room, playing Pearl's board games and chatting about unrelated things over Machi's occasional tinkering at the piano. When it came time for lunch, Iris arrived to join them in the kitchen, helping make food and promising to stick around a while when Machi and Pearl all-but-begged her to.

Once the meal was over and the plates were being piled up in the kitchen sink, Trucy threw her arms around Pearl and Machi with a grin and announced, "Last one back to the living room has to wash up later!" The last word was barely out of her mouth before she was already racing out the door into the hallway, cape flapping behind her.

Pearl and Machi shared a stunned look before jumping into action, Pearl shouting, "Trucy, wait!" as they dashed after her.

Luke rolled his eyes. "I'd better 'volunteer' for that before someone's feelings are hurt. Excuse me." He slipped past the rest of the group and followed the younger ones into the hallway.

Maya snorted. "Normally I'd insist they leave it to us, but this is a perfect opportunity to keep a certain something on the down low..." She turned to Iris. "I was hoping you could help me set up the Chamber for another channelling before you run off with the kids."

Iris nodded. "Of course, Mystic Maya."

Apollo frowned, staring intently at Maya. "Wait, you're...?" He glanced over to Thalassa, who nodded, then returned his gaze to Maya. "Why aren't we telling the others?"

Phoenix rubbed his chin with a finger. "I think I can guess." He raised an eyebrow at his fiancée.

Maya stuck her tongue out at Phoenix only briefly, quickly putting on a solemn air as she turned back to Apollo. "Thalassa decided it was best Trucy and Machi didn't accompany you for this one. After the channelling this morning, I thought it would just cause unnecessary grief to tell them about it only to then cut them out of the whole thing."

"You're worried they won't take it well," Phoenix summarised with a smirk.

"Nick!" Maya hissed back at him with a glare.

Apollo mulled over the explanation with a small frown. "That... makes sense."

"When will you be ready?" Thalassa asked.

"It shouldn't take very long at all," Iris replied, smiling. "If you wait in the Meditation Room, we'll be ready for you in no time."

Sure enough, it wasn't long before Iris and Maya were done with the preparations. With Phoenix again perched on the cubby-holes outside, Maya took Thalassa and Apollo into the Channelling Chamber and locked the doors behind her.

Iris sighed in relief; She'd hurried a little getting everything ready, and hoped there were no major blunders. Maya hadn't said anything, at least. Although Iris was a nun, she was more studied in the art of training than in actually channelling. With Hazakura all but shut down, she'd been trying to expand her knowledge, and with Maya about to leave for two years, it looked like Iris was the next in line to assist preparing the Chamber if Pearl was required to use it. She didn't want to let either of them down.

Phoenix jerked his head towards the hall. "If they ask what the rest of us are doing, just tell them we're busy."

Iris had to stare for a moment before she registered what Phoenix was talking about. "Oh, the kids." She frowned. "Why?"

Phoenix shrugged. "Well, we don't want them to know what's going on just yet, right? If you lie, Trucy sees though it instantly and the deception is gone. So, you tell an edited version of the truth that still omits what we're doing." He smirked. "But then you gotta be careful not to give too much information, or you'll tip off Luke. I honestly can't see how better to do it than 'we're busy'."

Iris thought over the advice for a moment before nodding, giving Phoenix a smile. "I'll do that then. Thank you, Feenie."

Phoenix just chuckled as she left the room.

View the Court Record
"It's Jove Justice, isn't it?"

Thalassa nodded. "Yes, that's it."

"Could I see a picture?"

Apollo stumbled forward from where he'd been lingering by the doors, pulling up a photo of his birth father on his Court Record. They hadn't yet started digitising the photos like they had the letters, but he still had a few favourites he'd copied on his own. His hand was shaking, so he didn't bother picking out a particular one of the handful he'd acquired, instead jabbing a finger at the first one he spotted and handing the computer to Maya.

While Maya studied the image on the screen, Thalassa laid a hand on Apollo's leg, highlighting that the young man was still on his feet while the two women were already sat on the floor. She stared up at her son with a concerned frown. "Are you alright, Apollo?"

Apollo nodded, shoving his hands under the belt of his hip-pouch. "I'm fine. I'm fine."

Even Maya was watching him now, raising an eyebrow. "You said that twice."

Apollo stopped himself from repeating the words a third time. "I, um... I'm gonna..." He turned and hurried to the back of the room.

Thalassa jumped to her knees, poised to stand. "Apollo?"

His feet stopped walking, but Apollo found himself shifting from side to side anyway, unable to keep still. "I'm not leaving the room, I just..." He made himself turn back around, facing his two worried mothers. "He doesn't know me. I'll sit back here until-"

"Of course he knows you!" Thalassa sighed, a hand pressed to her chest. "Apollo, you were the apple of his eye!"

"I was a baby." Apollo took a deep breath in a concerted effort not to snap at his biological mother. "If... If this works, and Mom Maya channels him... It won't have been twenty years for him." He pressed a hand to his face. "He'll be fresh off that fire... trying to rescue a baby."

Slowly, Thalassa lowered herself back to the ground, reflecting on Apollo's words.

"He is right." Maya spoke quietly, placing Apollo's computer on the ground at her side. "No time will have passed... He might even think he's still alive."

"He won't expect an adult when I tell him Apollo is here," Thalassa muttered. After a short pause, she looked up to meet her son's eyes with a small smile. "I'll explain what's happened to him... and introduce you."

Apollo managed a weak smile in return. He felt a lot calmer as he settled down on the floor in front of the room's lone exit.

Thalassa turned back to face Maya, the older woman rearranging her dress where it was tangled around her legs; All the moving around had shifted it oddly, and she wanted to look perfect for Jove... even more so given it was her alone he would see when he 'woke'. If this channelling succeeds, of course... but I shouldn't be so negative. That's just asking for this whole thing to fail.

Maya was frowning in sheer determination as she arranged herself into the channelling pose Thalassa knew very well by now. Thalassa hurried with the last of her skirt arrangements, then closed her eyes and bowed her head to await whatever would happen next.

Having witnessed two channellings in just the past week, Thalassa was pretty sure she would be able to pinpoint the moment it either succeeded or failed by the sound of Maya's breathing. Ten years of blindness had trained her how to use her ears to their fullest, and without the distraction of her children at her side, it was much easier to focus on them, locating the deep, calm breaths in front of her. There was no sign of change for a long while, and Thalassa worried the channelling was going to fail after all... until, finally, Maya's breathing hitched. Although the resulting breaths remained about as deep, Thalassa could tell they were slightly faster, maybe a bit panicky, and were slow to calm, shallow to the average level of relaxed breathing. The fabric of Maya's robes jostled, and the beads of her necklace softly clinked together. If Maya wasn't talking... surely that indicated the wearer was examining their surroundings, and possibly even themselves. That, Thalassa knew, could only mean one thing.

Thalassa smiled, and raised her head. "Jove."

Jove jumped, in the middle of picking at Maya's fringe. He grinned nervously, settling back into a neutral position with red cheeks. "Th-Thalassa! Hey..."

Seeing her goofy husband in the midst of noticing, before anything else, his different hairstyle made Thalassa laugh, and she couldn't resist jumping forward to pull him into a hug (it took quite an effort not to kiss him, something Maya had warned her was forbidden for a reason). "Oh, Jove... You have no idea how good it is to see you."

Jove chuckled, patting her back. "I'm... glad to see you safe."

Thalassa sensed the nervous hesitation in the careful way he was holding her, and leaned back to see him biting his lip. "Jove?"

Jove's eyes darted around the room before finally returning to his wife. "Thalassa, please don't take this the wrong way, but..." He scanned her up and down, and Thalassa wasn't sure if it was more confusion or resignation in his expression. "You look... old."

Thalassa laughed. "I am old. Forty-one this year."

"F-forty...?" Jove's face contorted in shock, almost disgusted to hear the confirmation. "You had a magic trick to bring me back from the dead and you waited twenty years to do it?" He scoffed, crossing his arms to cover the smile twitching at his lips. "I'm disappointed, Thalassa. Extremely disappointed."

Thalassa giggled, though it was hard to keep up a smile when she registered his words. "Not quite a magic trick, I'm afraid." She began to pick at her hair where it hung over her shoulder, acutely aware of Jove watching her closely. "How did you know you were dead?"

"How could I not? Even if I had gotten out of that fire alive, why would I have been left in a dark, candle-lit room, in a sitting position, with only you at my side?" Jove shrugged, tapping Maya's magatama hanging below his neck. "Plus, no pain or signs of scarring... I can believe the clothes, but the hair?" He brushed a hand over Maya's fringe, flopping it back into his face, only to then discover the knot of hair on top, patting it curiously. "It's growing out of my head, but there's no way it's mine." Placing his hands back in his lap, Jove sighed. "When I saw how much older you looked... I figured the stories about Khura'in spirit channelling must've been real after all."

Thalassa grunted, biting her lip. "Not... Khura'in spirit channelling, in this case..."

Jove looked up, raising an eyebrow. "What do you mean?" He frowned. "Wait, is this why you took so long to...?"

Grinning in embarrassment, Thalassa shrugged. "I wasn't in Khura'in long after the fire, and I never went back. The woman channelling you, Maya... She's American - Californian - and a good friend of mine. A very talented spirit medium who I owe so much already, even though we've only known each other a matter of weeks."

Jove thought this over for a moment, glancing down at his body, then shot Thalassa a smile. "Well, thank her for me, then. Even though it took you forever to find her."

Thalassa laughed. "You're incorrigible."

Chuckling, Jove's gaze turned to the floor, and his amusement quickly faded into a sorrowful frown. "I was worried... there was another reason you waited so long to see me again."

Thalassa waited a moment before replying, confused: "Another reason?"

Jove nodded. "It was my fault, after all. Sure, I was never going to turn down a gig at the palace, but I should never have listened to all the talk about that guy's son and dragged Apollo along with me."

"Jove, it was never."

"Don't interrupt Thalassa, I have to say this." Jove planted his hands firmly on his thighs, staring his wife down with a firm look. "If I had just left Apollo with you that night, he would still be alive right now."

Thalassa blinked, but was too shocked by the declaration to protest.

Jove sighed, eyes down in misery. "He was only five months old. He didn't deserve to die for my mistake. And what would even be the point of channelling someone that young? He was still awake and screaming when I passed out... Who knows how much longer he suffered before burning alive?"

Thalassa opened her mouth to correct Jove's misconception, only to change her mind and close it again. She wasn't sure where to start.

"You have every right to blame me for failing you, and for failing our son. You both deserved better." Jove turned a meek gaze warily towards Thalassa. "I guess... you probably went back to your dad, right?"

After a moment of thought, Thalassa nodded. "I waited as long as I could. When you never came home, I gathered my strength and went looking. I found only a country in turmoil, and since I didn't speak the language, it was nearly impossible to figure out what had happened... but I did, eventually." She looked away, the memories of those terrible days playing across her mind. "I forwent any self-care, any auditions for gigs... I did nothing but scour the streets until I simply couldn't afford to stay any longer. I returned to the Troupe, and my father made the awful decision I wasn't strong enough to make myself." She closed her eyes, hands clutched together at her chest. "I gave up the search. And I never went back."

Jove leaned forward, clutching her arms. "Thalassa, I am so sorry."

"It wasn't your fault."

"No, it was." Jove hung his head. "All those plans we had for our future, for Apollo... Because of my stupid mistakes, they were all cut short. I promised our son a bright future, a father who would never abandon him and always be there for him... He didn't get that, Thalassa..."

Thalassa placed her hands on Jove's shoulders, leaning in close to his ear. "Jove... I think I need to tell you why it is I owe Maya so much."

There was a short pause, then Jove straightened, staring in puzzlement at his wife. "Huh?"

Thalassa couldn't help a small giggle, clutching her hands in her lap. "This gets a bit complicated, but bear with me. There's a relevant point at the end, I promise."

Jove looked doubtful, but didn't protest. "Okay..."

"Good." Thalassa took a deep breath. "After you died, I eventually remarried."

"Hey, that's great." Jove shot her a grin and a thumbs-up. "I'm glad you were able to move on."

Thalassa giggled. "Thank you. It took me a while, of course. I even had another baby: A daughter, Trucy."

Jove was intrigued. "A little girl?"

Thalassa nodded. "We were very happy, for a time... but then we had an accident in rehearsal. I was forced to leave the Troupe again to recover, and I... lost contact with them." She decided it was better not to go into her father's odd plot, or the amnesia; She didn't want to confuse Jove too bad. "While I was gone, my father was diagnosed with cancer, and passed away. The Troupe fell apart, and Trucy was... separated from her father." Again, she decided it was better not to go into the whole suicide/murder confusion and the difficult decision Zak had made; Not even she fully understood that one.

"What?" Jove scratched his head, puzzled. "Troupe Gramarye fell apart? And how did you and your new husband both lose track of your little girl?"

"Like I said, it's complicated," Thalassa sighed. "Trucy was all alone... until she was taken in by a man named Phoenix Wright." She smiled. "Phoenix treated Trucy as his own daughter, and loved her enough that he never gave up the search to reunite her birth family. He looked for her father, and he looked for me... He found out about my past, about you, and about Apollo."

Jove raised an eyebrow. "How'd he find out about Apollo? Me I can understand, but we never 'announced' our son. I thought you hated your private life becoming public."

Thalassa bit her lip (though it did nothing to hide her grin) and held up her right wrist, showing off the bracelet there.

Frowning, Jove looked back and forth between Thalassa's face and the bracelet. "Did... Did you never recover the other one? Y'know, after the whole 'Gramarye Prince' thing?"
Thalassa laughed. "Oh, Jove... Apollo didn't die in that fire."

It took a few moments for the man to react, eyes widening until they were nearly bugging out of his head. "He...!?"

"I never knew it myself, but he ended up back here in California, and Phoenix found him." Thalassa tapped her bracelet proudly. "He recognised our little 'Gramarye Prince', and took him in just like Trucy. He's raised them these past seven years, as family. And Maya?" She placed a hand on Jove's arm, still internally giggling at his shocked expression. "Maya is Phoenix's fiancée. She's been Apollo's and Trucy's mother in my absence. I owe them both everything for the love and care they showed my children when I couldn't be there for them." She paused, and laughed. "And for the continued love and care they still show, because Apollo and Trucy are just as much their children as mine now. We're a very big, very strange, family."

Jove stared back at her for a very long moment before letting out a breath Thalassa hadn't noticed he was holding. "Apollo's... Apollo's alive? How old is he now? He'd be all grown up, right?" He held a hand to his head, looking around the room. "Why isn't he here?"

"I am here."

Thalassa and Jove both looked up into the shadow that cloaked the end of the room. Wood creaked underneath them, followed by the gentle padding of socked feet on carpet... and Apollo stepped out into the candlelight, the only sign of nervousness his tight grip on the bracelet at his left wrist. He met Jove's stares with a wary expression Thalassa recognised from their own reunion (had it really been only a week since then?), an expression that told her the young man wasn't quite sure how to react just yet.

Apollo cleared his throat. "Hi... I'm Apollo."

[View the Court Record]
Jove tried to jump to his feet, but stumbled on the trailing ribbons of Maya's obi and fell back to the floor with a thud. "Um..." He gave Thalassa an embarrassed look. "It was Maya, right? I think I'll just make her indecent if I try to get up..."

Thalassa hid a giggle, and turned to their son, holding out her right hand. "Apollo, come sit down and meet your birth father."

Apollo hesitated a second or two, then stepped forward and placed his left hand in his mother's outstretched palm. Keeping his grip on her tight, he dropped to the floor at Thalassa's side, legs crossed.

Jove stared at the young man with undisguised wonder. "Oh wow... Our little baby boy, all grown up..." Apollo blushed and stared at the floor, and Jove chuckled. "You'll be... about twenty, right? Older than me."

Apollo nodded. "I'm twenty-two." He frowned, then looked up to Thalassa. "And it's October, so..." Jove's eyes widened. "Really? So it's been...?"

"Twenty-two years this month since you died." Thalassa rubbed her thumb along the back of her son's hand. "It's been so long, we weren't even sure we'd be able to channel you at all."

Jove mused on the information for a long moment, then turned back to Apollo. "So, this Maya whose body I'm borrowing... She's your mom too?"

Again, Apollo nodded, his eyes meeting Jove's curious gaze. "Mom Maya and Mom Thalassa. Mom Maya's been our mother since Dad adopted us, and Mom Thalassa..." He glanced at the woman with red cheeks before looking to the floor. "Well, it's only been a week since she got back."

Thalassa chuckled, watching over him with fond eyes. "Pretty much exactly... and only if you discount the months of amnesia."

Jove raised an eyebrow. "Amnesia?"

Laughing, Thalassa waved his question off. "It's not important, dear."

Jove hummed in thought, then gave his wife a smile. "So, if you've known our adult son for a week now..." He leaned forward conspiratorially, not bothering to lower his voice. "Do you ever stop marvelling at him?"

Thalassa grinned as she leaned forward to meet him, also not bothering to lower her voice. "Not for a second."

Apollo blushed crimson, pulling his hand from Thalassa's grip to slap it to his face. "Moom!"

The pair laughed, pressing their foreheads together before both straightening and directing grins at their son. "I'm beyond thrilled you're alive, Apollo," Jove said. "And that you and your mother found each other."

Slowly, Apollo peeked out from behind his fingers, then lowered his hand. "Y-yeah... Me too." He still watched his parents warily.

Jove laughed. "How'd it happen? How'd you get out of that fire, and back to California?"

Apollo winced, looking away as he scratched his head.

Thalassa frowned in concern, resting a hand on her son's arm. "You don't have to explain."

"N-no, I should." Apollo sighed, dropping his hands into his lap. "If anyone deserves to know the details, it's him."

Jove glanced between the two, worried. He waited patiently for Apollo to explain.

"You mentioned earlier, the man who invited you to the palace, who had a son a year older than me?"

"Yes, little Nahyuta." Jove frowned. "Funny, I don't think I got his dad's name, though."

Apollo smirked. "He didn't get yours, either."

Jove scoffed. "Nonsense. I told him I was Jangly Justice. That's good enough."

Thalassa giggled. "You're sure you want to go down in history with the name 'Jangly'?"

Jove blushed. "Yeah, I never did come up with anything better, did I?"

Apollo couldn't laugh with them, busy building up the courage for his next words. "His name was Dhurke."

Jove looked up in surprise. "Dhurke?"

"When he heard the palace was on fire, he ran inside to try and rescue everyone," Apollo forced out, only his stage training keeping his words distinct. "He found me, next to your dead body."

"Ah." Although Jove was saddened by the mention of his own corpse, he forced a smile. "I knew that guy had a good heart... and lots of courage."

Apollo just barely bit back a series of choice words, and tried to reign in a stormy glare. "Well, he rescued me. After the fire, like Mom said, it was a bit chaotic all over the place. Dhurke told me he tried his best to find her, but he didn't know what to look for or where, because he knew nothing about Mom and next-to-nothing about you."

Jove blushed, scratching the side of his head. "Ah... That was my fault."

"Indeed it was." Thalassa gently nudged his arm with a smile. "Now why don't you be quiet and let Apollo finish?"

"R-right..."

Apollo flashed a small smile in appreciation for his mother. "Anyway, after a week or so, he said it got too dangerous to stay in the city, so he took me and Nahyuta up into the mountains. We grew up there together... lived as a family."
Thalassa slipped a hand under Apollo's cape, rubbing the small of his back. He was grateful for the comfort, though it still took him a while to work up the courage to continue.

"But then all of that changed. When I was eight years old, suddenly Dhurke decided it was 'too dangerous' for a foreigner like me." He couldn't help spitting the words out, still disgusted by the painful memory. "He sent me to California, alone, and I was dropped into the foster system here. It took me three years to figure out he was never coming back for me."

Jove stared open-mouthed for a long moment. He moved to speak, but soon changed his mind and simply closed his mouth with a sympathetic frown.

Apollo took a deep breath, already mentally returning Khura'in to the box labelled 'forbidden' at the back of his mind. "I learned to survive on my own. Went to school. Made friends." His eyes landed on his Court Record still lying on the floor at Jove's side, exactly where Maya had left it, and he smiled. Snatching it off the floor, he quickly unlocked the tablet computer and began navigating through his photos. "Then I made one friend in particular who'd just moved from England. He'd been in a car accident and his parents had disappeared, so he was kinda just stuck in foster care until a friend who lived nearby could put through the paperwork to adopt him." It wasn't entirely accurate, but the details weren't really important for this part of his story. "Anyway, Luke took me along to meet his friend, and..." His fingers landed on the picture he was looking for, the very first picture taken of him and his two younger siblings. Apollo couldn't help grinning as he spun the computer around to show Jove. "This is us the day after the adoption. Luke's on the left and Trucy's in the middle. Dad was the one taking it, so he's not there."

Jove gingerly took the machine, studying the photo displayed on the screen with a smile. He glanced up to Thalassa. "Can I talk now?"

Thalassa smirked and pretended to think over the request for a long moment. "Hmm... Oh, alright. I suppose so."

Apollo hid a snort of laughter.

Jove grinned, admiring the picture in his hands. "This is great... I can tell Trucy is a Gramarye." He laughed, giving Thalassa an incredulous look. "Why is she dressed like Blackjack?"

Thalassa seemed confused for half a second before breaking into hysterical giggles, pressing a hand over her mouth.

"Oh, please." Jove rolled his eyes, smirking. "Don't tell me you married Knickknack after I died."

Apollo raised an eyebrow, looking between the two. "Huh?"

Thalassa calmed down enough to explain, "He means Zak."

"Oh." Apollo frowned, thinking. "But Mom, didn't you say it was you who had the funny nicknames for Zak and Valant?"

Jove snorted. "Who do you think I picked it up from?"

Thalassa giggled harder.

Apollo rolled his eyes.

Jove handed the computer back to its owner, smile fading. "In all honesty, I'm so sorry to hear Dhurke wasn't good to you, Apollo. You deserved so much better than that."
Apollo turned red and meekly nodded. He kept his focus on the computer, flicking through his photos.

"When you were a baby, I promised you a father who would always be there for you for a reason."
Jove leaned forward, resting a hand on his son's knee. "My mother died when I was very young. It was just me and my dad, growing up... and my dad was never there for me. He never supported me in anything I did, sometimes forgot to get us food... Sometimes he even got drunk, and my dad was a very mean drunk."

Apollo couldn't help a wince hearing that, meeting his father's eyes. "R-really?"

Jove moved his head in a solemn nod. "After one particularly bad night with him, I gathered up what money I could and left home. It was safer for me out on the streets, and I was old enough to have a job by then, even if it didn't pay much. But, I was too scared to stay in the area, in case someone tried 'returning' me home... so I used the last of my money to get myself a guitar, left town, and started busking to get by." His eyes moved to Thalassa with a smile. "And that's when I met your mother, and I finally got a steady home, a paying job... even a family."

Thalassa smiled back, eyes shining with the memories of their time together.

"Mom told me that story..." Apollo placed his computer on the floor in front of him, watching Jove with a new appreciation for the man. "I didn't know about your dad."

"Neither did I," Thalassa replied, her smile replaced with undisguised concern for her husband. "You never told me all that, Jove."

Jove shrugged sheepishly. "I didn't want to worry you... And I really didn't want to be dwelling on a bad past when I had such an awesome present I could be living."

Thalassa turned to Apollo with a smile. "That sounds familiar."

Apollo blushed, scratching his head. "I-it's not exactly the same..."

Thalassa laughed, placing a hand on Apollo's shoulder and pulling him close enough to kiss the side of his forehead. "Close enough."

Jove chuckled, folding his hands in his lap. "Well, I may have failed at keeping that promise of being there for you, and Dhurke just failed outright at being your dad. What about this Phoenix character?"

Apollo returned his attention to his Court Record lying in front of him, looking over his collection of family photos still on the screen. He couldn't help a small smile. "Dad's... awesome. He likes teasing us and making jokes, and he does really stupid or embarrassing stuff sometimes... but we can always count on his support whenever we need it." He spotted a photo from their first Christmas together, just Apollo and Phoenix with their arms around each other's backs and smiling for the camera. He tapped to bring it full-screen, just staring at the beginnings of the close relationship he felt had always been there between him and his idol-turned-family. "I mean, I was already fifteen when we met and he still decided to adopt me, even though I was nearly all grown up and he could barely afford to take in Luke as it was. It would have been really easy for him to just keep in touch with me as Luke's friend... but Dad's really stubborn about taking the easy way for anything." He shot a smirk at Thalassa. "Not when there's a Wright way to go instead."

Thalassa snorted and shook her head. "And how many times has that particular pun been raised in your household?"

Apollo scoffed. "Why do you think we call ourselves the Wright Anything Agency, where you've always come to the Wright place? We Wrights live on the things."

"That I can believe," Thalassa replied, amused.

Jove laughed. "That's his name, huh? 'Wright'?

Apollo nodded. "Trucy and I changed our names when we were adopted... though we use 'Gramarye' as a stage-name." He blushed. "I-I don't use 'Justice' as a name anymore. Sorry."

Jove waved off his son's bashful apology. "No no, that's fine. You clearly have exactly the loving family and bright future I promised you. What does a surname matter?" He frowned in concern. "Though do tell me you became a magician because you wanted to. I don't want you stuck in a job you don't like."

Apollo laughed. "I'll be honest, I only started learning tricks because Trucy made me... but I do really enjoy performing, and stage magic is super fascinating once you know all the ins and outs." He shrugged. "I'd never really encountered it before coming to America, so if it weren't for Trucy, I probably wouldn't have taken it up... but I'm glad I did." He snorted, shooting Thalassa a grin. "Plus, I wouldn't have figured out Valant's trick at the concert. It would've been way harder proving Machi innocent in court!"

Thalassa chuckled. "I call that a reason to be grateful you are also a lawyer. Machi would not have stood a chance without you defending him."

Jove blinked, looking between the two. "Apollo's also a what?"

Apollo threw back the right side of his cape with no small amount of pride, and pointed to his attorney's badge on his waistcoat. "I'm a qualified defence attorney. I've had four cases so far, and I won all of them!"

"Phoenix used to be one as well," Thalassa added for the still-stunned Jove. "He's been a good mentor for our son."

"I already wanted to be a lawyer before I got adopted," Apollo continued with a shrug. "Dad used to be really famous, actually; I used to watch him in court. He inspired me to turn my fascination with the justice system into actually getting out there myself and defending the innocent... Standing up for people, and being on their side when no-one else is." He grinned, holding up both fists with a determined air. "And we Wrights don't rest until we've fully uncovered the truth of the case!" After a short pause, Apollo noticed Jove still staring at him and blushed, putting his hands back in his lap. "I... I just really like both my jobs. I entertain people in one, and I save lives in the other."

Finally, Jove smiled. "Well, it's a bit out of left field to hear you're a lawyer, but it's still impressive. It's a lot of work." He paused, eyes far away. "My mother was a lawyer, actually."

Apollo and Thalassa shared a shocked look, both asking, "Really?"

Jove laughed. "I don't know if she was the same kind of lawyer as you, Apollo - Like I said, she died when I was young - but maybe you'd be able to look her up."

Apollo nodded, snatching up his Court Record to make a note. "What was her name?"

"Rhea Fortuna. R, H, E, A." Jove smiled to himself. "I don't remember much about her, but I do know she was always busy with work. She wasn't always able to spend as much time with me as she wanted."
"R, h, e... Fortuna." Apollo grinned as he saved the note. "I'll definitely look into her later."

"What a stroke of luck," Thalassa mused. "I never imagined there was another lawyer in your bloodline, Apollo... Or yours, Jove."

"You're telling me. Who'd've thought our son would develop a passion in the same field as her?" Chuckling, Jove pointed to the computer. "Now Apollo, I must admit, I caught a glimpse of your dad earlier and now I'm curious. Do you have any other good pictures of your family I could see?"

Giggling, Apollo promptly navigated back to his family photos. "You bet I do."

View the Court Record
Apollo already felt accomplished at having this chance to meet the man who was his biological father... Though all the same, it was also a relief to know this was his one and only actual meeting with Jove Justice; There wasn't any pressure to form a long-term relationship with him, and he had handily avoided calling the man 'Dad' so far - Much like he remembered Luke saying seven long years ago, that was a name reserved for one man and one man alone, and it felt wrong to be giving it to anyone else. But Jove was a nice guy, especially when compared to Magnifi and Zak, and he seemed fascinated with every aspect of how Apollo's and Thalassa's lives had turned out since his death. Apollo had found it fascinating in return to see what his birth father was actually like after hearing so much about him from Thalassa, and even learning completely new things, like that his paternal grandmother was a lawyer and exactly how Jove had ended up busking on the streets as a teenager. He found himself impatient to return to the rest of his family just to tell them all about it, though he was wary of leaving while there was still the chance of learning something more.

They had spent about twenty minutes going through Apollo's collection of family photos from the past seven years: Apollo's initiation into magic and eventual acceptance of it as a career, Apollo and Luke finishing school and heading on to college and university, Apollo and Clay's move into their shared apartment, Apollo and Luke graduating, the arrival of Apollo's badge and his first trial... and now they had reached the most recent stretch, the three months since Machi had moved in to the Agency. It had necessitated finally explaining Thalassa's stint as a blind amnesiac celebrity and how Machi had ended up on trial, but Jove had just been all the more intrigued to hear it.

"Oh, this is the last one, from just last week." Apollo flicked the screen to the last file in the folder, from the day Thalassa had returned: The four Gramaryes in her apartment, huddled close together so Trucy could take a selfie with her phone. "Remember this, Mom?" He held it out for his parents to see.

Thalassa laughed. "Trucy had us holding that pose for ages so she could get it just right. 'It's a memento of the day we got back together, Mommy! It has to be perfect!'"

Jove snorted, admiring the picture. "Well, any photo of your family is already perfect, in my opinion."

Apollo chuckled, moving the computer to his lap. Without any more photos to show, he didn't need it now.

Jove sighed, watching the tablet computer go away. "Aw, is it already time for me to go?"

"It seems so." Thalassa placed a hand on her husband's arm, eyes already teary as she gave him one last, longing look. "We've been speaking a long time, and I cannot think of what else to tell you... but it feels like there is so much more to say."

Jove smiled, grasping her hand and holding it tight in his own. "Thalassa, I will be able to rest easy knowing the both of you have moved on, and are so happy together. I love you, but I don't want your happiness tied so completely to me that you can't live without me."
Thalassa laughed despite her tears, placing her other hand on top of his. "Somehow, I always knew that's what you'd want. I never would have been able to fall in love again in the first place without the thought that you'd be cheering me on."

"Why wouldn't I cheer you on? A beautiful girl like you?" Jove snickered, then corrected himself with "Well, beautiful woman would be more appropriate now. Not that you look nearly as old as forty."

"Flatterer." Thalassa giggled, and the pair leaned in close, resting their foreheads against each other. "It's a good thing I'm forbidden from kissing you, or there'd be a lot more going on right now."

Apollo gagged, face red. "Mom! You're as bad as Dad and Mom Maya!"

Thalassa fell sideways, laughing hysterically.

Jove raised an eyebrow at the young man. "Are they known for being a bit mushy?"

Apollo shivered in disgust, arms tightly crossed. "They never stop flirting. And their favourite thing to do is insinuate to us the kind of stuff they get up to behind closed doors." He sighed. "I don't mind them kissing, it's just that it doesn't stop at that with them."

"An exaggeration, of course," Thalassa laughed, sitting up again. "They aren't quite as wrapped up in each other as all that. Don't get me wrong, they have their moments, but they pick them well."

Apollo rolled his eyes.

Jove shrugged, hiding a smile. "Okay." Dropping the subject, he promptly turned to Apollo. "I'm glad I got to meet you, Apollo. Even though I lost the chance to raise you, I'm beyond proud you turned out so well regardless."

Apollo blushed, scratching his head. "Um... th-thank you."

Jove chuckled, then looked between his wife and son and snapped his fingers. "Oh, and there was one last thing I wanted to ask before I left."

Thalassa and Apollo exchanged a curious look. "What is it?" Thalassa asked.

"Did they ever get the guy who hit me?"

Mother and son stared back at Jove for a long moment, too stunned to speak. Slowly, Thalassa placed a hand on her chest, and quietly repeated "Hit you?"

Jove nodded, then frowned as he registered their expressions. "Did... you not know I was knocked out before I died?"

Thalassa shook her head. "Weren't you overcome by the smoke?"

Apollo bit his lip, then snatched up his Court Record and reopened his notes. "Nope." Jove crossed his arms, looking a little confused himself. "Someone came up behind me and whacked me on the head, with a lighter. I fell forward and passed out."

"On head... lighter," Apollo muttered, madly tapping away at his touchscreen keyboard. He cast a quick glance up at Jove. "Did you see them at all?"

Jove pressed his lips together, apologetic. "I... don't think so. I mean, I glimpsed their reflection in a fallen plate after I fell, but I wasn't exactly focussed on that at the time."

Thalassa sighed, clutching her hands together in distress. "From what I remember, the story was that you were trapped in the blaze. Your body burned to ashes in that fire."

Jove hummed in thought. "Yeah, that would make it pretty hard to tell how I'd died, huh?"

Apollo finished his notes, staring at them for a moment before returning his gaze to Jove. "Uh-Father? Could you tell us everything about what happened that night?"

Although the man seemed a little thrown at being addressed in that way, he nodded. "Sure. I left you with little Nahyuta and his dad - Dhrurke - while I performed for the queen. When the show was over, I picked you up and Dhrurke showed us to our room for the night." He paused. "I don't know exactly what it was that woke us up, whether it was the fire or just a coincidence... All I know is, you starting crying."

- Twenty-One Years Earlier -

Jove Justice groaned as he rolled to the side of the bed. "'Pollo, baby..." It took him a moment to locate the crib that had been provided for them, struggling to keep his eyes open long enough to stumble to its side. "S'okay, nothing to worry about..." Pulling the bawling infant into his arms, he blindly trudged back to the bed and dropped back down on the mattress. "You want me to sing, champ? Or are you just hungry?"

Apollo slightly calmed now he was in his father's grip, but he still wailed plaintively.

The young father sighed as he bounced the baby. "Well, your formula's in the kitchen. That's probably what you want, huh?" Knowing he wouldn't get a reply, he got to his feet again and opened the door into the hallway. No sooner had he taken a step outside than he noticed the carpet of flames consuming the end of the hallway, climbing up the walls and blocking the door to the nearby kitchenette.

Jove stepped back into the room and slammed the door, spinning around and pressing his back against the timber with wide eyes. He wasn't feeling drowsy anymore.

And that's when I discovered the building was on fire.

I hurried to get dressed, grabbed my guitar and your mother's bracelet, and wrapped you up in your blanket to try and protect you from the heat. The way we'd come in was blocked, so it was either find another way out or fight a path through it... and, despite my best efforts to find a way around, we still somehow ended up running right through the thick of it...

The nineteen-year-old father may have left the visible flames behind him, but the heat of the fire still permeated the air, making it hard to breathe. It was probably for that reason Apollo had stopped crying. Jove refused to stop moving, though. He dashed down the latest hallway, eyes alert for a possible way out, ears listening for any sign of someone else lost in this inferno.
And then, over the crackling fire, he heard something.

_I'm not sure exactly what it was... maybe a wail? A cry for help? It seemed to have come from a door nearby, so I ran through... and I found someone._

The room was lined with shelves, full of urns and various crockery. A long table filled the centre, and a woman in white robes hunched over it in a chair, face buried in her arms. She immediately struck him as familiar, as someone he had last seen only a matter of hours ago.

Apollo started to cry again.

Jove bounced his son in his arms, holding him close. "Shh, shh, it's okay, I'm getting us out." It didn't help, but he felt better for trying. He almost wanted to cry himself in the oppressive heat, and it was only the knowledge Apollo was depending on him that kept him moving. He returned his attention to the woman nearby.

_I recognised the woman then - the queen! - and I opened my mouth to call out to her... but then someone hit me on the back of the head. I was on the floor in the blink of an eye._

Jove was too stunned by the sudden spike of pain to move at first, his chest pressed to the hot, wooden floor and eyes still wide in shock. A metal plate was lying directly ahead of him, standing upright against something he couldn't make out; In its reflection, he saw something brown moving.

Was there a lot of smoke in here, or was Jove's vision going blurry?

A lighter dropped to the floor in front of him with a clatter, and the brown thing left. Apollo's crying pierced the air, making the pain in Jove's skull worse. Nevertheless, he fought through the overwhelming ache, reaching out to where his tightly-wrapped baby son had fallen nearby.

_I knew from the moment I discovered the fire that if I lost consciousness, I would never wake up again. And without me awake to protect you, you didn't have a chance of getting out either. To let myself pass out was to doom us both... but I was powerless to stop it. All my strength left me, and... and I died._

_View the Court Record_
A Mystery Abandoned

October 17, 2:35PM
Fey Manor
Channelling Chamber

Jove sighed, sorrowful eyes locked on the carpet in front of him. "I failed you, Apollo. I'm so sorry."

Apollo didn't reply, staring at his Court Record in his hands. He'd made dutiful notes of every detail Jove had told them, no matter how small, and was still quietly absorbing them, comparing them to the slightly different versions of the story he'd heard from Thalassa and from his former foster father. Thalassa's story meshed very well with Jove's, especially since she'd known so little of what happened that night... but the version Apollo had grown up with? He remembered so clearly when he'd first heard it as a six-year-old, had begged to know why he wasn't allowed to call that man 'Dad' the same way Nahyuta did, and was given the story of his 'real dad' instead.

"Because I'm not your real dad, Apollo. 'Dhurke' is fine. But I did meet your real dad once, and he was a great man. A great musician, too."

He frowned. 'And yet somehow I still never saw the signs until long after you dumped me on the other side of the world. You have a lot to answer for.'

"Apollo doesn't blame you, Jove."

Apollo looked up with the start, eyes flicking between his parents. "Huh? I what?"

Thalassa smiled, a hand resting on Jove's arm where she'd been comforting him. "So you did zone out. You were hit with a lighter, which seems to suggest it was the arsonist who killed you. You'd found the queen, the only other person who died that night. But, by the time Dhu-" he nearly choked when he realised how rapidly the unwanted name had left his mouth, "by the time he arrived to rescue me, there mustn't have been any sign of her, because there's no way he wouldn't have mentioned if he'd found her, dead or not."

Jove and Thalassa shared a puzzled look, then returned their gazes to their son. "Surely that means the queen was either buried in rubble or ran away when she was attacked," Thalassa reasoned. "That would put her out of sight, wouldn't it?"

Apollo bit his lip for a few moments. "I guess... But that still doesn't explain the arsonist. " He dropped the computer, looking his parents in the eyes. "They set this fire to kill the queen, right? Then they go into the burning building to kill her in person, kill you because you got in the way, ignore me because I'm a baby..." He frowned, returning his attention to his notes. "It just doesn't make sense to me. They'd already set the fire, and started attracting attention. Why did they stay at the scene of the crime and risk getting caught to kill the queen? Wasn't that the point of the fire? If they could sneak in anyway, why bother with the fire at all? They could've just killed her in her sleep!"

Jove crossed his arms, thinking. "I remember there being quite a few guards hanging around when I was performing. The fire may have been to clear the building, to open up access to the queen in the first place."

"But if she had guards at the time of the fire, why didn't they get her out?" Apollo huffed, pressing his finger to his forehead again. "Argh, something more is going on here, I just know it!" He shot a glance up at Thalassa. "And the second we explain all this to Luke, he's gonna figure it out in an instant. He's always been better than me at this."

"Oh, Apollo, don't sell yourself short." Thalassa patted her son's shoulder sympathetically. "You would not have won so many trials if you couldn't see a case through to its logical conclusion. I would know; I've seen, or at least heard, two of them."

Apollo paused, then gave his mother a half-lidded stare. "Mom. If it weren't for Luke, we literally never would have realised you were blind."

Thalassa retracted her hand in both shock and embarrassment, unable to reply in the knowledge Apollo had a point. Ignoring Jove's quiet chuckling, she folded her hands in her lap with a frown. "Well. Just because he notices things you don't, that doesn't necessarily make him so much better. I'm sure you see things he doesn't as well. That's why you work so well as a team, covering each other's weak points." Her expression softened, eyes on her son. "And Luke didn't have anything to do with your last trial. I thought you handled that one in particular very well indeed."

Apollo blushed. Now it was his turn to admit she had a point. Jove grinned, reaching forward to briefly pat Apollo's knee. "Whatever the problem is, it probably doesn't matter by now anyway. This fire was over twenty years ago, right? The Khura'inese police probably got that regicidal arsonist long ago."

Apollo paled, biting his lip.

Thalassa nodded. "That's very true. If nothing else, we can take comfort in-"

"No, we can't."

"They didn't find the culprit." Apollo ran a gloved hand through his hair, bashful eyes locked on the carpet in front of him. "Remember how I said D-... Dhurke rescued me? I think because of that... they pinned the blame on him."

"What!" Jove scoffed, disbelief in his eyes. "Look, he may have made bad choices raising you, but he was no murderer."

Apollo nodded. "He tried to clear his name, but he couldn't find any trace of the culprit himself, so the authorities decided it had to be him." He sighed, busyng his hands slipping his Court Record back into the pouch at his hip. "That's... That's why he took me and Nahyuta up into the mountains. We were in hiding, from the corrupt regime. As far as I know, he's probably still out there, trying to clear his name. And now he'd said it out loud, the similarities to Phoenix's situation struck him; Phoenix's wasn't nearly as bad, and had recently turned around in fact, but it was still uncomfortably similar. After all, Apollo's Khura'inese foster father had once been an attorney too... a fact the young man longed to forget was the originating spark for his interest in law.

Thalassa's eyes widened in concern. "Is this the real reason why you didn't want Maya trying to find him?"

Apollo wanted to deny it, to insist it was a co-incidence... but he knew there wasn't any point trying to lie to a living lie-detector. "A part of it, yes. If Mom Maya accidentally led the regime to his rebellion, she'd just get caught up in the whole fiasco herself... And knowing her luck, she'd probably wind up on the wrong side."

"Rebellion?" Jove's eyebrows shot up, impressed. "Geeze, I said he had courage, but that really takes balls."

Thalassa thought over Apollo's words, her face pinched tight with worry. "I... cannot argue that."

She clutched her hands together. "But if you wish not to tell any of this to Maya, and you do not plan on ever meeting Dhurke again... is there any reason to pursue this case now?"

Apollo frowned, confused. "What do you mean?"

Thalassa sighed, then shifted slightly to face Apollo and placed her hands on his face. "My darling... I want to see whoever killed your father brought to justice too, but if doing so brings you back into contact with Dhurke, and with Khura'in, and drags you into so much danger..." Her eyes shone in concern, tears threatening at their corners. "Are you prepared for that? Is it worth all those consequences? Is this what you want?"

Apollo placed his left hand over her right, their bracelets clacking against each other. He was surprised to realise he'd been so wrapped up in trying to solve the mystery, he hadn't noticed that, to bring it to a logical conclusion, he would have to face that part of his past he'd been trying so hard for so long to pretend hadn't happened. To find that arsonist would require returning to Khura'in, and talking to Dhurke, and almost certainly putting himself in the unenviable position of being in the regime's cross-hairs. He closed his eyes, leaning forward slightly, and Thalassa's forehead met his, her thumbs stroking his cheeks. It was comforting, but ultimately couldn't stand up to the frustration building in Apollo's chest. It wasn't fair, to hold that mystery hostage behind all that pain he would had to suffer again first. He released the anger with a sigh and a few tears, cursing out his former foster father under his breath. For once, he didn't care in the slightest about swearing in front of his parents.

"For what it's worth, I'm happy to leave taking care of that arsonist to Dhurke."

Apollo looked up, moving away from his mother's hands to see his birth father clearer. "You are?"

Jove nodded, a sincere smile on his face. "That you and your mother are alive, together, and happy is all I could have hoped for." He shrugged. "Knowing the guy who jumped me faced justice would have been a bonus, but they did only kill me because I was in the wrong place at the wrong time. There wasn't anything personal about it. I figure they'll make a mistake and out themselves to the authorities eventually."

Apollo looked down, deep in thought. He was a little surprised to note Jove hadn't been lying.

Thalassa moved her other hand to clutch Apollo's between both of hers. "I'll take your lead, Apollo. Whatever you decide is best."

There was a long moment of silence as Apollo considered his options. It was comforting to know he had the full support of his birth parents... and it was probably because of that he was able to stomach the sting of deliberately leaving a mystery unsolved. He sighed. "I... I hate to take the easy way over the right way, but..." He pressed his free hand to his face, tears spilling from his eyes. "I can't. Not Khura'in. Not Dhurke."

Thalassa pulled the young man into a hug as he descended into sobbing. "Apollo, this is a very hard choice to make. Neither way is 'easy'. You can only choose what is best for you, and I believe any option that keeps you out of unnecessary danger is the better one." She lifted a hand to the back of his head, stroking his hair. "If you cannot face Khura'in, you don't have to. Leave that place to its own devices. It's not your responsibility."

Apollo nodded into his mother's shoulder, clinging to her white dress. He was shaking too hard to say anything in reply.

Fabric scraped against carpet, and soon a third body had joined the hug, pressed against Apollo's back and gripping the young lawyer's shoulders. "We have always loved you, Apollo. We just want the best for you. Nothing about that will ever change... whether I'm here to see it or not."

Apollo smiled (though no-one could see it with his face still buried in Thalassa's shoulder), and moved a hand up to rest on top of Jove's. "Th-thanks. I... I love you, too." He sniffed, feeling a lot calmer already. "Even if it's just this once, I'm glad I got to meet my birth father. You really are as great as Mom said."

Jove and Thalassa both laughed.

They stayed in their hug for a long time.

_View the Court Record_
Apollo wasn’t sure how much time had passed, sitting on the floor sandwiched between his birth parents, clinging to Thalassa in front while Jove rested against his back. It was... comfortable. He was reminded of the first time he’d hugged Phoenix, and been hugged back, and how strange it felt at first to be enjoying such a small thing. He’d been so nervous back then, he’d always pulled out of the hug very quickly, but over time he’d learned to put that fear to rest. He knew now from experience, there was little better than a lazy afternoon with nowhere to go and nothing to do... and spending it wrapped up in the arms of someone you loved. He’d never done it with Luke - their relationship wasn't that touchy-feely - or with Machi - the boy simply hadn't been around long enough for the opportunity - but Apollo fondly remembered hours spent with Trucy or with Phoenix (and even once or twice with Maya), just hugging in comfortable silence after a difficult conversation or an exhausting morning. He felt a sense of pride to be able to add Jove and Thalassa to his mental list.

The body against Apollo's back shifted, pulling their hand from his grip. There was a pause, then they leaned back in, holding Apollo's upper arms far tighter than before. "Are you okay?"

Maya's voice. Apollo sighed, then pushed himself up into a proper sitting position. Maya remained pressed to his shoulder-blades and clinging to his arms, the feel of her figure starkly different to Jove's. "I'm fine, Mom." He shot her a quick smile over his shoulder.

Thalassa sniffed, wiping her eyes. "Thank you, Maya. We both really needed that."

Maya grinned, gave Apollo's arms a short rub, then pulled back and got to her feet. "I'm glad I was able to help you," she said in a serene tone, then paused, pressed her hands to her mouth... and emitted a muffled squeal, bouncing rapidly on her heels. She was done a moment later, removing her hands to reveal a massive grin. "Honestly, I am terrified it had been too long and I'd just mess it up like I did with Gaia."

Thalassa weakly laughed, standing up. "Must you insist I repeat myself on that?"

Maya hid a giggle. "Sorry." She gestured to the door, taking a few steps towards it. "Shall we head out and see if the kids have noticed yet?"

"Wait!" Apollo jumped up, tripping over his feet before managing to stand, and grabbed Maya's upper arms just as much to help himself stay upright as to hold her in place. "Mom, I have something to tell you first."

Maya gave him a blank stare for a second, glanced briefly over to Thalassa, then returned a concerned look to the young man. "What is it?"

Apollo took a deep breath to steady himself. "When... When I left Khura'in, it was in a pretty terrible state. A corrupt regime, and a rebellion trying to overthrow them... Not the ideal place to be." He tried not to dwell on this being why he was sent away; After all, if it had really been that bad, Nahyuta would have been sent away with him.

"Really?" Maya bit her lip, musing on the information. "So... Is it still like that?"
Apollo sighed. "I don't know. You'll probably be fine if you just stick to your training and keep your head down..." He swallowed a lump of panic building in his throat. "Just... Just be careful over there, okay? Just in case?"

Maya stared at him a moment before giving Apollo a warm smile. "I promise." She wrapped her arms behind his back, pulling her eldest child into a hug. "Don't you worry about me, kiddo; That's my job, to be worrying about you."

Apollo couldn't help a laugh, hugging her back.

"I'll be back before you know it. I can promise that, too."

Despite the worry still lingering at the back of his mind, Apollo decided he could believe her.

The first thing Apollo saw as he emerged from the Channelling Chamber (besides the back of Maya's head, of course) was his three siblings and young cousin all huddled together in the centre of the Meditation Room, watching the doors eagerly. Maya stepped aside, and Apollo and Thalassa stepped forward into the open doorway.

"Polly!"

Apollo barely had the time to look up before a fifteen-year-old had barrelled into his chest, her arms tightly wrapping around his back. She looked up at him with plaintive eyes, too close to his face to really focus on properly.

"Are you okay, Polly?"

Apollo smiled, patting the girl's back. "Of course I'm okay, Truce."

A little ahead, Luke, Machi and Pearl visibly sighed in relief.

Apollo smirked as he leaned in closer to his sister's ear. "By the way... My dad hates your dad."

Trucy paused, then leaned back to give her eldest brother a confused look. "Really?"

Thalassa scoffed, lightly whacking Apollo's arm with the back of a hand.

"What!?" Machi's hands flew to his chest, the teen looking pale. "But that awful! How he just hate-?"

"Machi," Apollo chuckled, "I'm joking."

Machi paused, then his cheeks flushed red and the teen ran a hand through his hair. "Oh."

Luke hid a giggle, walking up behind Machi and resting his hands on the boy's shoulders. He kept his eyes on his elder brother. "We're just glad you got the chance to meet him."

Apollo blushed. He couldn't help but notice Thalassa nearby watching over them with a warm look.

Maya skipped over to where Phoenix and Iris were standing, near the cubby-holes against the back wall. "So, how long did it take for them to notice we were gone?"
"Oh, not long." Phoenix grinned. "They came charging in here about half an hour after you went in."

Iris blushed, pressing a hand to her reddening cheek. "I did only tell them you were busy when they asked."

Pearl chewed a thumbnail, watching Apollo and Thalassa with concern. "But when you didn't come join us, we got worried."

"And 'they're busy' just got increasingly suspicious after that," Luke added. "We found Papa, and he told us what was going on."

Phoenix shrugged. "If you were determined enough to get past Iris, you deserved to know."

Iris continued to sheepishly avoid everyone's gazes.

Thalassa stepped towards her children, and pulled Trucy into a hug. "I'm sorry we didn't give you the chance to meet Jove yourself. He certainly wouldn't have turned down the opportunity to meet you in person."

"Oh, that's okay, Mommy." Trucy gave her mother a tight squeeze, then stepped back with a bright smile. "You weren't sure it'd work anyway, and we had a really busy morning."

Apollo hid a smirk. 'That's one way to put it.'

Machi moved to join them, slipping out of Luke's grip. "Isoveli, was your father good person? He nice to you?"

Apollo almost laughed, but settled for a nod. "Yep. We had a good long talk." He shot a glance at Thalassa, who was smiling in agreement, then he rested a hand on his youngest brother's shoulder. "C'mon, let's go sit down and I'll tell you all about it."

Machi and Trucy grinned, and the girl cried "That sounds great!"

Pearl ran to join them. "Is it okay if I come too?"

"Of course it is," Apollo chuckled. "We're all family here, aren't we?"

Pearl blushed, hiding her face in her hands.

Maya stretched dramatically, leaning her back against Phoenix. "Well, I am totally exhausted, so I'm afraid I'll have to sit out. Nick, carry me back to my room."

Phoenix began to struggle as the woman's full weight pressed against him, his arms gripping her waist tight. "M-May, I really can't..."

"C'mon, stop being such a whiny baby and carry me." Maya scoffed, and more insistently rested against him.

"Maya, I really can't carry you, not today!"

Luckily, Maya seemed to pick up on the slight note of panic in his voice and instantly straightened, turning to face her fiancé. She studied his pale face for a second in concern, then shrugged with a nonchalant air. "Okay, I'll let you off just this once. You can give me a massage or a foot rub or something."
Phoenix sighed in relief, gingerly rubbing his back with one hand.

The group split into two, the Gramaryes, Iris and Pearl heading back to the living room while Phoenix and Maya wandered in the direction of the master bedroom. Luke was the last to move, lingering in the Meditation Room for a few moments before choosing a direction and hurrying to catch up.

"Papa! Maya!"

Phoenix and Maya paused, turning to see the young man rushing to join them. "Luke?" Phoenix asked.

Luke adjusted his cap nervously as he came to a stop. "Maya, I just... This just occurred to me, and I'm not asking you to do this today, but... You know, we'll still be up here tomorrow, so I just thought..."

All signs of exhaustion vanished in an instant as Maya placed a hand on Luke's shoulder, giving him a concerned smile. "What is it, kiddo?"

"Could..." Luke took a deep breath. "Could you channel my dad one last time? Before you leave?"

Maya restrained a giggle, pulling the young man into a hug. "Of course I will. First thing tomorrow, okay?"

Luke sighed in relief, hugging her back. "Thank you, Maya."

"I know: I'm awesome."

Luke laughed. Phoenix watched them both with a fond smile.

View the Court Record
In all, Clark Triton had been channelled three times since his death: The first had been in July 2020, the very moment Luke had learned his father was dead; The second had been in 2021, a Christmas gift from Maya while the Wrights were in Kurain for the holiday; The third was also over Christmas, in 2025, a treat and a chance to catch up after Luke's horrific experience as a defendant the previous month. Today, only ten months later, would be counted on that list as number four.

Luke had kept his request to Maya quiet overnight... helped greatly by the fact that he'd been the one to take Machi back into the city and stay at the agency with him (and what a strange experience it had been to sleep in Phoenix's bed instead of his own!). With nothing else to talk about, he'd eventually admitted to the boy his plans for the next day. Machi seemed very excited, but had promised not to tell anyone when they returned to Kurain in the morning. And thus, with everyone else gathered in the living room, Luke and Maya slipped away to the Channelling Chamber, leaving the door unlocked.

Maya was quick to settle down in front of the altar, giving Luke a wink. "Say hi to him for me, huh?"

Luke grinned and nodded. He knelt on the floor in front of Maya, but didn't bother to sit still or even close his eyes, his attention focussed on his notebook as he finished jotting down reminders to himself for the incoming conversation. It may have been less than a year since he last saw his birth father, but so much had happened in the interim (and not even counting the past week alone) that it was difficult to keep track of without help.

'Iris wasn't in Kurain at the beginning of the year, so she'll need introducing just like Thalassa and Machi. Apollo's actually handled trials on his own now too, that wasn't happening yet last Christmas. Oh, and can't forget Papa and Maya's engagement. Also, I should probably outline how much detail to go into for how we found Thalassa and Machi, because that's a complicated story. Dad might be interested in Thalassa's trip to Borginia with the Professor, too. And then there's... that tiny bit of progress I made on finding Mum... if you can even call it that. It's not much, but it's more than I had the last time Dad was channelled...'

"So how long has it been this time?"

Luke almost jabbed his pen through the paper in surprise, jerking his head up. It was no shock to see the amused face watching him from beneath Maya's straight, black hair, though even now it still threw him a bit to not see the hazel beard as well. He grinned, dropped his pen, and jumped forward to envelop his father in a tight hug. "Dad!"

Clark laughed, patting his son's back. "Don't tell me it's been another four years. You don't look twenty-four."

Luke giggled, pulling back from the hug. "No, I'm still twenty."

"Really?" Clark raised an eyebrow. "Less than a year?"
Luke retrieved his dropped pen, returning it to his satchel. "To be honest, this was a last-minute decision. A lot's changed in just this past week, and Maya's about to go away for two years, so this was my last chance to see you before she gets back."

"Two years!?" Clark frowned, confused. "What on Earth would require her to be away for that long?"

"Spiritual training, apparently." Luke sheepishly smiled and shrugged. "She'd be able to explain it better than me."

Clark considered this for a moment, then nodded. "In that case... If you say a lot has changed for you recently, I suppose you'd better catch me up."

It didn't take long to give Clark the run-down of the three new members of the family, or to touch on the more minor changes to their lives... though exactly how Thalassa and Machi had stumbled across their path took a while just on its own. Exactly as had happened the previous two times his father was channelled, Luke took Clark's hand and led him out of the chamber, headed through the snaking hallways to the living room.

"No one knows you're coming except for Papa and Machi," Luke whispered as they rounded the final corner. "Just to remind you."

"I'll try not to be too surprising, then," Clark chuckled.

Luke gingerly slid open the door, grinning at the assembled group within. Most were sitting around the table on the floor, though Machi was up on the piano stool and Iris stood next to him. On the table itself, Pearl had set out another of her board games, this one called 'Ticket to Ride', which it seemed she, Trucy, Apollo and Thalassa were playing. Phoenix, though he was at the table, was just watching, and it was him who first spotted Luke's arrival, waving across the room.

"There you are, Luke. Finally decided to join us."

The activity around the table paused, all attention turned to the doorway as Luke sheepishly stepped in. "Hi." He pulled the door fully open behind him, watching as Clark followed him through, a polite smile on his face.

Trucy gasped, jumping to her feet. "Mister Triton!" She ran to the doorway, pausing in front of the man to bounce on her heels. "I didn't know you were coming today!"

Clark laughed. "No, Luke told me. It seems much has changed for you all since we last spoke, so this is a last-minute visit."

Luke noticed Apollo glancing his way as the latter stood from his cushion. "It's nice to see you again, Mister Triton." He smiled as he followed his sister. "It's only been ten months, hasn't it?"

"If you say it is, I'll have to believe you." Clark turned to his son with a raised eyebrow and a smirk. "I'm afraid I don't know the exact date."
Luke blushed, and hurriedly turned his attention back to the room. While Phoenix and Pearl were watching with similar grins, Thalassa and Iris simply looked confused. Machi was staring with wide eyes, a smile spreading across his face. Luke gestured to the man in Maya's robes. "Thalassa, Machi, Iris... This is Clark Triton. My dad."

Machi leapt from the piano stool and across the room, grabbing Clark's hand to vigorously shake. "Hello, Mister Triton! It is nice to meet you!"

"And it's nice to meet you, too." Clark looked the boy up and down with a friendly smile. "You must be Machi. Luke was just telling me about you."

Machi nodded. "And Luke tell me, you go to university with Professor Layton?"

Luke only blushed harder as he noticed his siblings snickering nearby. "Well... it's true."

"Mmhm." Clark returned his smile to Machi. "I imagine Luke's also told you all about the various adventures he went on with my old friend. The only reason I know anything about Hershel's travels over the years is because of Luke's stories; Hershel was always too modest to talk about them himself."

Luke tried and failed not to turn even redder. "I don't talk about them that much..."

Trucy gave him a knowing grin. "Yeah, you do."

Luke bit his lip and tried his best to ignore his siblings' continued snickering and his father's chuckling. Even Machi was hiding giggles.

Iris stepped away from the piano and directed towards Clark a modest bow. "It's a pleasure to meet you, Mister Triton." She pointed to the nearby table. "Would you like to sit down? The children were in the middle of a game-"

"But we can finish it later!" Pearl grinned, already working to move the various piles of cards and counters away from the edges of the table, to be most out-of-the-way.

Phoenix snatched up the box with a snort, standing to carry it elsewhere. "I'll go get the extra cushions, shall I?"

It didn't take long for everyone to sit back down around the table... though Clark did stumble a bit, fighting to keep Maya's skirt from riding up his legs. He ended up sitting between Luke and Machi, with Apollo and Trucy on Machi's side and Iris and Thalassa on Luke's. Phoenix and Pearl sat opposite.

"Mister Triton." Thalassa held out her hand across the table. "Thalassa Gramarye. I'm not sure how much Luke has told you about me."

"Ah yes, Apollo's and Trucy's mother." Clark shook her hand with a polite smile. "I didn't hear the details, but it sounded like a long story." Their handshake over, he folded his hands neatly in his lap. "Apparently you were privy to one of Hershel's famous 'trips'?"

Thalassa almost laughed. "Yes, we went to Borginia to recover my memory. Professor Layton and his family more than lived up to the rumours... in a very dramatic way."
Clark snorted. "He's always somehow had a knack for that. Even so, when Luke here wanted to tag along," he rested a hand on his son's shoulder, "Brenda and I knew we could trust Hershel to look after him."

Iris cocked her head to one side. "Brenda? Who's she?"

View Luke's Notebook
A resounding silence fell upon the room. The Wrights, Feys and Clark all stared at Iris with wide eyes. Thalassa and Machi merely looked just as confused as Iris. Luke turned bright red, shrinking in his seat and staring at the floor.

Pearl reached over and tapped her sister's arm, whispering "Iris! She's Luke's mother, remember? I told you!"

Iris gasped. "Oh! I'm so sorry, I forgot!" She winced, twirling a finger in her hair. "It's been a while since it was explained to me..."

Machi leaned forward to look around Clark, to where Luke was sitting. "Luke, you said your mother go to university with Professor Layton also, yes?"

Luke recoiled further, hiding his face behind the brim of his cap.

"She did indeed." Clark rested a hand on the boy's shoulder. "That was where Brenda and I first met, in fact. After we both graduated, we got married and eventually had Luke. We even appointed Hershel as his godfather."

Machi frowned, then pulled out his phone, muttering "Godfather..."

"Kumiseta," Thalassa translated for him.

"Ah!" Machi dropped the phone, turning back to Clark and Luke with an excited smile. "Professor Layton is Luke's kumiseta!?"

Apollo rolled his eyes, sharing a smirk with Trucy. "Here we go..."

"Careful, Machi," Phoenix chuckled. "When the Professor actually has time to visit us again, you're just going to lose your mind fanboying at this rate."

Machi blushed, but his grin didn't fade, and he kept his attention on the Tritons. "We get meet Luke's mother too, yes?"

"N-no, Machi." Trucy awkwardly grinned, patting her younger brother's arm. "Not for a while yet. We gotta find her first!" She tried to laugh, but it only sounded even more awkward when faced with Machi's confused look.

Clark watched the exchange with concern, then turned to Luke, who was still hiding his face. "Did you... not tell them what happened?"

Another silence. Apollo and Trucy edged closer together, sending embarrassed glances towards Thalassa and Machi, who shared the same kind of confused expressions as Iris and Pearl, though for different reasons.

Phoenix stared at Luke with the same kind of worry as Clark, but hid it under a grin. "Oh, I'm sure it's come up. We've mentioned that car accident before, haven't we, Thalassa?"

Thalassa reluctantly nodded. "A car accident that led to Luke's and Apollo's adoption, yes... But I'm afraid that's all the information I was ever given."

Clark sighed. He shot one final concerned glance at his son before turning to Thalassa with a polite smile. He pressed a hand to his chest. "I'm an archaeologist, same as Hershel. I was working in the research department at the university, when I got offered a job here in Los Angeles." He lowered his hands, clutching them tightly together on the table. "Myself, my wife Brenda, and our son Luke were all set to make the big move from England... but, upon our arrival, our car crashed into something on the road. My wife was kidnapped, and I... passed on thanks to my injuries." He cast another worried glance at Luke. "By some miracle, they left Luke alone. It's only thanks to Miss Fey's abilities I have been able to see my son grow up, with a family that cares about him as much as Brenda and I do."

Luke bit his lip hard, then collapsed forwards into a half-ball, burying his face in his hands as he began to shake with erupting sobs. "D-Dad, I'm so sorry!"

Clark jumped, alarmed, and moved to pat his son's shoulder. "Luke, what could you possibly have done to be sorry about?"

Trucy leapt to her feet, circling the table to her middle brother's side, and Apollo wasn't far behind her. She plopped down next to Luke, her back to the table, and threw her arms around his front in a tight hug. "It's okay, Luke. We're here for you, okay?"

Apollo knelt behind Luke, a hand on his back. "Yeah, no-one blames you for not wanting to talk about it. It's fine."

"That's not it!" Despite his loud sobs, Luke managed to shift his arms out from between him and Trucy, returning her hug. "I'm... I'm never going to find Mum!"

Clark froze, disbelief on his face. "What?"

"That's nonsense." Apollo jumped up on his knees, hopping closer to his brother's side to look him in the face with a stern frown. "What about what Valant told us after the concert? We've made progress, Luke."

"No, we haven't." Luke reluctantly pulled away from Trucy, looking up to his elder brother's face. "Think about it, Apollo: It's illegal to make large quantities of identical face-masks in California, and has been for over a decade. Whoever was, is, behind the Forest Road kidnappings has unrestricted access to that kind of technology. More than likely, they've put up a front of a legitimate business to recoup the costs of getting that technology."

Apollo nodded. "Exactly. That puts us much closer to finding your mom."

Luke sighed. "No, it doesn't." He pressed a hand to his face. "I thought it did too at first, but once the trial was over, and everyone had left, and I actually had time to think about it..." He met Apollo's gaze again with a pained expression. "Even assuming their business is still running all these years later... How would we identify them now?"

Apollo paused. He opened his mouth to reply, then closed it again, frowning in thought.

Trucy held Luke's forearms tight, looking up at him with a worried look. "You could do what you were doing before, couldn't you?"

Luke shook his head, turning his attention to his sister. "Before, we were just directly asking them for access to their records to investigate a murder. The ones that were agreeable told us outright they'd never filled big orders, and the other ones just... told us to get lost, in not-so-nice words." He hung his head. "Exactly how much better do you think it would go if we were asking them, 'Did you kidnap an untold number of people seven-to-ten years ago and kill a few in the process'?

Trucy winced, looking away.

"All Valant did was invalidate our entire investigation," Luke continued, his voice quiet. "We're so close... but we're further away than ever."

Trucy leaned forward to hug him again. Luke returned it.

Clark continued to watch his son with growing concern, his grip on Luke's shoulder tightening. "Luke..."

Machi jumped up from his cushion and circled behind Clark before again dropping to the floor, gripping Luke's back in a hug that mirrored Trucy's.

Apollo moved his hand away from the incoming fourteen-year-old just in time, shifting it to Luke's shoulder, opposite to Clark. "There has to be something we could do," he muttered with a frown. "We could... We could go back to the records of all the kidnappings. Or re-investigate Forest Road itself. If we contacted Ema, I'm sure she'd agree to help us out."

Luke sighed. "If we didn't find anything on Forest Road seven years ago, we certainly won't find anything now. And I've already gone back over the records; They're exactly as useless as they've always been. What could Ema possibly help us with?"

Apollo shrugged. "Well, she's a detective. She might be able to do something from the police side of things."

There was a long pause, then Luke pulled away from Trucy to stare his elder brother in the eyes. "Apollo, it's been seven years. As far as the law is concerned, all those people are dead now. Why would they care anymore?"

Apollo winced, removing his hand. "W-well... They'll still have that unsolved case just sitting there, and re-classified from just disappearances to serial murders! I'm sure they want to close it just as much as we do!"

Across the table, Phoenix got to his feet, silencing anything Luke may have been preparing to say in reply. He passed the awkward Fey sisters and Thalassa, and came to a stop next to Apollo. Seeing his stern eyes, the eldest Wright child hurriedly shifted back to make room, and Phoenix carefully lowered himself to the floor in the newly-available space. Once he was settled, he looked his middle child in the eyes. "Luke. What you need right now is a break."

"A break!?" Luke nearly burst into tears again, frantically waving a hand. "All a break is is sitting around doing nothing! I've been doing so much of that ever since Mum disappeared, that's why I've lost any chance I had of finding her and-!"

Phoenix held up a hand, again silencing Luke in an instant. "Believe me, I know: The years pass, and you don't make any significant progress, and you feel completely useless to the point of wondering why you even bother, since it's clear you're never going to reach your goal no matter how hard you try. I know." His gaze turned stern. "What do you think I've been doing for the past seven years?"

Luke bit his lip, looking down. It was all too easy to forget he and Phoenix had been in the same Phoenix's expression softened. "I understand. It's very easy to get wrapped up in the investigation at the expense of everything else... and it's the hardest thing in the world to put it down and ignore it when it means everything to you. But you have to recognise when you're doing more harm than good, and step back for a bit. You've been banging your head against a wall over this since July, right?"

Luke blushed and nodded.

"Then it's time to put the problem down for a little while. When you come back to it, you'll have a clear head to re-evaluate the entire thing from scratch, and work out what to do next. And don't be afraid to ask for help, either." He smiled. "I did promise you, right after that crash, that I'd help any way I could, no matter what. That offer's still open, any time you want to take it."

Luke sniffed and rubbed his nose, giving himself time to think. He remembered that first weekend after his and Apollo's adoption, when they went to Forest Road to look for clues. All they'd found was a blood-soaked bracelet Brenda had bought back in New York when the Tritons got off the boat, abandoned under a bush. Just like the police had, they made no further progress... until Maya first channelled Clark, but even then all they'd learned was that Brenda had been kidnapped by a group of twenty-to-thirty people in identical face-masks. For months afterward, Luke tried to locate and contact every single manufacturer of face-masks in the region, but was forced to give up when none agreed to talk to a child about a thing as private as their client history. Having hit a brick wall, Luke put the entire investigation on hold, going to England to study at Gressenheller and managing to completely forget about the search until nearly a year after he'd returned... the day he'd remembered co-incidentally being the American Mother's Day right after Apollo's first trial. He and Apollo had visited quite a few companies in person over the following months (being faced with two adults and an attorney's badge made their targets much more willing to talk), though they'd not managed to do much else other than cross a few helpful companies off Luke's list. Valant's hint that the large order they'd been looking for was illegal had explained why they'd been having such a difficult time on their existing strategy, but it hadn't given them a new lead to follow. Luke hadn't been privy to the investigation into Phoenix's disbarment until it was coming to an end, but he suspected his adoptive father had hit just as many obstacles over the years, if not more... and hadn't put the entire thing on hold for four years to focus on something else. It made sense Phoenix had more experience with burn-out than Luke did.

"Okay." Luke sighed. "I'll... I'll take a break."

"Good." Phoenix plopped a hand on top of Luke's head, smiling warmly at his son. "Don't worry. You're making more progress than you think you are. We'll find your mother."

Luke managed a weak smile of his own. "Thank you, Papa." He leaned past Trucy to give Phoenix a quick hug.

Phoenix chuckled, returning the gesture. "That's what I'm here for."

---

View the Court Record
After Luke's breakdown, the conversation in the Feys' living room had progressed much more smoothly. Apollo and Phoenix returned to their seats, though Trucy and Machi stayed huddled around Luke, and Pearl even joined them. Clark got along well with Iris and Thalassa once the awkwardness of his death was overcome, and Luke suspected this was mainly because they were in his age-range - After all, Clark had been thirty-five when he died, putting him close to Iris' thirty-two and Thalassa's forty-one... though adding the seven years since his death put Clark slightly older than Thalassa if Luke wanted to be technical. He even pointed this out when the discussion next came to a natural pause.

Clark hummed thoughtfully when he heard Thalassa's age. "If it's been seven years... Brenda will be that age by now."

"Oh?" Thalassa seemed intrigued.

Luke bit his lip at the thought of his mother being as old as the Gramarye matriarch, but didn't say anything.

Clark didn't seem to notice his son's reaction, giving Thalassa a smile and a nod. "I think the two of you would really get along."

Thalassa laughed. "I can't wait."

Finally, the hour allotted for Clark's visit came to an end.

"It was wonderful to meet you all," the elder Triton insisted, patting Machi's head as he got to his feet. "Maybe, if Luke remembers to have me channelled when Miss, or Missus Fey returns in another two years time, we can all meet again."

Luke blushed, standing at his father's side. "Dad, I won't forget."

Machi giggled. "I hope so. It was nice to meet you, Mister Triton. I hope we see you again."

"Absolutely perfect English." Clark grinned at the proud teen, then returned his attention to Luke. "Shall we go?"

After a few more waved goodbyes, Clark and Luke headed out to the hallway. It had become a part of the tradition, Luke couldn't say when, that whenever Maya or Pearl channelled someone for the Wrights, it always began and ended in the Channelling Chamber. He supposed the reasons were to do with Fey traditions, though he couldn't name them. Regardless, Clark had followed it himself twice now, so there was no need to discuss it on this third occasion.

Clark rested a hand on Luke's shoulder as they walked back to the Meditation Room. "You seem to be having a rough time of it lately."

Luke blinked, meeting his father's concerned eyes. A moment later, he blushed and looked away.
"Oh..." It was easy to forget that, the last time Clark had visited, Luke was still recovering from the chaos of Pound's murder, his own terrifying trial, and Reindeer's conviction. He'd burst into tears the moment Clark appeared, and it took him ten minutes to calm down. Today's visit, with Luke's complete breakdown over the search for Brenda, hadn't gone much better in comparison. "I-it's just... two bad days. That both happened when you were here." Luke clutched his arms together, staring at the floor beneath his feet. "That's all."

Clark's grip on his son's shoulder tightened, and Luke didn't need to look to know he'd not exactly been very convincing. "Luke..."

"H-honest, Dad. I've gotten over that trial now, and work's going really well." Luke couldn't make himself look up, and briefly lamented his role as the lone Wright family member who couldn't lie to save his life. "A-and, with Papa and Apollo to help me, I'm sure looking for Mum will go much better in future. When I next see you in two years time, I... M-maybe we'll even have found her by then. You'll see."

"Luke." Clark pulled his son aside, placing both hands on his shoulders and halting their walk. Luke couldn't help but finally meet his father's concerned eyes. "I just want you to be happy. Time may pass in an instant for me, but it's no less painful to think that, when Miss Fey next lends me her body like this, you'll have faced untold suffering in my absence."

Luke blinked back tears. "Dad..."

"I know you have your papa and your brothers and sister to look out for you, but I'm your father, your Dad. I can't help but worry."

"Even when you were running off with Hershel, I worried about you."

"No." Clark gave his son a warm look. "Because it was what you wanted, and we trusted Hershel to look after you. But we still worried."

'And by 'we', he means him and Mum...' Luke sniffed, then leaned forward and wrapped his arms around his father's chest. "Sometimes, I forget... how much I miss you and Mum... and our life back in London. It... It's been seven years, but... It still hurts, having lost you. Having lost everything."

Clark moved his hands to Luke's back, giving the young man comforting pats. "If we'd had any idea of what was going to happen that night, you know we would have avoided it. The painful truth is, we simply couldn't predict that crash. There's nothing we can do but the old British spirit of 'keep calm and carry on'."

Luke choked on a snort of laughter through his restrained tears, holding Clark tighter. "I just keep telling myself I'm fine. Apollo and Clay taught me that. Just keep saying it as loud as you can until you believe it."

Clark chuckled. "It's the same thing in the end."

Luke belatedly remembered he'd told his father about the Chords of Steel routine before. "I-I am fine, though. I've got Papa, and Apollo, and Trucy... and Maya and Pearl, and Machi... and Thalassa and Iris would probably help me too, if I needed them. I... It was because of all of them I decided to stay here in California. I turned down going back to England, because my family is here, and I didn't want to leave them. Not just Mum, wherever she's been hidden... but everyone else too."

"Precisely." Clark gave Luke a squeeze, then pulled out of the hug with a smile, resting his hands on his son's shoulders again. "That's why I know I can trust them to look after you... despite me being a big old worrywart."

Luke snorted. "Dad..." He got the feeling he'd just hijacked a speech Clark was gearing up to say.

"Although you don't need 'looking after' anymore, do you?" Clark sighed, his expression nostalgic. "You're a grown man now, as hard as that is to believe. I may be restricted only to snapshots of your life since the crash, but it still feels like it was only yesterday you were born."

Luke could only blush in response.

"You'll find your mother. I know you will." Clark planted a quick kiss on Luke's forehead. "Just don't let this investigation kill you in the meantime, huh?"

"I won't." Luke adjusted his hat, thinking. "I will take a break, like Papa suggested. Though..." He winced. "There is one last thing I need to do first."

"What's that?"

"Maya." Luke glanced up and down the kimono Clark was wearing, covering the body that wasn't truly his. "Before she goes, I need to ask her to try channelling Mum... just to check she's still alive."

Back in the Channelling Chamber, father and son gave each other one last hug.

"See you in two years, Dad."

"For me, it will be only a second."

Luke chuckled, tightening his grip around Clark's chest. He focussed on the hug, not wanting to know the moment his father left. Hands alternated patting and rubbing his back, and Luke pretended it was Clark moving them for as long as he possibly could.

"You okay, kiddo?"

Maya grinned. "That's what I'm here for."

Luke managed a small giggle in reply before his smile faded. "There was... one more thing, though. Could you check on my mum?"

"Brenda Triton?" Maya winked. "I'd be happy to." She shifted back a bit, closer to the altar behind her, and knelt on the floor. Her hands moved into her channelling pose in an instant, her eyes already closed.

Taking a deep breath, Luke shuffled back and dropped to the floor himself, his head lowered. He always dreaded doing this. The possibility that he'd look up and find himself face-to-face with his mother was terrifying. He trusted Maya to do her best to succeed regardless of his feelings, but he was pretty sure he would never be capable of handling a situation where Brenda had died before he could find her. He'd searched too long and too hard to accept a failure of that magnitude. The fear of losing her was the primary motivator behind his investigation since he'd restarted it earlier that year, and he could feel the panic rising that she was still out there in that mountainous forest, perhaps only days from death, and that he couldn't risk wasting a single moment locating her if he ever wanted to see her again... outside of Fey Manor, anyway.

'Now come on, Luke. It's precisely this fear that Papa is trying to protect you from by ordering the break. If Mum's survived this long, she'll last a little longer. I'm not doing anyone any favours by killing myself on this, least of all Mum.'

His own scoldings didn't do much to calm the panic, though.

"Luke?"

The young man jumped, head up with panicked eyes. "Huh?"

Maya smiled. "I couldn't find her. She's still alive."

Luke abruptly burst into tears again with sheer relief, leaping forward to throw his arms around Maya. "Oh thank goodness..."

"Hey, it's okay." Maya patted his back. This was, to Luke's frustration, his usual reaction to a failed channelling of Brenda, so she was very practised in calming the young man down. "You get all those tears out if you need to, kiddo."

Luke shook in her arms for a minute or two as he slowly brought himself back under control. It took far longer than he wanted, but finally he felt able to unwrap himself from her neck and sit back on his own legs, rubbing the wetness from his eyes and cheeks. "I'm... I'm sorry."

Maya gave him a stern look. "Don't apologise. I keep telling you." She smiled again, patting his shoulder. "I know how awful it is not to have your mom around when you most want her to be there. It's important to be able to have a good cry about that every once in a while."

Luke sniffed and nodded. "Then thank you. And thank you for checking on my mum."

"No problem, kiddo." Maya watched Luke fondly as they both got to their feet. "Are you ready to face the others?"

Luke thought a moment, then shook his head. "I'll just go rest in my room for a while. Will you tell the others I'm okay?"

"Of course." Maya gave Luke a second, much shorter, hug. "You take all the time you need."

Luke smiled as he hugged her back.
Mondays were always a very quiet day for the Agency. Luke had his other job at the shelter to attend to, and Trucy and Machi were at school, leaving only Phoenix and Apollo around on a usual day.

Unfortunately, today was not quite 'usual'.

It had now been a week since Thalassa's return to California, and hers was a presence Apollo was still adjusting to. He loved that she was back in their lives, and that he had ready access to his birth mother whenever he wanted it (within reason, of course), but they'd only had four 'office' days with her so far and Thalassa had yet to settle in to a regular schedule. Whether or not she would appear on any particular day was so far turning out to be a perfect fifty-fifty: Tuesday, she'd showed up on time, helping Apollo and Luke process most of the letters and photos from Magnifi's memory box. Wednesday, she'd been absent getting started with converting some of the various rooms of her apartment into studio workspaces, so she would never have to go far when she wanted to record a quick demo... and Thursday, she'd been late joining everyone else at Hickfield precisely because she was getting down a sudden song idea that had hit her overnight. Lastly, on Friday, she'd been out interviewing various producers to replace her former Borginian one, and it was this same reason she'd given Apollo the previous evening to pre-emptively explain her absence today. Though there was nothing about her that was 'usual' yet, at least Apollo knew not to expect to see her. It would probably be another several weeks before Thalassa had a 'usual'.

Relatedly, with the passing of Thalassa's first week back in their lives, Maya's final week in America had begun. She was only going to be away for two years, but it still felt to Apollo like it was going to be forever, and he suspected everyone else was harbouring similar feelings... not just their family, but in what was left of Kurain Village's aging Council of Elders too. Somehow, Maya had convinced them to give her this final week off for an early handover of her 'duties', and she showed up at the office that morning happily boasting:

"I mean, they're taking over everything in my absence anyway, so why not start a week early while I'm still around in case they get it wrong?"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow. "In case they get it wrong? Aren't they the ones who decide when something's been done wrong?"

Maya scoffed and waved him off. "Anyway, I figured there's no point wasting my time doing spiritual training - I'll be doing enough of that once I'm in Khura'ìn - so I thought I'd make the most of my time with my fiancé and future step-children!" She grinned at Apollo, only to then pause and tap her cheek. "Not that most of them are actually around today..." She shrugged. "Oh well. I'm here now."

Apollo couldn't help laughing.

It had taken five minutes for the engaged couple to disappear into the apartment, leaving the office in Apollo's sole care. He could only sigh and settle himself down at his father's desk.
The Agency was very quiet indeed with only Apollo inside.

He didn't feel like watching TV, so Apollo passed the time browsing through his Court Record's files, organising old case records and the random notes that accumulated when he wasn't paying attention. He suspected he'd picked up the habit of constant note-taking from Luke, and it hadn't helped that it was so easy to do so once he had his own Court Record; The computer tablets had their own text program, and, after struggling to get used to the touch keyboard, Apollo had ended up setting it to display in all-caps, rather than the mishmash of upper- and lower-case that was the results of his attempts to use the new-to-him touchscreen keyboard at speed. Over a year later, he'd gotten used to both the keyboard and the display as it was, so, although his typing skills were much improved, he hadn't bothered changing it. The only problem was that his files tended to get named random assortments of letters - 'BNOABO', 'OHUSBUG' and 'ASDFOKINBTG' were some of his latest - and Apollo so rarely remembered to go back and rename them later, so as not to get lost in the sea of unintelligible filenames. It was easy to get distracted reading the old notes, so he tried only to scan them to figure out their topic, then rename the file (splitting it into separate files if he had to) and move to the appropriate folder. Some he was able to consolidate - such as separate to-do lists he found, one in its own file and another tucked away at the bottom of a block of text where he mused on ideas for potential magic tricks - or outright delete - such as a page of ideas for things to ask Magnifi about when he was channelled two weekends back. Some functioned more as diary entries, his own version of the journal he knew Luke kept, except that his 'diary' took a lot longer to get down to his own satisfaction; He was still finishing up his entries on Machi's trial, after all.

Tossing another file into its allocated folder, Apollo opened up the next one, expecting to see more notes on the events of Vera's case for his 'diary'. 'I really need a better way to keep track of my goals while in the middle of an investigation...' Instead, he found the top of something he'd nearly forgotten about:

RHEA FORTUNA - LOOK UP LATER

HIT ON HEAD WITH LIGHTER, SAW NOTHING

LEFT ME WITH NAHYUTA WHILE PERFORMED, WENT TO BED, WOKEN BY ME CRYING, FOUND BUILDING ON FIRE, TRIED TO ESCAPE BUT PATH BLOCKED, HEARD WOMAN NEARBY, WENT TO HELP, WOMAN WAS QUEEN, HIT ON HEAD, FELL TO FLOOR, SOMETHING REFLECTED IN PLATE ON FLOOR, LIGHTER FELL, THING LEFT, TRIED REACHING FOR ME BUT PASSED OUT

Below was a rewriting of Jove's story, using the bullet point notes as a guide and with added details Apollo hadn't had the time to write down originally. He vividly remembered, that night after meeting Jove, lying in his bed up in Kurain as he fleshed out the hurried notes into something more readable. Underneath that was a diary entry, his own musings on getting to meet his birth father for the first, and more-than-likely only, time. Apollo had to force himself not to read it, knowing he would get sucked in to the memories of that day in an instant. He closed the file, quickly renamed it 'JOVE JUSTICE', then tossed it into the folder labelled 'PERSONAL'.

'There. Now back to organising.'

Apollo reached out with his finger to open the next file... but paused before touching the screen.
He'd been planning to run a search on his paternal grandmother's name once they returned to the city... but, after the curveball of how Jove died, and the visit from Clark Triton the next day, Apollo had instead forgotten all about it. If he didn't do something about that right now, he'd just forget again, and never find out what kind of lawyer Rhea Fortuna was, or where she worked, or even the kind of cases she handled... but, if he got distracted looking her up right this instant, he'd only be putting off the important work of organising his notes til later. Again.

'On the one hand, I always have notes to organise, so it would be great to actually finish this job for once. On the other hand, just putting my grandmother's name in a to-do list feels kinda wrong...'

Apollo sighed, then navigated to and re-opened the file labelled 'JOVE JUSTICE'. Soon enough, there would be a 'RHEA FORTUNA' to join it.
ALL OVER CALIFORNIA JUST TO FIND WHERE SHE LIVED.

View the Court Record
Phoenix couldn't help but feel concerned for whatever his eldest son was up to today.

Maya's arrival at the office had been unexpected, but Phoenix welcomed it all the same. He hadn't meant to let her drag him off into the apartment for two hours (and what they did in private he would never tell Apollo on his life), but he couldn't say he hadn't enjoyed the opportunity to spend more time with her before she left. After their... activities, he did one last check to make sure neither he nor Maya had somehow put their clothes back on wrong, then they'd gone downstairs for lunch... only to find Apollo in the midst of heading out.

"I need to go to the library, to look some stuff up. Can I leave the office with you, Dad?"

"Um, sure."

Phoenix and Maya stayed in the office that afternoon... and didn't get up to anything else purely thanks to Phoenix's fear of a potential client walking in on them, which Maya luckily listened to. Thalassa's interview with her potential producer had ended earlier than expected, so she arrived at the office to join them sometime around two. Just the three of them sitting around chatting reminded Phoenix so heavily of that first week, before the younger Gramaryes knew their mother had returned. Of course, that was the past now, and much of their talk was specifically about work and how said children fitted into it, which was enough to remind Phoenix not to drift off into the memories.

"Speaking of the children..." Thalassa looked around the office curiously from her spot on one of the couches. "Where is Apollo?"

"He left earlier," Maya explained, sat opposite with Phoenix at her side. "Said he had to look something up at the library."

Thalassa frowned. "And what is he looking up?"

Phoenix shrugged. "Search me. He didn't say. Any ideas?"

Thalassa sighed and shook her head. "No. I'm afraid I'm as lost as you are."

Apollo returned in the middle of the afternoon, wandering into the office with his eyes scanning three sheets of paper in his hand. He was so distracted, he didn't even glance towards his three parents on the sofa, his focus on heading straight for the desk at the back of the room.

Phoenix and Maya both fought to stifle their giggles. Once Apollo was passing the piano, Phoenix shot a grin over his shoulder. "And a good afternoon to you, too."

Apollo jumped a bit at being addressed, glancing to the sofas. "Oh, um, hey Dad, Mom." He took another few steps before pausing again, giving them a double-take and staring at Thalassa. "Mom?! When did you get here?"
Maya scoffed. "I've been here since this morning. You forget already?"

Apollo blushed crimson as the three adults laughed. "Mom Thalassa. You knew I meant her."

"I finished early, and thought I'd join everyone here." Thalassa smiled. "Phoenix and Maya told me you went to the library."

"Yeah, I did." Apollo bit his lip as he shuffled the papers in his hand. "I, um... I found some things."

Phoenix raised his eyebrows. "Oh really? Going to share?"

Apollo nodded, still looking awkward. He didn't make any move to join them.

Thalassa patted the sofa at her side. "We're always ready to listen, when you want to talk."

Apollo considered her words for a long moment. Finally, he managed a small smile and moved across to sit at her side.

Maya jumped forward in her seat, leaning towards their son with a wide grin. "So, what you got for us, kiddo?"

Chuckling, Apollo deliberately held his papers close to his chest so not even Thalassa could peek. "Well... I don't think you two were there when I was telling the others about this." His gaze on Phoenix and Maya opposite, he jerked his head to point at Thalassa next to him. "When we met my birth father on Saturday, he was telling us about his mom, and that she died when he was a kid."

"Ah, yes: Rhea Fortuna was her name, I believe." Thalassa turned her eyes to the ceiling thoughtfully. "He said she was a lawyer of some kind, but that's all he remembered about her."

Phoenix blinked, eyes wide. "Really?"

Maya gasped. "That's awesome! You've got more than two lawyers in your family tree, Apollo!" She bounced a bit in her seat, still grinning. "Is that what you were doing at the library? Looking her up?"

Apollo nodded. "I couldn't find anything online, so I thought I'd try the newspaper archives at the library." He indicated the papers in his hand. "And... well, I found her."

Maya shuffled even further forward on her seat. "And?"

Phoenix rolled his eyes. He would never let on that it was Maya's (incredibly adorable) enthusiasm that was keeping him looking so outwardly calm about the whole thing. In truth, he was as intrigued as her.

Apollo stifled a giggle, turning his attention to his papers. "Just like he said, she was a lawyer in California. Not down here though; She lived in this really small town in the north, past San Francisco." He showed the top sheet in his collection to Thalassa, who reached out a hand to take it. "Once I found this article about her death, it was a lot easier to trace her. Apparently she was shot when a gunman stormed the courtroom mid-trial."

Maya gasped again, though this time with sorrowful eyes. "Aw, that's so sad..."

Phoenix rubbed his chin with a hand. "She was a trial lawyer? What kind?"

"A defence attorney, actually." Apollo shrugged, a slight blush on his cheeks. The hint of pride soon faded as he solemnly continued, "The guy who shot her was the brother of a guy the prosecutor had convicted the previous day, so he was after revenge and... well, I guess he got confused about which side of the room was the prosecution."

Thalassa had a slight frown on her face as she read the article in her hands. "He killed both lawyers, the judge, and even a bailiff before he was disarmed and taken into custody."

Apollo nodded. "This was back in nineteen-ninety, which is why I couldn't find anything online."

Thalassa leaned back against the sofa cushions, still reading the article. "The same year my mother died... Rhea Fortuna was only twenty-five. Jove would have been six at most. I wonder if his father ever even told him what had happened?"

Phoenix frowned, thinking. He wanted to say such a situation would never happen today, especially with the kind of security their district's courthouse boasted, but said courthouse once had a defendant literally disappear from the witness stand, and anything that could be broken out of could equally be broken in to. It also concerned him that Apollo's grandmother and father had in turn died progressively younger... though, as Apollo had already surpassed Jove's age of death, it was more likely Phoenix was just seeing a pattern where there wasn't one.

Maya watched their son with concerned eyes. "Did you find out anything else about her?"

"Not much." Apollo sighed, his eyes on the two sheets still in his grip. "Her death was the biggest news-worthy thing to happen to her, which is why the article about it was the first thing I found... and it's from a San Francisco paper." He shrugged. "It gave me a location to find her in, but there really wasn't anything else new."

Phoenix gestured to Apollo's papers. "So, what are those? You found something other than that article, didn't you?"

Apollo snorted, flashing their contents to his father. "One's her obituary, the other's her birth announcement; It's not news that she was born or died." His smirk turned to a frown, the young man looking down at the papers in his hands. "These are the only other mentions of her in our library's archives, and both from papers covering the San Francisco area. I'd probably have to actually go to the town she lived in to find anything else."

Thalassa rested a hand on Apollo's shoulder. "If it's what you need to do, dear."

"That's just it: I don't know if I do." Apollo sighed, placing his papers on the table in front of him. "Don't get me wrong, it's super interesting finding out all this stuff about my biological ancestors that I never knew before... but, like... I don't know if it's really worth it going to that much trouble to find anything more." He pressed his hands to his knees, leaning on the outstretched arms. "From what my father told us, the man Rhea Fortuna married was an abusive asshole. I found out his name when I found her obituary, and... and I really don't want to know anything more about him. Finding out more about my grandmother will inevitably give me more about him, and I don't know if I want that." He chuckled bitterly. "Besides, it's kinda a bad time to be running off right now, isn't it?"

Maya scoffed, placing a hand to her chest with a mock-offended look. "Oh, you mean me? I didn't know you felt that way, Apollo."

Apollo blushed, failing to ignore his parents' muffled laughter. "Uh, n-not like that... I mean, with you leaving, and Dad going with you, right now is a bad time for me to be going anywhere too... You know?"

Maya grinned, reaching forward to pat her son's hand. "Don't worry, I know what you meant."
Apollo sighed, trying to look annoyed, but he couldn't hide the tiny smile on his lips.

Thalassa placed the article she'd been reading on the small pile next to Apollo. "Whatever you do next, you can count on our support, no matter what it is."

"Yeah, I know." Apollo hid his blush behind a tight focus on collecting the papers he'd walked in with. "Thank you. All three of you."

[View the Court Record]
And here it is, the beginning of the end.
You may or may not remember, but a while ago I decided I was going to go ahead and finally break this monster of a fic into multiple smaller ones... but I didn't want to end the original in the middle of a storyline, so I was waiting for the beginning of the next major arc to mark this as 'complete' and move on.
And that time has finally come.
The actual story itself will continue, just in a new 'work' under the Luke and Apollo Wright series. If you're already subscribed to that, or are following Turnabout Adoption, you'll know when the next storyline starts going up. For now though, we've got six more chapters being uploaded over the following week. I hope you all enjoy them!

October 20, 1:53PM
Drew Studio

Five days had passed since Vera had returned home from the hospital. Today marked two weeks since her father had suddenly collapsed in the middle of their shared studio in the front room, the beginning of the whirlwind that had given Vera the courage to put away her 'lucky charm' and work to overcome her fears for herself and herself alone. It was difficult, getting used to the house being so empty... but the Wrights had left a list of their phone numbers and assured her she could call them any time she needed to, for whatever reason. Knowing she wasn't the best talker, Luke had even assisted her in picking out what he called a 'mobile phone'; Once it arrived, he told her, she would be able to 'text' - send short written messages - instead of having to use her voice on her father's old landline. In the meantime, Vera tried simply to get used to living alone: She'd handled her very first grocery delivery the previous Friday, and though she'd felt stupid staring wordlessly at the kind man bringing everything in, at least now she knew how the whole thing worked. She was certain, next time, she'd have the courage to thank them before they left.

Today marked another important step in Vera overcoming her agoraphobia: As had been arranged last week, Thalassa and Phoenix were coming to visit, and the three planned to go out together to paint and draw. Vera had been fretting over the outing all weekend, getting out her nervousness in repeated sketches of dark corners of the house, so black the paper was nearly completely covered in graphite. She'd worn her pencil to a stub in the process, and was quickly working her way through a second. Now the day had come though, she had made herself put the sketchbook down, collecting together an easel, her stool, a canvas, and some assorted paints, all ready to go out and capture whatever might catch her interest in the world outside.

Vera just hoped her courage would hold out long enough to do so.

Knocks on her front door never failed to startle Vera, no matter where in the house she was. It was still an effort not to run and hide at the sound, as she used to, but she was getting better at heading straight for the door rather than away from it. There had been knocking on her door that very morning - a smiling woman with a package and a small device for Vera to sign - so she felt a little more practised as she hurried to attend to the problem a second time. At least now she was reasonably certain who she'd see when she opened the door.

"Hello, Vera!"

Vera couldn't help a stare, her hands clutching the edge of the door. "Luke..." The young man was standing on her doorstep, hugging a silver rectangle to his chest with a friendly smile. Behind him, she could see his car on the road, with Phoenix and Thalassa stood nearby, the pair deep in conversation.

Luke giggled. "Sorry, did you forget I was coming, too?" He pointed a thumb behind him. "Thalassa was worried about carrying her new easel and paints all the way out here, so I offered to drive. That's why we had to wait for this afternoon, because I have my other job to go to on Tuesday mornings."

Now Vera thought about it, she did remember it being mentioned that Luke would be going with them, providing his car to carry their easels. She gave Luke a nod.

Vera nodded again, and stepped back to open the way inside, still clutching the edge of the door.

Luke stepped in, casually looking around. It didn't take long for his eyes to land on the table, where Vera had arranged her supplies. "Oh!" He slipped the rectangle in his arms into his satchel, hurrying towards the pile. "Your new phone came!"

Belatedly, Vera remembered the white box sitting next to her supplies, the item she had extracted from the parcel she received that morning. "Yes... I was not sure how to make it work..."

"That's alright. I'll show you everything you need to know." Luke shot her a friendly smile, picking up the box to tuck away in his satchel. "I'll get started setting it up while you three are painting. We can save time that way."

Vera thought over his words for a long moment. Finally, she managed a small smile. "Thank you."

It was a lot easier this time to make the trip from her front door to Luke's car out on the road. Vera supposed it was probably because she had her painting supplies to focus on, carrying them out to join Thalassa and Phoenix. Once again, Vera was directed into the front seat. At first, she simply watched the others arranging her things in the back of the car, but soon enough everyone else was joining her in their seats and they were able to get moving. It wasn't a long journey, certainly not when compared to her past trips to the detention centre or from the hospital; Luke took the car down the road and around a corner, then turned left to the side of the road, neatly slotting themselves between other cars either side. The nose of the car faced an orange brick wall, the same one Vera knew was across the road from her house.

"Here we are: Gourd Lake Park." Luke gestured towards the orange structure in front of them. "This is the closest I can get to the entrance... Sorry, Vera."

Vera followed the wall with her eyes. To her right, only barely visible around the other cars, she could see the gap Luke was referring to, where the wall opened into the tree-lined path beyond.

"Like we said last week, this is the perfect place to start," Phoenix said from behind her. "It's not too far from your home, and it's very quiet compared to other parks. Plus, the lake should be quite impressive for you two to paint, if there's not too much fog today."

"And for you to draw, Phoenix." Thalassa chuckled. "That is why you came with us."

Phoenix nervously laughed, rubbing the back of his head. "Ah, yeah, of course..."

Luke turned to Vera with a smile. "Are you ready to go?"

Vera thought a moment, then nodded.

Like Phoenix had said, it seemed quiet... not that Vera had the experience to compare to anywhere else. Carrying their stools, easels, canvases, and other various supplies, the group of four headed down the path to the opening into the park. Vera stuck close to her friends, keeping her focus on the bag of paints, brushes, and canvas in her arms and her eyes on the concrete beneath her shoes. It was easier this way, to ignore the occasional passer-by as they progressed into the park. She caught only glimpses of the trees they walked past, watching the gravel path turn to grass, listening to the subtle crunching of their steps as it changed in the transition.

"There's a lot of people over there, Papa..."

"Don't worry, I know a spot around here that's pretty much guaranteed to be quiet."

"I thought you said you hadn't been here in years, Phoenix."

"Just trust me."

Vera followed the faint slap of Phoenix's sandals as they left the path, stepping over the ankle-height fence and into the open woods. The feel and sound of the leaves under her feet was very calming, and the branches above dimmed the bright sunlight, making it easier to pretend they were merely in a corridor of a building. The distraction of needing to step over tree roots helped too, as long as she pretended they were just an incredibly messy floor.

Finally, their path emerged into a clearing, and Vera made herself look up long enough to register where she was: Phoenix had led them along the shore of the lake, where the grass extended nearly to the water's edge. The ground was scuffed in several places, and sections of grass flattened. Nearby, Vera spotted a sign reading 'No Camping', complete with pictures of a tent and a campfire.

"See? Just like I said." Phoenix gestured around the clearing with a proud grin. "Nice and quiet, with a great view of the lake. This part of the park will never change."

Luke raised an eyebrow at the flattened grass. "Have people always been ignoring that sign, too?"

"For at least a decade." Phoenix placed the stools in his arms down on the ground, one by one. "Shall we set up here, ladies?"

It was very strange for Vera, setting up her easel and stool on ground that wasn't solid wood... but, then again, it was also strange to be getting out her paints and brushes anywhere other than her studio. Regardless, she pushed through it, sitting on her stool and putting her brush to the canvas like she was back home. In her head, she pretended she had the world's most amazing painting in front of her, provided by her father, and, as always, it was her job to copy it. She only allowed herself very quick glances towards her companions, enough to see Thalassa making her own hesitant brushstrokes with a deep frown of concentration, and the slight smile on Phoenix's face as his pencil made repeated, rapid movements across the paper of his sketchbook. Luke sat in the dirt behind them, the packaging of Vera's new phone piled in front of him as he worked on the device itself.
Vera smiled. She knew her anxiety would only soar again when they packed up and left, but for now... Now was just perfect. For the first time in her memory, she was outside, with friends... and she was finally relaxed.
It was almost becoming a regular thing, Apollo and Thalassa going to meet Trucy and Machi as they left school for the day. Sure, they hadn't done this every day since Thalassa's return, but Trucy still sported the biggest smile every time she saw her mother and oldest brother waiting outside the gates, as if every instance was the first time all over again. Machi met them with a much more sedate grin, but his tight hugs proved he still appreciated their efforts as much as his sister did. The only downside to the whole thing, in Apollo's opinion, was that going to his younger siblings' school meant hiding his distinctive hair spikes under his magician's top hat: All these years later, Jinxie was still wary around him otherwise. As Apollo wasn't keen on rekindling her enthusiasm for slapping paper wards on his forehead, wearing his top hat offstage was an acceptable (though annoying as hell) alternative. At the very least, Jinxie was able to greet him with a smile of her own before bidding her friends farewell and heading off home herself.

As they usually did when it was just the four of them, the Gramaryes headed back to Thalassa's apartment for the afternoon, stopping only briefly by the agency to drop off school-bags and wave hello to Phoenix, Maya, and Luke. Apollo took the chance to drop off his hat while they were there, and only rolled his eyes at the teasing jibes Phoenix and Maya threw at him in the process. He knew they were aware of what Thalassa and Apollo were planning to share with the two teens once they were alone. Just in case, it was good to have the rest of their family so close nearby.

Trucy led the way into their mother's apartment, dashing ahead to admire the view from the balcony at the back. She sighed dramatically. "You could never get sick of a landscape like this..."

Apollo smirked, locked eyes with his mother, and counted to three on his fingers.

"Well, I'm sick of it now." Trucy spun around with a grin, and bounced to the sofas.

Machi hid a giggle and ran to join his sister.

Thalassa shook her head. "Must you say that every time you come over?" She sat down at her daughter's side, petting Trucy's hair with a soft smile. "I may start to think you don't appreciate it here."

Trucy stuck out her lip in a pout, whining, "Mommy..."

Apollo snorted, moving to sit with his family. "Truce, save the jokes for our show, huh?"

"You can't turn off funny, Polly." Trucy crossed her arms, sticking her nose in the air. "Just like everything else in life, you gotta practise to be good enough to perform it."

"Then why do you waste so much time practising terrible jokes instead of good ones?"

Trucy paused, then stuck out her tongue at him in reply.

Thalassa sighed. "Maybe if the two of you could stop bickering for a moment?"

Apollo and Trucy grinned sheepishly.
Machi, who had ended up between them, giggled. "But that just who they are, Aska."

Thalassa nodded, giving her children a warm smile. "True." She let the embarrassed pair squirm for a moment before gesturing to the table in front of them. "Apollo, don't we have something to show your siblings?"

"Yup." Apollo shot the confused teens a wink as he pulled his Court Record from his bag. "Guess what we finally finished doing today?"

Trucy cocked her head to one side. "What?"

Machi gasped, pointing to the computer in Apollo's hands. "You finished the letters and photos!"

Thalassa laughed. "Indeed we did."

"Wow, cool!" Trucy clapped her hands, leaning forward impatiently. "Let's see, Polly! C'mon!"

Apollo grinned, fingers tapping away on his computer screen. "Calm down, it's coming." Finally, he laid his Court Record down on the table where all four of them could see it, the display showing an open folder full of image files, neatly labelled by date. Apollo scrolled through the files, showing where the yellowing paper turned to more colourful photos. "As cool as the letters are, I think it's the pictures that are the most interesting."

"Because you in some of them," Machi pointed out.

Apollo shushed him.

Trucy giggled, grabbing the computer herself. "Well, I want to read the letters first." She scrolled back to the top, checking everything was in order, then tapped the first file in the list. "Is this one from Grandma Gaia and Grandpapa Varlous? We can start with that."

As Apollo had already discovered, Trucy found that afternoon that the old letters were, for the most part, not all that interesting. She read aloud the first few from Gaia and Varlous, but as the descriptions of daily life began to repeat and blur together with all the unfamiliar names and confusing references, she began to skim more and more. Although his command of written English still struggled, Machi soon took over, intrigued by the occasional mention of "the orphanage across the road" and particularly of Gaia's "former classmate Sami Bonte, who has taken over the old place" and "younger brother, Lalu Salinen, who now runs a restaurant in town". However, even Machi began to burn out eventually; Thalassa's Mama and Papa had taken turns writing to Magnifi every week for just over two years - a period Apollo had dubbed 'the first era' - and Magnifi had kept every single one, resulting in a thick pile of one-sided correspondence that very slowly detailed Gaia's decline in health as village life droned on around them. Even worse, without the context the letters' authors could have provided, much of it was incomprehensible. During a four-month gap, Gaia's letters stopped, and were replaced by irregular and much less frequent letters from Varlous, who had started signing his letters as 'Winfred Geary' instead. Most of these were strictly business-related, talking about various machines he had built and discussing ideas for Magnifi's illusions. This period of thirteen years - what Apollo had dubbed 'the second era' - held interest only to the young magicians thanks to its discussion of their craft, but even Apollo and Trucy were keen to mostly skip over it. This lead easily into what Apollo called 'the third era': The era of the Justice Family.

With Thalassa around to give context, reading her own letters to her father for the year she was away was a very interesting journey indeed for her children... and especially for Apollo. Every new letter led Thalassa on a wistful trip down memory lane, telling her children of the various adventures she and Jove got up to on their travels, including the time they were forced to settle for a while thanks to the late stage of her pregnancy. Apollo couldn't keep the grin from his face as he listened to his mother read aloud the letter that announced his birth:

"Dear Dad,

"I have some long-awaited news for you: You have a grandson! He arrived early yesterday morning, and actually woke the both of us up, though we can't help but forgive him for the rude awakening. I'm sure he'll give us many more in the years to come! We've decided to name him Apollo, by the way: Apollo Justice-Gramarye. I hope you approve? It was Jove's idea to give him both surnames. When he's older, he can choose just the one if he wants to. Looking at him, it's amazing to think a person can be so small... He's so tiny, Dad! Though I'm sure you felt like this with me, didn't you? I remember you talking about it before, though I forget the details. I'll just have to ask to hear it again when we next meet in person, huh?

"Little Apollo's been given a clean bill of health, and the two of us have spent the past day recovering. We were both pretty exhausted, but apparently sleeping it off was much easier for the baby than for me. Apollo always seems a little restless if one of us isn't actively holding him. Jove's trying to teach him to sing to keep him calm, never mind how ridiculous that sounds given our son is barely two days old. Jove just says his lungs are clearly ready for it, and I'll admit Apollo does sound like a belter with how loud his crying can be. I'm sure he will be musical once he's older, but we'll need to wait at least a few months to find that out for sure. And we'll teach him to appreciate magic too, Dad, don't you worry. I remember enough tricks to let him give the Gramarye name justice even if he doesn't follow your path. Ha, I didn't even realise I'd made that joke until I wrote it down! Jove says he will give the Justice name justice, too! We will both be proud of him no matter what the future might bring for us all.

"We hope to move on soon, and get back to travelling. I know it's recommended that very young babies don't travel, but they say the same about heavily pregnant women, and that never stopped me. Until it did, I mean. As soon as we're all ready again, we won't be wasting time. I can't wait to introduce you to Apollo.

"As always, love you Dad.

"Thalassa"

The letters that followed proved just as exciting: Although their travels slowed down with a baby on hand, Thalassa and Jove never stopped performing. They took turns, one of them caring for Apollo while the other took Jove's guitar and sang wherever they were permitted to. Jove was self-taught when it came to the instrument, but he'd picked it up well in the years since first meeting the Gramaryes, and had passed on his hard-earned knowledge to his wife. No matter which of them went out, they always brought back enough money to live on. Every time they entered a new country, Thalassa would write to Magnifi about their adventures, though her letters were much more focussed now on the adventure of raising their son than anything else. Apollo, Trucy, and Machi listened in rapt attention as five months passed over the span of nine digital sheets of paper.

"Our next destination is a little country in the mountains, by the name of Khura'in. It's possible to take the road up, but it's far safer to fly, so we've decided to shell out for plane tickets. We'll only be there a couple of weeks, but it sounds far too interesting to not drop by and take a look around. I'll tell you all about it in my next letter."

Thalassa's face was pained as she returned Apollo's computer to the table. "But I never wrote that next letter."

Trucy bit her lip and gave her mother a hug.

"Khura'in...?" Machi tugged his shirt collar, deep in thought. "That is... where Maya going to, isn't it?"

"Oh, right, you didn't hear that part." Apollo blushed, running a hand through his hair. "I told you how my father died, right?"

Machi nodded, watching his brother. "He performed for a queen, and died in fire."

Trucy released Thalassa to shoot Apollo a glare. "You didn't tell him?"

Machi looked between the two, confused. "Tell me what?"

Apollo glared back at his sister. "I promised I'd tell Mom Maya, and I have."

Thalassa placed a hand on Trucy's shoulder, calming the girl. "Luke knows. Apollo told him last week."

Trucy bit her lip, but kept quiet.

Apollo sighed and turned to Machi. "So... That queen my father was performing for? She was the Queen of Khura'in."

"Oh." Machi frowned. "Why that such a big secret?"

Apollo bit back the lie that it wasn't, knowing Trucy would just jump down his throat if he did. "It... just wasn't important enough to mention. This was over twenty years ago, after all."

Machi thought a moment, then nodded. "Okay."

Trucy fidgeted, but said nothing.
With the end of the era of the Justice Family, Geary's irregular business letters resumed. Although the family returned to skimming his words, they picked up enough in what little wasn't about magic or machinery to guess Magnifi was keeping the man informed on Thalassa. Five years after Jove's death, and Geary was praising Thalassa's decision to remarry. Another couple of years later, Geary was happy to hear of the birth of her daughter. Every so often, he would leave a vague comment at the end of his letters - "Trucy sounds so adorable", "Little girls are supposed to be well-behaved, from what I've heard", "It seems Trucy takes after her mother and grandmother in that regard" - that they could only guess were in reply to stories Magnifi had detailed in the now-missing other half of the conversation.

Four years worth of paper passed in a moment, and the letters entered what Apollo called 'the fourth era', the final few years of correspondence: The Era of Lamiroir. Suddenly, Geary's letters were regular and often, and, instead of business, they detailed Thalassa's recovery after her accident. Geary's attempts to rebuild Thalassa's broken memory were heart-breaking to read, and for none of them more than Thalassa herself. They read aloud Geary's side of a heavy conversation about what to do for her, including a steadfast routine in an effort to repair her memory, and putting her in her own house to return her self-sufficiency. With nothing they did producing results, Geary was very nervous indeed about getting Thalassa a job.

"On the contrary, you are not worrying enough. We've tried routines, we've tried giving her her own place. None of it is working, Magnifi. I appreciate that you miss her singing, but I don't think doing more of it will help her. I especially don't want to resort to putting her in Lalu Salinen's hands. You may not remember, but this is the man Gaia thought of as her little brother, and she loved him so much she refused to let him see her on her death bed so he would remember her as she used to be. If anyone's going to recognise who Thalassa is, it will be him. That won't be much of a fresh start for her, will it?

"On top of that, there is the issue of how shady your idea sounds. 'Hello there sir, here is a blind woman with goldfish memory, but she sings beautifully and we want you to put her on your stage. Please don't ask me literally anything else about her.' No one in their right mind will accept that at face value. I'll be lucky if he doesn't call the police on me."

Even though they knew what was coming next, the kids couldn't help laughing when they moved on to the next letter:

"Holy cow, Salinen went along with it. I don't know if he recognised Thalassa or not, but he heard her sing and agreed to everything. He's personally escorting her from her front door to the stage, and back again when she's done. You should see Thalassa on stage, Magnifi. She's truly at home up there, far more than anywhere else in this town. Salinen has dubbed her 'The Siren', and she's already accumulating a few fans among the regulars. Obviously, I've been dropping in to check on her, and I don't know if it's just wishful thinking or not, but she seems to be improving. If nothing else, I hope she regains her short-term memory. That was the option you considered the happiest for her, wasn't it?"

From that point on, Geary's correspondence decreased in regularity, and returned to being mostly business-talk. However, Geary always put a paragraph aside to discuss Thalassa, keeping Magnifi updated on whatever distant glimpses Geary could get of their daughter.

"I've been going in later and leaving earlier to visit Thalassa. She is definitely improving. There weren't any panic attacks today about losing her train of thought, or not knowing where she was. I think we're close to the point where she doesn't need me around at all."

"Thalassa has regained her short-term memory! I know for sure because she joked after her song today that the audience are cheering harder for her every week. She is still going by The Siren - or Lamiroir to be specific - so no word yet on if her existing memories are close behind."

"I discovered today that Thalassa is getting herself to and from the restaurant, no escort needed. She has truly become self-sufficient, as we hoped she would. I've removed my name from the ownership of her house, and replaced it with 'Lamiroir'. It's her's now, after all."

Two years' worth of letters passed their eyes. Worries about Thalassa were replaced with worries about Magnifi, news having reached Geary of his old friend's diagnosis of liver cancer. Geary's letters grew shorter, discussion of work disappearing from the pages. When he did mention Thalassa, it was only to assure her father that she was doing well.

"Have I mentioned how Salinen supports the local orphanage? Apparently they've picked up a young talent there, good enough that he's been paired off with Thalassa. I've included a photo so you can see for yourself. The boy plays the piano, and Thalassa sings. They make a good pair. Gaia would be proud, I think."

Machi grinned. "He talking about me!" Taking the computer from Apollo, he swiped a finger across the screen to read the next letter... only to pause and frown. "Isoveli?" He showed his brother the photograph on the display, one of a young Magnifi and Geary. "Where is next letter?"

Apollo flashed an awkward smile. "Well... There isn't one."

Trucy's eyes widened. "There isn't?"

"No." Thalassa sighed, a sad look on her face. "That must have been the final letter my father read before his death."
"Oh." Machi lowered the computer to his lap, disappointed.

Apollo patted the boy's back. "Hey, it's okay. You got to meet Grandpa Magnifi in the end anyway, remember? He knows about you."

Machi smiled. "Yes. And Grandpapa Varlous saw us perform, at beginning."

"And Mister Salinen was the one who hired you!" Trucy giggled, turning to Thalassa. "He's, like, our great-uncle, right? 'Cause he was Grandma Gaia's brother."

Thalassa chuckled, eyes far away. "I suppose he is. I told him about the three of you, too."

"They all know we're together, then." Apollo took his computer, scanning through some of the photos there. "After everything everyone went through, at least they know we had a happy ending."

Thalassa frowned, thinking. "But I spoke to Monsieur Salinen and Papa when I was actually in Borginia. They knew I was going back to you three, but we hadn't reunited yet. Her eyes drifted far away, unfocussed. "I couldn't tell them much of anything about my biological children... I didn't even know the two of you yet."

Apollo looked up from his screen, watching their mother with concern.

Trucy huffed and crossed her arms, an expression on her face that Apollo didn't doubt was an impression of Luke. "Well that won't do. We can't have family, however distant, not know for sure we're alright. Even Uncle Valant knows we're all together now!" She held up her fists, giving Machi and Thalassa determined looks. "You know Mister Salinen and Grandpapa Varlous's addresses, right? We'll write them a letter, like all the ones Grandpapa Varlous wrote to Grandpa Magnifi! We can tell them ourselves how great everything is now!"

Machi gasped, mouth open in a wide smile. "That is great idea! Can we do that, Aska?"

"I... don't see why not, I suppose." Thalassa slowly grinned, a twinkle in her eyes as she watched her children. "Your thoughts, Apollo?"

Apollo shrugged. "No objections here." He couldn't resist ruffling Machi's hair with a chuckle. "Only question is, are we writing them letters individually, or as a group? And can Mister Salinen even read English, or will Trucy and me have to sit out his one?"

"That two questions." Machi grinned cheekily.

Apollo gently shoved the boy's head downwards with a smile.

Thalassa hid a laugh. "I don't think he can read English, no. I think, perhaps, all of us should write a short letter to each of them, and Machi and I will translate your and Trucy's letters to Monsieur Salinen. That would work best."

"I will do translating!" Machi bounced in his seat, throwing his arms around his siblings. "It will be good practise for me, yes?"

"That sounds great! Let's do it right now before we forget!" Trucy hugged her younger brother tight, then jumped to her feet. "Mommy, where do you keep your paper?"
"Papa,

"It's been a while, hasn't it? Knowing what I know now about the family I was born into, I couldn't rest easy thinking of our last discussion as the only contact I would ever have with my papa. I'm all settled in here in America, and my delightful children have talked me into writing you some letters, so we might all have the chance to get to know each other. I'll admit, it was mostly prompted by a stash of letters we obtained from Dad, ones he had kept for years. They all came from you, and from Mama, and there were even some from me, which was a real trip down memory lane. We spent the afternoon poring over them, talking about everything inside... Mama's illness, Apollo's birth, my accident, Dad's illness... After so much pain in the Gramarye family, we wanted to make sure one of its oldest members knew there was a happy ending to it all. The children have written their own letters. Poor Machi still struggles with his English, so his is in Borginian. I hope you don't mind, as I assured him you must surely be fluent with how long you've lived there.

"If you want to write back, I'm sure we would all appreciate it. I don't know how easy it would be for you, but I've included my new address if you're able to respond.

"Love, Thalassa"

"To Mr. Salinen,

"Hello. My name is Apollo, and I'm the oldest child of Thalassa "Lamiroir" Gramarye. I don't speak Borginian, so Machi's translating this for me, and we're both sorry if I come across as awkward as a result. I'm sure our mother told you in her letter that we decided to write to you because you were the brother of our grandmother, and thus a member of our family. I don't think we're ever likely to meet, but it can only be a good thing to make sure you're aware we exist, so you know everything turned out okay in the end. Mom and Machi tell me you got them performing together, and looked after them until they got picked up by that producer. We've also read some of Grandma Gaia's old letters to our grandfather, where she talked about how proud she was to see you starting up a restaurant even though she was too ashamed to talk to you. We could send you copies of those ones if you want them. Oh, and thank you for all the help you gave Mom, and Machi, even though they were just a strange blind woman and an orphaned kid to you. If it wasn't for everything you did for them, Trucy and I might never have found our mother, or got to meet our little brother Machi. We've all been together for a week and a half now, and I'll always be grateful for the chance to know my mother, when I spent so long thinking it would never happen. Getting Machi as part of the deal is a bonus, really.

"I'd better wrap this up. Thank you for reading, if you've gotten this far.

"Apollo Wright-Gramarye"

"Dear Grandpapa Varlous,

"Hello! My name is Trucy Wright, but my fans all know me as Artemis Gramarye. I don't know everything Grandpa Magnifi told you about me, but it was all a long time ago, and Mommy agreed we had to catch you up so you know we're all doing okay. She told us everything that happened while she was in Borginia too. You aren't being punished too badly, are you? I was really sad when I heard how unkind Grandpa Magnifi had been to you, and it wasn't fair that I had another granddad all this time I didn't even know about! Once Apollo and I revive Troupe Gramarye, maybe we can come and visit you in Borginia one day? The rights have been passed down to me, but we're still amateur compared to The Great Magnifi, so it might take a while. I don't think Machi will be able to come with us, but Mommy might. I guess we'll have to see, huh?

"Mommy told you how Apollo and me got adopted together after Grandpa Magnifi died, didn't she? Daddy Zak had to leave, so Daddy Phoenix took me in, and then he found Apollo and recognised his bracelet as one of Mommy's, so he got adopted too! I was so surprised to find out I'd had a big brother all that time! Although I only didn't know about him before because everybody thought he'd died when he was a baby. We've been performing together for six years now. If we ever get to visit you, we'll show you our act!

"I'd better go now. It was great to get to talk to you!

"Trucy"

"M. Salinen,

"It's been a while since we last met in person. Lamiroir told me the news of what I did has reached Kopunchiville. I wanted to say first of all how sorry I am for disappointing everyone like that. There's no excuse for what I did, and I should have known better than to think I could get away with it. I can only hope you can forgive me for my terrible mistake. I'm just thankful it was Apollo Wright who stood up for me when I was caught. He knew so quickly that we were both Lamiroir's sons, brothers, and he didn't stop trying to help me no matter how hard I made it for him. I won't ever feel safe returning to Borginia, but please know I am happy here. I have my mother Lamiroir, my brother Apollo, and my sister Trucy, and a whole extended family beyond them, and we all love and support each other in everything we do. It's a bit like life in the orphanage, except Trucy and I are the youngest by far. Well, technically cousin Pearl is our age too, but after her is our brother Luke, and he's grown up. He works as a vet at an animal shelter near here. (By the way, how is Keltanen doing? Could you give her a pat from me? Or a scratch behind the ears?) I'm going to school again, and learning English. Because of my punishment for the smuggling, I can't perform with Lamiroir right now, but I'm keeping up my piano skills so we can travel again once my probation is over.

"Before I go, I want to thank you again for everything you did for us. I've never forgotten it was you who introduced me to Lamiroir in the first place, and it's only because of that I have the family I have right now. That sort of includes you, doesn't it? You were my grandmother Gaia's brother, so you'd be our grand-uncle, right? I'm not sure what the proper Borginian word is for that, so I'm just guessing.

"Thank you again,

"Machi Gramarye"

View the Court Record
Another Saturday had come and gone all too quickly, and at last it was time for the extended Wright family to say goodbye to one of its members.

"I'll take those for you, Maya."

Maya nearly jumped, so lost in her own head as she leaned over the open back of Luke's small car. Standing at her side, holding out one hand in his trademark polite fashion, was Luke himself, giving her a warm smile. Maya hid her surprise behind a laugh and a wink, waving the young man off.

"You going to hide them away so I have to stay and spend more time with you, huh?"

Luke's face tightened a little, though his smile stayed firm. "It's the job of a gentleman to carry a friend's bags for them... and you have a lot more to carry than Papa."

Maya fought to keep the grin on her face despite the awkwardness in the air. Behind Luke, she could see the rest of the Wrights - Phoenix, Apollo, and Trucy - waiting on the pavement for her to join them. Phoenix had already pulled out his lone travel suitcase (indeed a smaller one than either of Maya's), and Trucy was idly playing with the extendible handle as she pretended not to be listening. Phoenix and Apollo mostly had their attention on the teenage girl, but cast frequent and furtive glances towards Maya. She didn't need to be as familiar with them all as she was to see how concerned they were... and she hated seeing anyone in pain, let alone her own family. Sighing, Maya let her grin fall to a more neutral smile and patted Luke's shoulder. "I was just joking. You guys really need to stop worrying about me." Before Luke could reply, she stepped back and gestured to her bags in the back of his car. "You can take them if you want to."

Relieved to have something to do, Luke gladly pulled out the two large suitcases, then slammed closed the back door.

"Don't forget to lock up the Lukemobile!" Trucy called.

Luke bit back a displeased look, digging out his keys from a pocket. "I was just about to."

Maya hid a giggle, skipping over to join the rest of the immediate family. "We'd better go look for the others now, huh? Don't want them to miss saying goodbye."

Phoenix nodded with a wry smile. "We got separated pretty quick. Hopefully Clay found his way here alright."

"Clay may seem like a ditz, but he has a knack for never getting lost." Having waved off his father's concerns, Apollo then pulled out his phone. "I'll just tell Mom Thalassa where we are so they know where to find us."

Trucy bounced up on her toes, scanning the slow-moving cars of the busy parking area. "Will they take very long?"

Luke had locked up his car by now, and was pulling Maya's suitcases onto the pavement. "I'm sure they'd... Oof." He grunted as he dragged the wheeled bags over the lip of the gutter with a final tug. "They'd have let us know if they were too far behind."

Maya felt Phoenix's eyes on her, and looked up to meet them. His furrowed brow told her he was already running over the possibility the other half of their party would be late, calculating the delay and comparing it to everything else he and Maya had to do before boarding their plane. Maya couldn't help a snort at his typical worrywart nature, and jabbed a finger in his arm. "Stop it. They'll be here in plenty of time, Nick."

Phoenix didn't look convinced, lips pursed in a frown. "Maybe... we should go ahead and check in our bags anyway. Then we'll be all ready to go through security once they've arrived."

Maya huffed and rolled her eyes, but agreed.

It had been a bit of a hectic day for Maya and her extended family. She'd left Kurain Village early that morning, bidding her goodbyes to the Elders and various friends and acquaintances. With Pearl and Iris helping carry her bags, she'd headed straight for the Wright Anything Agency to surprise her fiancé. It wasn't much of a surprise really, as he (and Trucy and Machi, of course) was fully expecting her arrival, but he'd played along anyway and Maya loved him all the more for it. Apollo, Luke, and Thalassa caught up not long after, and though the group hadn't specifically done anything else that day, just hanging out with her family was all Maya really wanted... especially knowing this would be the last time she saw them all together for a very long and lonely two years. She found herself paying extra close attention to every little detail of everything everyone did, trying to memorise the events of the day so she would have something to treasure until her return.

Naturally, when Maya actually got on her plane at the airport, her family all wanted to be there, to spend as much time with her as possible while they could. The only problem was, her bags were a bit bulky to be carrying around on public transport, and Luke had happily offered to take them in his car instead... his car which could only carry five people maximum of the nine that made up their group, none of which could drive except for him. It had been Apollo who'd found the solution when the problem was discussed earlier that week, calling in his housemate Clay, who had been more than happy to help. Clay showed up at the Agency that afternoon, and somehow Maya and the four Wrights had ended up in Luke's car while Pearl, Iris, Thalassa, and Machi all ended up in Clay's. Maya expected the other car to arrive at the airport soon enough.

It didn't take very long for Phoenix and Maya to check in their suitcases, Phoenix's lone medium-sized blue one and Maya's two larger purple ones (Luke had only given them up reluctantly when she insisted on making him wait with his siblings). As she idly chatted with the worker handling their tickets, Maya could feel the drowsiness already tugging at her body. It had been a long day already, and she only had an even longer journey ahead of her, flying across the Pacific Ocean and into Asia before arriving in Khura'in. She hoped to get some sleep on the plane, but until then she had no choice but to plaster a smile over her exhaustion and push on. She didn't want her family worrying about her, after all.

Phoenix wrapped an arm around Maya's back as they finally left the check-in counter, his hand resting on her hip. "You holding up okay?"

Maya nodded, idly fiddling with the ring on her finger. She had a feeling she would be drawing a lot of comfort from it over the next two years. "Of course. I'm always okay, Nick."

Phoenix raised a disbelieving eyebrow.
"I am." Maya tried not to sulk, whacking her fiancé with the back of her hand.

"Sure." Phoenix cracked a small smile, but it was obvious he was just lying to appease her.

As they approached the place they'd left the three Wright kids, Maya quickly noticed their patience had been rewarded: The half of their party that had been in Clay's car had arrived, all eagerly awaiting the travelling couple's return. Pearl particularly was waving excitedly to her cousin.

"Mystic Maya! We were worried we'd miss your plane!"

Maya grinned, skipping to meet the teen and enveloping her in a hug. "Aw, I wouldn't leave before getting to say goodbye to you, Pearly."

Pearl squeezed Maya tight in response. "I wouldn't want you to miss your plane either, Mystic Maya..."

"Well, we're not leaving just yet." Phoenix patted the girl's shoulder with a smile. "You've got at least a few more minutes with us."

Machi stood at Thalassa's side, his face scrunched tight as he clung to her hand. He whimpered quietly, then flung himself at Phoenix and grabbed the man around the middle. "We will miss you both while you are away, Isa!"

Phoenix looked a little bewildered at the boy's reaction, enough that Maya had to hide her laughter at the sight. He gently placed his hands on Machi's shoulders, pushing him back and leaning down to match his height. "Machi, I'm only going to be away for two weeks. I'll be right back in no time. You don't have any objections to Apollo looking after you until then, do you?"

Machi shook his head, rubbing at his eyes with a hand.

"Then what are you so upset at me for?" Phoenix smiled, then gestured to the woman at his side. "Why don't you tell Maya how much it'll suck not having her around?"

Blushing, Machi reluctantly withdrew from the man and turned to Maya, stepping into the space left by Pearl as she retreated out of his way. "I... I really will miss you, Maya. I wish you not have to leave for so long."

Maya bit back a giggle and patted the boy's shoulder. "And I'll miss you too, Machi." She pulled him into a hug. "Anyone would miss being around you, sweetheart."

Machi's cheeks only reddened all the more as he sheepishly returned her affection, trying his hardest to ignore the chuckles of the rest of their family.
Phoenix didn't wait long to direct their group closer to the security checkpoint, the furthest in visitors could go to see their loved ones off. The youngest of their group - Machi, Trucy, and Pearl - all clung close to the departing couple, not exactly eager to say goodbye. Apollo and Luke similarly stood close, though they were better able to hide their discomfort with the situation behind a forced nonchalance. Iris and Thalassa had the advantage of not being quite as attached to Phoenix and Maya as the couple's children, though they still cared greatly that it would be so long until Maya was back for good. Clay, on the other hand, was barely paying attention, his hands in his pockets as he casually sauntered behind the group, curiously watching the crowds around them. Maya mused he was probably the luckiest of them all, having met her so rarely over the years despite his status as 'honorary brother' to her eldest sons; Not seeing Maya for two years was nothing too out of the ordinary for Clay.

Once they'd found a space in sight of security, Phoenix and Maya waited until the last possible second to go through with the heartbreaking inevitability of the actual goodbyes. It was bad enough to watch the terror flick across their kids' faces every time one of them looked up to the clock on the nearby display. Finally, Phoenix sighed, waving the conversation to a halt. "Okay, we honestly can't waste any more time. We have to go, or we're in danger of missing the plane."

The group fell into an awkward silence, most everyone staring at the floor with a sad look. The first to break the atmosphere - perhaps unsurprisingly - was Clay, stepping forward to shake Maya's hand. "Good luck in Asia, ma'am. I hope you have fun, and we'll all be waiting for your return."

Maya couldn't help a smile, shaking the young man's hand vigorously. "Aw, thank you, Clay. That's very kind of you." She cast a cheeky look over Apollo and Luke before returning her gaze to Clay. "You'll look after my two boys until I get back, won't you?"

Clay laughed, a hand on his visor. "You bet! I'll keep 'Pollo and Luke out of trouble for ya, no problem."

Apollo rolled his eyes. Luke just giggled.

"I'll be running a check-up on them when I get back, just to make sure." Maya gave Clay a wink. "And if they have gotten into trouble, you better watch out, 'cause I'll be seeking revenge on you, mister."

Clay smirked and winked back. "Try and catch me, old lady." He promptly shot her twin finger-guns with a click of his tongue, then walked backwards out of the conversation. Maya was too amused to stop him.

Iris stepped forward into the empty space, hands folded at her belly. Her eyes flicked up to Maya's only occasionally, and her mouth was twisted in a worried smile. "Mystic Maya, I... I cannot express how thankful I am to you for everything you've done for me over the past four years. I truly don't deserve any of your kindness."
"Don't say that!" Maya slipped into a stern glare, gripping the other woman's upper arms. "Iris, you're family. You deserve so much more than what you got, and I told you long ago I don't want to hear another word about it."

"I know. I'm sorry." Iris tugged on a lock of hair, nervously twirling it between her fingers. "I just... It won't be the same in Kurain Village without you around. I know how important this training is, but... I really will miss you."

Maya's eyes crinkled in sympathy. "I'll miss you too, cuz." She pulled the other woman into a hug, her arms wrapped around Iris' purple kimono. "You'll keep an eye on Pearly for me, won't you? And on the Elders?"

Iris laughed - They had already discussed Iris becoming her sister's guardian in Maya's absence - and patted her taller cousin's back. "You needn't worry about me, Mystic Maya. I will keep the village ready and waiting for your return." She pulled out of the hug with a smile. "You remembered to pack the hood and gloves I gave you, didn't you? I hate to think of you getting too cold up in those mountains."

Maya scoffed and waved a hand. "Sure I packed 'em. You think I'm gonna turn down a thoughtful gift like that?" She turned to the others, proudly jerking a thumb at her elder cousin. "Iris here found out Khura'in's average altitude is about the same as Hazakura, so she's been prepping me for the cold and the snow."

Pearl gasped. "Oh! I didn't know you did that, Iris!"

Iris blushed, then turned to Phoenix. "I'm sorry I don't have a spare hood to give you, Feenie. I... didn't think to bring one today."

"Don't worry about it; I've already got one." Phoenix shot her a grin and pulled up the hood of his sweater. "I'll only be up there a couple of weeks, anyway. I can hold out that long."

"We'll see about that, Nick." Maya elbowed him with a smirk, bumping him enough that his hood fell back behind his neck.

Phoenix shushed his fiancée before returning his gaze to Iris. "Thank you for thinking of me. And of Maya too, of course."

Iris blushed harder, dipping her head in a polite bow before shuffling out of the way.

It was Thalassa who stepped forward next, gripping Maya's hands with a sad smile. "Goodbye, Maya. I may not have been here very long, but even I can tell it will not be the same with you away. We will all eagerly await your safe return."

"Thank you, Thalassa." Maya pulled the woman into a hug. "We didn't have nearly enough time to get to know each other before I had to go. Life just sucks sometimes."

Thalassa chuckled as they pulled apart. "Indeed it does."

Maya ran her eyes over the younger half of the group, trying not to show her concern on her face. "Thalassa, you'll... You'll look after the kids for me, won't you?"

"It's the least I could do." Thalassa glanced back at them with a warm look: Apollo had his arms over Trucy and Machi on either side, both teens clinging to his vest under his cape, while Luke stood nearby, patting Machi's shoulder sympathetically. Opposite him, Pearl imitated Luke's actions for Trucy. All five watched the conversation with various levels of embarrassed distress.
continued, "You looked after them when I couldn't be here, so it's only right I return the favour." She turned to Phoenix, who was also watching the younger group with the kind of concern Maya expected to see from him (and, though she'd never admit it out loud, the same kind of concern she was busy hiding). "Especially for these next two weeks, while both of you are away."

Maya heard a grunt from Apollo, and was still turning her head towards him when Machi catapulted himself onto her torso, arms wrapped tight around her upper body so that all she could see when she looked down was a golden bob of hair at her chin... and even that was hard to make out over how hard the boy was shaking. His voice was muffled, the boy speaking directly into her chest: "P-please... Please not go..."

"Oh, Machi, you poor baby!" Maya hugged the sobbing boy, unsure what exactly to do for him and trying not to burst into tears herself. "I... I can't not go, I have to...! Please don't cry, kiddo..."

In an instant, Phoenix and Thalassa had joined them, already working to comfort the boy: Phoenix was crouching at Maya's side, one hand on her back while the other patted Machi's arm, while Thalassa focussed on Machi, standing behind him and rubbing his shoulders.

"Machi?" Thalassa murmured something, but Maya couldn't make out the words. It was only when Machi reluctantly pulled away from the hug and choked out a lengthy reply that she realised the pair weren't speaking English. The boy sobbed and stumbled over his words, clinging to Thalassa's arm with one hand while fruitlessly drying his eyes with the other, but Thalassa simply nodded in understanding as she listened intently. Once he had finished, she hugged Machi close and looked up to Maya and Phoenix. "He is... scared to see you both leaving at once. Two years is such a long time as it is, and he says any kind of accident on the way would mean we don't see either of you for... for even longer than that."

Maya pressed her hands to her mouth, blinking back the tears. She hated herself for breaking down so easily just because one of the children was crying, but she couldn't stop. 'I can't let this be the last they see of me for two years... Get a hold of yourself, Maya! Aren't you supposed to be the Master of the Kurain Channelling Technique? Where's your composure!?'

Phoenix stepped forward and pulled the boy into a hug, and Machi didn't hesitate clinging to the man's hoodie. "Machi, no-one's saying two years isn't a long time. And it's true that every time we part, there's a danger we'll never meet again... but that's a danger we face every single moment of every day. If you make the decision to worry about that kind of thing, you'll only find you're too busy being scared of the possibility something will go wrong to enjoy the time you do have with us." He paused, and Maya realised in the silence that Machi's tears had finally quietened. Phoenix gently pushed the boy away and leaned down to meet Machi's blue eyes on their level. "Even if the worst does happen, do you want to live with the regret of having been too scared of saying goodbye to actually say it to our faces?"

Machi could only sniff in reply, his cheeks stained with wet streaks as he studied Phoenix's face with wide eyes.

"You should listen to Nick about this, Machi. He's the expert on worrying about our safety."

Immediately, the kids all broke out in muffled giggles, including Machi himself.

Phoenix turned to Maya with a raised eyebrow. "Gee, I wonder why that is. It couldn't possibly be because my closest friend for ten years now kept getting herself killed the first three years I knew her... Or, at least, getting herself killed as far as I knew."
Luke suddenly found it a lot harder to hide his laughter. Even Iris was covering her grin with a hand.

Maya scoffed and waved the comment off. "Excuses, excuses."

Machi wiped the worst of the tears from his face, then hugged Phoenix tight. "Goodbye, Isa." He then walked over to Maya, hugging her just as hard. "Goodbye, Maya. Be safe while you are away, okay?"

Maya grinned as she hugged him back. "That's a promise, kiddo."

With one last sniff, Machi pulled away. He gave Maya a small smile before once more retreating to Thalassa's side.
Pearl stepped forward, taking Machi's place to pull Maya into a quick hug. Holding her cousin's hands, she stared into Maya's eyes with a stern look. "Mystic Maya, you will keep talking to Mister Nick once he comes back home, won't you?"

Maya snorted, and raised her left hand to show off her ring with a flutter of her fingers. "You think a little thing like distance and time-zones is gonna keep me from my stubborn fiancé?"

Phoenix raised an eyebrow, hands shoved deep in the pockets of his hoodie. "Who's the stubborn one here? Besides," he turned to the teen with a small smile, "Pearls, you won. We're getting married. Why isn't that enough for you to stop bugging us?"

"Everyone knows getting together is only the beginning of the story, Mister Nick." Pearl gave him a triumphant grin, ignoring Phoenix's groan, then returned her attention to Maya. "We'll all miss you, Mystic Maya."

"And I'll miss all of you, Pearly." Once more fighting tears, Maya pulled her young cousin into another hug. "No amount of intense training could stop me there."

Pearl parted from the hug with a wide grin, then retreated to join her sister.

Checking off the list in her head, Maya knew she had only three people left to say her goodbyes to... and they were going to be the most difficult of all. It was hard to keep the smile on her face, however strained it was, as she lifted her eyes to meet the huddled trio. "Hey, kids."

Trucy squeaked once, tears already forming, then tore herself away from Apollo's side to leap at Maya and cling to the woman's kimono. "I'll really miss you, Mommy!" Her hat, tossed sharply at Maya's face, slipped back on the girl's head, but still blocked Maya's view.

Surprisingly, Apollo wasn't far behind, throwing his arms around the pair (though he spared a hand to catch the top hat before it slipped too far off his sister's head). "We'll all miss you, Mom."

Seeing them trying so hard not to cry made Maya's own battles somehow even harder, and she hugged the two back. Unable to speak for fear of sobbing, she peered over the top of Trucy's head to find Luke had also followed his siblings, though he now stood apart from them. His hands were curled into fists at his sides, slightly shaking, and his face was strained, only just holding back tears; Maya couldn't help but be filled with concern for him, enough to instantly dry her own eyes. She slightly pushed Trucy away to allow her to look at the young man properly. "Luke? Are you okay?"

Luke stood in silence for a moment, his eyes trained on Maya's feet so he wouldn't have to look at her - or his siblings' - faces; Given he was the tallest of all of them, this was quite an impressive feat. "G-gentlemen don't cause scenes in public..."
Maya's worry for him grew. She felt the other two Wright children stepping away, and took the movement as a cue to step towards their brother and pull him into a tight hug. A part of Maya idly wondered how many times she had done this exact action today... but most of her simply didn't care, hungry for every last bit of physical contact with her family she could get. As for speaking to her middle son, she couldn't think of anything to say. Perhaps it was better she keep quiet.

Luke loosely slung his arms behind Maya in a half-hearted hug, his hands pressed to her back. "I-I'm sorry, Maya..."

"There's nothing to be sorry about." Maya pulled back and pushed the young man's chin upwards to force him to look her in the eyes. Suddenly the tears were threatening again, making it hard for her to speak. "I will miss you so much while I'm away. All three of you." She turned, forcing a smile for Trucy and Apollo (the former clinging to the latter's arm). Trucy blinked back tears, then ran to grab Maya around the middle once more. As Maya hugged the girl, Apollo moved to join them, and patted his brother's shoulder with a small smile. Luke was busy wiping his eyes, but managed to force one in return.

After a short pause, Trucy pulled away to give Maya a stern stare. "Mommy, if you ever have the chance to come back and visit us, you'll take it, won't you?"

Maya winced. "That's not gonna happen, sweetpea..."

Trucy's pout deepened. "Promise."

Maya sighed. It was more difficult than it looked not to let herself be tempted by the idea of the possibility, no matter that she knew listening to it would only lead to heartbreak. "If by some miracle I had the opportunity to see you sooner, of course I'd take it. You know that, baby."

Trucy's hard expression wavered for only a moment. "Mommy, you have to promise."

"I promise." Despite the pain of knowing it would never happen, Maya managed to force a smile for her daughter, and was happy to see a relieved grin in return before Trucy once more enveloped the woman in a hug.

"Thank you, Mommy."

Before Maya could even register she was blinking back tears again, Luke and then Apollo had joined their sister, arms firmly wrapped around both Maya and each other. They said nothing, but they didn't need to speak; Maya knew her kids well enough to know exactly what they were communicating. All she could do in return was wriggle her arms out from where her sons had pinned them (she still questioned how the pair got so much taller than her) to encompass them just as their arms were encircling her and Trucy.

Maya wasn't sure how long they held their position before she felt a tap on her shoulder, and the huddle was broken as the four of them turned to see Phoenix. He watched them sympathetically, and jerked a thumb towards the screens above. "It's time for us to go."

Trucy sniffed, and slipped past Maya to give her father a quick hug. "Bye, Daddy. You be careful too, okay?"

"Of course I will." Phoenix chuckled, kissed his daughter on the forehead, then moved to also hug Luke. "Love you all."

Luke couldn't help a smile as Phoenix pulled down the young man's head to plant a kiss above his eyes as he had for Trucy. "Love you too, Papa."
Apollo put on airs of discomfort as Phoenix continued the small ritual for him, but the embarrassed smile said he enjoyed it more than he let on. "We'll see you in a couple of weeks, Dad."

Phoenix nodded, but followed it up by giving his eldest child a stern look. "Now you'll remember to keep a close eye on Trucy and Machi while I'm away, won't you? Make sure they get to school, and that they get home again in a reasonable time, make sure you're available if they need help with homework, make sure they do their homework-"

Apollo rolled his eyes; If it weren't for Trucy's top hat in his grip, he probably would have crossed his arms too. "Dad, this isn't the first time I've had to babysit, I know what I'm doing! Would you stop worrying? What were you literally just telling Machi about worrying?"

"Well, I'm not expecting you to get into any life-or-death situations," Phoenix replied, raising an eyebrow, "unless you're saying I should be worrying about that."

"Dad!"

"Papa, we'll be fine." Luke stepped forward, diffusing the tension with a smile. "And if anything does happen, you know we'll be in touch as soon as we possibly can."

Phoenix nodded, satisfied. "Two weeks, then." He parted from his kids, gave the rest of their group a wave, then patted Maya's shoulder and headed off towards security.

Maya moved to follow her fiancé, only to pause after a couple of steps and run back to give their three children another hug - "Love you, kids." - followed by her two cousins - "Take care of each other." - and finally Machi and Thalassa - "Be safe for me." She spared only a quick wave for Clay, but didn't dare to linger any longer, running to catch up to Phoenix. They'd wasted enough time that they would have to run to make sure they made their plane.

Waiting in line at security, Maya stood close to Phoenix. At some point, she'd grabbed hold of his arm, fiddling with her ring. Although she longed to turn around and check on her family, she was terrified of bursting into tears and not being able to muster the strength to keep walking forward. She was already worried she would do so even without the prompt of seeing them in person for what could easily be the last time. The next two years stretched out in front of her, feeling like an eternity. She longed for the freedom to cancel her training outright so she wouldn't have to leave them behind.

Phoenix pulled his arm from Maya's grip, wrapping it around her shoulders to push her against his side. She looked up just in time to catch his smile before he snuck a quick kiss on her lips.

Instantly, Maya felt a lot calmer. Though she could feel tears silently sliding down her cheeks, she managed a small smile and cuddled up tight to her fiancé. Two years was going to be a long time... but her family was strong enough to stay together even when they were physically apart. She just had to remember that it was more than her own strength that would be getting them through these two years of heartache.

Chapter End Notes

Thank you all from the bottom of my heart for reading Luke and Apollo Wright v1.0, whether you have been following along since the first chapter or read the whole thing at once now that it's 'complete'. Although this fic may be over, the story continues, and I hope you guys enjoy v2.0 at least as much as 1.0, if you choose to read both. Seriously, it still blows my mind whenever someone comments saying they enjoyed this fic. Whether or not you ever commented yourself, dear reader, I still appreciate that you spent time reading this; I know it's a bit of a monster. :) Thank you all so so much. <3 - Unicornfoal/WrightFamilyAgency

Works inspired by this one: Turnabout Adoption by WrightFamilyAgency (Unicornfoal)

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!